This qualification renders it necessary to prove the purpose for which the water is ordinarily used, and then it has to be proved that the fouling has rendered the water less fit for that purpose.

It is not necessary that the spring or reservoir should be reserved for the purpose. It is enough if its water is ordinarily used for that purpose.[95] It is not even necessary to prove the degree of fouling. All that is necessary is that the fouling rendered the water less fit for the purpose for which it is ordinarily used. Thus, spitting into a public well fouls its water so as to render it less fit for drinking, though the degree to which it has rendered the water less fit may be very small.[96]

9. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable. A summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. The offence is triable by any magistrate.

The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within one year.

10. Sanction Required under Local Acts, Whether Necessary for Offences under this Section

Where, a private complaint was filed alleging offences under ss 277, 278 and 290, IPC against the accused, the accused raised the question of want of jurisdiction even before issue of the process, after interpreting ss 49, 60, 47, 24 and 43 of the Water (Prevention and Control of Pollution) Act 1974 and ss 43, 52, 40, 22 and 37 of the Air (Prevention and Control of Pollution) Act 1981 and ss 190, 197 of the CrPC 1973 and s 26 of the General Clauses Act 1897. The Madhya Pradesh High Court, held that:1892

> The resultant effect of the provision in the Water Act, and Air Act is that irrespective of the question whether or not an Act, complained of also constitutes an offence under the Indian Penal Code, the prosecution has to be in compliance with the provision of these special Acts and it is not open to a magistrate to take cognizance under section 190 of the Code without the written sanction of the State Boards the express legislative mandate cannot be permitted to be whittled down by labelling the Act complained of as an offence not under the special Acts but under the Indian Penal Code .

Then any prosecution for an act which is an offence under the special Act, by any agency other that the competent Board on the ground that it is also an offence under the Indian Penal Code can also be characterised as colourable because the offences under the special Acts are graver ones and labelling the Acts as an IPC offence will be just to evade the requirement of previous sanction under the special Acts.[1]

11. Charge

In case the framing of a charge is deemed expedient or necessary. The following form may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at....., voluntarily corrupted, (or fouled), the water of the public spring (or reservoir), to wit..... so as to render it less fit for the purpose for which it is ordinarily used, and thereby committed the offence punishable under s 277 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

12. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused corrupted or fouled the water;
(ii) the water was of any public spring or reservoir;
(iii) he did so voluntarily;
(iv) the act of corrupting or fouling rendered the water less fit for the purpose for which it was ordinarily used.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

S. 278.

Making atmosphere noxious to health.--

Whoever voluntarily vitiates the atmosphere in any place so as to make it noxious to the health of persons in general dwelling or carrying on business in the neighbourhood or passing along a public way, shall be punished with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees.1893

Comments

1. Scope

This section is directed against public, and not a private nuisance. It is clearly provided in it that the atmosphere must be so vitiated as to make it noxious to the health of the persons in general dwelling or carrying on business in the neighbourhood, or passing along a public way.[2]

Where the accused threw a human skull into the house of the complainant and the skull was in a highly offensive condition, but there was no finding to show that the effect of it was to make the atmosphere noxious to the other persons dwelling in the locality, it was held that, although the conduct of the accused was most reprehensible and offensive, he was not guilty under this section.[3]

The act of performing the offences of nature in a public street is not an offence under this section.[4]

2. 'Voluntarily Vitiates the Atmosphere'

A public nuisance may be caused by smoke, stench, or effluvia, if, either singly or in combination, the accused creates serious public injury to health. An indictment for a nuisance, by steeping stinking skins in water, laying it to be committed near the highway, and also near several dwelling houses, has been held sufficient; for if a man causes a nuisance near the highway by which the air thereabout is corrupted, it must, in its nature, be a nuisance to those who are in the highway.[5]

3. 'Noxious to the Health'

The word 'noxious' does not merely mean hurtful and offensive to the smell, but includes also the complex idea of insalubrity and offensiveness.[6] If a trade is alleged to be noxious by producing unwholesome smells, it may be proved that the smells are frequently perceived, and are not only offensive to the senses but have an injurious effect on those who smell them.[7] It has been held that if an open compound is used as an open latrine without any shed, obnoxious smell is bound to emanate from it and it would amount to an offence under this section. It has also been held that the fact that the neighbouring houses were constructed after the nuisance had been commenced in immaterial.[8] Synopsis in s 272, IPC may be referred to.

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognisable. Summons may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It can be tried by any magistrate.

The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within six months.1894

5. Sanction Required under Local Acts, Whether Necessary for Offences under this Section

Synopsis note 10 of s 277 may be referred to.

6. Charge

For a charge under this section, if deemed necessary, the following form may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate etc), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of....., at.....by.....(state the act) voluntarily vitiated the atmosphere of..... (name the place) so as to make it noxious to the health of persons in general, dwelling or carrying on business in the neighbourhood or passing along a public way, and thereby committed the offence punishable under section 278 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

7. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it must be proved that:

(i) the accused voluntarily vitiated the atmosphere in a particular place; and
(ii) such vitiation made it noxious to the health of persons in general dwelling, or carrying on business, in the neighbourhood, or passing along a public way.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 279.

Rash driving or riding on a public way.--

Whoever drives any vehicle, or rides, on any public way in a manner so rash or negligent as to endanger human life, or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.18951896

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

Sections 279, 280 and 284 - 289, IPC all deal with public nuisances affecting public safety.[9] In all of these sections the offences are due to criminal rashness or negligence. In all of them mere negligence or rashness is made punishable, apart from any injury actually done.[10] It is plain that the essence of the offence consists in the possibility of injury, and not in its actual occurrence, as all the clauses contain the words 'likely to cause hurt or injury', or words of a similar nature. The occurrence of actual injury meets with punishment under ss 337 and 338, IPC, though, strangely enough, the actual inflicting of hurt is liable to less punishment under s 337, IPC than the commission of the same act would be, if no hurt has resulted. Nor is it necessary that there should be any intention to injure, or reason to anticipate the particular injury that ensued, if it was in fact caused by the accused's negligence.[11] It is sufficient if the carelessness is such as does cause, or is likely to cause, injury. Mere rashness or negligence (except in the case of negligence under s 281, IPC and of rashness and negligence under s 283, IPC) under the various circumstances given is rendered punishable by ss 279 - 289, IPC, quite irrespective of any injurious consequences, the essence of the offence being the possibility or likelihood of injury. If hurt is caused by reason of one of these offences, the offence falls under s 337, IPC . If grievous hurt is the result of one of these offences, the offence falls under s 338, IPC . If death is the result, the offence is punishable under s 304A, IPC .[12]

The section takes into account, the potential danger or possibility of danger to life or injury to persons on account of the rash or negligent driving or riding by an accused.[13]

2. Analogous Law

In England, by s 35 of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861:[14]

> Whosoever, having the charge of any carriage or vehicle, shall, by wanton or furious driving or racing, or other wilful misconduct, or by wilful neglect, do or cause to be done any bodily harm to any person whatsoever, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years.

The section extends to bicycles and to all carriages whether drawn by animals or propelled by steam, petrol, electricity or other mechanical means.

The Road Traffic Act 1930,[15] s 11,[16] states:

(1) If any person drives a motor vehicle on a road recklessly, or at a speed or in a manner which is dangerous to the public, having regard to all the circumstances1897 of the case, including the nature, condition, and use of the road, and the amount of traffic which is actually at the time, or which might reasonably be expected to be, on the road, he shall be liable:
(a) on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding in the case of a second or subsequent conviction six months, or to both, such fine and imprisonment;
(b) on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or to a fine, or to both such imprisonment and fine.[17]

Section 222(a) of the Tanganyika Penal Code also is similar to this section.

In India, a similar provision with respect to rash or negligent driving of a motor vehicle is contained in s 184 of the Motor Vehicles Act, 59 of 1988. Sections 304A, 336, 337 and 338 of this Code are also analogous to this section, but they are not confined to rash or negligent driving or riding, but extend to all rash or negligent acts.

3. Ingredients of the Offence

This section deals with rash or negligent driving or riding on a public way. To constitute an offence under this section:

(i) there must be rash or negligent driving or riding;
(ii) it must be on a public way; and
(iii) the driving or riding must be in a manner so rash or negligent as to endanger human life or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any person other than the driver.[18]

In order to constitute an offence punishable under s 279, IPC it must be established that:

(a) the accused was driving the vehicle on public way,
(b) such driving was done in a rash and negligent manner to endanger human life or likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person.

For the purpose of s 279, rashness and negligence must be described as criminal rashness or criminal negligence. It must be more than mere carelessness or error of judgment.[19]

Section 279, IPC requires two essentials: viz, (a) driving or riding of a vehicle on any public way; and (b) such driving must be so rash or negligent as to endanger human life or is likely to cause hurt or injury to any person. Both the said ingredients must exist to attract the offence. To invite the wrath of law under s 279, IPC, the act complained of need not be a rash and negligent one. For attracting the offence under s 279, IPC, the rashness or negligence attributable to the accused must be criminal rashness or negligence. It is true that the section does not require an element of mens rea for getting involved therein. What is essentially required is1898 the utter callousness or recklessness or an indifferent/unmindful attitude towards the consequences.[20]

Probability, Possibility and Likelihood

For an offence under this section, the effect of the manner, in which the act is performed, must be either: (a) that human life was, as a fact, endangered thereby; or (b) that hurt or injury was likely to be caused thereby. Therefore, it must be shown that some person was either in a position of danger to his life or there was a likelihood of persons being hurt or injured. Likelihood is something stronger than a possibility, and may or may not amount to a probability, which is merely a strong degree of likelihood.[21]

4. Essence of the Offences

Mere rashness or negligence (except in the case of negligence under s 281, and of rashness and negligence under s 283) under the various circumstances given is rendered punishable by ss 279 to 289, quite irrespective of any injurious consequences, the essence of the offence being the possibility or likelihood of injury.

Actual Accident or an Injury not Necessary

In order to constitute an offence under this section there need not be any accident or injury or death to individuals. Driving a vehicle on any public way in the manner specified in the section alone is sufficient. The provision is intended to protect the interest of society by avoiding danger to pedestrians and vehicular traffic mainly. Even without waiting for such danger happening, the offender could be brought to justice.[22]

An Aggravated Degree of Rash and Negligent Driving is Contemplated

To be guilty of an offence under s 279 the accused must drive a vehicle in such a rash or negligent manner as to endanger human life or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person. Both ingredients must be satisfied. The accused must drive the vehicle in a rash or negligent manner, and the driving in a rash or negligent manner must be such as to endanger human life or be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person. A certain aggravated degree of rash or negligent driving is contemplated here.[23]

5. Difference between Section 279 and Section 184 of the Motor Vehicles Act 1988

Culpable driving of a motor vehicle giving rise to penalties on the criminal side and damages on the civil side may be classified as negligent driving, rash driving and guilty errors of judgment. Of these three classes, the first two constitute the component elements of reckless or dangerous driving punishable under s 184 of the Motor Vehicles Act.1899

Section 184 of the Motor Vehicles Act (59 of 1988) runs as follows:

> 184. Driving dangerously.--Whoever drives a motor vehicle at a speed or in a manner which is dangerous to the public, having regard to all the circumstances of the case including the nature, condition and use of the place where the vehicle is driven and the amount of traffic which actually is at the time or which might reasonably be expected to be in the place, shall be punishable for the first offence with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, and for any second or subsequent offence if committed within three years of the commission of a previous similar offence, with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine which may extend to two thousand rupees, or with both.

Comparing the above with this section, the two sections might appear to cover the same offence. But there are differences between the two. Thus:

(i) Section 184 of the Motor Vehicles Act refers only to driving, while this section refers to not only driving, but also riding;
(ii) Section 184 of the Motor Vehicles Act refers to the driving only of a motor vehicle, while this section refers to the driving of any vehicle and is not confined to a motor vehicle.
(iii) Section 184, Motor Vehicles Act, refers to dangerous driving in any place, while this section refers to driving on any public way.
(iv) Section 184, Motor Vehicles Act, refers to driving 'at a speed or in a manner which is dangerous to the public, having regard to all the circumstances of the case'. But this section refers to driving 'in a manner so rash or negligent as to endanger human life, or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person.

The offence under the two sections may, however, overlap each other.[24] An accused, tried and acquitted for an offence under s 116 of the Motor Vehicles Act 1939, (since repealed and replaced by s 184 of the Motor Vehicles Act 1988) cannot be tried for an offence under this section.[25]

6. Section 279 and Section 177 of Motor Vehicles Act 1988

Section 177 of the Motor Vehicles Act 1988 would apply not only to offenders under the Motor Vehicles Act, but also for breach of any rule, regulation or notification made thereunder the punishment for which is not provided for, under those provisions. On the other hand, this section is a self-contained section like any other section of the Code, prescribing the extent of punishment. This being independent by itself, there is no meaning in connecting it or reading it with s 177 of the Motor Vehicles Act. It would be wrong to charge a person under both the sections for the same act.[26]1900

7. Sections 279, 337 and 336 --Distinction

The offences under ss 279 and 337 are offences of a different nature and the conduct referred to therein is penalised with different objects.[27]

This section penalises rash driving or riding on a public way. A person who drives any vehicle or rides on any public way in a manner so rash or negligent as to endanger human life, or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person, is liable to be punished under this section. This offence falls within ch XIV of the Code which is a chapter dealing with offences affecting public health, safety, convenience, decency and morals. An offence under s 279 is essentially an offence against public safety. By s 337, causing hurt by an act endangering life or personal safety of others is penalised. By that section, whoever causes hurt to any person by doing an act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others is liable to be punished in the manner provided thereby. This section occurs in ch XVI, which deals with offences affecting the human body. Under this section the maximum sentence which may be imposed is rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both. Under s 337, the maximum sentence is rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both. The offence punishable under s 337 is the offence of hurt committed in certain defined circumstances. By s 336, an act endangering life or personal safety of others which is done rashly or negligently is an aggravated form of the offence defined by s 336 .[28]

8. Sections 279 and 338 --Distinction

Under s 338, IPC, whoever causes grievous hurt to any person by doing an act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others, is liable to be punished in the manner provided thereby. This section is covered by ch XVI, which deals with offences affecting the human body.

None of the parts of the offence defined in s 338, IPC, is sufficient to constitute an offence under s 279 of the said Code because under s 279, the ingredient of driving any vehicle or riding in a public way is essential, which is not necessary under s 338 . The offence under s 338 of the IPC need not be committed by driving a vehicle or riding on a public way.[29]

Sections 279 and 338 are co-related with s 304A, IPC ; and s 279, IPC applies to the driving of any vehicle or riding on any public way in a manner so rash or negligent as to endanger human life or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any person where no hurt has actually been caused. Section 338 , IPC applies to a case where grievous hurt has been caused to any person by an act being done so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others. It is more general than this section and embraces not only the act of driving or riding but all acts which endanger human life or personal safety.1901

9. Sections 279 and 304A --Distinction

Commentary under the same heading in s 304A, vol III may be referred to.

To establish an offence under either s 279 or s 304A, rashness and negligence has to be established, but the only distinction is that in s 279 the rash and negligent act relates to the manner of driving or riding on a public way, while an offence under s 304A extends to any rash and negligent act falling short of culpable homicide.[30] A rash and negligent act is the gist of both the offences. However, offences punishable under ss 279 and 304A, IPC, being distinct, the accused can be convicted for both the offences.[31]

10. Overlapping of Offences under Sections 279, 337 and 338 does not make these Offences of Same Character

Undoubtedly s 279, IPC penalises rash or negligent driving but on that account an offence under either s 337 or s 338, IPC, cannot be said to be of the same nature or character. Offences under s 279, and s 337 or s 338, IPC are offences of different nature and the conduct referred to therein is penalised with different objects. There is no doubt that the above three sections overlap, but that does not make those offences of the same character. Offence under s 279, IPC is not compoundable, while ss 337 and 338 are compoundable with the permission of the court. Thus, the offence under ss 279 and 337 or s 338 of the Indian Penal Code, being distinct, an accused can be convicted both under ss 279 and 337 or s 338, IPC .

A person can be convicted of an offence under s 279 as well of an offence under s 337, IPC at the same time.[32]

11. 'Drives any Vehicle or Rides'

This section covers not only rash or negligent driving, but also such riding. If a man rides so fast that he would be unable to stop the horse if a foot-passenger got in the way, he would be liable, provided that the foot-passenger acts in a reasonable manner.[33]

So far as driving is concerned, it may be of any vehicle, including a tram-car,[34] or a bullock-cart,[35]or even a bicycle, for a man to ride pillion on an ordinary bicycle in a crowded street is a negligent act which is likely to cause injury to the other persons and vehicles there.[36]

12. 'On any Public Way'

What the section penalises is not rash driving anywhere, but only rash driving on any public way.[37] The expression 'public way' is not defined in the IPC . Sub-s (34) of s 2 of the Motor Vehicles Act 1988, defines a public place thus:1902

> (34) "Public place" means a road, street, way or other place, whether a thoroughfare or not, to which the public have a right of access, and includes any place or stand at which passengers are picked up or set down by a stage carriage.

The words 'are granted access or over which they have a right to pass' which occurred in the definition in the Motor Vehicles Act of 1914 have been substituted by the words 'have a right of access' and so no question of grant arises now. The way may be a road or street, and all that is necessary to make it 'public' is that the public should have a right of access to it.

Under s 121(1) of the English Road Traffic Act 1930:[38]

> (1) Road' means any highway and any other road to which the public have access, and includes bridges over which a road passes.

The 'public way' in this and some of the following sections may be a 'highway', which is defined as 'a way leading from the marked town, or inhabited place to another inhabited place, and which is common to all'.[39] In Pran Nath Kundu v Emperor ,[40] which was a case under s 283, it was observed:

> Where the privilege to use a road is enjoyed only by one particular section of the community or by inhabitants of two or three villages and not by others, the road is not a public road.[41] Where there is the intention to allow not the public generally but merely visitors to or traders with the people of the village, or way allowed to be used by villagers to go to a church or a market or the common fields of a village, such ways are not regarded as public ways but private ways, and they generally have their origin in custom.[42] Such a customary way can be converted into an ordinary highway after use by the general public sufficient to raise the presumption of dedication.[43] But the evidence in support of the public claim must be cogent.[44]

13. 'Rash or Negligent'

For the purposes of this section the manner in which the driving, riding or navigation is performed must be rash or negligent.[45] A certain aggravated degree of rash or negligent driving is contemplated here.[46]

In the case of negligence, 'the party does not do an act which he was bound to do, because he adverts not to do it'. In the case of rashness 'the party does an act and breaks a positive duty. He thinks of the probable mischief, but, in consequence of a mis-supposition begotten by insufficient advertence, he assumes that the mischief will not ensure in the given instance or case. The radical idea denoted is always this. The party runs a risk of which he is conscious'.[47] Even in ordinary parlance1903 negligence connotes want of proper care and rashness conveys the idea of recklessness or the doing of an act without due consideration.[48]

Negligence' was defined in the well-known case of Blyth v Birmingham Waterworks Co ,[49] thus:

> Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulated the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do.

The Law Revision Committee in 1939, adopted the definition, 'Negligence may be said to consist in a failure to exercise due care in a case in which a duty to take care exists'. The general concept of reasonable foresight is the criterion of negligence and is fluid in its application; it has to be fitted to the facts of the particular case.[50]

'Negligence is not established by proving that the loss might possibly and with extraordinary foresight and prudence have been avoided.'[51]

Negligence--Failure to take Precaution may Amount to Negligence

A rash act is primarily an over-hasty act and is thus opposed to a deliberate act. It may also include a deliberate act done without due deliberation and caution.[52] Negligence is a breach of duty caused by the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided by the consideration, which ordinarily regulates the conduct of human affairs, would do or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do.[53] The negligence connotes want of proper care.[54] If the possibility of danger emerging is reasonably apparent, then to take no precautions is negligence; but if the possibility of danger emerging is only a mere possibility which would never occur to the mind of a reasonable man, then there is no negligence in not having taken extraordinary precautions.[55] For the definition of 'negligence' in civil cases refer to Ramesh Kumar Nayak v Union of India. [56]

14. 'Culpable Rashness or Negligence'

Negligence is an omission to do something, which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations, which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do. Culpable negligence is acting without the consciousness that the dangerous consequences will follow but in the circumstances which show that the actor has not exercised the caution that was incumbent on him. Criminal negligence is the gross and culpable neglect or failure to exercise that reasonable and proper care and precaution to guard against injury either to the public generally or to an individual in particular, which,1904 having regard to all the circumstances out of which the charge has arisen, it was the imperative duty of the accused person to have adopted.[57]It is the duty of every motorist while driving on a public road to keep a lookout for other motorists coming from the front to avoid collision with the oncoming vehicle. Where a driver has not exercised this much care and caution incumbent upon him and if his conduct occasions an accident, he is guilty of culpable negligence as imputability of criminality arises from the neglect of civic duty of circumspection and running the risk or doing such an act with recklessness and indifference to the consequences. A person driving a motor vehicle is also under a duty to be in a position to control it on seeing the peril in front which could normally be expected on the road.[58] Rashness consists in hazarding a dangerous or wanton act with the knowledge that it is so, and that it may cause injury. The criminality lies in such a case in running the risk of doing such an act with recklessness or indifference as to the consequences.[59] Culpable rashness is acting with the consciousness that the dangerous consequences may follow, but with the hope that they will not follow, and often with the belief that the actor had taken sufficient precautions to prevent the happening of such consequences.[60] Driving at an excessive speed on a public road would be prima facie evidence of rash driving in determining whether the person is rash and negligent. The standard of reasonable care is that which is reasonable to be demanded in the circumstances, if still mishap occurs, the person cannot be held guilty of rashness.[61] But if a vehicle with defective brakes, is driven at a speed of 15 or 20 kms in a crowded bazaar, it is nothing but driving the vehicle rashly at high speed.[62]

Where the appellant driver of police jeep under the influence of alcohol was driving jeep at high speed, caused death of five persons, injured seven, and went 93 feet ahead of the incident, could only be stopped by the Police Officer who was travelling in vehicle. It was held a case of culpable negligence and the driver was convicted under ss 304A, 337, 338 and 279, IPC .[63]

Culpable rashness is acting with the consciousness that the mischievous and illegal consequences may follow, but with the hope that they will not, often with the belief that the actor has taken sufficient precaution to prevent their happening. Culpable negligence is acting without the consciousness that the illegal and mischievous effect will follow, in the circumstances which show that the accused has not exercised the caution incumbent upon him and if he had, he would have had the consciousness. The imputability arises from the neglect of the civic duty of circumspection.[64]1905

Where the accused appellant driver of a jeep was driving negligently and rashly, dashed against a girl going on the road, caused injuries to her, the accused was convicted under s 279 .[65]

Mere Error of Judgment or Carelessness not Sufficient

Under this section, the rashness or negligence shown must be what may fairly be described as criminal rashness or criminal negligence. Before an accused can be convicted of an offence under this section, there must be something more than a mere error of judgement or mere carelessness.[66] For the purpose of s 279 rashness and negligence may be described as criminal rashness or criminal negligence. It must be more than mere carelessness or error of judgment. Negligence connotes an idea of reckless doing of an act without consideration of any consequences.[67]

Reckless

In order to render a person liable for criminal negligence there must be something more than mere negligence; for law distinguishes between negligence which originates a civil liability and one the consequence of which is a criminal prosecution. But negligence does not mean, even for criminal negligence, absolute carelessness or indifference, but want of such a degree of care as is required in particular circumstances. Simple lack of care as will constitute civil liability is not enough. A very high degree of negligence is required to be proved before the felony is established and this may aptly be described by the epithet 'reckless'.[68]

Driver Running away from the Spot

Where the accused driver of a jeep was driving jeep rashly and negligently, after hitting the deceased boy standing on the side of the road, ran away, held it indicated that he was guilty otherwise, there was no necessity for him to run away from the place of occurrence. He took false defence in his statement under s 313, CrPC when it was pointed to him that he ran away from the place of accident. Accused was convicted under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[69]

No Universal Rule of Negligence

'Negligence' is the breach of a duty caused by omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided by these considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do.[70]

No universal rule as to what amount of carelessness is necessary in order to render negligence culpable can be laid down, and the question must be determined on the facts of the particular case.[71]1906

The culpability in culpable negligence arises from the neglect of the civic duty of circumspection;[72] such circumspection as a reasonable man guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs would use.[73] No universal rule as to what amount of carelessness is necessary in order to render negligence culpable can be laid down, and the question must be determined on the facts of the particular case.[74] Negligence cannot be inferred from the mere fact of a person having been run over.[75] Where the trial court and the appellate court convicted the driver of a bus with the finding that he was guilty of rashness and negligence both in driving the bus under ss 279 and 337, IPC, but in revision the Bombay High Court found that there was only negligence on his part and maintained the conviction.[76] Therefore, either of the two is sufficient to bring home the guilt to the accused.

15. Distinction between 'Negligence' and 'Rashness'

Rashness consists in hazarding a dangerous or wanton act with the knowledge that it is so, and that it may cause injury and running the risk of doing such an act with recklessness or indifference as to the consequences. And criminal negligence is the gross and culpable neglect or failure to exercise that reasonable and proper care and precaution to guard against injuring others which having regard to all the circumstances out of which the charge has arisen, it was the imperative duty of the accused person to have adopted.[77]

Distinction between rashness and negligence is that negligence connotes want of proper care, while rashness conveys of idea of reckless doing of an act without consideration of any consequences. A rash act is primarily an over hasty act and is thus opposed to a deliberate act, but it also includes an act which, though it may be said to be deliberate, is yet done without due deliberation and caution. Austin[78]has drawn distinction between negligence and rashness which, though closely allied 'are broadly distinguished by differences.' In cases of negligence, the party performs not an act to which he is obliged. He breaks a positive duty. Negligence is basically a breach of a duty because of omission to do something which a reasonable man guided by these considerations which ordinarily regulate conduct of human affairs to mould, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do. 'Negligence' is not an affirmative word. It is a negative word. It is absence of such care, skill and diligence as it was the duty of the person to bring to the performance of the work which he is said not to have performed. There is a distinction between a rash act and a negligent act. Criminal negligence is the great and culpable neglect or failure to exercise that reasonable or proper care and precaution to guard against injury either to the public generally or to an individual in particular, which having regard to all circumstances out of which charge has arisen was the imperative duty of the accused person to have adopted. Negligence is an omission to do something which a reasonable man guided upon these considerations which ordinarily1907 regulate conduct of human affairs would do or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do. A culpable rashness is acting with consciousness that mischievous effect will follow, but in circumstances which show that the actor has not exercised caution incumbent upon him and if he had he would have had consciousness. Imputability arises from the neglect of civic duty of circumstances. As between rashness and negligence, the former is a graver offence.[79]

There is a clear distinction between negligence and rashness and that distinction is contemplated even by this section. In the case of negligence, the party does not do an act which he was bound to do, because he adverts not to do it. In the case of rashness, the party does an act and breaks a positive duty. He thinks of the probable mischief. But in consequences of a mis-supposition begotten by insufficient advertence, he assumes that the mischief will not ensue in the given instance or case. The radical idea denoted is always this. The party runs a risk of which he is conscious. Even in ordinary parlance, negligence connotes want of proper care and rashness conveys the idea of recklessness or the doing of an act without due consideration.[80]

No Presumption of Negligence in Certain Cases

Negligence, however, cannot be inferred from the mere fact of a person having been run over,[81] or from the mere fact that the passengers were dragged into the bus in a hurry before the two buses collided,[82] or from a mere fact that an accident has taken place and some persons have been injured,[83] or from the mere fact that the vehicle was at a fast speed.[84] Failure of the driver to sound the horn has also been held to be negligent driving.[85]

16. Consciousness about Consequences in Rashness and Negligence in Practice

Culpable rashness is acting with the consciousness that mischievous and illegal consequences may follow, but with the hope that they will not, and often with the belief that the accused has taken sufficient precautions to prevent their happenings.[86] The imputability arises from acting despite the consciousness (luxuria). Culpable negligence is acting without the consciousness that the illegal and mischievous effect will follow, but in circumstances which show that the accused has not exercised the caution incumbent upon him, and that if he had, he would have had the consciousness. The imputability arises from the neglect of the civil duty of1908 circumspection. It is manifest that personal injury consciously and intentionally caused cannot fall within either of these categories which are wholly inapplicable to the case of an act or a series of acts, themselves intended, which are the direct producers of death.[87]

Rashness consists in doing something which ought not to have been done by a person who 'adverts to the consequences of his act, but by reason of some assumption which he examines insufficiently (he) concludes that those consequences will not follow the act in the instance before him'. 'The party runs a risk of which he is conscious; but he thinks that the mischief will probably be averted in the given instance'.[88] Negligence consists in not doing something which ought to have been done, by a person who does not think about that which he ought to have done.[89] A rash act is primarily an over-hasty act and is thus opposed to a deliberate act.[90]The rashness conveys an idea of recklessness in doing of an act without consideration of any consequences.[91] Rashness implies doing an act and thereby breaking a negative duty, and negligence implies not doing an act, and thereby breaking a positive duty. The one is doing something which ought not to have been done; the other is not doing something which ought to have been done. Such is the precise meaning of these terms in the language of jurisprudence, but, the word 'rashness' as used in the Code includes 'heedlessness' and thus signifies an insufficient advertence or complete inadvertence to the consequence of his conduct on the part of the agent. Thus, a man on horseback who furiously gallops down a crowded street commits a rash act, whether he thinks that people will get out of his way, or gives no thought at all to the probable consequences of what he is doing. So the driving of a vehicle at a high speed without caring for the persons going on the road, amounts to culpable rashness.[92] Absence of any person inside the vehicle is not, by itself, a circumstance to absolve the accused from liability.[93]

Again, 'negligence' in practice is more often combined with a positive act, i.e., it does not exist in reference to the very act, but with regard to the neglect of certain necessary precautions in doing the act. Thus, in the language of these sections, it is the 'manner' of doing the act which is rash or negligent. To take the above example, riding down the crowded street is the act in question. Galloping under these circumstances is a manner of riding which is rash, whilst omitting to give warning to the foot-passengers is a negligent manner of riding. The culpability (in culpable negligence) 'arises from the neglect of the civil duty of circumspection'.[94] Such circumspection as 'a reasonable man guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs' would use.[95]1909

17. Determination of Rashness and Negligence

In determining whether a person is negligent or rash, the standard of reasonable care is that which is reasonably to be demanded in the circumstances. The relevant circumstances to take into account may be the importance of the end to be served by acting in this way or the other. If all the vehicles running on the roads in this country were restricted to a speed of 5 or 10 miles per hour, there would be fewer accidents. But our national life would be intolerably slowed down. Therefore, the purpose to be served, if sufficiently important, justifies the assumption of abnormal risk. But that does not mean that the driver of a vehicle who uses the highway should take abnormal risk and drive in a manner so rash or negligent as to endanger human life or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other human life or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person. The driver must be able to pull up within limits of vision, but each case must depend upon its own circumstances.[1] The condition of the road and the nature of traffic are also circumstances to be considered in order to arrive at a conclusion as to whether the accident was the result of rash and negligent driving of the vehicle by the driver.[2] When the road is free and the road condition is perfect, the accused is justified in driving his vehicle (mini bus) at normal speed. But even when the road is blocked by the truck and the road condition is bad as fresh earth was spread on the roadside, if the accused-driver still drives his vehicle at normal speed without slowing it down, it is evident that such driving is a rash and negligent act on his part.[3]

Speed is not a criteria even to infer the rash or negligent act of driving, but it is corroborative factor.[4]Accused driver of a roadways bus was driving bus at a high speed which dashed against a tempo coming from opposite direction and caused injuries to three persons occupants of the tempo. Accused driver was convicted under ss 279 and 337, IPC .[5]

The accused driver was driving the bus, the bus took deviation at the spot of the accident and hit the house. The injured passenger PW did not depose that the accused was driving the bus rashly and negligently. The defence version was that a boy was crossing the road and to avoid accident, the accused driver look to the other side of the road and hit the house. The defence version being probable was believed, the accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under ss 279, 337, 338 and 427, IPC .[6]

Principle of Res Ipsa Loquitur--If Applicable

Commentary under same heading in s 304A, vol III may be referred to.1910

It is true that in motor accident cases the principle that the facts speak for themselves is applicable.[7] The principle of res ipsa loquitur will apply to the facts of the case where the incident speaks for itself. Where, the vehicle was driven on the highway by the accused on the wrong[8] side and the accident resulted in death of two persons, it was held that it is a fit case where the principle of res ipsa loquitur is applied. Normally, this principle is applicable only in the realm of tortious liability. An accident as mentioned above will speak for itself for the rash and negligent act on the part of the accused.[9] The courts can invoke the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur which is found applicable by the apex court as long back in the case of Syed Akbar v State of Karnataka .[10] But where some prosecution witnesses have corroborated the explanation given by the accused that he was compelled to take the vehicle to the right side leaving the road, in order to avoid a head-on collision with the lorry, it was clear that even assuming that the principle of res ipsa loquitur can be pressed into service in a case like this, there was sufficient explanation offered by the accused to explain why he had to take the vehicle to the wrong side. That being so, ignoring this aspect, the principle of res ipsa loquitur could not be applied stating that the facts spoke for themselves inasmuch as such facts were capable of being explained by the accused.[11] In the absence of any material on the record, no presumption of 'rashness' or 'negligence' could be drawn by invoking the maxim 'res ipsa loquitur'.[12]

The principle of res ipsa loquitur has limited application in the domain of criminal law.[13]Where accused driver has reasonable explanation for the accident viz, in order to avoid head on collusion he had to take vehicle to the wrong side resulting in accident, the accused cannot be convicted under s 279, IPC by applying the principle of res ipsa loquitur.[14]

Mere Non-Observance of Rules not Necessarily Constitutes Wilful Rashness or Negligence

Mere non-observance of the requirements of the rules framed under the Motor Vehicles Act or driving a vehicle, which is not in its ideal condition, would not necessarily amount to wilful rashness or negligence required to constitute an offence under the Motor Vehicles Act or driving a vehicle, which is not in its ideal condition, would not necessarily amount to wilful rashness or negligence required to constitute an offence under the aforesaid sections.[15]

Accidents on Highway

The situation that prevails on the open highway is slightly different to one that the court would take into account had the incident taken place within the city limits. One needs to take into account the factors that on the highway, vehicles would1911 legitimately be moving at a relatively high speed. The more important aspect is that on the highway the vehicles have a right of way and if a person desires to cross the highway, the rules of the road require that the person would have to wait until the traffic has passed and only then embark on crossing the highway. It is a very familiar error committed by pedestrians even on the national highway that they saunter on to the road regardless of the movement of the traffic and if a person does a suicidal act of this type, then it would be impermissible for a court in a situation of this type to hold the driver of the vehicle responsible for the consequences of the act.[16] High or low speed is a relative term depending upon other factors.[17] Where the vehicle being driven on a national highway, caused an accident in front of a school, it is expected for a driver to be cautious and slow down the vehicle.[18]

Slow and Fast Speed--Depends upon Individual Notions

The fact that a vehicle is driven at high speed or the fact that a vehicle is not driven at high speed cannot, by itself, without judging the situation in which the driver has been placed, be a factor to determine rashness or negligence. High speed may not in each case be sufficient to hold that the driver is rash or negligent. If, however, a person is driving along a street in a town or in a crowded locality where persons are on the move, he has a duty not to drive carelessly and at an unusually rapid pace.[19] Mere proof of high speed is not sufficient to prove rashness and negligence to drive home the accusation under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[20]Merely because the truck was being driven at a 'high-speed' does not bespeak of either 'negligence' or 'rashness' by itself. When none of the witnesses examined by the prosecution could give any indication, even approximately, as to what they meant by 'high-speed'. 'High-speed' is a relative term, it is for the prosecution to bring on record material to establish as to what is meant by 'high-speed' in the facts and circumstances of the case.[21] It is always dangerous to rely upon such evidence of the passengers because what is slow speed and fast speed depends upon the idea or notions about the speed and which varies from person to person. Unless a passenger is conversant with driving, it is difficult to rely upon the evidence of such a passenger to determine whether the bus was driven at fast speed or otherwise. The accident had taken place on a zig-zag road and it is unlikely that the driver could have driven the bus at such place at a high speed. If the bus was not driven at a high speed, then the mere fact that the accident has taken place would not lead to the conclusion that the accused was driving rashly and negligently.[22] Where the bus driver drove the bus at a very high speed, lost control over the vehicle and came to the eastern side of the road causing an accident with a jeep resulting in death of all passengers travelling in the jeep, besides finding no mechanical defect in the offending vehicle, the conviction of the accused driver under ss 279, 304A, IPC, was maintained.[23] Where the accused while driving the truck with high speed climbed onto a footpath and hit the deceased from behind1912 causing his death, testimony of five witnesses was found truthful, conviction of the accused under ss 279, 304A, IPC, was upheld.[24]

The expression 'high speed' is an unambiguous/unclear expression. There must be prosecution evidence that the accused was driving the vehicle in rash and negligent manner.[25]

Where the accused driver of the bus even though was driving the vehicle at a slow speed, but hit a scooterist from behind causing death, was held guilty under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[26]

Speed alone not the Test of Rashness and Negligence--Real Test Indicted

The relationship between speed, rashness or negligence depends upon the place, time, condition of the road, nature of the traffic and such other like circumstances. A motor vehicle is meant to be driven in speed. It is not always the one who drives his vehicle at a slow speed who is a safe driver. So, the speed with which a vehicle is driven is not always the deciding factor for coming to a finding whether accused was driving rashly or negligently.[27] Speed is not the sole contention for determining the negligent driving of the vehicle unless and until it is proved by the cogent evidence that the vehicle was being driven rashly or negligently.[28] It is not the speed alone that makes the driving rash or negligent. An automobile is meant to be driven in speed. Depending upon the place, speed by itself may not be rashness or negligence sometimes. But even without speed, driving can be rash or negligent as to endanger human life or health. The real test for negligent driving is whether the accident could have been avoided by the accused if he had exercised due care and diligence which ordinarily cautious persons using the road in similar circumstances would have done.[29]

It may not be always possible to determine with reference to the speed of a vehicle whether a person was driving rashly and negligently. Even when one is driving a vehicle at a slow speed but recklessly and negligently, it would amount to 'rash and negligent driving' within the meaning of s 279, IPC .[30]

Speed is not a criteria even to infer the rash or negligent act of driving, but it is corroborative factor.[31]Accused driver of a roadways bus, driving bus at a high speed which dashed against a tempo coming from opposite direction, caused injuries to three persons occupants of the tempo, accused driver was convicted under ss 279 and 337, IPC .[32]

To bring home a charge under s 279, IPC prosecution has to prove not only the fact that the accused was driving the vehicle on a public way, but has also to prove that1913 such driving was so rash or negligent as to endanger human life or likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person. Criminal negligence or criminal rashness is an important element.

The speed is not the sole contention for determining the negligent driving of the vehicle, unless and until it is proved by cogent evidence that the vehicle was being driven rashly or negligently.[33] Mere fact that the accused was driving the vehicle at high speed may not attract the provision of this section and prosecution has to prove something more.[34]

Situation and Location are also Material

High speed is a relative term. A vehicle which is driven in a congested road even at a speed of 30 km may constitute high speed, but driving a vehicle at a speed higher than 30 kms in an open road may not be considered driving at high speed. It would depend upon the nature and situation of the road, concentration of pedestrians and vehicular traffic on it and many such other relevant factors.[35]

The road on which the truck was plying was only 11 feet wide and, therefore, a very narrow road. Even if the truck was going at a speed of 10-12 miles per hour, it cannot be said as a rule that it was not rash driving. It depends upon the situation or the location where the vehicle was being driven.[36] High or low speed is a relative term depending upon other factors. If a vehicle with defective brakes is driven at a speed of 15-20 kms in a crowded bazaar, it is nothing but driving the vehicle rashly at high speed.[37] The lengthy skid marks found on the spot indicate that the bus while on descend and having negotiated the curve was being driven at a very high speed.[38] The fact that the accident took place on the right side of the road on a blind turn and brake-marks of 6.5 meters were found on the right side of the road, by itself proves that the accused was rash and negligent in driving the vehicle.[39] Where, the evidence of a witness whose jeep was also involved in the accident clearly discloses that the truck was being driven by the accused at a very high speed, the truck had no lights, it was being driven without the driver sounding the horn, the visibility was very poor at that time due to heavy fog and the witness was driving the jeep on the left side of the road very cautiously at a speed less than 15-20 miles per hour and he had put on both the head lights and he was also sounding the horn at intervals, so as to give warning to the vehicles approaching from the opposite sides. The finding of the courts below that the accident happened due to rash and negligent driving of the accused was perfectly justified.[40]

But where the evidence of the motor vehicle inspector, who visited the spot of accident, showed that after the accident the motor-cycle moved to a distance of 17.6 meters, it is a strong factor to draw the inference that the driving of the motor-cycle1914 was rash and negligent. There can be no escape from the conclusion that the accused-respondent is guilty of offences under s 279, IPC .[41]

Dragging Marks\skid Marks on Road--Absence of Absence of dragging marks/skid marks on the road are not always or invariably necessary to prove rashness/negligence of the driver of the offending vehicle.[42]

Other Factors

Where the truck was not being driven at a fast speed in a rash and negligent manner but it was the deceased himself who fully contributed to the cause of the accident and came in front of the truck all of a sudden when it was only at a distance of 6-7 feet. In these circumstances it was held, it cannot be said that the petitioner caused the accident due to his rash and negligent driving and the conviction of the petitioner cannot be sustained.[43]

Similarly, where the pedestrian crossed the road without attempting to take care to see the approaching vehicle with the consequences that he was knocked down by that vehicle, it was held that the finding as to rashness or negligence on the part of the driver was wrong and no offence under s 279, IPC was made out.[44]

While the truck was going on the main thoroughfare from south to north, the ill-fated young girl was crossing the road from east to west and she had already covered 35 ft. of the road. There was sufficient time and margin for the driver to see that the young child was crossing the road and he could have applied brakes instead of knocking down the girl only 17 ft. away from the kerb. Appellant accused was convicted of charge under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[45]

Accused car driver was prosecuted on allegations that the accused was driving the car in rash and negligent manner and caused grievous injuries to a child 7 years old. Evidence proved that the child was playing on the road, while playing the child was running on the road to reach the house, due to this act, he came in contact with the car and the driver of the car had applied its brakes to save him and there were skid marks upto 30 feet. The site plan prepared by IO corroborated the defence version as there were skid marks on the spot. Accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 279, 337 and 338, IPC .[46]

Accidents on Account of Mechanical defect in the Vehicle

Commentary under the same heading in s 304A, vol III may be referred to.

Evidence of witnesses established that the accused appellant driving a jeep loaded with passengers, dashed with roadside trees, collapsed by the side of the road, and as a result 12/13 passengers on board sustained injuries, one injured died later in the hospital. Vehicle was seized from the spot in damaged condition. The motor vehicle inspector reported that the vehicle was having no mechanical defect at the time of the1915 accident. Accused appellant had suffered injuries in the accident. The appellant driver was convicted under ss 279, 338 and 304A, IPC .[47]

Where the accident took place not due to rash and negligent driving of the car by the accused-petitioner but due to some mechanical defect, which developed when the car was being driven on the road immediately before the accident had taken place, and the brake-oil leaked out, it cannot be said that the accused petitioner was negligent in not checking up the brake-oil, rather it appears that it was due to sheer ill-luck that the brake-oil leaked out due to some mechanical defect which the car had developed all of a sudden, it was held that the accident during which the cyclist sustained his injuries was due to negligence on his own part and not due to rash and negligent driving of the car by the accused-petitioner.[48]

Mechanical Defect in Vehicle

Where the evidence established that the accident by a Road Transport Corporation bus occurred due to mechanical defect in the bus, the accused driver of the bus was acquitted of the charges under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[49]

The evidence led by the prosecution as well as by the defence clearly shows that the accident had taken place because of a mechanical defect mainly that the steering of the bus had got locked at the time when it met with the accident with the motorcyclist. No doubt, as could be inferred from the sketch, the bus had gone to the right, beyond the road along with the said motorcyclist. However, on this count alone one certainly cannot come to the conclusion that the accused/driver of the said bus was driving it rashly and negligently, more so because the motorcyclist was coming from his opposite direction. Therefore, the accused was entitled to acquittal.[50]

When steering wheel being not in order and hence, not workable, is a part of prosecution story itself shows that it was not necessary for the accused to state these facts in so many words even in his examination under s 313 of the Code of Criminal Procedure . It can safely be inferred that incident was merely an accident and there is nothing to infer that the accused was driving the vehicle either rashly or negligently.[51]

Poor Maintenance of Vehicle

The accused appellant by rash and negligent driving of scooter had caused serious injuries to a four years old boy. The appellant had taken plea that the accident had occurred as tyre of the scooter had bursted. Poor maintenance of the vehicle is itself a negligent act as it speaks of 'absence of care' so far as the vehicle is concerned. Accused appellant was convicted under ss 279 and 304A .[52]

Boy Crossing the Road

The accused driver was driving the bus, the bus took deviation at the spot of the accident and hit the house. The injured passenger PW did not depose that the accused was driving the bus rashly and negligently. The defence version was that a boy was1916 crossing the road and to avoid accident, the accused driver took to the other side of the road and hit the house. The defence version being probable was believed, the accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under ss 279, 337, 338 and 427, IPC .[53]

Benefit of Doubt when to be Given

The onus is on the prosecution to establish, beyond reasonable doubt, that the vehicle was being driven in a rash or negligent manner. What is rash or negligent driving would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case. No hard and fast rule can be laid down. Where the court is not able to get a clear picture as to how the accident happened, the accused is entitled to the benefit of doubt.[54]

18. Duties of the Driver and user of the Road

To Prevent Injury

As shown above, the offence consists in rash or negligent driving or riding. It is the duty of everyone who drives a vehicle on a public highway to drive it with such care and caution as to prevent, as far as is in his or her power, any injury to any person.[55] There is a duty on the driver of a motor car to observe ordinary care or skill towards persons using the highway, whom he could reasonably foresee as likely to be affected.[56]

Special Care in Case of Mechanical Defect

Where a vehicle with defective brakes had to be driven in the crowded bazaar the driver was required to exercise reasonable care by driving the bus at snail's speed to enable him to bring it to a halt whenever required without applying the brakes.[57]

Foot Passenger's Right to use Carriageway

A foot passenger, though he may be infirm from disease, has a right to walk on the carriageway, although there be a footpath, and he is entitled to the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the persons driving carriages along the carriageway.[58] It is obviously the duty of a driver to see that he does not approach so near a car in front of him that he cannot avoid a collision if that car slackens speed or stops.[59]

Overloading of Vehicle

Overloading of 60-65 people in the truck like fodder contributes to the negligence of the accused driver. In the present case the truck had turned turtle, causing injuries to several persons of death of the three persons on the spot and six persons1917 in the hospital. The appellant accused driver was convicted under ss 279, 304A and 338, IPC .[60]

Blowing Horn when Necessary

Mere speed is not the criterion to judge the rashness or negligence. Even high speed on a highway, which is not surrounded by abadi, cannot be said to be a rash act. But driving the bus in a locality without giving any horn is a breach of a duty imposed upon a driver.[61] Failure of a driver to sound the horn also amounts to negligent driving.[62]

Condition of Road and Nature of Traffic to be kept in view

A person who is driving a motor vehicle should always keep it in a state of control sufficient to enable him to avoid dashing against any other vehicle or running over any pedestrian who may be on the road. It is the duty of every one who drives a vehicle on a public highway to drive it with care and caution and to avoid as far as possible any injury to any person. The condition of the road and the nature of the traffic are also circumstances to be considered in order to arrive at a conclusion as to whether the accident was the result of rash and negligent driving of the vehicle by the driver.[63]

Bigger the vehicle, bigger is the responsibility. In the instant case the offending bus was a big passenger vehicle and while driving such a big vehicle along the public road and that too in an area where there are educational institutions, the accused driver should have been very careful. The very act of the accused in driving the bus and dashing from behind the cyclist, would speak volumes about the rashness and negligence in driving the vehicle.[64]

Certain Precaution to be Observed--Own Safety also Material

On a clear road with no traffic in front or behind except at a distance, a driver is entitled to take any part of the road he likes. He must, however, keep a sharp lookout in front and behind and when he sees a vehicle approaching, he must go to the left or near side of the highway to permit the passage of the other vehicle.[65]

No rider or driver can tell when a pedestrian may happen to arrive on a road; consequently, he cannot drive or ride rashly or negligently even at a time when the road happens to be temporarily unoccupied by any pedestrian or by any vehicle. And this is so not only because any person or any vehicle may happen to arrive on the road at any time, but also because the driver or the rider is to look to his own safety as well, and cannot at all indulge in a riding or driving which may endanger his own life.[66]1918

Vehicle Parked on Wrong side of Road

The accused was alleged to have caused injuries to the driver and the passengers of the auto rickshaw, evidence showed that the auto rickshaw at the time of the incident was parked on the wrong side of the road, there was no evidence that the accused at the time of the accident was driving the jeep at speed beyond prescribed limit for the area where the accident occurred, accused was acquitted of the charge under s 279, IPC .[67]

Care when using Wrong Side of Road

A person driving a carriage is bound to keep on the ordinary side of the road; but if he does not do so, it is his duty to use more care and diligence, and keep a better lookout, that he may avoid collision, that would not be a requisite if he were to keep to his proper side of the road.[68] Where it was established that the accident took place on the right side of the road taking the direction of the vehicle (truck) into consideration and the accident took place where the driver could not see beyond the said turn, the truck crashed into the scooter coming from the opposite direction on its own side, the fact that the accident took place on the right side of the road on a blind turn and brake-marks of 6.5 metres were found on the right side of the road, by itself proves that accused was rash and negligent in driving the said truck.[69] Where the accused driving mini bus rashly and negligently dashed against the bus, causing injuries to the passengers of both the buses, the mini bus driven by the accused was on the wrong side of the road, the passengers of the mini bus deposed that the accused driver was driving the bus at a high speed, accused respondent was convicted under ss 279 and 337, IPC .[70]

Where accused driver of a bus driving collided with a truck coming from opposite direction, caused injuries to the complainant and other persons, photographs showed that the bus was coming on wrong side, he was convicted under ss 279 and 337, IPC .[71]

Where the photographs of the spot showed that the offending truck was on the wrong side of the road, i.e. on extreme right side of road on the curve, whereas the victim Maruti car was at its left side, the appellant accused was convicted under s 279, IPC .[72]

Even if there is no oral evidence of rash and negligent driving of the bus by the accused, but the fact that the accused was driving the bus on the wrong side of the road at a high speed proves rash and negligent driving by the accused. Accused appellant was convicted under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[73]

Constant Anticipation by Driver is subject to Normal Conditions

As already stated, the rashness and negligence in driving cannot be inferred from the mere fact that the crossing pedestrian was knocked down by the bus. In the hustle and bustle of present day life, the most essential element of carefulness and diligence in the activity such as driving is constant anticipation, but its postulate is a normal1919 condition. Where the victim had crossed over to the western side on seeing the bus coming and still decided to cross back to the eastern side immediately unmindful of the approach of the bus, it was observed that the driver could not be blamed for not anticipating her last trip towards the east and as he was pardoned for not anticipating such a suicidal return journey on the part of the deceased, the case of rashness and negligence on his part was ruled out.[74]

Non-observance of the Rule of the Road

It is the duty of every user of the road to make reasonable use of it for the purposes of passing along it and to allow others to do so also. One way of doing it is to conform to the ordinary usages of the road. When the accused was coming along the wrong side and at a terrific speed, it is impossible to hold that he was not driving the car in a rash or negligent manner as to endanger human life or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person.[75]

Motorists are not the only persons who owe a duty of care; others also have a responsibility and must conform to the ordinary usages of the road. There is a duty on every user of the road to make a reasonable use of it for the purposes of passing along it, and to allow others to do so also.

A person driving a motor car has a right to expect that the persons negligently loitering on the road would make way for him, especially when he sees that they are aware of his approach. Even when they signal him to stop, he is not bound to do so, whatever the rules of courtesy may be. He has the right to assume that they would get out of the way when they see him ignore their signals. It is the experience of motorists along the Indian roads, and elsewhere also, that they are often signaled to stop by persons who are begging a ride. Obviously, they need not pull up for this. As a rule, it is not until they are right upon them that it is possible to determine whether the signals are really of distress or not, and then of course with a courteous driver the car is usually brought to a standstill a short distance away. But even then one does not expect a man to stand obstinately in the way while he is in the process of pulling up. A car cannot be stopped in a few feet, especially when it is a heavy one like a motor lorry.[76] The rule of the road is not an invariable or inflexible rule, and a deviation from it may, upon occasion, be not only justifiable but actually necessary.[77] It is the duty of any person driving another vehicle on the same road as that on which a tram-car is running, not to bring his vehicle on the tram lines in front of the car, so as to obstruct its ordinary progress. It follows then that a driver of a tram-car, while he must not drive negligently or rashly, is entitled to expect that other traffic along the road will keep clear off, or remove itself from, the tramway line so far as is reasonably possible. This does not mean of course that a driver of a tram-car is entitled to travel with excessive speed, that he is entitled, for instance, to ignore a blind man who is trying to cross the road or when he sees another vehicle is on the line and cannot get clear in time, that he is entitled to hold on his way regardless of all other considerations. His position is privileged to this extent that he has acquired the right by law to the use of the line and he is entitled to expect that if other vehicles are in the way that they will give passage to him.1920

In a case where a tram-car collided with a camel cart, it appeared that the tram-car was being driven by the applicant at a fast, but not at an excessive speed, upon the tram lime, and there was nothing upon the tram line directly in front of the tram-car, but on the other line parallel to it, the camel cart was proceeding in the same direction. It also appeared that if the camel had not suddenly swerved to the left side instead of to the right side there would have been no collision. In the circumstances, it was held that it would not be said that the driver of the tram-car was rash or negligent within the meaning of this section merely because he did not anticipate that the camel would suddenly swerve to the left side instead of to the right side. He was entitled to expect that the camel cart would continue on its way or that, if it made any effort to move, the effort would be directed towards moving away from the line upon which his car was proceeding and not moving across it.[78]

Accident at Green Signal

Where the accused driving a bus at a fast speed struck against the deceased at green signal, held it was sufficient proof that the accused was driving the bus rashly and negligently.[79]

Driving on Right Side on Kacha or Zigzag Road

Where the road was admittedly zig-zag near the place of accident, the accused driver ought to have slowed down the bus so as to be able to stop it at a moment's notice, and should not have driven the bus on the right side of the road. When a heavy loaded bus is driven across a zig-zag road or up a hill prudence requires that he should reduce the speed considerably so as to be able to stop the vehicle at a moment's notice.[80] The very act of driving of the vehicle on the right side of the kutcha road itself is a dangerous act.[81]

19. Precaution in 'Trial Run'

A 'trial run' is after all a 'test run' to satisfy the repairers that the repair work has been completed to their satisfaction. Putting a vehicle to trial run, therefore, is not certifying to its road-worthiness. The board should be hung on the vehicle to that effect to warn all concerned that such a vehicle on the road is not absolutely roadworthy but was being tested for the purpose, and the possibility of its failing could not be ruled out.[82]

20. Dashing against a Stationary Vehicle

The act of the accused in dashing against a stationary lorry may amount to rash and negligent driving. With the head lights on, the driver of the offending vehicle should have been able to see the stationary lorry and with diligent driving could have avoided the accident.[83]1921

21. Passenger Jumping Out of Bus in Motion

The deceased, on his own, opened the gate and alighted from the bus, while it was still in motion. On being asked by the conductor and the passengers the accused immediately stopped the bus. On these facts if the deceased had no patience and without waiting for the bus to come to complete halt, alighted, no negligence can be attributed to the driver of the bus. Thus, even if the prosecution case goes un-rebutted there are no chances of the accused being guilty for offence under s 279 or 304A, IPC .[84] Where the accused appellant driver of the truck was negotiating steep height and the truck due to some mechanical defect or otherwise started rolling back, one of the four labourers out of panic jumped from the truck and died, the act of jumping from the truck was the rash and negligent act of the deceased, for which the accused could not be convicted under ss 279 and 304, IPC .[85]

22. Passenger going on Roof of Bus

Section 279 deals with rash driving or riding on a pubic way. For bringing in application of either ss 279 or 304A it must be established that there was an element of rashness or negligence. Appellant accused was a driver in Himachal Pradesh Transport Corporation. On the day of the incident while he was driving the vehicle, the bus had stopped at a bus stop. One passenger after alighting from the bus went to its roof top for the purpose of unloading his luggage. The accused without waiting for a signal from the conductor and without verifying if all the passengers who were to board, had boarded and who were to alight had alighted, all of a sudden started the bus as a result of which the said passenger fell down and sustained injuries. He was carried to the hospital where he succumbed to the injuries. Even if the prosecution version is accepted in toto, there was no evidence led to show that any negligence was involved. The conviction of the accused appellant under ss 279 and 304A, IPC was set aside.[86]

23. Driving on the Wrong Side of Road--Whether Offence

The mere non-observance of the requirements of the rules, framed under the Motor Vehicles Act 1988, or driving a vehicle, which is not in an ideal condition, would not necessarily amount to wilful rashness or negligence, required to constitute an offence under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[87] It is true that the usage of the road is not the sole criterion for determining negligence and there may be instances where even though the vehicle was found on the wrong side of the road, the driver had taken appropriate precautions and exercised due care and diligence.[88]

It cannot be said that a person driving his motor car even slowly on the wrong side of the road at a blind corner between two roads of considerable traffic is not driving the car rashly or negligently.[89] But it is not always necessarily rash and negligent to drive on the wrong side of the road. Much would depend upon other conditions.[90]1922

Where the accused was driving on the wrong side of the road, but he took all possible precautions by driving his car slowly and by putting his hand up to give his signal to the complainant when he saw the complainant's car coming on from the opposite direction at an excessive speed, but in spite of all this an unfortunate accident occurred, which would not have occurred if the complainant had not been driving his car at an excessive speed, it was held that the guilt of the accused under this section was not proved.[91] But where the accused while driving the truck hit the scooter from behind while overtaking the scooterist from the left side, and hit the scooterist from the right side of the truck and could not stop immediately after colliding with the scooter, it is obvious that the accused did not exercise reasonable and proper care which was imperative duty to have exercised. He was obviously unmindful of the safety of the scooterist and was driving the truck at an uncontrollable speed, as a result he could not control his vehicle after hitting the scooter. He had not even blown the horn before overtaking the scooter from the left side. These circumstances clearly proved that the accused was guilty of rashness and criminal negligence and that was the direct cause of this fatal accidental death.[92]

There was prosecution evidence that the accused respondent was driving motorcycle at a high speed on the wrong side of the road after it had become dark and without lights. In mechanical examination the motorcycle was found in order. Held, the act of the accused was such a wanton that it must be presumed that he had the knowledge that his act would cause injury to any person on the road. He was convicted under ss 279 and 338, IPC .[93]

24. Racing Competition

Where two buses were racing and competing with each other, the drivers of both the buses were held guilty under this section because racing or competition involves rash driving on both sides.[94] Permitting or taking part in a race or trial of speed of any kind between motor vehicles in any public place without the written consent of the state government is an offence even under s 189 of the Motor Vehicles Act 1988.

25. Overtaking another Vehicle

Where the accused driving a vehicle overtakes another vehicle at fast speed having total disregard to the passengers who might have been crossing the road after alighting form the vehicle, he is guilty of rash and negligent driving. Accused appellant was convicted under s 304A .[95]

Accused appellant, driver of a van, attempted to overtake the car, had hit the scooter andcaused the death of the rider and injuries to the pillion rider of the scooter. The name of the accused was not mentioned in the FIR. He was arrested after one month of the accident. Identifying witness had only a glimpse of the driver of the vehicle. There was no interaction between identifying witness and the driver of the vehicle at the spot for a sufficient longer period. In these circumstances, the identification of the accused for the first time, after six years, in the court, in the1923 absence of any test identification parade, during the course of investigation was held not to be sufficient to connect him with the present case. Accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[1]

26. 'Driving Cart without Reins'

Simply driving a cart the bullocks of which have no nose-string, does not constitute the offence under this section.[2]

Upon a trial for manslaughter it appeared that the accused was standing up in a spring cart; the reins were not in his hands, but lying on the horse's back; while the horse was trotting down a hill with the cart, the deceased, a child of about three years old, ran across the road before the horse, and the wheel of the cart knocked it down and killed it. It did not appear that the accused saw the child before the accident. Erle J, told the jury that if the accused had had the reins, and by using them, could have saved the child, he was guilty of manslaughter; but if they thought he could not have saved the child by pulling the reins or otherwise by their assistance, they must acquit him.[3]

On an indictment for manslaughter, the evidence was that the accused, being employed to drive a cart, sat inside instead of attending at the horse's head, and while he was sitting there, the cart ran over a child who was gathering up flowers on the road. Bayley B, held that the accused, by being in the cart, instead of at the horse's head, or by its side, was guilty of negligence, and death having been caused thereby, he was guilty of manslaughter.[4]

Where a person allowed his cart to proceed unattended along a road and ran over a boy who was sleeping on the road, it was held he could be not convicted under this section but either under s 337 or s 338, IPC .[5]

27. 'Rash Riding'

If a person rides a horse so fast that he would be unable to stop it if a foot-passenger got in the way, he would be liable under this section provided that the foot-passenger acted in a reasonable manner.[6]

28. 'Riding Pillion on Bicycle'

For a man to ride a pillion on an ordinary bicycle in a crowded street is a negligent act which is likely to cause injury to the other persons and vehicles there.[7]

29. 'Contributory Negligence'--Doctrine not Applicable in Criminal Law

In case of an accident on account of rash and negligent driving under this section, contributory negligence cannot be put up as a defence.[8] It is well established that the doctrine of contributory negligence, so well known in the law of tort, has, as such,1924 fortunately no place in criminal law. The question is purely one of causation and the facts of each case should be examined in the light of the principles suggested above. It may, in some cases, appear that it was the sufferer's own conduct which can alone be regarded as the cause of his misfortune. But where this is not so, the victim's carelessness or folly does not per se limit the liability of one who has, in fact, caused him harm.[9] In cases of road accidents the court has to keep in mind the likelihood of an error of judgment on the part of the person who is driving a motor vehicle as well as a pedestrian who attempts to cross the road little realising the great difference in his speed and that of the approaching motor vehicle.[10] The doctrine of contributory negligence has no application in criminal law.[11]

Contributory Negligence--No Defence in such Cases

Whether a vehicle is being driven fast or not depends upon the notion of a person. The petitioner was carrying his sister on the pillion seat and in the normal course he would not be driving the motor cycle recklessly for his and for the safety of his sister. The plea of contributory negligence is no defence on a case of this nature but then while deciding the criminality one has to bear in mind the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case and the eyewitnesses' testimony cannot be accepted mechanically unless it fits in with the facts and circumstances of the case leading to the conclusion that the act of the accused was really a vicarious act of recklessness which alone resulted in the accident.[12]

Contributory Negligence--Ground for Lesser Punishment

Where the accused overtook three buses at a time by driving his bus in a rash and negligent manner and not only collided with the bus coming from the opposite side but also lost control of his vehicle and clashed against a tree causing simple and grievous injuries to the passengers and his conviction under ss 279, 337, 338, IPC, and s 184, Motor Vehicle Act (59 of 1988) was found proper. But, since the driver coming from the opposite side was also guilty of contributory negligence, the accused was not found entitled to leniencies and was sentenced to pay fine quantified at Rs 1000 on each of the heads of charge aggregating to Rs 4000 and no default in sentence was prescribed.[13]

Due to rash and negligent driving of cart, the deceased child came under the wheel of the cart, was crushed. Three carts were involved in the accident. As the case was of contributory negligence, sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[14]

30. 'So as to Endanger Human Life or to be Likely to Cause Hurt or Injury'

To be guilty of an offence under this section the accused must drive the vehicle in a rash or negligent manner and driving must be such as to endanger human life or be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person. A certain aggravated degree of rash1925 or negligent driving is contemplated here.[15]For an offence under this section the effect of the manner in which the act is performed must be either: (a) that human life was, as a fact endangered thereby, or (b) that hurt or injury was likely to be caused thereby. Therefore, it must be shown that some person was either in a position of danger to his life, or that there was a likelihood of persons being hurt or injured. Likelihood is something stronger that a possibility, and may or may not amount to a probability, which is merely a stronger degree of likelihood.[16] A magistrate may, therefore, take into consideration the probability of persons using the road being placed in danger, and the fact that no one happened to be on the road at the time is no defence.[17] For a conviction under this section, it is, however, not necessary that the rash or negligent act should result in injury to life or limb. Bare negligence involving the risk of injury is punishable under the section.[18]

31. Rash or Negligent Driving or Riding not Permissible even when Roads are Unoccupied

The more the public way is crowded, the greater is the diligence and care expected from a driver or rider. Again, no rider or driver can tell when a pedestrian may happen to arrive on a road, consequently, he cannot drive or ride rashly or negligently even at a time when the road happens to be temporarily unoccupied by any pedestrian or by any vehicle. And this is not only because any person or any vehicle may happen to arrive on the road at any time, but also because the driver or the rider is to look to his own safety as well and cannot at all indulge in a riding or driving which may endanger his own life.[19]

32. 'Hurt'

Section 319 and notes thereunder may be referred to.

33. 'Injury'

The word 'injury' in the section, would denote any harm whatever illegally caused, to any person, in body, mind, reputation or property (refer to s 44 ante). Therefore, negligent or rash driving, which may cause harm to the property of a person, is covered in this section.[20]

Notes under s 44 may be referred to.

34. 'To any other Person'

The words 'any other person' are very wide, and are not distinctly limited to persons on a road as distinct from the occupants of the particular vehicle which is being1926 rashly or negligently driven. They are wide enough to include the occupants of the vehicle itself, and it may be reasonably held, especially at the present time, that the occupants of a motor bus have as much right to be protected against rash or negligent driving on the part of the driver of the bus as have other people on the road.[21]

35. 'Abetment'--Meaning

To establish the abetment of an offence under this section, it is not sufficient to show that the accused had instigated the driver to drive fast; it must be shown at least that he instigated him to drive at a pace which was in itself, in all the circumstances, so rashly fast as to endanger human life. In fact, looking at the common sense view, it seems unlikely that any passenger in a car would explicitly tell any person to drive in a manner which is dangerous. The fact that the owner or an occupant did not insist on the driver driving at a moderate pace, does not show that he instigated his driving at a reckless pace.[22]

Supervisor of Learner Driver when Liable

The appellant had been acting (under the appropriate statutory regulation) as supervisor of a learner-driver of a motorcar. The driver pulled out on a pronounced bend of the road in order to overtake and pass a horse and cart, being unable to see a motor-lorry which was approaching in the opposite direction on its proper side of the road. He stalled his engine when well over the center of the road so that a collision occurred. The appellant sitting in the passenger's seat on the left of the driver saw the horse and cart, the white line in the center of the road, and the driver's manoeuvre in pulling out to pass, but he took no steps to prevent this, and so far as the evidence showed, remained passive. The driver was convicted of driving the motor vehicle without due care and attention, and the appellant was convicted of aiding and abetting the driver.

In dismissing his appeal, the divisional court held that the appellant was under a legal duty imposed by the regulations to take such action as could be reasonably expected to be done by a person supervising the acts of another to prevent that other from acting unskillfully or carelessly in a manner likely to cause danger to others; and to this extent to participate in the driving.[23]

Owner or Occupant when also Liable

If, however, the circumstances justify an inference that a common purpose to drive the car in a dangerously rash or negligent manner existed between the owner or occupant and the driver, the former also would be liable.[24]

36. Liability of Owner of Vehicle--When Exists

The rashness or negligence must be personal. Thus, the actual driver, and not the owner of the carriage, is liable under this section.[25] But this rule does not apply in1927 cases where a master employs a servant to do anything which is prima facie dangerous to the public.[26]

37. Liability under this Section and Special Laws

It cannot be laid down as a general rule of law that where there is a special law making a particular act an offence and providing penalties for such an offence, the general law must be held to be inapplicable. It is possible that the same act may be an offence under two different Acts and both may be applicable simultaneously, and the offender may be prosecuted and convicted under either Act. It may, however, be conceded that where the offence falls strictly within the provision of a section of a special Act, rather than fall back upon a more general law which prescribes a heavier penalty, in such a case it may be assumed that the legislature in prescribing the smaller penalty has considered recourse to the special law as the proper course.[27]Where a special kind of rash or negligent act is penalised under a special law, recourse should not be had to this section.[28]

38. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable, but a summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable offence but not compoundable. It can be tried by any magistrate and even summarily.

The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within one year.[29] Trial should be speedy. In case of enormous delay it is liable to be quashed.[30] Delay of nine and a half years for a trial of rash and negligence driving was held to be too long a time to be condoned.[31]

Court's Discretion to Exempt Personal Appearance of Accused

Under s 317, CrPC, the judge or magistrate can, at any stage of inquiry or trial, dispense with the personal attendance of the accused before the court if he satisfies that his presence is not necessary in the interest of justice. The discretion to exempt personal attendance of the accused should be exercised judicially with care and caution depending upon circumstances of each case or each occasion. Accordingly, when a question of identification of an offender arises in a case under ss 279 and 304A, IPC, the judge or magistrate should see that on the date of examination of eye-witnesses, the accused appears in court so that they can get a chance to identify him.[32]

39. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC 1973 may be adopted:1928

I (name of the office of the magistrate etc) hereby give notice to you (name of accused) as follows:

That you on or about the..... day of ..... at....., drove a vehicle (name the vehicle), or rode on a public way (name the way) in a manner so rash or negligent as to endanger human life or to be likely to cause hurt (or injury) to any other person and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 279 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

40. Joinder of Charges and Persons at one Trial

Rash or negligent driving by the driver of one vehicle is independent of rash or negligent driving by the driver of another vehicle. When, therefore, two vehicles collide due to the rash or negligent driving of the drivers of the two vehicles, the two acts of the two drivers cannot be said to constitute the same transaction within the meaning of s 223, CrPC, and the trial of the two drivers together at one trial for the offence under s 279 is illegal.[33] It has been held that where two motor vehicles coming from opposite directions collide due to rash and negligent driving by the drivers of the two vehicles, and the collision results in the death of one passenger and grievous hurt to another passenger, a joint trial of the two drivers for the Motor Vehicles Act, is illegal, as they cannot be said to have been committed in the course of the same transaction.[34] But a contrary view has been taken by the Rajasthan High Court.[35]

41. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused was driving a vehicle or was riding;
(ii) the driving or riding was on a public way;
(iii) he was driving or riding rashly or negligently; and
(iv) such manner of driving or riding endangered human life, or was likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person.[36]

Burden lies on the prosecution to establish that the accused driver was driving the vehicle at high speed. The prosecution must also establish the place of occurrence.[37] Where the accused has pleaded guilty, he cannot be allowed to urge later on that he was not made aware of the consequences.[38]

Prosecution case was that the accused was driving a truck at a very fast speed, dashed against the deceased from behind, causing his death. There was evidence of one witness who was also not cross-examined, there was no other evidence showing the speed of the truck at the time of the accident. Accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[39]

The petitioner accused was found guilty of driving auto rickshaw rashly and negligently. The petitioner had dashed the said vehicle against the deceased and as a result, the deceased sustained grievous injury and was admitted to the hospital. During treatment the deceased died after 38 days of the accident. The injury sustained by the deceased in the accident caused by the accused, was the direct and proximate cause, which led to the death of the deceased. The accused was convicted for offences under ss 279 and 304A .[40]

Eye-witnesses deposed that the accident was due to rash and negligent driving of the truck, the truck dashed against the scooter causing the death of two brothers. The conviction of the accused under ss 279 and 304A, IPC was held proper.[41]

Once the accident stands proved and the circumstances which appear on the record conclude the rash or negligent driving by the offending vehicle, immediately the onus shifts upon such driver to prove due care and caution.[42]

The respondent accused was prosecuted under ss 279 and 337, IPC on allegations that he was driving the motorcycle at high speed, hit the victim from wrong side, causing injuries on his legs, chest, head etc. There were material omissions and contradictions in the statement of the prosecution witness. Respondent was acquitted of the charges under ss 279 and 337, IPC .[43]

Where the accused driver of the bus in the process of overtaking the bullock cart dashed against the motorcycle coming from the opposite side, the pillion rider of the motorcycle injured in the accident was the best witness about the incident. The accused driver of the bus dragged the motorcycle for about 20 feet and stopped the vehicle on the footpath on the western side of the road. Held, the accused driver of the bus was guilty of rash and negligent driving of the bus. He was convicted under ss 279, 338 and 304A, IPC .[44]

Where the accused has been already acquitted under s 187, Motor Vehicles Act 1988, for want of evidence, accused cannot be convicted for offences under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[45]1930

Where Pedestrian Crossing the Road is Negligent

Where a person suddenly crossed the road without taking note of the approaching vehicle, there was every possibility of his crashing against the vehicle without the driver becoming aware of it. The driver of the vehicle in such circumstances cannot save accidents and so cannot be held to be negligent in such cases.[46] Where the boy who met with the accident was only aged five years, although he was accompanied by his father, yet he was going ahead of him independently and when the truck came close, he, all of a sudden started crossing the road, in these circumstances it cannot be said that accused driver caused the accident due to his rash and negligent driving.[47]

If an accident occurs on a public road in a village and is witnessed by one or more witnesses, the eye witnesses are more likely to be the residents of the locality or the persons visiting that locality on business or some other purpose. Merely because the persons are residents of the village or the locality where the accident occurred, they cannot be called as interested witnesses.[48]

Where a pedestrian crosses the road and does not take care to see whether any vehicle or truck is coming along the road, so that he dashes against the bus or truck, the driver may not be held guilty of negligence.[49] Where the old pedestrian crossed the road without attempting to take care to see the approaching bus with the consequence that he was knocked down by that bus, no case of criminal negligence could be inferred against the driver.[50]

Non-examination of the Driver of Victim Vehicle

Where it is proved by the evidence on the record that the accused was driving bus rashly and negligently and dashed against the tempo causing the death of two persons and injuries to several persons, accused would not be acquitted on the mere ground that the driver of the tempo was not examined in the case.[51]

Non-Examination of Investigating Officer

Where the very date of alleged occurrence became doubtful and the case of prosecution in this regard is contradicted by the evidence of the doctors, the injured has stated that his statement was not recorded and only his thumb impression was taken, the non-examination of investigating officer in these circumstances would certainly prejudice the accused and so the accused was acquitted for the offences under ss 279 and 338, IPC .[52]1931

Identification of Driver-Test Identification Parade

Prosecution witnesses identified the accused driver driving the vehicle at the time of accident, in the court. He was also named in FIR. Test identification parade was found not necessary. Conviction of accused under s 279, IPC was held proper.[53]

Identification of the Accused

Accused driving van in abnormal speed on a public way had caused the death of a lady. Owner of the offending vehicle deposed that the accused appellant was driving the vehicle at the time of the accident. Eye-witnesses identified the accused in the dock. Mere fact that the witnesses could not give out the name of the accused in the witness box was held not fatal to the prosecution case.[54]

Prosecution's case was that the accused driving goods truck in rash and negligent manner dashed against Tata Sumo which was coming from the opposite direction. All the PWS were sitting in the rear seats of the Tata Sumo as such they had no opportunity to see the driver of the offending vehicle. The witnesses did not depose before the court that they saw the face of the driver of the offending vehicle. The identity/identification of the accused was not proved beyond reasonable doubt. The accused were acquitted of the charge under ss 279, 337 and 304A, IPC .[55]

About 10-15 persons had gathered on the spot at the time of the accident, two of them were examined by the prosecution. One witness deposed that he came to know from the mob assembled on the spot that the accused was driving the offending vehicle, another witness deposed that on the next day of the accident he came to know that the accused was driving the vehicle. The identity of the accused driver was not proved beyond reasonable doubt. He was given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[56]

In prosecution of the accused for rash and negligent driving under ss 279, 337, 338, IPC, witness supporting the prosecution case, who was minor at the time of the incident testified before the court that the driver was not on the wheels at the time of the accident. Another hostile witness deposed that he could not see the driver of the offending vehicle. Accused was not convicted for offences under ss 279, 337 and 338, IPC .[57]

Prosecution's case was that the accused was driving the jeep rashly and negligently, which collided with the auto rickshaw, causing serious injuries to auto rickshaw passengers and death of one of them. The testimony of the witnesses varied about the direction from which offending jeep came. Witnesses disclosed the name of the accused driver for the first time in the court. The evidence of the eye-witnesses that they identified the accused in the light of another lorry was found not reliable. Investigating Officer of the case was not examined and the place of occurrence was not proved. The accused was entitled to the benefit of doubt and was acquitted.[58]1932

Accused driver of a canter was prosecuted on allegations that while driving rashly and negligent he dashed against the two girls, causing death of one and injuries to another. If the accused is not known to the witness previously and he is identified in the court for the first time then it becomes a question of fact whether reliance is to be placed upon that evidence or not. In the instant case there was evidence of PW1 that the accused alighted from the canter and came to them and disclosed his name, parentage and address and it was only thereafter that he had escaped from the spot leaving behind the canter. Thus, the complainant interacted with the accused and had sufficient opportunity to note his distinctive features which made the basis of identification of the accused by him in the court. There was nothing on the record to disbelieve that part of the testimony of the complainant. The accident had occurred in the day at 10.15 AM. The identification of the accused was found reliable. He was convicted under ss 279 and 304, IPC .[59]

Two Versions--Discretion of Court in such Cases

The principle is that when two versions emerge from the prosecution evidence, the one which is favourable to the accused, should be adopted and its benefits should be given to the accused.[60] Where in the given case the circumstances clearly showed rashness and negligence on the part of the driver and from the perusal of the site plan, it was evident that it is a straight road and the driver knew that there is a level crossing and when one side of the gate was locked by the gateman, he ought to have slowed down the bus and should have driven at a speed so that it could have completely stopped much before the level crossing, the ingredients of the offences under ss 279, 336 and 337, IPC and under s 129 of Indian Railways Act were held fully proved against the accused beyond all reasonable doubt and his acquittal recorded by the magistrate was set aside.[61]

Rashness and Negligence when not Averred in Complaint--Matter of Inference

Merely because there is no averment in the complaint that the crash by the respondent was a rash and negligent act of his driving, it does not follow that the ingredients of the offence alleged were not proved. It is a matter of inference. The impugned order of discharge was accordingly quashed and set aside and the magistrate was directed to dispose of the case in accordance with law.[62]

Circumstantial Evidence

In cases where negligence is the primary cause, it may not always be that direct evidence to prove it exists. In such cases, the circumstantial evidence may be adduced to prove negligence.[63]

42. Conviction both under Sections 279 and 337 or Section 338 --Legality of

None of the parts of the offence defined in s 338, IPC, is sufficient to constitute an offence under s 279, IPC, because under s 279, the ingredient of driving any vehicle or riding on a public way is essential, which is not necessary under s 338 .1933 The offence under s 338, IPC, need not be committed by driving a vehicle or riding on a public way and therefore s 71, IPC, cannot be applied to ss 338 and 279, IPC .[64]

A Full Bench of the Madhya Bharat High Court held that an offence under this section is distinct from an offence either under s 337 or s 338, and therefore, a person convicted of an offence either under s 337 or s 338 can also be convicted for an offence under this section. If, however, the two offences are committed in the same transaction, s 71 of this Code will govern the assessment of punishment.[65] The Rajasthan High Court has also held that the offence under ss 279, 337 or s 338, IPC being distinct an accused can be convicted both under ss 279 and 337 or s 338, IPC .[66] The imposition of separate sentences, however, cannot be justified where the acts constituting two different offences form part of the same transaction against the same accused.[67] Separate sentences under ss 279 and 338, IPC, obviously cannot be passed because an act of rash and negligent driving would automatically merge under the act covered under s 338, IPC .[68]

43. Conviction under Section 190Motor Vehicles Act--No Bar to Conviction under Penal Code

A conviction under s 190 of the Motor Vehicles Act is no bar to a conviction of the accused under this section or ss 304A and 338 of the Indian Penal Code .[69]

44. Acquittal under Section 337 or Section 338 --No Bar to Prosecution under Section 279

If by rash or negligent driving the accused has caused injury to some person, offences punishable under ss 279 and 337 will be committed, and acquittal of the offence under s 337 or s 338, IPC, as a result of compounding will still leave the charge under this section outstanding and prosecuting under this section is not barred by the acquittal.[70]

The offence punishable under s 279, IPC is a grave offence, the sentence prescribed is higher, the accused can be punished under s 279, IPC only, and not under both ss 279 and 337, IPC .[71]1934

45. Whether Conviction/Sentence both under Section 279 and Section 304A is Permissible

If a person is guilty of an offence under s 279, IPC, and death is also caused as a result of the negligent act, he will be guilty of the offence under s 304A, IPC,[72] because an offence under this section is a minor offence which is included in s 304A, IPC . An accused, convicted under s 304A, IPC, therefore, cannot be convicted under this section as the latter is a minor offence.[73] A somewhat contrary view has been expressed in MH Mohammadali v State of Gujarat [74] and Kantilal Shivabhai Thakur v State of Gujarat ,[75] wherein it has been held that offences under s 279, IPC, are distinct offences and an accused can be convicted for offences under the said two sections though the punishment given for the minor offence such as under s 279, IPC, cannot be passed in view of the provision of s 71, IPC . The Delhi High Court has also taken a similar view and it was held that there was no need to impose any separate sentence for minor sentence under s 279 because the offence under ss 304A and 338, IPC, are similar offence in aggravated forms. Thus, the sentence imposed under s 279 was set aside.[76] The same view is taken by the Madhya Pradesh High Court holding that some of the facts found as ingredients of the offences under s 304A, IPC covered the ingredients of the offence under s 279, IPC and hence, the sentence of fine imposed by the lower court under s 279, IPC, was therefore set aside.[77] A definite finding must be recorded by the court as to whether the version of the witnesses, regarding the high speed and negligent driving at the time of the accident, was acceptable to him or not. In the absence of a definite finding as to whether the driving was negligent or not, no conviction under this section or s 304A can be recorded.[78]

46. Punishment

Sentence, it is said is the most public face of the criminal justice system. A sentence imposed by the courts should have a deterrent effect more so when accident cases are on the rise. Courts are required to ensure that whenever an accused is found guilty, he does not escape the clutches of law very lightly. Sentencing discretion has to be exercised considering the facts of each case.[79] It is well known that there is no formula for determining sentence in each individual case. The lower appellate court might have decided to impose a little lesser or bigger sentence than the one imposed by it. There is no method of knowing as to what sentence would be appropriate in a given case. Sentence is a matter of discretion with the court and sentence is to be awarded on a conspectus of the entirety of facts and circumstances of each individual case.[80]

There cannot be a blanket sentence for all the offences and it is obligatory for the trial court to say specifically what is the sentence imposed and for which of the1935 offence, failing which the only course left of the High Court is to set aside the very conviction and remit the case to the trial court for disposal according to law.[81]

If the accused are found guilty of rash and negligent driving courts have to be on guard to ensure that they do not escape the clutches of law very lightly. The sentence imposed by the courts should have a deterrent effect on potential wrongdoers and it should be commensurate with the seriousness of the offence. Of course, the courts are given discretion in the matter of sentence to take stock of the wide and varying range of facts that might be relevant for fixing the quantum of sentence. But the discretion shall be exercised with due regard to the larger interest of the society and it is needless, that passing of sentence on the offender is probably the most public face of the criminal justice system.[82]

Where the evidence on record clearly revealed that the petitioner was driving the bus rashly and negligently, it was held that to avoid speeding menace and the alarming rate of increase in accidents to see that public roads do not become death traps and/or to see that heavy vehicles are not used as lethal weapons, some deterrent punishment is required to be provided for such type of cases. In any set of circumstances it would be totally misplaced sympathy if the accused is released on probation. This may lead to lawlessness. Further, the sentence also should not be a flea-bite sentence. It should not be forgotten that it was a defence of the petitioner that he was not the driver of the vehicle and that as the prosecution has proved beyond reasonable doubt that he was the driver of the vehicle, he seeks sympathy from the court and prays that he may be released on probation. It would not be just and proper to release the petitioner on probation or to reduce the sentence.[83]

Appellant accused while driving tanker in rash and negligent manner caused the death of the scooterist. There was no allegation that the appellant at the time of accident, was under the influence of liquor or any other substance impairing his driving skills. The sentence awarded to him was reduced to the period already undergone. In addition he was directed to pay Rs. 1 lac as compensation to the mother of the deceased.[84]

Lenient View, when Called for--Release on Probation, if Permissible

Where a truck was being driven by the appellant and another truck tried to overtake his truck with the result that when he found that bullock cart was in front of him he tried to apply his brakes but there was insufficient time to apply them before he hit the bullock cart. The pipe got burst and on account of this, the brakes failed. Thereafter the truck was not under his control. The accident occurred because the truck behind him overtook him at a place which was a bridge and at a time when there was a bullock cart already in front of his truck. The driver of the truck behind the appellant was also rash and negligent in overtaking the truck at such a place and time. It was held that the petitioner could not be absolved of his guilt on this ground because if he had been driving carefully he could avoid the accident. His rash and negligent driving has been proved but considering the circumstance that his brakes1936 suddenly failed and that another truck also came and he lost control, the accused can be given benefit of probation[85] or the punishment awarded in such cases can be lenient.[86] Where there was some breakage in the hydraulic system of the brakes of the vehicle it would be proper to deal with the accused under s 360, CrPC or under the Probation of Offender's Act.[87] Age of the accused, his antecedents, the manner in which the accident took place, the conduct of the accused in removing the injured to the hospital immediately after the accident, his family liability etc, are other considerations on which the benefit of release on probation may be extended to the accused.[88]

A person found guilty and convicted for offence under s 279 and s 304A, IPC cannot be released on probation.[89]

Where death of two persons was caused by rash and negligent driving of the accused the case was not found fit for the exercise of power under s 4 of Probation of Offenders Act or s 360, CrPC though the accused was the only earning member of his family.[90] Where the accused driving the matador suddenly overtook a lorry and went to the extreme right and hit the deceased standing at that spot resulting in his death the request for benefit of Probation of Offenders Act to the accused was declined.[91]

Where due to rash and negligent driving of the truck by the accused a person died the accused was a first offender and belonged to a poor family and had a number of persons dependent on him. There was no complaint of the conduct during the trial, the parties had also settled their dispute, the accused had already undergone part of the sentence the Punjab and Haryana High Court, on these facts directed that the accused be released on probation for a period of three years under s 360, CrPC read with s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act on his furnishing a personal bond of the sum of Rs 10,000 with one surety of the like sum.[92] Where the accused who was convicted under ss 279, 338, IPC, has suffered the agony of trial for six years, he had also undergone a period of 10 days in custody and was not a previous convict, the accused was found entitled to the benefit of s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act .[93] But where the accused caused the death of five persons by rash and negligent driving his case was not fit for grant of probation under s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act . However, since the degree of the rashness and negligence was not that culpable and great the sentence imposed upon the accused was reduced to nine months RI and sentence of fine was confirmed.[94]1937

Implications of Day's Imprisonment

The punishment of one day's simple imprisonment is a sentence that is well known. Its purpose is to exercise clemency towards an accused, and so it is ordinarily passed where imprisonment is the only punishment allowed by law, and the court sees, in the circumstances of the case, grounds for passing the lightest possible sentence. In practice the person on whom it is passed is not placed in prison, but is to all intents and purposes as free as though the sentence had not been passed.[1]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 280.

Rash navigation of vessel.--

Whoever navigates any vessel in a manner so rash or negligent as to endanger human life, or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section, which deals with rash or negligent navigation, is analogous to the preceding section. It only extends its provisions to waterways. That section applies to public ways on land whereas this section applies to all waterways, whether public or private, and whether a sea, river, lake or canal. The section is, however, confined to inland navigation, and not to navigation on high seas.

Rash and negligent navigation on the high seas is not within the scope of this section. The Indian Merchant Shipping Act,[2] the Pilgrim Ships Act,[3] and the Native Passenger Ships Act,[4] provide for the safety of passengers on the high seas.

2. 'Vessel'

This word denotes anything made of the conveyance by water of human beings or of property.[5]

3. 'Rash or Negligent Navigation'

The manner in which the navigation is performed must be rash or negligent. The fact that a steam launch ran into a cargo boat at anchor is in itself prima facie evidence of negligent navigation.[6]1938

To support a conviction under this section there must be proof of rashness or negligence which endangers human life or is likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person. The immediate cause of the accident should be rashness or negligence on the part of the navigator. In considering the question of degree, the question of contributory negligence has also to be taken into account, not as a defence to the indictment, but for the purpose of determining causation and fixing a measure of the liability of the accused.[7]To make the captain of a steam vessel guilty of manslaughter, in causing a person to be drowned, by running down a boat, the prosecutor must show some act done by the captain; and mere omission on his part, in not doing the whole of his duty, is not sufficient. But, if there be sufficient light, and the captain is either at the helm, or in a situation to be giving the command, and does that which causes the injury, he is guilty of manslaughter.[8] It is a primary duty of steam vessels to keep out of the way of vessels lying at anchor. Where the water at the place of the collision is admittedly apt to be disturbed and uncertain owing to eddies, it is all the more incumbent on the Serang to give a wide berth to cargo boats at anchor, and the fact that he can into the stern of one of them would be, in itself, prima facie evidence of negligent navigation.[9]

4. 'In a Manner...So as to Endanger Human Life or to be Likely to Cause Hurt or Injury'

In a prosecution under this section, it is not enough to prove that the accused navigated the vessel in an extremely slovenly manner. It is necessary to prove that he navigated it in such a manner as to endanger human life or in a manner which was likely to cause hurt or injury to other persons.[10] Where a ferryboat was upset because it was sent without sufficient ballast and the ferry contractor was charged of having abetted the navigation of a vessel in a manner so rash as to endanger human life and was convicted under this section and s 109, it was held that, in the absence of evidence to show that the contractor intentionally omitted to provide the ferryboat with what he knew to be necessary for safe navigation, the conviction for abetment could not be supported.[11] As pointed out above, the immediate cause of the accident should be rashness or negligence on the part of the navigator. But where a boat, carrying passengers more than its carrying capacity, capsized, it was held that the accused were guilty under this section and s 304A of this Code.'[12]

5. Quashing of FIR

Where except the master of the vessel, the responsibility of the crew for navigation of the vessel that they courted the disaster by design is not spelled out from the allegations in the FIR under ss 280 and 336 of the Indian Penal Code 1860 and s 14 of Foreigners Act 1946, and the documents produced in the case and the circumstances also do not prima facie indicate that the accused persons entered the territorial waters, willfully and even if so, they are entitled for innocent passage, being the members of the crew of a fishing vessel as per the existing laws and the1939 International Conventions, a conclusion which is unexceptionable. Except the accused, the master of the vessel, the other accused persons were not responsible for rash and negligent navigation. Evidently, the rest of the crew members who belong to different nationalities, were working in the fishing vessel to earn their livelihood. In the circumstances and for the reasons mentioned above, the case registered against the rest of the crew members except the master of the vessel was quashed.[13]

6. 'Endanger Human Life'

Notes under s 279 may be referred to.

7. 'Hurt'

Notes under s 319 may be referred to.

8. 'Injury'

Notes under s 44 may be referred to.

9. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable, but a summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable offence but not compoundable. It can be tried by any magistrate and can also be tried summarily.

The cognizance of this offence can be taken within one year.

Non-compoundable

Offences punishable under ss 279 and 304 A, IPC are not mentioned in the two tables of s 320, CrPC, the offences are not compoundable.[14]

10. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of notice under s 251, CrPC 1973 may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate etc) hereby give notice to you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....20.....at..... navigated a vessel (name the vessel) in a manner so rash (or negligent) as to endanger human life [or to be likely to cause hurt (or injury) to any other person], and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 280 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

11. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will be necessary to prove that:

(i) the accused navigated a vessel;
(ii) he did so, in a rash or negligent manner; and
(iii) the manner of navigation was such as to endanger human life, or such as to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 281.

Exhibition of false light, mark or buoy.--

Whoever exhibits any false light, mark or buoy, intending or knowing it to be likely that such exhibition will mislead any navigator, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with exhibition of false signals to a vessel. It punishes exhibiting a false light, mark or buoy (ie an anchored floating seamark for showing navigable course) with the intention and knowledge that such an action would mislead a navigator. *Mens rea*is an essential ingredient of the offence under this section. Where the act is not intentional but due to negligence, it will not be within the purview of this section.

2. Analogous Law

The provision of this section are analogous to the provisions of s 47 of the English Malicious Damage Act 1861[15]as amended by the Criminal Justice Act 1948, s 1 which reads:

> Whosoever shall, unlawfully mark, alter, or remove any light or signal, or unlawfully exhibit any false light or signal, with intent to bring any ship, vessel, or boat into danger, or shall unlawfully and maliciously do anything tending to the immediate loss or destruction any ship, vessel, or boat, and for which no punishment is hereinbefore provided, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the Court to be imprisoned for life...

3. Voluntary Exhibition of False Lights, Etc

A person who intends a certain effect of his actions, or knows that such an effect is likely, causes that effect 'voluntarily' under s 39, negligence is excluded by the terms in the section, only conduct accompanied by consciousness in regard to its likely consequence being punishable therein. A negligent act of the kind would fall under s 283, post.1941

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable and a warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The offence is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

There is no time limit for taking cognizance of this offence.

5. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

I (name and office of magistrate etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....did exhibit a false light (or mark or buoy) knowing (or intending) it to be likely that the exhibition of the said false light (or mark or buoy) would mislead the officer in charge of the navigation of any vessel; and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 281 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

6. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will be necessary to prove that:

(i) the accused exhibited a false light, mark or buoy; and
(ii) he did so with the intention or knowledge of misleading any navigator.

15 24 and 25 Vict c 97. Section 1 of the Malicious Damage Act 1861, now repealed by the Criminal Damage Act 1971.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

S. 282.

Conveying person by water for hire in unsafe or overloaded vessel.--

Whoever knowingly or negligently conveys, or causes to be conveyed for hire, any person by water in any vessel, when that vessel is in such a state or so loaded as to endanger the life of that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section which is confined to common carrier by water, deals with conveying persons by water, for hire in unsafe or overloaded vessels. The offence consists in conveying a passenger for hire in vessel which is so unseaworthy, either from its own condition or from the way in which it is loaded, as to endanger his life. The offence is not confined only to overloading, but includes carrying a passenger in an unsafe vessel. But a person is liable under this section only if he conveys a passenger in an unsafe vessel 'knowingly or negligently'. If an overloaded launch does not capsize1942 on account of the negligence of the owners but because of the stampede that followed the sudden rush of persons, waiting at the jetty, which resulted in a displacement of the balance of the launch and breaking away of the ropes, the owner and master of the launch cannot be held guilty under this section.[16]

2. 'Whoever'

This word is wide enough to include a boatman, a lessee of a ferry,[17] or the owner of a vessel.[18]

3. 'Knowingly or Negligently'

Apparently the word 'knowingly' takes the same meaning as 'rashly', ie, the party runs a risk of which he is conscious, but he thinks that the mischief will probably be averted in the given instance.[19] If, on the other hand, he 'negligently' conveys ie, conveys in a negligent manner, and gives no thought to the possible consequences of his conduct, or thinks about them insufficiently then the offence will come within the mischief of this section. Criminal negligence is gross and culpable neglect or failure to exercise that reasonable and proper care to guard against injury either to the public in general or to the individual in particular which, having regard to the circumstances, it was the imperative duty of the accused person to have adopted.

4. Mere Unseaworthiness of Vessel not Sufficient

To constitute an offence under this section, it is not sufficient that the vessel was not in a seaworthy state, it must have been known by the accused to be in such a state, or he must have occupied such a position that his ignorance of it amounts to negligence. The owner of a ship would be bound to take all proper precautions to ascertain whether or not his ship was seaworthy. The manager of a booking-office, at which passengers are supplied with tickets for any vessel they wish to select, would be under no such obligation. It is also to be remembered that seaworthiness is a relative term, and merely means fitness to perform the service which the vessel is about to undertake. A ship may be fit to undertake a small coasting voyage, with an ordinary cargo, when it may not be fit to go to a distant country in the typhoon season, or to carry a load of machinery.[20]

5. Owner of Boat when Liable for Overloading by Boatman--Liability of the Lessee of a Ferry

Where the owner of a boat who knowingly or negligently permits overloading of his boat so as to endanger the safety of the passengers travelling therein, he is guilty under this section. He cannot shift his liability to the tindal (boatman) who was in actual charge of the boat at the time of overloading. Even when there is no proof that he actually knew about the overloading, his negligence will make him liable if he did not take due care and attention.[21] Criminal negligence is gross and culpable neglect or failure to exercise that reasonable and proper care to guard against injury either to1943 the public in general or to the individual in particular, which having regard to the circumstances it was the imperative duty of the accused person to have adopted. The lessee of a ferry ought to know that overloading, particularly in the middle of the monsoon, would be dangerous and it is his duty to take proper precautions to ensure that his majhis (boatman) do not overload boats. He should not only give definite instructions to them not to overload the boats but also see that the majhis carry out the instruction. It would be culpable negligence on his part if he leaves the whole matter in the hands of boatman and thus leave the passengers to their fate.[22]

6. 'To Endanger'

It must be proved that the life of the person was, as a fact, endangered by the state of the vessel.

7. 'Conveyed for Hire'

The person whose life is endangered must be a person 'conveyed for hire' ie, a passenger.[23] Endangering the lives of officers and crews of a ship by sending it to sea in an unseaworthy condition is punishable under s 336, IPC, and not under this section.

8. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognisable but a summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by any magistrate.

The cognizance of this offence can be taken within a year.

9. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC 1973 may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of.....at.....knowingly or negligently conveyed, (or caused to be conveyed) for hire..... (name the person) by water in the vessel (name the vessel) when that vessel was in such a state (or so loaded) as to endanger the life of the said..... (name the person), and thereby committed the offence punishable under section 282 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

10. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will be necessary to prove that:

(i) the accused conveyed a person for hire, or caused the same to be done;1944
(ii) the conveyance was by water in a vessel;
(iii) such vessel was at that time in such a state, or so loaded, as to be dangerous to the life of that passenger; and
(iv) when he conveyed such person in the vessel, the accused knew of the state of such vessel, or he acted negligently.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 283.

Danger or obstruction in public way or line of navigation.--

Whoever, by doing any act, or by omitting to take order with any property in his possession or under his charge, causes danger, obstruction or injury to any person in any public way or public line of navigation, shall be punished with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees.

Comments

1. Scope

This section penalises causing danger or obstruction to any person in a public way or public line or navigation. This section refers to parties who do acts so as to cause danger, obstruction, or injury to any person in any public way.[24] It applies not only to persons who do some positive act, but also to those who omit to take order with any property in his possession or under his charge, and is based on the maxim Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas (so use your own as not to cause injury to another). The section is enacted to protect persons in the exercise of their public right. A public nuisance may undoubtedly be caused without any deliberate intention of causing it, and this section and indeed s 290, do not refer to the intention of the accused person. The obstruction may be caused by negligence, and in nine cases out of ten it is so caused.[25] The section cannot, however, be extended to a case where a party prohibits strangers from passing through its field even though they may have been allowed access on earlier occasions.[26]

2. Essential Ingredients of the Offence

The section has the following two ingredients:

(i) A person must do an act or omit to take order with any property in his possession or under his charge.1945
(ii) Such act or omission must cause danger, obstruction, or injury to any person in any public way or in the public line of navigation.

3. 'Whoever'

It is the author of the act, which caused the obstruction, etc, who is liable under this section, and not the person who may use the obstruction. Thus, where a hut encroached upon a public way and caused obstruction, it is the person who constructed the hut, who is liable and not the person who takes it on rent and opens a shop.[27]

Owner and Contractor

Where the accused employed a contractor to supply materials for the repair of a temple, and the contractor placed some girders on a public way and thereby caused an obstruction, but there was nothing to show that the accused directed or sanctioned the contractor to place the girders on the road, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section.[28]

Occupier and the Owner

With regard to an omission to take order with any property, the person liable under this section is the person who is in possession or charge of the property. Prima facie this person is the actual occupant, whether he is the owner or tenant, and it makes no difference in the latter case that, as between himself and his landlord, the latter is liable to make repairs.

As the danger is the matter that concerns the public, the public are to look to the occupier and not to the estate, which is not material in such cases to the public.'[29]

Liability in a Case of Nuisance

According to the civil law, and a fortiori according to criminal law, a landlord is not liable merely because premises in the occupation of a tenant are in such a state as to amount to a nuisance.[30] Nor does he become liable for a nuisance created by a tenant merely because, when the tenancy came to an end, he renewed it, the property with the nuisance on it never having got back again into his hands.[31] If, however, he has himself created the nuisance, he is of course, the person liable,[32] and if the nuisance is one of a continuing character, he does not free himself from liability by letting the premises to a tenant.[33] The occupation of servants or agents will be the occupation of their employers, though of course they would be personally liable for any nuisance created by themselves.[34]

4. Meaning of Act

'Act' is here contrasted with 'omitting' and thus bears its strict sense of something positive (refer to s 32, IPC). The word 'act' used in this section cannot be read in1946 such a wide sense that mere standing on the road without anything more is such an act as punishable under this section. If that were so, then anybody out of a crowd witnessing a fair or procession standing on the road might be hauled up under this section.[35]

5. 'By Doing any Act'

What is punishable under this section is not any act, but only an act which causes danger, obstruction or injury to any one. 'Anyone' does not mean 'everyone'. The liability results from the consequences to the individual harmed and not from any impropriety in the act itself. If there is a legal right to do the act, of course it is not punishable, unless it is improperly performed. Thus, an act done under statutory authority is not punishable even if it causes injury to somebody.[36] It would, of course, be otherwise, if the statutory authority was negligently or improperly carried out.[37] Similarly, there are some acts which are so necessary to the ordinary enjoyment of property, that they are lawful, even though they cause a temporary obstruction to the highway, such as the stoppage of carts to unload goods into a warehouse, or the erection of a hoarding to protect the public while buildings are being repaired.[38]

The occasional inconvenience arising from crowds of persons or a carriage blocking up the road when private entertainment is being given is not punishable if reasonable precautions are taken to mitigate the evil but it is a nuisance that the streets should be blocked up night after night by crowds waiting to enter a theatre, and it would be punishable even though only a single person complained that access to his house was obstructed.[39]

6. 'Or by Omitting to take Order'

The word 'omitting' seems to be used in the popular sense of the word 'omission',[40]ie, intentional or unintentional non-doing, and therefore, includes a mere neglect to take order. The offence by omission is an omission 'to take order', ie, to dispose of the property in such a way as to prevent the danger, obstruction or injury, but the omission must be the cause of the injury, and not some unavoidable event, such as a flood.

The danger or injury must be such as would naturally flow from the act. Therefore, where the defendant, being in possession of land abutting on a public footway, excavated an area in the course of building a house immediately adjoining the footway, and left it unprotected, and a person walking in the night fell in, the defendant was held to be liable though in point of law, the party who fell in was off the road, and was in law a trespasser.[41] But the contrary was held where a man made a well in the middle of his field, through which there was a right of way, and a person straying off the path at night, fell into it. Martin B, after citing the last case with approval said:1947

> But when the excavation is made at some distance from the way, and the person falling into it would be a trespasser upon the defendant's land before he reached it, the case seems to be different. We do not see where the liability is to stop. A man going off a road in a dark night, and losing his way, may wander to any extent. We think the proper and true test of legal liability is, whether the excavation be substantially adjoining the way.[42]

7. 'Any property'

The property may be movable or immovable. Notes under s 22 may be referred to.

8. 'Possession'

Notes under s 27 may be referred to.

9. 'In his Possession or under his Charge'

This expression means 'in his possession or custody',[43] and the essence of both is effective control. Hence, neither is the owner of a wrecked and abandoned ship is liable for the danger, obstruction or injury caused by it,[44] nor is the late owner of a bull which has been set at large according to the religious practice of the Hindus.[45]

But every shopkeeper in a public street, although he has a right to exhibit his wares in any way he likes in his shop, must exercise his right so as not to cause annoyance or nuisance to the public, as by attracting large crowds in the public street.[46]

10. 'With any Property in his Possession or under his Charge'

The words 'with any property in his possession or under his charge' are not to be read with the word 'act'. They are to be read only with the phrase 'by omitting to take order'. As observed by Sharma J in

Badrinarain v State :[47]

> So far as the Acts of the Indian Legislature and the Constitution of India are concerned, it has been held that in India, the punctuations in the statutes should not be ignored. We cannot, therefore, ignore the comma after the words 'by doing any act' and giving it significance, we hold that the words 'or by omitting to take order with any property in his possession or under his charge' are disjunctive and not conjunctive to 'by doing any act'. If the words 'with any property in his possession or under his charge', were intended by the Legislature to qualify the word 'act' also, it would not have been necessary to add the words 'or by omitting to take order' as under s 32 of the Indian Penal Code, the words which refer to acts done also extend to illegal omission. The words 'by doing any act with any property in his possession or under his charge' would therefore have included illegal omission to take order with any property in his possession or under his charge.

As it was the intention of the legislature to restrict the omission only to any property in the possession or under the charge of the accused, the expression 'or by omitting1948 to take order with any property in his possession or under his charge' had to be added.

11. 'Causes'

The danger, obstruction, or injury must be caused, ie, the mere act or omission is not per se punishable, as in the case of rashness or negligence (except in the case of negligence, which is excluded in s 281, in ss 279 - 282 and ss 284 - 289, IPC).

Where there was no evidence of any kind to the effect that the accused by driving their carts on the road caused danger, obstruction or injury to any person on the road, their conviction under s 283, IPC, cannot be sustained.[48]

12. Obstruction

Every obstruction must endanger and inconvenience, but the converse is not true. Every inconvenience need not necessarily arise out of obstruction. Where the accused placed logs at a space of seven feet in width on a road, which was 24 feet in width, but there was no finding or evidence that the stacking, caused injury, danger or annoyance, it was held that there was no obstruction within the meaning of this section and the accused could not be convicted under this section or under s 200, IPC .[49]

Where the accused driver was alleged to have negligently parked a tractor trolley duly loaded with fertilizers in the middle of the road without there being any signal of its being stationary and as such three persons who were proceeding on a motorcycle collided with the stationary trolley and sustained severe injuries. Initially a challan was filed against the accused only for offence under s 283, IPC, and subsequently a supplementary challan was filed under s 304A, IPC, and the court of the additional chief judicial magistrate took cognizance of both the offences. The petition filed by the accused under s 482, CrPC for quashing criminal proceeding against him before the additional chief judicial magistrate was dismissed by the Rajasthan High Court as there was ample material on record of the learned trial court to take cognizance of the offence under ss 283 and 304A, IPC against the accused petitioners.[50]Section 283 does not refer to the intention of the accused. The obstruction may be caused by negligence and in nine cases out of ten it is so caused.[51] Where the sub-inspector was exercising his public right to ride along the side of the road and it was admitted that the side of the road was occupied by the charpoy of the accused, and the circumstance were such that the sub-inspector was undoubtedly obstructed, the conviction of the accused under s 283, IPC, was found proper.[52] Notes and s 280 may be referred to.

13. Injury to any Person

The injury to any person means any harm illegally caused to his body or to his property.[53] The harm in these cases can clearly be only physical.1949

14. 'To any Person'

Obstruction to the public does not bring an act under this section, but under s 290 . For an offence under this section there must be obstruction to some particular person or class of persons in a public way, etc.[54]

An appropriation of part of a street by building over it does not constitute an offence under this section, in the absence of evidence that danger, obstruction, or injury was caused thereby. It would fall under ss 278 and 290 .[55]

15. 'In any Public Way'

A public way is a place over which members of the public have the right to pass, either individually or in a number collectively. But a highway cannot be so used as to exclude other persons, equally entitled, from the use of it.[56]

Private and Customary Way

As pointed out in Pran Nath Kundu v Emperor ,[57] where the privilege to use a road is enjoyed only by one particular section of the community or by inhabitants of two or three villages and not by others the road is not a public road.[58] Where there is the intention to allow, not the public generally but merely visitors to or traders with the people of the village, or ways allowed to be used by villagers to go to a church or marked to the common fields of a village, such ways are not regarded as public ways but private ways and they generally have their origin in custom.[59] Such a customary way can be converted into an ordinary highway after use by the general public sufficient to raise the presumption of dedication.[60] But the evidence in support of the public claim must be cogent.[61]

Where a municipality had constructed a barrel drain in the highway, and then allowed it to fall out of repair, so that it became a hole into which a man and horse fell, Sir Barnes Peacock J, said:

> Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that the applicants by reason of the construction of the drain, and their neglect to repair it, whereby the dangerous hole was formed, which was left open and unfenced, caused a nuisance on the highway, for which they were liable to an indictment. This being so, their Lordships are of opinion that the corporation are also liable to an action at the suit of any person who sustained a direct and particular damage from their breach of duty.[62]

Where the accused obstructed by building a stone wall across a cart track which he claimed to be in his private patta land, and he claimed a right to close it by putting a1950 wall, it was held that he could be convicted under this section, but could be proceeded under s 133, CrPC .[63]

16. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable, but a summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable offence but not compoundable. It can be tried by any magistrate and summarily.

The cognizance of this offence can be taken within six months only.

17. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC, 1973 may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of.....at.....did.....(name the act) (or omitted to take order) with...(name the property) in your possession (or under your charge), and thereby caused danger, obstruction or injury to (name the person) in the public way (name the way) [or in the public line of navigation (name the life of navigation)] and thereby committed an offence under section 283 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

18. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused did some act or omitted to take order with a property in his possession or charge; and
(ii) the said act or omission caused danger, obstruction or injury to some person in any public way or public line of navigation.

For a conviction under this section, there must be proof of obstruction to the road so as to cause danger or injury to any person passing the road without which there can be no conviction.[64]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

S. 284.

Negligent conduct with respect to poisonous substance.--

Whoever does, with any poisonous substance, any act in a manner so rash or negligent as to endanger human life, or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any person, or knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with any poisonous substance in his possession as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from such poisonous substance,1951 shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with negligent conduct with respect to poisonous substance. To sustain a conviction under this section, it is sufficient that a person in possession of a poisonous substance should have negligently omitted to take such order with it as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from the poisonous substance. The gist of the offence is culpable negligence, and the fact that a person has the custody of any dangerous substance suffices by itself to impose upon him the duty of being careful. It is not necessary to constitute an offence under this section, that the negligent omission punishable under the section should be followed by any disastrous consequences.[65]

2. Meaning of Act

Commentary under the same heading in s 283, ante may be referred to.

The word 'act' in ss 284 - 287, IPC is contrasted with the word 'omission' and thus, having regard to the context, it signifies a thing or things done, i.e., positive, as contrasted with negative conduct.[66]

3. 'Rash or Negligent'

Notes under s 279 may be referred to.

4. 'Endanger Human Life'

Notes under s 279 referred to.

5. 'Hurt'

Notes under s 319 may be referred to.

If hurt is actually caused by the rash or negligent act, the case falls within the ambit of s 337,[67] and not under this section.

6. 'Injury'

Notes under s 44 may be referred to.1952

7. 'Knowingly or Negligently Omits'

Both these mental states relate to non-doing and negative conduct, ie, something is not done by the agent, knowingly or negligently.

8. 'To take such Order'

Where the accused, who was a police sergeant, took over a desk containing poisonous powders and also some other powders, which might easily be mistaken one for the other, without taking any precaution whatever to guard against misuse of the poison, and the only order he took with the poison subsequently was to hand over the key of the receptacle, in which the powders were kept, to a subordinate official, who by mistake issued some of the poisonous powders to a person suffering from fever who took one of the powders and died, it was held, that on the above facts, a conviction under this section was sustainable, but not under s 304A .[68]

Notes under s 283 may be referred to.

9. 'Possession'

Notes under s 27 may be referred to.

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable but a summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable offence but not compoundable. It is triable by any magistrate and may also be tried summarily. Offences punishable under ss 279 and 304, IPC are not compoundable.[69]

The limitation for taking cognizance of this offence is one year.

11. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC, 1973 may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of.....did (name the act) with..... (name the poisonous substance) in a manner so rash (or negligent) as to endanger human life, [or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to (name the person)], [or knowingly (or negligently) omitted to take such order with.....(name the poisonous substances) in your possession as is sufficient to guard against probable danger to human life from such poisonous substance], and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 284 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

12. Proof

The following points require proof for a conviction under this section:

(i) Where the first para of the section is applicable:

(a) that the substance in question was poisonous;
(b) that it was capable of endangering human life or of causing hurt or injury to any person;

(c) that the accused did some act with it; and
(d) that the act was rash or negligent, so as to endanger human life or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any person.

(ii) Where the second para of the section is applicable:

(a) that the accused was in possession of a poisonous substance;
(b) that there was probable danger to human life from it; and
(c) that the accused knowingly or negligently omitted to take such order with it as to guard against such danger.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 285.

Negligent conduct with respect to fire or combustible matter.--

Whoever does, with fire or any combustible matter, any act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life, or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person, or knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with any fire or any combustible matter in his possession as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from such fire or combustible matter, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with negligent conduct with respect to fire or combustible matter. It extends the provisions of the preceding section, to fire or any combustible matter. For an offence under this section it is not necessary to show any danger to human life; it is sufficient to prove likelihood of hurt or injury to any person.[70] Where the management had not taken safety measures, as such the occurrence took place, prosecution of the accused under s 92 of the Factories Act was proper, was not permissible under the general law.[71]1954

2. Part I of Section 285 Distinguished from Section 435,IPC

The actus reus for an offence under the first part of s 285, IPC would be established in every case where the actus reus for an offence under s 435, IPC is made out. But the mens rea for the two offences is different. The mens rea for an offence under s 435, IPC is doing of a wrongful act with the requisite intention or knowledge of the likelihood to cause wrongful loss or damage to any person by the wrongful act. The mens rea for an offence under the first part of s 285, IPC is, however, rashness or negligence in doing the wrongful act.[72]

3. 'Combustible Matter'

Matter is said to be combustible if it is inflammable or capable of catching fire. The expression 'combustible matter' includes bidis,[73] fireworks,[74] and gunpowder or combustible fluids like naphtha.[75] Erecting gunpowder mills or keeping gunpowder magazines near a town is a public nuisance at common law. In R v Lister ,[76] it was held to be an indictable offence to deposit and keep large quantities of naphtha in such local circumstances as to create real danger to life and property, and further that although in the opinion of scientific men the manufacture and keeping of the material was carried on so carefully as to produce no danger, yet there was no doubt that its liability to danger ab extra might make it a public nuisance.

4. 'Rashly or Negligently'

Where the accused had a quarrel with his wife, got angry, broke the crockery and then went out and set fire to the eaves of his house, thereby causing risk of injury to the house owners in the neighbourhood but doing no actual mischief, it was held that this section was not applicable as his act was wilful and not rash and negligent.[77]

The owner of a house, in which a fire breaks out, cannot be convicted under this section, without proving actual carelessness or an illegal omission in the owner, from which rashness or negligence can be inferred. There may be conduct either by act or omission from which rashness or negligence may be inferred, which would require the accused to rebut it by evidence; but such an inference cannot be made merely because a fire breaks out and destroys property or occasions risk to life or property. Evidence of actual carelessness or of an illegal omission to take order with fire must generally be shown, before the party, by or through whom a fire is aid to be occasioned, can be convicted.[78] The mere fact that a man's house is burnt owing to causes which cannot be discovered, furnishes no ground for the assumption that he has been guilty of negligence under this section. The negligence must be clearly proved.[79] The mere letting off of a fire balloon cannot, therefore, in the absence of proof of rashness or negligence, be a ground of conviction.[80]The act of accused in setting fire to the tobacco stock inside the house after pouring petrol and further act of throwing petrol on the deceased when he tried to pacify, cannot be held either as1955 rash or negligent act so as to attract the offence under s 285 of IPC .[81]So also the accused could not be prosecuted for a rash and negligent act, which is the basic requirement of offences alleged, merely because he was incharge of a section.[82]

Commentary under s 279 may be referred to.

5. 'Endanger Human Life'

Notes under s 279 may be referred to.

6. 'Hurt'

Section 319 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

7. 'Injury'

The term 'injury' as used in this section, includes any harm illegally caused to the property of any other person, and is not confined to injury to the person only. While a marriage procession was going on, the accused, who was one of the members of the procession, used fireworks on the road, which burnt two bundles of straw with which a mandap (a temporary structure) belonging to the complainant was thatched, thereby causing him an injury. It was held that the accused was guilty under this section.[83] Where the accused was found smoking bidi close to half-pressed cotton bales lying close to the press house in the compound of a company, he was rightly convicted of negligent conduct with respect to fire or combustible matter causing thereby likelihood of injury to property.[84]

Section 44 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

8. 'Knowingly or Negligently'

Notes under s 284 may be referred to.

9. 'Take such Order'

Notes under s 283 and 284 may be referred to.

10. 'Possession'

Notes under s 27 may be referred to.

11. Procedure

Same as in the case of an offence under s 284 .

12. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC, 1973 may be adopted:1956

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....Day of.....at.....did..... (name the act) with fire (or the combustible matter) so rashly (or negligently) as to endanger human life (or to be likely to cause hurt) (or injury) to (name the other person) [or knowingly (or negligently)] omitted to take such order with fire (or the combustible matter) in your possession as was sufficient to guard against any probably danger to human life from such fire(or the combustible matter), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 285 of the Indian Penal Code, within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

13. Proof

In order to support a conviction under this section, the following matters must be proved:

(i) rash or negligent dealing with fire;
(ii) the rashness or negligence must be such as:

(a) endangers human life; or
(b) is likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person; or

(iii) there must be found intentional or negligent omission in dealing with fire to guard against probably danger to human life.[85]

In order to sustain a conviction under the above section, there must be evidence of rashness or of negligence of the accused.[86] It ought to be proved that on the part of the accused there was criminal negligence, as taking no proper precautions after discovering the fire.[87]

14. Conviction

In view of the provisions of s 221(2), CrPC 1973, an accused can be convicted under the first part of this section even if he has been charged only under s 435, IPC .[88]

15. Sentence

Where, due to the negligent act of the accused, fire breaks out in a factory, resulting in the death of seven persons, maximum punishment of six months' rigorous imprisonment to the accused cannot be said to be severe.[89]1957

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 286.

Negligent conduct with respect to explosive substance.--

Whoever does, with any explosive substance, any act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life, or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person, or knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with any explosive substance in his possession as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from that substance, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides for the punishment of a person who does any act with an explosive substance so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any person, or who knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with any explosive substance in his possession as is sufficient to guard against probable danger to human life from that substance.[90]

The preceding section dealt with 'negligent conduct with respect to fire or combustible matter' and this section deals with negligent conduct with respect to explosive substance. Otherwise in other respects, the provisions of both the sections are identical.

Whilst this section deals with rash or negligent conduct in respect of an 'explosive substance' (quite irrespective of any consequence of such conduct), mischief caused by an explosive substance is punishable under ss 435, 436 or 438, IPC, as the case may be, and the manufacture, possession, use, sale, transport and importation into India of such substances, is regulated by the Explosives Act 1884 (Act 4 of 1884), which is a penal Act, and the intentional causing, by an explosive substance, of 'an explosion of a nature likely to endanger life or to cause serious injury to property, whether any injury to person or property has been actually caused or not', or an attempt or abatement of such is punishable under the Explosive Substances Act (Act 6 of 1908).

2. Analogous Law

The provisions of this section are analogous to the English rule of common law, under which erecting gunpowder mills, or keeping gunpowder magazines near a town is a public nuisance at common law.[91]1958

3. Offence may be Committed in Two Ways

The rash or negligent conduct in regard to an explosive substance which is punishable under this section may take either of the two forms:

(i) an act done with such substance, which either endangers human life, or is likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person;
(ii) an omission (intentional or otherwise) to guard against a probably danger to human life, arising from such substance in the possession of the accused.

4. Extent of Liability under First Part of the Section

Like the last two sections, this section also has two parts. The first part deals with dangerous acts and the second with illegal omissions. The first part of the section is not confined to cases where the explosive substance is in possession of the accused at the time of the injury. It applies also to a case where the injury takes place after it left his possession and while it is being conveyed to its destination where it was sent by the accused without packing it properly.[92]

5. 'Explosive Substance'

This term is not defined in this Code, but according to s 4(d) of the Indian Explosives Act 1884, as substituted by the Indian Explosive (Amendment) Act 1978 (32 of 1978), 'explosive' means gunpowder, nitroglycerine, nitroglycol, gun-cotton, di-nitro-toluene, tri-nitro-toluene, picric acid, di-nitro-phenol, tri-nitro-resorcinol (styphnic acid), cyclo-trimethylene-tri-nitramine, penta-erythritol-tetranitrate, tetryl, nitro-guanidine, lead azide, lead styphynate,fulminate of mercury or any other metal, diazo-di-nitro-phenol, coloured fires or any other substance whether a single chemical compound or a mixture of substances, whether solid or liquid or gaseous used or manufactured with a view to produce a practical effect by explosion or pyrotechnic effect; and includes fog-signals, fireworks, fuses, rockets, percussion-caps, detonators, cartridges, ammunition of all descriptions and every adaptation or preparation of an explosive as defined in this clause.[93]

According to s 2(a) of the Explosive Substances Act 1908, 'explosive substance' shall be deemed to include any material for making any explosive substance; also any apparatus, machine, implement or material used, or intended to be used, or adapted for causing, or aiding in causing, any explosion in or with any explosive substance; also any part of any such apparatus, machine or implement. The term 'explosive substance' as used in s 4(b) of the said Act includes any part of any apparatus, machine, or implement intended to be used or adapted for causing or aiding in causing any explosive in or with any explosive substance; also any part of any such apparatus, machine or implement.[94]

A Part of Vessel may be Explosive Substance

The definition is of wide generality, and in the case of Rex v Charles ,[95] it was ruled that any part of a vessel which, when filled with an explosive substance, or adapted1959 for causing an explosion, is itself an explosive substance within the statute. The articles found with the accused in that case were a lead bolt, a fuse, a brass bolt, a screw, a brass casting, and evidence was given to show that these were various parts of a vessel, which when filled with chlorate of potash or other explosive substance, formed a bomb of a highly dangerous character.[1]

6. Revolver or Gun, if an Explosive Substance

It has been held by the Madras High Court in Kasia Pillai's case that a loaded revolver is not an 'explosive substance',[2] but the fireworks are.[3]

A contrary view has also been expressed and it has been held that a revolver, loaded or unloaded, is clearly an 'explosive substance' within the definition cited above in the undermentioned cases.[4] The view of the Madras High Court in Kasia Pillai also did not find favour with the Bombay High Court.[5] However, firing a loaded gun may come under s 286, IPC .[6]

7. 'Rashly or Negligently'

In a Madras case,[7] it was held that causing of hurt by negligence in the use of a gun would fall within the purview of s 337, and this section is not intended to apply to such a case. But whether the offence falls under this section or s 337, to sustain a conviction, it is necessary for the prosecution to prove affirmatively that the accused had been guilty of culpable rashness or negligence. Where the accused was out shooting with some friends and a pellet from his gun lodged in the thigh of the complainant, who was at work in the corner of his field, there was no evidence of the rashness or negligence on the part of the accused, but the magistrate inferred negligence from the fact that the accused fired the gun and the complainant was injured thereby, coupled with the fact that in the month of July people are out working in their fields, it was held that there being nothing on the record to show at what distance the accused was from the complainant, when he fired or even that the complainant was in the direct line of fire, and it was quite possible that the complainant was injured by a stray pellet accidentally deflected from its course, rashness or negligence was not proved, and the conviction was quashed.[8]

It is difficult to see how it is possible to contend, if the accused did fire the gun, and he fired the gun in that particular spot, it could be anything but a rash and negligent act.[9] Notes under s 279 may also be referred to.

8. 'So as to Endanger Human Life'

Under the first part of the action which deals with dangerous acts the substance need not necessarily be in the possession of the accused at the time of the injury (if any),1960*e.g.*, to dispatch fireworks, carelessly packed in a country cart, would be an offence under the section.[10]

Under the second part of the section, the explosive substance must be in the possession of the accused at the time of his omission to safeguard it.

Notes under s 279 may be referred to.

9. Bomb Explosion in Bus

There was explosion of a bomb kept inside a passenger bus which caused the death of one passenger and injuries to several passengers. The prosecution witnesses identified the accused appellant. There was enough material to connect the accused appellant with the heinous crime of planting a live bomb in a passenger bus and getting down from the same before the bomb exploded, thereby causing death of one person and grievous injuries on several other passengers. The accused appellant was convicted for offences under ss 285, 337, 338, 427 and 302, IPC and s 3 of the Explosive Substances Act .[11]

10. 'Hurt'

Notes under s 319 may be referred to.

11. Injury'

Injury means any harm illegally caused to the body or to the property of another. Notes under s 44 may be referred to.

12. 'Knowingly or Negligently'

The word 'knowingly' is evidently used here advisedly and the word 'intentionally' advisedly avoided. Whatever distinction there may be between 'knowingly or negligently' and 'rashly or negligently' it must be assumed that the former is purposely used in this part of the section while 'rashly' is used in the first clause, consciousness is involved in both, while intention is not. If a person omits to take precautions in respect of explosives in his possession sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life, being conscious of the probability of danger resulting from such omission, he 'knowingly' does that which under this section renders him liable to punishment. If a person omits to take such precautions without such consciousness, he is liable, by reason of his negligence, if he has not exercised the caution incumbent on him, and which, if he had exercised it, would have created in him the consciousness that his omission was likely to cause danger.[12]

13. 'Take such Order'

A, having returned from watching his crops, placed a loaded gun with its hammer down on the cap, on a cot outside his house, and went away for a short time. B, a neighbour's child, played with the gun, which went off and killed B. A was held not1961 guilty under this section, he having taken order sufficient to guard against any probable danger.[13]

Notes under s 283 may be referred to.

14. 'Possession'

Notes under s 27 may be referred to.

15. 'To Guard against any Probable Danger to Human Life'

Unless it is established that danger to human life was a probable consequence of the omission, the offence under this section is not established.[14]

16. Procedure

The same as in the case of an offence under s 284 .

Where the crakers were burst and they damaged the eyes of victim in the year 1995, the challan was filed in the year 2006, prosecution was filed beyond the period of limitation prescribed by s 468(2)(c), CrPC, the criminal proceedings were quashed.[15]

17. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC, 1973 may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of....., at....., acted with.....(name the explosive substance) so rashly (*or negligent*ly) as to endanger human life, (or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to) (name of the person) [or knowingly (or negligently) omitted to take such order with (name the explosive substance) in your possession as was sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from.....(name the explosive substance)], and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 286 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

18. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, prove the points, as mentioned in the last section, substituting 'explosive substance' for 'fire or combustible substance'.1962

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 287.

Negligent conduct with respect to machinery.--

Whoever does, with any machinery, any act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life, or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person, or knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with any machinery in his possession or under his care as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from such machinery, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The preceding section dealt with negligent conduct with respect to explosive substances while this section deals with negligent conduct with respect to machinery. In other respects both the sections are alike.

In Benu Krishna Mandal v State of Bihar ,[17] when the cooling tower was being lifted on the roof of the main building by a pulley, chains, ballis and ropes etc, the rope suddenly broke away and one labourer fell down and sustained injuries and later succumbed to the injuries. The factory inspector on inquiry was satisfied that the pulleys, chains etc, used for the purpose were sufficient and capable of lifting weight many times more than the registered weight of the tower and there was nothing specific to show that the accused had any hand in the alleged incident, the proceedings, against the accused persons for offences under ss 287, 288, 337, 120B, IPC, were quashed by the High Court in exercise of its powers under s 482, CrPC .

Where the impugned act is covered by the provisions of the Factories Act, prosecution would not be launched under s 287, IPC .[18]1963

2. Sections 287 and 304A --Distinction

Where negligent conduct with respect to machinery results in the death of a human being, the question arises whether the offence falls under s 304A, IPC or under this section. Section 304A , applies only to such acts of the accused as are rash or negligent and are directly the cause of the death of another person. Where the victim has no right to go near the machinery and it is never contemplated by the accused that any injury would be caused to him, nor is it his intention to cause any injury, the offence would fall under this section and not under s 304A .[19]

3. 'Whoever'

An employer who employs a competent engineer and does not fetter his discretion by instructions, is not criminally responsible for accidents.[20]

4. 'Act'

Notes under s 32 may be referred to.

5. 'Rashly or Negligently'

Notes under s 279 may be referred to.

6. 'Endanger Human Life'

Notes under s 279 may be referred to.

7. 'Hurt'

Notes under s 319 may be referred to.

8. 'Injury'

Notes under s 44 may be referred to.

9. 'Knowingly or Negligently'

Notes under s 286 may be referred to.

10. 'Take such Order'

In relation to machinery the order usually taken is to fence it.[21] A person may be guilty of an offence under this section although the person injured might not, by reason of his contributory negligence, be able to recover damages. It is to the interest of the State that machinery should be safe for negligent as well as careful people.[22]The hand of the victim was crushed while he was repairing conveyor belt. No negligence or overt act was attributed to the petitioner. It was also not the case that1964 the petitioner had not taken care/steps against the probable danger. No case under s 287 or s 304A, IPC against the petitioner was made out.[23]

Notes under s 286 may be referred to.

11. 'Possession'

Section 27 and the notes thereunder may be referred to.

12. 'Or under his Care'

In s 283 the expression used is 'under his charge'. The engineers[24] and mechanics,[25] employed in a mill may be said to have the machinery under their care.

Sleeping Partner not Liable

Where two partners took a lease of a mill, but one of them took no active part in the management of the mill which was left to the other partner, it was held that he could not be held liable under this section, for an accident due to the negligent conduct of the other partner with respect to the machinery in the mill.[26]

13. To Guard against any Probable Danger

What the section punishes is omission to take such order with the machinery as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger. The section does not say any possible danger; the owner is not required to provide perfect security against every possibility of danger. However remote, he ought to take reasonable precautions and so much care as insufficient to guard against such danger as can be expected within the bounds of probability.[27]

14. Procedure

The offence under this section is not cognisable. A summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It can be tried by any magistrate and can also be tried summarily.

The limitation prescribed for taking cognizance of this offence is one year.

15. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC 1973 may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of.....at.....acted with.....(name of the machinery) so rashly (or negligently) as to danger human life, (or to be likely to cause hurt) (or injury) (name the person) (or knowingly or negligently) omitted to take such order with (name the machinery) in your possession as was sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from the said machinery; and thereby committed an1965 offence punishable under section 287 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

16. Proof

In the case of an offence, under the first part of the section, the prosecution has to prove that:

(i) the accused committed some act with a machinery;
(ii) he did it rashly or negligently; and
(iii) his rashness or negligence was such as to endanger human life or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person.

In the case of an offence under the second part of the section, the prosecution must prove that:

(i) the accused was in possession of some machinery, or the same was under his care;
(ii) he omitted to take such order with it as was sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life therefore; and
(iii) the accused so omitted to do so knowingly or negligently.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

S. 288.

Negligent conduct with respect to pulling down or repairing buildings.--

Whoever, in pulling down or repairing any building, knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with that building as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from the fall of that building, or of any part thereof, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with negligent conduct with respect to pulling down or repairing a building. It contemplates only an omission and not a positive act, to safeguard against probable danger to human life. If the building is situated on public way and the omission to take order with it causes danger to any person, s 283, IPC, and not this section, will apply.1966

What the section requires is that the accused must knowingly or negligently omit to take such orders with the building as is sufficient to guard against a probable danger to human life 'from the fall of that building or of any part thereof'. Hence, the injury, complained of must be the consequence of the fall of the building or any part thereof. A worker, throwing a brick negligently, may be responsible for his rash or negligent act, but a contractor who has engaged a worker in a work of construction, cannot be held guilty of omitting to take such order as is sufficient to guard against a probable danger to human life from the fall of a building or any part thereof if the injury is caused not because the building, or any part thereof, fell, but because the worker threw a brick carelessly or negligently.[28]

2. 'In Pulling Down or Repairing'

The collapse of a house not undergoing such operations, as mentioned in this section cannot come under this section.[29]

A close reading of the s 288, IPC would show that the starting point of the offence is the pulling down of a building or part thereof or repairing the same. It is while pulling down or repairing is in process that offence contemplated by the section can take place. The offence lies in the one who pulls down or the repairer who, knowingly or negligently omitted to do certain things. What the section requires the one who pulls down or the repairer to do is 'to take such order with that building'. These words imply no more than the taking of such steps with reference to the building. The purpose of taking the said steps is, to guard against any probable danger to human life. The need to guard against the probable danger of human life is from the fall of the building or any part thereof. The offence can be committed only while the building is being pulled down or repaired. Once the pulling down or repairing is completed, the offence cannot be committed regardless of the deficiencies in the carrying out of repairs.[30]

For Scaffolding put by Contractor/Labourers Owner of Building is not Liable

Section 288, IPC concerns itself with a situation where a person, in pulling down or repairing any building, knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with that building as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from the fall of that building, or any part thereof. The scaffolding put up by the contractor and/or the labourers themselves cannot fall within the sweep of this section when the owner of the building had assigned the job of plastering to the contractor and/or the labourers and there was nothing else left for him to do. Therefore, it cannot be construed that he knowingly or negligently omitted to take such order as is required under s 288, IPC . Accordingly, the ingredients of s 288 are not made out against such owner.[31]1967

3. 'Knowingly or Negligently'

Notes to s 286 may be referred to.

4. 'Such Order with that Building as is Sufficient'

The degree of precaution required by this section varies with the actual necessity of the situation of the case. If a dilapidated building is situated in a populous place more care will be needed than where the building under the same circumstances stands in a desired place.

5. Procedure

The same as in the case of an offence under s 287 .

6. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC 1973 may be adopted:

> I (name and office of the magistrate etc), hereby notice to you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you on or about the.....day of....., at....., by pulling down (or repairing) (name the building) knowingly (or negligently) omitted to take such order with (name the building) as was sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life for the fall of (name the building) (or of any part thereof), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 288 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.
> Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

7. Proof

To establish an offence under this section it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused was pulling down or repairing a building;
(ii) in doing so he omitted to take such order therewith as to guard against any probable danger from the fall of the building or any part thereof; and
(iii) the accused omitted to do so knowingly or negligently.

Chapter XIV

S. 289.

Negligent conduct with respect to animal.--

Whoever knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with any animal in his possession as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life, or any probable danger of grievous hurt from such animal, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to on one thousand rupees, or with both.1968

Comments

1. Scope

The section deals with improper or careless management of animals. The section refers to animals in possession and of probable danger to human life or of causing grievous hurt.[32] It applies to all animals whether wild and ferocious or domestic.

Like the previous one, this section also deals with criminal omissions and not with positive acts.

2. Essential Ingredient

The essential ingredient of the offence under this section is that there should be probable danger to human life or limb from the negligence of the accused in not managing his animal.[33]

3. Section 289 and Section 323

If in a case falling under this section simple hurt is caused by the animal, the conviction of the accused should be under this section and not under s 323 .[34]

4. 'Whoever'

It is not only a servant, who is actually in charge of an animal, but the master also may be held liable under this section. When an old woman was gored to death by a buffalo, not only the herdsman who was in charge of the animal, but also the master was held liable under this section as the buffalo was known to be a dangerous animal which had attacked several persons, and no special precautions were taken regarding it.[35]

5. 'Knowingly or Negligently'

The offence under this section consists principally in a 'knowing or negligent omission' and not merely in an omission, which is no offence under the Indian Penal Code .[36] The principal point to be considered under this section will be the knowledge that the accused had of the dangerous propensities of the animal. Where the very nature of the animal gives him warning, his knowledge will be assumed; as, for instance, if a person were to make a pet of a tiger, or a bear. Otherwise, express1969 knowledge will have to be shown, in order to involve the necessity of unusual caution. Where injury is done by a horse, a pony, a bull, or a dog, and it is not shown that the animal was peculiarly vicious, or that his vice was known to his master, no indictment could be maintained, unless he had neglected the ordinary precautions employed by everyone who uses such animals. But if the animal had shown a savage disposition to the knowledge of the owner, it would not be necessary to show that he had actually injured anyone. In considering the knowledge of the master, it is material to inquire what knowledge as to the dangerous propensities of the animal was possessed by his servants. Their knowledge will not necessarily be imputed to him, but it will be a question for determination whether the persons who received actual notice of such facts stood in such a relation to the accused that it was their duty to communicate the notice to him, and whether in fact they did communicate it.

Negligence to be Inferred under the Rule of Civil Law in Certain Cases

Where the animal is known to be mischievous, or is of the class of undomesticated animals, which from their very nature are dangerous, though capable of being brought under a certain degree of subjection, the rule of civil law seems to be to infer negligence absolutely, from the mere fact that an injury has followed. Where the injury arose from a savage, the conclusion to be drawn from an examination of all the authorities appears to be this, that a person keeping a mischievous animal, with knowledge of its propensities, is bound to keep it secure at his peril; and that if it does mischief, negligence is presumed, without express averment. The negligence is in 'keeping such an animal after notice'.[37] This case was followed, and the general principle approved, where the injury was caused by an elephant which was being exhibited by the defendants.[38]

Presumption of Negligence in certain Cases

In the case of a ferocious animal it is quite clear that to allow it liberty is in itself likely to cause danger to human beings. But in the case of a dog, it must be shown that it is likely to bite human beings. There is no presumption in the case of an ordinary domestic dog that it is likely to bite human beings. There are many dogs that are likely and there are some dogs that are actually trained to do so. But it must be proved against the owner of the dog that this particular dog had a tendency or character of biting human beings.[39]

Case Laws on the Point Discussed

Before the owner or keeper of an animal can be convicted under this section, for negligence with respect to his animal, it must be made out that the animal was known to be ferocious, and that it was negligently kept. It is, however, not necessary to show that the animal had actually bitten or injured another person before it bit or injured the complainant; it would be enough to show that, to the knowledge of the owner, it had evidenced a savage disposition, eg by attempting to bite.[40] It must be shown that the accused knew that the animal was of a savage disposition as against human beings. A person cannot be convicted under this section merely because his buffalo1970 attacked and injured the complainant's buffalo.[41] The mere fact that a rope tied to a bullock when violently strained, broke, affords no proof of negligence.[42] Where the accused's bullock escaped from the herd, and straying into a hospital chewed some clothes, it was held that the omission of the accused to search for it in the hospital, which was close to his house and where he ought naturally to have suspected it would go, was not such negligence as to bring him within the provisions of this section.[43] The tethering of a horse in a narrow street where people cannot pass without going near the animal's hind legs is a negligent omission to take order with the animal sufficient to satisfy the requirements of this section.[44]

6. 'Omits to take such Order'

In order to convict a person of an offence under this section, it must be established in the affirmative that the accused knowingly or negligently omitted to take such order with the animal in question as was sufficient to guard against probable danger to human life or probable danger of grievous hurt from such animal. It should, therefore, be established in the affirmative that there was a probability that the animal would cause grievous hurt or danger to human life.[45] The degree of care or order, omission to take which is punishable under this section, differs in the case of different animals. There are some animals naturally so fierce that all persons acquainted with their habits are aware that danger to human life or risk of grievous hurt is the probable consequence of allowing them to be at large. There are other animals or which at least when domesticated, there is no probability of such danger or risk in allowing them to be at large even without a herdsman. As to animals of the latter class, there should be some evidence that the animal, of which the person in possession is charged with a conscious or negligent omission to take due order for its custody, is of an abnormally vicious disposition.

7. 'Any Animal'

This section does not refer to savage animals alone but to any animal.[46] For definition of 'animal' s 47 may be referred to.

8. 'In his Possession'

Section 27, IPC and the notes thereunder deal with the meaning and law of 'possession'. The only person liable under this section is the person who was in possession of the animal in question. The possession may be actual or constructive. An animal is not less in the actual possession of a servant because it is for some purposes in the constructive possession of his master.[47] Where a bull was set at large by the accused in accordance with a general practice of the Hindus and the accused had given up possession of the animal, the bull is no more in possession of the accused within the meaning of this section.[48] Where a bull let loose by the accused's father was ordered to be shot on its becoming vicious, it was held that merely1971 because the accused claimed the bull, he could not be convicted under this section, as it could not be said that the animal was in his possession.[49]

9. 'Probable Danger to Human Life or any Probable Danger of Grievous Hurt from such Animal'

To sustain a charge under this section there should be evidence not only of negligence but of such negligence as would probably lead to danger to human life or of grievous hurt.[50] It must be established in the affirmative that the accused knowingly or negligently omitted to take such order with the animal in question as was sufficient to guard against probable danger to human life or probable danger of grievous hurt from such animal.[51] The likelihood of the consequence must be determined by a deduction from facts, antecedent to the actual event and a man cannot be held criminally liable for a consequence of which so far as appears by the evidence, nothing had occurred to show the probability. Where a pony kicked a child on the road and the owner of the pony was convicted under this section, it was held that even assuming the negligence in keeping of the pony, there was no evidence in the case to show that such unsecure keeping would probably lead to danger to human life or of grievous hurt. If the pony had been proved to be vicious and the accused to be cognizant of the fact, there would have been evidence of the commission of the offence defined in the section.[52] But where the owner of the pony negligently omitted to fasten the animal securely, and it galloped through a crowded bazaar, it was held that the accused was liable under this section as the pony was galloping about loose. The bazaar was crowded with people and it is quite possible that a pony running away through a crowded bazaar, albeit a perfectly good-tempered beast on all ordinary occasions, would create a most probable danger to the lives or limbs of the men, women and children walking on the road.[53]

Where a bullock escaped by pure accident and it was not proved that the disposition of the bullock rendered any precautions necessary, it was held that the mere fact that the rope tied to the bullock, when violently strained, broke, would afford no proof of negligence, nor was there anything to show that the probable consequence of the negligence, even if it was assumed that there was negligence, would be danger to human life or danger of grievous hurt.[54] If a person allows his bull to be at large in spite of its vicious character, the presumption is that he did so with knowledge that there was probable danger to human life or limb.[55] The mere presence of stray cattle on a road at night cannot be said to involve probable danger to human life or grievous hurt within the meaning of this section.[56]

10. Procedure

It is the same as in the case of an offence under s 284 .1972

11. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC 1973 may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of.....at..... knowingly (or negligently) omitted to take such order with a (name the animal) in your possession as was sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life (or any probable danger of grievous hurt) from such (name the animal) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 289 of the Indian Penal Code within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

12. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused was in possession of an animal; and
(ii) he knowingly or negligently omitted to take such order with it as was necessary to guard against any probable danger to human life or of grievous hurt.

If the animal is not by nature, fierce or vicious, the onus of proving negligence is on the prosecution.[57]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 290.

Punishment for public nuisance in cases not otherwise provided for.--

Whoever commits a public nuisance in any case not otherwise punishable by this Code, shall be punished with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees.1973

Comments

1. Scope

This section only provides for punishment of the offence defined in s 268, IPC . The commission of a public nuisance as defined by s 268, and not made punishable by any other section in this chapter, is punishable hereunder. The section would not come into operation if the commission of a public nuisance falls within the scope of any particular section of this Code.[58] An action under this section does not lie for a private nuisance.[59]

2. 'Whoever'

A prosecution cannot be instituted against the chairman of a municipality under this section for keeping a rubbish depot in the neighbourhood of houses, but it should be against the municipal corporation.[60]

In some cases, undoubtedly, the agents themselves may be personally responsible for the crime. It is, however, a question of fact in each particular case whether the criminal act of the agent is the act of the corporation. In such a case, it depends upon the nature of charge and other relevant facts and circumstances.[61]

3. Public Nuisance

Section 268, IPC may be referred to.

4. 'Not otherwise Punishable by this Code'

Section 290, IPC, deals with punishment for public nuisance in cases not otherwise provided for. It deals with public nuisance causing under the four corners of the definition in s 268 of IPC but not punishable under any other section. These specific sections are ss 269 - 289 and ss 291 - 294, IPC .[62]

5. Intention not Necessary

A public nuisance may undoubtedly be caused without any deliberate intention of causing it and s 283 and indeed s 290 do not refer to the intention of the accused person. The obstruction may be caused by negligence and in nine cases out of ten it is so caused.[63]

6. Examples of Nuisance Dealt with and Illustrating Cases Falling under this Section

Fouling the water of a river, as contrasted with that of a public spring or reservoir under s 277 ;[64] causing an offensive (though not necessarily noxious) smell in a high1974 road from rotten bones or vegetable matter kept on private premises;[65] throwing dust and rubbish in the neighbourhood of houses, ie, a municipal rubbish heap,[66] though not if kept on the person's own premises, unless otherwise offensive to passer-by in a public place;[67] gambling in, and taking dangerous animals, such as fighting rams, about a market place;[68] gambling in the public streets,[69] but not in private houses;[70] encroaching upon or obstructing any part of the public highway, though it does not fall within s 283 ;[71] letting cattle loose at night so that they stray on the public roads, although this may not fall within s 283 ;[72] using vulgar language in public,[73] are all instances of nuisance punishable under this section.

