variable. This variation sometimes permits penetration without injury. This is possible because of the peculiar shape of the orifice or increased elasticity. On the other hand, sometimes the hymen may be more firm, less elastic and gets stretched and lacerated earlier. Thus a relatively less forceful penetration may not give rise to injuries ordinarily possible with a forceful attempt. The anatomical feature with regard to hymen which merits consideration is its anatomical situation. Next to hymen in positive importance, but more than that in frequency, are the injuries on labia majora. These, viz., labia majora are the first to be encountered by the male organ. Further, examination of the females for marks of injuries elsewhere on the body forms a very important piece of evidence. To constitute the offence of rape, it is not necessary that there should be complete penetration of the penis with emission of semen and rupture of hymen. Partial penetration within the labia majora of the vulva or pudendum with or without emission of semen is sufficient to constitute the offence of rape as defined in the law. The depth of penetration is immaterial in an offence punishable under s 376, IPC .[19]

Before an accused can be held guilty of the offence of rape, it must be proved that there was penetration in vulva.[20] Penetration is constituted when it is proved that any part of the virile member of the accused was within the labia of the pudendum of the female, no matter how little.[21] For constituting the offence of rape, it is not necessary that there should be full penetration of the male organ into the vagina.[22] The penetration, however, sight is sufficient for constituting the offence of rape.[23] It is not necessary that there should be complete penetration of penis, emission of semen and rupture of hymen.[24] The sine qua non of the offence of rape is penetration, and not ejaculation. Ejaculation without penetration constitutes an attempt to commit rape and not actual rape.[25] The only question is whether the private parts of the accused3110 did, or did not, enter into the woman.[26]If there has been no penetration, the act is outside the mischief of the section.[27] However, the law does not require proof of perfect and absolute penetration and the absence or presence of hymen is not conclusive either way.[28] A partial penetration, though insufficient to cause any injury to the hymen, is penetration within the meaning of the Explanation.[29] Partial penetration of the penis within the labia major of the vulva or pudendum with, or without, the emission of semen or such an attempt at penetration is sufficient to constitute the offence of rape.[30] Partial penetration, leading to the rupture of the hymen, without deep penetration into the vaginal canal, is therefore, sufficient to constitute rape.[31] Vulva penetration is as much rape as the vaginal penetration.[32] The statute merely requires medical evidence of penetration[33] and this may occur even if the hymen is intact.[34] It must, however, be remembered that though it is not necessary, in every case, that the hymen should be ruptured,[35] yet the courts are reluctant to believe that there could have been penetration without that, which is so very near to the entrance, having been ruptured.[36] For further commentary see under the heading 'penetration', s 376, post.

Slightest Penetration is Sufficient

Even a slightest penetration is sufficient to make out an offence of rape and depth of penetration is immaterial.[37] Modi in Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology[38] writes that:

> Thus, to constitute the offence of rape, it is not necessary that there should be complete penetration of penis with emission of semen and rupture of hymen. Partial penetration of the penis within the labia majora or the vulva or pudenda with or without emission of semen or even an attempt at penetration is quite sufficient for the purpose of the law. It is, therefore, quite possible to commit legally, the offence of rape without producing any injury to the genitals or leaving any seminal stains. In such a case, the Medical Officer should mention the negative facts in his report, but should not give his opinion that no rape had been committed. Rape is crime and not a medical condition. Rape is a legal term and not a diagnosis to be made by the Medical Officer treating the victim. The only statement that can be made by the Medical Officer is to the effect whether there is evidence of recent sexual activity. Whether the rape has occurred or not is a legal conclusion, not a medical one.3111

Similarly in Parikh's Textbook of Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology, 'sexual intercourse' has been defined as under :

> Sexual intercourse:-- In law, this term is held to mean the slightest degree of penetration of the vulva by the penis with or without emission of semen. It is therefore quite possible to commit legally the offence of rape without producing any injury to the genitals or leaving any seminal stains.

All Forms of Penetration Do Not Constitute Rape

The main question which requires consideration is whether by a process of judicial interpretation the provisions of s 375, IPC can be so altered so as to include all forms of penetration such as penile/vaginal penetration, penile/oral penetration, penile/anal penetration, finger/vagina and finger/anal penetration and object/vaginal penetration within its ambit. Section 375, uses the expression 'sexual intercourse' but the said expression has not been defined. The dictionary meaning of the word 'sexual intercourse' is heterosexual intercourse involving penetration of the vagina by the penis. The IPC was drafted by the First Indian Law Commission of which Lord Macaulay was the President. It was presented to the Legislative Council in 1856 and was passed on 6 October 1860. The IPC has undergone very few changes in the last more than 140 years.

Except for clause sixthly of s 375 regarding the age of the woman (which in view of s 10 denotes a female human being of any age) no major amendment has been made in the said provision. Sub-section (2) of s 376 and ss 376A to 376D were inserted by Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1983 but sub-s (2) of s 376 merely deals with special types of situations and provides for a minimum sentence of 10 years. It does not in any manner alter the definition of 'rape' as given in s 375, IPC . Similarly, s 354, IPC which deals with assault or criminal force to woman with intent to outrage her modesty and s 377, IPC which deals with unnatural offences, have not undergone any major amendment.[39]

It is a well-settled principle that the intention of the legislature is primarily to be gathered from the language used, which means that attention should be paid to what has been said as also to what has not been said. As a consequence, a construction which requires for its support addition or substitution of words or which results in rejection of words as meaningless has to be avoided. It is contrary to all rules of construction to read words into an Act unless it is absolutely necessary to do so. Similarly, it is wrong and dangerous to proceed by substituting some other words for words of the statute. It is equally well settled that a statute enacting an offence or imposing a penalty is to be strictly construed. The fact that an enactment is a penal provision is in itself a reason for hesitation before ascribing to phrases used in it a meaning broader than that they would ordinary bear.[40] Only sexual intercourse, namely, heterosexual intercourse involving penetration of the vagina by the penis coupled with the explanation that penetration is sufficient to constitute the sexual3112 intercourse necessary for the offence of rape has been held to come within the purview of s 375, IPC .[41]

Prosecution of an accused for an offence under s 376, IPC on radically enlarged meaning of s 375, IPC may violate the guarantee enshrined in art 20(1) of the Constitution which says that no person shall be convicted of any offence except for violation of a law in force at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence, nor be subjected to a penalty greater than that which might have been inflicted under the law in force at the time of the commission of the offence.[42] In Sakshi v Union of India ,[43] the Apex Court has held that if the hymen is ruptured by inserting a finger it would not amount to rape and for the purpose of 'constituting rape the penetration of the vagina by the male organ of generation is a must'.[44]

Now, with the enactment of the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013, the position has changed.

37. Explanation 1--Vagina

The new expln 1 provides that for the purposes of this section, 'vagina' shall also include labia majora.

38. Explanation 2--Consent

The new expln 2 provides that the consent in this section means an unequivocal voluntary agreement when woman by words, gestures or any form of verbal or non-verbal communication, communicates willingness to participate in the specific sexual act.

Provided that a woman who does not physically resist to the act of penetration shall not by the reason only of that fact, be regarded as consenting to the sexual activity.

39. Exception 1--Medical Procedure or Intervention is not Rape

The new Exception 1 to s 375 provides that medical procedure or intervention shall not constitute rape.

40. Exception 2

The exception embodies the rule that when the woman is married and not less than 15 years of age, sexual intercourse, by the husband, with her is not rape. If this exception had not been there, clause fifthly would have applied to such a case holding the husband guilty of rape. However, if a husband has connection with his wife, who is under 15 years of age, whether with her, or without her consent, he is guilty of rape.[45] The object of the exception is to protect married women, of less than 15 years, against being forced into premature sexual intercourse with their husbands3113 with disastrous consequences to themselves and also the infant mortality that may follow such cohabitation.[46]

1 Substituted by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 2013 (13 of 2013), s 9 (wef 3-2-2013). Prior to substitution s 375 stood as under:-" S. 375 . Rape.-- A man is said to commit "rape" who, except in the case hereinafter excepted, has sexual intercourse with a woman under circumstances falling under any of the six following descriptions:--First.--Against her will.Secondly.--Without her consent.Thirdly.--With her consent, when her consent has been obtained by putting her or any person in whom she is interested in fear of death or of hurt.Fourthly.--With her consent, when the man knows that he is not her husband, and that her consent is given because she believes that he is another man to whom she is or believes herself to be lawfully married.Fifthly.--With her consent, when, at the time of giving such consent, by reason of unsoundness of mind or intoxication or the administration by him personally or through another of any stupefying or unwholesome substance, she is unable to understand the nature and consequences of that to which she gives consent.Sixthly.--With or without her consent, when she is under sixteen years of age.Explanation.--Penetration is sufficient to constitute the sexual intercourse necessary to the offence of rape.Exception.--Sexual intercourse by a man with his own wife, the wife not being under fifteen years of age, is not rape.".

1. Legislative Changes

The present section has been substituted for the old s 376, IPC by the Criminal Law (Amendment), 2013 (13 of 2013), s 9 (wef 3-02-2013) on the recommendations of the Justice J.S. Verma Committee.3118

Recommendations of Justice J.S. Verma Committee on Sentence

While we believe that enhanced penalties in a substantial number of sexual assault cases can be adjudged on the basis of the law laid down in the aforesaid cases, certain situations warrant a specific treatment. We believe that where the offence of sexual assault, particularly 'gang rape', is accompanied by such brutality and violence that it leads to death or a Persistent Vegetative State (or 'PVS' in medical terminology), punishment must be severe - with the minimum punishment being life imprisonment. While we appreciate the argument that where such offences result in death, the case may also be tried under Section 302 of the IPC as a 'rarest of rare' case, we must acknowledge that many such cases may actually fall within the ambit of Section 304 (Part II) since the 'intention to kill' may often not be established. In the case of violence resulting in Persistent Vegetative State is concerned, we are reminded of the moving story of Aruna Shanbagh, the young nurse who was brutally raped and lived the rest of her life. (i.e. almost 36 years) in a Persistent Vegetative State.

In our opinion, such situations must be treated differently because the concerned effort to rape and to inflict violence may disclose an intention deserving an enhanced punishment. We have therefore recommended that a specific provision, namely, Section 376(3) should be inserted in the Indian Penal Code to deal with the offence of "rape followed by death or resulting in a Persistent Vegetative State"

In our considered, view, taking into account the views expressed on the subject by an overwhelming majority of scholars, leaders of women's organizations, and other stakeholders, there is strong submission that the seeking of death penalty would be a regressive step in the field of sentencing and reformation. We, having bestowed considerable thought on the subject, and having provided for enhanced sentences (short of death) in respect of the above-noted aggravated forms of sexual assault, in the larger interest of society, and having regard to the current thinking in favour of abolition of the death penalty, and also to avoid the argument of any sentencing arbitrariness, we are not inclined to recommend the death penalty.[48]

Prior to its substitution, the old s 376 ran thus:

" S. 376 . Punishment for rape.--

(1) Whoever, except in the cases provided for by sub-section (2), commits rape shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which shall not be less than seven years but which may be for life or for a term which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine unless the woman raped is his own wife and is not under twelve years of age, in which case, he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years or with fine or with both:

Provided that the Court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment for a term of less than seven years.

(2) Whoever,--

(a) being a police officer commits rape--
  (i) within the limits of the police station to which he is appointed; or
  (ii) in the premises of any station house whether or not situated in the police station to which he is appointed; or
  (iii) on a woman in his custody or in the custody of a police officer subordinate to him; or

(b) being a public servant, takes advantage of his official position and commits rape on a woman in his custody as such public servant or in the custody of a public servant subordinate to him; or3119

(c) being on the management or on the staff of a jail, remand home or other place of custody established by or under any law for the time being in force or of a women's or children's institution takes advantage of his official position and commits rape on any inmate of such jail, remand home, place or institution; or

(d) being on the management or on the staff of a hospital, takes advantage of his official position and commits rape on a woman in that hospital; or

(e) commits rape on a woman knowing her to be pregnant; or

(f) commits rape on a woman when she is under twelve years of age; or

(g) commits gang rape,

shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than ten years but which may be for life and shall also be liable to fine:

Provided that the Court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment of either description for a term of less than ten years.

Explanation 1.--Where a woman is raped by one or more in a group of persons acting in furtherance of their common intention, each of the persons shall be deemed to have committed gang rape within the meaning of this sub-section.

Explanation 2.--"Women's or children's institution" means an institution, whether called an orphanage or a home for neglected women or children or a widow's home or by any other name, which is established and maintained for the reception and care of women or children.

Explanation 3.--"Hospital" means the precincts of the hospital and includes the precincts of any institution for the reception and treatment of persons during convalescence or of persons requiring medical attention or rehabilitation.".

2. Scope

The general features of the offence, punishable under this section, have already been set out in the commentary under the preceding s 375 . Under s 375, irrespective of consent, it is rape when a man has sexual intercourse with a woman (a) under sixteen years of age (now, 18 years), if she is not his wife; or (b) under fifteen years of age if she is his wife. In this class of cases, only the following two questions will arise:

(1) was the woman, at the time of the act, under the prescribed age aforesaid? and
(2) was there penetration?[49]

However, there is another and larger class of cases where the girls are of the prescribed age of 15 or 16 years, as the case may be. In this class of cases, different questions will arise. All persons, other than the husbands, commit rape on a woman without her consent. Consent is, thus, the most important ingredient of the offence of rape in this large class of cases. Hence, the evidence will focus on that question to show that there was no consent which the law requires, namely, free and conscious permission before the act began or was completed. The consent, that will relieve the act of sexual intercourse of criminality, must be real consent to the act and it must be both free and previous to the act. A consent, subsequent to the act, is no defence to a charge of rape. This is why the law does not allow an offence of rape to be compounded. Further, consent, after the first act of rape, might purely be the result of3120 sexual urge and would not, therefore, be after the first act of coitus against the will of the woman. Every act of sexual intercourse would, thus, be a separate offence of rape.[50] The circumstances, vitiating apparent consent, have been explained in the commentary under the preceding s 375, IPC .

The alarming frequency of crime against women led the Parliament to enact the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1983 (Act 43 of 1983) and the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013 (Act 13 of 2013) to make the law of rape more realistic. By the amendment Acts, ss 375 and 376 were amended and certain other penal provisions were incorporated for punishing such custodians who molest a woman under their custody or care. Section 114A was also added in the Evidence Act for drawing a conclusive presumption as to the absence of consent in certain prosecutions for rape, involving such custodians.[51]

Prior to its substitution vide the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013, sub-s (1) to s 376 had a proviso and provided a minimum sentence (which has now changed). Sub-section (2) vide the different clauses of the section highlighted the aggravated form of the offence for which a higher punishment, i.e., rigorous imprisonment for not less than 10 years but which may extend for life and also fine was provided as against s 376(1), which provided for sentence of imprisonment of not less than 7 years but which may be for life or for a term which may extend to 10 years and accused was also liable to pay fine. When the accused committing the offence was the husband of the woman who was above the age 12 years but below 15 years, then the legislature had shown some leniency and the sentence of imprisonment up to 2 years or fine or both was prescribed in such cases. However, when the woman raped was less than 12 years of age, then the offence committed by the husband was at par with the other offenders falling within the then sub-s (1) of s 376, IPC . The court, however, had discretion both under sub-ss 1 and 2 to s 376 to impose a sentence of imprisonment prescribed for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment.

3. Normally Rape Case is not Concocted

Rape leaves a permanent scar and has a serious psychological impact on the victim and also her family members and, therefore, no one would normally concoct a story of rape just to falsely implicate a person.[52]

4. False Implication

No girl of self-respect and dignity who is conscious of her chastity having expectations of married life and livelihood would falsely level an accusation of rape against a person, much less against her father, sacrificing thereby her chastity and also expose the entire family to shame and at the risk of condemnation and ostracization by the society. It is unthinkable to suggest that the mother would go to the extent of inventing a story of sexual assault of her own daughter and tutor her to narrate a story of sexual assault against a person who is no other than her husband3121 and father of the girl, at the risk of bringing down their social status and spoil their reputation in the society as well as family circle to which they belong to.[53]

In a case, the accused forcibly entered the hut of the prosecutrix, knocked her down on the floor and pulled up her saree and committed sexual intercourse, while she kept shouting to break free, but there was nobody. Then, the accused ran away. In such case, the testimony of the prosecutrix was found reliable and the plea of false implication taken by the accused was rejected and he was convicted for offences under ss 376 and 450, IPC .[54]

5. Law Commission Reports

The Law Commission of India in its forty-second report on the IPC submitted in June 1971, suggested amendments to ss 375 and 376, IPC, thereby expanding the definition of rape and providing for a more severe punishment. The Commission also suggested the incorporation of other sexual offences in the IPC . In its sixty-ninth report on the Indian Evidence Act 1872, the Law Commission had also recommended reforms in the law. Nothing, however, was done and the law not amended. Then the subsequent Law Commission in its eighty-fourth report suggested changes in the law on rape and allied offences and amendments to the laws of procedure and evidence. The commission submitted its report in April 1980 to the Central Government after that the IPC, CrPC and Evidence Act were amended by the Criminal Laws (Amendment) Act 1983. In the statement of objects and reasons while presenting the Bill, it was mentioned that recommendations of the Law Commission had been examined in consultation with the State Governments and suggestions on the subject received. It was mentioned that the changes proposed in the Bill had been formulated principally on the basis of the following considerations:

(1) the law should be made more stringent without jeopardising considerations of fair trial;
(2) the definition of rape should be amended to remove certain loopholes and inadequacies and to ensure that consent should be vitiated unless it is real and given out of free choice;
(3) minimum punishments for rape should be prescribed;
(4) the prosecutrix should be protected from the glare of embarrassing publicity during the investigation as well as trial stage, and any information leading to the identification of the victim should not be disclosed;
(5) in the case of rape by a police officer or by a group of persons or by a person having custodial control, by virtue of his special position over the victim, once it is proved that sexual intercourse has taken place, the onus should be on the accused to prove that the sexual intercourse was with the consent of the woman.

It will be useful to quote the following passage from the eighty-fourth report of the Law Commission:

> It is often stated that a woman who is raped undergoes two crises, the rape and the subsequent trial. While the first seriously wounds her dignity, curbs her individual, destroys her sense of security and may often ruin her physically, the second is no less3122 potent or mischief, in as much as it not only forces her to re-live through the traumatic experience, but also does so in the glare of publicity in a totally alien atmosphere, with the whole apparatus and paraphernalia of the criminal justice system focused up on her. In particular, it is now well established that sexual activities with young girls of immature age have a traumatic effect which often persists throughout life leading subsequently to disorder, unless there are counter balancing factors such a family life and social attitudes which > could act as a cushion against such traumatic effects. Rape is the ultimate violation of the self. It is a humiliating event in a woman's life which reads to fear for existence and a sense powerlessness. The victim needs empathy and safety and a sense of reassurance. In the absence of public sensitivity to these needs, the experience of figuring in a report of the offence may itself become another assault. Forcible rape is unique among crimes, in the manner in which its victims are dealt with by the criminal justice system. Raped women have to undergo certain tribulations. These begin with their treatment by the police and continue through a male dominated criminal justice system acquittal of many de facto guilty rapists adds to the sense of injustice.

In effect, the focus of the law upon corroboration, consent and character of the prosecutrix and standard of proof of guilt beyond reasonable doubt have resulted in increasing alienation of the general public of the legal system, who find the law and language difficult to understand and who feel that the courts are not run as well as one would expect.[55]

6. Section 509 and Section 376 Read with Section 511 and Section 376 --Relative Scope

Commentary under s 509, post, vol 4, may be referred to.

7. Essential Ingredients of the Offence of Rape

Commentary under s 375, ante, may be referred to.

8. Crux of the Offence and Intercourse

The crux of the offence under s 376, IPC is rape and it postulates a sexual intercourse. The word 'intercourse' means sexual connection. It may be defined as mutual frequent action by members of independent organization. By a metaphor, the word 'intercourse' like the word 'commerce' is applied to the relation of sexes. In intercourse, there is temporary visitation of one organisation by a member of the other organization for certain clearly defined and limited objects. The primary object of the visiting organization is to obtain euphoria by means of a detent of the nerves consequent on the sexual crisis. There is no intercourse unless the visiting member is enveloped at least partially by the visited organization, for intercourse connotes reciprocity. In intercourse between thighs the visiting male organ is enveloped at least partially by the organism visited, the thighs; the thighs are kept together and tight.[56]

9. Problems Posed by rape and defect in Present System

It is rather unfortunate that in recent times, there has been an increase in violence against women causing serious concern. Rape does indeed pose a series of problems3123 for the criminal justice system. There are cries for very harsh penalties, but often such crimes eclipse the real plight of the victim. Rape is an experience which shakes the foundations of the lives of the victims. For many, its effect is a long term one, impairing their capacity for personal relationships, altering their behavioural values and generating fears. In addition to the trauma of rape itself, victims have had to suffer further agony during legal proceedings.[57]

The defects in the present system are that complaints are roughly handled and not given the attention warranted. The victims, more often than not, are humiliated by the police. The victims have invariably found rape trials a traumatic experience. The experience of giving evidence in court has been negative and destructive. The victims often say, they considered the ordeal to be even worse than the rape itself. Undoubtedly, the court proceedings added to and prolonged the psychological stress they had to suffer as a result of the rape itself.[58]

10. Acquittal on flimsy grounds improper

The Courts should be more cautious in appreciating the evidence in rape cases and the accused should not be left scot-free merely on flimsy grounds. [59]

11. Rape of Girl Child--Parameters and Factors to be kept in Mind

The following parameters and factors that need to be kept in mind, clearly emerge in cases of a rape of a girl child:

(1) Such cases need to be dealt with sensitively and not like cases involving other penal offences. In other words, the whole approach of the courts must be quite different.
(2) The traditional non-permissive bounds of Indian society must be kept in mind while examining the evidence in cases involving sexual offences. Social factors play an important role in the nature and quality of available evidence.
(3) The sole testimony of a prosecutrix is enough to convict a person accused of rape, if the testimony is free from blemish and implicitly reliable.
(4) Such testimony does not need corroboration; but if there is some doubt about the implicit reliability of the testimony, then the court may look for assurance to the acceptability of the testimony, short of its corroboration.

If the testimony of the prosecutrix is reliable and trustworthy, then minor contradictions are not enough to throw out the evidence and other issues such as non-examination of an available witness, even the non-examination of a doctor or the non-production of the doctor's report would not be fatal to the case of the prosecution.[60]

12. Delay in Lodging FIR

It is a recurring feature in most criminal cases that there would be some delay in furnishing the first information to the police. It has to be remembered that the law has3124 not fixed any time for lodging the FIR. Hence, a delayed FIR is not illegal, however, a prompt and immediate lodging of the FIR is ideal as that would give the prosecution a twin advantage. First, it affords commencement of the investigation without any time lapse. Secondly, it expels the opportunity for any possible concoction of a false version. Barring these plus points for a promptly lodged FIR, demerits of the delayed FIR cannot operate as fatal to any prosecution case. It cannot be overlooked that even a promptly lodged FIR is not an unreserved guarantee for genuineness of the version incorporated therein.[61]

When the delay in lodging the FIR is properly explained, it has no adverse effect on the prosecution case.[62] Where the father of the victim was not in the village on the day of the incident and after his return to the village was absent for 3-4 days and the FIR was lodged the next day, it can be said that the delay is explained.[63] Where rape was committed on a minor girl by a teacher, which was duly proved by evidence on record, and the FIR in the case was filed three months after the incident, it was held that a mere delay in filing the FIR was not sufficient to reject the prosecution case.[64]

The delay in filing a FIR in a case of sexual assault, cannot be equated with the case involving other offences as there are several factors which weigh on the mind of the prosecutrix and her family members before coming to the police station to lodge a complaint. In a tradition bound society prevalent in India, more particularly, rural areas, it would be quite unsafe to throw out the prosecution case merely on the ground that there is some delay in lodging the FIR.[65]

13. Natural Inclination of the Prosecutrix and Delay in FIR

A girl in a tradition bound non-permissive society would be extremely reluctant even to admit that any incident, which is likely to reflect upon her chastity, had occurred, being conscious of the danger of getting ostracized by the society or looked down by the society. Her not informing any one about the incident in the circumstances cannot detract from her reliability. In normal course of human conduct an unmarried girl would not like to give publicity to the traumatic experience she had undergone and would feel terribly embarrassed to narrate such an incident. Overpowered, as she may be, by a feeling of shame her natural inclination would be to avoid talking to anyone, lest the family name and honour is brought into controversy. Thus, a delay in lodging the first information report cannot be used as a ritualistic formula for doubting the prosecution case and discarding the same on such a ground in lodging the first information report. Delay has the effect of putting the court on guard to search if any explanation has been offered for the delay and, if offered, whether it is satisfactory.[66]

It needs to be observed that in cases involving sexual assault, delay in reporting the matter to the police by itself is not fatal to the prosecution case. It is well settled that the courts cannot overlook the fact that in sexual offences delay in lodging the FIR3125 can be due to a variety of reasons, particularly the reluctance of the prosecutrix or her family members to go to the police and complain about the incident which concerns the reputation of the prosecutrix and the honour of her family. It is only after giving a cool thought that a complaint of sexual offence is generally lodged.[67]

14. Quashing of FIR

Where the petitioner/accused, an IAS officer, filed a petition under s 482, CrPC 1973 for quashing of an FIR for having committed the offence of rape, there were specific allegations by the victim in her complaint that the petitioner/accused bolted the door of his chamber and allured her for promotion, and on her refusal forcibly committed rape by threatening her. Plea of alibi taken by the petitioner which is required to be proved by substantial evidence is to be determined during the trial. Further, cases filed by the petitioner against the complainant for malicious prosecution are not relevant for declaring an FIR false. Since the allegations made in the complaint prima facie disclosed the offence alleged, the FIR could not be quashed.[68]

15. Lapses/Laches on the part of Investigating Agency--Effect

The lapses/laches on the part of the investigating agency and prosecution while conducting investigation or during trial is not fatal to the prosecution case, unless serious prejudice has been caused to the accused by reason of such lapses/laches and it cannot be considered to be a ground for discrediting the testimony of the prosecutrix.[69]

When no prejudice can be said to have been caused, the question of trial being vitiated would not arise. When the eyewitness account available on record is trustworthy, the lapses in investigation are overshadowed by the testimony of the eyewitness.[70] Where on account of defective investigation, loopholes in the investigation are left designedly to help the accused at the cost of the poor prosecutrix, a labourer, acquitting the accused solely on that ground is not justified as it would be adding insult to her injury.[71]

16. Non-Examination of Person Writing Police Report--Effect

The non-examination of the person who is said to have written the report is fatal to the prosecution case when all the witnesses have categorically stated that some person wrote the report. but they had not even stated the name of that person, which throws serious doubt about the genuineness of the police report.[72]

17. Identification of Accused and Identification Parade

By mere lapse of time or by the mere fact that the test identification parade was not conducted, the identification made by the prosecutrix in the open court cannot be3126 disbelieved.[73]Section 9 of the Evidence Act deals with relevancy of facts necessary to explain or introduce the relevant facts. It says, inter alia, facts which establish the identity of any thing or person whose identity is relevant, insofar as they are necessary for the purpose, are relevant. Likewise, the evidence of identification is a relevant piece of evidence under s 9 of the Evidence Act, where the evidence consists of identification of the accused person at his trial. The statement of the witness made in the court, a fortiori identification by him of the accused is substantive evidence but from its very nature it is inherently of a weak character. The evidence of identification in the test identification parade is not substantive evidence, but is only corroborative evidence. It falls in the realm of investigation. The substantive evidence is the statement of the witness made in court. The purpose of test identification parade is to test the observation, grasp, memory, capacity to recapitulate what he has seen earlier, strength or trustworthiness of the evidence of identification of the accused and to ascertain if it can be used as reliable corroborative evidence of the witness identifying the accused at his trial in court. If a witness identifies the accused in court for the first time after a long time, the probative value of such uncorroborated evidence becomes minimal, so much so that it becomes unsafe to rely on such piece of evidence. However, if a witness has known the accused earlier in such circumstances which lend assurance to identification by him in court, and if there is no inherent improbability or inconsistency, there is no reason why his statement in court about the identification of the accused should not be relied upon as any other acceptable but uncorroborated testimony.[74] In a case, there was clear evidence of the prosecutrix that the accused truck driver committed rape on her. She also correctly identified the accused in test identification parade. Since the accused was not known to the prosecutrix from before, therefore omission of the name of the accused in FIR was held immaterial and conviction of the accused under s 376, IPC was sustained.[75]

It is well settled that the substantive evidence is the evidence of identification in court and the test identification parade provides corroboration to the identification of the witness in court, if required. However, what weight must be attached to the evidence of identification in court, which is not preceded by a test identification parade, is a matter for the courts of fact to examine.[76] The non-acquaintance of the victim with the accused and the absence of test identification parade is not fatal, when the offence was committed in the broad daylight as well as in the night for a few days giving sufficient time for the victims to identify the accused persons.[77]

In ch 1 of the Criminal Manual issued by the Bombay High Court it has been directed that two suspects roughly of similar appearance should be paraded, with at least twelve other persons, but when the two suspects are not similar in appearance, separate parades should be held using different persons for each parade.[78] The number of dummies per accused should be in the ratio of 1:4 or 1:6. Generally, not3127 more than two accused should be placed in an identification parade. The dummies so placed along with the accused should be of similar appearance to the accused.[79]

During the investigation of a crime, the police agency is required to hold identification parade for the purpose of enabling the witness to identify the person alleged to have committed the offence, particularly, when such person was not previously known to the witness or the informant. The absence of test identification may not be fatal if the accused is known or sufficiently described in the complaint leaving no doubt in the mind of the court regarding his involvement. Identification parade may also not be necessary in a case where the accused persons are arrested on the spot. The evidence of identifying the accused person at the trial for the first time is, from its very nature, inherently of a weak character.[80]

The evidence in order to carry out a conviction should ordinarily clarify as to how and under what circumstances the complainant or the witness came to pick out the particular accused person and the details of the part which he allegedly played in the crime in question with reasonable accuracy. In such cases, test identification is considered as a safe rule of prudence to generally look for corroboration of the sworn testimony of witnesses in court as to the identity of the accused who are strangers to them. There may, however, be exceptions to this general rule, when for example, the court is impressed by a particular witness on whose testimony it can safely rely without such or other corroboration. Though the holding of identification proceedings are not substantive evidence, yet they are used for corroboration purposes for believing that the person brought before the court was the real person involved in the commission of the crime. The identification parade even if held, cannot in all cases, be considered as safe, sole and trustworthy evidence on which the conviction of the accused could be sustained. It is a rule of prudence which is required to be followed in cases where the accused is not known to the witness or the complainant.[81]

The identification of the accused by the prosecutrix is not acceptable when she admits in cross-examination that she identified the accused in court because the police and her father had tutored her to identify the accused.[82] However, when the accused lived in the vicinity of the house of prosecutrix and the prosecutrix had sufficient opportunity to see the accused at the time of the occurrence, not holding the identification parade is not fatal to the prosecution case.[83] When the accused and the victim are both of the same locality, and the victim identifies the accused on the next day of the offence, she and her family members know the accused and that renders not holding of the test identification parade inconsequential. Moreover, substantive evidence is the evidence of identification in court.[84] Unlike some others, the accused was not caught at the place of occurrence and there was no test identification parade in the eye of law, thus, identification of the accused for the first time in Court was really of no consequence. The only evidence pressed into service by the prosecution so far as the accused was concerned was that his name was similar to one of the names by which the accused persons were addressing each other, as stated by the prosecutrix. That could not be, by any stretch of the imagination, an incriminating material and the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC .[85]3128

18. Attempt to Commit Rape

The expression 'whoever attempts to commit an offence' in s 511, IPC can only mean, whoever intends to do a certain act with intention or knowledge necessary for the commission of the offence. All offences may be viewed in four distinct stages (i) intention; (ii) preparation; (iii) attempt; and (iv) completed act. There is a thin line between preparation and attempt. Attempt has been defined in Stephen's Digest of Criminal Law as follows: 'an attempt to commit a crime is an act done with intent to commit that crime, and forming part of a serious (series) of acts which would constitute its actual commission if it were not interrupted'.[86]

The difference between preparation and an attempt to commit an offence consists chiefly in the greater degree of determination, and what is necessary to prove for an offence of an attempt to commit rape has been committed is that the accused has gone beyond the stage of preparation.[87]It is true that mere intention to commit an offence is not a crime, unless such intention is followed by an act. Mere intention is not suggestive of attempt when the accused with intent to commit rape to satisfy his lust laid the victim on the ground over the shawl, tore her salwar, opened his pants, laid over her which would show that he intended to gratify his passion on her person in all events. It is only when the mother of the victim calling and looking for the victim reached near the spot that he got up from the body of the victim and fled away. This prevented him from penetrating but in the process, he ejaculated on the shawl, stains of which were also found on his pants. The act of the accused would squarely fall under s 376 read with s 511, IPC .[88]

A person commits the offence of attempting to commit the particular offence, when he intends to commit that particular offence and having made preparations and with the intention to commit that offence, does as act toward its commission and that such act need not be the penultimate act towards the commission of that offence, but must be an act during the course of committing that offence.[89]

19. Attempt to Rape or Outraging the Modesty

It is now well settled that in a case of attempt to rape, in order to come to a conclusion that the conduct of the accused was indicative of a determination to gratify his passion at all events and in spite of all resistance, a preparation reasonably proximate to the consummation of the offence is sufficient to bring home the offence of attempt to rape.[90]

It is not only that the accused tore the clothes and took bites on the cheeks of his victim but forcibly tore the cord of the salwar and tried to go on the grown up lady from the leg-side. It is definitely an act beyond the stage of preparation proximate to the commission of the offence of rape taking it to the stage of attempt.[91]

The difference between preparation and an attempt to commit an offence consists chiefly in the greater degree of determination, and what is necessary to prove for an offence of an attempt to commit rape is that the accused has gone beyond the stage3129 of preparation. If an accused strips a girl naked and then making her lie flat on the ground undresses himself and then forcibly rubs his erected penis on the private part of the girl, but fails to penetrate the same into her vagina and on such rubbing ejaculates himself, then it is difficult to hold that it was a case of merely assaulting under s 354 and not an attempt to commit offence under s 376 read with s 511, IPC .[1]

Where the accused rubbed his male organs on the private parts of the minor girl and the semen leaked out of his male organ and fell on her private part, the case was found to be one of attempt to commit rape punishable under ss 376 / 511, IPC, and not outraging her modesty, punishable under s 354, IPC .[2]

When the clothes of the victim were found intact and examination of her genital area conclusively established that there was no sexual assault on her, though there was some evidence of minor injuries on the lower part of her body from which the offence of outraging her modesty was made out, the accused was found liable to be convicted under s 354, and not under ss 376 / 511, IPC[3]

When the sari of the victim was removed and nothing was done beyond that, the case was not found to be an attempt to commit rape, but of outraging the modesty of the woman.[4]

The accused-stranger representing himself as the *sarpanch*managed to get shelter for the night in the house of the complainant. In the night the prosecutrix awakened and found the cord of her petticoat loosened and the accused was trying to sit on her waist. She pushed the accused and cried out to her husband. In this state of evidence, the court held that the act of the accused would constitute not an attempt to commit rape, but only preparation for the same.[5]

20. Abetment of Rape

In order to bring home the conviction under s 376 read with s 114, IPC, the prosecution has to establish the presence of the accused person if it was committed as also their abetment to commit the offence by the perpetrator.[6]

In order to bring home such conviction under s 376 read with s 114, IPC, there must be evidence on record to show, (a) that there was abetment of rape to be committed; (b) that the abettors have actually abetted the commission of rape; and (c) that they were present at the time when the commission of rape took place.[7]

Abetment of doing of a thing is when a person instigates any person to do that thing or enters into conspiracy for the doing of that thing and if an act or illegal omission takes place in pursuance thereof, in order to the doing of that thing or intentionally aids by any act or illegal omission the doing of that thing. If anything is done in order to facilitate the commission of that act, it amounts to aiding the doing of that thing.[8] When the two accused did not commit rape with the prosecutrix, they3130 did not physically hold any part of her body nor intimidate her nor do any other act to facilitate the commission of rape by the main accused, the two accused could hardly be held to have committed abetment of the offence of rape.[9] The mere fact that rape was committed in a hut in possession of the accused is not sufficient to conclude any abetment on his part.[10] However, the accused though not himself committing rape but kept watch while rape was being committed by other persons and aided and abetted the commission of the crime instead of preventing it, is liable to be convicted under s 376 read with s 109, and not under s 376 read with s 34, IPC .[11]

21. Rape and Abetment of Suicide

The prosecution case was that the accused committed rape on the prosecutrix who committed suicide 5½ months after the date of occurrence on account of the rape committed on her. The charge of rape was not proved against the accused, so the cause for committing suicide was not legally proved. The accused cannot, therefore, be held responsible for abetment of the ultimate offence of suicide. Further, statement of the prosecutrix recorded by the police 11 days after the date of occurrence of rape, cannot be treated as her dying declaration under s 32 of Evidence Act, for suicide was committed after 5½ months, when it was not in a series of circumstances of the transaction which resulted in her death.[12] When the raped woman committed suicide three days after the commission of the offence, it was held that her statement to her mother-in-law was not admissible under s 32(1) of the Evidence Act 1872, because rape was not the cause of her death, though it might be the contingent motive, nor could it be relevant under s 6 of the said Act, as her statement was not so connected with her rape as to form part of the same transaction.[13]

22. Sexual Intercourse with false Promise of Marriage is Cheating

When an accused makes a false promise to marry, which he never intends to carry out, and induces thereby the victim, so deceived, to have with him the sexual act, which the victim would not have indulged in or permitted, had she not been induced by such deception and when such act of having sexual intercourse by her with the accused causes, or is likely to cause, damage or harm to her body, mind or reputation, the act of the accused would amount to cheating. Thus, when a woman is induced to part with her chastity or virginity, which is the most valued possession of hers, the person, who so induces the woman by making false representation, would be liable for punishment under s 417, IPC . If the victim's having sexual intercourse with such a person, causes, or is likely to cause harm to her body, mind or reputation, for, in such a case, unless so deceived, the victim would not have permitted sexual act by the accused. To put it differently, had such a victim not been deceived, she would not have permitted sexual act or would have refrained from allowing such sexual act and clearly in such a case, but for her permitting such sexual act, she would not have suffered harm to her body, mind or reputation.[14]3131

A representation deliberately made by the accused with a view to elicit the assent of the victim without having the intention or inclination to marry her, will vitiate the consent. If, on the facts, it is established that at the very inception of the making of promise, the accused did not really entertain the intention of marrying her and the promise to marry held out by him was a mere hoax, the consent ostensibly given by the victim will be of no avail to the accused to exculpate him from the ambit of s 375, IPC cl second.[15] In the instant case, the prosecutrix came from the lower rung of the society and had read upto Class VI only. The accused exploited the position by making her believe that he would marry her. Therefore, pinning faith on such repeated assurance, the prosecutrix consented to her having physical relationship with the accused. However, it was not a case of simple allurement or mere promise to marry, and the accused hailing from a well to do family made her believe that their physical relationship would culminate in marriage. In such case, the plea of consent was rejected, and the accused was convicted under s 376, IPC .[16] Where the accused was alleged to have committed sexual intercourse with the false promise to marry the girl, which continued for a long period of six months, the accused was held entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of charge under s 376, IPC .[17]

In a case, the prosecutrix and the accused had sexual intercourse continuously for a long period and when the prosecutrix became pregnant, she filed complaint for offence under s 376, IPC, on the allegation that she gave consent on misconception of fact or belief of false promise of marriage by the accused. It was held that the circumstances of the case showed that continuous sex between the parties was consensual. This was a relationship between two co-workers who were intimately known to each other, and in the circumstances, they had spent time together for long periods and that it was also possible that the desire to have sex was mutual and consensual. Hence, given the circumstances of the case, it was possible to hold in favour of the accused that there was consensual sex between the complainant and the accused. It is only when the relationship soured and when the appellant refused to marry the complainant that a case of rape has been brought against him. The accused was acquitted of the charge of rape under s 376, IPC .[18]

Where the prosecutrix and the accused continued sex for a long period and she never resisted the overtures of the accused for a long time, and she freely exercised a choice between resistance and assent, the evidence showed that the prosecutrix was well aware that the accused was already married and had children. Further, no marks of violence were found on her, therefore, it was held that there was no misconception of fact/misrepresentation by the accused, and it was clearly a case of consensual sex and the accused could not be convicted on the charge of rape under s 376, IPC .[19] The prosecutrix was a widow living in the village and the accused, a co-villager, showed sympathy and promised to marry her and had sexual relations with the prosecutrix for about 6-7 months. When the prosecutrix became pregnant, the accused refused to3132 marry her. Hence, case was filed for the prosecution of the accused for offence under s 376, IPC . The evidence of the prosecutrix showed that she was aware of the fact that the appellant is a married person and already has a legally wedded wife besides children, and she (legal wife) is also mother of seven children, eldest of which, at the time of her deposition, was about eighteen years old. In such circumstances, it was difficult to accept that any sexual assault of the prosecutrix would have been done perforce so as to attract the rigors of s 376, IPC, hence, the conviction of the accused under s 376, IPC was set aside.[20]

There was evidence that the prosecutrix had left her home voluntarily, of her own free will to marry the appellant. She was 19 years of age at the relevant time and was, hence, capable of understanding the complications and issues surrounding her marriage to the appellant. The prosecutrix had called the appellant on a number given to her by him, to ask him why he had not met her at the place that had been pre-decided by them. She also waited for him for a long time, and when he finally arrived, she went with him to the lake where they indulged in sexual intercourse. She did not raise any objection at this stage and made no complaints to any one. Thereafter, she also went to Kurukshetra with the appellant, where she lived with his relatives. Here too, the prosecutrix voluntarily became intimate with the appellant. She then, for some reason, went to live in the hostel at Kurukshetra University illegally, and once again came into contact with the appellant at the Birla Mandir. Thereafter, she even proceeded with the appellant to the old bus-stand in Kurukshetra, to leave for Ambala so that the two of them could get married in Court at Ambala. However, here they were apprehended by the police. Held, the allegation of 'promise of marriage' made by the prosecutrix was baseless, and no charge of deceit/rape was made out against the accused appellant. The accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC .[21]

Where the complainant filed FIR with the allegation that the accused had promised to marry her and developed physical relationship with her, such that her consent for rape was obtained on promise of marriage; but the complainant was already married, and there was no evidence of commission of rape by the accused on the prosecutrix, the FIR and charge sheet were quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[22]

Since the definition of the offence of cheating indicates that even when no parting of property is occasioned by deception, the deception may still amount to cheating if, as a result of the deception, a woman does anything or omits to do anything, which she would not have, but for such deception, done or omitted to do, it logically follows that when an accused, not intending to marry a woman, induces the woman, so deceived, to have sexual intercourse by him with her, the act of the accused of having sexual intercourse with such a woman would amount to offence of cheating if the act of the woman in letting such a man have sexual intercourse with her or the act of the woman in omitting to resist the act of sexual intercourse by such a man with her causes or is likely to cause damage or harm to the person of such a woman, her mind or reputation.[23] For further commentary, the heading 'Prosecutrix consenting to sexual intercourse on false promise of marriage' post, may be referred to.3133

If a woman, believing in the promise of marriage made by a man, consents to the promisor having sexual intercourse with her, the promisor would be liable for the offence of rape if the Court finds, on examination of the materials on record, that the promise of marriage made by the promisor was really a hoax to obtain consent of the woman, for, such a consent given by the woman would not, in the light of the provisions of s 90, IPC, amount to consent in law and the sexual intercourse by such a promisor with a woman, so induced, would constitute a offence of rape.[24]

Where the victim was aged more than 16 years and the accused was a middle aged person who had two wives and many children living under the same roof, and the victim maintained silence regarding her sexual relations with the accused and became pregnant thereafter, the act was found a consensual act, and the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC .[25]

23. Rape Committed by a Person in Authority

When a crime like rape is committed by a person in authority, e.g. a police officer, the court's approach should not be the same as in any other case involving a private citizen. By our criminal laws, wide powers are conferred on police officers investigating cognizable offences. The infrastructure of our criminal investigation system recognises and indeed protects the right of a woman to decent and dignified treatment at the hands of the investigating agency. It was also observed that a person in authority, such as a police officer, carries with it the awe of the office which is bound to condition the behaviour of his victim. The court must not be oblivious to the emotional turmoil and psychological injury that a prosecutrix suffers on being molested or raped. She suffers from a sense of shame and the fear of being shunned by society and her near relatives, including her husband. Instead of treating her with compassion and understanding, more often than not, one who is an injured victim of a crime, is shunned. It must, therefore, be realised that a woman who is subjected to violence would always be slow in disclosing her plight. The court should, therefore, evaluate her evidence in this background.[26]

The rape committed by a person in authority, e.g. a police officer, is considered a severe offence, and by virtue of sub-cll (a) to (d) of s 376(2), a higher punishment is prescribed for this offence in comparison to the ordinary rape committed under sub-s (1) of s 376 .

24. Rape by School Employee on Student

The accused was an employee of the school and was alleged to have committed rape on a school student. The statement of the prosecutrix and her father was found worth placing reliance on, and a delay of a few days in filing the FIR was found inconsequential. The accused had not pleaded false implication and was convicted under s 376, IPC .[27]

25. Accused Teacher

Where the accused, a teacher, committed rape on his student aged more than 18 years of age, and the student and teacher fell in love with each other, the same would not3134 mean that the teacher had taken undue advantage of his official position. There must be an inducement or seduction by a public servant so far as the woman in his custody is concerned. Even if the accused teacher is held to be a public servant, he could not be convicted under s 376(2)(b), as the prosecutrix was found to be more than 18 years of age and a consenting party, further, the offence was committed outside the school. Hence, the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 376B, IPC .[28]

26. Section 376(2)(h) [old clause (e)] -- Accused should have Knowledge and not Possibility of Knowledge of Pregnancy of Prosecutrix

The language of s 376(2)(e) is clear. It requires prosecution to establish that the accused knew her to be pregnant. This is clear from the use of the expression 'knowing her to be pregnant'. This is conceptually different that there is a possibility of his knowledge or that probably he knew it. Positive evidence has to be adduced by the prosecution about the knowledge.[29] There is a gulf of difference between possibility and certainty. While considering the case covered by s 376(2)(e), what is needed to be seen is whether evidence establishes knowledge of the accused. Mere possibility of knowledge is not sufficient.[30] In the absence of any material brought on record to show that the accused knew the victim to be pregnant, s 376(2)(e), IPC cannot be pressed into service.[31]

27. Section 376(2)(i) [old clause (f)] -- Commits Rape on a Woman when she is under Sixteen Years [Twelve Years under old clause] of Age

Child rape cases are cases of perverse lust for sex where even innocent children are not spared. It is a crime against humanity. Many such cases are not even brought to light because of social stigma attached thereto. According to some surveys, there has been a steep rise in child rape cases. Children need special care and protection. In such cases, responsibility on the shoulders of the courts is more onerous so as to provide proper legal protection to these children. Their physical and mental immobility call for such protection. Children are the country's future. However, in our country, a girl child is in a very vulnerable position and one of the modes of her exploitation is rape, besides sexual abuse. These factors point towards a different approach required to be adopted.[32]

Where the evidence on record clearly established that the victim was less than 16 years of age, the conviction for offences punishable under s 376, IPC was held proper.[33]

Where an accused commits rape on a minor girl aged 6 years, the accused would be convicted under s 376(2)(i), IPC .[34]

The rape of a woman when she is under twelve years of age was considered more severe than ordinary rape under sub-s (1) of s 376, so it was included in sub-s (2) of3135 s 376 vide cl (f) to fall amongst severe cases of rape falling under sub-s (2) of s 376 for which a higher sentence than the one in sub-s (1) of s 376, IPC, is provided.

Prosecutrix was above 16 Years of Age - Accused Acquitted

The accused had sex with the prosecutrix, aged more than 16 years, on several occasions and the prosecutrix was a consenting party, thus, the accused was given the benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC . [35]

28. Section 376(2)(g) [36] [old clause]--Gang Rape--Ingredients

To bring the offence of rape within the purview of s 376(2)(g), IPC, read with expln 1 to this section, it is necessary for the prosecution to prove:

(i) that more than one person had acted in concert with the common intention to commit rape on the victim;
(ii) that more than one accused had acted in concert in commission of crime of rape with pre-arranged plan, prior meeting of minds and with element of participation in action. Common intention would be action in consort in pre-arranged plan or a plan formed suddenly at the time of commission of offence which is reflected by element of participation in action or by the proof of the fact of inaction when the action would be necessary. The prosecution would be required to prove pre-meeting of minds of accused persons prior to commission of offence of rape by substantial evidence or by circumstantial evidence; and
(iii) that in furtherance of such common intention one or more persons of the group actually committed offence of rape on victim or victims. Prosecution is not required to prove actual commission of rape by each and every accused forming the group.[37]

In order to establish an offence under s 376(2)(g), IPC, read with expln 1 thereto, the prosecution must adduce evidence to indicate that more than one accused had acted in concert and in such an event, if rape had been committed by even one, all the accused would be guilty irrespective of the fact that she had been raped by one or more of them and it is not necessary for the prosecution to adduce evidence of a completed act of rape by each one of the accused. In other words, this provision embodies a principle of joint liability and the essence of that liability is the existence of common intention; that common intention pre-supposes prior concert which may be determined from the conduct of offenders revealed during the course of action and it could arise and be formed suddenly, but, there must be meeting of minds. It is not enough to have the same intention independently of each of the offender. In such cases, there must be criminal sharing marking out a certain measure of jointness in the commission of offence.[38]3136

Explanation I of old Section 376(2) --Gang Rape with Common Intention

The explanation only indicates that when one or more persons act in furtherance of their common intention to rape a woman, each person of the group shall be deemed to have committed gang rape. By operation of the deeming provision, a person who has not actually committed rape is deemed to have committed rape even if only one of the group in furtherance of the common intention has committed rape. 'Common intention' is dealt with in s 34, IPC and provides that when a criminal act is done by several persons in furtherance of the common intention of all, each of such persons is liable for that act in the same manner as if it was done by him alone. 'Common intention' denotes action in concert and necessarily postulates a pre-arranged plan, a prior meeting of minds and an element of participation in action. The acts may be different and vary in character, but must be actuated by the same common intention, which is different from same intention or similar intention. The sine qua non for bringing in application of s 34, IPC is that the act must be done in furtherance of the common intention to do a criminal act.[39] When a woman is raped by one or more several persons in furtherance of their common intention, each one of those persons shall be deemed to have committed gang rape under s 376(2)(g), IPC . The principle underlying the expln I to s 376 is the vicarious liability on account of common intention of the accused persons as defined under s 34, IPC .

Once it is established that the accused persons had acted in concert and entered the house of the victim, and thereafter raped her, then all of them would be guilty under s 376(2)(g), IPC in terms of expln I, irrespective of the fact that the victim had been raped by one or more of them.[40]

Explanation I--A Woman Cannot Be Prosecuted For Gang Rape

A bare reading of s 375 makes the position clear that rape can be committed only by a man. The section itself provides as to when a man can be said to have committed rape. Section 376(2) makes certain categories of serious cases of rape, as enumerated therein, attract more severe punishment. One of them relates to 'gang rape'. The language of sub-s (2)(g) provides that whoever commits 'gang rape' shall be punished etc. The explanation only clarifies that when a woman is raped by one or more in a group of persons acting in furtherance of their common intention, each such person shall be deemed to have committed gang rape within this sub-s (2). That cannot make a woman guilty of committing rape. This is conceptually inconceivable.[41] The expression 'in furtherance of their common intention' as appearing in the explanation to s 376(2) relates to intention to commit rape. A woman cannot be said to have an intention to commit rape. Therefore, a woman cannot be prosecuted for alleged commission of the offence punishable under s 376(2)(g), IPC .[42]

29. Presumption of absence of Consent-- Section 114A of Evidence Act

Commentary under the same heading in s 375, ante, may be referred to.3137

When sexual intercourse by the accused with the prosecutrix is proved to have taken place and the prosecutrix, in such a case, claims in her evidence before the Court that she had not consented to the sexual act, the Court shall draw a presumption under s 114A, Evidence Act 1872 that she had not consented to the sexual act and the burden would then shift to the accused to prove that his sexual act with the prosecutrix was with her consent.[43]

30. Procedure

The procedure for the trial of an offence of rape varies as the accused is, or is not, the husband of the woman raped. If the accused is the husband, the offence is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of sessions. If the accused is not the husband, the offence is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and triable by a court of sessions.

As the offence under s 376, IPC is not compoundable, rejection of a prayer for recalling the prosecutrix for further cross-examination on the ground that the parties have settled the matter outside the Court was held proper.[44]

31. Dismissal of complaint under Section 376 , IPC --Competency of Magistrate

The complaint includes both the cases, whether it is warrant triable case or sessions triable case. Thus, if the magistrate arrived at the conclusion that the complainant in a sessions triable case cannot be believed and it is not proper to summon the accused, the magistrate is empowered to dismiss the complaint. Therefore, to say that the magistrate had no jurisdiction to dismiss the complaint filed by complainant under s 376, IPC is contrary to the provisions of s 203, CrPC .[45]

32. Sessions Court Specified as Special Court Continues to be Sessions Court

The Supreme Court has considered the question whether the sessions court specified as a special court under the provisions of the Act will cease to be a sessions court, or whether he would continue to be the sessions judge videGangula Ashok v State of Andhra Pradesh .[46] The Supreme Court found that even after such specification the sessions court would continue to be the sessions court and a trial before that court can be held only in accordance with the provisions contained in ch XVII of the Code of Criminal Procedure . The following is the dictum laid down by this court:

> It is clear from sections 14 and 2 (1) (d) of the Act that it is for trial of the offences under the Act that a particular court of sessions in each district is sought to be specified as a special court. Though the word 'trial' is not defined either in the Code or in the Act it is clearly distinguishable from inquiry. Inquiry must always be a forerunner to the trial.3138

Thus, the court of sessions is specified to conduct a trial and no other court can conduct the trial of offences under the Act. Evidently the legislature wanted the special court to be a court of sessions.

33. Power of Court to Summon Documents in Rape Cases

A bare perusal of s 91, CrPC reveals firstly, that it is not subjected to s 172 and s 173 of the Code. Therefore, the prohibitions contained in ss 172 and 173 of the Code do not crib, cabin and confine the powers of the court under s 91 of the CrPC .[47] The only harmonious interpretation of the two provisions would be that sub-s (6) of s 173 does not curtail the power of the court under s 91 of the Code. In case the court is of the opinion that the prosecution has withheld vital, relevant and admissible evidence from the court, it can legitimately use its power under s 91 of the Code to discover the truth and to do complete justice to the accused.[48] Thus, in a rape case, refusal to summon documents by the trial court, such as photos, love letters between the prosecutrix and the accused, STD bill slips and a ledger book and earlier complaint filed by father of prosecutrix wherein there were no allegations of sexual exploitation was not proper as such documents were necessary for purposes of trial.[49]

34. In Camera Trial and Maintaining Anonymity of the Victim

Section 327 of the CrPC which deals with the right of an accused to an open trial was amended[50] by addition of sub-ss (2) and (3) after renumbering the old section as sub-s (1). Sub-sections (2) and (3) of s 327, CrPC provide in camera trial in cases falling under ss 376, 376A and 376D .

These two sub-sections of s 327, CrPC are in the nature of exceptions to the general rule of an open trial. Inspite of the amendment, however, it is seen that the trial courts either are not conscious of the amendment or do not realise its importance, for hardly does one come across a case where the enquiry and trial of a rape case has been conducted by the court in camera. The expression that the inquiry into and trial of rape 'shall be conducted in camera' as occurring in sub-s (2) of s 327, CrPC is not only significant, but very important. It casts a duty on the court to conduct the trial of rape cases etc. invariably 'in camera'. The courts are obliged to act in furtherance of the intention expressed by the legislature and not to ignore its mandate and must invariably take recourse to the provisions of sub-ss (2) and (3) of s 327, CrPC and hold the trial of rape cases in camera. It would enable the victim of crime to be a little comfortable, and answer the questions with greater ease in not too familiar surroundings. Trial in camera would not only be in keeping with the self respect of the victim of crime, and in line with the legislative intent, but is also likely to improve the quality of evidence of the prosecutrix because she would not be so hesitant or bashful to depose frankly as she may in an open court, under the gaze of the public. The improved quality of her evidence would assist the courts in arriving at the truth and sifting truth from falsehood. The High Courts would therefore be well advised to draw the attention of the trial courts to the amended provisions of s 327, CrPC and impress upon the presiding officers to invariably hold the trial of3139 rape cases in camera, rather than in open court as envisaged by s 327(2), CrPC . When trials are held in camera, it would not be lawful for any person to print or publish any matter in relation to the proceedings in the case, except with the previous permission of the court as envisaged under s 327(3), CrPC . This would save any further embarrassment being caused to the victim of a sex crime. Wherever possible, it may also be worth considering whether it would not be more desirable for cases of sexual assault on females being tried by lady judges, wherever available, so that the prosecutrix can make her statement with greater ease and assist the courts to properly discharge their duties, without allowing the truth to be sacrificed at the altar of rigid technicalities while appreciating evidence in such cases. The courts should as far as possible, avoid disclosing the name of the prosecutrix in their orders to save further embarrassment to the victim of crime. The anonymity of the victim of crime must be maintained as far as possible throughout.[51] There is no doubt that rape cases are to be tried in-camera in the chambers of the sessions judge. But when the trial court has no sufficient accommodation to accommodate the accused, prosecutrix, defence counsel and so also the staff, which are required to assist the trial court in recording the evidence of the prosecution, considering these facts and that the court ought to have allowed the application filed by the petitioner under s 327 of the CrPC, for recording the evidence of the prosecutrix in the court hall, after sending the general public and the advocates, who are unconnected with the case by closing the doors and windows.[52]

35. Name of Rape Victim Should be Avoided in Judgment

Commentary under the same heading in s 228A, vol 2, may be referred to.

36. Absconding Accused--Declaring him Proclaimed Offender--Propriety of

The provisions of s 82 of the new code are mandatory in nature. The trial court passed an order for issuing a standing warrant and directed the SHO concerned for making entry regarding absconding of the petitioner. However, the mandatory requirements of s 82 of the new code had not been complied with. There was nothing on the record of the trial court to show that there was a written proclamation requiring the accused-petitioner to appear at a specified place and at a specified time not less than thirty days from the date of publishing such proclamation. Likewise, there was no mention in the record that the proclamation was published at the conspicuous place of the town or village of the accused-petitioner or some conspicuous part of his house or homestead or a copy of the same was affixed at the conspicuous part of the court-house. There was no publication of the proclamation in a newspaper having circulation in the area where accused-petitioner resides. Again, there was no statement in writing by the court that the proclamation was duly published. Thus, there was complete non-compliance of the mandatory provisions of s 82 of the new code and as such it was held that the impugned order cannot be sustained in the eyes of law.[53]3140

37. Sessions Trial--Examination of Witnesses on Day-to-day Basis

The trial before the court of sessions must proceed and be dealt with continuously from the inception to its finish. It will be in the interest of both the prosecution and the defence that the trial proceeds from day to day. Sessions cases must not be tried piecemeal. Once the trial commences, he must, except for a very pressing reason which makes an adjournment inevitable, proceed de die in diem until the trial is concluded.[54] The Supreme Court in Ambika Prasad v Delhi Administration ,[55] in para 11 has held as under:

> It is also to be pointed out that PW4 Vikram Singh (informant) who had lodged FIR immediately was under constant threat and was compelled not to speak the truth despite the fact that he was the brother the deceased. Other witnesses also turned hostile including PW6 Prem Singh and Pratap Singh and PW8 Rattan Singh, which indicates, as observed by the High Court that the accused party was stronger in terms of money power and muscle power. At > the stage, we would observe that the session judge ought to have followed the mandate of section 309, Cr PC of completing the trial by examining the witnesses from day to day and not giving a chance to the accused threaten or win over the witnesses so they may not support the prosecution. It appears from the record that the examination-in-chief of PW4 Vikram Singh was over on 6-2-1984. The counsel representing Ambika Prasad requested the court that because of his uncle's demise, he would not be in a position to cross-examine the witnesses and therefore, recording of further cross-examination might be adjourned. Thereafter, the witness was cross-examined in the month of July, 1985 in our view, this is highly improper. Even if the request for adjournment of the learned counsel for the accused was accepted, the cross-examination ought not to have been deferred beyond two or three days.

