What is 'land'?

What people are not aware of is the existence of multiple jurisdictions of law, with multiple meanings of the word 'land'.

In the jurisdiction of the soil, there is no way of owning land, it doesn't exist except to support the constantly changing soil. This is the jurisdiction where animals and migratory tribes live. They may defend their immediate territory, but once they move on they have no more right to it. Think of a bear, it only ever lives in one cave at a time and once it leaves it would need to fight to get it back.

Think of the soil as four dimensional. As well as the 3 dimensions of space, there is also time, which constantly marches on, meaning no point is consistent.

In the jurisdiction of the land, non migratory people come to an agreement about how land should be owned or used. This enables people to leave for an agreed while, certain that they can return to their home. However, leaving for too long may lead to their land being regarded as abandoned, so that others can move in.

3D land has relative consistency, at least within the normal timeframes of people's existence. This consistency therefore allows agreements to be made.

In the 2D, effectively featureless, jurisdiction of the sea there are no living people. So, given the constantly changing, fluid nature of the oceans, maritime charts can only be made in relation to the fixed land. This land can either be at the shoreline, where it shows above the water, or in contour maps of the seafloor.

There can still be criminals on the high seas though, even though no-one can live there for any amount of time, except if in a vessel of some sort. These criminals may have committed crimes in a land jurisdiction country, or on the high seas, in the form of piracy for example, or they may have even committed a crime in the jurisdiction of the air, by interfering with the Post Office services, which are an offshoot of the global Catholic church.

Going back to Roman times, the great seafaring folk, the Phoenecians, were tasked with policing the Mediterranean, which was surrounded almost entirely by Roman controlled lands. There was therefore no problem with this force pursuing pirates and smugglers onto the land.

As time progressed, the Roman empire changed in outward appearance and the Phoenecians became the Venetians, but once the trade of western civilisation moved beyond the Mediterranean another seafaring folk, who had more experience of the Atlantic became the policemen of the high seas. They were of course the British.

The problem was that initially the British Admiralty had no authority on the land of Britain, or any other country, if chasing pirates or smugglers, but this was soon changed by passing a variety of Acts of Parliament, that allowed pursuit and apprehension, on the land of Britain, of those who broke maritime laws, or those who committed crimes against the Post Office services.

At first such pursuit was allowed just into port, or a mile or so inland. As time went on, however, the distance was increased to cover all the public land.

To facilitate pursuit, maps were made that continued the maritime charts, but now over the land showing the contours in the same way as maritime soundings showed depth.

Here my knowledge is hazy, perhaps these are Ordnance Survey maps, or maybe those are maps made from the point of view of the Jurisdiction of the Air.

Dr Johnson's 1773 dictionary explains the confusion between the words ordnance, ordinance, cannon and canon, leading to the likely conclusion that they are Canon Law maps and nothing to do with any land jurisdiction maps, but mere overlays that reference topological features.

Remember that those who used these maps could only pursue those who had committed international or maritime crimes or those against the Post Office services. The forces had no authority to deal with any crime by anyone on the land.

Not being ones to miss a trick, the Admiralty used its influence in Parliament to mix maritime Admiralty law with the Common Law in the 1750's under the influence of Lord Mansfield. [This was one of the factors in the American War of Independence, as the Americans could see where it was leading.]

Using a variety of deceits and weasel words, the people living on the lands of the British Isles, unbeknownst to them, came to be regarded as 'inhabitants' of the maritime Territorial waters of Great Britain and Ireland, by the law enforcers. This creation of identities, based on something in a different jurisdiction of law, is, of course, nothing more than a fiction.

Naturally the fiction has to have some sort of physical basis that it can be confused with.

4. To inhere; to have existence by means of something else.

> Though the general natures of these qualities are sufficiently distant from one another, yet when they come to subsist in particulars, and to be clothed with several accidents, then the discernment is not so easy.

The 'land' and 'soil' of their jurisdiction isn't 3D land, but rather the 2D map. The 'land' being the ground, or surface of the paper, a term well known to artists, on which the map was drawn and the 'soil' was the mark on the paper.

Similarly, the 'inhabitants' and 'residents' of these jurisdictions were fictions created from the 'accidental' naming and defining of a postnatal, abandoned afterbith as a person, (see Birth Certificate Revisited https://docs.google.com/document/d/1IyY6MLJI-T-w3zrzwEldKMgdhEc8GWAQrDvbxG2hRPw/edit?usp=sharing ) following the legal maxim Ex nihilo nihil fit, which means "nothing comes from nothing."