The mere act of enclosing village and government land is not an offence under this section,[74] nor mere gambling.[75] Similarly, mere interruption at a public meeting,[76] or quarrelling in a public street in a village,[77] or stacking of logs on a space of seven feet on a 24 feet wide road in the absence of evidence of finding that the stacking caused injury, danger or annoyance,[78] non-payment of taxes,[79] would not constitute an offence under this section.[80]

Filing up the well from which the public at large were drawing water would clearly result in common injury to the public or to the people of the village who dwell or occupy the property in the vicinity of the well. The action of the petitioner complained of would clearly amount to an injury to the public in that it has deprived the inhabitants of the facility of drawing water from the well.[81]

In a case of public nuisance under this section, it must be proved that injury, danger or annoyance was caused either in regard to the enjoyment of property or the exercise of a public right on the part of a portion of the community or of any particular class of people. The fact that there is a special law to meet a particular offence, such as, cattle trespass, does not prevent the punishment of the offenders under this Code of an offence which could be rightly punished under it.[82]

Where on account of accumulation of dirty water causing health hazards, a complaint was filed against officers and employees of UPSIDC Ltd, main persons responsible for the flow of coloured and dirty water were owners of the saree printing units and not the accused officers and employees of UPSIDC Ltd. Allegations in the complaint did not show any specific act done by the accused persons to make them liable under ss 268, 278, 290, IPC . It was held that an administrative lapse on the part of the accused persons cannot amount to a criminal offence. Further, the accused1975 persons were not impleaded by name and were impleaded by posts held, it was not clear when the industrial area was established and who was responsible for the construction of roads and drainage system at the relevant time. During the intervening long period the concerned officers must have been transferred, it was held that the complaint suffered from technical defect and no criminal offence was made out against the accused persons, and hence, proceedings against accused persons under ss 268, 278 and 290, IPC, were quashed.[83]

7. When a Trade becomes Nuisance

The question whether a particular trade or business is or is not a nuisance can be determined only after taking into consideration a number of circumstances such as the place where it is located or carried on, the number of the people whose rights are prejudicially affected thereby and the extent of the injury, discomfort and annoyance caused to human beings.[84] Noise alone may constitute a nuisance.[85] A noisy trade can be dealt with as a public nuisance; but most of the decisions as to nuisance by noise or vibration are in actions for nuisance caused to individuals suffering particularly therefrom or under byelaws made by local authorities. It was held a public nuisance to make great noises in the night with a speaking trumpet, to the disturbance of the neighbourhood.[86]

Nuisance includes Danger or Annoyance

Where a factory creates distressing noises and vibrations which render the occupation of the property in the neighbourhood unsafe and uncomfortable, the existence of the factory is a nuisance, for the expressions 'nuisance' includes every act or illegal omission which causes danger or annoyance to the public or to the people in general who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity. Although a person is at liberty to carry on any trade or business on property belonging to him, he has no right to do so if such trade or business deprives another of the reasonable and comfortable use of his property. Even a lawful trade would become a nuisance if it interferes with the comfort and enjoyment of the neighbours, and gives offence to their senses or obstructs the reasonable use of property.

A Lawful Trade may become Nuisance Afterwards

A particular trade or business may be lawful to start with but may become a nuisance, as by reason of changed circumstances such as the growth of population.

No Prescriptive Right to Maintain Nuisance

The mere fact that a factory was allowed to operate for several years without any objection having been raised by the neighbours would not render its owner immune from punishment if it is found that its existence constitutes a nuisance to the people of the neighbourhood. It has been held repeatedly that no prescriptive right can be acquired to maintain, and no length of time can legalise a public nuisance.[87]1976

Determination of Nuisance

The question whether a particular trade or business is or is not a nuisance can be determined only after taking into consideration a number of circumstances such as the place where it is located or carried on, the number of people whose rights are prejudicially affected thereby, and the extent of the injury, discomfort and annoyance caused to normal human beings.

8. Principal and Agent--Owner's Liability for Nuisance Caused by Occupier of Premises

The general rule is that a principal is not criminally answerable for the acts of his agent. Speaking generally the person liable, where the user of premises gives rise to a nuisance, is the occupier for the time being whoever he may be.[88]

Where the accused, the manager of a school, had a building put up at a cost of Rs 35,000 employing masons therefor and the masons constructed the same with excess of sand in the mortar, the building collapsed killing several inmates, on these facts, the Madras High Court held that it was not the case of the prosecution that the accused himself constructed the building, it was not disputed that he sought the assistance of the masons and the masons constructed the building, if the masons had not done the work properly and if they had been negligent in mixing the lime mortar in proper proportions, the accused could not be made liable for the negligence of those persons who actually constructed the building who were supposed to be skilled. The accused was a layman, he, therefore, could not be held liable for the negligence of the persons who actually constructed the building, which is the causa causans for the collapse of the building. The acquittal of the accused by the sessions court in appeal for offences under ss 304A, 337, 338 and 290, IPC, was found proper.[89]

9. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable. A summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable offence but not compoundable and is triable by any judicial magistrate and also summarily.

The limitation prescribed for taking cognizance of this offence is six months.

10. Sanction--Whether Necessary

Sanction under s 197, CrPC, is necessary for prosecuting public servants for omitting to perform certain functions which they are expected to perform as such public servants.[90]

Even against others, where the right of filing a private complaint for an offence under this section is clearly there but by the special Acts. The right has been subjected to the restriction on the lines of s 197, CrPC and previous written sanction of the state board etc, has been made a condition precedent to the cognizance of the offences being taken by courts; the prosecution will not be without such previous sanction in writing. This safeguard has a rational basis. Without it industrialists could1977 be vexed day in and day out by being dragged to criminal courts for a variety of reasons even unconnected with the indication of law.[91]

11. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC 1973 may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of...at.....committed.....which is a public nuisance and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 290 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this Court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

12. Alteration of Charge

Section 216 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 deals with alteration of a charge, but it requires that the alteration shall be read and explained to the accused. The accused must know what he is charged with and to what offence he has to answer. Section 221(2) of the CrPC, must be read with s 216 of that Code. A court cannot convict an accused person of an offence of which he has not been told anything. When the accused has no opportunity to meet the charge and he did not even know of it till his conviction, it is not only an irregularity but an illegality which cannot be cured.[92]

13. Proof

To establish any offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(i) the accused did an act or was guilty of an illegal omission;
(ii) such act or omission caused injury, danger, or annoyance;

(iii) such injury, danger, or annoyance was common to the public or the people in general who dwell or occupy in the vicinity;

or

(i) the accused did an act or was guilty of an illegal omission;
(ii) the act or omission in question was likely to cause injury, obstruction, danger, or annoyance, to persons who may have occasion to use any public right.[93]

Utterance of certain words by the accused to his brother during cross-examination before the Land Tribunal but there was no quarrel between them, such utterance even if true, does not constitute the offence of public nuisance as defined under s 268, IPC, and made punishable under s 270, IPC .[94]1978

14. Conviction

The essential elements, constituting offences under ss 290 and 323, IPC, are different. Hence, where an accused has been charged under s 290, IPC, he cannot be convicted under s 323, IPC .[1] The ingredients of an offence under s 160, IPC, are also totally different from the ingredients of an offence under s 290, IPC and it is doubtful whether a person charged under s 160, IPC, could ever be convicted under s 290, IPC .[2]

Playing of the radio loud at a particular time did not constitute public nuisance. It was also too trivial for being pursued in a court of law. The conviction under s 290, IPC was, therefore, set aside.[3]

15. Sentence

Imprisonment in default of payment of a fine under this section must be simple only[4] but the Madras High Court has held that it is not restricted to simple imprisonment.[5]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 291.

Continuance of nuisance after injunction to discontinue.--

Whoever repeats or continues a public nuisance, having been enjoined by any public servant who has lawful authority to issue such injunction not to repeat or continue such nuisance, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes repetition or continuance of a nuisance after an injunction to discontinue. Section 143 of the CrPC provides for the issue of such injunctions.

2. Enjoined

To support a conviction under this section, there must be proof of an injunction issued to the accused individually, against repeating or continuing the same particular public nuisance. It must be shown that the person convicted had, on some previous occasion, committed the particular nuisance, had been enjoined not to repeat or continue it, and had repeated or continued it.

The authority under which a magistrate can order or enjoin a person against repeating or continuing a public nuisance is provided in s 143 of the CrPC . It is the1979 infringement of this order that is punishable under this section. What is contemplated is an order addressed to a particular person.

A magistrate's powers to deal with public nuisances are contained in ch X of the CrPC 1973. Part C of this chapter is properly applicable only to temporary orders in urgent cases. It is only in such cases that an order may be made ex parte, and an exception is allowed to the general rule that it shall be directed to a particular individual in such emergent cases an order may, under s 144 of that Code, be directed to the public generally when frequenting or visiting a particular place to abstain from a certain act; but this provision does not apply to a proclamation directed not to the public generally frequenting or visiting a particular place, but to a portion of the community.[6]

3. Public Servant

For the interpretation of the term 'public servant' this section has to be read with s 143, CrPC which runs as follows:

> S. 143 . Magistrate may prohibit repetition or continuance of public nuisance.-- A District Magistrate or Sub-divisional Magistrate, or any other Executive Magistrate empowered by the State Government or the District Magistrate in this behalf, may order any person not to repeat or continue a public nuisance, as defined in the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860), or any special or local law.

4. Injunction

A personal injunction may be given by a district magistrate, or sub-divisional magistrate, or any other executive magistrate specially empowered by the State Government, or the district magistrate in this behalf, not to repeat or continue a public nuisance.[7] Under O 39, r 2 of the CPC, a civil court can also issue an injunction in pending cases.

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, but a summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable offence but not compoundable and is triable by any magistrate. It can be tried summarily.

The limitation for taking cognizance of this offence is one year.

6. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC 1973 may be adopted:

> I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you on or about the.....day of.....at.....repeated (or continued), ... (name the public nuisance), having been enjoined by..... (name the public servant) who had lawful authority to issue such injunction not to repeat (or continue) ..... (name the nuisance), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 291 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

1980

> Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?
> Ans. Yes
> Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?
> Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

7. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(i) the accused committed a particular public nuisance;
(ii) he was personally enjoined not to repeat or continue it; (a general proclamation to that effect is not sufficient.)[8]
(iii) he was so enjoined by a public servant having lawful authority to do so; and
(iv) after having been so enjoined he repeated or continued the offence.

In order to sustain a conviction under this section, it is necessary that the order of the magistrate forbidding the continuance of the nuisance or evidence of notice of such a character as to make plain the precise terms of the order and the notice, be recorded in the case. Strict proof of all the circumstances constituting an offence, especially when the offence is one, which is not malum in se, is required on the basis of a conviction.[9]

Where the magistrate tried 14 persons together and convicted Nos 1, 4, 7, 9 and 13 under s 291, IPC, and the remainder under s 290, IPC it was held that in trying 14 persons accused of distinct offences at the same time, the magistrate committed an irregularity calculated to the prejudiced by the several charges having been disposed of in one trial. The conviction was quashed.[10]

STATE AMENDMENTS

Orissa.--

(1) In its application to the whole State of Orissa, in Section 292, for the words, "which may extend to three months", substitute the words "which may extend to two years" and insert the following proviso before the Exception, namely:--

"Provided that for a second or any subsequent offence under this section, he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which shall not be less than six months and not more than two years and with fine".[16]1982

(2) Section 292A. Same as that of Tamil Nadu.[17]

Tamil Nadu.--

(1) In section 292, for the words "shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months or with fine or with both", substitute the following, namely:--

"shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years or with fine or with both:

Provided that for a second or any subsequent offence under this section, he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which shall not be less than six months and not more than two years and with fine."[18]

(2) In its application to the State of Tamil Nadu, after section 292, insert the following section, namely:--

" S. 292A . Printing,etc., of grossly indecent or scurrilous matter or matter intended for blackmail.--Whoever,--

(a) prints or causes to be printed in any newspaper, periodical or circular, or exhibits or causes to be exhibited, to public view or distributes or causes to be distributed, or in any manner puts into circulation any picture or any printed or written document which is grossly indecent, or in scurrilous or intended for blackmail; or

(b) sells or lets for hire, or for purposes of sale or hire makes, produces or has in his possession, any picture or any printed or written document which is grossly indecent or is scurrilous or intended for blackmail; or

(c) conveys any picture or any printed or written document which is grossly indecent or is scurrilous or intended for blackmail knowing or having reason to believe that such picture or document will be printed, sold, let for hire distributed or publicly exhibited or in any manner put into circulation; or

(d) takes part in, or receives profits, from, any business in the course of which he knows or has reason to believe that any such newspaper, periodical, circular, picture or other printed or written document is printed, exhibited, distributed, circulated, sold; let for hire, made, produced, kept, conveyed or purchased; or

(e) advertises or makes known by any means whatsoever that any person is engaged or is ready to engage in any act which is an offence under this section, or that any such newspaper, periodical, circular, picture or other printed or written document which is grossly indecent or is scurrilous or intended for blackmail, can be procured from or through any person; or

(f) offers or attempts to do any act which is an offence under this section, [19][shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both]:

Provided that for a second or any subsequent offence under this section, he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which shall not be less than six months [20][and not more than two years].

Explanation I.--For the purposes of this section, the word "scurrilous" shall be deemed to include any matter which is likely to be injurious to morality or is calculated to injure any person:

Provided that it is not scurrilous to express in good faith anything whatever respecting the conduct of--

(i) a public servant in the discharge of his public functions or respecting his character so far as his character appears in that conduct and no further; or1983

(ii) any person touching any public question, and respecting his character, so far as his character appears in that conduct and no further.

Explanation II.--In deciding whether any person has committed an offence under this section, the court shall have regard, inter alia, to the following considerations--

(a) the general character of the person charged, and where relevant, the nature of his business;
(b) the general character and dominant effect of the matter alleged to be grossly indecent or scurrilous or intended for blackmail;
(c) any evidence offered or called by or on behalf of the accused person as to his intention in committing any of the acts specified in this section."[21]1984

Comments

1. Scope

To attract the offence under s 292, IPC, there must be public circulation, sale or distribution of the alleged obscene writing.[22]Sections 292 - 294 deal with obscene publications, obscene objects and obscene acts which affect public decency and morals. This section makes it an offence to publish or put into circulation any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, drawing, painting, representation or figure or any other obscene object.

The section has two sub-sections. Sub-section (1) defines 'obscene matter' which itself consists of two parts, the first part is in regard to a book, pamphlet, paper, writing, drawing, painting, representation, figure or any other object, which is lascivious or appeals to the prurient interest, and the other part is related to its effect which (or where it comprises two or more distinct items, the effect of any one of its items), if taken as a whole is such as tends to deprave and corrupt persons who are likely, having regard to all relevant circumstances, to read, see or hear the matter, contained or embodied in it. Where the material produced satisfies the first part of what is described in s 292(1), the second part of it would not apply.[23]Sub-section (2) has five clauses and an act covered by any one of them constitutes the offence under it but all the clauses are related to publication or circulation of 'obscene matter'.

The publication or circulation may be either by sale, hire, distribution, public exhibition or in any other manner.

An advertisement is a manner of publication. But where an advertisement only says that the book advertised contains 84 postures of men and women, but it does not itself give any posture, offensive to the senses, and the words used do not suggest any indecent, obscene or immoral ideas, the advertisement will not come under this section.[24]

The exception to the section expressly exempts books, etc, kept or used bona fide for religious purposes or are justified as being for the public good in the interest of science, literature, art or learning or other objects of general concern. Engravings, painting, sculptures etc, on or in ancient monuments, temples etc, have also been specifically exempted.

No such exemption was earlier made in respect of works of art, science or literature. This defect has now been removed by inserting sub-cl (i) in cl (a) of the Exception by Amendment Act, 36 of 1969.

2. Legislative Changes

This section, as it originally stood in 1861, made it an offence to sell, distribute, import or print for sale or hire, or wilfully to exhibit any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, etc. A representation in a temple or on a car used for conveying of an idol was, however, exempted from the operation of the section.[25]

The section, as it stood before the amendment of 1969, was introduced into the Code by the Obscene Publications Act (8 of 1925) with a view to give effect to art I of the International Convention for the Suppression of the Circulation of Traffic in1985 Obscene Publications, signed at Geneva on behalf of the Government of India in 1923.[26] The scope of the section was widened and the exception was also slightly enlarged by inserting the words 'any book, pamphlet, writing, drawing or painting kept or used bona fide for religious purposes or'. The exception then applied to any such matter connected with religion. But with regard to the exception the select committee said:

> We have considered at length the desirability of extending the scope of the exception to new section 292 of the Indian Penal Code, so as to cover religious, artistic and scientific writings, etc, but we have come to the conclusion that it would be difficult to do so without including writings, etc., which are not bona fide of the nature stated. Further, there is a substantial body of case-law, which makes it clear that bona fide religious, artistic and scientific writings, etc, are not obscene within the meaning of the Indian Penal Code .

It is thus, clear that the scope of the exception has not been widened so as to make it applicable to objects of art and literature,[27] but it is also clear that the select committee left the exception to be supplemented by the 'substantial body of case-law' which made it clear 'that bona fide religious, artistic and scientific writings, etc, are not obscene within the meaning of the Indian Penal Code '.

There was again a drastic amendment in the section by Act 36 of 1969. Thereby the old s 292 was renumbered as sub-s (2) and the present sub-s (1) explaining the import and meaning of the word 'obscene' was introduced. The sentence (of imprisonment of either description, for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine or with both) earlier provided for this section was also enhanced by Act 36 of 1969 to make the repetition of the offence deterrent as will appear from the existing sub-s (2). The exception clause was also amended by Act 36 of 1969 by introducing certain new provisions. The old clause ran as follows:

> Exception.--This section does not extend to any book, pamphlet, writing, drawing or painting kept or used bona fide for religious purposes or any representation sculptured, engraved, painted or otherwise represented on or in any temple, or on any car used for the conveyance of idols, or kept or used for any religious purpose.

3. Analogous Law--Law of England

In England, the common law offence of obscenity was established three hundred years ago, when Sir Charles Sedley exposed his person to the public gaze on the balcony of a tavern. Obscenity in books, however, was punishable only before the spiritual courts because it was so held down to 1708 in which year Queen v Read ,[28] was decided. In 1727, in the case against one Curl it was ruled for the first time that it was a common law offence.[29] In 1857, Lord Campbell enacted the first legislative measure against obscene books, etc, and his successor in the office of Chief Justice interpreted this statute[30] in Hicklin's case.[31] The section of the English Act is long (they were so in those days), but it used the word 'obscene' and provided for search, seizure and destruction of obscene books, etc, and made their sale, possession for sale, distribution, etc, a misdemeanour. The section may thus be regarded as1986 substantially in pari materia with the section as it stood before the 1969 amendment in this Code, in spite of some differences in language.[32]

In 1959, the Obscene Publications Act[33] was passed. Section 1 of this statute prescribed the test for obscenity and by s 4 a defence that the publication of the article was justified as being for the public good on the ground that it is in the interest of science, literature, art or learning or of other objects of general concern was made available to the offender. With reference to this a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court had observed, 'We must, however, be guided by the law as laid down in this country without reference to a recent statute law in England'.[34]

Every person is liable to a fine who, in any thoroughfare or public place in the metropolitan police district or the City of London or in any street elsewhere in England and Wales, offers for sale or distribution, or exhibits to public view, any profane book, paper, print, drawing, painting or representation, or sings any profane or obscene song or ballad, or uses any profane or obscene language, to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers.[35]

Test of Obscenity

An article is deemed to be obscene for the purpose of the Obscene Publications Acts 1959 and 1964 if its effect or (where the article comprises two or more distinct items) the effect of any one of its items is, if taken as a whole, such as to tend to deprave and corrupt persons who are likely, having regard to all relevant circumstances, to read, see or hear the matter contained or embodied in it.

In proceedings against a person for publishing an obscene article, the question whether the article is obscene must be determined without regard to any publication by another person unless it could reasonably have been expected that the publication by that other person would follow from publication by the person charged. In proceedings against a person for having an obscene article for publication for gain, the question whether the article is obscene must be determined by reference to such publication for gain of the article as in the circumstances it may reasonably be inferred he had in contemplation and to any further publication that could reasonably be expected to follow from it, but not to any other publication.

The issue of obscenity is one for the jury and expert evidence on the issue is not ordinarily admissible although in exceptional cases a jury may require the assistance of such evidence.

Section 1(1) of the Obscene Publications Act is quite plain to understand. The question to be answered, bearing in mind all the circumstances of the case, is whether there are people who could be depraved and corrupted on the basis of the likely distribution of the material in question.[36]

Where obscene video cassettes were distributed to a limited circle of viewers but where there was no further control over them, where the official channels of certification of videos were not used, and where no artistic merit was claimed for the1987 works, the applicant's conviction for publishing obscene works was proportionate to the legitimate aim pursued.[37]

Publication of obscene material established even though material only sent to one person.[38]

4. Laws of Canada

In a case, Mr. Gill's wilful conduct in masturbating in the driver's seat of his car while stopped at a traffic light on a busy Surrey street, and while he was deliberately making eye contact with D.M.K., was an indecent act in the presence of D.M.K. The only reasonable inference to be drawn from the proven facts was that Mr. Gill would be seen by D.M.K. and he knew it. The exhibitionist nature of this conduct was a clear evidence of the intention of Mr. Gill.

A 'public place' is defined in s 150 as 'any place to which the public have access as of right or by invitation, express or implied'. 'Access' means 'the right or opportunity to reach or use or visit' and not the ability of those who are neither entitled nor invited to enter a place to see or hear from the outside, through uncovered windows or open doors, what is transpiring within.[39]

5. Object

The object of this section, which was enacted in pursuance of the international convention regarding suppression of the circulation and traffic in obscene publication is to prevent circulation or, and traffic in, obscene publications. There is bound to be an erosion of moral standards if one is constantly exposed to literary and visual materials which over-emphasise sexuality and brutality. All civilised societies need legal ban on obscenity for protecting and preserving the moral values on which there is consensus.[40] The basic object of s 292 is to prevent any circulation or sale of any obscene literature and the purposes behind the Act is to preserve such moral values of which there is universal consensus.[41]

6. Constitutional Validity of the Section

No doubt art 19(1)(a) of the Constitution guarantees complete freedom of speech and expression, but cl (2) of the article also makes an exception in favour of existing laws which impose restriction on the exercise of the right in the interest of public decency or morality. This section does not go beyond decency which falls directly within the words, 'public decency or morality' in the second clause of the article. The section manifestly embodies such a restriction as is contemplated by the second clause of the article because the law against obscenity, of course correctly understood and applied, seeks no more than to promote public decency and morality. The section cannot, therefore, be said to be invalid in view of the second clause of art 19 of the Constitution .[42]The validity of this section was thus examined by the Supreme Court before its amendment by Act 36 of 1969. There appears nothing objectionable in the said amendment so as to infringe the provisions of art 19 as considered by the Apex Court.1988

Let us also not forget that freedom of expression also requires adequate 'breathing space'.[43]

7. Section 292 , IPC and Rights under Article 21 of the Constitution

Where the petitioner bought the book 'The Women and Men in My Life', by Khushwant Singh and felt aghast and shocked at the cheap, vulgar and obscene writings about dead persons and filed writ petitions under art 21 of the Constitution of India for direction to the commissioner of police for registration of a case under ss 272, 509 read with s 24 of IPC . However Jaspal Singh J, of the Delhi High Court after referring to the alleged vulgar and obscene language used in the box regarding some men and women observed as follows:

> Khushwant Singh has dared to state. His book does not read like Anne Bradsheet's poem 'To My Dear Children' or like the life story of Elizabeth Ashbridge, a Quaker woman missionary. His are life stories of new styles of life challenging traditional social norms and values. What he has stated has to be tested by the current standards of ordinary decent people. I say so because the book being in English and with a high price tag is likely to be read only by well educated persons in high income bracket like the petitioner herself. Some of them may find some stray words or passages shocking or disgusting but not obscene. Even the petitioner only felt aghast and shocked. This does not prove obscenity. Let us also not forget that freedom of expression requires adequate 'breathings space'. I do not think Khushwant Singh has crossed the permissible limits. The question of violation of right to privacy, dignity, fair treatment or reputation as enshrined under article 21 of the Constitution thus also does not arise. In any case right of privacy under article 21 is enforceable only qua the State.[44]

8. Whether the Provisions of Press (Objectionable Matter) Act 1951 Repeal the Provisions of this Section

The Press (Objectionable Matter) Act 1951, does not provide for punishment for printing and publishing obscene matter, but provides only against the repetition of such publications. It is preventive in nature regarding objectionable matters and not penal. On the other hand, under this section once a person is found to have been concerned with the publication of obscene matter, the court must convict and punish him. Moreover, a person found guilty under this section is considered as an offender and is guilty of having committed an offence. The provisions of this section are not inconsistent with the provisions of the 1951 Act and therefore, it cannot be said that this section is repealed by implication by the subsequent Act.[45] There is nothing in the Act of 1951 to indicate that this section is either abrogated or superseded. A prosecution of the accused for an offence under this section, therefore, does not in any way amount to evading the provisions of Act 56 of 1951.[46]

9. Abetment

In order to constitute abetment, the abetter must be shown to have 'intentionally' sided to the commission of the crime and that mere proof that the crime charged could not have been committed without the interposition of the alleged abetter is not1989 enough compliance with the requirements of s 107, IPC .[47] Where it was not the case of the prosecution that the accused has intentionally exhibited or arranged exhibition of a blue film, and on the other hand, the allegation was that the accused was a spectator of the blue film and therefore, an abetter of the offences under ss 292, 293 and 294, IPC, this interposition as a mere spectator to the exhibition of a blue film without any further complicity, cannot be taken to be amounting to abetment of the main offence.[48]

10. 'Obscene'--Ingredients of

Sub-section (1), which defines the word 'obscene' was inserted, in this section by the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act 1969. Before it this Code did not contain any definition of this word. The said sub-s (1) now lays down that for the purposes of sub-s (2) of this section, a book, pamphlet, paper, writing, drawing, painting, representation, figure or any other object shall be deemed to be obscene if:

(i) it is lascivious of,
(ii) it appeals to the prurient interest, or
(iii) its effect, or (where it comprises two or more distinct items) the effect of any of its items, if taken as a whole, such as to tend to deprave and corrupt persons, who are likely having regard to all relevant circumstances, to read, see or hear the matter contained or embodied in it.

11. Obscene--Meaning of

The word 'obscenity' as the dictionaries tell us, denotes the quality of being obscene which means 'offensive, to modesty or decency, lewd, filthy, repulsive',[49] 'loathsome, indecent and lewd. But it does not mean that every indecent or repulsive or filthy article will come under the definition of obscenity though all obscene articles will be either indecent or repulsive'.[50] The language of a writing may have a tendency of shock or disgust but revulsion is not corruption. Tendency to corrupt is a much stronger concept than a tendency to shock or disgust. One may find some stray words or passages shocking or disgusting but not obscene. So merely feeling aghast or shocked does not prove obscenity.[51] 'Obscenity' means something opposed to public decency and morality.[52]

The obscenity does not lie in the letters of the words. The writing for the purpose of branding it as 'obscene' must have tendency to deprive and corrupt person who are likely to read the same. The letters written by the petitioner accused did not tend to deprive the reader like the chief matron to get influenced and get her corrupted as regards moral, his conviction, therefore, under s 292, IPC was set aside.[53]

It may be taken as meaning offensive to chastity or modesty; expressing or presenting to the mind or view something that delicacy, purity and decency forbid to1990 be expressed; impure as obscene language, obscene pictures, anything expressing or suggesting unchaste and lustful ideas, impure, indecent, lewd.[54] Obscenity is treating sex in a manner appealing to the carnal side of human nature, or having that tendency. Such treating of sex is offensive to modesty and decency, but the extent of such appeal in a particular book, etc, are matters for consideration in each individual case.[55] Anything distinctly calculated to incite a reader to indulge in acts of indecency or immorality is obscene, for example a book containing a description of defective sexual enjoyment with advice for heightening and prolonging such enjoyment in the case of normal persons.[56]

The concept of 'obscenity' would differ from country to country, state to state and even from region to region depending on the standards of morals and contemporary society. The words treated as obscene in Malabar area may not be obscene in other parts of Kerala; similarly the words used in other parts of Kerala may not be obscene in Malabar area.[57]

Whether the words uttered were obscene, whether those words are/were likely to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences is a question of fact to be decided based on the evidence that may have to be adduced by reference to the meaning attributed to those words in that particular region/locality. The tone and tenor of those words and the meaning of those words, whether hearers are likely to suffer mental shock on hearing such words, whether those words are actually intended and used in that locality as obscene are questions of fact to be decided based on the evidence that may have to be adduced.[58]

Hicklin's test postulated that a publication has to be judged for obscenity based on isolated passage of work considered out of context and judged by their apparent influence on most susceptible readers, such as children or weak-minded adults. Held, Hicklin's test is not the correct test to be applied to determine 'what is obscenity'. Section 292 of the IPC, of course, uses the expression 'lascivious and prurient interests' or its effect. The courts should apply the 'community' standard test rather than 'Hicklin's test' to determine what is 'obscenity'.[59]

12. Obscenity to be Judged in the Light of its Influence

Obscenity may be adjudged in the light of the influence, which the impugned matter may have, not only on the minds of the persons, already depraved or abnormal, but also on the minds of persons, who may be completely unintroduced to sex and may be innocent. The human mind has an inherent attraction for sex. If any material incites extreme immoral perversities in respect of sexual indulgence, then it incites the impulses to depravity and degeneration and would be obscene.[60]1991

13. Sub-section (1)--'To Deprave and Corrupt'

Sub-section (1) of this section has used the words 'deprave' and 'corrupt' as synonymous. 'To deprave and corrupt' does not merely mean to lead astray morality.[61] 'Deprave' and 'corrupt' refer to the effect of a pornographic publication on the mind, including the emotions; it is not necessary that the physical (ie 'overt') sexual activity should result.[62] 'Depravity' and 'corruption' is not, however, confined to sexual depravity and corruption.[63]

The word 'obscene' means what is offensive to modesty or decency and which gives rise to emotions, nudeness, filthiness, and repulsiveness. The real test of obscenity is whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscene is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands the object of the sort may fall.[64]

The accused was running a shop and found in possession for sale/hire/distribution, an obscene blue film video cassette depicting a man and a woman in a completely nude posture indulging in carnal intercourse appealing to the prurient interests of the viewers and arousing corrupt and lascivious feelings of persons who chanced to view the video cassette. Appellant accused was convicted for offence under s 292, IPC .[65]

Even the certificate issued by the Censor Board does not give immunity to a celluloid film from obscenity.[66]

14. Duty of Judge or Court in Deciding Question of Obscenity of any Book, Story or Article

In deciding the question of obscenity of any book, story or article the court whose responsibility it is to adjudge the question may, if the court considers it necessary, rely to an extent on evidence and views of leading literary personage, if available, for its own appreciation and assessment and for satisfaction of its own conscience. The decision of the court must necessarily be on an objective assessment of the book or story or article as a whole and with particular reference to the passages complained of in the book, story or article. The court must take an overall view of the matter complained of as obscene in the setting of the whole work, but the matter charged as obscene must also be considered by itself and separately to find out whether it is so gross and its obscenity so pronounced that it is likely to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to influence of this sort and into whose hands the book is likely to fall. Though the court must consider the question objectively with an open mind, yet in the matter of objective assessment the subjective attitude of the judge hearing the matter is likely to influence even though unconsciously, his mind and his1992 decision on the question. A judge with a puritan and prudish outlook may on the basis of an objective assessment of any book or story or article, consider the same to be obscene. It is possible that another judge with a different kind of outlook may not consider the same book to be obscene on his objective assessment of the very same book. The concept of obscenity is moulded to a very great extent by the social outlook of the people who are generally expected to read the book. It is beyond dispute that the concept of obscenity usually differs from country to country depending on the standards of morality of contemporary society in different countries. In judging the question of obscenity, the judge in the first place should try to place himself in the position of the author and from the view point of the author the judge conveys if the work has any literary and artistic value. The judge should thereafter place himself in the position of a reader of every age group in whose hands the book is likely to fall and should try to appreciate what kind of possible influence the book is likely to have in the minds of the readers. A judge should thereafter apply his judicial mind dispassionately to decide whether the book in question can be said to be obscene within the meaning of s 292, IPC, by an objective assessment of the book as a whole and also of the passages complained of as obscene separately. In appropriate cases, the court, for eliminating any subjective element or personal preference which may remain hidden in the sub-conscious mind and may unconsciously affect a proper objective assessment may draw upon the evidence on record and also consider the views expressed by reputed or recognised authors of literature on such questions if there be any for his own consideration and, satisfaction to enable the court to discharge the duty of making a proper assessment.[67]

It appears useful to quote here certain guidelines laid down by the Supreme Court in Samresh Bose v Amal Mitra ,[68] in this respect as follows:

> In deciding the question of obscenity of any book, story or article the court whose responsibility it is to adjudge the question may, if the court considers it necessary, rely to an extent on evidence and view of literary personage, if available for its own appreciation and assessment and for satisfaction of its own conscience. The decision of the court must necessarily be on an objective assessment of the book, story or article as a whole and with particular reference to the passage complained of in the book, story or article. The court must take an overall view of the matter complained of as obscene in the setting of the whole work, but the matter charged as obscene must also be considered by itself and separately to find out whether it is so gross and its obscenity so pronounced that it is likely to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to influence of this sort and into whose hands the book is likely to fall.

> ...The concept of obscenity is moulded to a very great extent by the social outlook of the people who are generally expected to read the book. It is beyond dispute that the concept of obscenity usually differs from country to country depending on the standards of morality of contemporary society in different countries. In our opinion, in judging the question of obscenity, the Judge in the first place should try to place himself in the position of the author and from the view point of the author the Judge should try to understand what is that the author seeks to convey and what the author conveys has any literary and artistic value. The Judge should thereafter place himself in the position of a reader of every age group in whose hands the book is likely to fall and should try to appreciate what kind of possible influence the book is likely to have in the minds of the readers. A Judge, should thereafter apply his judicial mind dispassionately to decide whether the book can be said to be obscene within the meaning of s 292, IPC by an1993 objective assessment of the book as a whole and also of the passages complained of as obscene separately. In appropriate cases, the court, for eliminating any subjective element or personal preference which may remain hidden in the sub-conscious mind and may unconsciously affect a proper objective assessment, may draw upon the evidence on record and also consider the views expressed by reputed and recognised authors of literature on such questions if there be any for his own consideration and satisfaction to enable the court to discharge the duty of making a proper assessment.

The petitioner accused had authored a book 'Breathless in Bombay'. Certain words used in the book to describe the character of a person in story were not held to be obscene. Prosecution of the petitioner was quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[69]

15. Obscenity Distinguished from Pornography

There is some difference between obscenity and pornography in the sense that the latter denotes writings, pictures, etc, intended to arouse sexual desire while the former may include writings etc, not intended to do so but which have that tendency. Both, of course, offend against public decency and morals, but pornography is obscenity in a more aggravated form.[70] It has now received the appellation of hardcore pornography by which term is meant libidinous writings of high erotic effect unredeemed by anything literary or artistic and intended to arouse sexual feeling.[71] Pornographic pictures and writings are always obscene within the meaning of s 292 .[72]

16. Obscenity Distinguished from Vulgarity

In Sameresh Bose v Amal Mitra ,[73] the question for determination before the Supreme Court was whether a novel written by the appellants was obscene. After carefully examining the contents of the novel, opinion of literary personage about it and other evidence produced in the case, the Supreme Court was of the view that, 'reference to kissing, description of the body and the figures of the female characters in the book and suggestions of acts of sex by themselves may not have the effect of depraving, debasing and encouraging the readers of any age to lasciviousness and the novel on these counts, may not be considered to be obscene'. Distinguishing obscenity from vulgarity the Apex Court observed as follows:

> A vulgar writing is not necessarily obscene. Vulgarity arouses a feeling of disgust and repulsion and also boredom but does not have the effect of depraving, debasing and corrupting the morals of any reader of the novel, whereas obscenity has the tendency to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences.

This distinction may be further clear from the following observations made by the Apex Court in the same case:

> ...the novel is not obscene merely because slang and unconventional words have been used in the book in > which there have been emphasis on sex and description of female bodies and there are the narrations of feeling thoughts and actions in vulgar language. Some portions of the book may appear to be vulgar and readers of cultured and refined taste may feel shocked and disgusted. Equally in some portions, the words used and1994 descriptions given may not appear to be in proper taste. In some places there may have been an exhibition of bad taste leaving it to the readers of experience and maturity to draw the necessary inference but certainly not sufficient to bring home to the adolescent any suggestions which is depraving or lascivious. If a reference to sex by itself in any novel is considered to be obscene and not fit to be read by adolescents, adolescents will not be in a position to read any novel and 'will have to read books which are purely religious'.

Thus, every vulgar matter is not obscene as these words do not have similar connotations and each term has its separate characteristics to affect the minds of the readers as laid down above.

17. Filthy Abuses, Whether Obscene

Filthy abuses are not, per se, obscene within the meaning of this section. Whether certain filthy abuses are obscene or not, regard must be had to the class of society to which the parties belong.[74] Every abusive or humiliating word would not by itself be obscene. The words uttered by the accused were abusive and humiliating but were not obscene, his conviction under s 294(b), IPC was set aside.[75]However, where the accused had abused the complainant in caste name and in open field, order framing charge under s 294, IPC was held proper.[76]

Word 'scandal' does not have the tendency of depraving or corrupting those minds which are open to prurient of lascivious influences.[77]

18. Nude Pictures--Whether Obscene

Nudity in itself cannot under all circumstances be classified as obscene.[78] A picture of a woman in the nude is not per se obscene[79] unless there is something in it which would shock or offend the taste of any ordinary or decent-minded person. Unless nude pictures are an incentive to sensuality and excite impure thoughts in the minds of ordinary persons of normal temperament who may happen to look at them, they cannot be regarded as obscene within the meaning of this section.[80]

Nude Pictures--Considerations for Decision

For the purpose of deciding whether a nude picture is obscene or not, one has to consider to a great extent, the surrounding circumstances, the pose, the posture, the suggestive element in the picture, etc., the person in whose hands it is likely to fall etc. So no hard and fast rule can be laid down for the determination of the matter.[81]

In the present day society in India, a book, picture, or a publication which deals with such matters cannot per se be said to be obscene. Great emphasis is being laid1995 on family planning and in that connection it has become absolutely necessary to import education about sex to the masses. It is a matter of common knowledge that there is even a thinking to introduce sex education as one of the subjects to be taught to the younger generation.[82]

When nude pictures are included in a book which deals with intimate side of sex life, without any reference to the subject-matter, but as a cheap medium for obtaining, greater circulation of the book, the only inference, that can be drawn, is that they have been included therein with an idea to arouse sexual desire in the readers. Such nude pictures are pornographic and as such obscene.[83]

'Obscenity' should be gauged with respect to contemporary community standards that reflect the sensibilities as well as the tolerance levels of an average reasonable person. In the present case, the appellant merely referred to the increasing incidence of pre-marital sex and called for its societal acceptance. At no point of time appellant described the sexual act or said anything that could arouse sexual desires in the mind of a reasonable and prudent reader. Furthermore, the statement has been made in the context of a survey which has touched on numerous aspects relating to the sexual habits of people in big cities. Even though this survey was not part of a literary or artistic work, it was published in a news magazine thereby serving the purpose of communicating certain ideas and opinions on the above mentioned subject. In the long run, such communication prompts a dialogue within society wherein people can chose to either defend or question the existing social mores. It is difficult to appreciate the claim that the statements published as part of the survey were in the nature of obscene communications.[84]

The same view was taken by the Allahabad[85] High Court and it was held that the mere showing of the nude female form in itself, is not necessarily obscene unless the manner, in which the nude pictures appear (in the film) is such that it is likely to arouse unhealthy lustful thoughts in the minds of viewers.

There was evidence that the accused showed pornographic films on handycam containing nude photographs of the prosecutrix. The handycam and the cassettes were recovered from the house of the accused appellant. When the prosecutrix demanded the cassette from the accused, he refused to return and threatened with dire consequences. Accused appellant was convicted for offences under ss 292 and 506, IPC .[86]

Obscenity of a Picture

For the purpose of testing whether a picture is obscene or not, one has hardly to depend upon any oral testimony. What has to be considered is to a great extent the surrounding circumstances such as the pose, the posture, the suggestive element in the picture and last of all the person or persons in whose hand it is likely to fall.[87] Under s 292 (1), IPC, a picture or article shall be deemed to be obscene if: (i) it is lascivious; (ii) it appeals to the prurient interest; and (iii) it tends to deprave and1996 corrupt persons who are likely to read, see or hear the matter, alleged to be obscene. Once the matter is found to be obscene, the question may arise as to whether the impugned matter falls within any of the exceptions contained in the section. A picture of a nude/semi-nude woman, as such, cannot per se be called obscene unless it has the tendency to arouse feeling or revealing an overt sexual desire. The picture should be suggestive of deprave mind and designed to excite sexual passion in persons who are likely to see it, which will depend on the particular posture and the background in which the nude/semi-nude woman is depicted. Only those sex-related materials which have a tendency of 'exciting lustful thoughts' can be held to be obscene, but the obscenity has to be judged from the point of view of an average person, by applying contemporary community standards.[88]

A picture alleged to be obscene has to be viewed in the background in which it was shown, and the message it has to convey to the public and the world at large.[89]

Where the smudged and indecipherable publication of the face of a woman either by itself or read with the name of the film 'Together with love' printed alongside did not tend to invade or deprave and corrupt public morals through over-sex and the film itself was not stated as being offensive, the offence under s 292, IPC, was held not made out.[90]

19. Exhibition of Blue Films

The appellant were found showing blue film in video hall to young men where about 15 viewers were present. They were convicted under s 292, IPC and s 7, Cinematograph Act. Held, exhibiting blue film does not deserve leniency in sentencing. Sentence of one month simple imprisonment and fine imposed was not interfered. Probation was refused.[91]

20. Obscene Film--Certificate by Board of Film Censors--Effect

The grant of a certificate by the Board of Film Censors does not bar the court from examining the question of obscenity, it raises rebuttable presumption that the picture does not offensively invade or deprave public morals through over-sex.[92]

21. Obscene Film--Protection under Section 79 , IPC when Available

The court has also to keep in view not only the exceptions provided by this section but also the general exceptions provided by this Code in ss 76 - 95, IPC . Section 79 , IPC makes an offence a non-offence when the offending act is actually justified by law or is bona fide believed by mistake of fact to be so justified. If the Board of Censors, acting within their jurisdiction and on an application made and pursued in good faith, sanctions the public exhibition, the producer and connected agencies do enter the statutory harbour and are protected, because s 79 exonerates them at least in view of their bona fide belief that the certificate is justificatory. The prosecution is1997 unsustainable because s 79 is exculpatory when read with s 5A of the Cinematograph Act and the certificate issued thereunder.[1]

22. Accused Privately seeing Obscene Film--No Offence

The accused were not in possession of the obscene films for the purpose of sale, distribution, circulation etc as mentioned in clause (a) of sub-s (2) of s 292 of IPC . Therefore, the act of the accused privately viewing obscene film did not constitute an offence under s 292, IPC .[2]

23. A Vulgar Picture not Necessarily Obscene

A vulgar picture is not necessarily obscene unless there is something in it which would shock or offend the taste of any ordinary or decent minded person.[3]

24. Indecent Exposure--Whether Falls under this Section

Any unlawful indecent exposure of the human body in a public place, and in the view of several persons (or either sex) the offence is in substance only a form of public nuisance by indecent exhibition. Exposing to public view the naked body of a newly born infant has been held indictable.[4] But most of the decisions relate to the exposure of the private parts of an individual in a public place.[5] Bathing so near a public footway frequented by females that public exposure must occur, is a nuisance, and it is no defence that there has been a usage to bathe at that place.[6]

Matrimonial dispute was pending between the complainant wife and the accused husband. The accused husband hanged painting of women on wall of the bedroom in nude/semi-nude. Prima facie case for offence under s 292, IPC was made out, order issuing process against the accused husband was not quashed.[7]

25. Test of Obscenity

The test of obscenity is whether it excites or not the average person enjoying a normal state of mind to have recourse to depravity as a matter of degenerate pleasure. Public depiction of sexual perversities crosses the norm of morality and containing an incentive to similar performance, such depiction in certain circumstance may surely be obscene.[8]

In R v Hicklin ,[9] the test of obscenity was laid down by Cockburn CJ, in these words:1998

> ...I think the test of obscenity is this: Whether the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands a publication of the sort may fall...It is quite certain that it would suggest to the minds of the young of either sex, or even to persons of more advanced years, thought of a most impure and libidinous character.

The test has been approved by Lord Goddard in R v Reiter ,[10] and it has been uniformly applied in India,[11] even before the insertion of sub-s (1).

In R v Martin Secker and Warburg Ltd ,[12] Stable J in directing the jury, cited Cockburn CJ's test of obscenity in R v Hicklin [13]and stated:

> Because this test was laid down in 1868, that does not mean that you have to consider whether this book is an obscene book by the standards of nearly a century ago. Your task is to decide whether you think that the tendency of the book is to deprave those whose minds today are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands the book may fall in this year, or last year, when it was published in the country.
> Remember that the charge is a charge that the tendency of the book is to corrupt and deprave. The charge is not that the tendency of the book is either to shock or disgust.
> It is undoubtedly, true that a case is not to be judged by the Victorian standards but by the moral standards of today, since moral values and standards vary from age to age. The tests to be applied for determining whether a particular object is obscene or not would depend on various circumstances. The idea as to what is to be deemed to be obscene has varied from age to age, from region to region, dependent upon particular social conditions. There cannot be an immutable standard of moral values.[14]

The idea as to what is to be deemed to be obscene not only varies from age to age and from region to region but even from person to person dependent upon particular social conditions. The court must take into account the change brought about in the society.[15] Still the test laid down in Hicklin's case should not be discarded. It makes the court, the judge of obscenity in relation to an impugned book etc, and lays emphasis on the potentiality of the impugned object to deprave and corrupt by immoral influences. It will always remain a question to decide in each case and it does not compel an adverse decision in all cases.[16]

Hicklin's test postulated that a publication has to be judged for obscenity based on isolated passage of work considered out of context and judged by their apparent influence on most susceptible readers, such as children or weak-minded adults. Held,1999*Hicklin's* test is not the correct test to be applied to determine 'what is obscenity'. Section 292 of the IPC, of course, uses the expression 'lascivious and prurient interests' or its effect. The courts should apply the 'community' standard test rather than 'Hicklin's test' to determine what is 'obscenity'.[17]

Further, it appears that the courts have, more often, restricted the use of the term 'obscenity' to sexual immorality only. Such matters as would tend to stir in persons, into whose hands such matter is ordinarily expected to reach. Sex impulse which leads to sexually impure and lustful thoughts, are declared as obscene, attracting the jurisdiction of the court to ban out such publications. The true test is not to find out what depraves the morals in any way whatsoever, but what leads to deprave only in one way viz, by exciting sexual desire and lascivious thoughts.

The effect produced on an ordinary member of the society or a particular class of readers for which a particular publication may be meant has to be ascertained. It is neither a man of wide culture or rare character, nor a person of a depraved mentality, who should be thought of as being the reader of such literature. The standard of readers is neither one of exceptional sensibility nor one without any sensibility whatsoever.[18] In considering whether a publication is obscene, the class of persons who are likely to read such a publication must be taken into consideration. In applying the test, one has also to consider the effect which the book would produce on an ordinary average person,[19] and not on a person with depraved mentality. In considering the question, the persons to whom, and the time and the circumstances under which, the obscene thing is put forth must be taken into account.[20]

Obscene Poem

The respondent composed and published an obscene poem 'Gandhi Mala Bhetla' on Mahatma Gandhi which would cause damage to the image and reputation of the father of the nation, which is nurtured by every citizen of India. Proceedings were not quashed on petition under s 482, CrPC .[21]

Whether one Obscene Passage is Sufficient to Render the Whole Work Obscene

One obscene passage is sufficient to render the work obscene.[22] There lurks a danger in the doctrine of the book as a whole. The application of this doctrine would mean that if in a book some portion, say, a few pages are clearly obscene and the rest innocuous, the book can pass muster, the good overshadowing the bad. The fact will, however, remain that the large portion of the book being innocuous, the obscene portion thereof would have the effect to deprave the mind of the reader. The result would be that the obscenity could then parade under the protective cloak of a2000 quantity of innocuous pages.[23] The words 'if taken as a whole' in s 292(1), are however, of significance and show a departure from the earlier approach.[24]

Again the test is whether the object or article is such as would rouse prurient thoughts in an average person and whether it is obscene by contemporary standards of decency and morality. What may not rouse prurient thoughts in an enlightened person or scholar or a moralist, may arouse, or provoke such thoughts in an average person into whose hands the object may fall. Determination must be with reference to the kind of person, likely to come by it. Test is not whether it will corrupt the morals of an archbishop, but whether it will tend to corrupt the thoughts of a person understood as the average person.[25]

Comparison of One Book with another not necessary

A publication cannot be said to be obscene merely because it deals frankly with sex matters, provided, of course, that the language used is not such as to excite sensual feelings or give rise to thoughts of lust.[26] A book which is intended to give advice to married people on how to regulate the sexual side of their lives, that is to say, with a view to promoting their health and mutual happiness, and which is written in a fairly plain language in order to be understood, cannot be said to be obscene, merely because such a book might fall into wrong hands.[27] When there is nothing in the books to offend an ordinary decent person, it is impossible to say that they are obscene. It is not necessary to compare one book with another to find the extend of permissible action. [28] It is useful to bear in mind the words of Lord Goddard CJ, in R v Reiter :

> The character of other books is a collateral issue, the exploration of which would be endless and futile. If the books produced by the prosecution are indecent or obscene, their quality in that respect cannot be made any better by examining other books...

> The court must, therefore, apply itself to consider each work at a time. An overall view of the obscene matter in the setting of the whole work would, of course, be necessary, but the obscene matter must be considered by itself and separately to find out whether it is so gross and its obscenity so decided that it is likely to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to influences of this sort and into whose hands the book is likely to fall. In this connection the interests of our contemporary society and particularly the influence of the book etc...on it, must not be overlooked.[29]

Elements which make a Book Obscene

A book shall be deemed obscene if: (a) it is lascivious or appeals to the prurient interest, or (b) if its effect or where it comprises of two or more distinct items, the effect of any one of its items is taken as a whole such as to tend to deprave and corrupt persons who are likely, having regard to all relevant circumstances, to read the matter contained in it. The words 'if taken as a whole' are of significance and show a departure from the earlier approach.[30]2001

The magazine published by the petitioner contained nude photographs of women. In the impugned pictures of the magazine there was hardly anything aesthetic or artistic about them. Rather the pictures were taken and published with the sole purpose of attracting readers who have a prurient mind. Held, there was prima facie case to frame charge under s 292, IPC against the petitioner.[31]

Offending Matter to be judged by the Court

The question, whether a book contains obscene matter or not, does not altogether depend on oral evidence because the offending matter of the book, which is the subject of charge, must be judged by the court in the light of s 292, IPC and the provisions of the Constitution. The publication in question should not be judged on a different standard than the strictly legal one because there is a good deal of gulf between legalism and literature on the question of decency.[32] If it may be necessary or is at all required the court may rely to a certain extent, on the evidence and views of leading literature on that aspect particularly when the book is in a language with which the court is not conversant.[33]

Certain Aspects to be Kept in View

The books as a whole and so also the passages under attack have to be judged keeping in view not only the present day literary trends and standards but the present day popular permissiveness as well. At places some words or passages may appear to be shocking or disgusting but not obscene. This does not prove obscenity. Freedom of expression requires adequate 'breathing space'.[34]

Whether a picture is obscene or not, one has to consider to a great extent the surrounding circumstances, the suggestive element in the picture and the person or persons in whose hands it is likely to fall. It is the duty of the court to find out whether there is any obscenity or any thing in the book which will undermine or take away or influence the public in general, and the reader in particular.[35]

Indecent Matter when Justified

Publication of indecent matter may be justified if it is genuinely in the interest, or for the purposes of art, science or any other form of learning. The justification must, however, depend on the facts of each particular case, on the form of the matter, the circumstances of its publication and the nature of the accused's business. In other words, if the necessary or natural effect of a publication is prejudicial to the public morality or decency, the motive of the accused in publishing the obscene matter is immaterial.

Where the accused, a company owned by the Government of India, engaged mainly in manufacturing and marketing of various types of condoms published the advertisement in question to promote the sale of one of their products 'Moods' for which the complainant Kerala Women's Commission and another responsible body sought explanation of the accused. On coming to know of the fact that advertisement2002 published drew objection from certain members of the society, the accused immediately withdrew the advertisement and expressed their regret, still the complaint was filed against the accused but much thereafter, alleging an offence punishable under s 292, IPC . It was held that even if the complaint was maintainable, the interest of the complainant who is alleged to be a social worker should give way to the larger interest of the society in not prosecuting the accused persons when the two very important public bodies have accepted the regrets expressed by the accused persons who immediately withdrew the advertisement and also in view of the explanation offered by the accused persons regarding publication of the advertisement, the proceeding against the accused persons was quashed by Kerala High Court by exercising powers under s 482, CrPC .[36]

26. Necessity of Publication or Circulation

Publication or putting into circulation, or attempting to do so is an essential element in the offence under this section. There are several ways of putting obscene matter into circulation. The section mentions some of them, such as sale, letting to hire, distribution, public exhibition, advertising etc. But this list is not exhaustive. For the purposes of the section, the indecent matter may be put into circulation in any manner.

Mode of Publication

It is immaterial whether the publication is in writing or in print or by sign, picture or effigy. The principles laid down in the cases upon this subject seem to cover oral communications, made before a large assembly, and having a clear tendency to produce immorality, as in the case of the performance of an obscene play. Publication is an essential element in the offence.[37] Showing an obscene print in private to another at his request who seeks to see and buy it for the purpose of prosecution has been held a publication.[38] It seems to be no defence in law to prove that the obscene libel is in a foreign language,[39] although the language may, in fact, limit the mischief of the publication.

Obscene books were seized from the shop of the accused, which the accused had kept in exposed state. The court considered the contents of the book and found that the necessary ingredients of the offence were made out. Appellant accused was convicted under s 292, IPC .[40]

Advertisement is Publication

An advertisement is a manner of publication. But where an advertisement only says that the book advertised contains 84 postures of men and women, but it does not itself give any posture offensive to the senses and the words used do not suggest any indecent, obscene or immoral ideas, the advertisement will not come under this section.[41]In Punjab a special Act [The Punjab Suppression of Indecent Advertisement Act (Punjab Act 7 of 1941)] has been passed for the purpose of suppressing indecent advertisement.2003

Where it appeared that the accused kept in Epsom Downs, a booth for the purpose of showing an indecent exhibition and they invited all persons who came within the reach of their solicitations to come in and see it, and that those who paid, went in and did see what was grossly indecent, it was held that the facts were sufficient to prove the common law offence of indecent exhibition.[42]

27. Mens Rea

It is beyond question that unless a statute, either clearly or by necessary implication, rules out mens rea as a constituent part of the crime, no one should be found guilty of an offence under the criminal law unless he has got a guilty mind.[43] Offences which can be held to be committed without a guilty mind are usually of comparatively minor character. The offence under this section is not of a minor character. So mens rea, is a necessary ingredient of an offence under this section.[44] 'Possession' in cl (a) of sub-s (2) of this section connotes conscious possession and in that sense it cannot be argued that mens rea or guilty mind has been dispensed with.[45]

28. Guilty Knowledge

Sub-section (2) of this section (unlike some others which open with the words 'whoever knowingly or negligently etc') does not make the knowledge of obscenity an ingredient of the offence. The prosecution need not prove something which the law does not burden it with. If knowledge were made a part of the guilty act (actus reus) and required the prosecution to prove it, it would place an almost impenetrable defence in the hands of offenders. Something much less than actual knowledge must therefore suffice. Absence of definite knowledge may be taken in mitigation, but it does not take the case out of the section. As regards the selling or keeping for sale of an object which is found to be obscene the ordinary guilty intention (mens rea) will be required before the offence can be said to be complete. The offender must have actually sold or kept for sale, the offending article. The circumstance of the case will then determine the criminal intent and it will be a matter of a proper inference from them. In criminal prosecution mens rea must necessarily be proved by circumstantial evidence alone unless the accused confesses. Sub-section (2) makes sale and possession for sale one of the elements of the offence. Where a sale has taken place, and the accused is a bookseller, the necessary inference is readily drawn. Difficulties may, however, arise in cases close to the border. To escape liability the accused can prove his lack of knowledge unless the circumstances are such that he must be held guilty for the acts of another. The court will presume that he is guilty if the book is sold on his behalf and is later found to be obscene, unless he can establish that the sale was without his knowledge or consent.[46]

29. Innocent Intention no Defence

If a publication is in fact obscene, it is no defence that the intention of the party charged was innocent,[47] or that there are other passages in the book which contain2004 moral precepts of an unexceptionable character.[48] If the probable effect of a publication is to prejudice public morals and decency, and is intended for those who have ardent sex appeal in them and it is for the delectation of the married and the unmarried for the gratification of their normal and abnormal sex appetites and it described varieties of sexual intercourse in a manner which, to say the least, is obscene, it must be taken that the book was written, printed and published and brought into circulation for prurient tastes. If the probable effect of the publication is to prejudice public morals and decency, the accused must be taken to have intended the natural consequences of his acts.[49]

30. Motive

The motive that the publisher had in publishing a book does not prevent it from being obscene if the descriptions are in themselves obscene. The motive may be taken into account as regards the question of sentence; but whether or not it is obscene depends on the material itself and not upon the reasons for the publication. Where a man publishes a work manifestly obscene, he must be taken to have intended the inevitable consequences.[50]

31. Master and Servant--Vicarious Liability--Extent of

The mere fact of a person being the proprietor and publisher of a newspaper is not sufficient to render him liable for a matter inserted by his servant. It must be shown that the matter was inserted by his orders, or with his knowledge,[51] which knowledge may be assumed if the thing is done in the ordinary course of trade management.[52]

32. Sub-section (2)(a)--'Makes, Produces'

The section covers not only the publication or circulation of an objectionable object, but also making, producing and having in possession such an object for the purpose of publication or circulation, and also an attempt to do so. The expression 'makes' and 'produces' occurring in cl (a) of sub-s (2) of this section do not exclude printing from its ambit. They are wide enough in their ambit[53] to embrace it. Possession of obscene matter is punishable only if such possession is for the purpose of publication or circulation. Possession by a person for his own use is not punishable under this section. But private circulation of obscene literature is not exempted under s 292, IPC . A person who puts obscene literature in private circulation is equally guilty under this section.[54]

33. Sub-section (2)(A)--'Or other Objects or General Concern'

The words 'or other objects of general concern' also occurring in sub-cl (i) of cl (a) of the exception to this section fall within the same field or dimension as 'science,2005 literature, art or learning' and do not fall in a totally different area of effect or sexual behaviour.[55]

34. Sub-Section (2)(A)--Sale etc of Obscene Object

In order to constitute an offence under s 292(2)(a), IPC, it must be a case where the obscene object was sold, let on hire, distributed or publicly exhibited or put into circulation. Production or possession of the object for any of the abovesaid purposes will also constitute an offence.[56] Where the allegations were that the first accused was seen exhibiting a blue film and accused nos 2 and 3 were viewing it from the drawing room of the first accused's residence, there was no allegation that the blue film was sold, let on hire or distributed or publicity exhibited, there was no allegation that the film was produced by any of the accused persons for purposes of distribution or circulation, the facts of the case were held not to constitute an offence under sub-s (2)(a) of s 292, IPC, the charge framed against the accused persons was therefore quashed.[57]

In the present day society in India, a book, picture or a publication which deals with such matters cannot per se be said to be obscene. Great emphasis is being laid on family planning and in that connection it has become absolutely necessary to import education about sex to the masses. It is a matter of common knowledge that there is even a thinking to introduce sex education as one of the subjects to be taught to the younger generation.[58]

35. Exceptions

The original exception to the section expressly exempted books, pamphlets, writings, drawing and paintings from the operation of the section if they were kept or used bona fide for religious purposes. It also exempted sculptures, engravings and paintings represented on or in any temple or on any car used for any religious purpose.

In England, s 4 of the Obscene Publications Act of 1959[59] makes an exception in the case of publications in the interest of science, literature, art or learning or of objects of general concern. This section did not make such exception earlier. But the courts had generally held that publication of indecent matters may be justified if it is genuinely in the interests or for the purposes of arts, science or any other form of learning. The books on medical science with intimate illustrations and photographs, though in a sense immodest, have not been considered to be obscene, but the same illustrations and photographs collected in a book form without the medical text would certainly be considered to be obscene.[60] This defect has now been removed by substituting a new exception in place of the old one by s 2 of Act 36 of 1969. Sub-clause (i) of cl (a) of the present exception now clearly states that this section will not extend to the publication of such book, pamphlet etc, which is proved to be justified as being for the public good on the ground that the same is in the interest of science, literature, art or learning or other objects of general concern. Sub-clause (i) of cl (b)2006 of the present exception has further widened the scope of the exception clause by exempting the representation sculptured, engraved, painted or otherwise represented on or any ancient monument within the meaning of the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Sites and Remains (Act 24 of 1958). Such provision was necessary with a view to protect some ancient monuments of historical and artistic importance having some vulgar or objectionable engravings etc.

Social Purpose

The book--'Indian Call Girls' has obviously been written by the petitioner, who is a sociologist with an object of general good inasmuch as she had carried out research in the lives of call-girls and the men helping in the lives of the call-girls in order to serve the social purpose of eradicating or minimising the evil of call-girls pervading the society. The mere fact that some sort of vulgar language has been used in some portions of book in describing sexual intercourse would not make it obscene. So this book falls under the exception to s 292, IPC .[61]

36. 'Justified as Being for the Public Good'

This expression occurs in cl (a)(i) of the exception to this section. It is open to an accused to plead that the book, pamphlet, writing, drawing, painting, representation or figure, alleged to be obscene, is justified as being for the public good in the interest of science, literature, art or learning, etc. Where the court is considering the question of obscenity and of public good as a defence, the court has, first of all, to determine the question of obscenity and the evidence on the question of public good is not relevant to the question of obscenity; once evidence has been given that satisfies the court that the articles are obscene, then and then only the court can proceed to consider the evidence on the other aspect, namely, public good.[62]

If the propagation of an idea, opinion or information be for public interest or profit, it would not be considered to be obscene though such propagation, in a different context, may be considered to be so. It is in this view of the matter that intimate illustrations in photographs, though in a sense immodest, are not considered obscene if included in books of medical science.[63] The justification must, however, depend on the facts of each particular case, on the form of the matter, the circumstances of its publication and the nature of the accused's business. In other words, if the necessary or natural effect of a publication is prejudicial to the public morality or decency, the motive of the accused in publishing the obscene matter is immaterial.[64]

A German magazine by name 'STERN' having worldwide circulation published an article with a picture of Boris Becker, a world renowned tennis player, posing nude with his dark-skinned fiancée by name Barbara Feltus, a film actress, which was photographed by none other than her father. The articles stated that in an interview, both Boris Becker and Barbara Feltus spoke freely about their engagement, their lives and future plans and the message they wanted to convey to the people at large, for posing to such a photograph. Article pictures Boris Becker as a strident protester of the pernicious practice of 'apartheid'. Further, it was stated that the purpose of the photograph was also to signify that love champions over hatred. 'Sports World', a2007 widely circulated magazine published in India reproduced the article and the photograph as cover story in its Issue-15 dated 5 May 1993 with the caption 'Posing nude dropping out of tournaments, battling racism in Germany. Boris Becker explains his recent approach to life' - Boris Becker Unmasked. Anandbazar Patrika, a newspaper having wide circulation in Kolkata, also published in the second page of the newspaper the above mentioned photograph as well as the article on 6 May 1993, as appeared in the Sports World. Held, the article and the photograph convey message to eradicate the evil of racism and apartheid in the society. Boris Becker is protestor against racism in Germany. The photograph and the article are intended to promote love and marriage between white skinned man and black skinned woman. The provisions of s 292, IPC were held not attracted in the case.[65]

The onus is on the accused to make out his defence on the probabilities.[66]

37. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable and a warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by a magistrate. Cognizance of the first offence under this section can be taken within three years of the commission of the offence. There is no limitation for taking cognizance of the subsequent offences.

38. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC 1973 may be adopted:

I (name the office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you.....(name of the accused) as follows:

That on or about the.....day of.....at..... you sold (or let to hire, or distributed, or publicly exhibited, or put into circulation) or, for that purpose made, produced or had in your possession an obscene book, pamphlet, paper, drawing, painting, representation or figure, or other object, namely.....(name the book, etc) or imported, exported or conveyed an obscene object for such purpose, or knowing or having reason to believe that it will be sold, etc, or took part in or received profits from a business in the course of which you knew or had reason to believe that such object was, for the purposes aforesaid, made, produced, purchased, kept, imported, exported, publicly exhibited or put into circulation, or, advertised or made known to the public that.....(name the person) was engaged or was ready to do any act which is an offence under section292 of the Indian Penal Code, or that any such obscene object would be procured from such person,] (or offered or attempted to do any such act which is an offence under section292 of the Indian Penal Code), and thereby committed the offence punishable under section 292 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

39. Contents of the Charge

When a charge is brought against an accused under s 292 or s 294, IPC, it should always specify the words or representations alleged to be obscene, and the magistrate should state in his judgment what he finds to have been exhibited or uttered.[67] A somewhat different view was expressed by the Kerala High Court and it was held that when a person is prosecuted under s 292, no doubt it is better to indicate, in the charge, in what respect exactly the book is obscene. But if the accused is not prejudiced in his defence and the prosecution maintains that the whole book is obscene mere failure to mention particular passages is not a sufficient reason to interfere in revision.[68]

However, in view of the provisions of s 211(2) of the CrPC if the law which creates the offence gives it any specific name, the offence may be described by that name only. If the charge under s 292(1), IPC mentions only 'obscene (photos) books in English, Tamil and Telugu language', the charge is not illegal because s 292, IPC uses a specific name to the offence and that name is obscene. The charge need not narrate the words 'such as to tend to deprave and corrupt persons who are likely, having regard to all relevant circumstances, to read, see or hear the matter contained or embodied in it' mentioned in the section.[69]

In the instant case, the accused were not found selling or doing anything to bring the case in cl (a) of sub-s (2) of s 292, IPC . For the second part of cl (a) the prosecution has to show that the obscene material was made produced or kept in possession for the purpose of the sale, hire, distribution, public exhibition or circulation, in other words, the possession of obscene object is punishable under s 292, IPC if the possession is for the purpose of sale, hire, distribution, public exhibition or circulation, if the obscene object is kept in the house and is not for sale, hire, public exhibition or circulation, the accused cannot be charged under s 292, IPC .[70]

40. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the book etc, is of an obscene nature;
(ii) the accused:

(a) sold, let to hire, distributed, publicly exhibited or in any manner put into circulation, or for purpose of sale, hire, distribution, public exhibition or circulation made, produced or had in his possession, any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, drawing painting, representation or figure or any other obscene object whatsoever; or
(b) imported, exported or conveyed any obscene object for any of the purposes aforesaid, or knowing or having reason to believe that such object would be sold, let to hire, distributed or publicly exhibited or, in any manner put it into circulation; or
(c) took part in, or received profits from, any business in the course of which he knew, or had reason to believe, that any such obscene2009 objects were, for any of the purposes aforesaid, made, produced, purchased, kept, imported, exported, conveyed, publicly exhibited or in any manner put into circulation; or
(d) advertised or made known by any means whatsoever, that any person was engaged or was ready to engage in any act which was an offence under this section, or that any such obscene object could be procured from or through any person; or
(e) offered or attempted to do any act which was an offence under this section.

It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the person, who sells, or keeps for sale, any obscene object, knows that it is obscene before he can be adjudged guilty.[71]

The requirement of passing an order of forfeiture of a book, presupposes that the book contains any matter the publication of which is punishable under ss 124A or 153A or 153B or 292 or 293 or 295A of the IPC, for the State Government to declare that every copy of such book be forfeited to the Government. The power can only be exercised and notification can only be issued if the Government forms an opinion that the publication contains matter which is in an offence under any of the sections of the IPC as aforestated.[72]

Proof of Mere Indecency not Sufficient

It is true that in order to sustain a conviction under s 292, IPC the prosecution has to prove that the book is obscene and that it is not sufficient to prove that it is indecent, the gravamen of the charge is that the tendency of the book is to corrupt and deprave and not merely to shock or to disgust.[73]

41. Certain Defences not Open to the Accused

It is not open to an accused to contend that the book is not in circulation,[74] or that one subject of that book was to hold up, to the reader, contemporary life in the west,[75] though he can contend that the book, or pamphlet, etc in question, falls within the purview of the exception contemplated in this section. An accused cannot also put to defence that his other publications were also obscene, but he had never been prosecuted earlier.[76] If a publication is, in fact, obscene, it is no defence that the intention of the accused was innocent,[77] or that there are other passages in the book which contain moral precepts of an unexceptionable character.[78]

42. Sentence

The offences of corrupting the internal fabric of the mind, like the one under s 292, IPC, have got to be treated on the same footing as in the cases of food adultrators,2010 and deserve no leniency.[79] Where the accused sold a packet of playing cards portraying on the reverse, luridly obscene naked pictures of a man and woman in pornographic sexual postures, a sentence of six months, rigorous imprisonment and line of Rs 500 was not held to be servere.[80] Where, however, the accused, who had not been prosecuted earlier for similar publications, was put to great loss by the destruction of the obscene books and the book gave useful instructions in sexual matters, a sentence of fine of Rs 250 for the offence under this section was held sufficient.[81] Where the accused guilty of an offence under this section, was aged 31 years and it was hoped that he would refrain from such activities in future, he was sentenced to a fine of Rs 300 and rigorous imprisonment of two months.[82] Where the accused, found guilty under this section, was a petty bookseller and his entire stock of obscene books was seized and he gave an undertaking that he would not repeat such an offence in future, a fine of Rs 50 was held sufficient.[83]But the discretion, which the court had in passing a sentence, has been taken away by the amendment, introduced by the Central Act, 36 of 1969, in this section. Therefore, it is now obligatory on a court to pass a sentence of imprisonment while convicting a person under s 292(2) of this Code. Hence, a mere sentence of fine is, now illegal.[84] While considering the quantum of sentence, the fact, that the accused has pleaded guilty to the charge, must be taken notice of by the court.[85] Where the accused, a young refugee and first offender, expressed desire to rehabilitate himself, sentence of three months was held sufficient.[86]

43. Probation

Where an accused is found guilty under s 292, IPC for showing blue films to young men, has undertaken it as a commercial activity, he is not entitled to be released on probation under s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958.[87]

44. Destruction of Obscene Matter

On conviction under section the court may order the destruction of all the copies of the thing in respect of which the conviction was had, and which are in the custody of the court or remain in the possession or power of the person convicted.[88] The provision is an enabling one and is not mandatory.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

[89][S. 293.

Sale, etc., of obscene objects to young person.--

Whoever sells, lets to hire, distributes, exhibits or circulates to any person under the age of twenty years any such obscene object as is referred to in the last preceding section, or2011 offers or attempts so to do, shall be punished [90][on first conviction with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and with fine which may extend to two thousand rupees, and, in the event of a second or subsequent conviction, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and also with fine which may extend to five thousand rupees].

Tamil Nadu--In section 293 --

(a) For the words "any such obscene object as is referred to in the last preceding section", the words, figures and letters "any such obscene object as is referred to in s 292 or any such newspaper, periodical, circular, picture or other printed or written document as is referred to in s 292A ", shall be substituted;
(b) for the words "which may extend to six months" the words "which may extend to three years" shall be substituted;
(c) in the marginal note, after the words "obscene objects" the words "and grossly indecent or scurrilous matter or matter intended for blackmail", shall be inserted.[91]

Orissa--

Same as in Tamil Nadu.[92]

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes a person who sells, lets to hire, distributes, exhibits or circulates obscene objects as referred to in the preceding section to young persons. It enhances the punishment where the obscene objects are sold, etc, to persons under the age of 20 years.

In the final draft of the International Conference which drafted, the convention in accordance with which this section was substituted for the original, it was stated that the conference generally was of opinion that the offence of offering, delivering, selling or distributing obscene objects must be held to have been aggravated when committed in respect of minors. The Council (of the League) considered that it would be preferable to leave each state free to fix the age under which a person should be considered to be a minor for the purposes of this provision.[93]

2. Legislative Changes

This section was substituted for the original by s 2 of the Obscene Publication Act, 8 of 1925. The section was again amended in 1969 by Act 36 of 1969 with a view to provide a more stringent punishment. Before the 1969 amendment the offence was2012 punishable only with imprisonment of either description for a term which could extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

3. Analogous Law

This section is analogous to s 2 of the English Children and Young Persons (Harmful Publications) Act 1955.

4. Abetment

Synopsis note 8 of s 292 may be referred to.

5. Procedure

This offence is cognizable and a warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by any magistrate.

The limitation for taking cognizance of this offence is three years. This bar of limitation will, however, not apply to subsequent offences committed by the accused after his conviction in a case under this section.

6. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of.....19....., at....., sold (or let to hire, or distributed or exhibited or circulated) to.....(name the person) under the age of twenty years.....(name the obscene object) (or offered or attempted to do so), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 293 of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of this court.

[94][And that you, the said.....(name the accused) stand further charged that you had been earlier convicted on the.....day of.....by.....(name the court) of an offence under this section, which conviction is still in force and effect, and that you are thereby liable to enhanced punishment in the event of your conviction in this case.]

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court for the said offence.

7. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will be necessary to prove that:

(i) a book or object of obscene nature, as is referred to in s 292, IPC, was sold, etc.;
(ii) the person, to whom it was sold, etc., or offered or attempted to do so, was under the age of 20 years.

8. Assessment of Evidence--Relevancy of Certificate of Board of Censors

In a trial for the offence under ss 292 and 293, IPC, a certificate granted under s 5A of the Cinematograph Act 1952, by the Board of Censors, does not provide an irrebuttable defence to the accused, who have been granted such as certificate, but2013 it is certainly a relevant fact of some weight to be taken into consideration by the criminal court in deciding whether the offence charged is established. Regard must be had, by the court, to the fact that the certificate represents the judgment of a body of persons, particularly selected under the statute for the specific purpose of adjusting the suitability of films for public exhibition, and the judgment extends to a consideration of the principal ingredients which go to constitute the offences under ss 292 and 293 of the Indian Penal Code . At the same time, the court must remind itself that the function of deciding whether the ingredients are established is primarily and essentially its own function and it cannot abdicate that function in favour of another, no matter how august and qualified be the statutory authority.[95]

9. Destruction of Obscene Matter

On a conviction under this section or under s 292, IPC, the court may under s 455(1) of the CrPC 1973 order the destruction of all the copies of the thing in respect of which the conviction was had, and which are in the custody of the court or remain in possession or power of the person convicted.

Obscene acts and songs.--

Whoever, to the annoyance of others,

(a) does any obscene act in any public place, or
(b) sings, recites or utters any obscene song, ballad or words, in or near any public place, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine, or with both.]2014

Comments

1. Object

The section is intended to prevent an obscene act being performed in public, to the annoyance of the public at large.[1]

It must be read subject, inter alia, to the general exception in ss 87 and 88 of this Code.[2] A customer, who goes to a hotel, where a cabaret show is run, impliedly gives his consent to take the risk of the mental harm, if any, of being annoyed by the obscene sound and dances which the cabaret performer may give. The maxim volenti non fit injuria must apply to annoyance, if any.[3] 'Writing letter' to the woman police officer at her residential address using vulgar and obscene language does not come under the mischief of s 292 or s 294 .[4]

To make out an offence under s 294(b) of IPC, the alleged obscene act must have been committed by the accused in or near a public place.[5] Offence under s 294(b) cannot be made out uttering words in a private garden which is not a public place.[6]

2. Legislative Changes

This section was substituted for the original s 294 by s 3 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act (3 of 1895). The original section ran thus:

> Whoever sings, recites or utters in or near any public place any obscene song, ballad, or words to the annoyance of others, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine, or with both.

The old section was replaced to meet a case of indecency which was common in the Madras Presidency and was pointed out in an unreported case of the High Court.

3. Essential Ingredients of the Offence under this Section

The essential ingredients of the section are:

(i) an act must have been done in a public place, or a song, ballad or words must have been sung, recited or uttered in, or near any such place;
(ii) the act, song, ballad or words must be obscene; and
(iii) the same must cause annoyance to others.

The main ingredient for the offence under s 294(b), IPC is uttering words in a public place to the annoyance of others.[7]

4. Abetment

Commentary under the same heading in s 292, ante may be referred to.2015

5. 'Annoyance to others'

An act*per se* indecent and obscene would not warrant prosecution under s 294 of the IPC in absence of express evidence of annoyance to any other persons.[8]

To prove the offence under s 294, IPC mere utterance of obscene words are not sufficient, but there must be a further proof to establish that it was to the annoyance to others.[9] Annoyance to others is essential to constitute an offence under this section. Where there is no evidence recorded that the language used caused annoyance to anybody, a conviction under this section cannot be sustained.[10] From the wording of the section it is plain that annoyance by the obscene act of the accused should be caused to others. The word 'others' includes singular member as well.[11]The section does not limit the scope of the word 'others' to mean the person who is the intended victim of the obscene act. It is enough if the obscene act is committed in public and causes annoyance to anybody, be he the contemplated victim of the offender or not.[12]There can be a large number of acts which, by their very nature, are so offensive to morality and repugnant to a sense of propriety and decency that, if done in public, they would cause annoyance to any every respectable member of the society regardless that the doer of the act has or has not any particular individual or individuals in his mind whom he wants to injuriously affect when doing the act. The doing of such an act would cause annoyance to the public at large and the offender cannot escape liability on the plea that there was no particular victim intended by him. Similarly, there is another class of cases in which the offender, by his act, intends to injuriously affect his victim only, but nonetheless, since the act is done in public and it is obscene, it is bound to cause annoyance to others also who happen to see and hear it besides the victim intended.[13] Kissing by two young people without any intention of annoying anyone has, however, not been held to be an obscene act.[14]

Where a couple was taking photograph of each other sitting together and using their mobile phones outside the court premises, held no annoyance was caused to the public, as such no offence under s 294, IPC was committed and therefore FIR was quashed.[15]

Annoyance--How to be Determined

In determining whether a particular utterance caused annoyance to others, regard should be had to the circumstances of the case and to the class of society to which the parties belong.[16]

6. 'Obscene Act'

No precise or arithmetical definition of the word 'obscene' to cover all possible cases could be given earlier. It had to be judged on the facts of each case, whether in the context of its surroundings the questioned act was obscene or not. The position has2016 considerably been changed now. Sub-section (1) of s 292 inserted by the Amendment Act 36 of 1969 now specifically defines the word 'obscene' and the said definition can be used for the purposes of this section as well.

The word 'obscenity' used in s 294, IPC does not have different meaning than what is explained in ss

292 and 293, IPC .[17]

Test of obscenity laid down in Hicklin's case[18] followed in PT Chacko v Nainan Chacko [19] and George v State of Kerala ,[20] while interpreting 'obscenity' used in s 294(b) of IPC, having been followed for nearly four decades has to be accepted and followed as the correct law laid down on the point.[21]

Commentary under s 292, ante may be referred to.

Test of Obscenity

Commentary under the same heading in s 292, ante may be referred to. For test of obscenity, see also Devidas Ramachandra Tuljapurkar v State of Maharashtra. [22]

The test of obscenity is the substantial tendency to corrupt by rousing lustful desires.[23]In a case, the accused addressed two respectable young girls not known to him, openly in the hearing of others, in a public place, inviting them to accompany him on his rickshaw in amorous words suggestive of illicit sex relations with them. The words addressed by the applicant were clearly offensive to the chastity and modesty of the girls, something which delicacy, purity and decency forbade to be expressed. The girls, as also others who were present, must have suffered a moral shock to hear such sensuous words addressed to them by an utter stranger. They were suggestive of unchaste and lustful ideas and were impure, indecent and lewd. It was held that by addressing such words to the girls the accused committed an obscene act within the meaning of this section.[24]

Cabaret Dances and Obscenity

It is hard to hold the contention that cabaret dances are harmful to public order and morals and are likely to deprave and corrupt the minds of the viewers, especially those who are young and besides being obscene, cause annoyance to the other customers of the restaurant. A customer above the age of 18, who goes to a hotel, where a cabaret show is run, looks forward to be entertained by obscenity and cannot complain of annoyance to which, if any, he shall be deemed to have given his consent. Even assuming that such a hotel where any person can buy tickets or seats is considered to be a public place, it cannot be held that the obscenity and annoyance which are punishable under s 294, IPC are caused without the consent express or implied of such person. An offence under s 294, IPC can be said to have been committed to the annoyance of the public, if the public or a section thereof object.[25] The cabaret dances where indecent and obscene act per se is involved would not2017 attract provision of s 294 in absence of express evidence of annoyance by any of the persons who attended such show.[26]

The performance of a cabaret dance devoid of nudity and obscenity judged with Indian standards, is permissible, and is not, in any way, liable to be banned or prevented.[27]

Nude Female Form--Whether Obscene

Mere showing of nude female form in itself, is not necessarily obscene, unless the manner in which the nude picture appeared in the film is such that it is likely to arouse unhealthy lustful thoughts in the minds of viewers.[28]

Obscenity and Moral Turpitude

In Pawan Kumar v State of Haryana ,[29] the question before the Supreme Court was whether a conviction under this section involves moral turpitude. The Apex Court defined 'moral turpitude' as follows:

> Moral turpitude, is an expression which is used in legal as also societal parlance to describe conduct which is inherently base, vile, depraved or having any connection showing depravity.

It was held that conviction under s 294, IPC, per se does not establish moral turpitude. The courts should be sensitive to the changing perspectives and concepts of morality to appreciate the effect of s 294, IPC on today's society and its standards, and its changing views of obscenity.

Commentary under s 292 may be referred to.

7. 'Public Place'

To constitute an offence under this section, it is necessary that the acts, enumerated in the section, must have been done in, or near, any 'public place'.[30] 'A public place is a place where the public go, no matter whether they have a right to go or not. The right is not the question'.[31]Where annoyance to the public was not caused by the act of the accused persons, namely a couple taking photograph of each other and, sitting together and using their mobile phones outside the court premises, held no offence under s 294, IPC was made out, FIR was quashed.[32]

In considering whether a particular locality is a public place or not, the courts look at it in respect to the manner in which it was used at the time of the alleged offence. Thus, if a village storehouse in which medicines are sold, is locked up at night, it then ceases to be a public place, though it was such during the day. And the general principle seems to be, that the place must be one to which people are at the time privileged to resort without an invitation. On the other hand, any place may be made2018 public by a temporary assemblage; and the exclusion of a few persons is not alone sufficient to prevent its being such.[33]

A necessary ingredient of the offence under s 294 of the IPC is that it must occur in a 'public place'. A public place must be held to be a place which is open to the members of the public though in some cases access to it by members of the public may be on fulfilling certain conditions. But the right of access to such place must not be limited to any determinate section of public and the person in charge of the place should have no right or discretion to deny access to any member of the public as long as such member is ready to fulfill the conditions attached for access. Where the incident was alleged to have occurred in the room of the petitioner, Managing Director, when the complainant had gone after prior appointment, the petitioner had threatened and abused the complainant, the Managing Director's room is not a public place, offence under s 294, IPC was not committed, cognizance taken against the petitioner was quashed on petition under s 482, CrPC .[34]

A railway carriage is a public place.[35] So also is an omnibus, train, or public urinal.[36]

Exposure of a man's person in a public place is indictable.[37]

In the instant case the incident had taken place inside the house of the accused appellant which is not a public place. The words and sentences alleged to be obscene were not mentioned in the FIR. FIR was quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[38]

Public Place--Hotel with Restriction of Entry by Ticket Like Cinema Hall

An enclosed area in a posh hotel where cabaret dance is performed cannot be said to be a private place merely by reason that entry is restricted to persons purchasing the highly priced tickets and costly food and drinks are served. A posh hotel is as much a public place as a cinema house. Entry to a hotel just like a cinema house cannot be and is not being restricted to anybody. A hotel must definitely be placed accessible to all except perhaps subject to reasonable restrictions allowed by law. It continues to be a public place. If any portion of the hotel is earmarked for persons who opt to pay a particular amount, it does not cease to be a public place for that reason, because without discrimination anybody will have access on such payment. Therefore, there is no point in contending that a portion of a hotel where the only restrictions for entry on some payments is not a public place. Otherwise the result will be that any public place could be made a private place by enclosing the same and restricting entry to persons who can afford payment of huge amounts. If 'public place' is determined on the amount of money, one may have to shell out for securing admission the position will be pitiable and it will only tend to judicial recognition of corruption. If what is prohibited in a cinema house where people are admitted for charges within their reach is not taboo for the rich who could afford to witness such shows for higher tickets with additional amounts for drinks and food, the position is really ridiculous. The position will be that those who could afford enormous amounts could conduct or witness obscene acts with impunity. That is not the legal intent. If that principle is2019 accepted the criterion for deciding a public place will be the amount that is expended for getting entry. If so a cinema house also will cease to be a public place if the ticket charges are enormously increased and it is provided that consumption of costly food and drinks on payment is also a must. That is not what the law intended as the criterion for deciding whether a place is public or not. If that is the criterion every public place could be converted into a private place by restricting entry to rich persons who alone could afford the luxury. The result will be that any obscenity which is prohibited to the poor will not be a prohibited obscenity for the rich. That will lead to a very unhappy position. So also previous advertisement of what is going to be performed cannot have the effect of converting a public place into a private place or obscenity into something which is not obscene.[39] Thus, (i) cabaret dances where indecent and obscene act per se is involved, would not attract the provision of s 294 of the IPC without fulfilment of its essential ingredients ie evidence pertaining to 'annoyance to others' and (ii) the hotels like the one where cabaret dances are performed and entry is restricted by purchase of the tickets, would still be the public places within the meaning of s 294 of the IPC .[40]

Where the allegation was that the accused owner of the bar and restaurant was organizing obscene dances in guise of orchestra in bar and restaurant it was held that s 294, IPC was not attracted in the case.[41]

8. Occurrences not taking Place in Public Place

Where the accused went to the complainant's house and abused him, it was held that the act was not done in, or near, any public place and, therefore, it did not constitute an offence under this section.[42] Similarly, where the accused was abusing the complainant, his next door neighbour standing on his own chabutra, the chabutra was held not to be a public place so as to constitute an offence under s 294(b), IPC .[43] Where the occurrence did not take place in a public place but it took place in the garden belonging to one person, who stated to have purchased the said property from another person without the knowledge of the accused person, who are the wife and son of the person who has sold the said property, under these circumstances the proceeding for the offence under s 294(b), IPC, is not maintainable.[44] The offence under the section cannot be made out for uttering words in a private garden which was not a public place.[45]

Where the place in question was out of sight of the public footpath but was a place to which persons were in the habit of going without any strict legal right to do so and without being in any way hindered, and the prisoner exposed his person to several little girls, it was held that he was rightly convicted, and a suggestion was thrown out that the offence might be indictable if committed before diverse subjects of the realm even if the place be not public.[46]2020

The prosecution case was that the accused by uttering obscene words and words relating to caste dispossessed the complainant from land. Evidence however showed that the accused was in possession of the disputed land. The case set up by the complainant was false. Accused was acquitted of the charge under s 294, IPC .[47]

9. Sealing and Seizing Theatre and Articles

Insofar as arrest of the persons, who are alleged to have been committed the offence under s 294 of IPC, which is a cognizable offence, and seizing five reels of the offending film is concerned, there cannot be any objection for they directly relate to commission of the offence. Sealing and seizing the theatre is, however, not authorised in law. But when on allegation that the licensee of the theatre is screening obscene or pornographic films, B-form licence is cancelled or suspended thereby the theatre cannot be used for screening any films. However, at the stage of investigation in relation to a criminal case, the police do not have any powers to seize the cinema theatre or projector.[48]

10. Clause (B)--'Obscene Songs'--Ballad and Words

It must be proved that the act or words in question were obscene.[49] They are to be stated in the FIR or complaint. The mere allegation of the use of obscene words without mentioning the words uttered cannot attract charges under s 294, cl (b).[50]

In order to constitute an offence under s 294(b), the accused must sing, recite or utter any obscene song, ballad or words, in or near any public place.[51]

A conviction under this section for singing obscene songs in a public place was set aside in the absence of proof that the particular songs sung were obscene, though they belonged to a class of songs many of which were obscene.[52]

11. Vulgar Abuses--Whether Obscene

No literal significance can, however, be attached to vulgar abuses,[53] abuse cannot be equated with utterance of obscene words, there must be proof of annoyance to others in the public place.[54] So mere vulgar abuses do not constitute an offence under s 294, IPC, though of course in certain circumstances intentional insult with intent to provoke breach of peace may enable court to frame a charge under s 504, IPC . Mere platitudinous utterances signifying the enraged state of a person's mind would not be sufficient to attract the application of the provision of s 294, IPC . The test is whether the tendency of the matter charged on obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences.[55] Where the accused called a mistress, serving in a school, 'Randi', 'Chhinar' and 'Vaishya' in the public place, it2021 was held that the words were obscene and annoying within the meaning of this section.[56]

Where the petitioners were alleged to have uttered words to two girls in public places, 'oh, good looking, how are you, from where have you come and how is your life, let us laugh and play'. These words allegedly created bad influence on the public. But it was held that none of the saying attributed to petitioners could in any way be construed as amounting to an offence under s 294, IPC .[57]

12. Obscene Words

So if the words uttered by the accused are not such as would tend to arouse sexually impure thoughts or deprave or corrupt the mind of complainant, who is himself a doctor they do not answer the test of obscenity.[58] But where the accused, in a public lane, repeatedly uttered words 'Haae jani maar daal idhar bhi darshan karti ja' when girls and ladies were passing, it was held that the words were obscene and annoying.[59]

13. Dramatic Performance Act, 19 of 1876, Section 9

A conviction under s 9 of the Dramatic Performance Act, 19 of 1876, is no bar to conviction under this section.

14. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It can be tried by any judicial magistrate and can be tried summarily.

But where the charge under this section is against a government servant, which if established, would entail the dismissal of the government, the accused should not be tried summarily.[60]

The cognizance of this offence can be taken within one year.

15. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC 1973 may be adopted:

> I (name and the office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you on or about.....day of....., at....., to the annoyance of (name the persons) did the obscene act.....(name the obscene act) in.....(name the public place) (or sung or recited or uttered).....(name the song, ballad or words) which was an obscene song, (ballad or words), in [or near.....(name the public place)], and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 294 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.
> Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?
> Ans. Yes2022
> Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?
> Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

16. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will be necessary to prove that:

(i) the accused:

(a) either did some act in any public place; or
(b) sang, recited, or uttered any song, ballad or words, in or near any public place,

(ii) the said act, song, ballad or words were obscene; and
(iii) it caused annoyance to others.[61]

Where the obscene words used by the accused were not set out in the evidence, it was held, that the omission was not a sufficient ground for setting aside the conviction.[62]

A vague or general statement in the FIR that the accused showered obscene words is not enough to constitute an offence under s 294(b) . It is necessary to state the words uttered by the accused. The prosecution would not be justified in bringing in the evidence for the first time the words are allegedly spoken to by the accused, when the same is not recorded in the First Information Statement in a case instituted upon police report.[63] Where the words alleged to be obscene were not reproduced in FIR, charge for offence under s 294(b), IPC framed against the accused was quashed.[64]

Mere unparliamentary words used by the accused would not amount to offence punishable under s 294 when the words are not obscene.[65]

To prove the offence under s 294, IPC, mere utterance of obscene words are not sufficient, but there must be a further proof to established that it was to the annoyance to others.[66]

Film Reel found containing Blue Film Attached to the Regular Film

Where the materials collected during the course of investigation *prima facie*point out that the obscene scene is totally unconnected with the English Film 'Girl' and the obscene scene had been connected to the film 'Girl' and shown as part of the film, just prior to intermission, in such a state of affairs, it cannot at all be stated that the offending act of exhibition of the blue film containing the obscene scene, which is totally unconnected with the censored film, is actually justified by law or is bona fide believed by mistake of fact to be justified, therefore, accused who were prosecuted of the offence under ss 294, 279, IPC, read with s 7(1)(b) of Cinematograph Act 1952 cannot get benefit of s 79, IPC, to get the proceedings quashed.[67]2023

Annoyance is to be Inferred from Proved Facts and Circumstances

Annoyance is generally associated with the mental condition and for that reason it is difficult to prove it as a fact by positive evidence. In almost all the cases, it is to be inferred from the proved facts. In the given case, the words attributed to the accused are clearly abusive and obscene especially when directed against a doctor and a public servant. The fact that the doctor and some other members of the public were impelled to complain about it is a sufficient indication of the fact that they were all annoyed by the use of such words in a public place. These circumstances are sufficient to establish the ingredient relative to annoyance contained in s 294, IPC .[68]Though, unless annoyance is caused, an act will not be punishable under s 294, IPC yet it is not necessary that the witness should specifically say that annoyance was caused, it can be inferred from the facts and circumstances in which the incident occurred.[69] In the absence of any evidence that an annoyance was caused to any member of the public, it was held that the charge was not proved.[70]

Photographs best Evidence

Where the charge related to dancing by a professional dancer in an obscene manner, it is not safe to act upon the oral evidence of the prosecution witness who has been set up by the police. The best thing in such cases should be to take a photograph at the time of dancing to find out whether such dancing is nude and obscene.[71] Similarly, where neither the informant nor the girl, who had been teased by the accused, was examined and the court recorded conviction on the hearsay evidence of a witness who had reached the spot after the occurrence was over, it was held that the conviction of the accused was not maintainable.[72]

17. Punishment

The old trend was in favour of a lenient punishment under this section. In a case of 1923 the Rangoon High Court had held that a sentence of three months' rigorous imprisonment under this section for using obscene language in a public place is unduly severe.[73] In yet another old case, it was observed that in ordinary cases under this section where the bad language is not specially pointed at an individual and arises from a mere outbreak of temper, a small fine is sufficient to meet the requirements of justice.[74] A woman, who abused her husband in language and under circumstances amounting to an offence under this section, was ordered to pay a fine of Rs 20, and, in default of payment, to undergo one month's simple imprisonment. The fine was paid. It was held that the sentence was unduly severe and that it must be reduced to Rs 2 and that the balance ought to be refunded.[75] This view was probably taken as it was the husband, who was abused by his own wife and was the result of some domestic quarrel otherwise even a fine of Rs 20 should be regarded as too lenient a punishment. Apart from this, the decision is of the period 1872-92, when2024 even a rupee had some value. In any case, it should be no authority at the end of the present century.

In a later, Allahabad case,[76] Misra J, observed:

> Teasing by road-side Romeos is fast on the increase in cities. Unfortunately, no offence is so easy to commit, yet so difficult to be booked. The victims of the offence are mostly modest and shy girls or young women of respectable families. While on the road or passing in the by-lanes, prowling desperadoes cut filthy jokes with them and pass indecent, sensuous and sarcastic remarks against them. The poor victims dare not protest in order to avoid creating scene and attracting a crowd at the spot. Publicity of such incidents sometimes leads to injurious effect against the victims themselves inasmuch as it subsequently provides material for groundless scandal and unjustified gossip against their character from interested quarters. The victims therefore, are compelled as of necessity to silently suffer the disgrace and instinctively leave the spot as quickly as they can without disclosing their identity. The offenders being riffraffs and desperate character, prudence dictates that even respectable passersby, who happen to hear and see the ugly incident must to their mental anguish, pretend not to have heard or noticed it and to pass off the place quickly in their own safety. The result is that the offenders indulge in the crime freely and with impunity without any fear of consequence to themselves. The offence hardly ever is brought to the notice of the authorities. In my opinion, such an offence, when proved, must be looked upon with utmost severity and should be punished deterrently. The maximum sentence of imprisonment provided under this section is three months' rigorous imprisonment only, plus fine also in the discretion of the court. In fact, I think it is time that, considering its large incidence, the legislature thought fit to amend the law and provide severe punishment for this offence.

Eve-Teasing Deserves Deterrent Punishment

The Patna High Court has also taken a similar view and it has been held that as the teasing of school girls has become very common, an offence, under this section when proved, must be looked upon with utmost severity and should be punished deterrently. It should not be dealt with lightly.[77]

18. Security for Keeping the Peace

Although an offence under this section, does not necessarily amount to a breach of the peace, if it in fact did so, or was intended or known to be likely to cause a breach of the peace the offender may be bound over to keep the peace at the time of conviction.[78]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

[79][S. 294A.

Keeping lottery office.--

Whoever keeps any office or place for the purpose of drawing any lottery [80][not being [81][a State lottery] or lottery authorised by the [82][State] government], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.2025

And whoever publishes any proposal to pay any sum, or to deliver any goods, or to do or forbear doing anything for the benefit of any person, on any event or contingency relative or applicable to the drawing of any ticket, lot, number or figure in any such lottery, shall be punished with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section makes it an offence to keep a place for drawing a lottery, and to publish a lottery. A lottery by itself is not, in India, unlawful in the sense that it is prohibited by law. It is only in relation to this section that a lottery becomes unlawful:[83]

Every lottery is either authorised or not authorised by government. The section does not touch authorised lotteries, but intends to save people from the effects of those not authorised, firstly, by prohibiting the keeping of offices or places for drawing them, and secondly, by prohibiting the publication of any advertisements relating to them.[84]2026

2. Analogous Law

In Sesha Ayyar v Krishna Ayyar ,[85] Venkataramana Rao J, summed up the development of the law regarding lotteries as follows:

> It is necessary to advert briefly to the development of the law, both in England in India, regarding lotteries and the underlying principle on which they have been rendered illegal, or, in certain circumstance made punishable.

Law in England

In England lotteries were perfectly valid at common law, but between the years 1698 and 1846 a series of statutes were enacted in order to suppress lotteries. The original purpose of these acts was twofold; to authorise only state lotteries which infact thrived from 1709-1803, and also to prevent any opposition to those state lotteries either at home or from abroad. Later statutes were also intended to prevent innocent persons from being ruined. It is necessary to refer to these various statutes except two of them insofar as they have a bearing on the Indian Statute Law. Two of the said statutes are the Gambling Act of 1802,[86] and the Lotteries Act of 1823.[87] The relevant provisions of the said two Acts are as follows:

The Gambling Act

> An act to suppress certain games and lotteries and authorised by law.[88]

> Whereas evil-disposed persons do frequently resort to public houses and other places to set up certain mischievous games or lotteries called little games, and to induce, servants, children, and unwary person to play at the said games; and thereby most fraudulently obtain great sums of money from servants, children, and unwary persons to the great impoverishment and utter ruin of many families.

> For remedy whereof, be it enacted, that all such games or lotteries called little goes, shall, from the after the passing of this Act, be deemed, and are hereby declared common and public nuisances and against law. From and after 1 day of July 1802, no person or persons whatsoever shall publicly or privately keep any office or place to exercise, keep open, show or expose to be played, drawn, or thrown at or in, either by dice, lotteries, cards, balls, or by numbers or figures, or by any other way, contrivance, or device whatsoever, any game or lottery called a little go or any other lottery whatsoever not authorised by Parliament, or shall knowingly suffer to be exercised, kept open, shown, or exposed to be played, drawn or thrown at or in, either by dice, lots, cards, balls or by number or figures, or by any other way, contrivance, or device whatsoever, any such game or lottery in his or her house, room, or place upon pain of forfeiting for every such offence the sum of five hundred pounds, to be recovered in the court of exchequer at the suit of His Majesty's Attorney-General, and to be put to the use of His Majesty, his heirs and successors.

Lotteries Act 1823 QQ 2548

The Lotteries Act 1823, provided that if any person or persons were to sell tickets or chances in any lottery not authorised by an Act of Parliament or publish any scheme or proposal for the sale of any ticket or chance in such a lottery, for every such offence he had to forfeit and pay a sum of fifty pounds.2027

It will be seen from the preamble of 42 Geo 3, the underlying public policy which declared the lotteries common public nuisance was that they promote gambling and speculations so that great sums are obtained fraudulently from servants, children and unwary persons, to the great impoverishment and utter ruin of many families.

Act 5 of 1844

In India, Act 5 of 1844 was enacted on these lines. The relevant provisions are as follows:

> Whereas great mischief has been found to result from the existence of lotteries:
> (1) it is hereby enacted, that, in the territories subject to the government of the East India Company, all lotteries not authorised by government shall, from and after 31st day of March 1844, be deemed, and are hereby declared, common and public nuisances and against law;
> (2) and it is hereby enacted, that from and after the day aforesaid, no person shall, in the said territories, publicly or privately, keep any office or place for the purpose of drawing any lottery not authorised by the government, or shall have any such lottery drawn, or shall knowingly suffer any such lottery to be drawn, in his or her house; and any person so offending shall for every such offence, upon conviction, before a justice of the peace, or magistrate, be punished by fine not exceeding Rs 5,000.

The interpretation of 'lottery' in Act 5 of 1844, was accepted by the legislature and with the knowledge of that interpretation, the Penal Code was amended by s 10 of Act 27 of 1870, by enacting this section, which it may be observed is more restricted in scope than that of Act 5 of 1844.

Though the Private Lotteries Act 1844 was repealed, the same spirit permitting its various provisions has reincarnated in the shape of s 294A, IPC .[89]

3. Legislative Changes

This section was inserted by s 10 of the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act, 27 of 1870.

The words 'a lottery organized by the Central Government or the government of a Pt A State or a Pt B State' were substituted for the words 'a state lottery' and the word 'state' was substituted for the word 'Provincial' by the adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The words 'a state lottery' were substituted for the words 'a lottery organized by the Central Government or the government of a Pt A or a Pt B State' by Pt B State (Laws) Act 1951 (3 of 1951).

4. Section repealed in Certain States

The provision of s 294A, IPC have been repealed in Andhra Pradesh by s 27 of Andhra Pradesh Act, 26 of 1968 (with effect from 1 February 1969), in Maharashtra by s 33 of the Bombay Act, 82 of 1958 (with effect from 1 May 1959) in Gujarat by s 33 of the Bombay Act, 82 of 1958 read with s 87 of the Bombay Act, 11 of 1960 and in Mysore, except Bellary district, by s 33 of Mysore Act, 27 of 1951.2028

5. Object

Neither under the English Acts on the subject, nor under this Code, is it made an offence to buy a ticket in a lottery. There can be no doubt that these enactments are aimed at the class of persons who promote lotteries and that they are intended to protect the class of persons who are tempted to take tickets in lotteries.[90] This was the view of the policy of the Lottery Acts taken by Striling J, in Barclay v Pearson .[91]The fact that the lotteries have a pernicious tendency is evident from the fact that private lotteries were prohibited as far back as in the 19th century by means of the Private Lotteries Act 1844, though the said Act was repealed, the same spirit permitting its various provisions has reincarnated in the shape of s 294A, IPC .[92] Under s 294A, if any person sums a private lottery, he is liable to imprisonment or fine or both. It appears that when the government itself sums a lottery or permits a lottery to sum, the lottery is not legitimised but it only exempts that lottery from the operation of s 294A, IPC .[93]

6. Two Parts of the Section

The section is in two parts. The first part makes it an offence to keep any office or place for the purpose of drawing any lottery not authorised by government. The second part makes it an offence to publish any sum on an event or contingency relative to the drawing of any ticket in such lottery.[94] What has been rendered indictable under the first part, is the running of public lotteries and the precise offence envisaged by the section is that of keeping any place for the purpose of drawing any unauthorised lottery.[95] The officer or place, the keeping of which is punishable under this part of the section, must be intended to be the scene of actual drawing of the lottery, the keeping of an office for the transaction of preliminary business and correspondence, and not intended or used for the purpose of drawing, is no offence under the first part of the section.[96]

The offence under the second part of the section consists in the publication of proposals and does not depend on whether the proposals were to be actually carried out or not. The intention of the legislature appears to have been that the public should not be informed of such proposals.[97] If the proposals are such as come within the mischief of the second clause of this section, the offence is completed by publishing them and it does not matter whether the scheme is to actually conduct the lottery or to merely defraud the public.[98]

7. Essential Ingredients of this Offence

The first part of the section which deals with keeping a lottery office has two essential ingredients, namely:2029

(i) there must be keeping of an office or place for drawing lottery; and
(ii) the lottery must not be a state lottery or a lottery authorised by the state government.

The ingredients of the offence under the second part of the section, which deals with the publication of any proposal regarding a lottery, are:

(i) there must be a lottery,
(ii) there must be a drawing of any ticket, lot, number or figure in such lottery, and
(iii) there must be a publication of a proposal to pay any money, or to deliver any goods, or to do or forbear doing anything for the benefit of any person on any event or contingency relative or applicable to such drawing.[1]

8. 'Lottery'

Meaning

There is no formal definition of 'lottery' in the Penal Code or in any other statute. Its common meaning, as disclosed by the dictionary is, 'a scheme for the distribution of prizes by lot or chance'. It is in this sense that the word is used in this section.[2] What constitutes a lottery is that some gain is to come to the subscriber dependent upon pure chance, any element of skill being absent.[3] Lucky draw schemes are covered under the provisions of s 294A, IPC .[4]

A Game of Chance

The term 'lottery' denotes a game of chance. Ordinarily, it is a sort of device to induce the party to buy worthless things against their better judgment and with no return. The only person, who always wins, is the lottery-keeper. Where the purpose of the scheme is only to attract deposits, and distribution of prizes from periodical lots is only an inducement; and where no subscriber stands to lose, as even the interest money is paid to the persons who do not get any prize, it is difficult to describe the transaction as a lottery to attract s 294A, Pt I, IPC .[5]

Chance to Win is the Essence of Lottery

In the Oxford New English Dictionary, a lottery is defined as 'an arrangement for the distribution of prizes by chance among persons purchasing tickets'.[6] Tickets of course are only the tokens of the chance purchased, and it is the purchase of this chance which is the essence of a lottery. A lottery involves the collective contribution of the prize money by the competitors, though some of them may have paid nothing.[7] The purchase of a chance of winning a prize makes the thing a lottery,[8] but an absolutely free and gratuitous distribution of chances, none of which had been paid2030 for by the competitors, would not be so.[9] Where the result does not depend entirely on chance, the transaction is not a lottery.[10]

Lottery Distinguished from a Game or Sports

A lottery is a distribution of prizes by lot or chance.[11] The distribution must be determined by mere chance and not by judgment or skill,[12] and this distinguishes a lottery from a game or sports. But where the result does not depend entirely on chance the transaction is not a lottery.[13]

Actual Distribution of Prize not Essential

The question of lottery or no lottery is not to be determined by the quality of the promoters' motive, and it is not an element of a lottery that some of the competitors must stand to lose.[14] The principle underlying a lottery is that there should be a distribution of prizes determined solely by chance; but if the results of the lottery are such that no prize at all is distributed and the organizer of the lottery pockets the whole of the stakes adventured, the transaction does not cease to be lottery. The actual distribution of a prize the essential factor in the case in that there should be a scheme for distribution of a prize or prizes to be determined solely by chance, and if chance so decrees that no prize is to be distributed to the adventures and the stakes are to be appropriated by the organizer of the lottery, the scheme is nonetheless a lottery.[15]

Substantial Object of the Whole Scheme is to be seen

It has been held that the substantial object of the whole scheme will be looked at in order to ascertain whether it is a lottery. Where the scheme has for its object the carrying on of a legitimate business, the fact that it provides for the distribution of its profits in certain events by lot will not vitiate the scheme.[16] But where one of the conditions of the scheme, floated by the accused, showed that the company would hold a draw every month and would give ten prizes of a total sum of Rs 1500 as detailed in the conditions, it was held that the scheme came within the ambit of the term 'lottery'.[17]

Circuitous Payment of Prize does not Change the Nature of Scheme

In Shanmugha Mudali v Kuman Swami Mudali ,[18] it was held that a scheme would not be a lottery if the prize money came out of the interest earned from the subscribers' contributions. But dissenting from this view it has been held by a Full Bench of the Madras High Court that if the subscribers have purchased a chance of winning a prize, it can make no difference whether the prizes are paid circuitously2031 from the interest earned on the subscribers' contributions or are paid directly from those contributions.[19]

Whether kuri is lottery?

It has been held that a transaction is not necessarily a lottery simply because a matter of whatever kind is agreed to be decided by lot, and a kuri where the fund is distributed by lot is not lottery.[20] Referring to the first of these cases the Punjab Chief Court remarked in Madan Gopal v R :[21]

> The proceedings were entirely private and extremely limited in extent, and we are by no means prepared to admit that if in similar circumstances subscribers had been invited by public advertisement, and in thousands instead of units, so that the profit resulting from a lucky draw would have been substantial, the result of the case would have been same.

In a subsequent Full Bench case, however, it has been definitely held that a kuri is a lottery.[22]

Prize Scheme under which Free Coupons Issued to Customers on Sale of Goods

As no amount is collected from the consumers to whom coupons are supplied, the conduct of the scheme cannot amount to conduct of a prize chit scheme prohibited by the Prize Chits and Money Circulation (Banning) Act 1978. From the scheme, it is seen that the proposal is to draw lots with all the participating merchants and it is not based on the coupons taken by them so that it is not possible to say that the merchants have made a contribution or subscription for taking part in the lots to be drawn so the scheme does not offend the provisions of the said Act.[23]

In order to constitute a lottery within the meaning of the Lotteries Regulation Act 1998, the scheme must be for distribution of prizes by lot or chance to those persons who participate in the chances of a prize by purchasing tickets. Since no tickets are sold or purchased, the scheme does not constitute a 'lottery'. Thus, neither the provision in the Lotteries Regulation Act 1998 nor the provision in s 294A, IPC are attracted.[24]

9. 'Whoever'

Includes User of a Place though Neither the Owner nor Occupier

This section makes it an offence for any person to keep an office or place for the purpose of drawing a lottery there. It would include the case of a person who, without being the owner or occupier, is permitted to keep the place for the particular object.[25]2032

Members of the Committee of a Club

The members of the committee of a club, who have control of the premises of the club, keep the premises for the purposes of this section and they cannot be allowed to shift their responsibility on to the general body of members or to the club which is an abstract entity.[26]

Persons having Common Object

Where the common object is the keeping of a place for the purposes of drawing a lottery not authorised by government, all who engage in such an object, are each individually guilty and they can be prosecuted successfully in whole or in part, jointly or severally.[27]

10. 'Keeps any Office or Place'

This section makes it an offence to keep a place for drawing a lottery or to publish a lottery. 'Keeping' implies not occasional user, but something habitual or regular. A certain degree of habitualness or continuity of operation is intended as also a fixed or ascertained locality for the drawing.[28] The notion of keeping also implies some dominion over the place kept. There would not be keeping of a place unless there is an occupation, so effective as to enable the persons drawing the lottery to be regularly found in that place at stated times. But an exclusive dedication of the place for the purpose of drawing the lottery is not necessary. The essential thing is the habitual or regular use of a place for the purpose of drawing lots, such user being sufficiently effective as to enable anyone interested in the lottery to know where the promoters can be found at the time of the draw. It is not necessary that the members of the public should be excluded from the place or that the place should not be used for any purpose other than drawing of the lottery.[29]

11. Meaning of 'Drawing'

The word 'drawing' is used in the section in its physical sense and when the section was enacted in 1870, it seems probable that the only form of lottery envisaged by the legislature was a lottery run on the usual lines in which the winning numbers are actually drawn out of an urn, box or other receptacle and the actual drawing of logs was an essential ingredient.[30]

Webster's *Dictionary*defines the word 'drawing' as 'the act of pulling, attracting, extracting, taking lots, a card or cards, from the pack, etc'. Its meaning relative to a lottery is clearly, therefore, that the lots should be drawn by some mechanical or human agency involving their chance extraction. Where there is no physical or mechanical 'drawing' to determine the lucky lots which depends on a sort of arithmetical progression based on an original number to be determined merely by the chance of a bond-holder there is no drawing as contemplated in the section.[31]2033

Drawing does not mean Conducting

The word 'drawing' must be given its natural meaning. It does not mean conducting.[32] Where the accused was running a lottery which was a gigantic swindle, in that the only substantial prize fell necessarily to the agent who sold the largest number of tickets, the ticket bearing the highest number among those sold by the agent was a number upon which all the other lucky numbers received a small prize of one rupee. It was held that although it was true that the accused was conducting a lottery and had cheated the public on a large scale, he was not guilty under either part of this section, because he had not been keeping an office or place for the purpose of drawing a lottery, and had not been publishing any proposal to pay any sum on any contingency relative to the drawing of any ticket, lots, number or figure in any such lottery.[33]

12. 'For the Purpose of Drawing any Lottery'

The first clause of the section speaks of keeping an office for 'purpose of drawing any lottery'. The conditions for the application of that part of the section are complied with, when it is shown that the accused did keep an office where they carried on the necessary preliminary work for running a lottery and received the lottery moneys, and which they held out to the public as the place where the lottery would finally be drawn.[34] The office or place, the keeping of which is punishable under this section, must be intended to be the scene of the actual drawing of the lottery. The keeping of an office for the transaction of preliminary business and correspondence and not intended or used for the purpose of drawing is not an offence under the first part of the section.[35]

13. Difference between Lottery and Wagering Contract

In Thacker v. Hardy ,[36] Cotton LJ, said:

> The essence of gaming and wagering is that one party is to win and the other to lose upon a future event which at the time of the contract is of an uncertain nature, that is to say, if the event turns out one way A will lose; but if it turns out the other way he will win.

In Carlill v Carbolic Smoke Ball Co ,[37] Hawkins J, defined a 'wager' thus:

> A wagering contract is one by which two persons professing to hold opposite views touching the issue of a future uncertain event mutually agree that, dependent upon the determination of that event, one shall win from the other, and that other shall pay or hand over to him, a sum of money or other stake; neither of the contracting parties having any other interest in that contract than the sum or stake he will so win or lose, there being no other real consideration for the making of such contract by either of the parties...if either of the parties may win but cannot lose, or may lose but cannot win, it is not a wagering contract.

Even if none Loses, the Scheme may be Lottery

A lottery and a wagering contract are two distinct things. A scheme may amount to a lottery though none of the competitions is a loser.[38]

14. 'Not being a Lottery Authorised by the State Government'

The section applies to unauthorised lotteries whether conducted in or out of India.[39] The fact that the business of an association of persons is registered as a company does not make it authorised by government.[40] It would not be within the collector's authority to sanction a lottery, he being a revenue officer; and the mere fact of taking income from the club on the profits of the lotteries would not authorise them.[41] The withholding of a prosecution does not amount to authorisation.[42]

The words in the section 'not authorised by government' are equivalent to meaning unless it (the lottery) has been authorised by government or except in the case where it (the lottery) has been authorised by government. It is a reasonable view to take that they are in the nature of an exception, and as they appear in the section defining the offence, it is reasonable to hold that s 105 of the Evidence Act, applies and that the burden of proof lies on the accused person, to show that the lottery was authorised by the government.[43]

Lottery Authorised by the State Government

The language of s 294A, IPC is very clear. It excludes only a State lottery and a lottery authorised by the State Government. In the latter portion, the words 'state government' should necessarily mean the State within which the lottery is conducted. In this case it is the State Government of Tamil Nadu. Unless the lottery is authorised by the State of Tamil Nadu, it will not be exempted under s 294A, IPC . Section 294A , IPC, does not prescribe the procedure by which the State Government should authorise to run a lottery. Hence, it is open to the State Government to pass executive orders for regulating the conduct of lotteries or to prevent the conducting of lotteries within the State.[44]

Discretion Vested in the Government

Section 294A of the Indian Penal Code 1860, contemplates authorisation being given by the State Government to any person to draw a lottery. It does not specifically give any guidelines to indicate in what manner the discretion vested in the government is to be exercised. But this does not mean that the discretion to be exercised is an unguided discretion. The provision itself, read in the light of the other provisions in the chapter, would certainly provide necessary guidelines and limitations. The authorisation granted by the State Government for punishment with imprisonment, or with fine, or with both indicates the seriousness with which the legislature looked at the particular act which is rendered punishable. Evidently, the offence involved is an offence which falls under the general category of offences which have been brought2035 under ch XIV, namely offences affecting public health, safety, convenience, decency and morals. One or more of these aspects would certainly be relevant in deciding whether in a given case, authorisation is to be granted or rejected. Drawing a lottery may affect public health, public safety or public convenience etc. A businessman may try to dupe the public by drawing a lottery. Another may try to flood the market with cheap goods and stifle healthy competition. A scheme may be loaded heavily against the public. A manufacturer may try to popularise substandard goods by attracting the customers in the guise of a lucky draw prize scheme. Certainly, this will be injurious to public health, public safety and public convenience, as the case may be depending on the nature of the manufacturing product, and terms and conditions of the scheme, state of the market and a host of other considerations.

Too many Prize Schemes--When not Conducive to Public Interest

Allowing too many prize schemes to be conducted at the same time in the same locality or area may also not be conducive to public interest as it may lead to unhealthy competition. Co-operative sector or small scale industry and the like may require to be assisted by such promotion schemes. At times, even a large scale manufactures may genuinely desire to run a lottery to help sales promotion. Individual requirements in the light of public interest must guide the government in authorising or declining to authorise, a scheme. In the case of multiplicity of applications, the government has certainly the power of regulation which includes the power of making a choice between applicants unless it be that all the applications, can be granted. Granting of preference in any reasonable manner short of conferring monopoly to a co-operative society would be permissible and will not amount to discrimination. If two manufacturers have not been allowed to conduct a scheme during an identical period, it cannot be said to be an attempt to create monopoly. It is only an attempt to regulate the conduct of schemes, keeping in mind the interest of manufacturers as well as public interest. If the State Government is of the opinion that it will not be conducive in public interest to allow two manufacturers to conduct the same scheme during the identical period, the decision cannot be said to be either discriminatory or creative of monopoly. This is a case where the state government is bound to select one or two or more of the applicants who seek authorisation of the state government, and the State Government will have to choose one or the other on relevant grounds.[45]

Lottery Business whether Protected by Article 19(1)(G) and Article 21 of the Constitution

It also needs to be noticed that the rights protected by art 19(1) are not absolute. The limitations are stated in cll 2-6 of art 19 . The rights guaranteed in arts 19(1)(a) -(g) are to be read alongwith the qualifications contained in cll 2-6 of art 19 . The right to practice any profession or carry on any occupation, trade or business does not extend to practising a profession or carrying on an occupation, trade or business which is inherently vicious and pernicious. It does not entitle a citizen to carry on trade or business activities which are immoral and criminal. They are res extra commerciumie they are outside commerce. May be the interest of a citizen lies in carrying on trade or business which is pernicious but demands of public interest have to be give primacy and they over ride individual interest.2036

Since the business of the sale of lottery tickets is of a pernicious nature no person has a legal or a fundamental right in it. There is good authority for the proposition that trade or business which is noxious or pernicious in nature, is not covered under art 19(1)(g) and art 21 of the Constitution .[46]

15. Meaning of Publisher

The word 'publisher' includes both the person who sends a proposal as well as the proprietor of a newspaper who prints the proposal as an advertisement. The proprietor of a Bombay newspaper who published an advertisement in his paper relating to a Melbourne lottery was accordingly held punishable under this section.[47] Where the publication is that a particular lottery ticket can be had at a particular place, it does not appear to be sufficient to constitute a publication of a proposal to pay any sum on any event or contingency relative or applicable to the drawing of any ticket in any lottery not authorised by the government as provided in the second paragraph of this section. If there had been an advertisement about the lottery itself, the position might have been different. It is difficult to say that the publication of a reference to the tickets about an unauthorised lottery is prohibited by this section.

Publication of Proposal

The publication, contemplated by this section, is not some public advertisement in the sense of a written publication in newspapers or handbills. As far as publication in the second part of s 294A, IPC is concerned, it envisages making a thing available to the public. Where a pamphlet is given only to persons who are depositing money in the bank, there is no advertisement of the same at all.[49] If a number of persons go about canvassing for subscribers on the basis of scheme, settled beforehand by the promoter, it amounts to a publication of the proposal.[50] Once it is established that the accused appellant was responsible for sending a circular to the printing company to be printed, and that it was printed, there is an end to his appeal, for it is inconceivable that none of the printers read the circular.[51] Under the Press and Registration of Books Act, 25 of 1867, a publication in a newspaper makes the proprietor liable. Section 7 of the said Act makes the printer or publisher responsible for everything appearing in the newspaper.[52] The provisions of that section lay down that a declaration made by a person that he is the printer of a newspaper shall be sufficient evidence (unless the contrary is proved) as against that person that he was the printer of every portion of every issue of the newspaper named in the declaration. The effect of this section is to throw upon the declared printer the onus of proving that in fact he was not the printer of any issues of the newspaper which may form the subject-matter of legal proceedings.[53] A mere causal and gratuitous delivery of a lottery ticket is not necessarily a publication within the meaning of this section.[54] But where the ticket2037 books were delivered with a view to the tickets therein being sold, this cannot be considered to be, in any sense, a mere casual or gratuitous delivery, and amounts to a publication.[55]

Publication of Proposal--Non-Payment of Prize is of no Consequence

Where the accused was charged for publishing a circular of a proposal for a lottery for the sale of tickets for prizes on horses winning at the Derby races on starters and for other special prizes in these terms, and saying that the sweep would close on a certain date, that the draw under the supervision of the patrons stated in the tickets would take place a few days later (date specified) and that the prize winners would be notified by telegrams, it was held that the accused was guilty of the charge as he had published a proposal to pay a sum for the benefit of a person on an event, or contingency relative or applicable to the drawing of the ticket in a lottery and it did not matter that the payment proposed to be made was not made by the person advertising.[56]

16. 'Goods'

The word 'goods' includes movable and immovable property.[57]

17. Procedure

The offence under this section is non- cognizable. A summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable offence but not compoundable. It can be tried by any judicial magistrate and summarily.

The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under Pt I of this section is one year and for Pt II is six months.

18. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC 1973 may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of.....at..... kept an office (or place) for the purpose of drawing a lottery not being a State Lottery or a lottery authorised by the State Government.

or

published a proposal to pay a sum (or to deliver goods) (or to do) (or forbear doing anything) for the benefit of any person on an event or contingency relative or applicable to the drawing of ticket, lot, number or figure in a lottery not being a state lottery or a lottery authorised by the state government,] and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 294A of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

19. Proof

For establishing an offence under the first part of this section, the prosecution will have to prove that:

(i) the accused kept an offence or place for the purpose of drawing a lottery; and
(ii) such lottery was not a State lottery or a lottery authorised by the State Government.

And to establish an offence under the second part of the section, it will be necessary to prove that:

(i) the accused published a proposal; and
(ii) the said proposal was to pay a sum, or to deliver any goods, or to do or forbear doing something for the benefit of any person, on any event or contingency relative or applicable to the drawing of any ticket, lot, number or figure in any such lottery.[58]20392040

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XV

Of Offences Relating to Religion

S. 295.

Injuring or defiling place of worship with intent to insult the religion of any class.--

Whoever destroys, damages or defiles any place of worship, or any object held sacred by any class of persons with the intention of thereby insulting the religion of any class of persons or with the knowledge that any class of persons is likely to consider such destruction, damage or defilement as an insult to their religion, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section makes punishable acts of destruction, damage or defilement by whomsoever committed and quite irrespective of the person of the offender, provided that such acts are done with the intention of insulting the religion of any class of persons, or with the knowledge that such destruction, damage or defilement will be considered by any class as2042 an insult to their religion. The *mens rea*is, therefore, of the essence of the offence, and, in addition, the act must itself be one of destruction, damage or defilement; otherwise it is not criminally punishable.[5]A doctrinal disagreement will not constitute an act of outraging or insulting any religion or religious beliefs.[6]

2. Analogous Law

This section follows the English law under which 'affrays in a church or churchyard have always been esteemed very heinous offences, as being very great indignities to the Divine Majesty, to whose worship and service such places are immediately dedicated; and upon this consideration all irrelevant behaviour in these places has been passed for the criminal by the makers of our laws. Several statutes have been passed for the purpose of preventing disturbances in places of worship belonging to the established church, and also in those belonging to congregation of Protestant Dissenters and Roman Catholics.'[7]

Law of England

'Religious hatred' is hatred against a group of persons defined by reference to religious belief or lack of religious belief; however, nothing in the statutory provisions governing the offences of incitement to religious hatred is to be read or given effect in a way which prohibits or restricts discussion, criticism or expressions of antipathy, dislike, ridicule, insult or abuse of particular religions or the beliefs or practices of their adherents, or of any other belief system or the beliefs or practices of its adherents, or proselytizing or urging adherents of a different religion or belief system to cease practicing their religion or belief system.[8]

When considering the seriousness of such offences in the context of terrorism, it was material to have regard to the period of time covered by the offending, the sophistication, skill and industry devoted to it and the likelihood that the offending would lead others to commit acts of terrorism, or might even have done so.[9]

Law of Canada

It is an offence punishable on summary conviction to willfully:

- disturb or interrupt an assemblage of persons met for religious worship or for a moral, social or benevolent purpose, or
- do anything that disturbs the order or solemnity of such a meeting.

Two people are "an assemblage of persons"; a "meeting" occurs when people meet for religious worship; and the period prior to the formal ceremony is included in the "order or solemnity of the meeting". Where the accused deliberately obstructed or partially obstructed parishioners, or caused parishioners to avoid their regular entrance to their place of worship, this was sufficient to constitute the offence. The offence of disturbing or interrupting an assemblage does not violate the Charter.[10]

3. Object

The object with which the legislature framed this section was, as indicated by the section itself, to prevent wanton insult to the religious notions of a class of persons.[11]2043 The section has been intended to respect the religious susceptibilities of persons of different religious persuasions or creeds. Courts have to be very circumspect in such matters and pay due regard to the feelings and religious emotions of different classes of persons with different beliefs, irrespective of the consideration whether or not they share those beliefs, or whether they are rational or otherwise, in the opinion of the court.[12]

In Note J being the note on the chapter of offences relating to religion and caste, the Law Commissioners stated of s 275 of the Code (which corresponds with s 295 of the present Code):

> We have prescribed a punishment of great severity (the proposed punishment is rigorous imprisonment for a term which might extend to seven years) for the intentional destroying or defiling of places of worship, or of objects held sacred by any class of persons. No offence in the whole Code is so likely to lead to tumult, to sanguinary outrage, and even to armed insurrection. The slaughter of a cow in a scared place at Benares in 1809 caused violent tumult, attended with considerable loss of life. The pollution of a mosque at Bangalore was attended with consequences still more lamentable and alarming. We have therefore empowered the courts in cases of this description to pass very severe sentence on the offender.

4. Ingredients of the Offence

The ingredients of the offence under this section are:

(1) a person must first destroy, damage or defile any place of worship or any object held sacred by any class of persons;
(2) he must thereby have the intention of insulting the religion of any class of persons, or he must have the knowledge that any class of persons is likely to consider such destruction, damage or defilement as an insult to their religion.

If any one of these ingredients is not present, the offence is not made out.[13]

5. 'Whoever'

It makes no difference that the guilty party is a worshipper in the temple which he has defiled.[14]

6. 'Distroys, Damages or Defiles'

Defiles--Meaning of

The word 'defiles' as used in this section, cannot be restricted to acts which would render the place of worship or object held sacred, unclean or dirty as piece of stone or metal. The words used in the section are 'whoever defiles a place of worship or an object held sacred' by a certain class of persons. The object with which the legislature framed this section, as indicated by the section itself, was to prevent wanton insult to the religious notions of that class of persons. The word 'defile' ought to be taken in the sense in which such class of worshippers usually understands it when it is applied to a place or an object of worship. In this sense it would include any act done in relation to the Lingam which would render it impure to the accused's2044 knowledge according to the recognised usage of the institution as an object of worship. 'If the accused knew that the temple in the case before us is one of those temples, and if he did the act imputed to him to ridicule openly the established rule in regard to the unity of the Lingam as an object of worship, it may then be reasonably inferred that he did the act wantonly and with the intention of insulting the religious notions of the general body of worshippers'.

Words 'Destroys' and 'Damage' Explained

The words 'destroys' and 'damages' which precede the word 'defiles' in this section indicate classes of acts which are designed to cause a particular result and not to limit the word 'defile' to making an object held sacred dirty as a material object.[15] Therefore, 'to defile' means, in this connection, not only to make a place unclean, foul, or dirty, but to render it ceremonially or ritually impure. For a conviction under this section, such pollution must be proved. The mere entry of a person of nonpolluting caste into a temple is not defilement within the meaning of this section.[16]

Bull not a Sacred Object

In Romesh Chunder Sannyal v Hira Mondal ,[17] it was held that the killing of a bull was not 'destroying' within the meaning of this section, because it was held that the bull was not an 'object' within the meaning of the section, and not because killing is not destruction.

7. Place of Worship

In the absence of proof that the place in question was a place of worship, a conviction under the section would be bad, eg., an enclosure to the tomb of a Mahommadan fakir not used as a place of worship.[18]

A mosque is a place of worship and so also a Hindu temple. A mosque becomes consecrated on the declaration of the waqf that he has constituted it into a Musjid, or on the performance of prayers therein.[19] But the subject-matter of a dedication under the Mahommadan law must be the lawful property of the waqf or the waqf will not be valid.

Where an attempt was made to bring into existence a public mosque in a plot in the possession of an agricultural tenant without the permission of the landlord, it was held that the use of a hut situated in that plot as a public mosque without the landlord's permission could not make it a place of worship as contemplated by this section.[20]

A lessee by his unilateral act cannot prejudice the lessor's proprietary right in a leasehold property. Where a piece of garden land together with a shed thereon is let out on lease, but the lessor has not dedicated the shed or the side to the Hindu public of the locality to be used as a temple or a place of worship, the lessor who has no proprietary right over the property cannot make any such dedication. The mere fact2045 that the lessees used the building as a place of worship and permitted such use by other Hindus of the locality could not in any way prejudice the proprietary right of the lessor over the property. The privilege enjoyed by the lessees and others in making use of this shed as a prayer hall could continue only as long as the lease arrangements continued. Such a user of the shed cannot make it a place of worship within the meaning of this section.[21]

8. 'Any Object held Sacred'

In S Veerabhadran Chettiar v EV Ramaswami Naicker ,[22] a learned judge referring to the decisions reported in the undermentioned cases[23] held that:

> In the above case they were dealing with a dedicated bull. It is clear from the observations in the above two cases that the word 'object' has to be interpreted ejusdem generis with a place of worship. Interpreted like that, it would mean that the section would apply to cases where an idol in a temple is sought to be destroyed, damaged or defiled. The words 'any object held sacred by any class of persons' even otherwise will apply only to idols in a temple or when they are carried out in procession on festival occasions.

Object--Whether includes Cow or Bull

The word 'object' means a material body or substance perceived or cognizable by the senses. It is a general word not limited to inanimate object, but is wide enough to include an animate object like a cow or a bull.[24] But a Full Bench of Allahabad High Court,[25] as well as a Full Bench of the Punjab

Chief Court[26] have held that the word 'object' in this section does not include animate objects like a cow or a bull.

An Object may be Sacred without Worship

However, on appeal their Lordships of the Supreme Court overruled the earlier decision in Veerabhadran Chettiar's case, and observed:

> The learned judge in the court below has given much too restricted a meaning to the words 'any object held sacred by any class of persons' by holding that only idols in temples or idols carried in processions on festival occasions are meant to be included within those words. There are no such express words of limitation in section 295 of the Indian Penal Code, and in our opinion the learned judge has clearly misdirected himself in importing those words of limitation. Idols are only illustrative of those words. A sacred book, like the Bible, or the Koran, or the Granth Saheb, is clearly within the ambit of those general words. If the courts below were right in their interpretation of the crucial words in section 295, the burning or otherwise destroying or defiling such sacred books, will not come within the purview of the penal statute. In our opinion, placing such a restricted interpretation on the words of such general import, is against all established canons of construction. Any object, however trivial or destitute of real value in itself, if regarded as sacred by any class of persons would come within the meaning of the penal section. Nor is it absolutely necessary that the object, in order to be held sacred, should have been actually worshipped. An object may be held sacred by a class of persons without being worshipped by them. It is clear, therefore, that the court2046 below were rather cynical in so lightly brushing aside the religious susceptibilities of that class of persons to which the complainant claims to belong.[27]

Object of Respect and Sacred Object--Not the same thing

There is a distinction, not arbitrary, between objects which are objects of respect and even veneration and objects which are held sacred; as an example of the former, a place of sepulchre (not actually consecrated, as in the case of ground specially consecrated for that purpose according to the rites of Christian Churches), as distinguished from a place for worship to the deity or where an idol or altar is kept; and such distinction appears to have been kept in view by the legislature, for while s 295, IPC deals with the latter class of objects and places,[28] s 297, IPC deals more especially with trespasses on places of sepulchre and places set apart for the performance of funeral rites and as depositories for the remains of the dead.[29]

Dilating further on the same point, their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed in Veerabhadran Chettiar:[30]

> The section has been intended to respect the religious susceptibilities of persons of different religious persuasions or creeds; courts have got to be very circumspect in such matters, and to pay due regard to the feelings and religious emotions of different classes of persons with different beliefs, irrespective of the consideration whether or not they share those beliefs, or whether they are rational or otherwise, in the opinion of the court.

9. Any Class of Persons

It cannot be held that ss 295 - 298, IPC are only applicable to between those who follow different religions and not as between different sects or classes of Hindus, who are lean towards sectarian beliefs. The expression 'any class of persons' includes any religious sect, however small in number.[31] Even two persons can form a class,[32] but the complainant and his family cannot form a class of persons within the meaning of this section.[33]

10. 'With the Intention of thereby Insulting the Religion'

The authors of the Code, while framing this section, noted:[34]

> The question whether insults offered to a religion ought to be visited with punishment does not appear to us at all to depend on the question whether that religion be true or false. The religion may be false, but the pain which such insults give to the professor of that religion is real. It is often, as the most superficial observation may convince us, as real a pain and as acute a pain as is caused by almost any offence against the person, against property or against character. Nor is there any compensating good whatsoever to be set off against the pain. Discussion, indeed, tends to elicit truth; but insults have no such tendency, they can be employed just as easily against the purest faith as against the most monstrous superstition. It is easier to argue against falsehood than against truth; but it is as easy to pull down or defile the temples of truth as those of falsehood; it is as2047 easy to molest with ribaldry and clamour men assembled for purposes of pious and rational worship, as men engaged in the most absurd ceremonies. Such insults, when directed against erroneous opinions, seldom have any other effect than to fix those opinions deeper and to give a character of peculiar ferocity to theological dissension; instead of eliciting truth, they only inflame fanaticism.

> These considerations apply with peculiar force to India. There is perhaps no country in which the government has so much to apprehend from religious excitement among the people. The Christians are numerically a very small minority of the population, and in possession of all the highest posts in the government in the tribunals and in the army. Under their rule are placed millions of Mahommadans, of differing sects, but all strongly attached to the fundamental articles of the Mahommadan creed, and tens of millions of Hindus, strongly attached to doctrine and rites which Christians and Mahommadans join in reprobating. Such a state of things is pregnant with dangers which can only be averted by a firm adherence to the true principles of toleration. On those principles the British Government has hitherto acted with eminent judgment, and with no less eminent success; and on those principles we propose to frame this part of the Penal Code.

Mere Doctrinal Disagreement will not Amount to Insulting the Religious Feelings

Where on publication of a book by the accused, a Christian group filed a complaint alleging the outraging of religious feelings and infringement of copy of translations of songs and mutilations of sacred writings in books published by the accused, there was no evidence showing that disagreement expressed by the accused with the doctrine of the complainant was with deliberate and malicious intention of outraging religious feelings of the complainant group, it was held that mere doctrinal disagreement will not constitute an act of outraging or insulting any religion or religious belief.[35]

11. 'Mens Rea'

Mens rea is of the essence of the offence under this section.[36] The mere defilement of a place of worship is no offence under it. In order to sustain a conviction, there must be an intention of thereby insulting the religion of a class of persons, or the knowledge that a class of persons is likely to consider the defilement as an insult to their religion.[37]

Some Illustrative Cases

Where a person, as a result of a quarrel with a relation, throws a basket containing cooked food (fowl, fish, rice, etc.), into a well without any intention to wound the religious susceptibilities of anyone, he cannot be convicted of an offence under this section.[38]

The defendants were charged under this section, in that they (Hindus) removed some old building materials belonging to a mosque, and thereby insulted the religious feelings of Mahommadans. They were acquitted on the finding that the mosque was, or at any rate its roof was, in a rotten condition, and that no one had any particular claim to it. Dismissing a revision petition against it, it was held that there was no reason to believe that one of the defendants, in acting as he did, had any2048 intention of insulting the religion of the Mahommadan residents of the village, or that he did so even with the knowledge that any class of persons was likely to consider the removal of the materials as an insult to their religion.[39]

Where a Hindu had sexual intercourse with a woman at night, within an enclosure surrounding a tomb of a Mahommadan fakir, venerated by some of his co-religionists, it was held that the accused had no intention to insult the religious feelings of the Mahommadan, and he could not be convicted under this section inasmuch as there was no evidence to show that the tomb in question was used as a place of worship, or that any particular object held sacred was defiled.[40]

Where the accused, a goldsmith by caste, performed abishekam, ie., poured coconut-water over a Lingam (an idol) it was held by Muthuswami Iyer J:

> The word 'defiled' in section 295 must not be restricted to acts which would render the Lingam unclean or dirty as a piece of stone or metal. It is to be taken in the sense in which such class of worshippers usually understood it when it is applied to a place or an object of worship. In this sense, it would include any act done in relation to the *Lingam,*which would render it impure to the accused's knowledge, according to the recognised usage of the institution as an object of worship. If the act leads to this result, it is of no consequence whether it makes the Lingam materially or ritually impure. In many temples it is not usual for worshippers generally to touch the idol or pour coconut-water upon it, except through persons, who are specially appointed to do so and enjoined to observe special rules of cleanliness. If the accused knew that the temple, in the present case, was one of those temples, and if he did the act imputed to him to ridicule openly the established rule in regard to the purity of the Lingam as an object or worship, it might then be reasonably inferred that he did the act wantonly, and with the intention of insulting the religious notions of the general body of worshippers.[41]

Where the lessee of a shed, without any authority, uses it as a prayer hall and the lessor, getting delivery of the property in execution of a decree, pulls down the shed, he cannot be said to have intended or known that such an act will be an insult to the religion of others who had no manner of right over the property or the shed.[42]

Where according to the customary religious practices prevalent in a temple certain puja pendas had the exclusive right to offer the daily bhog to the deity but on a certain occasion, they having refused to offer the bhog, the superintendent of the temple got it offered by others, it was held that in the absence of evidence to show that the superintendent intended to ridicule the established practices of the temple or to wantonly insult the feelings of the worshippers of the temple, he could not be held liable under this section.[43]

Where the accused, a Mahommadan, threw a burning cigarette on a Viman, an object held sacred by the Hindus, while it was being taken out in a procession, but the cigarette did not fall on the Viman and only struck it on the side and fell down, it was held that it could not be said that the act of the accused was unintentional or that the accused did not have the knowledge contemplated by this section, and that he was guilty of an attempt to commit the offence under this section.[44]2049

In DP Titus v LW Lyall ,[45] it was observed that unless it is alleged that the pastor of the church has done anything with the intention of insulting the religion of any class of persons, the mere running of a nursery school and a dispensary in a portion of the church premises, by him, would not amount to an offence under s 295, IPC .

When an elephant accompanying the Moharram procession got enraged and went berserk, the magistrate passed an order under s 133, CrPC authorising the accused to liquidate the elephant to protect the property and life of people. The situation's exigency had left no alternative but to direct the elephant's liquidation. The prosecution of the accused under this section was held unjustified.[46]

12. 'Religion'

The word 'religion' has not been defined in this Code or in the Constitution, and it is a term which is hardly susceptible of any rigid definition. In an American case,[47] it has been held "that the term 'religion' has reference to one's views of his relation to his Creator and to the obligations they impose of reverence for His Being and Character and of obedience to His will. It is often confounded with 'cultus' of form or worship of a particular sect, but is distinguishable from the latter".

However, this definition of 'religion' has not been accepted by the Supreme Court of India. With reference to the word 'religion' in art 25 of the Indian Constitution, their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed:

> Religion is certainly a matter of faith with individuals or communities and it is not necessarily theistic. There are well-known religions in India like Buddhism and Jainism which do not believe in God or in any intelligent first cause. A religion undoubtedly has its basis in a system of beliefs or doctrines which are regarded by those who profess that religion as conductive to their spiritual well-being, but it would not be correct to say that religion is nothing else but a doctrine or belief. A religion may not only lay down a Code of ethical rules for its followers to accept, it might prescribe rituals and observances, ceremonies and modes of worship which are regarded as integral parts of religion, and these forms and observance might extend even to matters of food and dress. What constitutes the essential part of a religion is primarily to be ascertained with reference to the doctrines of that religion itself. If the tenets of any religious sect of the Hindus prescribe that offerings of food should be given to the idol at particular hours of the day, that periodical ceremonies should be performed in a certain way at certain periods of the year or that there should be daily recital of sacred texts or oblations to the sacred fire, all these would be regarded as parts of religion and the mere fact that they involve expenditure of money or employment of priests and servants or the use of marketable commodities would not make them secular activities partaking of a commercial or economic character; all of them are religious practices and should be regarded as matters of religion.

> ... Freedom of religion in our Constitution is not confined to religious beliefs only; it extends to religious practices as well, subject to the restrictions which the Constitution itself has laid down under article 26(b) . Therefore, a religious denomination or organisation enjoys complete autonomy in the matter of deciding as to what rites and ceremonies are essential according to the tenets of the religion they hold and no outside authority has any jurisdiction to interfere with their decision in such matters.[48]2050

The offence under this section is cognizable. A summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is non-bailable and not compoundable. It can be tried by any magistrate.

The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within three years.

14. Notice under the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, Section 251

In a prosecution under this section, the following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC, may be adopted:

> I (name of office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of the accused) as follows:

That on or about the..... day of..... at..... You destroyed (or damaged or defiled) ..... (a place of worship) [(or..... an object held sacred by a class of persons namely (mention the class)] with the intention of thereby insulting the religion of that class of persons (or with the knowledge that any class of persons were likely to consider the said destruction, (damage or defilement) as an insult to their religion, and you thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 295 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

15. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that the accused:

(1)
- (a) destroyed, damaged or defiled any place of worship; or
- (b) destroyed, damaged or defiled any object held sacred by any class of persons; and

- (a) he did so with the intention of insulting the religion of any class of persons; or
- (b) had done so with the knowledge that any class of persons was likely to consider such destruction, damage or defilement as an insult to their religion.

16. Sentence

The Indian Law Commissioners were of opinion that an offence under this section deserves a very severe punishment and proposed rigorous imprisonment for a term which might extend to seven years. The section, however, prescribes only imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years or with fine or both.2051

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XV

Of Offences Relating to Religion

[49][S. 295A.

Deliberate and malicious acts intended to outrage religious feelings of any class, by insulting its religion or religious beliefs.--

Whoever, with deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of any class of [50][citizens in India], [51][by words, either spoken or written, or by signs or by visible representations or otherwise], insults or attempts to insult the religion or the religious beliefs of that class, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to [52][three years], or with fine, or with both.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section makes it an offence to speak or write any words with a deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of any class of citizens of India or insulting or attempting to insult the religious beliefs of that class.[53]It does not penalise any and every act of insult to, or attempt to insult, the religion or the religious beliefs of a class of citizens, but only those acts of insult to or those varieties of attempt to insult, the religion or the religious beliefs of a class of citizens which are perpetrated with the deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of that class. Insult to religion offered unwittingly or carelessly or2052 without any deliberate or malicious intention to outrage the religious feelings of that class do not come within the section. It only punishes the aggravated form of such insult when it is perpetrated with the deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of that class. The calculated tendency of this aggravated form of insult is clearly to disrupt the public order, and the section is valid only in so far as it is in the interests of public order. Having regard to the ingredients of the offence created by this section, there cannot be any possibility of the section being employed for purposes not sanctioned by arts 19(2), 25 and 26 of the Constitution . In other words, the section can be applied only when it is necessary 'in the interest of public order'.[54] In order to bring the case within the scope of this section it is not so much the matter of discourse as the manner of it. In other words, the words used should be such as are bound to be regarded by any reasonable man as grossly offensive and provocative, and maliciously and deliberately intended to outrage the feelings of any class of citizens of India.[55]

2. Legislative Changes

The section was inserted as stated above by s 2 of the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 25 of 1927. The words 'citizen of India' were substituted for the words 'His Majesty's subjects' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950.

The section was further amended by s 3 of the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act, 41 of 1961[56] by which:

(a) for the words 'by words, either spoken or written, or by visible representation', the words 'by words, either spoken or written, or by signs or by visible representations or otherwise', and
(b) for the words 'two years', the words 'three years', were substituted.

3. History of the Law

This section was inserted in the Code by s 2 of the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 25 of 1927. The immediate cause for this was an agitation following a decision of a judge of the Lahore Court in Raj Paul v Emperor ,[57] holding that s 153A of this Code was intended to prevent persons from making attacks on a particular community as it exists at the present time and was not meant to stop polemics against deceased religious leaders, however scurrilous and in bad taste such attacks might be. In a subsequent case a division bench of the same court held that a scurrilous, vituperative and foul attack on a religion or its founder would come within the purview of s 153A .[58] The Allahabad High Court also held that a certain book entitled 'Vichitra Jiwan' depicting the life of the Prophet Mohammad promoted feelings of enmity between Hindus and Mahommadans and came within the purview of s 153A, IPC . Thus, before the insertion of this section, such malicious writings could, if at all, be dealt with only under s 153A as attempts to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of citizens. They could not be dealt with as offences against2053 religion under this chapter. This section was enacted to make malicious acts insulting the religion, or outraging the religious feelings, of any class of citizens, punishable as offences relating to religion, whether or not they amount to attempts to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between classes.

4. Statement of Object

In the statement of objects and reasons, it was stated:[59]

> The prevalence of malicious writings intended to insult the religion, or outrage the religious feelings of various classes of His Majesty's subjects had made it necessary to examine the existing provisions of the law with a view to seeing whether they require to be strengthened. Chapter 15 of the Indian Penal Code, which deals with offences relating to religion, provides no penalty in respect of writings of the kind described above, such writings can usually be dealt with under section 153A of the Indian Penal Code, as it is seldom that they do not represent an attempt to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes. It must be recognized, however, that this is only an indirect way of dealing with acts which may properly be made punishable themselves, apart from the question whether they have the further effect of promoting feelings of enmity or hatred between classes. Accordingly it is proposed to insert a new section in chapter 15 of the Indian Penal Code, with the object of making it a specific offence intentionally to insult or attempt to insult the religion, or outrage or attempt to outrage the religious feelings, of any class of His Majesty's subjects.

