Making lists is relaxing. It makes you feel important - all those things to do. It dictates the shape of the immediate future; it calms you down and it makes you feel good when you cross something off. It might even help you to get things done too. The world divides in two when it comes to listing. Type A makes orderly lists, priorities and calmly sets to work on them. Type B waits until panic sets in, grabs the nearest envelope and scribbles all over it, sighs with relief and promptly loses it. The more you have to do, the more you need a list and few people with high-powered jobs get by without them.
James Oliver, psychologist, has created his own time managing matrix'. He writes a list of things to do and then organizes them into categories: things that have to be done straight away, other things that it would be good to do today, things that are important but haven't got to be done immediately and things that are less urgent but that he doesn't want to forget. Using categories to order the world is the way the human mind works,' he says. After that, you should put things into hierarchies of importance.' But he also warns against the danger of Excessive List Syndrome.
If people get obsessed with making lists, it doesn't work, they have too many categories and lose their capacity to prioritize.

27. Which of the following ideas about making lists is not mentioned in the text?
A) List-making is standard practice in therapy for depression.
B) If you make a list, you feel obliged to do each thing in it.
C) There is more possibility of fulfillment of your duties.
D) It gives you satisfaction when you get something done in the list.

28. The latter list-makers of the two types mentioned in the passage ...
A) make a proper list and work accordingly in a relaxed way.
B) feel a real necessity for list-making because of their jobs.
C) overcome their fear by making lists though they don't follow them.
D) write down everything in time as it gives them a great comfort.

29. According to the text, Excessive List Syndrome is ...
A) to work without priorities.
B) to give up categorizing.
C) to lose ability to list-making.
D) to get addicted to list-making.

30. The word "urgent" in the passage is closest in meaning to ... .
A) pressing B) sensible C) real D) odd