The Supreme Court in State of Uttar Pradesh v Shambhu Nath Singh [56] has held as under:

> We make it abundantly clear that if a witness is present in court he must be examined on that day. The court must know that most of the witnesses could attend the court only at heavy cost to them, after keeping aside their own avocation. Certainly they incur suffering and loss of income. The meagre amount of bhatta (allowance) which a witness may be paid by the court is generally a poor solace for the financial loss incurred by him. It is a sad plight in the trial courts that witnesses who are called through summons or other processes stand at the doorstep from morning till evening only to be told at the end of the day that the case is adjourned to another day. This primitive practice must be reformed by the presiding officers of the trial courts and it can be reformed by everyone provided the presiding officer concerned has a commitment towards duty. No sadistic pleasure, in seeing how other persons summoned by him as witnesses are stranded on account of the dimension of his judicial powers can be a persuading factor for granting such adjournments lavishly, that too in a casual manner.

Thus, the legal position is that once the examination of witnesses starts, the court has to continue the trial from day to day until all witnesses in attendance have been examined (except those whom the party has given up). The court has to record reasons for deviating from the said course. Even that is forbidden when witnesses are present in court, as the requirement then is that the court has to examine them. Only if there are 'special reasons', which would find a place in the order for adjournment,3141 can jurisdiction be conferred on the court to adjourn the case without examination of witnesses who are present in court.

38. Compounding of Offence--Permissibility

Offence under s 376, IPC is a serious and heinous one not only effecting an individual, but the society also. On the face of existence of prima facie case such offence should not be allowed to be compounded by importing s 482, CrPC, simply because that benefits individuals. Such a course if adopted, reduces and may, in certain cases, convert the offence of rape to prostitution in a different manner. If the accused is innocent and victimised by the family members of the prosecutrix then at the stage of trial, accused can have the remedy of bringing appropriate evidence in support of his defence plea regarding his innocence. It is for the trial court to consider at that stage, about the statement of the prosecutrix and on finding that a false FIR was lodged by the prosecutrix, it should follow with appropriate criminal proceeding against the person who lodged the false FIR and the persons who abetted the same.[57]

39. Place of Trial

According to s 177, CrPC, every offence shall ordinarily be inquired into, and tried by a court within whose local jurisdiction it was committed, whereas, according to s 180, CrPC, when an act is an offence by reason of its relation to any other act, which is also an offence, or which would be an offence, if the doer were capable of committing an offence, the first mentioned offence may be inquired into, or tried by a court within whose local jurisdiction either act was done. Similarly, the offences of kidnapping and rape can be tried at either of the two places if they are closely related to one another.[58]

An offence of rape by a person in active defence service is also triable by a court martial according to s 70, Army Act 1950, if the designated officer has exercised his discretion under s 125 of the said Act, but if the said officer has not exercised such discretion, the regular criminal court would be competent to try the accused.[59]

40. Anticipatory Bail

The remedy of anticipatory bail is an extraordinary remedy provided in law, and has to be resorted to only in exceptional cases and that too, if special grounds are made out. In a case where it is not prima facie made out that attempt is being made to falsely involve the accused in a case with a view to disgrace him or malign him with some ulterior or mala fide motive, anticipatory bail cannot be granted. Similarly, where a serious and heinous offence is prima facie shown to have been committed, anticipatory bail should not be granted.[60]

When the allegations against the accused-petitioners prima facie show their involvement in the commission of a serious and heinous offence, and thereby having satisfied their lust after administering something to the prosecutrix, whereby she3142 became unconscious and it was in that state of unconsciousness that she was subjected to sexual intercourse. The investigation in the case is yet in progress. Therefore, on the face of it, it is not a case where anticipatory bail should be granted to the accused for committing the alleged offences under ss 376 / 328 / 34, IPC .[61]

The accused, a student aged 19 years, was alleged to have raped a deaf and dumb woman successively with others. The victim was the wife of a poor rickshawwalla, the prosecution case prima facie appeared true so the application for anticipatory bail of the accused was rejected.[62] However, when there was delay in lodging the FIR and medical evidence did not support the prosecution story, and the victim was left all alone at the scene of occurrence by her relatives who saw the accused running from the spot, the accused alleged that the case was concocted on account of money dealings, thus, anticipatory bail was granted to the accused.[63]

41. Bail

Where the sessions court while granting bail to the accused imposed the condition that the accused shall pay Rs 700 per month as compensation to the prosecutrix till disposal of the case, the sessions court relied upon decision of the Supreme Court.[64] Wherein by using plenary power under art 142 of the Constitution, the Apex Court indicated broad parameters in assisting the victims of rape, the condition of interim maintenance imposed by the sessions court was set aside by the High Court observing that the order of the Supreme Court under art 142 cannot be relied upon as a precedent, unless the Apex Court so directs.[65]

42. Charge

In case falling under s 376(1), the following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of sessions judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the day of..... at... committed rape on AB (name the woman raped), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 376(1) of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

For offence falling under sub-s (2)(a) of s 376, following charge may be adopted:

> That you being a police officer, on or about the day of .....at.....within the premises of any police station (or within the limits of police station in which you are appointed) committed rape on AB (name of the woman raped) or on a woman in your custody or in the custody of the police officer subordinate to you and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 376 (2) (a) IPC and within cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

For offence of following under sub-ss 2(b), (d) and (e) of s 376, the following form of charge may be adopted:3143

> That you being a public servant (or being on the management of or on the staff of the jail etc for sub-s 2(c) or being on the management or staff of a hospital for sub-s 2 (d).
> That you, on or about the day of ..... at..... taking advantage of your official position committed rape on AB (name of the woman raped), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 376 (2) (and clause (b), (c) or (d) of sub- section 2 whichever is applicable IPC and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

A charge is not invalid merely because it does not specify the particular date and time at which an offence is alleged to have been committed,[66] if no prejudice has been caused to the accused.[67] Where different accused raped different girls, but the charge did not make it clear that two of the accused ravished one girl and the two others ravished another, it was held that there was a possibility of prejudice, but if the circumstances showed that the accused had in fact, not been prejudiced, it could not be contended that the accused had been prejudiced in their defence.[68]

In a case, a charge under s 302, IPC was framed, but no charge under s 376, IPC was framed against the accused, and there was also not an iota of evidence that the accused committed rape on the victim girl before the commission of murder, thus, the accused was acquitted of the charge for offence under s 376,

Where the medical report in the case revealed the age of the prosecutrix as 14 years and reported recent penetration of vagina, the order of the trial Court discharging the accused for offence under s 376, IPC was set aside.[70]

43. Accused Charged with Murder Cannot be Convicted for Rape

Where the accused was charged for the offence of murder but no charge was framed under s 376, nor was there any evidence to show that the accused had committed rape on the victim before committing the murder, the finding of the trial court that the accused was guilty of rape was held to be not sustainable.[71]

44. Confession

A confession statement, as is well known, is admissible in evidence. It is a relevant fact. The court may rely thereupon if it is voluntarily given. It may also form the basis of the conviction, wherefor the court may only have to satisfy itself in regard to voluntariness and truthfulness thereof and in given cases, some corroboration thereof. A confession which is not retracted even at a later stage of the trial and even accepted by the accused in his examination under s 313 of the Code, can be fully relied upon.[72] Where two confessions were recorded one after the other in quick succession, and the first confession was recorded in just 15 minutes, and no legal aid was provided to the accused, the confessional statement of the accused was inconsistent with the3144 prosecution case. There was no other material to establish the guilt of the accused. Under the circumstances, the conviction could not be based on confession.[73]

45. Accused in Statement under Section 313 of CrPC Admitting Rape

Where the accused under s 313 of CrPC has admitted that he had sex with the victim and also admitted that though he had sex with victim he did not penetrate his male organ in full as she got up, from the narration of the evidence on record, more particularly evidence of victim as well as the statement of the accused recorded under s 313 of CrPC, it is proved beyond all reasonable doubt that the accused has raped the victim and there was penetration of the male organ in the vagina of the victim notwithstanding the fact that no injury was found in the male organ of the accused.[74] Though a statement, recorded under s 313, CrPC, is not a statement made on oath and is not, strictly speaking, evidence, yet the statement, so made, can, indeed, be taken into consideration at the trial stage against the accused for the purpose of arriving at the guilt or otherwise of the accused. If an accused person, in his examination under s 313, CrPC confesses to the commission of the offence(s) charged with, the court may, relying upon such confession, proceed to convict the accused and that it is only if the accused does not confess and/or chooses to explain the circumstances appearing in the evidence against him or sets up his own version of the occurrence claiming to the effect that he had committed no offence, the statement of the accused, made during the course of examination under s 313, CrPC can be considered in its entirety along with other pieces of evidence on record. To put it differently, there is no impediment in law for a court to find conviction of an accused on his confession made by him during his examination under s 313, CrPC .[75]

When the accused appeared in a *panchayat*meeting before the elders after the incident, and admitted his guilt in writing, which was recorded, the accused was a resident of the village, a youngster and in the absence of legal advice he would normally have told the truth in the presence of his parents and elders, in any event, wherein an admission in writing has been recorded, the onus of disproving it shifts upon the defence and on the failure of the defence to dispose it, the court can act upon such admission of guilt.[76]

46. Settled Principles of Administration of Criminal Justice

There are certain well-settled principles of administration of criminal justice. These are:

(i) an accused person is presumed to be innocent unless proved guilty;
(ii) the charge against the accused is to be proved by the prosecution and it has to stand on its own legs to prove such charge; and
(iii) the accused may take more than one line of defence in a charge against him and the prosecution cannot take advantage of the weakness of the defence. Therefore, even if it is assumed that the accused has not been able to prove the plea(s) in defence, it cannot be taken as a circumstance lending corroboration to the prosecution case.[77]

47. Criminal Trial--Duty of Court

A criminal trial concerns itself with the question as to whether the accused at the trial is guilty of the crime with which he is charged. Crime is an event in real life and is the product of interplay of different human emotions. In arriving at the conclusion about the guilt of the accused charged with the commission of a crime, the court has to judge the evidence by the yardstick of probabilities, its intrinsic worth and the animus of witnesses.[78]

The legal trial is conducted to ascertain the guilt or innocence of the accused arraigned. In arriving at a conclusion about the truth, the courts are required to adopt a rational approach and judge the evidence by its intrinsic worth and the animus of the witnesses. The hyper technicalities of figment of imagination should not be allowed to divest the court of its responsibility of sifting and weighing the evidence to arrive at the conclusion regarding the existence or otherwise of the particular circumstances keeping in view the peculiar facts of each case, the social position of the victim and the accused, the larger interests of the society particularly the law and order problem and degrading values of life inherent in the prevalent system. The realities of life have to be kept in mind while appreciating the evidence for arriving at the truth. The courts are not obliged to make efforts either to give latitude to the prosecution or loosely construe the law in favour of the accused. The traditional dogmatic hypertechnical approach has to be replaced by rational, realistic and genuine approach for administering justice in a criminal trial. Criminal jurisprudence cannot be considered to be utopian, but has to be considered as part and parcel of the human civilisation and the realities of life. The courts cannot ignore the erosion in values of life which are common features of the present system. Such erosions cannot be given a bonus in favour of those who are guilty of polluting society and mankind.[79]

48. Burden of Proof

In a case of rape, the onus is always on the prosecution to prove affirmatively each ingredient of the offence it seeks to establish and such onus never shifts. It is no part of the duty of the defence to explain as to how and why in a rape case the victim and her mother have falsely implicated the accused. The evidence of prosecution witnesses cannot be accepted merely because an accused person has not been able to say as to why they have come forward to depose against him. However great the suspicion against the accused and however strong the moral belief and conviction of the judge, unless the offence of the accused is established beyond reasonable doubt or beyond the possibility of reasonable doubt on the basis of legal evidence and material on the record, he cannot be convicted for an offence. There is an initial presumption of innocence of the accused and the prosecution has to bring the offence home to the accused by reliable evidence. The accused is entitled to the benefit of every reasonable doubt.[80]

49. Proof

To establish the offence of rape, it must be proved that: [81]3146

(1) the accused man had sexual intercourse with the woman in question;
(2) the said sexual intercourse was under circumstances falling under any of the five descriptions specified in s 375 ;[82]

(3) the woman was not the wife of the accused (or if she was his wife, she was under fifteen years of age); and
(4) there was penetration.

It is for the prosecution to prove each of the above elements. Where there are circumstances to show consent of the woman to sexual intercourse with the accused, the burden is on the prosecution to establish non-consent.[83] Penetration being an essential ingredient of the offence of rape, there must be proof of actual penetration.[84] The word 'penetration' is not, however, necessarily to be used.[85] The only witness, who can prove that, is the prosecutrix.[86] In practice, a conviction for rape depends almost entirely on the evidence of the prosecutrix so far as the essential ingredients of the offence are concerned, the other evidence being only corroborative.[87] Such evidence, i.e., the evidence of the prosecutrix, must necessarily be received with caution. The fact that there has been sexual connection would be proved by medical examination and evidence, if possible. Then it must be proved that such connection was against the woman's will or without her consent. In regard to this point, the character of the woman, her degree of intimacy with the accused, the place where the act took place, and her conduct and appearance after the act are all important circumstances.

EVIDENCE

50. Enmity between Accused and Family Members of Prosecutrix-- Effect

To suggest that because of enmity of the father of the prosecutrix against the accused, the accused had been falsely implicated, is an absurdity.[88] The prosecutrix and her parents would not allow the real culprit to escape and falsely involve an innocent person in the commission of the crime.[89] Despite the fact that litigation between the accused party and the complainant party was going on, it cannot be stated that because of the litigation or enmity, the father of the prosecutrix will involve his daughter to falsely implicate the accused.[90] The fact that some litigation was pending between the accused father and the maternal uncle of the prosecutrix, is no ground to presume that the false case was instituted on the accused by the mother of the prosecutrix.[91] The plea that the accused was falsely implicated as there was enmity3147 between him and the husband of the prosecutrix regarding land dispute is not tenable in the absence of sufficient evidence to prove the same.[92] When the relationship of the mother of the prosecutrix and the accused was not cordial, it is absurd to suggest that because of this enmity the mother of the child-prosecutrix will falsely involve her daughter in a case of rape by the accused.[93] The entire family would, for no reason, combine to demolish their social reputation and shatter the future marriage prospects of their child to rope the accused in a crime under s 376, so the defence plea of false implication due to pre-existing animosity is absolutely unacceptable.[94]

51. Facts and Circumstances

The facts and circumstances often vary from case to case, the crime situation and the myriad psychic factors, social conditions and people's lifestyles may fluctuate, and so, rules of prudence relevant in one factual situation may be inept in another. We cannot accept the argument that regardless of the specific circumstances of a crime and criminal milieu, some strands of probative reasoning which appealed to a Bench in one reported decision must mechanically be extended to other cases. Corroboration as a condition for judicial reliance on the testimony of a prosecutrix is not a matter of law, but a guideline of prudence under given circumstances. Indeed, from place to place, from age to age, varying life styles and behavioural complexes, inferences from a given set of facts, oral and circumstantial, may have to be drawn not with dead uniformity but realistic diversity lest rigidity in the shape of rule of law in this area be introduced through a new type of presidential tyranny. The same observation holds good regarding the presence or absence of injuries on the person of the aggressor or the aggressed.[95]

52. Circumstantial Evidence

In the cases of circumstantial evidence, for the conviction of the accused, it is essential that the incriminating facts and circumstances must be incompatible with the innocence of the accused or guilt of any other person. Circumstances from which an inference as to the guilt of the accused is drawn have to be proved beyond reasonable doubt and have to be shown to be closely connected with the principal fact sought to be inferred from those circumstances.[96] In a rape on minor girl based on circumstantial evidence, because of the number of missing links in the prosecution case, the accused was held to be entitled to the benefit of doubt.[97]

53. Non-examination of Material Witness--Effect

Non-examination of a material witness is not a mathematical formula for discarding the weight of testimony available on record, however natural, trustworthy and convincing it may be. The charge of withholding a material witness from the court, leveled against the prosecution, should be examined in the background of facts and circumstances of each case so as to find whether the witnesses were available for3148 being examined in court and were yet withheld by the prosecution. The court has first to assess the trustworthiness of the evidence adduced and available on record. If the court finds the evidence adduced worthy of being relied on, then the testimony has to be accepted and acted on, though there may be other witnesses available who could also have been examined, but were not examined. However, if the available evidence suffers from some infirmity or cannot be accepted in the absence of other evidence, which though available has been withheld from the court, then the question of drawing an adverse inference against the prosecution for non-examination of such witnesses may arise. It is now well settled that conviction for an offence of rape can be based on the sole testimony of the prosecutrix corroborated by medical evidence and other circumstances such as the report of chemical examination, etc., if the same is found to be natural, trustworthy and worth being relied on.[1]

When the accused is a relation of the in-laws of the mother of the prosecutrix, and the other young girls who are alleged to have been not examined, being from the family of such in-laws, it is futile to expect that such girls would have been allowed by their parents to be examined as witnesses, and if allowed, could have freely deposed in court. The question of drawing an adverse inference against the prosecution for such non-examination does not arise.[2]

When the testimony of the prosecutrix inspires confidence and is also corroborated by medical evidence and other witnesses, non-examination of the mother of the prosecutrix does not make the prosecution case doubtful.[3]

54. Discrepancies and Contradictions in the Statement of Witnesses

Discrepancy has to be distinguished from contradiction. Whereas contradiction in the statement of the witness is fatal to the case, minor discrepancy or variance in evidence will not make the prosecution's case doubtful. The normal course of human conduct would be that while narrating a particular incidence there may occur minor discrepancies, and such discrepancies, in law, may render credence to the depositions. Parrot like statements are disfavoured by the courts. In order to ascertain as to whether the discrepancy pointed out was minor or the same amounted to contradiction, regard is required to be had to the circumstances of the case by keeping in view the social status of the witnesses and environment in which such witness are making the statement.[4] The Supreme Court in Ousu Varghese v State of Kerala [5] held that minor variations in the accounts of witnesses are often the hallmark of truth in their testimony. In Jagdish v State of Madhya Pradesh [6] the Supreme Court held that when discrepancies were comparatively of a minor character and did not go to the root of the prosecution story, they need not be given undue importance. Mere congruity or consistency is not the sole test of truth in the depositions. The Supreme Court again in State of Rajasthan v Kalk [7] held that in the depositions of witnesses there are always normal discrepancies, however honest and truthful they may be, such discrepancies are due to normal errors of observation, normal errors of memory3149 due to lapse of time, due to mental disposition of shock and horror at the time of occurrence, and the like. Material discrepancies are those which are not normal, and not expected of a normal person. Referring to and relying upon its earlier judgments,[8] the Supreme Court in Leela Ram v State of Haryana [9] held that there are bound to be some discrepancies between the narrations of different witnesses when they speak on details and unless the contradictions are of a material dimension, the same should not be used to jettison the evidence in its entirety. Incidentally, corroboration of evidence with mathematical niceties cannot be expected in criminal cases. Minor embellishments, there may be, but variations by reason therefore should not render the evidence of eyewitnesses unbelievable, trivial discrepancies ought not to obliterate which otherwise is acceptable evidence.

The court shall have to bear in mind that different witnesses react differently under different situations. Whereas, some become speechless, some start wailing, while some others run away from the scene and yet there are some who may come forward with courage, conviction and belief that the wrong should be remedied. As a matter of fact, it depends upon individual to individual. There cannot be any set pattern or uniform rule of human reaction, and to discard a piece of evidence on the ground of his reaction not falling within a set pattern is unproductive and a pedantic exercise.

55. Suggestions to Witness--No Inference Against Accused

Where in a case of charge of rape under s 376, IPC, the statement of the accused contained a plain denial and a plea of false implication, the subsequent suggestion by the defence lawyer to the prosecutrix about consent on her part would not amount to admission of guilt on behalf of the accused. A mere suggestion thrown by the defence counsel to a prosecution witness does not amount to an admission on the part of the accused. It is common practice to suggest to a witness while he or she is under cross-examination the case of the defence when such evidence or suggestion is denied. It does not constitute any evidence. Suggestions put are no evidence at all against the accused and on the basis of such suggestion, no inference can be drawn against the accused that he admitted the fact suggested in the cross-examination. The proof of guilt required of the prosecution does not depend on the suggestion thrown to a witness.[10]

56. Additional Evidence at Appellate Stage--Affidavit of Prosecutrix not Permissible

It is clear from the provisions of s 391, CrPC that discretion is given to the appellate court to take further evidence by itself or direct the sessions court or magistrate to take additional evidence in appropriate cases by recording reasons for taking additional evidence. The discretion vested in the appellate court under s 391, CrPC, to take additional evidence is not intended to fill up the lacuna in the prosecution evidence or to make out a case different from the one already on record.[11] When no additional evidence is sought to be adduced by the appellant/accused but by3150 tendering the affidavit of the victim and prosecutrix in the case, the appellant is seeking to erase the entire prosecution evidence regarding rape in the guise of further evidence at the appellate stage by cutting at the very root of the prosecution case, such affidavits sworn by the prosecution witness cannot be accepted as additional evidence under s 391, CrPC . Tendering of such affidavit by the prosecution witness who has given specific evidence before the trial court making contradictory statement against the evidence given by them before the trial court is not contemplated or envisaged under the provisions of s 391, CrPC .[12]

AGE OF PROSECUTRIX AND ACCUSED

57. Age of the Prosecutrix

No age is safe from rape because small babies and even elderly women are not safe.[13] If, in a case of rape, the defence pleads consent, the question arises whether the prosecutrix was of the prescribed age as to give consent in law.[14] In such a case, the prosecution is bound to prove that the victim was below the prescribed age so that her consent to have sexual intercourse with the accused, was no consent in law.[15] Where the prosecution produces no evidence that the girl was examined for the ossification test, or was taken for X-ray examination in spite of the suggestion in the doctor's certificate, and does not also explain this serious omission, the benefit of doubt on the question of age must go to the accused.[16] In case of contradiction between medical evidence and statement of parents of the prosecutrix regarding her age, benefit of doubt should go to the accused.[17] The court has to base its conclusion upon all the facts and circumstances disclosed on examining all the physical features of the person, whose age is in question, in conjunction with such oral testimony as may be available.[18] In a case, the parents of the prosecutrix deposed before the Court that the prosecutrix was below the age of 16 years on the date of commission of rape, their evidence was corroborated by the entry in the birth register of the Municipal Corporation and entry made in the hospital where the prosecutrix was born. Further, the entry in the school certificate which recorded age about 16 years was ignored as the parents admitted to having given an incorrect date of birth of their daughter, presumably with a view to make up the age to secure admission in the school. The prosecutrix was held to be below 16 years of age on the date of the commission of offence and consequently, the consent of the prosecutrix was found immaterial, hence, the conviction of the accused for offence under s 376, IPC was held proper.[19]

For further commentary, s 361, ante, may be referred to.3151

58. Medical Evidence as to age of Prosecutrix

For determining the age of the prosecutrix, the results of an ossification test are also helpful. It cannot, however, be laid down as a rule of law that, in all cases, this test must be performed,[20] as this test leaves much room for speculation and does not give a sure indication as to the age of a girl, when it is in the border region.[21] The radiological test margin of error in age ascertained by radiological examination is two years on either side.[22] Modi in his Medical Jurisprudence stated as follows:

> ....In ascertaining the age of young persons radiograms of any of the main joints of the upper or the lower extremity of both sides of the body should be taken, and an opinion should be given according to the following table, but it must be remembered that too much reliance would not be placed on this table as it merely indicates an average and is likely to vary in individual cases even of the same province owing to the eccentricities of the development. Recent work has shown that the range of error may be up to 3 years. [23]

When the doctor in his evidence has given the age of the prosecutrix which is contrary to the opinion of Modi as stated in Medical Jurisprudence, the benefit of the doubt should go to the accused.[24]

The evidence of the doctor based on ossification test about the age of the rape victim is of advisory character. If the statements of facts are pitted against the so-called expert opinion of the doctor with regard to the determination of age based on an ossification test scientifically conducted, the evidence of facts of the former will prevail over the expert opinion which is based on the ossification test for determination of age, if the age varies.[25]

It cannot, therefore, be taken as a matter of rule that an expert (medical) evidence must always be preferred to the evidence of other witnesses of fact if that evidence is otherwise found to be unimpeachable, particularly where the trial court, which has the opportunity of seeing the witnesses of fact, including that of the victim, prefers their evidence to that of the doctor, and the doctor's evidence does not entirely falsify the story of the prosecution.[26] The opinion of the doctor based upon the ossification test cannot repeal the age of the prosecutrix given in the school admission certificate and consistent oral evidence.[27] Courts have, however, in several cases, acted on the opinion of doctors, arrived at without conducting an ossification test and based on other factors such as growth of the hair, teeth, pubic and axillaries hairs, breasts, height, and weight of the girl.[28]

The ascertaining of age based on the growth of pubic hair can be scientifically arrived. On the basis of secondary sex characters and eruption of teeth, the prosecutrix was found aged 14 years on the date of occurrence, even though the3152 accused indulged in sexual intercourse with the consent of the victim girl, the consent of the victim was immaterial and the accused was convicted under s 376, IPC .[29]

Twenty Eight Teeth in Jaws of Prosecutrix

Where the doctor deposed that the prosecutrix was having only 28 teeth in each jaw, it was held that the prosecutrix was aged 14 years and therefore, the consent of the prosecutrix is immaterial.[30]

If the statement of facts are pitted against the so-called expert opinion of the doctor with regard to the determination of age based on ossification test scientifically conducted, the evidence of facts of the former will prevail over the expert opinion based on the ossification test for determination of age, as the age varies.[31]

The medical report and the deposition of the Radiologist cannot predict the exact date of birth, rather it gives an idea with a long margin of 1 to 2 years on either side.[32]

In Jaya Mala v Home Secretary, Governmnt of J&K ,[33] the Supreme Court held:

> However, it is notorious and one can take judicial notice that the margin of error in age ascertained by radiological examination is two years on either side.[34]

59. Birth Certificate Etc., as to age of Prosecutrix

Normally, the age recorded in the school certificate is considered to be the correct determination of age, provided the parents furnish the correct age of the ward at the time of admission and it is authenticated.[35] However, the date of birth recorded in the school certificate can be believed by the unimpeachable evidence of prosecution witnesses and contemporaneous documents like Date of Birth Register of Greater Bombay Municipal Corporation and the register of the nursing home where the prosecutrix was born and can be proved by the doctor.[36] The birth certificate, on the point of age, is a conclusive piece of evidence.[37] In the ascertainment of age, the entry in the kotwari book, which is genuine, can be considered a strong piece of evidence.[38] It may be true that an entry in the school register is not conclusive, but it has evidentiary value. Such evidentiary value of a school register is corroborated by oral evidence.[39] The admission form on the basis of which school certificate was prepared is primary evidence when the primary3153 evidence has not been produced in the court. The school certificate, which is prepared on the basis of some other document, has no evidentiary value in the eyes of law and thus, the prosecution cannot take any advantage of this document which is inadmissible in evidence. There is nothing on record so as to indicate that the primary evidence was lost and if that be the position, secondary evidence is not permissible.[40] The register maintained in a school is admissible evidence to prove the date of birth of the person concerned in terms of s 35 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872. It may be true that the entry of the school register is not conclusive but it has evidentiary value.[41]

The transferor School leaving certificate issued and duly signed by the Headmaster of the school is admissible in evidence in view of the provisions of s 35 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872.[42] The entries in school register by the Head Master of the School and certificate of birth issued by Municipality showed that the prosecutrix was aged about 14 years and was not a major on the date of the incident. Both these documents were ante litem motam and such documents made ante litem can be relied upon safely, when such documents are admissible under s 35, of the Indian Evidence Act 1872.[43]

The birth registration certificate issued by the municipal corporation is the primary evidence where an employee of the municipal corporation deposes that concerned birth entry has been made on the basis of information received by the corporation from the concerned hospital, it means that it is a basic information which has been received by the corporation through a proper channel and, therefore, it cannot be said to be an insufficient proof to prove the age of the victim. When a child is admitted in a school, parents of the child usually submit a form on the basis of cogent evidence on record which will be either the certificate from the hospital where the child is born or the birth registration certificate. When the original evidence which has been produced by the official of the corporation and proved by him, is there on record, there is no reason to discard the said evidence. But as per the settled principles of law, the certificate issued by the doctor conducting the ossification test is not to be treated as scientific proof which can surpass the actual evidence which are on record wherein also, there can be a variation of two years.[44] A mere non-production of admission register of school to prove the age of victim is not fatal to prosecution case.[45] A register maintained in a school is admissible in evidence to prove date of birth of the person concerned in terms of s 35 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872. Such dates of birth are recorded in the school register by the authorities in discharge of their public duty and an entry in the school register about the age of a person, though not conclusive, has evidentiary value. On the basis of the entry in school register and the testimony of the father of the victim girl, the age of the victim girl was found below 16 years.[46]3154

Where the genuineness of the contents of the school transfer certificate were not disputed by the defence, and the entries made therein were admitted as true, the prosecutrix was adjudged as a minor, being 12 years old.[47]

60. Age of Accused

The law of England presumes that a boy under fourteen years of age is sexually impotent, and therefore, incapable of committing rape. The presumption cannot be rebutted by evidence as to his physical capacity, but he may be convicted of an indecent assault under the Sexual Offences Act 1956.[48] However, the law in India does not presume any such age limit under which a boy is considered physically incapable of committing rape. In a charge of rape brought against a boy, the court decides the question of his potency from evidence in the case and is guided by ss 82 and 83, IPC, in awarding punishment.[49] Old men are also known to have committed rape on small girls.[50]

In the case of determination of date of birth of the child, the best evidence is that of the father and mother.[51]

PENETRATION[52]

61. Penetration--Meaning

For penetration, the Apex Court[53] said that according to the Concise Oxford Dictionary 'penetrate' means 'find access into or through, pass through'.[54]

In Nirmal Kumar v State of Haryana ,[55] while examining the question whether the case before it was of rape or attempted rape, the Punjab and Haryana High Court has quoted the following relevant portions from different sources dealing with penetration:

> "In Parikh's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology, the following passage is found:
> Sexual intercourse, in law, is held to mean the slightest degree penetration of the vulva by the penis with or without emission of semen. It is therefore quite possible to commit legally the offence of rape without producing any injury to the genitals or leaving any seminal stains.

In Encyclopedia of Crime and Justice (vol 4) at p 1356, it is stated:

'Even slightest penetration is sufficient and emission is unnecessary'.

In Halsbury's Statutes of England and Wales (fourth edn) vol 12, it is stated that even the slightest degree of penetration is sufficient to prove sexual intercourse within the meaning of s 44 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956.3155

In American Jurisprudence it is stated that slight penetration is sufficient to complete the crime of rape.

Code 263 of Penal Code of California reads thus:

The essential guilt of rape consists as the outrage to the person and feelings of the victim of the rape. Any sexual penetration however, slight is sufficient to complete the crime.

In Gaur's The Penal Law of India, sixth edn, 1955 (vol 11) p 1678, it is observed that even vulval penetration has been held to be sufficient for a conviction of rape.

In Taylor's Principles and Practice of Medical Jurisprudence at p 69, rape is defined as unlawful sexual intercourse by a man with a female other than his wife without her consent. The merest penetration of the penis between the labia associated with the lack of consent is sufficient to constitute the offence.

It was submitted that the offence of rape is constituted even if there is the slightest penetration of the male organ in the vagina of the prosecutrix. In order to constitute the offence of rape, penetration of the male organ in the vulva of the vagina of the prosecutrix is a condition sine qua non."

Merely because the doctor opined that the vagina admitted one finger with difficulty, absence of penetration cannot be inferred on that basis.[56] For further commentary, text under the heading

'Explanation' in s 375, ante, may be referred to.

62. Penetration--Determination of Rape--Legal and not Medical Conclusion

It is for the prosecution to prove that there was a penetration. In Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology,[57] it is stated:

> Thus, to constitute the offence of rape, it is not necessary that there should be complete penetration of penis with emission of semen and rupture of hymen. Partial penetration of the penis within the Labia majora or the vulva or pudenda, with or without emission of semen, or even an attempt at penetration is quite sufficient for the purpose of the law. It is therefore quite possible to commit legally, the offence of rape without producing any injury to the genitals or leaving any seminal stains. In such a case, the medical officer should mention the negative facts in his report, but should not give his opinion that no rape had been committed. Rape is a crime and not a medical condition. Rape is a legal term and not a diagnosis to be made by the medical officer treating the victim. The only statement that can be made by the medical officer is to the effect whether there is evidence of recent sexual activity. Whether the rape has occurred or not is a legal conclusion, not a medical one.

The observation made above makes clear that if there is slightest degree of penetration with or without ejectment, attracts the ingredients of s 375, IPC . It is therefore quite possible that the offence of rape may take place with or without causing injury to the genital organs or leaving any seminal stains. Therefore, it is for the court to come to a legal conclusion.[58]

If assuming for a while, forcible sexual intercourse were to have taken place on a girl aged about 10 to 12 years and the penetration were to have been taken place, it is needless to say that there will be rupture of vagina at least with some tear. The doctors who examined the prosecutrix did not find any injury over the private parts. Therefore, there could not have been any penetration so as to hold that the rape has3156 taken place. If some injuries or lacerations, abrasions or swelling were to have found over the vaginal portion, it could have been held that there is penetration and a forcible sexual intercourse had taken place. Therefore, only on the ground that the hymen may or may not be ruptured itself is not sufficient to hold that the rape has taken place.[59]

63. Penetration, Not Ejaculation Matters

The sine qua non of the offence of rape is penetration, and not ejaculation. Ejaculation without penetration constitutes an attempt to commit rape and not actual rape. Definition of 'rape' as contained in s 375, IPC refers to 'sexual intercourse' and the explanation appended to the section provides that penetration is sufficient to constitute the sexual intercourse necessary to the offence of rape. Intercourse means sexual connection.[60]

64. All forms of Penetration do not Constitute Rape

Commentary under the same heading in s 375, ante, may be referred to.

INJURIES

65. Injuries on the Person of the Accused

The plea that no marks of injuries were found either on the accused or the prosecutrix does not lead to any inference that the accused has not committed forcible sexual intercourse on the prosecutrix.[61]

66. Injuries on Genital Parts

In Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology[62] it has been observed as under:

> Injuries to the genital parts may result from force exerted by the accused or from forces applied by the victim. In addition to scratches or lacerations on the penis caused by the finger nails of the victim during a struggle an abrasion or a laceration may be discovered on the prepuce or glans penis but more often on the frenum, due to the forcible introduction of the organ into the narrow vagina of a virgin especially of a child but it is not necessary that there should always be marks of injuries on the penis in such cases.

According to the Modi's Medical Jurisprudence, therefore, it is not necessary that there should always be marks of injuries on the penis in such cases.[63]

67. Injuries on the Male Organ of the Accused

It is quite possible to legally commit the offence of rape without producing any injury either to the genital part of the victim or to the male organ.[64] It is not necessary3157 that there should always be marks of injuries on the male organ of the accused in such cases.[65] The cut in the tip of the penis of the accused is possible due to forcible intercourse with the virgin.[66]

When the vagina of the prosecutrix can admit two fingers, it is not necessary that the penis of the accused should have injuries during the sexual intercourse with her.[67]

In a case of rape by an adult of thirty-nine years on a girl of 10 years, the absence of a satisfactory explanation from the accused to account for the injury on his penis was held to be corroborative piece of evidence relating to his participation in the commission of the offence.[68] Accused committed rape on a minor girl aged 5 years. It was held that when a fully developed man has committed sexual assault with a minor girl aged about 4 or 5 years, there is likelihood of an injury being caused on the penis.[69]

A Doctor who examined the accused found a wound on the bottom of his penis and had found the hymen of the prosecutrix torn. Further, there was no motive for false implication and the accused was convicted under s 376, IPC, and a sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment was imposed.[70]

In Rahim Beg v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[71] the Supreme Court set aside the conviction of the accused, who was a fully developed man at the time of offence, holding the prosecution case to be false on the ground that there was no injury on the male organ of the accused, while, according to the medical evidence, when a girl of 10 or 12 years, who is a virgin and whose hymen is intact, is subjected to rape by a fully developed man, there are likely to be injuries on the male organ of the man. However, in spite of the injuries on the private parts of the victim, there may be no injury on the penis of the accused. Likewise, the prosecution case cannot be discarded on the mere ground that no injuries were found on the person of the accused.[72] When the vagina of the prosecutrix can admit two fingers, it is not necessary that the penis of the accused should have injuries during the sexual intercourse with her.[73]

Non-explanation by the accused of the injury to his glans of the penis and presence of semen on his pyjama are circumstances operating very harshly against the accused.[74]

Where a minor girl of 10 years is alleged to have been subjected to rape by a fully developed man, there will be injuries on the male organ of the accused. Absence of injuries on the male organ of the accused would point to his innocence.[75] However, Modi[76] has opined that even in case of a child victim being ravished by a grown up3158 person, it is not necessary that there would always be marks of injuries on the penis in such cases.

68. Injuries on the Person of Prosecutrix

Even mere existence of injury to the vagina may not necessarily and inevitably justify the inference that there had been rape, as rupture of the hymen may be caused by some instrument other than the male genital.[77] But the doctor having recorded in his report that hymen of the vagina was torn was not justified in giving an opinion that the male organ would not have penetrated into the young girl's vagina.[78]

When the prosecutrix alleges that she and the accused were stark naked and the rape took place on the floor, which was rough, absence of some marks or injuries at least on the knees of the accused and on the person of the prosecutrix would create great suspicion about the truthfulness of the prosecution story. In such a case, the accused cannot be held guilty under s 376, IPC .[79] However, non-resistance by a helpless prosecutrix and, therefore, the absence of any injuries on the person of the accused are not such circumstances which can create a doubt as regards the case established against the accused on the basis of evidence and circumstances in the case.[80]

It is most unlikely, that only to falsely implicate the accused, the prosecutrix would inflict injury on her private parts.[81]

When there is redness around the vaginal orifice of the prosecutrix, which leads to the conclusion that some sort of penetration was there, and if her hymen is not ruptured it does not mean that no rape is committed by the accused on her.[82]

The statement of the prosecutrix regarding commission of rape by the accused on her is corroborated when injuries are found on her vagina which were of probable duration of 24 to 48 hours.[83] The bleeding and injury in the private parts of the prosecutrix, a virgin, is suggestive of sexual assault.[84]

It would be pertinent to point out that Modi in Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology,[85] has mentioned that in cases of commission of rape on a minor girl, it is not always necessary for the hymen to be torn. If the hymen of the prosecutrix was not torn, then it is apparent that the injuries of the prosecutrix were trivial.[86]

Prosecutrix Married Woman -- Absence of Injuries

Where the prosecutrix is a married woman, overpowered by several persons, absence of injuries on her would not be fatal to the prosecution case.[87]3159

69. Absence of Injuries on the Prosecutrix

It is not always necessary that in all cases of sexual assault, injuries must be there on the body of the victim of rape.[88] Injuries are not always a sine qua non to prove a charge of rape.[89] When the prosecutrix was examined by the doctor on the fifth day of the occurrence, the absence of any external or internal injury on her private part or any seminal stains is of no consequence.[90]

In case of children who are incapable of offering any resistance, external marks of violence may not be found.[91]

When the injuries which the prosecutrix suffered or might have suffered in defending herself and offering resistance to the accused were abrasions or bruises which would heal in ordinary course of nature within 2 to 3 days of the incident, the absence of visible marks of injuries on the person of the prosecutrix on the date of her medical examination would not necessarily mean that she had not suffered any injuries or that she had offered no resistance at the time of commission of the crime. The absence of injuries on the person of the prosecutrix is not necessarily evidence of falsity of the allegation or evidence of consent on the part of the prosecutrix. It will all depend on the facts and circumstances of each case.[92]

The absence of any injuries on the prosecutrix, who was the helpless victim of rape, belonging to a backward community, living in a remote area, not knowing the need of rushing to a doctor after the occurrence of the incident, was held not enough for discrediting the statement of the prosecutrix if the other evidence was believable.[93]

Every resistance need not necessarily be accompanied by some injury on the body of the victim. The prosecutrix being a girl of 19-20 years of age was not, in the facts and circumstances of the case, expected to offer such resistance as would cause injuries to her body.[94]

The absence of marks of external injuries on the person of the prosecutrix cannot be adopted as a formula for inferring consent on the part of the prosecutrix and holding that she was a willing party to the act of sexual intercourse. It will all depend on the facts and circumstances of each case.[95] A judge shall have to apply the rule of common sense while testing the reasonability of the prosecution case. The prosecutrix on account of age of infirmity or overpowered by fear or force may have been incapable of offering any resistance. She might have sustained injuries but on account of lapse of time, the injuries might have healed and marks vanished.[96]3160

In a gang rape case of a married woman, the absence of injuries on her was held of no consequence when the gang rape was otherwise proved.[1]

However, the absence of injury, as per medical evidence, on the person of the prosecutrix, including her private parts coupled with the fact that her conduct showed that she was a consenting party to the sexual intercourse entitles the accused for acquittal under s 376, IPC .[2] Similarly, when rape was alleged to have been committed by eight persons and that too twice, and the accused had pushed the prosecutrix out of a running train after giving kicks, but except for a small incised wound on her right hand and some minor superficial abrasions no other injury was found on her person, coupled with the fact that there was no evidence that the prosecutrix raised shouts while the accused were taking her forcibly to the railway yard showed that the prosecutrix was a consenting party.[3] While appreciating the absence of injuries on the person of the prosecutrix, two things should not be overlooked, firstly when the prosecutrix is examined after 2½ days, traces of rape would have disappeared on account of passage of time, and secondly when the prosecutrix is a married lady and so used to sexual intercourse, it would have been very difficult for a medical witness to opine whether she had been raped.[4] For further commentary, s 375, ante, may be referred to.

In a case, the prosecutrix was kidnapped, further, the accused by deceitful means subjected her to rape and coerced her to indulge in flesh trade. As the prosecutrix was below 16 years of age and had become habituated to sexual intercourse, the absence of injuries on her body was found inconsequential and the accused was convicted under ss 366 and 376, IPC .[5]

Prosecutrix Habitual to Sexual Intercourse.--Absence of Injuries on her Body-- Inconsequential

Where the prosecutrix had become habitual to sexual intercourse, the absence of injuries on her body would be of no consequence.[6]

47 Substituted by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 2013 (13 of 2013), s 9 (wef 3-2-2013). Prior to substitution s 376 stood as under:--" S. 376 . Punishment for rape.--

(1) Whoever, except in the cases provided for by sub-section (2), commits rape shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which shall not be less than seven years but which may be for life or for a term which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine unless the woman raped is his own wife and is not under twelve years of age, in which case, he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years or with fine or with both:

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

SEXUAL OFFENCES

[S. 376.

Punishment for rape.--

EVIDENCE OF PROSECUTRIX

70. Court to Ensure that Prosecutrix is not Harassed in Cross-examination

There has been lately, a lot of criticism on the treatment of victims of sexual assault in the court during their cross-examination. The provisions of the Evidence Act 1872, regarding relevancy of facts notwithstanding, some defence counsel adopt the strategy of continual questioning of the prosecutrix as to the details of the rape. The victim is required to repeat the details of the rape incident not so much as to bring out3161 the facts on record or to test her credibility, but to test her story for inconsistencies with a view to attempt to twist the interpretation of events given by her so as to make them appear inconsistent with her allegations. The court, therefore, should not sit as a silent spectator while the victim of crime is being cross-examined by the defence. It must effectively control the recording of evidence in court. While every latitude should be given to the accused to test the veracity of the prosecutrix and the credibility of her version through cross-examination, the court must also ensure that cross-examination is not made a means of harassment or causing humiliation to the victim of crime. A victim of rape, it must be remembered, has already undergone a traumatic experience and if she is made to repeat again, in unfamiliar surroundings, what she had been subjected to, she may be too ashamed and even nervous or confused to speak and her silence or a confused stray sentence may be wrongly interpreted as 'discrepancies and contradictions' in her evidence.[7]

71. Mind of Woman Difficult to Fathom

It is difficult to fathom the working of the mind of the woman. The sexual offence is very easy to allege and difficult to refute, it is expected that immediately after the incident of molestation or rape/sexual intercourse, a report to the police be lodged.[8]

72. Prosecutrix Accustomed to Sexual Intercourse--Effect

Even assuming that the victim was previously accustomed to sexual intercourse, that is not a determinative question. On the contrary, the question which was required to be adjudicated was did the accused commit rape on the victim on the occasion complained of. Even if it is hypothetically accepted that the victim had lost her virginity earlier, it did not and cannot in law give license to any person to rape her. It is the accused who was on trial and not the victim. Even if the victim in a given case has been promiscuous in her sexual behavior earlier, she has a right to refuse to submit herself to sexual intercourse to anyone and everyone because she is not a vulnerable object or prey for being sexually assaulted by anyone and everyone.[9]

73. Statement of the Prosecutrix

It is hardly possible that any self respecting woman would come forward in a court of justice to make a humiliating statement against her honour, such as is involved in rape on her, unless it is absolutely true.[10] Therefore, the evidence of the prosecutrix should carry more weight than the evidence of an ordinary witness[11], and is considered more reliable than that of an injured witness.[12] The testimony of the prosecutrix is almost at par with an injured witness and can be acted upon without corroboration.[13] In such a case, the absence of the hymen and the absence of injuries3162 are not sufficient to dispose of the statement of the girl, her mother and the eyewitnesses.[14] In practice, however, a conviction for rape almost entirely depends on the credibility of the woman so far as the essential ingredients are concerned, the other evidence being merely corroborative. Her testimony is vital in a case where the woman is married and the medical evidence, in no way, corroborates the charge of rape. Naturally, no violence may be revealed in the genital organs of a woman who has several times been a mother. Even if spermatozoa, indicating semen, is found in her genitals or on her saree, it would, by no means, be final in the case of a married woman.[15] In the matter of rape, the statement of the prosecutrix must be given primary consideration, but, at the same time, the broad principle that the prosecution has to prove its case beyond reasonable doubt applies equally to a case of rape and there can be no presumption that a prosecutrix would always tell the entire story truthfully.[16] Not only has one to consider the possibility of deliberate falsehood, but those who have to arrive at a verdict have to consider the possibility of unintentional mis-statements produced by hysterical conditions which are apt to be found in cases of this nature.[17]

The evidence of a prosecutrix is more reliable than that of an injured witness and the testimony of the victim of sexual assault is vital unless there are compelling reasons which necessitate the looking for corroboration of her statement.[18]

The physical scar on a rape victim may heal up, but the mental scar will always remain. When a woman is ravished, what is inflicted is not merely physical injury but the deep sense of some deathless shame. An accused cannot cling to a fossil formula and insist on corroborative evidence, even if taken as a whole the case spoken of by the victim strikes a judicial mind as probable.[19] The rule, which according to the cases, has hardened into one of law, is not that corroboration is essential before there can be a conviction but that the necessity of corroboration, as a matter of prudence, except where the circumstances make it safe to dispense with it, must be present to the mind of the Judge. Therefore, corroboration is not the sine qua non for conviction in a rape case.[20]

74. Reliability of the Testimony of a Child Witness

The tender years of the child, a victim of rape, coupled with other circumstances appearing in the case, such, for example, as its demeanour, unlikelihood of tutoring and so forth, may render its evidence reliable and safe to be acted upon without corroboration.[21] It is, however, desirable that the courts should always record their opinion that the child understands the duty of speaking the truth and state why they think so; otherwise, the credibility of the witness may be seriously affected so much3163 so that, in some cases, it may be necessary to reject the evidence altogether.[22] Similarly, if, by reason of tender years and consequent immaturity of judgment, a child, in a case of rape on her, is unable to understand the questions put to her and convey the relevant information to the court, it ought not to be examined at all.[23] Therefore, the unsworn testimony of a girl, aged about 12 years, received by the court (in a case of rape), after satisfying itself that the girl possessed sufficient understanding, is admissible.[24]

A child witness of about 12 years of age can often be expected to give out a true version because of his/her innocence, however there is always the danger in accepting the evidence of such a witness that, under influence, she might have been coached to give out a version by persons who may have influence on her.[25]

Before the decision of the Supreme Court in Rameshwar v State of Rajasthan ,[26] the authorities, on the necessity of corroboration in the case of a child witness, were not uniform. According to the Nagpur High Court, when the victim of rape is a girl of tender age, her evidence carries great weight.[27] A child of ten, in a case of rape on her, cannot possibly have any motive for false incrimination which may attract the necessity of corroboration as to the identity of the accused.[28] However, in Gangaram Nanhoosingh v Crown ,[29] the view taken by the Nagpur High Court was that the rule of corroboration would apply, whether the prosecutrix is an adult or a girl of only seven years of age. The Madras High Court held, in Re Boya Chinnappa,[30] that where a girl of immature (seven) years has been raped, and made a disclosure of the rape at the earliest possible opportunity to her mother and another, the court will not insist upon independent testimony connecting the accused with the crime. In a case from Ajmer,[31] it was held that the court, in a case of rape on a small girl of seven years, would not insist on the same amount of corroboration as when the victim of rape is a grown up woman. However, as a matter of prudence, conviction should not ordinarily be based on the uncorroborated evidence of a child witness, whether sworn or unsworn.[32]

75. Prosecutrix Testimony--Whether Requires Corroboration

Prosecutrix cannot be considered to be an accomplice; her testimony cannot be equated with that of an accomplice.[33] Similarly, there is no rule of law which may3164 require that there should be corroboration before conviction can be based on the sole testimony of the prosecutrix.[34] The prosecutrix should be treated as an injured witness.[35] It is now well settled that a finding of guilt in a case of rape, can be based on the uncorroborated evidence of the prosecutrix. The very nature of offence makes it difficult to get direct corroborating evidence and the evidence of the prosecutrix should not be rejected on the basis of minor discrepancies and contradictions. If the victim of rape states on oath that she was forcibly subjected to sexual intercourse, her statement will normally be accepted, even if it is uncorroborated, unless the material placed on record requires drawing of an inference that there was consent or that the entire incident was improbable or imaginary.[36]

A conviction can be based on sole testimony of the prosecutrix provided it lends assurance of her testimony. However, in case the court has reason not to accept the version of prosecutrix on its face value, it may look for corroboration. In case the evidence is read in its totality and the story projected by the prosecutrix is found to be improbable, the case of the prosecutrix becomes liable to be rejected.[37] The prosecutrix is a victim of, and not an accomplice in a sex offence and there is no provision in the Indian Evidence Act 1872, requiring corroboration in material particulars of the evidence of the prosecutrix as is in the case of evidence of accomplice.[38]

It is well settled that a prosecutrix complaining of having been a victim of the offence of rape is not an accomplice after the crime. There is no rule of law that her testimony cannot be acted upon without corroboration in material particulars. She stands at a higher pedestal than an injured on the physical form, while in the former it is both physical as well as psychological and emotional. However, if the court of facts finds it difficult to accept the version of the prosecutrix on its face value, it may search for evidence, direct or circumstantial, which would lend assurance to her testimony. Further, an assurance, short of corroboration as understood in the context of an accomplice would do.[39]

In a case of abduction and rape, conviction of the accused can be based entirely on the statement of a rape victim.[40]3165

Corroboration is not the *sine qua non*for a conviction in a rape case. In the initial setting, refusal to act on the testimony of a victim of sexual assault in the absence of corroboration, as a rule is adding insult to injury. Why should the evidence of the woman who complains of rape/sexual molestation be viewed with doubt, disbelief or suspicion? To do so would justify the charge of male chauvinism in a male dominated society.[41]

It is not the law that in every case the version of the prosecutrix must be corroborated in material particulars by independent evidence on record. It all depends on the quality of the evidence of the prosecutrix. If the Court is satisfied that the evidence of the prosecutrix is free from blemish and is implicitly reliable, then on the sole testimony of the prosecutrix, the conviction can be recorded. In appropriate cases, the court may look for corroboration from an independent source or from the circumstances of the case before recording an order of conviction.[42] The woman or a girl subjected to sexual assault is not an accomplice to the crime but is a victim of another person's lust and it is improper and undesirable to test her evidence with a certain amount of suspicion treating her as if she were an accomplice. [43]

The appellants accused though were armed with sharp cutting weapons viz. tangies, yet inflicted injuries by blunt object viz. lathis, held, it could not be said that they share common object to cause the death of the deceased, they were convicted under s 304, Pt II IPC instead of s 302, IPC .[44]

In a case of rape, testimony of a prosecutrix stands at par with that of an injured witness. It is really not necessary to insist on corroboration if the evidence of the prosecutrix inspires confidence and appears to be credible.[45]

To insist on corroboration except in the rarest of rare case is to equate a woman who is a victim of lust of another, with an accomplice to a crime, and thereby insult womanhood. It would be adding insult to injury to tell a woman that her story of woe will not be believed unless it is corroborated in material particulars as in the case of an accomplice to a crime. Ours is a conservative society where it concerns sexual behaviour. Ours is not a permissible society as in some of the Western and European countries. Our standard of decency and morality, in public life is not the same as in those countries. Decency and morality in public life can be promoted and protected only if the courts deal strictly with those who violate societal norms. The standard of proof to be expected by the court in such cases must take into account the fact that such crimes are generally committed on the sly and very rarely direct evidence of a person other than the prosecutrix is available. Courts must also realise that ordinarily a woman, more so a young girl, will not stake her reputation by leveling a false charge concerning her chastity.[46]3166

The testimony of the victim of sexual assault is vital and unless there are compelling reasons which necessitate looking for corroboration of her statement, the courts should find no difficulty in acting on the testimony if it inspires confidence and is found to be reliable. Seeking corroboration of her statement before relying upon the same as a rule, in such cases amounts to adding insult to injury. Why should the evidence of a girl or a woman who complains of rape or sexual molestation, be viewed with doubt, disbelief of suspicion? The court while appreciating evidence of a prosecutrix may look for some assurance of her statement to satisfy its judicial conscience, since she is a witness who is interested in the outcome of the charge levelled by her, but there is no requirement of law to insist upon corroboration of her assault stands almost on a par with the evidence of an injured witness and to an extent is even more reliable. Just as a witness who has sustained some injury in the occurrence which is not found to be self inflicted, is considered to be a good witness in the sense that he is least likely to shield the real culprit, the evidence of a victim of sexual offence is entitled to great weight, absence of corroboration notwithstanding. Corroborative evidence is not an imperative component of judicial credence in every case of rape. Corroboration as a condition for judicial reliance on the testimony of the prosecutrix is not a requirement of law, but a guidance of prudence under given circumstances. It must not be overlooked that a woman or a girl subjected to sexual assault is not an accomplice to the crime but is a victim of another person's lust and it is improper and undesirable to test her evidence with a certain amount of suspicion, treating her as if she were an accomplice. Inference has to be drawn from the given sets of facts and circumstances with realistic diversity and not dead uniformity test that type of rigidity in the shape of rule of law is introduced through a new form of testimonial tyranny making justice a casualty. Courts cannot cling to a fossil formula and insist upon corroboration even if, taken as a whole. The case spoken of by the victim of sex crime strikes the judicial mind as probable.[47]

Of late, crime against women in general and rape in particular is on the rise. It is an irony that while we are celebrating women's rights in all spheres, we show little or no concern for her honour. It is a reflection of the attitude of indifference in the society towards the violation of her dignity of the victims of sex crimes and not only violates the victim's privacy and personal integrity, but inevitably caused serious psychological as well as physical harm in the process. Rape is not merely an assault. It is often destructive to the whole personality of the victim. The courts, therefore, should realise the great responsibility while trying an accused on charges of rape. They must deal with rape cases with utmost sensitivity. The court should examine the broader probabilities of a case and not get swayed by minor contradictions or insignificant discrepancies in the statement of the prosecutrix, which may be of a fatal nature, to throw out an otherwise reliable prosecution case. If the evidence of prosecutrix inspires confidence, it must be relied upon without seeking corroboration of her statement in material particulars for some reasons the court finds it necessary to place implicit reliance on her testimony. It may look for evidence which may lend assurance to her testimony, short of corroboration required in the case of an accomplice. The testimony of the prosecutrix must be appreciated in the background of the entire case and the trial court must be aware of its responsibility and be sensitive dealing with cases involving sexual molestations.[48] If the testimony of the prosecutrix is cogent and reliable, it alone can form the basis of the

It is open to the court to base its conviction of the offence solely on the evidence of the prosecutrix, if it is satisfied that the evidence is worthy of credence,[50], and if the prosectrux does not have strong motive to falsely implicate the accused.[51]

76. Legal Aspect as to Appreciation of Evidence of Prosecutrix

About legal aspect with respect to appreciation of evidence of prosecutrix, the same can be summarised in the following manner:

(1) That the main evidence in all such cases is that of victim herself.
(2) That corroboration of the testimony of the prosecutrix in rape case is not required as a rule of law. But, corroboration should ordinarily be required in the case of a woman having attained majority and who is habitual to sexual intercourse and is found in a compromising position, as in such cases there is likelihood of her having leveled such an accusation on account of instinct of self preservation or when the probabilities factor is found to be out of time.
(3) That corroboration may be by facts and circumstances.
(4) That the injury on the person of the victim, especially her private parts, had corroborative value.
(5) That if the evidence of the victim does not suffer from any basic infirmity and the probabilities factor does not render it unworthy of credence, as a general rule, there is no reason to insist on corroboration except from medical evidence, where, having regard to the circumstances of the case, medical evidence can be expected to be forthcoming.[52]

77. Suggestions Given to Prosecutrix--Effect

Any suggestion given by the defence to the prosecution witness cannot take the place of evidence and moreover, the suggestion given by the defence to the effect that she had made statement never goes to show that the defence accepted the fact that they had outraged the modesty of the prosecutrix.[53]

78. Principles Underlying Corroboration of Testimony of Prosecutrix

In Moti Chand v State of Rajasthan [54] the Rajasthan High Court after analysing the observations of the Apex Court in several cases[55] has summarised the principles3168 pertaining to corroboration of testimony of prosecutrix based upon these decisions of the Apex Court as follows:

(1) corroboration of the testimony of prosecutrix in rape cases is not required as a rule of law;
(2) corroboration in such cases is, however, required as a matter of prudence and this rule of prudence has now almost hardened into rule of law;
(3) the rule of prudence which has been hardened into rule of law is that the rule as to corroboration must be present in the mind of the judge and must have been incorporated in the judgment;
(4) if the evidence of the prosecutrix does not suffer from any basic infirmity and the probabilities factor does not render it unworthy of credence, as a general rule, corroboration should not be insisted upon;
(5) the corroboration of the prosecutrix evidence may be dispensed with where circumstances of a case make it safe to do so, but the reasons for dispensing with the necessity of such corroboration should be forthcoming in the judgment;
(6) corroboration should ordinarily be required in the case of a woman having attained majority and who is habitual to sexual intercourse as, in such cases, there is likelihood of her having leveled such an accusation on account of her instinct of self preservation or when the probabilities factor is found to be out of time;

(7) the view that though corroboration should ordinarily be required in the case of a grown up woman, it is unnecessary in the case of a child of tender years is not correct; whether corroboration is unnecessary is a question of fact in every case.

79. If No Motive to Falsely Implicate Accused, Statement of Prosecutrix should be Accepted

A prosecutrix of sex offence cannot be put at par with an accomplice, she is in fact a victim of the crime. The Evidence Act 1872, nowhere says that her evidence cannot be accepted, unless it is corroborated in material particulars. She is undoubtedly a competent witness under s 118 of the Evidence Act and her evidence must receive the same weight as is attached to an injured in a case of physical violence, the same degree of care and caution must attach in the evaluation of her evidence as in the case of an injured complainant or witness and no more. What is necessary is that the court must be alive to and conscious of the fact that it is dealing with the evidence of a person who is interested in the outcome of the charge leveled by her. If the court keeps this in mind and feels satisfied that it can act on the evidence of the prosecutrix, there is no rule of law of practice incorporated in the Evidence Act similar to illust (b) to s 114 which requires it to look for corroboration. If for some reason the court is hesitant to place implicit reliance on the testimony of the prosecutrix it may look for evidence which may lend assurance to her testimony short of corroboration required in the case of an accomplice. The nature of evidence required to lend assurance to the testimony of the prosecutrix must necessarily depend on the facts and circumstances of each case. However, if the prosecutrix is an adult and of full understanding, the court is entitled to base a conviction on her evidence, unless the same is shown to be infirm and untrustworthy. If the totality of circumstances appearing on the record of the case disclose that the prosecutrix does3169 not have a strong motive to falsely involve the person charged, the court should ordinarily have no hesitation in accepting her evidence.[56]

It is most unlikely that only to falsely implicate the accused the prosecutrix would inflict injury on her private parts.[57]

Circumstantial evidence, that soon after the crime the girl told her parents that the accused lifted her and caused her injuries, that there was some admission of the accused having committed a wrongful act, that there were injuries on the person of the accused and blood stains on his dhoti, was held sufficient to corroborate the girls direct evidence.[58]

80. Prosecutrix Stating Accused had 'Physical Contact' or did Ulta Kaam etc, with Her--If Sufficient to Prove Rape

When the prosecutrix in her local language made a statement in exact translation that accused no. 1 had physical contact with her 3-4 times in these two days, but the public prosecutor did not get it clarified in the examination in chief what she had exactly meant by 'physical contact', her statement cannot establish the commission of offence of rape under s 376, IPC, in order to bring home this offence. The prosecuting agency is required to bring on record the clinching evidence of penetration without which the offence under s 376 cannot be said to be proved against the accused.[59] However, when the prosecutrix aged 5 years being a child witness stated before the court that the accused beat her and had done dirty things to her private parts as a result whereof she bled, and the medical evidence also supported the prosecution case, the accused was found guilty under s 376, IPC .[60] When the prosecutrix nowhere stated about the removal of her clothes, ulta kam kiya as stated by the prosecutrix without any evidence by the prosecution cannot in local parlance mean the commission of sexual intercourse.[61]The prosecutrix in her statement said that the accused committed an indecent act on her and did the same forcibly without her consent. When she was asked as to what she meant by the words 'indecent act', she did not utter a single word in reply. Her father stated that his daughter informed him that she was raped by the accused. He also informed that his daughter informed him that the accused did hath path on her.