Provisions of Article 26 are not Affected

The section also does not prohibit or make punishable anything which is mere profession, practice or propagation of a religion or any of the things specified in art 26 of the Constitution of India . What is made punishable is 'deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of any class of citizens of India'. If there is any such deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of any class of citizens of India, then whether that intention is expressed by words, either spoken or written, or by signs or by visible representation or otherwise it is made punishable under this section. But 'deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings' of others is not the same thing as professing, practising or propagating one's own religion. One may, with complete liberty, profess, practise or propagate his religion without any obstacle or hindrance and nothing what he may do, can possibly be treated or considered as an intention to outrage the religious feelings of any class of people, much less would it amount to a 'deliberate and malicious' intention to do so. There would be deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of others only if a person does something which has a tinge of intention to outrage the feelings of others and even that intention is not merely deliberate, but also malicious.[60]

5. Validity of this Section

This section cannot be said to be ultra vires and void on the ground of its interfering with the fundamental right to freedom of speech and expression guaranteed under art 19(1)(a) of the Constitution . The section is enacted in the interests of public order, and only penalises the aggravated form of insult to religion when it is perpetrated with the deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of a2054 class of citizens. The calculated tendency of this aggravated form of insult is clearly to disrupt the public order, and the section which penalises such activities is well within the protection of cl (2) of art 19 of the Constitution, as being a law imposing a reasonable restriction on the exercise of the right to freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by art 19(1)(a) of the Constitution . Having regard to the ingredients of the offence, there cannot be any possibility of the section being applied for purposes not sanctioned by the Constitution.

Articles 25 and 26 of the Constitution guarantee the right to freedom of religion, but the right to freedom of religion so assured is expressly made subject to public order, morality and health. These two articles, in terms, contemplated that restrictions may be imposed on the rights guaranteed by them in the interest of public order.[61] If it does impose any restriction, it is within the four corners of the expression 'subject to public order, morality and health'.[62] Passing of an order banning or forfeiture of Koran would go against the preamble of the Constitution and would violate provisions of art 25 thereof. The preamble proclaims India to be a secular state. It states that each and every religion is to be treated equally. No preference is to be given to any particular religion. Liberty of thought, expression, belief, and worship are assured. The Koran, which is the basic textbook of Mahommadans, occupies a unique position to the believers of that faith. Bible is to the Christians and Gita, Ramayan and Mahabharata are to the Hindus. If such an order is passed, it would take away the secularity of India and deprive a section of people of their right of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship. It would also amount to infringement of art 25 which provides that all persons shall be equally entitled to freedom of conscience and the right freely to profess, practise and propagate any religion.

Banning or forfeiture of Koran would infringe that right. Such action would amount to the abolition of the Muslim religion itself. The Muslim religion cannot exist without Koran. The proposed action would take away the freedom of conscience of the people of that religion and their right to profess, practise and propagate the said religion. Such action is unthinkable. The court cannot sit in judgment on holy books like the Koran, Bible, Gita and Granth Sahib.[63]

Free thinking does not involve freedom to make scurrilous attacks on the religion and religious beliefs of other sects with impunity. It is not free thinking to abuse and insult other religions. Further, the method and the manner of discourse on a particular topic also matter very much. All the citizens of India are guaranteed freedom of religion and freedom of conscience by our Constitution and each one has a right to pursue his own way of attaining salvation, unhampered and without interference from others. It is the duty of the state to create such a climate as would enable every one of its citizens to exercise freedom of religion and conscience. Section 99A of the Old CrPC 1898 (now s 95 of the CrPC 1973) and s 295A of the IPC are only legislative recognition of the power of the state to take action for the purpose of affording such protection to all its citizens.[64] Freedom of speech is one of the basic rights guaranteed by the Constitution. But the limits of the freedom end where the religion and religious beliefs are insulted or outraged. Section 295A is obviously a reasonable restriction which is in public interest.[65]2055

6. Retrospective Effect of the Section

This section has no retrospective effect, but if a new edition of a book, which was published before the enactment of the section, is published after its enactment, the author of the book can be convicted under this section if his connection with the publisher is proved.[66]

7. Essential Ingredients of the Offence under this Section

To constitute an offence under this section, the following ingredients must exist:

(1) the accused must insult or make an attempt to insult, the religion or religious beliefs of any class of citizens of India;
(2) the said insult etc., must be with the deliberate and malicious intention to outrage the religious feelings of the said class of citizens; and
(3) the said insult, etc., must be by words, either spoken or written, or by signs, or by visible representations or otherwise.[67]

Relative Scope of Sections 153A and 295A

Notes under s 153A may be referred to.

Relative Scope of Sections 295A and 298

Commentary under the same heading in s 298, post, may be referred to.

This section first became law in 1927. Up to that time acts constituting the offence under it fell within s 298, which still forms part of the IPC . The Select Committee, in its report stated that the essence of the offence is 'that the insult to religion or the outrage to religious feelings must be the sole, or primary, or at least the deliberate and conscious intention. We have accordingly decided to adopt the phraseology of s 298 which requires deliberate intention in order to constitute the offence with which it deals'.

While s 298, IPC uses the word 'wounding', s 295A uses the word 'outraging'. Outraging is a much stronger word than wounding. In Murray's Dictionary, 'outrage' is explained as to wrong grossly, treat with gross violence or indignity.[68] The two sections still stand together in the IPC, but the offence under this section is more serious. 'Outraging' in this section is a stronger word than 'wounding', and the intention to outrage must be malicious as well as deliberate, and must be directed to a class of persons, and not merely to an individual. But under s 298 they must not only be directed to an individual, but must also be uttered in the hearing of that individual, but intention need not be malicious. It is enough if it is deliberate. Under this section, the prosecution must prove something more than under s 298 ; they must show insult for the sake of insulting and with an intention which springs from malice and malice alone. To a charge under this section, therefore, it would be a defence to say, 'I had no malicious intention towards a class, but I did intend to wound or shock the2056 feelings of an individual so that attention might, however rudely, be called to the reform which I had in view'.[69]

8. 'With Deliberate and Malicious Intention'

One of the basic requirements of s 295A, IPC, is a deliberate and malicious act. Malice in one sense is negation of bona fides.[70] To come within the ambit of s 295A, the intent must be both malicious and deliberate. It is well settled that the offending publication is to be viewed as a whole and the intent of the author has to be gathered from a broader perspective and not merely from a few solitary lines or quotations.[71]The main ingredient of the offence under this section is insult to the religion or religious beliefs of any class of citizens. But the section further requires that the act of insulting must be with 'deliberate and malicious intention' of outraging the religious feelings of that class of citizens. Now an act may be deliberate without being malicious, or malicious without being deliberate. What the section requires is not an intention which is either deliberate only or malicious only but an intention which is both deliberate and malicious.[72]

There should be a deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of any class of citizens of India or of wounding the religious feelings of any person.[73] Complaint allegation was that as per the belief of Muslim community, holy 'Quaran' was neither written nor created by any body but it came into existence/revealed by Allah (God) himself, therefore, disclosing the holy 'Quran' as 'Racha Gaya' in the answer given by Sir Amitabh Bachchan in the TV Programme 'Kaun Banega Krorepati' was contrary to the belief of the Muslim community and, therefore, the religious feelings of Muslim community were hurt and as this statement was deliberately made, the accused was liable to be prosecuted for the offences punishable under ss 295A and 298, IPC . Held, allegation made in the complaint that the statement was deliberately made was without any supporting material to show that there was a deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the feeling of any class of citizens of India or of any person, it would not be sufficient to draw the proceedings under ss 295A / 298, IPC . No such intention was shown or was apparent in the reply given in the programme. The accused was not summoned.[74]

The section requires that there should be deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of any class of citizens. The mere fact that the learned author used such words as 'Kulta', or 'Duracharini', with reference to Sita not as his comment, but as the accusations of the conspirators and the rumour-mongers, this cannot, by itself, establish his intention as contemplated by s 295A, IPC, though there may be other synonyms for such words or that they may be expressible in milder terms.[75]2057

Section 295A of the IPC does not penalize every act of insult but penalizes only deliberate acts of insult, so that even if by any expression insult is in fact caused, that expression is not an offence if the insult offered is unwilling or unintended.[76] It was alleged that pursuant to a criminal conspiracy hatched with the 2nd and 3rd accused, the 1st accused made certain disclosures as part of deciphering the Devaprasnam that a woman had entered into the sanctum sanctorum (Garbha griha) of the temple and touched the idol of Lord Ayyappa. He made such a false statement knowing fully well that no female above the age of 10 and below 50 years can ever enter into even the peripheries of the temple. He made a further declaration while Devaprasnam continued on 17-6-2006 that the woman who had committed such sacrilege is an artist and an accomplished dancer. The three accused, by their false declarations and acts done, caused hurt and also insulted the religious belief, tenents and faith of the followers of Hindu religion and the devotees of Lord Ayyappa, punishable under ss 295A and 120B of the IPC . The police report did not show that the accused had made such declarations with deliberate and malicious intention to outrage the religious feelings of a class of persons, that too, to insult the religion and religious feelings, to invite the penal consequences under s 295A of the IPC .[77]

The question arose in this case was whether the book "Dwikhandita" written by Taslima Narseen of Bangladesh could be proscribed in India. As the book was written in the context of author's country of origin, it does not deliberately and maliciously intend to outrage the religious feelings of any community of India, and since the theme of the book was the hapless condition of women in that country, it was held, that it does not come within the ambit of s 295A of the IPC and, therefore, the order of forfeiture under s 95, CrPC 1973 was unwarranted, and was accordingly set aside.[78]

Intention unless Conceived suddenly, may be Inferred to be Deliberate

In the first instance, the intention to outrage the religious feelings must be deliberate, i.e., not conceived all of a sudden in the course of a discussion, but premeditated. A mere knowledge that the religious feelings of others may be outraged would not suffice, nor a mere intention to outrage such feelings, unless the intention is deliberate. Where the intention to outrage the feelings is not conceived suddenly in the course of a discussion, but, premeditated, deliberate intention may be inferred.[79] It must also be shown that the intention to outrage the religious feelings was also malicious.

The fact that the statement is contrary to material available on record and has been made without inquiry or investigation, would be sufficient to hold that it was deliberately and maliciously made to outrage the religious feeling of followers of Pranami Dharma. Nothing else is required to establish the guilt of the respondent.[80]2058

Malice--Meaning of

One of the basic requirements of s 295A is deliberate and malicious act. Malice in one sense is negation of bona fides.[81] The word 'malicious' used in this section presents some difficulty. According to Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, malice in common acceptation means ill-will against a person. But in its legal sense, it means wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse. In Peary Lal v Emperor ,[82]it was held that, if a person willfully does an act injurious to another without lawful excuse, he does it maliciously. Malice in its legal import does not mean spite or ill-will, but the willful doing of an illegal act.[83] The court of criminal appeal has observed in a later case:[84]

> In any statutory definition of a crime, 'malice' must be taken not in the old vague sense of 'wickedness' in general, but as requiring either: (i) an actual intention to do the particular kind of harm that in fact was done, or (ii) recklessness as to whether such harm should occur or not (ie, the accused has foreseen that the particular kind of harm might be done, and yet has gone on to take the risk of it). It is neither limited to, nor does it indeed require, any ill-will towards the person injured'.

Object behind inserting the term 'Malice'

> Further, we were impressed by an argument to the effect that an insult to a religion or to the religious beliefs of the followers of a religion might be inflicted in good faith by a writer with the object of facilitating some measure of social reform by administering such a shock to the followers of the religion as would ensure notice being taken of any criticism so made. We have, therefore amplified the words 'with deliberate intention' by inserting > reference to malice, and we think that the section which we have now evolved will be both comprehensive and at the same time of not too wide an application.[85]

What is punishable under this section is not so much the matter of the discourse, written or spoken, as the manner of it. One must, therefore, look with great care at the words used. If the words used caused persons to feel insulted but were only such as might possibly wound and in fact did so, then there would be no offence under the section; if the words used were bound to be regarded by any reasonable man as grossly offensive and provocative, and were maliciously intended to be regarded as such then an offence would have been committed.[86]

Malice is not Capable of Direct or Tangible Proof

Malice, no doubt, is one of the important ingredients of the offence under the section and it is certainly for the prosecution to establish that element by proper evidence. But it has to be realised that malice is a state of the mind and often is not capable of direct and tangible proof. In almost all cases where it is required to be proved, it has to be inferred from the surrounding circumstances, having due regard to the setting, background and connected facts in relation to the writings in question. Malice in one sense is a negation of bona fides. If a person knowing that his words, either uttered or written, are likely to offend or injure the religious faiths2059 of others, indulges in them, it would be difficult to hold that his act was done bona fide and without malice.[87]

Malice and Intention are to be Inferred

Malice being an important ingredient of the offence under this section, it is for the prosecution to establish it by proper evidence. But it being a state of mind and often not capable of direct and tangible proof, it has to be inferred from the circumstances, having due regard to the setting, background and connected facts in relation to editing and publishing articles of the nature in question.[88] If the language used transgresses the limits of decency and is designed to vex, annoy and outrage the religious feelings of others, the malicious intention of the writer can be inferred from the language employed by him.[89]

Malice when to be Presumed

It, therefore, appears that, in this section the word 'malicious' has not been used in the popular sense. In order to establish malice as contemplated by this section, it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused bore ill-will or enmity against specific persons. If the injurious act was done voluntarily without a lawful excuse, malice may be presumed.[90] Provocation received from supporters of the opposite view cannot be treated as a lawful excuse for writing offensive books.[91]

9. 'Outraging Religious Feelings'

In s 298, the expression used is 'wounding religious feelings', while in this section 'outraging religious feelings' is used. The word 'outrage' is somewhat stronger than the word 'wound'.[92] The Select Committee in their report stated:[93]

> We think that to penalise even an intentional outrage or attempted outrage upon the religious feelings of any class would be casting the net too wide for the cases with particular reference to which the Bill has been introduced. At the same time, we realise that the reference to the outraging of religious feelings was inserted to provide for the case of an insult to the founder of a religion or a person held sacred by the followers of a particular religion where such an outrage does not amount to an insult of the religion. It has in one instance been held that an insult to the founder of a religion is not necessarily an insult to the religion although it may outrage the religious feelings of the followers of that religion. We have therefore provided that the new section shall only apply in cases where a religion is insulted with the deliberate intention of outraging the religious feelings of its followers.2060

Even a True Statement may outrage Religious Feelings

This section requires that the offending writing must be with deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of a class of citizens of India. Therefore, the enquiry under this section has to be confined to the question whether there was malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of a class of citizens of India. Even a true statement may outrage religious feelings.[1] In the case of books alleged to fall within the scope of this section, the truth of the language can neither be pleaded nor proved. The inquiry has to be confined to the question whether there was malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of a class of citizens of India. Even a true statement may outrage religious feelings.[2]

The applicant wrote a book "Islam -- A concept of Political World Invasion by Muslims". The book contained attack on the personal life of Mohammad Paigambar, which would hurt Muslim sentiments. The ban on the circulation of the book imposed by the Maharashtra Government under s 95, CrPC was held proper.[3]

Book of a Writer--When does not Outrage Religions Feelings

The book was an autobiographical work, detailing the events occurring in the life of the author and the status of the women in Bangladesh in the socio-religious and political situation by reason of adoption of state religion in Bangladesh. It was held that it, in no way, divulged the requisite mens rea to outrage religious feelings to insult the religion or religious belief of that class of citizens in India. The theme of the book and its context was essentially secular and not in the nature of an insult to religion or religious feelings of that class of the citizens in India. The contents of the offending passages are the opinion of the author based on historical data and the same cannot constitute an 'insult' or 'attempt to insult' upon the religion or religious belief of Muslims in India.[4]

Having regard to the established principles of law governing the field, the book read as a whole: (1) does not reflect that the book was concerned with the Indian scenario and by no stretch of imagination could any passage be construed to have even been intended to mean and apply to the citizens of that class in India; (2) does not reflect any intention of outraging the religious feelings to insult the religion or religious belief of that class of citizens in India; (3) the intention that could be gathered from the context and the theme of the book, by no stretch of imagination can be called deliberate and malicious for achieving any object of religious hatred; (4) it appears to be vibrant with the thoughts and philosophy of life conceived by the author having regard to the context and situation and the plight of women in the society in Bangladesh; (5) it appears to be directed against the malaise and ills of the society sought to be supported and sanctioned in the name of religion in general; (6) particularly, in the context of adoption of State religion in Bangladesh by the then ruler purporting to support such sanction through State machinery at the cost of democracy and secularism, the salient features of the Constitution of Bangladesh; (7) in the context of the socio-religio-politico situation in Bangladesh, the author had2061 intended to administer a shock in order to revolutionise the feelings and sensitize the attitude of the people of Bangladesh towards women clamouring for equality; (8) read in the perspective of the whole book, one would be left with the impression of the author's philosophy of equality between men and women, between women and women, between men and men and above all the humanity with a perfectly secular outlook which the State has to follow and the law is to be enacted applicable to the humanity irrespective of the caste, creed and religion affording equality to all, a principle enshrined and vibrant as the soul of the Constitution of India.[5]

Book has to be Read as a Whole

In order to see whether a particular passage in the book is offensive, the book has to be read as a whole and cannot be read in piecemeal. The offending passage cannot be read out of context of the central theme of the book.[6]

Feelings of a Class and not of the Individuals should have been Outraged

The idea of making a separate offence under s 295A is to punish those who attempt to insult the religion or religious belief of any class of citizens in India. It does not probably relate to any act done with the intention of outraging the religious feelings of any individual. Section 295A has application where the whole of particular class of citizens is affected and it is for this reason that a complaint by the state government or an officer empowered in this behalf by the state government has been made a pre-requisite for the initiation of such proceedings.[7]

Historical Part of any Narrative

Historical perspective and a discussion based thereon without the requisite mes rea does not and cannot fall within the ambit of s 295A of the IPC . Distortion of history may lead to an inference of necessary mens rea but such inference cannot be drawn due to existence of ample historical support.[8]

Where the origin of a community is sought to be traced, so long as there is adherence to the historical part of the narrative, however unpalatable it may be to the members of that community, there may be no offence. But, on the other hand, where the author uses language which shows malice and is bound to annoy the members of the community so as to degrade them in the eyes of the other classes, he would be promoting feelings of enmity and hatred.[9]

Mere Doctrinal Disagreement will not Amount to Outraging the Religious Feelings

Where on publication of a book by the accused, a Christian group filed a complaint alleging the outraging of religious feeling and infringement of copy of translations of songs and mutilations of sacred writings in books published by the accused, there was no evidence showing that disagreement expressed by the accused with the doctrine of the complainant was with deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of the complainant group, it was held that mere doctrinal2062 disagreement will not constitute an act of outraging or insulting any religion or religious belief.[10]

Where a person, who in public said that the Ramayana is a fiction and that no Rama was ever born and then kicked the book of *Ramayana*thereby tearing its cover and pages, it was held that the act of the accused was to outrage the feelings of Hindus and Sikhs who hold the Ramayana in reverence, and, therefore, the accused was liable under this section.[11]

Photographs of Gods and Goddesses of Hindus on Fire Crackers, Newspapers, etc.

It is a fact that photographs of Hindu Gods and Goddesses are pasted on fire crackers. This practice has been going on for many years and up till now nobody has raised any objection regarding this practice. This has happened only because nobody has thought it objectionable, nobody's feelings have been hurt on seeing the fire crackers bursting and the photographs being destroyed because the photographs on the fire crackers have not been viewed as photographs of Gods and Goddesses but just as some prints to attract the attention of customers. There was no intention that anybody's feelings should be hurt by selling such fire crackers or by bursting such fire crackers. However, in Bhau v State of Maharashtra ,[12] a new dimension has been given to the matter. The court observed in this case:

> Nobody from Hindu community up-till-now has thought over on this issue in this way. It is just whim of the petitioners and for that they have come before the court. This is nothing but wasting time, money and energy.

> Photographs of Gods and Goddesses, and for that matter, other respectable National Leaders, are being printed everyday in different newspapers and everybody knows that the life of the newspaper is hardly for 24 hours and thereafter it becomes waste paper and those photographs on the newspapers go to the dustbin in majority of the cases without anybody considering that there are photographs of Gods and Goddesses of Hindu religion or photographs of National Leaders because the matter is never looked at from that point of view.

> Whenever invitation cards of marriages or other ceremonies being performed by Hindu persons, photographs of Gods and Goddesses are printed on these invitation cards and once the purpose of the cards is finished, those cards also go to the dustbins, with them the photographs printed on them. Here also nobody's feelings are hurt by saying that the photographs of Gods and Goddesses are being thrown in dustbins along with other rubbish matters.

Criticism of Hindu Religion for Untouchability, etc.

The criticism of Hindu religion for its inculcation of the doctrine of untouchability and for the sanction which it has given to reprehensible treatment meted out to the lower castes has of recent years been considered perfectly legitimate.[13]

10. 'Class'

Notes under ss 153 and 295 may be referred to.2063

11. 'Written'

Notes under s 124A may be referred.

12. 'Visible Representation'

Notes under s 124A may be referred to.

13. Attempts

Notes under s 124A may be referred to.

14. 'Religious Beliefs'

The Select Committee, in its report stated:[14]

> 'To make it clear that an attack on a founder is not omitted from the scope of the section, we have specifically made punishable an insult to the religious beliefs of the followers or any religion'.

Whether Provocation may be Justified to Outrage Religious Beliefs

So an attack on a founder and the religious beliefs of his followers is not excluded from the scope of this section. Where the accused, finding that certain pamphlets had been issued in support of the opposite view, wrote six books by way of reply, it was held that it might be that the applicant wrote the six books by way of a reply to the pamphlets issued from the opposite camp, but, if on examining the language used by the applicant in the six books, it is found that the writing is likely to outrage religious beliefs or feelings of a certain class of citizens, he would be liable under this section.[15]

Appellant accused was carrying beef and the blood was falling on the road. The informant and others objected to it as it might cause hurt to the sentiments of Hindu. In the scuffle ensued in which the informants and others received injuries which were not grievous in nature. The FIR and the statement of the witnesses did not show that the accused did the act with the intention to create religious rift and communal disharmony between the two groups. Appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 295A, IPC .[16]

15. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable. A warrant shall issue in the first instance. It is neither bailable nor compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within three years.

16. Sanction for Prosecution

No court shall take cognizance of any offence punishable under this section except with the previous sanction of the Central Government or of the state government.[17]2064

The Central Government or the state government (as the case may be) may, before according its sanction, order a preliminary investigation by a police officer not below the rank of inspector, in which case such police officer shall have the power, referred to in s 155(3), CrPC .

The obtaining of a sanction is a sine qua non and no magistrate can take cognizance of the complaint under s 295A, IPC unless the order, granting sanction, is produced.

An order of cognizance of offence punishable under ss 153A and 295A, IPC without being supported by the order of sanction of the state government is liable to be quashed.[18] On a complaint filed under ss 153A, 295A and for other offences before the magistrate, the magistrate cannot take cognizance of offences under ss 295A and 153A without there being any sanction under s 196(1), CrPC .[19]

If the complainant feels that the applicants, with malicious and deliberate intention of outraging the religious feelings of Hindus, have published the article, proper course would be to move the government for their prosecution under s 295A, IPC .[20]

Where no sanction is given in accordance with s 196(1), CrPC to prosecute the accused for the offence under s 295A, IPC, the Apex Court quashed the proceedings.[21]

Complaint filed for offence under s 295A, IPC without obtaining the sanction of the Government was quashed.[22]

17. Charge

In a prosecution under this section the following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That on or about the .....day of.....at.....you (*) insulted (or attempted to insult) the religion (or the religious beliefs) of.....by the following words spoken (or written) [or by signs or by visible representations (or otherwise) to wit....] with the deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of the said class of citizens of India, and you thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 295A of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

18. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(a) the accused insulted or attempted to insult the religion or the religious beliefs of a class of citizens of India by words either spoken or written or by visible representations, or otherwise; and
(b) he did so with the deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of that class of citizens.2065

Under this section the prosecution must show that the accused insulted for the sake of insulting and with an intention which sprung from malice and malice alone.[23]

19. Defence

To a charge under this section it would be a defence to say: 'I had no malicious intention towards a class, but I did intend to wound or shock the feelings of an individual so that attention might, however rudely, be called to the reform which I had in view'.[24] But it is no defence for anyone to plead that he was writing a book in reply to the one written by one professing another religion who had attacked his own religion.[25]

Truthfulness of a Statement is no Defence

The truth of language can neither be pleaded nor proved. Even a true statement may outrage religious feelings. It was held that the intention of the writer of a book must be judged primarily by the language of book itself, though it is permissible to receive and consider external evidence either to prove or to rebut the meaning ascribed to it. If the language is of a nature calculated to produce or to promote feelings of enmity or hatred, the writer must be presumed to intend that which his act was likely to produce.[26] A statement, which would otherwise fall within the mischief of this section, cannot be taken out of it merely because it happens to be the true statement.[27]

20. Forfeiture

Section 95(1) of the CrPC authorises the state government to forfeit a newspaper, book or document, the publication of which is an offence under this section. A person aggrieved by an order of forfeiture passed by the state government may apply to the High Court under s 96, CrPC to set aside such order.

Where there was nothing objectionable in the book that might be said to insult Hinduism or to promote disharmony and hatred between different castes so as to be punishable under s 153A or under s 295A, IPC, the impugned order of its forfeiture was held wholly unjustified and unsustainable.[28] The statement of the ground of the opinion by the state government is mandatory and a total absence thereof would vitiate the declaration of forfeiture.[29] The satisfaction of the High Court alone that the offending material does not contain any matter which is punishable under one or other of the relevant sections specified in s 95(1)(b), CrPC, is the conclusive factor in either upholding or quashing the declaration of forfeiture.[30]2066

Chapter XV

Of Offences Relating to Religion

S. 296.

Disturbing religious assembly.--

Whoever voluntarily causes disturbance to any assembly lawfully engaged in the performance of religious worship, or religious ceremonies, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with disturbance of a religious assembly, which may or may not be in a place of worship.

The penal law of India extends a special protection against voluntary disturbance to all assemblies lawfully engaged in religious worship or ceremonies.[31]

2. Analogous Law

This section in the Code may fairly by supposed to have been framed upon the kindred English law to be found in 52 Geo III, ch 155, s 12, also 23 and 24 Victoria, ch 39.[32]

3. Object

The object of the section is to secure freedom from molestation when people meet for the performance of acts which ordinarily take place in some quiet spot vested for the time, in the assembly exclusively.2067

4. Ingredients of the Offence

To constitute an offence under this section:[33]

(1) there must be an assembly;
(2) the assembly must be lawfully engaged in religious worship or religious ceremonies; and
(3) the accused must have voluntarily caused disturbance to such an assembly.

5. 'Voluntarily'

A person is said to cause an effect voluntarily when he causes it by means whereby he intended to cause it, or by means which at the time of employing those means, he knew, or had reason to believe to be likely to cause it.[34]

6. Intention to Cause Disturbance is the Essence--Not an Active Intention but mere Knowledge is Sufficient

The essence of the offence under this section is the intention express or implied,[35]to cause disturbance to a religious assembly, and it is immaterial whether this intention is due to religious animosity, or any other cause, intention to cause a certain result is not an element necessary to constitute a voluntary causing of that result but knowledge of or belief in, the likelihood of the result following, though not intended, may supply the place of intention. If, therefore, the accused knew, or had reason to believe that their act in removing an image was likely to cause disturbance to any religious worship, then, though they might not have intended to cause such disturbance, yet the causing of the disturbance, would be voluntary within the meaning of the Code.[36] It is not, therefore, necessary for the purpose of this section, that the accused should have had an active intention to disturb religious worship. It is sufficient, if knowing they are likely to disturb it by their music, they take the risk and do actually cause disturbance.[37]

Refer to notes under s 39 .

7. 'Causes Disturbance'

If disturbance is not proved as a fact there can be no conviction under the section, but to constitute a 'disturbance', it is not necessary that there should be an actual stay or interruption of the service. It cannot be said that a congregation assembled for public worship cannot be disturbed unless there is an actual stay or interruption of the service. Where the worshippers are reciting one *Mantram,*it amounts to a disturbance to recite another, in their presence and hearing, so as to distract their minds from the act in which they are engaged.[38] But where one sect of a religion could not hear what the other sect recited, it was held that no disturbance was caused within the meaning of this section.[39]2068

Substantial and not Merely Fanciful Disturbance Matters

Spreading false rumours, although they might have had the most serious consequences, cannot be described as 'causing a disturbance'.[40] The playing of music near a mosque would not by itself, without anything further, amount to an offence within the meaning of this section. Any deliberate intention to disturb the worship may not be necessary; but surely it must be found as a fact before the section could apply, that there was a substantial and not merely fanciful disturbance of the worship.[41]

Persons Engaged in Religious Worship can cause disturbance to Different Community

There is nothing in s 296, IPC, to justify the interpretation that the persons who were themselves engaged in the performance of religious worship or religious ceremonies, cannot be convicted of causing disturbance to another community.[42]

DSP can Regulate extent of Music in Streets on Future Occasions

Where the order was issued that no procession with music would be allowed to pass within 40 kms from the mosque, it is clearly a regulation that falls within the ambit of s 30 of Police Act 1861. Sub-section 4 of s 30 of the said Act clearly gives the District Superintendent of Police a right to regulate the extent to which music may be used in the streets on future occasions, and it is not necessary for him to pass a separate order on every occasion.[43]

Consequences of Pronouncing Amin Loudly

A mosque to be a mosque must be a building dedicated to God, and not a building dedicated to God with a reservation that it could be used only by a particular person holding particular views of the ritual. No sect or creed or portion of the community can restrain others claiming the right. There is no authority in the Mahommadan ecclesiastical law to limit the tone of the voice in which the word amin is to be pronounced. So long as persons are Mahommadans, they are entitled to enter a mosque and perform the worship and say the word amin without anything to restrain their tone or note of the octave. But if the pronouncing of the word amin results in the disturbance of the peace, it will have to be dealt with under the criminal law. But where the word amin is pronounced aloud in the honest exercise of the conscience that it should be so pronounced, there can be neither any offence under the criminal law, nor any wrong in the civil law (per Mahmood J). If a Mahommedan goes to a mosque not with the object of honestly performing his own religious duties, but with the deliberate purpose and intention of disturbing the quiet devotion of others engaged in prayers, and acts in such a way that the necessary consequences is that the congregation is disturbed, he has brought himself within the meaning of this section (per Straight J). A Mahommedan would bring himself within the grasp of criminal law, who, not in the bona fide performance of his devotions, but mala fide for the purpose of disturbing others engaged in their devotions, makes any demonstrations, oral or otherwise, in a mosque, and disturbance is the result.[44] Where, however, there was no voluntary disturbance to any assembly, engaged in namaz or prayer, but the2069 word amin was loudly uttered by the accused at the close of the prayer, it was held that no offence under this section was made out.[45]

Interference with Devotion Amounts to Disturbance

Where a mosque is a public mosque open to the use of all Mahommadans without distinction of sect, a Mahommadan who, in the bona fide exercise of his religious duties in such mosque, pronounces the word amin in a loud tone of voice, according to the tenets of his sect, does nothing which is contrary to the Mahommadan ecclesiastical law or which is either an offence or civil wrong, though he may by such conduct cause annoyance to his fellow-worshippers in the mosque. But any person, Mahommadan or otherwise, who goes into a mosque not bona fide for religious purpose, but mala fide to create a disturbance there and interfere with the devotion of the ordinary frequenters of the mosque, will render himself criminally liable.[46]

8. 'Assembly'

For the purpose of this section, even three persons gathered together for the purpose of worship are sufficient to constitute an assembly.[47] A religious procession is but an assembly in motion.[48]

9. 'Lawfully Engaged in the Performance of Religious Worship'

To come within the protection afforded by the section, the assembly of persons must be essentially a religious assembly, and it must be lawfully engaged as such. An assembly, therefore, which is not really a religious assembly, though carrying on its proceeding in such guise, would not be protected by the section, eg., an assembly whose real common object is one of those set out in s 141, and is therefore, an unlawful assembly. 'Whatever' is prohibited by law to be done directly, cannot legally be effected by an indirect and circuitous contrivance.[49]

Worship to be Real and not a Cloak

The worship referred to in this section must be a real worship and not a cloak for doing something else, and the assembly must be lawfully engaged in such worship. If the ceremony is commenced by an act which is not lawful, it cannot be said that the persons engaged in them are lawfully engaged, from the mere circumstances of their falling into a posture of worship, though such worship may be real. As to whether a worship is real or not, much must depend upon the circumstances under which it is performed.[50]

10. Assembly Prohibited by Law is not Lawfully Engaged

A religious assembly which is prohibited by law is not lawfully engaged in the performance of worship or ceremonies eg., such an assembly on private property under conditions which constitute it a trespass or one which has been lawfully2070 commanded to disperse under s 151,[51] or which has been prohibited by order of a magistrate under s 144 of the CrPC .[52]

No Assembly can be Lawfully Engaged on a Highway

Where certain boys were beating drums on a public road to summon people for a procession during Moharram, and the accused seized the drums which he returned to them the next day, it was held that the accused's acts did not constitute an offence as no assembly can be lawfully engaged within the meaning of this section on a highway.[53]

Inherent Right to use Public Road for Religious Procession

The use of the public highways for religious processions is, despite dicta to the contrary,[54] a well-established right. Such use is but incidental to the right of the general public, all members of which have equal rights in them.[55] There is a right in every community to take out a religious procession, with its appropriate observances, along a highway. This is an inherent right and does not depend on the proof of any custom or a long, established practice. Even if such a procession be an innovation, it would be in the exercise of legal rights. The right is independent of any long standing tradition and is not lost by mere abstention or non-exercise of it for a number of years.

An enquiry as to the existence or non-existence of an old custom is, therefore, unnecessary and irrelevant.[56]

No Exclusive Right to any Religious Sect

However, no religious sect can lay claim to an exclusive right to the use of a public way, or portion of it for religious processions or worship.[57]

Condition of uses of Public Highways

A public highway is primarily for purposes of traffic, and every individual is entitled to use it in a reasonable way. But he cannot claim it exclusively for purposes of worship. Persons of every sect are entitled to take out religious processions through public streets provided they do not interfere with the ordinary use of such streets by the other members of the public.[58] The taking out of a procession accompanied with music, whether as a part of religious worship or not, is within the civil rights of the community, but not an exclusive use of the highway for worship, and worshippers in a mosque or temple which abuts on a highway have no right to compel processionists to stop their music completely while passing a mosque or temple on the ground that there was continuous worship inside it.2071

Religious Ceremony Starts when Procession Starts

Where the mahars of a certain locality took out their yearly samaptt processions and were proceeding by the customary route in front of a mosque when they were stopped by the accused and prevented from going by that route and threatened with attack if they did so, and they accordingly diverted their procession and went by a route behind the mosque, it was held that a religious ceremony was in progress from the time when the procession started and the accused were convicted accordingly.[59]

Exclusive use of Public way may Render the Religious Rites Unlawful

The right being thus limited, it follows that if any religious sect uses a public way in such a manner as to obstruct its use by other members of the public, it is not 'lawfully engaged' in the performance of religious rites and to cause disturbance of such an assembly in vindication of the right of passage would be no offence under this section.

This Section not Attracted in a Case of Procession through Private Land

A tazia procession was taken out by some Mahommadans on the tenth day of Moharram through a private grove, although they had no right to take tazias through the grove. The Hindus objected to the tazias being taken through the grove and directed the tazias to be taken back. A riot took place and they were convicted under ss 147, 323 and 296, IPC . In revision however, it was held that no offence under this section was committed.[60]

Where certain lodhas, who, with the sanction of the public authorities, had been carrying flags to a temple in procession through a public street, were attacked by persons who objected to the procession, it was held that such attack constituted a disturbance of the performance of a religious ceremony punishable under this section.[61]

Presumption in Case of Continued Use

Continued use by the public of a way raises a presumption that it belongs to the public, and was dedicated by the owner for public use.[62]

11. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, but a summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable offence but not compoundable. It is triable by any magistrate and can also be tried summarily.

The cognizance of this offence can be taken within one year.

Notice under Section 251 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

The following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC, may be adopted in a prosecution under this section:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of the accused), as follows:

That on or about the....day of....at.....you (*) voluntarily caused disturbance by (specify the act) to an assembly, to wit....which was lawfully engaged in the2072 performance of religious worship (or religious ceremonies) and you thereby committed an offence under section 298 of the India Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

12. Proof

To establish an offence under this section it will have to be proved that:

(a) the accused voluntarily caused disturbance to an assembly; and
(b) such assembly was then lawfully engaged in the performance of religious worship or religious ceremonies.

Where several persons are charged, the case of each accused should be considered and proved individually.[63]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XV

Of Offences Relating to Religion

S. 297.

Trespassing on burial places, etc.--

Whoever, with the intention of wounding the feelings of any person, or of insulting the religion of any person, or with the knowledge that the feelings of any person are likely to be wounded, or that the religion of any person is likely to be insulted thereby, commits any trespass in any place of worship or on any place of sepulture, or any place set apart for the performance of funeral rites or as a depository for the remains of the dead, or offers any indignity to any human corpse, or causes disturbance to any persons assembled for the performance of funeral ceremonies, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.2073

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes persons who injure the feelings of living persons by insults offered to the dead. It extends the principle laid down in s 295 to places which are treated as sacred. This section is comprehensively worded, and the offence at which it strikes is intimately bound with the commission of a trespass or, subject to that of deliberately offering an indignity to a corpse or causing disturbance to a body of persons assembled for the performance of funeral ceremonies.[64]

The criminal intention or knowledge in this offence is to wound the feelings, or insult the religion of any person, and the conduct in pursuance of such intention or knowledge is either: (i) a trespass on one or other of four places of religious rites; or (ii) the offering of an indignity to any human corpse; or (iii) the causing of a disturbance to a funeral ceremony. This section does not refer to 'religious feelings', though the kind of feelings which comes within the section, is clearly limited, in its nature, by the second paragraph to the section by reference to a place of worship, to a place of sepulchre, to feelings of a spiritual nature than a material kind and to feelings associated with such sacred places. It does not punish acts which are merely of earthly vanity or pride.[65]

This section, as originally drafted, applied only to 'a place of sepulchre' but its scope has been extended on the recommendation of the Law Commissioners, who said:[66]

> It seems to us that the word 'sepulchre', the proper meaning of which is burial or interment, is not sufficiently comprehensive to express what is intended in this place; for it is clear that what is contemplated is any place in which are performed the last rites of the dead, of whatsoever nature they may be, or in which the remains of the dead are deposited. Instead of 'a place of sepulchre' we would propose 'any place set apart for the performance of funeral rites, or a depository for the remains of the dead.

Gist of the Offence

The provisions of this section are applicable where there is a trespass in a place of religious worship with the knowledge that the feelings of persons would be wounded thereby.[67] The gist of the offence is the committing of trespass on a place of sepulchre with the intention or with the knowledge specified in the section, and if these essentials are not established, no offence under the section is made out.[68]

2. With the Intention or with the Knowledge'--Mens Rea

In a particular situation an act may not cause disgrace or may not humiliate, but in other situations that very act may cause disgrace or humiliation. So the intention of the person concerned as well as surrounding circumstances, are important factors.[69]

Intention or knowledge of either of the things specified is essential to the offence.[70] Mere reason to believe[71] which is so often classed with intention or knowledge in the IPC, is insufficient.2074

Ploughing Ground--Consequences

This section does not make an act committed in defiance of it an offence only when that act is committed with the intention of wounding the feelings of any person; it is equally an offence if committed with the knowledge that the feelings of any person are likely to be wounded or the religion of any person is likely to be insulted thereby. Persons who enter a burial ground and plough up land used as a graveyard are guilty of the offence under this section, although they enter the ground with the knowledge of the owner, and apparently, with his consent.[72]

Doing an Act Secretly with Knowledge of Consequences

A, a Hindu, had sexual connection with a woman at 9 o'clock at night in an enclosure surrounding a tomb of a Mahommadan fakir, which was not used as a place of worship. It was held that A committed an offence under s 297, IPC, as he committed a trespass on a place of sepulchre and knew that his act, if detected, was likely to wound the feelings of Mahommadans, and that his belief that the act would probably not be detected would not make any difference though it might well be taken into consideration in awarding punishment.[73]

Using a Mahommadan tomb as a place of privacy for adulterous intercourse is an offence under this section, as it is trespassing on a place of sepulchre with the knowledge that the religious feelings of certain Mahommadans were likely to be insulted thereby.[74]

Where, owing to a bona fide dispute as to use of a burial place, arising out of a question between the parties as to the complainants' delay or neglect in making a certain payment, a delay occurred in digging a grave, but nothing else, the corpse not having been brought to the ground, when the dispute commenced, it was held that this section was not applicable to the case.[75]

Mere Delay without an Intention to Offer Indignity

Where the accused, forming part of a committee, whose duty it was to collect subscriptions to defray the cost of a wall around a cemetery, but having no right to compel payment of burial fees, demanded a fee from the complainant's party before admitting the corpse into the cemetery, and after some discussion, during which the corpse was placed on the ground, the corpse was admitted without payment, it was held, that there was no intention to offer any 'indignity' within the meaning of this section.[76]

3. 'Commits any Trespass'

The word 'trespass' in this section has not the same meaning as criminal trespass in s 441, IPC, but implies any violent or injurious act committed in the place with the intention and knowledge specified in this section.[77] The word 'trespass' as2075 used in this section has not any peculiar meaning.[78] Every invasion of private property i.e., of possession or of a right to possession, be it ever so minute, is a trespass.[79]

Entry with Permission--Intention of Entry Material

However, leave or licence of the possessor to the entry, of course, prevents such entry being a trespass. In one case where A went on to certain land used as a burial ground, with the consent and wish of B, the owner of the land, and ploughed it up (thereby disturbing the graves) for the purpose of turning it into an agricultural land, it was held that A was guilty of an offence under this section.[80] But this decision cannot be supported. Apart from the fact that there was obviously no trespass (which is essential to the offence) A's intention in entering on the ground was clearly to cultivate it and nothing else. He intended no 'offence relating to religion', the subject-matter of this chapter. He may have had reason to believe that his operations would be likely to wound the feelings of the community who used the ground as a place of sepulchre but that would not bring his conduct within the section. The offence may be mischief under ss 425 and 426 .[81]

Trespass and Criminal Trespass

This section speaks of 'any trespass' and not of criminal trespass. Therefore, whether the trespass is of a civil or a criminal nature, the offence becomes complete, for the completion of the offence it is not necessary to record a finding that the trespass committed was necessarily a criminal trespass.[82]

Owner of Land not Exempt

The ownership of the land does not exempt its owner from the rigours of this section. In Abdul Kadar v Abdul Kasim ,[83] it was observed:

> Although the petitioners have been found by the Civil Court to be the owners of the land in question and although they have been given khas possession thereof by the Civil Court, that does not entitle them to disturb any graves that may be found existing in that land or to damage any structure that may have been raised over such graves, if by such act or acts the feelings of any person interested in the graves are likely to be wounded. The fact that the petitioners are the sole owners of the land in question does not render their action in damaging the structures that had been erected over the graves of the complainant's father and aunt, any the less a trespass within the meaning of section 297 of the Code, even though the petitioners have been placed in khas possession of the land by the Civil Court.

Where the accused removed bricks from the graves of the ancestors of the complainant, it was held that the bricks had been disturbed and that the intention was to wound the feelings of the complainant and the accused committed trespass within the meaning of this section.[84]2076

Consequences of Hurling Abuses in a Mosque

In a Nagpur case, the evidence established that the accused had gone to a mosque for mid-day prayer as usual; when the service was over, he was asked by some others why he had, on former occasions, abused the Moulvi and the congregation. On his attempting a denial, witnesses were sent for, and an altercation followed; the petitioner then began to abuse all and sundry, employing obscene epithets and uttering threats. It was held that in order to convict the accused, the court would have to come to the conclusion that he, with the intention of wounding the feelings of the Moulvi and the congregation, remained unlawfully within the mosque with intent thereby to insult or annoy the said

Moulvi and congregation, and that on the facts of the case a conviction under this section could not be sustained.[85]

Co-sharer's Liability under this Section

Acts done by a co-owner of property in the exercise of his rights of property cannot amount to a trespass. A, B, C and D were co-owners of a ground in which they were accustomed to bury their dead. A and B opened a saw-pit close to the grave of D's relations, but without disturbing their graves. It was held that A and B committed no offence under this section.[86] But a joint owner, who in the course of demarking his share in the land dug up certain graves and exposed the bones of the person buried there, in spite of the remonstrance of their relations, was convicted under this section.[87]

4. Place of Worship

For a conviction under this section, there should be a trespass on a place of religious worship with the knowledge that the feelings of persons would be wounded thereby.[88] Where a Mahar, a low caste man, entered into a temple, he was found guilty of an offence under this section.[89] Under the changed social conditions and the fundamental rights and right of equality guaranteed, by the Constitution, this decision may not hold good now. Persons found inside a mosque having sexual connection were held guilty under this section.[90] Four accused persons entered the house of the complainant and one of them demolished the wall which he was constructing and took the pindi of the Naika Cossain which was worshipped by the complainant and his family from the niche and threw it into a drain running by the side of the lane. It was held that the accused were guilty under this section.[91]

5. 'Place of Sepulchre'

Sepulchre means burial or interment.[92] A few isolated and secret cases of burial in the course of many years on a piece of land do not constitute the place one of sepulchre within the meaning of this section.[93] But it is not necessary that the burial2077 ground should be in use. If it has been a burial ground and if there are visible graves in it, it becomes a depository for the remains of the dead.[1] For an offence under this section it is essential that the place must have been set apart as a depository of the remains of the dead.[2]

The act of a person who destroys or disturbs a place of sepulchre with the intention of wounding the feelings of any person or with the knowledge that the feelings of any person are to be wounded, is wrongful and amounts to a trespass within the meaning of the said section, no matter whether the land in which the place of sepulchre is included does or does not belong to the persons who are guilty of the act complained of.[3]

6. 'Any Place Set Apart for the Performance of Funeral Rites'

Persons interfering in the performance of funeral ceremonies become trespassers at the funeral pyre and when they interfere with the obsequies, they are guilty under this section.[4] But the stopping of a tazia during a Moharram procession does not amount to an offence as, it is not a funeral ceremony within the meaning of this section.[5]

7. 'Offers any Indignity to any Human Corpse'

What is indignity to a corpse is not defined anywhere. Indignity is generally synonymous to humiliation or disgrace. A conduct to be criminal in the sense of s 297, IPC, should be spiteful to become humiliating or disgraceful. In a particular situation, an act may not cause disgrace or may not humiliate, but in other situations that very act may cause disgrace or humiliation. So, the intention of the person concerned as well as surrounding circumstances, are important factors.[6]

Where certain persons deliberately put obstacles in the way of the complainant in burying his son because he had not joined the khilafat movement, it was held that the accused were not guilty, as it would not be said that by their act they offered any indignity to the corpse. In the course of his judgment, Stuart J observed:

> I do not propose to expatiate upon the mentality of persons who, to support their view as to what they conceive desirable in politics, use their influence to prevent a man from burying his little child. But as the law stands, they have not committed any criminal offence in this particular case. The act was an act of boycotting and was not a criminal act either under the Penal Code or any other laws.

Where a dangerous criminal was shot dead in a police encounter and after the postmortem, the police took his body to his father, who refused to accept it for cremation, and a large crowd gathered in the meantime to see the dead body, and in order to maintain law and order and assure the public at large about the death of the dangerous criminal, his body was roped and tried to the tower for a few minutes, it was held that no insult or indignity was shown by the police/accused person to the dead body. Since the intention of police officers to show indignity to the body was not proved, so offence under ss 297 / 34, IPC was not made out against them.[7]2078

8. 'Causes Disturbance to any Person Assembled for the Performance of Funeral Ceremonies'

The word 'disturbance' in this section has not been defined, but it implies some active interference in, or hindrance to, the performance of the funeral ceremonies.

The grand-daughter-in-law of the complainant died, and the complainant and his relations took the body out to the cremation ground and were preparing to cremate it; the accused came there and told them not to cremate the body, and on being asked why, said that they would state the reason to the police. It was held that the mere utterance of the words 'do not cremate the body', unaccompanied by any attempt to prevent the cremation, or by any manifestation on the part of the accused of their intention to interfere if the complainant and his relations should persist in having the body cremated, cannot be regarded as a disturbance to the persons assembled for the performance of the funeral ceremonies, within the meaning of this section.[8]

9. Procedure

It is the same as in the case of an offence under s 296, IPC .

Notice under Section 251 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

In a prosecution for an offence under this section, the following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC, may be adopted:

> I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of the accused), as follows :
> That on or about the....day of.....at.....you (*) committed trespass in..... a place of worship [(or a place of sepulchre) (or a place set apart for the performance of funeral rites) (or a place which is used as a depository for the remains of the dead)], offered an indignity by....(specify the act) to the corpse of.....[(or caused disturbance to persons, to wit.....assembled for the performance of funeral ceremonies with the intention of wounding the feelings of (name the persons whose feelings are wounded) or insulted the religion of...) (or with the knowledge that the feelings of.....are likely to be wounded) (or that the religion of....is likely to be insulted)] and you thereby committed an offence under section 297 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

10. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(1) the accused had the intention to:

(a) wound the feelings of any person; or2079
(b) to insult the religion of any person; or, had the knowledge:

(i) that the feelings of any person are likely to be thereby wounded; or
(ii) that the religion of any person is likely to be thereby insulted;

(2) the accused

(a) committed trespass; or
(b) offered any indignity to a human corpse; or
(c) disturbed persons assembled for funeral ceremonies;

(3) the place trespassed upon was either:

(a) a place of worship; or
(b) a place of burial or cremation; or
(c) a place set apart for the performance of funeral rites, or
(d) a place set apart as a depository for the remains of the dead.

11. Conviction

Where the charges framed against an accused was under cl (1) of s 297, IPC, but the evidence established charge under cl (2) of s 297, IPC, against him, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under cl (1) of s 297, IPC .[9]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XV

Of Offences Relating to Religion

S. 298.

Uttering words, etc., with deliberate intent to wound the religious feelings of any person.--

Whoever, with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of any person, utters any word or makes any sound in the hearing of that person or makes any gesture in the sight of that person or places, any object in the sight of that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

STATE AMENDMENT

Andhra Pradesh.--In Andhra Pradesh, offence under section 298 is cognizable.--A.P.G.O. Ms. No. 732, dated 5-12-1991.2080

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes the doing of certain acts with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of any person. It is much wider in scope than s 295 and includes any action which is known to wound the religious feelings of others.[10]

The offence relates to oral words, uttered, in the presence of a person, with the intention of wounding his religious feelings. This section can, therefore, have no application where the grievance relates to a written article, published in a weekly.[11]

2. Analogous Law

In England, at Common Law, it is an indictable misdemeanour 'to speak or otherwise publish any matter blaspheming god, e.g., by denying his existence or providence to contumeliously reproaching Jesus Christ, or vilifying or bringing into disbelief or contempt or ridicule, Christianity in general, or any doctrine of the Christian religion or the Bible'.[12] There have also been some statutes on the subject.[13] But the opinions of the judges have of late changed with respect to the essential elements of the offence, and the gist of the offence is not now considered to be in holding an opinion contrary to the general tenets of Christianity, or the particular doctrines of the Church of England, which may be heretical, but in the mode of expressing it. Now it is not blasphemy with due gravity and propriety to contend that the Christian religion, or any part of its doctrine, or the whole or any part of the Holy scriptures, is untrue.[14] With regard to this section the Indian Law Commissioners observed:[15]

> In England, an attempt to convert any one from the religion of the country by the most gentle and dispassionate address, is by law an offence; to attempt the same thing by contemptuous or vituperative language is an offence which would be severely punished in practice. But the reason is that conversion is not recognised as a legitimate object. The law assumes the truth of Christianity. But it is manifest that the law and the legislature of this country cannot assume the truth of any religion. And, as free discussion, or, in other words, attempts to conversion, is the best criterion of the truth of anything, the truth or falsehood of which is not already assumed by law to be beyond controversy, it seems to follow that a bona fide attempt to convert ought not in this country to be treated as a crime, even though the intention to convert be an intention to do so by wounding the religious feelings of the persons addressed. We apprehend it is almost impossible to convert a sincere or ardent votary of any faith without wounding his religious feelings in the early stages of the process.

3. Object

With reference to the object of this section, the authors of the Code said:

> In framing this clause we had two objects in view: we wish to allow all fair latitude to religious discussion, and at the same time to prevent the professors of any religion from offering, under the pretext of such discussion, intentional insults to what is held sacred2081 by others. We do not conceive that any person can be justified in wounding with deliberate intention, the religious feelings of his neighbours by words, gesture or exhibitions. A warm expression dropped in the heat of controversy or an argument urged by a person not for the purpose of insulting and annoying the professors of a different creed, but in good faith for the purpose of vindicating his own, will not fall under the definition contained in this clause.

Gist of the Offence

The gist of the offence is the intention to wound the religious feelings of another, which may be by uttering a word or making a sound in his hearing, or making a gesture or placing any object, in his sight.

4. Relative Scope of Sections 295 and 298, Indian Penal Code 1860

See also synopsis 8 under s 295A . This section is one of the five sections (295-98) in ch XV dealing with offences relating to religion. It will be useful to compare the provisions in the other sections as regards the criminal intention or knowledge requisite for the commission of the offence. Section 295 , IPC deals with destruction, damage or defilement of a place of worship either with the intention of insulting the religion of any class of persons or with knowledge that such insult is likely to result. Section 295A , IPC which was inserted by the Amending Act of 1927, speaks of 'deliberate and malicious intention' of outraging the religious feelings of any class of person. Section 296 , IPC refers to voluntary disturbance of any religious assembly and the expression 'voluntarily' as defined in s 39 would include either intention or knowledge. Similarly, s 297, IPC refers both to the intention and knowledge. It will thus be seen that while ss 295, 296 and 297 require either guilty intention or guilty knowledge as specified in those sections, ss 295A and 298, IPC require 'deliberate intention'. Section 295A goes further and requires even proof of malice before a conviction can be sustained under that section. As to what the legislature meant by the words 'deliberate intention' occurring in this section, an indication may be found in the report of the Select Committee, on whose recommendation s 295A was inserted in the IPC . It is stated there that the essence of the offence is:

> That the insult to religion or the outrage to religious feelings must be the sole, or primary, or at least the deliberate and conscious intention. We have accordingly decided to adopt the phraseology of section 298 which requires deliberate intention in order to constitute the offence with which it deals.[16]

5. 'With the Deliberate Intention'

Section 298, IPC makes it an offence if anyone with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of any person, utters any word or makes any sound in the hearing of that person.[17] The essence of the offence consists in the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of other persons. A mere knowledge of the likelihood that the religious feelings of other persons may be wounded would not suffice, nor a mere intention to wound such feelings, unless that intention was deliberate.[18]2082

Mere allegation in the complaint that the statement was deliberately made without any supporting material to show that there was a deliberate and malicious intention to outrage the religious feelings of any class of citizens of India or of any person would not be sufficient to draw the proceedings under ss 295A / 298 IPC . The malicious intention should either be shown to exist or should be apparent from the nature of the act alleged to constitute an offence.[19]

The intention to wound the religious feelings of another must, in order to convict a person under this section, be a deliberate one.[20] Referring to certain objections to this action, the Law Commissioners said:[21]

> We understand these instances to be mentioned as indicative of the strictness with which the definition is to be construed, so as not to make a person criminally liable for words, etc, wounding the religious feelings of another, unless a deliberate intention so to wound his feelings be unequivocally manifested, as it would be by mere railing and abuse, and by offensive attacks upon his religion, under the pretext of discussion, without any argument which an impartial arbiter could possibly believe to have been addressed to him in good faith merely for the purpose of convincing him of the truth. It is here to be observed, that it is not the impression of the offended party that it is to be admitted to decide whether the words uttered deserve to be considered as insulting, and whether they were uttered with the deliberate intention of insulting; these are points to be determined upon cool and calm consideration of the circumstances by the judge. The intention to wound must > be deliberate, that is, not conceived on the sudden in the course of discussion, but premeditated. It must appear, not only that the party, being engaged in a discussion with another on the subject of the religion professed by that other, in the course of the argument, consciously used words likely to wound his religious feelings, but that he entered into the discussion with the deliberate purpose of so offending him. In other places in the Code, a party is held guilty if he causes a certain effect, the causing of which is an offence, intending to cause that effect, or knowing that his act was likely to cause it. Here, there is a marked difference; although the party uttering offensive words might be conscious at the moment of uttering them that they were likely to wound the feelings of his audience, yet if it were apparent that he uttered them on the spur of the occasion, in good faith, simply to further his argument--that he did not take advantage of the occasion to utter them in pursuance of deliberate purpose to offend--he would not, we think, be liable to conviction under section 298 . If, however, a party were to force himself upon the attention of another addressing to him, an involuntary hearer, an insulting invective against his religion, he would, we conceive, fall under the definition, for the reasonable inference from his conduct would be, that he had a deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of his hearer.

With reference to the offence of blasphemy which is analogous to this offence, Russell observes that:

> The wilful intention to insult and mislead others, by means of licentious and contumelious abuse offered to sacred subjects or by wilful sophistry calculated to mislead the ignorant and unwary, is the criterion and test of guilt. A malicious and mischievous intention, or what is equivalent to such an intention in law as well as morals--a state of apathy and indifference to the interests of society--is the broad boundary between right and wrong.[22]

Section 298 IPC is a penal provision which requires strict interpretation. Complaint was filed with allegations that the accused Managalore Ganesh Beedi Works is depicting picture of Lord Ganesh on its Bidi product as a result of which the religious susceptibility of Hindus were being hurt. It was also alleged that the accused was utilizing the name of the said pious deity for his commercial benefit. It was further alleged that after smoking of Bidi the residue is thrown on the roads and on the other filthy places and the said residues are trampled under the shoes, which hurt the religious sentiments of Hindus and brings disrepute to the deity. Held, the allegations made in the complaint were general allegations, the act is not using the trade mark with deliberate intention to hurt the religious feeling and sentiments of Hindus. The accused was not summoned.[23]

Intention has to be Inferred

The deliberate intention has undoubtedly to be inferred from the words spoken, the place where they were spoken and the persons to whom they were addressed and other surrounding circumstances.[24] In R v Boulter ,[25] on an indictment for blasphemous speeches, Phillimore J, directed the jury as follows:

> A man is free to speak and teach what he pleases as to religious matter, though not as to morals. He is free to teach what he likes as to religious matters even if it is unbelief. But when we come to consider whether he has exceeded the limits, we must not neglect to consider the place where he speaks, and the persons to whom he speaks. A man is not free in a public place where passersby who might not willingly go to listen to him knowing that what he was going to say might accidentally hear his words, or where young people might be present. A man is not free in such places to use coarse ridicule on subjects which are sacred to most people in the country. He is free to use arguments.

Insult in the Course of Argument--Inference Regarding Intention

It is true that the offence of blasphemous libel in English law is not the same as the offence described in this section but wilful intention which is the essential ingredient of the former offence is almost synonymous with deliberate intention required for the offence under this section and in considering whether certain words were said with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of persons, the observations of Phillimore J, quoted above, are very helpful.[26] When a man, in the course of an argument, uses insulting words to another, it is impossible to suppose that he does so without the intention of insulting him. It is not to be believed that he uses them in good faith simply for the purpose of convincing or persuading the person with whom he is arguing. In such a case the intention is to be inferred from the character of the words. Again, when words, not positively insulting in themselves, are used in a manner clearly evidencing a deliberate intention to insult the religious feelings of another, the case will fall within the clause. But it will not be an offence when any person arguing with another on the subject of his religion says, what is likely to wound his religious feelings in good faith, simply for the purpose of convincing the person with whom he is arguing, of what he believes to be the truth.[27]2084

Premeditated Intention

Where the intention to wound was not conceived suddenly in the course of discussion but premeditated, deliberate intention may be inferred. Similarly, if the offending words were spoken without good faith by a person who entered into a discussion with the primary purpose of insulting religious feelings of his listeners, deliberate intention may be inferred.[28]

Requirement in Case of more Intentions than One

In doing a particular act, a person may have more intentions than one and to hold him guilty of the intention required for a particular offence, it must be further shown that the intention specified in that offence was the real or dominant intention.[29]

Intention and Motive

Motive is not to be confused with intention. If a man knows that a certain consequence will follow from his act, it must be presumed in law that he intended that consequence to take place, although he may have had some quite different ulterior motive for performing the act. Killing of a cow in the presence of Hindus would lead to a wounding of their religious feelings, and the accused must be supposed to have intended the necessary consequences of his acts and is guilty under this section.[30]

In a case the accused were charged under s 295, IPC, in that they, Hindus, removed some old building materials belonging to a mosque, and thereby insulted the religious feelings of Mahommedans. They were acquitted on the finding that the mosque was, or at any rate its roof was, in a rotten condition, and that no one had any particular claim to it. The complainant having applied to the High Court for revision, it was held that there was no reason to believe that one of the defendants in acting as he did, had any intention of insulting the religion of the Mahommedan residents of the village, or that he did so even with the knowledge that any class of persons was likely to consider the removal of the materials as an insult to their religion.[31]

To throw a shoe on the ground adjacent to food prepared for a feast by caste Hindus, for the purpose of depriving them of expected meal, has been held not to constitute an offence within the section, or s 504 .[32]

Killing a goat and exposing its flesh for sale in the presence of Mahommedans does not amount to an offence under this section, as the Mahommedans do not revere goats.[33]

Where the accused called out to a gathering of members of a certain caste at a dinner, that they would be eating cow's flesh if they did not admit a certain woman to the caste, and in consequence the guests left their food untouched, it was held that no offence under this section had been committed.[34]2085

Where a woman, having given birth to an illegitimate child, went to the house of the person whom she alleged to be its father and threw upon him the clothes which she had been wearing at the time of her confinement, it was held that this was no offence under this section as it treats offences relating to religion and not those relating to caste.[35]

6. Religious Feelings

The IPC does not define religious feeling but it is evident that religious feeling can mean nothing more or less than that associated with a person's religious ideas.[36]

Religion

In Commissioner, Hindu Religious Endowments, Madras v Lakshmindra Thirtha Swamiar ,[37] their Lordships of the Supreme Court have held that religion is a matter of faith with individuals or communities and that a religion undoubtedly has its basis in a system of beliefs or doctrines which are regarded by those who profess that religion as conducive to their spiritual well being, but it would not be correct to say that religion is nothing else but a doctrine or belief. It has been further pointed out in that decision that a religion may not only lay down a Code of ethical rules for its followers to accept, it might prescribe rituals and observances, ceremonies and modes of worship which are regarded as integral parts of religion, and these forms and observances might extend even to matters of food and dress.

Cow Slaughter--Considerations arising therefrom

In view of the observations in Commissioner, Hindu Religious Endowments, Madras v Lakshmindra Thirtha Swamiar , the idea of slaughter of cows which is repugnant to the Hindus universally cannot be held to be a mere superstition. Such repugnance is nothing but a part of the religious idea of all who profess the Hindus religion. In Mahommad Hanif Quareshi v State of Bihar ,[38] the Supreme Court has held that sacrifice of a cow even on the Bakrid day is not an obligatory overt act of a Mussalman to exhibit his religious belief and idea. Even if it be conceded that the accused persons as Muslims were under a religious compulsion to sacrifice a cow on the occasion of Bakr-id Day, it must be noted that their rights to do such acts are subject to some important limitations under art 25(1) of the Constitution . If follows that Mahommedans can pursue their religious practices so as not to wound the feelings of others which might cause a breach of public order, i.e., the public tranquility.

Cow Slaughter in Privacy

Where a cow is slaughtered by Muslims in a place which cannot be said to be a public place at a time when it might be anticipated that there would be no one to overlook, and without uttering any insulting gestures, it would not be possible to say that the Muslims slaughtered the cow with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of the Hindus.[39] But if a Mahommedan slaughters a cow or a bull in broad day-light in an open place in full view of the Hindus, he must be deemed to2086 have done the act with a deliberate intention to wound the religious feelings of the Hindus and would be liable under this section.[40]

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable. A summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable and compoundable offence. It can be tried by any magistrate or summarily.

The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within one year.

Notice under Section 251 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

In a prosecution of an offence under this section, the following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby notice to you (name of accused) as follows:

That on or about the..... day of..... at..... you uttered the words..... (mention them) in the hearing of..... (name the person) [(or made a sound, to wit..... in the hearing of.....) (or made a gesture in the sight of.....) (or placed an object, to wit..... in the sight of.....)] with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of the said person and thereby committed an offence under section 298 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

Q. Have you heard and understood the notice ?

Ans. Yes

Q. Do you plead guilty or have any defence to make ?

Ans. Name of the office of the Magistrate

8. Proof

To establish an offence under this section it will have to be proved that:

(1) the accused uttered some words or made some sound in the hearing of the complainant or made a gesture or placed any object in the sight of the complainant; and
(2) he did so with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of the complainant.

To hold a person guilty of an offence under s 298, IPC, the prosecution must establish affirmatively that the act was done with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of some person. It is true that intention has to be gathered from the conduct of the parties and the surrounding circumstances. But a mere knowledge of the likelihood that the feelings of other persons might be hurt, would not suffice to bring their act within the mischief of s 298, IPC .[41]20872088

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 299.

Culpable homicide.--

Whoever causes death by doing an act with the intention of causing death, or with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, or with the knowledge that he is likely by such act to cause death, commits the offence of culpable homicide.

Illustrations

(a) A lays sticks and turf over a pit, with the intention of thereby causing death, or with the knowledge that death is likely to be thereby caused. Z, believing the ground to be firm, treads on it, falls in and is killed. A has committed the offence of culpable homicide.2091

(b) A knows Z to be behind a bush. B does not know it. A, intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely to cause Z's death, induces B to fire at the bush. B fires and kills Z. Here B may be guilty of no offence; but A has committed the offence of culpable homicide.

(c) A, by shooting at a fowl with intent to kill and steal it, kills B, who is behind a bush; A not knowing that he was there. Here, although A was doing an unlawful act, he was not guilty of culpable homicide, as he did not intend to kill B, or to cause death by doing an act that he knew was likely to cause death.

Explanation 1.--A person, who causes bodily injury to another, who is labouring under a disorder, disease or bodily infirmity, and thereby accelerates the death of that other, shall be deemed to have caused his death.

Explanation 2.--Where death is caused by bodily injury, the person, who causes such bodily injury, shall be deemed to have caused the death, although by resorting to proper remedies and skilful treatment, the death might have been prevented.

Explanation 3.--The causing of the death of a child in the mother's womb is not homicide. But it may amount to culpable homicide to cause the death of a living child, if any part of that child has been brought forth, though the child may not have breathed or been completely born.2092

1. Scope

This section defines culpable homicide broadly,[4] i.e., culpable homicide simpliciter, and not culpable homicide not amounting to murder;[5] it lays down that acts, which fall within the definition given, constitute the offence of culpable homicide. At this stage, the law is not concerned whether the acts described amount, or do not amount, to murder. All that is said is that they amount to culpable homicide, which is a wider offence than that of murder, as all acts of culpable homicide do not amount to murder though, of course, all acts of murder are acts of culpable homicide[6] because culpable homicide is the genus, while murder is a species of culpable homicide. What is left out of culpable homicide, after the special characteristics of murder have been taken away from it, is culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[7] 'Culpable homicide' is the genus and 'murder' is its species and all 'murders' are 'culpable homicides' but all 'culpable homicides' are not 'murders'.[8]

In the scheme of the IPC 'culpable homicide' is genus and 'murder' its specie. All 'murder' is 'culpable homicide' but not vice-versa. Speaking generally, 'culpable homicide' sans 'special characteristics of murder is culpable homicide not amounting to murder'.[9]2093

The offence of culpable homicide defined by this section, involves the doing of an act (a) with the intention of causing death; or (b) with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death; or (c) with the knowledge that the act is likely to cause death. If death is caused in any of these three circumstances, the offence of culpable homicide is said to be committed. The existence of the three circumstances (a), (b) and (c) distinguishes homicide, which is culpable, from homicides which are lesser offences or which are excusable altogether. The killing comes within the second part of s 299, which relates to intention of causing bodily injury likely to cause death, it comes under s 304, Pt I, and if there is no intention but only knowledge, that is to say, if there is no intention to cause death or a bodily injury likely to cause death, but only knowledge that the death is likely to be caused, the offence is under s 304, Pt II.[10]

'Culpable homicide' may or may not amount to 'murder', in terms of s 300 of IPC . When a 'culpable homicide is murder', the punitive consequences shall follow in terms of s 302 of IPC while in other cases, that is, where an offence is 'culpable homicide not amounting to murder', punishment would be dealt with under s 304 of the IPC .[11]

Intent and knowledge in the ingredients of the section postulate the existence of a positive mental attitude and this mental condition is the special mens rea necessary for the offence. The guilty intention in the first two conditions contemplates the intended death of the person harmed or the intentional causing of an injury likely to cause his death. The knowledge in the third condition contemplates knowledge of the likelihood of the death of the person.[12]

2. Law of Australia

Homicide is 'unlawful' or 'culpable' unless it is authorised, justified or excused at law. Examples of lawful homicide include accidental killings, killings in legitimate self-defence or defence of others, and, in certain circumstances, killings done during the exercise of a lawful power of arrest, the prevention of the commission of a crime, or in the defence of property. In Queensland, lawful homicide may also include the provision of palliative care. Suicide is no longer a crime in Australian jurisdictions, and therefore neither is attempted suicide. However, assisting another person's suicide may result in criminal liability for homicide. Homicide offences may also include crimes such as dangerous or culpable driving causing death.[13]

In case, the deceased, John Reid, occupied a flat above the flat occupied by the appellants Boreman and Michael Byrne in Plumstead. On the evening of 4 April 1996 there was a fight between Boreman and the deceased which resulted in both sustaining some injury. The appellants Michael Byrne and Malcolm Byrne (no relation) were both in the house later that night. At approximately 4 am the three appellants were in the deceased's flat when an ugly incident took place during which the deceased received substantial injuries from being kicked and hit by pieces of2094 wood. At 5 am the Fire Brigade were alerted and arrived to find the deceased at his flat badly burnt.

The prosecution case was that the appellants had intended to kill or seriously injure the deceased before the fire and that the injuries he then received were an operative and substantial cause of death. They also sought to show that the appellants had set the fire deliberately in any event. The defence case, in general terms, was that the injuries sustained before the fire were not life threatening and the fire itself, which the defence submitted was the sole cause of death, was accidental. Michael and Malcolm Byrne argued that if there was a joint enterprise in the deceased's flat, they withdrew before the serious injuries were inflicted and lacked any intent to cause serious harm.

Held, the attack was a joint enterprise, that each was a party to the common purpose to inflict grievous bodily harm, that grievous bodily harm was in fact inflicted in furtherance of the joint enterprise and that these injuries were a substantial and operating cause of death, even though the immediate and precipitating cause of death was the inhalation. Moreover they must have considered and rejected the defences of self-defence and provocation. Conviction on the charge of murder was held proper.[14]

3. Three forms of Culpable Homicide

For the purpose of fixing punishment, proportionate to the gravity of the generic offence, the IPC practically recognizes three degrees of culpable homicide. The first is, what may be called, 'culpable homicide of the first degree'. This is the gravest form of culpable homicide, which is defined in s 300 as 'murder'. The second may be termed as 'culpable homicide of the second degree'. This is punishable under the first part of s 304 . Then, there is 'culpable homicide of the third degree'. This is the lowest type of culpable homicide and the punishment provided for it is also the lowest among the punishments provided for the three grades. Culpable homicide of this degree is punishable under the second part of s 304 .[15]

The IPC recognizes two kinds of homicide : (1) Culpable homicide, dealt with between ss 299 and 304, IPC ; and (2) Not culpable homicide, dealt with by s 304A, IPC .

When an act or omission of an accused caused the death of any person, he or she is either guilty of culpable homicide or guilty of not culpable homicide. It is for the court to determine on the evidence whether, if it is culpable homicide, it amounts to murder as explained in s 300 of the IPC (along with all its clauses) or not as explained in s 304 IPC . If culpable homicide cannot be proved, then it would fall in the category of 'not-culpable homicide'.2095

When there is a death of a human being, it may either be culpable homicide (amounting to murder or not amounting to murder) or not culpable homicide, but it is a homicide nevertheless.[16]

4. Crucial Question

Commentary under the same heading in s 300, post, may be referrred to.

5. Essentials of Culpable Homicide

Culpable homicide consists of three elements: (a) death of a human being; (b) which is caused by the physical conduct of a person; and (c) the mental attitude of that person towards the consequences of such conduct. In other words, where one is charged with the offence of culpable homicide, three facts have to be established. First of all, it must be proved that the person, alleged to be victim of the offence, is dead; secondly, that he died by the means alleged on the part of the prosecution; and thirdly, that the accused intentionally took that part in causing his death which is attributed to him by the prosecution.[17] So, the mental element in culpable homicide, ie, the mental attitude of the agent towards the consequences of his conduct, is one of intention or knowledge. Motive is immaterial, so far as the offence of culpable homicide is concerned, and therefore, it need not be established.[18] The intention refers to either the death itself or a bodily injury which is likely to cause death, i.e., an injury dangerous to life, whilst the knowledge refers to the death itself. There are, thus, three species of mens rea in culpable homicide: (a) an intention to cause death; (b) an intention to cause a dangerous injury; and (c) knowledge that death is likely to happen. Illustrations (a) and (b) to s 299, IPC, give examples of culpable homicide accompanied by the first or third species and illust (c) shows that unless one or other of the three species is present, there can be no culpable homicide.[19] The first class of culpable homicide is causing death by doing an act with the intention of causing death; such an offence is also *prima facie*murder within the express words of s 300 .

The second class of culpable homicide is causing death with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death; this section, in defining this class of culpable homicide, does not dealt with knowledge at all, and knowledge and intention must not be confused. The third class of culpable homicide is causing death by an act with knowledge (on the part of the offender) that he is likely, by such act, to cause death.[20]

11. 'Whoever'

All accused may not be liable for culpable homicide. If it cannot be proved that it was the accused who caused the death of the deceased person, there can be no conviction.[21] Thus, even when it is clear that one of the two persons must have caused the death, but it is not clear as to which of them did so, both must be acquitted.[22]

The expressions 'whoever causes death', read along with s 9, IPC, means one, where death is caused by one person, and more where death is caused by more than one person.

Where death is caused by the act of one person, but with the assistance of others, he alone is guilty of culpable homicide under s 299, IPC, but the others would be punishable, as if they had caused the death, under the provisions of ss 34-38 .[23] Where three persons attack another with lathis, not upon a sudden quarrel, but in concert and after previous consultation, they must be deemed to be acting with a common intention and each one's act must be presumed to have been done in furtherance of the common intention.[24] However, for this to be the case, the death must have been caused 'in furtherance of the common intention of all'.[25]

If death is caused by one person but it was not the common intention of all the persons to cause death, the others are not liable therefore, ie, where the common intention is to give a beating, and no more, and one of the parties kills the victim.[26] In a case, four accused persons joined in beating another. Only the two older accused struck him on the head and those blows caused his death. The two younger men struck him on the body, but not with exceptional violence. There was no original2097 design to kill the man. It was held that the two younger accused, who did not themselves strike fatal blows, did not realise that they were joining in a murder, or how grave the injuries inflicted by their older comrades were, and they were not, therefore, liable for murder.[27]

Some other instances are given below:

(a) Where the two accused persons assaulted the deceased not with motive to murder but to commit the robbery successfully, an offence under s 394, IPC, was made out against them, the first accused having caused death of the deceased was also liable for offence under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[28]

(b) Where the accused were chasing the son of the deceased with intention to kill, the deceased interfered and got killed instead, since the accused had no intention to kill the deceased, the accused who inflicted the fatal injury on head of the deceased was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC instead of s 304, Pt I, the other accused who inflicted sword injury which was simple injury was committed under s 324, IPC .[29] Where the accused persons had right of private defence but exceeded it, accused attacked the prosecution witness with bhala and thrust the bhala in his abdomen causing grievious injuries and the co-accused gave fatal blow with a deadly weapon and caused death, the former accused was held liable under s 326 read with s 322, IPC while the co-accused was held guilty under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[30]

(c) Where the two accused persons attacked the deceased with a hunting sickle and dagger, the evidence showed that the co-accused first attacked and after he stopped beating the deceased the accused stabbed him. The injuries caused by the accused were fatal and led to the death of the deceased, conviction of the accused for murder under s 302 was found proper, however, considering the nature of attack, weapon used and injuries caused, the conviction of co-accused was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[31]

(d) Where the accused caught hold of the deceased while the co-accused inflicted a knife blow on him, the accused was convicted under s 326 read with s 34 while conviction of co-accused was altered from s 302, IPC to s 304, Pt I, IPC .[32]

(e) Where the accused persons went to the house of the complainant armed with lathis to belabour them, the main accused not a member of the assembly picked up a heavy stone weighing about 15 kgs and dropped it from the roof of his house on the head of the deceased who arrived there, he alone was found guilty of an offence under s 304, Pt II and the other accused persons were not held guilty of offence under s 304, Pt II, read with s 149, IPC, however, there was no sufficient evidence with regard to the formation of assembly and causing injury to the complainant and the2098 others, so, the conviction of the other accused persons under ss 323 / 149, IPC, was found proper.[33]

(f) Where accused no 1 hurled the bomb at the deceased and killed him, the conviction of accused no 1 under s 302 and ss 3 and 5 of the Explosive Substances Act was found proper. Similarly, accused no 2 who hurled a bomb on a prosecution witness but his wife came in the middle to save her husband, the bomb hit the wife and she succumbed to her injuries, conviction of accused no 2 under s 304, Pt II and ss 3 and 5 of the Explosive Substances Act was found proper. Accused no 3 hurled a country-made bomb towards the victim but missed him by chance, the act of accused no 3 was an attempt to kill and so accused no 3 was held liable to be convicted under s 307 and ss 3 and 5 of the Explosive Substances Act .[34]

Where co-accused caused simple injury with an axe and the main accused caused stab-injury, on a vital part of the body of the deceased, the co-accused was convicted under s 324, IPC and the main accused under s 304, Pt II, IPC, as each accused was found to have acted individually and not in concert.[35] Where the accused persons assaulted the deceased causing his death, the prosecution could not establish common intention of accused persons, accused no 1 who had used an iron pipe and had a given blow which proved to be a simple injury and accused no 3 who had given stick blows and inflicted injuries were convicted under s 324, IPC, accused no 2 who pelted stones and caused voluntary hurt was convicted under s 323, IPC, and accused no 4 who inflicted pipe-blow which landed on head of the deceased was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[36]

Cases frequently arise where the death could not have occurred but for an act on the part of the accused, but in which he had been excused on the ground that some other person intervened and appeared to have been the more immediate and direct cause of the death and that the death was not the consequence of what the accused did, but was the consequence of what the intervener did. But if one person is engaged in murderously beating another to death and a stranger, without sharing the common intention, rushes in and adds some more blows so that the victim's death is more speedily brought about, then it is a case where both would be guilty of murder and the first man cannot be allowed a defence that it was the second assailant's stroke that finally ended the victim's life.[37] The mere fact of presence at a murder, committed by another, is, therefore, insufficient,[38] but if coupled with some conduct, which renders aid, it is enough.[39] The aid rendered must be to the killing. Thus, assistance in the disposal of the dead body, or by not giving information of the murder, is not enough though such conduct constitutes offences under ss 201 and 202 irrespectively.[40]2099

12. 'Causes Death'

Death must be the result or consequences of the physical conduct, or, inversely, the conduct in question must be the cause of death. As observed by Mayne:[41]

> ...any act is said to cause death within the meaning of s 299 when the death results either from the act itself or from some consequences, necessarily or naturally flowing from that act, and reasonably contemplated as its result.

Where, without the intervention of any considerable change of circumstances, the death is connected with the act of violence by a chain of causes and effects, the death must be regarded as proximate, and not too remote, a consequence of the act of violence.[42]In order that a person should be guilty of culpable homicide, it is indispensable that the death of the deceased should be connected with the act of violence or other primary cause; not merely by a chain of causes and effect, but by such direct influence as is calculated to produce the effect without the intervention of any considerable change of circumstances.[43]

13. Explanation 1: Accelerating Death or Killing Person Labouring under Disease

A person, causing bodily injury to another, who is labouring under a disorder, disease, or bodily infirmity, and thereby accelerating the death of that other, is deemed to have 'caused his death'.[44] This is what explanation 1 to this section states. As explained by Morgan and Macpherson:[45]

> An offence, affecting the life of a person, who must soon die either from a mortal disease or in course of nature from old age and decay, is not a less offence than one which affects the life of a person in strong health. The offender causes death, in one case, by accelerating that event by a few months, or days, or hours; in the other case, possibly, he hastens the event by many years. The real difference between the two cases is not in point of law, but in respect of the degree of proof, requisite to show the cause of death. From where the death of a person, who receives some bodily injury, while labouring under a disease, is the subject of enquiry, the court, in estimating the evidence, must consider whether it is sufficiently proved which of the two causes, the disease or the bodily injury to the deceased person, is the cause of his death on the day when his death occurs.

It is not necessary (if it were possible) that the evidence should enable the court to apportion the two causes and the degree in which each of them contributes to the result. But the court must be satisfied: (1) that the death, at the time when it occurs, is not caused solely by the disease; and (2) that it is caused by the bodily injury to this extent that it is accelerated by such injury. Suppose A is ill of small-pox and Z gives him pills in such doses that the disease is aggravated and death is accelerated. Z has caused death, notwithstanding that it may be proved that A must have eventually died of the small-pox.2100

Likewise, if A is very ill with fever and B, intending his death, administers large doses of opium, thereby accelerating A's death. B kills A.[46]

The explanation assumes that the bodily injury was inflicted with the intention of causing death or the knowledge that it would be likely to cause death. It was only intended to repeat the English rule that an injury, which accelerates the death of a dying man, is deemed to be the cause of it and where death has been caused, it is no defence that the deceased was suffering from a complaint which would have caused his death in any event. Section 300(2) , IPC, makes it clear that the offender is not responsible for death in such a case, unless he knows that the condition of the deceased was such that his act was likely to cause death.[47] Thus, where the injury, inflicted by the accused, was not such as is likely to cause death, but death ensued because the heart of the deceased was weak and dilated, and the accused had no intention to cause death and did not know that the deceased was suffering from heart disease, it was held that the offence did not amount to culpable homicide under this section.[48] But when the right lung of the deceased was TB affected, the combined effect of alcohol consumed by him and the injuries inflicted by the accused shortened the period of death and resulted in quicker death. The conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II was found proper.[49]

14. 'Death'

The word 'death', in this section, means the death of a human being (s 46, IPC) But a person can be said to cause the death of a human being only if that human being was alive before his death was caused. In other words, death can be caused only of a living human being. This is made clear by expl 3 to this section. This explanation declares that the causing of the death of a child in the mother's womb is not homicide, but it may amount to culpable homicide to cause the death of a living child if any part of that child has been brought forth, though the child may not have breathed or been completely born.[50] The child may have breathed while in the mother's womb, but it does not itself prove that such breathing necessarily took place after it had wholly or partially emerged from its mother's womb.[51]

15. Death must be caused

Proof of the death of a person, alleged to have been murdered, is the first essential to a conviction of murder. This is established by the finding of the body. Sir Mathew Hale once observed:

> 'I will never convict any person of murder unless there is any trace of the body or unless the body is found.'[52]

2101

The first part of s 304, IPC applies where there is guilty intention, whereas the second part applies where there is guilty knowledge. But before an accused is held guilty and punished under the first part or second part of s 304, IPC, a death must have been caused by him under any of the circumstances mentioned in the five exceptions to s 300, IPC, which include death caused while deprived of power of self-control under grave and sudden provocation, while exercising in good faith the right of private defence of person or property, and in a sudden fight in the heat of passion without premeditation. When death itself had not been caused there is no occasion for convicting the accused under s 304 of the IPC .[53]

16. Death Caused may be of any Human Being

The section does not say that the intention must be to cause the death of a specific human being. It is sufficient if the death of any human being is in contemplation or known to be likely. Consequently, there may be: (a) complete indifference as to who, in particular, is killed; or (b) the death of a specific individual may be in contemplation, but it is another who is actually killed.[54]

17. Death may not be of any Particular Person

That, there may be complete indifference as to who, in particular, is to be killed, is clear from illust (a) to the section. If a person buries a bomb in a frequented path, where it is almost certain that it will be tread on and explode and cause the death of any one treading on it, and if it does, infact explode and cause death, that person is guilty of murder unless he can explain his action in such a way as to negative the inference as to his intention which the nature and circumstances of the act suggest. It is not at all necessary that he should intend to cause the death of any particular person.[55]

18. Death of Person not Intended to be Killed

The section does not require that the offender should intend to kill (or know himself to be likely to kill) any particular person. It is enough if he 'causes the death' of any one by doing an act with the intention of 'causing death' to anyone, whether the person intended to be killed or anyone else. The language is perfectly general and all that it requires, is that there should be an intention to cause death, or a knowledge that death is likely to be the result, and there is nothing which would require that the homicidal intention or knowledge must/be with reference to the life of the person whose death is actually caused. The law affords protection equally to the lives of all persons, and once the criminal intention, ie, an intention to destroy human life, is found, there is no reason why it should make any difference, whether the act, done with such intention, causes the death of the person aimed at or of someone else. Section 301 also supported this construction as it assumes that the accused, in such cases, would be guilty of culpable homicide.[56]2102

Where the accused hurled a bomb on the prosecution witness, the wife of the witness came in the middle to save her husband as a result of which the bomb hit the wife and she succumbed to her injuries, conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II, was found proper.[57]

19. Death due to Supervening Causes

Certain kinds of injuries are not immediately followed by serious consequences; an injured person may die after a long or short period and his death may be as much a consequence of the injury as if it had taken place on the spot. Similarly, an aggressor is as responsible as if the deceased has been directly killed by his violence, provided the fatal result can be traced to the probable consequence of the injury. No doubt, when death is so caused by remote or indirect causes, it might be difficult to establish the mens rea, which is necessary for the offence of murder, the more remote the cause, the less possible it would be to show that the accused intended or realised the result. However, where the intention to cause death is clearly made out, it does not matter that death was caused directly, but by a chain of consequences, each following upon the other in the processes of nature, and not being an unexpected complication causing a new mischief. Thus, where the accused stabbed his wife in the back and injured her spinal cord, and the injury resulted in paralysis of the lower limbs and the bladder, followed by cystitis and bed sore, and the woman died after several months, it was held that death was caused by the injury, inflicted by the accused, and he was guilty of murder.[58] In Re Dorasamy Servai,[59] it was held that when an injury to the head sets up septic pneumonia, which results in death, the person, who inflicts the blow on the head, cannot be absolved from the consequences of his crime by saying that his victim died of pneumonia, and not of the blow on the head, and that, by calling the consequences of an injury a disease, one cannot alter the nature of the consequential results of the injury. The court, after referring to a number of English and Indian cases, observed that the test is whether the cause of death is to be directly associated with the act. It further remarked that it would be a strange position if a man, who inflicts a wound, causing almost immediate death, should be held guilty of murder while a man, who inflicts a similar wound, from which pneumonia supervenes, should not.[60] In two Lahore cases,[61] it was held that if a person receives grievous injuries and dies from pneumonia, which supervenes as a result of them, the perpetrators of the attack on him are guilty of murder. In a Sind case, where the accused attacked a person with murderous weapons and inflicted dangerous wounds and, although the wounds had somewhat healed up, blood poisoning intervened and the person died of brain fever, it was held that the wounds were the cause of death within the meaning of this section.[62]

20. Proximate Cause of Death--Death due to Complication or Development

An act is said to cause death when death results from the act itself or from some consequences necessarily or naturally flowing from the act, and reasonably2103 contemplated as its result. Where, without the intervention of any considerable change of circumstances, death is connected with the act of violence of a chain of causes and effects, death must be regarded as the proximate, and not a remote, consequences of the act. The cause must not only be the cause sine qua non, but it must also be a cause reasonably proximate; but the doctrine of criminal causation has reasonable limits. An injury may lead to death. Death may be instantaneous; it may be delayed. The injury may lead to shock, excessive bleeding, coma, syncopation, etc, and cause death. In such a case, injury and death have a clearly perceptible and direct nexus and there will be no difficulty in finding that death is the direct result of injury. The decision may not be so easy in a case where death is caused not directly by the injury itself but due to a complication or development or in a case where death is not instantaneous but is delayed. Where death is delayed or due to a later complication or development, court has to consider the nature of the injury, complication or development and attendant circumstances. If the complication or development is the natural or probable or necessary consequence of the injury and if it is reasonably contemplated as its result, the injury can be said to have caused death. If, on the other hand, the chain of consequences is broken or if there is an unexpected complication, causing new mischief, the relation of cause and effect is not established, or the causal connection is too remote, and the injury cannot be said to have caused death. If the original injury itself is of a fatal nature, it makes no difference that death is actually caused by a complication, naturally flowing from the injury, and not the injury itself, since causal connection is proximate.[63]

21. 'By doing an Act'

For the application of s 299, IPC, death must be the result or consequence of an act, done by the accused, or, inversely the act of the accused must be the cause of the death. The act, or physical action, is the means of causing death.

An act, which is the cause of the death, must not be confused with a prior act which is merely one of preparation. Thus, if A, B, and C go armed to certain land, on which cultivators are at work, in order to enforce their supposed rights, and a quarrel ensures in which A kills one of the cultivators with a blow of a dao intending to kill him, they are guilty of murder. But the cause of death is the blow, and not the previous action of A, B and C in arming themselves and going to the land. In Reaz-ud-din Shaikh v Emperor ,[64]going armed to the land was held to be an act done with the knowledge that death was likely and, therefore, within the ambit of ss 299 and 300 . But the act likely to cause death must, by the terms of s 299, be 'such act', ie, the act which caused the death. The blow of the dao was the cause of death, and not the arming and assembling on the land.

22. 'An act' includes a Series of Acts

The word 'act', as used in ss 299 and 300, read with s 33 of the IPC, denotes not only a single act, but also a series of acts taken as a single act. When a number of persons participate in the commission of a criminal act, the responsibility may be individual, that is to say, each person may be guilty of a different offence, or all of them may be2104 liable for the total result produced. This would, however, depend on the intention and knowledge of the participants. The subject is then covered by ss 34, 35 and 38 of the IPC . Thus, if two persons beat a third person and one intends to cause his death and the other to cause only grievous injury and there is no common intention, their offences will be different. But this would not be the case if the offence is committed with a common intention.[65]

Under s 33, IPC, the word 'act' denotes a series of acts as well as a single act. But, for an act to amount to culpable homicide, it must have caused the death of a living human being and it must have been done with the intention or knowledge specified in this section. In a series of acts, the first act may not have caused death and the subsequent act, which caused the death, may have been done only to cause disappearance of the body of the victim, believed to be already dead, or to show that he committed suicide. In such cases, the law may be stated thus:

> where the first act is done without any intention to kill, or knowledge that it is likely to cause death, and the second act, which causes the death, is done in the belief that the victim is already dead, the accused is not guilty of culpable homicide or murder, but of hurt or grievous hurt.[66]

But if the first act is done with the intention of killing, or with the knowledge that it is likely to cause death, and the second act, which causes the death, is so closely connected, in time and purpose, with the first that the two acts form parts of the same transaction, the accused is guilty of culpable homicide whether, when doing the second act, he believed that the victim was already dead or was completely indifferent as to whether the victim was alive or dead.[67]

23. Accused Hitting and Making Victim Unconscious, Believing him Dead doing act Leading to Death of Victim--Effect and Instances

In Empress v Khandu Valad Bhawani ,[68] the accused struck the deceased three blows on the head with a stick. The deceased fell down senseless on the ground. The accused, believing that he was dead, set fire to the hut, in which he was lying, with a view to remove all evidence of the crime. The medical evidence showed that the blows, struck by the accused, were not likely to cause death, and did not cause death, and that death was really caused by injuries from burning when the accused set fire to the hut. The majority of the judges (Parsons J, dissenting) held that as the accused undoubtedly believed that he had killed his victim, 'there would be a difficulty in regarding what occurred from first to last as one continuous act, done with the intention of killing the deceased, and that the accused should be held to have committed only the attempt to murder, punishable under s 307 . In Emperor v Dalu Sardar ,[69] it was held that the accused was not guilty of murder on a finding that he had first assaulted the deceased, without any intention of causing death, and2105 subsequently, believing her dead, had suspended her body by the neck by a piece of string tied to the roof of the house. It was found that, in fact, death was not caused by the previous assault, but by the hanging. A conviction was inflicted under s 325, IPC . But in an earlier case, where one person struck the deceased a blow, which knocked him down, and then he and the other accused, without inquiring as to whether he was dead, in haste, hung him up to a tree so as to make it appear that he committed suicide, all the accused were convicted of hurt. But the High Court quashed the proceedings and directed the accused to be re-tried on charges of murder, culpable homicide not amounting to murder and hurt.[70] In Re Shreenarayan,[71] the accused struck the deceased a single blow on the head and she fell down bleeding from the nose and became senseless. The accused thought that she was dead and burnt the body. It was held that the accused were not guilty under s 302, but were liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt 2, for acting with gross negligence and thereby causing death. In Re Thavamoni,[72] the accused assaulted a woman, with the intention of causing her death, and believing her to be dead, though, in fact, she was not, threw her body into a well where she was found dead. The High Court, following the decision in Re Kaliappa Goundan,[73] held the accused guilty of murder since the intention of the accused was, from the beginning to cause the death of the deceased. In Nehal Mahto v Emperor ,[74] in which the facts were strikingly similar to those in the case of Kaliappa Goundan v Emperor ,[75] the Patna High Court, agreeing with that decision, held that the accused were guilty of murder, and the same view was taken in Lingaraj Das v Emperor ,[76] and it was held that if the intention is to kill, the offence is one of murder even if the killing takes place by a series of acts in two stages.[77] In Emperor v Gujjan Singh ,[78] the accused struck the deceased two or three times on the head and, when the latter fell down unconscious, threw him face down into a pool, containing a few inches of water, removed the contents of his pockets and covered the body with the branches of a tree. Later on, the accused carried the body of the deceased in a dhoti and threw it into a canal. On these facts, it was held, by a Division Bench of the Lahore High Court:

> The action being continuous and it being impossible to resolve the two incidents into two wholly separate actions, inspired by different motives and committed for different reasons, we are of opinion that the accused must be treated as having done one act with the intention of causing death and as having succeeding in carrying out his object.

24. 'With the Intention of Causing Death'

The word 'intention' means the mental attitude of the man who decides to bring about a certain result. Every act is followed by consequences. The consequence, necessary to constitute the offence of culpable homicide, is death. By 'intention' is2106 meant the expectation of the consequence in question[79] and intention does not, therefore, necessarily involve premeditation or thinking out the killing before hand.[80] An accused may 'intend' certain injuries albeit he may not know or intend the serious consequences of those injuries. But the injuries in order to be 'intentional' should not be such which the appellant in the heat of passion and without any previous enmity happened to just cause, but should at least be such, for causing which the appellant infact strove. 'Intention' is purposeful doing of a thing to achieve a particular end. It is the mental attitude of a man who has resolved to bring about a certain result, if he can possibly do so. It is shaping of one's conduct to achieve a particular end at which he aims.[81] A man expects the natural consequences of his acts and, in law, is presumed to intend them.[82] If, therefore, a person, in performing some act, either: (a) expects death to be the consequence thereof; or (b) expects a dangerous injury (i.e., a bodily injury likely to cause death) to be the consequence thereof; or (c) knows that death is a likely consequence thereof,[83] and, in each case, death ensues, his intention in the first two cases, and his knowledge in the third case, renders the homicide culpable. A guilty intention or knowledge is, thus, essential to this offence, and if this does not exist, the killing cannot amount to culpable homicide.[84] The law does not regard every case of homicide as prima facie murder; it throws on the prosecution the burden of proving an intent or knowledge.[85] Where, therefore, there is nothing more than a fatal result to indicate an intention to cause death, etc, and no weapon has been used, it is unsafe to convict a person of murder.[86] In certain classes of injuries, resulting in death, eg, injuries of which death is not a natural or ordinary consequence, there must be, in order to support conviction for murder, a specific finding of the intention to cause death.[87] However, under the IPC, no constructive, but actual intention is required.[88]

Assault from Blunt Side of Axe

Accused belonging to scheduled tribes and inhabitant of tribal area committed the murder of his wife. There were frequent quarrels between the accused and the victim. On the date of incident the accused under provocation assaulted his wife from the blunt side of the axe. Since he did not assault from the sharp cutting side of the axe, he could not be imputed with intention to cause the death of the deceased. His conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, IPC, a sentence of ten years rigorous imprisonment already undergone by him was found sufficient.[89]2107

25. Motive not Required to be Proved

Motive for doing a criminal act is generally a difficult area of prosecution. One cannot normally see into the mind of another. Motive is the emotion which impels a man to do a particular act. Such impelling cause need not necessarily be proportionally grave to do grave crimes. Many a murders have been committed without any known or prominent motive. It is quite possible that the aforesaid impelling factor would remain undiscoverable. Lord Chief Justice Champbell struck a note of caution in Reg v Palmer [90] thus:

> But if there be any motive which can be assigned, I am bound to tell you that the adequacy of that motive is of little importance. We know, from experience of criminal courts that atrocious crimes of this sort have been committed from very slight motives; not merely from malice and revenge, but to gain a small pecuniary advantage, and to drive off for a time pressing difficulties.

In some cases, it may not be difficult to establish motive but in other cases, inferences from circumstances may help in discerning the mental propensity of the person concerned. There may also be cases in which it is not possible to disinter the mental transaction of the accused which would have impelled him to act. No proof can be expected in all cases as to how the mind of the accused worked in a particular situation.

Sometimes, it may appear that the motive established is a weak one. That by itself, is insufficient to lead to any inference adverse to the prosecution.[91] Motive for the crime rarely affects the worth of evidence of the eyewitnesses.[92] When facts are clear, it is not necessary to prove motive. The motive, which induces a man to do any particular act, is known to him, and to him alone, or possibly to the deceased and it is impossible to establish it. At the most, the prosecution can only suggest as to what may have been the motive for any particular act.[93] Failure of the prosecution to establish the motive for the crime does not mean that the entire prosecution case has to be thrown overboard. It only casts a duty on the court to scrutinise the other evidence, particularly the evidence of eyewitnesses.[94] The fact, that the prosecution has failed to lead such evidence, has this effect only that the other evidence, bearing on the guilt of the accused, has to be very closely examined.[95]

Motive, the absence of which cannot absolve the accused from the commission of crime,[96] nor does it call for any leniency in sentence,[97] is relevant and important on the question of intention;[98] it does not, however, acquire much significance where the offence can be proved by other evidence,[99] or when the case is based on ocular testimony of witnesses.[99a] The fact, that the apparent motive was too flimsy, is,2108 therefore, no reply to the unshaken testimony of credible and natural eyewitnesses[1] because the question of motive becomes more or less academic where the direct testimony, regarding assault, it worthy of credence.[2] Sometimes, it may appear that the motive established is a weak one. That by itself is insufficient to lead to any inference adverse to the prosecution.[3] It must, however, be remembered that if motive, as a circumstance is put forward, it must, like any other circumstance, be fully established.[4] If motive is proved by the prosecution, the court has to consider it and see whether it is adequate.[5]

Inequitable distribution of property undoubtedly provides an adequate motive for murder,[6] but no inference of motive can be drawn merely from the existence of claims put up by kins to family property.[7] Where the accused killed the entire family of his uncle, the motive alleged by the prosecution was elimination of successors of half share of property. The plea of the defence that the motive alleged was not plausible as person to whom deceased had bequeathed property by Will was not killed. This was rejected because no material was brought forth to show that the accused knew of the Will.[8]

26. Motive--Sound Proposition and Unsound Suggestion

Though it is a sound proposition that every criminal act is done with a motive, it is unsound to suggest that no such criminal act can be presumed unless motive is proved. After all, motive is a psychological phenomenon. Mere fact that prosecution failed to translate the mental disposition of the accused into evidence does not mean that no such mental condition existed in the mind of the assailant. In Atley v State of Uttar Pradesh [9] it was held:

> ...that is true, and where there is clear proof of motive for the crime, that lends additional support to the finding of the court that the accused was guilty but absence of clear proof of motive does not necessarily lead to the contrary conclusion.

27. Motive not Essential Ingredient of Offence

It must be remembered that motive is not an essential ingredient of an offence[10] and the question of motive need not be considered when the evidence is clear that the particular accused was the assailant[11] and, therefore, there is no burden of proof on the prosecution to establish the existence of any motive.[12] It is true that motive is not2109 an essential ingredient of the offence of murder and when there is direct evidence about the commission of the offence, motive loses its significance and recedes in the background.[13]

28. In the Face of Direct Evidence Motive Loses Significance

Simply because it is not possible to find out the exact motive, the direct evidence cannot be disbelieved if it is reliable.[14] When there is direct evidence of a reliable character, no question of motive can arise.[15] It is now well settled that in cases in which there is direct testimony, motive loses much of its importance and the court has to decide the case on the basis of the evidence of direct witnesses.[16] Once it is established by other evidence that the offence was committed, the absence of motive becomes entirely immaterial and cannot be used as a mitigating circumstance in connection with the measure of sentence to be imposed.[17]

29. Existence of Motive is Important in Cases of Circumstantial Evidence

Existence of motive, even if not an essential component in proof of the offence,[18] assumes importance only where direct and credible evidence is not available and the case rests upon circumstantial evidence.[19] Where the prosecution evidence disclosed that there was a long-standing dispute over property between the accused and the deceased, the accused had strong motive to kill the deceased.[20] Where only circumstantial evidence is available at the outset, one normally starts looking for the motive of crime[21] as it is relevant in making the prosecution story probable[22] and helps in determining the conduct of the accused at the time of committing the offence.[23] Undoubtedly, in cases of circumstantial evidence, motive bears important significance. It is sometimes difficult to unlock the motive from the mind of the accused. People do not act wholly without motive. The failure to discover the motive of an offence does not signify its non-existence. The failure to prove motive is not fatal as a matter of law. Proof of motive is never indispensable for conviction. When2110 facts are clear, it is immaterial that no motive has been proved, therefore, absence of proof of motive does not break the link in the chain of circumstance connecting the accused with the crime nor militates against the prosecution case.[24]

30. When Motive to Implicate Accused and Motive to Kill by Accused are Equally Balanced

Discovery of motive for the crime is not imperative in every case.[25] When the motive to implicate accused on prosecution side as well as the motive to kill on the part of the accused are equally balanced, the court should look to the surrounding circumstances.[26]

31. Knowledge of Motive Different from Suspicion of Motive

If motive is known and established, it is a strong piece of evidence against an accused. However, knowledge of motive is different from suspicion of motive. When there has been a dispute between an accused and the deceased, the implication of the accused on the basis of suspicion of there being a motive for the crime cannot be ruled out.[27]

32. Motive alone is Insufficient to Fasten Guilt

There can be no conviction on mere vague evidence of motive.[28] In the absence of any reliable evidence, motive alone is insufficient to fasten guilt.[29] It is wholly insufficient, even if coupled with other circumstances, when the evidence of eyewitnesses is wholly unacceptable,[30] or when evidence on other important, issues is unreliable.[31]

33. Motive Distinguished from Intention

Motive should be distinguished from intention. Intention refers to consequences produced by the act or omission of the offender, while motive refers to inducement for producing such consequences.[32]

34. 'With the Intention of Causing such Bodily Injury as is Likely to Cause Death'

Both the first and second clauses of this section require intention. But the intention, required by the two clauses, is not the same. The intention, required by the first clause, is to cause death, whereas the intention required by the second clause, is only to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.

Where the intention is to cause2111 death, the offence is murder unless the case falls under one of the exceptions, mentioned in s 300 .[33] If an exception does apply, the first part of s 304 will regulate the punishment.[34] Where the intention is to cause only bodily injury, it may, or it may not, amount to murder. If the offence is culpable homicide not amounting to murder, the punishment is still regulated by the first part of s 304, being covered by the words 'if the act, by which the death is caused, is done with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death'.[35] When the accused were armed with lathis, the injuries caused by hard, blunt object were found only on the hands and feet of the deceased, the accused could not be convicted for murder, so their conviction was altered to one under ss 325 and 326 .[36]The bodily injury, intended to be caused, must be such 'as is likely to cause death'. To justify a conviction of culpable homicide of any sort against an offender, who has committed an intentional act, causing bodily injury to another, and which act was intended for some particular individual, there must, at least be a finding that the offender intended, by his act, to cause bodily injury likely to cause death.[37] Where the appellant on the spur of moment, all of a sudden inflicted one "Hansua" blow causing death, it canot be held that the appellant committed the offence of murder within the meaning of s 300, IPC rather it can be construed that the appellant committed the offence with the intention of causing such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, within the meaning of s 299, IPC . Conviction of the appellant under s 302, IPC was modified to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[38]

Accused police officers being annoyed with the stabbing of their constable, in police custody gave beating to the deceased causing death. Held, the accused appellant did not intend to cause death, but the act was done with the knowledge that it was likely to cause the death of the deceased. The case falls within the 3rd Pt of s 299 and will be punishable under the 2nd Pt of s 304, accordingly the accused appellant was convicted under s 304, Pt II.[39]

The difference between an intention to cause death and an intention to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death is a difference of degrees only. The latter is a degree lower in the scale of criminality than the former.[40]In either case, the act of the accused must have caused death. The nature of weapon used, the manner in which blows are dealt, the parts of the body on which they are dealt and the manner in which the weapons are used are important to gather intention of the accused.

The accused after consuming alcohol had gone to the house of the deceased. There was exchange of hot words, the accused caught-hold of the deceased by neck and dashed against the mud wall. Asphyxia and cardiac arrest were the cause of death. There was no preparation or pre-meditation on the part of the accused. The accused had no intention but he could be imputed with knowledge that his act was likely to cause the death of the deceased. The accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[41]2112

Where the accused gave only one injury by iron rod on the head of the deceased, it was not clear from the medical evidence as to whether deceased died on account of head injuries. The death of deceased could well be on account of septicaemia, the doctor however did not clarify whether septicemia was the direct result of the injuries, the accused surely cannot be pinned down for an offence under s 302, IPC, though he can be held guilty under s 304, Pt II as septicemia could have been developed because of operation also.[42] Where the accused caused a knife injury on the buttock of the deceased, the accused cannot be imputed with the intention of causing death as the buttock is not a vital part of the body, more so when two injuries caused by the accused on the person of the deceased were also not on a vital part of the body and were not of grievous nature and were opined to be caused by a blunt object, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to that under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[43] Where death of the deceased was caused by a single blow by kassi (spade), medical evidence showed that kassi blow caused damage to skull of the deceased, it can, therefore, be said that accused caused the death by doing an act with the knowledge that he was thereby likely to cause death, his act, therefore, would amount to culpable homicide not amounting to murder and would fall under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[44] Appellant accused inflicted single gun shot injury on the left side of chest resulting in death. The act was done with the knowledge that by such act the accused was likely to cause the death of the deceased, the case fell under IIIRD Pt of s 299, as culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The conviction of the appellant accused under s 302, IPC was converted into one under s 304, Pt II, a sentence of five years rigorous imprisonment was imposed.[45] Where the manner in which a stab injury on the chest of deceased was given by the accused showed that the accused had not only the intention but also the knowledge that injury given was likely to cause death, the conviction of the accused was altered from one under s 302 to one under s 307, Pt I, IPC .[46] Accused appellant assaulted the deceased with iron rod causing death. The accused did not intend to cause death but he can be attributed with knowledge that his act was likely to cause death of the victim. The conviction of the accused appellant under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II and accused was sentenced to ten years rigorous imprisonment.[47]

Over the cable connection, a sudden quarrel took place between the appellant accused and the son of the deceased. On account of heat of passion, the appellant went home; took out his father's revolver and started firing indiscriminately, and one of the bullets hit the deceased on her chin. The appellant had the knowledge that the use of revolver was likely to cause death and, as such, the present case would fall within the third clause of s 299, IPC . The offence committed by the appellant was only "culpable homicide not amounting to murder". The accused appellant was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[48]2113

35. 'Likely'--Interpretation

The word 'likely' means probably. It is distinguished from possibly. When the chances of a thing happening are even with, or greater than, its not happening, we say that the thing will probably happen. When the chances of its happening are very high, we say that it will most probably happen. An injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death merely means that death will be the most probable result of the injury, having regard to ordinary course of nature.

The expression does not mean that death must result in the case in which such an injury is caused. Therefore, the expression 'sufficient in the ordinary course of nature' is a species of the genus likely. In ss 299 and 304, the word 'likely' is used in a comprehensive sense as including both the higher and the lower degrees of likelihood. In s 300, the word 'likely' is used in the sense of a higher degree of likelihood. In s 300, the word 'likely' is used in the sense of a lower degree of likelihood only. In common parlance, however, the word 'likely' is used only as denoting a lower degree of likelihood. It is in this sense that the word is used in deciding cases to distinguish between an offence falling under s 302 from that falling under s 304 .[49] An effect is 'likely' to take place when there is a likelihood distinguishable from mere possibility. A thing is possible when it may happen; likely when chances are in favour of its happening, and probable when the chances are strongly in its favour. Thus, probability is the stronger degree of likelyhood. A thing may, therefore, be likely without being probable though a thing probable must be likely.[50] 'The offence is culpable homicide if the bodily injury, intended to be inflicted, is likely to cause death; it is murder if such injury is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.' The distinction is fine, but appreciable. It is a question of degree of probability.[51]

36. Explanation 2

This explanation provides that where death is caused by injury, the person, who causes it, would be deemed to have caused the death although, by resorting to proper remedies and skilful treatment, the death might have been prevented.[52]

In view of the expln 2 of s 299, IPC, no accused can raise the contention that he did not cause the death as it might have been prevented by resorting to proper remedies and skilful treatment. If an accused causes an injury on a vital portion of the body and as a result of it the victim dies, it is no defence to a charge of murder for the accused to say that rendering of proper and expert medical assistance would have prevented the death and so he cannot be held liable for murder.[53] The principle, underlying the explanation, seems to be that a man is responsible for the natural2114 consequences of his conduct and the fact, that those natural consequences might have been negatived by artificial means, does not affect the question of liability. Thus, if A deliberately inflicts an injury on B, which is likely to result in his death by lockjaw, and if B refuses to allow a surgeon to perform an operation to prevent this and dies, A is guilty of killing B.[54] Similarly, where an injury is intentionally inflicted, the defence, that no proper medical treatment was given to the victim, does not exonerate the person, who caused the injury, from the guilt of murder if he intended that the injury should be sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death or knew that it was likely to cause death of that person. It does not exonerate him from the guilt of culpable homicide if death ensues as a natural or likely consequence. Such a person is deemed to have caused the death and his degree of criminal responsibility must depend, on the knowledge or intention to be gathered from the proved facts.[55]

The appellant accused had beat the deceased on his head twice, the deceased died in the hospital where he was treated by various doctors. The plea of the accused that the deceased could have survived if proper treatment had been given to her was rejected in view of the provisions of expln 2 to s 299 which provides that where the death is caused by bodily injury, the person who causes such bodily injury shall be deemed to have caused the death, although by resorting to proper remedies and skilful treatment the death might have been prevented.[56]

37. 'Intention' does not Imply Knowledge of Likelihood of Causing Death

Intention is locked up in the heart of the assailant and the inference is to be drawn from acts and attending circumstances.[57] All that the second clause of this section requires, is an intention to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. Here intention neither implies existence of previous design, nor assumes any forethought. Nor is it necessary that the accused should have knowledge that the injury, which he intends to cause, will be sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[58] The plain words of the second clause of s 299, IPC, require no proof of knowledge that the bodily injury intended was likely to cause death. The question is one of fact and may be sub-divided into two parts: (a) was bodily injury intended? (b) was such bodily injury likely to cause death? If the answers to both these questions are in the affirmative, then the offender is guilty of culpable homicide. However, when one asks whether a bodily injury is likely to cause death, that means as a natural and probably consequence of the injury, and not as a special and abnormal consequence of some disability, on the part of the victim, which was unknown to the offender. Thus, a blow, with the fist upon the thyroid cartilage is not ordinarily likely to cause death; if fatal result ensues from it by reason of some abnormal condition of the cartilage, unknown to the offender, his offence does not amount to culpable homicide because the intention to be ascribed to him is no more than the natural and probable2115 consequence of his act. Similarly, in the absence of such knowledge, if a person causes death by doing an act with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, his offence comes under s 299, IPC and it is only if the intention was to cause bodily injury, which injury was sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, that the offence would come under s 300, cl (3).[59]

38. Knowledge

Knowledge, as used in this section, is a word which imports a certainty and not merely a probability,[60] though intention also includes foresight of certainty.[61] Knowledge, as contrasted with intention, would more properly signify a state of conscious awareness of certain facts in which the human mind might itself remain supine or inactive.[62]

39. 'Knows', 'Thinks' and Likely Consequences

'Knows' is a stronger word than 'thinks'. In many cases, which unhappily arise, a person does not pause to think, much less does he know, what degree of harm he will effect by striking a blow or blows which may ultimately prove fatal. Some of these cases rightly result in convictions for murder because of the savagery of the attack, or because a lethal weapon was used on a vital part of the body, as a result of which death was the natural and probable consequence, and the injuries, intended to be inflicted, were sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death. However, there are other cases which end fatally and in which death was not the natural and probable consequence because the injuries were not very severe, but were merely a likely consequence. These causes are expressly governed by the second part of s 299 ; they do not amount to murder, but are nonetheless culpable homicide.[63]

40. 'Intention' Distinguished from 'Knowledge'

The framers of the IPC designedly used the words 'intention' and 'knowledge' and it is accepted that the knowledge of the consequences which may result in doing an act is not the same thing as the intention that such consequences should ensue. Firstly, when an act is done by a person, it is presumed that he must have been aware that certain specified harmful consequences would or could follow. However, that knowledge is bare awareness and not the same thing as intention that such, consequences should ensue. As compared to 'knowledge', 'intention' requires something more than the mere foresight of the consequences, namely the purposeful doing of a thing to achieve a particular end.

Kenny in Outlines of Criminal Law[64] has observed:

> Intention: To intend is to have in mind a fixed purpose to reach a desired objective, the noun 'intention' in the present connection is used to denote the state of mind of a man who not only foresees but also desires the possible consequences of his conduct. Thus if2116 one man throws another from a high tower or cuts off his head it would seem plain that he both foresees the victim's death and also desires it: the desire and the foresight will also be the same if a person knowingly leaves a helpless invalid of infant without nourishment or other necessary support until death supervenes. It will be noted that there cannot be intention unless there is also foresight, since a man must decide to his own satisfaction, and accordingly must foresee, that to which his express purpose is directed.

> Again, a man cannot intend to do a thing unless he desires to do it. It may well be a thing that he dislikes doing, but he dislikes still more the consequences of his not doing it. That is to say he desires the lesser of two evils, and therefore has made up his mind to bring about that one.

Russell on Crime[65] has observed:

> In the present analysis of the mental element in crime the word 'intention' is used to denote the mental attitude of a man who has resolved to bring about a certain result if he can possibly do so. He shapes his line of conduct so as to achieve a particular end at which he aims.

It can thus be seen that the 'knowledge' as contrasted with 'intention' signifies a state of mental realisation with the bare state of conscious awareness of certain facts in which human mind remains supine or inactive. On the other hand, 'intention' is a conscious state in which mental faculties are aroused into activity and summoned into action for the purpose of achieving a conceived end. It means shaping of one's conduct so as to bring about a certain event. Therefore, in the case of 'intention' mental faculties are projected in a set direction. Intention need not necessarily involve premeditation. Whether there is such an intention is a question of fact.[66]

Knowledge, as contrasted with intention, would more properly signify a state of conscious awareness of certain facts in which the human mind might itself remain supine or inactive. On the other hand, intention connotes a conscious state in which mental faculties are roused into activity and summoned into action for the deliberate purpose of being directed towards a particular and specified end which the human mind conceives and perceives before itself. Mental facilities, which might be dispersed in the case of knowledge, are, in the case of intention, concentrated and converged on a particular point and projected in a set direction.[67]

41. Intention and Knowledge may Sometime Mean Same Thing

Motive is something which prompts a man to form an intention and knowledge is awareness of the consequences of the act. In many cases, intention and knowledge merge into each other and mean the same thing, more or less, and intention can be presumed from knowledge. The demarcating line between knowledge and intention is, no doubt, thin, but it is not difficult to perceive that they connote different things.[68] Intention requires something more than a mere foresight of the consequences, a purposeful doing of a thing to achieve a particular end, whereas knowledge implies awareness that certain consequences would or could not follow.[69]2117

42. Intention, Knowledge and three Clauses of Section 299

'Intent' and 'knowledge' in the ingredients of s 299, IPC postulate the existence of positive mental attitude and this mental condition as the special mens rea condition of s 299 contemplates the intended death of the person harmed or the intentional causing of an injury likely to cause death. The knowledge in the third condition contemplates knowledge of the likelihood of the death of a person.[70]

43. Foresight of Consequences

Foresight of consequences is the common factor in both intention and knowledge as used in the two clauses of this section. Where consequences are substantially certain or inevitable, the doer may be credited with knowledge of the foresight of those consequences and the act may be called intentional; but where consequences are not so certain, criminality may be attached to those acts only where the accused could be credited with the knowledge of foresight of such consequences only which are likely, ie, which he could reasonably have foreseen, though he may not have desired them. The third clause is, thus, only a species of the second clause where the degree of probability of the result being death is only foreseen as likely by the accused. The latter requires a particular intent, while the former is satisfied with knowledge only.[71]

44. 'With the Knowledge that he is Likely, by such Act, to Cause Death'

Section 299, IPC enacts that the doing of an act, which causes death, is culpable homicide if it is done either: (i) with one of the two intentions, that is to say, with the intention of causing either: (a) death, or (b) such bodily injury as is likely to caused death: or (ii) with the knowledge that death is likely to be caused by such act. Headings (i) and (ii) are, it will be noticed, alternative, one to the other, so that it follows that culpable homicide may be committed without any intention on the part of the accused if he has the knowledge indicated in the said heading (ii). Section 304 lays down as to what shall be the punishment for culpable homicide not amounting to murder; if the act is merely done with the knowledge that death is likely to be caused thereby and without either of the intentions, mentioned in the above heading (i), that is to say, if the case falls under the above heading (ii), a lesser punishment is provided under the latter part of s 304 .[72] The word 'likely' implies both higher and lower degrees of probability. Whether the offence is culpable homicide or murder depends upon the degree of risk to human life. If the risk is of a lower degree and death is merely a likely result, it is culpable homicide; if the risk is higher and death is the most probable result, it is murder.[73]

The third clause of the section, relating to knowledge, is intended to apply to cases in which there is no intention to cause death or bodily injury, eg, furious driving at a mark near a public road.[74] A person, causing death, even without homicidal intention, is liable if he acted with the knowledge that he is likely to cause death.[75] Even though2118 the accused might not have the intention to cause death, his act is done with the knowledge that it is likely to cause death, he has, therefore, committed an offence punishable under s 304, Pt II and is required to be punished for the same.[76] The accused picking up a heavy stone weighing about 15 kgs and dropping it from the roof of his house on the head of the deceased could be said to have knowledge that he vide his act was likely to cause death of the deceased and so is liable under s 304 Pt II, IPC .[77] Where it was found that death had been caused by a single blow with a lathi and the other injuries, found on the body of the deceased, did not indicate a determination to beat the deceased to death, it was held that it was not possible to hold that death was caused by doing an act with the intention of causing death or with the intention of causing such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, but it might be held that death was caused by the doing of an act with the knowledge that by such act the person, who did it, was likely to cause death.[78] Where the accused stuffed a cloth into deceased's mouth in order to silence him, and not with any idea of killing him, it was held that the most, that can be said, is that the accused must be presumed to have known that they were likely, in so doing, to cause his death.[79]

Where the accused had no intention to cause the death but knowledge could be imputed to him that his act was likely to cause the death of the deceased, viz the accused dashes the head of the deceased against the wall, the accused would be convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[80]

On proof of commission of the offence of gang-rape found to have been committed in a violent manner, the accused are assumed to be having knowledge that by their action it was likely that the deceased would have died.[81] Where looking into anti-mortem injuries suffered by the deceased and the fact that as the deceased appeared to have died as a result of the right artery being punctured at the ilium, the accused could not be fastened with the intention of puncturing right artery at the ilium as per the first three clauses of s 300, or the knowledge as contemplated by the fourth clause of s 300, he could only be saddled with the knowledge of causing death of the deceased, as contemplated by s 299, IPC .[82]

Where the medical evidence showed that there was only one injury on the head that proved to be fatal, the other injuries were found to be simple, the weapons used also were not deadly, it was held that under these circumstances, it was reasonable to hold that the accused persons only had knowledge that the injuries inflicted by them were likely to cause death, the conviction of accused persons from s 304, Pt I was altered to s 304, Pt II, IPC .[83]

45. Presumption Regarding Intention or Knowledge

The requisite intention or knowledge, in order to render killing culpable homicide, must be clearly proved by the prosecution,[84] which can usually be done by proof of2119 the circumstances which prove the act or omission in question,[85] because there is an accepted doctrine that a man of mature understanding is presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of his acts.[86] This doctrine itself is based upon the presumption that a person of mature understanding knows the natural and probable consequences of his acts. Therefore, if a person does an act, knowing what its natural and probable consequences will be, then he is presumed to have intended, by that act, to give rise to those consequences.[87] The degree of guilt depends upon intention, and the intention to be inferred, must be gathered from the facts proved. Sometimes, an act is committed which would not, in an ordinary case, inflict injury sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, but which, the offender knows, is likely to cause death. Proof of such knowledge throws light upon his intention.[88]

46. Presumption Regarding Intention

The intention is to be judged by his acts in relation to the surrounding circumstances.[89] The presumption of intention must, therefore, depend upon the facts of each particular case,[90]e.g., when the accused inflicts an injury with a blunt weapon, he would be liable for an offence no more serious than one under s 325,[91] but, in drawing the presumption, the court must have regard to the common course of events.[92] In deciding the question of intention, therefore, the nature of the weapon used, the part of the body on which the blow is given, the force of the blow and its number are some of the factors which assume importance. Death from a blow or blows on the head with a heavy sharp-edged weapon is probably, as rule, associated by the villagers with breaking of the skull, but the ignorance of the actual cause, which will bring about the victim's death as a result of the blow or blows, cannot affect the question of the striker's intention. The fact, that the accused went on striking shows unmistakably that he intended to cause bodily injury and that the bodily injury, intended to be caused, was sufficient to end fatally.[93] Where there was nothing more than a fatal result to indicate an intention to cause death, etc., and where no weapons had been used, it was held unsafe to convict the accused of murder.[94]

47. Presumption Regarding Knowledge

The fact that knowledge of wrongful act is accompanied by indifference, whether death or serious injury is caused, or even by a wish that it may not be caused, makes no difference.[95] In a case of snake-bite, two snake-charmers were giving a performance before a crowd and put a snake on a boy's head. The boy tried to push2120 away the snake and was bitten on the hand with the result that he died. It was held that the snake-charmers did not think that the snake would bite the boy, but nevertheless their act was done with the knowledge that it was likely to cause death, thought not with the knowledge that it was so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death. The accused were, therefore, convicted of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[1]Where the accused armed with a bow and arrow chased his deceased wife and while running shot an arrow at a distance of 80 feet causing injury to her resulting in her death. It is not possible to say that he inflicted injury with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, however, the accused who is familiar with the weapon must necessary have known that by shooting an arrow from a bow at such a distance there is every likelihood of the arrow piercing a vital part of the body and likelihood of causing death, it was held that accused's act attracted the last clause of s 299, punishable under Pt II of s 304, IPC .[2] Where altercation and fight took place between the accused and deceased and during the same the accused took out a knife from his trousers and inflicted a blow with it on the chest of the deceased, the death of the deceased was not instantaneous, the knife used resembled only a pen-knife, no second injury with a knife was caused, it was held that accused had not intended to kill the deceased and the offence will fall within the ambit of Pt I of s 304 and not under s 300, IPC .[3]

48. Death Caused by a Person under Voluntary Intoxication

Voluntary intoxication, while it affords no ground of exemption from liability for causing, whilst under its influence, the death of another (s 85), may render the offence culpable homicide, and not murder.[4]

49. Death as an Accidental Consequence

To cause death by an act, which is not likely to cause death, does not amount to culpable homicide, ie, death as an accidental consequence of a man's conduct does not render that conduct culpable homicide.[5]

Illustrations

(i) A is working with a hatchet, the head of which flies off and kills B on the spot. A is not liable.
(ii) A, an officer of a ship, whilst superintending its unloading by coolies, strikes at B, a cooly, with a light stick. To avoid the blow, B springs to one side, slips, falls overboard, and is drowned. A, though guilty of an assault, is not guilty of culpable homicide.

Section 299 and illust (c), IPC, do away with the distinction between accidental death caused by an unlawful act. Under the IPC, a person, who, whilst doing a lawful act, kills another accidentally, is exempted under s 80, and if the act is an unlawful one,2121 still he has not committed culpable homicide because intention or knowledge, in reference to the death, is, by force of s 299, essential to this offence.[6]

50. Numerous Injuries

Although, in a given case, the number of injuries on the person of the deceased may not be the determinative factor, the same, however, is relevant.[7] The number of injuries is always not determinative of the offence. It would depend on the weapon used, place where the injuries were inflicted and the nature of the injuries.[8]

Where the injuries inflicted were numerous, but no bones were broken and none of the injuries individually amounted to more than a simple hurt and they were mostly on the legs and arms, it was held that no intention to cause death could be inferred and the assailants could only be deemed to have known that, by the beating, which they gave, they were likely to cause the victim's death.[9] Where seven accused inflicted

24 injuries on the deceased, about 20 of which being inflicted after the deceased had fallen down and was unconscious, it was observed that it showed that they certainly beat him with the intention of causing such bodily injuries as were likely to cause his or with the knowledge that, by such acts, they were likely to cause his death. In these circumstances, all the accused were held guilty of an offence of culpable homicide punishable under s 304, IPC .[10] However, when three persons set to work to beat a fourth with sticks, the blows being directed at the head of that fourth, they must be fixed with the knowledge that they were likely to cause death.[11]

Where the number of injuries found on the dead persons were many and the accused persons were not justified in causing so many injuries so to have exceeded the right of private defence, their conviction under s 304 Pt I, was found proper.[12] Where the accused party entered the house of the complainant party and assaulted them with lathis resulting into death of the deceased, the number and nature of injuries received by each party pointed out that accused were aggressors.[13]

51. Single Blow Causing Death

In Zahid Khan v Emperor , a Division Bench of the Oudh Chief Court observed:

> Where death has been caused by a single blow with a lathi and the other injuries, found on the body of the deceased, do not indicate a determination to beat the deceased to death, such as is indicated in many cases, it is not possible to hold that death was caused by doing an act with the intention of causing death or with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, but it may be held that death was caused by the2122 doing of an act with the knowledge that, by such act, the person, who did it, was likely to cause death.

A similar view was taken by the Bombay High Court in Sardarkhan Zahidkhan v Emperor ,[14] in which Beaman J observed:

> 'Where death is caused by a single blow, it is always much more difficult to be absolutely certain what degree of bodily injury the offender intended.'

Referring to this observation in Virsa Singh v State of Punjab ,[15] the Supreme Court observed:

> With due respect to the learned Judge, he has linked up the intent required with the seriousness of the injury, and that, as we have shown, is not what the section requires. The two matters are quite separate and distinct though the evidence about them may sometimes overlap. The question is not whether the prisoner intended to inflict a serious injury or a trivial one, but whether he intended to inflict the injury that is proved to be present. If he can show that he did not, or if the totality of the circumstances justify such an inference, then, of course, the intent, that the section requires, is not proved. But if there is nothing beyond the injury and the fact that the appellant inflicted it, the only possible inference is that he intended to inflict it. Whether he knew of its seriousness, or intended serious consequences, is neither here nor there. The question, so far as the intention is concerned, is not whether he intended to kill, or to inflict an injury of a particular degree of seriousness, but whether he intended to inflict the injury in question, and once the existence of the injury is proved, the intention to cause it will be presumed unless the evidence or the circumstances warrant an opposite conclusion. But whether the intention is there or not is one of fact, and not one of law. Whether the wound is serious or otherwise, and if serious, how serious, is a totally separate and distinct question and has nothing to do with the question whether the prisoner intended to inflict the injury in question.

In cases of single injury, the facts and circumstances of each case has to be taken into consideration before arriving at the conclusion whether the accused should be appropriately convicted under s 302, IPC or under s 304, Pt II, IPC . It cannot be laid down as a general principle that in no case of single blow or injury, accused cannot be convicted under s 302, IPC .[16]

Where accused caught hold of deceased while co-accused inflicted a knife-blow on him, accused was convicted under s 326 read with s 34 while the conviction of co-accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I, IPC .[17] Accused appellant gave a single lathi blow on the head of the accused, deceased was hospitalized and died after six days. Other co-accused had not given any blow, as such were acquitted by the courts below. There was no intention or pre-meditation in the mind of the accused appellant to inflict such injuries to the deceased as were likely to cause his death in the ordinary course of nature. Accused appellant was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[18]2123

Accused appellant gave knife blow on the vital part of the body of the deceased which proved fatal, he had concealed the knife. He was convicted under s 302, IPC .[19]

It cannot be laid down as a rule of universal application that whenever a single blow is given application of s 302 IPC is ruled out. It would depend upon several factors. In the present case the accused appellant A1 had stabbed the deceased with a dagger on his left chest causing death on the spot. Looking to the facts and circumstances of the case, the appellant A1 was convicted under s 304, Pt I and not under s 302 .[20]

Where the accused gave one single katari blow in a sudden quarrel on the head of the deceased[21] and where the accused stabbed the deceased with a knife on the spur of the moment[22] the conviction of the accused was altered from one under s 302, IPC, to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC . Where the accused, after an altercation, hit the deceased on the leg, above the ankle, with his dah with such force that he cut through the bones and the arteries and in consequence the man died four days later in hospital, the Rangoon High Court altered his conviction under s 302 to one under s 304 Pt I, observing:

> The intention, so far as I can see, of the appellant was to cut the deceased on the leg and the cut inflicted was quite low down near the ankle. A man, who directs a blow in this direction as a general result, would be a man who does not intend to cause injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death because most cuts on the leg are not injuries sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death. The blow was delivered with great force, perhaps we could say, and even residents in the jungle must be held to know that a violent blow of this nature with a formidable weapon is likely to cause death wherever the blow may fall, but I do not think that any intention, higher than this, can be imputed against the appellant.[23]

Where the accused inflicted only one pipe blow on the head of the deceased, the deceased was operated and died 10 days later due to septicemia and other complications that set in, the accused cannot be said to have intended to cause death for that particular injury, the conviction of accused therefore was altered from s 302 2124 to s 304, Pt II, IPC . When the injury caused by the musal on head of the deceased[24] revealed there was no previous enmity but trivial incidents caused hot exchange of words, s 304, Pt II and not s 302 is attracted.[25] Where the evidence on record disclosed that it was blunt side of the axe which was used for dealing blow on the deceased and there was only one blow on the head of the deceased which proved to be fatal, the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder was made out. The conviction of the accused under s 302 was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[26]

It cannot be said as a rule of universal application that whenever one blow is given s 302, IPC is ruled out. It would depend upon the facts of each case. The weapon used, size of the weapon, place where the assault took place, background facts leading to the assault, part of the body where the blow was given are some of the factors to be considered. In the present case only one blow with a small stick was inflicted and the place where the assault took place was dimly lit. Held case was covered by s 304, Pt I, and not s 302, IPC . Ten years rigorous imprisonment was imposed.[27]

Where a single blow by the accused caused death of the deceased after several days, the accused is liable under s 304, Pt II.[28] Where the accused inflicted only one injury on the abdomen of the deceased, the doctor opined that the complications may set in, in some cases and further opined that the complications may be after the injured is admitted in the hospital, in these circumstances it is difficult to hold that the accused intended to cause that particular injury, so cl (3) of s 300, is not attracted and the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[29] Where the death was caused by single blow with kassi (spade), there was no previous enmity between the accused and the deceased. The medical evidence showed that the kassi blow caused damage to the skull, it was held that the accused caused the death by doing an act with the knowledge that he was thereby likely to cause the death, his act therefore, would amount culpable homicide and not murder and would fall under s 304, Pt I, the conviction was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I, IPC .[30] Where a quarrel took place between the accused and the victim and the accused incensed by the situation, gave a blow with a stick, which fell on a vulnerable part of the victims body resulting in his death the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt II, IPC .[31] Where, accused shot only arrow at the deceased in the night hitting him in the stomach, the deceased died 5 days after the occurrence, the accused was held guilty under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302 .[32]

Where the manner in which a stab injury on the chest of deceased was given by the accused showed that the accused had not only the intention but also the knowledge that injury given was likely to cause death, the conviction of the accused was altered from that under s 302 to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[33] Accused inflicted knife blow on2125 the chest, vital part of body causing death of the deceased. He was convicted under s 302, IPC and not under s 325, IPC .[34]

Where death of the deceased was caused by a single blow by kassi (spade), medical evidence showed that the kassi blow caused damage to skull of the deceased, it can, therefore, be said that the accused caused the death by doing an act with the knowledge that he was thereby likely to cause death, his act, therefore, would amount to culpable homicide not amounting to murder and would fall under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[35]

However, no legal proposition can be laid down that wherever one blow by means of a lethal weapon or by a stabbing instrument is dealt on the person of the deceased, the case would not come within the purview of any of the clauses of s 300 defining murder and that the case would come invariably within the purview of s 304, Pt I or Pt II, IPC . Each case would depend upon facts and circumstances.[36] Accused assaulted with darat, an agricultural implement, on the back side of head of deceased, causing cut of skull, and death. Single injury was caused, but injury caused was imminently dangerous. Accused was convicted on the charge of murder.[37]

The appellants accused persons who had assembled outside the house of the deceased were taking drinks and causing nuisance. On objection raised by the landlords, appellant accused had inflicted single injury on head of the deceased who had intervened with blunt-side of the axe, also assaulted another person on head. Held, it was not a case of single injury, the appellant accused had participated in the entire incident. Accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[38]

52. Single Blow Causing Death in a Sudden Quarrel

When the incident took place at the spur of the moment without any intention, the accused had given only one blow in a sudden quarrel with the deceased, the order of the High Court acquitting him under s 302 and convicting him only under s 304, Pt I was held proper.[39] Where there was a sudden quarrel and the accused inflicted single lathi injury on the deceased, the occurrence happened unexpectedly in a spur of moment and in heat of passion of sudden quarrel and there was no pre-meditation, the conviction of the accused under s 302 was set aside and accused was convicted for the offence under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[40]

53. Single Blow Causing Death in Right of Private Defence

Where the dispute arose between the accused persons on one side and the deceased on the other over partition of the house in which they were living, the evidence showing that the deceased was angry enough, armed with gandala and opened attack2126 on two out of the three accused persons, there was every possibility for the accused to have apprehended sufficient danger to himself justifying his taking recourse to protecting himself, single blow inflicted in abdomen of the deceased by the accused snatching weapon from assailant was not excessive use of force in his right to self-defence. So, the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt I was set aside.[41]

54. Single Sickle Blow on Back of Deceased

On the date of the incident, all of a sudden altercation ensued between the appellant and deceased on the issue of payment of Rs.150/- as interest amount. There was no previous enmity between the appellant and the deceased. A single blow of sickle was inflicted by the appellant on the back of the deceased. In the opinion of doctor, injury Nos. 1 to 9 were in the nature of 'Ulcers' and indirect outcome of injury No. 10. The deceased died two years after the incident. The doctor opined that the deceased had not died due to direct result of injury No. 10 sustained by him. The conviction of the appellant under s 324, IPC was affirmed. In view of the mental agony and financial sufferings, the sentence of three years imposed by the High Court was reduced to the period already undergone.[42]

55. Single Gun Shot Injury on Waist

Appellant accused caused a single shot injury to the deceased on waist. The accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[43]

56. Single Lathi Blow Causing Death

A blow on the head with a lathi is certainly likely to cause death and the person, who inflicts a lathi blow on the head of another person, must be presumed to have the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. But it does not necessarily follow that a lathi blow on the head is always sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[44] Similarly, it cannot be accepted that whenever death is on account of a single blow, offence is one under s 304, and not s 302 .[45] It would depend upon weapon used, size of it in some cases, force with which blow was given, part of body it was given and several such relevant factors.[46] The nature of offence where there is a single injury could not be decided merely on the basis of a single injury and thus in a mechanical fashion. The nature of the offence would certainly depend upon the other attendant circumstances which would help the court to find definitely about the intention on the part of the accused. Such attendant circumstances could be very many, they being: (i) whether the act was pre-meditated; (ii) the nature of weapon used; (iii) the nature of assault on the accused. In the instant case the accused plunged the screw driver. When the screw driver was plunged into the vital part of the body of the deceased, it cut his liver and spleen, injury was 12 cm deep. This was a case where the act was done with intention of causing bodily injury2127 and the body injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, covered by "Thirdly" of s 300 of " Indian Penal Code ". The conviction of the accused under s 302 and not under s 304, Pt II, IPC was held proper.[47]

57. Single Blow by Bamboo

Where the appellant accused inflicted single blow with broken bamboo stick on the deceased caused death on the place of occurrence, he was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC and sentenced to five years rigorous imprisonment.[48]

58. Single Blow by Yoke

The accused and the deceased were on inimical terms. The accused gave single blow of yoke to the deceased in night, caused single injury which proved fatal. The accused appellant was convicted under s 304, Pt I.[49]

59. To Beat a Person after he has Fallen Down

To beat a person after he has fallen down does not necessarily prove the intention of causing his death. Certain factors will have to be considered, for instance, the number of blows, the nature of those blows, and the parts of the body on which those blows have been inflicted.[50] Where the assailants took undue advantage of the fact that the victim was not armed and gave several blows on his head with lathis and the beating continued even after the victim had fallen down, it was held that the accused were guilty of murder, and not of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[51] Where, even after the deceased fell down after receiving injuries, he was not spared but the accused, further assaulted him, such conduct of the accused is consistent with an intention to kill the deceased.[52] In such cases, the possibility of the accused causing injuries in exercise of private defence is ruled out.[53]

60. Strangulation

When a man kneels on the body of another and presses his throat with great violence, he knows that he is likely to cause death and if death results from strangulation, the knowledge merges into intention and he is guilty of murder under s 300, firstly, unless he can obtain the benefit of any of the exceptions to s 300 . However, where death was not due to strangulation, but no internal bleeding due to rupture of an enlarged spleen, it was held that the knowledge stopped short of intention and the offence committed was culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[54] Where, in a sudden unpremeditated attack, the accused seized hold of the deceased and strangled him to death, it was held that it could not be said that the injury, intended to be2128 inflicted, was sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, but the act of the accused was done with the knowledge that it was likely to cause death, and that he was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[55]

Under explanation (3) to s 299, IPC, it is necessary to prove not only that the child breathed and was, therefore, a living child, but also that it breathed after it had, wholly or partially emerged from its mother's womb. In the absence of definite proof of the child being alive and having breathed after it was born, the mother cannot be convicted of culpable homicide.[56] Immediately on delivery of a child, the mother suffers from a mental depression, verging on temporary insanity, and she may not be in a position to observe the condition of the child minutely at birth. So, unless it is otherwise proved beyond reasonable doubt that the child was born alive, it is unsafe to convict the accused (mother) of murder. The standard of proof should be commensurate with the gravity of the crime. In India, infanticide is included in murder.[57]

61. Dangerous Injuries

A person plunging a dangerous weapon, like a knife, into a vital part of the body, will be deemed to intend to cause such injury as, he knew, was likely to cause death.[58] A person, who voluntarily inflicts injury such as to endanger one's life, must always, except in the most extraordinary and exceptional circumstances, be taken to know that he is likely to cause death. If the victim is actually killed, the conviction, in such cases, should ordinarily be of the offence of culpable homicide.[59]

What is the injury intended to be inflicted by the accused can be ascertained, unless the accused admits that he intended to inflict a particular injury, only by the nature of the weapon or weapons used, by the seriousness of the injury caused, and by the parts of the body on which the wounds are inflicted. Whether such injuries are likely to cause death or are sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, would depend again on the different degrees of probability. If death is the most probable result, it would be murder.[60]When a grown-up person, in full possession of his senses, stabs another person on the stomach in the region of the umbilicus, inflicting a wound three inches long and causing the intestines to protrude through it, and that injury is found by medical officers to be a very serious injury with very little chance of survival, and when death also has occurred as a result of that injury, it would amount almost to judicial misconduct to hold that there was no intent on to cause such bodily injury as the assailant knew to be likely to cause the death of the victim of that he had no knowledge that his act was so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.[61]

62. Burn Injuries

By no stretch of imagination one can reasonably argue that an act of pouring kerosene on the body of a person and setting him on fire thus resulting into injuries to2129 the person would amount to an offence of simple injuries punishable under s 323, IPC .[62]Such an act of the accused even if done under the influence of liquor or in the state of complete drunkenness would rule out the possibility of the said accused while committing the offence being totally unoblivious of the fact that the act by itself was so imminently dangerous that it might, in all probability cause death of the deceased or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.[63]

Where the accused poured kerosene and set the victim ablaze by lighting a match stick, after having set the victim on fire, the accused poured water on her and also covered her with a chadar to put out the fire. The victim died 19-20 days after the incident. In these circumstances the accused may not have had the intention to commit murder but he certainly had the knowledge that by pouring kerosene oil on the victim and setting her ablaze could result in her death, so the accused was found liable under s 304 Pt II, IPC, and sentence and conviction under s 302, IPC was set aside.[64]

63. Fracture of Bones

One who inflicts injuries, which cause fracture of the skull, must be held guilty of the offence of murder because he must have intended the natural consequences of the act. A fracture of the skull, in the ordinary course of nature, would result in death. A person is also presumed to know that a fracture of the skull is likely to result in death.[65] When, however, the surrounding circumstances of a case do not warrant the suggestion of an intention to kill or to cause a fatal injury, the accused must, at least, be deemed to know that a blow on the head with a weapon like kulhari (axe) is likely to cause death.[66] Presumably, everybody knows that the abdomen is the most delicate and vulnerable part of the human body, and if a man, with that knowledge, kicks the abdomen with such violence as to cause fracture of two ribs and rupture of the spleen, which is normal, he should be presumed to have done so with the knowledge that he, by so kicking, is likely to cause death.[67]

64. Use of Firearms

Where it appeared that the accused fired a gunshot in a free fight suddenly under grave provocation where there was a free fight between the parties for quite sometime, the accused was held guilty under s 304, Pt II instead of s 302, IPC .[68] Where the death of the deceased wife was caused by a pistol-shot fired by her husband accused, the possibility of husband using firearm in a fit of rage owing to quarrel with the deceased could not be ruled out, the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I and was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[69]2130

65. Use of Knife/Katari

It must be assumed that a person, who goes armed with a stabbing weapon to assault another person, against whom he has a previous grudge, and actually strikes that person at a vital part of his body and causes his death, intends to cause such bodily injury, as is imminently dangerous to life, and must be held guilty of murder.[70] An injury, caused, by stabbing, with a knife, which is a lethal weapon, in the abdominal region with the result that the intestines emerge, is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, and whoever intentionally causes such an injury is guilty of murder.[71]

Where the accused gave one single katari blow in a sudden quarrel on the head of the deceased[72] and where the accused stabbed the deceased with knife in a spur of the moment[73] the conviction of the accused was altered from one under s 302, IPC to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .

66. Squeezing Testicles

In a case, the prisoner, by gripping and squeezing the testicles of the deceased, caused them to be much bruised and reduced them to a pulpy condition, thereby causing an injury to them which resulted in his death. It was held that death was a probable consequence of the prisoner's act and that she was guilty under s 304, IPC, of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[74] Where the accused seized the deceased by his testicles and squeezed them with considerable force and for a long time and the deceased, who was in a very unsound bodily condition, died from the shock of the pain, and the medical evidence showed that the injury, inflicted by the accused, would not, in normal conditions, have endangered the life of the deceased, it was held that the accused was guilty of causing only simple hurt.[75]

67. Use of Deadly or Dangerous Weapons

There is no such thing as a regular or ear-marked weapon for committing murder.[76] The implements used in carpentry are not readily such deadly weapons so as to cause, per se, any serious or a grievous hurt or injury to the victim.[77] Where a number of persons go armed with deadly weapons to attack a person or a party, it may be assumed, as a matter of common sense, that their common intention is at least to cause grievous hurt. If, in the course of the commission of that offence, death is caused, the persons, so attacking, will be guilty of an offence under s 302, IPC .[78] Thus, where a number of persons attacked another with sharp-edged weapons like kripans, with object of causing him serious injuries, it was held that they must have2131 known that one or other of those injuries might cause death and, therefore, they were liable for murder under s 302, by virtue of s 149 .[79]

Tyre lever has been held to be a dangerous weapon in State of Madhya Pradesh v Manzoor Hason ,[80] and it was observed that the question, whether to convict the accused under s 302 or under s 326, must be answered with regard to the nature of the weapon used.

