Polo is an unusual sport. It uses a ball and a mallet, the stick which is used to hit the ball. It also requires caps to protect the player's heads, gloves for their hands and boots to protect their legs. The players hit the ball into a goal to score. The game of polo suddenly becomes very exciting when you discover the final piece of "equipment" the players need: horse. It is played entirely on horseback. The game of polo was developed in Persia around 2000 years ago, but the British made modern polo world-famous. The British came contact with the sport in the Indian city of Silchar 150 years ago. There, the oldest existing polo club, the Calcutta Club, was founded by the British in 1862. A polo club opened in England just ten years later, and British soon began to travel and show others this great "new" sport. Only after then polo quickly spread around the world. Twenty years later, clubs as far away as in Argentina and Australia were founded.

It almost seems too hard to believe, but there is a banana that can be eaten with peel. Peel is a cover on a banana. Most people would never think of eating the peel of a banana. However, banana farmers in Japan have created a special technique for growing bananas with a peel we can eat. Farmers in Okayama, in the west of Japan, keep their banana trees at a freezing cold temperature of -60° Celsius. The farmers then replant the trees in 27° Celsius. The huge change in temperature makes the tree suddenly grow too quickly for the peel to become hard. This makes the skin thin, soft and sweet enough to eat. The new variety of banana is called the "Mongee". Farmers are now selling it in small bunches of 10 bananas. They are not cheap. The farmers have not grown a lot of Mongee bananas, so the price is high. They want to grow more so they can sell them all over the world. This means the price will come down.