A Comparative and Etymological Dictionary of the Nepali Language by Ralph Lilley Turner which was first published in the year 1913 and first reprinted in India 1980 and thereafter in 1990. The word hath path, according to this dictionary, means laying hands on.

Taking note of the fact that the prosecutrix has used the words like, 'indecent act' but has also used the expressions, 'forcibly' and 'without her consent' also, and her father used the word 'rape', so 'indecent act' and hath path were understood by all the witnesses suggesting sexual intercourse and in local common parlance hath path means sexual assault on a woman the conviction of the accused under s 376, IPC, was found proper.[62]3170

In State of Karnataka v Narayanamurthy ,[63] the victim was a child and she did not describe sexual assault but stated that the accused did all sorts of things to her. The technical view taken by the trial court that penetration and sexual assault was not established did not find favour with the Karnataka High Court which observed thus:

> A reading of the judgment indicates that the learned trial judge has virtually taken off at a tangent and has gone into the technicalities of the offence of rape which undoubtedly requires that it must be a sexual assault and if it is to be punished under s 376, IPC the aspect of penetration is one of the necessary ingredients. The reasoning proceeds on the footing that the girl has not specifically described the act and that therefore, the evidence falls short of the requirement of establishing that it was an act of rape. We are rather distressed at this line of approach because the Legislature in this country has consciously stepped up the punishments prescribed for any form of atrocities against females particularly offences of rape and in cases where the victim is a minor the law views the offence so seriously that it provides for a minimum sentence of 7 years RI. It is necessary for the courts to appreciate the trauma which a victim of any age undergoes in these situations when one has to virtually relive the horrifying incident and in the background of this emotional struggle, the very serious limitations when it comes to the question of describing before a court as to what happened. It virtually means that the victim has to almost re-enact the incident particularly while facing cross-examination, which is one of the most traumatic aspects even in cases where, due to the passage of time victim has to some extent recovered. This is therefore not a category of cases where courts go to look for elaborate picturesque and precise descriptions of every gory details the incident. Even if the evidence is sufficient convey to the court that sexual assault particular type had taken place, that should more than sufficient because the courts always look to the important supportive evidence such the medical evidence and the forensic evidence relating to the clothes, CA Report etc.[64]

81. Prosecutrix Consenting to Sexual Intercourse on false promise of Marriage

Even if the accused had made a false promise to marry the prosecutrix and whereupon she consented to sexual intercourse with him, it would not vitiate her consent for the sexual intercourse which she had given, fully understanding the nature and implication of the act involved therein. It is not that the girl consented to the act on any understanding or misunderstanding that the accused was her husband (as distinct from 'would be' husband). It is not a case where the girl had any misconception about the nature of the act which she consented to, that being so it does not become a case of rape when she consented to the act of sexual intercourse fully knowing the nature and implication of such act and when she was fully aware that the person concerned was not yet her husband, even if he had proposed to marry her.[65]

However, a contrary view is taken by the Patna High Court according to which consent always means free will or voluntary act. When the consent was obtained on the basis of some fraud and allurement or practising deception upon the lady on the pretext that ultimately she will be married and under that pretext she allowed the3171 accused to have sexual intercourse with her, the act committed by the accused with such tainted consent should be treated as committed without consent.[66] However, in a subsequent decision the same High Court took the opposite view.[67] The accused, a class teacher of the prosecutrix was alleged to have committed rape on a promise to marry her. There was no question of dominating the will of the victim girl since she herself gave consent to have sexual intercourse according to the case of the prosecution, there was no allegation however that subsequently the accused declined to marry her, so it was held that no case under s 376, IPC, was made out.[68] However, in such cases the accused can be convicted under s 417, IPC .[69]

It appears that the consensus of judicial opinion is in favour of the view that the consent given by the prosecutrix to sexual intercourse with a person with whom she is deeply in love on a promise that he would marry her on a later date, cannot be said to be given under a misconception of fact. A false promise is not a fact within the meaning of the Code. But there is no strait jacket formula for determining whether consent given by the prosecutrix to sexual intercourse is voluntary, or whether it is given under a misconception of fact. In the ultimate analysis, the tests laid down by the courts provide at best guidance to the judicial mind while considering a question of consent, but the court must, in each case, consider the evidence before it and the surrounding circumstances, before reaching a conclusion, because each case has its own peculiar facts which may have a bearing on the question whether the consent was voluntary, or was given under a misconception of fact. It must also weigh the evidence keeping in view the fact that the burden is on the prosecution to prove each and every ingredient of the offence, absence of consent being one of them.[70] But when the consent of the prosecutrix was obtained in a deceitful manner tantamounting lack of her consent, the conviction of the accused under s 376, IPC was found proper.[71] For further commentary, text under s 375, ante, may be referred to.

Plea of Consensual Intercourse

The plea of the accused that it was consensual intercourse raised for the first time before the Supreme Court was not entertained.[72]

82. Story of Prosecutrix having Immoral Character

It must, however, be conceded that immoral character would still not be an absolutely irrelevant circumstance. It may render the story itself as incredible. It may take away probative force of the story, told as it is by a woman with no scruples or morals. It may be difficult to believe a woman of immoral character if she says that some persons had sexual intercourse with her, unless there existed satisfactory proof in support of the story of sexual intercourse.[73]3172

Prosecutrix of Easy Virtue/unchaste Woman, Accustomed to Sexual Intercourse

Even if the prosecutrix is of easy virtue or an unchaste woman, that itself cannot be a determinative factor and the Court is required to adjudicate whether the accused committed rape on the victim on the occasion complained of.[74] Even assuming that the victim was previously accustomed to sexual intercourse, that is not a determinative question. On the contrary, the question which is required to be adjudicated is, did the accused commit rape on the victim on the occasion complained of. Even if it is hypothetically accepted that the victim had lost her virginity earlier, it did not and cannot in law, give licence to any person to rape her. It is the accused who is on trial and not the victim. In a given case, if the victim has been promiscuous in her sexual behavior earlier, she has a right to refuse to submit herself to sexual intercourse to anyone and everyone because she is not a vulnerable object or prey for being sexually assaulted by anyone and everyone.[75]

83. Contradiction between Statement of Prosecutrix and Medical Evidence--Effect

When the medical evidence did not corroborate the testimony of the prosecutrix in as much as there was an absence of struggle marks and the statement of other witness was also inconsistent with her testimony, the conviction of the accused recorded by the High Court was set aside.[76] When the medical evidence did not corroborate the testimony of the prosecutrix; and the version of the prosecutrix was found to be not tallying with that of her maternal aunt to whom she said to have narrated the incident, and none were attracted to the place of incident despite her hue and cry to the maximum, the accused was found entitled to be acquitted.[77] Where the prosecution case was that the victim was forcibly pulled down to the ground in a jungle and was raped, the victim was an able bodied tribal woman aged thirty five years, the evidence of the eye witness was that he found the victim lying on the ground and the accused was on her, but not state that the victim was either struggling or making any endeavour to dislodge. There was no external injury, nor even a bruise was detected on the body of the victim. Medical evidence contradicted the ocular testimony of the eye witness as no semen stains or any blood-stain were detected either on the wearing apparels of the victim or that of the accused as per the chemical examination report. It was held that guilt of the accused was not proved beyond doubts.[78]

84. Subsequent conduct of the Prosecutrix--How far Relevant in a case of Rape

The Supreme Court has time and again said that, the post event conduct of a witness varies from person to person. It cannot be a cast iron reaction to be followed as a model by everyone witnessing such event. Different persons would react differently on seeing any violence and their behaviour and conduct would, therefore, be different.[79]3173

The statement made by the prosecutrix to prosecution immediately after the occurrence is res gestae and is a relevant fact under s 6 of the Evidence Act 1872. That is also relevant as her conduct under s 8 of the Evidence Act . When there was spontaneity in the disclosure of the incident by the prosecutrix and this disclosure was made almost contemporaneous with the occurrence, there was not much interval, such a statement immediately after the incident has a greater value as res gestae and it is a substantive evidence.[80]

Immediate conduct is also important while deciding the case of molestation or rape. If a statement or disclosure is made by the ravished girl either to the members of her family or others, it is an evidence of conduct admissible as corroboration by illust (j) to s 8 and under s 157 of the Evidence Act 1872. In all cases of rape, importance is attached to the subsequent conduct of the complainant. Delay in prosecution or failure to make a complaint at the earliest possible opportunity, weakens the case of the complainant.[81]

In all cases of rape, importance is attached to the subsequent conduct of the prosecutrix; whether she makes a charge promptly or not is always, relevant,[82] though not, by itself, enough.[83] In the absence of proper explanation, failure of the prosecutrix to make a complaint at the earliest possible opportunity affords strong presumptive evidence of consent.[84]

In assessing the value of the evidence, her conduct, immediately after the offence was committed, is important and such conduct is relevant under s 8 of the Evidence Act 1872.[85] The allegation of the prosecutrix is, however, admissible in evidence, not as evidence of truth of the charge, but as corroborating the credibility of the prosecutrix.[86] If the prosecutrix does not go to the witness box, there is nothing to confirm or corroborate as her statement to her mother-in-law cannot be proved.[87] In3174*Kappinaiah*'s case, cited above, the raped woman committed suicide three days after the commission of the offence and it was held that her statement to her mother-in-law was not admissible under s 32(1) of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, because rape was not the cause of her death, though it might be the contingent motive, nor could it be relevant, under s 6 of the said Act, as her statement was not so connected with her rape as to form part of the same transaction. In Ghulam Hussain v Emperor ,[88] it was held that in the absence of definite and reliable evidence that the outrage on the victim of rape and her statement to her father constituted together res gestae, much value cannot be attached to the statement.

85. When Prosecutrix should not be Believed--Instances

There may be factors in a case tending to show that the testimony of the prosecutrix suffers from infirmities in a manner so as to make it either unsafe or impossible to base a finding of guilt to the same. Some of the salient factors of this type may briefly be stated thus:

(a) Circumstances showing on the part of prosecutrix an animus against the accused.

(b) Where the question of want of consent is material, circumstances tending to show consent eg, absence of material showing an attempt at resistance absence of any marks of struggle.
(c) Attempt at imprisonment or exaggeration in the version as attempted by the prosecutrix.
(d) Conduct on the part of the prosecutrix, inconsistency with the credibility of the version e.g. omission to make a disclosure at the earliest opportunity.
(e) Element of artificiality or unnaturalness in the story as attempted by the prosecutrix.
(f) Absence of signs of rape in the findings of the medical examination or on chemical analysis.[89]

The version of the prosecutrix (or prosecution) that she has forcibly been raped cannot be believed when,

(a) after the alleged rape she went to a dance performance rather than to her parents to inform them of the crime and she kept quiet for six months about it;[90]
(b) for months together she had never informed her mother or anybody else that the accused had committed rape against her wish and under a threat;[91]
(c) she stated in the course of investigation that on earlier occasions she had been paid Rs 50 by the accused and that she had tea with them on the day of the occurrence. However, she had not stated in the course of investigation that she was forcibly pushed inside the room of the accused, or that the accused had slapped her, and out of fear she did not raise a hue and cry; or that after the accused went away, she was not permitted to leave by the wives of the two brothers of the accused, but on the contrary she had3175 hidden herself inside the room after having seen her cousin, one of the prosecution witnesses;[1]
(d) the alleged rape took place at 12.30 pm on a Sunday when most of the residents are at home but none heard her cries when she was raped, thereafter she was loitering in the locality till about 2.30 pm, ie, for about 2 hours after the incident but did not report to anybody about the incident, she returned home and went to sleep, in the evening when her husband came she did not report the incident to him, at night she cooked food for the family and went to sleep, the next morning she attended to her routine work and worked in four flats but she didn't report the matter to anyone, later she went to the house of her brother and for the first time there she reported the matter to her sister-in-law who was not been examined and only thereafter they went to the police station and lodged the report;[2]
(e) there is contradiction between her statement and medical evidence, and inconsistency between her statement and statement of other witness;[3]
(f) even after the rape, while plucking grass in the field, she alongwith her aunt kept plucking the grass for about an hour and thereafter went to their residence, there was a negative report from the doctor about the rape and no injury was found on the person or private parts of the prosecutrix, the prosecutrix could not recognise the accused when the occurrence took place but her uncle told the name of the accused, and therefore she named him;[4]
(g) a full grown woman consents to the act of sexual intercourse on a promise of marriage;[5]
(h) the prosecutrix being a married woman had no injury and the doctor did not find any injury suggesting forcible rape;[6]
(i) the prosecutrix has given a version in her evidence, which is totally contradictory to the FIR;[7]
(j) she alleged that the accused during the night forcibly lifted her to a near by bank of the river on knife point, and by threatening to kill her son, committed sexual intercourse but no sign of forcible intercourse or any mark of violence was found either on the spot or during medical examination of the prosecutrix, the medical examination of the prosecutrix found no local injury on her private parts nor any sign of sexual intercourse nor any living or dead spermatozoa;[8]
(k) the prosecutrix was only a child of three or four years and when produced by the prosecution there were remarks of the court that when she was asked her name she did not reply and therefore her evidence was not taken and declared nil, the mother of the prosecutrix and neighbours has been3176 declared hostile and did not support the prosecution,[9] and similar is the position when the father of the prosecutrix turned hostile;[10]
(l) the consent of the prosecutrix is apparent when she silently abided to have intercourse with the accused without putting up any resistance and shouting by her is also doubtful, the medical evidence also clearly discloses that the prosecutrix does not appear to have put up any resistance to the alleged onslaught committed on her by the accused;[11]

(m) she stated that the accused did not do anything with her, she was declared hostile but nothing could be extracted against the accused from her in her cross-examination on behalf of the state;[12]

(n) there are material contradictions in her statement before the court and the contents of FIR lodged by her;[13]

(o) the prosecutrix turned hostile and the evidence of the prosecutrix, her father and brother did not support the prosecution;[14]

(p) she has stated that when the incident took place she was pregnant for about seven months and because of the rape she had aborted on the third day, however, when she was examined by the doctor after a few days, no positive sign of recent abortion was noticed and she had also not stated in the FIR about the said pregnancy at the time of alleged rape;[15]

(q) she was tutored by her father and the police because of which she identified the accused in court;[16]

(r) she kept silent throughout the places she stayed at with the accused, which is indicative of the fact that she was a consenting party and it was not proved that she was below 16 years of age on the date of the incident;[17]

(s) the prosecutrix stated in court that after having the cold drink given to her by the accused, she became giddy and thereafter fell down on the cot and did not know what happened as she lost her senses;[18]

(t) there were no injuries on the private parts of the prosecutrix, her statement that she was forcibly thrown down and made to lie on her towel by spreading it on the ground, and accused then tied both her hands on either side with creeper trees was not worth believing as such an act by the3177 accused is not humanly possible, particularly when a woman exerts resistance as alleged by her and therefore, it can be inferred that she was a consenting party;[19]

(u) the prosecutrix stated that the accused had 'physical contact' with her 3-4 times in two days, but the prosecution agency has not got it clarified from her as to what she meant by 'physical contact' and also there was no evidence to establish penetration;[20]

(v) there was no mark of injury on her body showing absence of resistance and the incident took place in the morning when large number of persons were present near the place of the occurrence and no alarm was raised by her;[21]

(w) she did not disclose the alleged incident to her parents, and the medical report also did not support her story;[22]

(x) the accused and the prosecutrix stayed at different hotels without any protest from the prosecutrix at three places, on the other hand she stated that the accused intended to marry her, the inference that they leave from the house to marry to satisfy their lust, the inference that the prosecutrix was a consenting party can be drawn;[23]

(y) the victim stated that while committing rape the accused was holding a gun, but the accused, the father-in-law, was a handicapped person with one arm amputated, and the husband of the victim stated that he was at home and no such incident occurred.[24]

(z) it has also come in the evidence of the prosecution itself that nothing in the room of the prosecutrix, where the rape was allegedly committed, was found disturbed and everything was in order. This fact gives a lie to the statement of the prosecutrix, made in the course of cross-examination, that she had a scuffle with the accused before he committed rape on her. The absence of injuries on the person of the prosecutrix also belies her version that she had struggled and put up resistance to save her honour.[25]

(za) the testimony of the prosecutrix, a married woman, was that she had been raped but she did not raise any alarm to attract the attention of her brother-in-law and his wife, who were sleeping 20-25 feet away, she did not offer any resistance while having sexual intercourse with the accused and the knife, which the accused allegedly brandished to threaten the prosecutrix had not been recovered.[26]

(zb) the prosecutrix claimed that she was dragged and forcible rape was committed, however, in evidence forcible sexual marks of assaults on sexual organs were not seen. The medical evidence was that there were no injuries on her private part as well the doctor opined that the sexual intercourse had not taken place much less whether it was in the nature of3178 forcible act of sexual assault. The chemical analyser's report did not support and corroborate the story brought by the prosecutrix.[27]

(zc) the prosecutrix stated that she was repeatedly subjected to rape 9 times during 3 days but her testimony was not corroborated by medical evidence. There was a long unexplained delay of six days in lodging the FIR and the absence of any bloodstain on the underwear of the prosecutrix.[28]

(zd) the medical opinion about absence of any injury, external or internal, on the virgin prosecutrix aged 13 years and the fact that the hymen was intact and the absence of any injuries on the penis of the accused clearly negatives the story of rape for half an hour to one hour by the accused, as narrated by her.[29]

(ze) the testimony of the prosecutrix that she offered stiff resistance to the accused and made efforts to scratch and bite them during the repeated rape thrice by each accused is rendered doubtful in view of the fact that no external injury was found on both the accused. The prosecutrix was alleged to have been gang raped thrice after being undressed completely yet no external injury or injury on her private parts was found by medical officer.[30]

(zf) neither any injury on her private part nor on her person was found by doctor in spite of her allegation that she was thrown on ground and her blouse was torn.[31]

(zg) the prosecutrix alleged that while she was grazing buffaloes the accused forcibly took her away, put off her clothes and committed rape. No injury was found either on her body or on her private parts. The doctor who examined the prosecutrix found her hymen intact and labia majora and labia minora in contact with each other and were not separated. It cannot be said that there was slight penetration. The version of the prosecutrix that there was complete sexual intercourse cannot be believed.[32]

MEDICAL EVIDENCE

86. Medical Evidence

Invariably in rape cases the court would lean very heavily in favour of the medical evidence before holding that the offence has been conclusively established.[33] The mere fact that the doctor after one year of examination of the accused stated during cross-examination that duration of injuries on the person of the accused was more than 48 hours, would not be accepted as a factor which would falsify the entire prosecution case because the duration of injuries has nowhere been recorded by the doctor in his certificate.[34]3179

It is always desirable that the accused and the prosecutrix, in a case of rape, should be medically examined as soon as possible.[35] If this is not done as quickly as possible, valuable evidence bearing on the guilt of the accused may be lost.[36] Extreme delay in informing the police and subjecting the prosecutrix to medical examination will obliterate evidence on her clothes as to the commission of the offence.[37]

When the prosecutrix had taken a bath and cleaned the clothes after the rape was committed, no sign of sexual intercourse would be found by the doctor examining her and no stains would be found on her wearing apparels.[38]

When rape is denied, one looks for corroboration of the offence in medical evidence showing injury to the private parts of the prosecutrix, injury to other parts of her body, which may have been occasioned in a struggle, seminal stains on her clothes or the clothes of the accused or on places where the offence is alleged to have been committed.[39] The fact that the victim of an alleged rape did not offer herself for medical examination, cannot weigh against her. It is the duty of the police officer, before whom she is produced, to ask her if she is willing to submit to a medical examination in order to substantiate her charge.[40] It is also the duty of the prosecution to ensure medical examination of the accused within a period of time, when conclusive results can be achieved, so that the accused may not plead in defence that if such medical examination had been conducted of the vital, or material, parts of his body, that would have negatived penetration. Paramedical evidence cannot be disbelieved merely because the mother of the victim was working as maid-servant in the house of the doctor.[41]

87. Rape Victim--Statement under Section 161CrPC and Medical Examination

The victim of rape should generally be examined by a female doctor, and at the same time, she should be provided the help of a psychiatric. The medical report should be prepared expeditiously and the Doctor should examine the victim of rape thoroughly and give his/her opinion after looking at all possible angles e.g. an opinion regarding the age, taking into consideration the number of teeth, secondary sex characters, and radiological test, etc. The Investigating Officer must ensure that the victim of rape be handled carefully by a lady police official/officer, depending upon the availability of such official/officer. The victim should be sent for medical examination at the earliest and her statement should be recorded by the Investigating Officer in the presence of her family members making the victim comfortable, except in incest cases.[42]3180

88. Importance of Examination of Potency and Sterility of Accused

In the case of rape or sexual intercourse, examination of the accused by a doctor is also important to ascertain the physical capacity of the alleged rapist to commit the sexual intercourse. A person suffering from no incapacity whatsoever, may find it impossible to have intercourse. Therefore, in the case of rape, the examination of the accused and medical evidence conclusively establishes that the person is potent for all intents and purposes of committing sexual intercourse. As the police took no cognizance in this case, no such examination is made and thereby no evidence is on record. Besides this, in cases of rape where the child is delivered, the examination of the rapist is essential and important to ascertain whether a person can be sterile without being impotent and can perform the sexual act without being able to impregnate or get conceived. In this direction also, in such cases, the medical examination collecting the semen is necessary.[43]

89. Venereal Diseases

The prosecutrix and the accused should specifically be examined with a view to ascertain if they are infected with venereal diseases.[44] In Emperor v Asadali ,[45] it was held that the fact that the prosecutrix was not infected with gonorrhea from which the accused was suffering, was by no means, conclusive of the innocence of the accused. The communication of a venereal disease by one person to another is highly probable, but not certain.[46] Similarly, though gonorrhea, in a mild form, may be present in the girl, yet the absence of signs of gonococcus in the smears, pertaining to the accused, cannot establish his innocence.[47] Gonorrhea may exist even in young girls and infants as a result of infection, and without sexual intercourse.[48]

90. DNA Test is Clinching

DNA (Deoxyribonucleic acid) is found especially in cell nuclei which are the foundation of heredity. DNA is the genetic blue print for life and is virtually contained in every cell. No two persons, except identical twins have ever had identical DNA. DNA testing can make a virtually positive identification when the two samples match. It exonerates the innocent and helps to convict the guilty.[49]

91. Existence of Semen and Blood

It is well settled in law that absence of semen or spermatozoa is of no consequence and cannot negative the offence of rape.[50] The lack of semen stains on the clothes of the accused is natural when the accused was examined more than 23 days after the3181 incident.[51] The absence of any stains of semen on the clothes of the prosecutrix or the accused is of no consequence when the clothes of the accused were seized and examined after four days of the occurrence.[52] It is immaterial that the doctor who examined the prosecutrix stated about the non- presence of blood stains on her vaginal part and on her clothes, when it was a categorical statement by the mother of the prosecutrix that she was given bath and her clothes were washed before taking her to the doctor.[53]

The existence of semen and blood is always a material piece of evidence in cases of rape.[54] In State v Hiraman Punja Vidhate ,[55] the Court observed:

> The mere absence of semen on the clothing of the girl or in the vaginal 'swab, or the request of the girl's father to the doctor to give antitetanus injection to her, did not mean that rape was not committed on the girl when the circumstances are that the girl made the complaint naming the accused, that her private parts did show that she had been raped, and that the clothing of the accused, at the time of the offence, had stains of blood and semen suggesting that the accused could be the offender.

However, in Re Karichiappa Goundan,[56] it was held that even the presence of semen in the woman's genitals, or on her saree, is by no means conclusive that she was raped, particularly when she was a married woman at the time of the offence.[57]

Similarly, the detection of semen on a piece of cloth, recovered from the house of the accused, and the salwar, alleged to have been worn by the prosecutrix, is a neutral circumstance, helping neither the accused nor the prosecutrix, where both the persons are married and the prosecutrix, a grown up woman, admittedly passed the night before making the first information report at her husband's house.[58] A stain of semen on the langot of a young man may exist because of a variety of reasons, not connecting him with the offence of rape.[59]

The blood and semen found on the clothes of the prosecutrix, and semen found on the pyjama of the accused are strong circumstances appearing against the accused.[60] When blood and semen stains are found on the petticoat of the prosecutrix and there was no possibility that the said stains were due to physical contact with her husband, since her husband had left the house the previous afternoon, the testimony of the prosecutrix was found truthful, and the accused were convicted.[61]

Likewise, the presence of blood in the vagina may be due to either local injuries or occurrence of bleeding at the usual interval in pregnant ladies right up to the sixth month of pregnancy.[62]3182

In Pratap Misra v State of Orissa ,[63] the Supreme Court held that for the accusation of rape to be absolutely false, on the ground that according to the medical evidence, if the prosecutrix, a pregnant lady, had been raped by three persons, one after the other, in quick succession, with force and violence, the abortion would have been immediate, and not after four or five days.

In the case of State of Gujarat v Kishanbhai ,[64] the Supreme Court held that absence of semen or blood from pubic hair of accused would prima facie exculpate him from offence of rape.

92. Existence of Spermatozoa

It is well settled in law that absence of spermatozoa is of no consequence and cannot negative the offence of rape.[65] The discovery of spermatozoa in the private parts of the victim is not imperative to establish penetration. There are several factors which may negative the presence of spermatozoa.[66]

The presence or absence of spermatozoa dead or alive would differ from person to person and its positive presence depends upon various circumstances. Otherwise also, the presence of spermatozoa is ascertained for the purpose of corroboration of the prosecutrix and hence, when the prosecutrix is believed, absence of spermatozoa loses its significance.[67] As per Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and

Toxicology,[68] it has been stated that presence of spermatozoa in the vagina after intercourse has been reported by Polock (1943) from 30 minutes to 17 days and by Morrison (1972) up to nine days in vagina and 12 days in cervix.[69]

In RK Agarwal v State of Orissa ,[70] the facts were that the girl was playing in broad day light, that she was carried away by the accused and brought back crying after some time, the FIR was made shortly thereafter, and the medical examination of the accused's genitals indicated the presence of spermatozoa and there were blood stains on clothing of the accused. The said circumstances were held to be sufficiently corroborative of the act of rape by the accused on the victim.

The mere finding of spermatozoa on a quilt, by itself, may not have much evidentiary value, but it is a strong piece of evidence, when taken with the evidence given by the girl that the accused had raped her on the quilt.[71]

When the doctor examined the victim within 15 hours of the occurrence and did not find spermatozoa on the vaginal smear, the innocence of the accused can be inferred.[72] However, when there is medical corroboration of the version of the prosecutrix as on her clothes the presence of human spermatozoa has been3183 established and vaginal smear and swelling was also found on her private parts, the performance of forcible sexual intercourse with her is established.[73] The presence of semen/human spermatozoa on the salwar of the prosecutrix is strong corroborative piece of evidence to the prosecutrix version even if it has not been established that the human spermatozoa is that of the accused.[74]

Spermatozoa can be found if the woman is examined within 12 hours after intercourse/thereafter they may be found between 48 and 72 hours but in dead form. If the prosecutrix washes herself by then, the spermatozoa may not be found. In that case the court after satisfying itself regarding the presence of semen on the clothes of the prosecutrix, held that the absence of semen or spermatozoa in the vaginal smear and slides, cannot cast doubt on the creditworthiness of the prosecutrix.[75]

Modi in his Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology[76] has noted:

> The presence of spermatozoa in the vagina after intercourse has been reported by Polock (1943) from 30 minutes to 17 days and by Morrison (1972) 9 days in vagina and 12 days in the cervix. However, in the vagina of a dead woman, they persist for a longer period.

93. Sperm Detection Test

Where there was a categorical finding of the doctor that the hymen was found to have been ruptured, and the other prosecution witnesses also stated injury on her private parts and oozing of blood, and the medical evidence proved that the victim was raped before her death and died, the absence of a Sperm detection test was held not fatal. [77]

94. Examining the Hymen

It is evident that while examining the hymen, certain anatomical characteristics have to be remembered before assigning significance to the findings. It is also clear that the shape and texture of the hymen is variable. Sometimes, this variation permits penetration without injury because of peculiar shape of the orifice or increased elasticity. On the contrary, sometimes the hymen may be more firm, less elastic and gets stretched and lacerated earlier. Relatively less forceful penetration may not give rise to injuries ordinarily possible with a forceful attempt.[78] When the victim was a minor girl of 14 years age, and the doctor examined her, giving the opinion that there was no definite evidence of sexual intercourse and her hymen was intact, it would be highly doubtful whether the offence of rape was completed.[79]

95. Rupture of Hymen

In a case of girl of tender age, rupture of hymen, in the event of penetration, is not as a matter of rule. In cases where the hymen is deep seated, it may not rupture though there may be a penetration. In case of a forcible attempt to penetrate also, there are chances that the hymen of the victim may not rupture particularly when it3184 is deep seated. The presence of redness and inflammation over the vagina is at least a sign that either a complete penetration has taken place or a partial penetration has taken place or a forcible attempt to penetrate was made against the victim. Modi[80] opines that in small children, the hymen is not usually ruptured, but may become red and congested along with the inflammation and bruising of the labia. If considerable violence is used, there is often laceration of the fourchette and the perineum.[81] Where the hymen of the prosecutrix remained intact, it was held that, the offence under s 376, IPC against the accused was not proved beyond reasonable doubt.[82]

To constitute the offence of rape, the rupture of hymen is not necessary.[83]

The mere fact that hymen was intact, would not by itself negative the commission of rape by the accused as tearing of hymen would depend upon the extent of penetration and force used while committing sexual assault. The slightest penetration is sufficient for the commission of offence of rape and proof of rupture of hymen is unnecessary.[84]

Two Fingers Test

The fact of admission of two fingers and the hymen rupture does not give a clear indication that prosecutrix is habitual to sexual intercourse. The doctor has to opine as to whether the hymen stood ruptured much earlier or carried an old tear. The factum of admission of two fingers could be held adverse to the prosecutrix, as it would also depend upon the size of the fingers inserted. The doctor must give his clear opinion as to whether it was painful and bleeding on touch, for the reason that such condition obviously relates to the hymen.[85]

96. Absence of Hair, fresh Bleeding on Private Part of Prosecutrix

The absence of the matting of pubic hairs, foreign hair or fresh bleeding coupled with the absence of scratches on the prosecutrix's back and sperm, dead or alive, in her vaginal swab cannot outweigh the injuries appearing on her private parts as deposed by the medical witness and it cannot be said that the lacerated wounds on her private parts is the result of itching self-inflicted by the informant by her nail.[86]

97. Prosecutrix a Married Woman having Children -- Absence of Injuries

Where the prosecutrix is a married grown up lady, and blessed with two children, in such circumstances, the absence of injuries on her private parts is not of much significance. The mere fact that no injuries were found on the private parts of her3185 body cannot be a ground to hold that she was not subjected to any sexual assault, hence, the accused was convicted for offence under s 376, IPC .[87]

98. Existence of Smegma

It is well known in the medical world that the examination of smegma loses all importance 24 hours after sexual intercourse.[88]

The presence of smegma on the glans penis covered by the foreskin proves that the accused could not have had sexual intercourse at least during the last 24 hours.[89] However, the medical examination report of the accused indicating that no smegma was seen and he was capable of performing sexual intercourse supports the version of the prosecutrix.[90]

In Modi's Jurisprudence and Toxicology, it has been mentioned that the smegma accumulates on the glans penis if no bath is taken for 24 hours. The presence of smegma on the glans penis is a strong circumstance against sexual intercourse especially where the prosecutrix is alleged to have been ravished thrice by each accused one by one at the same time. In a case of gang rape of this character, it was most unlikely that smegma would be present on the glans penis of the accused persons. It is true that to constitute the offence of rape, it is not necessary that there should be complete penetration of the penis with emission of semen and rupture of hymen. Partial penetration within the labia majora or vulva with or without emission of semen is sufficient to constitute the offence of rape. However, in case where the prosecutrix is alleged to have been ravished by two young boys aged about 18 and 19 years repeatedly one by one, the presence of smegma on the glans penis of both the accused is a strong circumstance consistent with their innocence.[91] However, the presence of a negligible amount of smegma on the coronagrandis cannot disprove penetration.[92]

In Medical Jurisprudence[93], the learned authors have observed as under:

> Presence of smegma--In rape cases if the gland of male organ is covered by smegma, it negatives the possibility of recent complete penetration. If the accused is not circumcised, the existence of smegma round the corona gland is proof against penetration since it is rubbed off during the act. The smegma accumulates, if no bath is taken within 24 hours. In rape cases, the investigation must get the male organ of the alleged offender examined.[94]

However, when the accused aged 35 years committed rape on a girl of 5-6 years of age, there is no question of complete penetration of the accused's penis, therefore, by presence of smegma only on the dorsal side of the accused's glens, cannot completely rule out or negative the possibility of rape committed by him on the said girl.[95]3186

99. Ladies Bearing Child

Even if the prosecutrix is a married woman and is actually pregnant at the time of the alleged rape, medical evidence can help the prosecution.[1] When the doctor who had examined the prosecutrix has clearly stated that, no definite opinion could be gathered about any recent sexual intercourse. The doctor to a court's question replied that in the case of ladies bearing child if rape is committed on such ladies, the signs and injuries may not appear because vaginal walls of such ladies are dilated. The evidence of doctor does not rule out the possibility of commission of rape on prosecutrix, in such type of medical evidence, it is the only evidence of prosecutrix that has to be considered to find out the truth.[2]

100. Gang Rape--Medical Evidence not Supporting Prosecution

Where the prosecutrix was alleged to have been subjected to sexual intercourse by 5 persons, a perusal of the report of the doctor showed that there was no injury on any part of the body. There was no matting of pubic hair with discharge. There were no injuries or tenderness on genital areas, the hymen was ruptured and the old scars were present. No fresh scars or tenderness were found. There was no tenderness in vaginal organ or the cervical area. In the doctor's opinion there was no evidence of recent sexual intercourse and there was no sign of struggle. The prosecutrix was used to sexual intercourse. In her statement, the doctor has explained that in the case of sexual assault on a lady, if she is put under fear, there may or may not be injuries and if the concerned lady is habituated to sexual intercourse there may not be any injury. She, however, asserted that there was no evidence of recent sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix. It was held that the prosecution can derive no support from medical evidence.[3]

101. Delayed Medical Examination of Prosecutrix -- Absence of Injuries on her Private Parts Immaterial

In case of delayed medical examination of the prosecutrix, if the medical officer has not found injuries on her private parts, it would not affect the prosecution case. Where the prosecutrix was taken to doctor after the expiry of one month and 14 days, the absence of injuries in medical examination on her private parts was held immaterial. [4]

102. Medical Examination of Victim--Refusal by Doctor

The refusal of some government hospital doctors, particularly in rural areas, where hospital are few and far between, the conduct of any medical examination of a rape victim unless the case of rape is referred to them by the police would not be proper. Such refusal to conduct the medical examination necessarily results in delay in the ultimate examination of the victim, by which time the evidence of the rape may have been washed away by the complainant herself or be otherwise lost. The state is expected to ensure that such a situation does not persist.[5]3187

103. Medical Examination of Prosecutrix Twice--Effect

Where it appeared from the record that the medical examination of the victim girl was authorised by the court and the question of her examination, twice by the medical officer was occasioned only due to the mentioning of a wrong name by the victim girl and for mentioning the wrong case number, there appeared overwhelming evidence as to what prompted the victim girl to suppress her real name at different stages, no illegality was found in the manner the victim girl was examined by the medical officer, particularly when the medical reports were not different and the medical officer was consistent in his cross-examination being unshaken to depose that features of forcible sexual intercourse of recent origin were there in the private parts of the victim girl.[6]

104. Manipulation in Medical Report by Doctor

When the doctor has been found to help the accused by making interpolations in the report, it cannot be said that the doctor has given an independent report.

Such interpolated reports cannot be acted upon to ascertain the age of the prosecutrix.[7]

It is expected that the members of the medical profession and particularly doctors who are working in public hospitals should grasp the seriousness and horrifying consequences of the offence of rape and other sexual assaults, and that they should act in a far more professional, responsible and considerate manner. The fact that such an incident took place is bad enough and the fact that because of this type of handling in the hospitals, the courts are forced to acquit the accused, is compounding injustice and it is high time that the medical profession realises the damage that it is doing, and acts in the manner which the law and the courts expect of them.[8]

It is found that time and again the medical evidence in almost every case of sexual assault on women is tampered with and that the doctors come out with evidence that can only be termed as 'pro accused'. It does not require much intelligence to see through these malpractices which clearly indicate that there is a very serious integrity problem at this level. One comes across instances where doctors have brazenly given evidence that has virtually sabotaged the prosecution case as has happened in this instance. The court should not close its eyes to this state of affairs and direct the government to immediately formulate adequate safeguards to ensure that there is a full stop to these illegalities.[9]

When the government doctor examining the victim gave a certificate of commission of rape on the victim, turned hostile during trial, and tried to protect the accused, the court took a serious view of the matter and recommended the concerned authorities to take appropriate disciplinary action against him after affording him a reasonable opportunity to show cause. The court took the serious view of the fact that where heinous offence of sexual assaults on minors take place, and the medical authorities which should be instrumental in assisting the administration of justice in bringing such persons to book, are found to join hands with the culprits and subvert the due process of law.[10]3188

105. Non Examination of Doctor and Non-production of Medical Report--Effect

The non-examination of the lady doctor is fatal to the prosecution case.[11] It is well settled that non-examination of doctor and non-production of medical report would not be fatal to the prosecution case if the evidence of prosecutrix and other witnesses is worthy of credence and inspire confidence.[12] But when there is no dispute as to the contents of the certificate produced before the learned trial court, it is not necessary to examine the doctor.[13] The non -examination of the doctor who examined the prosecutrix, and the non-production of the doctor's report is not fatal to prosecution if the evidence of the prosecutrix and other witnesses is reliable.[14] When the testimony of the prosecutrix of rape having been committed on her by the accused is truthful and reliable, the non-examination of the lady doctor and non-production of medical report pales into insignificance.[15]

106. Plea of Insanity

When on conducting enquiry under s 329, CrPC, the trial court found that the accused was fit to make his defence, and accordingly, the trial proceeded ahead, the material on record also did not show that the accused was suffering from unsoundness of mind and that too of a nature which would have rendered him incapable of knowing the nature of the act which he was doing or incapable of distinguishing between wrong or right as per law, the plea of insanity would not be tenable.[16]

BENEFIT OF DOUBT AND ACQUITTAL

107. Principle of benefit of doubt and Conscience of the Court

The conscience of the court can never be bound by any rule but that is coming itself dictates the consciousness and prudent exercise of the judgment. Reasonable doubt is simply that degree of doubt which would permit a reasonable and just man to come to a conclusion. Reasonableness of the doubt must commensurate with the nature of the offence to be investigated. Exaggerated devotion to the rule of benefit of doubt must not nurture fanciful doubts or lingering suspicions and thereby destroy social defence. Justice cannot be made sterile on the plea that it is better to let a hundred guilty escape than punish an innocent. Letting the guilty escape is not doing justice, according to law.[17]

108. Benefit of Doubt

When it is proved that rape was committed by 'some one' on the prosecutrix, but there is no evidence connecting the accused with the commission of the crime, the3189 benefit of doubt should go to the accused.[18] In Gaya Rout v State ,[19]it was alleged that the act of rape continued for a long time and throughout that time the prosecutrix who was a girl of 11-12 years, struggled her best to get up from the ground where she was made to lie down, but her evidence to that effect was not corroborated by anything on record. No injury was found on her body during medical examination. It was observed that it sounds improbable how a girl of 11-12 years was forcibly raped by the accused at a rough and rugged place near the railway lines for a long time and all that time she was struggling hard to extricate herself from the clutches of the accused, yet she did not sustain any injury, indicating such struggle on her back, buttocks and other parts of her body. In these circumstances, the accused was given the benefit of the doubt. In Surat Singh v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[20] there was a sole evidence of the prosecutrix, a girl of 8 or 9 years, the other witnesses having turned hostile. The medical evidence only partly supported the prosecution version and the police report was lodged after a week of the occurrence. In these circumstances, it was observed that all that can be said is that there is a strong degree of suspicion, but it cannot be said that the guilt has been proved to the hilt and, therefore, the benefit of the doubt should go the accused. Where direct evidence as to the commission of the crime is untrustworthy and neither the absence of semen and blood the existence of which is always a material piece of evidence in cases of rape, nor the delay in making the first information report is satisfactorily explained and there is enmity between the accused's family and the prosecutrix's family, it is not possible to affirmatively hold that the accused raped the girl and the accused is entitled to the benefit of reasonable doubt as to his guilt.[21] No inference, adverse to the accused, can be drawn from the fact that the alleged victim of rape by him was very much ashamed and even committed suicide owing to the shame brought on her.[22] If there is no acceptable evidence to the effect that the prosecutrix was subjected to sexual intercourse and the statement of the prosecutrix does not find corroboration from the evidence on record, the accused cannot be convicted under s 376, IPC .[23] Commentary under the heading. When prosecutrix should not be believed Instances' in this section, may be referred to.

The prosecution case was that on the day of the incident at about 3 PM when the prosecutrix aged about 18 years had gone to fetch water, the accused called her inside his house on the false pretext that her father was inside his house and thereafter he raped her. As per the evidence of the doctor, there was no injury on the body of the prosecutrix and there was no sign of semen on the private parts of the girl's body. Neither her clothes were torn nor was there any presence of hair of the accused on the private part of the prosecutrix. The doctor after examining the prosecutrix deposed that the girl was habituated to sexual intercourse and it was held that the accused charged under ss 376 and 511, IPC was entitled to benefit of doubt, and as such, was acquitted.[24]3190

109. Accused Acquitted -- Illustrative Cases

The accused was prosecuted on allegations that he confined the prosecutrix in a room and committed rape on her, however, the prosecutrix gave a totally different version in her cross-examination, which rendered the prosecution case doubtful and the medical evidence adduced in the case did not corroborate the case of rape, therefore, the accused was acquitted of the rape charge.[25]

Where the rape was alleged to have been committed by the side of a busy and electrified road, and curiously enough, the cries of the prosecutrix did not attract any passerby, further, there were material contradictions in oral evidence and medical evidence, it was found that the testimony of the prosecutrix did not inspire confidence and hence the accused was acquitted of charge under s 376, IPC .[26] The evidence of the prosecutrix, aged more than 18 years as to the time of the commission of the offence, was contradictory. Her shout for help was not supported by the landlord of the premises where the rape was alleged to have been committed and no other evidence was adduced to prove the charge of rape, it was held that the acquittal was proper.[27]

The accused constable was alleged to have committed rape on a child when the latter was playing on his terrace, however, the parents of the girl and the medical evidence did not support the prosecution story. The child eye-witnesses examined in the case were in the custody of the police before they were examined in court, hence their evidence was found not reliable. The accused was acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC .[28] The prosecution case was that the accused abducted the prosecutrix, took her to a bus stand and gang rape was committed. It was alleged that since the bus stand is a busy place, and the prosecutrix did not cry for help, further, that in the medical examination the doctor did not find any injuries on her person, the prosecution and the charge under s 376, IPC was not proved.[29]

The prosecutrix aged 17 years and 2 months knew the accused from before. They were having some relationship for last one year, which was objected to by the parents of the prosecutrix. The accused was visiting the house of the prosecutrix and letters and calls were being exchanged between them. Further, the victim was not opposed to marry the accused, but it was only that her parents were objecting to the same and she was dressed like a bride at the time of recovery. The prosecutrix did not submit but in fact consented and voluntarily went with the accused and stayed with him for more than ten days, though her relationship with the accused was not palatable to her parents who reported the matter to police. It is not a case where she was under any psychological pressure, inducement or allurement of any nature. The possibility of the prosecutrix having consented to the rape could not be ruled out, hence the accused was acquitted of the charge under ss 366 and 376, IPC .[30]

The prosecutrix was a major and she along with the accused lived in a rented house for a period of sixty eight days from the date of alleged abduction, she did not raise3191 an alarm or protest during this long period, therefore, the prosecutrix was held a consenting party and the conviction of the accused under ss 366 and 376, IPC was set aside.[31]

In a case, the prosecution story was that the accused, a friend of the brother of the prosecutrix, forcibly committed rape against her will at 8.30 a.m. in daylight near a public road. The prosecutrix had previous acquaintance with the accused or else in all probability she would have resisted forcefully, attracting passersby or people from the neighbourhood. She had stated that she was threatened and made to believe that the accused would marry her, later she became pregnant and delivered a child, and the paternity of the child was disputed by the accused. An FIR was lodged after a period of 10 months from the date of incident, the prosecutrix version was found doubtful, and conviction of the accused appellant under s 376, IPC recorded by courts below, was set aside.[32] The prosecution case as testified by the prosecutrix was that when she was pursuing a computer course during the year 2007-2008, the accused was running a bakery shop nearby, and developed intimacy with the prosecutrix. The prosecutrix called the accused to the fields near her house, and on one evening they had sexual relations which continued for two years. The prosecutrix became pregnant, which was aborted, and when requested, the accused refused to marry the girl. Accordingly, the medical evidence did not support the case of the prosecutrix except that the prosecutrix was found habitual to sexual intercourse and there was paucity of evidence to show that the accused administered medicine which caused abortion, therefore, the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC .[33]

The two accused at 1.30 a.m. at night were alleged to have entered in the house of the prosecutrix and committed rape on her, one after the other. The eye-witnesses, the nephew and niece of the prosecutrix denied the events narrated in the complaint. The testimony of the prosecutrix did not find corroboration from the averments made in the complaint. Intercourse was alleged to be forcible by the prosecutrix, but no injury was found on the prosecutrix in the medical examination. The accused were acquitted of the charge under s 376(2)(g), IPC .[34]

When the prosecutrix went to the house of the accused class-mate to fetch her book, she was alleged to have been raped by the accused. The FIR was delayed by 11 days, but the delay was not explained. The doctor and the Investigating Officer were not examined in the case. The prosecutrix and the accused were class-mates, were acquaintances, and were in terms of meeting with each other. The prosecution story was held doubtful and the conviction of the accused under s 376, IPC was set aside.[35] In the instant case, there was no evidence that act of rape was committed by the accused on the prosecutrix against her consent or will or after promise for marriage. The prosecutrix remained in the company of the accused and moved from3192 one village to another and from one town to another town for about one month and did not complain anything against the appellant to anybody. She nowhere stated that she submitted herself because of the promise made by the accused to marry her and she was having full belief and faith upon the accused that he will marry her. It was held that, it could not be said that the consent of the prosecutrix was obtained on misconception of fact and the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC .[36].

An FIR was lodged after about by 48 hours of the incident, the doctor who conducted the examination of the prosecutrix found no injury on her genitalia and deposed that there was no evidence to show that she had been raped as the tear in her hymen was an old one. The prosecutrix also stated that at the time of her medical examination her vagina had been stitched. The doctor found no stitch on her and the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC .[37]The accused had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix by giving false assurance to her that he would marry her and after she got pregnant, he refused to do so. From this, it was evident that he never intended to marry her and procured her consent only for the reason of having sexual relations with her, which act of the accused falls squarely under the definition of rape as he had sexual intercourse with her consent which was obtained under a misconception of fact as defined under s 90 of the IPC, hence, the accused was convicted under s 376, IPC .[38] The evidence brought on record showed that the prosecutrix and the accused led marital life as married couple and there was intercourse with her by him. The prosecutrix herself fell in love with the accused and she went to the extent of threatening him that if he were not to love and would not marry her, she would die. Therefore, it was clear that she wanted to marry him at any cost, even without the consent of her parents. Since her parents were thinking of giving her in marriage to some other person, she communicated the same to the accused and compelled him to take her from her house and to marry her. The prosecutrix was a willing and consenting party. The testimony of the prosecutrix was not found reliable, the accused was thus acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC .[39]

The prosecutrix in statement before the Court deposed that she was raped by the accused, but in statement under s 161, CrPC she had not attributed rape to the accused, therefore the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC .[40]

Rape on Elderly Woman--Prosecution Story Improbable--Accused Acquitted

The accused, a young man was alleged to have entered the house of the prosecutrix an elderly woman, and inflicted injuries on her. The prosecutrix was alleged to have snatched a weapon from the accused and inflicted injuries on the accused. The accused had sustained serious injuries including a grievous one and the son of the prosecutrix and a relative who had reached the place of incidence, were both declared hostile and did not support the prosecutrix, even her husband who had accompanied her to the police station to lodge the report did not come into the witness box and the doctor was also unable to confirm the factum of rape. The prosecution story was3193 found improbable, and accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC .[41]

In the FIR, it was stated by the prosecutrix that the accused raped her thrice, but in statement before the Court she deposed that she was raped twice. In medical examination no injury was found on her private parts and she had enough opportunity to get down from the tractor carrying her which passed through several villages. Her testimony was full of material contradictions such that the conviction of the accused under s 376, IPC was not sustainable, and was set aside.[42] Where the prosecution case was that the accused kidnapped a 12 years old girl, raped her, committed her murder and threw her dead body in the bushes, but the evidence of the last seen was found not reliable, and the identity of the accused was not fully established, the accused was not convicted of offences under ss 363, 376, 302 and 201, IPC .[43]

The accused was prosecuted on allegations that he threatened the prosecutrix, promised to marry her and thereafter committed rape on her. The prosecutrix was a major and knew that the accused was already married and so the accused could not marry her. She also became pregnant. The Court held that the consent of the prosecutrix was not under misconception of fact and the acquittal of the accused on charges under ss 376 and 417, IPC recorded by Court below was held to be proper.[44]

The only evidence against the accused was that he provided space and cot and helped in detaining the prosecutrix. The evidence was lacking to show that the accused knew about the kidnapping and commission of rape by the co-accused on the prosecutrix. The accused was acquitted of the charge under s 376(2)(g), IPC, though convicted under s 368, IPC .[45]

The accused and co-accused at 10 p.m. in the night, were alleged to have entered the house of the prosecutrix, and at the point of knife committed rape on the prosecutrix and ran away. The FIR was filed next day and admittedly there was enmity between the accused and the husband of the prosecutrix. The prosecutrix did not support the case against the co-accused, and hence he was acquitted by the trial Court. The testimony of the prosecutrix was full of material contradictions and was not supported by medical evidence. At a later stage, the prosecutrix filed an affidavit, whereby she exonerated the accused. The circumstances of the case taken as a whole created a doubt about the prosecution case and the accused was also acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC .[46]

110. Accused Acquitted under Section 376 cannot be Convicted under Section 306

Where a careful reading of the material available on record would go to show that virtually on the same set of facts and basing on the same evidence, the trial in the case was conducted which had resulted in an acquittal for the offence of rape, the3194 only additional factor in the trial appears to be the dying declaration of the prosecutrix. On the strength of this additional factor, the trial court was found not justified in recording conviction under s 306, IPC especially, in the light of the fact that the charges in relation to both the offences had been founded on the same set of facts.[47]

111. Effect of Acquittal of Same Accused on Conviction of Others

The legal position is and reasonably well settled that merely because the co-accused have been acquitted and prima facie if the acquittal of the co-accused is bad and no appeal has been filed against the judgment of acquittal by the state, that by itself will not be ground of acquittal of the accused, who has been convicted, if there is evidence on record establishing the guilt of such accused beyond any reasonable doubt. Therefore, merely because the three accused persons have been acquitted by the trial court on almost identical evidence and the state has not chosen to file an appeal against the judgment of acquittal, if on the basis of the available evidence on record, the conviction of the accused/appellant could be sustained, the present accused/appellant cannot derive any advantage. What is, therefore, required to be seen is whether there is sufficient evidence on record to being home the guilt of the accused for the offence punishable under s 376(g), IPC .[48]

CONVICTION

112. Conviction

The statement of the prosecutrix corroborated by medical and circumstantial evidence on record, is sufficient to hold the accused guilty under s 376, IPC .[49] Where the accused who was running a photo studio committed rape on a seven years old, disposed of her dead body in a carton he was convicted under ss 201, 302 and 376, IPC .[50] Where there was evidence of a teacher, an independent and responsible witness who deposed that he had seen the accused and the deceased girl aged about 10 years going towards the orchard field and the dead body of the deceased victim recovered from the orchard field, the evidence of last seen was found reliable and the accused could not explain the injuries/scratches found on his face. Here, the accused was convicted for offence under ss 302 and 376, IPC .[51]

On the day of the incident, at about 12 noon, the accused criminally intimidated the prosecutrix, a married lady aged 22 years, and committed rape on her. The prosecutrix along with her husband was residing in the house of the accused and an FIR was filed by the husband of the prosecutrix. The delay in filing the FIR was found immaterial and the statement of the prosecutrix being straightforward was believed. A plea of false implication was not accepted and a conviction of the accused for offence under s 376, IPC was held proper.[52] There was reliable evidence of the prosecutrix that the accused entered the house of the prosecutrix during night hours and raped her. The brother, mother of the prosecutrix and other witnesses supported her version. The prosecutrix3195 was a mother of three children, her medical examination was held after several days, and as such, it did not corroborate her version, which was held immaterial, and the accused was convicted for offence under s 376, IPC .[53]

The accused was prosecuted on allegations that the accused conductor kidnapped the victim girl and raped her in a bus. The medical evidence did not show that sexual intercourse was committed, however the evidence showed that attempt was made by the accused to commit rape. The accused was convicted for attempt to commit rape under ss 376 / 511 and 366, IPC .[54]

The accused kidnapped a girl aged about 18 years, and took her to a lonely place and committed rape on her. The accused was convicted under ss 366 and 376, IPC .[55] The school leaving certificate and school register produced before the Court showed that the age of the victim was 14 years on the date of the commission of the offence, and there was also evidence of the Head Master of the School. There was no material before the High Court to ignore the said evidence and conclude that the entry in the school registers cannot be taken to be above the suspicion. The acquittal of the accused was set aside and the accused was convicted for offences under ss 366 and 376, IPC .[56] There was clear evidence of the prosecutrix that the accused truck driver committed rape on her and she also correctly identified the accused in test identification parade. The accused was not known to the prosecutrix from before, therefore, omission of the name of the accused in FIR, was immaterial. The conviction of the accused under s 376, IPC was sustained.[57]

The prosecutrix had gone in the field to bring green grass and after collecting the green grass she was on her way back to her home. The accused came to her and proposed for sexual intercourse. The victim protested and told that she will inform her mother in respect thereof. The accused felled her on the ground and removed her undergarment and ravished her. She was crying in pain and at this, the accused stuffed her mouth with clothes. The genitals of the accused had penetrated in her genitals which gave immense pain to her and, thereafter, the accused left her. She saw blood oozing from her private parts which had besmeared her undergarment. After the return from the said field, she narrated the incident to the brothers and their wives. The medical officer who had medically examined the prosecutrix had found superficial laceration present over perineum just at the bottom of Labia Majora and Labia Minora. She further deposed that the hymen membrane of the victim was found torn and there was fresh bleeding from slight touch and she has also found that her vaginal orifice admits one finger with difficulty. Therefore it was held that the charge under s 376, IPC was proved and the accused was convicted under s 376, IPC . The plea of the accused that the offence, if any, was under s 354, IPC was rejected.[58]3196

The prosecution story was that the accused committed rape on a minor girl aged 6 years and committed her murder. There was reliable evidence of the eye-witnesses that the accused was carrying the deceased girl on cycle and the dead body of the deceased was recovered next day from the sugar cane field. The evidence of their last seen together was found reliable and the omission of the name of the accused in FIR was explained. The accused was convicted under ss 376 and 302, IPC .[59]

When the statement of the prosecutrix is corroborated by medical evidence and evidence of other witnesses, the accused is liable to be convicted.[60]

Where three accused persons entered the house of the victim forcibly, lifted her, carried her to the shop of one accused and committed rape on her, the testimony of the prosecutrix was found reliable and the accused were convicted under ss 366 / 457 and 376 / 34, IPC .[61]

There was reliable evidence adduced by the prosecution that when the prosecutrix was returning after watching a movie, the accused took the victim about aged 12 years in an auto rickshaw and raped her. The statement of the victim girl was corroborated by medical report and FIR. It was immaterial that the hymen of the victim girl was found intact, and the conviction of the accused concurrently recorded by the Courts below was held proper.[62]

The statement of the prosecutrix that the accused, abducted her and committed rape on her was found in line with the averments made in the complaint. The prosecution established that the prosecutrix stayed with the accused in a lodge. The accused appellant was convicted for offences under ss 366 / 34 and 376 / 34, IPC .[63] Four accused entered the courtyard of the prosecutrix's house at about 11 p.m., and on the point of pistol, took her to the house in another village and committed rape on her. The FIR was lodged next day and the testimony of the prosecutrix and her mother was found reliable and believed. The plea of false implication had no substance and as such, was rejected. The conviction of all the accused under ss 366 and 376 IPC was held proper.[64] There was evidence of the villagers, that they asked the accused to marry the prosecutrix as he was having a physical relationship with her. When the accused refused, an FIR was filed and prosecution of the accused was launched. As long as commitment of marriage subsisted, the relationship between the parties could not be described as constituting the offence of rape under s 376 of the IPC . It is only after the accused declined to marry the prosecutrix that a different dimension came to be attached to the physical relationship, which had legitimately continued over the past six months. Things changed when the accused declined to marry the prosecutrix. After the promised alliance was declined, the prosecutrix without any delay, disclosed the entire episode to her immediate family, and the FIR was filed and the3197 prosecution launched. The conviction of the accused for offence under s 375, IPC was held proper.[65]The accused, brother-in-law of the prosecutrix, entered the victim's room during night, and committed rape on her. The statement of the prosecutrix was corroborated by oral evidence of the victim's younger sister, and the bite marks and the bruises found on the person of the victim in medical examination. Her hymen was found ruptured, the delay in filing the FIR was explained and the conviction of the accused on the charge of rape was held proper.[66] The evidence of the prosecutrix and other PWS to whom the prosecutrix informed immediately after the incident proved that the accused committed rape on the complainant at knife point. In medical examination, the hymen of the prosecutrix was found torn and ruptured. The broken bangles were also recovered from the place of occurrence at the instance of the prosecutrix. The conviction of the accused under ss 376 and 511, Pt II was upheld.[67]

When the prosecutrix was studying in class VII, the accused had developed his physical relationship with her and when she was in class IX, she gave birth to the baby. The School Transfer Certificate proved that the prosecutrix, when she was in class VII, she was 12 years old. The testimony of the prosecutrix (PW2) was found reliable, thus, conviction of the accused for offence under s 376, IPC, with sentence of 7 years rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs. 5000/- was found proper.[68] The testimony of the prosecutrix proved that the accused appellant committed rape on the prosecutrix, and her testimony was corroborated by the evidence of other eye-witnesses and the medical evidence. The victim had no control over the investigating agency and the negligence, if any, e.g. negligence of the investigating officer to send the blood stained clothes of the prosecutrix for chemical examination, would not affect the credibility of the statement of the victim. The accused appellant was convicted under s 376, IPC .[69]

The prosecution case was that the appellant accused committed rape on a pregnant woman while she was collecting cow dung cake in forest. The mere fact that semen stains were not found on the clothes of the prosecutrix was held immaterial as the clothes were seized and examined four days after the occurrence. There was no motive for false implication and minor inconsistencies and discrepancies in the testimony of the eye-witnesses were held of no consequence. The plea of the appellant accused that since the prosecutrix, a pregnant lady, did not abort hence she was a consenting party, in the presence of the statement of the prosecutrix was rejected. Therefore, the appellant accused was convicted under s 376, IPC .[70]

The charge against the accused appellant was that he committed rape on his own daughter. The testimony of the daughter victim of rape against her own father was found reliable as she had no reason to falsely implicate her father. The delay of one3198 week in filing FIR was held not fatal and conviction of the accused under s 376, IPC was upheld. [71]

113. Father Raping his own Daughter--Conviction Proper

Where there was evidence of the victim daughter and her mother that the accused father committed rape on the daughter, and their testimony was corroborated by medical evidence, the accused was convicted under s 376, IPC . [72]

114. Conviction of Accused and his Conspirator Wife

Where the co-accused wife of the accused took the prosecutrix, a minor girl to her house and closed the door from outside and thereafter the accused committed rape on the prosecutrix, there was convincing evidence of the prosecution that the co-accused entered into conspiracy with her husband, which cannot be discarded only on reasoning that a wife will not help her husband in commission of rape on a girl. The conviction of the accused under s 376 and the co-accused under s 376 read with s 120-B was found proper.[73]

Punishment for rape.--

115. Appeal against Conviction--High Court cannot enhance sentence without Exercising Revisional Powers

In Sahab Singh v State of Haryana ,[74] the Apex Court made the following observations:

> "Now in the present case the appeal was settled under s 374(2) of the Code by the convicts against the order passed by the Additional Sessions Judge. No appeal was filed by the State under s 377(1) of the Code against the sentence awarded by the trial court for the offence under ss 302 / 149, IPC on the ground of its inadequacy. Nor did the High Court exercise suo motu revisional powers under s 397 read with s 401 of the Code. If the High Court was minded to enhance the sentence the proper course was to exercise suo motu powers under s 397 read with s 402 of the Code by issuing notice of enhancement and hearing the convicts on the question of inadequacy of sentence. Without following such procedure it was not open to the High Court in the appeal filed by the convicts to enhance the sentence by enhancing the fine. The High Court clearly acted without jurisdiction. For the above reasons we are clearly of the opinion that the appeal must succeed."