68. Use of Heavy Weapons

In Karam v Empress ,[81] the prisoner, who had caused the death of his wife by striking her on the head with a wooden kharwanji in the course of a sudden quarrel, was held not to be guilty of murder, but only of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. It was observed that a single blow on the head with a kharwanji is not likely to cause the death of the person struck, nor can it be said that a person, who strikes another on the head with such a weapon, intends to cause death or such bodily injury as is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death. If, in such a case, death does occur as a result of the injury caused, the offence committed is not murder because none of the clauses to s 300, IPC, is applicable. If, however, a man, even in the course of a sudden quarrel, gives a terrific blow on the head of another with a weapon, like a heavy hammer or a heavy hatchet, and the result is that head bones are smashed to pieces, it must, on the principle that a man intends the natural consequences of his act, be held that he intended to cause such bodily injury as he knew was likely to cause death or that the injury intended to be inflicted was sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death. The offence, thus committed is, therefore, murder both under clauses secondly and thirdly to s 300, IPC, unless some exception to that section reduces it from murder to culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[82]

69. Use of an Axe

Even the most illiterate and ignorant person would realise that a savage blow with an axe in the region of the abdomen and spine is bound to cause death, or injury, which would result in death, and the person, who strikes such blows, must have either intended to cause death or cause such bodily injury as would, in the ordinary course of nature, result in death and, is therefore, guilty of murder.[83]

However, where the quarrel took place on the spur of the moment over a very trifling matter, there was no previous motive to cause murderous attack, the accused lost control over his temper and assaulted deceased with an axe, it could not be said that the accused had an intention to cause bodily injury and was likely to cause death or to cause death, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I,2132IPC .[84] Where the evidence on record disclosed that it was blunt side of the axe which was used for dealing blow on the deceased and there was only one blow on the head of the deceased which proved to be fatal, the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder was made out. The conviction of the accused under s 302 was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[85]

70. Use of Gandasa

The stomach is as vital a part of the human anatomy as the head, and to strike three or four blows with a heavy chopper or *gandasa*on the stomach of any human being, thereby injuring the intestines and the peritoneum and disembowelling that person, is an act which clearly shows that the assailant necessarily had the intention of causing such bodily injury as he knew was likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm is caused. There is no question of the amount of force used in striking the blow on the abdomen. The very fact, that such blows are inflicted on the abdomen with a heavy sharp cutting weapon like a gandasa or chopper, is sufficient to make manifest the intention of the assailant that he intended to cause such bodily injury as he knew was likely to cause the death of the victim.[86]

71. Use of Dagger

Appellant accused inflicted dagger blows on face, neck and hand of the deceased causing death. FIR was prompt, oral evidence and medical evidence, fully corroborated the prosecution case. Plea of the defence that there were several other persons of the name of the accused appellant as such the identity of the accused was not established was not supported by the evidence of other witnesses. Appellant accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[87]

72. Use of Kulhari

Any sane person must be presumed to know that a blow on the head with a weapon, like a kulhari is likely to cause death.[88]

73. Use of Spear

Prima facie, a man, who drives a spear into the stomach of another and causes that man's death, commits murder.[89] Injuries inflicted with a spear, are sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, or, at any rate, likely to cause death.[90]2133

74. Use of Scissors

The medical officer had found three incised wounds on the body of the deceased, which could be caused with a pair of scissors. There was evidence of the eye-witness that the accused appellant caused injuries by scissors on the deceased. Accused was convicted under ss 302, 307 / 34, IPC .[91]

Where the accused had given only one blow with a pair of scissors on the chest of the deceased causing death, it could be inferred that the accused had knowledge that an injury caused by such a weapon on the vital part of the body of the deceased would cause death. Conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II and ten years' rigorous imprisonment was imposed.[92]

75. Use of Stone

Eye-witnesses (PWs) deposed that the accused hit the deceased on the left side of the head with the stone and he rolled down. There was no material before the High Court to come to a conclusion that the death occurred due to fall. The High Court came to a peculiar finding that it might be possible that before the stone had hit the head of the deceased, he had slipped and had rolled down. Conviction under s 302, IPC recorded by trial court was restored.[93]

76. Use of Bow and Arrows

Where the accused shot only one arrow of the deceased in the night hitting him in the stomach, the deceased died 5 days after the occurrence, the accused was held guilty under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302 .[94]Where accused shot an arrow at a distance of 80 feet from the deceased wife who was being chased by the accused and both were running, it was held that accused's act attracted the last clause of s 299, punishable under s 304, Pt II of IPC .[95]

In a case of free fight the accused/appellant alongwith companions armed with bow and arrows encircled the deceased, the arrow shot by the accused hit the deceased on the chest who fell down, the accused took up a piece of stone and struck it on the head of the deceased as a result of which brain injury was caused. The High Court holding that there was a free fight convicted the accused for their individual acts and convicted accused/appellant under s 304, Pt II, IPC . The conviction was maintained by the Apex Court under s 304, Pt II, in an appeal filed by accused/appellant against the judgment of the High Court.[96] Where the fact situation showed that arrows were being shot from a distance, not with any accuracy and one of such arrows hit the deceased, as established by the evidence of eye-witnesses the accused had shot that arrow and there was no sudden quarrel, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I.[97]2134

77. Use of Cycle Chain

Where only one injury was caused by a cycle chain on the head of the deceased which was serious and other injuries were only bruises and abrasions though there was bitter enmity between two groups, only cycle chain and gloves were used, the conviction under ss 302 / 34, was altered to one under s 304, Pt II/ s 34, IPC .[1]

78. Use of Lathis/Sticks/Wooden Logs

A lathi cannot necessarily be considered an imminently dangerous weapon.[2] It (bamboo stick) is a lethal weapon. A person, who uses a lathi in assaulting another, must know that he is very likely to cause death.[3] Where the accused gave the deceased a terrific blow with a lathi on the head in consequence of which the skull got fractured like a coconut shell, and the unfortunate man died, it was held that ordinarily the only inference, that can be made, is that the person, who gave such a blow on the head, either intended to cause death or else intended to cause such bodily injury as would be sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[4] Where the accused gave two blows on the chest of the deceased with the stick resulting into his death having regard to the nature of the weapon used and on the parts of the body on which blows were dealt the conviction was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt II, IPC .[5] Appellant accused had nurtured grievance against the deceased, gave two or three stick blows on the head of the deceased. The deceased fell down, was admitted in the hospital where he was treated by several doctors and died after about forty days. Appellant accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[6]

The accused appellant picked up one gobbaly tree wood piece lying on the spot and hit on the head of the deceased, the post-mortem report stated that blow itself might have caused the death of the deceased, the accused appellant was convicted under s 302, IPC .[7]

Where the deceased having illicit relationship with the mother of the accused, he was also forcing the sister of the accused to have a relationship with him, the deceased picking up quarrel with the accused on the date of incident and attempting to cause injury to him, unable to bear the agony and ill-treatment meted out to his mother and sister and losing temper due to sudden provocation, the accused was beating the deceased to death with a stick, the accused acted on account of sustained provocation and was found liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt I.[8] Where the altercation took place between two parties, the accused gave a single lathi blow on the head of the deceased, an old man of 70 years who died 7 days after the incident, the doctor examining the deceased had admitted that at the old age of deceased a2135 fracture could be caused even by slight force used in inflicting a blow, on these facts intention to cause death or such bodily injury which was likely to cause death cannot be inferred, it cannot also be said that the accused knew that the blow he was giving could be so imminently dangerous that it must in all probabilities cause death, knowledge that the act was likely to cause death can only be inferred, therefore, the conviction of the accused under s 302 was altered to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[9] Where the appellant husband in a sudden quarrel after exchange of hot words picked up a wooden log in fit of anger and hit a single blow, on the head of the deceased wife causing death, the appellant accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I, and not under s 302, IPC .[10]

The injury attributed to the accused appellant on the person of the deceased was a very small abrasion.

The injury caused was a very small dimension and it was doubtful whether the injury could be caused with a lathi which the accused was said to be carrying, another accused placed in similar situation had been acquitted by the trial court, the accused was acquitted of the charge under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[11]

Appellant accused R was alleged to be armed with lathi. PWS did not state that the accused R had caused any lathi injury, no overt act was attributed to him. The appellant accused R was held entitled to benefit of doubt, was acquitted.[12]

79. Kicks and Blows

In a case, the accused kicked his wife on the side with such tremendous force that it caused practically her instant death. There was nothing to show that she was suffering from any disease. It was held that a man, who so kicks a prostrate woman on the side, must be credited with the knowledge that he is likely thereby to cause her death.[13] Where the accused went to the house of the deceased, caught hold of the deceased, hit him on cheek and neck, on sight that neighbours have come the accused stated that he would not leave the deceased alive and kicked him on the private parts, the deceased died due to neurogenic shock resulting from the injury to the private parts, the injury opined by the doctor to be sufficient to cause immediate death, the statement of the accused followed by the kick shows that he had knowledge that it was likely to cause death. On these facts, it was held that the conviction of the accused could only be for murder. The trial court convicted him under s 304, Pt II. The High Court in appeal should not have interfered with the conviction and altered it to s 323, IPC . Hence, the Supreme Court altered the conviction of the accused from s 323 to s 304 .[14] Where the statement in FIR by the interested eye-witnesses that the deceased was beaten by kicks and fists by the co-accused, however, in the statement on oath in the court, it was stated that the co-accused had caught hold of victim when the accused inflicted knife blows and also inflicted injuries by lathi, the contradictory2136 statements of the witnesses cannot be relied on. So, the co-accused was found entitled to be acquitted.[15]

Where the accused assaulted the deceased by means of fists and legs by throwing him on ground and injuries received on head caused his death, conviction of the accused under s 304 is was found proper.[16]

80. Throttling

The accused caused death of his mother by throttling, the incident happened on mother trying to advice his son (accused) that he should not treat his wife cruelly. The conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to conviction under s 304, Pt I.[17]

81. Woman Jumping into well with her Child

Where a girl of 17 years of age being tired of her husband's ill-treatment attempted to commit suicide by jumping in a well with child on her neck and she jumped with the child and the child died of the jump though survived, the conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 334A, IPC . The court was further pleased reduce the sentence to six months simple imprisonment to run concurrently with the instance under s 309, IPC .[18]

In a case of Emperor v Dhirajia [19] where a young woman with her baby in her arms had jumped or fallen down in a well, it was observed that in order to possess and to form an intention, there must be a capacity for reason. And when by some extraneous force the capacity for reason has been listed, the capacity to form an intention must have been unseated too. But knowledge stands upon a different footing. Some degree of knowledge must be attributed to every sane person. Obviously the degree of knowledge which any particular person can be assumed to possess must vary. The act done with knowledge of consequences is not *prima facie*a murder, it becomes murder only in the absence of excuse. Ill-treated wife leaving home without knowledge of her husband where husband following her, wife getting into panic and throwing herself with body in her arms into an open well, the evidence was held to be culpable homicide not amounting to murder. It was further observed that the offence did not amount to an attempt to commit suicide. Where an act of the accused in jumping into the well with her children was clearly one made by her knowing that it must in all probability cause the death of her children. She had no excuse for incurring the risk of causing the death of her children. The face that there were quarrels between her and her sister-in-law and that her life had become unbearable on account of this family discord could not be regarded as a valid justification.[20]

Where the accused appellant, wife of a rickshaw-puller who used to ill-treat her, jumped into the well with her two sons. It was observed that under the cl 4 of2137 s 300, culpable homicide is murder if the person committing the act knows that it is so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability, cause death, or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, and commit such act without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. In the circumstances the constant ill-treatment to which the accused appellant was subjected at the hands of her husband could not furnish such an excuse.[21]

Where there was no evidence as to how exactly the accused who was suffering from chronic and incurable illness fell into the well at midnight along with her child aged one and a half years. The child was also suffering from rickets prior to his death. It was observed that it may be possible to hold that the accused attempted to commit suicide by jumping along with her child. However, in absence of any evidence clearly indicating as to exactly how they fell into the well, it would be wrong to play on the termination and hold the accused guilty under s 309 or s 302 and exclude the operation of s 84, IPC .[22] Where the accused attempted to end her life by jumping into a well alongwith her female child in her lap, the life of the female child was lost in the incident, the mental condition of accused at the time of the incident was not normal as she was suffering from illness of tuberculosis coupled with severe stomach pain, the accused was in full senses when she was brought out of the well and had narrated to the witnesses the reason justifying her act, the case was not found fit to be covered for the purposes of plea of insanity available under s 84, IPC, the act was done by the accused with the knowledge of consequences so offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder was made out, hence, conviction of the accused under s 302 was altered to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[23]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 300.

Murder.--

Except in the cases hereinafter excepted, culpable homicide is murder, if the act by which the death is caused is done with the intention of causing death, or--

Secondly.--If it is done with the intention of causing such bodily injury as the offender knows to be likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm is caused, or

Thirdly.--If it is done with the intention of causing bodily injury to any person and the bodily injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, or Fourthly.--If the person committing the act knows that it is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, and commits such act without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing death or such injury as aforesaid.

Illustrations

(a) A shoots Z with the intention of killing him. Z dies in consequence. A commits murder.2138

(b) A, knowing that Z is labouring under such a disease that a blow is likely to cause his death, strikes him with the intention of causing bodily injury. Z dies in consequence of the blow. A is guilty of murder, although the blow might not have been sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause the death of a person in a sound state of health. But if A, not knowing that Z is labouring under any disease, gives him such a blow as would not in the ordinary course of nature kill a person in a sound state of health, here A, although he may intend to cause bodily injury, is not guilty of murder, if he did not intend to cause death, or such bodily injury as in the ordinary course of nature would cause death.

(c) A intentionally gives Z a sword-cut or club-wound sufficient to cause the death of a man in the ordinary course of nature. Z dies in consequence. Here, A is guilty of murder, although he may not have intended to cause Z's death.

(d) A without any excuse fires a loaded canon into a crowd of persons and kills one of them. A is guilty of murder, although he may not have had a premeditated design to kill any particular individual.

Exception 1.--When culpable homicide is not murder.--Culpable homicide is not murder if the offender, whilst deprived of the power of self-control by grave and sudden provocation, causes the death of the person who gave the provocation or causes the death of any other person by mistake or accident.

The above exception is subject to the following provisos:--

First.--That the provocation is not sought or voluntarily provoked by the offender as an excuse for killing or doing harm to any person.

Secondly.--That the provocation is not given by anything done in obedience to the law, or by a public servant in the lawful exercise of the powers of such public servant.

Thirdly.--That the provocation is not given by anything done in the lawful exercise of the right of private defence.

Explanation.--Whether the provocation was grave and sudden enough to prevent the offence from amounting to murder is a question of fact.

Illustrations

(a) A, under the influence of passion excited by a provocation given by Z, intentionally kills Y, Z's child. This is murder, inasmuch as the provocation was not given by the child, and the death of the child was not caused by accident or misfortune in doing an act caused by the provocation.

(b) Y gives grave and sudden provocation to A. A, on this provocation, fires a pistol at Y, neither intending nor knowing himself to be likely to kill Z, who is near him, but out of sight. A kills Z. Here A has not committed murder, but merely culpable homicide.

(c) A is lawfully arrested by Z, a bailiff. A is excited to sudden and violent passion by the arrest, and kills Z. This is murder, inasmuch as the provocation was given by a thing done by a public servant in the exercise of his powers.

(d) A appears as a witness before Z, a Magistrate. Z says that he does not believe a word of A's deposition, and that A has perjured himself. A is moved to sudden passion by these words, and kills Z. This is murder.2139

(e) A attempts to pull Z's nose. Z, in the exercise of the right of private defence, lays hold of A to prevent him from doing so. A is moved to sudden and violent passion in consequence and kills Z. This is murder, inasmuch as the provocation was given by a thing done in the exercise of the right of private defence.

(f) Z strikes B. B is by this provocation excited to violent rage. A, a bystander, intending to take advantage of B's rage, and to cause him to kill Z, puts a knife into B's hand for that purpose. B kills Z with the knife. Here B may have committed only culpable homicide, but A is guilty of murder.

Exception 2.--Culpable homicide is not murder if the offender, in the exercise in good faith of the right of private defence of person or property, exceeds the power given to him by law and causes the death of the person against whom he is exercising such right of defence without premeditation, and without any intention of doing more harm than is necessary for the purpose of such defence.

Illustration

Z attempts to horsewhip A, not in such a manner as to cause grievous hurt to A. A draws out a pistol. Z persists in the assault. A, believing in good faith that he can by no other means prevent himself from being horsewhipped, shoots Z dead. A has not committed murder, but only culpable homicide.

Exception 3.--Culpable homicide is not murder if the offender, being a public servant, or aiding a public servant acting for the advancement of public justice, exceeds the powers, given to him by law, and causes death by doing an act which he, in good faith, believes to be lawful and necessary for the due discharge of his duty as such public servant and without ill-will towards the person whose death is caused.

Exception 4.--Culpable homicide is not murder if it is committed without premeditation in a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel and without the offenders having taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner.

Explanation.--It is immaterial in such cases which party offers the provocation or commits the first assault.

Exception 5.--Culpable homicide is not murder when the person whose death is caused, being above the age of eighteen years, suffers death or takes the risk of death with his own consent.

Illustration

A, by instigation, voluntarily causes Z, a person under eighteen years of age, to commit suicide. Here, on account of Z's youth, he was incapable of giving consent to his own death; A has therefore, abetted murder.21402141

Comments

1. Scope

The nature of culpable homicide having been explained in s 299, IPC, this section sets out the circumstances when culpable homicide turns into 'murder' which is only an aggravated form of culpable homicide.[24]Section 300, IPC, is not attracted in the absence of any intention, on the part of the accused, to cause death of the deceased, particularly when he (i.e. accused) first gives lathi blows on non-vital parts of body of the deceased.[25] Therefore, unless the cause is brought within any of the five exceptions to this section, culpable homicide will be murder; but despite the fact that none of the exceptions has been pleaded, the prosecution is bound to bring the cause under any of the four clauses of this section.[26] The prosecution has to prove in every case of culpable homicide to attract the provisions of s 300, IPC, that, the act by which the death was caused was done (i) with the intention of causing death, or (ii) with the intention of causing such bodily injury which the offender knows to be likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm is caused, or (iii) with the intention of causing bodily injury to any person and the bodily injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, or (iv) with the knowledge that the act is so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death and without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing death.[27]

The section, defines as to what must be proved to establish a prima facie murder unless any of the mitigating circumstances, set out in the five exceptions, applies. If any of them applies, the prima facie presumption, that the offence is murder, is removed and the offence becomes 'culpable homicide not amounting to murder'.[28] It must, however, be noted that the exceptions, carved out under this section for mitigating the crime, would be inapplicable to a murder, committed in the course of the offence of dacoity, because the word 'murder', as used in s 396, is not the same thing as 'murder' defined in this section.[29]

2. English Law

To establish a case of murder the prosecution must prove: (1) that the unlawful death of the victim was caused by an act or omission of the defendant; and (2) that the defendant did that act or omitted to act with 'malice aforethought', express or implied. The burden of proof remains, throughout, on the prosecution and, apart from the special defences of insanity and diminished responsibility and the anomalous2142 case of suicide pacts, it is at no time incumbent upon the defendant to establish any other defence, or partial defence, to the charge. The mental element of murder, traditionally called 'malice aforethought', may take the form of 'an intention unlawfully to kill (express malice)' or 'an intention unlawfully to cause grievous bodily harm (implied malice)'. Therefore, 'intent' is the essential element in both forms of 'malice aforethought'.

Further, it has been held by the Supreme Court of United Kingdom that: 'Both parties in gunfight guilty of murder of bystander killed by stray bullet; guilt was result of either combination of common law principles relating to aiding and abetting and doctrine of transferred malice operated, or conclusion that both parties were principals to joint enterprise to engage in unlawful violence with intent to cause death or serious injury.'[30] It has also been held that, 'The public interest in the administration of justice is best served if in any trial on indictment the trial judge leaves to the jury, subject to any appropriate caution or warning but irrespective of the wishes of trial counsel, any obvious alternative offence which there was evidence to support: thus on a charge of murder it is in the interests of justice that a judge direct a jury as to manslaughter, as an alternative to murder.'[31]

3. Canadian Law

Under the Canadian law, 'Murder' is one of the three forms of culpable homicide: murder, manslaughter or infanticide. Further, it is an indictable offence to commit first degree murder or second degree murder..

Actus Reus

A person commits homicide when, directly or indirectly, by any means, he or she causes the death of a human being. There are two kinds of homicide: 'culpable' and 'non-culpable' homicide. 'Non-culpable' homicide is not an offence. Culpable homicide means to cause another person's death by:

- an unlawful act,
- criminal negligence,
- causing, by threats or fear of violence or by deception, the deceased to do anything that causes death, or

- wilfully frightening a child or sick person so as to cause death.

The test for 'death' is not 'brain death' but organ death i.e. to see whether or not the deceased's vital organs, including the heart, continue to operate. Where a person, by an act or omission, does anything that results in the death of another person, he is deemed to cause the death, notwithstanding that death from such cause might have been prevented by resorting to proper means. Where a person causes a bodily injury to another person, which itself is of a dangerous nature and from which death results, he is deemed to have caused the death, notwithstanding whether the immediate cause of death is proper or improper treatment that is applied in good faith. Where a person causes a bodily injury to another person resulting in death, he is deemed to have caused the death notwithstanding that the effect of the bodily injury is only to accelerate the death from a disease or disorder arising from some other cause.2143

These situations are fact-specific, and the trial judge is obliged to give the jury a clear and specific instruction with respect to intervening events. Where an intervening faulty CPR procedure appeared on the evidence to be the cause of death, it was critical that the jury understood their obligation to consider whether or not any independent, intervening and therefore, exculpatory factors occurred after the accused's acts, thereby severing the link in the chain that tied them to the death. The decision of treating physicians to pursue a conservative, non-interventionist treatment of the 77 year old man who had been shot, in view of his age and health, could not exculpate the accused, when the man died three weeks later. Organs such as kidneys may be removed for transplantation purposes before a mortally injured person is pronounced dead.

Causation

The applicable standard for causation in relation to all homicide cases (with one exception for first-degree murder) is a 'significant contributing cause'. This is constitutionally valid. No person commits culpable homicide where he causes the death of a human being by any influence on the mind alone or by any disorder or disease resulting from influence on the mind alone. However, causing the death of a child or sick person by wilfully frightening him or her may constitute culpable homicide. No conviction lay where the deceased died from acute heart failure caused by stress resulting from the accused's break-in and subsequent struggle.

Mens Rea

Culpable homicide is murder in the following circumstances:

- Intent to kill.

  The accused causes death with one of the specified intentions required for murder i.e., the accused means to cause the deceased's death.
- Intent to cause bodily harm, likely to cause death, and is reckless as to whether death ensues or not.

  In the absence of the intent to kill, murder requires the death of a human being by bodily harm of a sufficient gravity such that it is likely to cause death. Since death has in fact resulted, this requirement will generally, however illogically, operate except in cases where the bodily harm actually inflicted only caused death because of some unusual or unexpected chain of circumstances. Then the argument will remain plausible that the bodily harm intended by the accused was not in fact likely to cause death. The required accompanying mental elements are threefold: the intention to cause that bodily harm which is likely to cause death, the knowledge that the intended bodily harm is likely to cause death and recklessness as to whether death ensues or not. In the first element, the accused must foresee a likelihood of death flowing from the bodily harm she or he is intentionally causing the victim, therefore foresight of a mere danger of death is not sufficient. The element 'likely' in the mens rea of murder in s 229(a)(ii) means 'a substantial degree of probability'. Recklessness requires advertence to the prohibited consequence and the conscious running of that risk. It is now clear that recklessness requires advertence to the probability (likelihood) of the prohibited consequence and not merely the possibility thereof.2144

- o Unintended deceased.

  The accused would otherwise be guilty of murder in respect of an intended target, but happens to kill the wrong person. This is 'the doctrine of transferred intent' where the mental element is simply 'transferred' from the intended target to the actual deceased. Even in a case of transferred intent, the accused at the time of the act that kills the deceased must have the specific requisite intent in relation to the intended target. The 'transferred intent doctrine' has no application where the accused intends to commit suicide but inadvertently kills another.
- o No intent to kill, but death likely.

  The accused is engaged in an unlawful object and foresight of death becomes sufficient mens rea. The objective liability phrase 'ought to know' in the Code as written is constitutionally invalid under s 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and should be read out of the section. Thus, murder is made out upon simple foresight of the likelihood of death where the accused acts for 'an unlawful object'. In other words, the mental elements 'intent to cause bodily harm' and 'recklessness as to whether death ensues or not' are replaced by 'unlawful purpose'. The fact that the accused acts for an unlawful purpose is viewed as sufficiently equivalent in regard to culpability to justify discarding the other mental requirements since the accused is still required to have a foresight of likelihood of death. Thus, the section as read down is constitutional. There are three components under s 229(c) : an unlawful object ('for an unlawful object'); a dangerous act ('does anything that he knows is likely to cause death and thereby causes death to a human being'); and knowledge or foresight of; likelihood of death ('that he knows is likely to cause death'). A gang member who is prepared to engage in a shootout on a public street with an opposing gang can be liable for murder when an innocent bystander is shot to death.
- o Murder in commission of specified offences.

  This applies where the accused is engaged in one of the specified offences and the intentional use of bodily harm in aid thereof or in aid of his escape causes death. The specified offences are: committing or attempting to commit high treason or treason, or sabotage, piratical acts, hijacking an aircraft, escape or rescue from prison or lawful custody, assaulting a peace officer, sexual assault, sexual assault with a weapon, threats to a third party or causing bodily harm, aggravated sexual assault, kidnapping and forcible confinement, hostage taking, robbery, breaking and entering, and arson. As the offence is written in the Code, the accused may be convicted whether or not he or she means to cause death to any human being and whether or not he knows that death is likely to be caused to any human being, if the accused either meant to cause bodily harm, administer a stupefying or overpowering thing or wilfully stops the breath of a human being, for the purpose of facilitating either the commission of the offence or his flight after committing or attempting to commit the offence, and the death ensues from the bodily harm, the accused for the purposes of flight, and the death ensues therefrom. This offence is unconstitutional, as the minimum constitutionally acceptable mens rea for murder is at least foresight of death and the provisions of this section fail to comply with that consideration.2145

While there must be concurrence of the mens rea and actus reus, the two elements need not be completely co-extensive. If death results after a series of wrongful acts that are part of a single transaction, so long as the requisite mental state coincides at some point with the wrongful acts, it will be sufficient to constitute the offence.

If A assaults B, leaving him unconscious on the floor of a building in which the assault occurred and before B regains consciousness he is killed when the building collapses in a sudden earthquake, A cannot be held criminally responsible for the homicide. The law would attribute B's death to another intervening cause and not to A's assault even though B would not have been in the building but for the force of A's blow that rendered him unconscious. The assault was the reason that B was there but the blow was not the cause of the man's death.[32]

The transfer of intent applies equally to the elements of planned and deliberate action. If the accused intends to kill one person or himself or intends to cause serious bodily harm to one person or to himself knowing that he is likely to cause death, and he deliberately formulates a plan to carry out that act, but in so doing accidentally or mistakenly kills someone else, then he is still guilty of first degree murder regarding that killing.[33]

4. Essentials of Murder

Except in cases covered by the five exceptions mentioned in s 300 of the IPC, culpable homicide is murder if the act by which the death is caused is done with the intention of causing death, or if the act falls within any of the 3 clauses of s 300, namely, secondly, thirdly and fourthly.[34] In order that culpable homicide may amount to a murder, as enunciated in this section, the following two things are essential:

(1) The killing must be accompanied by the intention or knowledge, specified in this section. Culpable homicide is not prime facie murder. It lies on the prosecution to prove the requisite intention or knowledge.[35] If the prosecution fails to do this, but the intention or knowledge, requisite under s 299, is established, then the accused is guilty only of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[36]

Further, 'intent' and 'knowledge' postulate the existence of positive mental attitude and this mental condition is the special mens rea which is necessary for the offence.[37]

(2) The killing must not fall within one or other of the five exceptions, specified in this section. If it does, the accused is again guilty only of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[38]2146

5. Crucial Question

The crucial question is as to which was the appropriate provision to be applied. In the scheme of the IPC, 'culpable homicide' is 'genus' and 'murder' its 'specie'. All 'murder' is 'culpable homicide', but not vice-versa. Speaking generally, 'culpable homicide' sans 'special characteristics of murder' is culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[39]

6. Court's Approach in Four Stages

The proper way, in which a court should approach the facts and apply the law in cases where one person has, by doing an act, caused the death of another person, may be expressed in stages as follows:

First Stage

It should first be established, to the satisfaction of the court, that the accused person has done an act by doing which he has caused the death of another person, i.e., there must be a relation between the act, done by the accused, and the death of the victim of the offence.

Second Stage

The court must next consider whether that act on the part of the accused amounts to culpable homicide, i.e., whether the act of the accused comes within the purview of s 299, IPC .

Third Stage

If it is established that the act, which caused the death, was done, whether with one of the two intentions, or with the knowledge necessary to cause that act to amount to culpable homicide, then, and then only, s 300, IPC comes into operation and, therefore, the next thing to do is to ascertain whether such act was done either (1) with one of the three intentions, that is to say, with the intention of causing either (i) death, or (ii) such bodily injury as the offender knew to be likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm was caused, or (iii) such bodily injury as was sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death; or (2) (i) with the knowledge that the act was so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause either (a) death or (b) such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, and (ii) without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing either (a) death or (b) such bodily injury as was likely to cause death.

Fourth Stage

If it has been proved that the act either (a) was done by the accused with the intention of causing death, or (b) it fulfilled one of the other requirements of s 299, IPC and also fulfilled one of the requirements of s 300, IPC, then, it must further be considered whether, on the facts of the particular case, the culpable homicide is brought down from the higher plane of murder, to the lower plane of culpable2147 homicide not amounting to murder, by reason of the act having been done, either (a) in an excessive, but bona fide, exercise of the right of private defence, or (b) whilst the accused was deprived of the power of self-control, by grave and sudden provocation, or (c) in sudden fight in the heat of passion, or (d) in such circumstances as are mentioned in either exception 3 or exception 4 in s 300 . If culpable homicide is not amounting to murder, the only matter to be considered at the fourth stage is whether the accused has established (if such is his case) the right of private defence as a complete defence under s 96 .[40]

7. 'Murder' Distinguished from 'Culpable Homicide'

The distinction between murder and culpable homicide not amounting to murder is often lost sight of, resulting in undue liberality in favour of undeserving culprits like police officers.[41] Two offences involve the killing of a person, viz, the offence of 'culpable homicide' and the more heinous offence of 'murder'. What distinguishes these two offences is the presence of a special mens rea, which consists of four mental attitudes, in the presence of any of which the lesser offence becomes the greater. These four mental attitudes are stated in s 300 and they distinguish murder from culpable homicide. Unless the offence can be said to involve, at least, one such mental attitude, it cannot be murder.[42] The distinction between the offences of culpable homicide and murder is the presence of special mens rea which consists of four mental attitudes in the presence of any of which the lesser offence becomes greater. These attitudes are stated in s 300, IPC, as distinguishing murder from culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[43] In considering whether the offence is murder or culpable homicide not amounting to murder, the manner of causing injuries to the victim by accused persons as deposed by the prosecution witness, nature of injuries caused to the victim, part of the body where accused person/persons caused injuries to the victim, the weapon/weapons used in the commission of crime and conduct of the offender/offenders are to be taken into account.[44]

An injury 'likely to cause death', within the meaning of s 299(2) may, or may not, fall within the descriptions, mentioned in cll (2) and (3) of s 300, which both clauses together do not equal culpable homicide in s 299(2) .[45] The offence will amount to murder if the conditions, laid down in any one, or more, of the four clauses of s 300, are satisfied. If the offence comes under s 299, or under one, or other, of the exceptions to s 300, it will be culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[46]If an act is done with the knowledge that the doer is likely by such act to cause death, the offence is culpable homicide unless the act done is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death2148 and is committed without any excuse, in which case the offence is murder. If the act is done with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, the offence is culpable homicide unless the offender knows that the act done is likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm is caused or if the bodily injury is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[47] The degree of knowledge is a question of fact.[48] Putting it shortly, culpable homicide, as defined under s 299, does not amount to murder (a) where, though the evidence is sufficient to constitute murder, one or more of the exceptions to s 300 apply, or (b) where the degree of mens rea, specified under s 299, is present, but not the special degrees referred to by s 300 .[49] To render culpable homicide murder, the case must come within the provisions of cl (1), or (2), or (3), or (4), of s 300 .[50]

8. Culpable Homicide is Genus and Murder its Specie--Three Degrees of Culpable Homicide

In the scheme of the IPC, 'culpable homicide' is genus and 'murder' its specie. All 'murder' is culpable homicide, but not vice-versa. Speaking generally, 'culpable homicide' sans 'special characteristics of murder' is culpable homicide not amounting to murder. For purposes of fixing punishment, proportionate to the gravity of this offence, IPC practically recognises three degrees of culpable homicide.[51] The first is what may be called 'culpable homicide of the first degree'. This is the gravest form of culpable homicide which is defined in s 300 as 'murder'. The second may be termed as 'culpable homicide of the second degree'. This is punishable under the first part of s 304 . And then, there is 'culpable homicide of the third degree'. This is the lowest type of culpable homicide and the punishment, provided for it, is also the lowest among punishments provided for the three grades. Culpable homicide of this degree is punishable under the second part of s 304 .[52]

9. Tabular Comparison of Culpable Homicide and Murder

The terms of ss 299 and 300 are almost identical as readily appears from the following tabular comparison:[53]2149

Section 299	Section 300
A person commits culpable homicide if the act, by which the death is caused, is done--	Subject to certain exceptions, culpable homicide is murder if the act by which the death is caused, is done--
Intention
(a) with the intention of causing death; or	(1) with the intention of causing death; or
(b) with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death; or	(2) with the intention of causing such bodily injury as the offender knows to be likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm is caused; or
	(3) with the intention of causing bodily injury to any person and the bodily injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death; or
Knowledge
(c) with the knowledge that the act is likely to cause death	(4) with the knowledge that the act is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, and without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing death or such injury as is mentioned above.

On a glance of the above table, it will be noticed that not only the actus reus, but also the mental elements of intention or knowledge, required by the two sections, are the same and the only distinction between the offences lies in the degree of risk to human life which the offender intends or knows. If death is a likely result, it is culpable homicide; if it is the most probable result, it is murder.[54]

10. Court to Focus on Keywords used in Sections 299 and 300

The academic distinction between 'murder' and 'culpable homicide not amounting to murder' has always vexed the courts. The confusion is caused, if courts losing sight of the true scope and meaning of the terms used by the legislature in these sections, allow themselves to be drawn into minute abstractions. The safest way of approach to2150 the interpretation and application of these provisions seems to be to keep in focus the keywords used in the various clauses of ss 299 and 300 .[55]

11. Section 299,Section 300 and Section 304A

Commentary under the same heading in s 299, ante and commentary under s 304A, post, may be referred to.

The cases in which death of the victim is caused by the accused with the intention or knowledge to kill are either covered under culpable homicide as defined under s 299, IPC, and made punishable under s 304, IPC, or murder as defined in s 300, IPC and made punishable under s 302, IPC . The essentials of s 299, IPC, are given in synopsis note 5 of s 299, IPC, and that of s 300, IPC, are given in synopsis note 4 of that section and their distinctions in the last synopsis. There is another category of cases in which the death of the victim is caused by the accused on account of his rash or negligent act. There cases are covered under s 304A, IPC .

The provisions of s 304A, IPC apply to cases where there is no intention to cause death and no knowledge that the act done in all probabilities will cause death. Therefore, this provision is directed at offences outside the range of ss 299 and 300, IPC and obviously contemplates those cases into which neither intention, nor knowledge enters. The words 'not amounting to culpable homicide' in the section are very significant and it must therefore be understood that intentionally or knowingly inflicted injury or violence directly and wilfully caused is excluded. The section applies only to such acts which are rash or negligent and are directly the cause of death of another person. In other words, a rash act is primarily an over hasty act as opposed to a deliberate act, but done without due care and caution. Then the question of whether the conduct of the accused amounted to culpable rashness or negligence depends on the amount of care and circumspection which a prudent and reasonable man would consider fit to be sufficient and this depends on the circumstances in each case.[56]

In Sadhu Singh Harnam Singh v State of Pepsu ,[57] a mahant went to the house of the accused who was having a drink party and the accused was respectful to him and was very anxious to show all hospitality to him. The accused wanted the mahant to take meals and spend the night with him. However, on seeing that the mahant was going away, the accused fired his gun without aiming at the mahant just to prevent him from leaving his place by terrifying him to some extent, but unfortunately the shot hit the mahant and he died. The Apex Court held that on the materials placed, it was not proved that the accused had an intention of firing at the mahant, but it was a wholly rash and negligent act on the part of the accused and accordingly convicted him under s 304A, IPC .

In Meera Puri v State of Nagaland ,[58] the accused fired a rifle with the knowledge that the children and others were near about, and the same resulted in the death of a child. The court noted that the accused did not aim at the child or fire at the party. Gowsami CJ, as he then was, who spoke for the Bench, held as under:2151

> By her act in firing the rifle in the way she did with the full knowledge of the children and others near about, she has done a rash and negligent act, which, although does not amount to culpable homicide, brings her within the mischief of s 304-A, Penal Code. We consider her rash and negligent act in firing in that way as culpable rashness and negligence and act merely an error of judgment or defect of (sic) intelligence.

In Nga San Win,[59] the accused, a sub-inspector of police while pursuing a party of gamblers fired four shots in the air, but one of the persons got injured and died. Noting that the sub-inspector fired from a short distance from the crowd, the court observed that if he had only taken sufficient care and caution, he would not have fired the four shots, while running, even into the air from such a short distance and that he acted with over-hastiness and held him to be guilty under s 304A, IPC . In Emperor v Morgan and Anr ,[60] two accused persons belonging to the light infantry were practising target shooting at a place by the side of a public road, due to which a man was fatally wounded. The Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court found them guilty under s 304A, IPC holding that they fired the rifles without having taken any precaution or the use of the slightest circumspection with regard to the safety of others. In Balwant Singh v State of Punjab and Anr ,[61] the accused, a police constable, with a view to maintain law and order killed two bystanders with his service rifle. The accused did not aim at the two deceased persons who were away. It was night time and it could not definitely be said that the accused would have seen them. In fact the prosecution witness and his brother who started assaulting the head-constable and the accused were not hit by the shots fired by the accused. That itself showed that the accused fired his rifle without any aim and only to scare away the people; including the prosecution witness and his brother and he did so as directed by the head-constable who was in command of the police party. However, even in such a situation he had to act in a prudent manner but when he acted in such haste, rashly, and without circumspection and due care and caution with regard to the safety of other innocent people then the only inference is that his rash act amounted to culpable rashness attracting the provisions of s 304A, IPC . The conviction of the accused was, therefore, altered from s 302, IPC, by the open court.

12. 'Except in the Cases Hereinafter Excepted'

Except in cases covered by the five exceptions mentioned in s 300 of the IPC, culpable homicide is murder if the act by which the death caused is done with the intention of causing death, or if the act falls within any of the three clauses of s 300, namely, secondly, thirdly and fourthly. An offence cannot amount to murder unless it falls within the definition of 'culpable homicide' because s 300 merely points out the cases in which culpable homicide is murder. But an offence may amount to culpable homicide without amounting to murder. Thus, culpable homicide may not amount to murder (a) where, though the evidence is sufficient to constitute murder, one, or more, of the five exceptions to s 300 apply, or (b) where the degree of mens rea, specified under s 299, IPC, is present, but not the special degrees referred to by s 300 . So, the question, as to whether a particular case is within one of the said exceptions, does not arise for consideration unless the prosecution has established a case of murder. If the prosecution has proved that culpable homicide (under s 299, IPC) has been committed by the accused, but has failed to prove that such culpable2152 homicide amounts to murder (under s 300), it is improper, and indeed useless, to consider whether any of the mitigating factors are present.

13. Clause Firstly--"With the Intention of Causing Death"

By virtue of this clause, which corresponds with, and is equivalent to, the first clause of s 299, an offence is murder if there is an intention to kill. The intention to kill a person has to be gathered from certain factors such as, the nature of the weapon used and the vital part on which the injury was inflicted, and the force with which the weapon was used and other attendant circumstances. Once the intention to kill is proved, the offence is murder unless one of the exceptions applies, in which case the offence is reduced to culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[62] If the court comes to the conclusion that the accused had common intention to kill the deceased and this conclusion is further fortified by the medical evidence, the accused are guilty of murder under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[63]Further, it has been held that the intention of the accused to cause death can be ascertained from the resultant injuries.[64] Where injuries are inflicted with the intention of killing a person and death ensues as a result of the injuries, it is a clear case of murder falling under this clause.[65] Where the accused was held responsible not only for the fatal injury but other injuries too which were amongst 16 injuries found on the deceased, the magnitude of the damage apparent on the dead body besides the incised wound inflicted on deceased by accused with the aid of a dagger clearly indicated his intention to cause murder of the deceased.[66] Where the accused abused the deceased by holding his collar and brandishing the knife, however the deceased overpowered the accused and sat on his chest, the co-accused at the call of the accused delivered a knife-blow on victim's thigh by which the accused got released from the victim's grip and without any provocation dealt a very severe knife-blow on the stomach of the deceased causing severe injuries to the vital parts of the body resulting in his death, it cannot be held that the accused had no intention to cause the murderous assault on the deceased.[67] Where a knife injury was caused directly and deep into the stomach of the deceased, a vital part which led to his death in a short time, it cannot be said that there was no intention to cause that very injury which had led ultimately to the death of the deceased. Therefore, the accused were convicted under s 302, IPC .[68] Where, the accused A2 and A3 caught hold of the deceased and the accused A1 swiftly took out knife from his waist and stabbed the deceased causing death, it was held that, the acts on the part of A2 and A3 stood on a different footing than the act committed by A1. However, the common intention to attack the deceased was there in the minds of A2 and A3 along with A1 and it was proved that the 3 accused persons came together2153 and they wanted to attack the deceased. Further, A2 and A3 were having knowledge that their acts along with the acts of A1 were likely to cause the death of the deceased, but at the same time, an intention to commit murder could not be attributed to A2 and A3 as apart from catching hold of the deceased and stopping him, A2 and A3 had not attacked the deceased.[69] Where the assailants accused gave two lathi blows to the deceased S, which had caused facture of the ribs and pierced his lungs and the injuries caused were neither unintentional nor accidental, the doctor had opined that the injuries caused were sufficient to cause death in the normal course; it was held that the guilt of the accused fell under s 300, cl thirdly, punishable under s 302, IPC .[70]

Where there was a dispute between the accused and the deceased over the removal of the boundary stone, the accused assaulted the deceased with axe over his head and back of the neck of the deceased resulting in fracture and ultimate death, it was held that the guilt of the accused fell under s 302 and not s 304, IPC .[71]

Where the accused assaulted the deceased in such a manner that the deceased suffered grievous injuries which were sufficient to cause death, but the injuries were not inflicted by the accused to kill the deceased, the use of the words Maro Maro by the accused did not indicate that they intended to cause the death of the deceased. The conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[72]

The single-injury theory cannot be made applicable to a case where a deadly weapon like firearm is used. Even a single-injury caused by a firearm would only lead to an inference that the death was caused intentionally.[73] Firing two shots successively at a person clearly shows a murderous intent.[74] Where the accused set fire to the single room hut, in which the deceased was sleeping, after locking the door of the room from outside and also prevented the villagers from going to the rescue of the helpless inmate of the room, it was held that the intention of the accused to kill the deceased was clear and they were liable for murder.[75] When the assault was given by a sword on the head of a victim with such a force that grievous cut and bleeding injuries occurred on the head of the deceased such that his brain matter was exposed, there can be no manner of doubt that the intention of the accused was to cause the death of the deceased.[76] In a case, the intention to cause the death was inferred from the nature of the injuries caused.[77] Where as many as 34 injuries by an axe had been2154 caused, it was held that intention to cause death may be inferred from the nature and number of injuries.[78] Where a person causes an injury on a vital part, the intention to kill can be attributed to him.[79] Sometimes the nature of the weapon used, sometimes the part of the body on which the injury is caused, and sometimes both are relevant.[80] Where the accused had inflicted injury by axe on the head of the deceased and the medical officer who conducted autopsy examination deposed that such injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, the case fell under s 302 and not under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[81] Where an assault with a lathi is made on the head, the intention may not be to kill; if, however, the injury is inflicted on the chest with a long knife, the intention to kill is clear.[82] Illustration (a) to s 300, and (a), (c), (d), (e), and (f) to exception 1, s 300, IPC, illustrate cases falling under the first clause of this section.

As stated earlier, this clause contemplates the intention to cause death. Intention, which is a question of fact, when proved, is an almost necessary inference from the established facts. As a basic rule, one may say that when the doer of an act knows that his act will result in death, he should be deemed to have intended to cause death. Every man is, in law, deemed to know and to intend the natural and probable consequences of his act. This clause would, therefore, apply only when the culprit or culprits either knew, or must have known, that death would be the result of his or their act.[83] Where the deceased after consuming liquor entered the house of the accused, and did not leave the house despite the request of the accused, the appellant inflicted a blow with a spade on the head of the deceased; the deceased died after five days, it was held that the accused had no intention to cause the death of the deceased, and he was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[84]

There was evidence that the accused was unhappy with the quality of the food prepared by the deceased cook, and the accused assaulted him with kicks and fists causing his death. The deceased had sustained multiple contusions; however, the nature of injuries of the deceased did not suggest that the accused intended to cause death of the deceased. Therefore, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[85]

Intention

Where the accused had no intention to cause the death of the deceased but knowledge could be imputed to him as his act was one that was likely to cause death viz. the accused dashed the head of the deceased against the wall, the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[86]

Where the accused being armed with axe and kati could have assaulted on the vital parts of the body of the deceased if they had any intention to cause death; the very2155 fact that the accused were alleged to have assaulted on arm and wrist and corresponding injuries were also found in course of post-mortem examination, it was held proper to convict the accused for commission of offence under s 304, Pt II read with s 34, IPC since they had no intention to cause death but had knowledge that such injuries may cause death.[87]

Where the act of the accused appeared to have been committed out of deep frustration as the accused was a vagabond, it was held that there was no mens rea on the part of the accused to commit the murder of the deceased The conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[88]

In a case where the accused armed with knives laid down the deceased on the ground and caused injuries on the vital parts of the body of the deceased, it was held that the intention of all the accused to commit the murder of the deceased was discernible and the accused were convicted under s 302 . The plea of the accused that the offence fell under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC was rejected.[89]

14. Clause Secondly

An intention to kill is not required in every case. Knowledge on the part of the accused, that the natural or probable consequences of the act would be death,[90] or that his act was so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury which was likely to cause death,[91] would suffice. In common parlance, the word 'likely' is used only to denote a lower degree of 'likelihood', meaning thereby to distinguish an offence, falling under s 302, IPC, from that falling under s 304, IPC .[92]An act of setting any person aflame after pouring kerosene is definitely likely to cause death of that person and this fact is obviously known to the accused persons when they caught hold of the deceased, poured kerosene over her and set her ablaze. Both clauses secondly and fourthly of s 300 clearly apply to these facts.[93] Where both the accused had caused one blow each with a gandasa on the head, a vital part of the body, of the deceased and the extent of damage as disclosed by the doctor that the death was caused by shock and haemorrhage due to injury to the brain which was sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature, the conviction of the accused person under ss 302 / 34, IPC, was upheld.[94] Where the accused by use of bare hand suffocated the deceased in stagnant water leading to death, the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I and not under s 302, IPC .[95] . Where there was family dispute with regard to property, the accused appellant gave one blow with iron rod on the head of the deceased causing death, the accused had no intention to kill and his conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II.[96] Where on a sudden quarrel on the spur of the moment, the accused inflicted2156 cuts by kathi on the neck which caused the death of his younger brother, he was convicted under s 304, Pt II, and his conviction under s 302, IPC was set aside.[1]

Where the accused was quarrelling with prosecution witness and the deceased was trying to pacify, the accused being unhappy with the deceased's intervention assaulted the deceased with a pestle with such force that the head of the deceased was broken into pieces, the injury caused not only showed the intention of the accused to cause death but also knowledge that the injury was likely to cause death, thus, the accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[2]

This clause, i.e., the second clause of s 300, IPC, mentions one special circumstance which converts culpable homicide into murder. Putting aside the exceptions in the section, which reduce the offence of murder to culpable homicide not amounting to murder, culpable homicide is again considered murder if the offender does the act with the intention of causing such bodily injury which he knows to be likely to cause the death of the person to whom harm is caused.[3] This knowledge must be in relation to the 'peculiar physical condition' of the deceased and the accused, having full knowledge that the injury, intended to be caused, would most likely result in his death on account of his 'peculiar physical condition', causes the injury to him and death ensues.[4] Pushing a person into the sea, with a bleeding head injury may not have been with the intention to kill, but it would certainly show the 'intention of causing a bodily injury as was likely to cause death', within the meaning of s 300 & Secondly s 304, Pt I of the IPC .[5] Where the accused/victim who was brought to the police station on a false charge of dacoity, was mercilessly beaten by the constables with the intention to cause such bodily injury as the constables knew would cause his death, the injuries would fall under clause secondly of s 300 .[6] If the element of knowledge is wanting, the offence would not be murder, but only culpable homicide not amounting to murder or even a lesser offence. Illustration (b), appended to this clause, very clearly brings out the point.[7] When cl (3) of this section speaks of an injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, it contemplates an injury caused to a normal grown-up human being and does not take account of the special physical condition of the person harmed accelerating his death. When an injury, which would not be sufficient to cause the death of an ordinary grown-up human being, is sufficient to cause the death of a person in a sub-normal state of health, e.g. by reason of age, disease, or weakness of previous injuries, it is spoken of as an injury likely to cause the death of the person, to whom the harm is caused, bearing in mind that person's special physical condition. This is what is provided for in cl (2) of the section.[8] Where,, neither it has been shown that any constitutional or other peculiarity existed in the case of the deceased, which would have made it likely that injuries, which ordinarily would not cause death, would be2157 fatal in his case, nor the fact that his assailants were aware of it, cl (2) would be inapplicable.[9]

Where the deceased aged 90 years was dragged from his cot, beaten by wall clock on head by the accused, causing death, it was held that the accused was attributed by the consequences of his act and the accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[10]

15. Clause 'Secondly' of Section 300 Distinguished from the Second Clause of Section 299

Commentary under the same heading in s 299, ante, may be referred to.

The distinguishing feature of the mens rea requisite under cl (2) is the knowledge possessed by the offender regarding the particular victim being in such a peculiar condition or state of health that the internal harm caused to him is likely to be fatal, notwithstanding the fact that such harm would not in the ordinary way of nature be sufficient to cause death of a person in normal health or condition. It is noteworthy that the 'intention to cause death' is not an essential requirement of cl (2). Only the intention of causing the bodily injury coupled with the offender's knowledge of the likelihood of such injury. Clause (b) of s 299 does not postulate any such knowledge on the part of the offender. Instances of cases falling under cl (2) of s 300 can be where the assailant causes death by a fist blow intentionally given knowing that the victim is suffering from an enlarged liver, or enlarged spleen or diseased heart and such blow is likely to cause death of that particular person as a result of the rupture of the liver, or spleen or the failure of the heart, as the case may be. If the assailant had no such knowledge about the disease or special frailty of the victim, nor an intention to cause death or bodily injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, the offence will not be murder, even if the injury which caused the death was intentionally given.[11]

Clause (2) of s 300 differs from the second clause of s 299 in the sense that stress is laid on the knowledge of the offender that he is likely to cause death by the act done. It has, therefore, ordinarily been applied to those cases where the offender has specific knowledge of the facts or circumstances which makes the act done particularly dangerous to the life of the person to whom that harm is done. Thus, if A knows that B is suffering from an enlarged spleen and, with that fact in his mind, proceeds to give B a violent blow in the region of the spleen and B dies, the offence would fall under cl (2) of s 300, and not under the second clause of s 299, because of the special knowledge of A. This is not the only class of cases which is covered by cl (2) aforesaid, but it is the commonest type of cases falling under it.[12] If, on the other hand, a person does an act knowing what its natural and probable consequences will be, then he is presumed to have intended, by that act, to give rise to such consequences. The intention, spoken of in the second clause of s 299, is such intention. But the knowledge, mentioned in the second clause of s 300, is not knowledge of the nature and probable consequences to an ordinary human being, but2158 the knowledge of the nature and probable consequences to the particular person to whom the harm is caused. In proving this knowledge, it may be, and in most cases it is, necessary to have recourse to the natural presumption that a man is presumed to know the natural and probable consequences of his acts and, in such cases, the practical question, that arises, is whether, on account of a certain peculiarity, known to the accused, as a fact, in the person to whom the harm is caused, the presumption as to knowledge can property be drawn, having regard to the common course of natural events. If the answer be in the affirmative, the offence is murder; if the answer be in the negative, or there is any reasonable doubt that the presumption can be drawn, the offence may be culpable homicide if the injury intended was likely to cause the death of an ordinary human being without being especially likely to cause the death of the person, to whom the harm is caused, or it may not amount to culpable homicide if the accused cannot be presumed to have intended to cause an injury likely to cause death. In the last mentioned class of cases, the offence may be one of the lesser offences, affecting the human body, determined according to whether the accused intended to cause hurt or grievous hurt or knew his act to be likely to cause hurt or grievous hurt.[13]Thus, the distinction between knowledge of the natural and probable consequences of an act to an ordinary human being and the knowledge of the natural and probable consequences to the particular person, to whom the harm is caused, distinguishes cl (2) of s 299 from cl (2) of s 300 .[14] Again, when an injury, which would not be sufficient to cause the death of an ordinary grown-up human being, is sufficient to cause the death of a person in a sub-normal state of health, e.g., by reason of age, disease or weakness or previous injuries, it is spoken of as an injury 'likely to cause the death of the person, to whom the harm is caused', bearing in mind the person's special physical condition. This is provided for in cl (2) of s 300 . Clause (2) of s 299, on the other hand, refers to the causing of an injury likely to cause death without any reference to the special physical condition of the person to whom the harm is caused.[15]

16. Clause Thirdly

For cases to fall within this clause, it is not necessary that the offender intended to cause death if death ensues from the intentional bodily injury or injuries sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature.[16] It must be proved that there was an intention to inflict that particular bodily injury, which in the ordinary course of nature, was sufficient to cause death, viz, the injury found to be present was the injury that was intended to be inflicted.[17] The sufficiency of an intentional injury to cause death in the ordinary course of nature is the gist of the clause, irrespective of an intention to cause death.[18] The emphasis is on the sufficiency of the injury, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death. The sufficiency is the high probability of death in the ordinary course of nature.[19] Thus, for cases that fall within cl (3), it is not2159 necessary that the culprits should have the knowledge of death so long as the intended injuries are sufficient to cause death. Whether an injury is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature is a question of fact and it does not cease to be sufficient merely because the person, who inflicts the injury, does not know that it is sufficient. The correct principle seems to be that a case falls within cl (3) when the degree of probability of death is very great and certainly so where death is the inevitable result of the intended injuries, whether the culprits intended death or even did not know that death would result.[20]

If the probability of death is very high, then the requirements of clause 'thirdly' of s 300, IPC are satisfied and the fact that a particular individual may, by the fact of his having secured especially skilled treatment or being in possession of a particularly strong constitution, have survived an injury, which would otherwise prove fatal to majority of persons, subjected to it, is not enough to prove that such an injury is not sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[21] The chopping off of the leg would necessarily involve the cutting of all bone structures, blood vessels and nerves. A case of this kind would fall under clause 'thirdly' of the section.[22] If the injury, that the offender intends to cause, and does cause, is sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature, the offence is murder, irrespective of whether the offender intended to cause death and whether the offender had a subjective knowledge of the consequences.[23] The intention of the offender in relation to sufficiency, or otherwise, of the injury is not a matter for consideration at all,[24] and the notation, that the injuries should normally be on, what the layman considers to be, vital parts of the body in order to constitute murder in law is not correct.[25] This part of the inquiry is purely objective and inferential, and has nothing to do with the intention of the offender.[26] Similarly, what is necessary to establish is that the bodily injury, intended to be inflicted, is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[27]

The Supreme Court, in Virsa Singh v State of Punjab ,[28] observed that, for the application of this clause, it must first be established that an injury is caused; next, it2160 must be established objectively what the nature of that injury in the ordinary 'course of nature' is. If the injury is found, in the opinion of the court, to be sufficient to cause death, one test is satisfied. Then, it must be proved that there was an intention to inflict that very injury, and not some other injury, and that it was not accidental or unintentional. If this is also held against the offender, the offence of murder is established.[29] The question, in such a case, which falls for determination, is whether the causing of the fatal injury was accidental or unintentional or whether some other kind of injury was intended to be inflicted by the assailant.[30] There should be explicit medical opinion on the question whether the injuries caused were sufficient in the ordinary course to cause death. Where the two injuries caused by a stone were in the ordinary course of nature not sufficient to cause death, acquittal of accused proper.[31] If the injury, in the opinion of the doctor, is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death of the deceased,[32] and it is not unintentional or accidental,[33] or it cannot be said that it was caused negligently,[34] the case would fall under this clause. But, if the injury caused is not sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, it is out of the purview of this clause.[35] So, the fact, that the deceased met his death after one month of the date of occurrence, would exclude the application of the ingredients of this clause, particularly when the medical opinion with regard to the cause of death is hesitating.[36] Where the accused had inflicted as many as 26 injuries, the obvious intention of the accused was to cause the death of the deceased; merely because most of the injuries were on the extremities (non-vital parts), it was no ground to alter the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC into one under s 304, Pt II, IPC, when the doctor had opined that the injuries were sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature.[37] Where the accused had poured acid on the deceased while the latter was sleeping which caused 60% burn injuries and septicemia causing death, it was held that since the cause of death was burn injuries and not septicemia, the accused was convicted under s 302, IPC and not s 304, Pt I, IPC .[38]

Whether the injury inflicted was sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature is a matter of inference or deduction from the proved facts about the nature of the injury, and has nothing to do with the question of intention.[39] It has to be decided2161 by the court as a question of fact.[40] In some cases, where death resulted from a single lathi blow on vital part of the body, e.g., the head, it was held that the case fell under s 304 because the injury, intended to be caused, was such as was 'likely to cause death'.[41] However, in none of these cases, cl (3) of this section was discussed.

The two accused armed with weapons entered the house of the deceased to commit robbery, when overpowered by the deceased, the accused inflicted knife blow in the abdomen of the deceased causing death. It was held that the case was not covered by cl 'Thirdly' of s 300, IPC ; the accused who had come to commit robbery had the intention to cause the death of the deceased, and therefore, the offence of the accused fell under s 302, IPC and not under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[42]

The accused was alleged to have caused injuries by knife on the deceased. However, the medical evidence in the case disclosed that the injuries found on the deceased were simple injuries and none of them was described as grievous. There was no evidence to prove that the injuries inflicted on the deceased were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. This injury was not attributed to the respondent accused, and there was nothing to establish that the injury which ultimately resulted in the death of the deceased was intended by any one. Both the High Court and Supreme Court held that the offence under s 302, IPC was not made out and that the offence made out was one punishable under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[43]

17. Two Parts of Clause 'Thirdly'

This clause has two parts. The first part is a subjective one which indicates that the injury must be an intentional one, and not an accidental one and the second part is objective in the sense that, looking at the injury intended to be caused, the court must be satisfied that it was sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[44] These two parts are disjunctive and separate. In using the objective test, the court can take note of the fact that the accused used no weapon in attacking the deceased.[45] Where there is an intention to cause bodily injury and death has ensued, the question will ordinarily be whether the injury, which the accused intended to inflict, was sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death or was merely likely to cause death and that will depend mainly on the weapon used, the force with which it was used, the number of blows struck, and the part of the body injured.[46] Where the accused gave cuts with an axe in the middle of the thigh with such severity as to sever the lower part from the upper thigh, it was held that he was guilty under this clause.[47]2162

18. Test Laid Down in Virsa Singh's Case Ingrained in our Legal Systems

In Virsa Singh v State of Punjab ,[48] Vivian Bose, J, speaking for the court, explained the meaning and scope of cl (3). It was observed that the prosecution must prove the following acts before it can bring a case under s 300, 'thirdly'. First, it must establish quite objectively, that a bodily injury is present; secondly the nature of the injury must be proved. These are purely objective investigations. Thirdly, it must be proved that there was an intention to inflict that particular injury, that is to say, that it was not accidental or unintentional or that some other kind of injury was intended. Once these three elements are proved to be present, the inquiry proceeded further, and fourthly it must be proved that the injury of the type just described made up the three elements set out above was sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. This part of the inquiry is purely objective and inferential, and has nothing to do with the intention of the offender.

The ingredient of clause 'thirdly' of s 300, IPC were brought out by the illustrious judge in his terse language as follows:

> To put it shortly, the prosecution must prove the following facts before it can bring a case under s 300, "thirdly".
> First, it must establish, quite objectively, that a bodily injury is present;
> Secondly, the nature of the injury must be proved; these are purely objective investigations.

> Thirdly, it must be proved that there was an intention to inflict that particular bodily injury, that is to say, that it was not accidental or unintentional, or that some other kind of injury was intended.
> Once these three elements are proved to be present, the enquiry proceeds further and,
> Fourthly, it must be proved that the injury of the type just described made up of the three elements set out above is sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature. This part of the enquiry is purely objective and inferential and has nothing to do with the intention of the offender."

The leaned judge explained the third ingredient in the following words:

> The question is not whether the prisoner intended to inflict a serious injury or a trivial one but whether he intended to inflict the injury that is proved to be present. If he can show that he did not, or if the totality of the circumstances justify such an inference, then, of course, the intent that the section requires is not proved. But if there is nothing beyond the injury and the fact that the appellant inflicted it, the only possible inference is that he intended to inflict it. Whether he knew of its seriousness, or intended serious consequences, is neither here nor there. The question, so far as the intention is concerned, is not whether he intended to kill, or to inflict an injury of a particular degree of seriousness but whether he intended to inflict the injury in question; and once the existence of the injury is proved the intention to cause it will be presumed unless the evidence or the circumstances warrant an opposite conclusion.

These observations of Vivian Bose, J are locus classicus. The test laid down by Virsa Singh's case[49] for the applicability of clause 'Thirdly' is now ingrained in our legal system and has become part of the rule of law. Under cl thirdly of s 300, IPC, culpable homicide is murder, if both the following conditions are satisfied, i.e., (a) that the act which causes death is done with the intention of causing death or is done2163 with the intention of causing a bodily injury; and (b) that the injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. It must be proved that there was an intention to inflict that particular bodily injury, which in the ordinary course of nature, was sufficient to cause death, viz, that the injury found to be present was the injury that was intended to be inflicted.

Thus, according to the rule laid down in Virsa Singh's case, even if the intention of the accused was limited to the infliction of a bodily injury sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature, and did not extend to the intention of causing death, the offence would be murder. Illustration (c) appended to s 300 clearly brings out this point.[50]

19. So Many Injuries Caused in Quick Succession Attract Clause 'Thirdly'

Nineteen injuries caused in quick succession cannot be said to have been caused as a result of grave and sudden provocation. The very fact that so many injuries were caused in quick succession and particularly where the deceased being unarmed and in a helpless situation, is sufficient to indicate that s 300, cl 'Thirdly' is attracted to the case.[51]

20. Nature and Extent of Intention Required in Clause 'Thirdly'

In order to bring a case within the third clause of this section, it is not only necessary that the injury be sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, but also that the accused intended to cause that injury.[52]What clause 'thirdly' of s 300 requires is (a) that the act, by which death is caused, is done with the intention of causing bodily injury to any person, and (b) that the bodily injury, intended to be inflicted, is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death. Once the intention to cause the bodily injury, actually found to be present, is proved, the rest of the inquiry is purely objective and the only question is whether, as a matter of purely objective inference, the injury is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The intention in relation to sufficiency, or otherwise, of the injury is not a matter for consideration at all.[53] Proof of injury on any particular part of body may be determinative of the intention of causing death. If it has not been proved that it was the intention of the accused to inflict the particular injury on the particular place, it is not possible to apply cl (3) of s 300 .[54] Where the accused gave cuts with an axe in the middle of the thigh with such severity as to sever the lower part from the upper thigh, he was held guilty under cl (3) of s 300, IPC .[55]2164

For cases to fall within cl (3) of s 300, IPC, it is not necessary that the offender intended to cause death, so long as the death ensues from the intentional bodily injury or injuries sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature.[56]

21. Inference Regarding Intention to Cause Injury

Whether the offender intended to inflict the injury in question is one of fact, and not of law. Although the court 'attributes' a particular intention or a desire to the individual concerned having regard to the act, committed by him, and the circumstances, surrounding the commission of the act,[57] so that, on proof of existence of injuries in question, the intention to cause injuries would be presumed unless the evidence or the circumstances warrant an opposite conclusion,[58] yet the test of intention is always subjective to the accused,[59] and can be inferred from the act, conduct or other relevant circumstances in each case,[60] or it may become clear from the fact that the injury was inflicted 'on a very vital part of the body with a deadly weapon'[61] though there can be circumstances to show that the intention of the offender was not to inflict a bodily injury sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death and it was only accidentally, in the circumstances, which the offender could not himself foresee, that a fatal injury was caused and death took place.[62]Where the accused thrust a spear into the abdomen of the deceased with such force that it penetrated the bowels and three coils of the intestines came out of the wound and digested food oozed out from cuts in three places, as a result of which the deceased died, it was held that, in the absence of evidence, or reasonable explanation, that the accused did not intend to stab in the stomach with a degree of force sufficient to penetrate that far into the body, or to indicate that his act was a regrettable accident, and that he intended otherwise, it would be perverse to conclude that he did not intend to inflict the injury that he did.[63]

Where the accused hit the deceased with a rice pounder, which is a deadly weapon, with such force as to cause an extensive fracture and death, it was held that it could not be said that he did not intend to cause the injury which led to her death. Even if it be considered that he had no intention to kill, there can be no doubt that he intended to inflict the injury, which he actually inflicted, and he must have known that such an injury is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[64] A person, who causes such serious injuries as are expected, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, must, in the absence of anything to show that it was caused accidentally or2165 negligently, be held to have inflicted them intentionally.[65] In BN Srikantiah v State of Mysore ,[66] the Supreme Court observed:

> There were 24 injuries on the person of the deceased, out of which 21 were incised, and they were either on his head or the neck or the shoulders or on the forearms. All these, except perhaps the last, are vital parts of the body and anybody, who causes injuries with weapons of the kind, that the appellants used, must be fixed with the intention of causing such bodily injury or injuries as would fall within clause (3) of section 300 , IPC .[67]

Where the accused, armed with a long knife, went to the deceased and, taking him unaware, gave him a blow in the neck, with that knife, causing a deep injury, which was sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause his death, it was held that a deep stab wound, caused, with a long knife, in the neck of the victim, taking the defenceless victim, by surprise, could lead to only one conclusion that the accused had the intention to kill the deceased and was, therefore, guilty of murder.[68] Where the accused inflicted knife injuries on two minor children and inflicted injuries causing death of his wife, the injuries being sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, he was convicted under s 302, IPC, though he had no intention to commit the murder of his two children.[69]

22. 'The Bodily Injury Intended to be Inflicted'

The expression 'the bodily injury intended to be inflicted' is descriptive of the earlier part of the clause, namely, the infliction of bodily injury with the intention to inflict it, that is to say, if the circumstances justify an inference that a man's intention was only to inflict a blow on the lower part of the leg, or some lesser blow, and it can be shown that the blow landed in the region of the heart by accident, then, though an injury to the heart is shown to be present, the intention to inflict an injury in that region, or of that nature, is not proved.[70] So, the expression 'and the bodily injury intended to be inflicted' does not import the idea that the intention, required by the first part of the clause, should be to inflict an injury sufficient to cause death as was interpreted in Faqira v State .[71]

23. 'Ordinary Course of Nature'

The emphasis, in clause 'thirdly' of this section, is on the sufficiency of the injury in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. 'Ordinary course of nature' means 'in the usual course if left alone'.[72] The expression 'ordinary course of nature' means normal course or due course. At the best it may envisage a high probability of death. On the converse the word always means inevitably or invariably.[73]2166

Where the injury caused by knife by the accused was clearly intended by him and it was not an accidental or unintentional injury, the medical evidence established that the injury was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. It was held that, the offence committed by the appellant is clearly covered by clause 'Thirdly' of s 300, IPC .[74]

24. 'Sufficient, in the Ordinary Course of Nature, to Cause Death'

The expression 'sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death' only means in normal or due course or at the best may envisage a high probability of death, but certainly does not mean that the injury should invariably or inevitably lead to death. The distinction between the expression high probability of death and death invariably or inevitably taking place though fine is substantial and if overlooked may result in gross miscarriage of justice.[75] It is an error to suppose that the words 'sufficient in the ordinary course' can be applied only when death is an almost certain result. If a person knowingly causes injuries which are more likely to cause death than not in the ordinary course, his offence falls under cl (2), or cl (3), of s 300 .[76] So, an injury 'sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death' merely means that death will be the most probable result of the injury having regard to ordinary course of nature, and not that death must be the necessary consequence.[77] One single blow, with spear, in the abdomen,[78] or one blow on head,[79] is not a circumstance which will mitigate the offence in view of the medical opinion that the injury was, in the ordinary course of nature, sufficient to cause death.[80] A stab wound in the abdomen, viscera deep, has been held to be sufficient, in the ordinary cause of nature, to cause death.[81] An injury, inflicted by the assailant, may be said to be sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death if the bodily injury is proved to be fatal in the ordinary course.[82] Where an injury was inflicted with great force on the most vital part of the body, viz, chest, on account of which the left lung was pierced through and through and both the ventricles were punctured, it was held that the injury was sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[83] But2167 stuffing the mouth with a handkerchief cannot be said to be sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[84] Where, in a sudden unpremeditated attack, the accused caught hold the deceased and strangled him to death with his turban, it was held that it could not be said that the injury, which the accused intended to inflict, was sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[85] Where the accused was carrying only a torch and was given a dagger by the co-accused during the quarrel, only one overt act was attributed to the accused and injury inflicted by him on the neck of the deceased when there was a scuffle between accused and the deceased, the injury caused by the accused was likely to cause death cumulatively with other injuries, but was not sufficient in the ordinary cause of nature to cause death so cl 3 of s 300, IPC, was not attracted.[86] Where the accused had given severe beatings by sticks, the injuries and fractures received by the deceased were dangerously sufficient to cause death; omission of the doctor to give opinion that the injuries were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death was held to be of no consequence.[87]

Where the evidence showed that prior to the incident there was fight between the parties and the accused had extended death threat and the accused by his motor vehicle hit and dragged the deceased causing his death, it was held that the accused had the intention to cause bodily injury sufficient for conviction under s 300, IPC and not under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[88]

Where the deceased died due to septicemia after 35 days of the incident, but as the deceased had sustained seven gun shot injuries which in the ordinary course of nature were sufficient to cause death, it was held that the case fell within the ambit of s 302, IPC .[89]

25. Proof of Sufficiency of the Injury to Cause Death in Clause 'Thirdly'

Once the intention to cause the bodily injury, found to be present, is proved, the rest of the inquiry is purely objective and the only question is whether, as a matter of purely objective inference, the injury is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.[90] This question being one of fact in each case,[91] presumably, a medical witness, is in the best position to give evidence on the point.[92]The sufficiency of the injury may be established by the nature and quality of the act, taken with the consequence, which was intimately related to the act.[93] The prosecution may elicit, from the medical officer, who held that autopsy, the evidence to the effect whether2168 the injury, found on the body of the deceased, was merely likely to cause death or sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.[1] However, even if the doctor has not said that any one of the injuries was not sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course, the court can infer that from the nature of the injuries found on the body of the deceased.[2] No doubt it would have been of advantage to the court if public prosecutor had put the question to the doctor if the injuries were sufficient in the ordinary cause of nature to cause death. But mere omission to put that question is not enough for the court to reach a wrong conclusion that the injury noticed by the autopsy surgeon was not responsible for causing death of the deceased. Though not an expert as the autopsy surgeon, the sessions judge himself being an experienced judicial officer can look at the injuries himself and deduced whether the injuries were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. When no sensible man with some idea regarding the fracture of homicidal cases would come to a different conclusion from the 45 injuries on the dead body which included fracture of 5 ribs (2 to 6) on the left side toward sternal end, fracture of some of the fingers and extravasation of blood on the right side of occipital region and above on the citus of rib-fractures etc, except that the injuries were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.[3] In a case, it was observed that nineteen injuries caused in quick succession cannot be said to have been caused as a result of grave and sudden provocation. The very fact that so many injuries were caused in quick succession and particularly where the deceased being unarmed and in a helpless situation, it was sufficient to indicate that s 300, clause 'Thirdly' was attracted.[4]

Where the victim is either helpless or rendered helpless and the offender does some act which leads to death in the ordinary course and death takes place from the act of the offender and nothing else, it is hardly necessary to prove more than the acts themselves and the causal connection between the acts and the end result.[5] A blow on the head with a lathi is certainly likely to cause death and the person, who inflicts a lathi blow on the head of another person, must be presumed to have the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. But it does not necessarily follow that a lathi blow on the head is always sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[6] When, in view of the medical evidence, it is not certain that the deceased died a homicidal death, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC, cannot be sustained.[7]

With a view to bring home the charge under s 302, IPC, it is essential for the doctor to state that the injury/injuries were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. In the absence of such opinion, the courts do not generally make a guess about the nature of the injury, especially when there is evidence to show that the injured could have been saved. To clothe an accused with the liability under s2169 302, IPC, the prosecution has to establish the requisite intention or the requisite knowledge.[8]

26. Numerous Injuries and Clause 'Thirdly'

Commentary under the heading 'Numerous Injuries' in s 299, ante, may be referred to.

Although, in a given case, the number of injuries on the person of the deceased may not be the determinative factor, the same, however, is relevant.[9]

If, from the nature and number of injuries, caused on various parts of the body of the deceased, and the weapon used, it would be reasonable to hold that the accused really intended to cause injuries which were sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death,[10] then it is not necessary that each injury,[11] or even any one injury, should, by itself, be sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death. Even if none of the injuries, by itself, is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, but if they cumulatively,[12] or even two of them,[13] are sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, the offence would be murder under clause 'thirdly' of this section. Where, even though there was no punctured or incised wound on a vital part of the body, death was caused very soon after the incident on account of shock and haemorrhage produced by the multiple injuries caused with a spear, it was held that the injuries were sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[14] The point, whether the injuries were cumulatively sufficient, or individually sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, would, however, bring about a substantial difference in cases where the assailants are themselves numerous. When no specific injury can be attributed distinctly to any of the accused, the correct rule, as propounded by the Supreme Court in Sorban Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[15] is to convict the several accused under s 302, read with s 34, IPC, and not to convict any one of them under s 302 simpliciter.[16]

27. Injuries on Vital or Non-vital Parts of Body of the Deceased and Clause 'Thirdly'

Ordinarily, an injury on a vital part of the body is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[17] A stab in a vital part of the body, resulting in the victim's2170 death, is an injury sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[18] Where a man inflicts a wound on a vital spot and death ensues, it is no defence to say that the accused did not intend the injury to be fatal.[19] There are a plethora of cases on an injury in the ordinary course of nature.[20] Where the stomach and the omentum had hemiated together and the omentum protruded through the hole, which the injury had made, the pleura and the diaphragm were both cut and the injury had extended right up to the abdominal cavity, the injury was held sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature.[21] Where a concerted attack is direct against the head of a victim, which is smashed, the attack is made with the knowledge that the injury inflicted is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death and the offence is murder.[22] But all blows on the head do not necessarily cause death or inflict injuries sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.[23] A remark by Melville J, in Reg v Govinda :[24]

> Practically, I think, it will generally resolve itself into a consideration of the nature of the weapon used. A blow from the fist or a stick on a vital part may be likely to cause death; a wound from a sword in a vital part is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.

To this, it may be added that the decision may depend on the size and weight of the stick, where a stick is used, and in the way in which it is used.[25]

An injury on the neck, cutting through the spinal cord, is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[26] Where, in the course of an altercation between the two, the accused stabbed the deceased on the left forearm with a knife, it was held that as the forearm was not a vital part, the accused was guilty only of causing grievous hurt.[27] The case is, however, quite different when a weapon, like a sword, is used in order to chop off, or to hack at, a limb. The person, who uses a sword or aruval, chopping off an arm or a leg, and, by so doing, severs the arteries of the arm or leg, must know that he is inflicting an injury which, in the ordinary course of nature, is sufficient to cause death. The offence, in such a case, is clearly one of2171 murder.[28] So, even if the intended injury is on a non-vital part of the body and the victim dies as a result of it, it would be murder if the injury inflicted is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death. An injury to a vital part of the body is not necessarily an ingredient to determine whether the case falls under s 300 . If the bodily injury intended to be, and also actually inflicted, is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, the offence falls under s 300 .[29] Where merciless blows, with a fairly heavy stick, were struck so that two ribs were fractured, the pleura was injured and the right lung was lacerated, and the almost inevitable result of the injury was death, it was held that though an ordinary man might survive such a beating, death would be the most probable, and not merely the likely, result and it must, therefore, be held that the accused intended to inflict injuries sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[30] The fact, that to a reasonable man the case, resulting in the assault, may appear to be quite petty, is not decisive as to the offence committed when there is evidence that blows, more than one, were inflicted on the skull, which is a vital part of the body of a person, causing multiple depressed comminuted fractures. As the assault was preceded by a hot discussion, the blows must have been inflicted in anger as great force is bound to be used to cause the above fractures. Such a case would fall under clause 'thirdly' of s 300, IPC so that the offence would be one punishable under s 302 .[31]

Where the ordinary course of nature is neither interrupted, nor interfered, with, by any intervening act of another and whatever happens is the result of the acts of the assailants alone, they would be sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[32]

28. Clause 'Thirdly' of Section 300 Distinguished from the Second Clause of Section 299

In clause 'thirdly' of s 300, instead of the words 'likely to cause death', occurring in the corresponding second clause of s 299, the words 'sufficient in the ordinary course of nature' have been used. Obviously, the distinction is between a bodily injury likely to cause death and a bodily injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. This distinction is fine and real, but, if overlooked, may result in miscarriage of justice. The difference between the second clause of s 299 and clause 'thirdly' of s 300 is one of degree of probability of death, resulting from the intended bodily injury. To put it more broadly, it is the degree of probability of death which determines whether a culpable homicide is of the gravest, medium, or lowest, degree. The word 'likely' in the second clause of s 299 conveys the sense of 'probable' as distinguished from a mere possibility. The words 'bodily injury...sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death', in clause 'thirdly' of s 300, mean that death will be the most probable result of the injury having regard to the ordinary course of2172 nature.[33] If the act done will, in all reasonable probability, result in death, the offence is murder, whereas if it is only likely to cause death, the offence is within the second clause of s 299 .[34] Though a large number of blows, inflicted by a light stick, might indicate an intention to cause bodily injuries sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, yet there should be clear medical evidence to support such an inference; and, in the absence of such evidence, the benefit of doubt, as to whether the case falls under clause 'thirdly' of s 300, should be given to the accused and he should be convicted only of culpable homicide not amounting to murder under s 304, Pt I, read with s 299(2) of the IPC .[35]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 300.

Murder.--

29. Clause Fourthly--Scope and Applicability of

The fourth clause of this section contemplates the doing of an imminently dangerous act, in general, and not the doing of any bodily harm to any particular individual. In case of intentionally causing bodily injury to a particular person, the question, whether such an act is murder, has to be decided with reference to the first three clauses of the section. This clause, i.e., the fourth clause, is designed to provide for rare class of cases like putting lives of many persons in jeopardy, by the act done, as envisaged in illust (d) of the section and the like.[36] When a man deliberately strikes or shoots another, the case can never fall under this clause.[37]This clause comes into play only if no other clause of this section applies. In cases, where the intention of the assailants, as inferred from the result of their act, can, at least, be that of causing such bodily injuries as the assailants would have known to be likely to cause the death of their victim, the invocation of this clause would be altogether erroneous.[38] The emphasis in the preceding part of this fourth clause is on the imminently dangerous nature of the act itself. Further, the clause is usually applied to cases where the act of the offender is not directed against any particular person. There may even be no intention to cause harm or injury to any particular individual. The act proceeds not from any malicious intention towards any particular individual, but is the result of a general disregard for human life and safety. There may, however, be rare cases in which the target of attack, even under this clause, may be a single individual. The act of a person, practising feats of archery by aiming his arrow at the cap of a human being walking at some distance away or at a mother leaving a new born baby in the open, or the act of pouring kerosene oil over the body of victim and setting fire to it,[39] may provide an instance of it.[40] Therefore, furious driving and2173 firing at a mark near a public road would be cases of this description.[41] The Supreme Court, in State of Madhya Pradesh v Ram Prasad ,[42]observed that clause fourthly, though usually invoked in those cases where there is no intention to cause the death of any particular person (as the illustration shows), may on its terms, be used in those cases also where there is extreme callousness towards the result and the risk taken is such that it may be stated that the person knows that the act is likely to cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. In Pradeep Kumar Pathak v State ,[43] the court observed that the clause 'fourthly' of s 300, IPC, envisages knowledge, and not intention. An assailant, causing deep injury in the chest with a deadly weapon like knife, spear, gun, etc., must know that he is doing an imminently dangerous act which, in all probability, would cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. As it is common knowledge that the vital organs are found in the chest, therefore if, the deceased dies within half-an-hour of the causing of a deep injury in his chest by the accused with a deadly weapon like a knife, the accused is liable under the said clause even if the doctor, who conducts the post-mortem examination, is not examined in evidence.

30. Essential Requirements of the Fourth Clause

Following are the essential requirements of fourth clause of s 300 :

(i) the person, committing the offence, knows that the dangerous character of the act is so imminent that it must, in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death;[44] and

(ii) he should have committed the act without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.[45]

For applicability of this clause following are the necessary requirements:

(1) the act must be imminently dangerous;
(2) the act must be of extra-ordinary recklessness;
(3) the danger to human life must be imminent; and
(4) the imminence should be such that it will in all probability cause death or cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.[46]

Where the deceased had refused to take wine with the accused and the later first fired in the air and thereafter fired indiscriminately, the offence was committed under s 304, Pt I and not under s 302, IPC .[47]

31. Clause (c) of Section 299 and Fourth Clause of Section 300

Clause (c) of s 299 and cl (4) of s 300 both require knowledge of the probability of the act causing death. It will be sufficient to say that cl (4) of s 300 would be applicable where the knowledge of the offender as to the probability of death of a person or persons in general as distinguished from a particular person or persons,2174 being caused from his imminently dangerous act approximates to a practical certainty. Such knowledge on the part of the offender must be of the highest degree of probability, the act having been committed by the offender without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing death or such injury as aforesaid.[48]

32. 'Imminently' and 'Imminently Dangerous'

The word 'imminently' implies a risk which is both threatening and near. The question of whether an act is imminently dangerous depends upon nature of the act and its evident risk to human life. The danger threatened must be to human life. It must be an act in which death of human is certain or almost so, and it would be surprising if the result was otherwise. Moreover, the danger must not only be of certain or almost certain death, but of a death which is near and may be counted by number of hours or days.[49] The man, who strikes another with a knife in the throat, must know that the blow is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death and the injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.[50] When the accused had used a dangerous weapon like a rifle, (being a police constable he must have known that it was a dangerous weapon) and having regard to the fact that he had fired as many as five shots, at the deceased, one of which was fired after the victim was hit by a bullet and collapsed on the ground, in any view of the matter the case would fall under clause 'fourthly' of s 300, IPC .[51]The act of the accused in abandoning the two-year old child is imminently so dangerous that it would have in all probability caused death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause his death attracting clause, fourthly, of s 300, IPC .[52]

33. 'If the Person, Committing the Act, Knows that it is so Imminently Dangerous that it must, in all Probability, Cause Death or such Bodily Injury as is Likely to Cause Death'

The earlier part of this fourth clause of s 300 refers to cases where the act of the accused is itself so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. The degree of the probability or likelihood of the act, resulting in fatal harm being of the highest level.[53]The knowledge must relate to the time when the act was done, and not to any time anterior to it.[54]

An act of setting any person aflame after pouring kerosene is definitely likely to cause the death of that person and this fact is obviously known to the accused persons when they caught hold of the deceased, poured kerosene over her and set her ablaze.[55] One accused sprinkled petrol in a bus and another accused lit the matchstick thereafter. These facts are sufficient to bring the case under s 302, IPC, because these very acts were such that accused would be deemed to know that pouring of petrol in the bus and lighting fire are so imminently dangerous that in all2175 probabilities it would cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death of the passengers.[56]

Where the accused persons had thrown bricks on the vital parts of the body of the deceased who was a 78 year old man, thereby causing his death, in such event, knowledge to commit murder can definitely be attributed to the accused as the deceased died instantaneously after receiving the brick injuries. The conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II.[57]

The knowledge, that this clause requires, is not merely that the act in question is 'imminently dangerous', but also that 'it is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death'. A danger is imminent when it is immediately threatened or is impending. Bodily injury, which is likely to cause death, may be 'sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death', but the words 'imminently dangerous' and 'in all probability', in this clause, show that death must be an almost certain consequence of the act--so certain that only a miracle can prevent it.[58] At one time, it was considered that the wielding of a lathi was an imminently dangerous act and if a severe injury is caused resulting in death, the case should fall within the purview of clause 'fourthly' of this section.[59] However, this view has not been followed in other cases.

In Perana v Emperor ,[60] it was observed that the use of lathi is certainly dangerous, but is not so dangerous that anybody would, in the ordinary course, think that death is a probable cause of the use of the lathi. Lathis are frequently used and result in nothing more than injuries which are simple hurt or, at the most, grievous hurt. In another case, it was observed that it cannot be said of every lathi blow that it is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death. Even brutal assaults with lathis, resulting in death, do not fall under clause 'fourthly' of this section and do not ordinarily amount to murder, unless the accused intends to cause death or to cause such bodily injury as is sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death.[61]

34. Proof of Intention or Knowledge

It is the duty of the prosecution to prove the accused's guilt subject to his (accused's) defence of insanity and subject also to any statutory exception.[62] If, however, the prosecution has failed to prove the requisite intention or knowledge, the court can2176 rely on the proved circumstances in judging the offence even if the accused might have failed to raise the plea in his defence.[63]

In the context of intention, the question is not whether the accused intended to kill or to inflict injuries of any particular degree of seriousness, but the question rather is whether he intended to inflict the injuries in question, and once the existence of such injuries is established, the intention to cause the same will be presumed unless an opposite conclusion is warranted by the proved circumstances.[64] The following cases, for illustrations' sake, may explain the above proposition:

(i) The accused had intended only to incapacitate the deceased by hitting at his leg which act was not as imminently dangerous as would, in all probability, cause death; the stroke however hit the vital part of the body and resulted in the victim's death. It was held that the accused had no intention to cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.[65]

(ii) The accused had set fire to the clothes of his wife. It was held that accused must have known that he was running the risk of causing death of the victim because no special knowledge is required to know that one might cause death by such act.[66]

The circumstance, that there may be difficulty in establishing the requisite knowledge or intention, by no means, discharges the prosecution from the burden of so doing.[67] Thus, when the court is called upon to arrive at a finding as to the real intention of the accused in committing a particular offence, it is expected to consider every available circumstance and it should accept only that conclusion which can be arrived at, beyond reasonable doubt.[68] Section 100 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, does not absolve the prosecution from proving all the essential ingredients of an offence, nor does it cast upon an accused the burden of proving that no offence has been committed.[69] Therefore, in order to establish the guilt, specific intention to cause death or bodily injury should be proved by the prosecution.[70]

35. 'And Commits such act without any Excuse for Incurring the Risk of Causing Death or such Injury as Aforesaid'

Merely causing death, by doing an act with the knowledge that it is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death, is not murder. In order that an act, done with such knowledge, should constitute murder, it is necessary that it should be committed without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing the death or bodily injury. An act, done with the knowledge of its consequences, is not prima facie murder; it becomes murder only if it can be positively affirmed that there was no excuse. The requirements of the section are not satisfied by the act of homicide being one of extreme recklessness. It must, in addition, be wholly inexcusable. When a risk is incurred, even a risk of the gravest possible character which must normally2177 result in death, the taking of that risk is not murder unless it was inexcusable to take it.[71]It is culpable homicide because the act, causing death, is done with the knowledge that the actor is thereby likely to cause death; it is not murder because it does not satisfy both parts of the definition of murder in clause 'fourthly' of this section. Being culpable homicide and not murder, the act is necessarily culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[72]

The words 'without any excuse for incurring the risk' mean without any excuse which a criminal court, administering the criminal law, as embodied in IPC, can reasonably regard as an excuse. The term 'excuse', also occurs in the explanation to s 81, IPC . It is used there as synonymous with the expression 'to justify' which seems to indicate that the grammatical meaning of exculpating or absolving is intended to be retained. In this sense, the words would mean in the absence of any exculpatory circumstances other than any of those circumstances mentioned in the five exceptions to this section.[73]In view of the above, an imminently dangerous act is not murder if it is done to prevent a greater evil. If the evil can be avoided without doing the act, then there can be no valid justification for doing the act which is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.[74] In Emperor v Dhirajia ,[75] a village woman left her home with her six months' old baby in her arms on account of her husband's ill-treatment. After she had gone some distance from home, she turned around and saw her husband pursuing her. She became panicky and jumped into a well nearby with the baby in her arms. The baby died, but the woman survived. On these facts, a Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court assumed that the woman had knowledge of the consequences of her act, but thought that she had an excuse and that excuse was panic or fright, it held her guilty, not of murder, but of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. Similarly, in Supadi v Emperor ,[76] a girl of 17 years of age, who too was ill-treated by her husband, jumped with her baby into a well when she found that her husband prevented her from returning to her parents. In this case, she was carrying the baby on her back but the judges came to the conclusion that she was not aware at all that she had a baby with her and, therefore, the girl was convicted under s 304A, and not under clause 'fourthly' of s 300 . But in Re Karuppal,[77]a woman had been very harshly treated by her husband and was living a life of utmost misery and, therefore, jumped into a well with her two children with the result that the children died. It was held that, as there was no evidence of insanity which would take away the criminality of the act, the woman was guilty of murder; but in view of the extenuating circumstances, even a sentence of transportation for life was considered excessive and a sentence of three years' imprisonment was recommended. From the above decisions, it appears that it is a matter of fact, and not of law, whether a particular act of homicide, committed with the knowledge, described in clause 'fourthly' of this section, is committed without any excuse. As the fourth clause is framed, it need never be determined as a matter of2178 law what circumstances, other than, or falling short of, the five exceptions, constitute an excuse, it being, in each case, a question of fact whether, from the circumstances, which are proved, the just inference is that the act was done without any excuse.[78]

36. If one of the Four Conditions of Section 300 is Satisfied, the Offence is Murder

It is to be noticed that cll (1)-(4) of s 300, IPC define culpable homicide amounting to murder. An offence will amount to murder if any one of the four clauses enumerated under s 300, IPC is satisfied. All the four conditions precedent, enumerated under s 300, IPC are not necessary to co-exist for an offence of murder. It would be sufficient for the prosecution to establish any one of the conditions enumerated under s 300, IPC, against an offender or offenders, as the case maybe, for punishing him or them for an offence of murder.[79] To render culpable homicide to murder, the case must come within the provisions of cll (1), or (2), or (3), or (4), of s 300 .[80] In a case where the prosecution case is supported by direct eyewitness evidence, the rules applicable to a case where death is caused by administering poison and where the fate of the case rests entirely on circumstantial evidence are not applicable when the prosecution has otherwise proved its case against the accused. Its failure to prove the source from which the accused procured the poison would not by itself be of any consequence.[81]

37. Exceptions--Scope of

After setting out the four mental conditions, the section lays down five exceptions which reduce the offence of murder again to 'culpable homicide' which may be said to be culpable homicide not amounting to murder,[82] which mitigates the offence of murder. When a case does not fall under any of the exceptions of this section, the accused can rightly be convicted under s 302, IPC, as when he deliberately caused a fatal injury on the most vital part of body of the deceased.[83] If, however, any one of them is attracted, the prima facie presumption, that the offence is murder, is removed and the offence becomes 'culpable homicide not amounting to murder'.[84] An offence may also amount to culpable homicide, but not murder, even though none of the exceptions in s 300 is applicable to the case.[85]It must be noted that unless the act done constitutes, at least prima facie, a murder by reason of the intention, with which it is found to be done, the court need not consider the exceptions.[86]

The exceptions, specified in this section, are special exceptions which must be distinguished from the general exceptions specified in ch 4 of IPC . The general exceptions rebut the prima facie liability of the offender and he is completely exonerated from blame. But the special exceptions, specified in this section, do not2179 completely exonerate him, but only mitigate the offence, committed by him, and reduce his liability.[87] The five exceptions, specified in the section, may briefly be stated to arise out of:

(i) provocation;
(ii) right of private defence of person or property;
(iii) exercise of legal powers;
(iv) absence of pre-meditation and heat of passion;
(v) consent.

38. Operation of Exceptions

As pointed out by Plowden J, in a case, namely, Re Barkatulla,[88] the operation of the five exceptions to s 300 is practically somewhat different in respect to an act, which falls within one of the first three clauses of s 300, and in respect to an act which falls within the fourth clause. The exceptions operate in this way. The existence of all the circumstances, described in an exception, excuse an act, which would otherwise be murder within one of the first three clauses, to the extent that the act constitutes only culpable homicide not amounting to murder, and not murder. Here the act is *prima facie*murder unless and until an exception is established. There is no inconsistency involved in finding that an act falls within one of these clauses and also falls within an exception, for all the circumstances of any exception may co-exist with the murderous intention. When, however, an act falls within the fourth clause of s 300 as regards the knowledge, with which it is done, and the circumstances, constituting an exception, exist, there is this difference, i.e., it cannot consistently be affirmed (at the end of a trial and upon all the evidence) as an act, causing death, done with the knowledge described, in one breath that it was done without any excuse for running the risk of causing death and in the next breath that it was done under circumstances which the law declares to be an excuse for the act of causing death to the extent of preventing the culpable homicide not amounting to murder. It has been decided, that it is a matter of fact, and not, of law, whether a particular act of homicide, committed with the knowledge described in cl (4) of s 300 is committed without any excuse. As the fourth clause is expressed, like the three preceding clauses, to be subject to the five exceptions, which are legal excuses for murder (as contra-distinguished from culpable homicide), it is evident that the words 'without any excuse' in cl (4) do not mean merely in the absence of the circumstances described in the exceptions. A court, as a judge of fact, is left at liberty to affirm, upon proof of circumstances other than, or falling short of, an exception, not that these circumstances form an excuse for murder, but that, in view of them, the court is unable to affirm that the particular act of homicide was committed without any excuse and is, therefore, unable to pronounce the act to be culpable homicide amounting to murder as defined in cl (4) of s 300 .

Where one of the two accused raises a plea that his case falls under one of the exceptions, the case of the other may also be entitled to the benefit of such defence although the other denies his presence altogether.[89] Where the death caused by the accused was not premeditated and the injuries were not sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to have caused his death, furthermore the accused had no common2180 intention to cause death of deceased, as only accused no. 1 had caused a vital injury on the head of the deceased, it was held that, the case was covered by exceptions 1 and 4 of s 300, IPC . Therefore, the accused no. 1 was convicted under ss 304, Pt I/149 of the IPC .[90]

39. Burden of Proving Exceptions

The law of homicide is contained in ss 299 and 300 of the IPC . If a case falls under s 300 it is murder, unless one of the exceptions to the section is attracted. The other defences to a charge of murder are contained in ch IV of the IPC which prima facie rebuts the liability of the offender and he is completely exonerated from blame. In any case, unless one of the various sections of the IPC applies, the onus under s 105 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 is not discharged.[91] If an accused pleads an exception, then, because of s 105 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, the burden of proving the existence of circumstances, bringing the case within any of the exceptions, lies upon him and the court is enjoined to presume the absence of such circumstances. Consequently, the accused must establish, from the evidence, the existence of such circumstances. The court is precluded to presume them in the absence of their proof; it is precluded from speculating and giving the accused any benefit of doubt on the basis of such speculation.[92] Of course, the accused has merely to satisfy the standard of a prudent man. If the material placed before the court, such as oral and documentary evidence, presumptions, admissions or even prosecution evidence, satisfies the test of a prudent man, the accused will be deemed to have discharged his burden. It may merely raise a reasonable doubt in the mind of the court as regards one, or other, of the necessary ingredients of the offence itself. It may, for instance, raise a reasonable doubt in the mind of the court whether the accused had the requisite intention, laid down in s 299 of the IPC . If the court has such a reasonable doubt, it has to acquit the accused because, in that event, the prosecution must be deemed to have failed to prove conclusively the guilt of the accused.[93] In the case of

In Re Murugian,[94] the bare word of the accused was accepted. However, it cannot be accepted as a principle that, in every case, the bare word of an accused person is sufficient to discharge the burden of proof of an exception. There must be some corroboration, direct or indirect, of the statement of the accused person.[95]

40. Benefit of Exceptions to Accused though not Claimed or Claimed

Belatedly

If, upon the evidence, it appears that the accused is entitled to the benefit of any one of the exceptions, neither the ignorance of the accused, nor the falsity of his defence,2181 nor any mistake or omission of the lower courts or advocates, should deprive him of the benefit of it.[1] The fact, that the accused has not specifically pleaded the right of self-defence or any other exception, should not influence the court in concluding that the plea of self-defence was not available to the accused to any degree.[2] The fact, that the accused has disclosed the circumstances, constituting grave and sudden provocation for the first time only in his statement before the sessions court, is not, by itself, sufficient to dismiss the same out of consideration as being an afterthought counsel for the accused is entitled to rely upon any circumstance which, if accepted, would convert the offence into a lesser one even if such circumstance had not been placed before the court at an earlier stage. The question is whether such circumstances did exist, though it was not disclosed at an earlier stage.[3]

41. Exception 1--Scope of

The defence of provocation rests upon the fact that provocation was grave and sudden by reason of which the accused was deprived of his power of self-control.[4] One of the conditions for the operation of this exception is that the accused must have used force in consequence of grave and sudden provocation. One slap cannot constitute grave provocation even though it may be held to be sudden.[5] Nineteen injuries caused in quick succession cannot be said to have been caused as a result of grave and sudden provocation.[6] It is true that if the modesty of a girl is being outraged or any person tries to molest one's sister then that may give a right to a brother to thrash the person who has done so, but it does not give any sufficient cause to kill that person.[7] Mere objectionable or filthy abuses cannot be said to have deprived one of one's power of self-control[8] though a very foul abuse, hurled by the deceased, may be grave and sudden enough to entitle an accused to the benefit of exception I.[9] It is no defence if the fatal blow is traced not to the influence of passion, arising from the provocation, but after the passion had cooled down by lapse of time for premeditation and calculation.[10] Where the accused went home, came armed with a spear and brought his brothers, who were armed with lathis, it was held that this interval was enough to cool him down.[11] Similarly, where the accused went to his house, which was about a furlong away from the scene of occurrence, and fetched a gun to shoot the victim, it was held that there was sufficient time for him to cool down.[12] But running a distance of 45 yards by the accused was held not to furnish him sufficient time to cool down his indignant passion.[13]

It is the temporary loss, and not the permanent or utter absence of reason of self-control, which is contemplated by this exception and, what is more, such loss of self-2182control must be shown to have been caused by a grave and sudden provocative act or conduct of the victim.[14] An accused, who found his wife, lying with her paramour, almost naked, killed them by an axe, was held entitled to this exception.[15] But the rule, that when wife, mother or married sister, living under care of husband, son or brother, is apprehended having sexual intercourse with a stranger, the killing of that stranger would attract the benefit of grave and sudden provocation, was held not to extend to cases of first cousin, second cousin or others.[16]

Where the wife of the accused threw a vegetable cutter at him causing an injury on his right little finger, it was held that it constituted a grave and sudden provocation, which deprived him of his power of self-control within the meaning of exception 1, keeping in view, the fact that the wife was also refusing conjugal relations to her husband (i.e., the accused) while she was carrying them with her sister's husband. Viewed in this background, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC, was altered into one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[17]

In a case, the niece of the accused had eloped with her school teacher and the accused suspected the hand of the deceased. On the date of the incident the accused was working in his field and the deceased came there and after a long verbal duel, the accused picked up a sickle lying on the ground and delivered a blow on the neck of the deceased. There was no pre-meditation or pre-plan of the accused to cause the death of the deceased. As the accused acted under grave and sudden provocation, and he did not repeat the blow, he was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not s 302, IPC .[18]

42. Law Relating to Exception I

The law, laid down in the undernoted case,[19] relating to exception 1 of s 300, may be stated as under:

(i) the test of grave and sudden provocation is whether a reasonable man, belonging to the same class of society, to which the accused belongs, and placed in the situation, in which the accused was placed, would be so provoked as to lose his self-control;[20]
(ii) words and gestures may also, under certain circumstances, cause grave and sudden provocation to an accused so as to bring his act within exception 1 to s 300 ;
(iii) the mental background created by the previous act of the victim, may be taken into consideration in ascertaining whether the subsequent act caused grave and sudden provocation for committing the offence;[21] and2183
(iv) the fatal blow should be clearly traced to the influence of passion, arising from that provocation, and not after the passion had cooled down by lapse of time, or otherwise giving room and scope for premeditation and calculation.

43. Conditions Necessary for the Application of Exception 1

Under exception 1, culpable homicide is not murder if the following conditions are satisfied:

(i) there must be provocation to the accused;
(ii) the provocation must be grave;
(iii) the provocation must also be sudden;
(iv) the provocation must have deprived the accused of his power of self-control;
(v) the offence must have been committed during loss of self-control; and
(vi) the person killed must have been the person giving provocation, or another by mistake or accident.[22]

In applying the test, it is of particular importance:

(a) to consider whether sufficient interval had elapsed, since the provocation, to allow a reasonable man to cool; and
(b) to take, into account, the instrument, with which the homicide was effected, because a retort in the heat of passion, induced by provocation by a simple blow, is a very different thing from one by making use of a deadly weapon like a concealed dagger.[23]

44. Provocation

Provocation is an external stimulus which can be objectively measured. However, loss of self-control is a subjective phenomenon. To look into the mind of the accused is seldom possible. The state of mind can be inferred from the surrounding circumstances.[24]

The provocation must be such as will upset not merely a hasty, hot-tempered and hypersensitive person, but also a person of ordinary sense and calmness. The law does not take into consideration abnormal creatures reacting abnormally in given situations. It contemplates the acting of normal beings in a given situation and the protection, that is offered by the exception, is the protection for normal beings reacting normally in a given set of circumstances.[25] It all depends on how a particular2184 situation acts on the mind of the person keeping in view his social status and mental background to which a man of his nature could be prone to.[26]

45. Test of 'Grave and Sudden Provocation'

The test of 'grave and sudden' provocation is whether a reasonable man, belonging to the same class of society, to which the accused belonged, and placed in the situation, in which the accused was placed, would be so provoked as to lose his self-control. What a reasonable man will do in certain circumstance depends upon the customs, manners, way of life, traditional values, etc., that is to say, the cultural, social and emotional background of the society to which an accused belongs.[27] So, a reasonable man is a normal man of the same class or community as that to which the accused belongs.[28] In Mahmood v State ,[29] Dhavan J, suggested that whenever the courts refer to a 'reasonable' person, they really mean a normal person. The proper criterion is the likely reaction of a normal person against a similar provocation. Whenever an accused pleads grave provocation in defence, he means that the provocation, under which he killed his victim, was too strong for him to resist, and the simple question before the court is, would a normal person have been able to control himself, if similarly provoked, and did the accused, in killing the deceased, react like any normal person? Thus, the test is not the conduct of the reasonable man, but the impulses and frailties of a normal man and his likely reaction to a similar provocation. In Mahmood v State ,[30] the court pointed out that the question of fact, under the explanation, attached to exception 1, is not whether the accused lost self-control, but whether the provocation was grave enough to prevent the offence from being murder even if the accused did lose self-control. In deciding this question, ordinarily, the general nature of the provocation, rather than its effect on a particular individual, has to be considered. The court has to consider the general nature of the provocation and to decide whether it is provocative enough to make a normal person, in similar circumstances, react so violently as to release his homicidal impulses.

The word 'grave' indicates that provocation be of such a nature so as to give cause for alarm to the accused and 'sudden' means an action which must be quick and unexpected so as to provoke the accused. The question whether the provocation was grave and sudden is a question of fact and not one of law. Each case is to be considered according to its own facts.[31]

46. There must be Provocation to the Accused

The first condition to invoke the operation of exception 1 to s 300 is that there must be provocation to the accused. When fatal injuries have been caused without provocation the offence is punishable under s 302, and not under s 304, Pt I of the2185IPC .[32] Where the provocation came from the side of the accused, the accused was not entitled to the benefit of exception 1.[33]

The accused did not adduce evidence to show that the complainant or his brothers abused or used provocative words/language; exception 1 to s 300 was not attracted in the case. Conviction under s 302, IPC was held proper.[34]

47. Provocation Caused by Act

There may be circumstances which may merely predispose a man to a violent act, but these are not enough to bring the offender within the purview of exception 1. The provocation must be an act, or series of acts, which, by their very nature, would induce sudden and temporary loss of self-control in a reasonable man to such an extent that it can be said that he is no longer the master of his mind.[35]

Where there was admittedly a quarrel between the parties, following an assault on the accused's father, and both sides were injured and the prosecution failed to explain the injuries on accused person, it was held that the defence of grave and sudden provocation might be true.[36] If a person beats another with a shoe, that would be considered to be the height of shame, particularly in the midst of a number of villagers. An attempt to beat a man with a shoe would, therefore, give sufficient provocation to the man intended to be beaten.[37] But, it is impossible to say that a man was deprived of the power of self-control merely by being slapped two or three times on the back. Being slapped cannot be a sufficient provocation.[38] When there is material showing that the deceased prior to incident attempted to outrage the modesty of the niece of the accused provoking the accused, inflicting knife blows on the vital part of the body of the deceased causing death, the case falls under exception 1 to s 300, IPC .[39]

Where the deceased husband was perverted in sexual habits and used to satisfy his lust in an unnatural way and the accused wife killed him, the circumstances showed that she killed her husband under grave and sudden provocation, the case was found covered by exception 1 of s 300, IPC .[40] In Akhtar v State ,[41] the accused had been under the stress of previous provocations. He, however, controlled himself and acted quite reasonably and properly until the very last act of provocation by the use of foul and filthy language, hurled, at the accused's father and the accused himself, by the accused's own brother, who also aggressively advanced towards the accused and grappled with him. It was held that there was sufficient provocation within the meaning of this exception. Where a poor man catches a thief in the act of stealing rice and, on the impulse of the moment, rushes at the thief and belabours him with a2186 stick in a fatal way, it is a clear case of grave and sudden provocation.[42] A threat of a wife to leave her husband forever without any prior reason is indeed provocation and if she goes further and removes the thali (an ornament which, in Southern India, a Hindu woman is made to wear on her marriage and which she is supposed not to part with until the death of the husband) from her neck, which is attributable to the separation of the marital tie with the husband, and throws it, on his face, there is sufficient provocation for the husband to make him lose his self-control and give him the benefit of this exception.[43]

Where a wife not only refuses to give pan to her husband, when he asks for it, but also throws dirty water on his face, it would be an act which would cause the husband to lose, control of himself and would be grave and sudden provocation.[44]Where the accused on seeing the deceased committing the act of sodomy on the son of the accused, lost his power of self-control and it was undoubtedly a grave and sudden provocation for him which led him to commit the murderous assault on the deceased.[45] Where the accused were carrying on their agricultural operation, the deceased came to the field and tried to demarcate the boundary line and caused provocation, on such grave and sudden provocation caused by prosecution party, accused attacked the deceased. The evidence also disclosed that the accused on being suddenly and gravely provoked by the deceased was deprived of her self-control, exception 1 to s 300, IPC attracted to the facts of the case.[46]

Where the accused persons being provoked by the murder of their brother by the son of the deceased, within 15 minutes of the first incident set on fire the house of the deceased causing death of the deceased, his wife and children, it was observed that a time gap of 15 minutes was not sufficient for the members of the family of the accused persons to gain their self control, when they saw the dead body of their brother. It was held that, the accused persons committed murder in question under grave and sudden provocation and their case was fully covered by exception I to s 300, IPC and the accused were convicted under ss 304, Pt I, and 147, IPC .[47]

48. Provocation Caused by Words and Gestures

A notable difference between the English and the Indian law on the subject is that, while there is practically a rule of law in England that mere words and gestures cannot, except in circumstances of most extreme and exceptional character, be sufficient to constitute a grave and sudden provocation, there is no such firmly entrenched rule of any sort in this country about the use of words.[48] Everything depends on the peculiarities of facts and circumstances and the context in which certain words may have been used.[49] Where it was difficult to reach any definite conclusion, on the test of preponderance of probabilities, as to in what circumstances the fight between the deceased and accused originated, there was no previous enmity between the accused and the deceased, nor had the accused come to the scene of2187 occurrence with any predetermined mind or pre-planning and it was in evidence that the incident occurred on the spur of the moment during the course of altercation which ensued between the deceased and the accused, the evidence also did not make it clear, as to what exact altercation did occur between them, its nature and precise words spoken have not been brought on record, the weapon of offence, the spade was not used from its sharp-edged side, but was used only from its blunt end during the entire incident, all these factors, if taken together, would lead to a reasonable inference that the accused may have been deprived of his self-control on account of grave and sudden provocation given by the deceased.[50] In Ullu Mahapatra v King ,[51] it was observed that harsh words never break bones and the law expects a reasonable person to endure abuse without resorting to fatal violence. But in KM Nanavati v State of Maharashtra [52] the Supreme Court held that words and gestures may also, under certain circumstances, cause grave and sudden provocation to an accused so as to bring his case within the first exception to s 300 of the IPC . Where the deceased was a member of a high caste, and the accused belonging to low caste, was subjected to repeated insults by the deceased, the accused requested the deceased, a headmaster in a school for a job which was available in the school, the deceased asked the accused to make available his wife to him for immoral purpose, on these facts it was held that accused lost his self-control and due to grave and sudden provocation, inflicted injuries on the deceased, successively within seconds with knife.[53] In Ghulam Mustafa Gahno v Emperor ,[54] it was held that showing booja, gesture of contempt, by a wife to her husband cannot be said to cause such grave and sudden provocation as to deprive him of his power of self-control.

Information received from a reliable person and believed to be credible as to the existence of a provoking act, which is being done in the immediate neighbourhood and the existence of which is instantaneously verified, can, within the meaning of this exception, be said to be provocation given by the person, committing that act, just as much as if the person provoked had seen it in the first place with his own eyes.[55] However, the mere fact, that deceased described himself as chacha of accused, without mentioning any blood relation between the two, cannot be taken to be such grave and sudden provocation as to attract this exception.[56] Similarly, the act of a child of five years in coming out of her house to spit on the accused and show her legs would not constitute a provocation to sustain the plea of grave and sudden provocation.[57]

There was a verbal argument and heated exchange of words amongst the accused and complainant and his family members over a trivial issue of parking of autorickshaw. The accused no. 3 being driven by grave and sudden provocation gave knife blows to the deceased causing his death. Since there was no pre-meditation and intention to kill the deceased, the case of the accused appellant fell under s 300,2188 exception I, and his conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[58]

Where in a Panchayat convened by the parties for settling some matter, the accused being provoked by certain remarks passed by the deceased, suddenly inflicted a single blow by a knife on the chest of the deceased causing death, the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I and not under s 302, IPC .[59]

49. Provocation Caused by use of Abusive Language

The use of abusive language 'of the foulest kind', addressed to a man, already engaged, would be provocation sufficient to deprive him of self-control.[60] However, a mere vulgar abuse is not such a grave and sudden provocation as is contemplated by this exception.[61] In this last cited case, the deceased, a sardar, was a foul mouthed old man and was in the habit of abusing and bullying his servants and dependants. He abused the accused, a servant, in the morning and further struck him on the forehead causing it to bleed. These insults were offered in the presence of several persons who were the associates and fellow-workmen of the accused. The accused remonstrated and the deceased went away. But he returned at about noon and once again abused the accused in the manner which apparently was habitual with him. This repeated insult infuriated the accused who picked up a hatchet, which happened to be lying nearby, and without any premeditation, made a murderous attack on the deceased. It was held that there was grave provocation. In Amarjit Singh v State [62] the deceased, an unemployed addict father, demanded money from accused, his son, making his demand imperative even if money had to be raised by prostituting his (accused's) mother. The son assaulted the deceased with a knife. It was held that the language as used was sufficient to entitle the accused to the benefit of this exception. Where, in the course of a quarrel between them, the deceased hurled filthy abuses at the accused and even insinuated that he once committed unnatural offence with a pigeon, it was held that there was grave and sufficient provocation within the meaning of this exception.[63]

50. Provocation must be Grave

It is not all provocation that will reduce the crime of murder into mere culpable homicide. Provocation, to have that result, must be such that it temporarily deprives the person provoked of the power of self-control as a result of which he commits the unlawful act which causes death.[64] For the application of the section, the provocation2189 pleaded must be grave. 'Grave' means that it must be serious enough to influence the mind of the person provoked. An accused person, in order to invoke the benefit of the first exception, must distinctly show not only that the act was done under the influence of some feeling, which took away, from the person doing, it, all control over his actions, but also that, that feeling had an adequate cause.[65] Each little provocation cannot be called grave simply because the consequences ensuing from that provocation at the hands of the accused had been grave. The provocation must be such as will upset not merely a hastily, hot-tempered and hypersensitive person, but even a person of ordinary sense and calmness.[66] If provocation does not result in immediate retaliation and motive to take revenge emerges, the accused cannot claim benefit of exception I to s 300, IPC .[67] A bare statement by the accused, that he regarded the provocation as grave, will not be accepted by the court. The court has to apply an objective test for deciding whether the provocation was grave. An ordinary exchange of abuses is a matter of common occurrence. A reasonable man does not lose self-control merely on account of an ordinary exchange of abuses. An ordinary exchange of abuses is not, therefore, treated as the basis for a grave provocation.[68] Where the accused killed his wife not only because he was angry with her as she had gone away to her father's house to inquire about his health without the accused's permission, but also because he was annoyed that she refused to depart with him at once, it was held that it could not be said to amount to provocation, far less grave and sudden provocation.[69] Similarly, the mere sight of an enemy, travelling in another lorry, cannot be said to be a grave and sudden provocation.[70] Passions of a person in a drunken condition are probably easily aroused when he sees his aunt being beaten by her husband, but that is not the kind of provocation, contemplated by this exception; if he kills his uncle his offence is murder, and not culpable homicide, though sentence may be reduced.[71] The mere refusal of a wife to have conjugal connection with her husband cannot be said to cause grave provocation to him.[72] But a person, who finds his wife and her paramour in flagrante delicto, undoubtedly receives the highest provocation and the indulgence, which the law shows in such cases, is condescension to the frailty of human nature.[73]Ram Kumar v State of Haryana ,[74] was a case wherein the accused and the deceased were real brothers, the former exhorting the latter to discontinue illicit connection with the widow of their brother. The deceased protested in hot words whereupon the accused picked up knife, lying on a hand-cart, and caused a thrust on the back of neck resulting in death of the deceased. It was held that the case fell under the first exception because the accused2190 acted, while deprived of power of self-control, under grave and sudden provocation. Where a concubine, for whom the accused grievously injured his wife and sacrificed his caste, left him for another connection, it was held that it was a grave provocation to the accused.[75] Where the wife of the accused, a Hindu, hurled one of the most intolerable imprecations upon him that 'he would be eating cow's flesh if he cooked and ate in the house', it was held that the provocation was grave.[76] Where deceased caught hold of hand of wife of accused and asked her to come with him, somehow she got herself released and ran away to her house and informed the accused about the incident, accused went to deceased and gave an axe blow which proved fatal behaviour of the deceased in normal course was bound to cause great provocation to the accused a tribal because of which the offence was committed.[77]

A person claiming the benefit of provocation has to show that the provocation was so grave and sudden that he was deprived of power of self-control and that he caused the death of a person while he was still in that state of mind.[78]

Where the deceased was unarmed and was only trying to wake up the accused so as to do patrolling duty, the action of deceased to slap and push the accused, could not be characterized as grave and sudden, so as to provoke the accused to fire at the deceased killing him on the spot. In such a case, the plea of grave and sudden provocation was rejected and the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was not converted into one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[79]

Where the accused who was humiliated by his superior, after six hours while still on the guard duty shot the deceased dead, it was held that the provocation was not sudden and grave and he was not entitled to protection of exception I and was convicted under s 302, IPC .[80]

51. 'Sudden' Involves two Elements

The word 'sudden' involves two elements. First, the provocation must be unexpected. If an accused plans, in advance, to receive a provocation in order to justify the subsequent homicide, the provocation cannot be said to be sudden. Secondly, the interval between the provocation and the homicide should be brief. If the man, giving the provocation, is killed within a minute after the provocation, it is a case of sudden provocation. If the man is killed after six hours of the provocation, it is not a case of sudden provocation.[81]

52. Provocation must also be Sudden

The provocation must be grave as well as sudden to entitle the accused to the indulgence of the exception I.[82] Grave provocations, suffered by the accused over a2191 long series of years, are insufficient, in the absence of evidence of recent and sudden provocation, to reduce the offence of killing to culpable homicide.[83] If the provocation is not immediate and grave, but is the culmination of a long period of swaggering and insult, which finally makes an accused lose his temper, the benefit of exception 1 cannot be given to him.[84] A provocation, however grave, which is not sudden, but is a chronic one, will not satisfy the requirements of this exception.[85]In a case of intentional killing, the fact, that the intention was sudden and the impulse momentary and even uncontrollable, is no mitigation unless it can be shown that the act was the result of grave and sudden provocation.[86] Where the true reason for assault was that, a month or so before the incident, the deceased had attempted to outrage, the modesty of the accused's wife, it was held that the interval between the incident and the assault was too long to afford to him the benefit of exception I.[87] If a husband, finding his wife actually committing adultery, kills her or her lover at once, that, of course, would be grave and sudden provocation; but where the injured husband has time for deliberation, this exception will not apply. The reason for excusing a person, who acts under grave and sudden provocation, is that he has lost his reason. If, however, the accused shows that he has deliberated in any way, or there has been a lapse of time, which would enable him to cool down, he cannot be said to be acting under sudden provocation. Therefore, this exception would not apply though the sentence may be reduced.[88] In KM Nanavati v State of Maharashtra ,[89] the Supreme Court has pointed out that the mental background, created by the previous act of the victim, may be taken into consideration in ascertaining whether the subsequent act caused grave and sudden provocation for committing the offence, but that is, in itself, insufficient to invoke the provisions of exception 1. The accused, hearing that his sister was having illicit connection with the deceased, picked up an axe, went to the sister's home, broke open the door and, finding the deceased with his sister, killed both of them with the axe. It was held that provocation, though grave, was not sudden.[90] In another case, in which the accused, seeing his sister and her paramour having illicit connection, killed both of them, the Allahabad High Court gave him the benefit of this exception and observed:

> "Of course, there is a difference between the provocation, which a man receives when he finds another man committing adultery with his wife, and the provocation, which he receives when he finds his sister dishonouring his family by having illicit intercourse with a man; still, the latter provocation, cannot, in commonsense and in one's experience of the world, be looked upon as a light one.[91]"

But in a Madras case, it has been held that when a wife or mother or married sister, living under the projection of the husband or son or brother, is caught in the act of2192 having sexual intercourse with a stranger, the killing of that stranger by the husband, son or brother, before there is time to get over the sudden anger, would be only an offence under s 304, IPC . However, a person, who is not the guardian or custodian of a woman, would have no similar right to kill her and claim to be convicted only under s 304, IPC .[92]

But, for the provocation to be sudden, it is not necessary that it should have immediately preceded the killing in point of time. There have been cases in which the accused had the provocation of adultery, being committed by the deceased with his wife, and the killing was after an interval of time during which the accused had to wait for the deceased to come out of the room or the deceased was taken to some distance.[93] In Boya Munigadu v Queen ,[94] in the evening, preceding the commission of the murder, the accused saw the deceased having connection with his (accused's) wife and was intensely moved by what he saw, but he did not interfere then. The next morning, he saw his wife eating with the deceased and giving him food while she left her husband without it. Enraged at this, the accused immediately killed the deceased. Giving the accused the benefit of this exception, it was observed that, that amounted to provocation, grave enough and sudden enough to deprive him of his self-control, and reduced the offence from murder to culpable homicide not amounting to murder. In a Madras case, it was first reported to the accused that his wife gave betel-nut to another man, it being a sign of intimacy between the two. Then, on the day of occurrence, he saw his wife and that man weeding in a field side by side and their bodies frequently coming in contact. This greatly exasperated the accused. He subsequently upbraided his wife first, but she told him that she could do just as she liked and that there were thousands of men as good as he. Upon this, he killed her in a passion. It was held that the provocation, thus received by the accused, was sufficiently grave and sudden to bring the killing of his wife under this exception.[95]

Where the deceased had abused the accused and called him "gandu", thereafter the accused on the next day stabbed the deceased with knife, it was held that the accused had time to deliberate, and had planned to kill the deceased, and therefore, he was not entitled to benefit of exception I to s 300, IPC .[96]

In a case, the wife of the accused left the house and started living with another person and she did not return to the house of the accused on the message sent to her. It was observed that the accused had reasonable time to go to the carpenter's shop for picking up a Baditha and dealt the deceased with the Baditha; further it was held that this was not a grave and sudden provocation for the accused to give such fatal injuries to his wife. Therefore, the case was not covered under the clause of grave and sudden provocation.[97]

In the instant case, the wife of the accused had eloped with the deceased one week before the incident and she returned on 12 April 2000, and the incident took place in the evening of 14 April 2000. It was held that, the case was not covered by exception I to s 300, IPC, the provocation even if was grave, was not sudden.[98]2193

Where on account of an old enmity, the accused persons went to theatre, called out the deceased watching movie, quarreled with him, threatened and stabbed him causing death, it was held that exception I to s 300 was not attracted in the case.[1] Also, in the case of Imtiaz v State of UP [2], based on the facts and circumstances of the case, the plea of grave and sudden provocation was rejected. Where the accused husband asked his wife to withdraw the maintenance proceedings and after she refused, the accused inflicted polpat blow on her head resulting in death, it was held that the case was not covered by exceptions I and III to s 300 . Where the wife refuses to withdraw the maintenance proceedings, the mere denial of the wife would not amount to grave and sudden provocation within the meaning of exception I to s 300, IPC . Further the alleged provocation was sought by the accused himself.[3]

53. Lapse of Time Converts Provocation into Resentment

Provocation must be distinguished from resentment.[4] Lapse of time changes the former into the latter, which is founded on revenge, and not upon the absence of self-control caused by passion. A, believing that he had been the victim of witchcraft at the hands of his brother during the past three or four months, suddenly attacked and killed him. This was held to be murder.[5] A man's feeling, that the deceased was misbehaving with his wife, must cause a provocation to him to retaliate; but when such feeling of provocation is a long standing one, gaining intensity from day to day until finally the person, harbouring such feeling, yields to the provocation by attacking his enemy, it cannot be said that he is acting under grave and sudden provocation. On the other hand, the provocative feeling which he was entertaining for some time can only be termed the motive for the act committed by him.[6]

54. Whether the Provocation, in a Given Case, was Grave and Sudden is a Question of Fact

The explanation, at the end of exception 1, is very important because it enjoins that the question, whether the provocation was grave and sudden enough to prevent the offence from being murder, should be treated as a question of fact, and not as a question of law. It follows, therefore, that each case must be considered according to its own facts and the court must decide, on the particular circumstances of that case, whether the provocation was grave and sudden enough to permit an indulgent view of the crime committed by the accused.[7] The court must consider the reaction of a normal man, whose impulses are conditioned by the same environment as that of the accused, and not of a normal man in the abstract. What is grave and sudden provocation to a Baluchi may not be grave and sudden provocation to an Englishman2194 or vice versa.[8] Precisely, for this reason, the legislature has made the gravity of a provocation a question of fact and left it to the court to decide each case according to its own peculiar circumstances.[9] There can be no direct evidence as to what was the psychological effect of the provocation upon the mind of a person in certain circumstances. The state of mind of a person has to be gathered from proved facts.[10] Similarly, if it is proved that the accused did receive grave and sudden provocation, it will generally be assumed that the homicide was committed while the accused was deprived of the power of self-control.[11]

In the case of Re Murugian[12] the Madras High Court observed:

> "We should view it as a psychological problem, and not one where reasoning, as to the legality or otherwise, of the rights of parties is to be considered before the emotion of the man is roused to action. Each case has to be considered in the circumstances that prevail at the given situation, and there can be no generalization on such issues."

55. Grave and Sudden Provocation in Instances

Following are instances of grave and sudden provocation to accused:

(a) Deceased catching hold of wife of accused and asking her to go with him.[13]
(b) Rape of wife of the accused.[14]
(c) Deceased boasting that he is paramour of wife of the accused and openly expressing his intention to take her to live with him.[15]
(d) Accused carrying agricultural operation and deceased came to the field and tried to demarcate boundary lines to the field.[16]
(e) Insult to low caste accused by high caste deceased.[17]
(f) Deceased wife insisted on going to native town alone where she had extra-marital affair and such insistence leading to quarrel between her and accused.[18]
(g) Explanatory part of dying declaration of deceased clearly indicated that on the day of incident, the deceased did something so objectionable while cutting jokes with sister of the accused that blood quickly rushed to accused's head and the accused picked up loaded revolver of deceased and fired repeated shots at the deceased. Accused was deprived of power of self control by such grave and sudden provocation occasioned by obscene and objectionable behavior of deceased with his blood sister.[19]2195

(h) The deceased who used to collect waste papers from the roadside, collected the waste papers and cardboard boxes and threw them inside the shop of the accused. On seeing this, the accused got angry and shouted at deceased and pulled his hair. The deceased thereupon pushed the accused and the accused took a knife from the top of a table in the shop and stabbed the deceased in the chest. The deceased fell down due to this injury and died. It was held that the accused was deprived of the power of self control by grave and sudden provocation which led him to commit the offence. It is evident that the accused had no motive or intention to cause the death of the deceased since the accused was not carrying the knife from before, and only picked it up during the scuffle with the deceased. The incident resulted in a sudden fight and in the heat of passion, without the accused having taken undue advantage or having acted in a cruel or unusual manner. Hence, the accused was entitled to the benefit of exceptions 1 and 4 to s 300 and the case was under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[20]

(i) Where there was evidence that the deceased came drunk and started abusing and beating his father, on the call of the father, the accused (brother of the accused) came armed with a small axe and inflicted injuries on his head causing death, the act of the accused was out of grave and sudden provocation and was covered by exception to s 300, IPC and the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[21],

56. Insolent Answer of Wife, Whether Grave and Sudden Provocation

Where the accused asked his wife to cook his food and, on her declining to do so saying that she would rather die in a sweeper's house than cook meals for him, dealt several blows on her, with an axe, with a fatal result, it was held that the answer, given by the wife, could not be treated as sufficient provocation within the meaning of this exception.[22] Similarly, where the accused suspected his wife to be in criminal intimacy with one N and, one day, on seeing her going towards the house of N, asked her not to go there and, on her giving a defiant answer, brutally attacked her and brought about her death, it was held that the defiant tone of the answer could, to some extent, amount to provocation, but it was not sufficiently grave, nor was it surprisingly sudden.[23]

In Inayat v Emperor ,[24] the accused's younger sister, the deceased, who had left her husband and was living under the care of accused, was suspected to be of an immoral character. On the night of murder, at about 3 am, she had gone to meet a stranger in the cattle shed at the back of the house for a clandestine purpose. When the accused asked the deceased why she did not give up her evil ways, she refused to listen to him and gave an insolent reply. Thereupon, the accused gave her a blow with a hatchet which caused her death. It was held that the provocation, received by the2196 accused was, in the circumstances, almost as grave and sudden as it would have been if he had seen the deceased in the act of sexual intercourse with a stranger and it was further aggravated by insolvent reply given by the deceased and that the case properly fell within the purview of s 304, Pt I.

57. Confession of Adultery by Wife--Whether Grave and Sudden Provocation

In England, when the wife suddenly confesses to her husband that she has committed adultery with someone, it is treated as equivalent to a discovery of the act itself.[25] Same is the situation in India.[26] In Nga Saw Maung v Emperor ,[27] the accused found his wife pregnant and, suspecting that there was something wrong before and that he was not the father of the child, inquired of her if she had been cohabiting with a particular person. She said 'yes' in a taunting manner. The accused immediately stabbed her to death. It was held that it was hardly possible to imagine graver provocation being received and that the accused was guilty of culpable homicide, and not of murder. In an Allahabad case, the accused's wife was grossly immoral and he upbraided her with her misconduct. Instead of being repentant, she said that she would again do such acts upon his head. Thereupon, he became enraged and struck her with a stick. She struggled with him and caught hold of his fingers and bit them. He then lost control of himself and took out a knife and stabbed her to death. It was held that there was sufficient provocation to come within this exception.[28] Where accused found his wife in a compromising position with another man so assaulted her with a stick in the heat of passion and she died after receiving injuries, accused was found guilty under s 304, Pt I, and not under s 302 IPC .[29]

In Imbichi Koya v Emperor ,[30] it was held that the principle, that if a wife suddenly confesses to her husband that she had committed adultery, it may be treated as equivalent to the discovery of the act itself and if the husband forthwith kills her, the offence is only one of culpable homicide not amounting to murder and cannot be extended to a case of murder, by the husband, of the paramour with whom his wife had confessed to have committed adultery. If the wife tells her husband that she has committed adultery with a man that would not be grave and sudden provocation for the murder of the paramour. In Re Muthappa Goundan,[31] another Division Bench of the Madras High Court agreed with this view. It, however, makes no difference, whether the deceased is the wife or mistress of the deceased.[32] But where the altercation between accused and wife began the previous night when he had refused to have intercourse with her, his wife compared the manner of intercourse of her paramour with her and she even told him that if he was not willing to come she2197 would get her paramour and under the very nose of her husband (accused) would indulge in such intercourse, the altercation between accused and his wife over the affair took place the whole night even when, he came back following afternoon again the deceased wife quarreled with him and he lost control, he took a chisel (an instrument used in carpentry) and killed his wife, accused was held entitled to benefit of exception 1 of s 300, IPC .[33] Where the evidence clearly showed that the accused was piqued due to his recently acquired knowledge that the deceased had betrayed him and he wanted to finish the deceased for that reason, he had clear intention to kill the deceased and there was no evidence of the deceased lady providing him any provocation what to talk of sudden and grave provocation to the accused for commission of the offence, it was true that prosecution witness (PW1) was not aware of the language in which the accused and the deceased must have been conversing but that did not mean that there must have been some grave and sudden provocation at the hands of the lady which resulted in assault on her body by the appellant in view of the fact that the accused himself had uttered the crucial words in Hindi which could be understood by the two prosecution witnesses (PW1 and PW2) that he wanted to teach a lesson of life to the lady as she had betrayed him in love, on these facts the accused was found not entitled to the benefit of exception 1 to s 300, IPC and his conviction under s 302, IPC, by the sessions court was upheld.[34]

58. Provocation must have Deprived the Accused of his Power of Self-control

Under exception 1, the provocation must not only be grave and sudden but it must also have, by its gravity and suddenness, deprived the accused of the power of self-control.[35]In other words, it ought to be distinctly shown not only that the act was done under the influence of some feeling, which took away, from the person, doing it, all control of his action, but also that feeling had an adequate cause.[36] The adequate cause should be strong enough to make a normal man lose his self-control.[37] It is an essential condition for the operation of exception 1 that the offender, by reason of the provocation, shall have been deprived of the power of self-control.[38] So, provocation is an excuse only when the accused is thereby deprived of the power of self-control and unless it is found that the provocation had destroyed the power of self-control, the proof of provocation is no defence.[39] Where the accused were carrying on their agricultural operation, the deceased came to the field and tried to demarcate a boundary line and caused provocation, on such grave and sudden provocation caused by prosecution party, the accused attacked the deceased, the evidence also discharged that the accused on being suddenly and gravely provoked by the deceased, was deprived of her self-control, and hence exception 1 to s 300, IPC, was attracted to the facts of the case.[40]

Where the deceased was a member of high caste and accused belonged to a low caste and the former subjected the latter to repeated insults, and the accused2198 requested the deceased, a headmaster in school for a job which was available in school, the deceased asked the accused to make available his wife to him for immoral purpose, it was held that the accused lost his self-control and due to grave and sudden provocation, inflicted injuries on the deceased, successively within seconds with a knife.[41] In a case, it was held that the action of a wife, assaulting her husband with a sword and chasing him particularly when he has actually received some injuries, must be taken to be sufficient to provoke the husband to the extent of losing self-control when he snatches the sword from wife and inflicts on her fatal injury.[42] However, in another case, the deceased, the unarmed elder brother of the drunken accused, advised the accused to stop drinking and each abused the other. The accused then brought a naked kirpan and gave a blow with it across the throat of the deceased causing fatal injuries. It was observed that it could not be said from the evidence that there was any provocation which could be regarded as grave or that, in the situation, in which the two brothers were placed at the relevant time; the accused must have been deprived of the power of self-control.[43] In one case, it was remarked that mere unfounded suspicion, that the wife of the accused was carrying on an intrigue with someone is not enough to allow the accused to take the life of his wife.[44] There are, however, cases where suspicion of infidelity coupled with conduct of the wife, has been held to be sufficient to bring the case within this exception.[45]

An offence resulting from grave and sudden provocation would normally mean that a person placed in such circumstances could lose self-control but only temporarily and that too, in proximity to the time of provocation. The provocation could be an act or series of acts done by the deceased to the accused resulting in inflicting of injury.[46]

59. Offence must have been Committed during Loss of Self-control

Another essential condition for the application of exception 1 is that the accused should have killed the deceased during the continuance of loss of the power of self-control of which he was deprived by the grave and sudden provocation. The fatal blow should be traced to the influence of the passion, arising from that provocation, and not when the passion has cooled down by lapse of time or has otherwise given room and scope for premeditation and calculation.[47] Thus, the exception applies only if death is caused during the time when the offender is deprived of the power of self-control as a result of grave and sudden provocation. If the degree and duration of the loss of the power of self-control are not commensurate with the degree of gravity of provocation, the benefit of this exception cannot be availed of by the offender.[48]It has to be shown that the act, causing death, was committed after loss of self-control, but before self-possession had an opportunity to return. This can often be presumed2199 from the existence of a grave provocation and the sudden and drastic character of the violent and hasty act, immediately following the provocation; but facts and circumstances may sometimes exist which destroy the presumption and show that self-possession was not actually lost.[49] A husband, finding a man in his room at night, who has come there for the purpose of intriguing with his wife, would receive the gravest provocation; and if he kills the seducer then and there, his offence would not amount to murder. But when a man has time to cool down, i.e., if he, after seizing the intruder, under the circumstances stated above, takes him away to another room and, after being joined by another man there and so being in a position to render all resistance hopeless, deliberately first knocks his enemy down and then suffocates him with a bamboo-pole, placed and pressed upon his neck, the pole having been fetched from outside, he can hardly plead the extenuating circumstances provided for in this exception.[50] If, therefore, the accused shows that he has deliberated in any way, or there has been a lapse of time, which would enable him to cool down, then he cannot be said to be acting under sudden provocation.[51]However, the rule, contained in exception 1, does not contemplate that, in order to entitle the accused to earn the mitigation provided for, the act must immediately follow the provocation. In Abalu Das v Emperor ,[52] the court thought that the provocation was of a nature that would continue to influence the feelings of the accused for a considerable period after the culprit was found in the company of his wife. Where, therefore, the accused saw his wife and her lover, actually committing adultery, or, at least, together in a room, and he first grappled with the lover and killed him and then turned to his wife and killed her, it was held that it would not be a justification to say that any considerable period intervened between the two murders.[53] The question to be determined in such a case is how long the provocation continued to weigh on the mind of the accused. There must be some material on the record to enable the court to determine that question. Where there is nothing which leads the court to suppose that the accused acted on anything but grave provocation, the fatal stroke must be referred to the immediate impulse of such provocation.[54]

Nineteen injuries caused in quick succession cannot be said to have been caused as a result of grave and sudden provocation. Appellant accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[55]

It is impossible to lay down a hard and fast rule as to when a person can be said to have had time to cool down and thus to be deprived of the benefit of this exception. Much depends on the individual characteristics of the accused and that element cannot be ignored in the determination of this matter. In a Lahore case, the accused saw the deceased, who had contacted a liaison with his daughter-in-law, entering his house. He informed his son, who was at a short distance, of what he saw. Then they both came to the house and, seeing the daughter-in-law and the deceased together in2200 a compromising position, killed the deceased. It was held that even if the father had seen the deceased, entering his house in his absence, when he was at a short distance from his house, he must have been provoked to such a degree as to lose his sense then and there, and if he further informed his son, of what he had seen, and came to his house, accompanied by his son, he had no time to cool down, so to say, and thus return to his normal condition. The whole thing formed a series of one transaction and the provocation continued until such time when the deed was done.[56] But there should be some circumstance to indicate that the act of the accused was done in the same transaction in which he received the grave and sudden provocation.[57] In Bansi v State ,[58] the benefit of exception 1 was not given to the accused because, by the time the attack was launched, an appreciable amount of time had passed, thereby disentitling him to plead that he had been deprived of the power of self-control.

60. Person Killed must be the Person Giving Provocation to Another by Mistake or Accident

Another condition for the application of this exception is that the offender must have caused the death of the person who gave the provocation or that of any other person by mistake or accident.[59] The fact, that the provocation did not proceed directly from the victim, renders exception 1 to s 300 inapplicable to a particular case. If some other factors, emanating from other sources, intervene, which lead to the provocation, and the fatal blow cannot be traced directly to the influence of passion, arising from the conduct of the victim, the accused is deprived of the benefit of exception I.[60]Where, without any sudden and grave provocation from the deceased, who was an innocent intervener between the accused and his (accused's) father in a quarrel, the accused caused fatal injuries to the deceased with a knife, it was held that the act of the accused was a cruel act and his conviction under s 302, IPC, was proper.[61]

61. Provisos

The first exception to this section is subject to three provisos which are really exceptions to the exception.

62. First Proviso

The first proviso to exception 1 of this section says that the provocation will not be deemed to be grave and sudden when that provocation is sought, or voluntarily caused, by the offender as an excuse for killing or doing harm to any person.[62]When the accused himself was responsible for inviting provocation, the subsequent act of deceased by opening fire from their respective weapons upon the deceased and another and in this factual situation, the accused was responsible in inviting provocation from the complainant party who returned fire, the subsequent fact of2201 accused person of firing upon them cannot be brought within the four corners of exception I.[63] The effect of the proviso is that provocation does not reduce murder to culpable homicide under the first exception if the provocation is sought, or courted, by the offender, or if it is voluntarily caused by him, as an excuse for killing or doing harm to any person. A person cannot 'pick a quarrel' with another in order to fight and then plead the fight as being a provocation. Nor can a man 'go out of his way' in order to be provoked. Seeking provocation is best illustrated in adultery cases. In Queen v Lachan ,[64] the accused was convicted of culpable homicide not amounting to murder in respect of his cousin's widow who lived with him. The evidence showed that the accused was seen to follow the deceased for a considerable distance with a gandasa under circumstances which indicated that he wanted to detect whether she was going to keep an assignation. He found her in the act of connection with her paramour and killed her. The court held that the conviction should be altered to one of murder as the accused went deliberately in search of the provocation, sought to be made the mitigation of his offence, and under circumstances disclosed, it could not be said that he was deprived of self-control by grave and sudden provocation. Where the accused, who knew that his sister had gone to meet the deceased, with whom she had illicit connection, deliberately went to the spot with the intention of killing the culprit if he found him with his sister and killed him on finding him with her, it was held that he sought the provocation by deliberately going to the scene of the meeting.[65] Similarly, where the accused themselves started the trouble and offered earlier provocation by calling the opponents by beat of drum and calling them for a fight, it was held that the fact that the challenge by the deceased was couched in strong indecent language, cannot be considered to be grave and sudden provocation, as is contemplated by the first exception, especially when it is read along with the first proviso to the said exception.[66] Where the husband attacked his unarmed wife with pestle without any threat or danger to his life, the deceased wife caught hold of private parts of the husband in order to save herself but could not save herself and the result was that husband accused ultimately killed her by hitting her on her head, here the husband cannot be said to have acted in exercise of right of private defence.[67]

63. Second Proviso

This proviso is illustrated by illusts (c) and (d). It is not limited to what is done by public servants only; it also includes acts done by any person in obedience to law. Grave provocation, given by anything done under cover of obedience to the law, or under cover of its authority, or by a public servant, or in defence in excess of what is strictly warranted by the law, in point of violence, or as regards the means used, or the manner of using them and the like, would be admissible in extenuation of homicide under this proviso.2202

64. Third Proviso

The right of private defence is available against an offence and, therefore, where an act is done in exercise of the right of private defence, such act cannot give rise to any right of private defence in favour of the aggressor in return. This would seem to be so even if the person exercising the right of private defence, has the better of his aggressor, provided, of course, he does not exceed his right because the moment he exceeds it, he commits an offence. There is also no right of private defence in cases where there is time to have recourse to the protection of public authorities. The right of private defence is essentially a defensive right, circumscribed by the statute, available only when the circumstances clearly justify it. It would not be allowed to be pleaded, or availed of as a pretext for a vindictive aggressive or retributive purpose. According to s 97, IPC, this right vests even in strangers for the defence of the body or property of other persons against offences mentioned therein. The courts have, therefore, to be careful in seeing that no one, on the mere pretext of the exercise of the right of private defence, takes sides in a quarrel between two or more persons and inflicts injuries on the one or the other. In case, where two parties are having a free fight without disclosing as to who is the initial aggressor, it may be dangerous as a rule, to clothe, either of them or his sympathiser, with a right of private defence. If, however, one of them is shown to be committing an offence affecting the human body, then that would, of course, seem to give rise to such a right.[68]

65. Exception 2--Scope of

The IPC recognises the right of private defence of a person and property against certain offences (s 97, IPC) and declares that nothing is an offence which is done in the exercise of such right of private defence (s 96, IPC). The right of private defence, however, is made subject to certain restrictions. In the first instance, the right, in no case, extends to the inflicting of more harm than it is necessary to inflict for the purpose of defence (s 99, IPC). If, therefore, a person, exercising the right of private defence, causes death where it is not necessary to do so for the purpose of such defence, he exceeds the power so given to him by law within the meaning of this exception.[69] Then again, the right extends to the causing of death only in defence against certain offences enumerated in ss 100 and 103, IPC .[70]

Against other offences, the right of private defence extends only to causing any harm other than death, (ss 101 and 104, IPC). Even if death is caused in the exercise of the right of private defence of body or property against the offence, mentioned in ss 100 and 103, subject of course, to the restrictions as mentioned in s 99 it is no offence at all (s 96), nor even culpable homicide not amounting to murder, and no question arises as to the application of exception 2 to s 300 .[71] The accused need not affirmatively establish that he had a right of private defence and he exercised the same in that manner. This general exception which deals with the right of private defence lays an emphasis on the reasonable apprehension in the mind of accused while exercising the right of private defence. Where an injury is found on the accused, and if the accused comes forward with a specific plea of private defence, the2203 same has to be considered in the facts and the surrounding circumstances obtained in the case. Every kind of explanation put forward particularly at the belated stage by the prosecution will not be sufficient and cannot be held to be an appropriate explanation to reject the version put forward by the accused, particularly when it does not appear to be false but, on the other hand, appears to be plausible.[72]

The question of the operation of this exception arises only if the alleged offender exceeds the right of private defence[73] subject to the limitations, that (a) the accused caused the death of a person without premeditation; and (b) he caused the death of the victim, without any intention of doing more harm than what was necessary for the purpose of defence even if the harm caused was more than what was necessary for the purpose of defence.[74]In order to attract the benefit of this exception, it is necessary to show that the act of the accused was without any intention of doing more harm than what was necessary for the purpose of private defence where the deceased was made disabled and defenseless and the number of attacks on him were definitely with the intention of doing more harm than what was necessary for ousting him from taking forcible possession of the disputed land, it was held that this exception was not attracted.[75] Thus, what this exception means is explained below:

If a person, who possesses the right of private defence, infact, does no more than what is necessary for him to do, he commits no offence; but if he exceeds the right, it is still a lesser offence than murder if his intention was to do no more harm than what he believed necessary in the exercise of his right. The exception deals, in the concluding words, not with fact, but with intention, and refers to circumstances, in which a person does not take advantage of the right of private defence to kill with a vengeful motive, but exceeds that right by inflicting fatal injuries where their infliction was, in fact, unnecessary and where there was reckless criminality, though the right of private defence was the only impulse operating in the mind.[76]

This exception is a necessary corollary of s 99 IPC .[77]

In a case, the accused after inflicting injuries on R, ran towards P, who was standing 10 steps away from the place of incident, who after seeing the incident relating to the death of R started running away and he was chased by the accused persons who then inflicted lathi blows on P, thereby causing his death. It was held that in such situation the accused had no right to invoke right of self defence by chasing P and causing fatal injuries to him. The reasonable apprehension disappeared when P was running away to escape from the scene, therefore, the conviction of the accused under ss 302 / 34 was held proper.[78]

66. Requirements of Exception 2

The benefit of this exception can be invoked where an accused person has exercised the right of private defence of person or property in good faith and, then, had2204 exceeded that power, which the law had given to him, and has caused the death of his antagonist without premeditation and without any intention of doing more harm than what was necessary for the purpose of such defence.[79] In considering the question whether the accused exceeded the right of private defence, the court has to consider the part played by the accused persons, gravity of the offence committed and nature of attack made by them.[80] Normally, if there is non-explanation of the injuries on the person of accused, it may at the most give scope to argue that the accused had the right of private defence.[81] If the person has exercised his right (a) in good faith, (b) without premeditation of death, and (c) without any intention of doing more harm than what was necessary, then his offence will be culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[82] But the said three conditions must occur; otherwise the offence will be murder. It will have to be borne in mind that if, after commission of an assault of simple or grievous nature, there is, in any case, no further apprehension of assault, occasion for the exercise of right of private defence of body should not arise. At the same time, the possibility of infliction of further assault, likely to cause grievous bodily injury, cannot, as a rule, be ruled out on the mere ground that the injury or the injuries, already inflicted, are simple. The law, in this respect, honours the human instinct of self-preservation. In considering whether one is entitled to exercise the right of private defence of his body, one has to place himself in the position of the accused in the midst of circumstances, in which he stood, and to form his opinion, whether, for him in those circumstances, it was not fairly wise to apprehend such an injury to the body as would entitle him to exercise the right that he claims to have done. Where an accused, charged with murder, asserts that he killed in self-defence, his state of mind at the time of the killing becomes material and important in determining his justification or his belief in an impending attack by the deceased.[83] However, an accused cannot escape the liability for his assault merely by asserting that he exercised the right of private defence. There should be some evidence, direct or indirect, indicating either positively or showing at least the reasonable possibility of right of private defence having been exercised by the accused. A bald assertion of the exercise of right of private defence, without anything more, cannot deflect the scale against the prosecution if the evidence adduced by the prosecution, satisfactorily establishes that the accused had deliberately and wilfully caused injuries without any excuse[84] though it is not for the accused to prove beyond reasonable doubt that he acted in self-defence; he has only to raise a probability in his favour of the same being true.[85]

Where the injuries of the accused were self-inflicted, and the accused refused to undergo radiological examination of the injuries and failed to tell the doctor as to how and why he got the injuries, the plea of the accused that he attacked the deceased to save the life of his father was rejected.[86] Once it is established that there was the2205 existence of the right of private defence, the burden shifts to the prosecution to prove that such right had been exceeded.[87]

The accused armed with a kulhari in his hand went to the house of the deceased and hacked both the deceased to death one after another. The accused had not received any injury and the very fact that the accused committed the murder of two persons one after the other ruled out the plea of private defence. Further, a woman by virtue of its feminine nature and with a feeble body, ordinarily would not pose a threat or danger to the life of a well bodied man with a lathi. Therefore, the plea of private defence was rejected; and accused was convicted under s 302, IPC[88].

