The U.S. Losing a Strategic, Nuclear-Armed Ally to China

By Simon Shuster / Washington @simonshuster Nov. 2019

Supporters of ruling Pakistani Tehreek-e-Insaf (PTI) party attend a rally in Karachi on Nov. 3, 2019, to protest the arrest of party leader Imran Khan. Rizwan Tabassum—AFP/Getty Images

Imran Ali ✓ Follow

Ambassador of China! Chachi, Dyllish, Dilawri Sahib, Ambassador of Pakistan! Let's all be friends! Love from Canada! London and Islamabad

It's a rousing speech delivered on May 26, Pakistan's recently ousted Prime Minister, Imran Khan, gave the reality-TV audience. He was addressing a crowd of his supporters who had gathered to protest the unfairly detained Pakistani ambassador to China, Moazzam Ali Khan, and his family, who had been stopped at the airport in Islamabad by officials who seized their passports and refused to let them leave the country. Khan's anti-American pitch made the lowest-tech sort of accusation against the U.S., which has long been a target of conspiracy theories in Pakistan. But it also reflected a profound shift in the relationship between the two countries, which for decades has been one of the most important alliances in the world.

As a result of its involvement, Pakistan owes it has lost 70,000 lives, more than economic loss in excess of $150 billion to the country's economy. The U.S., meanwhile, blames the Pakistan Army and the country's powerful spy agency, the Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) for harboring Osama bin Laden in a safehouse in Abbottabad and for secretly helping the Taliban take back control of Afghanistan.

Relations between the U.S. and Pakistan have ebbed and flowed since the 9/11 early 80s, when Washington lavished Islamabad with millions of dollars in foreign aid as a reward for joining the anti-Soviet campaign against communism, only to be subjected to sanctions and punishment for Islamabad's bankrolling with Egypt and Saudi Arabia of Islamist militants in the 1990s, when the Nixon and Ford administrations looked the other way as Pakistan developed its nuclear weapons program under President Carter's administration, which cut off military aid to punish Pakistan for building a nuclear bomb in secret.

With Pakistan becoming a front line state in Washington's campaign against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, U.S. Pakistan cooperation steadied again. But when that war ended in 1989, the U.S. sanctioned Pakistan under the Pressler Amendment, which suspended aid and banned military sales to any country that developed a nuclear weapon. The Bush administration, which was determined to punish Pakistan for building a nuclear bomb in secret.

With Pakistan becoming a front line state in Washington's campaign against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, U.S.-Pakistan cooperation steadied again. But when that war ended in 1989, the U.S. sanctioned Pakistan under the Pressler Amendment, which suspended aid and banned military sales to any country that developed a nuclear weapon. The Bush administration, which was determined to punish Pakistan for building a nuclear bomb in secret.

VIDEO

Leaders Are Wasting In Person Again in Davos—but at the World Forum's Own Risk

Read more: Pakistan's Leader Imran Khan Faces a No-Confidence Vote. The Result Might Be Out Before Christmas Ideal

Read more: Popular Optimism May Prevent Pakistan's New Government From Mending Ties With the U.S.

A supporter of Pakistan's former prime minister Imran Khan holds a poster of Khan during a protest against his arrest in Karachi on May 26. Rizwan Tabassum—AFP/Getty Images

China's unstoppable rise in Pakistan

On the other hand, the China Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) is the latest program of infrastructure that creates a direct trade connection between the Arabian Sea and China through Pakistan's territory. It has also increased the economic development. Pakistan's government has also increased the amount of money it has been allowed to prioritize Pakistan's relationship with China and to the U.S. and its allies.

The Pakistan Army, which was instrumental in bringing Khan to power and is still very much in the power behind the throne, would like the civilian government to have more coordination with the United States, if for no other reason than to avoid more sanctions and aid cuts. Even as Khan leads the charge against the government, the head of Pakistan is negotiating an emergency bailout package with the International Monetary Fund.

The present administration—a coalition led by Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif appears committed to a policy of rapprochement with the U.S. and China and has already begun making overtures toward Washington. Foreign Minister Bilawal Bhutto Zardari, the son of Pakistan's late prime minister Benazir Bhutto, has been touring China and calling on Washington to "de-hyphenate" its relationship with India and Pakistan.