116. Special Leave Petition under Article 136 --General Principles

In an appeal filed under art 136 of the Constitution, generally the Supreme Court does not interfere with the finding of fact arrived after proper appreciation of evidence by the courts below. If, however, such a finding is perverse, based upon no evidence or based upon such evidence which is inadmissible or is the result of imaginative hypothesis and conjectures, the court is entitled to re-appreciate the evidence to ascertain the validity of the judgment impugned.[75] In 3199*Dalbir Kaur and Ors v State of Punjab* [76] the general principles governing interference by the Supreme Court, in criminal appeal by special leave were summarised as follows:

(1) that the court would not interfere with the concurrent finding of fact based on pure appreciation of evidence even if it were to take a different view on the evidence;
(2) that the court will not normally enter into a reappraisement or review of the evidence, unless the assessment of the High Court is vitiated by an error of law or procedure or is based on an error of record, misreading of evidence or is inconsistent with the evidence, for instance, where the ocular evidence is totally inconsistent with the medical evidence and so on;

(3) that the court would not enter into credibility of the evidence with a view to substitute its own opinion for that of the High Court;

(4) that the court would interfere where the High Court has arrived at a finding of fact in disregard of a judicial process, principles of natural justice or a fair hearing or has acted in violation of a mandatory provision of law or procedure resulting in serious prejudice or injustice to the accused;

(5) the court might also interfere where on the proved facts wrong inferences of law have been drawn or where the conclusions of the High Court are manifestly perverse and based on no evidence.

In exercise of jurisdiction under art 136 of the Constitution of India, the Supreme Court has set up judicial precedents for the purpose of averting miscarriage of justice and that is why in some cases where the court reached the conclusion that no conviction of any accused is possible, the benefit of that decision was extended to the co-accused, though he may not have challenged the order by means of an appeal petition to the Supreme Court.[77]

The power of the Supreme Court under art 136 of the Constitution of India is not circumscribed by any limitation. In any case, the power under art 142 of the Constitution of India is available to pass such order as may be deemed appropriate to do complete justice.[78] The limitations imposed under s 401(3), CrPC, cannot be read into the power available to the Supreme Court under art 136 of the Constitution . Therefore, in case of appeal against acquittal, if the acquittal was found wrongful, then the Supreme Court would be competent to convict the accused and the case would not be sent back for retrial.[79]

117 . Section 377 (3) of CrPC and Article 136 of the Constitution

In State of Uttar Pradesh v Dharmendra Singh ,[80] the Supreme Court considered s 377(3) of CrPC and observed, thus:

> A perusal of this section shows that this provision is applicable only when the matter is before the High Court and the same is not applicable to this court when an appeal for enhancement of sentence is made under art 136 of the Constitution . It is to be noted that3200 an appeal to this court in criminal matters is not provided under the code except in cases covered by s 379 of the Code. An appeal to this court under art 136 of the Constitution is not the same as a statutory appeal under the code. This court under art 136 of the Constitution is not a regular court of appeal which an accused can approach as of right. It is extraordinary jurisdiction which is exercisable only in exceptional cases when this court is satisfied that it should interfere to prevent a grave or serious miscarriage of justice, as distinguished from mere error in appreciation of evidence. While exercising this jurisdiction this court is not bound by the rules of procedure as applicable to the courts below. This court's jurisdiction under art 136 of the Constitution is limited only by its own discretion.[81]. In that view of the matter, we are of the opinion that s 377 (3) of the Code in terms does not apply to an appeal under art 136 of the Constitution ..."

This does not mean that this court will be unmindful of the principles analogous to those found in the Code including those under s 373(3) of the CrPC while moulding a procedure for the disposal of an appeal under art 136 of the Constitution . Apart from the Supreme Court Rules applicable for the disposal of criminal appeals in this court, the court also adopts such analogous principles found in the Code so as to make the procedure a fair procedure depending on the facts and circumstances of the case.

118. Orders of the Supreme Court under Article 142 are Not Per Se Precedent

The Supreme Court in its plenary power under art 142 of the Constitution of India can make any decree or order as may be found by it to be necessary for doing complete justice in any case or matter pending before it. Thus, when the Supreme Court in exercise of power under art 142, passes an order for assisting the victims of rape that cannot be relied upon as precedent, unless the Apex Court so directs. It is expected that the State Government will soon constitute the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. The other parameters laid down in para 17 of the judgment[82] shall be carried out by all concerned punctually and faithfully.[83]

119. Broad Parameters in Assisting the victim of Rape--Interim Compensation

In Domestic Working Women's Forum v Union of India ,[84] the Apex Court after considering various cases took note of the fact that in recent time, there has been increasing violence against women. It was also noticed that in addition to the trauma of rape itself, the victim have had to suffer further agony during legal proceedings. In this background, the court indicated broad parameters in assisting the victims of rape.

(1) The complainants of sexual assault cases should be provided with legal representation. It is important to have someone who is well acquainted with the criminal justice system. The role of the victim's advocate would not only be to explain to the victim the nature of the proceeding, to prepare her for the case and to assist her in the police station and in court, but to provide her with guidance as to how she might obtain help of a different nature from other agencies, for example, mind counseling or medical assistance. It is important to secure continuity of assistance by ensuring that the same person who looked3201 after the complainant's interests in the police station represents her till the end of the case.

(2) Legal assistance will have to be provided at the police station since the victim of sexual assault might very well be in a distressed state upon arrival at the police station, the guidance and support of a lawyer at this stage and whilst she was being questioned would be great assistance to her.

(3) The police should be under a duty to inform the victim of her right to representation before any questions were asked of her and that the police report should state that the victim was so informed.

(4) A list of advocates willing to act in these cases should be kept at the police station for victims who did not have a particular lawyer in mind or whose own lawyer was unavailable.

(5) The advocate shall be appointed by the court, upon application by the police at the earliest convenient movement, but in order to ensure that victims were questioned without undue delay, the advocate would be authorised to act at the police station before leave of the court was sought or obtained.

(6) In all rape trials anonymity of the victims must be maintained, as far as necessary.

(7) It is necessary, having regard to the Directive Principles contained under art 38(1) of the Constitution of India to set up Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, since rape victims frequently incur substantial financial loss. Some, for example are too traumatised to continue in employment.

(8) Compensation for victims shall be awarded by the court on conviction of the offender and by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, whether or not a conviction has taken place. The board will take into account pain, suffering and shock as well as loss of earnings due to pregnancy and expenses of the child if this occurred as a result of the rape."

This decision in Delhi Domestic Workers recognises the right of the victim for compensation by providing that compensation shall be awarded by the court on conviction of the offender subject to the finalisation of scheme by the state government. If the court trying an offence of rape has jurisdiction to award compensation at the final stage, there is no reason to deny to the court the right to award interim compensation which should also be provided in the scheme. On the basis of principles set out in the aforesaid decision in Delhi Domestic Working Women's Forum, the jurisdiction to pay interim compensation shall be treated a part of the overall jurisdiction of the courts trying the offences of rape which, as pointed out is an offence against basic human rights as also against Fundamental Right of personal liberty and life.[85]

Apart from the above, the Supreme Court has the inherent jurisdiction to pass any order it considers fit and proper in the interests of justice or to do complete justice between the parties.[86]

After laying down the aforesaid parameters, the court on the facts of the case, particularly, considering the fact that the accused 'B' having accepted the victim as his wife in the temple and also having impregnated her twice created a situation for miscarriage on both the occasions, it was considered a fit case where the matter could be disposed of by directing accused 'B' to pay the victim 'S' a sum of Rs 1000 every3202 month as interim compensation during the pendency of the criminal case and also for payment of arrears of compensation at the same rate.[87]

However, the Supreme Court in its plenary power under art 142 of the Constitution of India can make any decree or order as may be found by it to be necessary for doing complete justice in any case or matter pending before it. Thus, the Supreme Court in exercise of power under art 142, can pass an order that cannot be relied upon as precedent, unless the Apex Court so directs. It is expected that the state government will soon constitute the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board.[88] Therefore, the sessions court while granting bail to the accused for the offence under s 376, IPC, cannot impose condition of payment of interim compensation by the accused to the prosecutrix.[89]

120. Probation

As the offence under s 376, IPC, is punishable with imprisonment for life and a person convicted for that offence cannot be given the benefit of the provisions of Probation of Offenders Act 1958.[90] Thus, where the additional sessions judge erred in extending the benefit of probation under the Probation of Offenders Act to the accused convicted under s 376, the order of learned additional sessions judge to that extent was set aside.[91]

SENTENCE

121. Attempt to Rape-- Sections 376 / 511 --Sentence

Where the accused is found guilty under ss 376 / 511, IPC for offence of attempt to commit rape, it would be appropriate to impose half of the punishment as envisaged under s 511, IPC, which comes to imprisonment for a period of 10 years.[92]

The minimum awardable sentence for an offence punishable under s 376(1), IPC, is seven years, so the award of six years rigorous imprisonment for an offence punishable under ss 376 / 511 would be on the higher side. Therefore, an award of rigorous imprisonment of six years by a trial court was reduced to 3½ years.[93] However, when the delay in disposal of the case is entirely attributable to the accused who absconded with a view to evade the trial and punishment, immediately after commission of the offence and was apprehended after 7½ years, therefore, the delay in the disposal of the case cannot be treated as a mitigating circumstance in the case to reduce the sentence of 3 years rigorous imprisonment and five of Rs 3000, in default of which to undergo 6 months rigorous imprisonment, awarded by the trial court.[94] In another case, where the conviction of the accused was altered from s 376 to ss 376 / 511, IPC and the prosecutrix was 10 years old, the accused was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 5 years and pay a fine of Rs 2000 and in3203 default of which to undergo rigorous imprisonment for one month.[1] The Apex Court while altering the conviction from s 354 to ss 376 / 511, IPC sentenced the accused to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 5 years and maintained the sentence of fine of Rs 40,000 imposed by the High Court out of which Rs 25,000 were directed to be paid to the complainant father of the victim girl.[2]

Where the accused was found guilty and convicted under s 376 read with s 511, IPC for having committed rape on a girl aged 6 years at the time of the commission of offence, a sentence of five years rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs. 500/- was held appropriate.[3]

Where the accused was a young boy of 20 years and a daily wage earner, the occurrence which took place 7 years back, the sentence of 5 years rigorous imprisonment awarded by the trial court for the offence under ss 376 / 511 was reduced to 6 months imprisonment.[4]

122. Sentence--Position Prior to Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1983

Prior to the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1983 (43 of 1983) the offence was punishable with imprisonment for life or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to 10 years and also fine when the accused was not the husband of the prosecutrix. However, when the age of the wife is under 12 years, the accused-husband is at par with the other accused (other than the husband of the prosecutrix).

The ordinary sentence of rape varied from 3 years to 5 years; in a very bad case, 7 years imprisonment was sometimes given. There is no recorded instance of a sentence of imprisonment for life in a case of rape.[5]

123. Sentence--Position after Passing of Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1983

By Act 43 of 1983, new ss 375 and 376 were substituted in the IPC . Subsection (1) of s 376 which mainly represents s 376 earlier has provided a more severe punishment, ie, minimum sentence of imprisonment of 7 years but which may extend to life or for a term upto 10 years and also fine.

Sub-section (2) of s 376 vide its cll (a) to (g) denotes the aggravated form of rape for which punishment is harsher than sub-s (1) of s 376 . Here the accused is liable to be sentenced with rigorous imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than 10 years but which may be for life and accused is also liable to pay fine.

However, it is to be noted that under proviso to sub-s (1) and sub-s (2) the court for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, may impose a sentence of imprisonment of either description for a term less than the one which is prescribed as minimum under these two sub-sections.3204

124. Sentence--Position after Passing of the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013

New ss 375, 376, 376A, 376B, 376C, 376D and 376E have been substituted for the old ss 375, 376, 376A, 376B, 376C and 376D vide the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013.

Newly substituted s 376(1) now provides for a rigorous imprisonment of either description for a term which shall not be less than seven years, but which may extend to imprisonment for life, and fine.

Clauses (a) to (n) under s 376(2) are now made punishable with a rigorous imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than ten years, but which may extend to imprisonment for life and also fine. Section 376(2) further clarifies that the term 'imprisonment for life' shall mean imprisonment for the remainder of that person's natural life.

Now the new s 376A provides for rigorous imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than twenty years, but which may extend to imprisonment for life, or with death. Similarly, s 376D provides for rigorous imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than twenty years, but which may extend to life, and with fine.

125. Sentence--Proportionality of--Effect on Social Order

The criminal law adheres in general to the principle of proportionality in prescribing liability according to the culpability of each kind of criminal conduct. It ordinarily allows some significant discretion to the judge in arriving at a sentence in each case, presumably to permit sentences that reflect more subtle considerations of culpability that are raised by the special facts of each case. Judges in essence affirm that punishment ought always to fit the crime; yet in practice sentences are determined largely by other considerations. Sometimes it is the correctional needs of the perpetrator that are offered to justify a sentence. Sometimes it is the desirability of keeping him out of circulation, and sometimes even the tragic results of his crime. Inevitably these considerations cause a departure from just desert as the basis of punishment and create cases of apparent injustice that are serious and widespread. Imposition of sentence without considering its effect on the social order in any cases may be in reality a futile exercise. The social impact of the crime, e.g. where it relates to offences against women, dacoity, kidnapping, misappropriation of public money, treason and other offences involving moral turpitude or moral delinquency which have great impact on social order, and public interest, cannot be lost sight of and per se require exemplary treatment. Any liberal attitude by imposing meagre sentences or taking too sympathetic view merely on account of lapse of time in respect of such offences will be result-wise counter productive in the long run and against societal interest which needs to be cared for and strengthened by string of deterrence inbuilt in the sentencing system.[6]

126. Sentence--Duty of the Court

It is an obligation of the sentencing court to consider all relevant facts and circumstances bearing on the question of sentence and impose a sentence commensurate with the gravity of the offence. The sentencing court must hear the3205 loud cry for justice by society and more particularly, in cases of the heinous crime of rape of innocent helpless children, as in this case, of the victim of crime and respond by imposing a proper sentence.[7] No leniency in matter of sentence could be shown merely on ground that accused was in jail for last more than 4 years.[8]

The Supreme Court has time and again drawn attention of the subordinate courts to the sensitivity which is required of the court to deal with all cases and more particularly in cases involving crime against women. In State of Andhra Pradesh v Bedem Sundara Rao ,[9] the Supreme Court said:

> In recent years, we have noticed that crimes against women are on the rise. These crimes are an affront to the human dignity of the society. Imposition of grossly inadequate sentence and particularly against the mandate of the legislature not only is an injustice to the victim of the crime in particular and the society as a whole in general but also at times encourages a criminal. The courts have an obligation while awarding punishment to impose appropriate punishment so as to respond to the society's cry for justice against such criminals. Public abhorrence of the crime needs a reason through the court's verdict in the sentence of punishment.

Again, in the case of State of Karnataka v Krishnappa ,[10] the Supreme Court pointed that rape is not merely a physical assault. It is an offence which is destructive to the whole personality of the victim of crime. Courts shoulder a great responsibility in trying an accused on charges of rape and must deal with such cases with utmost care and sensitivity referring to imposition of punishment in such cases.

The measure of punishment in a case of rape cannot depend upon the social status of the victim or the accused. It must depend upon the conduct of the accused, the state and age of the sexually assaulted female and the gravity of the criminal act. Protection of society and deterring the criminal is the avowed object of law and that is required to be achieved by imposing an appropriate sentence. The sentencing Courts are expected to consider all relevant facts and circumstances bearing on the question of sentence and proceed to impose a sentence commensurate with the gravity of the offence. The courts must hear the loud cry for justice by the society in cases of the heinous crime of rape on innocent helpless girls of tender years.[11]

Sexual violence apart from being a dehumanising act is an unlawful intrusion of the right to privacy and sanctity of a female. It is a serious blow to her supreme honour and offends her esteem and dignity, it degrades and humiliates the victim and where the victim is a helpless innocent child, it leaves behind a traumatic experience. The courts are, therefore, expected to deal with cases of sexual crime against women with utmost sensitivity. Therefore, such cases need to be dealt with sternly and severely especially while dealing with the offence of rape and its traumatic effect on a rape victim.[12]

The Supreme Court in State of Punjab v Gurmit Singh [13] observed:

> Of late, crime against woman in general and rape on particular is on the increase. It is an irony that while we are celebrating woman's rights in all spheres, we show little or3206 no concern for her honour. It is a reflection on the attitude of indifference of the society towards the violation of human dignity of the victims of sex crimes. We must remember that a rapist not only violates the victim's privacy and personal integrity, but inevitably causes serious psychological as well as physical harm in the process. Rape is not merely a physical assault it is often destructive of the whole personality of the victim. A murder destroys the physical body of his victim, a rapist degrades the very soul of the helpless female. The courts therefore, shoulder a greater responsibility while trying an accused on charges of rape. They must deal with such cases with utmost sensitivity.

A socially sensitised judge is a better statutory armour in cases of crime against women than long clauses of penal provisions, containing complex exceptions and provisos.[14]

127. Rape Cases--Sentence bargaining

Sentence bargaining is impermissible in a serious offences like rape.[15]

128. Sentence--Leniency--Impermissible

Rape is an offence against human dignity, it is a transgression which is destructive of the whole personality of the victim, thus, there is no question of being lenient in passing sentence against the accused.[16]

129. Sentence--Different Approaches

In the matter of punishment for offence committed by a person, there are many approaches to the problem. On the commission of crime, three types of reactions may generate. One such reaction is the traditional reaction of universal nature which is termed as punitive approach. It regards the criminal as a notoriously dangerous person who must be inflicted with severe punishment to protect society from his criminal assaults. The other approach is the therapeutic approach. It regards the criminal as a sick person requiring treatment, while the third is the preventive approach which seeks to eliminate those conditions from society which were responsible for crime causation.[17]

Under the punitive approach, the rationalisation of punishment is based on retributive and utilitarian theories. Deterrent theory which is also part of the punitive approach proceeds on the basis that punishment should act as a deterrent not only to the offender, but also to others in the community.[18]

The therapeutic approach aims at curing criminal tendencies which were the product of a diseased psychology. There may be many factors including the family problems. We are not concerned with those factors, as therapeutic approach has since been treated as an effective method of punishment which not only satisfies the requirements of law that a criminal should be punished and the punishment3207 prescribed must be meted out to him, but which also reforms the criminal through various processes, the most fundamental of which is that in spite of having committed a crime, which may even be a heinous crime, he should be treated as a human being entitled to all the basic human rights, human dignity and human sympathy. It was under this theory that this court in a stream of decisions, projected the need for prison reforms, the need to acknowledge the vital fact that the prisoner after being lodged in jail does not lose his fundamental rights or basic human rights and that he must be treated with compassion and sympathy.[19]

Sexual offences, however, constitute an altogether different kind of crime which is the result of a perverse mind. The perversity may result in homosexuality or in the commission of rape. Those who commit rape are psychologically sadistic persons exhibiting this tendency in the rape forcibly committed by them.[20] In some states in the USA, therefore, emphasis was laid on psychotherapy treatment of the offender while he was under detention. For that purpose, psychopath sexual offenders laws have been enacted in certain jurisdictions in USA. These laws treat sex offenders as neurotic persons and psychotherapic treatment is given to them during the period of their detention which may, in some cases, be an indefinite period, in the sense that they would not be released till they are cured. However, the provision for indefinite detention even beyond the maximum period of imprisonment for that offence was seriously objected to by a group of lawyers and, therefore, in many of the states, this provision was dropped from the statute.[21]

Here, in India, statutory provision for psychotherapy treatment during the period of incarceration in jail is not available, but reformist activities are systematically held at many places with the intention of treating the offenders psychologically so that they may not repeat the offence in future and may feel repentant of having committed their dastardly crime.[22]

130. A Juvenile Accused Tried by the Sessions Court cannot be Sentenced

It is a settled position of law that when a child accused, instead of a children court or juvenile court, is tried by the sessions court and is convicted and sentenced, and on an appeal being filed, the appellate court may confirm the conviction of such accused but would set aside the sentence imposed by the sessions court.[23] The crucial date for determining the question whether a person is a juvenile is the date when he is brought before the competent authority, and not the date of commission of the offence.[24]But when the accused charged of unnatural offence the incident of which was committed in 1989, the Juvenile Justice (Care and Protection of Children) Act3208 2000 would have no application.[25] However, when the learned additional sessions judge has given cogent reasons in not holding the accused below 16 years of age, in his order of sentence and conclusive evidence, ie, birth certificate or school certificate of the accused is missing in the case, the case is not fit for calling the report about the age of the accused under s 32 of the Juvenile Justice Act (53 of 1986) or for setting aside the sentence imposed by the sessions court.[26]

In the present case, the accused appellant was not a juvenile under the 1986 Act as he had crossed the age of 16 years. The case was, however, pending before the High Court in appeal and on that date, the 2000 Act came into force and had, therefore, to be dealt with under s 20 of the Act, which required the High Court to record a finding about the guilt of the accused but stop short of passing an order of sentence against him. Inasmuch as the High Court convicted the accused appellant, it did not commit any mistake for the power to do so was clearly available to the High Court under the provisions of s 20 . What was not permissible was the passing of a sentence, for which purpose, the High Court was required to forward the juvenile to the Juvenile Board constituted under the Act. The order of sentence therefore was found unsustainable and was set aside. At the time of hearing of appeal before the Supreme Court, the accused had reached the age of 36 years. The accused had already undergone three years of imprisonment awarded to him by the High Court. In the circumstances, reference to the Juvenile Justice Board at this stage of his life would serve no purpose. The only option available was to direct his release from custody, and the Supreme Court directed the release of the accused.[27]

131. Rape and Murder--Sentence

In a rape cum murder or attempt to rape and murder case, where the accused killed the prosecutrix in attempting to commit rape or after committing rape, the question of sentence for the offence of rape or attempt to rape loses much of its significance. The reason for this is not far to seek. The offence of murder being most heinous and important than the offence of rape or attempt to commit rape and the punishment prescribed for murder under s 302, IPC, is either death penalty or imprisonment for life in addition to fine. When the accused is convicted both under ss 302 and 376 and is awarded the death penalty under s 302, the punishment under s 376 becomes immaterial. Similarly, if life imprisonment is awarded to the accused on his conviction under s 302, the sentence under s 376 again loses its significance as the maximum sentence which can be imposed against the accused under s 376, IPC, is life imprisonment. However, whether death penalty or life imprisonment should be awarded to the accused for committing offence under s 302 is dependent upon the fact whether on the given facts and circumstances of the case it is found to be amongst the rarest of rare cases,[28] after balancing mitigating and aggravating circumstances present in the case. When the case is not found amongst the rarest of the rare cases, the accused is liable to be punished with life imprisonment.[29]3209 However, when the rape and murder case is found to be amongst the rarest of rare cases, the accused is liable to be punished with death penalty.[30] There were deficiencies in the investigation of the case, death sentence awarded by Courts below was substituted by life imprisonment.[31] Where the appellants accused attempted to commit rape on village girls twice, on being admonished by village Panchayat, committed rape and brutally murdered a girl aged 18 years, the case was based on circumstantial evidence. It was held that the case fell in the category of rarest of rare case, and death sentence was held proper.[32]

The prosecution witnesses deposed that the accused was seen carrying a four years old child after having raped her. The accused committed the murder of the girl, threw the child in the wheat field and ran away. Conviction of the accused under ss 376 and 302, IPC was held proper.[33] The accused was alleged to have committed rape and murder of minor girl. The testimony of the mother and the brother of the deceased that the accused was last seen in the company of the deceased was found reliable and as such believed. On the disclosure statements made by the accused the clothes of the deceased and the accused, stained with human blood, were recovered. Therefore, the accused appellant was convicted under ss 302, 376, IPC .[34] There were major contradictions in the evidence of the prosecution witnesses, the participation of the accused appellants in the commission of the crime was not proved. Extra judicial confession made by the accused to Sarpanch was found not reliable, the Sarpanch had disclosed the extra-judicial confession to police after 16 days. The conviction of the accused appellants under ss 302 and 376, IPC was set aside.[35]

Even if it is accepted that the chappals and the utensils of the deceased were found in the fields of the accused appellant, the dead body of the deceased was found at another place i.e. in the field of another person. The conviction of the accused appellant under ss 376 and 302, IPC was set aside.[36]

132. Rape on false promise to marry -- Life imprisonment proper

Where the accused committed rape on the prosecutrix on false promise to marry her, which he subsequently refused when the prosecutrix got pregnant, he committed breach of trust. Award of life imprisonment was held proper. (State of UP v Naushad 2014 Cr LJ 540 (SC), AIR 2014 SC 384, (2013) 16 SCC 651).

133. Sentence under Section 376(1)[37]--Four Tier Punishment

The punishment prescribed for the offence punishable under s 376(1) of the IPC is a four tier proviso. The statute says that the period of sentence should be minimum of 7 years, if the offence is proved. The second tier is of 10 years, which means that the3210 court if decides to impose punishment for more than 7 years and to the extent of 10 years, then normally it should assign good and convincing reasons as to how the case falls in the category where punishment of more than minimum prescribed period needs to be imposed. The third tier is imposition of punishment for life. In a rape case, when the court decides to impose life imprisonment then detailed reasonings are required to be given by the learned trial judge as to how and why the case falls in the category where life imprisonment is required to be imposed. Fourth and last tier is for imposing less period of punishment than minimum prescribed. For this court is supposed to give adequate and special reasons. Therefore, the reasons must not be only adequate but also special. Unless the court is able to say so, there is no scope to award punishment less than minimum or to say that it is reduced to 'already undergone', if such period is less than seven years.[38]

134. Sentence--When Accused is the Husband of the Prosecutrix

By s 3 of Act 29 of 1925, the phrase 'unless the woman raped is his own wife and is not under 12 years of age, in which case he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine or with both' was added to s 376 . The position of law in this regard has not changed even after the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1983 (43 of 1983). By virtue of exception to s 375, sexual intercourse with his own wife, the wife being not under 15 years of age is not rape. Thus, though sexual intercourse by a man with his own wife aged 15 years and above is no offence, it is a mild offence when her age is 12 years and above, but less than 15 years. However, when the age of wife is under 12 years, the offence of rape committed by the accused-husband is at par with other cases falling under sub-s (1) of s 376 . However, it is yet to be explained by a judgment of the High Court or the Supreme Court whether such case would fall under sub-s (1) of s 376 or under cl (f) of sub-s (2) of s 376, IPC . The following table I depicts the legal position as to offence and sentence when a man commits sexual intercourse with his wife on her age.

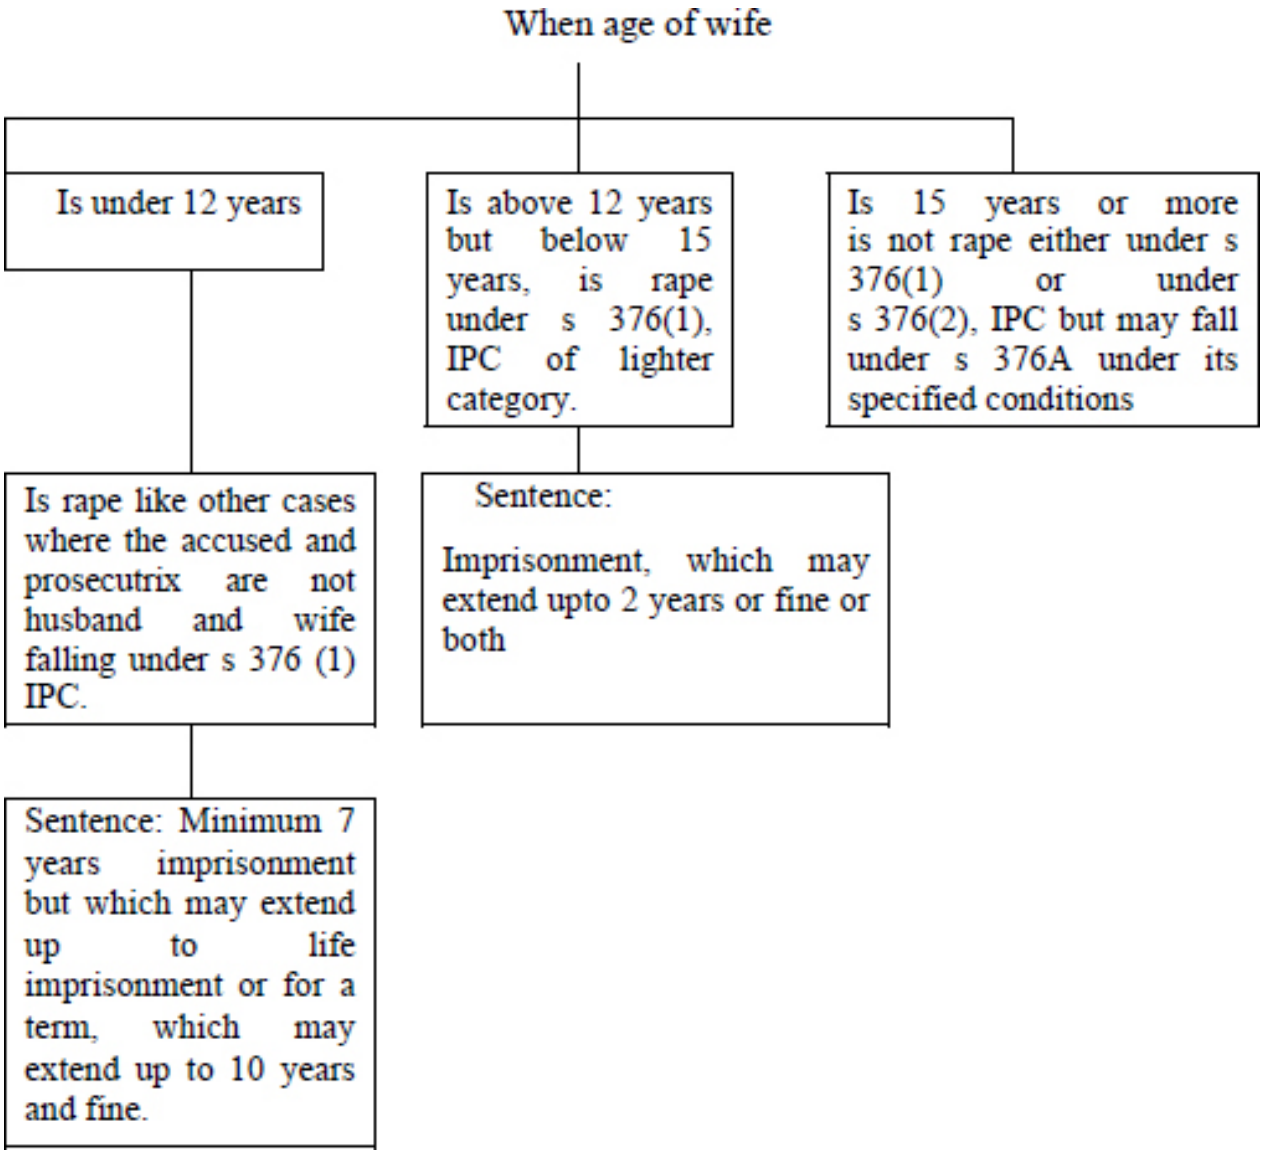
135. Sentence--Proviso to Section 376 (1) and (2)[39]--Meaning



Sub-section (1) of s 376, IPC provides that whoever, except in the cases provided for by sub-s (2), commits rape shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which shall not be less than 7 years but which may be for life or for a term which may extend to 10 years and shall also be liable to fine. In the category of cases covered under sub-s (2) of s 376, the sentence cannot be less than 10 years but which may be for life and shall also be liable to fine. The proviso appended to sub-s (1) lays down that the court may for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment for a term of less than 7 years. There is a similar proviso to sub-s (2) which empowers the court to award a sentence of less than 10 years for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment.[40]

It is a fundamental rule of construction that a proviso must be considered with relation to the principal matter to which it stands as a proviso particularly in such like penal provisions. The courts are obliged to respect the legislative mandate in the3211 matter of awarding sentence in all such cases. Recourse to the proviso can be had only for special and adequate reasons and not in a casual manner. Whether there exist any special and adequate reasons would depend upon a variety of factors and the peculiar facts and circumstances of each case.

Sexual Intercourse by Husband with or without consent

No hard and fast rule can be laid down in that behalf of universal application.[42] In order to exercise the discretion of reducing the sentence, the statutory requirement is that the court has to record 'adequate and special reasons' in the judgment and not fanciful reasons which would permit the court to impose a sentence less than the prescribed minimum. The reason has not only to be adequate, but also special. What3212 is adequate and special would depend upon several factors and no strait jacket formula can be indicated.[43]

136. Sentence--Proviso to Section 376 (1) and (2)[44]--Adequate and Special Reasons

In order to exercise the discretion of reducing the sentence the statutory requirement is that the court has to record 'adequate and special reasons' in the judgment and not fanciful reasons which would permit the court to impose a sentence less than the prescribed minimum. The reason has not only to be adequate but also special. What is adequate and special would depend upon several factors and no straitjacket formula can be indicated.[45] The words 'special reasons' in the context in which they are used could only mean special to the accused on whom sentence is being imposed. The court has to weigh reasons advanced in respect of each individual accused whose case is taken up for awarding sentence. The word special has to be understood in contradistinction to the word general or ordinary. Now, what does term special connote? Special means distinguished by some unusual quality, out of the ordinary. Webster defines special as particular; peculiar, different from others; designed for a particular purpose, occasion, or person; limited in range, confined to a definite field of action. Thus, anything which is common to a large class governed by the same statute cannot be said to be special to each of them. It would thus unquestionably appear that special reasons in the context of sentencing process must be special to the facts and the circumstances of the case in which the sentence is being awarded.[46]

The circumstances also must be special in the sense that they should be different from the normal. While using the circumstances for imposing a lenient sentence, the primary consideration should be whether the circumstances are special to the case. The special circumstances should be of such a nature which should have relation to the offence and not to the offender.[47]

The adequate and special reasons need to be disclosed in the order/judgment by the trial court itself so that the appellate forum is in a position to know as to what weighed with the court in awarding a sentence less than the minimum prescribed under the Act.[48] The accused, 21 years old at the time of the incident, having a love affair with a minor girl, eloped with her/prosecutrix to another village and married her under the misconception that they can do so. The accused had sexual relationship with the prosecutrix only after the marriage. Having regard to the tender age and offence having been committed out of reciprocal passion; coupled with the fact that the accused has already suffered substantial part of his sentence period, as imposed by the lower court, having undergone four years and nine months in jail, his sentence was reduced to the period already undergone under the circumstances of the case.[49] Where the incident was 20 years old, and the parties had married and settled in life, the Supreme Court reduced the sentence to the period already undergone.[50]3213

The expression 'adequate and special reasons' indicates that it is not enough to have special reasons, nor adequate reasons disjunctively. There should be a conjunction of both for enabling the court to invoke the discretion. Reasons which are general or common in many cases cannot be regarded as special reasons.

137. Sentence--Proviso to Section 376(1)[51]--Cumulative Requirement--Proviso Applies to both the trial Court and High Court

The reason has not only to be adequate, but also special. What is applicable to trial courts regarding recording reasons for a departure from minimum sentence is equally applicable to the High Court. Where the only reason indicated by the High Court is the young age of the accused and the fact that he belongs to a Scheduled Tribe, the same can by no stretch of imagination be considered either adequate or special. The requirement in law is cumulative.[52] Both in cases of sub-ss (1) and (2) the court has the discretion to impose a sentence of imprisonment less than the prescribed minimum for 'adequate and special reasons'. If the court does not mention such reasons in the judgment, there is no scope for awarding a sentence lesser than the prescribed minimum. In order to exercise the discretion of reducing the sentence the statutory requirement is that the court has to record 'adequate and special reasons' in the judgment and not fanciful reasons which would permit the court to impose a sentence less than the prescribed minimum. The reason has not only to be adequate, but also special. What is adequate and special would depend upon several factors and no straitjacket formula can be indicated. What is applicable to trial courts regarding recording reasons for a departure from minimum sentence is equally applicable to the High Court.[53]

138. Reasons not found Adequate and Special

The following reasons were not found adequate and special reasons:

(a) The accused was 17 years old at the time of incident and was an illiterate villager coming from a rural area.[54]
(b) The factors that the accused was 'unsophisticated' and illiterate citizen belonging to a weaker section of the society, that he was a chronic addict to drinking and had committed rape on the girl while in a state of intoxication and that his family comprising of an old mother, wife and children were dependent upon him.[55]

(c) When parents of the accused are old and the victim was married subsequently.[56]

(d) The incident took place 13 years back and now the accused has matured and would be 31 years of age and has already undergone nearly three years sentence.[57]

(e) The accused has remained in custody for 2½ years.[58]3214

(f) Long pendency of case or the fact that the accused and the victim may have got married and settled in life during the pendency of proceedings are not relevant factors to award less than the prescribed minimum sentence. These factors may be relevant for consideration by the executive or constitutional authorities for revision of sentence.[59]

(g) The fact that the occurrence took place ten years ago and the accused might have settled in life.[60]

(h) The fact that prosecutrix and her husband expired by the time of hearing of appeal is no ground to take a lenient view.[61]

(i) The plea that the accused was aged 18-19 years and was at the threshold of life and due to his extreme youth he could not control his passion, is not sufficient to reduce sentence when the accused raped a girl 8-9 years old.[62]

(j) The offenders were youngsters at the time of commission of gang rape.[63]

(k) The incident took place long time back and the accused was then only 19 years old and is now married and settled in life is not sufficient to take a lenient view when accused had betrayed the trust reposed on him by a young girl of 13 years and had committed the heinous crime by ravishing her forcibly by holding out threats.[64]

(l) The fact that the victim has since then married and settled in life, whereas the accused could not marry because of disrepute.[65]

(m) The offence in question was first offence committed by accused and that he was only earning member of his family and is having two wives and six children.[66]

(n) The court has not assigned any satisfactory reason much less adequate and special reasons for reducing the sentence to a term which is far below the prescribed minimum.[67]

(o) In view of the fact the accused took undue advantage of a woman, who was alone in her house at the relevant time to satisfy his lust, the plea of the accused for reduction of the sentence on the ground that he is the only bread earner in his family is not tenable.[68]

139. Sentence--Character and Reputation of Victim Irrelevant

Factors like character or reputation of the victim has no bearing or relevance either in the matter of adjudging the guilt of the accused or imposing punishment under s 376, IPC . Such factors are wholly alien to the very scope and object of s 376 and can never serve either as mitigating or extenuating circumstances for imposing the sub-minimum sentence with the aid of the proviso to s 376(2), IPC . Thus, the character,3215 reputation or status of a raped victim is an irrelevant factor for consideration by the court while awarding sentence to the rapist.[69]

Sentence--Consent Mitigating Factor

Where the victim girl was below the age of 16 years, but was found a consenting party as she had lived with the accused in a rented house, the sentence of three years imposed by the trial court was reduced to the period already undergone by the accused, which was one and half years.[70]

140. Sentence--Compromise between Accused and Victim is not a Mitigating Factor

While dealing with the accused for commission of the offence of rape, it is to be borne in mind that the monetary pleasure of one causes devastating effect in another. The cry of the collective has to be answered and respected while imposing a sentence.[71]

When during the pendency of appeal an application was filed under s 320(5), CrPC for grant of leave to compound the offence and to take factum of compromise in consideration while awarding sentence, it was held that apart from the fact that such an offence is not compoundable, compromise of this nature cannot be a factor for consideration in a case of rape for reduction with regard to quantum of punishment.[72]

141. Father Committing Rape with his Daughter--Sentence

Sexual offences constitute an altogether different kind of crime which is the result of the perverse mind. The perversity may result in homosexuality or in the commission of rape. Those who commit rape are psychologically sadistic persons exhibiting this tendency in the rape forcibly committed by them, particularly when the rape is committed by a father with his own daughter.[73] No lenient view in the matter of sentence could be taken looking at the relationship between the victim and the accused and in view the present trend of penology, the sentence has to be an eye opener so as to deter other members in the society from committing such crimes.[74]

If a person commits rape with his own daughter, such person cannot be regarded as a normal man and is psychologically sadistic person and some psychological treatment should be given to him during the period of detention, but whether such type of treatment is given in India is not clear. To prevent such type of offences, psychological treatment is a must and if such type of facility is not available in India, it should be provided in jail.[75]

However, looking at the facts and circumstances of the case, punishment of seven years rigorous imprisonment awarded to the accused was found sufficient by the Rajasthan High Court,[76] but the Madhya Pradesh High Court came to the conclusion3216 that sentence of imprisonment of life is appropriate sentence for such a shameful act of the father.[77]

The Rajasthan High Court in another such case reduced the sentence of imprisonment for life to imprisonment for ten years.[78] The Gauhati High Court in a case of a father committing rape on his daughter aged 11 years reduced the sentence of 10 years rigorous imprisonment imposed by the trial court to 5½ years while maintaining the sentence of fine, holding that the magnitude of the offence cannot be over emphasised in the context of the fact that the accused being the father who raped his minor daughter when there is no earning member in the family.[79]

The Supreme Court in a case enhanced the sentence of 5 years awarded by trial Court to imprisonment for life, as the accused respondent was found guilty of having committed rape on her daughter and convicted under s 376, IPC ..[80]

142. Child Rape Cases-- Section 376(2)(F)[81]--Sentence

Child rape cases are cases of perverse lust for sex where even innocent children are not spared. It is a crime against humanity. Many such cases are not even brought to light because of social stigma attached to it. According to some surveys, there has been a steep rise in child rape cases. Children need special care and protection. In such cases, responsibility on the shoulders of the courts is more onerous so as to provide proper legal protection to these children. Their physical and mental immobility call for such protection. In our country, a girl child is in a very vulnerable position and one of the modes of her exploitation is rape besides other modes of sexual abuse. These factors point towards a different approach required to be adopted.[82]

A perusal of s 376(2)(f), IPC, shows that the legislative mandate is to impose a sentence for the offence of rape on a girl under 12 years of age, for a term which shall not be less than 10 years, but it may extend to life and also to fine. The proviso to s 376(2) lays down that the court may for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment of either description for a term of less than 10 years. Thus, the normal sentence in a case where rape is committed on a child below 12 years of age, is not less than 10 years rigorous imprisonment. Though in exceptional cases for special and adequate reasons, a sentence of less than 10 years rigorous imprisonment can also be awarded.[83]

When during the pendency of appeal an application was filed under s 320(5), CrPC, for grant of leave to compound the offence and to take the factum of compromise into consideration while awarding the sentence, it was held that apart from the fact that such an offence is not compoundable, a compromise of this nature cannot be a factor for consideration in a case of rape for reduction with regard to quantum of punishment. It is to be borne in mind that the accused was a married person at the time of commission of rape, and has not only betrayed the faith reposed3217 in him by his wife, but also destroyed the dreams of a child. The accused has created a situation by which the prosecutrix would be forced to carry the traumatic experience imposed on her in the blossom of adolescence. An offence against the body of a woman lowers her dignity and mars her reputation. It is said that every one's physical frame is his or her temple. No one has any right of encroachment.[84]

No leniency could be shown when the accused, a full grown adult, committed rape on a minor girl of 6 years of age, and sentence of rigorous imprisonment for 10 years cannot be slashed in view of the provisions of s 376(2)(f), IPC .[85] Having played with the life of a child aged eight years, the accused does not deserve any leniency on the ground that the incident took place 13 years back and the accused has now matured and is about 31 years old and undergone nearly three years of sentence.[86]

143. Child Rape Cases-- Section 376(2)(f) [87]--Reduction in Sentences

Section 376(2)(f) which deals with rape on a child below 12 years provides for punishment which is normally not to be less than 10 years, but which may extend to life. The courts are also empowered, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment to impose a sentence of imprisonment of either description for a term which is less than ten years. Where the facts of the case indicate that the accused at the initial stages did not seem to have fixed plan to rape anybody, and apart from the heinous crime of rape on a small girl, the child was not otherwise harmed. It was not the case of the prosecution that the accused was a habitual offender or was earlier guilty of any such crime. The sentence of life imprisonment was reduced to rigorous imprisonment for 10 years along with fine of Rs 1000.[88] Where the accused, a young unmarried man and a first offender having no past antecedents of any crime had already undergone five years of imprisonment, the sentence of life imprisonment was modified to 10 years of rigorous imprisonment.[89]

144. Reduction of sentence to less than the Minimum Prescribed (Sub-section (2), old section 376)

The Sessions Judge had sentenced the accused convict to seven years of rigorous imprisonment. The High Court in appeal reduced the sentence to the period already undergone, which was eleven months and the only reason given by the High Court was that the accused belonged to rural areas, but the same could by no stretch of imagination be considered either adequate or special.[90] The mere fact that the accused belonged to Schedule Tribe was held not special/adequate reasons for reducing the sentence, especially when the victim was below 12 years of age.[91] In a case, the accused teacher committed rape on his minor student. The mere fact that the3218 accused had a family to maintain was held not sufficient ground to reduce the sentence.[92]

The trial Court convicted the accused appellant under s 376, IPC and sentenced him to seven years rigorous imprisonment. The reduction of sentence to the period undergone viz. one year and two months without assigning adequate special reasons by the High Court was held not proper by the Supreme Court.[93] The accused was found guilty and convicted for committing rape on a girl aged 10 years, such that the case fell under s 376(2)(i), IPC . The trial Court sentenced the accused to ten years rigorous imprisonment and the High Court reduced the sentence to 7 years rigorous imprisonment on the ground that the accused was young and the only bread winner of his family. It was held that the High Court was not justified in reducing the sentence and the Supreme Court restored the sentence of ten years rigorous imprisonment as imposed by the trial Court.[94]

Under the new s 376, IPC, the Court cannot impose a sentence less than the minimum prescribed by the section. The Parliament in the wake of the increasing crimes against women by Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 2013 has deleted the proviso to s 376(2), IPC .

In a case it has been held that merely because the parties have entered into a compromise is no ground to reduce the sentence.[95]

145. Reduction In Sentence--Instances

Following are the instances of cases in which the court reduced the sentence under s 376 :

(a) accused has remained in jail for about 3½ years and both the victim girl and the accused have already got married, so the sentence of imprisonment was reduced from 9 years to 5 years;[96]

(b) the incident occurred more than 13½ years ago and the accused was under the shadow of the case for a long time, the sentence of rigorous imprisonment of 7 years was reduced to 4 years rigorous imprisonment;[97]

(c) the incident took place about 7 years ago, the accused remained in custody and was released after 2 years when the High Court in appeal, acquitted him of the charge under s 376, IPC, the Apex Court though reversed the finding of acquittal of the High Court but sentenced the accused to the period already undergone by him and a fine of Rs 2000 in default of which further imprisonment of one year and nine months was to be imposed;[98]3219

(d) the accused deposited Rs 4 lakh with counsel for the prosecutrix, to be deposited as a fixed deposit in the bank, to fetch her a reasonable amount of interest on the said principal, the sentence of 7 years rigorous imprisonment was reduced to 6 months rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 1000 and in default of which to suffer rigorous imprisonment for one month;[1]

(e) the accused belonged to the Scheduled Caste category and there was some negotiation between the accused and the victim which had failed prior to the incident, so the sentence of 5 years rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 2000 was reduced to 3 years rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 1000;[2]

(f) the victim was above 14 years but below 16 years of age, so the offence would fall under s 376(1) and not under s 376(2)(f), IPC, so the sentence of 10 years rigorous imprisonment awarded by the trial court was reduced to 7 years rigorous imprisonment by the appellate court;[3]

(g) the accused was 21 years of age at the time of commission of offence, the offence was committed on account of erotic impulses with a view to satisfy the same, the injury done to the prosecutrix, a minor girl was healed after operation, the sentence of life imprisonment imposed by the trial court was reduced to 10 years rigorous imprisonment by the appellate court while maintaining sentence of fine of Rs 2000.[4]

(h) an offence under s 376, IPC is a non-compoundable offence. As the parties had entered into the compromise and had got married, and further the incident was 14 years old, the sentence was reduced to the period of 3½ years already undergone.[5]

Note: Proviso to s 376(2), IPC, prior to the amendment of the section by Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 2013 gave discretion to the Court to award sentence less than the minimum prescribed by the section. After the amendment, the proviso to s 376(2), IPC stands deleted, such that now the Court has no such power.

(i) the accused aged 18-19 years was convicted for committing rape on a seven years old girl and was sentenced to life imprisonment. It was held that, life imprisonment was not warranted in the case and was reduced to 10 years rigorous imprisonment, and the fine of Rs. 20,000/- was reduced to Rs. 1,000/- . [6]

(j) the accused was a casual labourer and had been in custody for about 2 months less than 5 years, he was exposed to public ridicule so the3220 sentence of 10 years rigorous imprisonment awarded by the trial court was reduced to 5 years rigorous imprisonment;[7]

(k) the accused took poison after the incident showing his repentance for the crime, so the sentence of rigorous imprisonment was reduced from 10 years to 7 years.[8]

(l) the victim girl was below the age of 16 years, but was found a consenting party as she had lived with the accused in a rented house, hence the sentence of three years imposed by the trial Court was reduced to the period already undergone which was one and half year.[9]

(m) the accused aged 45 years was found guilty for having raped a 12 years old girl and was sentenced to life imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 10,000/-. As the accused came from a tribal community, looking to the facts and circumstances of the case, sentence of fine was set aside, and a sentence of life imprisonment was reduced to period of ten years already undergone. [10]

146. Instances, where sentence not Reduced

The court refused to reduce the sentence in several cases as given below, when:

(a) the trial court imposed a sentence of 7 years rigorous imprisonment besides fine, and the incident occurred 13 years back and the accused who was now 31 years old had already undergone nearly 3 years of the sentence;[11]

(b) the sentence awarded to the accused by the trial court was less than the minimum sentence of 7 years under s 376(1), IPC,[12] or a minimum sentence of 10 years under s 376(2), IPC ;[13]

(c) the accused completely belied the trust of his niece and committed rape on his sister's daughter in a beastly manner and the court below had already shown leniency by imposing minimum imprisonment of 7 years and has not imposed a higher sentence;[14]

(d) the trial court has already taken a lenient view and awarded a minimum sentence prescribed for the offence of rape and since the accused had forcibly carried away a minor girl and committed rape on her with the result that injuries were caused to the private parts of the prosecutrix;[15]

(e) the accused aged 55-56 years, played with the modesty of the prosecutrix aged 15-16 years and ravished her by committing breach of faith which she3221 and her mother reposed in him and the minimum sentence of 7 years was imposed by the trial court;[16]

(f) the accused were guilty of gang rape of a minor girl punishable under s 376(2)(g), and sentenced to 10 years rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 3000, the plea of the accused for leniency on the ground that their parents were old and the prosecutrix got married subsequent to the incident was discarded;[17]

(g) the accused, a married man of about 36 years, committed the heinous crime of rape on a teenaged girl who used to call him uncle and who was his daughter's friend, so there was no room for leniency to reduce the sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment imposed by the trial court;[18]

(h) the accused behaved like 'wolves in human frame' and committed gang rape on a lady, a nurse, who was of the age of their mother while she was on her way for her duty in the hospital;[19]

(i) in a gang rape case, the accused persons taking undue advantage of the situation when the prosecutrix was alone in the house, made a severe sexual assault taking turns by giving threats;[20]

(j) the accused was serving in a disciplined service (Military Engineering Service) and committed rape on a 50 year old woman, the fact that prosecutrix and her husband died by the time of hearing of appeal against the conviction was not considered a mitigating factor to take a lenient view in the matter of sentence, as the offence under s 376, IPC, is an offence against society and state;[21]

(k) the accused raped a girl aged 8-9 years and would have destroyed her vagina beyond repair, the plea that the accused was aged 18-19 years and was on the threshhold of his life and due to extreme youth could not control his passions was not considered sufficient to reduce the sentence;[22]

(m) the accused and the complainant party compromised because the offence under s 376, IPC, is not compoundable under s 320(5), Cr PC ;[24]

(n) the offence was not found to have been committed on the spur of the moment or passion and there was no mitigating circumstances in favour of the accused who committed rape on the prosecutrix aged 10-12 years and she suffered injuries on her private parts.[25]3222

(o) The mere fact that accused and the prosecutrix had a love affair, or that the accused belonged to rural area, could not be considered either adequate or special, so it was no ground to reduce the sentence.[26]

147. Enhancement of Sentence

In the following cases the court enhanced the sentence under s 376, IPC, when:

(a) the trial court awarded a sentence of 18 months rigorous imprisonment on consideration of young age of the accused which was found too inadequate by the appellate court as the dignity of a girl cannot be considered so casually, and a person who commits such an act of rape on the helpless young girl should not get away with the sentence of 18 months rigorous imprisonment, the sentence of imprisonment was therefore enhanced to rigorous imprisonment for 7 years and fine of Rs 3000 was also imposed in default of which 6 months rigorous imprisonment was to be undergone by the accused;[27]

(b) the accused, a married man of 49 years of age, committed rape on a 7-8 years old girl, the reduction of sentence to 4 years rigorous imprisonment, ie, less than 10 years prescribed minimum sentence under s 376(2) which was imposed by the trial court, did not find favour with the Apex Court which enhanced the sentence from 4 years rigorous imprisonment to 10 years rigorous imprisonment for the said offence;[28]

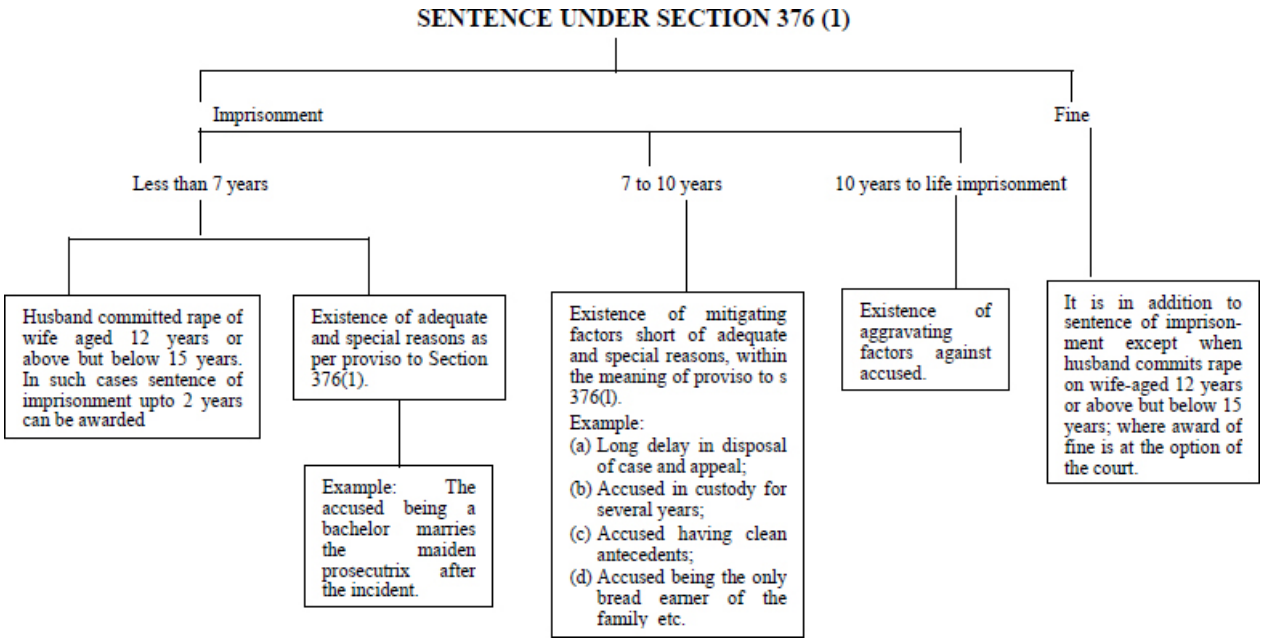
(c) a gang rape punishable under s 376(2)(g), IPC, was committed, the sentence of 5 years rigorous imprisonment in the absence of adequate and special reasons was held illegal and so was enhanced to 10 years rigorous imprisonment;[29]

(d) a person who has committed a heinous offence of rape upon a 4 year old girl deserves no sympathy in the matter of sentence and hence there are no adequate and special reasons for awarding a lesser sentence than the minimum of 10 years rigorous imprisonment, therefore, the sentence of imprisonment of three years rigorous imprisonment awarded by the trial court was enhanced to 10 years rigorous imprisonment by the appellate court;[30]

(e) in a case of abduction and rape of a minor girl, the High Court while maintaining conviction of the accused reduced their sentence to the period already undergone, i.e., 1½ months, the Apex Court enhanced the sentence under s 376, IPC to 5 years rigorous imprisonment;[31]

(f) the accused, a middle aged man of 45 years raped a girl of 10 years, the trial court sentenced the accused to undergo rigorous imprisonment for three years which was enhanced to 3 years rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 5000 by the High Court, and in default of payment of fine, the3223 accused was to undergo rigorous imprisonment for two years more, the fine realised was to be paid to the prosecutrix.[32]

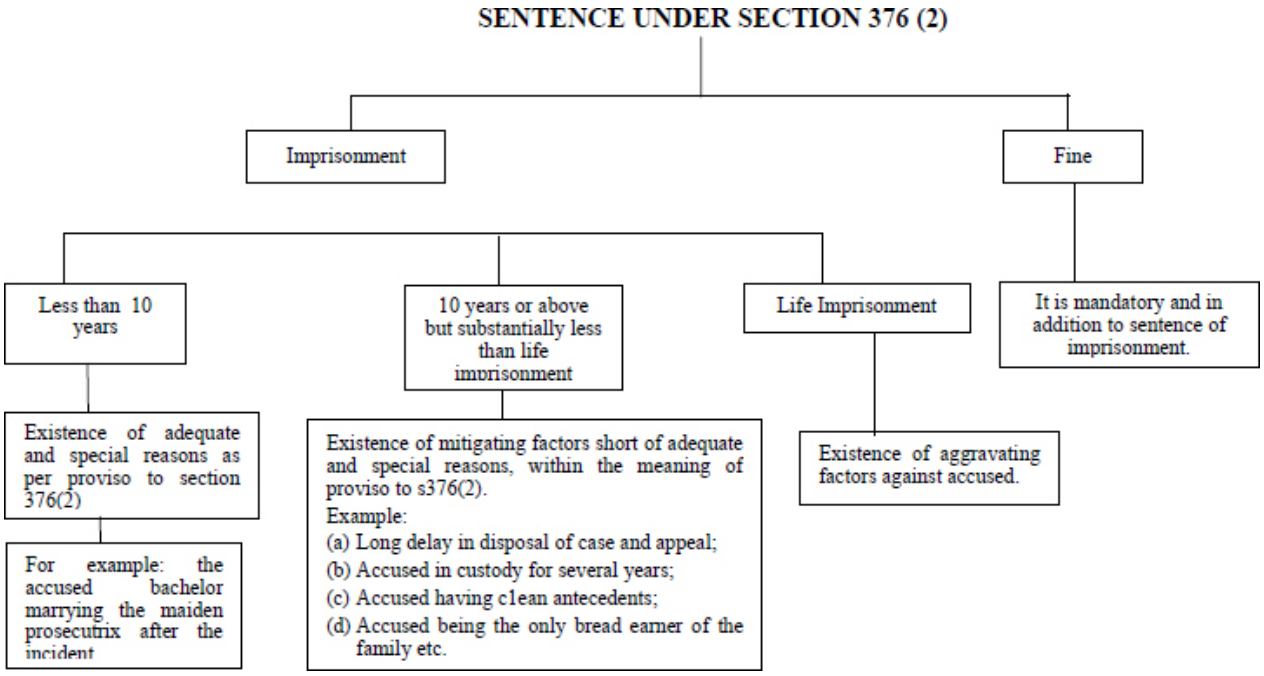
(g) Where the victim at the relevant time was about 19 years and not the wife of the accused, the order imposing a sentence of 2 years rigorous imprisonment which is less than minimum by showing misplaced sympathy on the accused was found not proper and the sentence was modified and enhanced to 7 years rigorous imprisonment with fine of Rs 2000.[33]



148. Instances where Sentence Not Enhanced

The High Court has plenary power to issue notice of enhancement of sentence in exercise of its power under s 397, CrPC, even if no appeal is filed by the State, provided that notice of enhancement of sentence is served upon the accused.[34] However, when the victim is a married lady, there was no injury noticed on the private parts of the victim, nor any seminal stain, blood stain, marks of violence on the persons of the accused were found, the sentence should not be enhanced.[35] The Bombay High Court declined to issue notice for enhancement of sentence to the accused holding that it was not appropriate to issue it after a period of 4 years from the date of conviction, particularly when the State has not preferred an appeal for enhancement of sentence under s 377(1), CrPC .[36]

149. Sentence under Section 376 --Tabular Analysis



In the light of discussion pertaining to sentence and interpretation of s 376, the fairly correct position with regard to sentence under s 376(1) and (2) can be understood with the help of Table II and III, Table II gives the idea of sentence for offence falling within s 376(1), IPC . Table III pertains to cases falling under sub-s (2) of s 376, IPC . These tables are self-explanatory.3224

ALTERATION OF CONVICTION

150. Alteration Of Conviction

Even in cases where the main offence or the main charge has failed, the courts should not ipso facto jump to the conclusion that an acquittal is automatic. It is the duty of the trial court to ascertain from the evidence on record whether some lesser offence has been made out and if so, to convict the accused of that lesser offence.[1]

However, a conviction under s 376 cannot be altered on appeal to one under s 323 on the ground that there was reasonable doubt with respect to the allegations of rape. Such an alteration is illegal and the conviction should be set aside.[2] If the offence under s 376 is not proved, it cannot be possible to convict the accused on a charge under s 497 or s 498 for which a complaint of the husband is necessary.[3] It is not, however, competent for a judge, in appeal, to alter a charge under s 376 to one under s 366 because charge under s 366 involves different elements and different questions of fact from a charge under s 376 .[4] However, if the proved facts establish both the offences, the accused can be convicted separately for each offence.[5]

It must, however, be remembered that if the real offence is rape and abduction is an aggravating circumstance, two separate sentences under s 365 and s 376 should not be given.[6]

If no specific charge under s 376 is made, but there is no doubt that technical rape is committed, a conviction under s 366 may be altered to one under s 376 by virtue of the provisions of s 221(2), CrPC 1973.[7]

151. Conviction under Section 376 read with Section 109,IPC

Where the accused took a room on rent in his own name and facilitated the main accused in committing rape on the prosecutrix, he was convicted under s 376 read with s 109, IPC .[8]

152. Accused Charged under Section 376 , Conviction under Section 354,IPC Proper

There was no evidence that the accused penetrated his private part into the private part of the prosecutrix and medical evidence did not establish sexual intercourse. The accused merely put his finger into the private part of the prosecutrix. It was held that, no offence under s 376, IPC was made out and the accused was convicted under s 354, IPC . [9]3228

When the evidence showed that even though the accused persons had forcibly taken the prosecutrix to a room and undressed her with a complete intention of committing sexual intercourse upon her, had ultimately only succeeded in making an attempt in furtherance of their heinous crime, and the medical testimony completely pointed to the completion of sexual act to establish the charge of rape against the accused, the conviction of the accused persons under s 376 was altered to one under s 376 read with s 511 .[10] When the prosecution is not able to prove the commission of the offence under s 376, IPC, by the accused but has been able to prove its attempt by the accused, the conviction of the accused under s 376 is liable to be altered from s 376 to one under ss 376 / 511 .[11] When the prosecutrix was 8 years old, it was noticed that fourchette was lacerated but hymen was not injured, the vaginal orifice was too small and did not even admit a single finger, the medical officer was of the definite view that it was an attempt to commit sexual intercourse, the accused was found liable to be convicted under ss 376 / 511, and not under s 376, IPC .[12] When there was complete absence of human semen in vaginal smear of the prosecutrix, and the report of the medical board stated that no intercourse had been performed on the prosecutrix, the presence of the human semen on dhoti of the accused and ghagra of the prosecutrix merely proves that the accused had ejaculation at the time of incident, the injuries on the body of the prosecutrix and their dimension and location suggested that accused attempted to ravish her, the conviction of the accused under s 376 was altered to one under ss 376 / 511 .[13]

153. Alteration of Conviction under old Section 376(2)(f) to Sections 376 / 511

Where the evidence of the father, the eye-witness, only reveals that on hearing the screaming sound of his daughter, he rushed to spot noticed that the accused was lying on his daughter and attempted to commit rape, but, did not succeed and fled away from the place, the medical evidence had not noticed any injury over private part and there being no penetration, therefore, offence falls under s 376 read with s 511, IPC, i.e., attempt to commit rape and not under s 376(2)(f), the conviction of the accused was altered from s 376(2)(f) to ss 376 / 511, IPC .[14]

154. Alteration of Conviction from old Section 376(2)(g) to Section 376(1)

Where two accused persons allegedly committed rape on the prosecutrix and one of the accused persons was acquitted by the trial court, the conviction of the remaining accused was altered to s 376 instead of s 376(2)(g), IPC .[15]

155. Alteration of Conviction from Section 376 to one under Section 509

If the offence under s 376, IPC, is not proved but that under s 509 is established, the conviction of the accused under s 376 is liable to be altered to one under s 509, IPC .[16]3229

156. Alteration of Conviction from Sections 376 / 511 to one under Section 509

Commentary under s 509, vol 4, may be referred to.