Where it was found that the death of two persons occurred due to the firing resorted to by the accused as part of his self-defence, the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC[89].

67. There must be a Right of Private Defence

The first requirement of exception 2 is that the accused must have had a right of private defence of body or of property and he must have exercised it.[90] It is not attracted when no right of private defence accrued to the accused who inflicts fatal injuries to the deceased.[91] If there is no initial right of private defence, then there can hardly be any question exceeding that right.[92] Normally if there is non-explanation by the prosecution about the injuries on the accused persons, it may at the most give scope to argue that the accused had the right of private defence or in general that the prosecution evidence should be rejected as they have not come out with the whole truth, particularly regarding the genesis of the occurrence.[93] Where the accused persons received injuries during the same occurrence in which the complainants were injured and when they had taken the plea that they acted in self-defence, which cannot be lightly ignored particularly in the absence of any explanation of their injuries by the prosecution.[94] In such an event a doubt arises whether the accused acted in exercise of his right of self-defence and that benefit has to go to him and submission on behalf of the accused that he might have acted in exercise of his right of self-defence has some force.[95] The determination of the question whether there exists the alleged right of private defence is always a question of fact.[96]

The accused need not affirmatively, establish that he had a right of private defence and he exercised the same in that manner. Where an injury is found on the person of the accused and if the accused comes forward with a specific plea of the right of private defence, the same has to be considered in the facts and surrounding2206 circumstances obtained in the case.[1] For example, the action of the entrant in the khandar of the accused being merely of easing himself, because, for want of time, he could not go outside the village, could not be sufficient to make out a case of criminal trespass and, in such a case, the accused, causing death of the entrant, cannot be held to have exceeded his right of private defence of property.[2] The right of private defence does not arise upon the use of mere words, threatening future injury, and the killing of the person, who uses such threats, would be murder.[3] A person, who began a quarrel by acting, in an improper manner, towards the wife of the deceased and declined to leave the place peacefully, when asked by them to do so, being himself responsible for the subsequent consequences, cannot plead the right of private defence.[4] The right commences as soon as a reasonable apprehension of danger arises and ceases when such apprehension ceases or on completion of the offence.[5]

In a Lahore case, the deceased was a man of desperate character who had recently come out of jail after undergoing a long sentence of imprisonment which had been awarded to him for causing somebody's death. The accused found him molesting his maternal uncle's wife and reprimanded him. The deceased abused him and threatened to give him a blow with a club which he was carrying. The accused snatched the club from him and gave him a blow with it. The deceased persisted in abusing him and so he gave him another blow which killed him by rupturing his spleen which was enlarged. The accused had no knowledge of it. It was held that the first blow, given by the accused, was in the exercise of the right of private defence, but since he gave the second blow, not because he apprehended any more danger from the victim, but because he went on abusing him, his act in giving the second blow was not protected by the right of private defence.[6]

In a case the evidence showed that heated arguments took place between the accused and the deceased for more than an hour and the deceased under the influence of liquor, had trespassed into the house of the accused with an intention of molesting the accused, who in fact was his real sister-in-law. The accused persons attacked the deceased; however, it was held that the accused might have retaliated to ward off the blows given by the deceased in exercise of their right of private defence; therefore the accused persons were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[7]

Where the accused fired with gun on the deceased causing his death, whereas the deceased was not armed and nor had he made any attempt on the life of the accused, it was held that the plea of the right of private defence by the accused was not sustainable and the accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[8]

Where the deceased had gone to the house of the accused and inflicted injuries by Kapa on the accused and his wife, the accused no. 3 in order to defend himself and2207 his wife inflicted a single injury on the chest of the deceased with a cobbler's instrument, the plea of the accused that they acted in exercise of right of private defence was accepted and the accused were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[9]

68. The Right must have been Exercised in 'Good Faith'

The right of private defence is a right of defence,[10] being purely preventive, and not punitive or retributive.[11] Culpable homicide cannot be held to be murder when the accused exercised in good faith his right of private defence.[12] The requirement of exception 2, therefore, is that the accused must have been exercising the right of private defence in good faith. Where two accused, armed with a lorh and a deadly axe, proceeded upon a house-breaking expedition and, in order to escape, the man with the axe used that axe, aiming his blow at the face and head of a pursuer, armed only with a lathi or a lorh, it was held that it cannot be said that he was bona fide exercising the right of private defence.[13] Where there is no evidence that the accused exercised in good faith, the right of private defence of person. Exception 2 will not apply.[14] When even after the deceased fell down after receiving injuries he was not spared, but the accused further assaulted him, such conduct of the accused is consistent with an intention to kill the deceased.[15] In such cases, possibility of accused causing injuries in exercise of private defence is ruled out.[16]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 300.

Murder.--

69. Accused must have Exceeded the Right of Private Defence

In considering the question whether the accused exceeded the right of private defence, court has to consider the part played by the accused person, gravity of the offence committed and nature of attack made by them.[17] Exception 2 applies only if the accused has, in exercising the right of private defence, exceeded the powers, given to him by law, and causes death.[18] The accused would be said to have exceeded the power, given to him by law, if he causes more harm than what is necessary for the purpose of his defence,[19]such as the act in spearing to death the unarmed deceased as soon as he (i.e., the deceased) advances to seize the trespassing cattle of the accused.[20] Where the deceased father, aged 74 years, had chastised his daughter,2208 the accused son, aged 32, on being enraged, inflicted a large number of injuries by blows/fists, knife and a wooden piece causing death; it was held that the accused son exceeded his right of private defence and the case was not covered by exception 2 to s 300 and the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was held proper.[21] Where occurrence of the event took place in the field of the deceased on his objection to removal of crops by accused persons, and the deceased's act of biting finger of the hand of the accused caused provocation to his accused sons, the medical evidence proved that the death was caused by back portion of the axe so the two accused armed with axe were convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC for exceeding right of private defence of body of their father/accused; the other accused persons were acquitted.[22]

Where the complainant party attacked the accused party with sticks causing injuries to them, in retaliation of attack by complainant the accused party exceeded the right of private defence so the charge of murder fails, thus, the accused were held liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[23]

Where the deceased came to the house of the accused in a drunken condition with a danda in his hands and started abusing the accused and his family members (other co-accused persons) and also assaulted the family members of the accused, the accused in retaliation, inflicted multiple tangier blows to the head of the deceased, it was held that the right of private defence accrued to the accused as he reasonably apprehended the death and grievous injuries to him and members of his family. However, the accused exceeded the right by inflicting more injuries to the deceased, therefore, the case fell within the ambit of exception 2 to s 300 and the accused was liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[24]

Where stones from the side of the house of the deceased had fallen on to the house of the accused, the accused had every right to protect his properties, but he exceeded the right by inflicting repeated blows leading to the death of the deceased. It was held that the case was covered by exception 2 to s 300, and the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[25] Where in a sudden quarrel the accused persons exceeded their right of private defence in causing death of two persons, they were held entitled to benefit of exception 2 of s 300, IPC .[26] Where, even after the deceased (who intruded into the accused's plot with a tractor) had fallen down, the accused continued to injure him in a vindictive and revengeful spirit, it was held that they exceeded their right of private defence and were, therefore, liable to conviction under Pt I of s 304 instead of under s 302 .[27] But where in a case of triple murder the accused fired at victims from a close range and one in the back while he was running away, the victims were not armed, the accused was not under any danger or threat from the victims, the accused was held not entitled to any right of private defence and deserved conviction under s 300, and not under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[28]2209

Where the deceased husband suspecting the fidelity of his wife, the accused, had threatened his wife that he will kill her with a vegetable cutter, and only thereafter the accused wife cut him with an axe, it was held that the act of the accused amounted to exercise of private defence, but she exceeded the right, hence the guilt of the accused fell under exception 2 to s 300, and was convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[29]

The defence of the accused was that he had gone to the deceased's house for repairing his TV, and the deceased had just come home and he expressed a desire to have unnatural sex with the accused, which the accused refused and thereupon the deceased removed all his clothes and for the purpose of gratifying his unnatural lust, he attacked the accused. The accused apprehended that the deceased would force him to have unnatural sex with him and on being certain that he would be a victim of unnatural lust, he picked up a weapon and to protect himself from unnatural sex and assault he attacked the deceased with a weapon. As a result, the deceased fell down and it was held that the 'defence version' was probable as theaccused caused death in exercise of right of private defence, but exceeded this right and was held guilty under s 304, Pt II.[30]

In a case, there was reliable prosecution evidence that R had dealt a blow on the head of the deceased by the sabba, due to which the deceased fell. Once the deceased fell to the ground, the apprehension of any threat of death or injury being caused by the deceased to the accused R, ended. The fact that the accused had brutally beheaded the deceased and assaulted him repeatedly on the thoracic cavity of the deceased with such force that during each assault the penetration of the sabba in the thoracic cavity was full, it can be safely inferred that the accused R had exceeded the right of private defence. Therefore, the offence committed by the accused R fell under exception 2 to s 300 of the IPC and did not travel beyond s 304, Pt I of the IPC .[31]

70. Accused not Exceeding Right of Private Defence is Entitled to Acquittal

Section 100, IPC, may be referred to. Where there was no prior enmity between the two groups and the whole incident developed suddenly, the accused persons received a fair number of injuries, some of them were on vital parts, the prosecution had no plausible explanation for these injuries, the plea of the accused that they inflicted injuries on deceased in self-defence was quite probable, the accused inflicted only one injury on the head of the deceased, in such a situation it cannot be said that the act of the accused was not in conformity with the limitation laid down s 100, IPC and all the accused persons were found entitled to benefit of doubt.[32]

71. 'Without Premeditation and without any Intention of doing more harm than is Necessary for the Purpose of such defence'

For the application of exception 2, it is further necessary that the accused must have caused the death without premeditation and without any intention of doing more2210 harm than what was necessary for the purpose of private defence. Where an accused, exceeding his right of private defence, intentionally,[33] or deliberately,[34] causes more harm than what is necessary or indiscriminately assaults the deceased after he becomes disabled,[35] he is not entitled to the benefit of the exception. In a case, the deceased, none of whom was in possession of any dangerous weapon, were harvesting the crops on a plot of land peacefully under the protection of police. The accused, who claimed the crop in the field, went to the field armed with guns, with the common intention of killing the deceased, and shot them dead at point blank range. It was held that, under the circumstances, it could not be said that the accused had shot at the deceased without premeditation and without the intention of doing more harm than what was necessary for the purpose of private defence.[36] It is an accepted proposition of law that a person cannot avail himself of the plea of self-defence in a case of homicide when he was himself the aggressor and had wilfully brought, on himself, without legal excuse, the necessity for the killing. It would be strange indeed if a person, who provides an attack, brings on a combat and then slays his assailant, were to take shelter behind the plea of self-defence in justification of the blow which he struck during the encounter.[37] If, however, the deceased becomes aggressive and attacks the accused first, it would be a case where the accused must be said to have acted without premeditation. Where all, but one, of the injuries, inflicted by the accused on the deceased, are such as are not likely to cause death, it cannot be said that the accused intended to cause more harm than what was necessary.[38] But where A and B, who are unarmed, assault C with their hands and C stabs B with a large knife through the lungs and stomach and B dies, C is guilty of murder, and not of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[39] Exception 2 or any other exception in s 300, IPC would not apply when the deceased is unarmed, and the assault cannot be said to be sudden and unpremeditated.[40] If the accused causes injuries to the unarmed deceased before he receives stick blows by the deceased's son, it cannot be said that the deceased was the aggressor and that the accused caused those injuries to the deceased to ward off any imminent apprehension of death or grievous hurt to himself.[41] The accused has to establish, with a balance of probability, circumstances which would bring his case within any exception.[42]

Where the accused had not gone to the spot with any weapon, but there was a lengthy quarrel and scuffle between the deceased and the deceased and his son hit the accused with sticks on his head and the blows landed on his elbows when he raised his hands to protect his head, and that at that stage, the accused picked up one of the thorny sticks lying at the spot and hit the deceased, to protect himself and not with2211 the intention of killing him, the plea of private defence was accepted and the accused was acquitted of the charge under ss 302 and 323, IPC .[43]

72. Exception 2 of Section 300 and Section 34

Commentary under s 34, ante, vol I, may be referred to.

Where two persons are charged with murder and one of them brings his case within exception 2 and is convicted of culpable homicide not amounting to murder under Pt I of s 304, the other cannot be convicted under Pt II of s 304, read with s 34, as s 34 requires common intention, while Pt II of s 304 deals only with knowledge, and not common intention.[44]

73. Exception 3--Scope and Applicability of

This exception provides that culpable homicide is not murder if the offender, being a public servant or aiding a public servant acting for the advancement of public justice, exceeds the powers, given to him by law, and causes death by doing an act which he, in good faith, thinks to be lawful and necessary for the due discharge of his duty as a public servant without ill-will towards the person whose death he has caused.[45] For the application of this exception, the following facts must be established, namely:

(i) the person, accused of murder, must be a public servant (s 21, IPC) or one who is aiding such servant when the latter is acting for the advancement of public justice;
(ii) he must, in good faith as under s 52, IPC, believe that the act, which results in death, was 'lawful and necessary' for the due discharge of his duty; and
(iii) he must act without ill-will towards the person who is killed.

Where the accused, a police constable and so a public servant, with a view to re-arrest a suspected thief, who has escaped from the running train, pursued him and, on his failure to catch him, fired at him, but, in that process, hit a fireman, it was held that the accused, being a public servant, whose object was the advancement of public justice, though he undoubtedly exceeded the powers given to him by law, caused the death of the fireman by doing an act which, he in good faith, believed to be lawful and necessary for the due discharge of his duty, and that he was entitled to the benefit of this exception.[46] A police officer, who causes death by firing on an unlawful assembly for the purpose of dispersing it, is protected only if he believes in good faith, that it is necessary for the public security to disperse the assembly by firing on it.[47]

Exception 3, thus, pre-supposes that a public servant who causes death, must do so in good faith and in due discharge of his duty as a public servant and without ill-will towards the person whose death is caused.

The accused had fired without provocation at a car killing two innocent persons and injuring one; in this case, the court observed that the accused had not acted in2212 good faith. Further, the obligation to prove an exception is on the preponderance of probabilities but it nevertheless lies on the defence and even on this touchstone, the defence did not succeed. Therefore, it was held that the accused police party was not entitled to the benefit of exception 3.[48]

This exception has no application to acts done by a public servant outside his duty.[49]

74. Exception 4--Scope and Applicability of

To invoke this exception four requirements must be satisfied, namely:

(a) it was a sudden fight;
(b) there was no premeditation,
(c) the act was done in a heat of passion; and
(d) assailant had not taken any undue advantage or acted in a cruel manner. The cause of the quarrel is not relevant, nor is it relevant, who offered the provocation or started the assault. The number of wounds caused during the occurrence is not a decisive factor but what is important is that the occurrence must have been sudden and unpremeditated and the offender must have acted in a fit of anger. Of course, the offender must not have taken any undue advantage or acted in a cruel manner. Where, on a sudden quarrel, a person in the heat of the moment picks up a weapon which is handy, and causes injuries, one of which proves fatal, he would be entitled to the benefit of this exception, provided he has not acted cruelly.[50]

Further, in order to bring a case under exception 4 to s 300, IPC, the evidence must show that the accused acted without any premeditation and in a heat of passion and without having taken undue advantage and that he had not acted in a cruel or unusual manner. Every one of these circumstances is required to be proved to attract this exception to s 300, IPC and it is not sufficient to prove only some of them.[51]

This exception is meant to apply to cases where, in whatever way, the quarrel may have originated; the subsequent conduct of both the parties puts them on an equal footing.[52] Where a mutual conflict develops and there is no reliable and acceptable evidence as to how it started and as to who was the aggressor, the situation does not permit of the plea of private defence on either side. It would be a case of sudden fight and has to be dealt with under this exception.[53]2213

The exception is just for the benefit of the person who cannot invoke the right of private defence. An occasion to consider the applicability of this exception will arise where the accused, who had no right of private defence of person, has caused the death of another in circumstances which, according to him, would bring his case within the exception. This means that this exception may be of help to an accused who was the first to strike or to create an apprehension of danger in the mind of the other and as such could not rely on any right of private defence of person or, in the circumstances, was not entitled to any right of private defence. It is to mitigate the gravity of his offence that he may take advantage of this exception by pleading that he had caused the death of the other without premeditation in a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel and without his taking undue advantage or acting in a cruel or unusual manner. The fact, that the accused committed the assault first, will not, in such circumstances, deprive him of the benefit of the exception. In other words, his act, being responsible for the first assault in the fight and thus, for the entire incident, will not aggravate the offence against him because of the want of premeditation, the suddenness of the incident, heated passion and his not taking unfair advantage do not put him at par with one who deliberately commits the murder of another with the intention or knowledge as contemplated in s 300 .[54] So, the aid of this exception can be invoked if, and only if, death is caused (a) without premeditation, (b) in a sudden fight, (c) in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel, and (d) without the offender's having taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner. To bring a case within this exception, all the ingredients, mentioned in it, must be found.[55] So long as the fight is unpremeditated and sudden, the accused, irrespective of his conduct before the fight, earns the mitigation, provided for in this exception, subject to the condition that he did not, in the course of the fight, take undue advantage or act in a cruel or unusual manner.[56]

If, from the evidence and attendant circumstances, it is reasonable to hold that the accused intentionally caused a bodily injury, to the deceased and this injury was found sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, but the said injury was caused without premeditation in a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel and without the accused having taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner, the case is covered by exception 4 to s 300 and the culpable homicide is not murder. The offence, therefore, is punishable under the first part of s 304 .[57]

Where, at a marriage function, there was exchange of hot words as to who had invited the deceased, which led to a sudden quarrel without premeditation and the accused inflicted one lathi blow on the deceased who was otherwise not armed, the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[58]2214

75. Test of Applicability of Exception 4

The proper test for the applicability of this exception is whether the accused shows, since the onus is on him, under s 105 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, that he acted solely out of the provocation generated by the heat of a sudden quarrel followed by a sudden fight.[59] In fact, exception 4 deals with cases in which notwithstanding that a blow may have been struck, or some provocation given in the origin of the dispute or in whatever way the quarrel may have originated, yet the subsequent conduct of both parties puts them in respect of guilt upon equal footing.[60] Where one person picks up a knife and stabs another in the stomach merely following an exchange of heated words, the ordinary inference is that the attacker has acted out of some other motive as well as the provocation that may have been generated by the verbal altercation.[61] Where accused on being slapped by the deceased ran to his house situated at a considerable distance and brought several deadly weapons, inflicted various injuries on deceased two of which were fatal, the accused can be said to have acted in a 'cruel' and 'unusual' manner and so was not entitled to benefit of exception 4 of s 300, IPC .[62]

Where there was evidence that the accused persons armed with deadly weapons like swords, balam, lathis, pharsa came to the house of the deceased to teach a lesson for getting the accused persons convicted, and after coming to the house of deceased, the accused opened the attack with the sword, with which he hit the deceased on the head and ultimately deceased succumbed to his injuries, it was held that exception 4 to s 300 was not attracted in the case.[63]

76. Ingredients of Exception 4

The ingredients of the said exception 4 are (i) there must be a sudden fight; (ii) there was no pre-meditation; (iii) the act was committed in a heat of passion; and (iv) the assailant had not taken any undue advantage or acted in a cruel manner. In the event the said ingredients are present, the cause of quarrel would not be material as to who offered the provocation or started assault. Indisputably, however, the occurrence must be sudden and not pre-meditated and the offender must have acted in a fit of anger.[64]

The help of exception 4 can be invoked if death is caused (a) without premeditation, (b) in a sudden fight; (c) without the offender's having taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner; and (d) the fight must have been2215 with the person killed. To bring a case within exception 4, all the ingredients mentioned in it must be found.[65]

77. 'Without Premeditation'

As stated earlier, exception 4 comes into play only if death is caused without premeditation. To constitute a pre-meditated killing, it is necessary that the accused should have reflected with a view to determine whether he could kill and that he should have determined to kill as a result of that reflection, that is to say, killing should be a predetermined killing upon consideration, and not sudden under the momentary excitement and impulse of passion upon provocation given at the time, or so recently before, as not to allow time for reflection.[66] Pre-meditation is the guiding factor to draw a line in between murder and culpable homicide. Therefore, if the court will get benefit of acquittal or lesser punishment whichever is applicable in the facts and circumstances of the case and that is the basic principle of criminal law.[67] Premeditation may be established by direct or positive evidence or by circumstantial evidence. Evidence of premeditation can be furnished by former grudges or previous threats and expressions of ill-feelings by acts of preparation to kill, such as procuring a deadly weapon or selecting a dangerous weapon in preference to one less dangerous, and by the manner in which the killing was committed. For example, repeated shots, blows or other acts of violence are sufficient evidence of premeditation. Premeditation is not proved from the mere fact of killing by the use of a deadly weapon; it must be shown by the manner of the killing and the circumstances, under which it was done, or from other facts in evidence.[68] But whether the killing was premeditated is not the first test to be applied while considering whether the exception of 'a sudden fight in the heat of passion' is applicable to any given set of facts. The first test is whether the act of the accused, which caused the deceased's death, was done without premeditation. The distinction is not to be ignored.[69]

The exception clearly indicates that culpable homicide in a fight is murder unless the fight is unpremeditated and is such as is, therein described, sudden in the heat of passion and on a sudden quarrel. A fight is not per se a palliating circumstance; only an unpremeditated fight can be such. Where persons engage in a fight under circumstances which warrant the inference that culpable homicide is premeditated, they are responsible for the consequences to their full extent.[70] If, after exchange of blows on equal terms, one of the parties, without any such intention at the commencement of the affray, snatches a deadly weapon and kills the other party with it, such a killing will be only culpable homicide not amounting to murder. But if a party, under colour of fighting, upon equal terms, uses, from the beginning of the contest, a deadly weapon without the knowledge of the other party and kills the other party with such weapon, or if, at the beginning of the contest, he prepares a deadly weapon so as to have the power of using it at some part of the contest and uses it accordingly in the course of the combat, and kills the other party with the weapon,2216 the killing, in both these cases, will be murder.[71] If the fight is deliberate and contemplated, it cannot be said that there was a sudden and unpremeditated fight.[72] But when the incident takes place in two parts and the latter part of the incident follows upon the earlier as its sequel and there is no time for reason to interpose and passions to cool down, the fatal injury must be thought to have been caused without premeditation.[73]

In a case, the evidence showed that as soon as the accused entered the house, there appeared to be some quarrel with his wife and in that fight first, he threw a water pot and thereafter a kerosene lamp, and since the deceased wife was wearing a nylon sari, she caught fire and sustained 70% burn injuries and died. The accused had also received burn injuries to the extent of 18%. It was held that there was a sudden fight and there was no pre-meditation and therefore, the case squarely fell under exception 4, s 300, IPC .[74]

78. Fight

Though the term 'fight' has not been defined in IPC, yet everyone knows as to what a 'fight' is.[75] It takes two or more to start a fight; it implies mutual assault;[76] it implies a combat or contest, in which both parties participate, irrespective of how they fare in it.[77] One-sided attack cannot constitute a fight.[78]An incident will be a fight if the parties are pitched and arrayed against each other and an act of violence of one party is met and countered by similar act of the other.[79] In order to constitute a fight, it is necessary that blows should have been exchanged,[80] but it is not necessary that weapons should be used,[81] though there has to be an offer of violence on both sides.[82] Fight must be with the person who is killed.[83] Exception 4 would not be2217 attracted where there was no exchange of blows between the deceased, who was unarmed, and the accused and the assault on the deceased by the accused was deliberate and pressed with determination when the deceased was fleeing for his life.[84] If blows are exchanged, the fact, that the person assaulted hits back in self-defence, would not make any difference. It may be added that if, in the course of a sudden quarrel, one of the parties gives a blow to his adversary and that blow results in death, he cannot take advantage of exception 4, notwithstanding the fact that, after he has given the blow, he is belaboured by the deceased, before he dies, or by his companions, for the simple reason that, at the time, when he gave the fatal blow, there was no fight.[85] It is always more than a mere verbal quarrel.[86] If there is no quarrel between the accused and the deceased, it is unnecessary to look further and inquire whether any of the other facts which are essential for the purpose of bringing a case within exception 4 have been established.[87] Moreover, for attraction of this exception, which is listed as exception 'Fourthly' in s 302, IPC, there has to be not only a sudden quarrel, but also a fight, which means use of criminal force by both the sides.[88] Verbal abuses are not a fight.[89]

In a case, the accused was not armed with any deadly weapon and the accused and the deceased were grappling and fighting and in that sequence, when the deceased jumped down in another field, the accused threw a stone which hit the deceased on his head leading to death. It was held that s 304, Pt II, IPC was attracted in the case.[90]

79. Sudden Fight/Quarrel

There is no previous deliberation or determination to fight. A fight suddenly takes place for which both parties are more or less to be blamed. It may be that one of them starts it, but if the other had not aggravated it by his own conduct, it would not have taken the serious turn it did. There is then mutual provocation and aggravation and it is difficult to apportion the share of blame which attaches to each fighter.[91] It is not possible to emaciate any general rule as to what shall be deemed to be a sudden quarrel. It is a question of fact and whether a quarrel is sudden must necessarily depend upon the proven facts of each case.[92] A 'fight' connotes something more than a verbal duel.[93]

Where the accused armed with spears had arrived on the spot, the act of the accused in assaulting the deceased was premeditated and not sudden, thus, it was2218 held that exception 4 to s 300, IPC was not attracted in the case and conviction under s 302, IPC was held proper.[1]

The word 'sudden' only means that the fight should not have been prearranged.[2] If two persons gather together at a place and some dispute suddenly arises, as a result of which the parties attack each other or one person attacks another, that would be a case of sudden fight. But if some persons deliberately go to another with the intention of attacking him, that can never be a case of free fight or sudden fight. That would be a case where the latter would be entitled to the right of private defence in order to ward off the attack on him by the former.[3] A 'sudden fight' implies mutual provocation and blows on each side. The homicide committed is then clearly not traceable to unilateral provocation nor in such cases the whole blame be placed on one side. For if it were so, the exception more appropriately applicable would be exception 1.[4] If two parties clash in a sudden fight in which nobody is killed, it is the duty of the court to determine which party was the aggressor and if this cannot be determined on the evidence produced in the case, the accused party must be given the benefit of doubt with regard to having acted in the right of self-defence.[5]

When there was a wordy quarrel between the two sides leading to the use of weapons by both the parties against each other, it is not a case where the accused had deliberately attacked the deceased and the injured witness with an intention to kill them. On the other hand, it is a case which would fall under exception 4 to s 304, IPC .[6] When admittedly there could not have been any premeditation, the accused (banana seller) and the deceased, (customer of the accused) quarreled after the deceased had refused to pay five paisa, the picking of knife by accused which had been kept by him for peeling bananas and giving of the blow by him can be said to be in the spur of the moment.[7] In a restaurant when the deceased and his friends were having food, the accused while passing by, made an abrasive comment on the complainant party at which the deceased laughed. The accused stabbed the deceased with a broken bottle causing death. It was held that the incident was out of sudden quarrel and the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[8] In a case, initially the accused did not have any weapon with him, however, during the course of the incident, he went inside and came back with a knife with the help of which he stabbed the deceased. It was held that the case cannot be said to be one under s 302, IPC but it is a case falling under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[9] Where, something happened at the spur of the moment, which led the accused to strike the deceased with the blunt side of gandhala in the heat of the moment, without pre-meditation and in a sudden fight;2219 the case was covered by exception 4 to s 300 .[10] Where in a sudden quarrel regarding going to village to the accused's ailing father, the husband stabbed his wife with knife, poured kerosene oil and set her on fire, it was held that the case was covered by exception 4 to s 300, IPC .[11]

Where in a sudden quarrel between the accused and the deceased, blows are exchanged, but they are separated by people, and thereafter, the accused runs to his house, fetches a deadly weapon and gives a blow on a vital part of the body of the deceased, who is standing unguardedly, the first part of the affair may be said to be a sudden fight, but the subsequent part of the affair, after the disengagement of the two parties, cannot be said to be a sudden fight without premeditation.[12] When the accused suddenly came out of the house and stabbed deceased first on the back and when the deceased who was repairing the puncture actually in his bicycle turned, the accused stabbed him again in the chest, it could not be said that the fight was on when the injuries were caused because at that time the deceased was actually repairing the puncture in his bicycle, so exception 4 to s 300, IPC, would not apply.[13]

Where the accused, in a sudden fight over beating of a dog, hit the deceased with an iron rod carried by him, however he did not repeat the blow which showed that the intention to kill was absent, the case fell under exception 4 to s 300, IPC . Therefore, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was converted into one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[14]

In the instant case, there was a fight at the spur of the moment between the two male groups on the issue of taking possession of cattle shed with no intention to kill any one. The accused set fire to the cattle shed, the deceased was inside the cattle shed, who caught fire and died. No overt act was attributed to any one and the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered into one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[15]

In the instant case, the accused and his father, armed with a knife, had followed the deceased who had gone to the pond for the purpose of digging the earth and ultimately murdered him. There was no evidence that there was sudden fight or that the accused attacked the deceased in heat of passion. It was held that the act was not covered by exception 4 to s 300, IPC .[16]

Where on a sudden quarrel at the spur of the moment, the accused inflicted cuts by kathi on the neck and caused the death of his younger brother, he was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC and his conviction under s 302, IPC was set aside.[17]2220

A fight cannot be said to be sudden if it was in the contemplation of the accused party from the very start and they must have been expecting it all along.[18] Thus, the fact that assault took place after about two hours after the exchange of hot words between accused and deceased and deceased was hit for quite number of times on head, a vital part, takes case out of the purview exception 4 of s 300, IPC .[19] Where the accused no. 1 did not strike the deceased at the first instance, but he struck him after an interval of time; since he left the place of occurrence, went home and then came back armed with a Farsa, it was held that exception 4 to s 300, IPC was not attracted in the case. The conviction of the accused no. 1 recorded by the Sessions Judge under s 302, IPC was proper.[20]

In a case where the accused persons, who were drunk, suddenly quarreled with the deceased for not voting in election in favour of the winning party and assaulted the deceased, it was held that the case fell under exception 4 of s 300, IPC and the conviction of the accused appellant under s 304, Pt I, instead of s 302, IPC was held proper.[21]

In a case, the son of the deceased threw a stone on a cat which, while jumping, landed on the terrace of the first accused, where some grain was lying for drying. The boy was scolded and beaten by the accused and the mother of the boy, on hearing this altercation, called her husband, the deceased. There was scuffle between the accused and the deceased, the accused struck the head of the deceased with tekani (piece of wood) used for supporting the bullock carts. The deceased fell down, and he died nearly four hours after the incident. The available evidence showed that there was no premeditation on the part of the accused and that it was a sudden fight. There was only one hit and there was nothing to show that there was any cruelty involved by inflicting any other injury or by any other conduct on the part of the accused so as to hold the accused as intending to cause the death of the deceased. The case was fully covered by exception 4 to s 300, IPC, and fell under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[22]

The accused was going to his house and carrying a bundle of cotton/grass, and on his way the cotton bundle hit the roof of the complainant's house. On sudden quarrel and exchange of hot words, the accused went to their nearby house, brought weapons viz axe, knife and gupti and caused injuries to the deceased which proved fatal. It was held that the case fell under exception 4 of s 300 and the accused were convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[23]

In another case, at the time of the incident the deceased was cutting karuvela trees and he had a spade and aruval in his hand, the accused came there and questioned him as to how he could cut the trees, and following the same, there was a verbal duel; immediately, the accused snatched the aruval and cut him on the neck and shoulder indiscriminately, causing instantaneous death. It was held that the occurrence took2221 place in course of sudden quarrel, thus, exception 4 to s 300, IPC applied and conviction was under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[24]

Where the facts of the case showed that there was no premeditation, the fight resulted on drinking of water from the hand pipe after an exchange of abuses, there appeared no intention on the part of the accused to cause the death of the deceased, nor were the injuries caused with the intention of causing such bodily injuries as the accused knew were likely to cause death. The case was covered by exception 4 to s 300, IPC, and the offence committed by the accused was culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The accused were convicted of the offence under s 304, Pt II of the IPC and not under s 302 of the IPC .[25]

Where a dispute arose between the parties because of conflicting claims as to ownership of land, after an exchange of hot words, in course of sudden quarrel, the accused assaulted the deceased. It was held that the case was covered by exception 4 of s 300 ; and accused was convicted under s 304 Pt I, IPC .[26]

Where in a sudden quarrel/fight, the accused had given two blows by a wooden log on the head of the deceased resulting in his death, it was held that the accused was entitled to the benefit of exception 4 to s 300, IPC, and he was convicted under s 304, Pt I and not under s 302, IPC .[27]

In a sudden fight between two religious groups over the issue of prayer, a single blow from a small knife was given to the deceased. It was held that the accused could not be convicted on the charge of murder and his conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[28]

When the accused assaulted their landlord when the latter asked for payment of rent and the nephew (deceased) of the landlord intervened, the accused S delivered a knife blow to the deceased; it was a case of sudden fight. It was held that exception 4 to s 300 was fully attracted in the case and the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC recorded by the trial court was converted into one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[29]

In a case, after an exchange of hot words between the accused and the deceased over the damage of the crops of the complainant by the accused, the accused fired one shot causing death of the deceased; it was held that the accused had no intention to cause the death of the deceased and exception 4 to s 300,

IPC was attracted.[30]2222

Where evidence showed that the accused on a sudden quarrel with regards to peels of eggs, inflicted injuries on the deceased by knife, blows, kicks and fists, it was held that the case fell under exception 4 to s 300, IPC, and the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I, instead of s 302 .[31]

A father, in a drunken state, abused his step son and mother, and also beat the latter and thereafter, in a sudden quarrel, the accused son hacked his father thereby causing death; it was held that the accused was entitled to the benefit of exception 4 to s 300, IPC, and his conviction under s 302, IPC was converted to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[32]

Where the accused in a sudden altercation with his wife and mother-in-law assaulted his mother-in-law causing three injuries which proved fatal, the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I and not under s 302, IPC .[33]

On sudden quarrel between the accused and the deceased over a trivial issue, the accused picked up the Dhangu and gave two Dhangu blows on the head of the deceased which proved fatal; the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[34]

80. 'Heat of Passion'

'Heat of passion' requires that there must be no time for the passion to cool down. In such a case, the court is not concerned with the origin of the fight, and the guilt or innocence of the accused is not dependent upon the result of an inquiry as to his conduct. The temper may rise with each exchange of blows and it is not unlikely that the less blameworthy individual may conduct himself in a more blameworthy manner. So long as the fight is unpremeditated and sudden, the accused, irrespective of his conduct before the fight, earns mitigation, provided for in the exception, subject to the condition that he has not taken, in the course of the fight, undue advantage or has not acted in a cruel or unusual manner.[35] Heat of passion requires that there must be no time for the passions to cool down.[36] There was dispute between the parties qua possession of land, the accused, in heat of passion, inflicted barchi blow on the head of the deceased which caused death; it was held that the case was covered by exception 4 to s 300, IPC .[37]

Where the two accused brought weapons from their houses, and inflicted blows on the deceased causing his death, it was held that the two accused had sufficient time to2223 cool down and the crime was not committed in a heat of passion; exception 4 was not attracted in the case.[38]

In another case where the accused had no pre-meditation to assault the deceased, rather the accused in the heat of passion inflicted such bodily injury, which was likely to cause death; his conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[39] Where the accused tried to commit rape on the deceased, which when resisted by the deceased, the accused poured kerosene oil and set her on fire and later, when she cried the accused also poured water on her to save her life, as the act of the accused was not premeditated, the accused only wanted to frighten the deceased, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[40]

In a sudden fight going on, the deceased, out of curiosity, came to enquire about the fighting going on, the accused dragged him and his brother and inflicted solitary Hasua blow on the neck causing instantaneous death. It was held that the act done was in the heat of passion; upon sudden quarrel and that the accused had neither taken undue advantage, nor acted in cruel manner. The case was covered by s 300, exception 4, and fell under s 304, Pt I and not s 302, IPC .[41]

It was established on record that the accused and the deceased were taking liquor and an altercation had taken place amongst the three. After the altercation, the accused N had slapped the deceased resulting into some grappling. It was at this moment that accused B had picked up an iron rod which was lying nearby and in the heat of passion, had given the fatal blow on the head of the deceased. Only one injury was given which clearly shows that accused B had not taken any undue advantage nor had he acted in a cruel manner. It was held that the case fell under exception 4 to s 300, IPC .[42]

Where there was neither any preparation, nor any premeditation after altercation, and in the heat of passion, the accused inflicted knife blow in the abdomen of the deceased, which hit in latter's kidney and proved fatal, the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II instead of s 302, IPC .[43]

81. Further Requirement of Exception 4

Though there may be absence of premeditation and it may be a case of sudden fight, that is not sufficient to bring the offence committed by the accused within the purview of exception 4. The further requirement of exception 4 that the offender should not have taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner, should be satisfied.[44]2224

82. Taking Undue Advantage

For the application of exception 4, it is not sufficient to show that there was a sudden quarrel and there was no premeditation. It must further be shown that the offender has not taken undue advantage or acted in cruel or unusual manner. The expression 'undue advantage' as used in the provision means 'unfair advantage'.[45] Where the offender takes undue advantage or has acted in a cruel or unusual manner, the benefit of exception 4 cannot be given to him. If the weapon used or the manner of attack by the assailant is out of all proportion, that circumstance must be taken into consideration to decide, whether undue advantage has been taken.[46]

The expression 'undue advantage', as used in this exception, means 'unfair advantage' and cannot be limited to a case where the victim is made physically incapable to defend himself. An assailant cannot but be said to have taken undue advantage when the victim is taken completely unaware, and struck when he does not even suspect of being struck,[47] or when the deceased has no weapon while the assailant has picked up a kripan and stabs the deceased in his most vital part.[48] Similarly, an assailant cannot but be said to have taken undue advantage of his victim if he is armed with an axe while the deceased is not.[49] When a man stabs an unarmed person, who makes no threatening gestures and merely asks the accused's opponent to stop fighting, it cannot be said that the accused has not taken undue advantage of the victim.[50] If two men are fighting and one of them is unarmed, while the other uses a deadly weapon, the one, who uses a weapon, must be held to have taken an undue advantage.[51] Where, however, a deceased is armed with a knife, formidably of nine inches in length, which he freely and unhesitatingly uses and carries it when he runs away for shelter, it cannot be said that, in chasing the deceased and inflicting the fatal injury on him, when he is armed with such a knife, the accused has taken undue advantage or has acted in a cruel or unusual manner.[52] In the instant case, the facts2225 showed that there was no premeditation in the incident, no sudden quarrel and it was a unilateral act on the part of the accused that he lost his temper as he suspected the deceased of having misappropriated the fare that he had been collecting. The accused had taken undue advantage of his position inasmuchas he had run to the scooter, opened the boot, taken out a knife and caused one injury on the person of the deceased who was a young, unarmed boy. It was held that the case was not covered by exception 4 and his conviction under s 302, IPC was held proper.[53]

Where despite protest/objection made by the accused persons, the complainant party tried to pass their bullock cart through the fields of the accused persons, a free fight ensued in which accused persons inflicted two injuries by palsi and dau (agriculture instruments), causing death; the accused persons had not taken undue advantage nor acted in cruel manner and it was held the case fell under exception 4 to s 300, IPC .[54]

In a case blows on vital parts of unarmed persons were given with brutality and the abdomens of two deceased persons were ripped open and internal organs came out. In view of the aforesaid factual position, exception 4 to s 300, IPC was held inapplicable in the case.[55]

The accused fired shot from his gun at the deceased, while the deceased was unarmed and there was also no provocation from him. However, the accused had intention to kill the deceased, and had taken undue advantage of his position. Therefore, exception 4 did not apply in the case, and his conviction under s 302, IPC was held proper.[56]

83. Acting in a Cruel or Unusual Manner

As has been stated elsewhere, to bring a case within exception 4 all the ingredients, mentioned in it, must be found.[57]And even then, the exception will apply only if it is established by the accused that he did not take undue advantage and did not act in a cruel or unusual manner.[58] Conversely, if the accused acts in a cruel manner, the case does not fall under this exception and the offence would be one of murder.[59]2226 Intention to cause more harm, if capable of being inferred from the facts and circumstances of the case, would mean that the act was done in a cruel and unusual manner.[60]

If the weapon or manner of attack by the assailant is out of all proportion to the offence given, that circumstance must be taken into consideration for deciding whether undue advantage has been taken. In such a case, the assailant must also be said to have acted in an unusual manner.[61] Wife's refusal to have sex with accused husband led to a quarrel and the accused husband inflicted as many as 14 injuries on the neck of deceased and strangulated her with enormous force causing death. He had taken undue advantage of the fact that he was a male and was much stronger physically and the murder had also been committed in a revolting and cruel manner. It was held that exception 4 to s 300, IPC was not attracted in the case and conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was upheld.[62] The absence or presence of injuries on the body of accused may quite often serve as a pointer whether the accused had acted in any cruel or unusual manner. An injury on person of accused may afford ground to assume that the members of the party of the deceased had also been armed with dangerous weapons, since otherwise the injuries, found on the body of the accused, cannot be explained.[63] Merely because three injuries were caused to the deceased during the scuffle, it could not be said that accused had acted in a cruel and unusual manner.[64] When two contending parties, each armed with sharp-edged weapons, clashed and, in the course of a free fight, some injuries were inflicted on one party or the other, it was held that it cannot be said that either of them acted in a cruel or unusual manner. It would have been otherwise if the deceased and his party were unarmed, or armed with weapons which were not lethal or dangerous, and the accused's party had used sharp weapons. In that case the accused could be deemed to have acted in a cruel or unusual manner.[65] In the instant case, blows on vital parts of unarmed persons were given with brutality such that the abdomens of two deceased persons were ripped open and internal organs come out. In view of the aforesaid factual position, exception 4 to s 300, IPC was held inapplicable in the case.[66]

The very fact that the accused appellants used the fire arms in the course of a frivolous quarrel triggered off by the sarcastic remarks of the deceased, demonstrated beyond doubt that the accused acted in a cruel manner. Exception 4 to s 300 was not attracted in the case and conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was held proper.[67]

Likewise, where the accused gave a beating to the buffaloes of the deceased with eucalyptus stick, as the buffaloes were tethering in his enclosure and when the2227 deceased quarreled with him not to do so, he gave two injuries with the same stick causing death of the deceased, it was a sudden quarrel without premeditation; the accused was held not to have taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner.[68] Where the accused without any pre-meditation inflicted a single knife blow causing death, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[69]

The accused inflicted a single blow with pen knife which caused the death of the deceased. It was held that intention to cause death could not be imputed to the accused. However, the accused knew that his act was likely to cause the death of the deceased; therefore, the case was covered by exception 4 to s 300, IPC .[70]

See also the undermentioned cases where on the facts of the case, exception 4 to s 300 was held inapplicable in the case.[71]

See also the following cases where on the facts of the case, the case was held covered by exception 4 to s 300, IPC . [72]

84. Distinction between Exception 1 and Exception 4

Exception 4 to s 300 covers acts done in a sudden fight. It deals with a case of provocation not covered by the first exception, the exception is founded upon the same principle of absence of premeditation the distinction is that while in exception 1, there is total deprivation of self-control, in exception 4 there is only that heat of passion which clouds a person's sober reason and leads to acts which would not have been otherwise committed. A sudden fight implies mutual provocation and postulates bilateral transaction in which both victim and assailant assault each other.[73] There is provocation in exception 4 as in exception 1, but the injury done is not the direct consequence of that provocation.[74] A sudden fight implies mutual provocation and2228 blows on each side. The homicide committed is then clearly not traceable to unilateral provocation, nor in such cases can the whole blame be placed on one side. For if it were so, the exception more appropriately applicable would be exception 1.[75] In fact exception 4 deals with cases in which notwithstanding that a blow may have been struck, or some provocation given in the origin of the dispute or in whatever way the quarrel may have originated, yet the subsequent conduct of both parties puts them in respect of guilt upon equal footing.[76]

85. Exception 5--Scope and Applicability of

The infliction of harm without the consent of the sufferer falls under the general exception, contained in ss 87 to 93 of IPC . But under those sections, death cannot be consented to, either expressly or by implication. Refer to ss 87, 88, 89 and 92 . Under s 87, even a person above the age of eighteen years is precluded from giving a valid consent to an act, intended to cause, or which is known to the doer to be likely to cause death or grievous hurt. Such a consent will not, therefore, prevent the act from being a crime, but this exception provides that, in such a case, the person, who kills the consenting party, shall be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, and not of murder. Where a man of full age (i.e. above 18 years) submits himself to emasculation, performed neither by a skilful hand, nor in the least dangerous way and dies from the injury, the persons concerned in the act are guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder by virtue of this exception.[77]

It may be noted that exception 5 to s 300, IPC, must receive a very strict and not a liberal interpretation and in applying the said exception the act alleged to be consented to or authorised by the victim must be considered by very close scrutiny.[78] Thus, where the sessions court and the High Court had correctly appreciated evidence adduced in a case and had come to the finding that the husband had planned to murder the wife and in execution of the said plan had murdered the wife and thereafter tried to commit suicide, the conviction of the husband under ss 302 and 309, IPC, was upheld by the Apex Court.[79]

This exception applies to cases where a man consents to submit to the doing of some particular act, either knowing that it will certainly cause death, or that death will be likely to be the result; but it does not refer to the running of a risk of death from something, which a man intends to avert, if he can possibly do so, even by causing the death of the person from whom the danger is to be anticipated.[80] In a Lahore case, the accused killed his step-father, who was an infirm old man, with his consent in order to involve some of their enemies in trouble by charging them with murder. It was held that the case was covered by this exception.[81] The exception cannot be applied unless the person killed had the full knowledge of the facts and was determined to suffer or to take the risk of death and unless this determination existed at the moment of his death. The question of whether there was such consent2229 is a question of fact, to be decided on the circumstances of each case.[82] In the Full Bench case of Empress v Nayamuddin ,[83] Pigot J, delivering the majority judgment, observed:

> ...the exception should be considered in applying it first, with reference to the act, consented to or authorised, and next with reference to the person or persons authorised. And, I think that, as to each of these, some degree of particularity at least should appear upon the facts proved before the exception can be said to apply...the consent may be inferred from circumstances and does not absolutely need to be established by actual proof of express consent.

A man, who, by concert with his adversary, goes out armed with a deadly weapon to fight that adversary, who is also armed with a deadly weapon, must be taken to be aware that he runs the risk of losing his life and, as he voluntarily puts himself in that position, he must be taken to consent to incur the risk.[84]In such a case, the circumstances do show a distant act of the mind of each combatant with respect to the other and in concert with him of willingness to encounter and suffer such known and anticipated acts of violence from that other as he cannot defend himself from. But to include such a case within this exception is rather to strain the terms of it. At any rate, there is a distinction between such a case and one in which the members of two riotous assemblies, who agree to fight together and some of whom, on each side, are, to the knowledge of all the members, armed with deadly weapons. From a mere agreement to fight, such a consent, as is contemplated by this exception, cannot be imputed, to each member of the two mobs, to suffer death or take the risk of death at the hands of any one of the armed members of the other mob, by means of whichever of such deadly weapons, used in whatever way that person may please and be able, to inflict.[85] The same reasoning would apply to cases of duelling.[86]

Consent, under IPC, is not valid if it is obtained by either misrepresentation or concealment as it implies not only a knowledge of the risk, but a judgment in regard to it, a deliberate free act of the mind. In other words, before exception 5 can be applied, it must be found that the person killed, with full knowledge of the facts, determined to suffer death, or take the risk of death and this determination continued, and existed till the moment of his death.[87] An accused who wants to bring his case within the domain of exception 5 of s 300, IPC must not only show that the deceased took the risk voluntarily, he must further prove that the deceased had the requisite knowledge that he would die while doing so.[88] An accused, pleading consent as a defence, must show that the person consenting did know what risk he was undertaking. A patient can hardly be said to accept a risk of which he is not aware. A doctor, pleading consent to an operation, that might prove fatal, must show that the patient did accept the risk and that consequently, he was aware of it.[89] A husband,2230 being in sore distress, desired to commit suicide. His wife asked him to first kill her and then kill himself and he accordingly killed her, but was caught before he killed himself. It was held that the consent of the wife was a consent within the meaning of exception 5 to s 300, IPC .[90]

To attract exception 5 to s 300, IPC, there must have been free and voluntary consent of the deceased. Where both accused and the deceased fell in love and then entered in the pact to commit suicide, the accused inflicted injuries on the deceased causing death and also inflicted injuries on himself but survived, it was held that exception 5 was attracted in the case.[91]

In Queen v Anunto Rurnagat ,[92] the accused and his wife, being overwhelmed with grief for the loss of their child, determined to kill themselves. His wife made repeated requests to him that he should kill her and after a time, he did so by striking her three blows with an axe. It was held that the case did come within exception 5 and that the accused was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. In a case, a man tried to persuade his concubine to leave on the ground that a scandal was being created by his association with her. But she refused, took the knife out of his waist, put it into his hand and asked him to kill her. He, accordingly, cut her neck with the knife. It was held that the accused was entitled to the benefit of this exception.[93] In a similar case the accused tried to persuade the deceased to leave him and go away, but she said that she would never leave him and suggested that both of them might commit suicide. The next morning, he killed her. The accused was given the benefit of this exception.[94] In Masum Ali v Emperor ,[95] the accused strangled his beloved, aged 16 years, to death upon their decision to die together in despair of future separation and with the feeling that they could not live apart. It was held that this was essentially the case where the spirit, if not the letter, of exception 5 could be applied. Because, the girl was below 18 years of age, not capable of giving her valid consent, the accused was convicted of murder though sentenced to transportation for life. Had the murdered girl been of 18 years or above, the offence would have been culpable homicide not amounting to murder. However, where in Queen v Poonai Fattehmal [96] the accused, a snake-charmer, persuaded the deceased to allow themselves to be bitten by a poisonous snake, inducing them to believe that he had power to protect them from harm, it was held that the consent having been founded on a misconception of fact and the accused knowing that the consent was given in consequence of such misconception, the accused was not protected by this exception.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 301.

Culpable homicide by causing death of person other than person whose death was intended.--

If a person, by doing anything which he intends or knows to be likely to cause death, commits culpable homicide by causing the death of any person, whose death he neither intends nor knows himself to be likely to cause, the culpable homicide committed by the offender is of the2231 description of which it would have been if he had caused the death of the person, whose death he intended or knew himself to be likely to cause.

Comments

1. Scope

Section 301, IPC does not enact any rule not deducible from ss 299 and 300, IPC ; it merely declares, in plain language, an important rule deducible from the said sections just as an explanation to a section does. The rule cannot well be stated as an explanation to either s 299 or s 300 as it relates to both. It was, therefore, found most convenient to state the rule by means of a fresh section. The rule makes it clear that culpable homicide may be committed by causing the death of a person whom the offender neither intended, nor knew himself to be likely to kill, a rule which, though it does not lie on the surface of s 299 yet, is deducible from the generality of the words 'causes death' and from the illustration to the section; and the rule then goes on to state that the quality of the homicide, that is, whether it amounts to murder or not, will depend on the intention or knowledge which the offender had in regard to the person intended or known to be likely, to be killed or injured, and not with reference to his intention or knowledge with regard to the person actually killed, a rule deducible from the language of ss 299 and 300 though not, perhaps, lying on their very surface.[97]

2. Object

The law affords protection equally to the lives of all persons, and once the criminal intention, i.e., an intention to destroy human life, is found, it does not make any difference whether the act, done with such intention, causes the death of the person aimed at, or of someone else. Illustration (a) to s 299, IPC makes it quite clear that the legislature deliberately employed general and unqualified language in order to cover cases where the person, whose death is caused by the act of the accused, was not the person intended to be killed by him, but some other person. This section, i.e., s 301, IPC, also supports this construction as it assumes that the accused, in such cases, would be guilty of culpable homicide. The object of this section is to lay down that the nature of culpable homicide of which the accused in these cases would be guilty, namely whether murder or not, would be the same as he would have been guilty of if the person, whose death was intended to be brought about, had been killed.[98]2232

3. Applicability

The section applies to cases where the accused causes the death of another whose death he neither intends, nor knows himself likely, to cause.[1]In other words, the section applies where the death of the person, whose death is intended, or known to be likely to occur, by the person doing the act does not, as a fact, occur, but the death of someone else occurs as a result of the act done by him. It does not apply where the death--both of the persons whose death was in contemplation and of another person or persons--has occurred.[2]The accused's intention or knowledge of the effect of his act in relation to the unintended or accidental victim is presumed not to exist at all in a case to which s 301 can apply[3] because this section clearly makes culpable homicide murder notwithstanding the fact that there was no intention actually to commit the murder of the particular person killed.[4]

4. Section 301 and Section 304A

Where the accused persons were alleged to have fired freely towards the fleeing complainant party, the first shot injured one person and the second shot resulted in the death of the 10-year old son of the complainant, the gun was not fired in the air just to frighten the complainant and his companion, the firing was resorted to in a locality where there were a number of shops, these circumstances attract s 300 read with s 301, IPC, and not s 304-A, as the death of a person other than whose death intended was caused.[5]

5. Doctrine of Transfer of Malice

The provision is founded on a doctrine called a transfer of malice by Halo and Foster. Others describe it as a transmigration of motive. Coke calls it coupling the event with the intention and the end with the cause. If the killing takes place in the course of doing an act which a person intends or knows to be likely to cause death, it ought to be treated as if the real intention of the killer had been actually carried out.[6] Where, though initially, the malice was focused on prosecution witness, the fact that all the accused chased and assaulted the deceased is a case of transfer of malice.[7]

The section embodies a well-established principle of criminal jurisprudence based on the doctrine of transferred malice. It is settled law that where a blow, aimed at one person, falls upon another and kills him, the offence committed by the assailant is the same as it would have been if the blow had struck the intended victim.[8] It is clear that even though the accused intended to cause the death of prosecution witness and the stab, which was aimed at prosecution witness, fell on the chest of the deceased, which resulted in the death of the deceased, as per the principle of 'transfer of malice', it must be presumed that the accused had the intention to cause the death of2233 the deceased alone. Hence, the act committed by the accused to commit the murder of prosecution witness, which, unfortunately, caused the death of the deceased would attract the offence under s 301, read with s 302, IPC, and consequently, the conviction imposed on the accused by the trial court, for the offence under s 301 read with s 302, IPC .[9]

Conviction under Section 326 Based on Doctrine of Transfer of Malice

Where the stab was aimed at the mother, but it hit the child in her arms causing his death, it was held that the accused was liable neither for the offence of murder nor for that of culpable homicide, even by operation of s 301, there being no material to show that the identical stab, if it had fallen on the mother, against whom it was aimed, would have caused her death. The offence made out was held to be one under s 326, since the conviction of the accused could be sustained on the basis of the doctrine of transfer of malice embodied in s 301 .[10]

6. Applicability of Section 34 to cases under Section 301

In Wazir Singh v State of Punjab ,[11] an interesting point as to the applicability of s 34 to cases falling under s 301, IPC, was raised, but it was left undecided. There, the accused and one X, who were both armed with rifles and had the common intention of killing B, fired their rifles at him. It so happened that at the time of firing, there was also one S with B. Both of them began to run and B succeeded in hiding himself behind a tree, but S was fatally injured by the shots. It could not be found as to whose shots caused the fatal injuries. The question arose whether the common intention to kill B could, by virtue of s 301, be transferred so as to operate on the matter of murder of S, there being, at no time, any common intention entertained between the accused and X to commit the murder of S. The point was left undecided as the appeal was limited to the question of sentence and the decision of the said point, one way or the other, was not to affect the sentence passed. In Ganga Singh v State ,[12] the court observed the expression 'in furtherance of the common intention of all', in s 34, IPC, need not necessarily relate to the person actually killed. It is sufficient for the application of s 34, IPC, that the 'common intention of several persons', contemplated therein, is to commit culpable homicide, irrespective of any specified person. In such a case, each member shall be liable for the act resulting in murder or culpable homicide not amounting to murder, as the case may be. In Shankarlal Kacharabhai v State ,[13] the Supreme Court pointed out that, under s 301, IPC, if A intends to kill B but kills C whose death he neither intends nor knows himself to be likely to cause, the intention to kill C is, by law, attributed to him. If A aims his shots at B, but it misses B, either because B moves out of the range of the shot or because the shot misses the mark, and hits some other person C, whether within sight or out of sight, A will be deemed, under s 301, to have hit C with the intention to kill him. What is to be noticed is that to invoke s 301, A shall not have any intention to cause the death, or the knowledge that he is likely to cause the death of C. If this condition is not complied with and the accused shoots at a particular person with the intention2234 of killing him, though under a misapprehension of his identity, all the ingredients of ss 299 and 300, IPC are complied with. The aid of s 301, IPC is not called for.

7. Applicability of Section 149 to Cases under Section 301

Though s 149, IPC, may not in a given case apply to a case covered by s 301, it would depend upon the factual background involved. No hard and fast rule of universal application can be invoked.[14]

8. Illustrative Cases

Where the accused aimed a blow with a sharp dao at B, but instead of killing B, it struck a child in his arms and killed it, it was held that the offence was of murder punishable under s 301 .[15] Similarly, where a blow was aimed at a woman, but, she having ducked, it struck another woman and killed her, it was held that the assailant was guilty of murder by virtue of this section.[16] If an accused intends to kill a particular person but he kills another, he is guilty of an offence under s 301 .[17] The accused, with the intention of killing A gave him poisoned sweet halwa to eat. A ate a little and threw away the rest. It was picked up by B who ate it and died. It was held that the accused was guilty of murder.[18] So also, where the accused mixed poison in halwa with the intention of killing her husband, but another man also partook of the halwa and died, it was held that the accused was guilty of murder.[19]Where the intention of the accused was to cause the death of a particular person but his act of taking a lorry at a high speed with the intention of hitting against that 'particular person' and killing him really resulted in causing the death of deceased and the fact that the deceased sustained the fatal injuries not as a result of the direct hitting of the lorry but due to the fall of pillar and its debris on the body of the deceased would not also change the position. Since the accused's intention in taking the lorry was to kill 'another person' and the overt act committed by the accused in furtherance of his intention was so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, and hence, the offence committed by the accused would squarely fall under s 301 and would amount to murder and the accused would be liable to be convicted for an offence punishable under s 302 .[20] Where the accused persons fired freely at the fleeing complainant party, the first shot injured one person and the second shot resulted in the death of a 10 year old boy of the complainant, which was not intended by the accused, the offence committed by accused was murder under s 300 read with 301, IPC and not under s 304A, IPC .[21]

Where the deceased received a single blow, by knife in the abdomen by the accused while intervening to save her brother from being attacked by the accused, the accused can be clothed with knowledge and not intention that the injury was likely to cause death and so the offence would fall under s 304, Pt II, IPC and not under s 300, IPC .[22]2235

1. Introduction

Unlike civil cases where documentary evidence matters far more than ocular evidence, the reverse is the position in a criminal trial of the offences under the IPC except for a few offences like ss 467 / 471, etc. Murder is the most heinous offence in the IPC, which makes it the most important too. Beside ocular evidence, medical evidence, dying declaration, confessions, identification of an accused are important pieces of evidence in a criminal case. A murder case cannot be properly understood without dealing with these important aspects. Keeping in view the importance of murder cases, a fair idea of the legal position as clarified by High Courts and the Supreme Court regarding different types of witnesses, different aspects of dying declaration, confessions, circumstantial evidence are dealt with separately under different heads in this part.

The idea is not to encroach upon the territory of commentaries on the Evidence Act or the CrPC, but to avoid wastage of time and diversion of attention of the reader in switching from this book to another in search of the latest basic law on these aspects. However, where in depth analysis is required, reference should be made to commentaries on CrPC or the Evidence Act with regard to relevant provisions enshrined therein.

2. Scope

Under the old CrPC, ample discretion was given to courts to pass death sentence. An alternative sentence of life term could be awarded in exceptional circumstances, that too, after advancing special reasons for making this departure from the general rule. The current CrPC entirely reversed the rule. A sentence for imprisonment for life is now the rule and capital sentence is an exception. It has also been made obligatory on the courts to record special reasons if ultimately death sentence is to be awarded. A Constitutional Bench of the Supreme Court in the case of Bachan Singh v State of Punjab ,[2] while upholding the constitutional validity of death sentence voiced that as a legal principle death sentence is still awardable but only in rarest of rare cases when the alternative option of lesser sentence is unquestionably foreclosed.[3] While it is the duty of the court to see that no innocent person is punished, it is equally important to see where it is clear evidence of commission of crime by a person such person should not be given the benefit of some distortion or exaggeration, made for the prosecution by the witnesses.[4] The plea by the accused that he remained in jail for more than seven years is not a good ground to reduce the sentence.[5] Every incidence of murder involves brutality, which is one of the factors for imposing the extreme penalty on the accused while considering the case for imposition of sentence on the accused, but it cannot be a sole ground for imposing extreme penalty. Other factors have also to2243 be taken into consideration, i.e., aggravating and mitigating circumstances along with the brutality, i.e., the act of the accused. The legislature has incorporated the provision of death penalty in order to impose appropriate punishment for a criminal act to respond to the need of society for justice against criminals. Punishment is always imposed not only to punish the criminal but also to ensure that criminal is punished in a befitting manner, commensurate with the crime committed by him. Of course, at the time of consideration for punishment the court is required to consider the act as well as right of victim of crime and the society at large. Manifestly, inadequate punishment having regard to the nature of crime of offence would not subserve the cause of justice to the society. The court has to examine as to whether the murder has been committed for a motive, which evinces total depravity, for e.g., murder by hired assassins for money or reward or cold-blooded murder for gains of a person vis-à-vis whom the murderer is in a dominating position or in a position of trust or when the court reaches to conclusion looking to the facts of the case that the accused is a menace to the society looking to his past criminal track record and nefarious activities.[6]

3. 'Whoever'

This section makes no distinction between men. It will apply even to a case where a police officer, in the zeal of his duty to trace out an offence, commits torture on the suspect and thereby causes his death.[7] Even the choice between the two penalties, provided in the section, does not depend upon any classification of murders on the basis of youth, sex, etc. The IPC has not created any special categories, or classes of persons, who can claim exemption from death sentence as a matter of right. Neither youth, nor sex, nor any other peculiarity is mentioned in the section entitling any person to claim exemption from capital punishment after his conviction for murder. It merely says 'Whoever commits murder shall be sentenced to death or imprisonment for life and shall also be liable to fine.'[8] In Gangu Singh v State , it was stated that the murder trial of the accused less than 16 years on date of occurrence should not be tried by a sessions judge, but, shall be dealt with in accordance with provisions of Uttar Pradesh Children Act 1952.[9]

This section applies, whether the murder is committed by one, or by more than one person (see s 9, IPC).

4. 'Commits Murder'

If it cannot be proved that it was the accused who caused the death of the deceased person, there can be no conviction.[10] Thus, even if it is clear that one of the two persons must have caused the death, but not as to which of them did so, both will be acquitted.[11] When assault is made by many accused but without common intention the doctor's opinion that the death was due to head injury and the accused who alone is the author of the head injury is guilty of murder and the other accused persons who2244 assaulted the dead body cannot be made liable for the offence of murder.[12] However, if one person is engaged in murderously beating another to death and a stranger, without sharing the common intention, rushes in and adds some more blows so that the victim's death is more speedily brought about, then it is a case where both would be guilty of murder and the first man cannot be allowed a defense that it was the second assailant's stroke that finally ended the victim's life.[13]

For the commission of the offence of murder, it is not necessary that the accused should have the intention to cause death. If it is proved that the accused had the intention to inflict the injuries actually suffered by the victim, and such injuries are found to be sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, the ingredients of clause 'thirdly' of s 300 are fulfilled and the accused must be held guilty of 'murder' punishable under s 302 .[14]

If the whole combination of facts, necessary to prove murder, is not proved, the accused may be punished for any complete minor offence, disclosed by the facts, which have been proved.[15] Where an accused person is convicted in the alternative, either of murder, or, e.g., of an offence under s 201, IPC (causing disappearance of evidence), he must be punished with a punishment applicable to the minor offence, e.g., imprisonment for seven years.[16]

In order to convict the accused for an offence under s 302, IPC, the first and foremost aspect to be proved by the prosecution is the homicidal death. Where the evidence proves that the death was accidental death and not homicidal death, the accused cannot be convicted under s 302, IPC .[17]

5. Relevant Factors to Ascertain Murder

Merely because there were some minor injuries, it cannot be said that s 302, IPC, is not attracted. Though the number of injuries does not determine the question whether s 302, IPC, is to be attracted, yet the nature of injuries, the weapon used, and the places where injuries exist are relevant factors.[18] In considering whether the offence is murder or culpable homicide not amounting to murder, the manner of causing injuries to the victim by the accused person as deposed by the prosecution witnesses, nature of injuries caused to the victim, part of the body where accused person(s) caused injuries to the victim, the weapon(s) used in the commission of crime and conduct of the offender(s) charged with the offence of murder, are to be taken into account.[19]

6. Motive

Commentary under s 299, ante, may be referred to.2245

Motive is a relevant factor in all criminal cases whether based on the testimony of an eyewitness or circumstantial evidence.[20] Motive is not an ingredient for an offence under s 302, IPC .[21] When the participation of the accused is established by the evidence of an eyewitness, absence of motive pales into insignificance and cannot be a ground to justify his acquittal.[22] Where the testimony of the wife that the accused fired shot from gun at the deceased was corroborated by medical evidence and contents of the FIR, in the presence of direct evidence, uncertainty of motive was held of no consequence and conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was affirmed.[23]

In a case where the accused himself had taken the deceased to the hospital which showed that he had no motive or intention to commit a crime, much less to give a gun shot, which would inevitably result in the death of deceased, the accused was acquitted of the charge of murder under s 302, IPC .[24]

In a case the accused committed the murder of three teenaged children of the complainant while they were returning from school, the accused had the motive as his wife had eloped with the brother of the complainant and had threatened the complainant. Therefore, the conviction of the accused under ss 302 and 364, IPC was held proper.[25]

Conviction of main Accused under Section 302 and of another under Section 341

Commentary under s 341, ante, may be referred to.

(I) CONSTRUCTIVE LIABILITY

7. Applicability of Section 34 to Section 302

Commentary under s 34, ante, Vol. 1 may be referred to.

It is only the person, who actually commits murder, who is directly made liable under this section, others may be held liable for murder vicariously under ss 34-38 or under s 149, IPC .[26] A mention of the section in the judgment is not the requirement of law to convict a person. If the ingredients of the offence are present, conviction can be made. It is not material to bring the case under s 34, IPC, as to who in fact, inflicted the fatal blow.[27] Accused persons charged with offences under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, can be convicted under s 302 read with s 34, IPC .[28] Even in the2246 absence of a charge under s 34 IPC, the conviction and sentence under s 302, IPC, can be maintained adding s 34 thereto.[29] When two, out of the three accused, have been convicted of a charge under ss 302 / 34, the third can be convicted under s 302, only when his 'individual, and not the conjoint, liability' has been established.[30] But where the other two accused, who have been tried along with the appellant on a charge under ss 302 / 34, have been acquitted, there being no evidence that any other unknown person took part in the murder, the appellant, too, cannot be convicted under ss 302 / 34 even though the appellant's confession, implicating conjointly himself and the two others, is taken as true and voluntary.[31] There was evidence that the four accused armed with weapons reached the place of occurrence, two of the accused dragged the deceased, and on the exhortation of one, he fired a shot at the deceased causing death. It was held that it could be said that not only the two accused were present at the scene of the offence but they actively participated in the commission of the offence by doing acts in furtherance of the common intention of killing the deceased, and so their conviction under s 302 was held proper.[32]

Out of seven accused persons put on trial, five accused persons were acquitted by the trial Court. Two accused H and M armed with lathi and sharp edged weapon had come together on the spot, gave abuses, had inflicted injuries with sharp edged weapon and lathi, and had left together from the spot. Held, common intention was proved, thus, the Supreme Court upheld the conviction of the two accused appellants not with the aid of s 149, IPC, but with the aid of s 34 .[33]

In a case of human sacrifice, it was held that just by mere presence of the accused it cannot be said to attribute a common intention and as such, the accused cannot be convicted with the aid of s 34, IPC . Therefore, the accused were acquitted of the charge under s 302 read with s 34, IPC .[34]

The evidence of public witnesses about the role of exhortation attributed to appellant N was full of contradictions, however there was no evidence of pre-consent or prior meeting of minds between the two appellants N and B, therefore, appellant N was held entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[35]

The co-accused S, who was a pillion rider, along with main accused R had gone to commit the murder of the deceased. But the eye-witnesses did not depose that the co-accused S was armed with any weapon or had any role in the murder, therefore the co-accused S was acquitted of the charge under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[36]

Where the testimony of the public witnesses about the presence/involvement of the two accused in the commission of the murder was contradictory, and there was no material to show that the accused had committed the alleged offence in the2247 furtherance of their common intention, the accused were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[37]

There was a land dispute between the two brothers and the accused assaulted the victim with chura and his minor son, the co-accused caught hold of the victim, however the evidence was lacking to show that there was any prior meeting of minds between the accused and his minor son co-accused, the conviction of the co-accused under s 300 read with s 34, IPC was held to be not proper and was set aside.[38]

The complainant and his father (deceased) were returning home from the police station at night and the accused persons came in the way armed with lathi, sword and iron rod, and assaulted the deceased, giving continuous beating and caused serious injuries resulting in death. It was held by the court that the injuries sustained by the deceased were caused by the accused persons in pursuance of their common intention to cause the death of the deceased and the accused were convicted under ss 302 and 34, IPC .[39]

In a case it was alleged that the father and son had gone to the house of the deceased, and father caught hold of the deceased and the son attacked the deceased with Gupti, however father was not named in FIR, hence he was acquitted of charge under ss 302 and 34, IPC .[40]

Where three persons separately armed with weapons storm into the house of the victim in the dead of the night, just because only one of them uses the weapon and gives a fatal blow, it would not absolve the others. The others may not be required to use their weapons, but that by itself does not change the role of such other accused to that of a mere bystander. It was held that the two accused were assigned the role of exhortation and all the three accused were convicted under s 302, IPC read with s 34, IPC .[41]

Applicability of Section 34 to Murder Case when all but one Accused Acquitted

In the case of Krishna Govind Patil v State of Maharashtra ,[42] a four-judge Bench of the Supreme Court was considering a case in which there were a total four accused persons and all of them were acquitted by the trial court of the charge under s 302 read with s 34, IPC . The High Court upheld acquittal of the three accused persons, but convicted the fourth accused under s 302 read with s 34, IPC . When the matter was brought to the Supreme Court, the conviction was set aside as apart from these four accused persons, there was no other fifth accused and in view of the acquittal of three accused persons, the conviction of the accused before the Supreme Court under s 302 read with s 34, IPC, could not be maintained as there was none else with whom he could have shared the common intention to cause death of the deceased. While acquitting, the Supreme Court observed that neither it was the prosecution case that there was any fifth accused person nor was there any evidence to that effect, meaning thereby that if there could have been any other accused person, known or unknown, other than the four persons tried, the conviction of the accused before the Supreme2248 Court could have been upheld as it could have been said that he shared the common intention with the fifth unknown accused person to commit the offence. To illustrate the point, if in a case an FIR is lodged against four persons, known as well as unknown, and tried, out of whom three acquitted, one person can be convicted under s 302, IPC*simpliciter*, in case it is found that injury inflicted by him was fatal one, but he cannot be convicted under s 302 with the aid of s 34, IPC as in view of acquittal of the other accused persons, he cannot be said to have shared the common intention with anybody. On the other hand, if there are three persons, two named and one unknown, whose identity could not be ascertained even during the course of investigation, and upon being put on trial, out of the two named one gets acquitted, the other can be convicted under s 302 with the aid of s 34, IPC, as it can be said that the convicted accused shared the common intention with the unknown person if there is evidence to that effect.[43]

The evidence of the eye-witnesses that the co-accused were holding the deceased by hand, exhorted the accused to bring gun and to shoot at the deceased was found reliable, thus, the co-accused were convicted under s 302 read with s 34, IPC .[44]

Where the public witness deposed that the accused S had gone to work after switching off the line from the transformer and after completing the work, he returned and switched on the electricity line; it was clear that the transformer was at a distance from the electric pole where the deceased got electrocuted and since the accused rushed there to ensure that the line is switched off, it was considered not safe to convict the accused under s 302 read with s 34, IPC, and as such he was acquitted.[45]

8. Applicability of Section 149 to Section 302

Section 149 of the IPC makes the members of an unlawful assembly vicariously liable where it is proved that the offence is committed in pursuance of the common object of the unlawful assembly, where the members of the unlawful assembly knew that such offence was likely to be committed in prosecution of the object of the unlawful assembly. Once it is established that the unlawful assembly had common object, it is not necessary that all persons forming the unlawful assembly must be shown to have committed some overt act for the purposes of incurring the vicarious liability for the offence committed by a member of such unlawful assembly. Under this section the liability of the other members of the unlawful assembly for the offence committed during the continuance of the occurrence, rests upon the fact whether the other members knew before hand that the offence actually committed was likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object. Common object has to be distinguished from the common intention. There is no question of common intention in s 149 of the IPC . Where no injury is inflicted pursuant to the common object to kill the deceased, but caused only when provoked by one of the witnesses, the members of the unlawful assembly cannot be held guilty for the commission of the offence of murder.[46] Where death has been caused in prosecution of the common2249 object of an unlawful assembly, it is not necessary to record a definite and specific finding as to which particular accused out of the members of the unlawful assembly caused the fatal injury. Once an unlawful assembly has come into existence, each member of the assembly becomes vicariously liable for the criminal act of any other member of the assembly committed in prosecution of the common object of the assembly.[47]

The presence of the accused KN on the spot was deposed to by the eye-witness who was niece of the accused, therefore, his conviction under s 302, IPC on the charge of murder was upheld.[48]

Where the prosecution evidence showed that out of eight accused persons, four accused were not present on the spot, no overt act could also be attributed to them, and they were acquitted of the charge under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[49]

All the seven accused assailants armed with lethal weapons viz. country made pistols, lathi, bhala came together to the house of the complainant and participated in the assault in which one person was killed and one injured. The charges against the accused that they in concert with other accused persons to achieve a common object entered the house of the complainant stood proved and they all were convicted under ss 149 and 302, IPC .[50]

There was no enmity between the deceased and the accused and he had not caused any injury to the deceased and no overt act was attributed to the accused so far as the deceased was concerned. Therefore, the mere fact that the accused was armed with a lathi, by itself would not prove that he shared common object with which the main accused was inspired. The prosecution had not adduced evidence to establish the nexus between the common object and the offence committed. Hence it was held that, the accused could not be convicted with the help of s 149, IPC .[51]

Where the eye-witness in his statement mentioned the name of one accused and did not attribute any overt act to other accused persons, it was held that other accused did not share common object with the named accused, and the conviction of the co-accused under ss 302 and 149, IPC was set aside.[52]

Where the two accused were not named in FIR and they were not identified, none of the public witnesses had taken their names as the persons who committed any overt act, or the persons who chased the deceased, it was not established that they were members of unlawful assembly, and therefore, it was held that they could not be convicted under ss 302 and 149, IPC and they were acquitted of the charge.[53]

The evidence of the eye-witnesses established that all the eight accused persons were armed with weapons, and they surrounded the deceased and prevented others from going near the deceased to rescue him. They had arrived together in the same2250 jeep and left by the jeep after the incident and the jeep was kept in starting position. The accused were convicted under ss 302 and 149, IPC .[54] Where the son of the accused, though present on the spot, did not take part in assault and no evidence was adduced that he shared a common object of an unlawful assembly, he was given the benefit of doubt, and his conviction under ss 302 and 149, IPC was set aside.[55]

(II) PROCEDURE

9. Procedure

The offence of murder is a cognizable, non-bailable and non-compoundable offence, and is exclusively triable by a court of session. Except as otherwise provided by the CrPC, or by any other law for the time being in force, no court of session shall take cognizance of any offence unless the case has been committed to by a magistrate under the said Code.[56]Section 209 of the new CrPC dispenses with the inquiry, preliminary to commitment, in cases triable exclusively by a court of session, irrespective of whether such a case is instituted on a criminal complaint or on a police report.[57]

When an offence under s 302, IPC, is alleged against a public servant and the cognizance of offence is not taken owing to the absence of sanction to prosecute him, there is no scope to take cognizance of the offence of murder punishable under s 302, IPC .[58]

The Apex Court has impressed upon the trial courts of the need to indicate the rank of the accused besides using the name while recording evidence in cases involving multiplicity of accused. It also opined that it would be profitable for the High Courts to issue circulars to trial courts to implement this practical suggestion to avoid possible miscarriage of justice resulting solely on account of defective and truncated recording of evidence in criminal cases.[59]

10. Judicial Restraint while Dealing with Judgments of Lower Courts

Commentary under s 366, post, may be referred to.

Time and again the Apex Court has emphasised the need to exercise judicial restraint, particularly while dealing with judgments and orders of the lowers courts. The High Court should avoid unsavory remarks against a judicial personage of the lower hierarchy,[60] when the situation does not warrant such castigation.[61]

11. Judicial Restraint while Making Remarks against Police/Investigating Officers

Castigation of investigation unfortunately seems to be a regular practice when the trial courts acquit accused in criminal cases. It is almost impossible to come across a2251 single case wherein the investigation was conducted completely flawlessly or was absolutely foolproof. The function of criminal courts should not be wasted in picking out the lapses in investigation and by expressing unsavory criticism against investigating officers.[62] The Courts should bear in mind the time constraints of the police officers in the present system, the ill-equipped machinery they have to cope with, and the traditional apathy of respectable persons to come forward for giving evidence in criminal cases which are realities the police force have to confront with while conducting investigation. In almost every case, an Investigating Officer (IO) is impugned with castigating remarks. The courts should not overlook the fact that usually such an officer is not heard in respect of such remarks made against him. The court need make such depreciatory remarks only when it is absolutely necessary in a particular case, and that too by keeping in mind the broad realities indicated above.[63] Thus when the division bench of the High Court did not make any reference to any particular omission or lacuna in the investigation but used unkind remarks against the investigating officer saying 'Investigation of the case was perfunctory and suffered from serious lacuna and irregularity', it did not find favour with the Supreme Court.[64]

12. Precedent--Broad Resemblance to another Case is not Decisive

Unless and until the facts and circumstances in a cited case are in pari materia in all respects with the facts and circumstances of the case at hand, it will not be proper to treat an earlier case as a precedent to arrive at a definite conclusion. This is clear from some judgments of the Supreme Court where the Supreme Court has taken a different view from the earlier cases, though basic facts look similar in the latter case.[65] How a person reacts in a given case may be the determinative factor so far as that case is concerned. That cannot be applied as a rule of universal application to all cases irrespective of the fact situation in that particular case. There can be no empirical formula as to how one reacts in a given situation and its effect and impact. It would be almost like trying to put a square peg on a round hole. To imprint the fact situation of one decided case upon another or observations made in the peculiar facts of a given case to any or every other case notwithstanding dissimilarity in effect and the distinctive features is legally impermissible. Each case, more particularly a criminal case, depends on its own facts and a close similarity between one case and another is not enough to warrant like treatment because a significant detail may alter the entire aspect. In deciding such cases, one should avoid the temptation to decide cases (as said by Cordozo) by matching the colour of one case against the colour of another. To decide therefore on which side of the line a case falls, the broad resemblance to another case is not at all decisive.[66]

13. Accused Pleading he was a Child--Duty of the Court

When a plea is raised on behalf of an accused that he was a 'child' within the meaning of the definition of the expression under the Act, it becomes obligatory for the court, in case it entertains any doubt about the age as claimed by the accused, to hold an inquiry itself for determination of the question of age of the accused or cause2252 an inquiry to be held and seek a report regarding the same, if necessary, by asking the parties to lead evidence in that regard. Keeping in view the beneficial nature of the socially oriented legislation, it is an obligation of the court where such a plea is raised to examine that plea with care and it cannot fold its hands and without returning a positive finding regarding that plea, deny the benefit of the provisions to an accused. The court must hold an inquiry and return a finding regarding the age, one way or the other.[67] The High Courts and subordinate courts were to deal with such cases with more sensitivity, as otherwise the object of the Acts[68] would be frustrated and the effort of the legislature to reform the delinquent child and reclaim him as a useful member of the society would be frustrated.[69] The Supreme Court also emphasised that High Courts may issue administrative directions to the subordinate courts that whenever such a plea is raised before them and they entertain any reasonable doubt about the correctness of the plea, they must as a rule, conduct an inquiry by giving opportunity to the parties to establish their respective claims and return a finding regarding the age of the concerned accused and then deal with the case in the manner provided by law.[70]

Relevant Date for Determining Age of Accused

The relevant date for determining age of the accused is date when the accused was brought for first time before the court. The accused below 16 years when brought before the court would be termed as 'Child' under s 2(f) of the Rajasthan Children Act of 1970.[71]

Can the Plea that Accused was a Child be Entertained for the First Time at the Appellate Stage?

The view of a Full Bench of the Patna High Court[72]was that though the normal rule is that a plea unless it goes to the very root of the jurisdiction should not be allowed to be taken at the appellate stage especially when it requires investigation into a question of fact but a plea that accused in question was a 'child' within the meaning of the Act can be entertained at the appellate stage also and should not be overlooked on technical grounds. After noticing the provisions of the Bihar Children Act 1982 and the Juvenile Justice Act 1986, a Full Bench of the Patna High Court opined, taking into consideration the aim and intention of the two Acts, that the application of the provisions of the Acts should not be denied to an offender where, by the time the trial commenced or concluded the accused had ceased to be a juvenile, although when the offence was committed he was a juvenile within the meaning of the Act. The court then laid down the procedure which should be followed when a plea is raised to the effect that the accused on the date of the offence was a child and held that inquiry into that aspect should be conducted and on the basis of the evidence led at the inquiry, the court should record a finding whether or not on the date of commission of the offence, the accused was a 'child' within the meaning of the Act.[73] A Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court also took the view that the plea2253 by the accused that he was a child at time of commission of the offence can be allowed to be raised for the first time in appeal.[74] But the Apex Court took a somewhat contrary view in another case.[75] Wherein, neither before the committal court nor before the trial court any plea was raised on behalf of the accused that he was a child and so should not have been committed by the magistrate and therefore tried by the sessions court and that he ought to have been dealt with only by the Court of Juveniles, the Apex Court did not approve that the High Court merely on the basis of the entry made in s 313, CrPC, a statement mentioning the age of the accused as 17 years, has concluded that the accused was a 'child' within the definition of the Act on the date of the occurrence.[76] Later in another case where the plea that the accused on the date of the incident was hardly 13 years old was not taken before the trial court and High Court so the Apex Court where this plea was raised for the first time upheld the conviction of the accused but set aside the sentences awarded.[77]When the accused has not taken the plea before the sessions court that he was a child at the time of the incident, such plea cannot be taken before High Court in appeal for the first time to get benefit of the Children's Act.[78] When such plea of applicability of Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act 2000 is neither taken before the trial court nor before the High Court nor before the Supreme Court, it being a mixed question of law and fact which cannot be taken for the first time in criminal appeal before the Supreme Court as this is not a pure question of law.[79]

A Child Tried by Sessions Court cannot be Sentenced

When a person accused is a child at the time of commission of offence under the Children's Act applicable and he is tried by the Sessions Court with or without an adult accused and is held guilty of the offence charged, he cannot be sentenced for the offence committed even though he becomes an adult at the time of his conviction and cannot be sent to an approved school under the respective Children's Acts for being retained there, as he had already attained majority. The sentence if awarded by the trial court is liable to be quashed on the sole ground that the accused was a child on the date of commission of the occurrence though his conviction can be maintained.[80] But when accused is found to be above 16 years of age at the time of incident, he is not entitled to the benefit of the UP Children's Act 1952.[81]2254

14. Form of Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Sessions Judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the...day of..., at...have committed murder by causing the death of...and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 302 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Particulars of Charge

Under s 211 of the CrPC,[82] every charge shall state the offence with which the accused is charged. If the law, which creates the offence, gives it any specific name, the offence may be described, in the charge, by that name only. The fact, that the charge is made, is equivalent to a statement that every legal condition, required by law to constitute the offence charged, is fulfilled in the particular case. It is only when the law, which creates the offence, does not give it any specific name that so much of the definition of the offence must be stated as to give the accused notice of the matter with which he is charged. A charge, which expressly mentions the specific name, given to it by law, would be a sufficient charge under sub-s (2) of s 221, CrPC 1898, corresponding to s 211 of the CrPC, even if the ingredients of the offence are not given. But if the specific name of the offence is not mentioned, the ingredients cannot be implied.[83] Thus, A is charged with the murder of B. This is equivalent to a statement that A's act falls within the definition of murder given in ss 299 and 300, IPC, that it did not fall within any of the general exceptions of the said Code or within any of the five exceptions to s 300 or that, if it did fall within exception 1, one or other of the three provisos to that exception applied to it.[84] A charge under s 302 / 34, IPC showing that either the appellant 'or' some other person' committed the murder, has been held to be defective because it does not show, nor does it mention, how the appellant acted in concert with anyone else.[85] It should be remembered that nothing, which is not essential to the offence, should be included in the charge, except such details of time and place as are sufficient to give, to the accused, notice of the matter with which he is charged.

Separate Charges for Distinct Offences

Under s 218 of the CrPC, for every distinct offence of which any person is accused, there shall be a separate charge, and every such charge shall be tried separately except in the cases mentioned in ss 219, 220, 221 and 223 . Where, therefore, the accused killed a man and subsequently his wife, it was held that the two murders were distinct offences and the inclusion of both in one charge offended against the first part of s 233, CrPC 1898, corresponding to s 218 (1), CrPC 1973.[86]2255

Alternative Charge

The joinder of a charge of murder (s 502, IPC) and of causing disappearance of the evidence of the murder (s 201, IPC) in the alternative is legal.[87] It was held, by the Privy Council, in Begu v Emperor [88] that in a charge of murder under s 302, a conviction under s 201, without a further charge being made, is not illegal. Where a person is acquitted of the charge of murder and other cognate charges, with which he is charged, his conviction under s 201, without any further charge, is perfectly legal.[89] Where alternative charges under ss 302 and 201 are framed, the Sessions Court should take the evidence into consideration and record its findings on both the charges. It should not record a finding of acquittal on the charge of s 201, without going into the question and taking the evidence into consideration, on the mere ground that the accused is convicted of the offence under s 202 . The dangers of such a course are pointed out in Adi Bhumiani v State .[90]

Alteration of Charge

Under the CrPC 1898, the magistrate, while committing a case to the court of session, was required to frame a charge. Under the CrPC 1973, he simply commits the case to the court of sessions and the latter proceeds to frame a charge as if it were the court of original jurisdiction. Under s 228, CrPC,[91] on the material placed before it, if there are grounds for presuming that the accused committed the offence, it has to frame a charge or the charges. Section 216(1) , CrPC,[92] empowers the court to alter, or to add to any charge at any time before the judgment is pronounced. It invests the court with a comprehensive power to remedy the defect in the framing or non-framing, of a charge, whether discovered at the initial stage of the trial or at any subsequent stage prior to judgment.[93] The law, however, warrants that the alteration of the charge and the trial on the altered charge must not occasion a failure of justice.

Where the circumstance are almost identical, the absence of a charge, under s 302, against only the accused, when others are acquitted, is not fatal and the defect is only a mere irregularity which is curable and no prejudice can be said to have been caused to the accused convict.[94]

Accused charged with Section 302 can be convicted under Section 314

Commentary under the s 314, ante, may be referred to.2256

Defect, Irregularity, Omission or Error in Charge

According to s 464, CrPC, no finding, sentence or order by a court of competent jurisdiction shall be deemed invalid, merely on the ground that no charge was framed or on the ground of any error, omission or irregularity in the charge including any misjoinder of charges unless, in the opinion of the court, a failure of justice has in fact been occasioned thereby. Thus, if in framing charges against the accused, there was some technical defect or error, no benefit arises to the accused unless due to that defect/error in framing the charge, any substantial injustice has been caused to the accused or accused has been prejudiced in getting justice.[1] When all particulars required to be given in the charge under s 212, CrPC, were mentioned in the charge and if, in a technical manner, the charges were not framed in the prescribed form as enjoined by the CrPC, then on the technical footing there is no justification for holding the charge to be defective.[2] Mere omission in charge of words 'along with three others' is not fatal when particularly no failure of justice is occasioned.[3]

(III) ADMISSION, CONFESSION AND PLEA OF GUILT

15. Introduction

Criminal law gives several opportunities to the accused to admit during investigation and trial the facts relating to the crime alleged to be committed by him. Such statements of the accused if proved are confessions and conviction can be based on the statements. But where, besides such statements of the accused, some evidence is required to be proved to establish the case of the prosecution then such statements are an admission and not confession. An accused who wants to confess his guilt during the investigation of his case can do so before a magistrate under s 164, CrPC, or give an extra-judicial confession before any member of the public. Besides admission and confession the accused may take a plea of guilt when after ascertaining a prima facie case against him, the court frames charge of the offence alleged against him and reads it over and explains it to him. The charge if admitted is known as plea of guilt and obviates the need for the trial. After the evidence, the prosecution is concluded and all the incriminating circumstances appearing against the accused are put to the accused under s 313(1)(b), CrPC 1973. The court may also in the inquiry or trial, at any stage without previously warning the accused put such questions to him as the court considers necessary under s 313(1)(a), CrPC 1973. In answer to the question or examination by the court under s 313(1)(a) and (b), CrPC 1973, the accused may admit to the incriminating circumstances against him but since the examination of the accused under s 313(1)(b), CrPC 1973, is always after the conclusion of the prosecution evidence which commences subsequent to pleading not guilty to the charge, by the accused, it is most unlikely that the accused would admit the prosecution case as a whole during his such examination. However, he may admit some of the circumstances appearing against him in evidence which may fall short of confession. The admission and confession may be judicial or extra-judicial.2257

From the above, it is obvious that there is essentially a difference between admission, confession and plea of guilt. Admission is defined and dealt with in ss 17-23 of the Evidence Act 1872, and is not in itself sufficient for the conviction of the accused. However, confession, and plea of guilt which are in themselves sufficient for the purpose of conviction of the accused owing to their being more important, are being further dealt with separately.

Plea of Guilt should be in the Words used by Accused

Unlike s 252 CrPC does not cast any obligation on the sessions judge to record the plea of the accused as nearly as possible in the words used by the accused, yet prudence demands that the court records the plea in the words used by the accused so that the court confirming conviction and sentence may know what exactly the plea of the accused was.[4]

16. Relevancy and Admissibility of Confession

A confession made by an accused person is irrelevant in a criminal proceeding, if the making of the confession appears to the court to have been caused by any inducement, threat or promise having reference to the charge against the accused person, proceeding from a person in authority and sufficient, in the opinion of the court, to give the accused person grounds which would appear to him reasonable for supposing that by making it he would gain any advantage or avoid any evil of a temporal nature in reference to the proceedings against him.[5] No confession made by any person whilst he is in the custody of the police officer, unless it be made in the immediate presence of a magistrate shall be proved against such person,[6] except the part of such statement of the accused which leads to the discovery of the fact.[7] Otherwise no confession made to a police officer shall be used against a person accused of any offence.[8] The position of a village administrative officer is not different from the police.[9] But a senior reserve police officer appointed under the State Reserve Police Force Act though a police officer under the Bombay Police Act, but since he is not empowered with the power of investigation envisaged in ch 12 of CrPC is not a police officer within the meaning of s 25 of the Evidence Act, so a confession before him by the accused is valid.[10]

17. What is a Confession

'Confession' which is known as a species of 'admission' is to be found contained in ss 24-30 of the Evidence Act 1872.

'Confession' has not been defined in the Evidence Act. Justice Stephen, in his Digest of the Law of Evidence, defined it thus: 'A confession is an admission made at any time by a person charged with crime, stating or suggesting the inference that he committed the crime'.2258

This definition was adopted by various High Courts in India.[11] Justice Straight, however, in Queens Empress v Jagrup ,[12] did not adopt this definition and held that only those statements which are the direct acknowledgements of guilt could be regarded as 'confessions' and not mere inculpatory admission which may fall short of an admission of guilt. A similar view was taken in Emperor v Santya Bandit. [13] The judicial opinion was thus not unanimous as to the exact meaning of 'confession'. The Privy Council, however, by its authoritative pronouncement in Pakala Narayana Swami v The King-Emperor ,[14] clarified the position and laid down that a confession must either admit in terms the offence, or at any rate substantially all the facts which constitute the offence.

This was followed by this court in many cases, including Palvinder Kaur v State of Punjab ,[15]Om Prakash v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[16]State of Uttar Pradesh v Deoman Upadhyaya. [17]

In view of these decisions, it is certain that a 'confession' must either be an express acknowledgement of guilt of the offence charged, certain and complete in itself or it must admit substantially all the facts which constitute the offence.[18] Compelling the accused to be searched does not amount to confession.[19]

18. Confessions before a Magistrate

During the course of an investigation or at any time afterwards before the commencement of the inquiry of trial, the confession may be recorded by any metropolitan magistrate or judicial magistrate under s 164, CrPC . However, a police officer on whom any power of a magistrate has been conferred under any law for the time being in force, is not entitled to record confessional statements.[20] The magistrate shall, before recording any such confession, explain to the person making it that he is not bound to make a confession and that, if he does so, it may be used as evidence against him; and the magistrate shall not record any such confession unless, upon questioning the person making it, he has reason to believe that it is being made voluntarily.[21] If at any time before the confession is recorded, the person appearing before the magistrate states that he is not willing to make the confession, and the magistrate shall not authorise the detention of such person in police custody.[22] The magistrate is also required to make a prescribed memorandum at the foot of the record of confessional statement verifying that he has explained to the accused that2259 he was not bound to make a confession and if he does so, then his confessional statement may be used against him and that the confession was made voluntarily by the accused.[23] Certificate/memorandum at foot of confession as one required under s 164(4) is mandatory and non-compliance with requirements of s 164(4) makes confession inadmissible.[24]The act of recording confession under s 164, CrPC being a very solemn act, the magistrate recording the confession must take care that the requirements of s 164(2), CrPC, are fully complied with.[25] The magistrate recording a confession should question the person making it to find out if the confession is being made voluntarily.[26] The questioning of the accused before recording confession as to whether it was voluntary as a matter of substance and not of mere form. A magistrate should ascertain at the beginning of the statement and not at the end whether the confession made is voluntarily.[27] If the questions to judge the voluntary nature of a confessional statement are not put to the accused before recording the confession, the confessional statements so recorded cannot be relied upon despite the fact that the magistrate has given a certificate as required under s 164(4), CrPC .[28]

Confession before Magistrate does not offend Article 21

The rendering of legal assistance, according to the principle of art 21 of the Constitution of India, on the very first day of production of the accused before the magistrate is meant for giving and for offering an opportunity to the accused as to the course he will take in the case as his defence. Section 164 , CrPC, contains a warning to the accused to be given by the magistrate, before making any confessional statement offering time to him for his reflection and to insure that before making such statement whether he was under coercion or duress by the police and or there was any police person within his sight. These are the protective measures. The accused has to be warned by the magistrate that even if he refuses to give any confessional statement he will not be sent to police custody and it will not be taken against him. The special provision under s 164, CrPC, is made by the legislature in its wisdom and the same does not come within the purview of art 21 of the Constitution of India and as such there is no militancy of art 21 and s 164, CrPC .[29]

19. Confession of Co-accused

Section 30, Evidence Act, states that when more persons than one are being tried jointly for the same offence, and a confession made by one of such person is proved, the court may take into consideration such confession as against such other persons as well as against the person who makes such confession.

Section 30 of the Evidence Act appears to be based on the view that an accused who admits his own guilt affords same sort of credibility in support of the truth of his2260 confession against offers as well as himself.[30] The statement of the co-accused must amount to confession and if it is short of that, it cannot be admissible in evidence against the other accused.[31]It is essential that the accused making the confessional statement and the co-accused be tried jointly. Where a joint trial started but could not continue for long as the son of the accused absconded and the case of the accused was separated, s 30 of the Evidence Act would not be attracted and the statement of the other accused would not be usable against the absconding accused.[32] But, where such accused absconded at the absolute end of the joint trial resulting in separating his trial, his confession can be taken into consideration against the other accused to lend assurance to the conclusion of guilt reached on the basis of other evidence.[33] In case, the accused making the confession dies before pronouncement of judgment in a joint trial, his confession under s 30 of the Evidence Act read with s 32(3) of the same act is relevant.[34] The confession of a co-accused against himself and against other accused in a joint trial is relevant only if they are being tried for the same or identical offence. If the accused persons in the same trial are being tried for different offences, then the confession of the accused is not relevant under s 30 of the Evidence Act . Such a confession can only be taken into consideration by the court but is not in itself a substantive piece of evidence.[35]

A confession made by an accused is not relevant against the co-accused under s 10 of the Evidence Act .[36]

Evidentiary Value of Confession of Co-Accused

The confession of a co-accused is a very weak type of evidence.[37] It does not even come within the definition of 'evidence' contained in s 3 of the Evidence Act .[38]The confession of a co-accused stands on an even lower footing than that of the evidence of an accomplice. It can only be considered against his co-accused. The Evidence Act itself gives it a position inferior to the evidence of an approver.[39] The conviction cannot be based solely on a confession made by a co-accused in the absence of corroboration from independent evidence.[40] Although without corroborative evidence a confession made by an accused cannot be used to convict his co-accused but the accused making a confession can be convicted solely upon his own confession despite the fact that he retracted his confession, provided that the court believes it to2261 be true.[41] The extrajudicial confession has to be proved like any other fact. The value of evidence as to the confession depends upon the veracity of the others to whom it is made and the circumstances in which it came to be made and the actual words used by the accused.[42]

20. Retracted Confession of Accused

After the confession is retracted by the accused, it is not free from suspicion and so cannot be acted upon without corroboration of credible independent evidence.[43] What amount of corroboration[44] is necessary and what is sufficient corroboration has to be decided in each case on its own facts and circumstances.[45] But the rule that a retracted confession cannot be acted upon unless corroborated, is more of prudence than of law.[46] The rule of prudence does not require that each and every circumstance mentioned in the confession with regard to the participation of the person in the crime must be separately and independently corroborated.[47] If the court believes that the retracted confession is voluntary and true, a conviction based upon even uncorroborated retracted confession is not illegal.[48] Where the confession was retracted after lapse of several months and after the closure of prosecution evidence during examination of accused under s 313, CrPC and not at the earliest opportunity, it can be concluded that the confession was voluntary as it militates to some extent against the contention of the accused that the confession was recorded under pressure of the police.[49] But when accused made confessional statement stating that he hit the deceased on head and other parts of the body and this version of the accused was inconsistent with the medical evidence and subsequently, the accused retracted the confession, it was not found safe to rely upon such retracted extra-judicial confession.[50] The legal position with regard to retracted confession can be summed up in the observations made by the Supreme Court in Shankar v State of Tamil Nadu ,[51] given below.

Judidal confessions are those which are made before a magistrate or in court in due course of legal proceedings and when such a confession is retracted, the courts have held that apart from the statement being voluntary, it should be true and should receive sufficient corroboration in material particulars by independent evidence. The rule of prudence namely requiring corroboration does not mean that each and every circumstance mentioned in the confession with regard to the participation of the accused in the crime must be separately and independently corroborated. It is sufficient if there is general corroboration of the important incidents, just like in the case of an approver's evidence and it is not necessary that the corroborative evidence2262 itself should be sufficient for conviction. It may not be necessary to refer to remaining aspects governing the use of retracted confession for the purposes of this case. Suffice it to say that it is also laid down that it is not illegal to base a conviction or an uncorroborated confession of an accused person but as a rule of prudence which has sanctified itself to the rule of law, the courts do look for corroboration before acting upon and accepting the retracted confession and what amount of corroboration would be necessary in a case would be a question of fact to be determined in the light of the circumstances of the case. In State of Tamil Nadu v Kutty alias Laxmi Narsimhan ,[52] it was said:

> It is not the law that once a confession was retracted the court should presume that the confession is tainted. As a matter of practical knowledge we can say that non-retracted confession is a rarity in criminal cases. To retract from confession is the right of the confessor and all the accused against whom confessions were produced by the prosecution have invariably adopted that right. It would be injudicious to jettison a judicial confession on the mere premise that its maker has retracted from it. The court has a duty to evaluate the evidence concerning the confession by looking at all aspects. The twin test of a confession is to ascertain whether it was voluntary and true. Once those tests are found to be positive the next endeavour is to see whether there is any other reason which stands in the way of acting on it. Even for that, retraction of the confession it not the ground to throw the confession overboard.

21. Retracted Confession of Co-accused

Retracted confession does not come within the definition of evidence contained in s 3 of the Evidence Act . But, when there is sufficient evidence against co-accused then the confession described under s 30 of the Evidence Act may be thrown into the scale as an additional reason for believing that evidence to support the conviction.[53] A retracted confession is a weak link against the maker and more so against a co-accused.[54] A retracted confession of a co-accused cannot be made the foundation of a conviction though it can be considered against the other accused to be used only in support of other evidence.[55] Although a confession made by an accused cannot be used to convict the co-accused in the same trial in the absence of corroborative evidence, but the accused making it can be convicted solely upon his own confession despite it being retracted provided the court believes it to be true.[56]

Credibility of Retracted Confession

The weight to be attached to a retracted confession must depend upon whether the court thinks that it was induced by the consideration that the confession was untrue, or by realisation on that it had failed to secure the benefits of the hope which inspired it.[57] The amount of credibility to be attached to a retracted confession would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case. As a matter of prudence and practice, a court would not ordinarily act upon it to convict a co-accused without the strongest and fullest corroboration on material particulars. Corroboration in full sense implies2263 corroboration not only as to the factum of the offence but also as to the connection of the co-accused with that offence.[58]

22. Extra-Judicial Confession

A confession made before a magistrate or in court is a judicial confession. The confessions made before anyone except magistrate or court are extra-judicial confessions. Sarkar on Evidence[59] states: 'An extra-judicial confession may properly be made to any person or collection or body of persons. It is not even necessary that the statement should have been addressed to any definite individual...'. Further, an extra judicial confession is a weak form of evidence.[60] Extra judicial confession made by the accused before the Village Administrative Officer is not admissible and thus, cannot be relied upon.[61]

Extra-judicial confessions are not usually considered with favour but that does not mean that such a confession coming from a person who has no reason to state falsely and circumstances tend to support his statement, should not be disbelieved. An extra-judicial confession made to one who is not a person of authority and which is free from any suspicion as to its voluntary character and has also a ring of truth in it is admissible in evidence against the accused and deserves to be acted upon.[62]

When the contents of extra-judicial confession are disclosed long before to the witnesses but the extra-judicial confession was subsequently recorded inside the police station, the mere fact that the confessions read to the witnesses were later put in black and white in the police station is no reason to cover it with the cloak of inadmissibility.[63] But extra judicial confession made in the presence of the police is not admissible.[64] Though it is admissible if made before a village administrative officer[65] or to a constable or an official of the Rajasthan armed constabulary not vested with power of investigation, before but not in the course of investigation, as s 162, CrPC, would not be attracted.[66]

Extra judicial confession made to the witnesses found not reliable as the accused had no occasion to make extra judicial confession to the witnesses.[67] The three accused respondents were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .

Where the accused was alleged to have made confession to one of his relatives who lodged a complaint with police after a delay of three days, though being a social worker she was with police for two days in connection with some other case, the2264 extra-judicial confession was held surrounded by suspicious circumstances.[68] In charge for rape and murder, extra judicial confession made by the accused to Sarpanch was found not reliable, as the Sarpanch had disclosed the extra-judicial confession to police after 16 days; the conviction of the accused under ss 302 and 376, IPC was set aside.[69]

In a murder case, the extra judicial confession made by the accused to Police Patil was believed and the accused were convicted under s 302 read with s 34, IPC .[70] In a case, the extra judicial confession was made by the accused to a convenient witness to the police as the witness admitted that he had stood bail in a large number of excise cases and that he was running a toddy shop. There was no other evidence to connect the accused with the commission of the offence charged. It was case of no evidence. The accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[71]

Extra-Judicial Confession may be Strong Evidence

Extra-judicial confession can be relied upon and it is not always essential that there should be corroboration, if found:

(i) voluntary;
(ii) reliable;
(iii) without any allegation of inimical terms;
(iv) trustworthy;
(v) unbiased;
(vi) in a natural incidental way;
(vii) showing the accused only as a perpetrator;
(viii) nothing which may militate against him;
(ix) clear and unambiguous inspiring confidence of the court; and
(x) appearing and natural.

In such factual scenario, no research of corroboration is warranted.[72]

The evidence in the form of extra-judicial confession if undergoes successful scrutiny of the aforesaid aspects, can be relied on for the purpose of holding the accused guilty even without other independent corroboration or circumstantial evidence. Corroboration to the extra-judicial confession in all cases is sine qua non is neither just nor reasonable proposition. If extra-judicial confession is found to be unbiased, untainted coming from the evidence of trustworthy and reliable witness who have stood the test of cross-examination against whom there is no remote suggestion or allegation of inimical terms can be based for holding the accused guilty.[73]

In fact, extra-judicial confession is like any other evidence if proved under s 3 of the Evidence Act . If it is successfully proved by the prosecution that version stated2265 by the witnesses was truthful and voluntary version of the accused referable to incriminating circumstances and his complicity, the same would form basis for conviction. It is not the quantity but quality which matters in evaluating the evidence of prosecution even in case of extra-judicial confession either under s 24 or 30 of the Evidence Act .[74]

There is neither any rule of law nor of prudence that evidence furnished by extra-judicial confession cannot be relied upon unless corroborated by some other credible evidence. The courts have considered the evidence of extra-judicial confession a weak piece of evidence. If the evidence about extra-judicial confession comes from the mouth of witness/witnesses who appear to be unbiased not even remotely inimical to the accused, and in respect of whom nothing is brought out which may tend to indicate that he may have a motive for attributing an untruthful statement to the accused, the words spoken to by the witness are clear, unambiguous and unmistakably convey that the accused is the perpetrator of the crime and nothing is omitted by the witness which may militate against it, then after subjecting the evidence of the witness to a rigorous tests on the touchstone of credibility, if it passes the test, the extra-judicial confession can be accepted and can be the basis of a conviction. It has further been observed that in such a situation to go in search of corroboration itself tends to cast a shadow of doubt over the evidence. If the evidence of extra-judicial confession is reliable, trustworthy and beyond reproach, the same can be relied upon a conviction can be founded thereon.[75]

It is required that the evidence of an extra-judicial confession should in all cases be corroborated and where such confession was proved by an independent witness who was a responsible officer and who bore no animus against the accused, there was hardly any justification to disbelieve the same.[76]

23. Plea of Guilty in Capital Cases

A plea of guilty under s 229 of the CrPC,[77] is not a confession. It is a statement which, if accepted by the court, amounts to a waiver of trial on the part of the accused in which case alone it might be utilised in evidence.[78] It is an admission of all the facts, on which the charge is found, as well as an admission of guilt in respect of them. A plea of guilt in a criminal court can only be made in response to a charge and an informal admission as to guilt does not amount to a formal plea of guilty and such admission has not, in fact or in law, the same binding effect as a plea of guilty.[79] It is also not an admission, by an accused, of the guilt under a particular section of the IPC . He does not plead to a section of a criminal statute; he pleads guilty, or not guilty, to the facts alleged to disclose an offence under that section.[80] Similarly, where the facts, mentioned in the police reports, do not, by themselves, constitute an offence, the mere admission of the accused, that the facts2266 mentioned are correct, is not tantamount to a guilty plea.[81] It must be remembered that the plea of guilty does not avail when the offence in question has not been committed in the eyes of law.[82]

Almost all the High Courts of the country have taken the view that the court should not act upon the plea of guilty in a serious offense but should proceed to take the evidence as if the plea had been one of not guilty and should decide the case upon the what evidence including the accused's plea.[83]

It is a settled practice not to accept the plea of guilty in a murder case unless the court is satisfied that the accused knew exactly what was implied by his plea of guilty and its effect.[84] Where, on a trial for murder, the accused was put to some questions, in answer to which he said that he hit the deceased, and the sessions judge, treating the statement as a plea of guilty, convicted the accused of murder, it was held: (a) that it was not in accordance with the usual practice to accept a plea of guilty in a case where the natural consequence would be a sentence of death; and (b) that a man may plead that he hit some one, who thereby died, without necessarily admitting that he committed murder because murder, under the IPC, requires a certain intention or a certain knowledge.[85] But though it is not the usual practice to accept plea of guilty on a capital charge, it cannot be said that it can never be accepted. There, is no reason why, if proper safeguards are taken, such a plea should not be accepted. Such safeguards must include the accused's representation by counsel, who must be in a position to answer the questions of the court, with respect to the fact as to whether the accused knows what he is doing and the consequences of his plea and also a medical report or medical evidence upon him.[86] Where, in a capital case, there is any doubt as to whether the accused fully understands the meaning and effect of a plea of guilty, it is advisable for the court to take evidence, and not to convict solely on the plea of the accused.[87] Under s 229, CrPC,[88] the court is not bound to convict the accused on his plea of guilty. The court has a discretion to accept, or not to accept, the plea.[89] If an accused pleads guilty, the court ought to satisfy itself that he confesses the full offence charged in the indictment.[90] So, before an accused can be convicted on a plea of guilty, it must be established that he has admitted all the facts, on which his charge is founded, as well as guilt in respect of them. Unless the accused distinctly admits each and every fact necessary to constitute the offence, and unless the judge himself finds, on the admissions made, that the2267 offence charged is legally established, he should record evidence and come to a decision thereon.[91]

Where an accused has pleaded guilty to a charge of murder, conviction of culpable homicide not amounting to murder is illegal.[92]

(IV) ARTICLES RECOVERED AS CASE PROPERTY

24. Discovery of the Deceased's Articles from the Possession of the Accused or at his Instance

Where an accused is found in possession of the ornaments, worn by the deceased at the time of the murder, the question arises as to the inference to be drawn from this circumstance. In this respect, some theories in favour of the accused need be considered and eliminated before drawing an inference of murder against the accused. The first is that it may be that someone merely committed the murder and went away leaving the ornaments. The second is that someone murdered the deceased and stole the property and then entrusted it to the accused. And the third is that the murderer, who robbed the deceased of the ornaments, was himself robbed by someone. After eliminating the possible theories suggested above, the court is entitled, if it appears reasonable in all the circumstances of the case, to infer that the accused committed the murder, or took part in its commission, from the fact that he is found in possession of property proved to have been in possession of the murdered person at the time of murder, or is able to point out the place where such property is concealed and admits having concealed it there and fails to give any reasonable explanation of his possession.[93]

In what circumstances, the presumption under s 114, illust (a), of the Evidence Act, may be drawn depends upon the circumstances, under which the discovery of the fruits of crime is made from a particular accused, the time-gap or the interval and the nature of the property involved, especially in quantity and character, in the context of early or delayed dispensability.[94] So, although the recovery of the articles belonging to the deceased from the possession of the accused raises a suspicion about his complicity in the murder, yet in the absence of any other evidence, it would be unsafe to draw an inference of guilt on a charge of murder and base a conviction thereon. What may be held in such a case is that the accused is guilty of an offence under s 411,[95] or under s 380 .[96] Where, therefore, the only evidence against an accused person is the recovery of stolen property, then even though the circumstances may indicate that the theft and the murder must have been committed at the same time, it is not safe to draw the inference that the person, in possession of the stolen property was the murderer.2268

Suspicion cannot take the place of proof.[1] In Bhikha Gober v Emperor ,[2] it was held that the mere fact, that an accused produced, shortly after the murder, ornaments which were on the murdered person, is not enough to justify the inference that the accused must have committed the murder. There must be some further material to connect the accused with the murder in order to hold him guilty of that offence.

The recovery of articles, which are ordinary articles found in many houses and which have no identifying marks, is held to be hardly of any probative value.[3]

25. In Robbery-cum-Murder Cases Recent and Unexplained Possession of Stolen Property Raises Presumption of Murder as well

When robbery and murder are part of the same transaction and the accused from whom the recovery of stolen properties was made, consequent upon their disclosure statements and they did not offer any explanation regarding their possession of the stolen properties, drawing a presumption under s 114 of Evidence Act, it can solely be held that the accused persons were at least guilty of the offence of robbery punishable under s 392, IPC, on the assumption that they were not armed with any deadly weapon.[4] The recent and unexplained possession of stolen properties will be taken to be presumptive evidence of the charge of murder as well.[5] The presumption permitted to be drawn under illust 114(a) of the Evidence Act has to be read along with 'important time factor'. If the ornaments in possession of the deceased are found in possession of a person soon after the murder, a presumption of killing may be permitted. The close proximity of the recovery with the murder as 'important time factor' should not be lost sight of.[6]

But in a case of robbery and murder, when the recovery of all the three articles of the victim are found in possession of the accused on the very next day leading to the presumption that the accused committed robbery but death of the victim was found to be caused by drowning, no internal or external injury was found on the person of the deceased though some superficial marks of injuries could not be noticed due to decomposition of the dead body, it was difficult to link the death of the deceased by drowning with the offence of robbery. Thus, the accused persons were found entitled to acquittal under s 302, IPC, but were liable for conviction under s 392, IPC .[7]While drawing presumption under s 114 of the Evidence Act in robbery-cum-murder cases on the basis of recent possession of belongings, of the victim with the accused, the2269 court must adopt a cautions approach and have assurances from all angles that the accused not merely committed theft or robbery but also killed the victim.[8] Thus, where the accused persons removed earrings causing injuries to the deceased and there was every possibility that one of the accused, picked up the stone at that moment and decided to hit the deceased in order to silence or immobilise the victim, if the idea was to murder him and take away the ornaments, there was really no need to forcibly snatch the earrings before putting an end to the victim. When there was no pre-meditated plan to kill the deceased, then two possibilities arose, one common intention of accused persons sprang up and they decided to kill the victim instantaneously for whatever reason, two, one of the accused suddenly got the idea of killing the deceased and in furtherance thereof picking up the stone lying at the spot and hitting the deceased, when there is a reasonable scope for two possibilities and the court is not in a position to know the actual details of the occurrence, it is not safe to extend the presumption under s 114 so as to find the accused persons guilty of the offence of murder with the aid of s 34, IPC .[9]

26. Recovered Articles not immediately Sealed--Effect

Where the recovered articles were not immediately sealed no value can be attached to the said recovery.[10] When the investigating officer did not affix lac seals after effecting recoveries from the accused persons, no evidentiary value can be attached to the said recovery.[11]

27. Discovery of Fact under Section 27, Indian Evidence Act 1872[12]

The essence of s 27, Evidence Act, is that it was enacted as a proviso to the two preceding sections (ss 25 and 26) which imposed a complete ban on the admissibility of any confession made by an accused either to the police or to any one while the accused is in police custody. The object of making a provision in s 27 was to permit a certain portion of the statement made by an accused to a police officer admissible in evidence whether or not such statement is or is not a confessional. Nonetheless, the ban against admissibility would stand lifted if the statement distinctly related to a discovery of fact. A fact can be discovered by the police (investigating officer) pursuant to information elicited from the accused if such disclosure was followed by one or more of a variety of causes. Recovery of an object is only one such cause. Recovery, or even production of object by itself need not necessarily result in discovery of a fact.[13]

That is why Sir John Beaumont said in Pulikuri Kottaya[14] that 'it is fallacious to treat the fact discovered in the section as equivalent to the object produced'. The following sentence of the learned law lord in the said decision, though terse, is eloquent in conveying the message highlighting the pith of the ratio.

> Information supplied by the person in custody that 'I will produce a knife concealed in the roof of my house', does not lead to the discovery of a knife; knives were discovered2270 many years ago. It leads to the discovery of the fact that a knife is concealed in the house of the informant to his knowledge, and if the knife is proved to have been used in the commission of the offence, the fact discovered is very relevant.

The legal proposition adumbrated in Pulikuri Kottaya has been considered and tested by the Court, time and again, and on all such occasions, the Court has only reiterated the said principle with approval.[15] The ratio therein (Kottaya's) has become locus classicus and even the lapse of half-a-century after its pronouncement has not eroded its forensic worth.[16] No doubt in a given case an object could also be a fact, but discovery of a fact cannot be equated with recovery of the object though the latter may help in the final shape of what exactly was the fact discovered pursuant to the information elicited from the accused.[17] Thus, during interrogation by the police when the accused made a statement 'I have kept firearm concealed behind the old house in a heap of wood', the fact discovered by police officer before whom statement is made is certainly not the gun, the fact discovered is that the accused had concealed the gun behind the old house under a heap of wood.[18]

Accused pointing out Place of Concealment of Dead Body or Incriminating Material--Three Possibilities

There are three possibilities when an accused points out the place where a dead body or an incriminating material was concealed without stating that it was concealed by himself. One is that he himself concealed it. Second is that he saw somebody else concealing it. And the third is that he would have been told by another person that it was concealed there. But if the accused declines to tell the criminal court that his knowledge about the concealment was on account of one of the last two possibilities, the criminal court can presume that it was concealed by the accused himself. This is because the accused is the only person who can offer the explanation as to how else he came to know of such concealment and if he chooses to refrain from telling the Court as to how else he came to know of it, the presumption is a well-justified course to be adopted by the Court. Such an interpretation is not inconsistent with the principle embodied in s 27 of the Evidence Act .[19]

28. Blood-stained Articles

The fact that there was human blood on the accused's clothes when he was arrested, may be taken into consideration in determining his guilt in a murder case,[20] but it cannot be regarded as a conclusive piece of evidence.[21] Of course, it is a piece of evidence which goes to support other evidence,[22] but it is impossible to say that mere2271 discovery of a blood-stained article is enough to justify a conviction for murder.[23] The recovery of a blood-stained axe at the instance of the accused is one of the incriminating circumstances against the accused.[24] The plea that as the knife was found from a nearby water pit after about 24 hours, no blood would have remained on it cannot be accepted as the evidence showed that the knife was closed before it was thrown in that water pit.[25] Recovery of a piece of cloth and two shirt buttons found near the body of the deceased on the basis of disclosure statement made by accused 14 days after the incident was not attached importance in case under s 302, IPC . The accused was given benefit of doubt and acquitted.[26] The recovery of the dead body along with a blood-stained khurpi from the field of the accused may render his conduct rather suspicious, but suspicion, however strong, cannot take the place of legal proof,[27] and more so when falsehood has been mixed by witnesses in such a manner that it is difficult to separate it from truth[28] though it is another matter when the evidence of identifying witnesses shows that they had sufficient opportunity to mark the features of the accused and their identifications are also corroborated by the recovery of a blood-stained knife and a blood-stained bush shirt at the pointing out of the accused and there is not a shadow of doubt that the accused had committed the dastardly attack on the deceased.[29] Where a person could not explain as to how his wife was killed or who killed her and not only denied the ownership of clothes but also betrayed ignorance about the stains on his clothes, his conduct was held to be inconsistent with his innocence.[30] In Kashinath Krishna Jadhav v State of Maharashtra ,[31] where the clothes of the accused when arrested soon after the occurrence, were found to be stained with blood and the accused was also, soon after the occurrence, seen sitting with a blood-stained knife in his hand in front of the room, in which the dead body of the deceased was lying, conviction of the accused, in the absence of any acceptable explanation, was held proper. Mere presence of blood stains on the shirt of the accused without evidence of blood group is not of any consequence.[32] Where the accused produced a blood-stained sword and said that he had killed the deceased with it, but the prosecution failed to prove that the blood on the sword was human blood, it was presumed that the blood was not human blood and consequently the sword could not be said to have any connection with the crime.[33] It was held, in another case, that, from the mere finding of blood in accused's house, it could not be concluded that the accused either himself committed, or was responsible for the commission of, murder.[34] The fact that no blood was found2272 on the spot is immaterial.[35] There was clear and consistent evidence of the eye-witnesses that the occurrence took place inside the house of the deceased, hence, evidence was not discarded merely because no blood stains were found at the place of occurrence.[36]

The discovery is a weak kind of evidence and cannot be wholly relied upon and conviction in such a serious matter like charge of murder cannot be based upon the discovery. In the instant case, recovery of articles viz. blood stained clothes of the deceased and blood stained kuduval offence weapon, was made from open space ten days after the incident. The prosecution did not establish that the house where murder was committed belonged to the accused. The alleged discovery was absolutely farcical. There was also no motive for the murder. The accused was given benefit of doubt and conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was set aside.[37]

(V) MEDICAL EVIDENCE

29. Medical Evidence--Importance

Medical evidence plays an important role in a murder case. In a criminal case, medical evidence is a very safe yardstick for measuring the veracity of ocular accounts. It corroborates the same, unless it suffers from some inherent improbabilities or intrinsic infirmities, it would ordinarily be accepted by the Court. On the converse, if it is belied by the medical evidence in the absence of some in-built guarantees which demonstrate the truthfulness of the prosecution case, like spot arrest of accused persons, the Court normally would be loath to accept it. Such an approach is founded on the trite law that whereas witnesses may lie, circumstances do not.[38] In cases of ghastly murders where the accused has taken the plea of insanity the medical experts, particularly the professors, should not venture to come and give evidence in a light hearted manner with unconvincing opinions.[39] The value of a medical witness is not merely a check upon the testimony of eyewitnesses; it is also independent testimony because it may establish certain facts, quite apart from the other oral evidence. If a person is shot at close range, the marks of tattooing, found by the medical witness, would show that the range was small, quite apart from any other opinion. Similarly, fractures of bones and depth and size of the wounds would show the nature of the weapon used. It is, therefore, wrong to say that it is only opinion evidence; it is often direct evidence of the facts found upon the victim's person.[40] In firearm injuries, usually the entrance wound is smaller and the exit wound is bigger. Where the exit wound was not only smaller in dimension than the entry wound but was also smaller in dimension than the size of the cartridge, taken out of the revolver, allegedly used for causing injuries, it was held that the injuries were not gunshot injuries. In such cases, it cannot be expected from medical evidence to give any categorical opinion about the character of injuries merely on the basis of their margins or edges.[41] Where the medical officer has not given depth of all the2273 injuries on the person of the deceased, and except injury no. 5 in the post-mortem certificate, none of the injuries seemed to have been deep cut injuries, the inference arose that other injuries, i.e., injuries nos. 1-4 and 6-11 were not serious in nature.[42]

Where the doctor conducting post-mortem categorically stated in his certificate that the exact cause of death cannot be ascribed and preserved his opinion pending result of chemical analysis and in his subsequent report was not able to give definite opinion as to injuries found on the dead body could be ante-mortem or post-mortem, it could not be concluded that death of the deceased can only be homicidal.[43] The mere fact, that the eyewitness had seen the victim being struck with a knife, cannot be held to be inconsistent with the medical evidence showing strangulation as the cause of death when the medical report shows that there were a number of incised wounds in addition to marks of strangulation.[44] It is the duty of the prosecution, and no less of the Court, to see that the weapon of offence, if available, is shown to the medical witness and his opinion invited as to whether all, or any of the injuries on the victim could be caused with that weapon. Failure to do so may, sometimes, cause miscarriage of justice.[45]

Time of Death

Medical science has not achieved such perfection so as to enable a medical practitioner to categorically state in regard to the exact time of death.[46]

30. Doctor's statement only Opinion

A doctor usually confronted with such questions regarding different possibilities or probabilities of causing those injuries or post-mortem features which he noticed in the medical report may express his views one way or the other depending upon the manner the question was asked. But the answers given by the witness to such questions need not become the last word on such possibilities. After all, he gives only his opinion regarding such questions. But to discard the testimony of an eyewitness simply on the strength of such opinion expressed by the medical witness is not conducive to the administration of criminal justice.[47]

31. Corpus Delicti

It is a well-settled principle in law that in a trial for murder, it is neither an absolute necessity nor an essential ingredient to establish corpus delicti. The fact of the death of the deceased must be established like any other fact. The corpse in some cases may not be possible to be traced or recovered. There are a number of possibilities where a dead body could be disposed of without a trace, therefore, if the recovery of the dead body is to be held to be mandatory to convict an accused, in many a case the accused would manage to see that the dead body is destroyed which would afford the accused complete immunity from being held guilty or from being punished. What is2274 therefore required in law to base a conviction for an offence of murder is that there should be reliable and plausible evidence that the offence of murder like any other factum of death was committed and it must be proved by direct or circumstantial evidence, albeit the dead body may not be traced.[48] In law, a conviction for an offence does not necessarily depend upon the corpse being found. There may be reliable evidence, direct or circumstantial, of the commission of the murder though the corpse is not traceable.[49] Where the prosecution is successful in providing cogent and satisfactory proof of the victim having met a homicidal death, absence of corpus delicti will not, by itself, be fatal to a charge of murder.[50] Post-mortem examination on the dead body is not absolutely necessary to prove murder. Even in the absence of the dead body, murder may otherwise be proved by credible evidence.[51] The failure on the part of the prosecution to recover the dead body will not indicate that there was no murder if the other evidence is convincing enough to establish the crime of murder.[52] In a murder case, it is the murder which is the thing to be regarded, and not the finding of the body. Once the Court is satisfied that the murder has been committed and the accused person has committed it, the question of sentence must be determined upon the gravity of the offence irrespective of the circumstances whether the body has, or has not, been discovered.[53] Where the body of the deceased is not found and the factum of death is established by nothing but a retracted confession, the accused should be given the lesser sentence.[54]

The question, whether a man is dead or not, is always a question of fact to be decided on the facts of each case.[55] In the absence of evidence, direct or circumstantial, of the death of the person, who is said to have been killed by the accused, there is no onus upon the accused to account for the disappearance, or non-production, of the person alleged to be dead. Again, the prosecution must further prove that the accused are the persons who committed the murder charged.[56] Therefore, it is impossible for a court, in a matter of life and death, to leave a gap in2275 the prosecution evidence and to arrive, by a process of speculation, at a conclusion which cannot be justified by evidence.[57]

When it is established that the accused persons after killing the deceased took away the body of the deceased it is for the accused persons to explain, what they did with the dead body of the deceased as s 106 of the Evidence Act[58] would apply as prosecution has succeeded in proving the death of the deceased by the accused person.[59]

Would a person play hoax with the police stating that he had murdered another and had caused disappearance of evidence, when the person allegedly murdered was, in fact, alive? Would accepting these allegations of masochism as true not be credulous? Are not the allegations made against the petitioners of their having given false information to the police that they had committed murder and had caused disappearance of the evidence, so absurd and improbable, on the basis of which no prudent man could ever reach a just conclusion that there was sufficient ground for proceeding against them? The answers thereto can only be in the affirmative. It defies reason that two persons would confess to having murdered their sister/niece, when in fact, she was very much alive. Given alteration in the charge-sheet by the police was only to cover up their earlier lapse in having charged the petitioners of murder and destruction of evidence under ss 302 and 211, IPC . The accused persons are however required to be paid suitable costs, for the harrowing experience they have undergone and the uncalled for misery they had to suffer for no fault of theirs.[60] The corpus delicti or the fact of homicidal death can be proved by telling and inculpating circumstances which definitely lead to the conclusion that within all human probability, the victim has been murdered by the accused concerned.[61]

Identity of the Corpse

In one case, overwhelming evidence showed that the dead body on which autopsy was conducted was that of the victim, the sister and nephew of the deceased were sure of the identity of the deceased, the fact that the deceased aged 29 years was shown by novice medical practitioner to be aged 40 years without conducting any medical tests in this regard or the observation of the same doctor that the penis of the dead body had undergone religious circumcision contrary to the report of the senior doctor, a specialist in forensic medicine who conducted the post-mortem but did not find any evidence of such circumcision on the dead boy, are not enough to create doubt as to the identity of the victim.[62] The identification of dead body on the basis of clothes and ornaments cannot be altogether rejected on the ground that the garments such as a saree and blouse are common items which any women would be wearing and there was nothing very special on the basis of which it could be said that the clothes could form a reliable basis. Often there is familiarity particularly within the family with regard to some of the garments which a person wears. When the parents of the deceased on seeing the clothes identified them as belonging to their daughter, there is strong possibility that they are right, but the same could not be said with regard to jewellery worn by the deceased which is a common item in the2276 absence of special distinguishing features.[63] Where the daughter of the deceased identified her mother's body after its recovery from the river on the basis of tattoo marks, and the post-mortem report regarding post-mortem held on the next day of recovery of body showed that there were no tattoo marks or the body, since the report did not suggest that the body when recovered was in a badly decomposed state, identification made by daughter could not be disbelieved.[64]

Corpse found Floating in Water

Medical jurists have warned that in the case of a dead body found floating in water, the medical men, from a mere observance of the external condition of the body, should not jump to the conclusion that the death was from drowning. Only internal examination of the body can reveal symptoms which may indicate with certainty as to whether death was from drowning or from unlawful violence before the body was immersed in water. The fact that the stomach was not filled with water and bloated and no froth was coming out of the mouth of deceased, are important symptoms which go a long way to exclude the possibility of death being as a result of suicide by drowning.[65]

Case of Burning Case--Smell of Kerosene from Deceased even after Three Days--Effect

The doctor who conducted the post-mortem examination, found smell of kerosene emanating from the body of the deceased. If, as put forth by the accused, accidental fire that erupted from the stove, had set the deceased on fire, it is not possible that the body would smell of kerosene even after three days. The incident took place on 27 October 1996, whereas the death occurred on 30 October 1996, and the post-mortem was conducted then. If it was an accidental fire, it is highly impossible that the body would smell of kerosene. The learned counsel for the accused made a feeble attempt to explain it saying that in his attempt to extinguish the fire, the accused might have rolled the deceased on the ground as the result that the kerosene which had fallen on the ground due to toppling of the kerosene can could have percolated the deceased's body. This theory is also not possible since if kerosene had fallen on the ground, that would have caught fire and it is not likely that the appellant, in his attempt to extinguish fire on the body of the deceased would roll her on such fire. Besides, in his written statement submitted under s 313 of the CrPC, nowhere did the appellant mention any such attempt. The smell of kerosene emanating from the body of the deceased is a clear indication that the fire was set only after kerosene was poured on her body.[66]

Burning Case--Doctor's Report Suggesting Suicide

Doctor's opinion that colour or burns was suggestive of suicidal death was a stray observation and could not help accused since it was not the defence of accused that deceased committed suicide.[67] Prosecution case was that the accused husband on account of non-fulfilment of dowry demand poured kerosene oil on the deceased and2277 set her on fire. The dying declaration of the deceased was not free from doubt. The record of the case maintained in the hospital noted that when the doctor examined the deceased she was conscious. The doctor noted that the deceased had stated to have sustained burns around 9 p.m. at her residence. She was given some treatment and referred to the resident medical officer. Here again the doctor noted that the deceased alleged to have sustained burns accidentally at her residence. The acquittal of the accused for offences under ss 302, IPC and 498A, IPC was held proper.[68]

Three types of Contradictions between Medical and Oral Evidence and their Inferences

The conflict between oral testimony and medical evidence can be of varied dimensions and shapes. There may be cases where there is total absence of injuries which are normally caused by a particular weapon. There is another category where though the injuries found on the victim are of the type which are possible by the weapon of assault, but the size and dimension of the injuries do not exactly tally with the size and dimension of the weapon. The third category can be where the injuries found on the victim are such which are normally caused by the weapon of assault but they are not found on that portion of the body where they are deposed to have been caused by the eye-witness. The same kind of inference cannot be drawn in the three categories of apparent conflict in oral and medical evidence enumerated above. In the first category it may legitimately be inferred that the oral evidence regarding assault having been made from a particular weapon is not truthful. However, in the second and third category, no such inference can straightaway be drawn. The manner and method of assault, the position of the victim, the resistance offered by him, the opportunity available to the witnesses to see the occurrence like their distance, presence of light and many other similar factors will have to be taken into consideration in judging the reliability of occular testimony.[69]

Punishment for murder.--

32. Contradiction between Medical Evidence and Oral Evidence--Accused may be Entitled to Acquittal

Whenever there is a conflict between medical evidence and ocular testimony, normally ocular testimony should be preferred unless it belies fundamental facts.[70] If, in the light of the medical evidence, it is difficult to accept the prosecution case as alleged, and the defence version is not false altogether, it is unsafe to maintain the conviction.[71] It is trite law that oral evidence has to get primacy and medical evidence is basically opinionative. It is only when the medical evidence specifically rules out the injury as claimed to have been inflicted as per the oral testimony, then only in a given case, the Court has to draw adverse inference.[72] It is very important for the prosecution that the medical evidence with regard to type of weapon used by the accused and the nature of injuries sustained by the victim is corroborated with the2278 statement of the eyewitnesses in this regard. The contradictory occular and medical evidence may be fatal to the prosecution case, leading to acquittal of the accused.[73] Following are the instances of types of contradictions between the ocular and medical evidence which were one of the major factors in the acquittal of the accused.