To make matters more complete, town councils were incorporated, to come under Admiralty control and many roads were renamed, or numbers assigned to the 'residences' that then replaced the property names on maps. These novel road names were then put up as street names, but always in UPPER CASE, once again making them another level of deceit, as ALL CAPS is not technically English.

Once the maps were made, the streets named and the houses numbered it became much easier to ascertain where someone lived and to foist an identity on them. Add in a postal service and it becomes much easier to convince the unwitting populace that this is for their benefit.

From there it's just a step or two to send census or voter registration letters to the address, so that very soon almost everyone has accepted the status of their location and name. Add a postcode and all you need is that and a house number.

With everything being so smoothly greased, it’s no issue to enable even more money to flow upwards.

Simply send out demands for payment in multiple different variations of the name or address for a variety of services such as council, police, fire, gas, electricity, water in and, separately, water out and more, or licences such as for a dog, radio, television, car  etc. etc.

These latter corporate deceits won’t even need their own maps. They can effectively create their own addresses, either by linking the commonly known address to a meter or to a licence of some kind, or simply just by assigning a reference, as is done by land registry.

Legally, none of the following are the same person:

Mr Jonathan Smith
Jonathan Smith
Mr Jon Smith
Jon Smith
Mr J Smith
J Smith
Mr J. Smith
J. Smith
J. SMITH

Any variation will be registered as a different person, even capitalising part of the name, or adding a full stop, creates a different entity, leading to an almost infinite variety once that person's address has also undergone the same treatment.

It’s even possible to add new regions with no-one batting an eyelid, a good example being Mid Sussex Council. Has anyone ever seen Mid Sussex on a map of the counties? Are there even any county boundaries marked in the 3D environment.

Naturally any postman is going to deliver all mail with an address that seems to fit without a second thought and they certainly don’t worry if the address is on the envelope, or visible through a window of the envelope. If the person doesn’t pay up, the corporations issue demands and threats via the same route and offer persons ‘payment’, with money that their system prints essentially for free and recycles thousands of times, to collect these deceitful demands.

To reinforce the people’s belief in the ‘personal’ identities that have been foisted upon them, ‘courts’ are set up that will punish misdemeanors. Crown courts deal with the Territorial, Admiralty (sea) jurisdiction, court martialling their persons for failing to obey orders. Magistrates courts deal with Municipal, Eccelsiastical (air) jurisdiction misdemeanours demanding a penance be paid for sins that are confessed by those who answer to a summons.

The same corporations that send the demands set up schools that will educate their persons to be good servants to the system. (Educare is Latin - to draw out - not to draw out knowledge, but rather to draw people out of the land jurisdiction)

All the 3D land that is not claimed by living people, all the way to the low tide mark, and likely all the way to the limit of territorial waters is seen by air jurisdiction, municipal and sea jurisdiction, teritorial corporations as a way of making even more money.

It is claimed as public land and the government and councils make hay while developing for their own benefit, once again using the manpower of those that they have bamboozled, i.e. pretty well all of us

The corporations arrange for road signage and markings to trick people (persons) into thinking that there are things that they can only do if they pay a fee. Contrariwise they also demand payments if they catch people doing something that their rules don't allow. They produce 2D 'evidence' in the form of photographic images, which they follow up with court demands.

They even convince people that they need permission and to pay a fee to alter their own property in the form of planning permission and building regulations approval. What people are actually paying for is permission to alter the 2D map of the environment, not the environment itself.

People are bamboozled into forming 2D corporations for tax advantages. This only serves to snaffle the unwary who wouldn't have to pay any income tax anyway, if they simply didn't enter the arena.

So, what is land to living people? It is something that none of these systems can touch you on, while you identify as a living man or woman.

The problem is that these systems not only don't, but can't recognise you as living, meaning that if you agree to be identified as a felon in the jurisdiction of the sea or air, they take your word for it.

There are a variety of people offering a variety of ways to correct things, some seem to work some don't, but that's really a subject for another article. Personally I [called Martin Ansell (among other things ;) ) on the land] simply ignore any and all fictional correspondence and never answer to their assumed name. Don't take this as legal advice though, as I'm not part of that system.