157. Alteration of Conviction from Section 376 to Section 354

When a charge under s 376, IPC, is not established but the evidence on record proves that the accused outraged the modesty of the prosecutrix, the conviction under s 376 is liable to be altered to s 354, IPC .[17] The prosecutrix being a patient of mental retardation on the date of occurrence was not examined in the court. The FSL report had not been produced by the prosecution and the doctor clearly stated that no definite opinion regarding rape on the prosecutrix can be given for want of the FSL report. The prosecutrix was having no injury on her private parts when she was medically examined. She was also a married woman. There was no actual evidence to prove that sexual intercourse actually took place with her. The prosecution, however, was able to prove that the accused used criminal force on the prosecutrix with the intention to outrage her modesty. On these facts the conviction of the accused under s 376 was altered to one under s 354, IPC .[18] It is difficult to believe that the accused though not suffering from paralysis yet his whole body trembled, could forcibly commit sexual intercourse with a grown up lady, more so when it is not alleged that he had threatened her by showing any weapon, however, he outraged the modesty of the prosecutrix, so the conviction of the accused under s 376 was altered to one under s 354, IPC .[19] The prosecutrix was the only prosecution witness who stated that the accused committed rape on her. The other witness stated that the accused caught hold of prosecutrix who was weeping and when the prosecutrix raised cries, the accused ran away, suggesting that the accused outraged her modesty. The medical evidence was doubtful. The conviction of the accused under s 6 was altered to one under s 354 .[20] Vaguely stating that the accused had sexual intercourse would not be a substitute for the statutory mandate, as contained in the explanation to s 375 without indication about the penetration aspect. When the offence of rape is not made out and the materials on record clearly make out a case under s 354, the conviction of the accused under s 376 is liable to be altered to one under s 354, IPC .[21] The accused was proved to have dragged the prosecutrix inside the house but the commission of rape was not proved, the accused were acquitted under s 376 but convicted under s 354, IPC .[22] The prosecution story regarding the commission of rape by the accused was not proved as even the parents of the child prosecutrix turned hostile but there was sufficient evidence to show that the accused outraged the modesty of the girl by playing with her in sexual manner. Thus, the conviction of the accused under s 376 was altered to one under s 354, IPC .[23] For further commentary, text under the same heading in s 354, ante, may be referred to.3230

158. Alteration of Conviction from Section 354 to one under Section 376 by the Sessions Court

The state filed the appeal and the High Court held the accused guilty under s 354, IPC . The state did not prefer any further appeal before the Supreme Court. However, the father of the victim girl who was also a complainant filed a criminal appeal before the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court found that all the necessary ingredients under s 376 had been satisfactorily established against the accused and therefore the conviction of the accused was altered from s 354 to one under s 376, IPC .[24]

159. Alteration of Conviction from Section 376 Read with Section 511 to one under Section 354

Where the accused tried to fulfil his lust from the back side of the prosecutrix without removing or lifting the clothes, the conviction of the accused was altered from one under s 376 read with s 511 to one under s 354, IPC .[25] The accused forcibly laid the prosecutrix on the bed and broke the string of her pyjama but made no attempt to undress himself, the prosecutrix pushed the accused away and he made no effort to grab her again. On these facts, the conviction under s 376 read with s 511 recorded by the sessions court was altered to one under s 354, IPC, by the High Court.[26] The accused had removed the cord of the petticoat of the prosecutrix and was about to sit on her waist when she cried out for her husband, the conviction of the accused under ss 376 / 511 was altered to one under s 354, IPC .[27] When the allegations against the accused were that he held the saree and tore the blouse of the prosecutrix but did not proceed ahead from the stage of preparation, the charge under ss 376 / 511, 448 was altered to one under ss 354 and 448, IPC .[28] The accused was seen holding the hand of the prosecutrix, an inmate of the hospital and pulling her towards the corner of the corridor and embracing her tight at which time her hospital dress was raised above the knee. The accused kept the zip of his pant half open so that even his pubic hair could be noticed. There was no determined effort to forcefully maintain sexual intercourse, nor medical evidence pointed out to any physical effort or violence which the accused might have made on the prosecutrix. On these facts the conviction of the accused under ss 376 / 511 was altered to one under s 354, IPC .[29] For further commentary, text under s 354, ante, may be referred to.

160. Alteration of Conviction from Section 354 to Sections 376 / 511

The accused charged under s 376 was convicted under s 354 by the sessions court. The prosecutrix was a dumb witness and through the expert interpreter stated by signs that the accused by lifting her lehnga and making her lie did 'something' in her vagina and for that she did not agree. There was no evidence to show that actual intercourse in fact had taken place, the conviction of the accused under s 354 was altered to ss 376 / 511, IPC .[30] The accused charged with s 376 was acquitted by the3231 sessions court on appeal filed by the state before the High Court, the High Court convicted the accused under s 354, IPC . The Supreme Court found that the offence under ss 376 / 511, IPC was established against the accused, the High Court after having come to the conclusion that the accused was guilty of an offence under ss 376 / 511 could not have convicted the accused for an offence under s 354 . Therefore, the conviction of the accused under s 354 was altered to ss 376 / 511, IPC .[31] For further commentary, text under the same heading in s 354, ante, may be referred to.

161. Alteration of Conviction from Section 366 to one under Section 376

If no specific charge under s 376 is made, but there is no doubt that technical rape is committed, a conviction under s 366 may be altered to one under s 376 by virtue of the provisions of s 221(2) of CrPC 1973.[32]

162. Alteration of Conviction from Sections 366 and 376 to Section 365

Commentary under the same heading in s 365, ante, may be referred to.

163. Alteration of Conviction from Section 376 to Section 417

Where the prosecutrix voluntarily visited the house of the accused who allegedly raped her, the testimony of the prosecutrix indicated that she did not disclose incident as the accused had promised her to marry, the complaint was lodged only two days prior to the birth of child, the act of the accused did not attract the ingredient of s 375 . However, accused having sex with her by making a false promise of marriage and thereafter when she became pregnant, he refused to marry her, such an offence does fall under s 417, IPC so the conviction of the accused was altered from s 376 to s 417, IPC .[33]

Accused was prosecuted on allegations that the accused conductor kidnapped the victim girl and raped her in bus. The medical evidence did not show that sexual intercourse was committed. Evidence showed that attempt was made by the accused appellant to commit rape. Accused was convicted for attempt to commit rape under ss 376 / 511 and s 366, IPC .[34]

164. Accused Charged under Section 376 or Sections 376 / 511 or Sections 376 / 109 can be Convicted under Sections 354 and 323

When the accused is charged with committing rape or attempted rape but these charges are not proved, the statement of the prosecutrix that the accused had bitten her on the breasts and these bite marks are corroborated by a medical report of the doctor, are sufficient to establish that the modesty of the prosecutrix was outraged and injuries were caused to her, in such circumstances though the accused are entitled to acquittal of the charge under s 376 or ss 376 / 511, they are liable to be3232 convicted under ss 354, 323 / 34, IPC .[35] In the face of weak medical evidence, though the accused were found entitled to the benefit of the doubt under s 376 read with s 109, but instead were convicted for the offence under s 354, IPC .[36] An accused charged under s 376 and acquitted of the said charge can be convicted under s 354, IPC .[37]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

SEXUAL OFFENCES

[38][S. 376A.

Punishment for causing death or resulting in persistent vegetative state of victim.--

Whoever, commits an offence punishable under sub-section (1) or sub-section (2) of section 376 and in the course of such commission inflicts an injury which causes the death of the woman or causes the woman to be in a persistent vegetative state, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than twenty years, but which may extend to imprisonment for life, which shall mean imprisonment for the remainder of that person's natural life, or with death.]

Comments

1. Legislative changes

This section is new, inserted by the Criminal Law (Amendment), 2013 (13 of 2013), with effect from 3-2-2013 on the recommendations of Justice J.S. Verma Committee.

2. Scope

This section is new, providing severe punishment when in the course of commission of rape, the offender inflicts an injury which causes the death of the woman or causes the woman to be in a persistent vegetative state.

When the accused committing rape kept his hand on mouth of the prosecutrix, so that she should not shout and in that process, if she died due to suffocation, then certainly the accused caused an injury to the prosecutrix which caused the death of the prosecutrix, and the offence falls within the purview of s 376A, IPC . The conviction of the accused appellant under s 376A, IPC was held proper.[39]

3. Vegetative state

Concised Oxford Dictionary defines vegetative state as 'concerned with growth and development as distinct from sexual reproduction'. We are reminded of the moving3233 story of Aruna Shanbaug, the young nurse who was brutally raped and lived the rest of her life (i.e. almost 36 years) in a persistent vegetative state. Unfortunately the petitioner has died in the year 2015, while the accused who put the petitioner in such a stage is still alive.[40]

4. Procedure

An offence under this section is congnizable, non-compoundable, non-bailable and triable by the Court of Sessions.

5. Charge

I, ... (name and office of Session Judgeetc.), hereby charge you.....(name etc. of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the .....day of.....at ....., committed rape on X, and during the course of such commission inflicted injury which caused the death of X (or caused the said X to be in persistent vegetative state) and thereby committed offence punishable under Section 376 -A IPC, and within the cognizance of this Court.

And I hereby direct you to be tried by this Court for the said charge.

38 Substituted by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013 (13 of 2013), s 9 (wef 3-2-2013). Prior to substitution s 376A stood as under:-- " S. 376A . Intercourse by a man with his wife during separation.--Whoever has sexual intercourse with his own wife, who is living separately from him under a decree of separation or under any custom or usage without her consent shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years and shall also be liable to fine.".

SEXUAL OFFENCES

[41][S. 376B.

Sexual intercourse by husband upon his wife during separation.--

Whoever has sexual intercourse with his own wife, who is living separately, whether under a decree of separation or otherwise, without her consent, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which shall not be less than two years but which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.--In this section, "sexual intercourse" shall mean any of the acts mentioned in clauses (a) to (d) of Section 375 .]

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

This section has been substituted for old s 376A by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013 (13 of 2013), s 9, wef 3-2-2013 on the recommendations of Justice J.S. Verma Committee. Explanation to the section is new, though the new section is the same as the old section. However, under the new section, the punishment shall not be3234 less than two years, which may extend to seven years while under the old section, the punishment could be imposed upto two years. The old s 376A ran thus:

"376A. Intercourse by a man with his wife during separation.--Whoever has sexual intercourse with his wife, who is living separately from him under a decree of separation or under any custom or usage without her consent shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years and shall also be liable to fine."

2. Scope

Sexual intercourse, whether forced or voluntary, between the husband and wife is no offence when the age of the wife is not less than 15 years. When the age of the wife is under 12 years then the sexual intercourse by a man with his wife amounts to rape. However, when the age of the wife is 12 years and above but less than 15 years, the sexual intercourse by a husband with his wife though it amounts to rape, but of mild category, is punishable with imprisonment with imprisonment of either description for a term which shall not be less than two years, but which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine. By insertion of this section in the IPC, another offence against a husband is added, when despite a decree of separation or under any custom or usage the husband and wife are living separately but still the husband has sexual intercourse with his wife without her consent.

3. Procedure

An offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable and triable by Court of Sessions.

4. Charge

I, ... (name and office of Session Judgeetc.), hereby charge you.....(name etc. of accused) as here below:

That you, on or about the .....day of.....at about ..... a.m/p.m. in village/town..... Police Station..... District.....committed rape of 'A' your wife, who has been living separately from you under a decree of separation (or under any custom or usage) without her consent, and thereby committed an offence punishable under Section 376 -B, IPC and within the cognizance of this Court.

And I hereby direct you be tried by this Court for the said charge.

5. Proof

In order to establish the offence against the accused under this section, the prosecution has to prove that,

(a) the accused had sexual intercourse with his own wife.
(b) the wife was living separately from him under a decree of separation or any custom or usage,
(c) sexual intercourse was done by the accused without her consent.3235

41 Substituted by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013 (13 of 2013), s 9 (wef 3-2-2013). Prior to substitution s 376B stood as under:-- " S. 376B . Intercourse by public servant with woman in his custody.--Whoever, being a public servant, takes advantage of his official position and induces or seduces, any woman, who is in his custody as such public servant or in the custody of a public servant subordinate to him, to have sexual intercourse with him, such sexual intercourse not amounting to the offence of rape, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years and shall also be liable to fine.".

> S. 376D . Intercourse by any member of the management or staff of a hospital with any woman in that hospital.--Whoever, being on the management of a hospital or being on the staff of a hospital takes advantage of his position and has sexual intercourse with any woman in that hospital, such sexual intercourse not amounting to the offence of rape, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years and shall also be liable to fine.

2. Scope

When a person being on the management or on staff of jail or other place, custody established by or under the law takes advantage of his official position and commits rape on any inmate of such jail etc., he commits rape of a severe category punishable under s 376(2)(b), IPC . However, when he being a superintendent or manager of a jail etc., takes advantage of his official position and induces or seduces any female inmate of such jail etc. to have sexual intercourse with him which does not amount to rape, he commits a milder offence under this section inserted by the Legislature in the IPC to avoid the misuse of their position by the superintendent or manager of the jail etc. by taking advantage of custody of female inmates and committing sexual intercourse with them.

The two accused hospital employees allured the prosecutrix, a patient, with refund of money and free treatment, s 376D was attracted in the case.[43]

1. Legislative Changes

This section is new, inserted by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013 (13 of 2013), s 9 wef 3-02-2013 on the recommendations of Justice J.S. Verma Committee. Explanation 1 to old s 376, IPC provided as under:

"Explanation 1. Where a woman is raped by one or more in a group of persons acting in furtherance of their common intention, each of the persons shall be deemed to have committed gang rape within the meaning of this sub-section."

...

2. Scope

This section deals with the offence of gang rape and provides enhanced punishment for the offence. It is not necessary that in case of a gang rape, the victim should have been raped by all the accused persons. If she is raped by one or more in a group of persons, each of the persons shall be 'deemed to have committed gang rape', provided those persons are acting in furtherance of their common intention. The common intention of all the five accused persons can be gathered from their conduct, prior to the incident and during the course of the incident.[45]

A woman cannot be said to have an intention to commit rape. Therefore, the woman cannot be prosecuted for alleged commission of the offence punishable under s 376(2)(g) .[46]

3. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, non-compoundable, non-bailable and triable by the Court of Sessions.

4. Charges

I,.....(name and office of the Sessions Judgeetc.) hereby charge you.....(name of the accused) as herebelow:

That you A alongwith B and C constituted a group and in furtherance of the common intention you all committed rape on H and thereby committed the offence of gang rape punishable under Section 376 -D IPC, and within the cognizance of this Court.

And I hereby direct you to be tried by this Court on the said charge.3239

5. Illustrative Cases

Prosecution case was that the accused appellants committed gang rape on the prosecutrix when she along with her husband had gone to market for making purchases. The prosecutrix shouted for help but no one except her husband came for help. No marks of injury were found on the body of the prosecutrix in medical examination. Report of forensic laboratory was also not filed in the case. Evidence revealed that there was some dispute between the parties regarding the distribution of their earnings as labourers. Case against the accused was not proved beyond reasonable doubt. Accused were acquitted of the charge of rape.[47]

The accused police officials had called the complainant at police station in connection with the visit of the terrorists in the village, the complainant was detained at the police station and tortured. During night the accused police officials committed gang rape at police station. The testimony of the prosecutrix, her husband and neighbor was found reliable hence believed. As the prosecutrix was not young, importance was not attached to the absence of medical examination. Accused appellants were convicted for offence of gang rape punishable under s 376, IPC .[48]

Accused appellant was prosecuted on allegations that he along with other accused persons abducted the prosecutrix and committed rape on her. Accused was not named in the FIR. The most important witnesses mother and the sister who were present at the time of abduction were not examined by the prosecution. The prosecutrix did not raise any alarm for help while travelling certain distance after alleged abduction. Her testimony was shaky and not corroborated by medical evidence. Accused was shown to the prosecutrix at police station. Conviction of the accused appellants under s 366 and s 376(2)(g), IPC was held not proper.[49]

Two accused persons committed rape on a minor girl sleeping on the rear seat of bus at bus stand. Testimony of two Head Constables on patrol duty was believed. Medical examination report also proved prosecution case. Conviction was held proper (Old s 376(2)(g), IPC).[50]

The prosecutrix in an earlier part of statement stated that accused arrived on the spot after the rape had been committed. No common intention to commit rape was proved. Accused was acquitted of the charge of gang rape.[51]

The accused appellants gang raped the deceased and when she was dead, threw her into pit. The evidence of wife of co-accused was found reliable. The conviction of the appellants under s 302 and s 201 read with s 34, IPC was found proper.[52]

The theory of consent of the prosecutrix in a gang rape case was not accepted where the prosecutrix categorically deposed before the court that she was raped by six persons. [53]3240

OF UNNATURAL OFFENCES

S. 377.

Unnatural offences.--

Whoever voluntarily has carnal intercourse against the order of Nature with any man, woman or animal, shall be punished with [55][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.--Penetration is sufficient to constitute the carnal intercourse necessary to the offence described in this section.

Comments

1. Constitutional Validity

Recently three Judges Bench of the Supreme Court has held that s 377, IPC is constitutionally valid, is not ultra vires of art 14 and art 15 of the Constitution .[56] The Supreme Court held:

> Those who indulge in carnal intercourse in the ordinary course and those who indulge in carnal intercourse against the order of nature constitute different classes and the people falling in the latter category cannot claim that Section 377 suffers from the vice of arbitrariness and irrational classification. What Section 377 does is merely to define the particular offence and prescribe punishment for the same which can be awarded if in the trial conducted in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure and other statutes of the same family the person is found guilty. Therefore, the High Court was not right in declaring Section 377 , IPC*ultra vires* Articles 14 and 15 of the Constitution .

2. Scope

A civilised society abhors unnatural carnal intercourse and reckons it a crime which this section punishes. The crime is committed by persons of all ages, in all stations of life, and in all countries, and it is committed stealthily.

Unlike in an offence of rape under s 376, consent of the victim is immaterial though it may be taken into consideration in awarding punishment.[57] However, as in rape penetration is an essential ingredient of the offence under this section.[58]

The unnatural carnal intercourse with a human being generally consists in penetration per anus. Under the English law, to constitute the offence, the act must be in that part where sodomy is usually committed. Hence, the act, in child's mouth, does not constitute the offence.[59] However, in Khanu v Emperor ,[60] it was held that coitus per os (through the mouth) is punishable under this section, though not with the same severity as coitus per anus.3241

3. Sodomy

By virtue of the explanation to the section, it is necessary to prove penetration, however little, to constitute carnal intercourse. Under the English law, to constitute a similar offence the act must be in that part where sodomy is usually committed. According to that law, the unnatural carnal intercourse with a human being generally consists in penetration per anus.[61] In R V Jacobs,[62] and Re Govindarajulu,[63]it was held that the act in a child's mouth does not constitute the offence. However, in Khanu v Emperor ,[64] it was held that coitus per os is punishable under the section. These is no statutory definition of sodomy.[65]

The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary gives the meaning of the term 'Sodomy' thus:

> An unnatural form of sexual intercourse, esp that of one male with another.

Webster's Third New International Dictionary gives the meaning of the term 'sodomy' thus:

> Carnal copulation with a member of the same sex or with an animal, non coital carnal population with a member the opposite sex, specific, the penetration of the male organ into the mouth or anus of another.

Thus, it enlarges the meaning of the term 'sodomy' to include non coital carnal copulation with a person of the other sex also. Halsbury's Laws of England,[66] under criminal law, gives the meaning of Sodomy thus in para 1281-- > 1281. Sodomy. The offence of Sodomy can only be committed per annum (RV Jacobs (1817), Russ & Ry 331, CCR). It may be committed by a man upon a woman (R v Wiseman (1718) Fortes Rep 91, 1 Russel on Crime (10th edn 846) even upon his own wife (RV Jellyman (1838) 8 C&P 604; Stathan v Statham (1929) p 131 CA).

Further in Jowitts Dictionary of English Law, the term 'Sodomy' is described thus:

> Sodomy, unnatural sexual intercourse by a man whether with a man or a woman so called from Sodom (Gen xiii 13). In the criminal law it is known as buggery.

In American Jurisprudence[67] Sodomy is dealt with by Emmanuel S Tipon; giving a general introduction to the term, the learned author writes.

> In most of the states, statutes have been enacted making sodomy a criminal offence, although considerable variation exists as to the wording of such statutes and such variation accounts to a large extent for the differences in the decisions of the courts in the various jurisdictions as regards sodomy cases. The making of unnatural sexual relations a crime is embedded in the history of the common law and finds its sanction in the broader basis of the settled mores of our western civilisation, and although there is a considerable body of opinion that as between willing adults, the question should be left to moral sanctions alone and eliminated from the criminal law, it has been held that such matter presents a legislative question and not one for the courts. At least one jurisdiction has amended its statute so as to require force or threat of force in order for an offence to be committed under its statute penalising the crime of deviate sexual assault.3242

> Sodomy, 'Sodomy appears originally as part of the Hebriac law, taking its name from the practices reputedly indulged in by the inhabitants of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, but unfortunately, the Biblical text is not explicit about the various types of conduct for which these cities were visited with fire and brimstone, although other portions of the Old Testament prohibit sexual congress between man and man in general terms (Though shall not lie with mankind, as with womankind; it is abomination.' Levitieus 18: 22).[68]

Taylor's Principles and Practice of Medical Jurisprudence,[69] also states thus in this behalf.

> Sodomy, It is a felon by the Sexual Offences Act 1956 (s 12) for a person to commit buggery with another person, while means the action of a male person attempting to obtain sexual gratification by means of a human being (sodomy), or with an animal (bestiality), whether per vaginam or per annum.

In terms of s 377, IPC whoever, voluntarily has carnal intercourse against the order of nature with any man, woman or animal, commits the offence. Words used are quite comprehensive and an act like putting the male organ into the victim's mouth which was an initiative act of sexual intercourse for the purpose of his satisfying the sexual appetite, would be an act, punishable under s 377, IPC .

In Corpus Juris Secundum,[70] the following comments have been made:

> Words used in statutory definitions of the crime of sodomy have been frequently construed as more comprehensive and as not depending on, or limited by the common law definition of the crime, at least as no dependent on the narrower definition of sodomy afforded by some of the common law authorities and are generally interpreted to include within their provisions all acts of unnatural population, whether with mankind or beast, other authorities, however, have taken a contrary view, holding that the words used in the statute are limited by the common law definition of the crime where the words of the statute themselves are not explicit as to what shall be included.

It is competent for the legislature to declare that the doing of certain acts shall constitute the crime against nature even though they would not have constituted that crime at common law, and the statutory crime against nature is not necessarily limited to the common law crime of sodomy, but in imposing a punishment for the common law crime it is not necessary for the legislature to specify in the statute the particular acts which shall constitute the crime.

Under statutes providing that whoever has carnal population with a beast, or in any opening of the body, except sexual parts, with another being, shall be guilty of sodomy, it has been held that the act of cunnilingus is not a crime, but that taking the male sex organ into the mouth is sodomy. On the other hand, under such a statute it has been held that the crime of sodomy cannot be committed unless the sexual organ of accused is involved, but there is also authority to the contrary, under a statute defining sodomy as the carnal knowledge and connection against the order of nature by man with man, or in the same unnatural manner with woman, it has been held that the crime cannot be committed by woman with woman. A statute providing that any person who shall commit any act or practice of sexual perversity, is either with mankind or beast, on conviction shall be punished, is not limited to instances involving carnal population, but is restricted to cases involving the sex organ of at least one of the parties. The term sexual perversity does not refer to every physical contact by a male with the body of3243 the female with intent to cause sexual satisfaction to the actor, but the condemnation of the statute is limited to unnatural conduct performed for the purpose of accomplishing abnormal sexual satisfaction for the actor. Under a statute providing that any person participating in the act or populating the mouth of one person with the sexual organ of another is guilty of the offence a person is guilty of violating the statute when he has placed his mouth on the genital organ of another, and the offence may be committed by two persons of opposite sex.[71]

In Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, the word buggery is said to be synonymous with sodomy. In KJ Ayer's Manual of Law Terms and Phrases (as judicially expounded), the meaning of the word 'sodomy' is stated to be carnal knowledge committed against the order of nature by a man with a man or in the same unnatural manner with a woman, or by a man or woman in any manner with a beast. This is called buggery. As observed in Lohan Vasantlal Devchand's case, sodomy will be a species, and unnatural offence will be general in that view of the matter, there can be scope for any doubt that the act complained of is punishable under s 377, IPC .[72]

4. Orifice of Mouth and Intercourse

The orifice of the mouth is not, according to nature, meant for sexual or carnal intercourse. 'Intercourse may be defined as mutual frequent action by members of independent organisation'. Commercial intercourse is therefore, referred to; emphasis is made on the reciprocity. By metaphor the word intercourse like the word commerce is applied to the relations of the sexes. Here also there is the temporary visitation of one organism by a member of the other organisation, for certain clearly defined and limited objects. The primary object of the visiting organisation is to obtain euphoria by means of a detent of the nerves consequent on the sexual crises. However, there is no intercourse unless the visiting member is enveloped at least partially by the visited organism, for intercourse connotes reciprocity, and in this view it would seem that sin of gomorrah is no less carnal intercourse than the sin of sodomy. These aspects have been illuminatingly highlighted in Khanu v Emperor. [73]Coitus per os is punishable under s 377, IPC .[74]

5. Age of Victim

Section 377, IPC would apply irrespective of age and consent. Section 377 , IPC does not criminalize a particular people or identity or orientation. It merely identifies certain acts which if committed would constitute an offence. Such a prohibition regulates sexual conduct regardless of gender identity and orientation.[75]

When the victim is minor, consent is not a defence.[76]

6. Consent of Victim

In cases of unnatural offences the consent of the victim is hardly of any consequence.[77] Unlike in an offence of rape under s 376, IPC, the consent of the3244 victim in a case under s 377, IPC, is immaterial though it may be taken into consideration in awarding punishment.[78]

7. Attempt to Commit Unnatural Offence Under Sections 377 / 311

For committing or for attempting to commit an offence under s 377, IPC, penetration must be proved before the accused can be convicted.[79] The only allegation of opening of the lungi and pulling of the underwear in the FIR without any fact showing that any attempt was made by the accused to commit the offence under s 377, the charge under s 377 read with s 511 IPC, could not have been framed.

8. Law of Australia

A person who commits an act of bestiality with any animal is guilty of an offence. 'Bestiality' consists of any form of sexual intercourse with an animal or bird. Anal penetration is not essential. Bestiality may be committed by either a man or a woman. In some jurisdictions, it is an offence to compel a person to commit an act of bestiality. In the Australian Capital Territory, the definition of sexual intercourse includes penetration by an animal. In Western Australia, it is a separate offence to procure, incite or encourage a child or an incapable person to commit an act of bestiality. In Tasmania, it is an offence to make or reproduce or possess a bestiality product.[80]

In Reg v Brown [81], the Court held that it cannot be accepted that because a man pleads guilty, any difficulty with respect to the statement of the case against him is immaterial, that he is absolutely concluded forever after from taking any point upon it, and that the judge who tries him cannot state a case for the opinion of the Court.

9. 'Penetration'

Carnal intercourse against the order of nature is the gist of the offence in this section. By virtue of the Explanation to the section, it is necessary to prove penetration, however little, to constitute carnal intercourse.[82]

Penetration is sine qua non for establishing the offence under s 377, IPC, without which the accused cannot be convicted.[83] However, it is not necessary to prove emission to establish the unnatural offence. A mere filthy and indecent assault without proof of attempted or intended penetration, would not amount to an offence under this section.[84]

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is congnisable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

Where a person while going to a particular destination in a truck, made a halt at some place and committed the offence of sodomy, the offence would be deemed to3245 have been committed during the course of the journey, and it could not be said that a new journey started from place of where he came to a halt. Consequently, the court having jurisdiction over the place of termination of journey would be competent to take cognizance of the offence. It could not be said that the journey being terminated at the place of destination the accused did not pass through it within the meaning of s 283, CrPC .[85]

Such an interpretation would tantamount to stretching the ordinary meaning of the word 'pass' under s 183, CrPC, beyond the sense in which it is commonly understood. The legislature has carefully employed the words 'through or into' under s 183, CrPC, and its intendment is abundantly clear that the court having local jurisdiction at the place of termination of journey will also be competent to try the accused for an offence committed in the course of performing the said journey. Moreover, the objects of s 183, CrPC, is to overcome the difficulties which are likely to be encountered in cases it is insisted that the trial of an offence committed during the course of performing a journey should be held at the place where the offence is actually committed. The section, therefore, embodies a sort of legal fiction by which the offence is deemed to have committed within the local limits of certain courts other than where the offence has been actually committed.

11. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the ..... day of ..... at ..... had carnal intercourse, against the order of nature, with AB (specify the man, woman or animal), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 377 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

A charge under this section must allege the time when, the place where, and the person, known or unknown, with whom the particular act, charged as an offence, was committed. Conviction upon a vague charge cannot be sustained even though there may be evidence to show that the accused was a habitual sodomite.

However, when the accused is fully aware of the true import of the prosecution case against him pertaining to the offence under s 377, though the place of occurrence is not indicated correctly in the chargesheet, no prejudice can be said to have been caused to the accused and error in the charge is not material.[86]

12. Quashing of Charge

When the only allegation of opening the lungi and pulling of the underwear was there but the FIR did not reveal that after the pulling of the underwear any attempt was made by the accused to commit the offence nor there was any material to suggest penetration, the charge under s 377 read with s 511, IPC, was quashed by the High Court.[87]3246

13. Child Witness

There can be no two opinions that before a statement of a child witness is recorded by a magistrate or a judge, he is required to put some questions in order to ascertain whether he is able to understand the questions put to him and can give rational answers. For compliance of voir dire, the magistrate or the judge may either give his certificate or keep such record as to enable the appellate court to find out that the magistrate or the judge had satisfied that the child witness had reasonable understanding to answer the questions put to him in order to appreciate his evidence. This care and caution is necessary in recording the statement of the child witness because of his innocence and also vulnerability to undue influence and tutoring. On the other hand, we cannot lose sight of the fact that it is because of his innocence that the child is expected to give a true version of an incident.[88]

Where the accused was proved to have had carnal intercourse against the order of nature with a bullock by placing his penis inside the nostril of a bullock, it was held that the offence was punishable under this section.[89]

14. Proof

Prosecution has to prove that:

(1) the accused had carnal intercourse with man, woman or animal;
(2) such intercourse was against the order of nature;
(3) the act by the accused was done voluntarily; and
(4) there was penetration.[90]

As a charge under this section is difficult to refute, evidence in support of the charge must be convincing.[91]

The accused police officials were indulged in indiscriminate firing at the hard core wanted criminal in retaliation to killing of innocent police official. Their conviction with the help of s 34, IPC was held proper.[92]

There was evidence of the child victims that the accused used to have sex with them and also asked them for fellatio with other boys of the shelter home. The victims stood the test of cross-examination, their evidence was found reliable. The acquittal of the accused on the ground that there was no corroboration of the testimony of the victims by other inmates of shelter home was not proper. Accused was convicted.[93]3247

15. Medical Evidence

It is very desirable that there should be some medical evidence on record, if it is possible to get it, as to the condition of the anus of the person, on whom the act of sodomy is said to have been perpetrated, or, at any rate, some proof as to the appearance of the part of his body shortly after the alleged act of unnatural intercourse from which penetration may properly be inferred.[1] If it is not the case of the prosecution that the unnatural offence remained incomplete, the medical evidence ought to be definite against the accused.[2] In a charge of sodomy, stains of semen constitute important evidence.[3] Great weight must therefore, be attached to the chemical examiner's report.[4]

Likewise, the post mortem report of a victim in a case of sodomy and murder, showing clearly that there were at least three tear marks leading to the irresistible conclusion that some hard object (implicitly like a male organ) was thrust violently into the anus of the deceased.[5] However, when the doctor did not find any external injury over the private parts of the accused and no semen was detected on the underwear as per the report of CFSL, the sample of pubic hair of the accused though sent for an opinion to the chemical examiner from whom no opinion was found possible, the prosecution's case against the accused had become doubtful notwithstanding the presence of blood stains on the underwear of the accused as the report of the serologist suggested that the blood found on the underwear was insufficient for grouping.[6]

16. Conviction

When the statement of the victim is natural and trustworthy, the medical report shows that the anus of the victim was found swollen, the delay of one day in lodging the FIR was properly explained, the conviction of the accused under s 377, IPC, was found proper.[7] When the statement of the victim is corroborated by medical evidence, the accused is liable to be convicted.[8]

The appellant Swamiji of Math was prosecuted for an offence under s 377, IPC on allegations that he committed the alleged offence on a minor boy in morning hours continuously for seven days. FIR was filed one month after the incident when a dispute arose between the accused and Senior Swamiji of Math. It is against natural human conduct that such an act of sodomy would be committed at 8 o'clock in the morning and that too continuously for seven days. Medical evidence did not corroborate the prosecution case. Appellant was acquitted of the charge under s 377, IPC .[9]3248

17. Probation

The social ostracisation and humiliation likely to have been suffered by the accused are no grounds to release the accused on probation.[10] As the offence under s 377, IPC, is punishable upto imprisonment of life, the benefit of the Probation of Offenders Act cannot be extended to the accused.[11]

18. Attempt to Convict Unnatural Offence--Sentence

The trial court convicted the accused under s 377 but the appellate court altered the conviction to one under ss 377 / 511 instead of s 377, IPC, and sentenced the accused to 1 year rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 2000 in default to further undergo 2 months SI. Sentence of 2 years rigorous imprisonment passed by trial court for offence punishable under s 377, IPC . On revision being filed, the High Court taking into account the fact that accused was in custody for about eight months reduced the sentence awarded under ss 377 / 511, IPC to the period already undergone.[12]

19. Sentence Under Section 377

The sentence should be proportionate to the gravity of the offence. The court while imposing sentence should keep into consideration the antecedents and character of the convict and the circumstances in which the alleged offence has been committed. No hard and fast rule can ever be laid down for imposing a just and proper sentence upon the convict, and the question differs from case to case.[13] Under s 377, IPC, the accused can be punished with imprisonment for life or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to 10 years. The age of the accused, his belonging to a socially backward strata of the society of his village and the fact that he is a first offender are factors which may be taken into account for awarding sentence.[14] Sodomy is one of those offences for which there can hardly be any extenuating circumstance. Sentence of imprisonment for four months only, for such an offence, is a very lenient punishment. Coitus per os is punishable under this section but not with the same severity as coitus per anum.

20. Reduction In Sentence

In the following cases the sentence awarded by the trial court was reduced by the appellate court:

(a) an accused aged 20/21 years was not a previous convict and a sentence of long term imprisonment may not have had a healthy effect or result in that case, so the sentence of imprisonment was reduced from 10 years rigorous imprisonment to 3 years rigorous imprisonment, but sentence of fine of Rs 1000 was maintained.[15]

(b) the accused was aged about 22 years at the material time of the incident and was in custody for about one year, so the sentence of imprisonment of the accused was reduced from 2½ years to 1½ years.[16]

However, in Chitranjan Dass v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[17] the Supreme Court, looking to the fact that, as a result of his conviction, the appellant would suffer loss of service and other serious consequences in his career, reduced his sentence to that already undergone which was more than two months.

21. Enhancement of Sentence

Under s 377, IPC, the accused can be punished with imprisonment for life or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to 10 years. The sentence of two years imprisonment awarded by the trial court without specifying whether it is in the nature of rigorous or simple imprisonment is not proper and is grossly inadequate taking into account the fact that besides the offence under s 377 the accused has also committed the offence under s 376 for rape on the prosecutrix who was less than 12 years of age. The sentence of 2 years awarded by the trial court under s 377 was enhanced to 5 years rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 2000 in default of which rigorous imprisonment for 3 months, taking into account the fact that the accused belonged to a socially backward strata of society of a village and age of the accused and the fact that the accused was a first offender, the maximum sentence prescribed was not awarded.[18]32503251

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

TOPICAL INTRODUCTION

For human society to regulate its administration, it requires the protection of not only the person of individuals, but also of their property. All systems of jurisprudence from the earliest times have, therefore, made provisions for its protection.To a considerable extent, provisions for violation of property rights have been provided in civil law and remedies are sought by private individuals in civil courts to obtain relief. A stage is, however, reached when violations of property rights become so violent, mischievous or fraudulent that the state finds it necessary to step in and utilise the machinery of its criminal law to afford protection to property in a speedy and effective way. To achieve this objective, this chapter, i.e., ch XVII, classifies the offences against property under the following ten heads:

(a) Theft (ss 378 to 382).
(b) Extortion (ss 383 to 389).
(c) Robbery and dacoity (ss 390 to 402).
(d) Criminal misappropriation of property (ss 403 to 404).
(e) Criminal breach of trust (ss 405 to 409).
(f) Receiving stolen property (ss 410 to 414).
(g) Cheating (ss 415 to 420).
(h) Fraudulent disposal of property (ss 421 to 424).
(i) Mischief (ss 425 to 440).
(j) Criminal trespass (ss 441 to 462).

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF THEFT

S. 378.

Theft.--

Whoever, intending to take dishonestly any moveable property out of the possession of any person without that person's consent, moves that property in order to such taking, is said to commit theft.

Explanation 1.--A thing so long as it is attached to the earth, not being moveable property, is not the subject of theft; but it becomes capable of being the subject of theft as soon as it is severed from the earth.

Explanation 2.--A moving effected by the same act which effects the severance may be a theft.

Explanation 3.--A person is said to cause a thing to move by removing an obstacle which prevented it from moving or by separating it from any other thing, as well as by actually moving it.3251

Explanation 4.--A person, who by any means causes an animal to move, is said to move that animal, and to move everything which, in consequence of the motion so caused, is moved by that animal.

Explanation 5.--The consent mentioned in the definition may be express or implied, and may be given either by the person in possession, or by any person having for that purpose authority either express or implied.

Illustrations

(a) A cuts down a tree on Z's ground, with the intention of dishonestly taking the tree out of Z's possession without Z's consent. Here, as soon as A has severed the tree in order to such taking, he has committed theft.

(b) A puts a bait for dogs in his pocket, and thus induces Z's dog to follow it. Here, if A's intention be dishonestly to take the dog out of Z's possession without Z's consent, A has committed theft as soon as Z's dog has begun to follow A.

(c) A meets a bullock carrying a box of treasure. He drives the bullock in a certain direction, in order that he may dishonestly take the treasure. As soon as the bullock begins to move, A has committed theft of the treasure.

(d) A, being Z's servant, and entrusted by Z with the care of Z's plate, dishonestly runs away with the plate, without Z's consent. A has committed theft.

(e) Z, going on a journey, entrusts his plate to A, the keeper of a warehouse, till Z shall return. A carries the plate to a goldsmith and sells it. Here the plate was not in Z's possession. It could not, therefore, be taken out of Z's possession, and A has not committed theft, though he may have committed criminal breach of trust.

(f) A finds a ring belonging to Z on a table in the house which Z occupies. Here the ring is in Z's possession, and if A dishonestly removes it, A commits theft.

(g) A finds a ring lying on the high-road, not in the possession of any person. A, by taking it, commits no theft, though he may commit criminal misappropriation of property.

(h) A sees a ring belonging to Z lying on a table in Z's house. Not venturing to misappropriate the ring immediately for fear of search and detection, A hides the ring in a place where it is highly improbable that it will ever be found by Z, with the intention of taking the ring from the hiding place and selling it when the loss is forgotten. Here A, at the time of first moving the ring, commits theft.

(i) A delivers his watch to Z, a jeweller, to be regulated. Z carries it to his shop. A, not owing to the jeweller any debt for which the jeweller might lawfully detain the watch as a security, enters the shop openly, takes his watch by force out of Z's hand, and carries it away. Here A, though he may have committed criminal trespass and assault, has not committed theft, inasmuch as what he did was not done dishonestly.

(j) If A owes money to Z for repairing the watch, and if Z retains the watch lawfully as a security for the debt, and A takes the watch out of Z's possession, with the intention of depriving Z of the property as a security for his debt, he commits theft, inasmuch as he takes it dishonestly.

(k) Again, if A, having pawned his watch to Z, takes it out of Z's possession, without Z's consent, not having paid what he borrowed on the watch he commits theft, though the watch is his own property, inasmuch as, he takes it dishonestly.

(l) A takes an article belonging to Z out of Z's possession, without Z's consent, with the intention of keeping it until he obtains money from Z as a reward for its restoration. Here A takes dishonestly; A has therefore committed theft.

(m) A, being on friendly terms with Z, goes into Z's library in Z's absence, and takes away a book without Z's express consent for the purpose merely of reading it, and with the intention of returning it. Here, it is probable that A may have conceived3252 that he had Z's implied consent to use Z's book. If this was A's impression, A has not committed theft.

(n) A asks charity from Z's wife. She gives A money, food and clothes, which A knows to belong to Z her husband. Here, it is probable that A may conceive that Z's wife is authorised to give away alms. If this was A's impression, A has not committed theft.

(o) A is the paramour of Z's wife. She gives A valuable property, which A knows to belong to her husband Z, and to be such property as she has no authority from Z to give. If A takes the property dishonestly, he commits theft.

(p) A, in good faith, believing property belonging to Z to be A's own property, takes that property out of B's possession. Here, as A does not take dishonestly, he does not commit theft.3253

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines the offence of theft and the next section prescribes the punishment thereof. In order to constitute the offence of theft, there must exist the following ingredients,[1] namely:

(a) the accused must have an intention to taking dishonestly;
(b) the subject of the theft must be some movable property;
(c) the said movable property must be taken out of the possession of any person;
(d) the said taking must be without that person's consent; and
(e) the property must be moved in order to such taking.

Similarly, the commission of theft consists in: (a) moving a movable property of a person out of his possession without his consent; and (b) the moving being in order to taking the property with dishonest intention. Thus, the absence of the person's consent at the time of moving and the presence of dishonest intention in so taking at that time are essential ingredients of the offence of theft.[2] The Supreme Court while analysing the ingredients of this section in Pyarelal Bhargava v State of Rajasthan ,[3] observed that this section may be dissected, into its component parts. Thus, a person will be guilty of the offence of theft:

(a) if he intends to cause a wrongful gain, or a wrongful loss, by unlawful means, of property to which the person gaining is not legally entitled, or to which the person losing is legally entitled, as the case may be;[4]
(b) the said intention to act dishonestly is in respect of movable property;
(c) the said property is taken out of the possession of another person without his consent; and
(d) he moves that property in order to such taking.

As theft is an offence against possession and not title, the criminal courts are not required to adjudicate on rival claims of the parties about title while deciding whether offence of theft is made out or not.[5]

2. Law of England

A person is guilty of theft if he dishonestly appropriates property belonging to another with the intention of permanently depriving the other of it; and 'theft' and 'steal' are to be construed accordingly. It is immaterial whether the appropriation is made with a view to gain or is made for the thief's own benefit.

A person guilty of theft is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years, or on summary conviction to imprisonment for a3254 term not exceeding six months or to a fine not exceeding the prescribed sum or to both.

In R v Smith ,[6] it was observed, 'Applying settled principles, notwithstanding that the victim had been in unlawful possession of a prohibited Class A drug, the appropriation of drugs constituted theft and the circumstances in which the drugs and been taken amounted to the offence of robbery. On the question of sentence, the instant case fell within level two of the guidelines of the Sentencing Guidelines Council, in which the range of sentence was seven years' custody. It followed that the sentence imposed in each case was manifestly excessive.' In P v Director of Public Prosecutions , [7] it was held, 'The instant case fell squarely on the side of pick-pocketing and other such cases, in which there was no direct physical contact between the thief and the victim. It could not be said that the minimal use of force used to remove a cigarette from the fingers of a person sufficed to use of force on that person. Such force could not cause any pain unless perhaps the person resisted strongly, inevitably resulting in direct contact between the persons. That unexpected removal was no more than removal of an item from a pocket. The offence was perfectly categorised as simple theft.'

3. Law of Canada

It is an indictable offence to commit theft where the property stolen is a testamentary instrument or the value of what is stolen exceeds $5,000. Where the value of what is stolen does not exceed $5,000, theft is a hybrid offence. 'Theft' means to take or convert anything, whether animate or inanimate, to the use of the accused or another person, with intent:

- to deprive, temporarily or absolutely, the owner of it, or a person who has a special property or interest in it, of the thing or of his property or interest in it;
- to pledge it or deposit it as security;
- to part with it under a condition with respect to its return that the person who parts with it may be unable to perform; or
- to deal with it in such a manner that it cannot be restored in the condition in which it was at the time it was taken or converted.

The taking or conversion must be done fraudulently and without colour of right. A person commits theft when, with intent to steal anything, he moves it or causes it to move or to be moved, or begins to cause it to become movable.

Special Property or Interest

This phrase includes the equitable interest that trust beneficiary has in shares of a company held in trust. It includes the interest of the holder of a conditional sales agreement. The National Research Council has been held to have 'special property or interest' in moneys given by way of a grant to a professor. The phrase includes the retention of a reversionary interest in the moneys, any shared interest in the moneys, or a right to have the moneys applied in a particular manner for a specific purpose. The de facto owner of an illegal narcotic drug has a special property or interest in the narcotic.3255

A person may be convicted of theft notwithstanding that anything that is alleged to have been stolen was stolen:

- by the owner of it from a person who has a special property or interest in it;
- by a person who has a special property or interest in it from the owner of it;
- by a lessee of it from his reversioner;
- by one of several joint owners, tenants in common or partners of or in it from the other persons who have an interest in it; or
- by the representatives of an organization from the organization.

Theft was held to be made out where an article was sold with knowledge of a bank's chattel mortgage and hence there was special interest in it. A neighbour looking after a house for the owner is within this section in respect of the house and its contents.

A person who has a wild living creature in captivity is deemed to have a special property or interest in it while it is in captivity and after it has escaped from captivity. Where oysters and oyster brood are in oyster beds, layings or fisheries that are the property of any person and are sufficiently marked out or known as the property of that person, that person shall be deemed to have a special property or interest in them. An indictment is sufficient if it describes an oyster bed, laying or fishery by name or in any other way, without stating that it is situated in a particular territorial division.

De Minimis Defence

The de minimis defence was rejected and the accused was convicted of theft of a bottle of nail polish, but the doctrine was applied where a handful of nuts was involved.

The offence of 'theft' is defined in s 322(1) of the Criminal Code. For the purposes of this trial, s 322(1)(a) is the applicable section. It states as follows:

> "322.
> (1) Every one commits theft who fraudulently and without colour of right takes, or fraudulently and without colour of right converts to his use or to the use of another person, anything, whether animate or inanimate, with intent:
> (a) to deprive, temporarily or absolutely, the owner of it, or a person who has a special property or interest in it, of the thing or of his property or interest in it."[8]

In R v Fowler ,[9] it was held, 'What is established is this accused put his hand in a bulk bin at the grocery store and took out some nuts. Given the accused's physical disability, which limits the use of his hands, I am satisfied, that the quantity of the nuts taken would be something significantly less than a full handful. The private investigator estimated the value of the nuts at $2.50, however the way he provided this estimate and the fact that he was not sure what type of nuts or candy were taken, does not provide me with any confidence that the value of the product taken has been established. It is my conclusion that the value was minimal, and likely less than the $2.50 estimated. The test is whether the conduct is sufficiently serious that it should be properly stigmatized as criminal. I have concluded that while this conduct is unacceptable and wrong, it should not be stigmatized as criminal, and therefore I3256 apply the principle of de minimis non curat lex. The accused is found not guilty of both charges.'

4. Theft Distinguished from Larceny

For a distinction between 'theft' under the IPC and 'larceny' in English law, KN Mehra v State of Rajasthan ,[10]Empress v Churn Chungo ,[11] and Empress v Nagappa [12] may be referred to.

The law relating to larceny, being substantially different from that under the IPC, it would not be proper to apply the principles under the English law, which is not in consonance with the Indian law, to cases in India.[13]

Similarly, cases decided in England, must be received in India with careful allowance because of great difference in law in the two countries.[14]

5. Theft Distinguished from Mischief

When a person commits mischief, he only causes loss to another, but does not gain himself. In theft, the wrongdoer makes dishonest gain at the expense of his victim. This is the essential distinction between theft and mischief.[15]

6. Theft Distinguished from Extortion

A distinction between theft and extortion is well known. Whereas offence of extortion is carried out by over-powering the will of the owner; in commission of an offence of theft the offender's intention is always to take without that person's consent.[16]

7. Criminal Misappropriation Distinguished from Theft

Theft and criminal misappropriation are two distinct offences and are defined in ss 378 and 403, IPC, respectively. A person commits theft when he dishonestly removes any movable property out of the possession of another person without that person's consent. In other words, a person is said to have committed theft of a movable property which is not in his own possession but in the possession of some other person. On the other hand, a person commits the offence of criminal misappropriation when he dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use any movable property which has already come into his possession by innocent means.[17]

Where a person commits theft or criminal misappropriation, the subsequent restoration of the theft or criminal misappropriation will not undo the offence which3257 has already been committed although in fit and proper circumstances the High Court in view of the particular facts and circumstances of the case may, in exercise of its inherent power under s 482, CrPC, quash the proceeding or pass such other order as it may deem fit and proper in view of the subsequent development or the parties may even compromise or compound the offence where it is permissible or the trial court in awarding punishment may take into consideration the subsequent development in mitigating the severity of punishment.[18] Where an exclusive property of one of the spouses is unwarrantedly taken away or misappropriated by the other and the marriage breaks down, it will not be correct to have a rigid approach, divorced from facts and circumstances of each case, to hold that the offence of misappropriation or theft cannot be made out.[19]

8. Theft and Criminal Breach of Trust by Public Servant

Where certain property is in possession of the main accused as a public servant as its custodian and it is dishonestly removed by the accused himself or by someone else at his instance, the offence does not amount to theft as the removal is with the consent of the accused, but amounts to a criminal breach of trust punishable under s 409, IPC .[20]

9. 'Intending to Take'

The intention of the accused must be to take, i.e., to acquire, possession of something in another's possession. The moving of property should be effected with a view to take possession or custody of property.[21] Again, to commit theft, one need not take movable property permanently out of another's possession with the intention of not returning the same to him. It would be sufficient if he takes any property out of the possession of another person though he intends to return it to him later on.[22] Where the accused snatched away some books from a boy, as he came out of school, and told him that they would be returned when he came to his house, it was held that theft had been committed.[23] However, snatching of a revolver by the accused from a member of the complainant's party, in order to prevent further bloodshed and surrendering it to the police at the earliest possible opportunity, is not theft as there is no intention to steal it.[24]

10. 'Dishonestly'

The word 'dishonestly', as is used in this section, does not carry its ordinary meaning.[25] It is a technical term which has been expressly defined in s 24, IPC . A person can be said to have dishonest intention if, in taking the property, it is his intention to cause gain, by unlawful means, of the property to which the person so gaining is not legally entitled, or to cause loss, by unlawful means, of property to3258 which the person so losing is legally entitled.[26] 'Dishonestly' involves the twin ingredients of 'intention' and 'dishonestly'. 'Dishonestly' again involves intention, i.e., the doing of a thing with an intention to cause wrongful gain or wrongful loss.[27] The intention of a person who takes a thing, is not dishonest unless it is with the intention to cause either such gain or loss as is provided in s 24 .[28] A person cannot be convicted of theft of a property unless it has been found, as a matter of fact, that he is not entitled to it.[29] The section requires that the removal of property from the possession of another should be with the intent to cause wrongful gain to himself or wrongful loss to another person. Dishonest intention is the gist of the offence.[30] This intention is known as animus furandi and without it the offence of theft is not complete.[31] Unless the removal of property by the accused with dishonest intention is established, no offence under s 378, IPC, can be made out.[32]

The element of 'dishonest intention' which is an essential element to constitute the offence of theft cannot be attributed to a person exercising his right under a hire-purchase agreement entered into between the parties as he may not have an intention of causing wrongful gain or to cause wrongful loss to the hirer.[33] However, on the other hand, his motive in intending wrongful gain or loss is immaterial and motive does not form an ingredient in the definition of theft.[34] The following points should, however, be noted:

(a) It is not essential that both gain and loss should be intended, i.e., the act, causing wrongful loss to one, need not simultaneously cause wrongful gain to the accused. It is sufficient if the person, from whose possession the removal takes place, has suffered wrongful loss.[35] Usually, of course, the thief intends to acquire a gain to himself or to a third party and a loss to the former possessor of the thing, but it is sufficient if only loss is intended. However, if neither of these intentions is present, there can be no theft by the taking since the intention, whatever it may be, is not dishonest. Where the accused, charged by his master for having committed theft of a box, admitted that he had removed the box and left it concealed in the cow-shed to teach a lesson to his master, it was held that he could not be convicted of theft.[36]

(b) Wrongful loss is said to be caused in keeping, without legal right, a person out of possession of his property as also in wrongfully retaining possession3259 by one of another's article.[37] In Empress v Rambaran ,[38] it was held that a theft would not be any less because it is committed by members of one denomination in regard to the property of members of any other denomination under some religious incentive.

(c) The intended gainer need not necessarily be to the thief personally. The thief may intend gain to a third party or to himself and a third party. Where a post office peon, employed for sorting letters for delivery, secreted two bearing letters in his cloth, intending to hand them over to the delivery peon and to share with him the bearing postage, it was held that he was guilty of theft.[39]

(d) The gain or loss may be permanent or temporary.

11. 'Any Movable Property'

Under this section, the subject of theft can only be 'movable property'. The words 'movable property', as defined in s 22, IPC, 'are intended to include corporeal property of every description except land and things attached to the earth or permanently fastened to anything which is attached to the earth'. A thing, as long as it is attached to the earth, is not movable property and cannot be the subject of theft. It can, however, be so as soon as it is severed from the earth. In the definition of movable property, the property includes corporeal property of every description. Corporeal property is property which may be perceived by the senses in contradistinction to incorporeal rights which are not so perceivable. It must, therefore, be tangible. A house is not the subject of theft, but its materials would be movable property and their removal would be theft.[40] A boat, used for residence, does not cease to be movable property because it is used for residence. It may be the subject of theft.[41]Standing crop, when cut, becomes movable property. Infact, the very act of severance may constitute the offence of theft and this is made clear by explanations 1 and 2 of this section.[42] Removal of fallen trees, or the cutting of standing trees, by a tenant from the land of his landlord without his consent would be theft.[43] However, the sale of trees, belonging to others and not cut down at the time of sale, does not constitute theft.[44] Earth, i.e., the soil, and all the component parts of soil, inclusive of stones and minerals, when severed from the earth or land, to which it is attached, becomes movable property and it becomes the subject of theft. Thus, cart-loads of earth,[45] or of stones and other minerals,[46] would become subjects of theft. The position of some other movable properties is constituted below.3260

(a) Salt

Taking salt against the will of the government from a swamp, which is government property and is guarded by the police, is theft.[47] However, the removal of salt for one's own use from a creek, not forming part of any salt-work, would not constitute any offence; a dishonest removal from a creek under the supervision of an officer of the customs department would, however, be theft.[48]

(b) Mining of sand without licence/permit

Where a person mines sand from river bed without licence/permit from the Government, his act constitutes offence under ss 378 punishable under s 379 IPC .[49]

(c) Electricity--Position under Indian Electricity Act 1910

Electricity, not being movable property, cannot be the subject of theft under the IPC .[50] Section 39 of the Indian Electricity Act (9 of 1910), brings the act of dishonest abstraction, consumption or use of electricity within the meaning of theft as understood in the IPC . The offence is not theft within the meaning of IPC ; it is deemed to be theft within the meaning of IPC in view of s 39, without which theft of electrical energy could not be so deemed as theft.[51] Similarly, the view, taken in Omprakash v State ,[52] and State (Delhi Administration) v Dharampal ,[53] that the charge of dishonest abstraction of electricity must be framed under s 379, IPC, read with s 39, Indian Electricity Act (9 of 1910), seems to be the correct approach.