(i) An eyewitness stated that the accused assaulted the deceased with a pronged weapon (jalia) but the medical witness categorically opened that injuries 1, 2 and 9 on the body of the deceased could have been caused by gandasi.[74]

(ii) The prosecution case is that the accused inflicted the injury only once and that too for from behind by way of a single blow with jalia but the medical evidence clearly indicates that three incised wounds were inflicted upon the deceased, one on the nape of neck, another on the left side of mandible and third on the left side of the elbow joint.[75]

(iii) The ocular evidence is that the deceased was attacked not by kassi but by spade but the doctor who held the autopsy clearly stated that the injuries could be caused only by a kassi

(pickaxe).[76]

(iv) In the opinion of the doctor, the person who caused injuries to the deceased was at a higher level than the deceased, which was wholly inconsistent with the testimony of eyewitnesses.[77]

(v) The prosecution case was that accused gave lathi blow over forehead of the deceased but the doctor did not find any head injury on the body of the deceased during post-mortem examination, further the doctor did not find any undigested food material in the abdominal cavity of the deceased making statement of eyewitnesses regarding time of death, contradictory.[78]

(vi) According to prosecution witnesses the deceased was allegedly beaten by all the accused with lathi, medical evidence supported the possibility that the fatal head injury could be caused when the head of the accused could have struck a stone on account of fall on the ground.[79]

(vii) Eyewitnesses stated that the accused persons grappled with the deceased who fell down but the doctor who conducted postmortem on body of the deceased did not find any mark or ligature around the neck or any mark of injury on the body and opined clearly that cause of death was asphyxia due to drowning,[80] where the eyewitnesses state that the only injury on the person of the deceased was the result of three separate blows but medical evidence showed that it was extremely improbable that the injury was caused even by two simultaneous blows.[81]2279

(viii) Medical evidence showed injuries to be caused by knife whereas eyewitnesses stated that the main accused had a pharsa battle axe in his hand and the other accused did not cause any injuries.[82]

(ix) The medical evidence shows that death of victim was due to the effect of endrin poisoning but prosecution evidence did not show that victim was forced to take endrin by the accused.[83]

(x) Eyewitnesses stated that the deceased and injured were assaulted with sharp cutting weapons but evidence of doctor who conducted post-mortem examination showed that the deceased had no injury which could not have been caused by a sharp-cutting weapon and he had sustained only one injury which could have been caused, according to the doctor, by a blunt weapon only.[84]

(xi) The eyewitness stated that the deceased was given 10/15 tamba blows and also was strangulated, but the medical expert did not find any injury on the neck or on other parts of the body except two injuries on the head and also did not find any evidence of strangulation and there were other infirmities also in prosecution case.[85]

(xii) The medical evidence clearly indicates that three incised wounds were inflicted on the body of the deceased but evidence of eyewitness, shows that the accused had inflicted injury only once by a single blow.[86]

(xiii) The doctor who held the post-mortem examination states in his evidence that during autopsy partly digested food material was found in the stomach of the deceased but the evidence of the eyewitnesses state that the deceased took his food alongwith them, just before he was killed.[87]

(xiv) From the evidence of doctor it appears that except one injury all the injuries were caused by sharp cutting weapon, but from the evidence of eyewitness, even a whisper could not be found that the accused had any sharp cutting weapon capable of inflicting incised wounds or that they had any weapon except a dagger/knife which normally can cause puncture wounds.[88]

(xv) The medical evidence depicts three injuries on the person of deceased while according to ocular evidence only one blow was struck on the person of the deceased.[89]

(xvi) The only eyewitness states infliction of many injuries by accused but doctor states that the deceased sustained only one anti-mortem injury.[90]

(xvii) According to the medical evidence, the victim died within moments of receiving the injuries whereas according to the ocular version of the2280 prosecution witnesses, there was gap of about nine hours between the receipt of injuries and death.[91]

(xviii) The evidence of eyewitnesses was that the accused assaulted the deceased on face, thighs and stomach but post-mortem report belied the said evidence.[92]

(xix) The specific evidence of eyewitnesses is that the accused gave a single hit on the head of the deceased but the medical evidence showed that there were several injuries but no injury on the back of the head though the injuries were on the left side occipital region, right-parietal region and right temporal region.[93]

(xx) The eyewitnesses deposed that two shots were fired by the accused and both had caused injury to the deceased but the evidence of the doctor was that the injuries were possibly caused by only one shot. All the eyewitnesses stated that the accused had fired two shots from his revolver from a distance of six to nine feet, but medical evidence showed that there was blackening around the wounds. Further, the eyewitness stated that the injured witness suffered injuries of pharsas and lathi at the hands of the accused, but medical evidence disclosed that he had not received a single injury which could have been caused by a pharsa.[94]

(xxi) The doctor did not find any head injury on the body of the deceased during post-mortem examination, while the eyewitness account shows that a lathi blow was given on the head of the deceased and it was not a mild blow and the Investigating Officer also observed the said injury on the forehead of the deceased.[95]

(xxii) The prosecution case was that the accused armed with sharp weapons like a gandhasa and ghop attacked the deceased. The post-mortem report showed that the assault was made with the blunt side of the weapon, there was no mention in the FIR about the use of the sharp edged weapons from their blunt side, the eyewitness account that accused had used blunt side of weapon showed that they made statements to fit in with post-mortem report.[96]

(xxiii) The eyewitnesses stated that accused persons gave barchha and lathi blows but the medical evidence showed that all the injuries on the person of the deceased were caused by sharp edged weapons.[97]

(xxiv) The evidence of extra-judicial confession that deceased was poisoned was belied by medical evidence stating that death occurred due to multiple injuries.[98]

(xxv) The eyewitness alleged that the accused fired a revolver shot at the deceased in a scuffle, but medical evidence showed stab wounds on the person of the deceased apart from firearm injury.[99]2281

(xxvi) The consistent prosecution version that victim was assaulted with lathis and knife was belied by absence of any lathi injury in the post-mortem examination of the victim, which runs contrary to the prosecution case.[1]

(xxvii) Medical evidence showing presence of two shots from the gun and was contrary to occular testimony and the manner of assault as stated by witnesses was rendered doubtful by the conflicting medical evidence.[2]

(xxviii) The deceased suffered kassi injury by the sharp side, the witness stated in categorical terms that kassi had penetrated four angul (approximately three inches) in the head. At the same time witness said that the accused had inflicted kassi blow from the reverse side making contradictory statement. The doctor who conducted autopsy of the deceased found that the injury on the head of the deceased did not correspond to the measurement of the reverse side of kassi shown to him.[3]

(xxix) The evidence of eyewitness mentioned in an omnibus way that the accused were armed with lathis but no overtact was attributed to them, the medical evidence ruled out any lathis having been used and doctor found only incised injuries on the dead bodies and on the injured prosecution witnesses.[4]

(xxx) The number of injuries and nature of injuries on the person of the deceased were totally and completely impossible to reconcile with the oral evidence and medical evidence.[5]

(xxxi) The ocular evidence showed that deceased was thrashed by four persons on a cot by lathi blows for one hour but there was no blood of the victim on the cot or on the floor.[6]

(xxxii) Eyewitnesses stated that they had seen the accused persons grappling with the deceased and when there was a noise, the accused persons fled away from the spot and as a result of grappling, the deceased fell down but no injury was found on the body of the deceased and the evidence of the doctor who conducted the post-mortem on the body of the deceased showed that there was no mark of ligature seen around the neck and there was no mark of injury on the body and cause of death was asphyxia due to drowning which was sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature.[7]

(xxxiii) Evidence of eyewitnesses showed that the deceased was first assaulted with lathis and when he had fallen down, he was shot at, but the face of the deceased was virtually turned into pulp, though there was no evidence that indiscriminate lathi blows were given on his face nor did the doctor say that the face was turned almost to a pulp by lathi blows. There was also no possibility of single gunshot injury causing such damage to face and so occular evidence was neither reliable nor compatible with medical evidence.[8]2282

(xxxiv) The eyewitness stated that the accused stuck the deceased with a hansia blow while the doctor explained that injury caused on chest of the deceased was a punctured wound and a hansia which is curved or half-rounded with a sharp edge on only one side could not cause such an injury.[9]

(xxxv) According to prosecution witnesses, accused come down by staircase to the ground floor, fell down, got up and after going 5-6 steps fell down, but according to the evidence of the doctor, due to the injuries caused to the accused he might have suffered paralysis and he could not have moved 5-6 steps after falling down.[10]

(xxxvi) All three eyewitnesses in a parrot-like manner stated that when accused fired at the deceased he was removed by five-six paces (12-15 ft) from him but the doctor has been very specific in the opinion that the shot must have been fired from a distance of less than four feet. The doctor further opined that the shot must have been fired from right side of the deceased as direction of that shot was inward and from right to left, however, according to one of the eyewitnesses the accused was in front of the deceased and not on his right or last side.[11]

(xxxvii) The ocular evidence was that deceased was assaulted with bhusa. But the doctor's statement was that death was due to the injury on the head which might have been caused by a sharp cutting weapon.[12]

(xxxviii) The eyewitnesses stated that the accused fired the shot with his hand bent downwards. But the doctor opined that the hand which fired the shot must have been at a slightly lower level than the part of the body hit by the shot, which means that the barrel of the gun must have been pointing upwards.[13]

(xxxix) The three eyewitnesses stated that the accused rasped the neck of the deceased by using gandasa while two co-accused caught hold of the deceased but medical evidence regarding nature of injuries on neck of deceased did not suggest that the neck of the deceased having been rasped, i.e., using a weapon like gandasa or like a saw. On the contrary, the medical evidence showed that probably that heavy blow or blows, one or two, were dealt with by sharp cutting heavy weapon, may be a gandasa, resulting into instantaneous death of the deceased. The medical evidence also showed that the deceased also sustained an injury on the hand by the same or similar weapon but no explanation was given by eyewitnesses as to how the deceased sustained injury on hand.[14]

(xl) The consistent stand of the prosecution witness has been that the bullet hit the deceased on the chest, but the medical evidence clearly points out that the deceased was hit on the back and the exit wound is on the chest.[15]

(xli) The prosecution case was that two positive injuries were sustained by the deceased by firearms of the accused but medical evidence showed that only one gun injury shot was found on the person of the victim.[16]2283

(xlii) The testimony of the two eyewitnesses showed that the accused inflicted two injuries by the axe and 10 to 12 injuries by the 'jayee', while as per doctor and his post-mortem report the deceased received five incised injuries and seven injuries by a blunt weapon on her person.[17]

(xliii) The prosecution witness stated that deceased received pellet injuries on his chest and jaw, investigating officer also stated in injury statement that deceased received pellet injuries on tongue, chest, chin etc., but the bullet was recovered from the chest cavity of the deceased by the doctor and there was no explanation by the prosecution about it.[18]

was that deceased was assaulted with lathis after his fall on the ground due to firearm injury.[19]

(xlv) The post-mortem report of the two deceased showed that besides firearm injury the deceased also sustained non-superficial, injuries by blunt object while ocular evidence did not disclose that any of the accused was armed with any blunt object or that the firearm was also used by any of the accused from the blunt side.[20]

(xlvi) The post-mortem report of the deceased persons showed no firearm injury while the prosecution witnesses stated before the police that the accused caused gunshot injuries on the person of the deceased and subsequently tried to improve their statements after knowing about post-mortem report, the panchnamas prepared immediately after the occurrence also showed gunshot injuries on the person of the deceased.[21]

(xlvii) Incised and penetrating wounds were found on the body of the deceased. Where no lathi or pistol injury was found on the body of the deceased in medical examination, the presence of accused armed with pistol or lathi was ruled out. Accused persons alleged to be armed with pistol and lathi were acquitted of the charge of murder.[22]

(xlviii) Eye-witnesses, relatives of the deceased, deposed that accused persons caused fire-arm injuries to the deceased but in post-mortem examination no fire arm injury on the person of the deceased was found. The accused were given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge of murder.[23]

(xlix) It was the prosecution case disclosed in the FIR, and the eye-witnesses also deposed before the Court that the accused inflicted pharsi (axe) blow and a stick blow on the head of the deceased. But in post-mortem examination no incised wound was found on the head of the deceased. Only one lacerated wound was found on the head of the deceased in post-mortem examination.2284 Appellant accused was given benefit of doubt and acquitted of charge under s 302, IPC .[24]

(xlvii) It was the consistent testimony of both eyewitnesses that accused at the time of incident had a pharsa while his unknown companions had spears and they all caused injuries to the deceased with their respective weapons, but a perusal of the post-mortem report showed that the bone deep injury was a lacerated wound and the doctor admitted in his cross-examination that this injury was the result of a lathi blow.[25]

(xlviii) As per medical evidence, two injuries caused by a sharp-edged weapon were found on the body of the deceased and the eyewitness account was that three accused assaulted the deceased with a sharp-edged weapon. The seized weapons were also not shown to the doctor for soliciting his opinion as to whether injuries on the body of deceased could be caused by those weapons.[26]

(xlix) The testimony of the two eyewitnesses did not show that the deceased was also attacked on the chest and the hand and so was contradictory with the medical evidence. Further, the ocular evidence was also contradictory with medical evidence regarding time of incident.[27]

(l) The two eyewitnesses stated that all the eight accused were armed with gandasas and they caused a series of injuries on the deceased but their statements were belied by medical evidence which showed that injury no 1 was caused by a sharp weapon, injuries no 2, 3, 4 and 5 were caused by firearms and injuries no 6 and 7 by a blunt weapon.[28]

(li) Eyewitness stated that one accused fired a shot on the deceased, while the other gave a gandasa/chopper blow, but as per medical report, no injury of sharp-edged weapon was found on the body of the deceased.[29]

(lii) As per evidence of witness the accused fired at the deceased from behind, but the medical evidence showed that the entry wound was found on the stomach of the deceased.[30]

(liia) Where the eye witnesses deposed that the deceased was shot on his back by the accused, but in the post-mortem report, a singular bullet wound which had entry from the front of the chest and had exit point at the back of the deceased was found, there was major contradiction between ocular and medical evidence, hence, the accused appellant was acquitted of the charge of murder.[31]

(liii) The eyewitness stated that one of the accused, fired two rounds on the back of the deceased but no gunshot injury was found in the post-mortem report of the doctor.[32]2285

The evidence of the two eye-witnesses about the assault made by the accused persons was not corroborated by medical evidence, and evidence about the assault was so intermingled that it was not possible to separate the grain from the chaff, thus, the accused were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[33]

Prosecution case was that the accused fired with pistol and rifle at the deceased from behind and caused death. No rifle injury was found on the body of the deceased though PWS deposed that the accused fired with rifle at the deceased. Accused was acquitted of the offence under s 302, IPC .[34]

It would be erroneous to accord undue primacy to the hypothetical answers of medical witnesses to exclude the eye-witnesses' account which are to be tested independently and not treated as the 'variable' keeping the medical evidence as the 'constant'. Where the eye-witnesses' account is found credible and trustworthy, a medical opinion pointing to the alternative possibilities cannot be accepted as conclusive.[35]

The eyewitness account did not obtain any support from the medical evidence regarding the nature of injuries rather it ran counter to medical evidence and though for ascertainment of weapon used, the body of the deceased was referred for X-ray examination by the doctor conducting post-mortem, however, the X-ray report was not shown to the doctor till the date of examination or even produced before the Court.[36]

The eye-witness stated that the accused, on being exhorted by the co-accused, had picked up a big stone and thrown it at head of the deceased resulting in his death. However, the injuries suffered by the deceased and medical evidence neither indicated any depressed injury nor showed any bleeding from nose and ears of the deceased.[37]

When the eye-witnesses stated that deceased was assaulted by a hasua, a semi-circular weapon and the medical witness deposed that toddy tapper, i.e., a hasua is curved in shape, but none of the injuries appearing on the dead body of the deceased was semi-circular or a curved injury and as such there was a question mark regarding the injuries appearing on the dead body of the deceased having been caused by a hasua.[38]

The medical witness had deposed that the injuries of the deceased were caused by heavy sharp cutting weapon, might have been inflicted by a farsa, but the eye-witness stated that main accused gave single farsa (axe) blow on neck of the deceased and other accused assaulted deceased with farsa and lathi, however, injuries caused by hard and blunt substance were not found on body of the deceased.[39]

Evidence of the prosecution witnesses was that the deceased was killed immediately after he had his evening meals, however, medical evidence showed that2286 stomach and small intestine of the deceased was empty, falsifying prosecution case as regards time of death.[40]

According to medical evidence, injury no 1 was caused by a shot fired from a distance of within three feet and injury no 3 from a distance of 3" to 12" and PW 2 stated that the shots were fired at his deceased father from a distance of some 5-6 paces (one pace is equivalent to two and a half feet) while PW 3 stated that the shots were fired at the deceased from a distance of some ten paces.[41]

Evidence of the witness was that the accused assaulted the deceased with blunt side of bankri on left ear of the deceased but as per medical evidence there was no injury on left ear which could be attributed to blunt weapon.[42]

There was discrepancy between the oral evidence and the medical evidence inasmuch as the injury on the deceased indicated that the bullets were discharged from very close range from his body, while the prosecution evidence in this regard showed that the assailants were standing at a considerable distance away from the deceased.[43]

Absence of burn injuries on the person of injured not supporting evidence of the witnesses regarding alleged infliction of assault by means of hot iron rod.[44]

Where the FIR and the eye-witnesses alleged that the deceased was given a pharsa (axe) blow and a stick blow on his head but no incised wound on the head was found in the post-mortem report, the post-mortem report also showed only one injury on the head of the deceased.[45]

The testimony of the witnesses was that they heard firing of 2-3 gun shots was contrary to evidence of doctor who held post-mortem examination over body of the deceased and found only one bullet injury.[46]

The testimony of eye-witnesses was that the accused persons assaulted the deceased with ballam, bichhua and axe, was totally inconsistent with medical evidence showing that all injuries found on the body of the deceased were caused only by hard and blunt object.[47]

Both the eye-witnesses stated that from the chaunh (pointed end of the plough) injury was caused to the deceased, but the doctor in very specific words had said that injury no 5, by which the deceased had died, could not have been caused by a chaunh.[48]

The postmortem report showed only one incised injury on the head of the deceased whereas the witness, specifically stated that the accused dealt two axe blows on the head of the deceased.[49]2287

The accused appellant ULC had carried a knife, but no injury from the same knife was found on the person of the deceased. The participation of the accused appellant ULC was doubtful, thus, his conviction under ss 302 / 34, IPC recorded by the courts below was set aside.[50]

PW 2 while describing the incident deposed that A1 appellant had inflicted injury on the neck of the deceased by patta knife and, thereafter caused cut on the right side of his head and further inflicted cut on the neck and that he had also inflicted injuries on the back. It was submitted by the learned counsel that no injury was found on the back of the deceased and, therefore, the medical evidence did not corroborate the statement of PW. In the instant case, the duration of the occurrence was short. The injuries on the deceased were inflicted in quick succession and it was too much to expect from a witness in such circumstances to narrate the exact injuries caused on the person of the deceased. The generalized statement as regards the injuries would be more credible than the particularized statement of location of injuries on the body when the injuries were caused in quick succession and in a short time. Moreover, there was every possibility of the first injury being caused from the back side of the deceased. The medical evidence corroborated the statement of the eye-witness PW. There was no conflict between medical and ocular evidence.[51]

Reliable Evidence of an Eyewitness does not become Untrustworthy due to Inconsistency with Medical Evidence

It is well-settled that positive evidence in a case is that of eyewitnesses who had seen and narrated the entire occurrence. The evidence of a medical man or an expert is merely an opinion which lends corroboration to the direct evidence in a case where there is a glaring inconsistency between direct evidence and medical evidence in respect of entire prosecution story, that is undoubtedly a manifest defect in the prosecution case.[52] Where the eyewitness travelling alongwith the deceased deposed that the deceased received injury in his back but medical evidence showed that the deceased received a gunshot in his chest and thoracic region, it was held that witness having seen exit wound on back of deceased, bleeding, though he had been hit in back so his evidence could not be rejected.[53] It is not always the inconsistency in the evidence of eyewitnesses and medical evidence in a murder case which makes eyewitnesses unreliable, the evidence of eyewitnesses is to be fully and correctly evaluated and cannot be discredited on the basis of somewhat unsatisfactory testimony of the doctor which on proper judicial appraisal does not contradict the version of prosecution witnesses as to the manner in which offence was committed.[54] Merely because an illiterate witnesses stated that deceased took his meal immediately2288 before the occurrence cannot by itself be a circumstance to discredit their evidence on basis of medical evidence regarding presence of semi-digested food in stomach of the deceased giving contradictory version regarding time of the incident.[55] If direct evidence is satisfactory and reliable, the same cannot be rejected on hypothetical medical evidence.[56] When post-mortem report showed that there were a number of incised wounds on the person of the deceased in addition to marks of strangulation and the death was due to strangulation, evidence of eyewitness that she saw the accused striking the deceased with a knife cannot be contradictory to post-mortem report as the witness also stated that she woke up from sleep on hearing a gurgling sound which evidently came from her husband when he was being strangulated.[57] Where eyewitnesses stated that the deceased was hit on his back by a shot fired by the accused but the doctor who had performed the post-mortem examination deposed that the entry wound was on the chest and exit wound on the back, the inconsistency could not help accused he being compounder in the same government hospital, the doctor who had performed the post-mortem examination had evidently tried to help him, evidence of eyewitnesses therefore could be rejected.[58]

Should Eye-witness Account be preferred to Medical Evidence in Cases of Contradiction between them

Where ocular evidence is cogent, reliable and credible, medical evidence to the contrary cannot corrode the evidentiary value of former.[59] In the case of State of Madhya Pradesh v Dharkole alias Govind Singh ,[60] it was held by the Supreme Court that where the medical evidence was at variance with the ocular evidence, the testimony of the eye-witness should be decided independently and if found trustworthy, the same could not be discarded merely because it is at variance with medical opinion. While there can be no difference of opinion with the principle explained in the aforesaid decision, the application thereof will depend on whether the story as made out by the prosecution is trustworthy and can be related to the injuries suffered by the victim in the manner as sought to be projected. If the ocular testimony is such that it is not possible to relate the injuries with the circumstances in which they were said to have been inflicted, the Court has the discretion not to accept the ocular evidence. The principle enunciated in Dharkole's case (supra) may be applied in an appropriate case, but each case has to be determined having regard to its own set of facts.[61]

Slight Variation between Medical and Ocular Evidence

It is trite law that minor variations between medical evidence and ocular evidence do not take away the primacy of the latter. Unless medical evidence in its term goes so far as to completely rule out all possibilities whatsoever of injuries taking place in the manner stated by the eye-witnesses the testimony of eye-witness cannot be thrown out [62] In State of Uttar Pradesh v Krishna Gopal and another ,[63] this position has been illuminatingly and exhaustively reiterated.[64]2289

Inconsistency between Opinion of two Medical Witnesses

Where the opinion of a medical witness is contradicted by another medical witness, both of whom are equally competent to form an opinion, the opinion of that expert should be accepted which supports the direct evidence in the case.[65] The contradictions in the nature of injuries on the person of the deceased depicted in the post-mortem report and in the injury report prepared by the doctor who examined the deceased when he was injured, coupled with other infirmities in the prosecution case entitle the accused to the benefit of doubt.[66] Similarly, the contradiction in the evidence of the two doctors regarding nature of injuries found on the accused and also that they could not be caused by knife as alleged by accused disentitles the accused to the right of private defence.[67] When the doctor who actually examined the accused and had noted the injuries himself stated that one of the injuries cannot be a self-inflicted injury, another doctor gave his opinion only on the basis of injury report and the X-ray report, without even looking at the X-ray plate, the Court relied upon the opinion of the former.[68] Where medical evidence showed that the victim died of jaundice and liver failure but post-mortem report listed cause of death as shock and hemorrhage due to anti-mortem injuries, in a custodial death case, the Supreme Court directed that the cause of the victim's death should be investigated by the CBI.[69] The opinion of the doctor, who was new to the profession and had just completed his internship after his graduation, that the penis of dead body had undergone religious circumcision is not material when the doctor, who conducted post-mortem examination and was a specialist in forensic medicine and a senior person, did not find any evidence of such circumcision on the dead body.[70] Whatever be the reason, no court could afford to ignore the report of the doctor who so conducted the autopsy with meticulous precision about all the features noticed, merely on the strength of what another doctor had scribbled in the medico legal case at the initial stage.[71]

Where, on the question that the victim was murdered, there is conflicting medical evidence, circumstantial evidence satisfactorily establishing that death was homicidal, the medical evidence supporting homicide ought to be accepted.[72] Where three doctors who conducted a joint post-mortem examination without seeing the report of the chemical examiner who conducted the autopsy exhausted their opinion that the deceased had died of asphyxia due to suffocation caused by smothering and/or internal airway obstruction, the doctor examined by defence after going through chemical examiner's report opined that poison was responsible for death rather than smothering, the Court could not ignore the large number of external injuries particularly there on the legs of the victim and in association with the finding of joint post-mortem report of internal organs cumulatively lead to one conclusion in favour of the theory of forcible smothering leading to discarding of evidence of the doctor examined by the defence.2290

Contradiction between Ocular and Medical Evidence regarding Fatal Injury--Medical Evidence to be preferred

Where the medical officer who had performed the post-mortem examination gave clear, irrefutable reasons founded on physical facts noted by him at the autopsy in support of his firm opinion that the only external injury found on the body of the deceased could not be the result of two simultaneous blows, and, in the ordinary course of human events and experience also it was extremely improbable, that the three blows simultaneously given by three different persons from different directions with sharp-edged weapons would land with such precision and exactitude so as to cause a single wound of such clean cut margins and such dimensions and other characteristics as those of the external wound round by the medical officer, the version of the eyewitnesses that the injury of deceased was the result of three separate blows was inherently improbable and intrinsically incredible and so could not be accepted in preference to evidence of the medical expert.[73] In the chapter on 'Deaths from Asphyxia' in Modi's Medical Jurisprudence,[74] the learned author has pointed out that in cases of death due to hanging, in addition to the cord-mark, there would be dribbling of saliva from the mouth at an angle. A study of this book shows that in case of strangulation, death could be slow.[75] But where in case of murder there was medical evidence on record that blood was oozing from nose and mouth and that there was a pool of blood underneath the body of the deceased, the death would be due to asphyxia by strangulation. In other words, asphyxia was not due to hanging though dead body was ultimately recovered from a tree. Therefore, the defence version that death of the victim was due to strangulation in the absence of cord-mark around the neck of the deceased could not be believed in preference to medical evidence.[76]

Post-mortem--Non-recovery of Pellets

Where death of the deceased was caused by air-gun, and proved by medical opinion, non-recovery of pellets from the body of the deceased in post-mortem examination, despite best efforts, was held not fatal to the prosecution case.[77]

33. Medical Testimony as to the Nature of the Injury

The testimony and report of medical witness as to nature of the injury on the person of victim is not final. Where the doctor had stated that the injuries were sufficient in ordinary course of nature to cause death, the Court after analysing the injuries can come to the conclusion that the injuries, cumulatively were not sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.[78] 'It is well known that doctor can never be certain on the point of the time so far as duration of injuries are concerned'.[79] In the face of hesitant medical opinion about the causes of death given by three doctors and the further fact that the deceased died after a month of occurrence, the Court may come to the conclusion that cl (3) of s 300, IPC, has not been established beyond2291 reasonable doubt, leading to conversion of conviction under s 302 to one under s 304, IPC .[80] If numerous injuries are found on the body of the deceased and the doctor's medical evidence does not say that any one of the injuries was sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature, even if none of the injuries by themselves was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, cumulatively they were certainly sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause his death, which infact took place soon after the assault.[81] The inquiry in regard to the question whether the injury is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, is purely objective and inferential and the matter has to be decided by the Court as a question of fact, even where the medical witness does not say anything about the sufficiency or otherwise of an injury to cause death in ordinary course of nature or where a medical witness makes a positive assertion one way or the other, the Court cannot be relieved of its duty in deciding for itself the nature of injury. A medical witness who conducts a post-mortem is one of the witnesses in a case and assessing evidence of witnesses including the evidence of a medical witness, is the duty of the Court.[82]

If the doctor expresses his opinion that the injury is sufficient to cause death but does not use the words of the code in the ordinary course of nature. By no stretch of imagination can it be construed that when the doctor stated that the injury is 'sufficient to cause death', he meant that injury is 'sufficient' to cause death under peculiar or extraordinary circumstances and insufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature.[83] No doubt it would have been of advantage to the Court if the public prosecutor had put the question to the doctor if the injuries were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. But mere omission to put that question is not enough for the Court to reach a wrong conclusion that the injury noticed by autopsy surgeon was not responsible for causing death of the deceased. Though not an expert as an autopsy surgeon, the sessions judge himself would have been an experienced judicial officer. Looking at the injuries he himself could have deduced whether the injuries were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. No sensible man with some idea regarding the features of homicidal cases would come to a different conclusion from the 45 injuries on the dead body which included fracture of five ribs (2-6) on the left side towards sternal end, fracture of some of the fingers and extravasation of blood on the right side of occipital region and also on the citus of rib-fractures etc., except that these injuries were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.[84]

Medical evidence can be used to repel the testimony of eyewitnesses only if it is so conclusive as to rule out even the possibility of the eyewitness's version being true. A doctor usually confronted with such questions regarding different possibilities or probabilities of causing those injuries or post-mortem features which he noticed in the medical report may express his views one way or the other depending upon the manner the question was asked. But the answers given by the witness to such questions need not become the last word on such possibilities. After all, he gives only his opinion regarding such questions. But to discard the testimony of an eyewitness2292 simply on the strength of such opinion expressed by the medical witness is not conducive to the administration of criminal justice.[85]

34. Duration of Injuries in Post-mortem Report and Medical Certificate

In the instant case, in the medical certificate, the age of the injuries was mentioned as 24 hours, which meant that the injuries could have been caused within 24 hours of examination of the injured. In the post-mortem report, the determination of precise duration of the injuries can be possible due to the internal examination of the injuries, whereas no such advantage is available to the doctor when he examines the injuries in the nature of contusions. Therefore, normally the approximate duration is indicated in such certificates.[86]

35. Failure of Prosecution to show Weapon of Offence to Medical Witness

It is the duty of the prosecution, and no less of the Court, to see that the alleged weapon of the offence, if available, is shown to the medical witness and his opinion invited as to whether all or any of the injuries on the victim could be caused with that weapon. Failure to do so may, sometimes, cause aberration in the course of justice.[87] Where the weapons of offence were not shown to the doctor and it was impossible to say with certainty whether the injury was caused by the ballam or the bhala that were seized and therefore, whether it was one or the other of the accused persons who was responsible for it, even if one believed that on the day of occurrence one of them carried a ballam and the other a bhala, the conviction under s 302, IPC, simpliciter cannot therefore be sustained.[88] But when the accused persons in furtherance of their common intention stabbed the victims, the failure of the prosecution to seek the opinion of the doctor with regard to particular weapons used in stabbing the two victims could not result into rejecting the prosecution case.[89] Where the seized weapons were not shown to the doctor for soliciting his opinion as to whether injuries on the body of deceased could because by those weapons, the number of injuries found on the person of deceased was two, while prosecution case was that, three accused assaulted deceased with sharp-edged weapon, the conviction of the accused person under ss 302 / 34, IPC, was set aside.[90]

36. Post-mortem Report

It is not always necessary to have a complete post-mortem in every case. Section 174 of the CrPC confers discretion to the police officer not to send the body for post-mortem examination if there is no doubt as to the cause of the death. If the cause of2293 death is absolutely certain and beyond the shadow of doubt or controversy, it is unnecessary to have the postmortem done by the medical officer.[91] The post-mortem report is not substantive evidence but it is the doctor's statement in court which has the credibility of substantive evidence, which in normal circumstance ought to be used only for refreshing the memory of the doctor witness or to contradict what he might say from the witness box.[92] When both post-mortem report and inquest report are not substantive evidence, the discrepancy occurring therein cannot be fatal to the prosecution case.[93] Where the post-mortem was conducted jointly by two doctor but the doctor who did the major work was examined and the other doctor was not examined the omission to examine the latter conducting post-mortem was of no relevance.[94] Failure of the doctor conducting post-mortem to state that the cause of death was firearm injuries is not of much importance if occular version is cogent.[95] Where the doctor who conducted the post-mortem examination was not examined but another qualified and experienced doctor who could identify his signature and handwriting was examined who deposed about the nature of injuries and consequence thereof, the post-mortem report was treated as proved and it was also observed by a Division Bench of the Karnataka High Court that s 294, CrPC would have no application to the facts of the case nor was it obligatory on the part of the prosecution to have tendered the post-mortem report after having obtained the consent of the defense under s 294, CrPC .[96] Where the doctor conducting post-mortem in his certificate categorically stated that exact cause of death cannot be ascertained and preserved his opinion pending result of chemical analysis, in his subsequent report he was not able to give a definite opinion as to injuries found on the dead body which could be ante-mortem or post-mortem, it could not be concluded that death of the deceased could be homicidal.[97] Whatever be the reason, no court could can afford to ignore the report of a doctor who has conducted an autopsy with meticulous precision about all the features noticed, merely on the strength of what another doctor has scribbled in the medico legal case at the initial stage.[98]

The Two Aspects of Expert Evidence

Expert evidence has two aspects, the data evidence and the opinion evidence while it is undoubtedly true that data evidence cannot be rejected if it is inconsistent with oral evidence, yet so far as opinion evidence is concerned, it is only an inference drawn from the data and that evidence would not have precedence over the direct eyewitness testimony unless of course the inconsistency between the two is so great as to obviously falsify the oral evidence.[99] There is distinction between the objective finding of the doctor and his opinion based on such objective finding. Where the doctor finds a lacerated wound on the dead body and opines that the same had been caused by a hard blunt substance, it is open to the court to take a different view on the basis of reliable ocular evidence and hold that the wound in question was caused2294 by a firearm and not a hard, blunt substance. But it is not possible to read lacerated wound as incised wound. In other words, so far 'opinion' is concerned, it may be possible in an appropriate case to take a different view, but it is not possible to say that the objective finding is not correct, unless it is challenged on the basis of some reliable evidence.[1]

37. Importance of Rigor Mortis in ascertaining Time of Death

The time within which rigor mortis develops all over the body has no factual basis. It depends on various factors such as constitution of the deceased, season of the year, the temperature in the region and the conditions under which the body has been preserved.[2]

In estimating the time of death from the presence or absence of rigor mortis, is of slight use. In the warm climate of India, rigor mortis may commence in an hour or two after death, even these assumptions are only guidelines and are not a sure test to fix the time of death.[3] It is true that normally rigor mortis commences after one to two hours after the death and the entire body gets stiffened within five to six hours but the definite time since death cannot be estimated with the aid of the time of commencement of rigor morits. The speed of onset of rigor mortis depends on many factors and this speed is delayed indefinitely in cold conditions.[4] The murder allegedly took place on a boat. The dead body was thrown in the water. It remained under water for more than five days. Rigor mortis was absent and the body was fully decomposed. The soft tissues of some of the parts of the body had been eaten away by fish. Medical science has not achieved such perfection so as to enable a medical practitioner to categorically state in regard to the exact time of death. In a case of this nature, it was difficult to pinpoint the exact time of death.[5] When, it is quiet apparent, that in the absence, of various factors which had not been noted by any doctor considering which the probable time for the outset of rigor mortis and estimation of probable time of death with references to the state of rigor mortis and coolness of the body can be fairly estimated, any opinion as to the time of death therefore cannot be held to be wholly reliable.[6]Modi's Medical Jurisprudence[7] states:

> Rigor mortis first appears in the involuntary muscles, and then in the voluntary... In the voluntary muscles rigor mortis follows a definite course. It first occurs in the muscles of the eyelids, next in the muscles of the back of the neck and lower jaw, then in those of the front of the neck face, chest and upper extremities, and lastly extends downwards to the muscles of the abdomen and lower extremities. Last to be affected are the small muscles of the fingers and toes. It passes off in the same sequence.[8] Taylor, in his book,[9] under the caption 'The order in which rigor appears' states:

> As a rule, cadaveric rigidity first appears in the muscles of the face, neck and trunk; it then takes place in the muscles of the upper extremities, and lastly in the legs... In regard to its disappearance the muscles of the lower extremities will often be found2295 rigid, while those of the trunk and upper extremities are again in a state of relaxation. It appears later and lasts longer in the lower extremities than in other parts of the body.[10]

In Jhala and Raju's Medical Jurisprudence[11] it has been stated:

> Rigor mortis is due to rigidity of the muscles. It appears both in the voluntary as well as involuntary muscles, its appearance and disappearance in various muscles follows a pattern. It is apparent first in the region of head, face, neck, eyelids and lower jaw. It last shows its appearance in the lower extremities. Hence, if rigor mortis is present in the lower extremities, it can safely be opined that it is present all over... After the rigor mortis has set in the whole body (as confirmed from its presence in lower extremities), no specific opinion is possible till the time it starts disappearing i.e., after about 18 hours.[12]

It would thus appear that all the authorities on the subject are unanimous in their opinion that rigor mortis sets in and reaches the 'extremities' at the end and that it follows the same pattern both in the matter of appearance and disappearance. The presence of rigor mortis by itself, cannot be decisive of the time of death, but it is difficult to believe that rigor mortis would be found only in the extremities of the body within seven hours of the death. It is true that on the basis of presence of rigor mortis, no opinion can be given with mathematical precision regarding the time of death. At the same time, in view of the undisputed position regarding the 'course' of appearance and disappearance of rigor, its presence only in the extremities does provide a sound basis to find out the probability or otherwise of the prosecution case regarding time of death. The process of appearance and disappearance of rigor mortis may take relatively shorter and longer time but it cannot be that within seven hours time it would disappear from the other portions of the body like head, face, neck, and abdomen and remain only in the extremities.[13] In Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology,[14] in the heading 'Putrefaction of Decomposition and Autolysis' it is stated:

> Putrefaction follows the disappearance of the rigor mortis but this is not always the case; since, in Northern India especially during the hot months from April to October it commences before rigor mortis has completely passed off from the lower extremities.[15]

Time of Death

Medical science has not achieved such perfection so as to enable a medical practitioner to categorically state in regard to the exact time of death. In the instant case, the murder took place on a boat, and the dead body was thrown in the water. Dead body remained under water for more than five days. Rigor mortis was absent and the body was fully decomposed. The soft tissues of some of the parts of the body had been eaten away by fish. It was not possible for the doctor to pinpoint the exact time of death.[16]2296

38. Contents of Stomach cannot give exact Time of Death

The stomachic contents cannot determine with precision the time of death inasmuch as the power of digestibility may remain in abeyance for a long time in states of profound shock and coma and it must also be remembered that the process of digestion in normal healthy person may continue for a time after death. Be it noted, all the imponderables pointed out by Dr. Modi in his book on Medical Jurisprudence which makes the digestive testimony inconclusive, and, therefore insufficient, to contradict positive evidence, if any, about the time of death. To impute exactitude to a medical statement, oblivious to the variables noticed by experts and changes in the dietary and eating habits is to be unfair to the Science. We are not prepared to run the judicial risk of taking the whole verdict on such nebulous medical observations made by the Doctor.[17]

As the occurrence was a daylight occurrence, the inconsistency as to the fact that the stomach of the deceased was found empty, whereas, the wife of the deceased deposed that the deceased had taken breakfast before incident took place, was held not fatal to the prosecution case.[18]

When Contents of Stomach Assume Importance

It may be possible to contend that contents of the stomach may not always be an indicator of the time of death. But in a case where stomach is empty and the prosecution evidence is that the murder had taken place shortly after the deceased has his last meal, to say that the contents of the stomach have no material bearing on the determination of the time, is not acceptable. When the time of death being a material factor to verify the presence of the eye-witnesses it was obligatory for the prosecution to have clarified the discrepancy between the medical evidence and the oral evidence. If the prosecution has failed to do so, a serious doubt as to the time of incident and the presence of the eye-witnesses at the time of incident and their narration of the incident also becomes doubtful.[19] Where the PW I stated that he and the deceased had gone to take tea after dinner when the incident took place, but no food was found in the post-mortem, and even small intestines were found empty, the evidence of eye-witnesses was not believed, and appellant accused was acquitted of the charge of murder.[20]

Semi-digested Food in Stomach of the Deceased

As per oral evidence of PW12 sister in law of the deceased, the deceased had taken food at about 10 pm, while the occurrence was alleged to have taken place at 8.30 pm and in the post-mortem examination, semi-digested food was found. The accused contended that there was a conflict between oral and medical evidence. Held, as per doctor's evidence, the death occurred within 24 hours of the post-mortem, and the variation between the medical evidence and the testimony of the eye-witnesses was not such which would lead to a conclusion that the prosecution case was not correct.[21]2297

Undigested Food in the Stomach of the Deceased--Time of Death can be Ascertained

The Supreme Court in a quite number of cases determined time of death of deceased relying on nature of the contents of the stomach or intestine.

In Ram Narain Singh v State of Punjab ,[22] In para 9 of this decision the Supreme Court held:

> Medical evidence of Dr Walia shows that undigested food was found in the stomach of the deceased and according to him deceased must have taken his food only five minutes before his death or at the most within half an hour of his death. Doctor's evidence, therefore, clearly shows that he must have taken his food at 8 pm which is also the usual time when the villagers take their food. Relying on this circumstance. The Supreme Court came to the conclusion that the incident must have taken place at about 8 pm, and it belied version of the two eyewitnesses that the occurrence took place in their house at about 6.30 pm. From the aforesaid decision of the Supreme Court, it appears clear that if in the stomach of dead man undigested food material is found, it must be presumed that he died at the most within about half an hour since he took his food last. Therefore, the contents of stomach/intestine of a dead man must contain undigested food material if he dies within half an hour after he took food.[23]

Likewise the Supreme Court in Raghunandan v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[24] determined the time of death/occurrence on the basis of nature of the contents of the stomach/intestine.

In Charan Singh v State of Punjab ,[25] it was held by the Supreme Court in para 18 as follows:

> The first information report about the present occurrence was lodged promptly and this is apparent from the fact that a copy of the first information report was received by the Judicial Magistrate concerned at Ludhiana at 8.12 pm the same evening. We are not impressed by the suggestion that the occurrence took place not at 5 pm but much earlier. According to the post mortem examination reports, the stomach of each one of the two deceased persons was empty at the time of the post mortem examination. Normally a vegetable diet containing mostly farinaceous food as usually taken by an Indian does not leave the stomach completely within six to seven hours after its ingestion (see page 151 of Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology. Sixteenth Edition). If the occurrence had taken place at 2 or 3 pm as suggested on behalf of the accused persons the mid day meals usually taken by the villagers at about 11 am would still be in their stomachs and the same would have been empty at the time of the post mortem examination. The fact that the stomach of each of the deceased persons was empty lends assurance to the prosecution version that the occurrence took place at about 5 pm.

From the above discussion it is evident that stage of digestion of the food material or the nature of the contents of the stomach or intestine can be the basis to estimate time of death or the time of occurrence depending upon the circumstances of the case.[26] Where the prosecution case was that the deceased was murdered at about 7.30 am on 13 March 1990 and FIR and lodged at 10 am on the same day but defence has thrown a suggestion that the deceased died in the previous evening, suggestion was denied by prosecution witness, the doctor's evidence showed that age of injury was 38-40 hours from the time of post-mortem examination which takes the time of death to2298 previous evening, besides the doctor also found undigested rice in the stomach, the normal practice in the month of March in the area was to take rice in the evening, so evidence of record established that deceased took food in the evening and immediately thereafter he died, accused was held entitled to the benefit of doubt.[27] Where the prosecution had fixed up the time of murder as 11 pm on surmise, perhaps, the actual time of murder would have been later in the night or the last earlier, by any stretch of imagination on the fact of the case, absence of any food materials in the stomach cannot be counted as a circumstance in favour of the accused.[28]

The Time Period for Emptying the Stomach--Factors affecting it

In Modi's Medical Jurisprudence & Toxicology,[29] the learned author has opined: 'The rate of emptying of stomach varies in healthy persons. It varies in man from 2.5, 6 hours...'.[30]

In Medico-legal Postmortems in India,[31] the learned author Dr CK Parikh has opined:

> The length of time required to empty the stomach after a meal is very variable, and depends not only on the type of meal ingested but also on stomach tone and pyloric function and on the psychological state of the individual. Fear slows but anger hastens gastic emptying. The power of digestion may remain suspended for a long time in conditions of shock and coma. Food has been sent in the stomach remaining undigested in persons who received severe head injuries soon after their meal and died within 12-24 hours.

In general, milk leaves the stomach rapidly but the large vegetable and fatty meals consumed in India do not usually leave the stomach under four hours. Chapattis digest to a pulp fairly quickly, within about two hours, but do not leave the stomach quickly when other foods are present with them. Most kinds of dals retain their form for about two to three hours and rice grains retain their from up to three to four hours. If meat has been eaten along with the vegetable foods, it is seldom distinguishable as such after three hours, and after four hours, both green vegetables and roots are also indistinguishable. In general, if at autopsy one finds that the stomach is full it would suggest that the victim died within two hours of taking the last meal if food was distinguishable and four hours if the food was indistinguishable. The volume and condition of stomach contents can thus provide important data.[32]

In HMV Cox's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology,[33] the learned author opined:

> In a sudden and unexpected death, if a full stomach containing undigested food is found, it is reasonable, if other evidence is not incompatible to deduce that death occurred within two to four hours of the eating of the last meal. It is dangerous to make any more accurate interpretation than this.[34]

The opinion of Dr CK Parikh contained in the book Medico-legal Postmortems in India, is that not only ingestion of the meal will depend upon the type of meal2299 consumed but it will also depend upon stomach tone and pyloric functions and on the psychological state of the individual. According to the author large vegetable and fatty meals do not leave the stomach under four hours but chapattis digest to pulp fairly quickly within about two hours. In case chapattis are taken along with other items of food, it will take a longer time to leave the stomach. Dals retain their form for 2-3 hours and rice retains its form for 3-4 hours. So therefore, the ingestion will depend upon the type and quality of food consumed by a person and upon his digestive power. This power varies from person to person. It would depend upon the kind and quantity of food consumed. Period of digestion is different for different types of foods.[35]

The time taken normally for digesting of food would depend upon the quality and quantity of food as well, besides others. It is required to be factually proved as to the quantum of food that was taken, atmospheric conditions and such other relevant factors to throw doubt about the correctness of time of occurrence as stated by the witnesses. Only when the ocular evidence is wholly inconsistent with the medical evidence the has the Court to consider the effect thereof. The Supreme Court in Pattipati Venkaiah v State of Andhra Pradesh ,[36] observed that medical science is not yet so perfect as to determine the exact time of death nor can the same be determined in a computerised or mathematical fashion so as to be accurate to the last second. The state of the contents of the stomach found at the time of medical examination is not a safeguide for determining the time of occurrence because that would be a matter of speculation, in the absence of reliable evidence on the question as to when exactly the deceased had his last meal and what that meal consisted of. In Nihal Singh v State of Punjab ,[37] it was indicated that the time required for digestion may depend upon the nature of the food. The time also varies according to the digestive capacity. The process of digestion is not uniform and varies from individual to individual and the health of a person at a particular time and so many other varying factors.[38]

Empty Stomach of the Deceased and Time of Death

The time of death cannot be viewed with any mathematical accuracy.[39] The stomach contents cannot determine with precision the time of death and there are imponderables which make the digestive testimony inconclusive and therefore, insufficient to contradict positive evidence, if any, about the time of death. To impute exactitude to a medical statement oblivious to variables noticed by experts and changes in dietary habits is to be unfair to science.[40] In the absence of any convincing evidence that the doctor holding post-mortem examination had deliberately given a wrong report, his evidence is not liable to be discarded. Where there is positive direct evidence about the time of occurrence, it would be wrong to make conjecture about such time on the basis of the presence of faecal matter in the intestines and come to the conclusion that the deceased would normally have evacuated it early in the morning.[41] Even the presence of faecal matter in the intestines would not be conclusive. In the present case, the fact that the stomach of the deceased was empty, lends assurance to the prosecution version that the occurrence took place at around2300 4.45 pm, because it has come in evidence that he had taken his meal at noon time on that day.[42] The contents of the stomach found at the time of postmortem are not a safe guide to determine the time of the incident. It was also observed that it was not proper and fair to a medical witness to discard his evidence by referring to passages of experts on medical jurisprudence without bringing the reference to the notice of the witnesses.[43] Where the stomach of the deceased was found empty as revealed by post-mortem report, it was held that inference that incident took place early in the morning would be a pure speculation.[44] The stomach being empty or the large intestine not having any faecal matter would not falsify the positive evidence on the question of time of death. Therefore, the evidence of eyewitnesses as regards the time of occurrence of the incident and of the doctor as regards the time of death cannot be discarded merely on a theoretical consideration of the process of digestion of food.[45] Where as per the prosecution's case the incident took place at 12 noon and the postmortem reports of both the deceased boys showed that the stomach of both the deceased was empty and faecal matter was present in the intestines and on the strength of that medical evidence the plea of the defence was that it was unnatural that the boys had not taken their breakfast or food by the time, i.e., 12 noon, the unfortunate incident had occurred so eyewitness account given by the witnesses was in conflict with medical evidence, was rejected by the Allahabad High Court on the ground that because it was not the case of the prosecution that the deceased had left the house after taking food or breakfast. Unless there is evidence to that effect, it can safely be said that the incident had not taken place at 12 noon as alleged by the prosecution or the oral evidence is not in line with medical evidence.[46] The presence of faecal matter in the large intestine of the deceased is not suggestive of the fact that the incident took place late in the night or in the early hours of the next day, more so, when there was convincing evidence of the son of the deceased that his father was shot dead when he had gone to ease himself in the night.[47]

Contradiction between Statement of Witness and Post-Mortem Report as to Content of Stomach

The contradiction in post mortem report relating to empty stomach of deceased and statement of his wife that he had taken breakfast before going to the fields would not be fatal.[48]

39. Non-mentioning of Name of Accused in Medico-legal Report--When Fatal

When from the medico-legal report that the doctor sent to the police after examining the deceased, apart from the name of deceased, his father's name, his address, his occupation and an account as to how the injuries were caused, the place where he was found, these particulars obviously were furnished by the deceased himself before his death or eyewitness, who accompanied him. In that context it was expected if really the accused was the assailant that his name would be disclosed by all or any of them while furnishing the cause of the injuries. It can, therefore, be legitimately2301 inferred that at the earliest available opportunity the same of the accused was not disclosed. This fact coupled with the fact that no special report in the respect of registration of the case on the day FIR was recorded and the evidence on record unmistakable shows that it was forwarded to the magistrate only after the case was converted to s 302, IPC, consequent upon the death of the deceased. This glaring circumstance prompts the inference that the FIR did not see that light of the day till the death of the deceased, in the light of these facts the conviction and sentence of the accused under s 302, IPC, and other offences were set aside.[49]

Non-mentioning of the Statement made to the Doctor in the Memo forwarded to the Police

The memo which is sent by doctor to the police is in a prescribed form found in a book obviously kept by the hospital. One of the forms is filled up and sent by the doctor to the sub-inspector of the police. It is not necessary at all to mention all the statements made to the doctor by the persons who brought the patient to him in that memo. It is not part of the duty of the doctor.[50] Thus, omission of doctor to mention the statements made to him by the persons who accompanied the injured in the memo sent to the police had no effect on the prosecution case.

40. Strangulation and Hanging Cases

In Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology in the chapter on 'Deaths from Asphyxia', the deaths due to asphyxia by strangulation are explained. The learned author points out that death due to hanging, in addition to the cord-mark their would be dribbling of saliva from the angle of mouth. The learned author also says that in cases of strangulation, pure blood issues from the mouth, nose and ears specially when great violence had been used and the tongue is also protruding.[51] A study of Modi's Medical Jurisprudence shows that in a case of strangulation death could be slow.[52] The strangulation is established due to the availability of contusion of sternomestoid of muscle on both sides, which is common in strangulation and will not occur in hanging.[53] Where in a case of murder the suggestion by defence was that the death of the victim was by hanging as dead body was recovered from a tree but the medical evidence on record showed that blood was oozing from the nose and the mouth and that there was a pool of blood under the body of deceased, the death could be due to asphyxia by strangulation. In other words, asphyxia was not due to hanging though the dead body was ultimately recovered from a tree.[54]

In the act of strangulation by the hands much greater degree of violene is commonly employed than is necessary to cause death, fingernail impressions are common and if much force is used locally in producing construction, the larynx, wind pipe, the muscles, even vessels in the front sides of the neck may be found to be bruised or lacerated. The hyoid is sometimes fractured.2302

Evidence of violent compression or constriction of the neck during life is obtained from the presence of ecchymosis and swelling and lividity of haemorrage above the level of the constriction and swelling and lividity of face.

In Llyods Medical Jurisprudence of India, the author has noticed that: 'If both hands are employed as is very often the case, several marks will be seen on each side of the throat'.

It will appear from the aforesaid text books on medical jurisprudence that in strangulation with hands (throttling), the face is cyanosed, livid and swollen, the eyes are open and suffused, the pupils dilated, the tongue swollen, dark coloured and protruded, bleeding occurs from the mouth, nostrils and ears, ecchymosis may result and fingernail marks may be found. If both the hands are used several marks may be seen on each side of throat. Hyoid bone may be fractured. Hyoid bone is not fractured by any means other than strangulation.

The opinion contained in Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology is always regarded as of high authoritative value.[55] Both in Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology and in Taylor's Principle and Practice of Medical Jurisprudence, it has been clearly indicated that suicide by self strangulation is very rare. For committing suicide by self-strangulation the person committing suicide must take aid of contrivance so as to ensure application of sufficient force until death by strangulation. Without such contrivance sufficient force cannot be applied because initially with the pulling the ends of the string must get loosened.[56] Therefore, on account of absence of contrivance which rules out any possibility of suicide by the deceased by self-strangulation, the defence plea of self-strangulation was discarded and in the face of circumstantial evidence being absolutely clinching in establishing the complicity of the accused in committing the murder of the deceased, the Apex Court reversed the order of acquittal of the accused passed by the High Court.[57]

On the night of occurrence, the deceased wife was with the accused husband. The accused did not furnish any explanation as to how the deceased died. In post-mortem examination, external and internal injuries and, hematoma were found on the neck of the deceased wife. The medical officer opined that the death of the deceased was due to strangulation. Conviction of the accused on charge under ss 302 / 34, 201, IPC was held proper.[58]

The accused had strangulated his deceased wife and threw her dead body into a well. The accused took the plea that the deceased fell into the well accidentally. After the body of the deceased was taken out from the well, no water came out of her mouth when her dead body was pressed. The defence theory of accidental fall was ruled out. The accused was convicted under ss 302 / 201, IPC .[59]

In the instant case of alleged strangulation, the second post-mortem reiterated that cause of death was 'asphyxia as a result of strangulation'. According to the medical2303 opinion, a hard blunt substance appeared to have been used to cause strangulation leading to death on account of asphyxia. However, no such hard or blunt substance was found or seized from the room. Doctors had not found any physical signs of internal injuries viz. any extravasations of blood in the tissue or any laceration in the underlying muscles. Considering post-mortem reports and the evidence of PWS, the Court held that reasonable doubts arose as to the cause of death due to asphyxia as a result of strangulation.[60]

Presence or Absence of Ligature Marks on Neck of Deceased--Effect

If there was no ligature mark on and around the neck of the deceased it is a very signifiant feature ruling out the possibility of suicide by strangulation with the help of rope, etc. Abraded contusions in front of the neck and on right side of the neck with ecchymosis present under the contusions speak of throttling because the abraded contusions would be caused when the neck is pressed by the hand and pressure is exerted upon the throat. The doctor clearly stated that the contusions on the neck and the fracture of both the cornua of hyoid bone was the result of forceful pressing of the neck.[62] Where post-mortem report showed that there was ligature mark on the neck of the deceased wife which was ante-mortem, the opinion of the doctor was clear and definite that such ligature mark of 5 cm width in horizontal position could not be caused by hanging but would have been caused by strangulation, the medical evidence, therefore, completely pacified the case of the accused husband that on his return from the field to his house he had found his wife hanging, and thus she had committed suicide.[63] In case of ligature mark caused by suicidal hanging, normally, the mark could be situated above the thyroid cartilage. If it was across the thyroid cartilage, the possibility of ligature mark is homicidal cannot be ruled out. The possibility of death due to suicide also cannot be brushed aside. In case of homicidal death there would be further injuries inside the neck muscles. In case of homicidal strangulation in addition to ligature mark or finger mark there is probability of struggle mark of violence on the other part of the body. Although in the case of suicide saliva must have dribbled, but due to partial suspension of the body asphyxia process might be slow and gradual as a result dribbling of saliva might be absent.[64]

Where it has come in evidence that the chadar was about one and a half meter long and one meter wide, this shows that in fact it was not a full chaddar or a bed sheet but was a piece of cloth, which is sometimes used by ordinary people like rickshaw pullers to cover their face during winters especially in night, if the said piece of cloth is converted into a rope by rolling it over, its diameter will very much depend upon the fact as to how strongly and tightly it is rolled over. If a piece of cloth which is only one meter in width is tightly rolled over in the shape of a rope, its diameter will be much less than 6/7 cm and the ligature mark on the neck of the deceased would be2304 of still lesser dimension. The width of the ligature mark would very much depend upon the type of the cloth, how tightly and strongly it was rolled over and was converted into a rope and how soon it was removed.[65]

Distinction between Ligature Marks in Cases of Hanging and Strangulation

In the case of hanging, the position of ligature mark would be different from that of the strangulation. In the case of hanging, mark goes up towards the jaw and it also passes above the thyroid cartilage. The ligature mark pass obliquely from the front side of the neck. In the case of hanging, the mark of knot of the rope would be visible on front of the neck. In the case of hanging, there must be a little stretch on the neck due to the weight of the body. In the case of hanging, there would be no horizontal ante-mortem injuries around the neck. In the case of strangulation, it may be caused by any rope or by any cloth or it may be caused by pressing the throat by hand, small bruises and contusion on the sides of the neck would be visible. If the strangulation may have been caused by pressing the neck by rope or anything alike, the ligature mark would be present on the neck in a circle all around the neck.[66]

Strangulation and Throttling

The Court should not lay uncalled for emphasis on the difference between strangulation and throttling. Strangulation is a generic term and throttling is one of its species as observed in Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology,[67]Taylor's Principle and Practice of Medical Jurisprudence[68] and Lyods Medical Jurisprudence for India.[69] Strangulation means a violent form of death when results in constricting the neck by means of ligature or by any other means and strangulation on is called throttling when the constriction is produced by the presence of the fingers or palm upon the throat.[70] The strangulation is established due to the availability of contusion of sternomestoid of muscle on both sides, which is common in strangulation and will not occur in hanging.[71] Where there is absolutely nothing in the evidence on record to indicate that the multiple bruises on the body of the deceased were self-inflicted; rather, these bruises were indicative of severe beating and the fracture of the hyoid bones with superficial bruises on the neck cements the possibility of strangulation. In such circumstances, there can be really no escape from the conclusion that it was the accused who had killed the said deceased by throttling her to death.[72]

Accused persons committed the murder of the deceased boy aged 5 years by strangulation as proved by the post-mortem report, thus, they were convicted under s 302, IPC .[73]2305

The three appellants accused had strangulated the deceased, chopped off her head, cut the body into pieces and disposed of the body. The deceased had gone to the accused to demand money, her share in the property sold, as her husband was inside the jail in connection with a case under the NDPS Act. The human skeleton of the deceased and her garments were recovered at the instance of the accused appellants. Accused appellants were convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[74]

The doctor who conducted post-mortem in the case deposed that the death of the deceased was on account of asphyxia caused by throttling. This conclusion was supported by the fact that there was a fracture of the cornua of the hyoid bone. It is well accepted in medical jurisprudence that hyoid bone can be fractured only if it is pressed with great force or hit by hard substance with great force. Otherwise the hyoid bone is not a bone which can be easily fractured. Moreover, the absence of carbon particles and fumes in the trachea and bronchus led to the irresistible conclusion that the deceased must have died before she was set on fire. Some amount of carbon particles and fumes would have certainly been found in the trachea and bronchus if she were alive when set on fire. Accused husband was convicted for offences under ss 302, 498A and 201, IPC .[75]

Duty of Medical Officer in Throttling Cases

According to the medical jurisprudence, in a case of throttling, the medical officer is expected to remove a piece of skin around the neck for preservation as an exhibit in a later criminal proceedings for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of the expert. The failure in this regard, is a lacuna in the case.[76]

Some Hanging Cases

(a) When the medical evidence of the doctor shows that in the case of suicide by hanging there is normally trickling of the saliva from an angle of the mouth of the deceased, when stains the clothes of the deceased which, were not found on examination of the clothes worn by the deceased, the plea of defence that the deceased committed suicide by hanging stood falsified.[77]

(b) Where the allegations against the accused were that accused assaulted deceased wife till she became unconscious and thereafter left the house, he came back and hanged her, the evidence on record indicated that after assaulting the deceased as result of which she became unconscious the accused left the house alongwith his daughter and came back home sometime later. The version of the accused was that he untied the knot of the saree which she used as the ligature and brought her down. In the absence of any evidence to prove that deceased was alive when the accused came back, his version cannot be rejected altogether entitling him to acquittal.[78]

(c) Where the accused husband was alleged to have throttled his wife to death at his father-in-law's house, no external injuries of fracture of hyoid bone was found in post-mortem examination of the deceased, though in the2306 cross-examination, the doctor stated that generally in all cases of throttling, marks of violence and injuries cannot be found but this stray statement of the doctor in the cross-examination was not a conclusive opinion but it was only a possibility in the absence of material to show that the death had occurred by throttling and some other infirmities in the prosecution case, accused was found entitled to be acquitted.[79]

41. Death by Drowning--Signs

In the autopsy examination 200 mls of watery fluid was found in the stomach of the deceased. Modi in his celebrated work Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology, has opined that the presence of a certain quantity of water in the stomach is an important sign of death by drowning. It is not possible for water to get into the stomach, if a body is submerged after death.[80]

Mere absence of diatom in the deceased's body would not exclude the possibility of death by drowning. The post-mortem report also indicated presence of mud in the trachea of the children, which also pointed to the possibility of death by drowning.[81]

Accused appellant, a girl aged 15 years, was alleged to have drowned the child (deceased) in pond. As there was a short distance between the pond and the house of the deceased, the possibility of accidental death could not be ruled out. Conviction of the accused appellant under s 302, IPC was set aside.[82]

42. Depth of Injury more than Length of Blade of Weapon

Normally the depth of injury may not be more than the length of the blade of the weapon of offence because the blade of the weapon has an important role in causing the injury. But when a 14 cm deep injury was found on the person of the deceased which was undoubtedly more than the length of the blade of the weapon but since it was a forceful blow, the Apex Court did not see any improbability of such a deep injury having being caused by the said weapon.[83]

Character of an Incised or Slash Wound

The edges of a wound made by a heavy cutting weapon, such as an axe, hatchet or shovel may not be as smooth at thoswithmuche of a wound caused by a light cutting weapon, such as a knife, razor, etc., and may show signs of contusion.[84]

Keeping in view the above view of the learned author and taking into consideration the axe used and the injuries found on the person of the two deceased persons, it can certainly be said with all experience in life that when a weapon like an axe is used even on its blunt side, then, the very weight of the axe added with the force exerted behind it will generate forceful momentum and accordingly, the resultant blow was found to give an appearance of the injury of a contused lacerated wound and not that of an incised wound depending upon force exerted. Apart from the above quoted2307 recitals. Modi's Medical Jurisprudence supports occular evidence even the common sense approach and experience of life commands that the injury caused by muddamal heavy axe with all force and the momentum at its back was bound to cause and bring about an appearance of the contused lacerated wound. In fact, when the axe blow lands on the head and when it first contacts the skin with the sharp side and there is not much force, then it may cause and also leave behind the appearance of incised wound but as against this if with the heavy weight axe and the force behind it, the blow is delivered then even if with the first contact, it causes an incised wound but instantaneously in an inseparable moment the weight and the force makes a further impact, it is bound to ultimately give the look of a contused lacerated wound.[85]

43. Value of Expert Opinions expressed in Medical Text Books

It cannot be said that the opinions of the authors of medical textbooks were given in regard to circumstances exactly similar to those which arose in the case before the Court nor is this a satisfactory way of dealing with or disposing of the evidence of an expert examined in the case unless the passages which are sought to be relied to discredit his opinion are put to him. The Supreme Court in Sunderlal v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[86] disapproved of judges drawing conclusions adverse to the accused by relying upon such passages in the absence of their being put to medical witnesses. Similar view was expressed in Bhagwan Das v State of Rajasthan. [87] Though opinions expressed in textbooks by specialist authors may be of considerable assistance and importance for the Court in arriving at the truth, these cannot always be treated or viewed to be either conclusive or final as to what such author says to deprive even a court of law to come to an appropriate conclusion of its own on the peculiar facts proved in a given case. In substance, though such views may have persuasive value cannot always be considered to be authoritatively binding, even to dispense with the actual proof otherwise reasonably required of the guilt of the accused in a given case. Such opinions cannot be elevated to or placed on higher pedestal than the opinion of an expert examined in court and the weight ordinarily to which it may be entitled to or deserves to be given.[88] The purported opinion expressed by an author, hypothetical answers given to hypothetical questions, and mere hypothetical and abstract opinions by textbook writers, on assumed facts, cannot dilute evidentiary value of ocular evidence if it is credible and cogent.[89]

Should the Books on Medical Jurisprudence be Relied upon by Courts with or without putting the same to the Medical Witness?

In Piara Singh v State of Punjab ,[90] the reliance on a number of books on medical jurisprudence to support the evidence of one doctor did not find favour with the Apex Court. It was observed that unless the books were put to an expert the High Court should not have done so. Recitals in the books do not provide a sufficient guide to determine the truth or falsity of the testimony of an expert.2308

The ratio of the decision of the Apex Court was analysed by a division bench of the Gujarat High Court in Rataniya Bhima Bhil v State of Gujarat ,[1] and it was explained that in the aforesaid the Supreme Court case that the prosecution had examined two medical officers who had given two conflicting opinions and at the time of writing the judgment, the Court had relied upon some recitals in medical jurisprudence without giving an opportunity to the other concerned medical officer whose evidence did not conquer with the said recitals. Therefore, in the case before a division bench of the Gujarat High Court where the facts were very simple viz., which side of axe whether sharp or blunt side was used which was simply an aspect of appreciation of evidence and did not call for expert knowledge, so it was held that the decision of the Supreme Court in Piara Singh's case did not apply.

Where the doctor who conducted the post-mortem was confronted by the defence in the cross-examination by observations made in Lyon's Medical Jurisprudence,[2]Parikh's Text Book on Medical Jurisprudence and also with the book The Essentials of Forensic Medicine by Dr KS Narayana Reddy[3] and the opinion of the doctor as to the cause of death was contrary to the opinion expressed by the learned authors in these books on medical jurisprudence, the Supreme Court held that though sufficient weightage should be given to the evidence of the doctor who has conducted the post-mortem, as compared to the statements found in the textbooks, but giving weightage does not ipso facto mean that each and every statement made by a medical witness should be accepted on its face value even when it is self-contradictory. When there is a reasonable doubt in regard to cause of death of the victim, it is not safe to rely upon the evidence of the doctor solely for the purpose of coming to the conclusion that the victim's death is proved by the prosecution to be homicidal.[4] The opinions in the eminent books on medical jurisprudence cannot be ignored when the doctor in a case has given his report without reason and without support of authority.[5]

44. Fractures caused to Ribs without corresponding Internal Injuries--Not an Accident Case

Where the doctor being a prosecution witness stated in the cross-examination that the injuries on the person of the deceased could as well have been caused even in a motor accident, the Apex Court observed that a closer scrutiny of the injuries impels it to rule out the possibility of a motor accident as a cause for all the injuries eg, fractures on the ribs 5-10 have no corresponding external injury. If these fractures were caused in a motor accident there should necessarily have been corresponding external injuries but if the deceased was manhandled by the assailants with bare hands and legs (either by stamping or by hitting on the chest when the victim was lying) those fractures could have been caused without causing any corresponding internal injury. That apart, the minor damage noticed on the scooter is incompatible with the theory of motor accident resulting in such number of injuries.[6]2309

Depressed Fracture

Cox, in his Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology, while dealing with head injuries, has described various types of fractures. He has described 'depressed fracture' in the following words:

> Depressed Fracture: This is also known as signature fracture or fractures a la signature as their pattern at times resembles the weapon which caused it. Heavy weapons with a small striking surface, e.g. axe, hammer, stone etc, cause localized depressed fracture.[7]

45. Injury caused by Accused but Death due to Improper Medical Treatment

It will be useful to refer to the law in the UK and the USA on this point as many principles of our justice system have been borrowed from these two countries:

Position of Law in the United Kingdom

In Halsbury's Laws of England,[8] the law on the point has been stated as follows:

> For the purposes of offences of homicide, a person causes the death of another where by any act or omission he accelerates the death of that other. The act or omission need not be the sole or the substantial cause but it must be one of the causes, and one that is more than minimal. It is, therefore, possible to have two or more independent operative causes of death, and any person whose conduct constitutes a cause may be convicted of an offence in respect of the death.

It is not necessary that the death should have been caused in the way intended or foreseen by the defendant. It is enough that the death was a foreseeable or natural consequence of the defendant's conduct, so if the defendant threatened the victim who accidentally killed himself in trying to make his escape, the defendant is liable for murder or manslaughter, according to his mens rea.

If a wound is inflicted and death results, the person who inflicted the wound will be held to have caused the death although the victim may have neglected to use proper remedies, or have refused to undergo a necessary operation.

Similarly, where a wound or hurt has necessitated medical treatment and such treatment is improper or negligent so that death ensues, the wound will be regarded as causing the death if it continues to be an operative cause at the time of death, but if the original wound is merely the setting in which another cause operates, or has become merely part of the history of the case, an ensuing death cannot be said to result from the wound and the person who inflicted it cannot be said to have caused the death.[9]

Position of Law in the USA

(a) Contribution of act to death--liability for homicide does not depend upon the fact that death is the immediate consequence of the injury inflicted by the accused. One who inflicts an injury on another is deemed by law to be guilty of homicide if the injury contributes mediately or immediately to the death of such other. He is legally accountable if the direct cause of death is the natural result of his criminal act. The fact that other causes contribute to2310 the death does not relieve the actor of responsibility, provided such other causes are not the proximate cause of the death. Criminal responsibility for inflicting an injury which is the immediate cause of death is not lessened merely because of the predisposed physical condition of the deceased without which the blow or wound would not have been fatal.

(b) Acceleration of death--Criminal responsibility for homicide is not relieved because the person killed has previously been mortally wounded by another, if the act of the accused actually causes or accelerates death. The law declares that one who inflicts an injury on another and thereby accelerates his death shall be held criminally responsible thereof. It is said in this connection that if any life at all is left in a human body, even the least spark, the extinguishment of it is as much homicide as the killing of the most vital being. In accordance with this rule, one who inflicts injury on the deceased after the latter is mortally wounded by another may be guilty of homicide if the effect of the former's act hastens death. In such case, the person who inflicts the first injury may also be convicted, according to some authorities, if it appears that the injury or wound inflicted by him would have resulted in death without the intervening act.

(c) Disease or physical condition resulting from or co-operating with injury--One who > inflicts a blow or wound upon another, which devolves into or initiates an affliction or disease, is criminally responsible for the death of such person ultimately resulting from the affliction or disease. It is not indispensable to a conviction that the wounds be necessarily fatal and the direct cause of death. It is sufficient that they cause death indirectly through a chain of natural effects and causes, unchanged by human action. This rule is applied not merely where the consequential development is in the form of an immediate infection of the wounds itself, such as erysipelas, septicemia or blood poisoning, but also when the condition developing it is anatomically dissociated from the mere external wounds, as in the case of miscarriage, or pneumonia, or where blows cause congestion of the brain resulting in death, or in exposure which causes death.[10]

Position of Law in India

It may be pointed out that expln 2 to s 299, IPC, lays down that when death is caused by bodily injury the person who causes such bodily injury shall be deemed to have caused death although by resorting to proper remedies and skillful treatment, death might have been prevented. In Moreha v State of Rajasthan ,[11] it was held that the mere fact that if immediate expert treatment had been available and the emergency operation had been performed there were chances of survival of the deceased can be of no avail to the accused in view of expln 2 to s 299, IPC . The nature of the offence committed by an accused has to be judged with reference to ss 299 and 300 of the IPC .[12] In Zorawal v State ,[13] where the deceased had sustained gunshot injuries but died after 12 days on account of peritonitis, it was held that the offence committed by the accused was under s 302, IPC . In Naresh v State ,[14] knife injuries were caused to the deceased on 2 March 1974. After initial treatment at Ghaziabad he was shifted to2311 Safdarjang Hospital, Delhi where he died on 20 April 1974. The post-mortem examination showed that the death took place due to septicaemia and there was pus in the operational injury. It was held that septicaemia caused by the abdominal operational injury accelerated the death of the victim and injury sustained by him was the real cause of his death. In Jageshwar Singh v State of Bihar ,[15] it was held as follows:

> Even if the injuries caused the death combined with the complication of tetanus, it must be held that those injuries wer]e the cause of death or that, in any case the circumstances in which those injuries were received would be circumstances of transactions which resulted in his death.[16]

The legal position which emerges is that if injury is caused which makes it imperative for the victim to have medical treatment and such treatment is improper or negligent or is not up to the mark and the victim dies, the injury will be regarded as causing the death of the victim and the fact that other causes contribute to the death does not mitigate or reduce the liability of the accused unless the other causes are wholly independent and do not owe their origin to anything connected with the injury or their treatment and are the sole cause of death.[17]

Victim got Discharged against Medical Advice, Dying on Re-Admission

Where the victim wife was set on fire by the husband, sustained 807 burn injuries and she got discharged from hospital against medical advice and on her re-admission in the hospital she succumbed to her injuries, the doctor who besides conducting post-mortem examination had also treated the deceased at first instance and after re-admission, opined that deceased died on account of burn injuries sustained by her, the accused was found guilty under s 302, IPC, and not under s 304, IPC .[18]

Stone

In normal circumstances, incised wounds cannot be caused by a stone unless the stone is sharp-edged or is given the shape of a sharp-edged weapon.[19]

(VI) GUN, BULLET INJURY AND EVIDENCE AND REPORT OF BALLISTIC EXPERT

46. Importance of Report of Ballistic Expert

In murder cases where firearms are used, the report of a ballistic expert is important, particularly to know whether the bullet found in the body of the deceased or when it has pierced the body and was recovered from the spot and was fired from the same firearm which was recovered from the accused or at his instance.

It cannot be laid down as a general proposition that in every case where a firearm is allegedly used by an accused person, the prosecution must lead the evidence of a Ballistic Expert to prove the charge, irrespective of the quality of the direct evidence available on record. Where direct evidence is of such an unimpeachable character, and, the nature of injuries disclosed by post-mortem notes is consistent with the2312 direct evidence, the examination of the Ballistic Expert may not be regarded as essential. However, where direct evidence is not available or there is some doubt as to whether the injuries could or could not have been caused by a particular weapon, examination of an expert would be desirable to cure an apparent inconsistency, or for the purpose of corroboration of oral evidence.[20]

Comparison Microscope--Importance in Comparing the Crime Cartridge with Test Cartridge

Usually more can be seen through a microscope than can be photographed through it. There are several reasons for this superiority of visual perception, in the first place, the eye looking through a microscope can scan the field and change focus at different points of the field in addition the eye can see any movement present, and with the aid of mental 'filling in' is able to perceive form and detail that may not be recorded photographically. Moreover, as the lens system of the microscope produces a curved field, this works out nicely for the eye since the retina is curved, but does not work so well photographically since the film plane is flat. Due to this latter defect, not all of the field will be photographed to the same degree of sharp focus, and some distortion may be produced in the photograph.[21] It cannot therefore be doubted that a comparison microscope is the most important and most widely used scientific instrument in comparing the crime cartridge with the test cartridge. Such microscopes are of various types but they have been described as follows in Mathew's Firearms Identification.[22]

> A comparison microscope consists essentially of two compound microscopes, having identical optical systems, so that they give the same magnification, connected by an optical 'bridge' containing a combination of prisms such that by viewing two separate objects (one under each miscroscope) through a single eyepiece the two objects may be compared by bringing the images of parts of each into juxtaposition.

It has further been stated that when the desired condition is attained for purposes of comparison the bullets are said to be 'matched' and correct opinion can be given thereon.

Modi, in his book,[23] states:

> Close range wounds of entry without washing should be excised with the surrounding skin and deeper tissues and immersed in a fixative solution, eg, formaline. The microscopic examination of close range wounds of entry may show the scorching effects of the gases and traces of carbon monoxide and metals etc.[24]

Expert not taking Microscopic Photograph or its Non-Production in Court--Effect

It is true that there has been considerable difference of opinion amongst investigators regarding the use of photographs in a court for the purpose of illustrating the matching of the markings, and while it may be that microscope photographs, when2313 taken with the due care and in the best of conditions, may enable the evidence to be placed on the record in a visible form, it cannot be denied that a court would not be justified in rejecting the opinion of an expert who has examined the markings under the comparison microscope simply for the reason that he has not thought it necessary to take the photographs. It is therefore not possible to reject the evidence of ballistic expert who has categorically stated that he had compared the land and groove markings on the bullets under a comparison microscope, simply because he did not think it necessary to take the photographs.[25]

Bullet Injury Entry Wound Smaller Than Exit Wound

A wound of entry is smaller in size than the wound of emergence. The wound of entry has inverted margins and wound of re-emergence has everted margins. In Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology,[26] this opinion is mentioned:

> The wound of entrance in distance shot is usually smaller than the projectile due to the elasticity of the skin, and round when the projectile strikes the body at a right angle and oval when it strikes the body obliquely. The edges of wound are inverted...The wound of exit is often larger than the wound of entrance and its edges are irregular and everted...The edges of both the wounds of entrance and exit may be exerted in fatty persons due to protrusion of fat in the wounds, and in decomposed bodies from the expansive action of the gases of putrefaction...

In a book on the subject, namely, Forensic Science in Criminal Investigation and Trials[27] by Dr BR Sharma, Ph D, Director, Himachal State Forensic Science Laboratory, Shimla, it is observed regarding wounds caused by a gun, that when velocity of a fired shot exceeds 600 meter per second and up to 1100 meter per second it also causes wound of the nature of blast effect. Thus, the wound in the loose skin around the testicles of the deceased could be because of such effect also. At the same page it is also mentioned that if a projectile comes out of the body the exit wound is larger than the entrance wound. So the laceration in that area after testicles of the size 3½´´ × 3´´ with irregular margin is explainable on this theory of blast effect of a fired shot. Even in Gaur's book, namely Firearms, Forensic, Ballastic, Forensic Chemistry and Criminal Jurisprudence,[28] it is observed at that wound of exit is usually larger than the wound of entrance, unless on the way through the body the projectile is intercepted by some bones and, there is some deformity or disintegration in the projectile, Shri K Kumar in his book Forensic Ballistics in Criminal Justice based on his experience as Director of Ballistics Laboratory of various states, making a scientific exposition of gunshot wounds, compares wound of entrance and wound of exit as under:

	Wound of Entrance	Wound of Exit
1.	Size
	Appears smaller than the wound of exit due to inversion. Greater the distance, smaller the appearance. Contact shots are exception to this phenomena due to stretching of surface skin.	Appears larger than the wound of entrance due to eversion. May appear smaller than the entrance if the entrance wound is a contact shot.2314
2.	Shape
	Regular, i.e., circular when the bullet hits at right angles and oval when it hits and penetrates in an angular direction.	The shape is of irregular size.
3.	Nature
	Punctured and lacerated.	May at times appear as incised particularly with high velocity, tapered and pencil point bullet.

4.	Margins
	Usually inverted, but in case of wound on fatty part of the body, the entrance wound may appear as everted due to protrusion of fat. May be surrounded with abraded collar and contused. Quantity of grease may be deposited. There may be blackening, scorching, tattooing, singing of hair in case of close range shot. Microscopical examination of skin and subcutaneous tissues around the wound of entrance will disclose evidence of carbonisation, swelling and homogenisation of dermal collagen apart from the deposit of dark particles.	Usually everted, broaded collar, contusion, tattoo in, blackening, burning, carbonization, etc., are absent. Usually everted, abraded A collar, contusion, tattooing, blackening, burning carbonisation, etc. are absent.

In firearm injuries, usually the entrance wound is smaller and the exit wound is bigger. Where the exit wound was not only smaller in dimension than the entry wound but was also smaller in dimension than the size of the cartridge, taken out of the revolver, allegedly used for causing injuries, it was held that the injuries were not gunshot injuries. In such cases, it cannot be expected from medical evidence to give any categorical opinion about the character of injuries merely on the basis of their margins or edges.[29] From a country made pistol it cannot be expected that after penetrating the abdomen and intestine and back muscles of a person it would cause multiple exit wounds when pellets were not big in size so that exit wounds would be found in large numbers. There may not be any exit wound at all.[30] In cases of a bullet injury except where the bullet gets fragmented after entering the body and only a portion thereof passes out of the exit wound or the bullet remains embedded in the body and does not pass out in the normal course and is subsequently taken out or2315 except in case of a point blank wound, it is practically and usually not possible that the size of the wound of exit may be smaller than the diameter of the bullet.[31]

47. Person Shot at from Close Range

If a person is shot at from close range, the marks of tatooing found by the medical witness would show that the range was small, quite apart from any other opinion.

In case of gun the range of blackening would normally extend to three feet as beyond that shot charge begins to disperse. In Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology[32] the opinion of Dr Modi goes that the shot charge of a gun at a distance of one to three feet makes a single aperture with irregular and lacerated edges corresponding in size to the bore of the muzzle of the gun as the shot charge enters as one mass but is scattered after entering the wound and causes great damage to the internal tissues. The skin surrounding the wounds is blackened, scorched and tattooed with unburnt grains of powder. On the other hand, at a distance of six feet the central aperture is surrounded by separate openings in an area of about two inches in diameter made by a few pellets of the shot which spread out before reaching the mark, the skin surrounding the aperture may not be blackened or scorched but is tattooed to some extent. At a distance of about 12 feet the charge of shot spreads widely and enters the body as individual pellets producing separate openings in an area of five to eight inches in diameter depending on the extent of choke but without causing blackening, scorching or tattooing of the surrounding skin. According to Taylor,[33] no general rule can be laid down about the distance from which a firearm was discharged. If blackening is found around the wound of entry on the dead body by the medical man it confirms that the deceased was within six feet of the assailant.[34] No charring or burning of the skin was found in medical examination as shot was fired from a distance of more than six feet.[35]

Fire from a Shot Gun by Close Range

The prosecution case was that the appellant had fired shot from about 2 meters causing death of the deceased. Several wounds of entry spread across the chest and left upper arm with blackening and burning around some of them were found. The dispersal of pellets and the uneven blackening and burning over the bullet holes suggested that a primitive weapon, (a 'topidar' shot gun, a muzzle loading weapon, which is often a primitive weapon and when used with gun powder and shot of uncertain quality and quantity, is likely to give uneven and uncertain pellet patterns) could have been used. The doctor gave opinion that the shot had been fired from about 2 metres from a shot gun, which fully corresponded with the injuries found on the dead body. Accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[36]

Where prosecution witnesses deposed that the accused appellant fired from a close range causing death of the deceased, but no blackening or charring was found at the2316 wound of entry in the body of the deceased, the use of the gun by the accused appellant was not established. Accused was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[37]

Accused Assaulted Deceased with Fire-arm--No Fire arm Injury found--Accused Acquitted

Evidence of eye-witnesses was that the accused assaulted the deceased with fire arms, knife and rod. But in post-mortem examination, no gun shot injury was found on the person of the deceased. Empty cartridges were also not recovered from the spot. Enmity between the parties was admitted. Eye-witnesses were related to the deceased. Accused persons were acquitted of the charge under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[38]

Prosecution case that the accused persons took away the deceased from his house and about 20 minutes thereafter 3-4 shots were heard, was not supported by medical evidence as in post-mortem examination, no gun shot injury was found on the person of the deceased, and only lacerated wounds were found. All the accused appellants were held entitled to benefit of doubt, thus, their conviction under ss 302 / 34, IPC was set aside.[39]

48. Wounds and Gunshots

The argument that the two gunshot injuries had spread, which suggested that these were fired from some distance is negatived by presence of blackening, charring and tattooing mark. The blackening was present in an area of 14 cm by 10 cm but the entry would was 2 cm by 2.06 cm only.[40] But where the deceased died of gunshot injuries fired from single barrel gun, the pelletes were recovered from the dead body of the deceased and their was possibility of pelletes from single shot being disbursed and causing more than one injury, the injuries found on the body of the deceased being more will not belie prosecution version of single shot fired from gun of the accused when the pelletes were fired from the distance of 40 feet or even 15-20 feet. The possibility of blackening around injuries also could not be ruled out as due to gap of about a month from the date of incident to the date of recovery, the possibility of the gunpowder residues being washed off by water cannot be ruled out.[41]

49. Double Barrel Gun

In case of a double barrel gun, it is impossible to make out which pellet has been fired from which gun.[42] Where the evidence of ballistic expert showed that the injuries suffered by the deceased and the pellets removed from his body, could be fired from the double barrel guns recovered as per the disclosure statement made by the accused, the conviction of the accused under s 302 read with s 34, IPC, was upheld.[43]2317

50. Evidentiary Value of Opinion of Ballistic Expert

The evidence of ballistic expert has corroborative value when it finds support from statement of eyewitnesses. It helps the prosecution in proving guilt of the accused, when the case of prosecution that the accused persons had fired their guns is amply corroborated by the report of the ballistic expert that all the cartridges of point 12 bore recovered from the house of the deceased had been fired from the guns of the accused persons, the conviction of the accused persons under ss 302 / 307 / 34, IPC, and under s 27 Arms Act was upheld.[44] Where the ballistic expert showed that bullets recovered from the body of the deceased had been fired from revolvers used by the accused, the injuries of the deceased were compatible with the manner of their being caused as deposed to by eyewitnesses, the conviction of the accused persons under ss 302 / 34, IPC, was upheld.[45] When the reliable ballistic experts opinion that gunshot injuries found on the body of the deceased and on the person of the injured person were caused by two different weapons, i.e., one by country made pistol and other by factory made gun, while prosecution case was that both deceased and injured witness received gunshot injury, the conviction of the accused under ss 302 and 307, IPC, was set aside.[46] Where defence of accused was that in a free fight between accused party and deceased party, the butt of the gun of the accused was broken by an axe-blow because of which it went off killing deceased, evidence of ballistic expert showed that axe-blow could not move forward safety lock of gun so that gun could go off, gun injuries on deceased also indicated that the gun was not fired from close range. Plea of accidental firing of accused persons was not accepted.[47] The Court can refuse to place any reliance on the opinion of an expert which is unsupported by any reasons.[48] When the opinion of ballistic expert is based on the notes prepared by him and the same is prepared in the exercise of his official duty, no reliance can be placed upon such opinion/report when the copies of the notes are not supplied to the defence.[49] In the face of definite evidence of ballistic expert on record that point 32 deformed lead bullet, which was found from the body of deceased was fired from an English revolver which was seized from accused, the defence plea that bullet recovered from the body of the deceased was not compared by ballistic expert to find out that it was fired or not from the revolvers of police officers is of no use to the accused.[50]

Where ocular evidence of the injured witnesses was that the first shot as well as the second one were fired by the accused and the report of the ballistic expert showed that two shots were fired from two different guns, the explanation of the witness that it was dark and when the torchlight was flashed, the accused was seen pointing his gun towards them and therefore they had believed that the previous shot was also fired by him, deserves to be accepted when the identity of accused was not challenged.[51] When the witnesses have not stated that shots were fired from the two guns in question, non-production of the report of the ballistic expert is of no consequence.[52] It cannot be laid down as a general proposition that in every case2318 where a firearm is allegedly used by an accused person, the prosecution must lead the evidence of a Ballistic Expert to prove the charge, irrespective of the quality of the direct evidence available on record. In the present case, the death of the deceased was caused by bullet fired from a revolver. The medical evidence was consistent with the oral evidence. It was clear that the bullet recovered by the doctor at the time of post-mortem of the victim had traversed to thoracic spine through the neck from the face near the angle of the jaw, hitting the fifth thoracic vertebra, badly damaging the underlying spinal cord, thus, the absence of Ballistic Expert's evidence was held not fatal to the case of the prosecution, notwithstanding the fact that the Forensic Science Laboratory, in its report, had not expressed a definite opinion about the bullet recovered from the place of occurrence.[53]

There was cogent and reliable evidence to establish the prosecution case. Seizure of the fire arms and recovering the empties and sending them for examination by the Ballistic Expert would have only corroborated the prosecution case but by not sending them to the Ballistic Expert in the case was not fatal in view of the categorical testimony of PW about the whole incident.[54]

Appellant accused fired with gun at the deceased causing his death. The evidence of two eye-witnesses was found reliable, and the plea of the accused that it was accidental firing from rifle was found improbable. As admittedly it was a case of firing from gun, the non-sending of rifle to the Ballistic Expert for opinion was inconsequential.[55]

Inconsistency between Evidence of Ballistic Expert and that of Eyewitnesses

When evidence of qualified ballistic expert proved beyond doubt that injuries attributed to the accused were caused by a double barrel gun and not a rifle, the contradictory statements of eyewitnesses who was neither expert nor had used gun or rifle before, about use of gun at one time and rifle at other is not material.[56] But when accused as per prosecution case has fired with a gun causing death of the deceased and injuring the eyewitnesses but ballistic experts opinion that the gunshot injuries found on the body of the deceased and the injured witness were caused by two different weapons i.e., one by factory made gun and other by country made pistol, the conviction of accused under ss 302 and 307, IPC, was set aside.[57]

When direct evidence of witness is available inconsistency related to distances from which gunsshots were fired between evidence of medical expert and eyewitness is of no significant whatsoever. So what is required is that the eyewitness account must substantially tally with the medical evidence on record.[58] Where it is proved beyond doubt that the evidence of the eyewitnesses is trustworthy in a case where the accused person committed murder by gunshots, the inconsistency between the opinion of expert and the eyewitnesses relating to the distance from which gunshots were fired carried no weight. If the eyewitnesses stand the test of their credibility2319 they have to be believed.[59] From the mere admission in his evidence by witness that 'MO 1 is the gun which the accused was having at the time of shooting', it cannot be held that based on the contents of ballistic expert (that fired cartridge could not have been fired from rifle examined by him), the whole prosecution case must fall to the ground.[60] Where prosecution witness stated that the deceased received pellet injuries on his chest and jaw, and the investigating officer also stated in the injury statement that deceased received pellet injuries on tongue, chest, chin etc., but the bullet was recovered from the chest cavity of the deceased by the doctor and there was no explanation by prosecution about it, the fact that the loaded gun seized by investigating officer and bullet removed from chest cavity of the deceased by the doctor were not sent to ballistic expert for examination the acquittal of accused was upheld.[61]

51. Time when Weapon/Cartridge was fired

In Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology,[62] while dealing with the topic as to 'the time when the weapon was fired' it has been observed that 'it is never possible to ascertain with any scientific accuracy the time when a weapon or cartridge was fired'.[63]

52. Non-recovery of Pistol or Spent Cartridge

The non-recovery of the pistol or cartridge does not detract from the case of the prosecution, where the direct evidence is acceptable.[64]

53. Mere Recovery of Offence Weapon not sufficient to Record Conviction

The recovery of offence weapon viz. gun, was effected after more than two years. The prosecution did not prove that during this intervening period of more than two years, the gun had not changed hands and the same was consistently possessed by the accused appellant. Possibility of use of another gun of the same caliber could not be ruled out. There was also no direct evidence to connect the accused with the commission of offence by the accused appellant. The accused appellant was given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charges under ss 302, 460 / 34, IPC .[65]

54. Recovery of Empties from the Place of Occurrence--Weapon used is Pistol and not Recovered

If shots had been fired from a revolver then the empties would have remained inside the chamber of the revolver and would not have fallen out on the platform. Presence of five empties on the platform clearly indicated that the weapon used for firing shots was a pistol.[66] Identity of weapon and manner of use by the accused has to be2320 established by the prosecution the weapon and the empties have to be connected with the crime otherwise the use of weapon is not established and the same is not connected with the accused.[67]

In every case of gun firing, it is not required that each and every bullet should hit the target. There may be attempts by the deceased or the victim to save himself from the raining bullets, in which case, the bullets may not hit the target. Merely because all the bullets fired from the gun did not hit the target and were not recovered from the scene of offence, is no ground to conclude that the incident did not take place.[68]

55. Seized Firearm not sent for Examination by Ballistic Expert--Effect

Where the guns seized from two accused persons had not been sent for forensic examination by ballistic experts, both accused persons having licenced guns surrendered in the court after a lapse of 11 days from the date of incident. Examination of guns by the ballistic expert after a lapse of 11 days would not have made any material difference. It would have been different if any bullet or pellet would have been found and recovered either from the body or from the scene of occurrence in which case the ballistic expert would have been expected to conduct test-fires and determine whether the bullet or pellet was fired from the seized guns or any one of them.[69] Seizure of the fire arms and recovering the empties and sending them for examination by the ballistic expert would have only corroborated the prosecution case but by not sending them to the ballistic expert in the particular case may not be fatal in view of the categorical testimony of prosecution witness about the whole incident.[70]

56. False Encounter

In autopsy examination, blackening and tatooing were found around bullet injuries on the chest and back of the deceased. This showed that shots were fired from a short distance, which was not consistent with the theory of genuine encounter. No fire-arm was recovered from the body of the deceased. The police party had not received any injury. Held, it was a case of false encounter.[71]

57. Death in Police Lock-up

Where the entries in police station diary showed that the appellant accused had kept the deceased in police lock-up, and injuries including fracture of rib, which was the cause of death, were found in the medical examination of the deceased, and the deceased was in the custody of the appellant accused and none-else, however as the evidence did not show that the accused intended to cause the death of the deceased, his conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, IPC .[72]2321

Where the deceased, suspect in a theft and lurking house trespass case, was detained in police custody for 2/3 days, subjected to electric shock to his scrotum by accused police officials in police custody, causing death, accused appellants police officials were convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[73]

(VII) POISONING CASES

58. Routes of Administration of Poison

In Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology,[74] in s II dealing with toxicology, routes of administration of poison have been given. It is stated: 'Poisons may gain entry into the body by various other routes. These can be considered as enteral routes. The poison may come in contact with the skin, mucous membrane of the respiratory tract, gastro-intestinal tract, eye, ear and the vagina'.[75]

59. Poisons

Mercury

In Modi's Medical jurisprudence and Toxicology,[76] in s II dealing with toxicology, Modi has dealt with mercury and its compounds as poisons. About mercury, it is stated at p 135 that:

(i) Persons concerned with mercury mining are also liable to get poisoned. It is easily converted into a dull grey powder when shaken up with oil or triturated with sugar, chalk or lard. The process is known as deadening and is used in preparing mercurial ointment and emplastrum. The metal is not acted upon by hydrochloric acid. It is slightly dissolved by dilute cold sulphuric add but completely dissolved by strong sulphuric and nitric acids.

About compounds of mercury, against mercuric chloride the book states: 'It is a violent poison, and is obtained in the bazaar, often mixed with impure sub-chloride'.[77]

Further:

> After mercury is absorbed into the system, it is eliminated in the saliva, urine and faeces, and in the milk and perspiration. If the quantity is large. It also passes rapidly to the foetus in uterus through the placental circulation particularly methyl mercury compounds. Elimination commences within a few hours of the administration of a single dose and is completed within four to five days after which the metal cannot be detected in the urine, but its excretion is very slow, if mercury, is given in repeated small doses it may be detected in the solid organs after long periods. The diagnosis of clinical and industrial mercury poisoning can be proved by measuring the amount of mercury in the urine.
> Mercury is often used as a medicine, hence the detection of small quantity in the viscera does not contra indicate death from some other cause.2322

According to Modi this type of poison can cause renal failure.[78]

According to Dr Bernard Knight, in Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology,[79] 'a characteristic feature of poisoning by mercury is suppression of urine at early stage of poisoning and presence of blood and albumin in urine. This is because mercurials are specific poisons to kidneys and cause necrosis of glomeruli'. Shock and collapse supervenes and the cause of death is mostly kidney failure. Where the accused, a scientist who had done his Phd in bio-chemistry was alleged to have inserted mercuric chloride crystals mixed with tamarind into vagina of his wife who developed severe burning in her genitals after insertion and was treated by the doctor for chemical burns, the wife died 44 days after administration of the poison due to renal failure. The post-mortem and forensic science laboratory report showed that there was no trace of mercuric chloride in her body. In view of Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology, since the deceased died 44 days after administration of poison and so there was no possibility of mercury at the time of conducting post-mortem, and since the accused had access to the mercuric chloride crystals in the laboratory at the place of his work and crystals were available in open market and accused being a scientist knew the use and misuse of the chemical, the death of deceased was held to be caused by mercury poisoning by the accused and not by renal failure.[80]

Dhatura

In Lyon's Medical Jurisprudence for India,[81] it is said:

> In the East, dhatura is not used with homicidal or suicidal intent; it is almost invariably employed with the object of producing stupefaction to facilitate theft.[82]

In Emperor v Bhagwan Din ,[83] it was observed that dhatura is not exactly a deadly poison and may often be given for the purpose of merely stupefying a victim. But, although death does not always follow from dhatura poisoning, yet it does follow in a considerable proportion of cases.[84] A division bench of the Nagpur High Court observed that dhatura is a common poison frequently used to cause death, and the effects of dhatura, plants of which are often to be found in villages, are well known to the villagers.[85]

The question, as to what offence is constituted by the administration of *dhatura*depends upon the consequences of the act of its administration and the intention or knowledge of the person administering it. In Empress v Tulsha ,[86] a woman who had administered dhatura to three members of her family, who all recovered, was found guilty of an attempt to murder. In Re Venkatachalam Chetty,[87] it was held that since it was not shown that pneumonia was a likely consequence of the administration of2323*dhatura,* nor was it established that the pneumonia was caused by the exposure or was a probable consequences of sleeping out, it could not be said that the death was caused by the administration of dhatura and the accused was guilty of the offence under s 238, IPC . On the other hand, in Emperor v Bhagwan Din ,[88] where dhatura had been administered to travelers, one of whom died and the trial court had convicted the accused under s 304, the High Court had altered the conviction to one under s 325 though the judges remarked that the case might possibly have come under s 326 .[89]

The best indication of the intention of the offenders can be gathered from the quantity of dhatura which he administered. Where, therefore, in order, to facilitate robbery, the accused administered a large quantity of dhatura to his victims in the hope that the successful culmination of his crime would be facilitated by the death of his victims and the subsequent difficulty of tracing him with the help only of persons, little acquainted with him, it was held that he was guilty of murder.[90] So once it is established that the accused, with a motive to get rid of the victim administered a fatal dose of dhatura in his food, the conclusion to be drawn is that he or she committed murder unless the explanation is such as to create some doubt in the mind of the Court. Thus, if one deliberately administers a common poison, the effects of which are well known, it is no defence to say that one failed to grade the exact dose correctly so as to cause some injury short of death. The question, whether a person knows what he is administering and knows what its effects will be, is, of course, a question of fact in the particular case. If the necessary knowledge can be attributed to the accused, he would be guilty of murder.[91]

Arsenic

A person who administers a well-known poison, like arsenic, to another, must be taken to know that his act is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death, or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, and if death ensues, he is guilty of murder notwithstanding that his intention may not have been to cause death.[92] If, however, the person, to whom the arsenic is administered, survives, the accused would be guilty of an offence under s 307, IPC .[93] In Emperor v Sikandar ,[94] it was held that it is of the utmost importance, in a case of arsenic poisoning, that the prosecution should prove that a lethal dose of arsenic, i.e., two grains or upwards, had been administered.[95]

Accidental case of poisoning by arsenic sometimes occurs from its admixture with drinks or articles of food. There have been instances where white arsenic has been mistaken for baking powder, soda, sugar, salt or flour and has caused mass accidental2324 poisoning.[1] Thus where the testimony of eyewitnesses as regards manner of pouring arsenic poison by the accused in the cooking-pot was not reliable, there was absence of motive on the part of the accused of administering poison, there was possibility that the arsenic poison was mixed in dal (pulse) accidentally at the hands of someone else, the conviction of the accused was set aside.[2]

Aconite

It is stated in books on medical jurisprudence and toxicology that a root of aconite is often used both externally and internally by vaids and hakims in this country and that it is also sometimes added to country made liquors to increase their intoxicating power. But there is no doubt that a variety of aconite is a deadly poison and, in the absence of anything to show any other intention, a person, who administers aconite to another, producing fatal results within three hours, cannot but have the intention of killing him. In any case, a person, who administers aconite of such quality and in such quantity to another, as results in his death within three hours, must be taken to have known that his act is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death, or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, and if death ensues, he is guilty of murder, notwithstanding that his intention may not have been to cause death.[3] Where, however, a woman administered aconite powder to her husband, not with an intention to kill him, but with an intention to obtain some kind of domination over him, it was held that she was guilty of an offence under s 328, IPC .[4]

Love Potions

Sometimes poisonous drugs are used as love potions with fatal results and the question arises as to which of the offences has been committed in such cases. There have been several cases, all very much of the same nature, in which it has been held that where the intention to cause death cannot be clearly found without any other possible explanation of the act of the person of giving poison, a conviction for murder cannot stand and even if the person, administering the drug, had neither the intention to cause death, nor the knowledge that she was likely to cause death, she must be held to have administered the poison without due care and caution and the offence would fall under s 304A, IPC .[5] In Pika Bewa v Emperor ,[6] it was held that unless it is shown clearly and without possible doubt that the intention was to cause death, where a substance is administered as a love potion, the accused cannot be convicted of murder. The mere administering of a love potion or drug, which, a person thinks, might be beneficial, is not, in itself, an offence, but when it is supposed to have effect upon persons, with whom the paramour of the accused had enmity, and when she administers it without due care and caution or any inquiry as to what it really is, her act certainly falls within s 304A, IPC . If, however, the administration of the love potion does not cause death of the victim, but results merely in his falling into delirium or coma, the person administering it would be2325 guilty of the offence under s 328, IPC .[7] A person, who supplies love potion to another for being administered as such, would be liable as an abettor.[8]

60. Proof Needed in Poisoning Cases

In a case of poisoning, the prosecution must establish that:

(a) death took place by poisoning;
(b) the accused had poison in his possession; and
(c) the accused had an occasion to administer poison to the deceased;
(d) there is a clear motive for an accused to administer poison to the deceased.[9]

If however, the accused gives the victim something to eat and the victim dies immediately on the ingestion of that food with symptoms of poisoning and poison, in fact, found in viscera, the requirement of proving, that the accused was possessed of the poison, would follow the circumstance that the accused gave the victim something to eat and it need not be separately proved.[10] In Mohan v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[11] the Supreme Court considered the proof of the fact of possession of poison unnecessary as the victim had died soon after eating pedas given by the accused and had not taken any other food likely to contain poison.

Beyond the above four elements, which are essential to be proved in poisoning cases, the prosecution has also to establish that the deceased died of a particular poison said to have been administered.[12] It has also been said that it is of the utmost importance in a case of arsenic poisoning that the prosecution should prove that a lethal dose of arsenic, that is, two grains or upwards, had been administered.[13] In Happu v Emperor ,[14] it was observed that if the prosecution wishes to establish that the deceased died of arsenic poisoning by means of the chemical examiner and weight is to be attached to his evidence, it must be proved that at least two grains of arsenic were administered to the deceased before death. It can be done by proving the discovery of this quantity in the body of the deceased or by accounting for its absence in part which absence in part may be attributed to vomiting, purging or the natural elimination of poison from the body of the deceased.[15]

Where in alleged case of poisoning, no poison was detected in the viscera of the deceased, and evidence failed to show that the death of the deceased was caused by2326 administering poison by the accused, the acquittal of the accused for offence under s 302, IPC was recorded.[16]

Where evidence proved that there was matrimonial discord between the parties and death of the deceased was caused by forced administration of poison and smothering, accused husband was convicted under s 302, IPC .[17]

Where the appellant husband was alleged to have mixed cyanide in cold drink and given the same to his wife causing death, the oral evidence about the purchase of cyanide was not reliable, and the recovery of limca bottle from the house of the accused did not inspire confidence as the sample to the FSL was sent 22 days after the seizure, the conviction of the appellant was found not sustainable, and was set aside.[18]

Proof needed in poisoning cases is circumstantial evidence. If circumstantial evidence, in the absence of direct proof of the above mentioned elements,[19] is so decisive that the Court can unhesitatingly hold that death was the result of administration of poison (though not detected) and that the poison must have been administered by the accused, then the conviction can be rested on it.[20] Even in Anant Chintaman Lagu v State of Bombay ,[21] where poison could not be traced in the viscera by chemical and post-mortem examination, the majority of the judges had concluded that the circumstantial evidence established the administration of poison by the accused.[22] It was, however, warned, in Ramgopal v State of Maharashtra ,[23] that where the evidence is circumstantial, the fact, that the accused had motive to cause death of the deceased, though, relevant, is not enough to dispense with the proof of certain facts. The evidence of motive, which is frequently given in poisoning cases, is of subsidiary importance and the mere fact, that the accused had a motive to cause the death of the deceased, is not a fact which will dispense with the proof of points that the accused had the poison in his or her possession and that the accused had an opportunity to administer the same to the deceased.[24] On the fateful night, admittedly nobody was present in the bedroom where the accused appellant and the deceased were sleeping as husband and wife. The victim screamed at about 2 am, which attracted the inmates of the house to rush to the bedroom where they found the victim dead. The accused husband did not explain how the deceased died. The conviction of the accused husband under s 302, IPC was held proper.[25]

The evidence of a prosecution witness, a goldsmith, cannot be rejected on the ground that he had no license to possess potassium cyanide and he had not disclosed2327 the fact of giving potassium cyanide to accused to any other person. Being a goldsmith, it was quite likely that he was able to obtain potassium cyanide even though he did not have a license to possess it as cyanide is commonly used by goldsmiths for electroplating gold ornaments.[26]

Appellants were prosecuted for offences under ss 302, 120B and 201, IPC on allegations that the accused persons made the deceased and his wife drink coffee in which they had mixed sleeping pills, and also administered five injections of poison. The doctor in post-mortem report had opined that the cause of death could not be ascertained as the body was decomposed. According to FSL report, medicine called Diazepam 'Tranquilizer' was found in the stomach, intestine, liver, heart, kidney and lungs etc. The mere recovery of injections from a lane near the house of the accused was held not sufficient to record the conviction of the accused appellants. Conviction of the accused appellants for offences under ss 302, 120B and 201, IPC was held not proper and was set aside.[27]

There was no evidence to show that any of the accused persons administered poison. PW3 deposed that the poison was mixed with the Halua and she found the taste to be pungent and did not have the whole of halua served to her; but the deceased took the whole quantity which was offered to him. She did not know from where the halua came. There was no forensic examination of the halua which is supposed to have contained the poison by PW3 and shared by the deceased. The acquittal of the accused persons, as recorded by the High Court under s 302, IPC, was held justified.[28]

Appellant accused doctor son-in-law with intention to grab property made his father-in-law and mother-in-law believe that they were suffering from AIDS, and on the pretext of treatment, gave poisonous injection, caused their death and that of their three minor children. Held, case was proved beyond reasonable doubt, thus, accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[29]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 302.

Punishment for murder.--

61. Chemical Examiner's Report

Before using the chemical examiner's report, the Court must satisfy itself that the substances examined were, in fact, what they are said to be[30] because such a report can be of no use unless there is proof of the identity of the articles found during investigation and sent to the chemical examiner with the articles examined by him.[31] It is always open to the Court to call the chemical examiner when this course is deemed to be necessary in the interests of justice. He does not, as a rule, give any opinion as to the cause of death; he merely reports the result of the chemical examination of the substances sent to him. It is for the Court to determine the cause of death after a consideration of such report together with the post-mortem appearances, as deposed to by the officer, who conducts the autopsy, and the other evidence in the case.[32] In ordinary circumstances there would be nothing wrong in2328 taking reports of the chemical examiner and the imperial serologist on record without examining these persons as witnesses as permitted by the CrPC . When however there is a difference of opinion in the reports so much so that the effect of one report is to nullify the effect of the other, the duty to explain the difference is on the prosecution and mere production of reports does not, under the circumstances, prove anything which can weigh against the accused.

Failure of the serologist to detect the origin of the blood due to disintegration of the serum in the meanwhile does not mean that the blood stuck on the axe would not have been human blood at all. Sometimes it happens, either because the stain is too insufficient or due to haematological changes and plasmatic coagulation that a serologist might fail to detect the origin of the blood. Will it then mean that the blood would be of some other origin? Such guess work that blood on the other axe would have been animal blood is unrealistic and far-fetched in the broad spectrum of this case. The effort of the criminal court should not be to prowl for imaginative doubts. Unless the doubt is of a reasonable dimension which a judicially conscientious mind entertains with some objectivity no benefit can be claimed by the accused.[33] In the absence of report regarding origin of blood it cannot be said that the Court could not have convicted the accused when the serologist and chemical examiner have found that the chadar (sheet) seized in consequence of the disclosure statement made by the accused was stained with human blood, as with the lapse of time the classification of the blood could not be determined. No bonus or benefit can be conferred upon the accused by the Court.[34] Even if the serologist did not enter the witness box, his report is admissible in evidence under s 293(4)(f), CrPC .[35]

62. Contradiction between Report of Chemical Examiner and Statement of Doctor

Where in a murder by burning, the doctor who examined the deceased stated that the body of the deceased smelled of kerosene but the report of forensic science laboratory showed that traces of petroleum were detected on partially burnt clothes of the deceased, in the face of report of the forensic science laboratory which was based upon scientific analysis, the statement of the doctor which was only an opinion was discarded particularly when it militated against the version of eyewitness.[36]

63. Failure of Police to send the Blood for Chemical Examination--Effect

The failure of the police to send the blood for chemical examination in a serious case of murder is to be deprecated. In such cases, place of occurrence is often disputed. However, such an omission need not jeopardise the success of the prosecution case where there is other reliable evidence to fix the scene of occurrence.[37] Where in a case based on circumstancial evidence, the crucial questions were as to whether the gloves of the accused were stained with blood, whether that blood was human matched the blood group of the deceased, to link the accused with murder, non-production of the chemical analysts report by the prosecution was fatal to its case because without it the Court was unable to hold that either the clothes or the axe was2329 blood-stained.[38] Lapse on the part of investigating officer in not sending the sample of blood-stained earth to the chemical examiner is fatal to the prosecution case when eyewitnesses account given by interested and inimical witnesses is not reliable.[39]

64. Burn Cases

The prosecution case disclosed in the complaint filed by the father of the complainant was that the appellant husband subjected the deceased to mental and physical torture and on the date of incident poured kerosene oil on the deceased and set her ablaze. Contrary to it, in the dying declaration recorded in the hospital, the deceased had stated that she had sustained burn injuries due to explosion of stove. She did not name the accused. The accused had also sustained injuries on his hand and face which showed that he tried to save the deceased. The possibility of committing suicide could not be ruled out. Held, the prosecution case was not proved beyond reasonable doubt. The conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC recorded by the trial Court was found not sustainable, hence, it was set aside.[40]

The accused husband had poured kerosene oil on the body of his deceased wife as the latter had refused to transfer her property to the husband. At the time of the admission of the victim in the hospital the doctor examined in the case, had recorded the statement of the deceased in the admission register in which she had told him that the accused appellant had poured kerosene on her and set her on fire. She also stated the same in the dying declaration made by her to the Head Constable, showing the involvement of the accused appellant. The conviction of the accused appellant recorded by the High Court under s 304, Pt II, IPC, after setting aside the acquittal recorded by the trial Court was confirmed.[41]

Prosecution case and evidence was that the appellants mother-in-law and sister-in-law ill-treated the deceased for non-fulfilment of dowry demand, and burnt her alive. Dying declaration of the deceased implicated the accused appellants. Doctor had given certificate that the victim at the time of making dying declaration was in fit mental state to make dying declaration. Conviction of the appellant was held proper.[42]

The incident admittedly took place inside a small room. It had two doors. The prosecution witnesses knocked both the doors. Their call to the deceased to open the door remained unanswered and only then they took recourse to breaking open the door. According to them, not only the appellant was with them at that point of time, but also he took part in dousing the flames. Indisputably, he took the deceased to the hospital. In such a situation, the dying declaration which implicated the appellant accused was eschewed from consideration. The appellant husband was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[43]2330

65. Honour Killing

The deceased, a Kshatriya, was married to the accused appellant, a member of the Schedule Caste. The accused paternal uncle of the deceased was annoyed with the marriage. The prosecution case was that the accused appellant had taken the deceased on the pretext that her grandmother was seriously ill and wanted to see her. The dead body of the deceased was recovered two days later. Marriage had taken place six years before, even a child was born to the couple. The honour killing, which was the alleged motive of murder, was weak. Last seen evidence was found unreliable as the statement of witnesses recorded under s 161 CrPC was recorded four months after the incident. Evidence of recovery was also found not reliable. Circumstantial evidence adduced in the case was found insufficient to record the conviction of the accused appellant. Accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[44]

(VIII) IDENTIFICATION OF THE ACCUSED AND CASE PROPERTY

66. Night Incident--Foggy Night--Accused given Benefit of Doubt

A mob of about 20 persons at about 10 pm in the night had entered the house and committed the murder of three inmates of the house. Eye witness from his field had seen the incident, he identified only 4 persons out of mob. The injury said to be received by the eye-witness was not mentioned in the FIR, nor was he examined by the doctor. The night of incident was a foggy night. FIR was delayed. The accused appellants were entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted.[45]

Where the incident took place in the month of March at 5 pm, and the victims and the accused persons were known to each other, identification of the accused persons could not be doubted, thus, conviction of the accused persons for offence under ss 300, 307, 436, 506 and 149, IPC was held proper.[46]

67. Identity of Accused proved--Night Occurrence--Accused Acquitted

The identity of the assailants was not established by the prosecution evidence. The incident had taken place at night and though the oral evidence did indicate the presence of lantern in the premises but the said lantern was neither shown in the site plan nor seized by the police. The incident was seen by a large number of persons and that too from a distance of 20 paces. There was enmity between the parties. The medical evidence did not support the ocular version. The Supreme Court affirmed the view expressed by the High Court that the accused was entitled to benefit of doubt and to acquittal.[47]

There was explosion of a bomb which was kept inside a passenger bus which caused the death of one passenger and injuries to several passengers. The prosecution witnesses identified the accused appellant. There was enough material to connect the accused appellant with the heinous crime of planting a live bomb in a passenger bus and getting down from the same before the bomb exploded, thereby causing death of2331 one person and grievous injuries to several other passengers. The accused appellant was convicted for offences under ss 285, 337, 338, 427, 302, IPC and s 3 of the Explosive Substances Act .[48]

The very identification of the accused appellant was doubtful. The accused appellant was convicted solely on the evidence that the murder weapon which had been recovered at his instance had been matched with the bullet recovered from the dead body. Recovery of offence weapon was itself doubtful. The case of the acquitted co-accused was similar. The accused appellant was also acquitted of the charges under ss 393, 398 and 302, IPC .[49]

68. Identification Parade

The main purpose of holding test identification parade during investigation is to enable the eyewitnesses to identify the accused who were not previously known to them. This way the investigating officer can satisfy himself of the bona fides of the witnesses and produce further evidence to corroborate their testimony.[50] The holding of test identification parade is all the more necessary when the eyewitnesses are unable to name the offender but claim that they could identify him on seeing him.[51] But the State is not bound to hold test identification parade when the accused are arrested on the spot though such an identification parade can be held on the request from the accused.[52] When the accused persons are named in the FIR lodged within one hour of the incident, non-holding of identification parade does not matter.[53] Where identity of the accused is not disputed, holding of test identification parade is not necessary.[54] Where conviction of the accused was not based on identification parade but on the evidence of eyewitness which was found reliable as the conviction cannot be set aside on the ground that identification was not reliable as witness had seen the accused in the police lock-up, more so when the witness admitted before the identification parade that he was acquainted with the accused.[55] When the accused was known to the witnesses before the occurrence, and though the witness did not know his name but could identify him, holding of test identification parade was not essential.[56] When the police asked the witness whether he could identify the persons who were on the scooter to which he replied in affirmative and then the two accused persons were shown for the purpose of identification and the witness identified them, such an identification will not assist the prosecution in any way nor could it be held to be test identification parade.[57] The legal position is the same when the accused is shown to the witnesses before holding test identification parade.[58]2332

Where identity of the accused is not disputed, holding of test identification parade is not necessary.[59]

PW who identified the accused in jail knew the accused, as he was also in jail along with the accused in that very cell for about 20 days. The police had detained illegally and un-authorizedly PW along with the accused in the same cell for about 20 days. Thus, the test identification parade was not conducted in a lawful manner, and such test identification parade was not relied upon. Acquittal of the accused A2 to A6 on charges under ss 302, 395, 201 / 34, IPC was held proper.[60]

Delay in holding Test Identification Parade

The test identification parade must be held without any delay. In the absence of proper explanation given by the prosecution for the delay in holding the test identification parade, the evidence of identification is not reliable.[61] The unexplained delay of four months in conducting such parade itself mars the credibility of test identification parade.[62] But when accused is put to test identification within 24 hours of his arrest, identification cannot be rejected on the ground that it was not possible for the witnesses to identify the accused after a lapse of three months.[63] An identification parade held 44 hours after occurrence cannot be said to be delayed.[64] Where parade was held after about two months and delay was properly explained, it cannot be discarded.[65]

Evidentiary Value of Test Identification Parade

The test identification parade has corroborative value only. The identification of the accused by the witness in the Court is substantive evidence. But when the accused is not known to the witnesses, the safe rule is that the testimony on oath of the witnesses regarding identity of the accused requires corroboration by way of an earlier test identification parade during investigation,[66] without which the evidence of identification during trial in the Court is of little value.[67] When photograph of the accused was published in all local newspapers and it was also shown to the witness2333 before test identification parade, neither the test identification parade nor subsequent identification of the accused in the Court during trial by the witness after many years is reliable.[68] The legal position is the same, when the accused is shown to the witnesses before holding test identification parade.[69]

Identification of the accused not known from before, for the first time by a witness in Court during trial, is considered a weak type of evidence.[70]

Failure to hold Test Identification Parade though demanded or not by Accused

The failure to hold that test identification parade even after a demand by the accused is not always fatal and it is only one of the relevant factors to be taken into consideration alongwith the other evidence on record. If the claim of the occular witnesses that they already knew the accused is found to be true, the failure to hold a test identification parade is inconsequential.[71] The evidence of eyewitnesses is not to be jettisoned merely due to the failure of the investigating officer to conduct test identification parade when the witnesses already knew the accused and name of some of the accused is given in the FIR.[72] In some cases the Supreme Court has held that failure to hold test identification parade with respect to the witnesses who did not know the accused before the occurrence is not necessarily fatal.[73] In other words, identification of an accused in Court is the substantive evidence of the person identifying him and earlier identification in test identification parade does not affect the admissibility of the evidence of identification in Court.[74] But it cannot be denied however that though not fatal, absence of the corroborative evidence of prior identification in a test identification parade makes the substantive evidence of identification in Court after a long lapse of time a weak piece of evidence and no reliance can be placed upon it unless sufficiently and satisfactorily corroborated by other evidence.[75]

Accused/Known People can be identified by their Voice etc, in the Absence of Light

Known people could be recognised by their gait, timbre of voice etc.[76] Thus, although in some instances there was no light, but where the witnesses were known to the accused persons being their very close relations, they could have recognised them by the timbre of their voice, gait, etc.[77]

Identification of Accused by Witness in Scooter Headlight

The four appellants accused armed with sickles and knives attacked the deceased who was driving a scooter, fell down and died. Incident was of the month of April at about 7 pm. Eye-witness identified the appellants in the scooter headlight.2334 Identification was found reliable and believed. Absence of source of light in the FIR was held not fatal to the prosecution case. Accused appellants were convicted under s 302, IPC .[78]

Legal Position of Test Identification Parade

The legal position regarding test identification parade of accused is concluded by the Supreme Court as follows:

(a) If an accused is well known to the prosecution witnesses, no test identification parade is called for and it would be meaningless and a sheer waste of public time to hold the same.

(b) In cases where according to the prosecution the accused is known to the prosecution witnesses, but the said fact is denied by him and he challenges his identity by the prosecution witnesses by filing a petition for holding test identification parade, a court while dealing with such a prayer, should consider without holding a mini inquiry as to whether the denial is bona fide or a mere pretence and/or made with an ulterior motive to delay the investigation, question for grant of such a prayer would not arise. Unjustified grant or refusal of such a prayer would not necessarily insure to the benefit of either party nor the same would be detrimental to their interest. In case prayer is granted and test identification parade is held in which a witness fails to identity the accused, his so-called claim that the accused was known to him and the evidence of identification in court should not be accepted. But in case either prayer is not granted or granted but no test identification parade held, the same ipso facto cannot be a ground for throwing out evidence of identification of an accused in Court when evidence of the witness, on the question of identity of the accused, is found to be credible. The main thrust should be on answer to the question as to whether evidence of a witness in Court to the identity of the accused is trustworthy or not. In case the answer is in the affirmative, the fact that prayer for holding test identification parade was rejected or although granted, but no such parade was held, would not in any manner affect the evidence adduced in court in relation to identity of the accused. But if, however, such an evidence is not free from doubt, the same may be a relevant material while appreciating the evidence of identification adduced in Court.

(c) Evidence of identification of an accused in Court by a witness is substantive evidence whereas that of identification in test identification parade is, though a primary evidence but not substantive one, and the same can be used only to corroborate identification of accused by a witness in Court.

(d) Identification parades are held during the course of investigation ordinarily at the instance of investigating agencies and should be held with reasonable dispatch for the purpose of enabling the witnesses to identity either the properties which are the subject matter of the alleged offence or the accused persons involved in the offence so as to provide it with materials to assure itself if the investigation is proceeding on the right lines and the2335 persons whom it suspects to have committed the offence were the real culprits.

(e) Failure to hold test identification parade does not make the evidence of identification in Court inadmissible rather the same is very much admissible in law, but ordinarily identification of an accused by a witness for the first time in Court should not form the basis of conviction, the same being from its very nature inherently of a weak character unless it is corroborated by his previous identification in the test identification parade or any other evidence. The previous identification in the test identification parade is a check value to the evidence of identification in Court, of an accused by a witness and the same is a rule of prudence and not law.

(f) In exceptional circumstances only, as discussed above, evidence of identification for the first time in Court, without the same being corroborated by previous identification in the test identification parade or any other evidence, can form the basis of conviction.

(g) Ordinarily, if an accused is not named in the first information report, his identification by witnesses in Court, should not be relied upon, especially when they did not disclose name of the accused before the police, but to this general rule there may be exceptions as enumerated above.[79]

69. Fingerprints

Under s 4 of Identification of Prisoner's Act 1920, police is competent to take fingerprints of the accused but to dispel any suspicion as to its bona fides or to eliminate the possibility of fabrication of evidence. It is eminently desirable that they are taken before or under the order of the magistrate in accordance with s 5 of the said Act.[80] When specimen fingerprints of the accused were not taken before or under the order of a magistrate and the prosecution failed to prove that the seized article with the fingerprints of the accused was not tampered with before sending to the bureau and the seized articles were not produced and exhibited during the trial, the conviction of the accused on the basis of the fingerprints report was found not proper.[81] When majority of fingerprints found at the crime scenes or crime articles are partially smudged, it is for the experienced and skilled fingerprint expert to say whether a mark is usable as fingerprint evidence. Similarly, it is for a competent technician to examine and give opinion whether the identity of fingerprints can be established, and if so, whether that can be done on eight or even less identical characteristics in an appropriate case.[82] Since the Supreme Court says that the fingerprint test is an exact science, the availability of fingerprints of the accused in the house of the deceased is a clinching and vital circumstance.[83] The report of the fingerprint expert does not fall within any of the categories contemplated under s 293(4) CrPC . Hence this report cannot be used in evidence without examination of the fingerprint expert.[84] Failure of the prosecution to produce the result of examination of fingerprints lifted from the scene of occurrence leads to the inference that it is possible that the result of this examination may have been contrary to the2336 story set-up by the prosecution.[85] But, non-examination of the fingerprint expert has no effect on the prosecution case when it has come on record that before seizure of the weapon of offence many persons had handled it.[86] When the fingerprints were lifted from the spot but the fingerprints of the accused were not taken and sent for comparison by an expert, there is no possibility of any report of the expert being in existence, non-production of which may lead to any adverse inference against the prosecution.[87]

Presence/Absence of Fingerprints of Accused--Effect

Presence of a fingerprint at the scene of occurrence is a positive evidence. But the absence of a fingerprint is not enough to foreclose the presence of the persons concerned at the scene. If during perpetration of the crime the fingerprint of the culprit could possibly be remitted at the scene it is equally a possibility that such a remnant would not be remitted at all. Hence absence of finger impressions is not guarantee of absence of the person concerned at the scene.[88]

70. Footprints

The science of identification of footprints is not a fully developed science and, therefore, if in a given case evidence relating to the same is found satisfactory, it may be used only to reinforce the conclusions as to the identity of a culprit already arrived at on the basis of other evidence.[89]It is not safe to act upon the footprint evidence when sample footprints of the accused were not taken before a magistrate.[90] In a murder case, it is not proper for a judge to take the opinion of a footprint expert regarding footprints found near the corpse of the victim, as conclusive evidence against the accused. The expert's opinion is valuable but it must be supported by statements of fact, the accuracy or otherwise of which can be verified by the Judge.[91] The circumstance of matching of shoeprints found at the spot with that of the accused is considered insufficient to establish the offence.[92]

71. Accused Making Phone Calls from Mobile of the Deceased Immediately after Murder

The use of Mobile handset bearing IEMI No. 35136304044030 on which the accused appellant made calls from his own registered mobile phone (SIM) No. 9818480558, immediately after the occurrence of the murder of deceased, was a legitimate basis for the identification of the accused appellant. The accused appellant was arrested. The nexus of the accused appellant with the deceased at the time of occurrence stood fully sustained from the aforesaid SIM/IEMI details. The conviction of the accused appellant under ss 302, 380 and 452, IPC was upheld.[93]2337

72. Identification of Accused by Police Dogs--Evidentiary Value

The uncanny smelling power of canine species has been profitably tapped by investigating agencies to track the culprits. Trained dogs can pick up scent from the scene of any object and trace out the routes through which the culprits would have gone to reach their hideouts. Developing countries have utilised such sniffer dogs in a large measure. In India also the utilisation of such tracker dogs is on the increase. Though such dogs may be useful to the investigating officers, can their movements be of any help to the Court in evaluating the evidence in criminal cases?[94] Where FIR was lodged about the murder of the deceased, but accused was not named, and the sniffer dog identified the accused and the accused was formally arrested, the identification of the accused by sniffer evidence was relied upon.[95]

A four-fold criticism is advanced against the reception of such evidence. First is, that it is not possible to test the correctness of the canine movements through the normal method available in criminal cases, ie in cross-examination. Second is that the life and liberty of human beings should not be made to depend on animal sensibilities. Third is that the possibility of a dog misjudging the smell or mistaking the track cannot be ruled out, or many a times such mistakes have happened. Fourth is that even today science has not given a final pronouncement about the accuracy of canine tracking.[96]

There are basically three kinds of police dogs: tracker dogs, patrol dogs and sniffer dogs. Recent trends show that hounds belonging to certain special breeds sheltered in specialised kennels and imparted with special training are capable of leading an investigating agency to a very useful clause in crime detection and thereby help detectives to make a breakthrough in investigation. English courts have already started treating such evidence as admissible. In Canada and in Scotland such evidence has become admissible of late though in the United States the position is not uniform in different states.

The weakness of the evidence based on tracker dogs has been much discussed. The possibility of error on the part of the dog or its master is the first aspect. The possibility of misunderstanding between the dog and its master is also a factor. The possibility of a misrepresentation or a wrong inference from the behaviour of the dog cannot be ruled out. The last, but not the least, is the fact that from a scientific point of view, there is little knowledge and much uncertainty as to the precise faculties which enable police dogs to track and identify criminals. Police dogs engage in these actions by virtue of instincts and also by the training imparted to them.[97]

In Abdul Razak Murtaza Dafadar v State of Maharashtra ,[98] a three judge Bench of the Supreme Court declined to express any concluded opinion or to lay down any general rule with regard to tracker dog's evidence or its admissibility against the accused as it was not necessary to do so on the fact situation. However, their Lordships made the following observations on the usefulness or otherwise of such evidence:2338

> 'It was argued that the tracker dog's evidence could be likened to the type of evidence accepted from scientific experts describing chemical reactions, blood tests and the actions of bacilli. The comparison does not, however, appear to be sound because the behaviour of chemicals, blood corpuscles and bacilli contains no element of conscious volition or deliberate choice. But dogs are intelligent animals with many thought process similar to the though processes of human beings and wherever you have though processes there is always the risk of error, > deception and even self-deception. For these, reasons we are of the opinion that in the present state of scientific knowledge evidence of dog tracking even if admissible, is not ordinarily of much weight. In Surinder Pal Jain v Delhi Admn ,[1] a two judge Bench expressed the opinion that the pointing out by the dogs could as well lead to a misguided suspicion that the accused had committed the crime, so their Lordships sidelined that item of evidence from consideration.'

Criminal courts need not bother much about the evidence based on sniffer dogs due to the inherent frailties adumbrated above although the investigating agency may employ such sniffer dogs for helping the investigation to track down criminals.

Investigating exercise can afford to make attempts or forays with the help of canine faculties but judicial exercise can ill afford them.[2] In the undermentioned case, the prosecution case was that the accused killed the deceased by sharp edged weapon. The dog tracking evidence adduced by the prosecution was not relied on for the following reasons:-

(i) It was not established that the pair of tyre chappals which was found near the dead body of deceased either belonged to the accused or it was used by the accused.
(ii) After taking smell of the pair of chappals, the dog pointed out the blood stained shirt, pyjama and sickle. However, no evidence was collected by the investigating officer to establish that clothes or the sickle either belonged to the accused or they were used by the accused.
(iii) After taking smell of the shirt, pyjama and sickle, the dog pointed out the house of the accused. It came in the evidence of PW5 (Dog Handler) that whenever the trained dog recognizes the culprit, it would raise its front legs and place the same on the chest of the culprit and/or start barking. However, nothing of this sort happened in the present case though there was evidence suggesting that the accused was present near the house.
(iv) The house pointed out by the dog was not in exclusive occupation of the accused.[3]

73. Voice Identification

Indubitably, requiring the accused to lend his voice sample for the limited purpose of identification of his voice so as to compare the same with the tape-recorded telephonic conversation, is not requiring him to impart knowledge in respect of relevant facts, by means of oral statements or statements in writing of his personal knowledge of the facts to be communicated to a court or to a person holding an enquiry or investigation, thus, it is not violative of art 20(3) of the Constitution .[4]2339

74. Identification of Stolen Property

The identification of stolen articles by owners or the persons who have the opportunity to see them very often, cannot be discarded merely on the ground that no special identification marks were present on the said ornaments. It is so because such person can identify the articles by feel, touch or various points of difference distinguishing one thing from the other of the same kind, though they may not be able to formulate the reasons, as such identification is based on untranslatable impressions of their minds.[5]

The two accused appellants and one more accused (convicted), were alleged to have committed the murder of the deceased couple. The articles viz. mangalsutra, ring and chain recovered from the possession of the accused were of common use and are easily available. No TI parade in respect of the recovered articles was held. Material witnesses examined by the prosecution had not supported the prosecution case against the two appellants. Their acquittal recorded by the High Court was not disturbed.[6]

(IX) POLICE INVESTIGATION

75. Duty of Investigating Officer

The Investigating Officer (IO) has to workup a theory on the clues available but if he finds that there is material which shakes that theory, he must not be adamant to present a pre-conceived theory before the Court. The IO must keep his mind open to collect and verify the facts in a straight forward manner.[7] Non-action on the part of IO reflects upon the nature and manner of the investigation. When the IO deliberately made no efforts to know the genesis and origin of the occurrence, the investigation is far from fair and honest.[8] But the more fact that the Investigating Officer committed irregularity or illegality during the course of the investigation would not and does not cast doubt on the prosecution case nor trustworthy and reliable evidence can be cast aside to record acquittal on that account.[9] Failure of IO to note crime number in some documents during investigation cannot be a ground to disbelieve his evidence.[10]

76. Defective Investigation--Effect

It is true that in case the Court, on perusal, finds that statements of eyewitnesses are truthful and are reliable and trustworthy, then, ignoring the lapses of investigating officer in not complying with such safeguards, as are provided in th CrPC with regard to recording of substance of FIR in daily diary, sending of the special report promptly to the Metropolitan Magistrate and recording of brief facts containing the names of the accused and eyewitnesses in the inquest proceedings, could be2340 ignored.[11] In the case of a defective investigation, the Court has to be circumspect in evaluating the evidence. But it would not be right in acquitting an accused person solely on account of the defect; to do so would tantamount to playing into the hands of the IO if the investigation is designedly defective.[12] The defective investigation would not, therefore, deter the Court from convicting the accused if the courts finds that dehors the defects the accused can still be convicted on the basis of the evidence on record.[13] As was observed in Ram Bihari Yadav v State of Bihar and others ,[14] if primacy is given to such designed or negligent investigation, to the omission or lapses by perfunctory investigation or omissions, the faith and confidence of the people would be shaken not only in the law enforcing agency but also in the administration of justice. The view was again reiterated in Amar Singh v Balwinder Singh and others. [15] As noted in this case,[16] it would have been certainly better if the firearms were sent to the forensic test laboratory for comparison. But the report of the ballistic expert would merely be in the nature of an expert opinion without any conclusiveness attached to it. When the direct testimony of the eye-witnesses corroborated by the medical evidence fully establishes the prosecution version, failure or omission or negligence on the part of the IO cannot affect credibility of the prosecution version.[17] Experience shows that for reasons unknown, the police invariably commit lapses in not complying with the relevant provisions of law meticulously in every case. When such lapses occur in a particular case, the Court is to be on guard to examine the occular evidence, with more care in order to determine whether such ocular evidence is fully reliable and can be given credence despite such lapses on the part of the investigating agency. Where, the ocular evidence is of a shaky nature and a lingering doubt comes to mind about such eyewitness, where, eyewitness having not actually witnessed the occurrence, these lapses committed by the investigating officer assume significance and the benefit of doubt has to be given in such a case to the accused.[18]

77. Delay in Recording Statement of Witness under Section 161 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973[19]

It depends on the facts and circumstances of each case to find if testimony of a witness is credible inspite of delay in case diary statement under s 161, CrPC .[20] In2341*Sunil Kumar v State of Madhya Pradesh* ,[21] there was delay of one and a half months in recording the case diary statement of a witness who was the mother of the victim and who had reached there at once. The Supreme Court found that there was ample evidence that the mother had reached the spot, and regarding delay in the case diary statement the Court observed that such delay in every case does not lead to disbelieving such witness. If the witness's presence is natural, the dereliction of duty by the police in not recording the case diary statement in time will not adversely affect the reliability of such witness.

Another case worth citing is State of Uttar Pradesh v Sikander Ali. [22] In this case, one witness who was the father of the victim was examined by the police 24 days after the incident. The investigating officer explained that delay was due to a law and order problem. The Supreme Court held that the statement of such witness cannot be discarded on account of such delay. The non-explanation by the prosecution as to why the eyewitness had not been examined shortly after the incident and for inordinate delay in examining them, is no ground to discard the convincing and reliable evidence adduced in the case.[23] However, whether the investigating officer met the witness for the first time about 3-4 months after the incident and the statement of the witness was recorded after extreme delay, for which no explanation was available on record, the statement of the witness becomes incredible.[24]

78. Statement made to Police before the Start of Investigation is Admissible and not Hit by Section 162 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

It is settled position in law that the prohibition contained in s 162, CrPC, extends to

(1) all statements:

(a) the statement need not be a confession, it applies equally to all statements, confessional or otherwise;
(b) the statement need not be reduced into writing; it applies equally to all statements whether reduced into writing or not;

(2) by whomsoever made:

(a) the prohibition applies equally to statements made by any person, whether accused or not;
(b) the person making the statement need not be in police custody while making the statement; but:

(i) the statement must be made to a police officer; and
(ii) must be made in the course of an investigation under ch 12, CrPC .

It will thus be seen that for being excluded from using the statement made to a police official it must be made in the course of investigation under ch 12, CrPC . A constable or an official of the Rajasthan Armed Constabulary is not invested with any powers of investigation as contemplated by ch 12, CrPC and, therefore, there is no question of the statement being made to any of them being excluded from use by2342 recourse to the provisions of s 162, CrPC . Assuming that an official of the Rajasthan Armed Constabulary is police as contended by learned counsel relying on several rules contained in the Rajasthan Police Subordinate Service Rules 1989, in order that it could be so excluded it must be in the course of investigation under ch 12 of the CrPC .[25] The statement of the deceased, i.e., dying declaration recorded by the investigating officer before the start of investigation of the case can be treated as a dying declaration and the plea of the accused that it should be treated as an FIR cannot be accepted.[26]

All statements made to the police before commencement of investigation are admissible in evidence, and investigation does not necessarily commence immediately after the FIR is recorded.[27] When the IO had only received the FIR at the shop of the witness and had not even visited the site before he recorded the statements 'C' to 'D', and therefore the portion 'C' to 'D' is the part of the FIR not hit by s 162, CrPC .[28]

79. Delay in forwarding Report to Magistrate--Effect

On receiving first information of a cognizable offence an officer incharge of a police station is required under s 157(1), CrPC, to forthwith send a report of the same to a magistrate empowered to take cognizance of such offence upon a police report. The report is to be submitted in the manner provided under s 158, CrPC . But delay in dispatch of FIR to the Magistrate in itself is not sufficient to throw out the prosecution case in its entirety.[29] It is not that as if every delay in sending the delayed special report to the District Magistrate would necessarily lead to the inference that the FIR has not been lodged at the time stated or has been ante-timed or ante-dated or that the investigation is not fair and forthright.[30] But when such delay is coupled with the suspicion or other infirmities attaching to the recording of FIR, or the conduct of the investigation thereafter, it affects adversely the case of the prosecution.[31] So, when there is inordinate delay of about three days in lodging FIR and also delay of about four days in sending FIR to the Magistrate in a murder case coupled with other circumstances, the accused cannot be convicted.[32]

In several cases the Supreme Court has emphasised the importance of prompt dispatch of FIR from police-station to the Judicial Magistrate and also to the superintendent of police of the district.[33] But, such a delay in dispatch of FIR to the Magistrate cannot be so detrimental as to dislodge the case of the prosecution on2343 this ground alone if otherwise it is worth placing reliance.[34] Mere fact that the copy of FIR was received by the concerned magistrate three days after the incidence does not lead to the conclusion that FIR was not lodged on the same date or it was ante-dated.[35] But, non-proving of FIR and record to show that the copy of FIR was dispatched to the jurisdiction magistrate in compliance with s 167, CrPC, points out a few likely holes left unplugged by the prosecution.[36] The explanation by the prosecution that delay in sending FIR to magistrate occurred as those two days were holidays is not acceptable, as FIR should reach the concerned Magistrate without any undue delay.[37] If the delay is reasonably explained no adverse inference can be drawn but failure to explain the delay would require the court to minutely examine the prosecution version for assuring itself that no innocent person has been implicated in the crime. Investing upon the accused to seek an explanation of the delay in sending copy of FIR to the Magistrate is not the requirement of law. It is always for the prosecution to explain such a delay and if reasonable, plausible and sufficient explanation is tendered, no adverse inference can be drawn against it.[38] The expression 'forthwith' used in s 157(1), CrPC, obviously cannot mean that the prosecution is required to explain every hours delay in sending the FIR to the Magistrate, of course, the same has to be sent with reasonable dispatch, which would obviously mean within a reasonable, possible time in the circumstances prevailing.[39]

Copy of the FIR mandated under s 157, CrPC was not forwarded to the concerned Magistrate. There were material contradictions in the statement of the prosecution witness. Recovery of offence weapon was found doubtful. Conviction of the accused appellants under ss 148 and 302, IPC recorded by courts below was set aside.[40]

80. Shortcomings in Site-Plan prepared by the Investigating Officer

The Investigating Officer, who generally himself is not an eyewitness of the occurrence, prepares the site-plan. He has no personal knowledge regarding the place from where the witness has seen the occurrence or from where the accused has assaulted the deceased. He can make the entries in the site plan what he himself had seen and observed and that will be the direct and substantive piece of evidence being based on his personal knowledge; but as he has not himself seen the incident, therefore, he could have mentioned the place from where the witnesses had seen the occurrence only after ascertaining the same from the eyewitnesses, which is not admissible in evidence being hit by s 162, CrPC .[41]

In Jagdish Narain v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[42] site plan was prepared by the investigating officer who failed to indicate in the site plan the spot wherefrom the shots were allegedly fired by the appellants. While considering the effect of failure of the Investigating Officer to indicate the spot, the Supreme Court held:[43]2344

> While preparing a site plan an investigating police officer can certainly record what he sees and observes, for that will be direct and substantive evidence being based on his personal knowledge; but as he was not obviously present when the incident took place, he has to derive knowledge as to when, where and how it happened from persons who had seen the incident. When a witness testifies about what he heard from somebody else it is ordinarily not admissible in evidence being hearsay, but if the person from whom he heard is examined to give direct evidence within the meaning of s 60 of the Evidence Act, the former's evidence would be admissible to corroborate the latter in accordance with s 157, CrPC . However, such a statement made to a police officer, when he is investigating into an offence in accordance, with Chapter 12 of the Code of Criminal Procedure cannot be > used to even corroborate the maker thereof in view of the embargo in section 162(1) , CrPC, appearing in that chapter and can be used only to contradict him (the maker) in accordance with the proviso thereof, except in those cases where sub-section (2) of the section applies. That necessarily means that if in the site plan PW 6 had even shown the place from which the shots were allegedly fired after ascertaining the same from the eyewitnesses it could not have been admitted in evidence being hit by section 162 , CrPC .

In this view of the matter, the failure on the part of the investigating officer to point-out the place in the site plan from where the eyewitnesses had seen the occurrence, is not and it cannot be read in evidence being hit by s 162, CrPC .[44]

Omission of Crime Number in Site Plan

Where the crime number is not mentioned in the site plan, that by itself, does not create any doubt as to the truthfulness of the prosecution story for the reason that it is only one site plan in respect of crime in question which has been prepared.[45]

Omission of Crime Number in Inquest Report

Mere non-mentioning of crime number in the inquest report does not create any doubt as to the preparation of inquest report where the doctor who conducted autopsy on the dead body of the deceased stated that he received the dead body in sealed condition.[46]

Site Plan--Existence/Absence of Blood

It is often argued by the Counsel for the accused that in the site plan or in the observation panchnama no place where blood was found has been shown. The Supreme Court opined that the existence of blood or absence thereof would not, by itself, be such a fact as would completely wipe out the evidence of eye-witnesses.[47]

81. If Court can examine Case Diaries and Statement under Section 161 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, in favour of Accused

The Courts can certainly look at the case diary as contemplated under s 172(2) of the CrPC, to determine the veracity of the investigation and to aid the Court in such inquiry. However, such diaries cannot be used as evidence.[48]2345

The provisions embodied in sub-s (3) of s 172 of the CrPC cannot be characterised as unreasonable or arbitrary. Under sub-s (2) of s 172, CrPC, the Court itself has the unfettered power to examine the entries in the diaries. This is a very important safeguard. The Legislature has reposed complete trust in the Court which is conducting the inquiry or the trial. It has empowered the Court to call for any such relevant case diary if there is any inconsistency or contradiction arising in the context of the case diary the court can use the entries for the purpose of contradicting the police officer as provided in sub-s (3) of s 172 of the CrPC . Ultimately, there can be no better custodian or guardian of the interest of justice than the Court trying the case. No court will deny to itself the power to make use of the entries in the diary to the advantage of the accused by contradicting the police officer with reference to the contents of the diaries.[49]

The public interest requirement from the stand point of the need to ensure a fair trial for an accused is more than sufficiently met by the power conferred on the Court, which is the ultimate custodian of the interest of justice and can always be trusted to be vigilant to ensure that the interest of accused persons standing the trial, is fully safeguarded.[50]

This proposition of law will equally apply to the statements made to the police officer in the course of investigation under s 161 of the CrPC under s 162(1) of the CrPC there is a bar to the statement made by any person to a police officer to be used for any purpose and the same is provided under s 145 of the Indian Evidence Act .[51]

However, the bar under s 162 shall not apply to the statements falling under s 32(1) of the Evidence Act or for a discovery of fact as required under s 27 of the Evidence Act . If certain admissions were made to the police officer by a witness in the course of investigation and if such admissions or contradiction were not elicited in evidence, it is always open to the Court to look at the case diary to find out contradictions not elicited in evidence. If such contradictions are in favour of the accused, it can be looked into, to aid the Court in favour of the accused. If the Court can look at a confession of the accused there does not seem to be any inhibition for looking at the statement of the witnesses recorded under s 161, CrPC, in favour of the accused. There is nothing wrong in this procedure, otherwise the power under s 172(2) of CrPC, could become as empty formality.[52] But a somewhat contrary view is taken by the Apex Court which was confronted with the question that if the public prosecution failed to get the contradiction explained as permitted by the 1st limb of the proviso to s 162(1), CrPC, is it permissible for the Court to invoke the powers under s 172, CrPC, for explaining such contradiction After referring to sub-s 172, CrPC, the Supreme Court explained as follows:

> A reading of the said sub-sections makes the position clear that the discretion given to the court to use such diaries is only for aiding the court to decide on a point. It is made abundantly clear in sub-section (2) itself that the court is forbidden from using the entries of such diaries as evidence. What cannot be used as evidence against the accused cannot be used in any other manner against him. If the court uses the entries in a case diary for contradicting a police officer it should be done only in the manner provided in section 145 of the Evidence Act ie, by giving the author of the statement an opportunity2346 to explain the contradiction after his attention is called to that part of the statement which is intended to be so used for contradiction. In other words, the power conferred on the court for perusal of the diary under section 172 of the Code is not intended for explaining a contradiction which the defence has winched to the fore through the channel permitted by law. The interdict contained in section 162 of the Code, debars the court from using the power under section 172 of the Code for the purpose of explaining the contradiction.[53]

82. Conclusion of Investigation and Proceedings in Court thereafter

The result of investigation under ch 12 of the CrPC is a conclusion that an investigating officer draws on the basis of materials collected during investigation and such conclusion can only form the basis of a competent court to take cognizance during investigation are to be translated into legal evidence, the trial court is then required to base its conclusion solely on the evidence adduced during the trial, and it cannot rely on the investigation or the result thereof.[54] If the result of investigation was to be made the basis of a court's verdict regarding guilt or innocence of an accused, there would be no need of a trial in a police case for relying on the report submitted under s 173(2), CrPC . A court would be entitled to decide the fate of the person arrainged, such a course is not legally permissible.[55]

83. Inquest Report

The proceedings under s 174, CrPC, have a limited scope. The object of the proceedings thereunder is merely to ascertain whether a person has died under suspicious circumstances or an unnatural death and if so, what is the apparent cause of death[56] and nature of injuries and the possible weapon used in causing those injuries.[57] The question regarding the details as to how the deceased was assaulted or who assaulted him or under what circumstances he was assaulted, is foreign to the ambit of the scope of proceedings under s 174, CrPC . Neither in practice nor in law is it necessary for the police to mention these details in the inquest report.[58] It is neither incumbent upon the police officer who prepared the inquest report to mention the names of the assailant, nor it is necessary for the eyewitnesses,[59] who are witnesses to the said inquest to insist upon the mention of the names of the assailants in the inquest report nor it is possible to draw any inference against the prosecution that the names of the assailants were not known merely because they are not mentioned in the inquest report.[60] The non-mentioning of the names of the assailants in the inquest report or in the requisition memo, cannot be said to be fatal to the2347 prosecution case.[61] When there was no column in inquest-report about the names of the assailants, there was no occasion for anyone to mention the names of assailants in it.[62]

The evidence of eyewitnesses cannot be discussed on erroneous interpretation of s 174, CrPC, to disbelieve the prosecution story.[63] The Court is not justified in treating the statement allegedly made by the witness during inquest proceeding as substantive evidence in view of embargo of s 162, CrPC . It is equally unjustified when it placed reliance upon the FIR informer who could not be examined during trials as the FIR could only be used for the purpose of corroborating and contradicting the person who lodges it and under no circumstances can it be used as substantive evidence, and the accused is entitled to the benefit of doubt in such cases.[64] The Supreme Court has consistently held that inquest report cannot be treated as substantive evidence but may be utilised for contradicting the witness of inquest.[65] Statements contained in an inquest report, to the extent they relate to what the Investigating Officer saw and found are admissible but any statement made thereon on the basis of what he heard from others, would be hit by s 162, CrPC .[66] If on reading of inquest report it is clear that the names of the assailants are not mentioned and nevertheless, the FIR gives all the names of the assailants, then it would lead to an indication that FIR might have been registered after the inquest report.[67] In some cases,[68] it has been held that even not giving the names of the accused or of the eyewitnesses in the brief facts which are sent alongwith the inquest papers also would sometime result in doubting the prosecution version.[69] Where the entire inquest report was in one ink while the name of the informant in the inquest report was by a different ink, which created a suspicion that when the inquest report was prepared, the FIR had not come into existence, and it had not been decided as to who would be made the first informant. It was later that the name of the informant was inserted in the inquest report. This gives rise to a great deal of doubt as to whether the FIR was lodged by the person named therein, and at that time, because in that event the name of the informant would have been written at the time when the remaining contents of the inquest report were written.[70]2348

(X) DYING DECLARATION OF VICTIM

84. Dying Declaration--Scope

The statement made by the deceased before his death as to the cause of his death or as to any of the circumstances of the transaction which resulted in his death is known as dying declaration. Such statement is relevant under s 32 of the Indian Evidence Act in a case in which the cause of that person's death is relevant. Section 32 is an exception to the rule of hearsay.[71] A magistrate should preferably record the dying declaration in question and answer form.[72] But when the dying person is in severe bodily pain owing to stab injuries in abdomen and words were scarce, his natural impulse would be to tell the Magistrate without wasting his breath on details as to who had stabbed him. The recording of such brief dying declaration is natural and reliable.[73] The dying declaration must not necessarily be made before the Magistrate[74] but when it is not recorded by a magistrate, it has to be scrutinised closely.[75] The dying declaration recorded by a police officer in the light of facts and circumstances of the case may lead to conviction of the accused.[76] But recording of dying declaration by the investigating officer during the course of investigation should not be encouraged.[77] Recording of dying declaration by an executive magistrate though not in question-answer form[78] or by the doctor or[79]in the injury report by the doctor[80] is admissible in evidence. Although it is preferable to have the dying declaration in question-answer form, such requirement is not absolute. A dying declaration if otherwise reliable and trustworthy need not be discarded merely on the ground that it is not recorded in question-answer form.[81]

Eyewitness Accounts Stand on Higher Footing to Dying Declaration

The dying declarations can not be put at the same pedestal as direct account or eye witness account of the incident. If the two are to be compared, the eye witness account must stand on a higher footing.[82]

Fit Mental State of Declarant--Necessity of Acceptability of a dying declaration is greater because the declaration is made in extremity. When the party is on the verge of death, one rarely finds any motive to tell falsehood and it is for this reason that the requirements of oath and cross-examination are dispensed with in case of a dying declaration. Since the accused has2349 no power of cross-examination, the Court would insist that the dying declaration should be of such a nature as to inspire full confidence of the Court in its truthfulness and correctness. The Court should ensure that the statement was not as a result of tutoring or prompting or a product of imagination. It is for the Court to ascertain from the evidence placed on record that the deceased was in a fit state of mind and had ample opportunity to observe and identify the culprit.[83]

85. Evidentiary Value of Dying Declaration

The earlier view was that it is not safe to convict an accused person on the evidence furnished by a dying declaration without further corroboration because such a statement is not on oath and is not subject to cross-examination and because the maker of it might be mentally and physically in a state of confusion.[84] However, subsequently, in a landmark judgment Khushal Rao v State of Bombay ,[85] the earlier view was reversed and the following propositions of law have been made:

> On a review of the relevant provisions of the Evidence Act and of the decided cases in the different High Courts in india and in this Court, we have come to the conclusion, in agreement with the opinion of the Full Bench of the Madras High Court, aforesaid, (1) that it cannot be laid down as an absolute rule of law that dying declaration cannot form the sole basis of conviction unless it is corroborated; (2) that each case must be determined on its own facts keeping in view the circumstances in which the dying declaration was made; (3) that it cannot be laid down as a general proposition that a dying declaration is a weaker kind of evidence than other pieces of evidence; (4) that a dying declaration stands on the same footing as another piece of evidence and has to be judged in the light of surrounding circumstances and with reference to the principles governing the weighing of evidence; (5) that a dying declaration which has been recorded by a competent magistrate in the proper manner, that is to say, in the form of questions and answers, and, as far as practicable, in the words of the maker of the declaration, stands on a much higher footing than a dying declaration which depends upon oral testimony which may suffer from all the infirmities of human memory and human character, and (6) that in order to test the reliability of a dying declaration, the court has to keep in view, the circumstances like the opportunity of the dying man for observation, for example, whether there was sifficient light if the crime was committed at night; whether the capacity of the man to remember the facts stated, had not been impaired at the time he was making the statement, by circumstances beyond his control; that the statement has been consistent throughout if he had several opportunities of making a dying declaration apart from the official record of it; and that the statement had been made at the earliest opportunity and was not the result of tutoring by interested parties.