The decline of American influence in this South Asian country has been precipitated by the failure of America's Afghanistan campaign, which has brought those two countries to the surface, with each side blaming the other for the war's failure. Pakistani contends that it was forced to support the U.S. war effort against its will and that it succeeded in the end, Richard Armitage, of threatening to bomb the country "back to the stone age" if it refused to cooperate. (Armitage refuted the allegation.)

VIDEO

Read more: Pakistan's Leader Imran Khan Faces a No-Confidence Vote. The Result Might Be Out Before Christmas Ideal

A supporter of Pakistan's former prime minister Imran Khan holds a poster of Khan during a protest against his arrest in Karachi on May 26. Rizwan Tabassum—AFP/Getty Images

China's unstoppable rise in Pakistan

On the other hand, the China Pakistan Economic Corridor (CPEC) is the latest program of infrastructure that creates a direct trade connection between the Arabian Sea and China through Pakistan's territory. It has also increased the economic development. Pakistan's government has also increased the amount of money it has been allowed to prioritize Pakistan's relationship with China and to the U.S. and its allies.

The Pakistan Army, which was instrumental in bringing Khan to power and is still very much in the power behind the throne, would like the civilian government to have more coordination with the United States, if for no other reason than to avoid more sanctions and aid cuts. Even as Khan leads the charge against the government, the head of Pakistan is negotiating an emergency bailout package with the International Monetary Fund.

NEXT

A SUMMARY IN 5

Chinese State Councilor and Foreign Minister Wang Yi speaks during a press conference at the Pakistan Foreign Affairs Center in Islamabad, China, May 22, 2022.

The present administration—a coalition led by Prime Minister Shehbaz Sharif—appears committed to a policy of rapprochement with the U.S. and China and has already begun making overtures toward Washington. Foreign Minister Bilawal Bhutto Zardari, the son of Pakistan's late prime minister Benazir Bhutto, has been touring China and calling on Washington to "de-hyphenate" its relationship with India and Pakistan.

As far as Pakistan is concerned, the consensus across the political spectrum is that the future belongs to China, and with it, Pakistan's new friends. It's unclear when the next election is held and who wins, America is clearly losing a friend.

MORE MUST-READ STORIES FROM TIME

- The Best Movies of 2022 So Far
- Loneliness Is a Public Health Crisis. Here's How to Help Older People, According to Experts
- Column: Sheryl Sandberg Made Facebook Into a Giant—But At a Cost to the World
- America's African Founders: The Black Thinkers Who Shaped the U.S.
- U.S. Landlords Are Getting a Second Life as Solar Farms
- The Tulsa Massacre Is a Reminder Health Care Workers Face Violence Every Day
- America Needs to End Its Love Affair With Single-Family Homes. Here's How to Discovering It's a Tough Sell
- The Supreme Court Perpetuates the Myth of the Perfect Victim

TIME

SUBSCRIBE

Get weekly coverage of the most important stories and commentary across politics, business, culture, technology, and more.

SHARE THIS STORY

READ MORE FROM TIME

NEXT UP: EDITOR'S PICK

How We Can Learn to Live with COVID-19 After Vaccinations

ENTERTAINMENT

Ben Jort Morrow Former Bassist Alec Such

WORLD

Gronda House WWII Veterans at Normandy D-Day Celebrations

SPORTS

Ukraine Misses Out on World Cup After Losing 1-0 to Wales

Home
U.S.
Politics
World
Health
Personal Finance Tu Rechtscraue
Future of Work by Charter
Business
Tech

TIME Ships
Video
Masthead
Newsletters
Subscribe
Subscribe Membership
Give a Gift
Shop the TIME Store
Careers

Entertainment
Ideas
Science
History
Newsfeed
Sports
Magazine
The TIME Vault
TIME For Kids

Press Room
TIME Studios
U.S. & Canada Customer Service
Global Help Center
Contact the Editors
Reprints and Permissions
Site Map

© 2022 TIME USA, LLC. All rights reserved. Use of this Site constitutes acceptance of our Terms of Service, Cookie Policy, Privacy Policy and Do Not Sell My Personal Information. TIME may earn commission on some of the products featured on this site. Affiliate partnerships do not influence our editorial content.