Where the consumer had willfully or fraudulently altered the index of the meter or tampered with the wiring for preventing it from duly registering the energy consumed, he must be held to have committed the offence of theft of energy under s 39 read with s 44(c) of the Indian Electricity Act (9 of 1910).[54]

The prosecution launched by the electrical engineer of the electricity board without any authority from the board being in contravention of the Indian Electricity Act (9 of 1910), the conviction and sentence awarded to the accused are liable to be quashed.[55]When the initiation of prosecution is by a junior engineer and not at the instance of persons mentioned in s 50 of the said Act, the lapse is fatal to the prosecution.[56]

In case of death of the deceased while he went to catch fish in the river due to electrocution on coming into contact with the unauthorised electric hook line drawn3261 by the accused, the SDO (electrical) is competent under s 50 of the Indian Electricity Act (9 to 1910) to lodge a written complaint against the accused for offences under ss 379 and 304A, IPC read with s 39 of the Indian Electricity Act (9 of 1910).[57] The electrical engineer is also a person aggrieved and thus the competent person to initiate prosecution against the accused.[58] However, when the entire amount of impugned theft of electricity bill is paid by the accused, the FIR lodged against the accused under s 44 of the Indian Electricity Act (9 of 1910) read with s 379, IPC, is liable to be quashed.[59]

When the name/particulars of the accused and the date of raid to detect the theft is not correctly given in the complaint, the FIR, charge sheet and consequential proceedings against the accused are liable to be quashed.[60]

The offence of theft of energy is not made compoundable under the Indian Electricity Act (9 of 1910). The same cannot also be compounded under s 320, CrPC, when the amount involved exceeds Rs 250.[61]

(d) Electricity--Position under Indian Electricity Act 2003

Commentary under the headings 'Theft of Electricity--Complaint by "Person aggrieved"' and 'Theft of Electricity-- Section 379 not attracted--Special Law Overrides General Law' in s 379, post, may be referred to.

Section 135 of the Electricity Act 2003 deals with the offence of theft of electricity and s 136 of the Act deals with the theft of electric lines and connected materials. Section 152 of the Act provides for compounding of the offence of theft of electricity. Where a consumer has committed theft of electricity, on the payment of compounding sum as specified in the section on the spot, the consumer is set at liberty and no proceedings in criminal court shall be instituted against such person. For theft of electricity, see the undermentioned case.[62] Where a consumer is found guilty of tampering with the meter by the courts below, interference with the findings by the High Court is not proper.[63]

Where the allegation against the accused was of tampering with electric meter, the tampering and seizure of meter were not proved, the investigating officer of the case was not examined. Held, the prosecution failed to prove the charge, accused was acquitted of the charge under s 379, IPC .[64]

(e) Telegraph Wire

'Telegraph Wire' means any copper wire the diameter of which in millimeters, is:

(i) not less than 2.43 and not more than 2.53; or
(ii) not less than 2.77 and not more than 2.87; or3262
(iii) not less than 3.42 and not more than 3.52.[65]

A mere visual appreciation of the colour and lustre of the wire coupled with the measurement of the diameter is not sufficient to establish that the wire in question was copper wire which came within the prohibited category of telegraph wire as defined in s 2(b) of the Telegraph Wires (Unlawful Possession) Act 1950. The three tests namely: (a) measurement of diameter, (b) taking of weight, and (c) finding out the resistance of wire are not sufficient to establish that the wire in question was copper wire, the possession of which is prohibited and punishable under the said Act.[66] A mere possession of telegraph wire is punishable under s 5 of the said Act, while to attract ss 379 / 411, IPC, such possession should be dishonest.[67]

(f) Aircraft

The taking out of an aircraft by the accused for an unauthorised flight gives him the temporary use of the aircraft, for his own purpose and temporarily deprives the owner of the aircraft, viz, the government, of its legitimate use for its purposes, i.e., the use of the aircraft for the Indian Air Force squadron that day. Such use being unauthorised and against all regulations of aircraft-flying is a gain or loss by unlawful means. In such a case, all the circumstances of the unauthorised flight justify the conclusion, both as to the absence of consent and as to the unlawfulness of the means by which there is a temporary gain or loss by the use of the aircraft.[68] Although the ultimate purpose of the flight was to go to Pakistan, the use of the aircraft for that purpose was unauthorised and hence, unlawful gain of that use by the accused and the consequent loss to the government of its legitimate use, can only be considered intentional.[69]

(g) Gas

Gas is distinctly a tangible and corporeal property and can be the subject of theft,[70] though electricity, as stated above, is not a movable property.

(h) Idol

Idol, when fixed to the earth, is an immovable property. However, if it is severed from the earth, it is a movable property and may be the subject-matter of theft.[71]

(i) Fish

Fish in an open and unenclosed water body are ferae naturae and cannot be the subject of theft,[72] but if the fish have been taken at a time when they are restrained of their natural liberty and are liable to be taken at the pleasure of the owner of the tank, the accused may be held guilty of theft.[73] When there was nothing to show that the creek was anything in the nature of a tank in which fish are caught and stored in any3263 sense, but was a natural reservoir of water which had come there without human agency and in which fish would naturally be, it was held that the catching of fish from such a place was not an offence of theft.[74]

Where fish are able to go in, or come out of a private fishery, the removal of fish from such fishery would not amount to theft.[75] Therefore, the removal of fish from a running stream is not theft.[76] Similarly, fishing in a tank by one in assertion of his own bona fide claim of right does not constitute the offence of theft.[77]

In the absence of any evidence to show that the complainant was in exclusive possession of disputed jala (net) at the relevant time, the acquittal of the accused of the charge under s 379, IPC, that he trespassed into the disputed jala (net) belonging to the complainant and caught fish is justified.[78]

As stated earlier, fish in their free state are regarded as ferae naturae, but they are regarded as being in the possession of the person who owns an exclusive right to catch them in a particular spot, known as a fishery, but only within that spot. There can, thus, be theft of fish from a tank which belongs to another and is in his possession.[79] Similarly, the removal of fish from an enclosed tank can be the subject of theft.[80] When once the water in a pond has fallen to such a level that fish cannot leave it, they are trapped, and consequently in the possession of the owner of the pond. That being so, any person, who takes fish from that pond, may be guilty of theft.[81] Where the accused broke open the bank of a tank, which had been recorded as khas property of the zamindar, and took a large quantity of fish therefrom, they were held guilty of theft.[82]

(j) Birds

Birds in their wild state are not the subject of theft even though they may be on the land or in the forest which is the subject of private ownership. If, however, they are reduced to possession and are reclaimed (and known to be so) or confined, they can be the subject of theft. Thus, where pigeons are shut up in their boxes every night,[83] or are so tame that they come home every night to roost in the boxes at the house of the owner,[84] and have retained animus revertendi,[85] they may be the subject of theft even though they have an opportunity of getting out and enjoying themselves in the3264 open air.[86] Similarly, there may be larceny of pheasants if they are under the control and dominion of the keeper at the time when they are taken.[87] A peacock, though ferae naturae, if it is tamed and remains with the owners and does not consort with other wild peacocks, it can be the subject of theft.[88]

Edible bird's nests are not in the possession of anybody until they are collected. A person who collects them without a licence, does not commit theft.[89]

(k) Animals

Animals, other than domestic animals, can be the subject of theft if they are so enclosed in a park, or in some other enclosed space, which is private property and from where they may be taken at pleasure. In order to render any animal ferae naturae, the property of any person, there must be a complete capture, the result of which is to reduce the animal completely into possession. Mere pursuit short of capture will not do, and so long as it is possible for the animal to escape, it cannot be said that there is such a reduction into possession as makes the animal the property of the pursuer. The mere fact of the accused's dog overtaking an animal and pulling it down, does not preclude the possibility of escape so as to make the animal his property.[90] The wildness of an elephant, which has escaped from a life of domestication, must, in every case, depend upon the circumstances. Where an elephant has apparently been in a state of domestication for a long time and it has resumed its habits on being recaptured, it is not wild, and the property in it never ceases. Therefore, the property in it of the owner, before recapture, does not come to an end.[91]

If a person kills a wild animal or wild bird on the land of another person, such dead creature does not belong to the killer, but to the proprietor of the land and such proprietor can lawfully demand and, if refused, seize such dead creature from the possession of its killer.[92]

(l) Human Body

A human body, whether living or dead, except perhaps bodies or portions thereof or mummies, preserved in museums or scientific institutions, cannot be the subject of theft.[93]

(m) Water

Water, running freely along a channel, is not reduced to possession till it is actually brought on to the land irrigated.[94] Whether, in the case of any particular river, channel or reservoir, the government can be said to be in possession of water, must depend on circumstances, and the question must be decided as one of fact. Waters in rivers are presumably vested in the government and when the government has taken elaborate steps and employed a large establishment to control the use of water in a3265 river or channel and to prevent any person from using it, the water in the river or channel should be regarded as being in possession of the government so as to be the subject of theft.[1] When water is conveyed in pipes and reduced into possession, it can be the subject of theft. Thus, the taking of water, supplied in municipal pipes, without permission would amount to theft.[2]

(n) Standing Timber

The petitioners who were alleged to have removed the standing timber from the property in their possession even after the civil court had declared the title of the complainant, cannot be charged with the offence of theft.[3]

(o) Things of no Value

Under s 378, IPC, the mere fact that the stolen thing is not, in itself, of any value, does not belittle the offence.[4] A cancelled cheque falls within the meaning of the term 'property' even if it is worth no more than the value of the paper upon which it is written.[5] In such cases, if the property has absolutely no value, s 95, IPC, may be applied and the accused acquitted of theft.[6]

12. 'Out of the possession'

To constitute an offence of theft within the ambit of s 378, IPC, the prosecution has to prove that the offender has taken movable property from the actual/physical possession of the victim without consent.[7]

13. Bona Fide Claim to a Movable Property--a Good Defence

Although, in law, the taking of property out of possession dishonestly without the consent of the person concerned is sufficient, yet the bona fide claim of right will constitute a good defence in a charge of theft. No charge of theft can be sustained, unless the conduct of the accused is compatible with that of a thief. For example, the conduct of an accused, proceeding in a challenging way towards his car, seized in a case, with gesture made articulate that he would take the same, is not the conduct compatible with that of a thief.[8] If a crop is removed,[9] or if a property is taken away,[10] under a *bona fid*e claim of right, it would not amount to an offence under s 379, IPC, even though the claim may be ill-founded in fact or in law.[11] A conviction for theft cannot be sustained if there is a bona fide assertion of a claim of3266 right and the court should not convict unless it is in a position to say that his claim is a mere pretence.[12]

14. Bona Fide Claim--Plea Should be Honest, and Not a Mere Pretence

In order however to set up a bona fide claim of right as a defence in a case of charge for theft, it is necessary that the plea must be an honest one, and not a mere pretence. If it is not so made and is a mere pretence, it will be of no avail.[13] A mere assertion of right does not constitute a claim of right.[14] Thus, a mere plea by an accused, that the property, with the theft of which he is charged, is his own property unsupported by poor or by some circumstances which tend to indicate that there is some truth in the statement, is insufficient.[15] Where the entire question of possession and even of title was in an extremely fluid state, the respondent's stand, that he cultivated the land, was held, by the Supreme Court, to be a matter of considerable doubt.[16]

15. Bona Fide Claim--Colour of a Legal Right

It is well settled that a *bona fide*claim of right is a good defence against a charge of theft and an act does not amount to theft unless there is not only any legal right but also no appearance or colour of legal right. However, the expression 'colour of a legal right' means not a false pretence, but a fair pretence, not a complete absence of the claim, but a bona fide claim, however weak. Therefore, when the removal is in the assertion of a bona fide claim of right however ill-founded that claim may be, the removal thereof does not constitute a theft.[17]

A bona fide claim of right has reference to an honest belief in the accused that he can legally claim that property which he has taken. Such a claim is bona fide when there is existence, appearance or even colour of a legal right, the last being a fair pretence of the claim even if it be weak.[18] The above proposition seems to imply a distinction between mere existence, appearance or colour of a right and the bona fide nature of a claim. The claim of the right as well as the bona fide nature of the claim both seem to be essential in order to constitute a good defence because it is stated that the court has to examine both--that the belief existed and that the claim was bona fide.[19] Where a bona fide claim of right exists, it can be a good defence to a prosecution for theft. An act does not amount to theft unless there is not only any legal right, but also no3267 appearance or colour of a legal right.[20] In State of Uttar Pradesh v Tota Ram ,[21] the accused was the highest bidder at an auction, held by the gram sabha, for the sale of a khandhar. The accused, even without complying with the condition of depositing one-fourth of the auction price, removed bricks from the khandhar. It was held that since no contingent title relating to the khandhar, had vested in the accused, it could not be said that the accused believed, in good faith, that he had right to the khandhar when there was not even a semblance or colour of a legal right over the same.

16. Whether a Claim is a Bona Fide Claim is a Question of Fact

It is a question of fact in each case as to whether the accused acted under a bona fide claim or colour of right.[22] The honesty, or otherwise, of the claim, advanced by the accused, has to be decided in each case.[23] The court has to decide this question by considering all the circumstances of the case.[24] Where, in Brajabehari Mohapatra v Chakradhar Misra ,[25] one of the accused had the right, whereas most of the other accused had only some right to fish in a tank, it was held that the assertion of their claim was not at all a false pretence. Where there was a dispute with respect to a crop, which was reaped, but not removed from the land by the accused, and the accused claimed a share as joint owner of the land on which the crops were raised, it was held that the accused was acting in assertion of a bona fide claim.[26]

17. Cases in Which a Question of Bona Fide Claim may Arise

The question as to whether an act done amounts to theft, when a plea of bona fide claim is raised, may arise in the following cases:

(a) Where the person, who takes property from the possession of another, claims any right to the property. This may be claimed:

(i) because the claimant is the owner of the article and he has not parted with the right of possession with the owner in favour of another; or
(ii) because he bona fide believes himself to be the owner of the article as he has not parted with its possessory rights; or
(iii) because he claims possession of the property on behalf of another person, who is the owner of the article, or the claimant, in good faith, believes another to be the owner.

(b) Where the property admittedly belongs to another person, and the person, taking it out of the possession of such person, or anyone else in possession3268 on his behalf, is under the mistaken notion that he is not entitled to keep that property to enforce any right that he may, in good faith, believe himself to be possessed of.

When the plea of bona fide right of claim of the accused persons is believed by the court to be proved, the charge under s 379, IPC, cannot stand.[27]

A mere doubt as to one's right is not sufficient. The doubt must be shown to be reasonable.[28] The claim must not be mala fide, but must be tried and determined by the court and must be proved by evidence to be fair and adequate, though not necessarily acceptable or adequate in a civil court for making, or refusing of a decree.[29] In cases where a person has removed crop grown by another at his cost, it cannot be laid down as an inflexible rule of law that a plea of bona fide claim of right can be rejected as a matter of course; only the plea has to be examined with great care than in other types of cases. It is always necessary that in such cases, the courts should give a clear finding as to the assertion of the bona fide claim of right being well-founded or not. Where properties stand recorded jointly in the name of several persons, though the disputed property stands in the name of one branch alone and remains to be partitioned, the accused persons may honestly believe that they still had the right to the said property, and even if they had no right, there may be a bona fide dispute as to title and possession. Thus, the accused persons cannot he held to have dishonestly removed the crop. Such removal would not amount to an offence.[30] A bona fide claim of right can be asserted between two rival claimants to the property as when the same property is the subject-matter of sale to two different persons and the theft alleged is in respect of that property.[31]

18. Removal of Crop--Whether Theft

In the case of an alleged theft of crop grown on land, the real test is as to which of the parties has grown the crop,[32] and a decision on this point will, in a majority of cases, enable the court to come to a definite conclusion as to whether the claim of the accused person is made in good faith or is a mere pretence.[33] It can be a good defence only if the accused can show that he has a bona fide claim to crops which he had harvested and taken away.[34] The court must see whether the prosecution has3269 established, beyond reasonable doubt, that the complainant had raised the disputed crop.[35] The animus has to be determined with reference to the plea of the accused because a mere plea of denial and the plea of ignorance as to who was the real grower of crop are poles apart.[36]

When the land is alleged to be purchased by the complainant from the accused, the cultivating possession of the accused cannot be denied in the absence of any documentary evidence so the offence of theft is not made out against the accused.[37]

Where the accused removed some paddy crops and claimed that he was in possession of the plot and had himself grown the crops, but the court, without coming to any specific finding as to who was in possession of the plot, was of the opinion that the crops were grown by the accused himself, it was held that his claim was bona fide.[38] Where the adjoining fields of the complainant and the accused were demarcated by a line and the accused removed some crops from the complainant's side of the line under the impression that he had sown the crops and he was entitled to them, it was held that the accused was not guilty.[39] Where the crops are grown by the accused and merely a decree for possession,[40] or an order under s 145, CrPC, is made,[41] a charge of theft would not be sustainable. In execution of a decree of rent against the accused, his holding was put to sale and was purchased by the decree-holder who was put in possession thereof by the court. The accused filed a suit to set aside the rent decree and contended that the decree was obtained by fraud. He removed the crops from the field in his possession. It was held that the accused was not guilty of the offence of theft.[42] In the absence of any cogent and unimpeachable proof on behalf of the prosecution that the paddy crops were grown and harvested by the complainant, the plea of the accused, that the said crops were grown by him on the land in question and they were harvested by him and his brother, has to be accepted. In such a case, removal of paddy crops, grown and harvested by them, cannot amount to theft.[43]

However, when the oral evidence, tendered by the prosecution witnesses firmly established the uprooting of some of the crops and removal of the same, the mere non-recovery of the crop from the accused is immaterial for the offence under s 379, IPC .[44]

Generally speaking, the question as to who grew the crop is the first matter to look into, but it is not the only matter in all cases. The question of title, though secondary,3270 is relevant and so is the state of evidence as regards past possession.[45] The rule can, at best, be treated only as a general principle and circumstances may vary wherein other factors may also be found necessary to be taken into consideration.[46] In such case, the documentary evidence regarding possession is very often unsatisfactory because, in most cases, the actual possession of land and the sowing of the crop therein has only an oral source of proof. Where there is no oral evidence as to ownership and actual possession of land and of growing crops therein by the complainant, the accused is entitled to an acquittal,[47] but when the crop has been grown by another, the person, removing the same, cannot escape liability merely by asserting his claim of title to the land containing the crop.[48] The removal of the crops by a person, who knows, or when it is proved,[49] that they had been raised by another person, who was in possession of the land, would be theft, and it cannot be contended that there was a bona fide claim of right.[50] Where the possession of the land had been delivered to the complainant, who had throughout remained in possession and had grown paddy crop, which was the subject of theft, the accused were convicted of theft.[51] The mere fact that some trouble arose,[52] or there was some disturbance caused to the complainant at the time of his sowing the crop, will not lead to any contrary conclusion unless the disturbance was of the character actually dispossessing the complainant.[53] Similarly, the mere institution of a civil suit for partition just a few months before the alleged occurrence will not justify a bona fide claim of right when the complainant has been in possession for the last 14 years.[54] In Abinash Chandra Sarkar v Atul Krishna Bose ,[55] the trespasser had grown paddy on the land in dispute. The complainant obtained a decree for ejectment against the trespasser and got into actual possession of the land. The accused, acting on behalf of the trespasser, cut and removed the paddy. It was held that as they had no right to enter upon the land and remove the paddy, they were guilty of theft. Where a person, appointed as guardian of a minor, allows the lessees of a field to prepare the land, sow and cultivate it and, when the crops are ripe, takes forcible possession and removes the crop, he would be guilty of theft.[56] Where the complainant was in possession of the disputed land and had grown crops on it, the cutting and forcible removing of the standing crops from the disputed land would amount to theft.[57] In Durga Tewari v Emperor ,[58] certain land, on which there was a standing crop of paddy, was entrusted to the accused to take care and watch till paddy was ready, when they were to give notice to the factory people, who would reap it. It was held3271 that by cutting the crops themselves and disposing of the same, the accused made themselves liable for theft.

19. Removal of Movable Property Other than the Crop--Whether Theft

When there is a bona fide dispute regarding certain land, the cutting of trees from such land is not theft. In Suraj Ali v Arfan Ali ,[59] the accused claimed that the disputed land belonged to him and he was in possession of that land and, therefore, he had lawfully taken his own bamboos. It was held that the accused could not be convicted of theft unless the court is in a position to say that his claim is a mere pretence.[60] Where each party was asserting its right to take some sand from a particular spot of a river, it was observed that though one or the other of them was wrong, yet as both of them were claiming a bona fide right to take the sand, a conviction under s 379, IPC, could not be maintained.[61] If the ownership of a tank is in dispute, removal of fish from such tank is not theft.[62] However, the removal of fish from a tank, which belongs to another and is in his possession, is theft if they are caught without the consent of the owner and without any bone fide claim of right.[63] Similarly, entering land in another's possession and cutting down and removing trees therefrom is certainly a wrongful loss of the usufruct from the trees to that another, and in such a case, the pretence of bona fide right cannot be sustained.[64]

Where the accused demolished a small encroachment in the bona fide belief that the land belonged to him and took away the demolished materials, it was held that howsoever high-handed the action of the accused might have been, he could not be convicted of theft as criminal intent was doubtful.[65] Where some property of the deceased was in possession of his concubine and, on his death, his heir and servants removed the property from the possession of the concubine as belonging to the deceased, it was held that the accused could not be convicted of theft.[66] Where an accused, who had lost a buffalo, found some buffaloes with some persons, who claimed that they had found them straying, claimed one of them as his own, took it away and subsequently cut off the tips of her horns, it was held that the accused had a3272*bona fide* claim and was not guilty of theft.[67] In Suvvari Sanyasi Apparao v Boddepalli Lakshminarayana ,[68] a printing press was sold by a person, who was admittedly a printer for some years and the declared keeper of that press, to one person. A declaration was made by the purchaser under s 4 of the Press and Registration of Books Act (25 of 1867) and it was accepted. The two accused, one of whom was the owner, in law and in fact, of the press and the other a lessee, removed the printing press in the absence of the purchaser. Both of them were prosecuted for the offence of theft. Their plea was that they had removed the press in the bona fide exercise of their right. It was held that a declared keeper of the press is not necessarily the owner thereof so as to be able to confer title to the press upon another and, therefore, a prima facie case was established that the accused had taken possession of the press under a bona fide claim of right as a result of which they were not guilty of the offence of theft. In Harnam Singh v Emperor ,[69] the foreman in a printing press removed several bags of types from the press without the consent and permission of the employers. He pleaded that the things belonged to him and that he had removed them because the employers failed to carry out their part of the contract which was that they would either take him as a person in the business or purchase the disputed materials from him for their press. There was no finding as to whether the ownership of the things removed did or did not belong to the complainants. It was held that there was a bona fide assertion of right on the part of the accused with respect to the articles removed and the fact that the things were removed secretly and were dispatched by railway as locks, and not as types, was not sufficient to indicate dishonest intention. It is not theft if the accused removes some property from the possession of a vendee of his partner (who had not paid the balance of money due from him) under a mistaken notion of law that the property belonged to the accused.[70] In Jagdish Chandra Dey v Nilkanta Chakraborty ,[71] the case against the accused was that they had removed some jack fruits, etc, from the ail of the complainant. The complainant failed to prove that the disputed ail was in his possession and that the accused removed jack fruits, etc, with dishonest intention. In these circumstances, the accused could not be convicted of theft. In EJ Judah v Emperor ,[72] the accused gave a kettle for repairs to the complainant on the promise to finish it within six or seven days. The complainant did not complete the repairs within the stipulated time. The accused went to his shop and took forcible possession of the article. It was held that the accused was not guilty of theft as there was no dishonest intention. A person who had removed bulls from the cattle-pound and returned them to the true owner, was not held guilty of theft.[73] In Paltu Goswami v Ram Kumar Das ,[74] the land of the accused on which paddy was grown, surrounded a pond. There was a dispute between the accused and the villagers regarding the use of the pond for wetting their jute on the ground that such use would damage the paddy land of the accused. The accused removed the jute of the complainant and kept it outside the pond asking the complainant to take the jute away. It was held that no question of theft at all arose in the case. Where the accused, in pursuance of the common object, broke into a temple and removed idols for celebrating a festival3273 without any dishonest intention, it was held that they were guilty under s 147, IPC, but not of theft.[75] Where a buffalo of the complainant, which had injured the buffalo of the accused, was taken away by the accused who thought that they could retain it until compensated, it was held that the accused was not guilty of theft.[76] In Matabbar Sheikh v Emperor ,[77] A, a ticket collector of a steam-boat company, when collecting tax-tickets, found B, a passenger, without a ticket and took, from him, his umbrella as security for paying, by him, his fare. It was held that A was not guilty of theft as the conduct of the accused might be overzealous, but it was not theft in the sense that he had no intention to appropriate the umbrella for his own use.

The complainant had first sold a bullock to the accused. The accused subsequently left the bullock with the complainant and took away another bullock in replacement of the one, sold to him, on the ground that the complainant had promised that another bullock would be given if the accused was not satisfied with the bullock sold. He made this belief known to the complainant at the time of purchase. It was held that though the claim might have been unfounded in law or fact, that, by itself, was not sufficient to infer that there was dishonest intention.[78]

The mere inability to prove a prescriptive right to fish within certain limits free from payment of rent is quite distinct from the want of right of any kind to fish therein rendering a person, so fishing, liable for the theft of fish taken by him.[79] In Harendra Narayan Das v Ramjan Khan ,[80] the accused removed some wood from a forest and his case was that he had a right to take the wood without a pass. It was held that the accused could not be convicted of theft as the magistrate had refused to decide whether he had such a right.

Where the charge is for theft of clods of earth worth 6 pies from the public channel bed belonging to the government, any dishonest intention need not be assumed unless it is shown that the accused knew that the public officer in charge of the bed, had notified that the removal of earth would injure the pecuniary or other interests of the government or unless, from the clandestine nature of the act, such knowledge can be inferred.[81] Some bark from trees in a government forest, which was not defined and notified and was not a bark subject to seigniorage, would not be theft in the absence of proof of dishonest intention.[82]

Cutting branches of a tree, causing obstruction to an overhead electricity supply line, without permission under s 18(3) of the Electricity Supply Act, under the orders of the superior officers in good faith would not amount to theft.[83]

20. Removal of Attached Movable Property--Whether Theft

Once a property is attached by a court of competent jurisdiction, the custody thereof shall be deemed to be with the court.[84] There is no doubt that property under3274 attachment under s 145, CrPC 1973, is in custodia legis.[85] Where the crops are grown by the accused and merely a decree for possession,[86] or an order under s 145, CrPC, is made,[87] a charge of theft would not be sustainable.

When property is attached under s 145, CrPC, and so its possession is with the court, the reaping and removal of crop therefrom by a party to the proceeding under s 145, CrPC, would amount to theft, but such act of a non-party to the proceeding or a non-party engaged by the respondents in the proceedings would not amount to theft when such non-party had no criminal intention of committing theft.[88]

Where the attachment of the movable property is not legally valid, removal thereof by the accused with the consent of the judgment-debtor is not theft.[89]

Where a process is signed only by the amin and it does not bear the seal of the court, the attachment is illegal and property does not pass from the possession of the judgment-debtor into that of the court and the removal of such property does not constitute any offence.[90]

The removal of property, which has been attached without a proper warrant of attachment, would not be theft.[91] If, however, the movable property, belonging to a judgment-debtor, is attached in execution of a decree and is placed in the custody of another person in a proper way, the judgment-debtor would be guilty of theft if he removes the property and appropriates it.[92] Where property is attached by a receiver, a person, removing the property with the knowledge of such attachment, from the receiver's possession the person would then be guilty of theft.[93]

However, when no material is brought on record by the prosecution to show that the accused persons had any knowledge relating to the order of attachment or auction sale of standing crop, they cannot be held liable for theft or criminal trespass.[94]

Where the claim of the accused in respect of some articles, attached in execution of a decree, was allowed, but the accused, instead of taking delivery through court, broke open the locks of the shop, where the articles were, and took forcible possession in the absence of the complainant, it was held that the accused only took his own property secured in his own shop, and it could not be said that he intended to cause wrongful loss to the complainant or wrongful gain to himself.[95] Where the3275 accused cut the crops, which were attached for arrears of revenue, to prevent them from being damaged and placed them on the threshing floor on the land for which arrears were due, its was held that it would not be theft if they had no intention to carry it off and defeat the attachment.[1]

21. Removal of Movable Property by a Vendor or Vendee--Whether Theft

If a vendor, after giving notice to his vendee, removes his article from the place of delivery on non-payment of the balance of price, he commits no theft, there being no dishonest intention.[2] If, however, a vendor takes away a thing from the possession of the vendee not because of a bona fide belief that he has a right to take it away, but with the intention of coercing him to pay the balance of the price even though he does not intend to deprive the vendee of the thing permanently, he must be deemed to have committed theft.[3] In AV Srinivasalu v Govinda ,[4] the accused, who purchased some land from one of the land-owners in a village, removed grass from the land. The contention of the vendor was that he had sold the land without the right to share the grass, and that the right was severable from the land. It was held that the accused did not commit theft and the court could not go into the question whether the claim was good or bad. The only question before the court, was whether the accused had acted bona fide, and not whether there was any right at all.

22. Removal of Movable Property by Spouse--Whether Theft

When the husband and wife even on the date of the incident were residing together in the house as husband and wife, and all the household goods belonging to either of the spouses were in their joint possession, if the wife has removed anything from her own house and from her own possession, it cannot be said that the removal was from somebody else's possession much less than it was done with any dishonest intention, particularly, when in the circumstances of the case it can safely be said that she removed her goods with a view to protect her interest and not to remain at the mercy of her husband, who was maltreating her.[5] However, this view of the Delhi High Court runs counter to its earlier decision wherein it was held that:

> Where an exclusive property of one of the spouses is unwarrantedly taken away or misappropriated by the other, and the marriage breaks down, it will not be correct to have a rigid approach, divorced from facts and circumstances of each case, to hold that the offence of misappropriation or theft cannot be made out. Similar must be held to be the position of the dowry items given for the exclusive use of one of the spouses. Even with regard to the articles of dowry which are given for common use and enjoyment, the purpose for which they are brought in for such use and enjoyment disappears when the commonality no longer remains with the breakdown of the matrimonial life. In such a case, the spouse bringing in the articles in the commonality should be entitled to render that into his or her possession severally. If in such eventuality the other spouse is not ready to see reason, and is bent upon unwarranted retention or usurpation, the law must take its course. The bonds of matrimonial home are already fallen > asunder and when the human beings constituting the wedlock part companying for good, it is folly to treat3276 what belonged to each one of them exclusively as continuing to remain joint or common.[6]

Under normal situations, a wife may even entrust her ornaments with her husband for safe custody for a prudent or careful husband may, for reasons of safety, keep the ornaments with him or under his control, and such an arrangement could never lead to the inference that the husband was disentitled to retain the wife's ornaments, and that it is a guilty circumstance against him. Particularly, in criminal cases, such facts are not to be considered in a vacuum, but must be looked at strictly in relation to the special situation that prevails in that particular case. When the wife has very clearly stated in her evidence that these ornaments belong to her as they had been made by her father for her wedding, and that they were in her custody and on her person and that the accused under threat, took the ornaments away from her. If the custody of the ornaments has come to the accused under these circumstances, then his possession becomes clearly unlawful. The ornaments and personal property belonging to a wife necessarily constitutes her personal possessions and divesting a wife of these against her wishes or without her consent would clearly bring the case within the ambit of a criminal offence. It is a misnomer to argue that irrespective of such a situation, the possession of the wife's personal ornaments by her husband still continues to be lawful.[7]

23. Removal of Movable Property by a Tenant--Whether Theft

The offence of theft being one against possession, a tenant has a right to the possession of a tree standing on his holding and there can be no theft in cutting down the trees standing on it.[8] Where the accused were in possession of a shop for a about three years and some trees, growing upon the bank of a tank near it, formed the compound of the house, occupied by the accused, it was held that the cutting of the trees would not amount to theft as the trees were admitted to have been on the holding in possession of the accused.[9] Removal of the trees by the tenant would not amount to theft even though his landlord is jointly interested in them if the tenant is in actual possession of the trees.[10] Similarly, the removal, by a tenant, of the heaps of grain in his possession and control does not amount to theft, unless there was actual delivery to the landlord, of his share of the grain.[11] Where a landlord, who ejected the tenant from his holdings and received formal possession, failed to tender the price of the standing crops, raised by the tenant, and the tenant cut and removed them, it was held that he was not guilty of theft.[12] Where the mortgagee, who, under the terms of the mortgage-deed, was given possession over the trees without the right to cut or appropriate them, it was held that he could not be convicted of theft as the possession over the trees clearly lay with the mortgagee upon the terms of the deed.[13]3277

Some trees, blown down by a dust storm, were removed and appropriated by some tenants of the village. It was pleaded that the tenants had customary right to the trees uprooted by a storm, but they could not substantiate their plea. It was held that they were guilty of theft.[14] In Abdul Ali v Net Ali ,[15] under the terms of a kabuliyat, it was provided that if the tenant cut down any trees, he would pay compensation to the landlord. The tenant assigned his interest to the accused who cut down some valuable trees. It was held that the accused was guilty of theft.

24. Removal of Movable Property of a Debtor by his Creditor--Whether Theft

A creditor cannot dispossess the debtor of movable property without his consent in order to coerce him to satisfy the amount of debt. The creditor's remedy is to sue his debtor in a court of law. He cannot take the law into his own hands. There is no question of a bona fide exercise of right in such cases.[16] Thus, where the bullocks of a debtor were seized by the creditor in order to put pressure on the debtor to discharge his debt, it was held that the he was guilty of theft.[17] Where a chaukidar forcibly took away the cattle of the complainant and divided them among the creditors, it was held that he was guilty of theft.[18]

25. Removal of Articles in the Case of Hire-purchase Transactions--Whether Theft

Hire-purchase agreements are executory contracts under which the goods are let on hire and the hirer has an option to purchase in accordance with the terms of the agreement. These types of agreements were originally entered into between the dealer and the customer, and the dealer used to extend credit to the customer. However, as a hire-purchase scheme gained in popularity and in size, the dealers who were not endowed with liberal amount of working capital found it difficult to extend the scheme to many customers. Then the financiers came into the picture. The finance company would buy the goods from the dealer and let them to the customer under a hire-purchase agreement. The dealer would deliver the goods to the customer who would then drop out of the transaction leaving the finance company to collect instalments directly from the customer. Under a hire-purchase agreement, the hirer is simply paying for the use of the goods and for the option to purchase them. The finance-charge representing the difference between the cash price and the hire-purchase price is not interest but represents a sum which the hirer has to pay for the privilege of being allowed to discharge the purchase price of goods by instalments.[19]3278 Under a hire-purchase agreement, the finance company is the owner of the vehicle till the entire payment was made and the option to the accused purchaser to purchase the vehicle was given after the entire payment, on some of the instalments remaining unpaid the reference to arbitration was made according to the agreement and the award was passed and filed in court, the receiver was appointed by the court for taking possession of vehicle with the help of police and the vehicle was kept with police in safe custody, no offence of cheating, criminal breach of trust or theft was made out against the accused.[20]

Though in India, Parliament has passed the Hire Purchase Act 1972, the same has not been notified in the Official Gazette by the Central Government so far. An initial notification was issued and the same was withdrawn later. The rules relating to hire-purchase agreement are delineated by the decisions of higher courts. There are a series of decisions of the Supreme Court explaining the nature of the hire-purchase agreement and mostly these decisions were rendered when the question arose whether there was a sale so as to attract payment of tax under the Sales Tax Act.[21]

In Damodar Valley Corporation v State of Bihar ,[22] the Supreme Court took the view that a mere contract of hiring, without more, is a species of the contract of bailment, which does not create a title in the bailee, but the law of hire-purchase has undergone considerable development during the last half a century or more, and has introduced a number of variations, thus, leading to categories and it becomes a question of some nicety as to which category a particular contract between the parties comes under. Ordinarily, a contract of hire-purchase confers no title on the hirer, but a mere option to purchase on fulfillment of certain conditions. However, a contract of hire-purchase may also provide for the agreement to purchase the thing hired by deferred payments subject to the condition that the title to the thing shall not pass until all the instalments have been paid. There may be other variations of a contract of hire-purchase depending upon the terms agreed upon between the parties. When rights in third party have been created by acts of parties or by operation of law, the question may arise as to what exactly were the rights and obligations of the parties to the original contract.

In KL Johar and Co v Deputy Commercial Tax Officer ,[23] the Supreme Court took the view that a hire-purchase agreement has two elements: (a) the element of bailment; and (b) the element of sale in the sense that it contemplates an eventual sale. The element of sale fructifies when the option is exercised by the intending purchaser after fulfilling the terms of the agreement. When all the terms of the agreement are satisfied and the option is exercised, a sale takes place of the goods which till then had been hired.

Similar views were expressed earlier for Instalment Supply (Pvt) Ltd v Union of India [24] and reiterated in Sundaram Finance Ltd v State of Kerala. [25]3279

The owner repossessing the vehicle delivered to the hirer under the hire-purchase agreement will not amount to theft as the vital element of dishonest intention is lacking. The element of dishonest intention which is an essential element to constitute the offence of theft cannot be attributed to a person exercising his right under an agreement entered into between the parties as he may not have an intention of causing wrongful gain or wrongful loss to the hirer.[26]

Where the hypothecation deed envisaged provision for re-possession of vehicle in the event of default payment of installment without the court's invention, seizure of the vehicle by the bank would not amount to offence of theft.[27]

The hire-purchase agreement in law is an executory contract of sale and confers no right in rem on hirer until the conditions for transfer of the property to him have been fulfilled. Therefore, the repossession of goods as per the term of the agreement may not amount to any criminal offence.[28]

In the undermentioned case, the Supreme Court elaborately discussed the earlier law on the subject and summarized the law thus: In an agreement of hire purchase, the purchaser remains merely a trustee/bailee on behalf of the financier/financial institution and ownership remains with the latter. Thus, in case the vehicle is seized by the financier, no criminal action can be taken against him as he is repossessing the goods owned by him.[29]

Removal of articles, in the case of hire-purchase transactions is not theft if there is no dishonest intention on the part of the accused. The law leaves the parties to their own agreement in respect of various incidents of hire-purchase agreements. If the parties specifically provide in their agreement for certain situations and prescribe a particular procedure, which they are to adopt, and specify the means, which they may use to resolve situations, they are bound by those provisions in their agreement.[30]

In case of seizure of vehicle by an employee of the finance company according to one of the clauses of the hire-purchase agreement, the dispute between the parties would be a bona fide civil dispute and proceedings initiated under s 379, IPC, would be an abuse of process of the court.[31]

The criminal court in exercise of powers under s 457, CrPC, cannot deliver the property to a 'deemed owner' under the Motor Vehicles Act 1988 as against a person who is exercising his right to get back the vehicle for which he paid the price at the instance of the owner on condition that owner shall repay part of the price.[32]3280

26. Repossession of Vehicle Under Hire Purchase Agreement--Complaint when Maintainable

The owner/financier after expiry of the period of agreement, especially after long lapse of time cannot exercise the right to take possession of the vehicle covered by hire-purchase agreement. The rights of the owner/financier under the agreement is extinguished in accordance with s 27 of the Limitation Act. In such a case, the complaint of theft is maintainable.[33]

27. Conversion of Joint Possession of Property into Exclusive Possession--Whether Theft

Conversion of joint possession of property into exclusive possession does not constitute the offence of theft. For theft, it is necessary that the property should be in the exclusive possession of the person other than the thief. If, therefore, a joint owner takes some moveable property from the joint possession (in which possession his own possession is included) with a view to make it his separate property, he commits no theft.[34] There are, however, some exceptions. If the shares in the movable property among co-owners are defined, one co-sharer who converts joint property into his separate property is guilty of theft.[35] Likewise, if a coparcener, with the aid of more than five persons, removes property from joint possession, he along with his accomplices, is guilty under s 395, IPC .[36]

Where the accused broke open a lock of a room and removed a box of ornaments belonging to his sister-in-law, claiming them to be joint family property in which he had a share, and it was found that the ornaments were the stridhan property of the sister-in-law and were not ancestral property, it was held that the asserted claim of right of the accused could not be said to be bona fide and he was guilty of theft.[37] In Emperor v Sitaram Rai ,[38] a Hindu, who had migrated to a foreign country, returned to his family after thirty years and brought some money with him. On returning to his family, he lived in commensality with it, but did not treat such property as the joint family property. It was held that his brother was not a joint owner of such property and he was, therefore, convicted of theft in respect of it.

28. Removal of Complainant's Articles for Recovery of Legal Dues--Whether Theft

Where the complainant did not pay rent for a temporary projection and the accused, who was a lessee for collection of rent due in respect of temporary stalls in the municipal market, removed the planks of the complainant's stall, it was held that he was not guilty of theft as he had no intention either to cause wrongful loss to the complainant or to obtain wrongful gain for himself though his intention might have3281 been to do something which could compel the complainant to pay him the lawful rent.[39]

29. Seizing Cattle and Taking it to the Cattle-pound for Impounding--Whether Theft

A person who seizes cattle on the ground that they were trespassing on his land and were causing damage to his crop or produce and gives out that he was taking them to the cattle-pound, commits no offence of theft, however mistaken he may be about his right to the land or the crop.[40]However, a person, not in possession of a field, has no right to take the cattle of another person to the cattle-pound; his act in taking them to the cattle-pound would amount to theft.[41] Taking away of the cattle, which has not trespassed and has not caused damage to the crop, to the cattle-pound, without the consent of the owner, would amount to theft even though the person, taking them, may not have any intention of any wrongful gain to himself because it would mean deprivation of cattle to the owner and consequently wrongful loss to him.[42] Therefore, a person, who illegally seizes cattle to impound them, commits theft even though he had no intention of causing wrongful gain to himself.[43]

30. Civil Disputes about Rights to Movable Property--Whether it can be the Subject of Theft

It is not pertinent to a criminal court to decide a complicated question of title.[44] In a case of clear plea of bona fide title, the court should leave the parties to have their rights determined by a civil court and throw out the criminal case.[45] Where, however, the court has clear evidence before it and the claim of the accused is not borne out by any acceptable material before it, the criminal court should not shirk its duty to decide the case on the material before it.[46] Where a complainant complained of the accused having cut the grass from his field, the title which was disputed by the accused, who had adjoining land, it was held that, it was a civil dispute and the criminal court was not competent to take action.[47]3282

When the dispute is civil in nature, the respective rights of the parties can be decided in a civil form, the finding in the criminal case would not be binding in any civil dispute regarding right, title and interest of the parties.[48]

It would be trespassing into the exclusive jurisdiction of a civil court for any charge of theft. All that the criminal court has to decide is whether the subject-matter of theft was moved out of the complainant's possession with dishonest intention.[49]

31. Removal of Movable Property by its Owner from the Legal Possession of Another is Theft

Theft, as defined in this section, is an offence relating to the possession of property. The mere act of ownership of property would not take it out of the purview of the section. The owner would, therefore, be guilty of theft if he takes the property out of the valid possession of another with dishonest intention.[50] Where a person removes cattle from the pound, where they are secured, without paying the legitimate fee, he has undoubtedly dishonest intention of saving himself from fees and it makes no difference whether the man, who so removes, is the owner himself or a stranger.[51] In Kartikeswar Roy v Bansidhar Byas ,[52] under an agreement, the accused was entitled to take advances upto 70 percent of the value of the goods hypothecated with the complainant firm. The accused somehow secured the key of the godown and removed the goods which was in the possession of the complainant firm. It was held that the accused was guilty of theft. In Abdul Karim v Emperor ,[53] the accused was charged excess fare after weighing of his luggage when he came by a train. The accused paid the excess fare. It was alleged that the accused removed the entire luggage, including a box, which had traveled in the van, and took away the railway receipt for that box with him. On being asked to give the receipt, the accused left the station for bringing the receipt from his companion, but never returned. The accused denied having received the box at all. It was held that the box had been removed with the implied consent of the station master and there was no dishonest intention in removing the box after the demand had been satisfied.

Where a person is in possession of a vehicle by virtue of a lawful agreement either oral or written with the registered owner, he shall be deemed to be a person in rightful possession of the vehicle, and when vehicle is removed from his possession, the offence of theft is committed, even though the registered owner of the vehicle is another person.[54]

32. Servant Removing Articles Under the Order of his Master--Whether Guilty of Theft

If an employee, working under the order of his master, removes jackfruits from the trees in assertion of his employer's right to share in the proceeds, he commits no3283 criminal offence.[55] Where the servant of the Raj snatched away a bird, shot by the complainant, under the bona fide belief that all game, without the permission of the Raj, belonged to it, it was held that he committed no theft.[56] Likewise, the removal of some cut-timber by the servants of one zamindar, contending that the trees stood on the land of their employer, and not on the land of the complainant, would not be theft.[57] Similarly, where the accused, who was the servant of a company, seized the nets of a party of fishermen, who were encroaching on the company's fisheries, it was held that the accused, having acted bona fide in the interests of his employer in retaining the possession of the nets, pending orders, would not be guilty of theft.[58] Where, however, gitti was dishonestly removed from a quarry, owned by the ordinance factory, it was held that the accused was guilty of theft even though he was acting as a servant for some one else.[59] In order to dissociate himself from the animus of his master, the accused ought to state that he had no knowledge of the master's animus and that he entered the land without knowing that the crop was grown by the complainant, because the conviction cannot be set aside when the defence is based on mere denial.[60]

Where, however, the accused-servant went with his master to Akola from where they were coming to Mathura, and enroute Mathura the accused gave some food to his master and another person, but the accused-servant himself did not eat with them, after taking food, the said master and that person felt sick and regained conscious in Jhansi Hospital where the said master learnt that he was robbed of his money. The evidence against the accused was clear and clinching, so the conviction of the accused under ss 328 and 379, IPC, was upheld.[61]

33. 'Out of the Possession of any Person'

In order to bring home the charge of theft, the prosecution has to prove that the accused had the intention to take away the case property dishonestly from the victim out of his possession without his consent.[62]

The victim must be in rightful possession of the property.[63]

Where the averments in the complaint showed that neither the aircrafts nor their engines were ever in the possession of the Indian Oil Corporation of India, they were in possession of the NPC India Ltd., at all relevant time, held the question of NEPC committing the theft of something in its possession did not arise.[64] To hold a person guilty on the charge of theft, it is necessary to prove that the property was in possession of any person other than the accused.[65]3284

Theft is essentially an offence against possession[66] which comprehends legal control attended with lawful possession of the character attributable to movable property.[67] If a person has physical control over an article, sufficient for practical purposes, to exclude others and intends to exercise control to treat the thing as his own, then that person is in legal possession of that article and if another person takes it away from him dishonestly, it is theft. Thus, although the owner, who has not parted with his right of possession, is protected against the world at large, a thief in possession of property, stolen from the owner, is equally protected as against the world at large except the owner. Both have legal possession, or possession in law, though the possession of the first is lawful, and that of the second unlawful. Similarly, the possession, which is violated, may be that of a person who has no right of ownership or no right of possession.[68] Stated conversely, a charge of theft would not be maintainable when neither party can claim to have been in possession of the property, for example, when both parties are restrained from going upon the agricultural land in question, the removal of crops by one party cannot be said to have been moved out of the possession of another.[69]

34. Possession

The term 'possession' has not been defined in the IPC . There is only a reference to the question of the possession of a person's property by his wife, clerk or servant being the property of such person if the possession is on account of that person as under s 27, IPC . The term has been explained by Stephen[70] as follows:

> A moveable thing is said to be in the possession of a person when he is so situated with respect to it that he has the power to deal with it as owner to the exclusion of all other persons and when the circumstances are such that he may be presumed to intend to do so in case of need.

35. Possession not lost when Owner or Possessor is Temporarily Away

The possession of a movable property is not lost if the owner or the person in possession is temporarily away from it. It would continue to be in his possession, and its removal would be theft.[71]If the materials of a house are taken away dishonestly, the act would be theft even though the house is left uncared for.[72] Cattle sent out to graze in pasture or jungle, are still in possession of the owner unless the contrary is shown and a taking of such cattle dishonestly is theft.[73] Where the complainant washed a carpet at the village tank and hung it up there to dry, it was held that the3285 dishonest removal of it by the accused was theft.[74] In leaving a cycle temporarily outside the market, the complainant cannot be said to have either abandoned or lost it because he did not intend to give up his possession or dominion over it when he left it. Its dishonest removal would be theft.[75] Where the accused, who was allowed to inspect a file, which was in possession of another person, extracted a paper from the file, it was held that the file remained in possession of that person even when the accused was inspecting it and the accused was guilty of theft.[76]

Possession of wood by a forest inspector, who is a government servant, is possession of the government itself.[77]

36. 'Without that Person's Consent'

The taking of property out of the possession of some person without his consent is one of the important ingredients of the offence of theft. Consent, which cannot be said to be a valid consent, is explained in s 90, IPC, where the trees, which a licensee cuts from a government forest, were not covered by his licence and he obtained consent for their removal on the understanding that they were covered by his licence, it was held that consent was given under a misconception of facts and, therefore, the offence committed by the licensee was one of theft.[78] In Parshottam Mahadev v State ,[79] a person, who had no right to take the goods, took delivery of the same from the luggage clerk, it was held that all the ingredients required for theft were established, as the delivery of the goods against the luggage ticket was made under a misconception of facts. Where, however, a debtor gave certain property to his creditor and it was subsequently found that the debt was a 'time-barred' debt, the charge of theft could not be sustained against the creditor in as much as there was a full and unqualified consent on the part of the debtor at the time of giving away his property.[80]

Theft, under the IPC, being essentially an offence against possession, any person, who is in possession of an article, may be the victim of theft. It is quite immaterial whether he is the owner of the chattel and whether his possession is rightful or wrongful, lawful or unlawful. The removal of any property without the consent of the person in possession would be theft. If the removal of the property is with the consent of the person in possession, there can be no theft.[81] If, however, the owner has given consent to the moving of the property in order to afford facility for the commission of the offence in view of detecting the thief in the act, the fact of which consent is not known to the taker, the latter is guilty of theft by reason of his criminal3286 intention, such a consent being immaterial.[82] In one case, C, knowing that A intended to steal his property, instructed B, his servant, to help A in doing so, in order to catch A, and A took the property. It was held that A did not commit theft because C had consented although A would be guilty of abetment of theft.[83] This view, it is submitted, is not correct. Under the terms of the section, the question is not as to whether C consented or not, but as to what A intended. An identical case is cited by Justinian in his illustration on theft.[84] In such a case, it cannot be said that the owner consented to the dishonest taking away of the property. He merely assisted the thief in carrying out his dishonest intention. A having had no knowledge of the owner's act, it would not be construed as consent.

37. Property Removed from a Dead Person

There must be proof of commission of the offence of theft by taking the property out of the possession of another person without that person's consent. A dead person cannot give consent. It follows that this offence would be wholly inapplicable if property is removed from a dead person. When it cannot be said from the evidence in the case that the property had been removed from the possession of the deceased while he was still alive, no offence under this section can be said to have been committed by the accused, though s 404, IPC, which provides for dishonest misappropriation of property possessed by a deceased person at the time of death may be attracted.[85]

38. 'Move that Property'

The only physical conduct involved in the offence of theft is movement of the property in question, in order to effect the intended taking or transfer or possession. By movement is meant 'such a removal of the thing that no part of it occupies the same particular position of pace as before', although the whole of it may not be moved from the whole of the space which it occupied. The section does not require that the thing stolen should be moved to any place or to any extent or indeed that it should have been permanently displaced. The bare removing of the thing taken from the place, where it was before, suffices to constitute offence of theft though it be not carried away.[86] Similarly, if a thief moves the goods even an inch from the place where they lay, the offence would be complete even though he may then leave them alone.[87] Where the string, by which the hasli was fastened to the neck of a woman was cut and the ends of the hasli forced slightly, and in order to remove the same from her neck and in the struggle that ensued between her and the thief, who was attempting to remove it from her neck, it fell from her neck and was found on the bed, it was held that the act of cutting the string and forcing the ends constituted sufficient moving to bring the act within the purview of s 378, IPC .[88]3287

Till the property is moved, no offence of theft can be committed even if the alleged offender had intended to take dishonestly the property out of the possession of any person without his consent. Where cattle is seized for taking them to the cattle-pound, the mere seizure of cattle found trespassing on land, does not amount to moving of the cattle. The act of moving the cattle would be subsequent to their seizing.[1]By virtue of expln 2 to the section, moving effected by the same act, which effects the severance, may be theft. The mere severance of trees amounts to theft.[2] Where trees are in the possession of the landlord under the terms of a kabuliyat, it is theft on the part of the tenant to sever them from the ground.[3] Severance of the soil from the earth,[4] or quarrying of stones,[5] or removing of crops from the earth,[6] would amount to theft.

A direct movement may be effected by actually moving the thing or by removing an obstacle as by slipping a collar and chain off a dog secured thereby, or opening the door of the horse-stable so that the horse therein comes out,[7] or by separating the thing from something to which it is attached as by cutting a rope securing a boat. An indirect movement occurs where something's moved in consequence of a direct movement applied to something else. This is clear from illustrations (b) and (c) to this section.

39. 'In Order to such Taking'

To constitute a theft under this section, the moving of the property should be 'in order to such taking', meaning thereby that the accused must intentionally take away the movable property dishonestly from the possession of another possession.[8]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF THEFT

S. 379.

Punishment for theft.--

Whoever commits theft shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.3288

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals only with the punishment for the offence of theft which has already been defined in the preceeding s 378, IPC . As all the aspects as to the ingredients, which constitute the offence of theft, have been dealt with under that section, the commentary under this section is confined to practice and procedure only.

2. Procedure

The offence, under this section, is cognizable, non-bailable, and triable by a magistrate. The mere fact that prior to the filing of the complaint, a prohibitory order had been made under s 144, CrPC, in respect of the land, cannot take away the jurisdiction of the magistrate to take cognizance of an offence under this section, for cutting away paddy crops from such land.[9] The offence under this section is compoundable, if the property stolen does not exceed two hundred and fifty rupees with the permission of the court before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, by the owner of the property stolen. Where the crop, cultivated in a field, belonging to the complainant's wife, was stolen, compounding of the offence by the complainant or his son could not be sustained in law.[10]

An offence under this section is triable summarily under s 260(1)(ii), CrPC 1973, where the value of the property stolen does not exceed rupees two hundred. However, it would be a wrong exercise of discretion to try a case summarily when complicated question of right and title are involved.[11]

Summary trials in cases in which the conviction of the accused is likely to result in dismissal from service, are not desirable.[12] Offences under ss 379, 380 and 381, IPC, are not triable summarily when a previous conviction of an offence under ch XVII of IPC is also charged.[13]

3. Who Can File a Complaint for Theft

It is necessary that only persons to whom wrongful loss by theft has been caused, should file the necessary complaint against it. Any person, who is aware of the offence of theft can make a complaint.[14] Where, however, a crop has been harvested3289 in violation of the order, passed under s 144 or s 145, CrPC, the magistrate would be the competent person to file a complaint of theft.[15] Similarly, where the parties having been restrained by the magistrate from going over the land in question, the chief of the gram panchayat was asked to harvest the crop and he made a complaint of theft of the crop, on its removal by one of the parties, it was held that the complaint was incompetent.[16]

4. Theft of Electricity--Complaint by 'Person Aggrieved'

Regarding taking cognizance of the offences under ss 135 and 138 of the Electricity Act 2003, s 151 clearly lays down that no court should take cognizance of those offences except upon a complaint in writing made by the appropriate Government or appropriate Commission or Chief Electrical Inspector or Electrical Inspector or licensee. Thus, the registration of FIR was clearly not permitted by the said provision.[17] The meaning of expression 'or/of a person aggrieved by the same' could not be confined to merely state electricity board and/or officers appointed or designated by that board to institute the prosecutions. The expression surely encompassed within its meaning persons who were directly affected or aggrieved by the offence. However, when prosecution was instituted by state electricity board, it could be instituted only by those officers who were authorised by the said board and not by other officers not so authorised.[18]

Cognizance of electric offences under the Act can also be taken on the basis of police report. (Vishal Aggarwal v Chattisgarh State ELCETRICITY Board, AIR 2014 SC 1539, 2014 AIR SCW 1001, 2014 (3) SCC 696).

5. Theft of Electricity-- Section 379 not Attracted--Special Law Overrides General

Law

Section 379, IPC deals with punishment for a simple case of theft. When there is a specific/special law covering the question of theft of electricity, i.e., s 135 of the Electricity Act 2003, the general law contained in s 379, IPC will not be applicable. Any attempt by the police to add offence under s 379, IPC will be a crude devise by the prosecution to overcome the likely objection from the accused about the filing of the complaint instead of registration of FIR. Law is well settled that special law will prevail over the general law. Once there is a specific provision in the Electricity Act 2003 in respect of providing of punishment for theft of electricity, no offence under s 379, IPC could be alleged by the prosecution or later on added during the investigation so as to pre-empt the taking of plea by the accused that no prosecution for the offence under s 135 of the Electricity Act 2003 could be launched except upon a complaint by the authorised officer.[19]

6. Jurisdiction

The offence of 'theft' may be enquired into, or tried by, a court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction such offence was committed or the property stolen was3290 possessed by the thief or by any person who received or retained the same knowing or having reason to believe it to be stolen.[20]

7. Joint Trial

Where one of the accused who committed theft and was in the custody of a private person, who had arrested him in the act of stealing, was rescued by two other accused from such custody, it was held that though it was irregular to try all the accused together, yet it was only an irregularity which did not prejudice the accused.[21]

If two persons go to steal a particular article, and one who is committing theft, is not able to find that particular article but steals something else instead, both must be held guilty as they acted in furtherance of the common intention to commit theft.[22] Where the purse of a person was removed by the first accused, when he and the second accused were near the person from whom the purse was stolen, and both the accused ran away together and the first accused handed over the purse to the second accused immediately after the theft and the purse was recovered from the possession of the second accused, it was held that the second accused was also guilty of an offence under ss 379 / 34, IPC, and not of one under s 411, IPC . Where the accused went to a railway godown with a carter, who removed a bag from the godown, and the accused accompanied the carter to his house and there took delivery of the bag, consisting of pilfering from a number of bags, consigned to different persons, it was held that the accused and the cartman were jointly guilty of theft.[23] Persons forming a gang, came on to the land with the intention of removing the paddy by force and it fell to some of the accused to use the necessary violence while it fell to others to commit the actual theft, it was held that all the accused must be held responsible both for violence and theft.[24] However, where the common object of an unlawful assembly was the destruction of a mosque, and not the theft of the materials therein, and there was no finding that any of the accused individually took away any of the materials of the mosque, it was held that they could not be convicted under s 379, IPC .[25]

8. Subsequent Trial

Section 300(4) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, is no bar to an accused being tried under s 3 (a) of the Railway Property (Unlawful Possession) Act 1966, after his acquittal under s 379, IPC .[26]

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I am (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the..day of at you, intending to take dishonestly moveable property, to wit out of the possession of.. (name of the person), without his3291 consent, moved that property in order to such taking, and thereby committed an offence of theft, punishable under s 379 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

It is well-settled that the court cannot discharge an accused on the basis of a document produced by him when the prosecution was taken by surprise.[27]

A mere non-mention in the charge of the person from whose possession the article was stolen, is not fatal.[28] However, non-mention in the charge of the place from where theft of fish was committed, was held to be fatal in Lingaraj Pradhan v Jagannath Das .[29] The grave lapse on the part of the trial court in not invoking s 34, IPC for holding joint trial is fatal.[30]

Framing of charge against the accused on the basis of his disclosure statement while in police custody when no recovery is effected at the instance of the accused and no material is collected in the investigation that the accused shared booty or was involved in the incident except the disclosure statement of the co-accused, is not proper.[31]

When the accused is admittedly the owner of the land, the allegations that he removed rocks for a commercial purpose from his own land are not sufficient to frame charges under ss 379 / 427, IPC .[32]

10. Joinder of Charges

An accused cannot be charged, at one trial for offences which are distinct and separate.[33] Where the accused, when detected by the complainant in stealing the crop, ran away and then returned and caused hurt to him, it was held that the two offences were distinct and separate and their joint trial was not, therefore, legal.[34]

Thefts of different things on different dates, separated by considerable periods, cannot be treated as theft on the analogy of successive blow constituting one assault. Each act of theft would be a complete offence by itself and cannot be lumped together.[35] Where the accused entered upon a land, belonging to the complainant, and looted the linseed crop and the next day they entered upon another plot and looted tobacco, it was held that the events of the two different dates were not parts of the same transaction and the trial was bad for misjoinder.[36] Where, however, the accused committed theft of paddy from three different fields, but a single charge was framed against the accused in respect of all the three thefts, though each was clearly specified in it, it was held that although, strictly speaking, three separate charges should have been drawn up in identical terms for the three offences under s 379, IPC,3292 yet as the charges were separately specified, the error was in form, rather than in substance, and, therefore, the irregularity was curable.[37]

Where the accused was tried for the offence of theft of some buffaloes (under s 379, IPC) and of receiving gratification to cause restoration of those buffaloes (under s 215, IPC), it was held that the latter offence having been committed some days after the former, the trial was bad and that a real thief could not be charged with an offence under s 215, IPC .[38] However, where the accused stole a bullock and returned it to the owner two days later on payment of Rs 20 and they were prosecuted under ss 380 and 215, IPC, it was held that the theft and the subsequent return might be considered to be the series of acts, so connected as to form the same transaction, and there was no misjoinder.[39] However, a trial for theft and escape from lawful custody are not so connected as to form one transaction, and one trial for the two offences would be illegal.[40] Where a man was cheated and when he detected the cheating, the accused stole away the articles to destroy evidence against him, it was held that the two offences under ss 380 and 420, IPC, were not committed in 'one series of acts so connected together as to form the same transaction'.[41]

11. Proof

In order to establish a charge of theft, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused moved some movable property;
(b) that property was in possession of some other person;
(c) the accused had the intention of taking the property out of the possession of that person;
(d) he moved the property without that person's consent;[42] and
(e) in intended to take that property dishonestly.