Death after Few Days--Dying Declaration not Discarded

Dying declaration which is recorded in expectation of death, need not be discarded only because death took place after a few days. In the instant case, death of the deceased old woman took place 25 days after the incident. Dying declaration was not discarded. Conviction under s 302, IPC was affirmed.[86]2350

86. Dying Declaration of Burnt Person--Conduct of Accused in Extinguishing Fire

In case the burnt wife gives dying declaration implicating her husband, the fact that the accused tried to extinguish the fire on the person of the deceased may be on the account of two reasons, one reasons may be that the accused is really innocent and he is trying to save the life of that person by extinguishing the fire. Another reason may be that the accused had become immediately repentant and to control the damage that had been caused by his act in setting fire to that person. To put it plainly, such conduct could be the conduct of an innocent person or a repentant person. If a person after having set fire to another person, realises immediately the magnitude of the damage caused by him to the life of that person and out of repentance immediately tries to control that damage, it could not be the conduct of an innocent person but it could be the conduct of a repentant person.[87]When there were strained relations between the deceased burnt wife and the accused husband and she made a voluntary reliable dying declaration to neighbours implicating her husband in the act of setting her on fire, the subsequent conduct of the accused in extinguishing the fire was not the conduct of an innocent man, rather it was the conduct of a person who was trying to control the damage caused by him, so the conviction of the accused was upheld.[88] But in State of Assam v Mafizuddin Ahmed ,[89] the Apex Court disbelieved the dying declaration on the ground of certain circumstances which also included that the accused in that case covered the burning body of the deceased with a quilt and tried to extinguish the fire. In State of Gujarat v Mohanbhai

Ragubhai Patel ,[90] the Supreme Court held that burning of the woman by accused is doubtful because of conduct of accused in throwing mattress over the deceased and also because of absence of motive in that case, the attempt of accused to extinguish fire on body of deceased was considered one of the grounds to disbelieve the dying declaration. But later in Kumbhar Dhirajlal Mohanlal v State of Gujarat ,[91] the Supreme Court took a somewhat contrary view and assumed that the accused sustained the injuries while extinguishing the fire still it would not lead to the inference that the fire was accidental for the dying declaration itself indicated that the accused received those injuries after he had set her on fire. The observations of the High Court that a shrewd person may adopt these tactics; first setting his wife on fire then make an effort to extinguish the fire and thereafter remain by her side were approved. The fact that the accused recorded injuries in the hand and other portions of the body which were also indicated by the doctor that it was likely that the injuries on the person of the accused were caused while gripping the deceased when she was trying to escape from the flames on her person. The conduct of the accused after the incident that he has not been either in the hospital or even cared to see the deceased showed that he was trying to keep himself away. The dying declaration of the deceased was also found truthful so the conviction of the accused was upheld.[92] The accused husband made no attempt to put out the fire and save the deceased wife, the dying declaration by the wife showed that he killed her by setting her on fire. The accused was found guilty of2351 murdering his wife.[93] Where, in four dying declarations to different persons, the allegation was that the death of the wife was due to setting her on fire by the husband, the plea of the husband/accused that he is innocent and attempted to save her and got injured in the process was found without merit as the doctor opined that location and nature of injuries found on the body of the accused were not consistent with the claim that he had tried to extinguish the fire but on the other hand had tried to hold her to prevent her from going out of the room.[94] Similarly, in a death by burns case, the deceased wife gave dying declaration which was trustworthy and reliable, the accused sustained injuries not while extinguishing fire but in the process of setting the deceased on fire, the conviction of the accused husband was found proper.[95]

87. More than One Dying Declaration

When two or more dying declarations are recorded and they corroborate with each other they on being proved can be acted upon but when two or more dying declarations are contradictory to each other, it is not safe to act upon them. In a bride burning case, there were few dying declarations made by the deceased revealing glaring inconsistencies vis-à-vis naming the culprit, one of the dying declarations indicated the incident as an accident, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC, based upon one of the dying declarations implicating the accused was set aside by the Supreme Court.[96] When there is more than one dying declaration genuinely recorded, they must be tested on the touchstone of consistency and probabilities.[97] In another bride burning case, the two dying declarations gave contrary versions. One dying declaration duly recorded by a doctor showed that the victim was burnt by her mother-in-law and husband while the second dying declaration recorded by a person attested by sarpanch indicated that the deceased committed suicide which was introduced by the police inspector in his cross-examination and was not proved by a competent witness was discarded and placing reliance on the first dying declaration recorded by the doctor, the conviction of the accused under ss 302, 34, IPC, was sustained.[98] In a bride burning case, as the two dying declarations were inconsistent, the accused mother-in-law was given the benefit of doubt and was acquitted of charge under s 302, IPC .[99] In another case, a dying declaration was recorded by the doctor that the deceased was set on fire by her husband, the second dying declaration was recorded by a police constable and was also attested by a doctor. The third dying declaration was duly recorded by an executive magistrate with endorsement by doctor that the patient was fit to give statement, observing that it was immaterial that the third dying declaration was not recorded in question-answer form and there was2352 no infirmity in any of the dying declarations, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC, was upheld by the Apex Court.[1]

The prosecution evidence was that the accused appellant hit the deceased and the eye-witness by a wooden bat and pushed them into bushes. It could not be stated that the accused appellant intended to cause the death of the deceased. However, knowledge could be imputed to him that his action was likely to cause the death of the deceased. The conviction of the appellant under s 302, IPC was altered into one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[2]

Where the first dying declaration was recorded by the doctor and another by a police officer and thereafter the deceased succumbed to burn injuries, the evidence of witness attesting first dying declaration showed that the deceased was in a fit condition to give a statement, both dying declarations stated that the accused himself caused burn injuries to his accused wife and so corroborated with each other, no relatives of the deceased were present at the time of recording of the dying declaration, no one could think of tutoring her to give false statement so as to implicate the accused; no domestic lady having children and living with her husband will falsely implicate her husband unless there is a strong motive which was not proved, the dying declaration was therefore admissible.[3] First dying declaration recorded by police immediately after incident was found not reliable as it was recorded in the presence of mother-in-law under pressure. Second dying declaration recorded by Magistrate which showed the complicity of her husband, in-laws was found more probable. Conviction of the accused appellants under ss 302 / 34, IPC was affirmed.[4] When there is no contradiction between the two dying declarations of one deceased[5] or three dying declarations[6] of another deceased implicating the accused, the conviction of the accused was found proper. Same is the legal position when two out of three dying declarations are not contradictory.[7] But when all three dying declarations did not inspire confidence and the other evidence was also not creditworthy the accused is entitled to acquittal.[8] When two dying declarations are inconsistent, much importance need not be given to them.[9] But when two of the four dying declarations are reliable, they can be acted upon.[10] The Court cannot sideline2353 noticeable discrepancy looming large as between the two different dying declarations made by the same person. When the sphere of scrutiny of dying declaration is a restricted area, the Court cannot afford to sideline such a material divergence relating to the very occasion of the crime in either context, spoken to one was wrong, or that, in the other was wrong. Both could be reconciled with each other only with much strain as it relates to the opportunity for the culprit to commit the offence. Adopting such a strain to the detriment of the accused in a criminal case is not a feasible course.[11]

The deceased was said to have made two dying declarations. The second dying declaration made by the deceased introduced a new case and involved new accused persons and new witnesses. The first dying declaration was recorded by ASI at the police station. Both the dying declarations were discarded. Conviction of the appellant under s 302, IPC was found improper, and as such, was set aside.[12]

88. Principles Governing Dying Declaration

In Paniben v State of Gujarat ,[13] the Supreme Court laid down the principles governing dying declaration which could be summed up as under:[14]

(i) There is neither rule of law nor of prudence that dying declaration cannot be acted upon without corroboration.[15]

(ii) If the Court is satisfied that the dying declaration is true and voluntary it can base the conviction on it, without corroboration.[16]

(iii) This court has to scrutinise the dying declaration carefully and must ensure that the declaration is not the result of tutoring, prompting or imagination. The deceased had opportunity to observe and identify the assailant and was in a fit state to make the declaration.[17]

(iv) Where dying declaration is suspicious it should not be acted upon without corroborative evidence.[18]

(v) Where the deceased was unconscious and could never make any dying declaration the evidence with regard to it is to be rejected.[19]

(vi) A dying declaration which suffers from infirmity cannot form the basis of conviction.[20]

(vii) Merely because a dying declaration does not contain the details as to the occurrence it is not to be rejected.[21]2354

(viii) Equally, merely because it is a brief statement, it is not to be discarded. On the contrary, the shortness of the statement itself guarantees truth.[22]

(ix) Normally, the Court in order to satisfy itself whether deceased was in a fit mental condition to make the dying declaration, seeks medical opinion. But where the eyewitness has said that the deceased was in a fit and conscious state to make his dying declaration, the medical opinion cannot prevail.[23]

(x) Where the prosecution version differs from the version as given in the dying declaration the said declaration cannot be acted upon.[24]

(xi) The deceased told the doctors attending her in the hospital that she did not know as to who set her on fire. Accused appellants were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[25]

Long Delay between the Time of Dying Declaration and the Death of the Deceased

There is no merit in the contention that the deceased died long after making the dying declaration and therefore, the dying declaration has no value. Such a dying declaration does not lose its value if the person lives for a longer time than expected. However, the question has to be considered in each case on the facts and circumstances established therein.[26]

Lengthy Dying Declaration Discarded

The dying declaration showed that the deceased was not in a position to speak and see and in such state of mind, it was highly doubtful and unbelievable that the deceased had written a lengthy statement running into more than 3 pages containing various details by sign and gestures. The contents of the dying declaration were shrouded by doubts and suspicion and the entire evidence suggested that the dying declaration did not reveal the entire truth. The appellants were held entitled to benefit of doubt and their conviction under s 302, IPC was set aside.[27]

Circumstances of Transaction which resulted in His Death

The collocation of the words in s 32(1) of the Evidence Act, 'circumstances of the transaction which resulted in his death' is apparently of wider amplitude than saying 'circumstance which caused his death'. There need not necessarily be a direct nexus between 'circumstances' and death. It is enough if the words spoken by the deceased have reference to any circumstance which has connection with any of the transactions which ended up in the death of the deceased. Such statement would also fall within the purview of s 32(1) of the Evidence Act . In other words, it is not necessary that such circumstance should be proximate, for, even distant circumstance can also become admissible under the sub-section, provided it has nexus with the transaction which resulted in the death.[28] The test of proximity cannot be too literally2355 construed and practically reduced to a cut and dried formula of universal application so as to be confined in a strait-jacket. Distance of time would depend or vary with the circumstances of each case. For instance, where death is a logical culmination of a continuous drama long in process and is, as it were, a finale of the story, the statement regarding each step directly connected with the end of the drama would be admissible because the entire statement would have to be read as an organic whole and not torn from the context. Sometimes statements relevant to or furnishing an immediate motive may also be admissible as being a part of the transaction of death.[29]

Bride Burning--Dying Declaration of Deceased

Where in a bride burning case, the dying declaration made by the deceased before the Executive Magistrate and police was found voluntary, conviction of the appellant accused under s 302, IPC was held proper.[30]

89. Tests to know the Truthfulness of Dying Declaration

The truthfulness of a dying declaration has to be tested with reference to the circumstances and other relevant facts of each case.[31] By and large, inter alia, the following tests can be devised in order to answer the question whether dying declaration is true:

(i) whether the declarant had sufficient opportunity to observe and identify his assailant;

(ii) whether the capacity of the declarant to remember the facts stated, had not been impaired at the time he was making the statement by circumstances beyond his control either due to nature of the injuries or for any other cause;
(iii) whether the statement has been consistent throughout if the declarant had several opportunity of making a dying declaration apart from the official record of it;
(iv) whether the statement had been made at the earliest opportunity and was not the result of the tutoring by interested parties;
(v) whether the statement made by the declarant is intrinsically sound and in accord with probabilities;
(vi) whether any material part of the statement is proved to be false by other reliable evidence.[32]

90. Person Making Dying Declaration Surviving

Where a witness survives after making dying declaration, his statement cannot be admitted as dying declaration but as it is a statement made shortly after the2356 occurence, at the earliest opportunity and is so connected with the fact in issue as to form part of the same transaction, it is relevant and admissible as *res gestae*under s 6 of the Evidence Act .[33] A magistrate is legally competent to record a dying declaration 'in the course of investigation' as provided in ch 12 of the CrPC . The contours provided in s 164(1), CrPC, would cover such a statement.[34] However, such a statement, so long as its maker remains alive, cannot be used as substantive evidence. Its use is limited to corroboration or contradiction of testimony of its maker.[35]

91. Dying Declaration is useless when Accused has right of Private Defence

Although dying declaration is a very strong piece of evidence and conviction of accused on its basis even on its corroboration is not illegal but in the face of right of private defence of the accused this piece of evidence looses its significance. Thus in a case before the Supreme Court, though the dying declaration held the accused to be the sole author of the fatal injury but it was held that this by itself was not a corroborative factor to establish the murder charge in view of the plea of private defence taken by the accused and so the accused was acquitted.[36]

92. Importance of Certificate showing Deceased Medically Fit to make Statement

It is an essential requirement and one on which there could be no matter of compromise that the condition of the patient at the time when the dying declaration was made has to be assessed by the doctor concerned and certified on the document at that very point of time. The courts can never accept a situation whereby this very vital requirement is bypassed and the prosecution attempts to get over the infirmity by examining the doctor at a much later point of time in order to try and cover up the lacuna. It is a well accepted position in law that where the condition of a patient is so serious, the doctor must certify the consciousness levels. There can be no dispute about the fact that the patient in such cases is undergoing a lot of physical pain that the mental condition of the patient is also not very certain having regard to the nature of the injuries and the consequences thereof, but what is most important is that the courts have always taken note of the fact that as soon as a seriously injured person is brought to the hospital, the formal treatment is commenced, the most important of which is the administration of tranquilisers and pain-killers for the purposes of controlling the trauma and reducing the pain. It is a medically accepted fact that these drugs have attendant side effects, the most important of which is drowsinsess and it is for this reason that the courts insist that the doctor has to certify that the patient was not only conscious but is also in a position to speak and was in a mentally fit condition to make a statement.[37] When deceased died within 15 minutes of recording the statement, the doctor had not certified that she was in her full senses and was medically fit to make a statement although, he had certified that she was conscious,2357 having regard to the fact that the deceased had sustained extensive burn injuries and died within 15 minutes of recording her statement her dying declaration recorded by the doctor cannot be relied upon and conviction of the accused based upon it is not proper.[38] In the absence of certificate of the doctor that the victim was in a fit state of mind to make the statement, i.e., dying declaration, the dying declaration recorded cannot be relied upon to convict the accused.[39]

Where it is proved by the testimony of the Magistrate that the declarant was fit to make the statement without there being the doctor's opinion to that effect, it can be acted upon provided the Court ultimately holds the same to be voluntary and truthful. A certificate by the doctor is essentially a rule of caution and, therefore, the voluntary and truthful nature of a statement can be established otherwise.[40]

93. Suspicion and Proof

It must be recalled that the well established rule of criminal justice is that 'fouler the crime higher the proof'. Though a case when superficially may bear all grotesqueness so as to prima facie shock the conscience of any court yet suspicion, however great it may be, cannot take the place of legal proof. A moral conviction, however, strong or genuine cannot amount to a legal conviction supportable in law.[41]

It may be that in a situation the Court legitimately may raise a strong suspicion that in all probabilities the accused was guilty of commission of heinous offence but applying the well-settled principle of law that suspicion, however, grave may be, cannot be a substitute for proof, the same would lead to the only conclusion that the prosecution has not been able to prove its case beyond all reasonable doubt.[42]

(XI) BURDEN OF PROOF

94. Proof

What degree of probability amounts to 'proof' is an exercise particular to each case. Referring to of probability amounts to 'proof' is an exercise the interdependence of evidence and the confirmation of one piece of evidence by another a learned author says:[43]

> The simple multiplication rule does not apply if the separate pieces of evidence are dependent. Two events are dependent when they tend to occur together, and the evidence of such events may also be said to be dependent. In a criminal case, different pieces of evidence directed to establishing that the defendant did the prohibit act with the specified state of mind are generally dependent. A juror may feel doubt whether to credit an alleged confession, and doubt whether to infer guilt from the fact that the defendant fled from justice. But since it is generally guilty rather than innocent people who make confessions, and guilty rather than innocent people who run away, the two2358 doubts are not to be multiplied together. The one piece of evidence may confirm the other.[44]

95. Burden of Proof

The burden to prove a criminal case beyond reasonable doubt always lies on the prosecution. However, when accused set up his defence the burden to prove it is not as stringent as that on prosecution and the accused can successfully discharge the burden to prove his defence on preponderance and probabilities.

Right of Silence of Accused

The accused is entitled to exercise the right of silence. That he did not offer any explanation itself may not be sufficient to conclusively hold that he was guilty of commission of the offence, but the legal position that the same would be considered to be a circumstance against him is not in dispute.[45]

96. Burden on Prosecution

In a criminal case, it is for the prosecution to affirmatively and satisfactorily establish the guilt of an accused and it is not for him to prove his innocence[46]because the presumption is that he is innocent until the contrary is clearly established. The burden of proof, that the accused is guilty, is always on the prosecution. If there is an element of reasonable doubt as to the guilt of an accused, the benefit of that doubt must go to him. It does not, however, mean that even an imaginary or unreal and improbable doubt is enough for holding the accused not guilty if the evidence, on the whole, points to the only conclusion, on which a prudent man can act, that the accused is guilty.[47] The contention on behalf of the prosecution, that inference should be drawn against the accused for murdering the deceased due to an absence of explanation, cannot be sustained.[48] Similarly, falsity of defence cannot take the place of proof of facts which the prosecution has to establish in order to succeed. A false plea can, at best, be considered as an additional circumstance if other circumstances point unerringly to the guilt of the accused.[49]

97. Burden of Proof on the Accused

Section 106 of the Indian Evidence Act does not relieve the prosecution to prove its case beyond all reasonable doubt. Only when the prosecution case has been proved the burden in regard to such facts which was within the special knowledge of the accused may be shifted to the accused for explaining the same. Of course, there are certain exceptions to the said rule, eg, where burden of proof may be imposed upon the accused by reason of a statute.[50]

When the accused has admitted the fact that the house from where the body of the deceased was exhumed, belonged to him and he was residing in the said house,2359 though not at the relevant time, failure to give any explanation by the accused as to how the body of the deceased came to be exhumed from his house is an important incriminating circumstance against the accused.[51]

98. Plea of Alibi

The word 'alibi' is derived from a Latin expression which means and implies in common acceptation 'elsewhere'. It is a defence based on the physical impossibility of participation in a crime by an accused by placing the accused in a location other than the scene of the crime at the relevant time, or shortly put by the presence of the accused elsewhere when the offence was committed.[52] The distance, in such a case thus, would be a material factor in the matter of acceptability of the plea of alibi.[53] A distance which was only 15/20 minutes' walk from the place of occurrence cannot possibly be said to be 'presence elsewhere'. It was not an impossibility anyway to be at the place of occurrence and also at the place where the accused had allegedly gone just to buy some food. Such plea of alibi must miserably fail. And once it does, as a false plea as it looks, it boomerangs on the accused - only to further fortify the prosecution case.[54] When there is a possibility that the accused had travelled from the place of work to the place of the incident in the village and had come back during the intervening period between 7:15 pm and 6:00 am next day, the plea of alibi cannot be accepted.[55]

The prosecution story was that at the time of incident the deceased and his two associates were going on scooter, the accused persons stopped them, fired with 12 bore gun which hit the deceased causing death. Evidence showed that at that time accused A2 was admitted in hospital at Bombay and the accused A1 was attending him. The said evidence was not challenged by the State. The plea of alibi was accepted. Accused persons were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[56]

99. Burden of Proof of Plea of Alibi

The burden of proving an alibi is entirely on the accused and strict proof is required for establishing an alibi. The word alibi means 'elsewhere', and that word is used for convenience when an accused takes recourse to a defence that when the occurrence took place he was so far away from the place of occurrence that it is extremely improbable that he would have participated in the crime. Under s 11 of the Indian Evidence Act, dealing with facts not otherwise relevant, becoming relevant in certain context, it is inter alia provided that facts not otherwise relevant are relevant if they make the existence or non-existence of any fact in issue or relevant fact highly probable or improbable. Therefore, once the prosecution succeeds in discharging the burden, it is incumbent on the accused who adopts the plea of alibi, to prove it with absolute certainty so as to exclude the possibility of his presence at the place of occurrence. When the presence of the accused at the scene of occurrence has been established satisfactorily by the prosecution through reliable evidence, normally the2360 Court would be slow to believe any counter-evidence to the effect that he was elsewhere when the occurrence happened. If the evidence adduced by the accused is of such a quality and of such a standard that the Court entertains some reasonable doubt regarding his presence at the scene when the occurrence took place, the accused would no doubt be entitled to the benefit of that reasonable doubt.[57] It would be a sound proposition to be laid down in this context that the burden on the accused is rather heavy, and that strict proof is required for establishing the plea of alibi.[58]

If an accused takes the plea of alibi, he must establish it.[59] Alibi, not being an exception under the IPC, is governed by s 11 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, and the burden to prove it is always on the accused who must prove it to the satisfaction of the Court.[60] This burden cannot be discharged by showing merely a preponderance of probabilities in his favour. As envisaged by s 11, he has to show a high degree of probability in his favour. In Satya Vir v State ,[61]it was remarked that the omission on the part of the accused to produce all important evidence in support of his plea, which could have been easily produced, would raise a presumption under illust (g) to s 114 of the Evidence Act 1872, that it would, if produced, have been unfavourable to him.[62] Plea of alibi postulates the physical impossibility of the presence of the accused at the scene of offence by reason of his presence at another place. The plea can, therefore, suceed only if it is shown that the accused was so far away at the relevant time that he could not be present at the place where the crime was committed.[63] The plea of alibi may be established from prosecution case, itself.[64]

No finding on a plea of alibi can be recorded by the High Court for the first time in a petition under s 482, CrPC .[65]

It is true that a plea of alibi must be proved with absolute certainty so as to completely encode the presence of the person concerned, at the time when, and the place where the incident took place.[66] Where the accused claimed that he had gone to see a certain advocate for consultation with regard to some matter at the time when the murder took place, and lent no contemporaneous document produced by such advocate to the accused to prove the plea of alibi, the plea was not accepted.[67] The burden of proof for a plea of alibi lies on the person who raises it.[68] If the burden is not discharged, the appellate court will not interfere with the finding of conviction.[69]2361 The prosecution case cannot be said to have not been proved against the accused, merely because he comes out with a plea of alibi without establishing the same.[70] The plea of alibi has to be proved to the satisfaction of the Court where there is ample time and opportunity for the accused to reach the place of occurrence, and it is for the accused to prove that he did not reach the place.[71]

Plea of Alibi--Best and Worst Defence at the Same Time

Once a plea of alibi is taken by an accused, then it is for him to establish the said fact, the defence of alibi is the best and worst of defence at the same time, they are best because if the accused was not here, when the deceased was murdered, he could not have murdered her, it is the worst because once he raises a plea of alibi, no other defence is usually open to him.[72]

100. Plea of Insanity in Murder Cases

Commentary in s 84, vol I, may be referred to.

When the abnormal behaviour of the accused was apparent from the evidence on record, and the opinion of the doctors also supported the ground of insanity, the accused is entitled to be acquitted.[73] Where there was clear indication in the evidence of the witness that the accused was not a normal person who also killed his son aged three years for no apparent reason, with no evidence led by the prosecution with regard to the state of mind of the accused during custody, the accused was found entitled to be acquitted.[74] The conduct of the accused at the time of assaulting the deceased in broad daylight within sight of his relatives leaving blood stains on the spot, demonstrate abnormality, so the circumstances showed that the accused at the time of doing the act of assault, by reason of unsoundness of mind was incapable of knowing the nature of the act and so was entitled to the benefit of doubt.[75]

Where, on account of medical evidence, the accused was found to be of unsound mind, preceding and following the occurrence, the nature and burden of proof on the accused is no higher than that which rests upon a party to a civil proceeding. The state of mind of the accused at the time of commission of the offence was an aspect to be inferred from the circumstances, if the circumstances justify the inference that the accused was under a delusion and under attack of an ailment of paranoid schizophrenia. He was held entitled to the benefit of s 84 and acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[76]

101. The Case not put to the Witness in Cross-examination--Effect

It is a essential rule of justice that whenever the opponent has declined to avail himself of the opportunity to put his case in cross-examination, it must follow that the evidence tendered on that issue ought to be accepted.[77]2362

102. Reasonable Doubt

Doubts would be called reasonable if they are free from a zest for abstract speculation. Law cannot afford any favourite other than truth. To constitute reasonable doubt, it must be free from an over emotional response. Doubts must be actual and substantial doubts as to the guilt of the accused persons arising from the evidence, or from the lack of it, as opposed to mere vague apprehensions. A reasonable doubt is not an imaginary, trivial or a merely possible doubt: but a fair doubt based upon reason and common sense. It must grow out of the evidence in the case.[78]

Benefit of Doubt and its Relation with the Accused

In a criminal case, the burden of proof is always on the prosecution, and the benefit of doubt, if any, is given to the accused.[79] When the benefit of doubt is given to the co-accused because his name does not figure in the FIR, but same yardstick cannot be applied to accused who was named in the FIR as one of the assailants and he was also identified by the prosecution witnesses.[80] The benefit of doubt, to which the accused is entitled, is a reasonable doubt, i.e., doubt which rational thinking men will reasonably, honestly and conscientiously entertain, and not the doubt of a timid mind which fights shyness or is afraid of the logical consequences.[81] The doubt must be reasonable, cogent and coherent, and fanciful.[82] If the doubt amounts to reasonable doubt, the accused must be acquitted. If, however, there is no doubt concerning the guilt of the accused, he should be convicted.[83] However, he cannot be convicted on the basis of mere suspicion.[84] If there is a gap or lacuna in the prosecution evidence, the accused, and not the prosecution, should get its benefit.[85]

There is a long distance between 'may be true' and 'must be true', and the whole of this distance must be traveled by the prosecution by legal, reliable and unimpeachable evidence before it can ask for a conviction. If there has been any failure or omission in covering this distance, even if the prosecution case 'may be true', the benefit of the doubt must go to the accused and he must be acquitted even though, as a result, a foul and cruel murder goes unpunished.[86] The allegation that the accused entered the house of the victim by making a hole in the wall was not believed as it was not possible to make a hole without making noise as the walls were built of bricks and were strong. The incident of assaulting five victims by a known accused attacker going unheard by anybody was also doubtful, and the weapon of offence recovered from the accused also did not prove to be connected with the crime, the accused in such a case is entitled to the benefit of doubt.[87] When there is2363 no legal evidence, connecting the accused with the crime, and the circumstances relied upon by the prosecution, are not sufficient to bring home the offence to the accused beyond reasonable doubt, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC, could not be sustained.[88]

If the prosecution witnesses have come out with two inconsistent versions of the occurrence, conviction of the accused cannot be sustained.[89] The discrepancy in the evidence of eyewitnesses as to the alleged role played by the accused, is sufficient to give him the benefit of doubt.[90] When the case of the convict-accused cannot be distinguished from the case of those acquitted by reading the evidence correctly in all material particulars, the conviction will have to be set aside.[91] When two parties clash in a sudden fight, and it cannot be decided on evidence, produced in the case, as to which party was the aggressor, then both parties are entitled to the benefit of doubt having acted in exercise of the right of private defence.[92] When it is not proved which of the accused persons attempted or committed murder by attacking with knife, all the accused are entitled to benefit of doubt.[93]

Appellant accused persons were prosecuted on allegations that they caught hold of the deceased, young lad of 20 years, and set him on fire with match stick. Statement of the complainant and prosecution witnesses were replete with glaring discrepancies. Written report lodged by the complainant was not produced before the Court. Dying declaration of the deceased did not inspire confidence. Appellants accused persons were given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[94]

Conviction cannot be based merely on the bald conclusion that the deceased died as a result of injury, deliberately given by the accused, when the prosecution has failed to establish the case beyond reasonable doubt,[95] and such reasonable doubt holds to the benefit of the accused not only in the matter of conviction but also in the matter of sentence.[96] When names of the miscreants were not mentioned by the eyewitness in the FIR but their names were subsequently included in the investigation report by the investigating officer, the false implication of the accused cannot be ruled out making him entitled to the benefit of doubt.[97] Where wife of the deceased, a natural witness, deposed about the presence of named accused 1 and accused 2, but in cross-examination she omitted the name of accused 1 and accused 2, on the same evidence, accused A4, A5 and A6 were acquitted, hence, accused A1 and A2 were also held entitled to benefit of doubt, and acquitted of the charges under2364 ss 302 / 34, IPC .[1] Where neither of the circumstances singly nor cumulatively lead to the conclusion that the accused alone was the perpetrator of the crime or that he had participated in the crime, the accused will be entitled to both the benefit of doubt in respect of the conviction and sentence.[2] Prosecution case was that the accused appellant and others fired shot at the deceased and caused death. Other accused persons on the same evidence were acquitted. There was discrepancy in the name of the father of the accused appellant. The weapon of offence and the pellet were not recovered. The accused appellant after the commission of the offence did not abscond. The Supreme Court held that the accused appellant was also entitled to benefit of doubt, and his conviction under ss 302 / 34, IPC was set aside.[3]

Appellant accused R was alleged to be armed with lathi. PWS did not state that the accused R had caused any lathi injury, and no overt act was attributed to him. The appellant accused R was held entitled to benefit of doubt, and was acquitted.[4]

Out of eight accused persons arraigned on trial for offence under s 302, IPC, six accused persons were acquitted while two were convicted. The two accused persons against whom overt acts were attributed were not named in FIR, the evidence of the informant examined in the case was found not reliable. The two convicted accused were held entitled to benefit of doubt and were also acquitted.[5]

The three accused appellants were armed with lathi which had not been used by them in any manner and the only allegation against them was that they had exhorted their co-accused to fire at the opposite party. Held, the possibility that the three accused persons were roped in on account of animosity could not be ruled out. The three accused appellants were given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under ss 149, 302 and 307, IPC .[6]

Three appellants (real brothers) were alleged to have assaulted the deceased, causing death. Deceased died as a result of knife blow given by the appellant no. 1. The evidence adduced to establish the guilt of appellant nos. 2 and 3 was that appellant no. 1 had come to place of occurrence along with a knife in his hand and other two accused came from another place. They allegedly came out of the field, caught hold of the deceased and embraced him. If the appellant nos. 2 and 3 had embraced the deceased, a knife blow could not have been given in that manner by the appellant no. 1 on the chest of the deceased. It is not stated by the prosecution that the said two accused nos. 2 and 3 were embracing him from behind. Nature of the evidence adduced and role ascribed to them entitled them to benefit of doubt. The conviction of the appellant no. 1 was confirmed, the appellant nos. 2 and 3 were held entitled to benefit of doubt, they were therefore acquitted of the charge under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[7]2365

If one of the accused is given the benefit of the doubt, it cannot be said that the rest of the accused should also be acquitted.[8] The benefit of doubt, resulting in the acquittal of the other accused, would not, therefore, vitiate the conviction of only one of them.[9] The fact that the dimension of blood-stains on cloths in the seizure memo were not given, or that with lapse of time the classification of blood group on the chadar (sheet) could not be determined, is not sufficient to claim the benefit of doubt by the accused.[10]

Reasonable doubt as regards some ingredients of the offence ought to be distinguished from reasonable doubt as regards some general exception claimed.

In the former case, the accused is entitled to an acquittal while, in the latter case, he is not.[11]

Accused Convicted under Sections 302 / 34 cannot be Convicted under Sections 506 / 34 or under Section 303,IPC

Where the sessions court convicted the accused under s 302 read with s 34, IPC, and also under s 506 read with s 34, IPC, the conviction under ss 506 / 34, IPC, was not found proper particularly because the charge under ss 506 / 34, IPC, was with respect to the accused threatening the deceased and the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 506 and s 34, IPC .[12] The conviction of accused persons under s 303, IPC, is not proper when they are convicted for a major offence under s 302, IPC .[13]

103. Improbable Version

Appellant accused and the deceased were going on the same scooter, the deceased was a pillion rider. The prosecution case was that the accused set the deceased on fire after pouring petrol from the petrol can kept in the scooter. The counter version of the accused was that the deceased set herself on fire without his knowledge while the scooter was in motion. As both the versions were found improbable, and incredible, the accused was given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge for offence under s 302, IPC .[14]

(XII) APPRECIATION OF EVIDENCE IN MURDER CASES

104. Appreciation of Evidence

It is trite law that where the eyewitnesses' account is found credible and trustworthy, medical opinion pointing to alternative possibilities is not accepted as conclusive.

Witnesses, as Bentham said, are the eyes and ears of justice. Hence the importance and primacy of the quality of the trial process. Eyewitnesses' account would require a careful independent assessment and evaluation for their credibility which should2366 not be adversely prejudged making any other evidence, including medical evidence, as the sole touchstone for the test of such credibility. The evidence must be tested for its inherent consistency and the inherent probability of the story; consistency with the account of other witnesses held to be creditworthy; consistency with the undisputed facts the 'credit' of the witnesses; their performance in the witness-box; their power of observation, etc. Then the probative value of such evidence becomes eligible to be put into the scales for a cumulative evaluation.[15] The Court's approach to the evidence in a case must be dispassionate and free from prejudice, and the examination of the evidence must be fair and just in fixing the guilt upon an accused.[16]

The proper way to approach a case is first to marshal the evidence against the accused, excluding the confession altogether from consideration, and see whether, if it is believed, a conviction can safely be based on it. If it is capable of belief independently of the confession, then, of course, it is not necessary to call the confession in aid. However, cases may arise where the Judge is not prepared to act on the other evidence, as it stands, even though, if believed, it would be deficient to sustain a conviction. In such an event, the Judge may call in aid the confession, and use it to lend assurance to the other evidence and, thus, fortify himself in believing that without the aid of the confession, he would not be prepared to accept.[17] The Supreme Court observed in Birpal Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[18] that in appreciation of evidence, the Court should see whether the prosecution case and its evidence suffer from such infirmities that the accused cannot be justifiably convicted. In the undernoted cases,[19] the accused had to be acquitted because of a number of infirmities in the prosecution evidence. When there is enough material to support the inference that it might have happened in the manner alleged by the defence, the prosecution evidence has to be scanned and sifted in the light of the defence contention.[20] The Court should therefore, make an attempt to separate the grain from the chaff, if possible.[21] Where however, the grain cannot be separated from the chaff because the grain and the chaff are so inextricably mixed up, that in the process of separation the Court would have to reconstruct an absolutely new case for the prosecution by divorcing the essential details presented by the prosecution, completely from the context and the background against which they are made, then2367 this principle will not apply.[22] Where deposition of the wife of the deceased has been discarded and some accused persons are acquitted, that cannot be a ground for acquitting the prime accused of the case.[23]

Where there is failure to appreciate the oral evidence in the light of the general probabilities and the salient circumstances that have come out, the judgment is not in conformity with the law.[24] The Court should not miss that failure on the part of the prosecution to produce an important eyewitness which would give the accused the 'benefit' of optional presumption under s 114, illustration (g) of the Evidence Act 1872, and to infer that if such witness had been produced, it would have defeated the prosecution case.[25] When a lady is confronted with a number of intruders in her house armed with deadly weapons and showering bullets, she cannot give a very accurate and photogenic version as whole thing happened in a few minutes. Therefore, while appreciating such testimony, the Court should give due regard to their rural background and the whole scenario in which the incident happened.[26]

When a murder takes place, and when there are more than one accused, it is not necessary for the prosecution to lead evidence as to which accused has dealt which blow on what part of the body of the deceased. Any inquiry into the question as to who among the accused has dealt the fatal blow is clearly not warranted.[27]

The prosecution case was that the accused appellants in furtherance of their common object fired gun shots at the deceased causing death. There was long enmity between the family of the complainant and the accused persons. The eye-witnesses, brother and friend of the deceased had seen the incident from their flour mill. The place of occurrence viz. shop of the deceased was not visible from the flour mill. The witnesses deposed contrary to the averments of the FIR and their statement in examination-in-chief. There was no direct evidence that the accused appellant fired shots from the rifle causing the death of the deceased. The conviction of the accused under s 302 read with ss 148 and 149, IPC recorded by the trial Court was set aside.[28]

Two views Emerging from Evidence

The golden thread which runs through the web of the administration of justice in criminal cases is that if two views are possible on the evidence adduced in the case, one pointing to the guilt of the accused and the other to his innocence, the view which is favourable to the accused should be adopted. This principle has a special relevance in cases wherein the guilt of the accused is sought to be established by circumstantial evidence.[29] It is now well settled that if two views are possible, the appellate court should not interfere with the judgment of acquittal passed by the2368 Court below.[30] If two views are possible the view in favour of the accused should be accepted and the accused should be acquitted.[31] On the basis of evidence, two views being possible, as such accused A1 was entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[32]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 302.

Punishment for murder.--

Two Important Considerations for Evaluating Evidence of Eye-witness

In assessing and evaluating evidence of eyewitnesses, the two important considerations are as under:

(i) Whether, in the circumstances of the case, it was possible for the eyewitness to be present at the scene or their explanation for their presence at the scene can be accepted; and
(ii) Whether there is anything inherently improbable or unreliable in their evidence.

Shot fired All of Sudden

When a shot is fired all of a sudden, it is difficult for anybody to give a vivid description of the entire incident.[33]

105. Conduct of Witness--Considerations by the Court

As regards conduct of different witnesses it is sufficient to refer to an observation made by the Supreme Court in Rana Pratap v State of Haryana ,[34]wherein, the Apex Court clearly stated that there is no legal principle of universal application as to how a witness will react in seeing an occurrence. A person may be dumb-founded and may not disclose the incident to others immediately. Some are stunned. Some become speechless and some stand rooted to the spot. The Court while considering the conduct of the witness has to bear in mind that even in a given situation different persons act differently which may not be considered to be natural and probable by others while judging the matter after a number of years. In a case where the witnesses depose after a number of years, slight contradictions in their evidence and slight discrepancies in their statements must be viewed in the context of capacity of retention of the respective witnesses, the chance of their forgetting a minor part of the incident, etc.[35] The Court can convict some accused, and acquit others on the basis of testimony of some eyewitnesses depending upon the facts and circumstances of the case.[36] The plea by some of the convicted accused persons that when eyewitness evidence is disbelieved as regards some accused persons they are also entitled to the benefit of doubt is not tenable.[37]

Where the witnesses continued sitting on their respective cots inspite of repeated fires made by the appellant R from his pistol, and did not try to run or take shelter in order save their lives, held there was false implication of the appellant R, and he was acquitted of the charge under ss 302, 307, 458 read with s 34, IPC .[38]2369

If the conduct of the witness is inconsistent with the conduct of an ordinary human being then his testimony has no credence for acceptance.[39]

Daughter of the deceased, an eye-witnesses, deposed before the Court that she had informed her grandmother that the accused forcibly had taken her mother, but the grandmother did not disclose this fact to any one in the village or to the police, and kept mum for two days. The evidence of the daughter of the deceased was rejected. Accused persons were acquitted for offences under ss 302 / 149 / 201, IPC .[40]

The prosecution case was that the accused appellant committed the ghastly murder of the deceased on the way leading to temple. There was no reason to disbelieve the evidence of PWS and the medical evidence adduced in the case. The eye-witness after seeing the ghastly murder fled away from the scene of occurrence and did not inform the police, the conduct of the witness was found not unnatural. Conviction of the accused appellants concurrently recorded by the Courts below was confirmed.[41]

The eye witnesses closely related of the deceased had left the injured in lurch, did not take the deceased to the hospital, did not inform anybody about the incident, disappeared from the scene of the occurrence till they were asked by the police. The conduct of the witnesses was unnatural, their presence on the spot was doubtful. The dying declaration of the deceased recorded by the Judicial Magistrate did not implicate the accused nos. 1 to 4. The accused respondents were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[42]

On the night of occurrence at about 11.00 pm the deceased was coming back home, accused appellant appeared there with a country made pistol in his hand and fired a single shot on the back of the deceased, who on being hit, fell down on the ground. Four PWS alleged that eye-witness had seen the occurrence. The witnesses did not accompany the deceased to hospital, nor went to the Police Station which showed their unnatural conduct. The evidence of eye-witnesses was not believed, and acquittal of the appellant recorded by High Court was held proper.[43]

Eye-witnesses not Shouting on the Spot

Accused persons armed with weapons formed unlawful assembly, assaulted the deceased, threatened members of his family and the eye-witnesses. In such atmosphere, it did not matter if the witnesses did not shout.[44]

Free Fight between Parties--Omission of Name(s) of the Witnesses in FIR

In the case of a free fight where large number of persons are involved, the omission of the name(s) of the witnesses, especially eye-witnesses, does not affect the prosecution case.[45]2370

High Daily Temperative--Absence of Witnesses from Spot

The occurrence had taken place on 28 June 1993 at 3.00 p.m. The daily temperature in the month of June in the relevant part of Haryana where the occurrence had taken place, was approximately 50 degree Celsius. People do not venture out in this heat and prefer to stay at home and come out only when the temperature cools down in the evening. This is the reason that no person was present at the bus stand at the time of incident.[46]

106. Evidence to be Weighed and not Counted

The evidence has to be weighed and not counted.[47] This well known maxim that 'Evidence has to be weighted and not counted' has been given statutory placement in s 134 of the Evidence Act,[48] which provides as under.[49]

No particular number of witness shall in any case be required for the proof of any fact.

It should be remembered that plurality of evidence is only a rule of prudence and not an inflexible requirement of law. The necessity of plurality crops up in those cases where evidence of a solitary witness is not wholly reliable.[50]

107. Ordinary Presumption as to Witness

Though the ordinary presumption is that a witness speaking under oath is truthful unless and until he is shown to be untruthful or unreliable in any particular respect,[51] yet witnesses are very often tutored. In Haria v State of Himachal Pradesh ,[52] a young boy of 13 or 14 years was kept for 10 or 15 days at the police station, and it was observed that he could be easily tutored. In Ram Singh v State ,[53] it was held that a conviction, based on the testimony of a child witness, found untrustworthy, is unsustainable. When a child eyewitness admits to have been tutored and has given different versions and there is otherwise no other corroborating evidence, the Court should not place reliance on such evidence.[54]

There appears to be conflict of decisions, pronounced by the Supreme Court, on the point whether direct evidence can be believed with regard to some of the several accused while rejected in relation to the others. The Supreme Court held in Ram Janam v State of Uttar Pradesh [55] that direct evidence may be believed in relation to one accused though it may be disbelieved in relation to the other, while, earlier in Prem Singh v State of Punjab ,[56] it was ruled that if the evidence of two eyewitnesses is disbelieved in regard to participation by the four other accused in the incident, it is difficult to accept it so far as the role assigned to the one is concerned. It is submitted that in such a case of conflict, the juristic notion favours the latter view to prevail.2371 Similarly, the mere defect, that one prosecution witness did not state in the FIR that he was an eyewitness to the occurrence of murder, whereas, in his evidence in the Court, he claimed to have seen the murder, may be a justification for rejecting this particular part of his testimony, but that would not mean that his entire deposition should be rejected.[57] It is, however, not safe to convict an accused under s 302, IPC when eyewitnesses have identified him as the assailant of the victim.[58]

108. Place of Occurrence not Established--Accused Acquitted

Eye-witness deposed four places of occurrence, as such place of occurrence in the case was not established. When the place of occurrence itself has not been established, it would not be proper to accept the prosecution version. Appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[59]

109. Change of Place of Occurence

When there was a free fight between the parties and a large number of persons were involved, in such a fight it is usual for the parties to change their position. Ultimately the case rests on the testimony of the eye witnesses. Therefore, in case of a free fight between parties, change of place of occurrence would not affect prosecution case.[60]

110. Maxim--Falsus in Uno Falsus in Omnibus

The maxim falsus in uno falsus in omnibus (false in one thing, false in everything) has not received general acceptance nor has this maxim come to occupy the status of rule of law. It is merely a rule of caution. All that it amounts to, is that in such cases testimony may be disregarded. The doctrine merely involves the question of weight of evidence which a court may apply in a given set of circumstances, but it is not what may be called a 'mandatory rule of evidence'.[61]

Even if a major portion of evidence is found to be deficient, in case residue is sufficient to prove guilt of an accused, notwithstanding the acquittal of a number of other co-accused persons, his conviction can be maintained. It is the duty of the Court to separate the grain from the chaff. Where chaff can be separated from grain, it would be open to the Court to convict an accused, notwithstanding the fact, that evidence has been found to be deficient to prove the guilt of the other accused persons. Falsity of particular material witness or material particular would not ruin it from the beginning to the end. The maxim falsus in unofalsus in omnibus has no application in India and the witness cannot be branded as a liar.[62]

It is well settled by a catena of decisions of the Apex Court that the maxim falsus in uno falsus in omnibus has not been accepted by the courts in India. While assessing evidence, courts try to separate the grain from the chaff, and it is only where truth and falsehood are so inextricably mixed that it is impossible to separate2372 them that the entire statement of a witness is rejected.[63] The evidence of a witness cannot be rejected only because a part of his testimony may not inspire confidence.[64] If the Court disbelieves a portion of evidence of a witness, the testimony of that witness should not be rejected if the rest of the evidence is found to be acceptable and true.[65]

111. Corroboration--A Rule of Prudence

Corroboration is a rule of prudence. Evidentiary value of a deposition which is otherwise admissible is not just wiped out in the absence of corroboration. Even in the absence of corroboration, a deposition for its quality may be safely accepted to be correct. It will be unfortunate, if on account of over emphasis for corroboration, a crime goes unpunished by not giving due weight to uncorroborated evidence when such evidence is otherwise reliable.[66] However, corroboration is required to be appreciated by the court at the time of deciding the case after conclusion of evidence. The court, therefore, cannot seek independent corroboration at the stage of framing of charge to quash the charge and discharge the accused.[67] If the High Court thought it unsafe to convict any of the accused on uncorroborated evidence of a single eyewitness, it does not mean that the evidence of the witness stands castigated. It is no stigma against the evidence of any eyewitness if the court only wanted reassurance from other sources. Corroboration is what the court requires as a matter of prudence and as step of caution.[68] Corroboration is not a rule of practice, and hence, no corroboration is required if the testimony of the child inspires confidence, and there is no likelyhood of tutoring, and its demeanour was found to be straightforward by the trial judge.[69]

Where the sole eye-witness did not disclose the incident to any one for almost two years simply because he had been threatened by the co-accused, and his statement was recorded belatedly, the conviction of the accused on un-corroborated testimony of the witness on the charge of rape was found unsustainable, and was set aside.[70]

112. Discrepancy as to Age of Deceased--Effect

Where the age of the deceased in the post-mortem report was given 26 years, while witnesses stated the age of the deceased as 40 years. But, the discrepancy with regard to the age of the deceased vis-à-vis the postmortem report was neither drawn to the attention of the doctor, investigating officer or the other witneses, the said discrepancy in the age, is not pertinent so as to throw away the entire prosecution case, particularly when the identity of the deceased was not suspected.2373

113. Withholding Evidence by Prosecution--Inference

An adverse influence against the prosecution can only be drawn if it withholds some evidence, and not merely on its failure to obtain certain evidence. No adverse inference can be drawn against the prosecution from non-examination of the accused's younger sister who was aged only about 17 years, when the evidence on record is sufficient to prove beyond doubt the case of the prosecution and the failure to examine another person does not affect the credibility of the prosecution.[71] It is not necessary for prosecution to examine somebody as a witness even though the witness was not likely to support the prosecution version. Non-examination of some persons per se does not corrode vitiality of prosecution version, particularly when the witnesses examined have withstood incisive cross-examination and pointed to the accused as the perpetrators of the crime.[72] Non-examination of material witness would be immaterial where other prosecution evidence proves the case of the prosecution.[73]

114. Minor Inconsistencies

Where the evidence of two eye-witnesses proved the accusations against the accused persons, the minor variations did not in any way corrode the credibility of the prosecution version.[74] Minor discrepancies or some improvements would not justify rejection of the testimonies of the eye-witnesses, if they are otherwise reliable. Some discrepancies are bound to occur because of the sociological background of the witnesses as also the time-gap between the date of occurrence and the date on which they give their depositions in court. Conviction of the appellants under s 302, IPC was upheld.[75]

115. Contradictions in the Testimony of Eyewitnesses--Riot Cases

When people are killed during a riot, there may be a possibility of the incident being exaggerated or some innocent persons being named as being part of the assailants party. This may happen wittingly or unwittingly. However, just because there may be some inconsequential contradictions or exaggeration in the testimony of the eyewitness, that should not be a ground to reject their entire evidence. In cases of rioting; where there are a large number of assailants and a number of witnesses, it is but natural that the testimony of the witness may not be identical. What has to be seen is whether the basic feature of the occurrence has been similarly viewed or sustained by the victims and the people who are attacked and killed.[76]

Same Evidence may justify Conviction of some Accused and Acquittal of Others

The Court can convict some of the accused and acquit others on the basis of testimonies, of the same eyewitness depending upon the facts and circumstances of2374 the case.[77] The plea by some of the convicted accused persons that when eyewitness evidence is disbelieved as regards some of the accused persons they are also entitled to the benefit of doubt is untenable.[78] The mere fact that the evidence of the prosecution witness is not safe enough to be relied upon with regard to the part assigned to one accused in the occurrence, is no ground to reject it mechanically against the other accused also.[79] Where the witness had stated that the accused dealt gupti blows on the person of the deceased, which fact was corroborated with medical evidence but the witness did not state the specific overt act committed by co-accused persons, the conviction of the accused was maintained but that of the co-accused persons was set aside.[80] Where accused no 1 inflicted razor blows on the deceased, and accused nos 2 and 3 were alleged to have caught hold of the victim, an evidence of the eyewitness corroborated with the medical evidence. Similarly accused no 1 was convicted under s 302, IPC, but since the prosecution had failed to prove the identity of accused nos 2 and 3, so they were given the benefit of doubt.[81] Where accused persons fired at the victims after being exhorted by the co-accused person to assault the victim, it did not necessarily amount to asking the accused persons to kill the deceased, so the accused persons exhorting the main accused were acquitted, while the main accused who killed the victim were held guilty under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[82] Where, during the scuffle on the date of incident, the co-accused tried to hold the deceased or separate the main accused and the deceased, the presence of the co-accused at the scene of offence could not be said to be for causing any injury to the deceased; the medical evidence disclosed only one knife blow to the deceased, in these circumstances no inference could be drawn that the said co-accused shared common intention with the main accused, so his conviction under ss 302 / 34, IPC, was set aside.[83]

116. Parity of Reasoning to be Adopted by the Courts

Where in a murder case the sessions court acquitted some of the accused and convicted the others on the basis of the same prosecution evidence, and the High Court confirmed the judgment of the sessions court, the Apex Court held that every reasoning mentioned by the sessions court if applied on the same yardstick to the prosecution evidence regarding the convicted accused persons, does not lead to any2375 symptomatic differences in regard to applying the said evidence to convicting the accused and rejecting the same with reference to the acquitted accused on the parity of reasoning adopted by the session court, the case of the convicted accused could not have been distinguished from those of the acquitted persons; the convicted accused were also entitled to be acquitted.[84] When the courts below have chosen to discard the evidence of dying declaration regarding acquitted accused persons, it is rather difficult to accept this dying declaration as the sole basis to come to the conclusion that it has implicated the convicted accused of having caused the injuries leading to the death of the victim.[85]

117. Evidence of Tape-recorded Conversation

Tape-recorded conversation can only be relied upon as corroborative evidence of conversation deposed to by any of the parties to the conversation, and in the absence of evidence of any such conversation, the tape-recorded conversation is not proper evidence and cannot be relied upon.[86] It is settled law that rendering a tape-recorded conversation can be legal evidence by way of corroborating the statement of a person who deposes that the other speaker and he carried on with the conversation, even of the statement of a person who deposes that he overheard a conversation between two persons and what they actually stated had been tape-recorded. The tape-recorded conversation can only be used as corroborative evidence of such conversation deposed to by any of the parties to the conversation.[87]

118. Both Prosecution and Defence coming with False Facts--Who Gains

Where neither the prosecution nor the defence come out with the whole and unvarnished truth so as to enable the Court to judge where the rights and wrongs of the whole incident or set of incidents lay or how one or more incidents took place in which so many persons were injured, courts can only try to guess or conjecture to decipher the truth if possible. This may be done, within limits to determine whether any reasonable doubts emerge on any point under consideration from proved facts and circumstances of the case.[88]

If both the parties come to court with untrue facts and conceal the real truth, they have only themselves to blame, and they cannot expect the Court to arrive at any definite conclusion on unreliable evidence produced either for or against either of the parties. In such a case, the Court will certainly attempt to separate the grain from the chaff but only if it is possible to do so. In certain circumstances, it may be found to be an impossible task. That is particularly so when the evidence of both parties is thoroughly unreliable and cannot be accepted even in part with safety. In such a case, it is not open to the Court to make out a third case which is different from the case set out by both parties; the Court can only say that the matter is doubtful in the extreme, and it is not possible to arrive at any conclusion one way or the other. The result-of such a finding may be that all the persons who stand as accused in the case, may have to be given the benefit of doubt. However, that cannot be helped. The defective investigation and the conduct of the parties themselves are really2376 responsible for such regrettable results in which case there can be no question of recording any conviction.[89] The position which crystallises is that when in a murder trial, both the prosecution and the defence are coming with untrue versions, the gainer is not the prosecution but the defence in which case there can be no question of recording a conviction.[90]

119. Single Accused Single Deceased Case--Negligible Chance of False Implication

When more than one person is implicated in a case, chances of false implication of some of them may be there because the complainant or the witness may avail of that opportunity to wreak vengeance against some of their enemies by falsely implicating them. However, in a case of a single accused and a single deceased, such chances of false implication are negligible. It is wholly unnatural that the complainant would let go of the real culprit, and would implicate someone else falsely without any reason.[91]

120. Documentary Evidence in Criminal Proceedings

Certain amount of caution is required to be observed, particularly in criminal proceedings with regard to admission in evidence of documents, when the prosecution relies on the contents for purposes of securing a conviction. Documents are required to be proved by either the maker of the document or some other persons who are in a position to depose to the satisfaction of the Court with regard to their contents. Effectively, it is necessary to adopt this procedure for two reasons: first, in order to introduce that material in evidence through a process, that is, in consonance with that prescribed by the provisions of the Evidence Act, but more importantly in order to make available to the accused the witness who vouches for the contents so that the veracity can be tested by cross-examination of that witness.[92] The incriminating documents relied upon by the prosecution should also be put to the accused in his statement under s 313, CrPC, without which the documents cannot be used against the accused in the criminal trial.[93]

The expression, 'books of accounts' used in s 34 of the Evidence Act means books in which merchants, traders or businessman generally keep their accounts, i.e., statements of debits or credits or receipts and payments. A register kept at the counter of a hotel need not contain any statement of account. So, until it is shown that such register also pertained to the pecuniary transactions involving the customers of the hotel, the same cannot be treated as a book of account. In the second place, even if it is assumed that a register kept in a hotel can be treated as a book of accounts, the entry therein cannot became the sole premise to charge a person with liability.[94] However, if an accused conceals his identity to the hotel people, and hence, writes a pseudonym name in the hotel register, he is the only one who knows why he wrote a different name, so in the absence of any explanation from him it is2377 open to the Court to draw an inference that the accused had some reasons to conceal his identity from the hotel people.[1] In a case where death of the deceased was alleged to have been caused by her in-laws, a letter written by the deceased to her father stating that she should be immediately taken from the house of her in-laws otherwise her in-laws and her husband would kill her, the handwriting of the deceased stood proved on the testimony of her brother. No effort was made by the accused to get it compared with the admitted handwriting of the deceased. The mere fact that the prosecution witness did not produce other letters allegedly written by the deceased, cannot be a ground to say that the prosecution suppressed evidence which the accused could have utilised for the purpose of comparing handwriting of the deceased. Further the alleged discrepancy or overwriting on the top of the letter regarding its date would not be helpful to the accused.[2]

Section 294, CrPC,[3] is amended with a view to avoid delay in trial. When any document is produced by the prosecution, it is for the defence to admit or not to admit it. Once the defence admits the documents, then no formal proof of execution of the documents is required. The said document can be read in evidence for all purposes though the author is not examined before the Court. Such document is not only admissible in evidence to the execution of the document but also admissible to the contents of the document.[4]

121. Acts or Conduct of Accused

The fact that the accused accompanied the co-accused to the house of the deceased or that the accused knew that the co-accused was himself armed with a pistol and also had knowledge about previous enmity between the co-accused and the deceased, does not lead to the inference that the accused had common intention with the co-accused to kill the deceased.[5] The fact that the accused was seen by the witness going with two other accused persons towards the house of the deceased, by itself, is not sufficient to establish the guilt of the accused in the absence of other circumstantial linking of the accused with the commission of the offence.[6]Conduct of the accused regarding his leading the police and other persons present at the spot to his house wherefrom the weapon of assault and other articles were found, would be admissible under s 8 of the Evidence Act, and such circumstances lend support to the confession made by the accused before one of the prosecution witnesses.[7]

No Role Assigned to Accused Appellant--Acquitted

Where no role was assigned to the appellant accused, he was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[8]2378

Mere Fact of Recovery of Sword at the Instance of Accused--Conviction not Proper

When almost all other evidence produced by the prosecution is disbelieved, the conviction in a murder case cannot be based on the mere fact of recovery of the sword at the instance of the accused.[9]

122. Evidence to be Considered as a Whole

It is on the totality of the evidence that the guilt of an accused has to be determined to that high degree of moral certainty which is required for proof of a criminal charge.[10] The evidence has not to be considered merely as a number of bits of evidence, but the whole of it together and the cumulative effect of it has to be weighed.[11] No distinction has, therefore, to be made between circumstantial and direct evidence.[12] The Court must satisfy itself that the cumulative effect of the evidence, led by the prosecution, establishes the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt.[13] When the evidence recorded in a case is quite sufficient for coming to the conclusion of guilt beyond reasonable doubt, the order of acquittal will be unsustainable.[14] Likewise, no hard and fast rule can be laid down as to what inference can be drawn from certain circumstances. The cumulative effect of all the circumstances established by evidence, and the nature of those circumstances have to be taken into consideration, and then it has to be judged whether having regard to the ordinary course of human conduct, it is safe to presume that the offence was committed by the accused.[15] Where the prosecution evidence is found to be false and riddled with defects and the prosecution has not, discharged the burden, the Court can look to the plea of the accused and his evidence to see whether there are materials available to bolster up the case for the prosecution or add weight and reliability to the prosecution witness where none exists.[16] It may be mentioned that: (a) the criminal trespasses into the land under actual possession of the accused; (b) the physical prevention of the accused's legitimate right of ploughing the land; and (c) the aggressive wrongful attack on the vital parts of the body of the accused 1 and 4 with dangerous weapons coupled with the non-mentioning of the injuries found on the persons of accused 1 and 4 leave apart the explanation for that are all important points which go in favour of the accused persons.[17] It is, therefore, the paramount duty of every court to separate the grain from the chaff on a careful and scrupulous analysis and, if that is not possible, to give the benefit of it to the accused so that no innocent person may be2379 convicted.[18] However, this principle does not compel a court to give the benefit of the doubt to an accused person even after considering the totality of evidence, the Court is convinced beyond all reasonable doubt that the prosecution case is acceptable and the defence version is completely wrong.[19] Individual circumstances, considered in isolation and divorced from the context of the overall picture, emerging from a consideration of the diverse circumstances and their conjoint effect, may, by themselves, appear innocuous. It is only when the various circumstances are considered conjointly that it becomes possible to understand and appreciate their true effect.[20]

123. Assault by Many Persons

In the a case where a large number of persons had attacked one person, the witnesses cannot be expected to explain the role in the inflicting of injuries by each one of them individually and the weapons used.[21]

When there are many accused persons involved in commission of the occurrence, then in that event it is highly improbable for all the witnesses to identify the individual accused with the weapon in his hand as well as respective part played by each of them.[22]

In case(s) where several accused persons assault and give numerous blows to the deceased, and evidence is quite unclear as to whose blow resulted in the death of the deceased, and accused have no intention to kill, the accused would be convicted under ss 325 / 34, IPC and not under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[23]

124. Competency of a Witness

Under s 118 of Indian Evidence Act,[24] all persons are competent to testify unless the court considers that because of tender years, extreme old age, disease whether of body or of mind, or any other cause of the same kind, they are prevented from understanding questions put to them or from giving rational answers. All grounds of incompetency have been swept away by s 118 under which competency of witness is the rule and their incompetency is the highlights their premature or defective intellect.[25]

Depositions of Witness should be Scrutinised with same Yardsticks

Deposition of witness, whether examined on the prosecution side or the defence side or as a court witness, are oral evidence in the case, and hence, the scrutiny shall be without any predilection or bias. No witness is entitled to get better treatment merely because he was examined as a prosecution witness or even as a court witness. It is judicial scrutiny which is warranted in respect of depositions of all witnesses for2380 which different yardsticks cannot be prescribed.[26] Defence witnesses are entitled to equal treatment with those of the prosecution, and the Court ought to overcome this treatment of instinctive disbelief in defence witnesses who quite often may tell lies, but so do the prosecution witnesses.[27]

Plight of a Witness--Frequent Adjournments--Diet Money to Witness

A criminal case is built on the edifice of evidence that is admissible in law. For that witnesses are required whether it be direct evidence or circumstantial evidence. In these cases witnesses are a harassed lot. A witness in a criminal trial may come from a far-off place to find the case adjourned. He has to come to the Court many times and at what cost to himself and his family, is not difficult to fathom. It has become a fashion to have a criminal case adjourned again and again till the witness tires and gives up. It is the game of unscrupulous lawyers to get adjournments on one excuse or the other till a witness is won over or tired. It is not only that, a witness is threatened, abducted, maimed, done away with, or bribed. There is no protection for him. In adjourning the matter without any valid cause, a court unwittingly becomes party, to miscarriage of justice. A witness is then not treated with respect in the Court. He is pushed out from the crowed courtroom by the peon. He waits the whole day and then finds the matter adjourned. He has no place to sit and no place even to have a glass of water. And when he does appear in court, he is subjected to unchecked and prolonged examination and cross-examination, and finds himself in a hapless situation. For all these reasons and others, a person abhors becoming a witness. It is the administration of justice that suffers. Appropriate diet money for a witness is a far cry. Here again, the process of harassment starts and he decides not to get the diet money at all. High courts have to be vigilant in these matters. Proper diet money must be paid immediately to the witness (not only when he is examined but for every adjourned hearing) and even sent to him, and he should not be left to be harassed by the subordinate staff. If the criminal justice system is to be put on a proper pedestal, the system cannot be left in the hands of unscrupulous lawyers and the sluggish state machinery. Each trial should be properly monitored. The time has come for all courts, district courts, subordinate courts to be linked to the High Court with computers and a proper checks to be kept on adjournments and recording of evidence. The Bar Council of India and the State Bar Councils must play their part and lend their support to put the criminal system back on its trail.[28]

No Expectation of Minute Details from Scared Eye-Witness

It is not reasonable to expect that the scared eye-witnesses would be able to give a meticulous and precise account of the details of shots that landed on the victim. The charring at the entry wounds 1, 3 and 5, found on the dead body of the deceased indicated that the firing was done from close range. The Court cannot expect the panic-stricken eye-witnesses to come forward with a vivid account of the distance from which each one of the shots was fired at. The possibility of firing from close range cannot be ruled out.[29]2381

125. Evidence of Relations

It is not a rule of evidence that a relation is not a competent witness. In other words, in a criminal trial a relation of a natural witness of a particular sequence of events, such relation's evidence cannot be discarded on the ground of his relationship if such evidence is found to be true, trustworthy and reliable. The evidence of a prosecution witness having no enmity with the accused cannot be brushed aside merely on the ground of relationship with the deceased.[30] There is no probation in law that a person who is related to the deceased has to be termed as an unreliable witness. More often than not, a relation is supposed to be a truthful witness. That is because a relation would not normally implicate an innocent person and shield the real culprit. Interest should be to get a person convicted. When allegation of interestedness is made, the accused is required to establish and to show that the witness had a partisan approach. In such case, the Court is required to make a careful analysis of the evidence to find out whether the allegation of partisan approach is borne out from the materials on record. Facts showing that the witness is biased or partial in relation to the parties or the cause has to be elicited in cross-examination or if denied, independently proved. It has always been permissible to call evidence to contradict a witness's denial of bias or partiality towards one of the parties and to show that he is prejudiced so far as the case being tried is concerned.[31]

The testimony of the father and wife of the deceased who had seen the incident from the courtyard of the deceased was believed, hence, the conviction of the accused persons under ss 326 / 34, IPC was held proper.[32]

The accused fired at the deceased when he was returning to his village. Father of the accused and other eye-witness deposed about the incident, their evidence could not be rejected merely because no outsider or pedestrian or resident of the vicinity was examined though incident took place on metalled road.[33]

The evidence of brother of the deceased, eye-witness, was believed, thus, the conviction of the accused appellant under s 302, IPC concurrently recorded by the Courts below was upheld.[34]

The testimony of the wife, eye-witness who claimed to be with the deceased since morning was found doubtful, as she could not depose when the deceased took food, hence, same was rejected. Acquittal of the accused under s 302, IPC was held proper.[35]

The fact, that one of the witnesses happens to be the grandson[36] or uncle[37] or son[38] of the deceased, is, by itself, no ground to view his evidence with distrust. An2382 eyewitness cannot be disbelieved on the ground that he is the son or relation[39] of the deceased.[40] The fact of being a relation, far from undermining, rather guarantees the truth of his testimony because, as observed by the Supreme Court in Gopal Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[41] being a relation, he would be the least disposed to falsely implicate the accused or substitute him in place of the real culprit[42] unless there is cogent evidence on record to show that the said witness had some animus against the accused.[43] Mere fact that an FIR lodged by the brother of the deceased on the next morning would hardly be sufficient to reject his evidence or otherwise reliable testimony of the wife of the deceased.[44] Though, in one case, one of the four eyewitnesses was the brother of the deceased and he had admitted his enmity with the accused, yet the Supreme Court observed that if his evidence can stand the test of a more close 'scrutiny', it can be acted upon despite such enmity. It all means that suggestion of animus need not be accepted on purely speculative grounds.[45] Similarly, not only should the witness not be discredited because of their relationship[46] but also their testimony should not be disbelieved merely on the ground that neighbours residing near the place of occurrence have not been examined.[47] In Vishvas Aha Kurane v State of Maharashtra ,[48] the deposition of the solitary eyewitness, who was the full brother of the deceased, was not brushed aside as it had received ample corroboration not only from the medical evidence but also from circumstantial evidence. The matter of appreciation of such witness, who are relations, only casts a duty upon the Court to scrutinise their evidence with more than ordinary care.[49] Likewise, the evidence of relations and partisan witness has to be scrutinised with caution, but the evidence of such witness does not deserve to be rejected outright simply because they are relations or inimical witnesses.[50] In Prem2383 Singh v State of Punjab,[51] the prosecution had chosen to rest its entire case on the evidence of S who was the brother of the two witnesses, examined in the case, and because his evidence had failed to inspire confidence, the conviction was ultimately set aside.

Merely because the inhabitants of the village were not examined by the prosecution, no adverse inference should be drawn against it because it is not necessary to examine each and every witness and particularly when occurrence of the incident is proved from the statement of the injured witnesses. Now-a-days, nobody would like to place his life in danger by giving evidence against the accused persons.[52]

Related is not Equivalent to 'Interested'

It is worth mentioning here that 'related' is not equivalent to 'interest'. A witness may be called interested only when he or she derives some benefit from the result of a litigation, i.e., in a decree in a civil case, or in seeing an accused person punished. A witness, who is a natural witness and is the only possible eyewitness in the circumstances of a case, cannot be said to be an interested witness.[53] A close relative, who is a very natural witness in the circumstances of a case, cannot be regarded as an 'interested witness'. The term 'interested' postulates that the person concerned must have some direct interest in seeing that the accused person is somehow or the other convicted, either because he had some animus with the accused or for some other reason.[54]

126. Evidence of Co-villager

In Satyanarain v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[55] murder had been committed in a village where there were two parties--both tried under s 107, CrPC 1898, and naturally all witnesses were partisan or interested. It was observed that it was not safe to base conviction of the accused on their evidence unless some corroboration was found in the evidence or material on record. However, in assessing the value to be attached to the evidence of co-villagers, who have natural inclination of sympathy for their fellow villagers against a stranger, the courts should rely more on human probabilities than on the assertion of the witness.[56] When eyewitnesses are persons of the same village from which the accused hailed, there is no question of any mistaken identity of the accused,[57] though, non-examination of the villagers who tried to intervene in the attack would not affect the veracity of the prosecution case.[58]

127. Evidence of--Eye-witnesses

The testimony of the two eye-witnesses established the accusations against the accused, minor contradictions, variations were not attached importance. The conviction of the accused appellant under s 302, IPC was upheld.[59]2384

Eye-witness(es)

Where the testimony of the eye-witnesses is reliable to record the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC, the fact that co-accused has been acquitted, cannot be a ground for holding that appellant's conviction is infirm.[60]

Where there is no bitterness between the eye-witnesses and the accused, and the evidence of eye-witnesses is clear and reliable, it can form the basis of conviction of accused.[61]

The evidence of closely related eye witnesses that they had seen the accused persons involved in the case with weapons in their hands from a distance of 30 feet was not believed, and FIR being delayed, conviction of the accused persons under s 302, IPC was set aside.[62]

Evidence of a Single Eyewitness

The well-known maxim that 'Evidence has to be weighed and not counted' has been given statutory placement in s 134 of the Evidence Act which provides as under:[63] '134. No particular number of witnesses shall in any case be required for the proof any fact'. Where the prosecution relies on the sole testimony of an eye-witnesses, it should be wholly reliable.[64]

Where the testimony of an eye-witness is otherwise found reliable, his testimony would not be rejected merely because he has not sustained any injury.[65]

Conviction can be based on the testimony of a single witness if he is wholly reliable. Corroboration may be necessary when he is only partially reliable.[66]

This section marks a departure from English law where a number of statutes still prohibit conviction for certain categories of offences on the testimony of a single witness. This difference was noticed by the Privy Council in Mohamed Sunal Esa Mamasn Rer Alalah v King [67] wherein it was laid down as under:

> It was also submitted on behalf of the appellant that assuming the unsworned evidence was admissible the court could not act upon it unless it was corroborated. In England, where provision has been made for the reception of unsworned evidence from a child, it has always been provided that the evidence must be corroborated in some material particular implicating the accused. But in the Indian Act there is no such provision and the evidence is made admissible whether corroborated or not. Once there is admissible evidence a court can act upon its corroboration unless required by statute goes only to the weight and value of the evidence. It is sound rule in practice not to act on the2385 uncorroborated evidence of a child, whether sworn or unsworned but, this is a rule of prudence and not of law.

The Privy Council decision was considered by the Supreme Court in Vadivelu Theuar v State of Madras ,[68] in which it was observed as under:

On a consideration of the relevant authorities and the provisions of the Evidence Act, the following propositions may be safely stated as firmly established:

(1) As a general rule, a court can/may act on the testimony of a single witness though uncorroborated. One credible witness outweighs the testimony of a number of other witnesses of indifferent character.
(2) Unless corroboration is insisted upon by statute, courts should not insist on corroboration except in cases where the nature of the testimony of the single witness itself requires as a rule of prudence, that corroboration should be insisted upon for example, in the case of a child witness, or of a witness whose evidence is that of an accomplice or of an analogous character.
(3) Whether corroboration of the testimony of a single witness is or is not necessary, must depend upon facts and circumstances of each case and no general rule can be laid down in a matter like this and much depends upon the judicial discretion of the judge before whom the case comes.

In view of these considerations, we have no hesitation in holding that the contention that in a murder case, the Court should insist upon plurality of witnesses, is much too broadly stated. Section 134 of the Indian Evidence Act, has categorically laid it down that 'no particular number of witness shall, in any case, be required for the proof of any fact. The Legislature determined, as long ago as 1872, presumably after due consideration of the pros and cons, that it shall not be necessary for proof or disproof of a fact, to call any particular number of witness.

This Court further observed as under:

> It is not seldom that a crime has been committed in the presence of only one witness, leaving aside those cases which are not of uncommon occurrence where determination of guilty depends entirely on circumstances evidence. If the legislature were to insist upon plurality of witnesses cases where the testimony of a single witness only could be available in proof of the crime, would go unpunished. It is here that the discretion of the presiding judge comes into play. The matter thus must depend upon the circumstances of each case and the quality of the evidence of the single witness whose testimony has to be either accepted or rejected. If such a testimony is found by the court to be entirely reliable, there is no legal impediment to the conviction of the accused person on such proof. Even as the guilt of an accused may be proved by the testimony of a single witness, the innocence of the accused person may be established on the testimony of the single witness, even though a considerable number of witnesses may be forthcoming to testify to the truth of the case for the prosecution. Hence, in our opinion, it is a sound and well-established rule of law that the court is concerned with the quality and not with the quantity of the evidence necessary for proving or disproving a fact. Generally speaking, oral testimony in this context may be classified into three categories.
> Namely:
> (1) wholly reliable;
> (2) wholly unreliable;
> (3) neither wholly reliable nor wholly unreliable.2386
> In the first category of proof, the court should have no difficulty in coming to its conclusion either way--it may convict or may acquit on the testimony of a single witness, if it is found to be above reproach or subordination. In the second category, the court equally has no difficulty in coming to its conclusion. It is in the third category of cases, that the court has to be circumspect and has to look for corroboration in material particulars by reliable testimony, direct or circumstantial. There is another danger in insisting on plurality of witness. Irrespective of the quality of the oral evidence of a single witness, if courts were to insist on plurality of witnesses in proof of any fact, they will be indirectly encouraging subordination of witnesses. Situations may arise and do arise where only a single person is available to give evidence in support of a disputed fact. The court naturally has to weigh carefully such a testimony and if it is satisfied that the evidence is reliable and free from all taints which tend to render oral testimony open to the suspicion, it becomes its duty to act upon such testimony. The law reports contain many precedents where the court had to depend and act upon the testimony of a single witness in support of the prosecution.

The above decision in Vadivelu Thevar has been followed in several subsequent cases[69]by the Hon'ble the Supreme Court and by different High Courts. In some other cases,[70] the Supreme Court has considered the question of the sole witness constituting the basis of conviction or otherwise.[71] On a conspectus of these decisions, it clearly comes out that there has been no departure from the principles laid down in Vadivelu Thevar's case,[72] and, therefore, conviction can be recorded on the basis of a statement of a single eyewitness, provided his credibility is not shaken by any adverse circumstance appearing on record against him and the Court at the same time is convinced that he is a truthful witness. The Court will not then insist on corroboration by any other eyewitness particularly as the incident might have occurred at a time or place when there was no possibility of any other eyewitness being present. Indeed, the courts insist on the quality and not the quantity of evidence.[73] Where the evidence of the sole eye-witness is of sterling quality, reliable and trustworthy, it can form the basis of conviction in charge for murder.[74]

If the High Court thought it unsafe to convict any of the accused on the uncorroborated evidence of a single eyewitness, it does not mean that the evidence of the witness stands castigated. It is no stigma against the evidence of any eyewitness, if the Court only wanted an assurance from yet other sources. Corroboration is what2387 the Court requires as a matter of prudence and step of caution.[75] Although, it is permissible for a court to record and sustain a conviction on the evidence of a solitary eyewitness, but at the same time such a course can be adopted only if the evidence tendered by such witness is cogent, reliable and in tune with probabilities, and inspires implicit confidence. By this standard, when the prosecution case rests mainly on the sole testimony of an eyewitness, it should be wholly reliable. Even though such witness is an injured witness and his presence at the place of incident may not be seriously doubted, when his evidence is in conflict with other evidence, it would be unsafe to convict the accused on his sole testimony.[76] Where there are improvements and inconsistencies in the statement of complainant/sole eye-witness made before the Court, the accused would be entitled to benefit of doubt.[77]

Appellant accused and two others had attacked the deceased with patta knife causing a large number of injuries leading to death. Evidence of sole eye-witness was corroborated by medical evidence, and as such was believed. The mere fact that brother of the eye-witness named in FIR was not examined did not affect the prosecution case. Appellant accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[78]

The evidence of the eye witness that he saw the appellant accused attacking the deceased, was corroborated by finger prints, recovery of offence weapon, locket and clothes at the instance of the appellant. The mere fact that one person cannot inflict large number of injuries was held not sufficient ground to rule out involvement of the appellant. The appellant accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[79]

Where the sole eye-witness did not disclose the incident to anyone for almost two years as he was being threatened by the co-accused, and his statement was recorded belatedly, simply because the conviction of the accused was on un-corroborated testimony of the witness on the charge of rape, same was found unsustainable, and was set aside.[80]

Where the eye-witnesses who had seen the occurrence were related to the deceased, and did not inform the police immediately after the occurrence, nor took the victim to the doctor for medical aid, the conduct of the witnesses was found unnatural, thus, the conviction of the accused on the charge of murder was held not proper.[81]

128. Evidence of Independent Witnesses

The examination of independent witnesses in a case is a rule of prudence, though not a rule of law, which depends on whether the independent witnesses were present and saw the occurrence, but are not supporting the prosecution story or that they are withheld by the prosecution. If there are many independent witnesses who are said to have witnessed the occurrence and are not brought to the Court to support the prosecution story then inference can necessarily be drawn, but if the possibility of an2388 independent witness being present and witnessing the occurrence is ruled out, non-examination of the independent witness as such cannot be a ground to disbelieve the prosecution story.[82] A witness is normally to be considered independent unless he or she springs from sources likely to be tainted, and that usually means that the witness has caused such enmity against the accused as to wish to implicate him falsely.[83] It cannot be said that, the evidence of independent witnesses should automatically be believed. The evidence of an independent witness has also to pass the test of being in tune with probabilities, and being trustworthy, and in consequence with attending circumstances. In the instant case, it was found that the testimony of independent witnesses did not pass such test.[84] Where the incident took place in broad daylight but there was nothing on record to show that independent witnesses from the locality had witnessed the same, it was not proper to reject the prosecution evidence on the ground that independent witnesses from the locality were not examined as eyewitnesses.[85] Where the deceased and prosecution witnesses boarded the bus the next morning, the prosecution witness again boarded the said bus, during talks with the prosecution witness, the bus conductor was informed about the murder of the deceased, the bus conductor being an independent person not connected with the accused or the witnesses, there was no reason to doubt his evidence.[86] When the witness examined by the prosecution cannot be held to be interested in the prosecution and inimical to the accused, he must be held to be a wholly disinterested witness.[87] When the occurrence took place in the late hours of the night inside the house, the prosecution cannot be expected to examine independent witness occurrence.[88]

129. Evidence of Tutored Witness

Use of the word 'Pitaji' by a Muslim accused to call his father as per statements of witnesses showed that they were wrongly tutored because it is not language of a Muslim to address his father.[89]

130. Evidence of Hostile Witnesses

It is now a well-settled principle of law that though a witness has been declared hostile, his statement cannot be discarded in toto merely because on a certain point he has chosen not to support the prosecution.[90] It is for the Judge, infact to consider in each case whether as a result of cross-examination and contradiction, the hostile witness stands thoroughly discredited or can still be believed in regard to a part of his testimony.[91] The fact that the public prosecutor after obtaining permission of the Court, asked a question with regard to the role played by the two accused on the basis of the police statement, does not show that the witness was not supporting the prosecution case, on the contrary, this would mean that the witness was truthful and2389 he had not supported his police version with regard to identification of the two accused.[92]

The evidence of a prosecution witness cannot be rejected in toto merely because the prosecution chose to treat him as hostile and cross-examined him. The evidence of such witness cannot be treated as effaced or washed off the record altogether but the same can be accepted to the extent his version is found to be dependable on a careful scrutiny thereof.[93]

Necessity to Prove Previous Statement of Hostile Witnesses

Section 145 of the Evidence Act mandates that if any contradiction in evidence of any witness from his previous statement reduced to writing is intended to be used in the case, the attention of the witness must be called to that particular part of his previous statement. If he admits the previous statement, it is unnecessary to prove it. If he denies the previous statement, such statement has to be proved in an appropriate manner. If this is not done the evidence of the witness cannot be assailed in respect of those statements.[94] In this view of the matter, when contradictory portion has not been proved in accordance with law, the mere fact that the witness has been declared hostile by the prosecution and allowed to be cross-examined does not make him an unreliable witness, so as to exclude his evidence from consideration altogether.[95]

131. Tendering a Witness for Cross-Examination--Not Permissible

The procedure of tendering a witness for cross-examination without his being examined-in-chief is not warranted by law.[96] Permitting the prosecution to tender a witness for cross-examination only would be wrong and the effect of their being tendered only for cross-examination, amounts to the failure of the prosecution to examine them at the trial.[97] The effect of witnesses being tendered only for cross-examination amounts to the failure of the prosecution to examine them at the trial. Their examination, therefore, seriously affects the credibility of the prosecution case and detracts materially from its reliability.[98] Even if a witness was tendered for cross-examination, such tender will not cure the inherent defect of non-examination-in-chief of such witness by the prosecution.[99]

132. Evidence of Child Witness

It is well-settled that the testimony of a child witness should only be accepted with great caution and circumspection. The rationale for this is that it is common experience that a child witness is most susceptible to tutoring. Both on account of fear and aducement, he can be made to depose about things which he has not seen,2390 and once having been tutored, he goes on repeating in a parrot like manner what he has been tutored to state. It is commonly felt and rightly so that such witnesses are the most dangerous witnesses.[1] It would also be relevant to quote Dr Kenny Downing (Professor of the Laws of England Cambridge University) at page 386, in his book, Outlines of Criminal Law:

> Children are a most untrustworthy class of witnesses for when of a tender age as our common experience teaches us, they often mistake dreams for reality, repeat glibly as of their own knowledge what they have heard from others and are greatly influenced by fear of punishment, by hope of reward and desire of notoriety.[2]

The testimony of a child witness should be evaluated with the greatest caution and circumspection. It is common knowledge that there can more dangerous witnesses than children for they live in a world of make-believe, are prone to imagine things, even if they have not seen them; on account of fear or reward they can be made to depose false facts.[3]

The law regarding a child witness is that evidence of a child witness should be accepted with great caution.[4] The legal position is that when a child is a witness, the first step for the judge is to satisfy himself that the child is a competent witness within the meaning of s 118 of the Evidence Act, and competency of the child witness should be ascertained by putting a few questions in order to find out whether the witness is intelligent enough to understand what he has seen, and afterwards to inform the court thereof, and understands the duty of speaking the truth or not. The holding of preliminary inquiry is merely a rule of prudence and not a legal obligation upon the Judge.[5] The decision on the question whether the child witness has sufficient intelligence primarily rests with the trial Judge who notices his manners, his apparent possession or lack of intelligence, and said Judge may resort to any examination which will tend to disclose his capacity and intelligence as well as his understanding of the obligation of an oath. The decision of the Trial Court may, however, be disturbed by the higher Court if from what is preserved in the records, it is clear his conclusion was erroneous. This precaution is necessary because child witnesses are amenable to tutoring and often live in a word of make beliefs.[6] Under s 5 of the Oaths Act, an oath shall be administered to such witness only, who understands the sanctity of the oath. A witness may be a competent witness, though he may not understand the sanctity of the oath, and in such a case s 13 of the Oaths Act becomes applicable, in which the Court refrains from administering the oath to such witness.[7] Nowithstanding s 5 of the Oaths Act, evidence of a child witness is not inadmissible merely on the ground that no oath was administered. However, it is desirable that the Judge Magistrate should record their opinion so that the child witness understands the importance of speaking only the truth and states why he thinks so.

Prosecution case was that the accused came in the field and committed the murder of three accused persons. Only eye-witness was a girl aged 7 years. She was the2391 resident of another village, and had no opportunity of seeing or knowing the accused persons. Mere recovery of motorcycle and wrist watch did not connect the accused with the commission of crime. Accused was given benefit of doubt, and acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[8]

One of the tests to judge the credibility of such solitary witness is the intrinsic quality of of his evidence, independent of other evidence, and if such evidence measures up to the Court's satisfaction it can itself form the basis of conviction. It is only when such evidence does not pass muster that the Court seeks corroboration to draw its conclusion therefrom.[9] When the statement of the child witness was highly reliable and it could not be rejected merely because he was a child, the conviction on the basis thereof was found not illegal.[10] The allegation was that the accused assaulted his wife and the father of the child with stone slab at midnight as he suspected illicit relations between his wife and father of the child. The child witness was the most natural witness, and his evidence was found reliable. There was no reason for false implication. Confessional statement recorded by the Special Executive Magistrate also implicated the accused. Conviction of the accused for offence under s 302, IPC was upheld.[11]

Clear evidence of girl aged 7 years that the accused, her uncle, killed her grandfather was found reliable, thus, conviction under s 302, IPC was upheld.[12]

Testimony of Child Witness--Children of the deceased

The testimony of PW2 and 3, children of the deceased (their mother) was believed, and the accused appellant (their father) was convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[13]

The testimony of a eight old years old son against his father accused for the murder of the mother of the child was found reliable and accused was convicted on the charge of murder.[14]

A child witness is prone to tutoring so the Court should look for corroboration particularly when the evidence betrays traces of tutoring. In the absence of corroboration from independent and reliable evidence, reliance cannot be placed on the testimony of a child witness.[15] When there is no delay in lodging the FIR, and the evidence of the child witness is reliable and truthful and corroborated by evidence of another witness, conviction of the accused can be upheld.[16] A boy of 13 years who2392 has attained the measure of mature understanding, cannot be treated as a child witness.[17] A child aged four years may be found a reliable witness.[18]

When the child witness cogently narrated the incident immediately after the occurrence to his relations, who in turn narrated the incident in court as was narrated to them by the child witness, the evidence of the child witness was found credible.[19] Testimony of child witness is reliable more so when it was corroborated with evidence to recovery and report of the forensic science laboratory.[20] Appellant accused no. 1 had developed illicit relationship with accused no. 2, the wife of the deceased, both strangulated and throttled the deceased with nylon rope causing his death. The testimony of the child witness, daughter of the accused no. 2 (her mother), in the murder of her father was found reliable, and her testimony was corroborated by the recovery of the dead body at the instance of accused no. 2. Conviction of the appellant under s 302, IPC recorded by the Courts below was affirmed.[21]

All grounds of incompetency have been swept away by s 118 under which competency of witnesses is the rule, and their incompetency is the exception. Only incompetency that the section highlights is incompetency from premature or defective intellect. As to infancy, it is not so much the age as the capacity to understand which is the determining factor. No precise age limit can be given, as persons of the same age differ in mental growth and their ability to understand questions and give rational answers. The sole test is whether the witness has sufficient intelligence to depose or whether he can appreciate the duty of speaking the truth. The general rule is that the capacity of the person offered as a witness is presumed, i.e., to exclude a witness on the ground of mental or moral incapacity, the existence of incapacity must be made to appear under s 118, a child is competent to testify if it can understand the questions put to him, and give rational answers.[22] Corroboration is not a rule of practise and hence no corroboration is required if the testimony of the child inspires confidence and there unlikelihood of tutoring and demeanour was found to be straightforward by the Trial Judge.[23] However, when the child witness admitted that he was not only brought to the Court by another person but was also told what to depose, the conviction cannot be based on such evidence of the child witness alone even if it is corroborated by medical evidence.[24]

133. Tutored Witness

The child witness deposed before the Court that she had seen voltage of bulb lighted at a distance of 200 yards, hence, she was a tutored witness, and her evidence was discarded.[25]2393

134. Weapon of Offence not Gotten Identified from Witnesses in Trial--Effect

The three eye-witnesses were not shown the weapons of offence allegedly recovered by two of the accused persons but that fact does not cause any dent in the prosecution case since from the evidence of the eye-witnesses, it can be found that the injuries to the deceased were caused with sharp edged weapons, which according to the eye-witnesses were churis, and also with dandas. The autopsy surgeon had opined that the fatal injury on the back of the chest of the deceased was caused by a sharp cutting penetrating weapon and injury on the chest also was caused by a hand blunt weapon and fist blows. During the investigation the autopsy surgeon had been shown the weapons of offence recovered by accused persons and after seeing those recovered weapons the autopsy surgeon had opined that the injuries sustained by the deceased were possible with those weapons. In these circumstances, the absence of identification of the recovered weapons by the three eye-witnesses in court during their evidence is of no consequence.[26] In the judgment of the Hon'ble Supreme Court in State of Rajasthan v Dhool Singh ,[27] also, a similar objection was raised but was rejected.[28]

135. Evidence of Chance Witness

In a murder trial, by describing the independent witnesses as 'chance witnesses', it cannot be implied thereby that their evidence is suspicious and their presence at the scene doubtful. Murders are not committed with previous notice to witnesses soliciting their presence. If murder is committed in a dwelling house, the inmates of the house are natural witnesses. If murder is committed in a brothel, prostitutes and paramours are natural witnesses. If murder is committed in a street, only passers by will be witnesses. Their evidence cannot be brushed aside or viewed with suspicion on the ground that they are mere 'chance witnesses'. The expression 'chance witnesses' is borrowed from countries where every man's home is considered his castle, and everyone must have an explanation for his presence elsewhere or in another man's castle. It is a most unsuitable expression in a country whose people are less formal and more causal. To discard the evidence of street hawkers and vendors on the ground that they are 'chance witnesses', even where murder is committed in a street, is to abandon good sense and take too shallow a view of the evidence.[29]

In a murder trial, by describing an independent witness as 'chance witness' it cannot be implied thereby that his evidence is suspicious and his presence at the scene doubtful. Murders are not committed with previous notice to witnesses; soliciting their presence. If murder is committed in a dwelling house, the inmates of the house are natural witnesses. If murder is committed in a street, only passersby will be witnesses. Their evidence cannot be brushed aside or viewed with suspicion on the ground that they are mere 'chance witnesses'. The expression 'chance witness' is borrowed from countries where every man's home is considered his castle and everyone must have an explanation for his presence elsewhere or in another man's castle. It is quite unsuitable an expression in a country where people are less formal and more casual, at any rate in the matter explaining their presence.[30] On the sole2394 ground that the witness in question belonged to a different area and had no business to be near the place of occurrence, his evidence should not be disbelieved.[31]

136. Evidence of Approver

An accomplice is a competent witness and his evidence can be accepted, and a conviction may be based on it, if there is nothing significant to reject it as false. However, the rule of prudence, ingrained in the consideration of accomplice evidence, requires independent corroborative evidence first of the offence and next in connecting the accused against whom accomplice evidence is used with the crime. [32]Section 138 of the Evidence Act only says that a conviction is not illegal merely because it proceeds on uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. However, the law is settled, and it is established as a rule of prudence that the testimony of an accomplice if it is thought reliable as a whole, then conviction could be based if it is corroborated by independent evidence, either direct or circumstantial connecting the accused with the crime.[33] When the evidence of an approver relating to the role of the accused has remained uncorroborated in material particulars, it is difficult to accept the evidence of the approver.[34] However, when it is trustworthy and corroborated on material particulars by other witnesses, the, conviction of the accused would be justified.[35] Pardon granted to approvers by a magistrate or a chief-judicial magistrate, after the case is committed to the Court of Sessions is not a curable irregularity, and only a court of sessions is empowered to grant pardon after committing the case to it.[36] For making use of the accomplice, the law provides a specific procedure under ss 306 and 307, CrPC,[37] but when the investigating officer (IO), instead of adopting and adhering to the prescribed procedure, himself decided the matter, and granted pardon to the co-accused, though he was not authorised to do so and also got his statement recorded under s 164, CrPC,[38] the IO did not act in accordance with law.[39] Considering the object and purpose of examining the person accepting tender of pardon as a witness, which is limited, the proceeding which takes place before the Magistrate at that stage is neither an inquiry nor a trial. Therefore, it cannot be said that the approver should have been examined as a witness in open court and not in the chamber, and while being examined by the Magistrate, the accused should also be present and afforded the opportunity to cross-examine the approver. The phrase 'examination of witness' does not necessarily mean examination and cross-examination of that witness.[40]

Evidence of Approver has more Sanctity than a Confession under Section 164 , Code of Criminal

Procedure 1973

The evidence of an approver has more sanctity than a mere confession under s 164, CrPC, because an approver deposes in open court and he is subject to cross-2395examination by the other accused.[41] Adopting the principle of harmonious construction and having regard to the words 'at any stage of investigation or enquiry into or trial of offence' in sub-s (1) of s 306,[42] and the words 'and in the subsequent trial, if any' in sub-s (4) of s 306, CrPC, taken alongwith the directory nature of s 307, CrPC,[43] by use of the word 'may', the Chief Judicial Magistrate and the Sessions Judge have concurrent jurisdiction to grant pardon after commitment of the case to the Court of Sessions.[44]

137. Non-mentioning of Name of Accused by Eyewitness in his Statements under Section 164 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, and at Inquest

Where the eyewitness did not make a mention of the name of one of the accused in his statement record under s 164, CrPC, and also in his statement recorded at the inquest, the accused is entitled to the benefit of the doubt and an acquittal.[45]

138. Discrepancy as to Age of Deceased--Effect

Where the age of the deceased in the post mortem report was given as 26 years, while witnesses stated the age of the deceased as 40 years, the discrepancy with regard to the age of the deceased vis-à-vis the post mortem report was neither drawn to the attention of the doctor, 10 or other witnesses, the said discrepancy in the age was held as not very pertinent as to throw away the entire prosecution case, particularly when the identity of the deceased was not suspected.[46]

139. Signed Statement of Accused before Police

The bar of inadmissibility of a signed statement created by s 162, CrPC, operates not only on statement of witnesses but also on the statement of the accused made to the police officer.[47] Such statement of the accused is inadmissible in evidence.[48]Whenever, handwriting or signature of the accused are required, the investigating officer has to approach the Magistrate having jurisdiction under s 73 of the Evidence Act, and file a requisition for obtaining specimen signatures and handwriting of the accused. There is no law authorising him to directly obtain the signature and handwriting of an accused.[49]

140. Accused as his Own Witness

As per s 315, CrPC,[50] any person accused of an offence before a criminal court shall be a competent witness for the defence, and may give evidence on oath in disproof of the charges made against him or any co-accused at the same trial; provided that the accused shall not be called as a witness except on his own request in writing, and his failure to give evidence shall not be made the subject of any comment by any of the2396 parties or the Court or give rise to any presumption against himself or his co-accused at the same trial.

Accused Admitting Incriminating Circumstance under Section 313 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

In very rare instances, the accused may even admit or own upto incriminating circumstances adduced against him, for the purpose perhaps of adopting legally recognised defences. In all such cases the Court gets the advantage of knowing his version about those aspects, and it helps the Court to effectively appreciate and evaluate the evidence in the case. If an accused admits any incriminating circumstances appearing in evidence against him, there is no warrant that those admissions should altogether be ignored merely on the ground that such admissions were advanced as defence strategy.[51] However, only a part of such statement under s 313, CrPC, cannot be made the sole basis of conviction of the accused.[52]

Sub-section (4) of s 313, CrPC,[53] contains necessary support to the legal position that answers given by the accused during such examination are intended to be considered by the court. The words, 'may be taken into consideration in such inquiry or trial' in sub-s (4), would amount to a legislative guideline for the court to give due weight to such answers, though it does not mean that such answers could be made the sole basis of any finding.[54] Several times has the Supreme Court pointed out that such answers of the accused can be taken into consideration in deciding whether the prosecution evidence can be relied on, and whether the accused is liable to be convicted of the offence he is charged with.[55]

Thus, it is made clear by the Apex Court that the answers of the accused when they contain admission of circumstances against him are not by themselves, delinked from the evidence, to be used for arriving at a finding that the accused had committed the offence.[56]

Non-examination of Accused Under Section 333 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973[57]

Non-examination of the accused under s 313, CrPC, is an irregularity but it would not vitiate the trial unless prejudice is shown to be caused to the accused.[58] The challenge to the conviction based on non-compliance of s 313, CrPC, for first time in the appeal cannot be entertained unless the appellants/accused persons demonstrate that prejudice has been caused to them.[59]2397

141. Non-questioning the Accused under Section 313 , CrPC[60]Regarding any Incriminating Circumstance--Effect

In the case based on circumstantial evidence, the circumstances which were not put to the accused under s 313, CrPC, cannot be used for holding him guilty.[61] In the event of any inadvertent omission on the part of the Court to question the accused on any incriminating circumstance appearing against him, the same cannot ipso facto vitiate the trial unless it is shown that some prejudice was caused to him.[62] The challenge to the conviction based on non-compliance of s 313, for the first time in appeal, cannot be entertained unless the appellants/accused demonstrate that prejudice has been caused to them.[63] It is obligatory on the part of the trial court to examine the accused for the purpose of enabling the accused personally to explain any circumstances appearing in evidence against him. If such opportunity is not afforded, the incriminating pieces of evidence available in the prosecution evidence cannot be relied upon for the purpose of recording conviction of the accused persons.[64]

142. Evidence of Injured Witness

Injured witnesses are those who are injured in the crime committed by the accused. These witnesses are stamped witnesses, whose presence admits no doubt as being themselves victims they would not leave out the real assailant and substitute them with innocent persons.[65] The medical evidence showed that the sole injured eye-witness had received injuries on the previous day of the occurrence. The conviction of accused appellant rested solely on the testimony of the injured witness. Inference drawn that the eye-witness was not present at the time of occurrence. Appellants accused were acquitted of the charges under ss 302 and 324, IPC .[66] It should always be remembered that injuries only insure the presence of witnesses and do not guarantee his/her credibility, even in cases resting on the testimony of injured witnesses; the Court does not convict if it does not find their evidence to be truthful in respect of the substratum of the prosecution case.[67]

The evidence of injured witnesses carries much weight and cannot be thrown away, merely because it is not corroborated by independent witnesses.[68] The evidence of the injured witness stands on a higher footing.[69] When eyewitnesses being inmates of the house in which incident took place were present at the time2398 of incident, their presence being natural, and they also, received injuries at the time of the incident, their evidence is reliable;[70] the credible evidence of the injured, eyewitnesses cannot be discarded on the ground of non-examination of the investigating officer or non-examination of independent witnesses despite the fact that 20 to 25 persons were collected at the spot at the time of the incident.[71]

When the prosecution failed to examine the injured witness and the explanation offered was that the said witness was gained over, no adverse presumption against the prosecution can be drawn under s 114 illust

(g) of the Evidence Act.[72]

It would be practically impossible for any injured witness to exactly notice and memorise which accused was assaulting with the blunt side of the weapon and which accused was causing injuries with the sharp-edged weapon. Even if such statement is made, it may amount to an exaggeration because when a number of assailants are there, injuries are not inflicted in a manner which could exactly be noted by the witness. If one or two injuries are caused and if it is broad daylight, it is quite possible that the same witnesses maybe in a position to note it. However, at 8:30 pm, when the witness herself was receiving injuries, it would not be possible to note and narrate whether the accused were causing injuries to her parents by the blunt or sharp side of the weapon.[73] When the testimony of an injured witness is found reliable regarding involvement of some accused in the murder, even though the witness sought to make an improvement in the course of his disposition by also naming falsely other persons as the accused, his entire evidence for this reason cannot be rejected.[74] The absence of injury reports in respect of injuries on the witnesses can at best be a ground for raising doubt on the point of their receiving injuries. It will not be a ground to discard their entire evidence.[75] Where the evidence of sole injured and related eye-witness was found cogent and reliable, and corroborated by medical evidence, conviction of five appellants accused on the charge of murder was held proper.[76] The evidence of injured person who is examined as a witness lends more credence, because normally he would not falsely implicate a person thereby protecting the actual assailant.[77]

It is not necessary to invariably accept the version of the injured witnesses but it is well settled that greater weight has to be given to the testimony of the injured witnesses.[78]

Where a number of persons are injured witnesses, their evidence cannot be discarded in the absence of strong reasons.[79]2399

One of the Witnesses not Injured--Effect

In a murder case the fact that two of the witnesses were also injured does not make the presence of another witness at the spot doubtful, merely because no injury was caused to her.[80]

143. Rustic witnesses

For every minor discrepancy or slight embellishment in the prosecution version, which does not touch the core of the prosecution case, the entire prosecution version cannot be discarded, if the testimonies of the witnesses are found to be worthy of reliance and have a ring of truth in them. The presence of some discrepancies and minor contradictions in the testimonies of rustic witnesses as a result of prolonged cross-examination is completely natural and only to be expected.[81]

144. Unreliable Witness(es)

As the name would suggest an unreliable witness is the one on whose testimony no reliance can be placed. Such a witness is of no use to the prosecution or defence producing him. A witness(es), is/are unreliable, when:

(i) Being an eyewitness he admits during cross-examination that he did not tell anyone about the occurrance of murder of his employer even to his co-employees, though on the next day of murder he went to his work place.[82]

(ii) His deposition that two of the accused had guns and he identified them by flashing a torch towards them at a distance of 8-10 paces, and the witness was spared by the accused without any harm despite flashing the torch towards them.[83]

(iii) His statement as an eyewitness was recorded belatedly, and despite seeing the gruesome murder he did not inform the mother and father of the deceased or the police, immediately and his presence at the place of occurrance is found doubtful.[84] The eye-witness after seeing the murder, had disappeared and did not inform anyone about the incident. The conviction of the appellant under s 302, IPC was set aside.[85]

(iv) The accused had reached the 'Kothi' and shot dead the victim after taking him out and gunned down another victim who was inside, it was highly improbable that the accused did not care to look at the places where prosecution witnesses were hiding in the small room, and so the presence of witnesses in that room and their version was improbable.[86]

(v) Despite having good relations with the deceased, he, after the accused had given a knife blow to the deceased, did not take the deceased to his aunts2400 place which was nearby, or to a hospital for treatment, or to the police station for lodging a complaint, but disappeared from the spot and appeared only the next evening.[87]

(vi) He did not disclose any information about the incident to anybody till the next day,[88] or for about one and a half days.[89]

(vii) Being a complainant, he stated before the Court that he identified the accused persons except for one but suppressed this fact in the FIR leading to the presumption that he could not identify anybody and had incorrectly named the assailants in the FIR.[90]

(viii) They falsely implicate two of the accused persons who were in jail at the relevant time rendering their evidence wholly unbelievable against other accused persons also.[91]

(ix) They implicated a dead person as one of the accused persons rendering their evidence false against all the accused persons.[92]

(x) There is inconsistency in the version of the eyewitness as towords spoken by the accused before his son fired the shot.[93]

(xi) There are number of infirmities in the evidence of eyewitnesses.[94]

(xii) Being a complainant he had mentioned in his complaint that only 'dongi' was used by the accused, and only in his oral evidence before the Court, after having noticed the nature of the injury, he spoke about the use of a stick by the accused. Secondly, the presence of the witness at the place of incidence was disputed, and even though there were two independent eyewitnesses they were not examined by the prosecution though their statements had been recorded.[95]

(xiii) The act of alleged eye-witness in not reporting matter to police though an assault on his friends took place in his presence is his most unnatural conduct so also the police approaching him only after the accused was arrested.[96]

(xiv) In examination-in-chief, the witness stated that he saw only one assault on the deceased while in cross-examination, he stated that he saw the accused attacked on the deceased twice and both injuries were caused in his presence.[97]

(xv) The evidence of wife of the deceased as witness was that she tried to intervene and protect her husband by covering him but no injury was found on her person and mother of the deceased who was injured in the incident neither speaking about presence of wife of the deceased at the place of the incident nor naming any of the accused as persons who assaulted her and2401 the deceased and evidence of wife was not corroborated by any injured witness.[1]

(xv) The deceased profusely bleeding after receiving the gun shot, eye-witnesses who were accompanying the deceased stated to have carried victim on shoulder but no blood-stains were found on clothes of witnesses.[2]

(xvi) The witnesses, brothers of the deceased stated that on hearing the sound of firing they came out from inside their house and saw the accused running away with a pistol and the deceased lying injured having sustained a gunshot injury, unnatural conduct on part of said witnesses in not taking the deceased who was precariously injured first to hospital makes evidence of witnesses doubtful in view of some other several infirmities also. So, conviction of the accused on the basis of their evidence, not proper.[3]

(xvi) The witness having paralysed legs for past 20 years, not stating in his evidence as to how he went to place of incident which was about more than one furlong away.[4]

145. Evidence of Interested Witnesses

The term 'interested' postulates that the person concerned must have some direct interest in seeing that the accused person is somehow or the other convicted, either because he had some animus with the accused or for some other reason.[5] The fact that the eyewitnesses were known to the younger brother of the deceased is no ground to discard their evidence.[6] As dexterously emphasised by the Supreme Court on many occasions[7] that interested witnesses are not necessarily false witnesses, though the fact that those witnesses have a personal interest or stake in the matter must put the court on its guard, that the evidence of such witnesses must be subjected to close scrutiny and the court must assess the testimony of each important witness and indicate reasons for accepting or rejecting it, and that no evidence should at once be disregarded simply because it came from interested persons.[8] There is no proposition in law that relatives are to be treated as untruthful witnesses. On the contrary, reasons have to be shown when a plea of partiality is raised to show that the witnesses had reason to shield actual culprit and falsely implicate the accused.[9] A witness may be called interested only when he or she derives some benefit from the result of a litigation in decree in a civil case or in seeing an accused person punished. A witness who is a natural one and is the only possible eyewitness in the2402 circumstances of a case cannot be said to be an interested witness.[10] The evidence of the brother of the deceased who was present along with the deceased at the time of the occurrence, who was also an injured witness was believed, and accused was convicted on the charge of murder.[11] The evidence of eye-witness cannot be rejected merely because he is the brother of the deceased.[12] Where the murder takes place during the night inside the house, the wife is the most natural witness, thus, the accused appellant was convicted under s 302, IPC .[13]

The evidence of an eye-witness cannot be rejected merely because he/she is a relation of the deceased. In the case of murder of the father, the testimony of the son was believed, especially when he had sustained injuries.[14]

Where the village is faction-ridden and where there is serious enmity between the parties, as appears in the present case on account of repeated incidents of murders taking place on regular intervals, it is highly unsafe to place reliance upon such interested witnesses whose presence at the scene of occurrence is doubtful.[15]

Conviction of an accused on the sole uncorroborated testimony of an eyewitness, who was not only interested being a cousin of the deceased but also enimical to the accused is liable to be set aside when the material witness though available is not examined and other eyewitness, whose name was mentioned in the FIR was also not examined.[16] In cases of long enmity, it is not unusual to lug in innocent persons.[17]

Evidence of mother about assault by the accused on his son was believed, as the mother would not be interested in allowing the real culprits to go unpunished. The conviction of the accused appellants under ss 302, 147, 148, 302, IPC was upheld.[18]

146. Wife's Role as Eye-Witness

Appellant accused assaulted the deceased by Tangia (axe) in front of the latter's shop in the presence of wife (PW1) of the deceased. The presence of wife (PW1) was natural, and could not be doubted as occurrence took place in the early morning. The appellant accused was named in FIR, which was promptly lodged within 1½ hours of the incident. The conviction of the accused on the evidence of wife (PW1) sole eye witness under s 302, IPC was sustained.[19]

147. Deaf Eye-Witness

Eye-witness was deaf, she was able to read and write, but her statement was recorded in signs and gestures with the help of the interpreter. Her father being an2403 interested witness in the case, the accused respondent was acquitted for offence under s 302, IPC .[20]

148. Non-Examination of Independent Witness(s)

In a faction ridden village, daylight murder of deceased was committed by accused persons armed with spears and axes at Bus stop. The investigating officer deposed before the Court that on that day he went to the place of the incident but none came forward to reveal anything about the case. Due to double murder in the town in a single day, there was tension in the public, and he imposed s 144 CrPC . In such a situation surcharged with tension and fear psychosis, it is not expected of any witness to come and depose about the incident even though they may have seen something. Non-examination of independent witnesses, in such a situation, would be no ground to discard the otherwise creditworthy testimony of PWS found reliable. Conviction under ss 148, 149, 302, IPC was held proper.[21]

Where FIR was ante-timed, there were about 100 persons present on the place of occurrence, but police did not make any effort to join/examine independent witnesses, appellants accused were held entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of charge under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[22]

Where independent witnesses, though available, were not examined in the case, and there was no explanation for the omission by the prosecution, the evidence of the related eye witnesses was found not reliable, thus, conviction of the accused persons on the charge of murder was set aside.[23]

149. Inimical Witness

The evidence of inimical witness cannot be rejected on the ground that he is inimical to the accused, though of course it has to be considered with caution. Murder by gun shot. Accused convicted under s 302, IPC .[24]

150. Evidence of Investigating Officer

The evidence of the IO should not be brushed aside simply because he is a police officer, if his evidence can be characterised as that of a trustworthy witness.[25] In a murder case when the involvement of the accused has been clearly established by the evidence of the eyewitnesses in confirmity with medical evidence and fact stated in the FIR, non-examination by the IO would not fail the prosecution case.[26] Non-seizure of torchlight used by the witness to see the occurrence of murder, by the IO cannot be considered a lapse on the part of the IO, or a ground for impairment of2404 testimony of the eyewitness.[27] Same is the position regarding non-seizure of hurricane lamp from the place of occurrence.[28] When the IO neither entered the time of the statement of witnesses in his diary, nor sent the blood-stained clothes and earth seized from the place of occurrence for examination serologist, these lapses and non-compliance of s 172, CrPC, read with r 164 of the Bihar Police Manual have no adverse effect on prosecution case if no prejudice is caused to be shown to the accused.[29] If the IO did not instruct the person who drew up the site plan to note down certain details, that would not render the testimony of material witnesses unreliable.[30] The credible evidence of injured eyewitnesses cannot be discarded merely on the ground of non-examination by the investigating officer.[31]Even if the investigation is illegal or even suspicious, the rest of the evidence must be scrutinised independently of the impact of it. Otherwise, the criminal trial will plummet to the level of investigating officers ruling the roost. The court must have predominance and pre-eminence in criminal trials over the action taken by investigating officers. Criminal justice should not be made the casuality for wrongs committed by investigating officers. In other words, if the court is convinced that the testimony of a witness to the occurrence is true, the court is free to act on it albeit the investigating officer's role in the case.[32]

Non-examination of Investigating Officer

The non-examination of the IO does not affect the prosecution case adversely when the defence has not been prejudiced by it and when no contradiction has been taken by the defence from the eye witnesses vis-à-vis their statements in court and the statements made by them before the 10 during investigation of the case.[33] In a murder case, when the involvement of the accused has been clearly established by the evidence of eyewitnesses, in conformity with the medical evidence and facts in the FIR, the non-examination by the 10 would not fail the prosecution case.[34] However, when there are discrepancies in the statement of eyewitnesses and the doctor conducting the post-mortem is also not examined, the non-examination of investigating officer would cause prejudice to the case of the defence.[35]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 302.

Punishment for murder.--

151. Evidence of Police officials

The statement of a police officer can be relied upon and even form the basis of conviction when it is reliable, trustworthy and preferably corroborated by other evidence on record.[36] Merely because the eyewitnesses happened to be police officers, it is not a ground to reject their testimony. The acquittal of the accused2405 persons for offences under ss 333 and 452, IPC recorded by the Trial Court was held not proper, and was set aside.[37]

152. Public Witness(es)--Non-Examination of

Once cannot lose sight of the ground realities that the members of the public are generally insensitive and reluctant to come forward to report and depose about the crime even though it is committed in their presence. Even otherwise, it will be erroneous to lay down as a rule of universal application that non-examination of a public witness by itself gives rise to an adverse inference against the prosecution or that the testimony of a relative of the victim, which is otherwise credit-worthy, cannot be relied upon unless corroborated by public witnesses. The conviction of the accused appellants under ss 324 and 329, IPC, was affirmed.[38]

153. Public Prosecutor may give up Witnesses during Trial[39]

Section 134 of the Evidence Act provides that no particular number of witnesses shall in any case be required for the proof of any fact. This provision of law makes it unnecessary to produce any particular number of witnesses to prove a fact in consonance with the maxim 'evidence has to be made and not counted'.

A public prosecutor may give up witnesses during trial to avert proliferation of evidence which could save much time of the court unless examination of such witness would achieve some material views. The witness, if examined, would only have helped in duplication of the same category of evidence as the other two eyewitnesses, the public prosecutor cannot be blamed for adopting the course of not examining him. If the accused thinks that the witness not examined by the prosecution would help the defence, it is open to the accused to examine him as a defends witness.[40] In murder cases, it is primarily for the prosecutor to decide which witness he should call to unfold the prosecution story. If a large number of persons have witnessed the incident it would be open to the prosecutor to make a selection of those witnesses, but the selection must be made fairly and honestly and not with a view to suppress inconvenience from the witness box.[41] Similar sentiments were echoed by the Apex Court in some other cases.[42]

When the prosecution failed to examine the injured witness and the explanation offered was that the said witness was gained over, no adverse presumption against the prosecution can be drawn under s 114, illust (g) of the Evidence Act.[43] It is clear from s 231, CrPC, that the public prosecutor is expected to produce evidence 'in support of the prosecution' and not in derogation of the prosecution case. If there are2406 too many witnesses on the same point, the public prosecutor is at liberty to choose two or some among them alone so that the time of the Court can be saved from repetitious depositions on the same factual aspects. Similarly, when there are too many injured witnesses, applying the same principle, the public prosecutor is not obliged to examine all of them if he is satisfied by examining any two or three of them, it is open to him to inform the Court that he does not propose to examine the remaining persons in that category to avoid repetition of evidence on the same point and to lessen the work load of the Court.[44]

154. Two Categories of Witnesses--Duty of Prosecutor

The situation in a case where the prosecution cited two categories of witnesses to the occurrence, one consisting of persons closely related to the victim and the other consisting of witnesses who have no such relation, the public prosecutor's duty to the Court may require him to produce witnesses from the latter category, also subject to his discretion to limit to one or two among them. But if the public prosecutor received reliable information that any one among that category would not support the prosecution version he is free to state such fact in court excuse the witness from being examined as a prosecution witness. It is open to the defence to cite him and examine him as a defence witness. The decision in this regard has to be taken by the public prosecutor in a fair manner. He can interview the witness beforehand to eanble him to know well in advance the stand which that particular person would be adopting when examined as a witness in court.[45]

Evidence of Senior Police Officers as Defence Witnesses on Basis of Case Diary

etc. should not be Allowed by the Court

Where in a murder case the deputy superintendent of police and the additional district superintendent of police were examined as defence witnesses, to testify that they had perused the case-diary prepared by the IO, and interrogated some of the accused and other persons and on such exercise found that three of the accused were innocent, the Apex Court held that the Court ought not to have permitted the defence to adduce this evidence as it is not legally admissible. It was also observed that if the result of investigation was to be made the basis of the Court's verdict regarding the guilt or innocence of an accused, there would be no need for a trial in a police case, for relying on the report submitted under s 173(2), CrPC, a court would be entitled to decide the fate of the person arraigned.[46]

155. Evidence of Stock Witness

In Prem Chand v UOI ,[47] the Apex Court while inviting attention to the perils likely to be caused to the judicial process if professional perjurers are kept captive by the police, to be pressed into service for proving 'cases', condemned in the strongest terms, the systematic pollution of the judicial process and the consequent threat to human rights of innocent persons. The Supreme Court further emphasised the need for the state to issue clear orders to the police department to free the process of2407 investigation and prosecution from the contamination of concoction through the expediency of stock filing of stock witnesses.

A person who has given evidence on behalf of the police more than 23 times in the court of law, would clearly expose the fact that he was a stock witness readily available in the hands of the police. The evidence of such a witness is highly doubtful as he seems to be a false witness utilised by the police to give evidence in support of the prosecution case.[48] The evidence of persons appearing as prosecution witnesses, four or five times in police cases, hardly carries any value in court.[49]

156. Evidence of Reliable Witnesses Establishing the Presence of other Witnesses

When the Trial Court accepted evidence of two witnesses establishing the presence of other eyewitnesses at the place of incident, the presence of such other witnesses cannot be doubted by it merely on the ground that they were not residents of the same locality or on the ground of failure of police to seize their blood stained clothes or to promptly examine them under s 161, CrPC .[50]

157. Delayed Examination of Eye-Witness under Section 161CrPC

In the presence of the wife PW1 (First informant) when she along with her deceased husband was waiting at the bus stand, the accused appeared, assaulted the deceased with knives causing death. FIR was filed by wife (PW1) instantly, but her statement under s 161, CrPC was recorded after 13 days, and the delay was not explained. In the inquest report name of the informant was entered in different ink which showed that when the inquest report was prepared, FIR had not been filed. Accused was held entitled to benefit of doubt, and acquitted of charge under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[51]

158. Evidence of Witness cannot be Discarded on the Plea that Police Statement was given under Threat

The plea that the witness had given her police statement under threat that if she did not give such statement she would be involved in the incident, so no reliance whatsoever should be placed on her evidence, and such evidence cannot be accepted. It is difficult to appreciate how for this reason the evidence given by the witness in the Court could be discarded. The witness being the wife of the younger brother of the accused, it was quite likely that she did not want to state in the Court all that she had stated before the police and therefore, deposed about those facts which she could not have denied.[52]

Eyewitnesses not Stating under Section 161 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, which blow was given by which Accused

When eyewitnesses had received injuries during the very incident; and therefore, their presence at the time of incident has to be believed, merely because they have2408 not stated in their statements under s 161, CrPC which blow was given by which accused, their evidence cannot be discarded if it is found to be otherwise reliable.[53]

Witness not Confronted with Statement under Section 161 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973--Court cannot Draw Adverse Inference Regarding Statement of Witness--Correct Procedure to be Followed

Section 162, CrPC[54] interdicts the views of any statement recorded under s 161, CrPC except for the limited purpose of contradicting the witness examined in the trial to whom such statement is attributed.[55] However, s 162, CrPC does not impair the special powers of the Court under s 165 Indian Evidence Act[56] which authorises the Court to question a witness in order to secure the ends of justice,[57] but it must be remembered that the said procedure can be followed only when the witness is in the box. Bearing the above two modes and statement recorded under s 161, CrPC, can only remain fastened up at all stages of the trial in respect of that offence. In other words, if the Court has not put any question to the witness with reference to his statement recorded under s 161, CrPC, it is impermissible for the Court to use that statement later even for drawing any adverse impression regarding the evidence of that witness. What is interdicted by the Parliament in direct terms cannot be obviated in any indirect manner.[58] The correct procedure to be followed would assume to be to first ask the witness whether he/she made the previous statement. If the witness returns the answer in the affirmative, the previous statement in writing need not be proved and the cross-examiner may, if he so chooses leave it to the party who called the witness to have the discrepancy, if any, explained in the course of re-examination. If on the other hand, the witness denies having made the previous statement attributed to him or states that he does not remember having made any such statement, and it is desired to contradict him by the record of the previous statement, the cross-examiner must read out to the witness the relevant portion or portions of the record which are alleged to be contradictory to his statement in court and give him an opportunity to reconcile the same if he could.[59] Merely allowing the public prosecutor to cross-examine the witness without inviting the attention of the witness to his earlier contrary statement under s 161, CrPC is of no use.[60]

159. Statements under Section 161 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 of the Witness in two Different Incidents

Where the statement of a witness is recorded under s 161, CrPC, in two incidents though one incident has followed the other, they did not overlap each other and both incidents were distinct and separate, the statements made before the 10. Cannot be used for the purpose of cross-examining a witness within the meaning of the first part of s 145 of the Evidence Act to establish a contradiction between one statement and another.[61]2409

160. Two Sets of Contradictory Witnesses

Where there is evidence of two sets of witnesses and each set contradicts the other, both sets of witnesses stand discredited and therefore cannot be relied upon.[62]

Where there is major discrepancy and contradiction between statements of one witness and the other, it not only creates a grave suspicion regarding an accused person being part of the offence but also make his presence doubtful at the place of occurrence.[63]

161. Evidence of Defence Witnesses

Defence witnesses are entitled to equal treatment with those of the prosecution, and courts ought to overcome their traditional instinctive disbelief in defence witnesses. 'Quite often they tell lies but so do the prosecution witnesses'.[64]

162. Reliability and Credibility of a Witness

It is not that every discrepancy or contradiction that matters much, in the matter of assessing the reliability and credibility of a witness or the truthfulness of his version. Unless the discrepancies and contradictions are so material and substantial, and are in respect of vitally relevant aspects of the facts deposed, the witnesses cannot straightaway be condemned and their evidence discarded in its entirety.[65]

Evidence of Statement of Person in another Criminal Case

The copy of statement of a person in another criminal case, who is not examined in the later case cannot be relied upon by the Court to disbelieve the presence of eyewitness at the time of occurrence.[66]

Reaction of Witnesses on Seeing the Incident

Criminal courts should not expect a set reaction from any eyewitness on seeing an incident like murder. If five persons witness one incident, there could be five different types of reactions from each of them. It is neither a tutored impact nor a structured reaction which the eyewitness can make. It is fallacious to suggest that witnesses would have done this or that on seeing the incident. Unless the reaction demonstrated by an eyewitness is so improbable or so inconceivable from any human being pitted in such a situation it is unfair to dub his reactions as unnatural.[67] Thus, the disbelief by the High Court of the statement of an eyewitness on the ground that during the incident she did not shout or cry but remained calm, was found not proper.[68] No fixed pattern of natural conduct can be laid down as different as a2410 witness would react in a different manner in the same situation.[69] Conduct of the mother who did not raise a hue and cry when she found that her son was shot at or atleast when she apprehended that the assailant was about to shoot her son cannot be said to be unnatural.[70]

Even Corroborated Evidence of three Eyewitnesses not Enough to Prove Guilt when Large Number of Accused are Involved

Where a large number of people are accused of committing a crime and are said to be charged with the aid of s 149, IPC, the Court should be extremely careful in scrutinising the evidence, and prudence demands in such cases that the prosecution case should be supported by two, three or more witnesses who give a consistent account of the incident.[71] Where it is seen that a large number of people exceeding 500 in number were alleged to have taken part in this incident and nearly 22 prosecution witnesses have supported this part of the prosecution case in which the courts below believed the case of the prosecution in regard to only 36 of them, who have been convicted for their part in the second incident. Taking into consideration the nature of the attack and the possibility or otherwise of identification of these accused persons by the prosecution witnesses, and bearing in mind the principles laid down by this court in the above-cited judgments, it is not safe to rely on the evidence of witnesses who speak generally and in an omnibus way without specific reference to the identity of the individuals and their specific overt acts in regard to the incident that took place in the Harijan Basti. In view of the large number of accused implicated in this incident and the simultaneous nature of attack as stated by the prosecution witnesses, as a rule of prudence it is necessary to fix a minimum number of witnesses needed to accept the prosecution case to base a conviction.[72] When the three prosecution witnesses have implicated all the accused persons and though the presence of the witnesses at the place of the incident cannot be doubted, it is difficult to accept that the three witnesses could have noticed and identified all the accused numbering 64, out of nearly 500 participants in the incident. Likewise, conviction cannot be based on the testimony of the three witnesses. However, if evidence of these three witnesses is supported/corroborated by one or more reliable witnesses, then the conviction of the accused can be safely based.[73]

Contradiction between Statements of Witnesses

The insignificant contradiction in the testimony of the witnesses as to whether the victim received knife blows in standing or lying posture should be ignored.[74]

Witness Narrating Incident to Other Witness--Corroboration of Their Testimony

In Smt Chander Kala v Ram Kishan ,[75]an incident which took place on 10 March was narrated by the victim to some of her colleagues on 11 March and it was held that the testimony of her colleagues was admissible under s 157 of the Evidence Act and2411 could be used for the purpose of seeking corroboration to the testimony of the victim. Thus, the testimony of the prosecution witness who had reached immediately after the incident had happened and to whom the other prosecution witness had narrated the incident and the role played by the three accused persons in causing the death of his brother by firing upon him can be used for corroboration to the testimony of the said other witness.[76]

Evidence of two Eyewitnesses who did not see each Other

Where the two eyewitnesses produced by the prosecution stated that they saw the accused giving a death blow to the deceased while they were ploughing their field, and yet saw that other witnesses were not present, a reasonable doubt about the presence of either of the two witnesses at the scene of occurrence would create a serious doubt in the mind of a reasonable man regarding presence of these witnesses as to whether there was any eyewitness to the incident.[77]

Evidence of Witness with Weak Eyesight

It is unsafe to convict the accused on the sole testimony of an eyewitness who admits his eyesight to be weak and does not depose to any of injury inflicted, nor what has been done by other accused persons.[78]

Evidence of Advocate Conducting Defence Case

Where learned counsel was conducting the defence case, right from the beginning till defence witnesses were examined, and at the stage of final arguments an application was filed on the behalf of the defence where this advocate entered as a defence witness, the trial court simply observed that this advocate was an interested witness and if he had personal knowledge in the matter, he should not have conducted the defence in the case; but the Division Bench of the High Court of Allahabad took a serious view, observing that it was not befitting his noble profession to have conducted the defence in the case, when he knew fully well that he was a witness to suggest innocence of the accused and when he had sworn an affidavit at the initial stage of the proceedings, the High Court directed that a report in this regard must be made to the Bar Council by the sessions judge for appropriate action against the concerned advocate who had failed to maintain the high standard of professional ethics.[79]

Evidence of Witness cannot be Contradicted by Citing another Witness

The general rule of evidence is that no witness shall be cited to contradict another witness if the evidence is intended only to shake the credit of another witness.

The said rule incorporated in s 153 of the Evidence Act has only two exceptions. One is that if the witness denies having been previously convicted, then evidence can be adduced to prove that he was convicted. The other exception is the following:

"...

Exception 2.--If a witness is asked any question tending to impeach his impartiality, and answers it by denying the facts suggested, he may be contradicted.2412

Illustration (d) cited in s 153 amplifies the aforesaid exception no 2. That illustration is extracted below:

...

(d) A is asked whether his family has not had a blood feud with the family of B against whom he gives evidence. He denies it.

He may be contradicted on the ground that the question tends to impeach his impartiality."

The basic requirement for adducing such contradictory evidence is that the witness whose impartiality is sought to be contradicted with the help of such evidence, should have been asked about it and he should have denied it. Without adopting such preliminary recourse it would be meaningless, if not unfair, to bring in a new witness to speak something fresh about a witness already examined.[80] The rule limiting the right to call evidence to contradict a witness on collateral issues excludes all evidence of facts which are incapable of affording any reasonable presumption or inference as to the principal matter in dispute.[81] As the general rule of evidence is one of prohibiting evidence on collateral issues and since it is only by way of exception that such evidence can be permitted, the Court must guard that the defence evidence falls strictly within the exception.[82]

Evidence of Eyewitnesses Attracted to the Spot by Dogs Barking

Where one of the witnesses stated that she was awakened only by the barking of dogs who used to be unchained during night hours, and further stated that the dogs stopped barking immediately after the firing, which was most unusual, all the eyewitness were attracted to the spot by the barking of dogs and it appeared that the barking of dogs was introduced in evidence purposely, and it would have been proved, then a mention of this ought to have been there in the FIR; this serious omission in the FIR created a grave doubt in the witnesses having been awakened before the victim was fired upon, making the witness unreliable.[83]

Conduct of Eyewitness in Not Saving the Deceased

The conduct of the eyewitness in not making any attempt to save the deceased who was his grandmother and with whom he was living is not natural. The explanation of the witness that he was frightened due to the sudden attack is also not normal or natural as he was healthier than the accused. His natural instinct and normal conduct would have been to take all steps to save his grandmother, particularly when he had been called to live with her in her hut and cultivate her land.[84]

Unnatural Conduct of Witness

Merely because the evidence of father of the deceased shows that he acted in an unnatural manner, i.e., he left the spot seeing his son being attacked and did not return for a long period, per se, is not a determinative factor to throw out otherwise cogent prosecution evidence. Every person cannot act or react in a particular or very same way and it would depend upon the mental set up of the person concerned and the extent and nature of fear generated and consequently on the spot his reaction in a2413 particular way has to be viewed on the totality of all such circumstances.[85] The conduct of husband of the deceased in not taking her to hospital and not lodging report was not unnatural as their marriage took place only 21/2-3 months prior to incident and Gauna had not taken place, more so, he was threatened by the accused.[86] The witnesses, brothers of the deceased stated that on hearing the sound of firing they came out from inside their house and saw the accused running away with a pistol and the deceased lying injured having sustained a gunshot injury, unnatural conduct on part of said witnesses in not taking the deceased who was precariously injured first to hospital makes evidence of witnesses doubtful in view of some other several infirmities also. So, conviction of the accused on the basis of their evidence, not proper.[87] The prosecution case for establishing motive was that the accused was harassing mother of the deceased and had been rebuked for that. It was also stated that on several occasions the accused wanted to sexually assault the mother of deceased and to ensure that she is not left alone, the deceased was asked to accompany her. In this background it is improbable and unnatural that mother of the deceased would permit the deceased to go with the accused and would not take any precaution when she claimed to have seen the deceased in the company of the accused.[88]

163. Recalling of Witness for Cross-examination

In a serious case of murder when the accused persons were given sufficient opportunity to cross-examine the witness, and if during cross-examination the criminal was not put questions which ought to have been put, cannot give the accused persons the right under s 311, CrPC,[89] to recall the witnesses for cross-examination.[90] When an application is filed by the defence for recalling a witness under s 311, CrPC, the Court has to satisfy itself with the reasons assigned for recalling the witness. The practice of recalling witnesses should be deprecated.[91]

Prosecution Witness Stating Accused (With 60 Percent Disability) Ran Away

Where one of the accused was afflicted by polio on his lower limbs with nearly 60 percent disability in his legs due to which he was hardly able to stand or walk, the statement of the witness that he ran away from the place of incidence cannot be treated as false, solely on the ground that the word used by him was that the accused also ran away; what the witness actually meant was that the accused alongwith other assailants left the place of the incident before the sarpanch could come to the place of the incident. Further, the prosecution story that the accused with the disability caught hold of the hands of an adult lady right through the assault, is also reliable as disability was confined only to the legs of the accused and was only in regard to his walking.[92]2414

164. Affidavits of Prosecution Witnesses in Advance

Where the defence side examined a notary public who gave evidence that PW1 to PW10 had visited his office, and sworn affidavits, the contents of which were read out by him to these witnesses and these affidavits were filed before the sessions court in a murder case. The defence also examined a municipal councellor who claimed to have identified these witnesses, and another defence witness, a fingerprint expert, was examined to prove thumb impressions of witnesses PW1 to PW10 on the affidavits. In these affidavits PW1 to PW10 stated that they did not see the occurrence. However, when confronted with the affidavits, these witnesses denied them. The practise adopted by the defence side in getting the affidavits of these witnesses in advance is to be deprecated. That, in a way, amounts to an attempt aimed at dissuading the witnesses from speaking the truth before the Court. The witnesses also appeared to be illiterate. Their so called affidavits must have been either concocted or obtained by playing fraud on them. This type of interference in criminal justice is not be encouraged and is to be viewed seriously.[93]

165. Evidence of Criminal Witness

The admitted position of law is that enmity is a double edged weapon which can be a motive for the crime as also a ground for false implication of accused persons. In case of inimical witnesses, the courts are required to scrutinise their testimony with anxious care to find out whether their testimony inspires confidence, to be acceptable notwithstanding the existence of enmity. Where enmity is proved to be the motive for the commission of the crime, the accused cannot be urge that despite proof of motive of the crime, the witnesses proved to be inimical should not be relied upon. Bitter animosity is a double edged weapon instrumental for false involvement or for witnesses inferring and strongly believing that the crime must have been committed by the accused. Such possibility has to be kept in mind while evaluating the prosecution witnesses regarding the involvement of the accused in the commission of the crime. Testimony of eyewitnesses, which is otherwise convincing and consistent, cannot be discarded simply on the ground that the deceased were related to the eyewitnesses or previously there were some disputes between the accused and the deceased or the witnesses. The existence of animosity between the accused and the witnesses may, in some cases, give rise to the possibility of the witnesses exaggerating the role of some of the accused or trying to rope in more persons as accused persons for the commission of the crime. Such possibility is required to be ascertained on the facts of each case. However, the mere existence of enmity in the case, particularly when it is alleged as a motive for the commission of the crime cannot be made a basis to discard or reject the testimony of the eyewitnesses, the deposition of whom is otherwise consistent and convincing.[94]

Evidence of Eyewitnesses giving Different Versions of Colour of the Cow--Its Effect

Where in a murder case, one witness stated the colour of the cow to be white, another witness stated that the colour was 'dhawar', and still another witness stated its colour as 'sokan' the different versions of colour of the cow assigned by prosecution witnesses cannot be a ground to throw away the presence of witnesses, the factum of2415 the witnesses milching cow at the place and time of occurrence has been clearly established and in such a melee, the witnesses may not be mindful of the colour of the cow.[1]

(XIII) CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

166. Bride Burning Cases

The fact that after deceased suffered burn injuries appellant himself carried her to hospital for treatment and remained present there throughout, until she expired, militates against the idea of his culpability. Appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[2]

167. Accused not named in FIR--Acquitted

Accused appellant was not named in FIR by informant who was an eye-witness. His name was disclosed by him in Court. Other witnesses who named him were examined under s 161, CrPC with delay. No specific role was attributed to the accused appellant. He was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[3]

168. Circumstantial Evidence

Circumstantial evidence is that which relates to a series of other facts than the fact in issue; but which by experience have been found so associated with the fact in issue in relation of cause and effect that it leads to a satisfactory conclusion. It is one of the established principles of law that a witness may lie but not the circumstances.[4]

Death by violence may be proved by circumstantial evidence,[5] but it is well settled that when evidence against an accused person consists only of circumstantial evidence, and not of direct oral evidence, it must be qualitatively such that on every reasonable hypothesis the conclusion must be that the accused is guilty.[6] In other words, in every case dependent wholly on circumstantial evidence, the court before recording a conviction on the basis of such evidence, must be firmly satisfied,[7] that:2416

(a) the circumstances, from which the inference of guilt is to be drawn, have been fully established by unimpeachable evidence beyond a shadow of doubt;[8]
(b) the circumstances are of determinative tendency, unerringly pointing towards the guilt of the accused; and
(c) the circumstances, taken collectively, are incapable of explanation on any reasonable hypothesis except that of the guilt sought to be proved against him.

Child was left in the custody of the accused persons, and the dead body was found buried in the premises of the accused persons. No explanation by way of suggestion in cross examination or in the examination under s 313, CrPC was offered as to how the dead body was found buried in the hut of the accused which was in his exclusive use. It is now settled law that if the deceased was in the custody or in the company of the accused, then the accused must supply some explanation regarding the disappearance of the deceased. The conviction of the accused appellants under s 302, IPC was affirmed.[9]

No presumption against an accused can be drawn unless the circumstances proved are completely incompatible with the innocence of the accused.[10]

Rules to be Observed in Cases of Circumstantial Evidence

Sir Alfred Wills in his admirable book Wills Circumstantial Evidence lays down (in ch VI) the following rules specially to be observed in cases of circumstantial evidence: (1) the facts alleged as the basis of any legal inference must be clearly proved and beyond reasonable doubt connected with the factum probandum; (2) the burden of proof is always on the party who asserts the existence of any fact, which infers legal accountability; (3) in all cases, whether of direct or circumstantial evidence the best evidence must be adduced which the nature of the case admits; (4) in order to justify the inference of guilt, the inculpatory facts must be incompatible with the innocence of the accused and incapable of explanation, upon any other reasonable hypothesis than that of his guilt; and (5) if there be any reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused, he is entitled as of right to be acquitted.[11]

Test to be Satisfied by Circumstantial Evidence

In Padala Veera Reddy v State of AP ,[12] it was laid down that when a case rests upon circumstantial evidence, such evidence must satisfy the following tests:2417

(1) the circumstances from which an inference of guilt is sought to be drawn, must be cogently and firmly established;
(2) those circumstances should be of a definite tendency unerringly pointing towards guilt of the accused;
(3) the circumstances, taken cumulatively, should form a chain so complete that there is no escape from the conclusion that within all human probability the crime was committed by the accused and none else; and
(4) the circumstantial evidence in order to sustain conviction must be complete and incapable of explanation of any other hypothesis than that of guilt of the accused and such evidence should not only be consistent with the guilt of the accused but should be inconsistent with his innocence.[13]

Two Inferences Emerging from Circumstantial Evidence

In State of UP v Ashok Kumar Srivastava ,[14] it was pointed out that great care must be taken in evaluating circumstantial evidence and if the evidence relied on is reasonably capable of two inferences, the one in favour of the accused must be accepted. It was also pointed out that the circumstances relied upon must be found to have been fully established and the cumulative effect of all the facts so established must be consistent only with the hypothesis of guilt.[15]

169. Essential Ingredients

The essential ingredients to prove guilt of an accused person by-circumstantial evidence are:

(i) the circumstances from which the conclusion is drawn should be fully proved;
(ii) the circumstances should be conclusive in nature;
(iii) all facts so established should be consistent only with the hypothesis of guilt inconsistent with innocence;
(iv) the circumstances should be to a moral certainty and exclude the possibility of guilt of any person other than the accused.[16]

In the case of Tarsem Kumar v Delhi Admn ,[17] the Hon'ble the Supreme Court has held as under:

> When the case of prosecution solely rests on circumstantial evidence, the court has to be satisfied that (i) the circumstances from which conclusion of guilt is to be drawn has been fully established; (ii) all the facts so established are consistent only with the hypothesis of guilt of the appellant and they do not exclude any other hypothesis except the one sought to be proved; (iii) the circumstances on which reliance has been placed are conclusive in nature; and (iv) the chain of the evidence in the present case is such that there is no scope for any reasonable ground for a conclusion consistent with the innocence of the accused.2418

Panchsheel of Circumstantial Evidence

The Panchsheel of proof of a case based on circumstantial evidence, which are usually called the five golden principles, has been stated by the Apex Court and reiterated by the High Courts.[18] They read as follows:

(1) The circumstances from which the conclusion of guilt is to be drawn should be fully established, as distinguished from 'may be' established;
(2) The facts so established should be consistent only with the hypothesis of the guilt of the accused, that is to say, they should not be explainable on any other hypothesis except that the accused is guilty;
(3) The circumstances should be of a conclusive nature and tendency;
(4) They should, exclude every possible hypothesis except the one to be proved; and
(5) There must be a chain of evidence so complete as not to leave any reasonable ground for the conclusion consistent with the innocence of the accused and must show that in all human probability the act must have been done by the accused.