No conviction under s 379, IPC, is possible when the prosecution has failed to allege who had removed the gun of the victim.[43] The victim merely stated that someone stole money from his bag by cutting it and he had not seen his face. Neither identification parade was held, nor any recovery made from the accused. On these facts the accused cannot be held guilty of theft under s 379, IPC .[44] When the link between the seized timber and the accused was not established nor any evidence brought to show that the seized timber was transported by the accused under the guise of permits issued to him by the forest department, the acquittal of the accused was found proper.[45]

Allegation was that the accused had stolen several items from the victim after administering stupefying substance to him in tea. The incident had taken place at Railway Station between 3.45 p.m. to 4.15 p.m. Public persons were present on the3293 spot but no independent witness was examined. Accused was acquitted of the charge under s 379, IPC .[46]

12. Private Defence

The law is well settled, even if the plea is not taken by the accused, the court can definitely examine the question of right of private defence.[47]

13. Taking out of Possession

Taking out of possession being the essential ingredient of the offence of theft, it must be proved that at the time of the act being done, the property stolen was in the possession of the prosecutor.[48] Thus, when the documentary evidence on the point of possession is far from satisfactory and oral evidence is also not worthwhile, the ingredients of theft would not be made out.[49] In Brahmachari Martha v State ,[50] the accused removed some trees from a plot which was claimed to be in the possession of the government. The defence was that the trees were in possession of the village deity. It was held that unless it was affirmatively established that the trees were in the possession of the government, and not merely that the government was the owner, the charge of theft could not be maintained. In the case of removal of crops, it must be proved that the crops were grown by the person who was in possession of the disputed land.[51]

When the complainant or his witnesses did not describe the plot number of the land in question, the variety of land and when the paddy (stolen property) was sown, it cannot be said that the complainants were in possession of the land in question or have grown the paddy, therefore, the ingredients under s 378, IPC, cannot be said to be satisfied.[52]

The complainants were the owner of the shops were carrying wholesale business of crockery in the shops. Evidence proved that the accused persons taking advantage of the riots trespassed into the premises by breaking open locks and committed theft of property kept in the shops and continued in illegal possession of shops for two years. Their conviction for offence under ss 379 and 448, IPC was held proper.[53]

14. Repossession of Vehicle by Bank due to Default in Payment of Loan

Where the car was repossessed by the bank which had given the car loan to the owner, due to default in the payment of loan and while repossessing the car, the bank had followed and exhausted the procedure laid down in that behalf, in such circumstances, it cannot be said that the offence of theft of car was made out, more so when the owner of the car had already got possession of the said car from bank after making certain payment.[54]3294

15. Removal of Articles in the Case of Hire Purchase Transactions--Whether Theft

Commentary under the heading under s 378, ante, may be referred to.

16. Repossession of Vehicle Under Hire Purchase--Complaint When Maintainable

Commentary under the headings under s 378, ante, may be referred to.

17. Recovery of Stolen Property at the Instance of Accused

It is generally perceived that a person accused of commission of theft, when in police custody, discloses before the police about the whereabouts of the stolen property, as a result of which the police during the investigation of the case recovers the stolen property, the question which arises is how much of the information received from the accused may be proved by the prosecution against the accused. The answer lies in s 27 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, which allows one to prove the discovery of facts from the accused by the police. However, the discovery of facts should not be confused with the recovery of stolen articles by the police at the instance of the accused.

As observed by the Supreme Court in Mohd Imayatullah v State of Maharashtra ,[55]that 'fact discovered' means not only the physical object produced but also the place from which it is produced and the knowledge of the accused as to this. The above statement in view will not come within the purview of s 27 of the Evidence Act .

Similarly, in Jaffar Husain Dastagir v State of Maharashtra ,[56] it was held by the Supreme Court that only such portion of the information given as is distinctly connected with the said recovery is admissible against the accused and, that the discovery of the fact must relate to the commission of the offence, and the essential ingredient of the section according to the Supreme Court is that the information given by the accused must lead to the discovery of the fact which is the direct outcome of such information.

In Himachal Pradesh Administration v Om Prakash ,[57] the Supreme Court took the view that, what should be discovered is the material fact and the information that is admissible is that which has caused that discovery, so as to connect the information and the fact with each other as the cause and effect. That information which does not distinctly connect with the fact discovered or that portion of the information which merely explains the material thing discovered is not admissible under s 27 of the Evidence Act and cannot be proved. A witness cannot be said to be discovered under s 27 of the Evidence Act though the statement of the accused may be taken into consideration as conduct relevant under s 8 of the Evidence Act .

The accused must be deemed to be in exclusive possession of the articles concealed under the earth though the spots at which they were concealed may be accessible to the public.[58]3295

18. Possession of Stolen Property--Presumption

The court may presume that a man in possession of stolen goods soon after the theft is either the thief or has received the goods knowing them to be stolen, unless he can account for his possession.[59] The circumstance of recovery of incriminating articles within a reasonable time after the incident at the places shown by the accused, unerringly points to the involvement of the accused. The accused who are in a position to explain as to how they could lay their hands on the stolen articles or how they had knowledge of the concealment of the stolen property, did nothing to explain, on the other hand, they denied knowledge of recoveries which turned out to be false in the light of cogent evidence produced by the prosecution; by omitting to explain it must be inferred that either they intended to suppress the truth or invited the risk of presumption being drawn as to the commission of offence envisaged by illustration (a) to s 114 of the Indian Evidence Act is essentially for the offence of theft or about the receiving of stolen property by the accused, but in a theft and murder case, this presumption cannot essentially be stretched regarding the commission of murder also by the accused.[60] When the recoveries of gold and silver ornaments and the currency notes which belong to the victim, were effected at the instance of the accused and they did not claim those recovered articles nor gave any explanation as to how they had come in possession of those articles, the presumption against the accused persons for committing theft under s 380, IPC, can be drawn keeping in view the provisions of s 114, illustration (a) of the Indian Evidence Act.[61] Where motorcycle was recovered from the possession of the accused, recovery memo was signed by the accused, four other theft cases and of receiving stolen property were pending against him, the accused was habitual offender, he was convicted under s 379, IPC .[62]

Purse of the victim containing cash Rs. 14,800/-, driving license and a memo issued by the MPSRTC to Police outpost was stolen at the Railway Station. Ten days after the incident, the accused appellant was arrested on suspicion and a sum of Rs. 7300/-, along with the driving license as well as the letter issued by MPSRTC were recovered from the possession of the accused. Section 114, Evidence Act was attracted in the case, accused was convicted for offence under s 379, IPC .[63]

19. Identity of Stolen Property

It is for the prosecution to establish the identity of the stolen property. The prosecution must establish that the paddy found was the stolen paddy, and the onus probandi is not on the accused.[64] The burden first rests on the prosecution to prove that the money and things seized from accused form part of the property stolen, and it is only after the initial burden has been discharged that burden can be cast on the accused to explain as to how he came to possess the cash and jewels.[65] Where the3296 allegation against the accused was that they had removed a sal log from the reserve forest but there was no evidence that the log found corresponded to the stump left, as alleged to have been cut, it was held that conviction under this section could not be sustained.[66] Similar is the case with currency notes recovered from a pick pocket.[67] Where the accused was found in possession of two freshly flayed skins of goats within twenty-four hours of the theft, it was held that for the purpose of establishing an offence of theft, it was absolutely necessary for the prosecution to establish that the skins, found in the possession of the accused, were those of the goats recently stolen.[68] From the mere fact that a common article of clothing similar in pattern and texture to the one lost by the complainant, is found in the possession of the accused, it cannot be presumed that the article was stolen by the accused.[69]

20. Non-production of Stolen Property in Court

Non-production of the stolen property in court may amount to a fault on the part of the prosecution, but that would not entitle the accused to an acquittal, the fault being a technical one.[70]

If the subject-matter of a theft, when it has already been seized by the police, has not been placed, for identification before the court, a conviction cannot be sustained, under this section, on account of non-production of material evidence.[71]

21. Accused Claiming Stolen Property

One of the ingredients of the offence of theft is intending to take dishonestly. This intention is known as animus furandi. Without it, the offence of theft is not complete.[72] Thus, a person who claims that he has a right to a property, cannot be convicted of theft for removing it where it has not been found as a matter of fact that he was not entitled to the property which he took.[73] There can be no conviction when the property removed is honestly believed by the accused to be his own and his claim, though ill-founded, is not merely a colourable excuse.[74] If, however, the claim is a mere colourable pretence to obtain or retain possession over the property, the same would not be available as a defence.[75]3297

Where an accused sets up the plea that he had a claim to the property, which he took away from the complainant, the prosecution must establish the dishonest intention to show that the so-called claim was not made in good faith, but only as a cloak to conceal the dishonest intention, and the accused himself knew that there was no substance in the claim.[76] When there is evidence that the crop was grown by the complainant and his vendor had been in possession prior to him, there can be no question of any bona fide claim by the accused.[77] The evidence that a particular crop belonged to the complainant necessarily means that the crop was raised by him and the latter fact need not be asserted in so many words.[78] Theft is established by the proof of dishonest intention, and not by proof of illegality.[79] Where the accused had no bona fide claim of right, but there was no finding that they did not bona fide believe that they had such a bona fide claim, it was held that the conviction for theft could not be upheld.[80] Where a ratyat took away the forest produce from the jungle in the state, not near his village, but long off, for domestic and agricultural use in the time-honoured manner without permit and did so openly, and not stealthily, it was held that there was no trace of dishonest intention.[81] It has, however, been held that theft is not always committed secretly. When there is nothing on record to show that the belief existed in their mind when they cut down the tree, a bona fide claim may not be inferred from the fact that the accused acted openly.[82]

22. Circumstantial Evidence

Circumstantial evidence of theft must exclude the possibility of the guilt of any other person and must point conclusively to the complicity of the accused.[83] The dishonest abstraction of electric energy was held to be circumstantially proved by an overhead main line of supply being abstracted in fittings in possession of the accused coupled by his admission and his failure to prove his plea of false charge levelled due to his non-payment of illegal gratification to the electricity department.[84] Where the bullocks were found in the field of the accused without there being evidence of stealing, it was held that he could not be convicted for theft as the possibility of the bullocks having gone astray into the field of the accused could not be excluded.[85] Where the only evidence against the accused was that fingerprints of the accused3298 were found on the stolen trunk and that he had handled it in the complainant's house two or three days before the occurrence, it was held that this evidence was not sufficient.[86]

23. Statement of the Accused Under Section 313 , CrPC 1973

The circumstances appearing against the accused, should not be considered unless an opportunity is given to him to explain the same in his examination under s 313, CrPC 1973.[87]

24. Double Conviction

Where the accused stole property belonging to different persons from the same room of a house, it was held that he could not be sentenced separately for the two offences of theft.[88] Similarly, the theft and the taking and retention of stolen property form one and the same offence and it cannot be punished separately.[89] Likewise, a person proved to have committed theft, cannot also be convicted for receiving the stolen property as the two offences are not distinct.[90]

25. Admonition

Where the accused persons forcibly entered into the land and cut away the paddy crop that was standing on the land, the case of the accused person was found fit to be dealt under cl 3 of s 360, CrPC, and the direction was issued to the magistrate to deal with them under s 360(3), CrPC, and instead of being sentenced to any punishment to release them after due admonition.[91]

26. Probation

The provision of s 361, CrPC, makes it abundantly clear that in all cases where the conditions precedent prescribed for the application of s 360, CrPC, are satisfied, the court must apply the same or else must give special reason as to why the court does not apply the same.[92]

Theft of cars/scooter etc., are quite rampant these days and have to be viewed seriously because this is peculiar to people belonging to the so-called higher strata of society. Such theft is prompted by the desire to enrich overnight. The benefit of the provisions of Probation of Offenders Act or ss 360 / 361, CrPC, cannot be granted in such cases.[93]

The accused cannot be released on probation for good conduct when he had committed theft of stones from the mine belonging to the government by employing six or seven labourers.[94]3299

No doubt the case of an accused, being less than 21 years of age at the time of occurrence, is fit to be considered for extending them the benefit of s 360, Crpc, or of the Probation of Offenders Act, but this benefit can be denied to them for the reason that they had taken the law into their hands and caused damage after they were not evicted from the house in question in pursuance of a decree of the competent court and that too with police help.[1]

However, where the accused picked the pocket of the victim and took currency amount of Rs 940, the accused aged 19/20 years at the relevant time was a first offender and the incident occurred 10 years ago, so the sentence of 1 year rigorous imprisonment imposed against the accused was maintained in different form, i.e., the accused was released on probation on entering into a bond of Rs 1000 with one surety of the like amount. If the accused during the period of 2 years did not keep peace and bear good behaviour, his bond was directed to be forfeited and he was to undergo imprisonment for 1 year.[2] The accused persons forcibly cut the paddy crop and removed the same. The substantive sentence of 1 year rigorous imprisonment awarded by the two courts below was set aside and modified to the extent that the accused persons will execute bonds of Rs 2000 with one surety in the like amount and would undertake to maintain peace and bear good behaviour for a period of l year, failing which they will be called upon to receive sentence.[3]

27. Punishment

Sentencing is the cutting age of the judicial process, being the crucial strategy of criminal law in achieving social defence and delinquent rehabilitation. The court should consider the totality of factors bearing on the offence and the offender, and fix a punishment which will promote effectively the punitive object of the law, that being deterrence and habilitation.[4] The payment of fine brings home a sense for responsibility than even short terms of imprisonment in some cases.[5] Where there is only a case of simple theft without any aggravating circumstance, a sentence of rigorous imprisonment for one year would be more than necessary even if the accused might have been convicted on several prior occasions.[6] In Okha v State of Rajasthan ,[7] where the accused was a cultivator by profession and had no previous conviction, the sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment was, by taking a lenient view, reduced to four months. When, however, convincing reasons are given for a sentence of one year and fine is imposed, the sentence cannot be said to be severe.[8]However, the fact, that the accused has, by his act, rendered the recovery of the stolen property impossible, is no ground for inflicting a heavier sentence.[9] Where the accused was convicted on the charge of theft of that of electricity, the incident was of3300 the year 1999, the accused was TB patient, the sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[10]

The accused convicted under s 379, IPC was aged 21 years at the time of the incident, had no previous criminal record, had remained in jail for five months and 27 days, the sentence of one year imposed was reduced to the period already undergone, fine of Rs.5000/- was maintained.[11]

Accused found in possession of stolen motorcycle convicted and sentenced to one year and fine of Rs. 500/- was in jail for more than two and half months. His sentence was reduced to the period already undergone, however fine was enhanced to Rs. 15000/-.[12]

28. Theft of Cattle--Sentence

Theft of cattle in an agricultural country like India must be regarded as a serious offence.[13] Similarly, where cattle stealing is very rife in a particular locality, a severe sentence should be passed.[14] Cattle theft ordinarily calls for a sentence of two years.[15] There is, however, no hard and fast rule that a sentence of two years must be passed in all cattle and boat theft cases. A sentence should never be heavier than what is necessary to deter the criminal from committing the offence again.[16] At the very least, a heavy fine should be imposed.[17]

29. Theft of Crop--Sentence

In cases of theft of crop, the maximum sentence need not be imposed in the absence of substantive proof of the value of crop.[18]

30. Pick-pocketing--Sentence

Pick-pocketing having become extremely rampant, a sentence of six months imprisonment is not excessive.[19]

31. Theft on a Railway Train--Sentence

Thefts from running trains and waiting-rooms and from travellers, or from children should be visited with exemplary punishment. [20] In cases of thefts on a railway train, the sentence should be deterrent specially where the accused has already been convicted for theft.[21]3301

32. Alteration of Conviction

A person charged for a specific offence, may be convicted of a different offence if the evidence supports it. Therefore, a person, charged under s 379 can be convicted for an offence under s 430, IPC .[22] Likewise, an accused charged under s 392 can be convicted under s 379, IPC .[23] Where, however, the necessary ingredients for an offence under s 403 or s 424 have not been considered in a trial under s 379, the charge under s 379 can not be converted into an offence under s 403, or s 424, IPC .[24] Hence, conviction for theft cannot be altered to one for abetment of theft.[25]

A charge of theft is graver than a charge of criminal misappropriation and the magistrate cannot find a person charged under s 403 guilty of a graver offence under s 379 without framing a specific charge.[26] Where there is no charge of extortion under s 384, it is wholly illegal to punish a man for a grave offence, involving many totally different ingredients, on a charge of theft under s 379 .[27] An offence under s 379 cannot be said to be one of the component parts, constituting the major offence under s 394, nor can it be said that s 379 is a minor offence in relation to s 326, IPC .[28]

33. Alteration of Conviction from Section 392 to Section 379

Commentary under the headings under s 392, post, may be referred to.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF THEFT

S. 380.

Theft in dwelling house, etc.--

Whoever commits theft in any building, tent or vessel, which building, tent or vessel is used as a human dwelling, or used for the custody of property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

STATE AMENDMENT

Tamil Nadu.-- Section 380 of the Indian Penal Code (Central Act XLV of 1860) shall be renumbered as sub-section (1) of that section and after sub-section (1) as so renumbered, the following sub-section shall be added, namely:--

"(2) Whoever commits theft in respect of any idol or icon in any building used as a place of worship 'shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which shall3302 not be less than two years but which may extend to three years and with fine which shall not be less than two thousand rupees:

Provided that the court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment impose a sentence of imprisonment for a term of less than two years."[30]

Comments

1. Scope

This and the following two sections treat all the three kinds of aggravated theft:

(a) on account of the place (s 380);
(b) on account of the capacity of the thief (s 381); and
(c) on account of the nature of the preparation for the theft (s 382).

This section provides for punishment for an offence of theft, committed inside any building, etc, in the committing of which the accused would not only commit trespass on the property, but would also endanger the security of the inmates of the building. The essential point in the offence of theft in a building is that the property should be under the protection of the building and the offence may be committed by the owner of the building, or by any other person, who has lawful access to the building.[31] In the case of theft in a dwelling-house, the invasion would not reduce the culpability by the presence of the owner of the house.[32] Where the accused finding the door of a house open, walked in and proceeded to steal certain articles therefrom, but before he could get away, he was actually caught, it was held that the offence was one under s 380, and not under s 457, IPC .[33]

To constitute offence under s 380, IPC, what is necessary is that movable property has been moved out of the possession of a person without his consent.[34]3303

In cases under this section, all the ingredients of the offence of theft have to be established.

Where accused was caught red handed committing theft of 84 ballot papers from the printing press, even if the offence falls under s 127(P)(iv) of Assam Panchayat Act, the accused can be tried for offence under s 380, IPC .[35]

Merely on the basis of possession of some stolen articles accused cannot be convicted for offences under s 380, IPC .[36]

2. Object

The object of this section is to give greater security only to property deposited in a house, under the protection of the house, and not to the property of the person or the party from whom it is stolen. Theft from a person in a dwelling-house is only a simple theft under s 379 .[37]

3. 'Building'

The expression 'building' has not been defined anywhere in the IPC . A building within the meaning of ss 380 and 442, IPC, includes structure, whether covered or not, made of any material whatsoever. The limitation, which appear to have been imposed by the legislature, are not as to the nature of the structures or materials of which they are made, but to the use to which such structures are intended to be put.[38] The expression 'building', having regard to the expressions 'tent' and 'vessel' that follow, must be regarded as indicating some structure intended for affording some sort of protection to the persons, dwelling inside it, or for the property placed there for custody. Any structure, which does not afford any such protection by itself, but merely serves as a fencing or other means of merely preventing ingress or egress, cannot make the place a 'building' or 'house' within the meaning of s 380 or s 442, IPC .[39] Where theft of a cloth, spread out to dry on the top of a house, was committed by the accused getting access by scaling the wall, and there was no entry into the house, it was held that there was neither house-breaking, nor theft in a house and the fact that the roof was used for various domestic purposes, made no difference.[40] However, where the roof of the house had been used by the informant for the purpose of storage of stock of clothes, it was held that the theft of a portion of chillies from the roof of the house was theft from the dwelling house.[41]

4. Courtyard, Compound and Dalan

A courtyard, attached to the living rooms, walled in on all sides and provided by a door, leading to the street, comes within the purview of this section.[42] However, a compound or a courtyard of a house, surrounding a building, is not a building for the3304 purposes of this section.[43] Likewise, a dalan or entrance, surrounded by a wall, in which there are two doorways, but without doors, and used for custody of property, would be a building.[44]

5. Verandah

An ordinary verandah is no doubt a part of a building, but a theft from the verandah, which is outside the house, is not theft in a building. It may so happen that the verandah is so enclosed as to be a substantive building used for the custody of the property, but this is a question of fact to be determined on evidence of each case.[45] If the verandah forms part of a building, which is used as a human dwelling or for custody of property, it would be a building within the meaning of this section.[46]

6. Railway Carriage Van

A railway carriage is not a building, tent or vessel used as human dwelling or for the custody of property. Theft from a railway carriage is an offence under s 379, and not under s 380 .[47] Similarly, a brake-van from which theft is committed, would not be a theft in a building, tent or vessel.[48] However, a goods van, in which goods are carried, is a place used for the custody of property.[49] Where the accused stole some luggage and cash from the railway carriage when it was at a railway station, it was held that it was an offence under s 380 although the railway carriage was not a building while the railway station was.[50] A theft from a railway godown was considered to be an offence under s 380, IPC .[51] In State v Nihal Singh ,[52] a railway waiting room was held to be a building.

7. 'Tent'

While 'building' signified a permanent edifice of some kind, however simple; a tent is merely a temporary erection for the purpose of protecting man and property. Such portable provisions are frequently made for various purposes, such as for the camping of officers or for shopkeepers in markets, and particularly in fairs and exhibitions. The same protection is extended to temporary tents as it is to buildings.

8. 'Vessel'

This term, as defined in s 48, IPC, means anything made for the conveyance, by water, of human beings or of property. All means of transport, provided for the protection of the property, such as a boat, would be covered by the term. Theft by a person on a boat falls under this section.[53]3305

9. 'Used as Human Dwelling'

In order to bring the case under this section it is not enough that the building in question is one designed for the purpose of human habitation, but not actually put to that use. It must be a building, whether designed for the purpose or not, for example, a room in a house,[54] or chambers in a college or inn or a court.[55] A building will, however, not lose its residential character by the mere absence of the person, residing there, so long as he has animus revertendi, but it is otherwise if he quits it with no intention of returning.[56] Dilapidated houses, which have fallen into disuse, would not be covered by the section.[57]

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate.[58] The offence is triable summarily if the value of the property does not exceed Rs 200.

The offence, alleged to have been committed by the accused under ss 380 and 420, IPC, being distinct from the offences committed by them under ss 467 and 471, IPC, and the said ss 380 and 420, IPC, not occurring in s 195(1)(b)(ii), CrPC 1973, the magistrate is competent to take cognizance under ss 380 and 420, IPC, against the accused.[59]

The two courts below convicted the accused persons under ss 147 / 427 and 380, IPC . During the pendency of the revision petition before the High Court there was a compromise between the accused persons and the victim, and the accused persons were found entitled to an acquittal for the offence under s 417, IPC . In view of the acquittal of the said offence it was observed, that the allegations made by the prosecution for the offences under ss 140 and 387, IPC, cannot stand. Further, the parties being co-villagers having entered into a compromise in order to promote a healthy relationship, it was just and proper that the accused persons should be acquitted of the offences for which they were convicted by the lower appellate court.[60]

11. Identification of Accused

When the identification parade is not conducted and authentic identification is made for the first time in court, such identification is inherently uninspiring and cannot be accepted or acted upon unless sufficient circumstances are there to corroborate such identification.[61]

12. Quashing FIR/ Police Investigation

When investigation had not culminated into final report or charge sheet as required by law. It is neither desirable nor possible, at this stage, to conclude that there was no3306*prima facie* case, so prayer for quashing of investigation proceedings under ss 380, 467 IPC cannot be allowed.[62]

13. Free Legal Assistance to the Accused

Free legal assistance at state cost is a fundamental right of a person accused of an offence which may involve jeopardy to his life or personal liberty. This fundamental right is implicit in the requirement of reasonable, fair and just procedure prescribed by art 21 of the Constitution . The exercise of this fundamental right is not conditional upon the accused applying for free legal assistance so that if he does not make an application for free legal assistance, the trial may lawfully proceed without adequate legal representation being afforded to him. On the other hand, the magistrate or the sessions judge before whom the accused appears is under an obligation to inform the accused that if he is unable to engage the services of a lawyer on account of poverty or indigence, he is entitled to obtain free legal services at the cost of the state.

A conviction was reached without informing the accused that he was entitled to free legal assistance and inquiring from him whether he wanted a lawyer to be provided to him at state cost, This resulted in the accused remaining unrepresented by a lawyer in the trial which is clearly a violation of his fundamental right under art 21 of the Constitution and the trial must be held to be vitiated on account of a fatal constitutional infirmity.[63]

A court is under an obligation to ask the accused or any person coming under s 12 of the Legal Services Authority Act that he is entitled to free legal service and failure to do so is sufficient ground for demand of retrial or re-hearing of the case in question.[64]

14. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about. day of at you committed theft in ..(specify building/tent/or vessel), which was used as a human dwelling (or which was used for the custody of property), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 380 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

When the allegation of theft were vague in the absence of description of books and other equipments alleged to be stolen, the order discharging the accused was found proper.[65]

15. Quashing of Charge

The accused persons were alleged to have trespassed into a room and committed theft in respect of furniture and fixtures in the room. The prosecution having failed to3307*prima facie* show that the disputed room and the furniture and fixtures contained therein were in possession of the de facto complainant prior to the incident as alleged, and that being so the major ingredients of the offence of theft remained unfulfilled so the charges under ss 380 and 457, IPC, framed by the metropolitan magistrate were set aside.[66]

16. Proof

In order to secure a conviction under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the movable property was taken out of the possession of a person by the accused;
(b) such taking was without that person's consent;
(c) he did so with the intention of taking away the movable property dishonestly; and
(d) the said property was taken away from a building, tent or vessel which building, tent of vessel was used as a human dwelling or for the custody of the property.[67]

Thus, an offence under s 380, IPC would be committed:

(a) if the ingredients of theft, as required under s 378, IPC, are established; and
(b) if the theft is committed in a building, tent or vessel, which is used:

(i) as a human dwelling, or
(ii) for the custody of property.

However, where neither the stolen property is seized from the accused, nor has it been recovered from his possession, then the mere fact that it was recovered at his instance, will not prove that he was in possession of the stolen property, with the result that he cannot be convicted under s 380, IPC .[68] Similarly, an offence of theft cannot be said to have been committed by an accused merely because a silver bangle has been recovered from his possession.[69] Where the charge against an accused cannot be held to have been established beyond reasonable doubt, his conviction under s 380, IPC, cannot be sustained.[70]

Want of Recovery Evidence--Acquittal of the Accused

The two accused A1 and A2 were prosecuted for the offence of house breaking and theft. Evidence was lacking to show that the stolen articles were recovered at the instance of accused A2. Accused A2 was acquitted.[71]3308

The prosecution case was that when PW2 daughter of the complainant was sleeping in her room inside the house in night, the appellant along with two other co-accused entered the house of the complainant and committed theft of the golden chain which PW2 was wearing. FIR was lodged sixteen days after the incident when the police came to the complainant with that golden chain. The complainant or PW2 did not know about the theft of the chain even though PW2 was wearing the chain when it was stolen. Held, the chain in question was being worn by PW2. It was stated to have been stolen while she was sleeping. It was inconceivable that she would not realize that she had lost her chain. The appellant was acquitted of the charges under ss 380 and 451, IPC .[72]

Where in case of housebreaking and theft, stolen properties were recovered from the possession of the accused A-2, at his instance, which was spoken by the prosecution witnesses, the accused A2 did not offer any explanation, he was convicted for offence under s 380, IPC .[73]

17. Accused Convicted for Robbery Cannot be Convicted for Theft

When the accused persons are convicted for robbery under s 392, IPC, it is not necessary that they should be convicted for the offence of theft under s 380, IPC . Such a conviction by the trial court under s 380, IPC, is liable to be set aside by the appellate court though the conviction under s 392 is maintained.[74]

18. Probation

Under criminal jurisprudence the object of awarding punishment to a person who is guilty for the commission of an offence is prevention of the crime and future deterrence for other towards such crime. With the emergence of the new conception of dealing with the delinquents and criminals in a manner so as to reform them and to give them a chance to reform themselves, the Probation of Offenders Act was enacted by Parliament. The said Act shifts the emphasis from deterrence to reformation and from the crime to the criminal as per the modern concept of punishment. Reformation and rehabilitation of the offenders are the objects of the provisions regarding release of the accused persons after admonition or on probation. The legislative trend, of late, has also been for reformation and rehabilitation of offenders, and not mere deterrence, are now among the objects of the administration of criminal justice.[75]

In order to give benefit to a convict under s 3 of the Probation of Offenders Act the following conditions must be fulfilled:

(a) There must not be any previous conviction; and

(b) The offender should be found guilty of having committed one of the following offences:

(i) theft (s 379),
(ii) theft in dwelling houses, (s 380),3309
(iii) theft by clerk or servant of property in possession of master (s 381),
(iv) dishonest misappropriation (s 404),
(v) cheating (s 420),
(vi) any offence punishable with imprisonment for not more than two years or with fine or with both under the IPC or any other law.

Apart from the above, the court must be of the opinion that having regard to the circumstances of the case including the nature of the offence and the character of the offender it is expedient to give him the benefit of the provisions of s 3 of the Probation of Offenders Act .[76] Where the accused convict was aged 20 years only at the time of commission of offence, he was released on probation.

Accused A1 was found guilty and convicted for offence under ss 380 and 354, IPC .[77]

19. Deterrent Sentence

Deterrent sentence should be passed in the case of offences under ss 380 and 457, IPC, committed at night in an industrial area.[78]

The offence under s 380, IPC, is punishable with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to 7 years and also fine. The fact that the accused are first time offenders and villagers having no regular source of income is hardly a reason to justify leniency. The fact that the accused is a young boy of 22 years also does not justify leniency. These factors are not relevant for taking a lenient view against accused persons when they have been convicted for having stolen an unlicensed gun, making them liable also under s 25 of the Indian Arms Act 1959.[79]

20. Leniency in Sentence

When the accused is in custody for quite some time, taking liberal view, the court may direct that both sentences shall run concurrently instead of consecutively.[80]

The incident took place more than 14 years ago, no recovery had been set up against the accused persons who had suffered mental agony for years so the sentence of imprisonment of 1 year rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 2000 each was modified to the extent that instead of imprisonment, each of them shall pay a fine of Rs 2000 and in default, to undergo 3 months rigorous imprisonment.[81]

The accused was convicted under s 380, IPC, was sentenced to 1 year rigorous imprisonment by the trial court. On appeal, the sentence was reduced to 3 months rigorous imprisonment by the sessions court. On revision against the sessions court, keeping in view that the accused was a young boy and had already suffered 1 year rigorous imprisonment, the sentence was reduced to the period already undergone and a fine of Rs 30 was also imposed.[82]3310

21. This Section and Section 454, IPC

Offence under s 454, IPC, includes offence under s 380, IPC, where accused is convicted under s 380, IPC, separate conviction under s 454, IPC, is not required.[83]

22. Alteration of Conviction from Section 380 to one under Section 411

In the absence of any prejudice to the accused, the conviction under s 380 can be altered to one under s

411, IPC, in view of the provisions of s 221(2), CrPC 1973.[84]

Section 411, IPC, is actually a minor offence vis-a-vis the offence under s 380, IPC, though accused is charged under s 380, IPC, and not under the said section, by virtue of s 222 (2), CrPC .[85]

23. Alteration of Conviction from Section 394 to one Under Section 380

If there is no evidence as to whether the victim was dead or alive when the ornaments were removed by the accused from her person, an inference, favourable to him has to be drawn to the effect that he took away the ornaments from her body when she was already dead. In such circumstances, he cannot be convicted under s 394, IPC . It can, however, safely be inferred that he committed theft of the ornaments from a dwelling place and, therefore, he can be convicted under s 380, IPC .[86]

24. Alteration of Conviction from Section 395 to Section 380

In Sheodeni Singh v State of Bihar ,[87] during land acquisition proceedings in respect of a plot of land, on which some construction were standing, tenders were invited for constructing a motor car park on it. The contractor, who had offered the tender (but before its acceptance), demolished the construction with the help of his men and removed the materials. He did not exercise any violence or put anybody in fear when the demolition and removal of the materials were carried on. It was held that the offence fell under s 380, and not under s 395, IPC . Therefore, the conviction was altered from s 395 to s 380, IPC .

25. Alteration of Conviction from Sections 454 and 380 To Section 411

Where the recovery of stolen property was made at the instance of the accused 3 months after the alleged theft was committed, but there was no evidence on record that the accused was seen near the house of the complainant on the day of the theft, the conviction of the accused was altered from ss 454 and 380, IPC, taking recourse to illust (a) of s 114 of the Indian Evidence Act .[88]

26. Alteration of Conviction from Section 457 to Section 380

Of Offences Against Property

OF THEFT

S. 381.

Theft by clerk or servant of property in possession of master.--

Whoever, being a clerk or servant, or being employed in the capacity of a clerk or servant, commits theft in respect of any property in the possession of his master or employer, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

Possession of a clerk or that of a servant being the possession of his master or employer (s 27, IPC), theft (s 381, IPC) and breach of trust (s 408, IPC), etc, have been treated as the more aggravated forms of the offence because the very position of a clerk or of a servant, which involves the placing of confidence in him by his master or employer, give him ample opportunities to handle his (master's or employer's) property on account of which particular importance is attached to it. The distinction between an offence by a clerk or a servant under s 381 and one under s 408, IPC, is that under the former section, the property is taken out of the possession of the owner, by the clerk or servant, having, at the time of taking, a mere custody thereof, whereas under the latter section, the property is converted by the offender when it is in his possession and before that possession is changed into mere custody by the property passing into the possession of the master. The main distinguishing feature is the nature of the possession of the property by a clerk or a servant. Where the possession of the master continues inspite of its physical possession by the clerk or servant, the offence would be under s 381, but if the clerk or servant, when he himself is in legal possession of the property in the nature of a trust, converts the property to his use or dishonestly uses and disposes it of, the offence would be one under s 408, IPC . Thus, if a clerk first reduces some property into his master's possession as by putting a bank-note into the master's till or cash box,[89] or by putting the goods in the master's cart,[90] and then takes it out animo furandi, he is guilty of theft; but if he dishonestly misappropriates it before putting it into his master's possession, he commits breach of trust.

2. 'Clerk or Servant'

A man may be a clerk or servant though:

(a) he was appointed or elected to the employment, in respect of which he is a clerk or servant, by some person, other than the master, whose orders he is bound to obey;
(b) he is paid for his services by a commission or a share in the profits of a business;
(c) he is a director of the company which he serves;
(d) he is a clerk or servant of more masters than one, eg, the clerk or servant of a firm is the servant of several partners, and therefore, of each of them;
(e) he acts as a clerk or servant only occasionally, or only on the particular occasion, on which the offence is committed.3312

An unpaid apprentice is a clerk or servant within the meaning of this section,[91] but not a hired boatman.[92] Where a mamlatdar left a file with his correspondence clerk, but the accused, another clerk of the same office, removed the file, without the mamlatdar's consent, to show it to the vakil of his co-accused, it was held that it constituted as theft by a clerk within the meaning of this section.[93] Where the accused were charged with having stolen a sum of money, shut up in a box and placed in the police treasury buildings, over which they, as burkandauzes, were placed in guard, it was held that the case fell under this section as it was theft by a servant in possession of the property.[94]

It is immaterial whether the man is employed by one or by more than one master at the same time.[95] A clerk or a servant is a person bound, either by express contract of service or by conduct implying such a contract, to obey the orders and submit to the control of his master in the transaction of the business which it is his duty as such clerk or servant to transact.[96]

Section 381, IPC deals with the offence theft by a servant of the property in the possession of the master. Where the property was not in the possession of the master, the money was entrusted to the servant accused, and he misappropriated the same, the conviction of the accused under s 381, IPC, was held not sustainable.[97]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, compoundable, with the permission of the court before which prosecution of such offence is pending, by the owner of the stolen property, where its value does not exceed Rs 250, and triable by a magistrate. It is also triable summarily where the value of the property stolen does not exceed two hundred rupees in value.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the. day of., at you committed theft of certain property, to wit..(specify the property), form the possession of AB, of whom you were (or by whom you were being employed in the capacity of) a clerk/servant, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 381 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

In order to secure conviction under this section the prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the accused committed theft (for which all the ingredients of theft required for an offence under s 378, IPC, must be proved);3313
(b) at the time, when the theft was committed, the accused was a clerk or servant or was being employed in the capacity of a clerk or servant; and
(c) the theft was committed by him in respect of the property of his master or employer.

Mere suspicion alone against the accused-domestic servants is not sufficient to point towards the guilt of the accused persons. The case against the accused has to be proved to the hilt and beyond all reasonable doubt.[1] The recovery of stolen property by the police at the instance of the accused-servant may not be sufficient to convict him for the offence of murder of his deceased master under s 302, IPC, but the same would bring home the guilt of the accused under s 381, IPC .[2]

6. Sentence

Sentence of imprisonment is mandatory under this section and the accused 'shall also be liable to fine', meaning thereby that fine cannot be substituted in lieu of imprisonment though it may be added to imprisonment.[3] The court may impose fine in appropriate cases in addition to imprisonment which alone is obligatory.[4] The word 'liable' means a future possibility or probability, the happening of which may or may not actually occur. In other words, the magistrate has the power to impose the sentence of fine, but it is discretionary.[5]

The appellate court can interfere if the sentence is inadequate.[6] Circumstances of any particular case may justify the reduction of a sentence as when the entire property, alleged to have been stolen, is recovered and the accused is a low paid servant whose wife is found to be pregnant when he committed the theft.[7]

Of Offences Against Property

OF THEFT

S. 382.

Theft after preparation made for causing death, hurt or restraint in order to the committing of the theft.--

Whoever commits theft, having made preparation for causing death, or hurt, or restraint, or fear of death, or of hurt, or of restraint, to any person, in order to the committing of such theft, or in order to the effecting of his escape after the committing of such theft, or in order to the retaining of property taken by such theft, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Illustrations

(a) A commits theft on property in Z's possession; and, while committing this theft, he has a loaded pistol under his garment, having provided this pistol for the purpose of hurting Z in case Z should resist. A has committed the offence defined in this section.3314

(b) A picks Z's pocket, having posted several of his companions near him, in order that they may restrain Z, if Z should perceive what is passing and should resist, or should attempt to apprehend A. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

Comments

1. Scope

The section provides for an even more aggravated form of the offence of theft. That which renders the theft an aggravated offence in this section, is when the thief has made preparation for causing:

(i) death, i.e., death of a human being (s 46), or
(ii) hurt [ss 319 and 11(a)] or,
(iii) restraint [ss 340 and 11(b)], or
(iv) the fear of one or the other in order to show the commission of theft for his escape or the safety of the property after the theft.

An accused cannot be convicted under this section, unless there is proof of actual theft for which he was present at the scene of occurrence.[8]

2. Offence under Section 382 Distinguished from Robbery

When the offender makes preparation for causing death, etc, in the event of any resistance during the commission of theft, it would be an offence under this section. The guilty preparation is the essence of this offence. If, however, hurt is attempted or actually inflicted, the theft would amount to robbery.[9] If one, keeps a knife with him and commits theft, he may be liable for conviction for the offence under this section even though there was no occasion for him to wield the knife or cause injury. What is relevant is preparedness of the accused in such a manner that he may be able to cause hurt, etc, to others who might resist or may come in his way while escaping or taking the stolen property away.[10]

3. 'Preparation for Causing Death' etc

The possession by a thief at the time of his committing a theft, of a knife or other weapon which, if used (on a human being), might cause death, or hurt, etc, would not, by itself, justify the conviction under this section. There must be something to show, or from which it may properly be inferred, that the offender made a preparation for causing one or more of the result mentioned in this section.[11]3315

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

A complainant under this section cannot be legally dismissed in default of the complainant after a date has been fixed for evidence and the case has reached the stage contemplated by ss 243, 246 and 247, CrPC 1973.[12]

5. Anticipatory Bail

When the name of one of the accused was mentioned in the FIR but no role was attributed to him, the accused was found entitled to be granted concession of anticipatory bail which was granted to him, subject to the following conditions:

(a) in the event of his arrest, the accused shall be released on bail subject to the satisfaction of the arresting officer;

(b) he shall not tamper with the evidence of the prosecution in any way;
(c) he shall not leave the jurisdiction of the concerned court of competent jurisdiction without prior permission;
(d) this order of anticipatory bail shall remain operative for a period of 60 days from the date of order.[13]

6. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Magistrate,etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the..day of at committed theft of.. (specify the property) from the possession of AB, after having made preparation for causing death (or hurt or restraint or fear of it) (specify the nature of the injury) by.. (specify the nature of the preparation) in order to the committing of the said theft (or in order to the effecting of your escape after committing the theft) (or in order to the retaining of property taken by the said theft), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 382 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

7. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed theft as defined in s 378, IPC ;
(b) the accused committed theft having made preparation for causing death, hurt, restraint or fear of death, hurt or restraint; and
(c) he did so:

(i) in order to the committing of theft, or
(ii) to effect his escape, or3316
(iii) to retain property taken by such theft.

If the prosecution fails to prove mens rea as contemplated in s 378 against the accused, the proceeding under s 382, IPC, must fail.[14]

8. Probation

The object of probation is three-fold. Firstly, many offenders are not dangerous criminals but are weak characters who have surrendered to temptation or, through misfortune have been brought within the operations of the police and the courts. Secondly, in assigning this type of offender to the care of a probation officer, the court encourages his own sense of responsibility for his future and saves him from the stigma and possible contamination of prison. Thirdly, such a practice not only assists the offender, but also result in economy by relieving the prisons of a large number of first offenders, short-term prisoners and other classes of quasi-criminal offenders. The basic idea underlying a sentence of probation is very simple. Sentencing is in the large part concerned with avoiding future crimes by helping the defendant learn to live productively in the community. Probation proceeds on the theory that the best way to pursue this goal is to orient the criminal sanction towards the community setting in those cases where it is compatible with the other objectives of sentencing. The odds are that a given defendant will learn how to live successfully in the general community if he is dealt with in that community rather than being shipped off to an artificial and typical environment of an institution of confinement.[15]

The accused snatched a scooter by threatening with a dagger. The accused was a young man of 30 years of age having four children besides his wife, he did not have landed property or any other source of income and was a street hawker. Undisputedly, he was not a previous convict and had no past criminal record. On these facts his sentence of imprisonment imposed by the trial court was set aside and the accused was given the benefit of probation.[16]

9. Sentence

Where the accused persons have gone through lot of mental and financial strain during prolonged proceedings lasting 11 years and remained in jail for 6 months, the sentence of 3 years rigorous imprisonment awarded was reduced to the period already undergone and a fine of Rs 1000 each was also imposed in default of which they were to further undergo rigorous imprisonment for 6 months.[17]

10. Alteration of Conviction from Section 382 to Section 411

Where the accused were arrested after about 4 months from the date of the alleged theft, and stolen ornaments were recovered from them, no test identification parade of the accused was held, the conviction of the accused person under s 382 was set aside and instead they were convicted under s 411, IPC .[18]3317

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF EXTORTION

S. 383.

Extortion.--

Whoever intentionally puts any person in fear of any injury to that person, or to any other, and thereby dishonestly induces the person so put in fear to deliver to any person any property or valuable security, or anything signed or sealed which may be converted into a valuable security, commits "extortion".

Illustrations

(a) A threatens to publish a defamatory libel concerning Z unless Z gives him money. He thus induces Z to give him money. A has committed extortion.
(b) A threatens Z that he will keep Z's child in wrongful confinement, unless Z will sign and deliver to A, a promissory note binding Z to pay certain monies to A. Z signs and delivers the note. A has committed extortion.
(c) A threatens to send club-men to plough up Z's field unless Z will sign and deliver to B a bond binding Z under a penalty to deliver certain produce to B and thereby induces Z to sign and deliver the bond. A has committed extortion.
(d) A, by putting Z in fear of grievous hurt, dishonestly induces Z to sign or affix his seal to a blank paper and deliver it to A. Z signs and delivers the paper to A. Here, as the paper so signed may be converted into a valuable security. A has committed extortion.

Comments

1. Scope

If a person voluntarily delivers any property without there being any fear of injury, an extortion cannot be said to have been committed. Even the illustrations under s 383 of IPC would reveal that the delivery must be pursuant to threat of injury to reputation; to the body or to the body of another person. If someone forces another person to deliver some property, without there being an element of dishonest intention to cause injury or the feeling of fear of injury in the deliverer, an offence of extortion cannot be made out.[19] In contrast to theft, in extortion there is an element of consent, obtained by putting the victim in fear of injury. In extortion, the will of the victim has to be overpowered by putting him in fear of injury. Forcibly taking any property will not come under this definition. It has to be shown that the person was induced to part with the property by putting him in fear of injury. The illustrations to the section given in the IPC make this perfectly clear.[20]3318

The recovery of money from the house of the accused A6 and A7 was proved, but there was no evidence to show that the said amount was paid as ransom to the accused. The two accused A6 and A7 were also not involved in his confessional statement by the co-accused. Acquittal of the accused A6 and A7 for offences under ss 362 and 383, IPC was held proper.[21]

2. Law of Canada

It is an indictable offence to commit extortion. An accused commits extortion when he or she induces or attempts to induce any person by threats, accusations, menaces or violence to do anything or cause anything to be done without reasonable justification or excuse and with intent to obtain anything. It does not matter whether or not the person threatened, accused or menaced or to whom violence is shown is the person induced or threatened to be induced. A threat to institute civil proceedings is not a threat for the purposes of this section.

Nature of Offence

The threat need not be one for the accused to do anything personally. 'Attempt to obtain' is specifically made a mode of the full offence of extortion. The conviction should thus be for the full offence and not merely attempted extortion even if the target does not capitulate. Extortion contrary to s 346 of the Criminal Code can be made out by 'veiled' threats. The accused's conduct must be viewed in the context of his entire course of behaviour.

Example Situations

Sexual favours can be the 'anything' sought to be extorted. A request by the accused lawyer for security, suspected of theft and receiving stolen goods, consequently the lawyer representing the company for $10,000 to avoid bad publicity did not constitute extortion absent a threat, accusation, menace or violence.

Double Jeopardy

The Kienapple principle bars convictions for both extortion and robbery (s 344) arising from the same factual and legal nexus. Where accused was guilty of 2 counts: (1) sexual assault, and (2) making threats that induced the complainant to engage in sexual intercourse and fellatio (extortion), then the sexual assault conviction was stayed in accordance with Kienapple.

In R v Gigliotti ,[22] it was observed that 'The elements of extortion are included in the sexual assault offence, and the elements of sexual assault are included in the extortion offence. Therefore, in this way, I find that the elements of extortion are substantially the same as the elements of sexual assault in the present case. I find that there is a sufficient legal nexus between the two counts. The two counts refer to the same matter, cause, or delict.'[23]3319

2. Ingredients

The following ingredients would constitute the offence of extortion:

(i) The accused must put any person in fear of injury to that person or any other person.
(ii) The putting of a person in such fear must be intentional.
(iii) The accused must thereby induce the person so put in fear to deliver to any person any property, valuable security or anything signed or sealed which may be converted into a valuable security.
(iv) Such inducement must be done dishonestly.[24]

3. Cheating Distinguished from Extortion

Commentary under the same heading under s 415, post, may be referred to.

4. Criminal Intimidation--Distinguished from Extortion

Commentary under the same heading under s 503, post, may be referred to.

5. 'Whoever'

It is not necessary that the person, who threatens, should himself receive the property. It may be a matter of arrangement between several persons, who conspire, and threat is used by some and the property is received by others. They will all be guilty of extortion.[25]

6. 'Puts any Person in Fear'

The main feature of the offence of extortion, which distinguishes it from cheating, theft, etc., by which the property is dishonestly obtained, is the intimidation by which the person extorts property from another. The kind of fear which will bring a case within the definition of this section, must be of a nature to operate on a man of reasonably sound, or ordinarily firm mind.[26]Where money was obtained by the accused by giving false representation to the effect that they held a warrant, signed by the magistrate, authorising them to make a distress upon the goods of the prosecutor for arrears of rent, it was held that if a man is induced to part with property through fear or alarm, he is no longer acting as a free agent if the threatened violence, whether to person or property, is of a character to produce, in a reasonable mind, some degree of alarm of fear. The essential factor is that it should be of a nature and extent to unsettle the mind of the person, on whom it operates, and take away, from his act, that element of free and voluntary action which alone constitutes consent.[27] The element of extortion was held to be lacking in a case where some persuasion to the members of the governing body of an institution, who were hard run were made to obtain an order to the effect that the earlier order of suspension of the head of the institution be rescinded.[28]3320

Merely because the accused was the chief minister at the relevant time and the sugar co-operative society had some of its grievances pending consideration before the government, and pressure was brought about to make the donations promising consideration of such grievances possibly by way of reciprocity, it could not be said that the ingredients of the offence of extortion had been made out.[29] The accused were charged with the offence of conspiracy to extort money under fear of injury. The material witness died before commencement of investigation. The prosecution failed to conduct an identification parade. In the absence of evidence, either oral or documentary or circumstantial, to conclude that the accused entered into a criminal conspiracy to commit the alleged offences, the acquittal of the accused recorded by the High Court cannot be interfered with under art 136 of the Constitution by the Supreme Court.[30]

7. 'Injury'

'Injury', as is defined in s 44, IPC, is not confined to physical injury.[31] Injury for purposes of this section and s 385 may take any of the forms of harm to a person's body, mind, reputation or property, caused illegally. So long as there is nothing illegal about the act of the person obtaining property, the offence would not be one of extortion. Where a junior vakil, in the absence of his senior, who had instructed him to simply apply for adjournment, took advantage of the occasion and obtained a bond for thirty rupees for conducting the case, it was held that the threat was only the non-rendering of service as a vakil, and this act, being clearly not an offence and not forbidden by law, did not amount to extortion.[32] Where the owners of trespassing cattle paid a penalty to a private person under the influence of threat that the cattle would be impounded if the payment was refused, it was held that the charges were paid under a threat of what was a lawful proceeding and the offence of extortion was not made out.[33] A nikah khawan is not bound to read the nikah for a person unless he chooses to do so. He might demand any fee that he likes. There is no law forbidding him to do so and the case does not fall under this section by his refusal to read the nikah.[34] Where possession of the property (bullocks) is taken peacefully without the use of any force or threat, and without resistance and objection to the taking possession of the property, there would be no offence of extortion even if the accused obtains the signature of the owner upon a receipt showing that they were sold to the accused by threatening the owner. The offence of extortion might, however, be said to have been committed in obtaining the signature upon the receipt.[35]

8. Harm to a Person's Body

A sub-inspector of police arrested one J, wrongfully confined him and extorted money from him under a threat that he would not be released unless the money was paid. The money was obtained from a moneylender. It was held that the money was3321 not voluntarily given and the accused was guilty of an offence under this section.[36] Where a chowkidar charged the complainant with theft, tied him with a turban and took him towards the police station and on the way the complainant was released on payment of rupees fifty demanded for his release, it was held that the action of the accused amounted to wrongful restraint, and the threat to take the complainant to the police station amounted to extortion.[37]

9. Harm to a Person's Mind

The terror of a criminal charge, whether true of false, amounts to a fear of injury. Though to threaten to use the process of law is lawful, to do so for the purpose of enforcement of payment of money not legally due, is unlawful and such a threat, made with such an object, is a threat of injury sufficient to constitute the offence of extortion. Thus, where the accused, a village headman, who found certain persons, setting cocks to fight near a public road, threatened them with prosecution and subsequently took money as a consideration for not prosecuting them, it was held that the accused was guilty under s 384, IPC .[38] Extortion may be equally committed whether the charge threatened is true or false.[39] Where the accused whose goat had been injured by the complainant, demanded a sum in excess of its value by threatening to prosecute her and succeeded in obtaining payment of that amount, it was held that the offence was one of extortion.[40]

10. Harm to a Person's Reputation

Harm to reputation is covered by the term 'injury'. Threat of harm to the reputation of a person is, and can be, an easy means of extortion. Where a mukhtar, engaged for the accused, threatened the complainant to put irrelevant, scandalous and indecent questions about him to the ladies of his house unless some money was paid to him, it was held that the mukhtar was guilty of extortion.[41]

11. Harm to a Person's Property

Whether the gumashta of a toll contractor illegally levied toll on carts preventing them from passing through the toll-gate unless the toll demanded was paid, he was held guilty of an offence under this section.[42] The making use of real or supposed influence to obtain money from a person against his will under threat, in case of refusal of the loss of appointment is extortion.[43] Where the complainant, who sold foreign cloth, was asked to pay five percent of the value of the stock and was threatened that pickets would be put if he refused to stop the sale, it was held that the accused committed extortion.[44]3322

12. 'Dishonestly'

It is not only sufficient that there should be wrongful loss, caused to one individual, but the person, putting that individual in fear of injury, must also have the intention that wrongful loss should be so caused. If the accused honestly believes that he has taken money, belonging to him, the attempt to get it back cannot be said to be with the intention of causing wrongful loss.[45] It is no offence to put a person in fear of injury unless it is done with criminal intention. If the object is merely to realise debts, which are admittedly due, the offence would not be extortion as 'dishonestly' would not be established.[46] To constitute the offence of extortion under s 383, IPC, a person must intentionally have put another person in fear of an injury and that by so doing he must have dishonestly induced the person so put to fear to deliver to any person any property or valuable security. If allegations in the complaint do not make out these ingredients, the conviction cannot be sustained.[47] Where the accused forcibly removed certain property from the possession of the complainant, claiming that it belonged to him, and placed it with a shopkeeper and there was a certain amount of evidence in support of the claim, it was held that the accused had no dishonest intention and was not guilty of the offence under s 384 .[48]

13. 'Induceto Deliverany Property'

One of the necessary ingredients of the offence of extortion is that the victim must be induced to deliver to any person any property or valuable security etc. That is to say, the delivery of the property must be with consent which has been obtained by putting the person in fear of any injury.[49]

There can be no extortion unless a person is, by a threat of injury, induced to deliver any property to the culprit.[50] The fear must be the inducement for delivery.[51] Where the thumb impression of the victims were forcibly taken from them on blank pieces of papers, which could subsequently be converted into valuable securities, it was held that this did not necessarily involve inducing the victim to deliver papers with their thumb impressions and the offence was not of extortion; it was no more than the use of criminal force.[52]

The snatching of the revolver by the accused from the complainant could not amount to extortion as there was no inducement to the complainant to part with the revolver.[53]

The persuasion to the members of the governing body to obtain an order to the effect that the earlier order of suspension was illegal and should be rescinded, and that persuasion might even at times have been hard-run, but the element of extortion which is necessary for the purpose of establishing a charge under s 384, IPC, was found lacking.[54]3323

14. Property

The word 'property' as used in the definition of extortion in s 383, IPC, is not defined. Property, therefore, can be understood in a wide sense. The letters got written from the victim while in confinement to his parents to fulfil the demands of the abductors would constitute property in the hand of the abductors.[55]

The word 'property' occurring in ss 327 and 383, IPC, must be taken to mean both movable and immovable property, and not movable property only.[56]

15. 'Valuable Security'

The offence of extortion under s 383 must be in relation to any property or valuable security or anything signed or sealed which may be converted into a valuable security. A blank promissory note and blank receipt, with forged signatures of the executant and a stamp of one anna at the top without specification of any details, would nevertheless be valuable securities within the meaning of s 30, IPC .[57] However, a document alleged to have been written by the complainant does not create any legal right, and it cannot be termed as a valuable security.[58]

Even an illegal order of the governing body of the college rendering an earlier order of suspension of the principal of a college to be non est continues to be valuable security.[59]

A promissory note, which a minor is forced to execute, is a valuable security.[60] Where the accused obtains illegally, from the complainant, a deed of relinquishment in respect of the complainant's property by threats, the offence would fall under s 383, IPC, even though the deed is unregistered as that would be a valuable security for the purpose of this section.[61]

16. Abetment to Extortion

The mere fact that the offence of extortion under s 384 is committed in the presence of the village chowkidar without eliciting any disapproval on his part, will not render him liable as an abettor to the offence.[62] The mere presence of a person on the occasion of giving a bribe and his omission to promptly inform the authorities does not constitute him as an accomplice, unless it can be shown that he somehow cooperated in the payment of the bribe or was instrumental in negotiating for the payment.[63] A constable, accompanied by civic guards, demanded a cash memo from a person, carrying a kerosene tin, and, after going some distance, demanded some money and then let that person go when the money was paid and the constable tore up the cash memo without protest from the civic guard, it was held that the civic3324 guard also considerably aided in giving force to the demand of the constable and abetted extortion.

Of Offences Against Property

OF EXTORTION

S. 384.

Punishment for extortion.--

Whoever commits extortion shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section prescribes punishment for the offence of completed extortion which is defined in the preceding section. Provision for a minor offence of attempted extortion and punishment, therefore, has been made in s 385, IPC .

Where the accused husband took his wife to the forest and obtained her ornaments under threat to kill, but the FIR indicated a slightly less serious situation, the accused is liable to be convicted under s 384 and not under ss 386 / 392, IPC .[64]

There was evidence that mob of 18-20 persons after coming to the dalan of the deceased forced them to handover their gun by show of force. An offence under s 384 was, therefore, clearly made out and with the aid of s 149, IPC, all the appellants were held guilty of that offence.[65]

2. Theft Distinguished from Extortion

Commentary under the same heading under s 378, ante, may be referred to.

3. Criminal Intimidation distinguished from Extortion

Commentary under the same heading under s 503, post, may be referred to.

4. Bail

The accused occupied the property of the complainant as a tenant and there was a history of litigation between them, extortion and criminal intimidation was caused by anonymous communication, and threats were extended from Dubai on telephone referring the name of the accused. Considering these facts and the gravity of the offences under ss 384, 357 / 120B / 34, IPC, the accused was not found entitled to the discretion of bail.[66]3325

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable,[67] and triable by a magistrate.

6. Compounding of Offence

It is true that having regard to the decision of the Supreme Court in Bankat v State of Maharashtra [68] that the courts would have no power to allow compromise of a prosecution when the same is not permissible in terms of s 320 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 but relying upon Badrilal v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[69] where a joint petition of compromise has been filed on behalf of the parties in which prayer has been made for recording the compromise for the offence under s 307, IPC which is not a compoundable one but the sentence of imprisonment awarded against the accused by the trial court as reduced by the High Court was further reduced to the period already undergone, by the Supreme Court.