170. Distinction Between Circumstantial and Direct Evidence

As evidence, there is no difference between direct and circumstantial evidence. The only difference is in that as proof, the former directly establishes the commission of the offence whereas the latter does so by placing circumstances which lead to irresistible inference of guilt.[19]

171. Circumstantial Evidence--Cumulative Effect of all Proved Facts Decisive

While appreciating circumstantial evidence, the Court has to adopt a very cautious approach, and should record a conviction only if all the links in the chain are complete, pointing to the guilt of the accused, and every hypothesis of innocence is capable of being negatived on evidence. Great care must be taken in evaluating circumstantial evidence and if the evidence relied on is reasonable, capable of two inferences, the one in favour of the accused must be accepted. The circumstances relied upon must be found to have been fully established and the cumulative effect of all the facts so established must be consistent with the hypothesis of guilt. However, this is not to say that the prosecution must meet any and every hypothesis put forward by the accused howsoever far fetched and fanciful, nor does it mean that prosecution evidence must be rejected on the slightest doubt.[20]

It is a settled principle of law that circumstances relied upon by the prosecution must be fully established, and the chain of evidence furnished by these circumstances should be fully complete so as not to leave any reasonable ground for a conclusion consistent with the innocence of the accused. In a case of circumstantial evidence, not only various links of evidence should clearly establish guilt of the accused, but it must also be such as to rule out reasonable likelihood of innocence of the accused. Where the various links satisfactorily make out a case and the circumstances point to2419 the accused as the probable assailant with reasonable definiteness and while pointing to the accused as regards the time and situation, and the accused offers no explanation, which if accepted, though not proved, would afford a reasonable basis for a conclusion on the entire case consistent with his innocence then such absence of explanation or false explanation would itself be an additional link which completes the chain. However, at the same time it has to be kept in mind that it does not mean by implication, that before the prosecution can succeed in a case resting upon circumstantial evidence alone it must meet any and every hypothesis suggested by the accused, however extravagant and fanciful it might be. In other words, when deciding the question of and sufficiency, what the Court has consider is the cumulative effect of all proved facts, each one which reinforces the conclusion of guilt and the combined effect of all those facts taken together if conclusive, and establishes the guilt of the accused, conviction would be justified even though it may be that any one or more of these facts by itself is not decisive.[21] In order to justify an inference of guilt, the circumstances from which such an inference is sought to be drawn, must be incompatible with the innocence of the accused. The cumulative effect of the circumstances must be such as to negate innocence of the accused and to bring home the offence beyond any reasonable doubt. Where the accused on being asked, offers no explanation or the explanation offered is found to be false, then that itself forms an additional link in the chain of circumstances to point the guilt.[22]

In a case based on circumstantial evidence, it is now well settled that circumstances from which the conclusion of guilt is to be drawn should be fully proved and those circumstances must be conclusive in nature to connect the accused with the crime. All the links in the chain of events must be established beyond reasonable doubt and the established circumstances should be consistent only with the hypothesis of guilt of the accused and totally inconsistent with his innocence. In a case based on circumstantial evidence the court has to be on its guard to avoid the danger of allowing suspicion to take the place of legal proof and has to be watchful to avoid the danger of being swayed by emotional considerations, however strong they may be, to take the place of proof. It is in the context of the above settled principles, that an analysis of the evidence led by the prosecution is made.[23]

Appellant accused mother killed her own 4 years old son with axe. She was seen near the dead body holding axe in her hand. Evidence of close relatives of the accused who deposed against her was found reliable, and as such believed. Prosecution case was corroborated by report of post-mortem. The plea of the Counsel for the accused that a mother would not commit the murder of her own son was discarded. She was convicted under s 302, IPC .[24]

Where the accused and the deceased (niece of the accused) alone were present inside the house when the incident took place, the prosecution story that it was the appellant who had first shot the deceased and then attempted to commit suicide, stood proved. Accused was convicted on the charge of murder.[25] Both the appellant accused and the deceased spent a night together prior to the date of the incident.2420 There was also evidence that an altercation took place between the two. Injuries were found on the body of the deceased, and a rope was seized. Dead body was cremated hurriedly without giving any information to police. Appellant accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[26]

The initial burden of proof is on the prosecution to bring sufficient evidence pointing towards guilt of accused. However, in case of last seen together, the prosecution is exempted to prove exact happening of the incident as the accused himself would have special knowledge of the incident and thus, would have burden of proof as per s 106 of the Indian Evidence Act . Therefore, last seen together itself is not a conclusive proof but along with other circumstances surrounding the incident, like relations between the accused and the deceased, enmity between them, previous history of hostility, recovery of weapon from the accused etc., non-explanation of death of the deceased may lead to a presumption of guilt.[27]

On basis of two circumstances i.e. motive of the appellants and that the death of the deceased was homicidal in nature, a suspicion may arise against the appellants that they were the persons who killed the deceased. However, suspicion cannot take the place of a valid evidence. The appellants could not be convicted on the basis of suspicion. Appellants were acquitted of the charge under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[28]

172. Circumstantial Evidence--Evidence of 'Last seen together'

The theory of being last seen together is one where two persons are seen together alive and after an interval of time, one of them is found alive and the other dead.[29] The circumstance that the accused and the deceased were last seen together alone is not sufficient to bring home the offence to the accused, particularly when there has been no motive proved which could have goaded the accused to kill the deceased.[30] The last seen evidence would not necessarily mean that the accused had killed his wife.[31] In prosecution for offence of murder the mere fact the accused and the deceased (the real brother of the accused) were together in the field prior to the occurence does not by itself lead to the irresistable inference that the accused must have murdered the deceased. Though it is ordinarily believed that when a person is accused of committing murder, the fact that the accused and the deceased were last seen together in the company of each other, and the failure of the accused to satisfactorily account for the disappearance of the deceased is considered a circumstance of incriminating character. However, that itself is not sufficient unless the same is established beyond reasonable doubt that the accused must have caused the death of the deceased.[32] The deceased was seen in the company of the accused by the mother of the deceased, one witness and shopkeeper. There was property dispute between the accused and the deceased. The blood found on the clothes of the accused2421 was of the blood group of the deceased. Conviction of the accused for offence under s 300, IPC was held proper.[33] The initial burden of proof is on the prosecution to bring sufficient evidence pointing towards guilt of accused. However, in case of last seen together, the prosecution is exempted to prove exact happening of the incident as the accused himself would have special knowledge of the incident and thus, would have burden of proof as per s 106 of the Indian Evidence Act . Therefore, last seen together itself is not a conclusive proof but along with other circumstances surrounding the incident, like relations between the accused and the deceased, enmity between them, previous history of hostility, recover of weapon from the accused etc., non-explanation of death of the deceased, may lead to a presumption of guilt.[34] In the absence of any suggestion as to how and where the deceased was done to death, it is not possible to record conviction of the accused on the basis of last seen evidence.[35] The only circumstance that the deceased was last seen alive in the company of the accused and that the dead body of the deceased was recovered at the instance of the accused from a part of the building which was near the residential position of the accused, is not inconsistent with the innocence of the accused, and on the basis of these two circumstances alone, it cannot be held that the accused was a party to the murder of the deceased.[36] When the presence of the accused and the deceased as being last seen together is doubtful, this evidence cannot be considered as a piece of circumstantial evidence against the accused.[37] The evidence of last seen of the accused with the deceased was found not reliable as the witness had not disclosed this fact to the son of the deceased or at the police station. The evidence of recovery at the instance of the accused was also found not acceptable. Accused appellants were acquitted of the charge under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[38] Prosecution case was that the accused and the deceased had gone together to another village, but the deceased did not return. Two days later, the dead body of the deceased was found in the field. The witnesses could not depose the date on which they had seen the accused and the deceased going together, could not also give the identification mark(s) on the basis of which they identified the two. The conviction of the accused appellant under s 302, IPC was found not sustainable, and was set aside.[39] Evidence of last seen together was not found sufficient to record conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC). Where both the appellant husband, his deceased wife were living together in the same house, and the two did not have good relations as the deceased was short tempered, both were last seen together, conviction of the appellant husband under s 302, IPC was held proper.[40]

Charge against the appellant police officers was of abduction and murder. From the evidence of PW3 it was clear that terrorism was prevailing in the State of Punjab at the time when the seven persons were abducted and action was being taken by the police against the terrorists. When the seven persons abducted by the appellants did not go missing immediately after their abduction and were found in different police2422 stations in the State of Punjab and one of them was also found going in a gypsy at Amritsar, the Court cannot hold that the seven abducted persons were last in the custody of the appellants and hence they must discharge the burden under s 106 of the Evidence Act and must explain what they did to the seven abducted persons. The prosecution should have examined witnesses from amongst the police personnel or the Police Station to establish that the seven abducted persons were last seen in the custody of the appellants. The conviction of the two appellants under ss 302 / 120, IPC was found not sustainable, and was set aside.[41]

Last seen Evidencetime Lag of two Daysaccused Acquitted

There was evidence of prosecution witness that all the five accused and the deceased were seen together two days earlier to the incident. The High Court was justified in holding that the time lag made it difficult to connect A2 to A5 with the incident. There was no other evidence showing the involvement of the accused. Accused A2 to A5 were acquitted of the charge under s 300, IPC .[42]

The accused and the deceased were last seen going together in the evening, next day body of the deceased was found lying in the water course. Incriminating articles viz. iron plate, wooden leg of bed recovered from the house of the accused. Accused did not explain as to what happened to the deceased after they were last seen in the previous evening. Motive also proved as the accused had taken money from the deceased for securing job for him in the police department which the accused was not returning to the deceased. Conviction of the accused for offence under s 302, IPC was held proper and justified.[43]

The accused and the deceased had gone together for buying toddy, the deceased did not return, his dead body was recovered from the river the next evening. The body was recovered after more than 24 hours. Evidence was lacking to show that the accused and the deceased were seen together before the dead body was recovered. The prosecution witnesses examined in the case did not support the theory of last seen together. There was delay in filing FIR. The conviction of the accused under ss 302 and 201, IPC was found not sustainable and was set aside.[44]

The accused appellant was alleged to have committed rape and murder of minor girl. The testimony of the mother and the brother of the deceased that the accused was last seen in the company of the deceased was found reliable and as such believed. On the disclosure statements made by the accused, the clothes of the deceased and the accused, stained with human blood, were recovered. Accused appellant was convicted under ss 302, 376, IPC .[45]

Accused appellant was prosecuted on allegation that the accused committed the murder of his father-in-law and mother-in-law (two deceased). The prosecution evidence showed that the relations between the accused appellant and the two deceased were on visiting terms. The evidence did not prove that the blood on the clothes of the accused was that of the deceased. It was also not proved that at the time of the2423 occurrence, the accused appellant alone was in the house. Once that was clear and once it is found that the circumstances could not point out towards the guilt of the accused, without any other inference being probable, the accused must get the benefit of doubt. The conviction of the accused appellant under s 302, IPC was set aside.[46]

Prosecution story was that the accused respondent committed murder of the deceased, amputated her legs and took away her silver anklets. Case was of circumstantial evidence. Evidence of last seen was found not reliable and was as such rejected. Prosecution evidence as to the time of the occurrence was scanty. The recovery of khurpi as offence weapon was also found doubtful. Acquittal of the accused respondent for offences under ss 394 and 302, IPC was upheld.[47]

There was no evidence that both the appellant and the deceased were last seen together. The deceased was found lying in a pool of blood. FIR was filed again by unknown person. Finger print of the appellant accused was not found on the articles seized. Merely because the identity card of the appellant accused was found near the body of the deceased was not sufficient to record the conviction of the appellant. Accused appellant was acquitted for offence under s 302, IPC .[48]

After the complaint about a boy being missing was filed, telephone call was received demanding ransom amount. From the nearby place where the ransom amount was to be paid accused persons were arrested and on their pointing out, the dead body of the kidnapped boy was recovered. The accused persons could not explain their presence. Held, the circumstances proved beyond doubt that the accused persons committed the offence. Conviction of the accused persons under ss 363, 302 and 201, IPC was held proper.[49]

Prosecution story was that accused committed rape on a minor girl aged 6 years and committed her murder. There was reliable evidence of the eye-witnesses that the accused was carrying the deceased girl on cycle. The dead body of the deceased was recovered the next day from the sugar cane field. Evidence of last seen together was found reliable. Omission of the name of the accused in FIR was explained. Accused was convicted under ss 376 and 302, IPC .[50]

The two appellants accused brothers, committed the murder of the wife and children of their brother, having thrown acid on them. There was strong motive for the accused to liquidate the deceased to grab the property. On killing them, the accused became the immediate beneficiary to the estate left by the husband of deceased. No enmity with the accused could be proved by the evidence against the witnesses. Four eye-witnesses had seen one of the appellants accused coming out of the house of the deceased with acid in hand. There was also dying declaration of the elder daughter of the deceased. Conviction of the two accused appellants and acquittal of two other accused appellants was affirmed.[51]2424

The deceased, a deserted wife, had intimacy with the appellant accused and used to live in a hut and the accused frequently visited the house of the deceased and they lived there as husband and wife. During the lifetime of the deceased, the appellant used to harass and beat the deceased suspecting her fidelity. During night time on the previous day of the occurrence while the deceased was watching TV in the house of PW3, the appellant came to the house of PW3 and started beating the deceased and dragged her to the hut. On the next day morning, she was found dead. The police found one towel of the accused which was tied around the waist of the deceased and the rope was lying near the cot. The appellant accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[52]

There was evidence of a teacher, an independent and responsible witness who deposed that he had seen the respondent accused and the deceased girl aged about 10 years going towards the orchard field. Dead body of the deceased victim was recovered from the orchard field. Evidence of last seen was found reliable. The accused could not explain the injuries/scratches found on his face. Appellant accused was convicted for offence under ss 302 and 376, IPC .[53]

There was evidence that the accused husband used to ill treat his deceased wife. Offence weapon recovered from the side of the body of the deceased belonged to the accused appellant. The evidence of 'last seen' was found reliable. Abscondence of accused for a period of 12 years was a great circumstantial evidence against the accused. Conviction under s 302, IPC was held proper.[54]

There was reliable evidence that the accused appellant was last seen in the company of the deceased. Half burnt discarded clothes of the accused were recovered by the police. The plea of alibi taken by the accused appellant was not established. Appellant accused was convicted for offence under ss 201 and 302, IPC .[55]

In the instant case there was evidence that the accused persons had stayed at the house of the deceased in the night, next day they left in the company of the deceased, and soon thereafter, the dead body of the deceased was recovered. At the instance of the appellant accused, articles belonging to the deceased were also recovered from the possession of the accused appellant and his uncle. The conviction of the appellant under s 302, IPC read with s 34, IPC was held proper.[56]

173. Circumstantial Evidence--Additional Link

Once the fact of 'last seen together' is proved, a duty is cast on the accused to explain the circumstances in which they parted company. The failure of the accused to explain the circumstances in which he parted company with the deceased may well serve as additional link in the chain of circumstances thereby fortifying the prosecution case.[57] Silence of inmates of the house about cause of the death of the2425 victim, would become additional link in chain of circumstances.[58] The accused absconding after incident is an additional circumstance which reinforces prosecution case, no explanation given by the accused as to where they were, indicates their guilty mind.[59]

It is a well settled principle that in a case of circumstantial evidence when the accused offers an explanation and that explanation is found to be untrue then the same offers an additional link in the chain of circumstances to complete the chain.[60] A false answer offered by the accused when his attention was drawn to a circumstance renders that circumstance capable of inculpating him. In such a situation a false answer can also be counted as providing 'a missing link' for completing the chain.[61] Where the accused on being asked, offers no explanation or explanation offered is found to be false, then that itself forms an additional link in the chain of circumstances to point out to the guilt.[62]

Recovery of dead body of the deceased from the house of the accused

The prosecution case that the appellant accused called the deceased at his house and committed his murder. The dead body of the deceased was recovered at the house of the appellant accused, no explanation was given by the appellant accused thereof. Conviction of the appellant accused under s 302, IPC was held proper.[63]

174. Circumstantial Evidence--Considerable Gap Between Last Seen Together and Death of the Victim or Recovery of Corpse--Effect

The theory of being last seen together can be considered a link in the chain when the case rests on circumstantial evidence. It is a well settled principle that merely because two persons are found together at a particular time and sometimes thereafter one of them was found unnaturally dead, the inevitable conclusion is not that the other is the author of the crime. Even if the prosecution version is accepted in the case that in the evening the deceased and the accused were seen going out together and the former was found dead in the morning, in the absence of any motive or material about the probable death of time, it would be difficult to positively establish theory that the deceased was last seen in the company of the accused as there is a possibility during the long gap of time that some other person might have come in between. In the absence of any further positive material to show that the accused and the deceased were together immediately before the death of the deceased, it cannot be conclusively held that the accused is the author of the crime. It is true that when two persons are seen together and immediately thereafter one of them is found dead, it would be a material link in the process of finding out as to who is the guilty person. When there is an explained time gap of considerable length, the evidence that at2426 some point of time prior to the discovery of the dead body the accused was found together with the deceased is not a conclusive link to fasten guilt on the accused.[64] Where the evidence shows that the accused was last seen with the deceased in the court at Pune on 1 August 1992 and the corpse of the deceased was recovered on 12 October 1993, since between the circumstance of being last seen and the recovery of the corpse there was a very long gap of more than 14 months, it cannot be inferred from this circumstance that it was the accused who had murdered the deceased.[65]

The circumstance of last seen in order to constitute an incriminating circumstance in a murder case must be in a close proximity with the recovery of corpse of deceased. The rationale for this is that only in such a contingency would it probablise the inference that the person with whom the deceased was last seen in all probability murdered him, and unless such an inference is probabalised it would not be an incriminating circumstance.[66] Evidence establishing the 'last seen together' theory and the fact that after altercation and strangulation of the deceased, which was witnessed by PWS, the body of the deceased was recovered in pieces in presence of the witnesses, were fully established. The gap between the time when the accused persons were last seen with the deceased and the discovery of his mutilated body was quite small and the possible inference would be that the accused were responsible for commission of the murder of the deceased. Once the last seen theory comes into play, the onus was on the accused to explain as to what happened to the deceased after they were together seen alive. The accused persons failed to render any reasonable/plausible explanation in this regard. The conviction of the accused persons under ss 302 / 34 was held proper.[67]

The last seen theory comes into play where the time gap between the point of time when the accused and the deceased were seen last alive and when the deceased is found dead is so small that possibility of any person other than the accused being the author of the crime becomes impossible. It would be difficult in some cases to positively establish that the deceased was last seen with the accused when there is a long gap and possibility of other persons coming in between exists. In the absence of any other positive evidence to conclude that the accused and the deceased were last seen together, it would be hazardous to come to a conclusion of guilt.[68]

175. Circumstantial Evidence--Short Gap Between 'Last Seen Together' and Death of Victim--Effect

The theory of being last seen together is one where two persons are seen together alive and after an interval of time, one of them is found alive and the other dead. If the period between the two is short, presumption as to the person alive being the author of death of the other can be drawn. Time gap should be such as to rule out possibility of somebody else committing the crime. The theory can be pressed into service effectively when the two persons last seen together were close friends or2427 persons who are likely to been seen together giving due margin to the time gap.[69] In the absence of any positive material to show that the accused and the deceased were together immediately before the death of the deceased, it cannot be conclusively held that the accused is the author of the crime. True, it is when the two persons are seen together and immediately thereafter one of them is found dead, it would be a material link in the process of finding out as to who is the guilty person.[70] Where the deceased and the accused were living together as husband and wife, they were seen together leaving with articles to shift residence, and after about two hours, the accused was seen alone and the deceased was not in his company when they had gone out together with a definite purpose, and the deceased was found missing, that is certainly a circumstance against the accused.[71]

The deceased was last seen going with the accused in the car of the accused. The injuries found in post-mortem examination on the person of the deceased were four days old. The gap of four days between the date when the accused was last seen with the deceased and the date of death of the deceased was held not long. Accused was convicted under s 302, IPC .[72]

176. Importance of Motive in Cases of Circumstantial Evidence

In Tarsem Kumar v Delhi Admn ,[73] the Supreme Court has laid down that where the case of the prosecution has been proved beyond all reasonable doubt on the basis of material produced before the Court, the motive loses its importance, but in a case based on circumstantial evidence, motive for committing the crime on the part of the accused assumes great importance. It was further emphasised that if each of the circumstances proved on behalf of the prosecution is accepted by the Court for the purpose of recording a finding that it was the accused who committed the crime in question, then even in the absence of any proof of a motive for commission of such crime the accused can be convicted. In Budha Satya Venkata Rao v State of Andhra Pradesh ,[74] the Supreme Court again emphasised that in a case of circumstantial evidence, the aspect of motive assumes considerable importance. A similar view is taken in several other cases.[75] In the case of Prem Kumar v State of Bihar ,[76] the Apex Court held that if motive is proved or established, it affords a key or a pointer to scan evidence in the case, and as a satisfactory circumstance corroboration. It is a very relevant and important aspect:

(i) to highlight intention of the accused; and,2428
(ii) the approach to be made in appreciating the totality of circumstances including evidence discussed in the case.

Absence of motive cannot be said to be fatal to the prosecution case but motive assumes pertinent significance in a case solely based on circumstances, as existence of motive is an enlightening factor in the process of presumptive reasoning in such a case; the absence of motive, however, puts the Court on its guard to scrutinise the circumstance more carefully to insure that suspicion and conjecture do not take the place of legal proof.[77]

In a case of circumstantial evidence, motive helps in the process of presumptive reasoning. However, by itself it is not sufficient to convict a person.[78] Motive is a relevant factor in all criminal cases whether based on the testimony of eyewitnesses or circumstantial evidence.[79] It is well settled that merely because motive is neither alleged nor proved, the same would ipso facto not affect the prosecution case, but in case there are other circumstances to create doubt regarding veracity of the prosecution case, this may also become material.[80]

177. Missing Link in Chain of Circumstances--Effect

The prosecution case was that the accused stole gold ornaments of the deceased and murdered her. But the prosecution had failed to establish: (a) that the accused was seen by the neighbour in the house of the deceased on fateful day; (b) that the accused had got certain gold ornaments melted with the help of gold-smith; and (c) that the accused had sold two ingots of 60 grams and 35 grams each to a jeweller for a consideration of Rs 35,000. In view of the fact that the prosecution failed to prove these links in the chain of circumstances, it was held that the rest of the circumstances did not form a complete chain as to draw an irresistible inference that it is the accused and the accused alone who could have committed the murder of deceased. The accused was therefore held entitled to be acquitted.[81]

178. On Failure to Secure Eyewitnesses or their Support Prosecution can Rely upon Circumstantial Evidence

The question arises whether the prosecution can rely on circumstantial evidence on its failure to secure the presence of eyewitnesses. The question arose directly before the Apex Court in Jagjit Singh v State of Himachal Pradesh ,[82] and it was observed that when the presence of eyewitnesses could not be secured at all, it does not prevent the prosecution from relying on evidence though circumstantial in nature and if such evidence is sufficient to bring home the guilt, the conviction should follow. When the witnesses to the actual murder did not support the prosecution case during trial, the question for consideration was whether the circumstantial evidence would be sufficient to bring home the charge.[83]2429

179. Circumstantial Evidence--Accused Alongwith Other Accused Seen going Towards House of the Deceased

The fact that the accused was seen by the witness going with the other two accused persons towards the house of the deceased, by itself is not sufficient to establish the guilt of the accused in the absence of other circumstantial linking of the accused with the commission of the offence.[84]

180. Absconding

The accused cannot be said to be absconding merely because he was absent when the police reached at his house.[85]Normally, courts are reluctant to attach too much importance to the act of absconding. It can scarcely be held as a determining link in completing the chain of circumstantial evidence which must admit of no other reasonable hypothesis than that of guilt of the accused.[86] It, by itself, is not a strong piece of evidence against an accused.[87] The act of absconding, even if proved, is considered a somewhat weak link in the chain of circumstances utilised for establishing the guilt of an accused.[88] The Supreme Court in Rahman v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[89] stated that absconding, by itself, is not conclusive proof of guilt of an accused because one might abscond for fear or for any other allied reason. Even an innocent man may feel panicky and try to evade arrest when wrongly suspected of a grave crime. Of course, it is a relevant piece of evidence to be considered along with other evidence, but its value depends upon the circumstances of each case. In Mohinder Singh v State of Punjab ,[90] the accused's absence from duty without any proper leave, his overstaying the period of leave, his setting up a false plea of alibi, and evading arrest for a period of more than two months were, in the light of the dying declaration of the deceased, held to be circumstances which could have, independently of any direct evidence, brought home the guilt of the accused. Similarly, the disappearance of the accused after the commission of the alleged crime is a circumstance, which in the absence of any plausible explanation, may be taken against him.[91]

Where the accused, who was on casual leave on the day of the occurrence, gave a false denial when he was questioned about his whereabouts during the relevant period, it was held that his false reply strengthens the prosecution case.[92] The accused absconding after incident is an additional circumstance which reinforces2430 prosecution case, no explanation given by the accused as to where they were, indicates their guilty mind.[1]

181. Circumstantial Evidence--Benefit of Doubt

The prosecution case was that the accused caused the death of the deceased brother of the informant by lathi blows. The dead body of the deceased was found in the courtyard of the house of the accused, the accused and members of his family were not present at that time in the house. Son-in-law of the informant did not disclose to anyone nor was it disclosed in the FIR that he had last seen the deceased and the accused together before the discovery of dead body. The blood stained earth and the lathi seized were not sent for forensic examination. All the chains of circumstantial evidence were not proved. Accused was held entitled to benefit of doubt, hence, his conviction under s 302, IPC recorded by the trial Court was set aside.[2]

182. Effect of Non-explanation by Prosecution of Injuries on the Accused

The Apex Court, in Lakshmi Singh v State of Bihar ,[3] on the aspect of non-explanation of injury on the person of the accused has laid down:

> In a murder case, the non-explanation of the injuries sustained by the accused at about the time of the occurrence or in the Court altercation is a very important circumstance from can draw the following inferences:
> (a) that the prosecution has suppressed the genesis and the origin of the occurrence and has thus not presented the true version:
> (b) that the witnesses, who have denied the presence of the injuries on the person of the accused are lying on a most material point and therefore their evidence is unreliable:
> (c) that in case there is defence version which explains the injuries on the person of the accused it is rendered probable so as to throw doubt on the prosecution case:
> The omission on the part of the prosecution to explain the injuries on the person of the accused assumes much greater importance where the evidence consists of interested or inimical witnesses where the defence gives a version which competes in probability with that of the prosecution one.

It was further observed in the same case that:

> There may be cases where the non-explanation of the injuries by the prosecution may not affect the prosecution case. This principle would obviously apply to cases where the injuries sustained by the accused are minor and superficial or where the evidence is so clear and cogent, so independent and disinterested, so probable, consistent and credit worthy, that it outweighs the effect of the omission on the part of the prosecution to explain the injuries.

In Hare Krishna Singh v State of Bihar ,[4] the law laid down by Mohan Rai v State of Bihar ,[5] was considered and discussed in some detail and it has been laid down that:2431

> The obligation of prosecution to explain the injuries sustained by the accused in the same occurrence may not arise in each and every case. In other words, it is not an invariable rule that the prosecution has to explain the injuries sustained by the accused in the same occurrence. The burden of proving the guilt of the accused is undoubtedly on the prosecution. The accused is not bound to say anything in defence. The prosecution has to prove the guilt of the accused beyond all reasonable doubts. If the witnesses examined on behalf of the prosecution and believed by the court in proof of the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt, the question of the obligation of the prosecution to explain the injuries sustained by the accused will not arise. When the prosecution comes with a definite case that the offence has been committed by the accused and proves its case beyond any reasonable doubt, it becomes hardly necessary for the prosecution to again explain how and in what circumstances injuries have been inflicted on the person of the accused.

Thus, non-explanation of the injury is a factor which is to be taken into consideration in judging the veracity of the prosecution witnesses and the Court should scrutinise their evidence with care. In some cases, the failure of the prosecution to count for the injuries of the accused may undermine its evidence to the core, while in others, it may have little or no adverse effect on the prosecution case. The entire prosecution case cannot be thrown over board simply because the prosecution witnesses do not explain the injuries, on the person of the accused.[6]

The omission on the part of the prosecution to explain the injuries on the person of the accused assumed much greater important where the evidence consists of interested or inimical witnesses or where the defence gives a version which competes in probability with that of the prosecution one. In the instant case the two accused were admitted to the hospital after the occurrence. Their injuries were not explained by the two interested witnesses examined in the case. Accused persons were acquitted of the charge of murder under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[7]

Where the injuries sustained by the accused persons alleged to be received during the course of the incident are not on vital parts of the body and are as such insignificant, the non-explanation of those injuries cannot be advantageous to the defence nor can it be said that the prosecution, in not explaining those injuries, had suppressed the genesis of the incident.[8]

When the accused was examined by a doctor four days after the incident, where in the statement, the doctor stated that the injuries were simple in nature and could be self-inflicted, and no defence witness stated anything about the alleged attack with a hockey stick on the accused or about his private defence, the injuries on the person of the accused had no effect on the prosecution case.[9]

When the injuries on the person of the accused are in fact minor and small injuries, the prosecution is not obliged to explain the same and this non-explanation by the prosecution cannot be held to be fatal to the prosecution case, particularly when the2432 injured has been examined only five days after the occurrence and it is difficult to hold that these injuries have been inflicted in the course of the incident.[10] Same is the result if the injuries received by the accused are found to be minor and could be received as suggested by the prosecution,[11] In Mohar Rai and Bharath Rai v State of Bihar ,[12] it was observed:

> ...In our judgment, the failure of the prosecution to offer any explanation in that regard shows that evidence of the prosecution witnesses relating to the incident is not true or at any rate not wholly true. Further those injuries probabilities the plea taken by the appellants.

In Mohar Rai and Bharath Rai v State of Bihar ,[13] it is made clear that failure of the prosecution to offer any explanation regarding the injuries found on the accused may show that the evidence related to the incident is not true or at any rate not wholly true. Likewise in Lakshmi Singh and others v State of Bihar ,[14] it is observed that any non-explanation of the injuries on the accused by the prosecution may affect the prosecution case. But such a non-explanation may assume greater importance where the defence gives a version which competes in probability with that of the prosecution. But where the evidence is clear, cogent and creditworthy and where the Court can distinguish the truth from falsehood the mere fact that the injuries are not explained by the prosecution cannot by itself be a sole basis to reject such evidence, and consequently the whole case. Much depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. These aspects were highlighted by Supreme Court in Vijayee Singh and others v State of UP. [15]

Mere non-explanation of the injuries by the prosecution may not affect the prosecution case in all cases and the said principle applies to cases where the injuries sustained by the accused are minor and superficial or where the evidence is so clear and cogent, so independent and disinterested and so probable, consistent and creditworthy that it far outweighs the effect of the omission on the part of the prosecution to explain the injuries.[16]

Non-explanation of injuries by the prosecution will not affect prosecution case where injuries sustained by the accused are minor and superficial or where the evidence is so clear and congent, so independent and disinterested, so probable, consistent and creditworthy, that it outweighs the effect of the omission on the part of prosecution to explain the injuries. As observed by this court in Ramlagan Singh v State of Bihar ,[17] prosecution is not called upon in all cases to explain the injuries2433 received by the accused persons. It is for the defence to put questions to the prosecution witnesses regarding the injuries of the accused persons. When that is not done, there is no occasion for the prosecution witnesses to explain any injury on the person of an accused. In Hare Krishna Singh and others v State of Bihar ,[18] it was observed that the obligation of the prosecution to explain the injuries sustained by the accused in the same occurrence may not arise in each and every case. In other words, it is not an invariable rule that the prosecution has to explain the injuries sustained by the accused in the same occurrence. If the witnesses examined on behalf of the prosecution are believed by the Court in proof of guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt, question of obligation of prosecution to explain injuries by the accused will not arise. When the prosecution comes with a definite case that the offence has been committed by the accused and proves its case beyond any reasonable doubt, it becomes hardly necessary for the prosecution to again explain how and under what circumstances injuries have been inflicted on the person of the accused. It is more so when the injuries are simple or superficial in nature. In the case at hand, trifle and superficial injuries on accused are of little assistance to them to throw doubt on veracity of prosecution case[19] or injuries found on the person of the accused are superficial and not caused by the deceased.[20] However, when there is non-explanation of grievous injuries on the head of the accused and all eyewitnesses were related to the deceased victim, the accused is entitled to an acquittal.[21]

Before non-explanation of injuries on the person of the accused by the prosecution witnesses, may affect the prosecution case, the Court has to be satisfied of the existence of two conditions: (a) that the injury on the person of the accused was of a serious nature; and (b) that such injuries must have been caused at the time of the occurrence in question. Non-explanation of injuries assumes greater significance when the evidence consists of interested or partisan witnesses or where the defence gives a version which competes in all probability with that of the prosecution. Where the evidence is dear, cogent and creditworthy, and where the Court can distinguish truth from falsehood, the mere fact that the injuries on the side of the accused persons are not explained by the prosecution cannot by itself be a sole basis to reject the testimony of the prosecution witnesses, and consequently the whole of the prosecution case.[22] The non-explanation of injuries on the person of the accused by the prosecution together with three days delay in sending the FIR, to the Magistrate thus creating doubt about the genuineness of time and date of recording of the FIR; the non-examination of the doctor performing the post-mortem examination; the CFSL report not suggesting involvement of the accused beyond all reasonable doubt, entitles the accused to the benefit of the doubt.[23]When the prosecution has failed to produce the injury report of the accused, an adverse inference can be drawn against it under s 114, expln (g) of the Evidence Act that the injury suffered by the accused was serious and therefore prosecution deliberately suppressed his injury report. The inference that injuries of the accused were manufactured cannot be reached and his2434 failure to get his injuries examined for three days pales into insignificance for failure of the prosecution to prove injury report of the accused.[24] It is not an absolute rule of law that non-explanation by the prosecution of the injuries on the accused is bound to result in his acquittal, because if positive evidence of guilt of the accused is otherwise cogent and reasonable, failure of the prosecution to explain the injuries on him cannot compel an acquittal.[25]

In Abdul Waheed v State of Maharashtra ,[26] it was held that the mere presence of a number of injuries on the person of the accused is no ground to accept the defence version. The injury on the person of an accused may afford a ground to assume that the members of the party of the deceased were also armed with dangerous weapons, since otherwise, the injuries found on the body of the accused cannot be explained.[27] As regards the injuries on the person of an accused, the rule is that the prosecution is not, in all cases, obliged to explain them, and before an adverse inference is drawn against the prosecution for its alleged failure to explain their presence, it must reasonably be shown that in all probability, they were caused to him in die same occurrence in which the victim of the prosecution case was injured. It all depends upon the circumstances of each case as to whether the prosecution case has become doubtful.[28] When the injuries sustained on the person of the accused pertain to a different case, no question of explanation to such injuries by the prosecution arises.[29]

Where the injuries of the accused persons were not explained by the prosecution, and the main accused had died during the pendency of the appeal, surviving accused were entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge of murder.[30]

Free fight between partiesnon-explanation of injuries of accused

In the case of a free fight in which large number of persons participated, there is a reasonable explanation for the injuries suffered by some of the members of the defence party.[31]

(XIV) SENTENCE IN MURDER CASES

183. Sentence--General

Even a casual glance at the provisions of the IPC will show that punishments have been carefully graded corresponding with the gravity of offences; in grave wrongs, the punishments prescribed are strict, whereas, for minor offences leniency is shown. Here again there is considerable room for manoeuvre because the choice of punishment is left to the discretion of the judge with only the outer limits stated. There are only a few cases where a minimum punishment is prescribed.[32]2435

Sentences of severity are imposed to reflect the seriousness of the crime, to promote respect for the law, to provide just punishment for the offence, to afford adequate deterrent to criminal conduct and to protect the community from further similar conduct. It serves a three-fold purpose: (i) punitive; (ii) deterrent; and (iii) protective.[33]

It is no doubt true that the measure of punishment in a given case must depend upon the atrocity of the crime; the conduct of the criminal etc., imposition of appropriate punishment is the manner in which the courts respond to the cry of the society for justice against criminals. Justice demands that the Court should impose punishment befitting the crime, so that the courts reflect public abhorrence of the crime. The courts must not only keep in view the rights of criminals, but also the rights of the victim of the crime and the society at large while considering the imposition of appropriate punishment. While it is true that punishment disproportionately severe ought not to be passed but that does not even sloth the law courts, however, with an option to award the sentence which would be manifestly inadequate having due regard to the nature of the offence since an inadequate sentence would not subserve the cause of justice to the society.[34]

Different Schools Profess Different Punishments

Justice is supreme and justice ought to be beneficial to society so that society is placed in a better situation. Law courts exist for society and ought to rise to the occasion and subserve the basic requirement of society. It is a requirement of society and the law must respond to its need. The greatest virtue of law is its flexibility and its adaptability, it must change from time to time so that it answers the cry of the people, the need of the hour and the order of the day. In present day society, crime is considered a social problem and a tremendous change, even conceptually, is being seen in the legal horizon so far as the concept of punishment is concerned.

One school of thought on this score propagates that the function of the law court is that of a social reformer, and as such in its endeavour to act as such, the question of deterring punishment would not arise since society would otherwise be further prone to such violent acts or activities by reason of the fact that with the advancement of age the mental frame of boys of tender age also goes on changing and in the event of any arrogance being developed or a sense of revenge creeping into society, the society would perish to the detriment of its people. The other school, however, expressly recorded and expressed emphatically that unless the severest of severe punishments is inflicted on an offender (obviously depending upon the nature of the crime) society would perish.

The other school professes that since one has taken the life of another it does not mean that his life shall have to be taken but during the trial if it transpires that the method and manner or the nature of the activities has resulted in the elimination of a human being from this world, there should not be any laxity on the part of the law courts, otherwise, people will, and in turn the society, will be engulfed in a false sense of security of life in the event of a heinous crime.[35]2436

Sentence--Position Under Code of Criminal Procedure 1898

The legal position regarding award of sentence in murder cases under CrPC 1898 can be divided into two parts--i.e., upto 31 December 1955 and wef 1 January 1956 to 31 December 1973.

(a) Sentence upto 31 December 1955--Before the Criminal Amendment Act 26 of 1955, for the offence of murder, death sentence was the rule, and transportation for life an exception and if the lesser penalty was to be awarded then sub-s (5) of s 367, CrPC 1898 required reasons to be given.[36] Sub-section (5) of s 367, which, as it then stood, was as follows:

> '...
> (5) If the accused is convicted of an offence punishable with death and the court sentences him to any punishment other than death, the court shall, in its judgment, state the reason why sentence of death was not passed
> ...'

(b) Position wef 1 January 1956 to 31 December 1973--By the Amendment Act 26 of 1955, sub-s (5) of s 367, CrPC was recast and the requirement of giving reasons for the lesser punishment was done away with. The former rule was thus no longer operative. The court has after 31 December 1955, discretion, to award either of the two penalties prescribed under s 302, IPC . The death sentence was exacted only where murder was perpetrated with marked brutality.[37] The determination of sentence in a given case depended on a variety of considerations, the more important being the nature of the crime, the manner of its commission, the motive which impelled it and the character and antecedents of the accused.[38] After amendment of s 367 (5), CrPC 1898 by Act 26 of 1955, the discretion of the Court in deciding whether to impose the sentence of death or imprisonment of life has become wider.[39]

The Law Commission in its 35th report (vol 1), made the following comments on this provision:

> ...a considerable body of opinion is in favour of a provision requiring the court to state its reasons for imposing the punishment either of death or of imprisonment for life. Further, this would be good safeguard to ensure that the lower courts examine the case as elaborately from the point of view of sentence as from the point of view of guilt... It would increase the confidence of the people in the courts, by showing that the discretion is judicially exercised. It would also facilitate the task of the High Court in appeal or in proceedings for confirmation in respect of the sentence (where the sentence awarded is that of death) or in proceedings in revision for enhancement of the sentence (where the sentence awarded is one of imprisonment for life). In deference to this recommendation, see 60 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act 1955 (XXVI of 1955) deleted old sub-s (5) of s 367 with effect from January 1, 1956, and thereafter, for such capital offences, it was left to the courts on the facts of each case, to pass, in its2437 discretion, for reasons to be recorded, the sentence of death or the lesser sentenced. Their led to some difference of opinion, whether even after the Amendment of 1955, in case of murder the normal punishment was death or imprisonment for life; (See AI a. Commentaries on the Code of Criminal Procedure, Vol 3, page 565, by DV Children and S Appu Rao).[40]

Sentence--Position Under Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

After coming into force of CrPC wef 1 January 1974, the position with regard to award of punishment is reverse of what it was before the Criminal Amendment Act 26 of 1955.[41] Thus, while before 1 January 1956, death sentence was the rule; but after 1 January 1974, imprisonment of life has become the rule and death sentence can be awarded by giving special reasons as provided under s 354(3), CrPC, death sentence has now become an exception unlike the position before 1 January 1956. On the question of awarding sentence for offences for which life imprisonment as well as death sentence is prescribed, sub-s (3) of s 354, CrPC enjoins that in case of sentence of death, special reasons for such sentence shall be stated. The provisions of the said section fell for consideration of the Supreme Court in Bachan Singh v State of Punjab. [42] The Supreme Court pointed out the change in the policy of sentencing thus: Section 354(3) of the CrPC, marks a significant shift in the legislative policy underlying the CrPC 1898 as in force immediately before 1 April 1974, according to which both the alternative sentences of death or imprisonment for life provided for murder and for certain other capital offences under the IPC were normal sentences. Now, according to the changed legislative policy which is patent on the face of s 354(3) the normal punishment for murder and six other capital offences under the IPC is imprisonment for life (or imprisonment for a term of years) and death penalty is an exception.

And elucidated the principle for awarding proper sentence. It will be advantageous to note the following observations:

> ...for making the choice of punishment or for ascertaining the existence or absence of 'special reasons' in that context, the court must pay due regard both to the crime and the criminal. What is the relative weight to be given to the aggravating and mitigating factors, depends on the facts and circumstances of the particular case. In many cases the extremely cruel or beastly manner of the commission of murder is itself a demonstrated index of the depraved character of the perpetrator. That is why it is not desirable to consider the circumstances of the crime and the circumstances of the criminal in no separate water-tight compartments. In a sense, to kill is to be cruel and therefore all murders are cruel. But such cruelty may vary in its degree of culpability. And it is only when the culpability assumes the proportion of extreme depravity that special reasons can legitimately be said to exist. It may be noted that 'special reasons' necessary for imposition of death penalty must relate, not to crime as such, but to criminal. Criminal may not deserve death penalty though crime may be shocking.[43]

The principles laid down in Bachan Singh v State of Punjab [44] were applied in various cases by the Supreme Court. [45]Section 354, CrPC, makes it obligatory in cases of conviction for an offence punishable with death or with imprisonment for life or for a2438 term of years, to assign reasons in support of the sentence awarded to the convict, and further, ordains that in case the judge awards the death penalty, 'special reasons' for such sentence shall be stated in the judgment. When the law casts a duty on the judge to state reasons it follows that he is under a legal obligation to explain his choice of sentence. It may seem trite to say so, but the existence of the special reasons clause in the above provision implies that the Court can in fit cases impose the extreme penalty of death which negatives the contention that there never can be a valid reasons to visit an offender with the death penalty, no matter how cruel, gruesome or shocking the crime may be.[46]

Sentence--Whether Crime or Criminal or both should be Considered

All three views which form part of the present synopsis found favour separately with the Apex Court in different cases, though it may be interpreted as somewhat variant in approach by the Supreme Court in these cases. In Bishnu Deo Shaw v State of West Bengal ,[47] and also in Shiv Mohan Singh v State (Delhi Administration) ,[48] the Supreme Court took the view that the criminal, not the crime, must figure prominently in shaping the sentence where reform of the individual and rehabilitation into society, and other measures to prevent recurrence are weighty factors. However, in Ravji alias Ramchandra v State of Rajasthan ,[49] the Supreme Court held that it is the nature and gravity of the crime but not the criminal which are germane for consideration for appropriate punishment in a criminal trial.

However, the correct approach seems to be that there should be consideration of both circumstances for awarding sentence in a murder case. In Bachan Singh v State of Punjab ,[50] the Constitutional Bench of the Supreme Court has held that for making the choice of punishment or for ascertaining the existence or absence of 'special reasons' within the meaning of s 354(3), CrPC, the Court must pay due regard to both the crime and the criminal. It was also observed that it is not desirable to consider the circumstances of the crime and the circumstances of the criminal in two separate water-tight compartments. In Ashok Kumar v State (Delhi Administration) ,[51] the Supreme Court took the view that the Court has to consider the totality of factors bearing on the offence and the offender, and fix a punishment which will promote effectively the punitive objective of the law--deterrence and habilitation.

In Apren Joseph v State of Kerala ,[52] also the Apex Court has emphasised the need to consider the nature of the crime, the manner of its commission, motive which impelled it and the character and antecedents of the accused for determination of sentence. In Shankar alias Gauri Shankar v State of Tamil Nadu ,[53] the Supreme Court has held that the nature of the crime and circumstances of the offender should be so revealing that the criminal is a menace to society and the sentence of imprisonment for life would be inadequate and which is why death sentence is desirable. In Dhananjay Chatterjee alias Dhana v State of West Bengal ,[54] the Apex Court opined that the measure of punishment in a given case must depend upon the2439 atrocity of the crime, the conduct of the criminal and the defenseless and unprotected state of the victim. In Bachan Singh v State of Punjab ,[55] it was held that when the question of choice of sentence is under consideration, the Court must not only look to the crime and the victim, but also the circumstances of the criminal and the impact of the crime on the community.

184. Deterrent Punishment

The society survives on social values and commitment by social beings to conform to such values. This strengthens the social bonds which at times are stronger than the laws of the land, when the accused has, belligerently defied the social order, any leniency shown towards the accused, therefore, is likely to send wrong signals to the society apart from an adverse psychological fear in women folk. The crime against women is rising with extraordinary abnormality. The time is ripe when the courts will have to alarm themselves with the fact that too liberal attitude leading to disproportionately lesser punishments viz. the nature of crime, has encouraged the incorrigible anti-social elements. The bonanza of paroles, remissions, furloughs and/or en-block release of convicts on the eve of certain historical days by the Executive, has failed to serve any good rather has led the hard core criminals to believe as if 'life imprisonment' is just a temporary stay for a few years. The abnormal increase in crime against women is one of the root causes in creating chaotic and fearful social conditions, especially for the downtrodden and middle class families who find themselves totally exposed to the lecherous eyes of the criminals. It is high time that deterrent punitive measures are taken, failing which we will land ourselves in a situation of no return. It is in this context and backdrop that we find the accused not only guilty of committing ruthless crime against the two victims but equally guilty of committing a crime against the society.[56]

Just and Appropriate Sentence Based on Aggravating and Mitigating Factors

With regard to the quantum of punishment, the IPC gives very wide discretion to the court in the matter of awarding punishment. The maximum and minimum punishments are prescribed under the Code and it is left to the discretion of the court to award appropriate punishment having regard to the aggravating and mitigating circumstances in each case. Though there are no general guidelines for purposes of awarding punishment, yet it is judicial discretion that guides the Court in the matter of sentencing.[57]

No formula of a foolproof nature is possible that would provide a reasonable criterion in determining a just and appropriate punishment in the infinite variety of circumstances that may affect the gravity of the crime of murder. In the absence of any foolproof formula which may provide any basis for reasonable criteria to correctly assess various circumstances germane to the consideration of gravity of crime of murder, the discretionary judgment in the facts of each case, is the only way in which such judgment may equitably be distinguished.[58] The choice as to which one of the two punishments provided for murder is a proper one in a given case will depend upon the particular circumstances of that case and the Court has to exercise its discretion judicially and on well-recognised principles after balancing2440 all mitigating or aggravating circumstances of the case.[59] Shockingly, a large number of criminals go unpunished, thereby increasing and encouraging criminals and ultimately making justice suffer by weakening the system's credibility. Justice suffer by weakening the system's credibility. The imposition of appropriate punishment is the manner in which the court responds to society's cry for justice against the criminal. Justice demands that courts should impose punishment befitting the crime so that the courts reflects the public abhorrence of the crime. The Court must not only keep in view the right of the criminal but also the rights of the victim of the crime, and the society at least while considering the imposition of an appropriate punishment.[60] It is the nature and gravity of the crime but not the criminal which are a germane consideration of appropriate punishment in a criminal trial. The Court will be failing in its duty if appropriate punishment is not awarded for a crime which has been committed not only against the individual victim but also against the society in which the criminal and victim belong. The punishment to be awarded for a crime must not be irrelevant, but it should conform to and be consistent with the atrocity and brutality with which the crime has been perpetrated, the enormity of the crime warranting public abbhorence and it should respond to society's cry for justice against the criminal. If for an extremely heinous crime of murder perpetrated in a very brutal manner without any provocation, adequate deterrent punishment is not given, the case of deterrent punishment will lose its relevance.[61] In the matter of death sentence, the courts are required to answer new challenges and mould the sentencing system to meet these challenges. The object should be to protect society and to deter the criminal in achieving the avowed object of law by imposing an appropriate sentence. It is expected that the courts would operate the sentencing system to impose such sentence which reflects the conscience of society, and the sentencing process has to be stern where it should be.[62] For deciding a just and appropriate sentence to be awarded for an offence, the aggravating and mitigating factors and circumstances in which a crime has been committed are to be delicately balanced in a dispassionate manner is indeed a difficult test.[63]

The law courts as a matter of fact have been rather consistent in the approach that reasonable proportion has to be maintained between the seriousness of the crime and the punishment. While it is true that a sentence disproportionately severe ought not to be passed, but that also does not clothe the law courts with the option to award the sentence which would be manifestly inadequate having due regard to the nature of the offence since an inadequate sentence would fail to produce a deterrent effect on society at large. Punishments are awarded not because of the fact that it is an eye for an eye or a tooth for tooth rather than having its due impact on the society, while undue harshness is not required yet inadequate punishment may lead to sufferance of the community at large.[64] It is true that in a civilised society a tooth for tooth or death for death is not the rule but it is equally true that when a man becomes a beast and a menace to society, he can be deprived of his life according to the procedure established by law, as the Constitution itself has recognised the death sentence as a2441 permissible punishment for which sufficient constitutional provision for an appeal, reprieve and the like have been provided under the law.[65]

Principle of Proportion between Crime and Punishment

The principle of proportion between crime and punishment is a principle of just desserts that serves as the foundation of every criminal sentence that is justifiable. As a principle of criminal justice it is hardly less familiar or less important than the principle that only the guilty ought to be punished. Indeed the requirement that punishment not be disproportionately great, which is a corollary of just desserts, is dictated by the same principle that does not allow punishment of the innocent, for any punishment in excess of what is deserved for the criminal conduct is punishment without guilt.[66]

Criminal law adheres, in general, to the principle of proportionality in prescribing liability according to the culpability of each kind of criminal conduct. It ordinarily allows some significant discretion to the Judge in arriving at a sentence in each case, presumably to permit sentences that reflect more subtle considerations of culpability that are raised by the special facts of each case.

Judges in essence affirm that punishment ought always to fit the crime; yet in practice, sentences are determined largely by other considerations. Sometimes it is the correctional needs of the perpetrator that are offered to justify a sentence, sometimes the desirability of keeping him out of circulation, and sometimes even the tragic results of his crime. Inevitably these considerations cause a departure from just desert as the basis of punishment and create cases of apparent injustice that are serious and widespread.[67]

Proportion between crime and punishment is a goal respected in principle, and in spite of errant notions, it remains a strong influence in the determination of sentences. Anything less than a penalty of greatest severity for any serious crime is thought to be a measure of toleration that is unwarranted and unwise. But in fact quite apart fom those considerations that make punishment unjustifiable when it is out of proportion to the crime, uniformly disproportionate punishment has some very undesirable practical consequences.[68]

Imposition of sentence without considering its effect on the social order in many cases may be in reality a futile exercise. The social impact of the crime, eg, where it relates to offences against women, dacoity, kidnapping, misappropriation of public money, treason and other offences involving moral turpitude or moral delinquency which have great impact on social order, and public interest, cannot be lost sight of and per se require exemplary treatment. Any liberal attitude by imposing meager sentences or taking too sympathetic view merely on account of lapse of time in respect of such offences will be result-wise counter-productive in the long run and against societal interest which needs to be cared for and strengthened by string of deterrence inbuilt in the sentencing system.[69]2442

No Foolproof Formula for Proportion Between Crime and Sentence

Proportion between crime and punishment is a goal respected in principle, and despite of errant notions, it remains a strong influence in the determination of sentences. The practice of punishing all serious crimes with equal severity is now unknown in civilised societies, but such a radical departure from the principle of proportionality has disappeared from the law only in recent times on account of misplaced sympathies to the perpetrator of crime, thus leaving the victim or his family into oblivion. Even now for a single grave infraction drastic sentences are imposed. Anything less than a penalty of greatest severity for any serious crime is thought then to be a measure of toleration that is unwarranted and unwise. But in fact, quite apart from those considerations that make punishment unjustifiable when it is out of proportion to the gravity of the crime, uniformly disproportionate punishment has some very undesirable practical consequences.

After giving due consideration to the facts and circumstances of each case, for deciding just and appropriate sentence to be awarded for an offence, the aggravating and mitigating factors and circumstances in which a crime has been committed are to be delicately balanced on the basis of really relevant circumstances in a dispassionate manner by the Court. Such act of balancing is indeed a difficult task. It has been very aptly indicated in Dennis Councle MCGDAUTHA v State of California ,[70] that no formula of a foolproof nature is possible that would provide a reasonable criterion in determining a just and appropriate punishment in the infinite variety of circumstances that may affect the gravity of the crime. In the absence of any foolproof formula which may provide any basis for reasonable criteria to correctly assess various circumstances germane to the consideration of gravity of crime, the discretionary judgment in the facts of each case, is the only way in which such judgment may be equitably distinguished.[71]

185. 'Shall be Punished With Death or Imprisonment for Life'

In a sessions trial case, if the accused is convicted, the judge shall, unless he proceeds in accordance with the provisions of s 360, CrPC, hear the accused on the question of sentence, and then pass sentence on him according to law.[72] However, since the punishment prescribed under s 302, IPC is either death penalty or imprisonment for life, there is no question of proceeding in accordance with the provisions of s 360, CrPC .

No discretion is given to the trial judge who convicts a person of an offence under this section to award or not to award the punishment provided. The only discretion allowed is to determine which of the two punishments prescribed should be awarded, regard being had to the circumstances of the particular case.[73] Similarly, the sentence for murder prescribed by this section is death 'or imprisonment for life' in the alternative. The sentence of life imprisonment is the minimum, provided under this section, and that cannot be reduced even if the Court so desires.[74] Where an accused has been awarded the minimum sentence prescribed in this section, it is not necessary2443 to remit his case to the sessions judge for giving a hearing on the question of sentence under s 235(2), CrPC 1973.[75]

186. Table Showing Sentence to be Awarded in Section 302

The following table shows that appropriate sentence to be awarded in s 302, IPC .

187. Sentence Less Than Life Imprisonment--Not Permissible

Under s 302, IPC, the accused can be punished with death or imprisonment for life and is also liable to fine. Thus, the minimum sentence provided for the offence under s 302 is imprisonment for life.[81]

An accused found guilty of an offence punishable under s 302, IPC, which only prescribes for two sentences, death and life imprisonment, cannot be given a lesser punishment than the two prescribed, as passing such sentence would be contrary to the provisions contained in s 302, IPC .[82] The sentence of life imprisonment is the minimum provided under s 302, IPC and that cannot be reduced even if the Court so desires.[83] Thus, awarding of rigorous imprisonment for seven years only when the accused is found guilty under ss 302 / 34, IPC, by a sessions court is a seriously grievous error.[84]

188. Imprisonment for Life

See commentary under the same heading in s 53, ante, Vol I.

In Shri Bhagwan v State of Rajasthan ,[85] while reducing the death sentence to imprisonment for life, the Supreme Court considered s 57, IPC and referred to the following observation in Dalbir Singh v State of Punjab: [86]

> The sentences of death in the present appeal are liable to be reduced to life imprisonment. We may add a footnote to the ruling in Rajendra Prasad v State of Uttar Pradesh. [87] Taking the clue from the English Legislation on abolition, we may suggest that life imprisonment which strictly means imprisonment for the whole of the man's life, but in practice amounts to incarceration for a period between 10 and 14 years may, at the option of the convicting court, be subject to the conditions that the sentence of imprisonment shall last as long as life lasts where there are exceptional indications of murderous recidivism and the community cannot run the risk of the convict being at large. This takes care of judicial apprehensions that unless physically liquidated the culprit may at some remote time repeat murder.

The Court also observed that though under the relevant rules a sentence for imprisonment for life is equated with a definite period of 20 years, there is no indefeasible right of such prisoner to be unconditionally released on the expiry of such particular term, including remissions and that is only for the purpose of working out the remissions that the said sentence is equated with a definite period and not for any other purpose. The Court, thereafter directed that the accused shall be released from prison unless he had served out at least 20 years of imprisonment including the period already undergone by the accused.[88]2445

Life Convict

A convict undergoing life imprisonment is expected to remain in custody till the end of his life, subject to any remission granted by the appropriate Government under s 432 of the CrPC, which in turn is subject to the procedural checks in that section and the substantive check in s 433-A of the CrPC .[89]

189. 'And shall also be Liable to fine'

This section provides that whoever commits murder shall be punished with death or imprisonment for life 'and shall also be liable to fine'. Whether there should be a sentence of fine also is for the Court to determine.[90] The words 'and shall also be liable to fine' in s 302, IPC, are not to be understood as a legislative mandate that the Court must invisibly award a sentence of fine also in addition to imprisonment for life.[91] If, however, the Court imposes a sentence of fine also under s 302, IPC, it must, give reasons as to why a sentence of fine is also being imposed, the reason being that a sentence of fine, over and above the substantive sentence of death or life-imprisonment, is deemed to be in excess and it is always desirable to give reasons for imposing the excess penalty.[92] To sustain an order imposing fine, there must be evidence to show that the convicts can pay the fine. If the fine is for the purpose of compensating the heirs of the deceased, it must be specified who those heirs are. It is not the practice of the courts to impose fine when death sentences are given.[93] Of course, there is power to combine a sentence of death with a sentence of fine, but that power is sparingly exercised because the sentence of death is an extreme penalty to impose, and adding to that grave penalty, a sentence of fine is hardly calculated to serve any social purpose. In fact, the common trend of sentencing is that even a sentence of life-imprisonment is seldom combined with a heavy sentence of fine, but the Supreme Court, in Palaniappa Gounder v State of

Tamil Nadu ,[94] was not inclined to go so far as to express approval of the unqualified view, taken in some cases, that a sentence of fine for an offence of murder is wholly 'inapposite'.[95] A sentence of fine, in a murder case, looks appropriate only where the murder has been motivated by monetary gain.[96]

190. Forms of Death Sentence

Commentary under s 53, ante, Vol. 1, may be referred to.

When any person is sentenced to death, the sentence shall direct that he be hanged by the neck till he is dead.[97] Therefore, the order of the Court directing that 'the accused be hanged or'[98] 'to review the supreme penalty'[99] are not in proper form.2446 However, the omission to specify the direction in the manner indicated under s 354(5), CrPC 1898) is only an irregularity which is only technical in nature and does not vitiate the judgment.[1] The form of death sentence prescribed by s 354(5), CrPC 1973, does not violate the provisions contained in art 21 of the Constitution .[2] The method of execution of capital punishment by hanging by neck is a scientific and one of the least painful methods of execution of the death sentence.[3]

Hanging in Public View Violates Article 21 [4]

Execution of death sentence under s 354(5), CrPC (2 of 1974) by public hanging would be a barbaric practice clearly violative of art 21 of the Constitution . The jail manual of no state in the country makes a provision for execution of death sentence by public hanging. The direction for execution of death sentence by public hanging is unconstitutional and if any jail manual were to provide public hanging the Supreme Court would declare it to be violative of art 21 of the Constitution .[5]

191. Should Capital Punishment be Abolished?

Courts are constantly faced with the situation where they are required to answer to new challenges and mould the sentencing system to meet those challenges. Protection of society and deterring the criminal is the avowed object of law and that is required to be achieved by imposing an appropriate sentence. The change in the legislative intendment relating to award of capital punishment, notwithstanding the opposition by the protagonist of abolition of capital sentence, shows that it is expected of the courts to so operate the sentencing system and impose such sentence which reflects the social conscience of society. The sentencing process has to be stern where it should be.[6]

To be or 'not to be' is a highly vexed question. Throughout the globe, brilliant brains including legal luminaries and philosophers have debated whether the death sentence should be retained as punishment for some of the most heinous crimes. Lord Denning once said that punishment of death should reflect adequately the revulsion felt for the gravest of crimes by the great majority of citizens. In our country, for the offence of murder, death sentence has been retained for rarest of rare cases.[7]

Human rights activists, reformists and sociologists sometimes argue that life once past cannot be brought back, that capital punishment does not serve any social purpose and in the absence of any study, the barbaric penalty of death should not be awarded to any person as it has no deterent effect. It is argued that penalty of death sentence has a dehumanising effect, and execution of capital punishment by hanging is barbaric and dehumanising. The 35th Report of the Law Commission submitted in 1967 summarises the recommendations in the following words:

Having regard, however, to the conditions in India, to the variety of the social upbringing of its inhabitants, to the disparity in the level of morality and education in the country, to the vastness of its area, to the diversity of its population and to the2447 paramount need for maintaining law and order in the country at the present juncture India cannot risk the experiment of abolition of capital punishment. The majority opinion in Bachan Singh's case[8] held that having regard to the social conditions in our country the stage was not ripe for taking a risk of abolishing it. Further, a judicial notice can be taken of the fact that the law and order situation in the country has not only not improved since 1967 but has deteriorated over the years and is fast worsening today. The present is, therefore, the most inopportune time to reconsider the law on the subject. While, rejecting the demand of the protagonist of the reformatory theory and humanitarian ideology or rehabilitarian philosophy for abolition of the death penalty the Legislature in its wisdom though that the 'special reasons clause' under s 354(3), CrPC, should be a sufficient safeguard against arbitrary imposition of the extreme penalty.[9] The reasons why the community as a whole does not endorse the humanistic approach reflected in 'death sentence in no case' doctrine are not far to seek. In the first place, the very humanistic edifice is constructed on the foundation of 'reverence for life' principle. When a member of the community violates this very principle by killing another member the society may not feel itself bound by the shackles of this doctrines. Secondly, it has to be realised that every member of the community is able to live with safety without his or her own life being endangered because of the protective arm of the community and on account of the rule of law enforced by it. The very existence of the rule of law and the fear of being brought to book operates as a deterrent to those who have no scruples in killing others if it suits their ends. Every member of the community owes a debt to the community for this protection. When ingratitude is shown instead of gratitude by 'killing' a member of the community which protects the murderer himself from being killed. Or when the community feels that for the sake of self preservation the killer has to be killed, the community may well withdraw the protection by sanctioning the death penalty. But the community will not do so in every case. It may do so (in rarest of rare cases) when its collective conscience is so shocked that it will expect the holders of the judicial power centre to inflict death penalty irrespective of their personal opinion as regards desirability or otherwise of retaining death penalty. The community may entertain such a sentiment when the crime is viewed from the platform of the motive for, or the manner of commission of the crime, or the antisocial or abhorrent nature of the crime.[10]

It is only the Legislature which can abolish the death penalty and not the Courts. As long as the death penalty exists in the statute book it has to be imposed in some cases, otherwise it will tantamount to repeal of the death penalty by the judiciary. It is not for the judiciary to repeal or amend the law, as that is in the domain of the legislature.[11]

Death Sentence Not Unconstitutional

It cannot be said that since it may not be possible to eradicate crime itself, criminals cannot be awarded the death sentence prescribed by law.[12] The death penalty, provided for in an offence of murder under s 302, IPC, is not unconstitutional. It2448 neither violates 19 nor art 21of the Constitution of India .[13] In the face of the statutory provision in cl (3) of s 354, CrPC which requires the giving of special reasons while imposing the death penalty. This is consistent with art 21 which enjoins that the personal liberty or life of an individual shall not be taken except according to the procedure established by law, extreme plea of death in no case cannot be countenanced and the death penalty cannot be said to be violative of art 21 .[14] A provision conferring power on courts to exercise discretion cannot be said to be violative of art 14 and capital punishment should not be regarded as per se unreasonable or as not being in public interest.[15] It is a most inopportune time to consider the question of imposition of capital punishment as the law and order situation in the country has deteriorated over the years and is fast worsening today.[16] The death sentence is not unconstitutional.[17]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 302.

Punishment for murder.--

192. Other Indications in The Constitution Regarding Death Penalty

Article 21 reads as under:

'No person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to procedure established by law'.

If this article is expanded in accordance with the interpretative principle indicated in Maneka Gandhi, it will read as follows: 'No person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to fair, just and reasonable procedure established by valid law'.

In the converse positive form, the expanded article will read: A person may be deprived of his life or personal liberty in accordance with fair, just and reasonable procedure established by valid law.

Thus, expanded and read for interpretative purposes art 21 clearly brings out the implication that the founding fathers recognised the right of the state to deprive a person of his life or personal liberty in accrodance with fair, just and reasonable procedure established by valid law. There are several other indications also, in the Constitution which show that the Constitution makers were fully cognizant with the existence of the death penalty for murder and certain other offences in the IPC . Entries 1 and 2 in List III--Concurrent List of the Seventh Schedule, specifically refer to the Indian Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedure as in force at the commencement of the Constitution. Article 72(1)(c) of the Constitution specifically invests the President with the power to suspend, remit or commute the sentence of any person convicted of any offence, and also 'in all cases where the sentence is a sentence of death'. Likewise, under art 161, the Governor of a state has been given power to suspend, remit or commute inter alia, the sentence of death of any person convicted of murder or other capital offence relating to a matter to which the executive power of the State extends. Article 134 in terms gives a right of appeal to the Supreme Court to a person who on appeal, is sentenced to death by the High Court, after reversal of his acquittal by the trial court. Under the successive Criminal2449 Procedure Code which have been in force for about 100 years a sentence of death is to be carried out by hanging. In view of the aforesaid constitutional postulates, by no stretch of imagination can it be said that death penalty under s 302, Penal Code, either per se or because of its execution by hanging, constitutes any unreasonable, cruel or unusual punishment. By reason of the same constitutional postulates it cannot be said that the framers of the Constitution considered death sentence for murder or the prescribed traditional mode of its execution as a degrading punishment which would defile 'the dignity of the individual' within the contemplation of the preamble to the Constitution. On party of reasoning, it cannot be said that death penalty, for the offence of murder violates the basic structure of the Constitution.[18]

193. Convict in Prison till Execution of Death Sentence--No Double Jeopardy

A prisoner who is sentenced to death and kept in jail custody under a warrant under s 366(2), CrPC,[19] is neither serving rigorous imprisonment nor simple imprisonment. In substance, he is in jail where he is kept with safety and protection so that he may be available for execution of the sentence awarded. Therefore, when capital punishment is awarded, the sentence awarded is only a sentence of death and not a sentence of death plus imprisonment, and therefore, if a condemned prisoner has to live in jail for long, in substance, it would not amount to punishment which is sentence of death and imprisonment for sometime. Thus, there would be no double jeopardy or violation of art 21 of the Constitution .[20]

194. Confirmation of Death Sentence

When a reference is made to the High Court under s 366, CrPC by the learned sessions judge on passing a sentence of death, the High Court has to satisfy itself whether a case beyond reasonable doubt has been made out against the accused for infliction of the extreme penalty of death. The proceedings before the High Court in such a case require reappraisal and reassessment of the entire facts and law so as to come to its independent conclusion, but while so doing, the High Court cannot also overlook the conclusion arrived at by the learned sessions judge. In performing its duty, the High Court is of necessity bound to consider the merits of the case and examine the entire evidence on record. The Legislature having provided in the confirmation proceedings a final safeguard to the life and liberty of the subject in cases of capital sentence, the duty of the High Court becomes more onerous to consider independently the matter carefully and examine all relevant material evidence, and come to a conclusion one way or the other. It is therefore, the duty of the High Court in a death reference to consider the evidence afresh.[21] A sentence of death passed by the sessions court cannot be executed without confirmation of sentence by the High Court. The procedure for submission of sentences for confirmation is given in ch 28, ss 366-371, CrPC .[22] While rejecting the reference under s 366, CrPC, the High Court should discuss in detail why it came to the conclusion that the death sentence awarded by the trial court be not confirmed. It2450 would be appropriate for the High Court to give reasons for differing from the view taken by the trial court, rather than mechanically rejecting the reference.[23]

195. No Norms can be Laid Down for Awarding Death Sentence

The circumstances in which the extreme penalty should be inflicted cannot be enumerated in view of the complex situation in society and the Legislature, therefore, was right in leaving to the discretion of the judicial decision as to what should be the sentence in the particular circumstance of the case. However, the Legislature has put a further rider that when the extreme penalty is inflicted, it is necessary for the Court to give special reasons thereof,[24] under s 354(3), CrPC . In Bachan Singh's case,[25] the question of laying down standards for categorising cases in which the death penalty could be imposed was considered, and it was felt that it would be desirable to indicate the broad guidelines consistent with s 354(3) of the Code without attempting to formulate rigid standards. That was because it was felt that standardisation of the sentencing process would leave little room for judicial discretion to take account of variations in culpability even within the same category of cases. After referring to the aggravating circumstances (para 202) and the mitigating circumstances (para 206) pointed out by counsel, the Court observed that while these were relevant factors it would not be desirable to fetter judicial discretion. It pointed out that these factors were not exhaustive and cautioned: 'courts, aided by broad illustrative guidelines indicated by us, will discharge the onerous function with evermore scrupulous care and human concern' consistent with s 354(3) of the CrPC . In the subsequent decision in Machhi Singh's case,[26] the court tried to indicate the type of cases which may fall within the exceptional class without attempting to introduce rigidity. It would not be fair to read the decision as an attempt to fetter judicial discretion. Even in cases of the type indicated in the case, circumstances may vary, which would necessitate a different approach.[27] No straight-jacket formula for awarding death sentence can be evolved which is applicable to all cases. The facts of each case will have their own implication on the question of awarding sentence.[28] No litmus test is provided nor any test formulated to discern precisely what is the rarest of rare cases in which the alternative option of awarding life sentence is foreclosed.[29] Even though the categories framed in Machhi Singh provide very useful guidelines, nonetheless those cannot be taken as inflexible, absolute or immutable, and even in those categories, there would be scope for flexibility as observed in Bachan Singh itself. The judgment in *Machhi Singh*was rendered on 20 July 1983, nearly twenty five years ago, that is to say a full generation earlier. Classification in that case was made looking at murder mainly as an act of maladjusted individual criminal(s). In 1983, the country was relatively free from organized and professional crime. Abduction for ransom and gang rape and murders committed in the course of those offences were yet to become a menace for the society compelling the Legislature to create special slots for those offences in the Penal Code. At the time of Machhi Singh, Delhi had not witnessed the infamous Sikh carnage. There was no attack on the country's Parliament. There were2451 no bombs planted by terrorists killing completely innocent people, men, women and children in dozens with sickening frequency. There were no private armies. There were no mafia cornering huge government contacts purely by muscle power. There were no reports of killings of social activists and 'whistle blowers'. There were no reports of custodial deaths and rape and fake encounters by police or even by armed forces. These developments would unquestionably find a more pronounced reflection in any classification if one were to be made today. In a given case, the Court may, for a good and strong basis substitute a death sentence by life imprisonment or by a term in excess of fourteen years and further direct that the convict must not be released from the prison for the rest of his life or for the actual term as specified in the order, as the case may be.[30]

In Bachan Singh v State of Punjab ,[31] their lordships of the Supreme Court have not categorised the circumstances in which murder is to be punishable with death. They have laid down certain guidelines for imposing the death sentence depending on the facts and circumstances of each case. They were of the view that the rigid categorisation of death sentence would offend the legislative policy.[32]

Two Landmark Judgments of the Supreme Court on Death Penalty

Bachan Singh v State of Punjab [33] and Machhi Singh v State of Punjab [34] are two landmark judgments of the Apex Court profusely quoted by the Apex Court and different High Courts while deciding the question of death sentence in murder cases. Bachan Singh's case was interpreted in Machhi Singh's case by the Supreme Court laid down the following propositions of law:

(i) The extreme penalty of death need not be inflicted except in gravest cases of extreme culpability;

(ii) Before, opting for the death penalty the circumstances of the offender also require to be taken into consideration alone with the circumstances of the 'crime';

(iii) Life imprisonment is, the rule and death sentence is an exception. In other words death sentence must be imposed only when life imprisonment appears to be an altogether inadequate punishment having regard to the relevant circumstances of the crime and provided and only provided, the option to impose sentence of imprisonment for life cannot be conscientiously exercised having regard to the nature and circumstance of the crime and all the relevant circumstance;

(iv) A balance-sheet of aggravating and mitigating circumstances has to be drawn up and in doing so, the mitigating circumstance has to be accorded full weightage and a just balance has to be struck between the aggravating and the mitigating circumstances before the option is exercised.

In order to apply these guidelines inter alia the following questions may be asked and answered.[35]2452

(a) Is there something uncommon about the crime which renders sentence of imprisonment for life inadequate and calls for a death sentence?
(b) Are the circumstances of the crime such that there is no alternative but to impose death sentence even after according maximum weightage to the mitigating circumstance which speak in favour or the offender?

(v) If upon taking an overall global view of all the circumstances in the light of the aforesaid circumstances in the light of the aforesaid proposition and taking into account the answers to the questions posed hereinabove, the circumstances of the case are such that death sentence is warranted, the court would proceed to do so.[36]

196. Hearing on Sentence

The requirement of hearing the accused in the sub-section is intended to satisfy the rule of natural justice. It is a fundamental requirement of fairplay that the accused who was hitherto concentrating on the prosecution evidence on the question of guilt, should on being found guilty, be asked if he has anything to say or any evidence to tender on the question of sentence. This is all the more necessary since the courts are generally required to make the choice from a wide range of discretion in the matter of sentencing. To assist the Court in determining the correct sentence to be imposed, the Legislature introduced sub-s (2) to s 235, CrPC .[37] The said provision, therefore, satisfies a dual purpose; it satisfies the rule of natural justice by according to the accused an opportunity of being heard on the question of sentence, and at the same time helps the Court choose the sentence to be awarded. Since the provision is intended to give the accused an opportunity to place before the Court all relevant material having bearing on the question of sentence there can be no doubt that the provision is salutary and must be strictly followed. It is clearly mandatory and should not be treated as a mere formality.[38] An administrative decision having civil consequences, if taken without giving a hearing is generally struck down as violative of the rule of natural justice. Likewise a sentencing decision taken without following the requirements of sub-s (2) to s 235, CrPC[39] in letter and spirit, would also meet a similar fate and may have to be replaced by an appropriate order. The sentencing Court must approach the question seriously and must endeavour to see that all relevant facts and circumstances bearing on the question of sentence are brought on record. Only after giving due weight to the mitigating as well as the aggravating circumstances placed before it, it must pronounce the sentence. As a general rule trial courts should after recording conviction, adjourn the matter to a future date and call upon both the prosecution as well as the defence to place the relevant material bearing on the question of sentence before it, and thereafter, pronounce the sentence on the offender.[40] The courts have impressed the need to adjourn the matter to some other day, thereby giving an opportunity to the convict under s 235, CrPC to explain2453 all circumstances in favour of a lenient sentence.[41] It is to be noted that the statute has engrafted in the statute book provisions of s 235(2) to see that proper appreciation of the evidence takes place and proper opportunity of hearing as regards punishment be afforded, but if there is no taker of such opportunity inspite of there being lawyers appearing for the accused, the question of further adjournment of the matter would not arise. It is true that the obligation is not discharged by putting a formal question to the accused. The Judge is supposed to elicit material questions of sentence, and this requirement of law would show whether there was infact such genuine attempt to elicit such material before passing such sentence.[42] Where the accused is not heard by the sessions court before passing the death sentence on account of non-compliance with s 235(2), CrPC, the High Court directed that they be heard and allowed production of evidence/material having a bearing on the question of sentence before passing order on sentence, and the sentence of death already awarded was set aside.[43] If such opportunity of being heard is not given by the sessions court to the accused, the accused can be heard on the point of sentence by the High Court in the appeal before it.[44]

Opportunity for Hearing on Sentence--Legal Position

In Ramdeo Chauhan alias Rajnath Chauhan v State of Assam ,[45] the Supreme Court explained the legal position regarding the necessity to afford opportunity for hearing to the accused on the question of sentence, as follows:

(i) When the conviction is under s 302, IPC (with or without the aid of ss 34 or 149 or 120B, IPC), if the sessions judge does not propose to impose death penalty on the convicted person it is unnecessary to proceed to hear the accused on the question of sentence. Section 235(2) of the Code will not be violated if the sentence of his imprisonment is awarded for that offence without hearing the accused on the question of sentence;
(ii) In all other cases the accused must be given sufficient opportunity of hearing on the question of sentence;
(iii) The normal rule is that after pronouncing the verdict of guilty the hearing should be made on the same day and the sentence shall also be pronounced on the same day;
(iv) In cases where the judge feels or if the accused demands more time for hearing on the question of sentence [especially when the judge proposes to impose the death penalty the proviso to s 309(2) is not a bar for affording such time];
(v) For any reason the Court is inclined to adjourn the case after pronouncing the verdict of guilty in grave offences, the convicted person shall be committed to jail till the verdict on the sentence is pronounced. Further detention will depend upon the process of law.2454

197. Accused Sentenced to Life Imprisonment--Hearing Not Necessary

Where an accused has been awarded the minimum sentence prescribed in this section, it is not necessary to remit his case to the Sessions Judge for giving a hearing on the question of sentence under s 235(2), CrPC .[46] If, therefore, conviction under s 302, IPC stands, the sentence of life imprisonment is beyond interference.[47] When it is a case of conviction under s 302, IPC, if the minimum sentence is imposed, the question of providing an opportunity of being heard to the accused under s 235, CrPC, would not arise.[48]

It is required to be noted that when the statute prescribes minimum sentence then even of the accused is heard on the question of sentence, the minimum sentence is to be imposed. However, if the Court has to exercise discretion in imposing sentence, i.e., where minimum sentence is not prescribed, then the question of hearing the accused would arise. If the accused is convicted for an offence under s 302, IPC, and if the Court is of the view that punishment provided for this offence is minimum, is to be imposed, then there may not be question of hearing the accused on the question of sentence, but if the Court is of the opinion that more than the minimum sentence is required to be imposed, then the Court has to hear the accused on the question of sentence. When there is discretion with the Court, the Court will have to hear the accused on the question of sentence. However, when minimum sentence is prescribed and the Court is awarding that sentence, there may not be a question of hearing the accused as contemplated under s 235(2) of the CrPC .[49]

198. Relevant Considerations for Determining Sentence

The important aspect of sentence in a murder case depends on several considerations based upon facts and circumstances of a given case. In a death sentence matter, it is not only the nature of the crime but the background of the criminal, his psychology, his social conditions and his mindset for committing the offence also are relevant. Mere number of persons killed is not, by itself, a circumstance justifying the death sentence.[50]

The question of sentence is a matter of judicial discretion. The relevant considerations in determining the sentence, broadly stated, include the motive for and the magnitude of the offence, and the manner of its commission.[51] The determination of sentence in a given case depends on a variety of considerations; the more important being the nature of the crime, the manner of its commission, the motive, which impelled it and the character and antecedents of the accused.[52] The2455 heinousness of the crime is a relevant factor in the choice of the sentence. The circumstances of the crime, specially social pressures which induce the crime which we may epitomise as a 'just sentence in an unjust society' are another consideration.[53] The manner in which the crime was committed, the weapons used, and brutality or the lack of it, are some considerations which must be present in the mind of the Court while awarding sentence in a murder case.[54] A proper sentence is the amalgam of many factors such as the nature of the offence; the circumstances--extenuating or aggravating--of the offence; the prior criminal record, if any, of the offender; the age of the offender; the record of the offender, as to employment, the background of the offender with reference to education, home life, sobriety and social adjustment; the emotional and mental condition of 'the offender'; the prospects for rehabilitation of the offender, the possibility of return of the offender to a normal life in the community, the possibility of treatment or training of the offender; the possibility that the sentence may serve as a deterrent to crime by the offender or by others and the current community need, if any, for such a deterrent in respect to the particular type of offence. These are factors which have to be taken into account by the court in deciding the appropriate sentence, and therefore, the Legislature felt that for this purpose, a separate stage should be provided after conviction when the Court can hear the accused in regard to these factors bearing on sentence, and then pass proper sentence on the accused. Hence, the new provision in s 235(2), CrPC .[55]A number of factors which are to be taken into account while imposing penalty of death, are the motive of the crime; the manner of the assault; the impact of the crime on society as a whole; the personality of the accused; the circumstances and facts of the case as to whether the crime committed is for satisfying any kind of lust, greed or in pursuance of any organised anti-social activity or by way of organised crime, drug trafficking or the like or the chances of inflicting the society with a similar criminal act, that is to say, vulnerability of the members of the-society at the hands of the accused in future or commission of murder which may be shocking to the conscience.[56]

Relevancy of Mental Condition of Accused in Awarding Sentence

The mental condition or state of mind of the accused is one of the factors that has been legitimately taken into account in various cases and that can be taken into account in considering the question of sentence. There are various cases in which the Court having regard to the disturbed or imbalanced state of mind of the accused at the time of commission of offence, thought it fit not to impose the death sentence vide: Shamshul Kanwar v State of UP; [57]Lehna v State of Haryana [58] and Om Prakash v State of Haryana. [59] In Francis v State of Kerala ,[60] the following pertinent observations were made:

> Nevertheless, in deciding whether the case merits the less severe of the two penalties prescribed for murder a history of relations between the parties concerned, the background, the context, or the factual setting of the crime, and the strength and nature2456 of the motives operating on the mind of the offender, are relevant considerations. The state of feelings and mind produced by these, while insufficient to bring in an exception may suffice to make the less severe sentence more appropriate.

Where the killing of two other policemen without premeditation and without any motive whatsoever further reveals that these acts were done out of panic reaction and in a state of frenzy. It is not a case where it can be said with certitude that the murderous attacks were 'diabolical in conception and cruel in execution' as pointed out in Bachan Singh v State of Punjab. [61] Nor can it be said that 'the nature of the crime and the circumstances of the offender reveal that the criminal is a menace to the society'or that the 'collective consciousness of the community would be shocked' if the death sentence is not inflicted. Above all, the sentence of death has been haunting him for considerable time, videAllauddin Mian v State of Bihar. [62] So, extreme penalty of death sentence is not desirable in such a case.[63]

199. Special Reasons for Awarding Death Sentence

Under sub-s (3) of s 354, CrPC, the court is required to state the reasons for sentence awarded, and in case of imposition of sentence of death, the judge has to record 'special reasons' for imposing the death sentence. Punishment for murder as a rule should be life imprisonment and death sentence is only an execution. In Balwant Singh's case,[64]Ambaram's case,[65] and Sarveshwar Prasad Sharma's case,[66] the Court held that it was neither necessary nor possible to specify the 'special reasons' which may justify the passing of death sentence in a given case.

It would thus be obvious that it is neither feasible nor legally permissible for this court to give a definite connotation to the expression 'special reasons' occurring in sub-s (3) of s 354, CrPC . It is difficult to put 'special reasons' in a strait-jacket. Each case must depend on its own particular facts. The question of sentence must be left to the discretion of the sessions judge trying the accused.[67]

The Court is not required to record reasons for commuting the death sentence to one of life imprisonment, it is only required to record reasons for either confirming the death sentence or awarding it.[68]

200. Death Sentence in Rarest of Rare Cases

Section 302 of the IPC authorises the Court to punish the offender of murder with death or imprisonment for life--the statute therefore has provided discretion to the Court to sentence the offender either with death or with imprisonment for life. Obviously, a serious decision and a heavy burden is imposed on the Court--this discretion conferred however, shall have to be exercised in a manner and in consonance with the concept of law to subserve the ends of justice and it is on this aspect that the Supreme Court in a long catena of cases in no uncertain terms laid down that award of death sentence though within the ambit of jurisdiction of the2457 courts but that does not clothe the courts to exercise the same in a indiscriminate manner. The Supreme Court has been candid enough to record on more occasions than one that it is only in the rarest of the rare cases that this discretion as regards capital punishment ought to be exercised, civilisation and due process of law coupled with the social order ought not to permit us to be hasty in regard to the award of capital punishment and courts ought to be slow in that direction.[69]

It is open for the Court to grant a death penalty in an extremely narrow set of cases, which is signified by the phrase 'rarest of rare'. The rarest of the rare test relates to 'special reasons' under s 354(3), CrPC . This route is open to the Court only when there is no other punishment which may be alternatively given. This results in the death penalty being an exception in sentencing, especially in the case where some other punishment can suffice.[70]

In rarest of rare cases when collective conscience of the community is so shocked that it will expect the holders of the judicial power centre to inflict death penalty irrespective of their personal opinion as regards desirability or otherwise of retaining death penalty, death sentence can be awarded. The community may entertain such sentiment in the following circumstances:

(1) When the murder is committed in an extremely brutal, grotesque, diabolical, revolting or dastardly manner so as to arouse intense and extreme indignation of the community.
(2) When the murder is committed for a motive which evinces total depravity and meanness; e.g., murder by hired assassin for money or reward or a cold-blooded murder for gains of a person vis-à-vis whom the murderer is in a dominating position or in a position of trust, or murder is committed in the course for betrayal of the motherland.
(3) When murder of a member of a scheduled caste or minority community, etc., is committed not for personal reasons but in circumstances which arouse social wrath, or in cases of 'bride burning' or 'dowry deaths' or when murder is committed in order to remarry for the sake of extracting dowry once again or to marry another woman or account of infatuation.
(4) When the crime is enormous in proportion. For instance when multiple murders, say of all or almost all the members of a family or a large number of persons of a particular caste, community, or locality, are committed.

(5) When the victim of murder is an innocent child, or a helpless woman or old or infirm person or a person vis- à-vis whom the murderer is in a dominating position or a public figure generally loved and respected by the community.[71]

The law is well-settled by reason of decisions of the Supreme Court as to circumstances in which capital punishment can be imposed. Capital punishment can be imposed in the rarest of rare cases if there are any aggravating circumstances such as the accused having any criminal record in the past, the manner of committing the2458 crime, delay in imposing the sentence and so on.[72] While applying this test, the Court has to look into a variety of factors like society's abhorrence, extreme indignation and antipathy to certain types of crimes like rape and murder of minor girls, minor girls with physical disability, old and infirm women with disabilities etc., these examples being only illustrative and not exhaustive. Courts award death sentence because the situation demands so due to constitutional compulsion, which is reflected by the will of the people, and it is not Judge centric.[73]

Death sentence remains in the statute book and its constitutional validity stands approved by the Constitution Bench in the celebrated decision of Bachan Singh v State of Punjab. [74] The Constitution Bench while upholding the validity of death sentence, has laid down as a legal principle that such sentence can be awarded only in 'rarest of rare cases when the option is unquestionably foreclosed'. No litmus is provided nor any test formulated to screen precisely what is the rarest of the rare cases in which the alternative option is thus foreclosed. However, a three judge Bench of this court in Machhi Singh v State of Punjab ,[75] elaborated the ratio in Bachan Singh. The Bench laid stress on the reaction of the community at large in cases 'when its collective conscience is shocked that it will expect the holders of the judicial power centre to inflict death penalty irrespective of their personal opinion a regards desirability or otherwise of retaining death penalty. Rarest of rare cases would be discerned when the crime is viewed 'from the platform of the motive for, or the manner of commission of the crime or the anti-social or abhorrent nature of the crime'. The Bench has suggested a few instances thereof as guidelines and has observed that in order an apply those guidelines the following questions may be asked and answered:

(a) was there something uncommon about the crime which renders sentence of imprisonment for life inadequate and calls for a death sentence?;

(b) were the circumstances of the crime such that there is no alternative but to impose death sentence even after according maximum weightage to the mitigating circumstances which speak in favour of the offender.[76]

The accused respondents committed rape on the deceased and thereafter murdered her by strangulating her with scarf. The reasons recorded by the Trial Court for awarding death sentence to the respondents were that the respondents deceived and took the deceased away, turn-wise committed rape on her in the darkness of night and thereafter, committed her murder by throttling her by her chunni (scarf) and hence they were not entitled for any leniency and should be punished with death. The Supreme Court held that the reasons given by the Trial Court do not make out the case to be a rarest of rare case in which death sentence could be awarded to the respondents. There was no material to establish that the character of the respondents was of extreme depravity so as to make them liable for the punishment of death. Accordingly, the Court awarded life imprisonment to the two accused respondents for offence under s 302, IPC and maintained the sentence of ten years rigorous imprisonment for offence under s 376(2)(g), IPC as awarded by the Trial Court.[77]2459

The accused shot the deceased dead while the deceased was riding on the hind seat of motor cycle driven by the PW. Held, it was not a rarest of the rare case. The accused was not a professional killer. The death sentence awarded by the High Court was substituted by life imprisonment.[78]

The accused had burnt alive his wife and four daughters. Held, the case was rarest of rare cases. However, since the High Court in appeal had acquitted the accused and he was free for more than 6 years, the Supreme Court did not restore the penalty of death sentence awarded by the trial Judge.[79]

Accused appellant killed his wife and four children in a planned brutal and barbaric manner, and threw the dead bodies into the river. Accused held to be a menace to the society, and case fell in the category of rarest of rare cases. Death sentence was held proper.[80]

Accused appellant had raped and murdered a seven years old girl. Accused was held to be a menace to the society. Death sentence was held proper.[81]

The accused staying as paying guest in the house of the complainant had fallen in arrears of rent and boarding charges, and committed murder of the informant's three children and caused injuries to one during night hours in brutal manner. Family members were natural witnesses, their evidence was natural and proved the complicity of the accused appellant. The case was a rarest of rare case, thus, death penalty awarded to the accused appellant was confirmed.[82]

The instant case, the accused wife, along with accused her husband put an end to the lives of her step-brother and his whole family, which included three tiny tots of 45 days, 2½ years and 4 years, her own father, mother and sister in a very diabolical manner so as to deprive her father from giving property to her step-brother and his family. The fact that murders in question were committed in such a diabolical manner while the victims were sleeping, without any provocation whatsoever from the victims' side indicated the cold-blooded and premeditated approach of the accused to cause the death of the victims. The case was a rarest of rare case, hence, death penalty awarded confirmed.[83]

The accused had committed rape on a minor girl aged 6 years and thereafter had brutally murdered her. The case fell in the category of rarest of rare case. Death sentence awarded by the Sessions Judge was proper.[84]

Where the appellant accused committed the murder of his wife, two sons and one person on account of abject poverty, and tried to kill himself, he was not a menace to society, and had no criminal record, thus, death sentence awarded to him was converted into life imprisonment.[85]2460

Where the accused persons had killed five persons and caused injuries to several others, and the offence was triggered by thirst for revenge, the hope of reformation and rehabilitation of the accused persons could not be ruled out, held that the case did not fall in the category of rarest of rare cases, hence, alteration of death sentence into life imprisonment by the High Court was upheld.[86]

Where the case was of double murder, but could not be called an exceptional one, held that the situation could not be treated as rarest of rare case, thus, death penalty awarded by the Sessions Judge was converted into life imprisonment.[87]

Relevant Factors for Ascertaining Rarest of Rare Cases

In Machhi Singh v State of Punjab ,[88] the following five factors are emphasised for desirability or otherwise of retaining the death penalty by society in the rarest of rare cases.

(i) Manner of Commission of Murder

When murder is committed in an extremely brutal, grotesque, diabolical, revolting, or dastardly manner which arouses intense and extreme indignation of the community, for instance;

(a) when the house of the victim is set aflame with the end in view is to roast him alive in the house;
(b) when the victim is subjected to inhuman acts of torture or cruelty in order to bring about his or her death;
(c) when the body of the victim is cut into pieces or his body is dismembered in a fiendish manner;

(ii)Motive for Commission of Murder

When the murder is committed for a motive which evinces total depravity and meanness.

For instance, when:

(a) a hired assassin commits murder for the sake of money or reward;
(b) a cold-blooded murder is committed with a deliberate design in order to inherit property or to gain control over property of a ward or a person under the control of the murderer or where the murderer is in a dominating position or in a position of trust;
(c) a murder is committed in the course for betrayal of the motherland.

(iii) Anti-social or Socially Abhorrent Nature of the Crime

(a) When murder of a member of a scheduled caste or minority community etc., is committed not for personal reasons but in circumstances which arouse social wrath. For instance when such a crime is committed in order to terrorise such persons and frighten them into fleeing from a place or in order to deprive them of, or make them surrender, lands or benefits2461 conferred on them with a view to reverse past injustices and in order to restore the social balance.
(b) In cases of 'bride burning' and what are known as 'dowry-deaths', or when murder is committed in order to remarry for the sake of extracting dowry once again or to marry another woman on account of infatuation.

(iv)Magnitude of crime

When the crime is enormous in proportion.

For instance when multiple murders say of all or almost all the members of the family or a large number of persons of a particular caste, community, or locality, is committed.

(v) Personality of Victim of Murder

When the victim of murder is:

(a) an innocent child who could not have or has not provided even an excuse, much less a provocation, for murder;
(b) a helpless woman or a person rendered helpless by old age of infirmity;
(c) when the victim is a person whose murderer is in a position of domination or trust;

when the victim is a public figure generally loved and respected by the community for services rendered by him and the murder is committed for political or similar reasons other than personal reasons.[89] The way in which the crime was executed shows that it was pre-meditated and was not on account of a sudden provocation or any 'mental derange', and the manner in which the crime was committed, the weapon used, the brutality of the crime, the number of persons murdered, the helplessness of the victims are also relevant factors for ascertaining whether a case falls amongst the rarest of rare cases.[90] Capital punishment can be imposed in the rarest of rare cases if there are any aggravating circumstances such as the accused having any criminal record in the past, the manner of committing the crime, delay in imposing the sentence and soon.[91]

Where the following facts are proved beyond doubt:

(1) there is no provocation or quarrel between the accused and the five deceased. All the five deceased were unarmed and sleeping during midnight and were helpless. There was no scope or chance for them to face the attack;
(2) it is proved beyond doubt that it was a pre-meditated one, but not on account of any sudden provocation;
(3) there is no mental derangement for the accused to kill five human beings in five strokes one after the other and were killed during the course of their sleep.
(4) the nature of the manner in which the accused committed the five murders found to be gruesome, calculated, heinous, atrocious and cold-blooded.2462

Accordingly, in the above circumstances, it is proved beyond doubt that the said heinous and calculated offence committed by the respondent/accused in killing the five persons with five strokes one after the other is a rarest of the rare cases of the present age in this State as a whole.[1] In Bachan Singh v State of Punjab ,[2] the Supreme Court has laid down certain guidelines for imposing death sentence depending upon facts and circumstances of each case. For example:[3]

(1) only in the gravest cases of extreme culpability, extreme penalty of death need to be inflicted;
(2) along with the crime, circumstances of the criminal has to be considered while marking choice of punishment;
(3) death sentence must be imposed only when life imprisonment appears to be altogether inadequate;
(4) before inflicting extreme penalty of death on the convict the Court has to strike a balance between aggravating and mitigating circumstances.

While deciding the question whether a case falls under 'rarest of rare category' the nature of the offence and its impact on the society is a determinative factor. Mere acquittal or lesser sentence imposed by sessions court or the High Court does not really relate to the gravity of the offence or its impact on society.[4]Where the murders of three persons had been committed in an extremely brutal, diabolical, revolting and dastardly manner with 9, 4, and 21 stab injuries being inflicted by the accused one after the another in succession on the three deceased, the motive for crime evinced total depravity and meanness. This was a cold blooded murder for money and for gains in the property without any immediately provocation, crime committed was an enormous one as all the members of the deceased family had been wiped out. The victims of the murder were an innocent girl of 18 years and a boy in his teens with a mother who was helpless before the accused, the brutality of the act as noted earlier is amplified by repeated stab wounds inflicted on the three deceased persons one after another in succession, these demonstrate that accusssed did not possess basic humaness and lacked the psyche or mind set which, might be amenable for any reform, therefore the case falls amongst rarest of rare cases.[5] The deceased, a child of less than 6 years was raped and thereafter brutally murdered by accused and it was held that the case falls in rarest of rare category and awarding death sentence would be proper.[6]

(vi) Contract killers

Contract killers deserve death sentence. In the instant case, prima facie some police officers and staff were engaged by some private persons to kill their opponent and the police officers and the staff acted as contract killers for them. Such a case would be a rarest of rare case.[7]2463

(vii) Serial killer

Accused was a serial killer who lured a number of small girls and killed them. He used to kill the girls after luring them inside the house, and he would then chop up and eat up their body parts after cooking them. Case fell under rarest of rare case. Death sentence awarded was held proper.[8]

(viii) Honour killing covered

The appellant was very annoyed with his daughter, who had left her husband and was living in an incestuous relationship with her uncle. This infuriated the appellant as he thought this conduct of his daughter had dishonoured his family, and hence he strangulated her with an electric wire causing death. Honour killings, for whatever reason, come within the category of rarest of rare cases deserving death punishment. It is time to stamp out these barbaric, feudal practices which are a slur on our nation. This is necessary as a deterrent for such outrageous, uncivilized behavior. All persons who are planning to perpetrate 'honour' killings should know that the gallows await them. Death sentence was affirmed.[9]

It was a case of honour killing. Three accused appellants had killed six persons and had finished the whole family. The case fell within the category of rarest of rare case. However, as the incident was 20 years old, and the High Court in appeal had recorded the judgment of acquittal, the Supreme Court altered the sentence of death awarded by the Trial Court into that of life imprisonment.[10]

The 'rarest of the rare case' exists when an accused would be a menace, threat and antithetical to harmony in the society. Where the appellant had killed his brother and entire family (eight persons) of his brother, without any provocation, death sentence awarded to the appellant accused was held proper.[11]

201. Principles Governing Rarest of Rare Case

The following principles govern whether a case falls within the category of rarest of rare cases for inflicting punishment of death:[12]

(i) Though under the IPC the Court has very wide discretion in the matter of awarding sentence, yet when conviction is for an offence punishable with death, or in the alternative with imprisonment for life, or imprisonment for the term of years, the Court, if it deems fit to award death sentence, shall state special reasons for such sentence and the choice of maximum punishment of death should be reserved for the rarest of rare case.

(ii) What reasons constitute special reasons, will have to be determined on the facts and circumstances of each case, and in the very nature of things no criteria can be specified. Even so, a case of special reasons is made out, where the facts of the case disclose that culpability of the accused has assumed extreme depravity; where the accused it found to be an ardent2464 criminal and menace to the society; where the crime is committed in an organised manner and is gruesome, cold blooded, heinous atrocious and cruel where innocent unarmed persons are attacked and murdered without any provocation and where murder is committed by an accused who was duty bound to protect the victim. This is not exhaustive.

(iii) To determine whether the case falls in the rarest of rare cases, the Court shall consider aggravating as well as mitigating circumstances in the case.

(iv) Here again we may observe that it is neither possible nor desirable to attempt to specify the aggravating and the mitigating circumstances. They take their colour from the setting in which they occurrence their effect will have to be considered on the facts of each case. However, the number of deaths ipso facto to will not make a case the rarest of the rare case but will be a relevant aggravating circumstance and the mental condition of an accused will be a relevant mitigating circumstance.

202. Number of Persons Killed--Should Death Penalty be Imposed

The number of persons killed in the incident is not the determinative factor for deciding whether the extreme penalty of death could be awarded or not.[13] The number of persons murdered is a consideration but that is not the only consideration for imposing death penalty unless the case falls in the category of rarest of rare case.[14] Considering number of persons who had lost their lives at the hands of assailants by burning, then the motive for commission of the crime is not the only consideration which has to be kept in view for imposing the death penalty.[15] The number of victims alone would not make the case, 'rarest of the rare'.[16] Thus, where the accused aged 19 years under some psychic disorder and without any previous enmity, murdered three women by stabbing, the death sentence awarded to him by the sessions court was commuted to that of life imprisonment.[17] Likewise, when three persons were killed by using a bomb, deadly weapons and the sessions court awarded the death sentence only to the accused attacking with bombs and life imprisonment to the other accused, the death sentence of the accused attacking with the bomb was modified to life imprisonment by the High Court.[18] Again, when the accused persons forming an unlawful assembly and armed with axe and sticks, allegedly killed five deceased persons and injured five others, there being no premeditation to commit the five murders and no material to show that the accused who killed two persons with an axe was a person of desperate and dangerous character, the case was not found amongst rarest of rare case, and so the sentence of life imprisonment awarded by the sessions court could not be enhanced to capital punishment.[19]

True, the number of victims by itself is not a yardstick to discern a case to the category of rarest of rare cases, yet none the less, the number of victims is not2465 altogether outside the scope of consideration and should not be marginalised in appropriate cases.[20] In several cases where several victims were murdered, the Apex Court or the High Courts have awarded death sentence to the accused persons.[21] The accused, along with the co-accused, killed as many as 13 persons for a flimsy reason. All the victims were closely related to the accused and they were killed in the most dastardly manner. Most of the victims were sleeping when they were attacked. The accused did not spare even the small kids with whom he had apparently no enmity, the accused did not have even a grain of mercy or human kindness in his heart. Considering all these aspects, it was not found a fit case where the death penalty is to be commuted to life imprisonment.[22]

Brutality does not Necessarily make it Rarest of Rare Case

In every incidence of murder, brutality is involved. Brutality, obviously would be an existing factor, but how the same did take place is the relevant and necessary material to be considered. Brutality by itself will not bring it within the ambit of rarest of rare cases.[23] In Subhas Ramkumar Bind alias Vakil v State of Maharashtra ,[24] the Supreme Court emphasised that in every murder case, brutality is involved, but how the same took place is the relevant and necessary material to constitute a crime, such as murder committed for gain and when there is nothing exceptionally gruesome about the manner of committing the murder, the death penalty is not justified.[25]

203. Aggravating Circumstances

In Bachan Singh v State of Punjab ,[26] the following aggravated circumstances have been indicated by the Supreme Court on the basis of which death penalty may be imposed by the Court in its discretion:

(i) if the murder has been committed after previous planning and involves extreme brutality; or
(ii) if the murder involves exceptional depravity; or
(iii) if the murder is of a member of any of the armed forces of the Union or of a member of any police force or of any public servant and was committed:

(i) while such member or public servant was on duty; or
(ii) in consequences of anything done or attempted to be done by such member of public servant in the lawful discharge of his duty as such member or public servant, whether at the time of the murder he was2466 such member or public servant, as the case may be, or had ceased to be such member or public servant; or

(iv) if the murder is of a person who had acted in the lawful discharge of his duty under s 43 of the CrPC 1973 or who had rendered assistance to a magistrate or police officer demanding his aid or requiring his assistance under s 37 and s 129 of the said Code.

The aggravating circumstances given below were found enough to pass death sentence:

(1) This was a case of cold-blooded murder.
(2) Two victims were burnt to death by locking the house from outside.
(3) One of the victims was a young boy, aged about six years who somehow managed to come out of the burning house, but he was mercilessly thrown back to the fire.
(4) The victims did not provoke or contribute to the incident.
(5) One of the deceased persons was forcibly brought out from his house despite protests by his wife and, thereafter killed in a dramatic manner in broad daylight in the presence of people.
(6) The entire incident took place in the broad day light and the crime was committed in a most barbaric manner to deter others not to challenge the supremacy of the appellant in the village.
(7) The entire incident was pre-planned by the accused.[27]

204. Mitigating Circumstances

In Bachan Singh's case,[28] the Apex Court has pointed out the following mitigating circumstances, which may be considered by the Court in awarding sentence:

(i) that the offence was committed under the influence of extreme mental or emotional disturbance;
(ii) the age of the accused--if the accused is young or old, he shall not be sentenced to death;
(iii) the probability that the accused would not commit criminal acts of violence to constitute a continuing threat to society;
(iv) the probability that the accused can be reformed and rehabilitated the state shall by evidence prove that the accused does not satisfy conditions 3 and 4 above;
(v) that in the facts and circumstances of the case the accused believed that he was morally justified in committing the offence;
(vi) that the accused acted under duress or domination of another person;
(vii) that the conditions of the accused showed that he was mentally defective and that the said defect impaired his capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct.2467

Mitigating Factors are Negative Elements Against Postive Theory of Death Punishment

The Court has to follow the basic ingredients, which, emerge from the settled principle of doctrine of 'rarest of rare case' and 'sufficient cause' as contemplated under CrPC for proposing and confirming death penalty. All the sides of this aspect of confirming the death penalty have to be scrutinised with great care and caution. The 'mitigating circumstances', always play dominant role in confirming the death sentence. The mitigating circumstance has to be gathered and or collected and to be weighed from the facts and circumstances of the case. The confirmation of death sentences, therefore, cannot be based only on the precedents and or aggravating facts and circumstances of any other case. The essential and relevant mitigating circumstances of the particular case always play a role of negative elements against the positive theory of death punishment. Therefore, the Court has to re-appreciate and re-assess the facts and circumstances of the case for the purposes of sentence.[29]

Young Age Whether a Mitigating Factor

Under s 82, IPC, only children under seven years of age are totally exempted from liability under the criminal law and, under s 83, a child above seven and under 12 years of age is immune from liability if he has not attained sufficient maturity of understanding to judge the nature and consequence of his conduct on the particular occasion. However, apart from these provisions, the Code has not created any special categories or classes of persons, who can claim exemption from death sentence as a matter of right.[30]

Young age may be a circumstance to be taken into consideration in offences where the accused person is not fully able to understand the nature of his act or has been influenced by older persons. However, in a case in which a youth had deliberately murdered a small boy for motive of greed and there was no suggestion that he was prompted to the crime by any motive except his own basic nature, the proper sentence is one of death.[31] In the absence of extenuating circumstances, the sentence of death was, therefore, imposed on youthful offenders in several cases.[32] In State of Rajasthan v Bhagwandas ,[33] it was held that young age alone is not a mitigating circumstance to justify a lesser penalty when the accused has committed cruel and cold-blooded murders, though young age may be taken into consideration in a mercy petition.[34] In Bachchey Lal v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[35] the Supreme Court observed2468 that it is not in every case in which the accused is below 18 years of age, that the Court would necessarily and always decline to impose sentence of death, though the fact that the accused was below 18 years of age at the time of commission of offence is certainly an important factor which would guide the Court in determining whether it should, or it should not, inflict the penalty of death. In Raghubir Singh v State of Haryana ,[36] the fact of the convict being in his twenties won the modification of his death sentence into one of life-imprisonment. Where an accused of 19 years, on his father and mother being insulted, in an excited and emotional mood, shot the deceased without any premeditation, it was held that imprisonment for life would meet the ends of justice.[37] Similarly, where a young woman of 15, being roused to frenzy by the way in which she was treated, seized the first weapon that came to her hand, and made a murderous attack on her stepson in order to avenge herself against her husband, it was held that capital sentence was not called for and the lesser sentence would meet the ends of justice.[38] In Amrit Lal Someshwar Joshi v State of Maharashtra ,[39] their lordship of the Hon'ble Supreme Court observed that the age of the accused is a mitigating circumstance and that if the accused is young he should not be sentenced to death but it is not an inflexible rule that he cannot be sentenced to death.[40] The young age of the accused was considered as one of the factors in awarding lesser sentence of life imprisonment in several cases.[41]

Age definitely is a factor which cannot be ignored, though not a determinative factor in all fact situations. The accused had committed the murder of four members of a family. But keeping in view the fact that the accused was a young man and possibility of reformation could not be ruled out, death sentence awarded by Courts below was converted into life imprisonment.[42]

In the context of young age, the Supreme Court pointed out, in Raisul v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[43] that the courts would not be right if they substitute their own estimate in regard to the age of the accused, and reject on the basis of such estimate the statement as to age made by the accused.

Sex if a Mitigating Factor

The fact that the accused is a woman is not conclusive reason for not passing the sentence of death.[44] Even if the accused is a pregnant woman, capital sentence can be imposed, but its execution may be deferred till after delivery.[45] Similarly, the2469 existence of an extremely young baby, born to the accused since the murder, is not a ground for passing the lesser sentence when there are no extenuating circumstances.[46]

Old Age Whether a Mitigating Factor

No indulgence can be shown to old age when the crime has been committed in a most high handed and cruel manner on a small provocation.[47] Where an accused of 60 years age, killed his daughter and son-in-law with an axe, inflicting injuries on selected parts of their bodies, and the murders were not only pre-planned and cold-blooded but also treacherous of the worst kind, the Supreme Court did not interfere with the sentence of death.[48] In Sunder v State ,[49] it was held that the mere fact that the accused was 70 or 75 years of age, could not be taken to be a circumstance warranting the lesser sentence. However in Ananta Kumar Karan v State ,[50] the lesser sentence was imposed on the ground of the present old age of the appellant, and out of consideration for his family, and on the ground of absence of sufficiency of motive on record. However, when the accused aged 76 years was found guilty of an offence, punishable under s 302, IPC and got lesser of the two sentence, viz., life imprisonment, his sentence was not further reduced as the same would be contrary to the provision contained in s 302, IPC .[51]

Old age has emerged as a mitigating factor.[52] The Court substituted death sentence to life imprisonment since the convicts were 64 years old and had been in custody for 16 years.[53]

Criminal Antecedents

Where the accused found guilty for committing the murder of minor girl by strangulation had no criminal antecedents, and there was no evidence on the record that the accused was likely to repeat the crime, death sentence awarded to him by the Sessions Judge was modified to life imprisonment.[54]

Mere pendency of criminal cases against the accused is not a ground for awarding death sentence to the accused guilty for offence under s 302, IPC .[55]2470

Mob Violence Whether a Mitigating Circumstance

It is common experience that when people congregate in crowds, normal defences are lowered by offering a release from inhibitions from personal doubts and anxiety. In such a situation, one can well imagine that a member of such a group loses one's self, and normal standard or sense of judgment and reality. The primary motivational factor in the assembly of a violent mob may result in murder of several persons. Experts in criminology often express that when there is collective action, as in the case of a mob, there is diminished individual responsibility unless there are special circumstances to indicate that a particular individual had acted with any predetermination such as by use of a weapon not normally found. If, however, a member of such a crowd picks up an article or a weapon which is close by and joins the mob, either on his own volition or at the instigation of the mob responding to the exhortation of the mob playing no role of leadership, one may very well say that such a person did not intend to commit all the acts which a mob would commit left to himself, but did so under the influence of collective fury.[56]

Vicarious Liability Whether a Mitigating Factor

It is possible that in a given set of facts that the Court might think even in a case where death sentence can be awarded, the same need not be awarded because of the peculiar facts of that case like the possibility of one or more of the accused being responsible for offences less culpable than the other accused. In such circumstances, in the absence of their being no material available, to bifurcate the case of each accused person the Court might think it prudent not to award the extreme penalty of death. However, then such a decision would rest on the availability of evidence in a particular case.[57]

Prime Motive Robbery and not Murder--Whether a Mitigating Factor

Where the accused persons set ablaze the bus resulting in roasting of passengers and death of 24 passengers, the fact that the accused person were of young age or their prime motive was not murder but only robbery and the act of arson might have been committed in a weak moment or the fact that the accused did not prevent atleast some of the passengers who tried to get out of the bus from escaping the scene, are not necessarily mitigating circumstances. Even if these three circumstances have any overtone of mitigation, they have been totally eclipsed by the other aggravating features looming large in the scenario of the crime unfurled in the evidence.[58]

Delay in Trial or in Disposal of Appeal Whether a Mitigating Factor

The value of delay as a mitigating factor depends upon the features of a particular case, and it cannot be divorced from the diabolical circumstances of the crime itself if it justifies the award of capital sentence.[59] Delay in hearing of an appeal, may, in conjunction with other circumstances, justify the commutation of death sentence, but this is not an absolute rule in the matter of sentence in every case.[60] Delay between the imposition of death sentence and its actual execution is not always a relevant consideration on the question as to whether the death sentence should be confirmed.2471 In matters of sentencing, there can be no inflexible rule that a delay of this or that particular number of years is a necessary impediment in the confirmation of sentence, including the sentence of death.[61]

The sense of masculine jealousy in the accused which developed into indignation over the infidelity of his beloved, an already married lady, and the fact of the long lapse of time between the imposition of capital sentence by the trial court and the hearing of the appeal by the Supreme Court were considered to be relevant grounds for reducing the sentence of death to that of life-imprisonment.[62] In State of Maharashtra v Manglya Dhavu Kongil ,[63] the Supreme Court was deciding the appeal in 1972 while the trial in the case was over on 27 April 1968 and the High Court in the meantime had acquitted the accused and set him free. In these circumstances, while reversing the judgment of acquittal, the Supreme Court sentenced him only to life-imprisonment. In the State of Uttar Pradesh v Ramesh Prasad Misra ,[64] the incident took place in September 1985 in which deceased die, the sessions court convicted the accused but the High Court acquitted them in appeal, the Apex Court while deciding the criminal appeal on 13 August 1996 reversed the order of acquittal of the High Court and convicted the accused under s 302, IPC, but in view of the long passage of time from the date of commission of the offence and the date of judgment in appeal by the Apex Court, the sentence of death recorded by the sessions judge was converted into rigorous imprisonment for life.[65] Where the occurrence had taken place in 1987 where the accused was 19 years of age and the accused was acquitted by the sessions court and the revision filed against the order of acquittal was dismissed by the High Court, the Supreme Court deciding the criminal appeal on 5 February 1996, ie, after about 8 years, reversed the orders of the two courts below and convicted the accused for the offences of murder but sentenced him to the lesser punishment of life imprisonment.[66] However, in a later case, State of Uttar Pradesh v Dharmandra Singh ,[67] the Supreme Court held that while it is true that a prolonged trial or execution of death sentence beyond all reasonable period may be a ground for converting the death sentence in a given case, it will be highly erroneous to lay down as a principle in law or draw an inference on fact that awarding of death sentence is improper in cases where accused persons are in custody for three years or more, even though the facts of the case otherwise call for a death sentence. If the former view is to be accepted as a correct principle, then practically in no murder case can death sentence be awarded, since in this country, normally, a murder trial and confirmation of death sentence takes more than three years.[68] However, where the accused persons were not habitual offenders and the trial had ended after 16 years, the case was not found amongst rarest of rare cases.[69] In State of Haryana v Sher Singh ,[70] though the2472 murder was ghastly and brutal and the trial court imposed the sentence of death upon the accused, the Supreme Court, in view of the fact that the trial court passed the order of conviction and sentence as early as 27 July 1974, and the High Court passed its order of acquittal as early as 2 April 1975, refrained from visiting the accused-respondent with the extreme penalty, provided by law for murder, and sentenced him to imprisonment for life. In Vivian Rodrick v State of West Bengal ,[71] it was observed that excessive delay in the disposal of a case, would by itself be sufficient for imposing a lesser sentence and when there has been an inordinate delay in the disposal of the appeal by the High Court, it should be a relevant factor for the High Court to take into consideration for imposing a lesser sentence. However, delay, caused by abscondence on the part of the accused, cannot be considered as an extenuating circumstance.[72]

Mental Derangement, Short of Insanity, Whether a Mitigating Factor

Under s 84, IPC, nothing is an offence which is done by a person, who, at the time of doing it, by reason of unsoundness of mind, is incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or what he is doing is either wrong or contrary to law. However, there may be cases where a man may not be insane in the strict sense so as to be entitled to the benefit of that section, but may, at the time of committing the murder, be in a frenzied mood or something in the nature of an abnormal state of mind. In such cases, the courts have generally imposed the lesser sentence of life imprisonment.[73] Where the accused, feeling insulted at his wife giving birth to an illgitimate child in his house and resenting the villagers congratulating him for the child birth, killed his wife, it was held that it was not a case for imposing the extreme penalty of law, and that the ends of justice would be met by imposing the lesser sentence.[74] Where feeling life unbearable on account of domestic quarrels, a woman (accused) jumped into a well with her children, it was held that the only sentence that could be passed, was the lesser sentence of imprisonment for life.[75]

Fear complex and excitement or irresistible impulse with loss of self-control do not substantiate the plea of insanity. They may, however, be relevant for the mitigation of the offence from murder to culpable homicide in certain circumstances.[76] In Jai Dev v State of Punjab ,[77] excitement was regarded as an extenuating circumstance.

Drunkenness Whether a Mitigating Factor

A person under intoxication can be excused, under s 85, IPC, if he had committed any offence, provided, intoxicating material was given to him without his knowledge2473 and against his consent, since a person cannot become drunk himself with liquor and commit an offence and then come and say that he had consumed liquor and therefore the benefit of s 85 should be given to him.[78] However, s 85, IPC is relevant only to ascertain whether the accused who was under intoxication at the time of commission of the offence is guilty or not. Once found guilty, the question arises whether drunkenness is an extenuating circumstance or not. In the absence of any evidence of motive, drunkenness, at the time of committing the murder, will be a good ground for passing the lesser sentence.[79] Where, therefore, the accused has committed the offence, in a state of drunkenness, as a result of provocation, however slight, it is a case in which the extreme penalty of law should not be inflicted.[80] Drunkenness was taken into consideration and the lesser sentence was passed in the undermentioned cases.[81] However, where the attack is a premeditated one, the mere fact that the accused had taken some liquor, cannot be regarded as sufficient reason for not imposing the penalty of death.[82]

Murder by a Deaf and Dumb Whether a Mitigating Factor

The law does not provide for a sane deaf-mute, who has never been instructed, from being exempted from punishment.[83]Of course, presumption may be made in the case of the deaf and mute, in favour of an absence of mind, but it cannot always be taken as an irrebuttable presumption; every case has to be judged on the evidence available in a particular case. The conduct of the accused, immediately after the occurrence, may be taken into consideration in determining whether he is incapable of understanding the nature of the act.[84]

In the undermentioned cases, on a conviction of a deaf-mute for murder, only the lesser sentence was passed.[85]

Provocation Whether a Mitigating Factor

If it looks more probable that some kind of provocation was offered by the deceased to the accused, death sentence should not be passed.[86] Where the accused waylaid the deceased, pursued him and stabbed him to death because he (i.e., the accused) believed that the deceased had illicit intimacy with his wife, it was held that this was a sufficient provocation to constitute an extenuating circumstance for modifying the2474 sentence of death into one of life-imprisonment.[87] Where, therefore, the crime has been committed, in the heat of passion, on provocation and without premediation, it is not proper to pass the extreme penalty of law.[88] But the mere fact, that the attack was preceded by some exchange of abuse between the assailants and the deceased, is not a mitigating circumstance.[89]

Perverted Sense of Family Honour Whether a Mitigation Circumstance

That the murder was motivated by a perverted sense of family honour cannot be regarded as a mitigating circumstance.[90]

Accused having 2 children

In a case[91] before Karnataka High Court the lenient view was sought in the matter of sentence as the accused had two children. The request was declined by the Karnataka High Court as accused himself was responsible for making them orphans by killing their mother. It was something like an accused killing his own parents and praying for mercy in the Court on the ground that he has become orphan.

Absence of Premeditation Whether a Mitigating Circumstance

When the murder is committed in the course of sudden premediation, or on an impulse of the moment, usually the death sentence is not passed unless the circumstances are exceptional.[92] In Dalel Ram Sarup v Emperor ,[93] the extreme penalty of the laws was not considered desirable in view of the young age of the accused, the loss of temper in the heat of the moment, the sudden and trivial origin of the fight, the absence of any premediation and his anxiety to help his elder brother who too had received an injury. Where there was no sufficient motive for a premeditated murder and the probabilities were that there was some violent quarrel between the parties, the death sentence was commuted to the lesser sentence.[94] Where the murder was not a premeditated one, but was committed by the accused with a sense of frustration by the fact that his wife eloped with a stranger, it was held that the ends of justice would be amply met by sentencing the accused to imprisonment for life.[95] Where the accused, with a view to rob the ornaments and2475 money the deceased was having with her, suddenly succumbed to the temptation and murdered her when he found a suitable opportunity, it was held that the ends of justice would be met by awarding the lesser penalty of imprisonment for life.[1] In several cases the murder committed without premeditation and not in cold blood then it is recognised as one of the factors for awarding lesser punishment of life imprisonment.[2]

Acquittal of, or Passing of a Lesser Punishment on the Principal Offender Whether a Mitigating Factor

Where murder has been committed by the accused at the instigation of another person, the fact that the principal instigator has been acquitted is not an extenuating circumstance. However, where the accused, who are young men, have come under the influence of an elderly man and would not have committed the murder but for that baneful influence upon them, the ends of justice do not require that they should be sentenced to death.[3] Where, in participating in the murder, a son may have been acting under the influence of his father, the death sentence is not called for.[4] However, too much leniency should not be exercised in favour of persons whose participation alone made the commission of the crime possible, merely because the accused had no direct motive and probably participated in the murder to oblige a friend.[5] Therefore, merely because a son uses a pistol and causes the death of another at the instance of his father is no mitigating circumstance which the courts would take into consideration.[6]

Acquittal of or Sentence of Life Awarded, by Trial Court/ High Court Whether a Mitigation Circumstance

If after consideration the courts come to the finding that the case belongs to the rarest of the rare categories, acquittal or sentence of life awarded by trial court or High Court should not be considered to be a mitigating factor by the Apex Court.[7]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 302.

Punishment for murder.--

Acquittal of Some of the Accused Persons Whether a Mitigation Factor

Merely because eight persons convicted by the trial court were acquitted, by itself cannot be termed to be a justified ground for commuting the death sentence.[8] However, when the High Court exercised discretion and commuted the death sentence of some accused on account of acquittal of the other accused, the Supreme Court observed that for interfering with the discretion of the High Court, further exceptional grounds are required to be made out. Thus, though the Supreme Court had reservation about the sentence awarded by the High Court by way of exercise of discretion in commuting the death sentence, the Supreme Court declined to interfere with the sentence awarded by the High Court.[9]2476

Where in a case of kidnapping and murder of a child and causing disappearance of evidence, the other accused persons were given the benefit of the doubt having discarded the sole testimony of the prosecution witness but the conviction of the accused had been upheld in view of the evidence other than that of the said prosecution witness, i.e., on presumptive evidence, in these circumstances, the death penalty imposed on the accused was converted into imprisonment for life.[10]

Life Imprisonment to Some of the Accused Persons--Whether a Mitigating Factor

Where the role played by the accused was somewhat similar to the role played by the other accused persons who had been given lesser sentence while the accused had been awarded death sentence, that too, with the aid of s 149, IPC, therefore, a question arose why this accused should not be considered at par with those accused for the purpose of awarding the sentence. The specific overt act attributed to the accused that he climbed the house of the informant and threatened to shoot the victims if they came out of their houses, while the other accused latched and set the houses on fire seemed to be an afterthought not having been told to the investigating officer by the witnesses when their statements were recorded by him. The accused was not treated by the prosecution itself as the leader of the gang but was considered to be one amongst other accused who took part in the incident. So, due to these mitigating circumstances sentence of accused was converted from death penalty to life imprisonment.[11]

Superstition and Religious Fanaticism Whether a Mitigating Factor

The fact that the accused was a weak man with a weak mind, labouring under strong religious superstition and belief, which actuated him in cutting off his wife's head, to the effect that profit and gain could come to him thereby, is not sufficient to exempt him from criminal liability for his wrongful acts unless the impulse was such as to render him unconscious of what he was doing or make him ignorant of the fact that the act which he was about to commit was wrong.[12] However, in Queen v Orem Sungra ,[13] where the accused committed murder in the belief that the deceased was a wizard and the cause of his child's illness, and that by killing the deceased, the child's life might be saved, the court commuted the sentence of death to the lesser sentence. Likewise, where the accused killed a woman under the conviction that she was a witch and was responsible for the illness of his wife and daughter, the court held that the proper sentence to be inflicted was the lesser sentence.[14] However, where a religious fanatic deliberately stabbed the deceased as he made speeches against the head of his (accused's) community, the sentence of death was confirmed with the observation that it would be dangerous in this country to give cause for belief that death would not, as a rule, result from murders even when they are committed for attacks on leaders of religious communities or under their influence2477 unless they are committed in circumstances which do amount to grave and sudden provocation.[15]

Circumstantial Evidence Whether a Mitigating Factor

The mere fact that the case rests on circumstantial evidence, and not on the direct evidence, should not affect the sentence. If the evidence, whichever it be, leaves reasonable doubt about the accused's guilt, he is entitled to an acquittal. If it does not, the accused should receive an appropriate sentence.[16] There is no flexible rule that a death sentence cannot be awarded in a case resting on circumstantial evidence but Courts are, as a matter of prudence, hesitant in awarding this sentence in such a situation. Death sentence awarded on the charge of rape and murder was commuted to life imprisonment.[17]

The accused had eliminated three deceased. However, as the case was based on circumstantial evidence, death sentence awarded by Courts below was reduced to life imprisonment.[18] Even in the absence of direct evidence, the commission of the crime and the relative offence can be established if the circumstances on record prove the crime beyond reasonable doubt.[19] Witnesses may lie, but circumstances do not and generally speaking, it is possible to conclude on the basis of circumstantial evidence than with the evidence of eyewitnesses.

In cases where conviction in a murder case is based on circumstantial evidence, it would not be safe to award death sentence.[20]

Accused appellants had cut the dead body of the deceased stealthily. There was no direct evidence as to the manner in which the gruesome murder had taken place. No doubt the accused appellants committed the crime in a cold-blooded manner but they did it quite stealthily. The entire case rested on the circumstantial evidence. The High Court having taken all relevant factors into consideration rightly came to the conclusion that the case is not the one which falls in the category of 'rarest of rare'. The accused appellant was sentenced to life imprisonment.[21]

Accused respondent out of frustration arising from property dispute committed the murder of his father, step-mother and step-sister by administering poison in prasad and by strangulation. Held, the case did not fall in the category of rarest of rare cases. The Supreme Court refused to enhance the life imprisonment awarded to death sentence.[22]

Manner of Disposal of the Body of Deceased by Accused Whether a Mitigating Circumstance

It cannot be said that the manner in which the body of a deceased is disposed off should not influence the mind of an ordinary person, but the Court should not forget that it is to convict a man and award sentence for what he has done at the first2478 instance, and not by the manner in which he reacted after committing the crime. If in a case the accused did commit murder of his mother, then, the effect would remain that he committed murder and after committing the same realises that he would be caught and punished, because of which he disposed of the body in a particular manner. The disposal of the body in a particular manner would be punishable under s 201, IPC, and could not provide a foundation for awarding the capital punishment.[23] One would justify the award of capital punishment if the medical report said that the deceased was butchered and cut into pieces while she was alive.[24]

Not Running Away from Scene after Committing Murder whether a Mitigating Circumstance

The circumstance that after killing the deceased the accused did not run away and did not resist from being taken to the police station is not an extenuating circumstance.[25]

Being the only Son of his Mother Whether a Mitigating Circumstance

The circumstance that the accused is the only son of his widowed mother, cannot be taken into consideration in deciding whether or not the death sentence should be inflicted.[26]

Compromise Between the Accused and the Relations of Deceased Whether a Mitigating Circumstance

Nothing, including a compromise between the accused and the husband or father of the deceased victim, can be considered as an extenuating circumstance for imposing a lesser penalty than death where the accused commits murder of the victim by using a dangerous weapon like a dagger.[27]

Absence of Motive Whether a Mitigating Factor

In cases of multiple murders, where an accused is clearly not insane in the sense that he did no know what he was doing, the mere absence of motive, the apparent senselessness of the murders and the fact that he murdered persons in his own family in cold blood can furnish extenuating circumstances which can be taken into consideration in mitigation of the sentence, and the only sentence that can be passed is the sentence of death.[28]

Public Feeling Whether a Mitigating Circumstance

In Re Sambangi Lakshumanna,[29] it was pointed out that there may be individuals who may have strong views against capital punishment but it is wrong to say that the public as a whole, is urging the total abolition of capital punishment and, even if it were so, it is not part of the duty of the trial Judge to be influenced by public feeling.2479 His duty is to administer the law. The state of public feeling is not an admissible reason for refraining from passing the sentence of death.

Murder of an Illegitimate Child Whether a Mitigating Factor

It has invariably been held in all courts in India that in the murder of her newly born illegitimate child by a woman, there are mitigating circumstances sufficient to reduce the appropriate penalty very much below a sentence of imprisonment for life. It can safely be said that most of them apply, though certainly in a less degree, to the case of the father of such a child, more especially where the mother is his own sister.[30]

Receiving of Severe Injuries by the Accused Himself Whether a Mitigating Circumstance

The fact that the accused himself received severe injuries is no reason for mitigating his punishment.[31]

Accused in Jail for Years--Whether a Mitigating Factor

The fact that accused has spent nearly 17 years in custody after the incident in question can also be treated as a mitigating circumstance while considering the question of sentence.[32]

Expectation of Survival after Judgment of High Court Whether a Mitigating Factor

There is no legal basis that after the High Court refused to confirm the death sentence, the accused persons have entertained a just expectation of survival and therefore, the Supreme Court should not interfere with the judgment of the High Court. In a judicial system like ours where there is a hierarchy of courts, possibility of reversal of judgments is inevitable, therefore, the expectations of an accused cannot be a mitigating factor to interfere in an appeal for enhancement of sentence if the same is otherwise called for in law.[33]

Sole Deposition of Child Witness Whether a Mitigating Circumstance

The sole deposition of a child witness, even if true, is not enough,[34] even if the murder may have been committed in a premeditated and calculated manner with extreme cruelty and brutality.[35] Therefore, when conviction in a murder case is based upon the sole testimony of a child witness, it amounts to mitigating circumstance in favour of the accused.

Conviction Based on Sole Evidence of Informant Whether a Mitigating Circumstance

Where the accused entered the house of the informant mother, armed with a pistol in order to rape her and shot dead her minor child, such act is gruesome and executed with extreme cruelty more so when both the informant mother and child were helpless2480 and defenceless, the case was found dangerously close to rarest of rare cases having regard to the fact that the conviction of the accused was based upon the sole testimony of the informant, not as a matter of law but by way of abundant caution, the High Court converted the sentence of death into one of rigorous imprisonment for life.[36]

205. Discrimination in Sentence Where Several Accused Commit the Offence

It would not be right to inflict death penalties upon a number of persons merely because a large number of persons have been killed. A good deal of authority shows that in proper cases, the Court should discriminate and that is probably for the reason that although a sentence may be logical, it may not be proper. The discrimination is based upon the ground of the assailant having taken a major part or a minor part and, in that process of reasoning a sense of propriety is involved.[37] Similarly, greater penalty may be inflicted upon the ring leader and lesser on those who took a comparatively subsidiary part.[38] Likewise, if, in a case, one particular accused, out of several accused, has a strong and direct motive for committing murder, he may be sentenced to death while others may be sentenced only to imprisonment for life.[39] Thus, where out of the two accused, the two shots fired by one, were separately sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, but the one fired by another and hitting the clavicle of the deceased was not sufficient to cause death, discrimination was made in the matter of sentence, upholding the death sentence on the one but commuting the same, on the other, into one of imprisonment for life.[40] Where, however, there are several persons accused of murder, and there is no reliable evidence as to who struck the fatal blow, it is not safe to differentiate the guilt of the accused and sentence some of them to the extreme penalty of the law.[41] Where it was difficult to say that the injuries, caused by B alone by gunshot led to the death of the deceased, and not the injuries, caused by S with the pharos, it was held that B could not be sentenced to death when sentence of S was reduced to one of life imprisonment.[42] Where, in Jose v State of Kerala ,[43] there was no indication that the appellant had played any greater part in murder than the other three accused, who had been sentenced only to life imprisonment, it was held that the appellant, too could not be singled out for a different punishment and, therefore, the sentence of death, imposed on him, was converted into that of life imprisonment. Where, in another case, nine persons had been shot dead and all the four accused had a role in causing such death, and there was no doubt that appellant 2 and appellant 4 must also have been responsible for causing death of some of the deceased, it was held that there was no reason for distinguishing the case of appellant 1 and appellant 3 from that of2481 appellant 2 and appellant 4. The sentence, on two of them, enhanced to death by the High Court, was, therefore, set aside and all were sentenced to life imprisonment.[44]

In a case where murder has been committed by one or more members of an unlawful assembly in pursuance of the common object of that assembly, the question whether sentence of death should not be imposed on those members of the unlawful assembly who themselves did not commit the murder has to be decided on the facts and circumstances of each case.[45] However, it was held, in Ajmer Singh v State of Punjab ,[46] that when the offence is committed in consort, in pursuance of a prearranged plan and in furtherance of the common intention, there can be no justification for distinguishing the case of one accused from that of his co-accused in the matter of sentence. The view that five persons should not be sentenced to death for a murder of two persons is not in accordance with law.

206. Delay in Execution of Death Sentence by Judicial Process

Delay in execution of death sentence by judicial process is not a ground for commutation of death sentence.[47]

207. Inordinate Delay in Disposal of Mercy Petition

In Ajay Kumar Pal v Union of India ,[48] a three Judges Bench of the Supreme Court has held that an inordinate delay in the disposal of mercy petition and the solitary confinement of the accused during this period is violative of art 21 of the Constitution of India . In this case, the death sentence awarded by the Trial Court on 9 April 2007 attained finality on 16 March 2010 with the dismissal of appeals by the Supreme Court. His mercy petition preferred on 10 April 2010 i.e. within a month of the decision of the Court was forwarded the same day with all relevant documents so as to enable the concerned functionaries to exercise requisite jurisdiction. Held, though no time limit can be fixed within which the mercy petition ought to be disposed of, in the considered view of the Court the period of 3 years and 10 months to deal with such mercy petition in the present case comes within the expression 'inordinate delay'. The delay is not to the account of the petitioner or as a result of any proceedings initiated by him or in his behalf, but is certainly to the account of the functionaries and authorities concerned. The death sentence was commuted into life imprisonment.

208. Effect of Acquittal of Some Accused on Conviction of Others

See commentary under the same heading in s 34, ante, Vol. 1.

Where, after acquittal of 14 accused persons out of 15, there was no finding that the unlawful assembly consisted of five or more persons, known or unknown, identified or unidentified, it was held that the charge under s 149 had failed and2482 ss 149 and 147 could not be invoked for convicting one single accused.[49] Likewise, if out of seven persons charged under s 149 along with s 302, three persons are acquitted, the remaining three cannot be convicted because the essential requirement of an unlawful assembly would be lacking.[50] Where, however, four persons are prosecuted under s 302 read with s 34, failure of the prosecution to prove that one of them took part in the commission of the offence does not introduce any infirmity in its case against the remaining accused at all. Even if he is held not to be present at the scene of the offence, that, in law, cannot prevent the prosecution from presenting its case against the remaining accused if the evidence, adduced by it, is otherwise satisfactory and cogent.[51] In Prabhu Babaji Navle v State of Bombay ,[52] it was held that if a person is charged under s 302 read with s 34, for having shared common intention and participated in the crime and all other persons, except him, are acquitted, the element of sharing common intention with them disappears; and unless it can be proved that he shared common intention with the actual murderers, he cannot be convicted with the aid of s 34 . On the other hand, in Wasim Khan v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[53] the High Court found that the appellant, along with two others committed the offence of robbery and murder, but the two co-accused were acquitted. The Supreme Court held that, on the finding of the High Court, the appellant could be convicted by the application of s 34 even though the two co-accused of the appellant were acquitted. Where two co-accused are charged under s 302 read with s 34, and one of them is acquitted or found not guilty of the offence charged, the other co-accused can be convicted of murder under s 302 if the evidence justifies it.[54] Where an accused is charged with a substantive offence by invoking the aid of s 34, there is no legal bar to his conviction under the substantive offence simpliciter[55] if no prejudice is caused to the accused.[56] When the only evidence against accused No 1 was that he gave a lalkara and report of ballistic expert did not support the prosecution in regard to the complicity of accused No 2 and, therefore, they were given the benefit of the doubt and came to be acquitted, the acquittal of the co-accused 1 and 2 cannot to be a ground for giving the benefit of the doubt to the main accused no 3,[57] even if the acquittal of two accused or the remaining accused is erroneous.[58] When the evidence showed that the accused intentionally fired at the deceased causing fatal injuries to him and subsequently fired at the injured his conviction under s 302 and ss 307 / 34, IPC was found proper but there was no evidence showing that the co-accused fired the shot either at the injured or at the deceased or made any exhortation to kill, the co-accused was given the benefit of the2483 doubt.[59] As the Supreme Court doubted the veracity of the prosecution case against all the accused persons and acquitted them, the Court found it just and expedient to extend the benefit of doubt even to two non-appellants accused and recorded acquittal of all the accused of the charge under s 302, IPC .[60]

Four accused persons armed with iron rod, knife, dang had assaulted the deceased, and caused injuries. The appellant no. 4 inflicted 4-5 knife blows in the abdomen of the deceased as a result of which the deceased fell down. After the deceased fell own, appellant nos. 1, 2 and 3 did not inflict injuries on the deceased. Conviction of the other appellant nos. 1, 2 and 3 under ss 302 / 34, IPC was set aside. However, they were convicted under ss 323 / 34 and 324 / 34, IPC .[61]

209. Death Sentence held Proper

Where the accused had committed murder of three innocent children when they were returning from school, and accused aged 28 years, was not suffering from a mental disorder, there was no chance of his reformation and rehabilitation, hence, death sentence awarded by Sessions Judge was held proper.[62] Appellants accused attempted to commit rape on village girls twice, on being admonished by village Panchayat, committed rape and brutally murdered a girl aged 18 years. Case was based on circumstantial evidence. Held, case fell in the category of rarest of rare case, thus, death sentence was held proper.[63]

Appellant accused along with others committed the murders of 13 persons of his family in most dastardly manner on flimsy motive. Death penalty imposed was held justified and proper.[64]

Two persons were burnt to death by the accused appellants after locking the house from outside. One person was dragged from his house and cut into pieces. The aggravating circumstances against the accused were (a) this was a case of cold-blooded murder; (b) the accused was leading the gang; (c) the victim did not provoke or contribute to the incident; (d) two victims were burnt to death by locking the house from outside; (e) one of the victims was a young boy, aged about 6 years, who, somehow, managed to come out of the burning house, but he was mercilessly thrown back to the fire by the appellant; (f) the dragging of Nagarmol Bordoloi by the appellant to his house and then cutting him into pieces in broad day-light in the presence of by-standers; (g) the entire incident took place in broad daylight and the crime was committed in the most barbaric manner to deter others from challenging the supremacy of the appellant in the village; (h) the entire incident was pre-planned by the accused appellant. Death sentence awarded to appellant was held proper.[65]2484

210. Pardons, Suspension, Remission etc. of Sentences under Constitution and the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973--Legal Position

Few provisions in the CrPC and others in the Constitution deal with such a situation, ss 432, 433, and 433A of the CrPC and arts 72 and 161 of the Constitution deal with pardon. Article 72 of the Constitution confers upon the President the power to grant of pardons, reprives, respites or remission of punishment or to suspend, remit or commute sentence of any person of any offence. The power so conferred is without prejudice to the similar power conferred on the Governor of the State. Article 161 of the Constitution confers upon the Governor of a State similar powers in respect of any offence against anybody relating to a matter to which the executive power of the State extends. The power under art 72 and art 161 of the Constitution is absolute and cannot be altered by any statutory provision such as ss 432, 433, 433A of the CrPC or by any Prison Rules.[66]

Section 432 of the Code empowers the appropriate government to suspend or remit sentences. The expression 'appropriate government' means the Central Government in cases where the sentences or order relates to the matter to which the executive power of the Union extends and the State Government in other cases. The release of prisoners condemned to death in exercise of the powers conferred under s 432 of the CrPC and art 161 of the Constitution does not amount to interference with due and proper course of justice, as the power of the Court to pronounce upon the validity, propriety and correctness of the conviction and sentence remains unaffected, similar power as those contained in s 432 of the CrPC or art 161 of the Constitution can be exercised before during or after trial. The power exercised under s 432 of the CrPC is largely an executive power vested in the appropriate government and by reducing the sentence, the authority concerned thereby modify the judicial sentence. The section confines the power of the Government to the suspension of the execution of the sentence or remission of the whole or any part of the punishment as s 432 of the CrPC gives no power to the Government to revise the judgment of the Court. It only provides power of remitting the sentence. Remission of punishment assumes the correctness of the conviction and only reduces punishment in part or whole. The word 'remit' as used in s 432 is not a term of art. Some of the meanings of the word 'remit' are to pardon to refrain from inflicting to give up. It is therefore, no obstacle in the way of the President or Governor as the case may be in remitting the sentence of death. A remission of sentence does not mean an acquittal.[67]

The power to commute a sentence of death is independent of s 433A, CrPC . The restriction under s 433A of the Code comes into operation only after power under s 433, CrPC is exercised. Section 433A is applicable to two categories of convicts:

(a) those who could have been punished with sentence of death; and
(b) those whose sentences have been converted into imprisonment for life under s 433 .[68] It was observed in Mura Ram v Union of India .[69] That s 433A does not violate art 20(1) of the Constitution .2485

In the circumstances, if any motion is made in terms of ss 432, 433, and 433A of the Code and or art 72 and art 161 of the Constitution as the case be the same may be appropriately dealt with.[70]

Wide Powers of President and Governor Regarding Pardon, etc., are Subject to Judicial Review by Higher Courts

There cannot be any dispute with the proposition of law that the power of granting pardon under art 16 is very wide and does not contain any limitation as to the time on which and the occasion on which and the circumstances in which the said powers could be exercised. However, the said power being a Constitutional power conferred upon the Governor by the Constitution is amenable to judicial review on certain limited grounds. The Court, therefore, would be justified in interfering with an order passed by the Governor in exercise of power under art 161 of the Constitution if the governor is found to have exercised the power himself without being advised by the Government or if the Governor transgresses the jurisdiction in exercising the same or it is established that the Governor has passed the order without application of mind or the order in question is a mala fide one or the Governor has passed the order on some extraneous consideration.[71] The extent of judicial review in relation to an order of the President under art 72 of the Constitution of India was a subject matter of consideration before this court in Kehar Singh's case[72] where the Constitution Bench had observed, 'It appears to us clear that the question as to the area of the President's power under art 72 of the Constitution falls squarely within the judicial domain and can be examined by the Court by way of judicial review.'

The Court had further indicated that 'as regards the considerations to be applied by the President to the petition we need say nothing more as the law in this behalf have already been laid down by this court in Maruram's case.'[73] What has been stated in relation to the President's power under art 72 applies equally to the power of the Governor under art 161 of the Constitution . In Maruram's case the Court came to the conclusion that the power under arts 72 and 161 can be exercised by the Central and State Governments and not by the President or Governor on their own. The advice of the appropriate government binds the head of the State. The Court also came to the conclusion that considerations for exercise of power under art 72 or art 161 may be myriad and their occasions protean, and are left to the appropriate Government, but no consideration nor occasion can be wholly irrelevant, irrational, discriminatory or mala fide. Only in these rare cases will the Court examine the exercise. In para 62 of the judgment in Maruram's case[74] the Court had observed:

> An issue of deeper import demands our consideration at the stage of the discussion. Wide as the power of pardon, commutation and release (Articles 72 and 161) is, it cannot run riot: for no legal power can run unruly like John Gilpin on the horse but must keep sensibly to a steady course. Here, we come upon the second constitutional fundamental which underlies the submissions of counsel. It is that all public power, including constitutional power, shall never be exercisable arbitrarily or mala fide and, ordinarily, guidelines for fair and equal execution are guarantors of the valid play of power. We proceed on the basis that these axioms are valid in our constitutional order.2486

> It was further held that the power to pardon, grant remission and commutation, being of the greatest moment for the liberty of the citizen, cannot be a law unto itself but must be informed by the finer canons of constitutionalism.

A three judge Bench of the Supreme Court considered the question of judicial review against an order granting pardon by the Governor under art 161 of the Constitution in the case of Swaran Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh. [75] In that case, an MLA of the State Assembly had been convicted of the offence of murder and within a period of less than two years he succeeded in coming out of the prison as the Governor of Uttar Pradesh granted remission of the remaining long period of his life sentence. The son of the deceased moved the Allahabad High Court challenging the aforesaid action of the Governor, and the same having been dismissed the matter had been brought to the Supreme Court by grant of special leave petition. The Supreme Court had come to the conclusion that the Governor was not told of certain vital facts concerning the prisoner such as his involvement in five other criminal cases of serious offences, the rejection of his earlier clemency petition and the report of the jail authority that his conduct inside the jail was far from satisfactory, and out of two years and five months he was supposed to have been in jail, he was in fact on parole during the substantial part thereof. The Court further held that when the Governor was not posted with material facts the Governor was apparently deprived of the opportunity to exercise the powers in a fair and just manner and the order fringes on arbitrariness. The Court, therefore, quashed the order of the Governor with a direction to reconsider the petition of the prisoner in the light of the materials which the Governor had no occasion to know earlier.

The Governor should be made aware of as to what is the total period of sentence the accused has really undergone, and if at all has undergone any sentence. When an accused is convicted of the heinous offence of murder and is sentenced to imprisonment for life the authority who has been conferred with the power to grant pardon and remission of sentence under art 161 of the Constitution must be made aware of the period of sentence in fact undergone by the said convict, as well as his conduct and behaviour while he has been undergoing the sentence which would all be germane considerations for exercise of the power.[76] Not being aware of such material facts would tend to make an order granting pardon arbitrary and irrational as has been held by this court in Swaran Singh's case.[77]

211. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 304, Part I

Commentary under the same heading in s 304, post, may be referred to.

Where the deceased was an intervener, was trying to pacify the dispute, and the accused appellant had no intention to cause the death of the deceased, he had fired one gunshot which proved fatal, his conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[78]

212. Alteration of Conviciton from Section 302 to Section 304, Part II

Where appellant A2 had inflicted two injuries by knife which were sufficient to cause death of the deceased, and the doctor also opined that these injuries were sufficient to2487 cause death, the plea of the appellant A2 that he had no intention to cause death as such was repelled, and he was liable for conviction under s 304, Pt II.[79]

219. Alteration of Conviction under Sections 300 / 302 to Section 307

Where the doctor who examined the injury of the deceased had stated that his condition was serious and pulse ineffable; however, the deceased died while being taken from one hospital to another and was cremated without post-mortem; the evidence showed that the accused made an assault on the life of the deceased with a country made pistol with an intention to cause death, due to which his condition was serious; the conviction of the accused under s 302 was set aside, and he was held guilty under s 307, IPC .[80]

Where the victim died due to an injury as a result of being fired at by the co-accused as per the opinion of the doctor, and the said co-accused was acquitted by the High Court, the accused who fired at the deceased causing the injuries on his back which were not fatal was not convicted for the offence under s 302 but as he had fired at the victim with a rifle, he could not escape his conviction for attempt to commit murder.[81] Where the accused persons were convicted and sentenced under ss 302 / 149 and ss 307 / 149 but the death of the victims were caused by the sole fatal arrow injury, the accused who caused the arrow injuries were held guilty under s 302, and the remaining accused who caused grievous and simple injuries to the prosecution witness were held guilty under ss 307 / 34, and acquitted under ss 302 / 149 2488 and ss 307 / 149, IPC .[82] When one of the eyewitness stated that the accused persons did not continue to be a member of the unlawful assembly, the conviction of the accused person was modified from under ss 302 / 149 to that under ss 307 / 149, IPC .[83]What was proved against the appellant was that he shot at the deceased, but there was no evidence to show that it was the injury inflicted by the appellant which was the cause of death. However, from the facts proved, there was no doubt that he shot at the deceased with an intention to kill him or at least he had the knowledge that the act would cause the death. Held that the allegations proved constituted an offence under s 307, IPC . Conviction of the appellant accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 307, IPC .[84]

There was really no direct exhortation to kill but the same was to the effect that the deceased and others should not be permitted to run away and should be attacked. On hearing the exhortation, accused no. 2 pierced the spear in the chest of the deceased. The evidence of PWS was different as to the manner of exhortation. Accused was convicted under s 307 read with s 110 and not under s 302, IPC .[85]

220. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 323

The fact of death supervening upon infliction of hurt is not imputable to the person, who inflicts the hurt, if all that he intends or knows to be likely, is hurt. The conviction, in such cases, must be for hurt only.[86]

Obviously, if no hurt has been caused, there can be no offence under this section. Even if hurt has been caused, it would not be an offence under this section if it was caused without an intention to cause it or without knowledge of its being likely to be caused. The fact of death, supervening upon infliction of hurt, is not imputable to the person who inflicted the hurt if all that he intended or knew to be likely was hurt. The conviction, in such cases, must be for hurt only.[87]

Where a large number of persons armed with sticks and stones caused death of one victim and injury to another, it was not established as to who specifically attacked whom, the intention to cause death of the deceased was not clearly established and there was more possibility that intention was to give a severe beating to the deceased, in the circumstance's the conviction of the accused under s 302 read with s 149 was2489 altered to one under ss 147, 323 and 325 .[88] The deceased who had come to the field of the accused unexpectedly was attacked by gandasa. Held, the accused did not have common intention to cause the death of the deceased. The accused who gave fatal blow was convicted under s 302, IPC, others were convicted under s 323, IPC .[89]

There was no evidence of plan or prior meeting of minds between the two accused appellants A1 and A2. A1 had assaulted and caused injuries to the PW5, hence his conviction under ss 302 / 34, IPC was altered to one under s 323, IPC . The appellant A2 had assaulted the deceased with a Tabbal, had caused as many as 8 incised wounds on various parts of the body of the deceased, thus, his conviction under s 302, IPC was upheld.[90]

The question of convicting the accused under s 302 or s 304, Pt I/Pt II, IPC, would arise only if it can be established that the fatal blow can be traced to the accused. Similarly, the question of convicting the accused under s 325 can arise only if it can be established from the evidence on record that the accused inflicted one of the grievous injuries sustained by the deceased. However, when there is no evidence and accused's involvement in the crime has been established, he can be convicted being one of those who assaulted the deceased with a stick and the autopsy report shows injuries attributable to a stick on the corpse of the deceased. Under these circumstances there is no option but to convict the accused under s 323 so the conviction under s 302 was altered to one under s 323, IPC .[91] Where other accused persons other than main accused found guilty under s 302, IPC had inflicted only simple injuries, they were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC and convicted only under ss 323, 324 and 325, IPC .[92]

Where the deceased was assaulted with fists and kicks, the accused did not have any weapon, the doctor did not find any visible injury and death was caused due to spleen rapture, the accused could not be attributed with knowledge that by such act they were likely to cause death of the deceased, nor it could be said that they intended to cause that particular injury which they caused, under the circumstances, the offence would fall under ss 323 / 34 and not under ss 302 / 34 .[93] Where the accused caught hold of the shirt collar of the deceased and pushed to fall on the rough surface and when the deceased fell down, he succumbed to the head injury. The evidence of the Medical Officer revealed only one external and one internal injury. There was not even a fracture. Neither any weapon was used nor the push given by the accused was followed by any violent attack. Therefore, as the medical evidence was clear to the effect that the deceased received only simple injuries, even though the death ensued conviction under s 302 was altered to one under s 323 .[94]

Where the accused kicked on testicles of the deceased, intention to cause death or knowledge that said act would cause death, could not be inferred, it was an accidental and not homicidal death and the offences under s 302 or 304, Pts 1 or 2 were not2490 made out, when the accused persons did not use any deadly weapons in causing assault on the deaceased, the case falls under s 323 and not under s 302 of IPC .[1]

Where the accused inflicted a single lathi blow on the head of the deceased resulting in simple injury which was in the nature of a lacerated wound on the left side of the parietal region with swelling extending upto the left eye lid, which did not result in fracture. A lacerated wound on the head cannot be said to be dangerous to life or of a serious nature; the medico-legal report described this injury as simple, caused by a blunt weapon, the cause of death was an internal injury in the nature of intracranial hemorrhage caused by the single lathi blow inflicted by the accused; the conviction of the accused was modified from under s 302 to s 323, IPC .[2] Where the accused inflicted a lathi blow, and the co-accused inflicted a single spear blow on the stomach of the deceased causing his death, the spear injury intentionally caused by the co-accused was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death but the same was not in the contemplation of the accused, the conviction of the accused under s 302 read with s 34 was altered to one under s 323 and that of the co-accused under s 302 was found proper.[3]

Where the only evidence against the accused was that he instigated the main accused to give blows and he would take care of the situation, he having entered the scene after the quarrel had started, did not have the knowledge that the main accused had knife with him, would not mean that the accused had an intention to cause the death of the deceased, particularly, under s 324 read with s 114 or s 302 read with s 34, IPC . The appropriate provision under which he was convicted was s 323 read with s 34, IPC or s 114, IPC .[4] Where the evidence of the witnesses proved that while the accused and his wife, the deceased, were alone he beat her, and on hearing her cries the witnesses ran to the spot and found her lying in injured condition. The injuries caused on her head and chest, resulted in her death, however, no weapon with which injuries were caused was found or discovered, and the accused was held liable to be convicted under s 323 and not under s 302 .[5]

221. Free Fight Case

Where both the complainant and the accused had sustained injuries in a free fight, and the accused appellant had not caused fatal injury on the deceased, his conviction under s 302, IPC was converted into one under s 323, IPC .[6]

222. Alteration of Conviction under Sections 302 / 149 to Sections 324 / 149

Where on the basis of the evidence of the prosecution witnesses including an eyewitness and a medical witness on record, it was clear that the accused persons in furtherance of their common object gave a beating to the deceased causing simple injuries on non-vital parts of the body and superficial injuries on the head, the accused persons had ample opportunity and time to inflict serious injuries to the deceased, the conviction of the accused persons under ss 300 / 302 / 149 IPC was set aside and instead they were convicted under ss 324 / 149, IPC .[7] When one of the accused instigated the2491 co-accused by saying 'maro' i.e., 'to strike' the deceased, which did not mean 'to kill', the conviction of the accused was altered from ss 302 / 34 to s 324 read with s 110, IPC .[8] Where all the accused persons were armed with deadly weapons and attacked the deceased, the main accused hurled a bomb on the deceased while other co-accused persons joined the main accused in chasing the deceased and beating him indiscriminately with hunting sickles, the conviction of the main accused under ss 148 and 302 IPC, and ss 3 and 5 of the Explosive Substances Act 1908, was found proper, but since the vital injuries were not caused by the co-accused persons, they were found liable to be convicted for the offence under ss 324, 148, IPC .[9]

223. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 325

Where there was no positive evidence in the case to hold as to which particular injury was inflicted by the accused and which injury sustained by the deceased was responsible for his death, the co-accused having been acquitted making s 34, IPC, inapplicable, the conviction of the accuse was converted from one under s 302 to one under s 325, IPC .[10] Where the accused after conniving with the other accused entered in house of the complainant unauthorisedly, beat the deceased and by twisting his neck murdered him, and the incident had occurred suddenly as accused persons were abusing family members of the deceased, no specific role has been assigned to the accused by the eye-witnesses except one witness in relation to twisting of neck, there was no evidence showing that the accused had any intention to cause death of the deceased or to cause such bodily injury which was likely to cause his death. Therefore, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to one under s 325 .[11] Where the 8 persons assaulted the deceased and others, and only lathis were used as weapons, both hands, right fibula and 4 metacarpal bones of the deceased got fractured, no injury was found on vital parts of the deceased, the deceased died five days after the attack, and injuries were not such as to attract s 300, the accused first assaulted the injured witnesses causing them minor injuries then moving to house of injured calling deceased out and assaulting him, manner of the attack as given by the injured witnesses and injuries caused, did not show their intention to cause death, so, conviction only under s 325 and not under s 302 was found justified.[12]

Except one witness who stated that the appellant assaulted the deceased with a stick, the other purported eye-witnesses stated that the appellant gave only fist blow to the deceased. The conviction of the appellant accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 325, IPC .[13]