The appellate court held that there was absolutely no reason as to why the settlement arrived at by and between the parties could not have been accepted, as the same would not come within the purview of sub-s (9) of s 320 of the Code of Criminal Procedure . So, while quashing the charge framed under s 384 of the IPC, the Supreme Court directed the learned magistrate to proceed to consider the question in regard to the maintainability of the compromise petition between the parties in accordance with law.[70]

7. Withdrawal from Prosecution--Duty of the Prosecutor and the Court

The sole consideration for the public prosecutor when he decides to withdraw from a prosecution is the larger factor of the administration of justice, not political favour nor party pressure nor like concerns; however, the interests of public justice being of paramount consideration, may transcend and overflow the legal justice of the particular litigation.[71]

The public prosecutor is an officer of the court and, therefore, responsible to it. It shall be the duty of the court to apprise itself of the reasons which prompted the public prosecutor to withdraw from the prosecution. Both the court and the public prosecutor have a duty to protect the administration of criminal justice against possible abuse or misuse by the executive by resort to the provisions of s 321, CrPC . The independence of the judiciary requires that once the case has gone to the court, the court and its officers alone must have control over the case and decide what is to be done in each case.[72]

The reasons, viz, that the case under ss 147, 342, 365 and 384, IPC, is pending for the last about 11½ years, there are a total sixteen accused who have been regularly appearing and no witnesses have been examined and no useful purpose is served by3326 continuing the case anymore, would not be a reason under s 321, CrPC, to permit withdrawal of the case.[73]

8. Jurisdiction

Section 179, Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, may be referred to.[74]

9. Quashing of Complaint

A complaint was filed alleging that accused no 1 was bringing pressure and threatening to kill the complainant if he did not vacate the premises which was in his lawful possession. Against accused no 2 it was alleged that he called in the complainant and threatened him to vacate the premises and go to his native place. The court of the metropolitan magistrate concerned issued process against the accused. Nowhere in the complaint was it revealed that any property or valuable security was delivered by the complainant to accused no 1 and that any threat was given by accused no 2 to force the complainant to deliver the said property to accused no 1. Thus, the ingredients of extortion were not at all made out nor of the other offence alleged. Consequently, the issuance of process against accused no 2 and proceedings against him pending before the metropolitan magistrate were quashed.[75]

Second exercise of inherent power for one and the same subject of quashing of charge-sheet for offence under s 384, IPC is not maintainable.[76]

10. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc), hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the..day of., at intentionally put AB in fear of an injury, namely (specify the injury),to him/or to another person..(specify the name), and thereby dishonestly induced AB to deliver the property, or valuable security, to wit..(specify the property or valuable security), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 384 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

In the case of extortion of money from several persons, the charge must state, with some approach to accuracy, the approximate amount, alleged to have been extorted from each person, and the nature of the extortion used against each person.[77]

11. Accused Charged with Section 302 can be Convicted under Section 384

Where the accused are charged for the offence of murder by resorting to extortion, the prosecution failed to prove several particulars relating to the major offence of murder but proved the commission of the minor offence punishable under s 384 read3327 with s 34, IPC, the conviction of the accused for the minor offence, eg under s 384 read with s 34, IPC, was held proper.[78] However, when circumstantial evidence against the accused persons is firmly established, their conviction under ss 454, 380 and 302, IPC, was found proper.[79]

12. Proof

For establishing a charge of extortion, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused put the complainant in fear of an injury:

(i) to the complainant, or
(ii) to any other person;

(b) the accused did so intentionally; and
(c) the accused induced the complainant to deliver, to any person:

(i) any property, or
(ii) valuable security, or
(iii) anything signed or sealed which could be converted into a valuable security.

In extortion, it has to be shown that the person was induced to part with the property by putting him in fear of injury. Mere taking away forcibly is not enough.[80]

When the witnesses did not say anything about one of the accused of harming, tried to extract money and the evidence on record did not show that the said accused accompanied the other three accused when they allegedly made a demand of Rs 5 lakh from PW1 and PW3, the evidence of PW1 regarding the presence of the said accused in the house of the co-accused at the relevant time cannot be accepted because he did not state that fact before the investigating officer in his statement under s 161, CrPC, the charges under s 384 read with s 34, IPC, along with charges under ss 504, 509 read with s 24, IPC, cannot be said to have been proved against the said accused.[81]

Where accused appellants A1 and A2 in collusion with other accused illegally confined the complainant and his wife at police station, snatched cash and ornaments from them and also got their property transferred in the name of accused A exercising threat and coercion, the case against them was held proved beyond reasonable doubt, conviction of accused A1 and A2 for offence under s 384, IPC was held proper.[82]

13. Sentence

The sentence should neither be too harsh, nor too lenient.[83] Where the police officer, whose duty is to help the helpless people of the village and protect them from oppression, who instead of doing that, adopts the rule of an oppressor and discharges the police force by committing the offence under ss 161 and 384, IPC, the sentence3328 should be deterrent to serve as an example to others.[84] If, however, the accused is convicted under ss 384 and 420 and the appellate court acquits him of the offence under s 420, IPC, the maintaining of the original aggregate sentence, passed for both offences, would amount to enhancement and would be illegal.[85]

When the sessions court has passed the sentence of 3 years rigorous imprisonment for the offence under s 395 and just 1 year for the offence under s 384 and made both sentences concurrent, there is no good ground to reduce the sentence awarded to the accused in the appeal to a lesser term or to substitute it by any amount of fine. A liberal attitude cannot be taken in regard to such offences on any sentencing policy.[86] Where the accused-husband took his wife to a forest and obtained her ornaments under threat to kill, he was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 2 years for the offence under s 384, IPC .[87]

14. Alteration of Conviction from Section 384 to Section 161

Even if the offence is principally an offence under s 384, IPC, it would be no bar to a conviction and sentence under s 161, IPC if the offence comes within the definition of that section.[88]

15. Alteration of Conviction from Section 395 to Section 384

Putting person in fear of injury in order to commit extortion.--

Whoever, in order to the committing of extortion, puts any person in fear, or attempts to put any person in fear, of any injury, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with a case of attempted extortion. The section prescribes punishment for extortion which remains incomplete by reason of the fact that the accused fails to induce delivery of property by putting the complainant in fear of an injury. Extortion consists of two parts, i.e.,

(a) causing fear of injury, which induces the person, labouring under the fear, and
(b) to deliver up the property.

If the complete offence, i.e., fear caused and a consequent delivery of the property is committed, then it is punishable under s 384 . If only the first part of the offence is3329 committed, it is punishable under this section.[89] The extortion, defined in s 383, includes putting any person in fear of injury and covers this section which deals with a less serious offence.[90] Similarly, this section must be read in conjunction with s 383, IPC .[91]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate.

3. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case (s 251, CrPC). Where an accused is alleged to have committed offences under ss 300 and 385, a conviction under s 385, IPC cannot be sustained if the accused never charged under the latter section and no opportunity is given to him to meet the charge. Both the offences have got distinct and separate ingredients.[92]

4. Proof

For establishing a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused put, or attempted to put, the complainant in fear of an injury; and
(b) the accused did so in order to the committing of extortion (as defined in s 383).

Where the prosecution case was that the accused had asked the complainant to pay 10% of the project, otherwise he would be implicated in serious offences, the presence of the accused at that time was found doubtful, no other witness corroborated the prosecution case, the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 385, IPC .[93]

Extortion by putting a person in fear of death or grievous hurt.--

Whoever commits extortion by putting any person in fear of death or of grievous hurt to that person or to any other, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.3330

Comments

1. Scope

This section prescribes punishment for an aggravated form of extortion by subjecting the victim in fear of death or of grievous hurt to him or to another person. Where the modus operandi disclosed in the ransom letters, was clearly to put the father of the kidnapped boy into a state of fright of the boy being murdered, and there was throughout the likelihood of the boy being murdered if the ransom money was not paid for one reason or the other, it was held that the accused were guilty of the offences under ss 364 and 386, IPC .[94]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

3. Bail-- Section 167(2) , CrPC 1973

From the relevant part of s 167, CrPC, and s 386, IPC, it is apparent that pending investigation relating to an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term 'not less than 10 years' the magistrate is empowered to authorise the detention of the accused in custody for not more than 90 days. For the rest of the offences, the period prescribed is 60 days. Hence, in case, where the offence is punishable with imprisonment for 10 years or more, the accused could be detained up to a period of 90 days. In this context, the expression 'not less than' would mean imprisonment should be 10 years or more and would cover only those offences for which punishment could be imprisonment for a clear period of 10 years or more. Under s 386, punishment provided is imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to 10 years and also fine. This means, that imprisonment can be for a clear period of 10 years or less. Hence, it could not be said that the minimum sentence would be 10 years or more. Further, in context also if we consider cl (i) of proviso (a) to s 167(2), CrPC . It would be applicable in case where investigation relates to an offence punishable:

(a) with death,
(b) imprisonment for life, and
(c) imprisonment for a term of not less than ten years.

It would not cover the offence for which punishment could be imprisonment for less than 10 years. Under s 386, IPC, imprisonment can vary from a minimum to a maximum of 10 years and it cannot be said that imprisonment prescribed is not less than 10 years.[95]

Therefore, when the accused is in custody for an offence punishable under s 386, IPC, and the chargesheet is not filed by the police within 60 days, the accused has to be released on bail by taking recourse to s 167(2), CrPC .

The accused kidnapped the complainant and demanded ransom money, the complainant was put in fright of being murdered and there was a likelihood of the complainant being murdered in case the money was not paid for any reason. The3331 offence attracted to these facts is not under s 386 but under s 364, IPC, punishable with life imprisonment. As the challan was filed within 90 days, the accused was not found entitled to bail on the ground of filing of challan beyond 60 days.[1]

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the..day of., at., you intentionally put AB in fear of death (or of grievous hurt) to him/or to another person, namely(specify his name), and thereby dishonestly induced AB to deliver the property/or valuable security, to wit.(specify the property/or valuable security), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 386 of the Indian Penal Code, and-within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

The offence under this section being an aggravated form of extortion in addition to the ingredients of the offence of extortion, which have to be proved to establish an offence under s 384, IPC, it has to be proved that the nature of fear was of death or of grievous hurt.

Where there was no proof of planning of conspiracy or execution thereof, the chain of events in a case based on circumstantial evidence were miserably incomplete, the accused were found entitled to the benefit of a reasonable doubt and acquittal of charges under ss 302, 120B, 364 and 386, IPC .[2] Where the accused was alleged to have abducted a girl aged 5 years, but there was no evidence on record to show that the girl was ever threatened or she was ever put in danger of being murdered by the accused, the letter demanding ransom alleged to have been written was held to be very weak type of evidence as no expert was produced, so the accused could not be convicted for offences under ss 364 and 386, IPC .[3]

Mere fact that a plastic bag containing 25 lakhs was found in the possession of the accused would not prove that he had demanded the said money. Tape recorded evidence did not reveal that ransom demand was made by the person who had made telephone call. Accused was acquitted of the charge under s 386, IPC .[4]

6. Conviction

Where, on circumstantial evidence, it was found that the two accused had actually committed offences under ss 364 and 386, IPC, in pursuance of a common intention, it was held that both could equally be held guilty for the offences with the aid of s 34, IPC .[5]

OF EXTORTION

S. 387.

Putting person in fear of death or of grievous hurt, in order to commit extortion.--

Whoever, in order to the committing of extortion, puts or attempts3332 to put any person in fear of death or of grievous hurt to that person or to any other, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

Sections 386 and 387, IPC have the same relation as ss 384 and 385, IPC, the only difference being that in a case of this section and s 386, the injury in fear of which a person is put is death or grievous hurt. The sections do not, however, provide that the fear of death or grievous hurt should necessarily be instant.[6]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

Although, the Bihar Act IV of 1976 required vide its proviso added wef 20 January 1976 that it is necessary that the sanction of the state government or such officer specified by the government should be obtained before initiating any prosecution under s 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961, but it does not require to obtain any sanction for prosecution for offences under the IPC . Therefore, cognizance of an offence under s 387 of IPC without any such sanction is not without jurisdiction.[7]

3. Charge

The form of the charge is the same as under s 385, IPC, except that the nature of injury, which has to be specified, is death or grievous hurt and s 387, IPC is to be substituted for s 385, IPC .

An accused charged under s 307, IPC, cannot be convicted under s 387, IPC if error in the charge causes prejudice to him.[8]

When the statement of the complainant's son prima facie indicates a threat of putting the complainant in fear, as contemplated by s 387, the special court, cannot be said to have committed any error in framing the charge for the offence punishable under s 120B read with s 387, IPC .[9]

4. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, all the ingredients required to be established under s 385 must be proved with the only exception that it has to be further proved that injury, of which the complainant was put in fear, was death or grievous hurt.3333

In Hira Pearelal Kirar v State ,[10] the real accusation of firing on the complainant by the accused having been disbelieved, the same witnesses could not be relied upon for their statements with respect to the demand of money, and, therefore, the conviction for extortion under this section could not be upheld.

In the absence of any physical act on the part of the accused and also any such material which may indicate that, as a matter of fact, the accused had practiced extortion by threat of fear of death and hurt, the offence under this section is not constituted.[11]

5. Non-payment of Actual Currency Notes--Effect

Where the accused demanded ransom after kidnapping and the police arranged a trap and asked the witness to give a bundle of pieces of papers of size of the currency notes to the accused and give signal to the police, and the evidence of the witness and the police showed that the accused accepted the bundle, the offence of extortion stood proved. The fact of non-payment of actual currency notes does not make the prosecution case disbelievable as the intention to commit crime is important than the Act.[12]

6. Sentence

If a person is abducted in order that money may be extorted from his relatives, a conviction under s 385, IPC, would be justified; if this was done in order to compel the relatives of the abducted person to ransom by putting them in fear of death of the abducted person, the provision of s 387 would be applicable, but separate sentences cannot be passed both under ss 385 and 387 in view of the first part of s 71 .[13] Where the appellant took an active part in abducting and torturing the complainant and also demanded ransom, it was held that there was no ground to reduce the sentence of three years rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 100.[14]

However, when a child was abducted for ransom the sentence (concurrent) of 3 years each awarded under ss 363 and 387, IPC, by the trial court was reduced from 3 years to 1 year.[15]

Of Offences Against Property

OF EXTORTION

S. 388.

Extortion by threat of accusation of an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life, etc.--

Whoever commits extortion by putting any person in fear of an accusation against that person or any other, of having committed or attempted to commit any offence punishable with death, or with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, or of having attempted to induce any other person to commit such offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; and, if the3334 offence be one punishable under section 377 of this Code, may be punished with imprisonment for life.

Comments

1. Scope

The preceding sections deal with the putting of a ransom into fear of different kinds of injury. This section also deals with an aggravated form of extortion, but under this section, the threat is of accusing the victim of an offence, punishable with death/or with imprisonment for life/or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years. An accusation of a charge of unnatural offence under s 377, IPC, is viewed with even greater seriousness. In that case, the punishment extends to imprisonment for life, while in other cases, it may extend to ten years.

Accusation need not be against the person who is put in fear. Such accusation against any other person would bring the offence under this section if a person is put into fear of such accusation against another person. The term 'accusation' is not confined to a threat to prefer a charge before a tribunal; it includes a threat to accuse before any third person.[16]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Magistrate,etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the... day of..at., you committed extortion by putting AB in fear of an accusation, against him or another person, of having committed (or attempted to commit) the offence of (s*pecify the offence*), which is punishable with death/or with imprisonment for life/or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years (or having attempted to induce another person, namely., to commit such offence, and thereby dishonestly induced AB to deliver..(specify the property,etc), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 388 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

4. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) the accused put, or attempted to put, the complainant in fear of an accusation against him or against any other person;
(b) the accusation was:

(i) of an offence punishable with death/or with imprisonment for life/or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, or3335
(ii) of an offence under s 377, IPC, or
(iii) of having attempted to induce any other person to commit such offence; and

(c) the accused did so in order to commit extortion (as defined in s 383, IPC).

The accused were charged with the offence of conspiracy to extort money under fear of injury. The material witness died before commencement of investigation. The prosecution failed to conduct the identification parade. In the absence of evidence to conclude that the accused entered into a criminal conspiracy to commit the alleged offences, the acquittal of the accused recorded by the High Court was interfered with under art 136 of the Constitution by the Supreme Court.[17]

Putting person in fear of accusation of offence, in order to commit extortion.--

Whoever, in order to the committing of extortion, puts or attempts to put any person in fear of an accusation, against that person or any other, of having committed or attempted to commit, an offence punishable with death or with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; and, if the offence be punishable under section 377 of this Code, may be punished with imprisonment for life.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is to the preceding s 388, in the same position as s 385 is to s 384 and s 387 to s 386, IPC .

2. Anticipatory Bail

Where the sub-inspector of police and two other accused allegedly extracted money by threat from the complainant aged 80/85 years attracting offences under ss 384, 389 / 34, IPC, and also under s 13, Prevention of Corruption Act, the anticipatory bail should be refused. It is highly dangerous to let such a person on bail as it will be very easy for them to tamper with the evidence and even threaten the complainant.[18]

3. Procedure

Commentary under the headings under s 388, ante, may be referred to.

4. Charge

The charge would be similar to that under s 385, IPC, with consequential changes.3336

5. Proof

Prove that:

(a) the accused put, or attempted to put, a person in fear;
(b) the fear was of the accusation of an offence or an attempt to commit it;
(c) such offence was punishable with death or imprisonment for life or for a term which may extend to ten years; and
(d) this was done in order to commit extortion (as defined in s 383, IPC).

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 390.

Robbery.--

In all robbery there is either theft or extortion.

When theft is robbery.--Theft is "robbery" if, in order to the committing of the theft, or in committing the theft, or in carrying away or attempting to carry away property obtained by the theft, the offender, for that end, voluntarily causes or attempts to cause to any person death or hurt or wrongful restraint, or fear of instant death or of instant hurt, or of instant wrongful restraint.

When extortion is robbery.--Extortion is "robbery" if the offender, at the time of committing the extortion, is in the presence of the person put in fear, and commits the extortion by putting that person in fear of instant death, of instant hurt, or of instant wrongful restraint to that person or to some other person, and, by so putting in fear, induces the person so put in fear then and there to deliver up the thing extorted.

Explanation.--The offender is said to be present if he is sufficiently near to put the other person in fear of instant death, of instant hurt, or of instant wrongful restraint.

Illustrations

(a) A holds Z down, and fraudulently takes Z's money and jewels from Z's clothes, without Z's consent. Here A has committed theft, and, in order to the committing of that theft, has voluntarily caused wrongful restraint to Z. A has therefore committed robbery.

(b) A meets Z on the high road, shows a pistol, and demands Z's purse, Z, in consequence, surrenders his purse. Here A has extorted the purse from Z by putting him in fear of instant hurt, and being at the time of committing the extortion in his presence. A has therefore committed robbery.

(c) A meets Z and Z's child on the high road. A takes the child, and threatens to fling it down a precipice, unless Z delivers his purse. Z, in consequence, delivers his purse. Here A has extorted the purse from Z, by causing Z to be in fear of instant hurt to the child who is there present. A has therefore committed robbery on Z.

(d) A obtains property from Z by saying--"your child is in the hands of my gang, and will be put to death unless you send us ten thousand rupees". This is extortion, and punishable as such; but it is not robbery, unless Z is put in fear of the instant death of his child.3337

Comments

1. Scope

Robbery involves either theft or extortion. The difference in the effects of theft and extortion for constituting robbery may be analysed as follows:

Robbery consists of either:

Aggravated theft or aggravated extortion,

(a) i.e., where the offender, in order to commit the theft,
(b) or in committing the theft,
(c) or in carrying away the stolen property,
(d) or in attempting to carry it away, thereto voluntarily causes, or attempts to cause, to any person, death, hurt or wrongful restraint, or fear of instant death, hurt or wrongful restraint.

Where the property is taken under the above circumstances, the theft becomes robbery [refer to illust (a)].

(a) i.e., where, at the time of extortion,--the offender, in the presence of the person put in fear,
(b) puts him in fear of instant death, hurt or wrongful restraint to himself or any other person,
(c) thereby inducing him then and there to deliver up the thing extorted.

Where the owner is induced, under above circumstances, to deliver up the property, the extortion becomes robbery [refer to illusts (b) and (c)]. Extortion need not fall immediately upon the restraint in order to constitute a robbery if there is fear of restraint at the relevant time.[19]

Robbery is only an aggravated form of offence of theft or extortion. Aggravation is in the use of violence of death, hurt or restraint. Violence must be in the course of theft and not subsequently. It is not necessary that violence actually should be committed but even attempt to commit it is enough. Where there is no theft committed, then as a natural corollary there cannot be robbery.[20]

The essence of the offence of robbery is that the offender, for committing theft, or for carrying away or attempting to carry away the looted property, voluntarily causes, or attempts to cause, death/or hurt/or wrongful restraint. The use of violence will not, therefore, ipso facto convert the offence of theft into robbery unless the violence is3338 committed for one of the ends specified in the section.[21] If violence is used in order to help an offender to escape,[22] or to make good his own escape,[23] the act does not become robbery. The mere fact that the assault and the theft took place in the same transaction, is not enough. The assault must be to facilitate commission of theft.[24]If the threat, if any, is occasioned subsequent to the act of carrying away the property, it is theft, and not robbery.[25]

Section 95, IPC provides that nothing is an offence if any harm caused, or intended to be caused, or known to be likely to be caused, is so slight that no person of ordinary sense would complain of such harm. The taking away of a stick of no utility and a torn and worn out piece of cloth, practically of no value, is harm of such slight nature that no person of ordinary prudence would complain. Therefore, no offence of robbery, as specified in this section, can be made out against an accused if there is neither any theft, which need be complained of is committed, nor there is any intention on the part of the accused to commit theft.[26]

2. Law of England

A person is guilty of robbery if he steals, and immediately before or at the time of doing so, and in order to do so, he uses force on any person or puts or seeks to put any person in fear of being then and there subjected to force. A person guilty of robbery, or of an assault with intent to rob, is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for life or for any shorter term.

In R v Smith , it was held, 'Applying settled principles, notwithstanding that the victim had been in unlawful possession of a prohibited Class A drug, the appropriation of drugs constituted theft and the circumstances in which the drugs had been taken amounted to the offence of robbery. On the question of sentence, the instant case fell within level two of the guidelines of the Sentencing Guidelines Council, in which the range of sentence was seven years custody. It followed that the sentence imposed in each case was manifestly excessive.'[27]

It is irrelevant whether or not the person threatened is put in fear of being subjected to force.[28]

A professionally planned and executed commercial robbery falls outside the categories of robbery dealt with by the definitive guideline.[29] Section 8 of the Theft Act 1968, so far as material, provides: '(1) A person is guilty of robbery if he steals, and immediately before or at the time of doing so, and in order to do so, he uses force on any person or puts or seeks to put any person in fear of being then and there3339 subjected to force. (2) A person guilty of robbery, or of an assault with intent to rob, shall on conviction on indictment be liable to imprisonment for life.'[30]

3. Law of Canada

It is an indictable offence to commit robbery. The following situations constitute 'robbery':

- The accused steals, and for the purpose of extorting whatever is stolen or to prevent or overcome resistance to the stealing, uses violence or threats of violence to a person or property. Holding a person's arms to prevent resistance is sufficient "violence". Proof of a threat is sufficient.
- The accused steals from any person and, at the time he steals or immediately before or immediately thereafter, wounds, beats, strikes or uses any personal violence to that person. The purpose for the violence is irrelevant. The violence need only be contemporaneous with or immediately before or after the theft. A mere technical assault, such as nudging or bumping the complainant to steal her purse, does not constitute required degree of the personal violence.
- The accused assaults any person with intent to steal from him. A charge of 'robbery of $15' particularizes a completed stealing and a conviction for robbery based upon para (c) is not available. Attempted robbery is the available verdict.
- The accused steals from any person while armed with an offensive weapon or imitation thereof. 'Armed' means equipped with or possessed of an instrument and an accused who merely pretends to have a gun cannot be convicted under s 343(d) . While the mere use of a hand, inside a coat pocket, to create the impression of a firearm, did not constitute the use of an imitation firearm, the accused may be convicted where it was not clear what he had in his pocket. Merely having the weapon or imitation is sufficient.

In order for a robbery to take place, there must be contemporaneous violence. In one case, the accused's tussle with police after he was caught shoplifting and dropped his stolen goods did not constitute the requisite contemporaneous violence required for robbery. The theft was complete when the accused exited the store. The violence cannot be said to be to overcome resistance to the theft.

If a particular mode of robbery is specified in the indictment, every essential averment as alleged must be proved and the other modes of robbery cannot be left with the jury. However, in a case, it was held on a charge of robbery that the accused did 'use a firearm, to wit: a sawed off shotgun, in robbing [CT] of cash monies contrary to s 344(a) of the Criminal Code'; the allegation of the shotgun is to engage the minimum penalty and not to particularize any particular type of robbery. Thus the jury could convict of robbery even if not satisfied that the particular firearm was used.

In R v Mckay , it was observed, 'Theft and assault were two separate events, a conviction for robbery could not be sustained. Here, the theft was complete prior to the threat made by the accused. Therefore, the robbery conviction could not stand, as the theft and the threat were two separate events. The robbery conviction was set3340 aside and a conviction for theft under $5,000 was substituted, as there was no evidence the knife was used in the course of the theft.'[31]

4. Robbery with Theft

Before theft can amount to robbery, the offender must have voluntarily caused, or attempted to cause, to any person, death/or hurt/or wrongful restraint/or fear of instant death/or fear of instant hurt/or fear of instant wrongful restraint. The second ingredient, necessary to constitute robbery, is that the (accused's) act must be in order to the committing of the theft of, or carrying away, or attempting to carry away, the property obtained by theft. The third ingredient is that the offender must voluntarily attempt to cause, to any person, hurt for that end in view.[32]

However, before a person can be convicted of robbery, theft by him must be established; if theft is not established, the accused would not be guilty.[33] A charge of robbery cannot be entertained if there is evidence that the accused acted in good faith under a claim of right, however erroneous the belief may have been.[34] Where the accused seizes a truck under a claim of right, no offence of theft is made out with the result that the charge or robbery fails.[35]

5. Dishonesty

Dishonesty is one of the elements of the offences of theft and robbery. Where an amin attached some property under a warrant which had expired but which he failed to notice, it was held that the amin could not be held guilty of committing theft and, therefore, also not of robbery.[36] Where the estate official took away the cattle of the accused under a distraint, which was wholly illegal and the accused went to recover their cattle from the possession of the estate official, it was held that it could not be said that the accused were acting dishonestly. There being no theft, there was no offence under s 391, IPC .[37]

6. 'For that End'

The words 'for that end' are crucial words which distinguish a case of theft accompanied with assault from that of robbery;[38] They mean 'for the purpose or object of theft' or 'for the purpose of carrying away the stolen property'. An assault not made for such purpose or for that end would not make the theft a robbery.[39] The words 'for that end' in s 390 clearly mean that the hurt caused must be with the object of facilitating the committing of the theft or must be caused while the offender is committing theft or is carrying away or is attempting to carry away property3341 obtained by the theft.[40] If the assault and loot take place simultaneously, and there is no evidence to prove that the assault took place for any of the purposes specified in s 390, IPC, the accused cannot be convicted under s 392, IPC .[41]

Common sense admits of no dispute that a person who would commit a robbery would also attempt to run away with stolen articles with the utmost promptitude and if the victim or witnesses would try to obstruct this design of his, he would assault them with the weapon he is armed with. Therefore, the contention that the accused gave a knife blow to the informant only to extricate himself from his clutches and not to accomplish his design of carrying away the gold buttons which he had obtained during the course of theft cannot be accepted.[42]

In most of the cases where an offender obtains a property during theft and which the victim or witnesses try to catch while the offender tries to run away and if armed with a weapon assaults them, both the facets namely:

(a) in attempting to carry away property obtained by theft the offender causing hurt to the person who is trying to foil his attempt, and
(b) the normal instinct of self preservation on account of which the offender tries to run away and foil the bid of the person, who endeavours to thwart it by assaulting the said person may co-exist.

To ignore facet (a) in the judgment would cause gross miscarriage of justice.[43] The use of violence will not, therefore, convert the offence of theft into robbery unless violence is committed for one of the ends specified in this section.[44] The hurt caused by the offender, must be with the express object of facilitating the committing of the theft or must be caused while the offender is committing the theft or carrying away or is attempting to carry away the property obtained by the theft.[45] Where, with the object of stealing, the accused seized a bundle from the hands of a woman at a railway station and tried to run away with it but the woman resisted and was dragged to some distance, it was held that the hurt caused was only accidental.[46] Where the inception of the struggle was only a quarrel between the complainant and the accused and it was at the end that the accused found a chance of taking the property to ensure payment of money due to him, it was held that the offence was one under s 379, IPC, and not robbery.[47] Where however, the accused attempted to remove a nath from the nose of a woman but the nose was torn as the clasp of the nath became loose though pain was caused and blood flowed, it was held that there was indubitably an intention seconded by an attempt to cause hurt and the offence was, therefore, robbery.[48]3342 Where a person through fear offers no resistance to the carrying away of his property but does not deliver any of the property to those who carry it off, the offence committed is robbery, and not extortion.[49]

7. Removal of Property from a Dead Body is not Robbery

Where the accused committing a murder removed some ornaments from the dead body, it was held that though the accused was guilty of an offence under s 302, IPC, the removal of ornaments from the dead body could not amount to a robbery because robbery is theft by force in taking property out of the possession of a person, and a dead body is not a person'. The accused was in that respect, guilty of dishonest misappropriation, and robbery.[50] If, however, a murder is committed for the purpose of stealing the jewels, the removal of the jewels would be robbery.[51] Where murder and robbery are committed in the course of the same transaction by the same person, the offence would fall under s 392, IPC, and not under s 404, IPC . In that context, the word 'person' cannot be narrowly construed as to exclude the dead body of the human being who was killed in the same transaction in which the theft was committed.[52]

8. 'Robbery' as used in Railway Risk Notes--Whether Theft

On the question as to whether the term 'robbery' in railway risk notes is synonymous with theft, there is a conflict of opinion among the different High Courts. According to the Allahabad High Court, both the terms are synonymous.[53] This view was followed in Lahore[54] and Bombay.[55] However, according to the Patna[56] and Calcutta[57] High Courts, robbery and theft are not synonymous, and the term 'robbery' is used in the sense in which this word is used in the IPC .

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 391.

Dacoity.--

When five or more persons conjointly commit or attempt to commit a robbery, or where the whole number of persons conjointly committing or attempting to commit a robbery, and persons present and aiding such commission or attempt, amount to five or more, every person so committing, attempting or aiding, is said to commit "dacoity".3343

Comments

1. Scope

Dacoity, which is an aggravated form of robbery, is viewed with great seriousness and has been made punishable at different stages as follows:

(a) Preparation.--Preparation is not punishable except under a few sections like ss 121 and 126, IPC . Express provision has been made under s 399, IPC in respect of preparation to commit dacoity.
(b) Assembling for dacoity.--This is made punishable under s 402, IPC .
(c) Attempt at dacoity.--Preparation and attempt are treated as separate offences in other cases. In the case of dacoity, even attempt is itself a dacoity (s 391, IPC).
(d) Commission of the actual dacoity.

Punishments have also been graduated as under s 395, IPC . Even association with dacoits is made punishable under s 400, IPC .

The term 'dacoity' is defined in s 391 of the IPC, which clearly postulates that when five or more persons conjointly commit or attempt to commit a robbery, or where the whole number of persons conjointly committing or attempting to commit a robbery, and persons present and aiding such commission or attempt, amount to five or more, every person so committing, attempting or aiding, is said to commit 'dacoity'. Where the offence is said to have been committed by only 3-4 persons, conviction in and sentence of accused under s 391 is illegal and cannot be sustained.[58]

2. Dacoity and Robbery--Distinction

For an offence of dacoity, minimum number of the miscreants required is five. The term 'dacoity' is defined in s 391, IPC, which clearly postulates that when five or more persons conjointly commit or attempt to commit a robbery, or where the whole number of persons conjointly committing or attempting to commit a robbery, and persons present and aiding such commission or attempt, amount to five or more, every person so committing, attempting or aiding, is said to commit 'dacoity'. The offence of 'robbery' is defined in s 390, IPC, and as is clear from a perusal of the said section, even a theft is 'robbery' if during its commission, the offender voluntarily causes or attempts to cause to any person death or hurt or wrongful restraint, or fear of instant death or of instant hurt, or of instant wrongful restraint. Whereas 'robbery' is punishable under s 392, IPC, dacoity is punishable under s 395, IPC .[59]

3. 'Conjointly'

The essential ingredient of the offence of dacoity is that five of more persons should be concerned in the commission of it, and they should either commit, or attempt to commit, a robbery.[60]3344

The word 'conjointly' is the most important word appearing on the liability of person against an offence of dacoity.[61] The word 'conjointly', used in s 391, IPC, manifestly refers to united or concerted action of the persons participating in the transaction.[62]

Where the two accused who were standing outside the house near the gate, came with the other three miscreants jointly, and had also participated in the dacoity, and then fled with the other three miscreants after the commission of the dacoity, all the five accused were found liable for the offence of dacoity.[63]

It is necessary that all the persons should share the common object of committing robbery.[64] Mere presence of an accused amongst the robbers is not sufficient. The accused must be shown to have conjointly committed the robbery or aided in such commission and that the accused were in the body of persons who extorted money or at least aided them in extorting the money.[65] Where the accused, not present at the relevant time, was, to some extent, aiding the commission of the dacoity, he could not be convicted on that finding as the accused was not one of those who were conjointly committing or attempting to commit robbery.[66] If individual acts of persons cannot reasonably be referred to as united or concerted action of such persons, there can be no question of any conviction for the offence of dacoity.[67]If the act of any of them is dissociated from the common object, it cannot be brought home to the other member.[68]Where the common object of the accused was to rescue some persons from the custody of some officials and one of them seized something from the hands of one of the officials, it was held that it was not a conjoint act and did not amount to dacoity.[69] Where, however it was established that the common object of certain Mohammedan rioters was both to hurt any member of the Hindu community, whom they might happen to find, and to rob the shops and houses of Hindus, any person, who is proved to have taken part in the disturbance, must be found guilty not only of the offence of riot, but also of the offence of dacoity.[70] Similarly, where a large body of Hindus, acting in concert, forcibly deprived, certain Mohammedans, of some cattle and the circumstances did not indicate any intention of subsequently restoring them, it was held that they were guilty of dacoity.[71] Where, however, several Hindus, acting in concert, forcibly removed an ox and two cows from the possession of a Mohammadan, not for the purpose of causing wrongful gain to themselves or wrongful loss to the owner of cattle, but for the purpose of preventing the killing of the cows, it was held that there being no dishonesty, the accused could not be convicted of dacoity, but only of riot.[72]3345

4. Motive Unnecessary in Dacoity Cases

In cases of dacoity and cognate offences where it is alleged that substantial property has been stolen, it is entirely unnecessary to consider motive at all. The taking of body in such cases itself provides a sufficient motive for the offence if any motive is required.[73] It is not necessary that the accused should have known their victim previously and should have some personal grievance against them before they would commit dacoity.[74]

5. Attempt to Robbery Sufficient for Dacoity

Dacoity begins as soon as there is an attempt to commit robbery. A shot fired in order to keep off the rescue party and allow the theft to be committed is an act committed in committing the dacoity.[75] It cannot be argued that no dacoity was committed if the dacoits were unsuccessful.[76] There is no distinction between a dacoity and an attempt to commit one.[77] It may be noted that in the case of robbery, an attempt at robbery is treated as a separate offence under s 393 with a much lesser punishment than for robbery under s 392, IPC . In the case of dacoity, however, attempt stands at the same level as the commission of dacoity and is punishable to the same extent.

6. Aiding the Commission of Dacoity

Under this section, not only the persons directly committing or attempting to commit robbery but also those present and aiding such commission or attempt will be guilty of dacoity. It may be noted that the word used is 'aiding', and not 'abetting'. The presence at the scene of the dacoity is necessary for aiding although it is not so for abetment.

Knowing of a design to commit dacoity and voluntarily concealing the existence of that design, with the knowledge that such concealment would facilitate the commission of dacoity, does not amount to the abetment of dacoity.

7. Putting in fear Without Show of Force or Violence--Whether Sufficient to be Dacoity

It is wrong to say that if no resistance is offered and no violence required, it will cease to be a dacoity and should be treated as theft.[78]

It is not necessary that force or menace should be displayed by an overt act. An overwhelming show of force sufficient to terrify and threaten violence would constitute dacoity.[79] Where a body of men plunders a house, the mere fact of the proprietor's family having been able to make their escape a few minutes before the robbers forced entrance, does not take the offence out of the purview of s 395, IPC .[80]3346

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 392.

Punishment for robbery.--

Whoever commits robbery shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; and, if the robbery be committed on the highway between sunset and sunrise, the imprisonment may be extended to fourteen years.

Comments

1. Scope

The various aspects of the offence of robbery have been discussed in s 390, IPC . Punishments for robbery are prescribed under ss 392 to 394, IPC . This section covers the case of simple robbery and s 393, IPC of attempt to commit robbery. The punishment has been made heavier in the case of highway robberies between sunset and sunrise. Section 394 , IPC, provides for even higher sentences for causing hurt in committing robbery which is a more aggravated form.3347

2. Offence under Section 382 Distinguished from Robbery

Commentary under s 382, ante, may be referred to.

3. Sections 392, 394, 397 Compared

Commentary under s 394, post, may be referred to.

4. Unwanted Police Visits Cause Prejudice to Businessman and his Business

When an article, a golden chain, is not maintained to have been stolen during robbery in the FIR, it is totally improper on the part of the investigating officer to go for seizure of such an article. It casts serious prejudice to a businessman in his business, reputation as well as in his social reputation whenever police visit his shop; it causes a serious dent to his business and social reputation which never gets restored. Had there been a mention in the FIR that such an article was stolen at the time of said incident of dacoity, house breaking or robbery, there could have been some justification.

The jeweller cited as witness should be examined as a prosecution witness in the trial court. He should be given an opportunity of claiming that article in the court. Had he been examined, he would have said something about his ownership in respect of that golden chain. His non-examination is likely to cause him a financial loss and denial of an opportunity of putting a claim on the said chain.[81]

5. Violence--Two Views--Effect

The facts constituting the offence either by reason of it being a theft or extortion, as the case may be, must be proved for establishing a charge under this section. Ordinarily, if violence or hurt, etc, is caused at the time of theft it would be reasonable to infer that the violence or hurt was caused for facilitating the commission of theft or for facilitating the carrying away of the property stolen or for facilitating the attempt to do so. However, there may be something in evidence to show that hurt or violence was caused not for this purpose, but for a different purpose. If two views can be taken as to the object for which the violence has been used, it would be safer to take the view which would be more favourable to the accused.[82]

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

7. Importance of Evidence of an Identification Parade

Commentary under s 395, post, may be referred to.3348

8. Precautions in Holding test Identification Parade

There are no fixed rules about the procedure which has to be followed while holding the test identification and as to who is competent. As such to hold the test identification, para 9 of r 395 of the Madhya Pradesh Prisons Rules 1968, makes a provision with respect to the procedure in respect of under-trial prisoners who have to be subsequently identified.

The procedure of holding the identification as laid down in the Criminal Manual issued by the High Court of Judicature, appellate side, Bombay, provides that not more than two suspects at a time should be put for identification in one parade.[83]

The law with respect to test identification came up for consideration before a Division Bench of the Madhya Pradesh High Court in Narayan Singh v Amarsingh. [84] It was observed in that case that:

> As the identification parades are test for eliminating false assertions and to guard against honest mistakes of the witnesses, the court requires that they should be held under conditions most conducive to their being fair tests for the elicitation of truth, such as without undue delay, when the impressions are fresh and other influences are less likely to have operated, without giving an opportunity to the witnesses to see the accused or to acquaint themselves with his features with the aid of photographs, sketches, description or the like, by mixing the accused with sufficient number of other persons to eliminate chance identification, by mixing the accused with persons of the same race, culture, age, height and position in life, so that he is not easily picked out by reason of any of the aforementioned characteristics, by allowing the accused to select his own position in the line, by concealing the distinguishing marks of the accused if any by not permitting the identifying witnesses on their leaving the parade to communicate with the others who are yet to identify, by holding the parade free from the influence of the police the prosecuting agency etc.

A detailed consideration so far as the question of identification is concerned was made by a Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court as early as 1961 in Ashrafi v State .[85] In this case their lordships of the Allahabad High Court considered in great detail as to what is the object of test identification. Who can hold and what is the legal effect of identification. Their lordship also took into consideration various aspects relating to identification, including delay in holding test identification, conditions necessary for acceptability of identification evidence, identification at the instance of the accused etc. The detailed consideration made in this authority and the law laid down therein still holds good and has not been dissented by any High Court. In this case their lordships also took into consideration a Division Bench decision of the Madhya Pradesh High Court reported in State of Madhya Pradesh v Manka ,[86] and quoted the following passage from that judgment:

> The evidence of identity must be thoroughly scrutinised, giving benefit of all doubt to the accused; but if after a thorough security there appears to be nothing on the record to suspect the testimony of the identification witnesses, the court ought not to feel shy of basing a conviction on such evidence alone, because of the bare possibility that there could be honest though mistaken identification.3349

Their lordships agreed with the above observation made by this court. After mentioning agreement with the above decision of the Division Bench of the Madhya Pradesh High Court, it held that twelve questions are apt to arise and must be answered by the court to its satisfaction before it can accept the evidence. They are as follows:

(a) Did the identifier know the accused from before?
(b) Did he see him between the crime and the test identification?
(c) Was there unnecessary delay in the holding of the test?
(d) Did the magistrate take sufficient precautions to ensure that the test was a fair one?
(e) What was the state of the prevailing light?
(f) What was the condition of the eye-sight of the identifier?
(g) What was the state of his mind?
(h) What opportunity did he have of seeing the offenders?
(i) What were the errors committed by him?
(j) Was there anything outstanding in the features or conduct of the accused which impressed him?
(k) How did the identifier fare at other test identification held in respect of the same offence?
(l) Was the quantum of identification evidence sufficient?

After laying down the aforesaid questions, the learned judges specifically held that no hard and fast rule can be laid down, and each case has to be dealt with on its own merits.

These questions are of universal application. There cannot be any denial with respect to the questions mentioned by the learned judges in the said authority and while acting upon the test identification the court must satisfy itself with the answers of these questions. If the court comes to the conclusion that answers to these questions do not convey that the result of the test identification is reliable and the test identification is not in conformity with para 9 of r 395 of the Madhya Pradesh Prison Rules mentioned above, it cannot be relied upon. On the other hand, if the court concludes that there is nothing on record to suspect the testimony of identification witnesses, the court can base conviction on the basis of such evidence alone as held by the Division Bench of the Madhya Pradesh High Court in the aforesaid authority of State of Madhya Pradesh v Manka .[87]

There are other authorities as well in which a more or less similar view was taken as was taken in Ashrafi's case.[88] In Kamaraj Groundar, the counsel laid down certain hints and precautions which should be noted or observed. The precautions are given in detail and not being repeated here for the sake of brevity. It has to be observed that they are more or less similar to those mentioned above. A Division Bench of the Kerala High Court also considered the guiding principles for test identification parade in Mohanan Nair v State of Kerala .[89] They are also similar. Thus, before acting upon the test identification, the court must be satisfied that it is trustworthy3350 and reliable. The Apex Court in Somappa

Vamanappa Madar Shankarappa Ravanappa Kaddi v State of Mysore ,[90] held that if in an identification parade the accused was identified by most eyewitnesses, then because of some defects in proceeding relating to identification parade, the evidence of eyewitnesses regarding participation of the accused cannot be rejected.[91]

9. Identification of an Accused

It is the duty of the prosecution to lead evidence that all precautions were taken so that no witness could have the opportunity to see the accused after his arrest or before the test identification parade.[92] Identification of the accused by prosecution witnesses for the first time in court cannot be relied upon in the absence of corroboration by an earlier test identification parade.

It is settled principle of law that in the case of identification of a stranger by a victim, the victim should get sufficient time and opportunity of seeing the culprit and thereafter, impressing his features, identification marks, in his memory so as to allow him to recollect it at the time of the test identification parade, and thereafter, in court.[93] When the incident took place suddenly in a surprising way frightening the victims, it is difficult for them to maintain their balance and become alert to grasp the features of the culprit. If he happens to be a person well-acquainted with the victim, such circumstances may not weigh much against his identification. However, when that culprit is a stranger to the victim, the effect of surprise in which the victim had been caught, coupled with fright, are the factors which go against the capacity of such witness identifying such person, after a gap of even couple of days.[94] Likewise, the question of identification of the accused person would not arise when the accused persons were caught and taken to the police and remained in the company of the complainant right from going to their house and reaching the police station. When the accused remained in the company of witnesses for a long period in continuation, the question of holding identification parade would not arise.[95] Where the accused is not known to the witnesses from before holding of test identification parade is necessary.[96]

The accused persons were alleged to have beaten a scooterist and a pillion-rider at night and stole their belongings. None of the witnesses stated as to the availability of light at the place of the incident and the accused were not known to witnesses before the incident. The identification parade was conducted five months after the incident and the statement of the witnesses were recorded in the court after 3½ years. One witness failed to identify the accused in court and another failed to identify in the identification parade, but suspiciously identified the accused in court. The delay is conducting the identification parade without assigning any reason was held to be not3351 proper. Further, the witness having better chances of identifying the accused did not identify them and the injured witness who was riding the scooter when he was stated to be hit by the accused at night, identified the accused. In these circumstances, the identification of the accused was held improbable and the accused was acquitted.[1]

When an eyewitness has identified the accused by a general statement that all the accused persons standing in the dock are the culprits and the other eyewitness has not identified the accused, it would be difficult to sustain the conviction of the accused on the basis of identification by some of the witnesses in the court in the absence of any corroboration by way of the test identification parade.[2] When the complainant and his wife identified the accused persons in the court and they have sufficient time to closely observe the accused persons, merely because the test identification parade was not conducted properly, is no ground to discard their evidence.[3]

When there is no material to show that witnesses had any chance to see the suspect before the identification parade was held, the test identification parade held after the occurrence can be relied upon.[4]

The test identification parade held after more than 6 months from the date of occurrence and also from the subsequent arrest of the accused, cannot be relied upon when there is no plausible explanation regarding the inordinate delay in holding the identification parade. The accused cannot be convicted on the basis of such identification evidence, particularly when two co-accused had been acquitted on the same evidence.[5] Where the PWS did not give details of the accused in their s 161, CrPC statements, though they claimed to have identified the accused persons in full moon light at the time of the commission of dacoity, even in TI parade they did not describe the accused, the accused were arrested three months after the incident, identification of the accused appellants was found doubtful, they were acquitted of the charge under s 392, IPC .[6]

10. Test Identification of Accused not held--Effect

There is no legal impediment in convicting an accused on the basis of his identification at trial in the absence of test identification parade, provided that the court has good reasons to believe the evidence of identification at trial, particularly, when there is other corroborative evidence on record, direct or circumstantial. Further, the absence of test identification may not be fatal if the accused is known or sufficiently described in the complaint.[7] When the accused was identified by the complainant and even though no identification parade was conducted, the same cannot affect the case of prosecution.[8] Non-holding of test identification parade in3352 cases pertaining to robbery with an attempt to cause grievous hurt is neither fatal nor necessary.[9]

16. Accused Refusing to Join Test Identification Parade--Effect

It is true that the normal rule is that testimony of a witness, who does not know an accused from before and identifies him for the first time in the court as person who had participated in the commission of the crime, without holding a previous identification parade, does not carry much weight. The substantive evidence of a witness is the statement in court, but as a rule of prudence earlier identification proceedings are held in order to corroborate the testimony of a witness given in court as regards the identity of the accused who is not known to him from before. However, this normal rule can have no application. When the accused was kept baparda (with his face muffled) for holding test identification parade, but the accused himself refused to participate in the test identification parade, in such a case, the identification of the accused by the witness for the first time in the court can be relied upon.[10] When the complainant has not identified the accused in court, the mere refusal by the accused to participate in the test identification parade is not sufficient to convict the accused under s 392, IPC .[11]

17. Delay in Holding Test Identification Parade--Effect

The conduct of an identification parade belongs to the realm and is a part of the investigation. The evidence of test identification is admissible under s 9, Evidence Act. However, the value of the test identification apart from the other safeguards appropriate to a fair test of identification depends upon the promptitude in point of time with which the suspected persons are put up for test identification. If there is an unexplained and unreasonable delay in putting up the accused persons for test3353 identification, the delay by itself detracts from the credibility of the test. The test identification parade in the case was held after four months.[12] In view of the guidelines regarding appreciation of evidence in the matter of test identification parade, the Supreme Court has clearly observed that though there is no proposition of law like that, a test identification parade if it is delayed, cannot be relied upon, but what is required is that in such matter the courts are required to scrutinize the evidence cautiously. It has also been observed by the Apex Court that it could be a reason which may create doubts.[13]

In Soni v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[14] a test identification parade was held after a lapse of 42 days from the date of the arrest of the appellant. The delay in holding the test identification parade created a doubt on the genuineness thereof, apart from the fact that it may be difficult that after lapse of such a long time the witnesses would be remembering the facial expressions of the appellant. This court, therefore, held that if this evidence cannot be relied upon, there is no other evidence which can sustain the conviction of the appellant. In these circumstances the appellant was acquitted. The judgment is a short judgment of only one paragraph and conviction of the appellant in that case rested solely on his identification by the witnesses. There was no other evidence which proved the complicity of the appellant.

In Asif Ahmad v State of Chhattisgarh ,[15] the unexplained delay of 46 days in holding the test identification parade of the accused was held fatal, when the parade was conducted in jail premises in open verandah and when news regarding arrest of all accused persons was published in all the newspapers.

In Subhash v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[16] the test identification parade was held three weeks after the arrest of the appellant. There was, therefore, a room for doubt as to whether the delay in holding the test identification parade was in order to enable the identifying witnesses to see him in the police lock-up or in the jail premises and make a note of his features. The court also noticed that four months had elapsed between the date of occurrence and the date of holding of the test identification parade. The descriptive particulars of the appellant were not given when the report was lodged. But while deposing before the sessions judge, the witnesses had stated that the appellant was a tall person and had sallow complexion. If on account of these features the witnesses were able to identify appellant, Shiv Shankar, at the identification parade, they would have certainly mentioned about them at the earliest point of time when his face was fresh in their memory. As the conviction of the appellant was based solely on the identification at the test identification parade, the Supreme Court gave to him the benefit of doubt, while upholding the conviction of the co-accused. This is also a case where the conviction of the appellant was based solely on the evidence of identification. There being a delay in holding the test identification parade and in the absence of corroborative evidence this court found it unsafe to uphold his conviction.

In Rajesh Govind Jagesha v State of Maharashtra ,[17] accused no 2 was arrested on 20 January 1993, but the identification parade was held on 13 February 1993. It was also not disputed that at the time of identification parade the appellant was not having3354 beard and long hair as mentioned at the time of lodging of the FIR. It was also not disputed that no person with beard and long hair was included in the parade. The witnesses were alleged to have identified accused no 2 at the first sight despite the fact that he had removed his long hair and beard. The Supreme Court held that the magistrate should have associated 1-2 persons having resemblance with the persons described in the FIR and why it was not done was a mystery shrouded with doubts and not cleared by the prosecution. In these circumstances, the court observed that the possibility of the witnesses having seen the accused between the date of arrest and the test identification parade cannot be ruled out. This case also rests on its own facts, and mere delay in holding the test identification parade was not the sole reason for rejecting the identification. In Delhi Administration v Bal Krishan ,[18] it was held that it cannot be laid down as a proposition of law that after a lapse of a long period, witnesses would, in no case, be able to identify the dacoits they had seen in the course of a dacoity committed during the night. However, the courts will have to be extremely cautious when such evidence is before them. In Vikram Singh v Raj Singh ,[19] the Supreme Court held that in the absence of anything to indicate that the accused were shown to the witnesses, the test identification parade held after a month of the arrest of the accused could not be rejected. In Bharat Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[20] the Supreme Court held that although it is desirable to hold identification parade at the earliest opportunity, when there is a delay of three months in holding the identification parade, it is the duty of the accused to cross-examine the police officer who conducted the investigation and the magistrate who held the parade, if the accused wishes to take advantage out of such undue delay. In Daya Singh v State of Haryana ,[21] the Supreme Court held that the identification of the accused in court after seven or eight years would not affect the evidence of the eye-witnesses, where the trial was delayed for one or the other reason in a case where it was apparent that the witnesses had gained an enduring impression of the accused during the incident. It will thus be seen that the evidence of identification has to be considered in the peculiar facts and circumstances of each case. Though it is desirable to hold the test identification parade at the earliest possible opportunity, no hard and fast rule can be laid down in this regard. If the delay is inordinate and there is evidence probablising the possibility of the accused having been shown to the witnesses, the court may not act on the basis of such evidence. Moreover, cases where the conviction is based not solely on the basis of identification in court, but on the basis of other corroborative evidence, such as recovery of looted articles, stand on a different footing and the court has to consider the evidence in its entirety.[22]

18. Factum of Light and Identification Evidence

In cases resting on identification evidence, the burden is on the prosecution to prove that there was sufficient light wherein the victim and witnesses identified the miscreants. No presumption can be raised about sufficiency of light. The question of demolishing the factum of light by the accused arises only when the prosecution has established the presence of light.[23]3355

Where the complainant was robbed on a street by three persons when it was dark, and there was no mention of the fact that he had seen their faces in the head-light of a truck in his parcha bayan or police statement, and the accused were arrested after three years from the date of incidence, and they were not kept baparda and also their photos were flashed in newspaper, their identification by the victim was held to be doubtful and conviction cannot be based on it.[24]

20. Identification of Case Property

The plea that the identity of the currency notes found must tally with the stolen notes before a conviction can be recorded is not tenable.[25]

The identification of case property in the court without test identification does not render the identification inadmissible. The weight to be attached to such identification is a matter to be decided by a court of fact.[26] When nothing has been stated by the investigating officer that ornaments were sealed at the time of recovery and so the test identification of case property was not reliable, but this does not make a difference to the overall weight of evidence of witnesses as it is in the prosecution's favour.[27] When the identity of the accused person to the persons responsible for committing the alleged robbery has not been established nor the identity of the stolen property has been established to be the stolen property of that robbery, the conviction of the accused under s 392 read with 397, IPC, is liable to be set aside.[28]

The identification of stolen articles by the owner or the persons who have the opportunity to see them very often cannot be discarded merely on the ground that no special identification marks were there on the said ornaments. It is so, because such persons can identify the articles by feel, touch or by other distinguishing features, though they may not be able to formulate the reasons since identification is based on the untranslatable impression of their minds.[29] When the test identification of the accused is liable to be ignored on account of doubt about its fairness and the test identification of case property has to be discarded because the investigating officer has not stated that the ornaments, i.e., the case property were sealed at the time of recovery, but, if it is established by other reliable evidence beyond doubt that it was the accused who looted these ornaments from the victim in her house at knife point threatening to kill her, the accused is liable to be convicted under s 392 read with 397, IPC .[30]3356

21. Doubtful Recovery of Stolen Articles

When the witnesses to recovery turned hostile and did not support the prosecution case, and the accused denied the aspect of having made the disclosure statement on the basis of which recovery was allegedly made, the houses from where recovery was made, were not proved to be the houses of the accused and the recoveries were made after a long lapse of time, under these circumstances, the recovery and identification of stolen articles is doubtful.[31]

22. Recovery of Property Looted-Non-Joining of Public Witnesses

Where the arresting officer deposes that he made effort to search/join public witness to the recovery, but none was prepared to be a public witnesses, the evidence of the police officials about the recovery of the looted property was reliable, the non-joining of public witness to the recovery would be of no effect.[32]

25. Separate Trial

Where persons were convicted on three different and distinct charges for three separate and distinct robberies committed on the same night in three different houses, it was held that they must be tried separately for each of the said charges.[33]

26. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about theday of, at, committed theft of (specify the property) and, in committing theft (or in order to commit the theft or in carrying away (or attempting to carry away) the said property), voluntarily caused (or attempted to cause) death of (name the person) (or hurt, or wrongful restraint) (or fear of instant death, or of instant hurt, or of instant wrongful restraint, to (name the person) [or committed extortion on AB by putting the said AB (or CD) in fear of instant death (or of instant hurt, or of instant wrongful restraint) and that you were in the presence of the said AB at the time of committing extortion and induced the said AB then and there to deliver up (name the property)], and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 392 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

It is to be noted that in the case of a robbery committed on a highway between sunset and sunrise, this fact must be mentioned in the charge.3357

27. Burden of Proof

If the prosecution evidence in a case under s 392, IPC is insufficient by itself to justify a conviction, the mere fact that the accused in his statement adopted a story which was not believed by the court, would not remedy the defect. The prosecution cannot fill up the gap in the evidence by the statement of the accused,[34] nor can infirmities of the defence, if any, be taken advantage of.[35] Where the accused was not named in the FIR and the identifying witness was not found reliable as having already seen the accused at the police station, and the money recovered from the accused was not of the same value as alleged to be looted, it was held that there was no proof beyond reasonable doubt.[36]

28. Proof

To secure a conviction under this section, the prosecution must prove:

(a) in the case of a robbery by theft,[37] that:

(1) the offender voluntarily caused, or attempted to cause, to any person:

(i) death, or hurt, or wrongful restraint, or
(ii) fear of instant death, or of hurt, or of wrongful restraint; and

(2) the above was done that end, namely:

(i) in order to the committing of the theft, or
(ii) in committing the theft, or
(iii) in carrying away, or in attempting to carry away, property obtained by the theft;

(b) in the case of a robbery by extortion, that:

(1) extortion, as defined in s 383, IPC, was committed;
(2) the offender, at the time of committing extortion, was in the presence of the person put in fear;
(3) extortion was committed by putting that person in fear of instant death, or of hurt; or of wrongful restraint, to that person or to some other person; and
(4) by so putting the person in fear; he was induced to deliver up then and there the thing extorted.

In robbery cases, proof is adduced in the form of evidence relating to the identification of the accused or of the property recovered from his possession or on being pointed by him towards recovery. No importance can be attached to minor omissions. Non-mentioning of car number by the witness would be no ground to disbelieve the recovery memo.[38] Where the appellant accused admitted that he along with co-accused demanded money from the deceased at knife point and that a sum of Rs 6290/- was recovered from him by the police, this amount was part of Rs 8000/-3358 which fell out from the pocket of the deceased, was picked up by him from the ground, the conviction of the appellant accused under s 392, IPC was upheld.[39]

29. Presumption under Illustration (A) to Section 114, Indian Evidence Act 1872

Illustration (a) to s 114 of the Evidence Act provides that a presumption arises when a man is in possession of stolen goods, soon after the theft, he is either the thief or has received the goods knowing then to be stolen, unless he can account for his possession. Presumption of facts are assumptions resulting from one's experience in the course of the natural events of human conduct and character, and all those which one is entitled to make use of or has to make use of in the ordinary course of life, as well as the business of courts.[40]

The question, whether a presumption under illust (a) to s 114 of the Evidence Act, should be drawn, is a matter which depends on the evidence and the circumstances of each case, the nature of the recovered articles, the manner of their acquisition, the nature of their identification, the manner in which the articles were dealt with by the accused, the place and the circumstances of their recovery, the length of the intervening period and the ability of the accused to explain the recovery.[41] Recent and unexplained possession of stolen articles can well be presumptive evidence of the charge even of murder committed at the robbery.[42]

When a charge of murder on the accused is established, in a murder, and robbery case, the presumption under illust (a) to s 114, Evidence Act, may also arise that accused committed robbery of the stolen property.[43]

31. Acquittal

Where, in the absence of the owner of a factory, some excise officers illegally seized some account books which he afterwards forcibly recovered from their possession, it was held that the owner committed no offence under s 392, IPC .[44] When the identification of the accused by the witness is doubtful and no incriminating articles are seized from the accused, the conviction of the accused merely because he was found in the company of the other co-accused and tried to run away after seeing the police, is not proper.[45]3359

Prosecution case was that five persons including the appellant accused persons armed with lathi, revolver and knife entered the temple, tied the priest (complainant) of the temple with rope and took away collection box. Admittedly no injury was caused to the complainant. The testimony of the complainant and the sole witness examined in the case was inconsistent and contradictory. Conviction of the appellant accused under ss 452, 392 and 397, IPC was set aside.[46]

When the witnesses to recovery turned hostile and did not support the prosecution case, and the accused denied the aspect of having made the disclosure statement on the basis of which recovery was allegedly made, the houses from where recovery was made were not proved to be the houses of the accused,and the recoveries were made after a long lapse of time, under these circumstances, the recovery and identification of stolen articles is doubtful.[47] Appellant accused was alleged to have committed murder of the deceased and robbed her gold ornaments. Evidence showed that the accused was present in the funeral ceremony of the deceased. Motive was also not proved. No test identification parade of the recovered gold ornaments was held. Accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 302, 392 read with s 397, IPC .[48]

Appellant A1, A2 accused were alleged to have robbed a woman of her ornaments and committed her murder by drowning her. The evidence relied upon was the recovery of ornaments and the fact that the accused appellants were seen near the place of occurrence. The two circumstances were found not sufficient to record the conviction of the accused appellants, their conviction under ss 392 and 302, IPC was set aside.[49]

There were material contradictions in the evidence of the prosecution witnesses. The participation of the appellant in robbery was not proved beyond reasonable doubt. Accused was acquitted of the charge under s 390, IPC .[50]

The prosecution witnesses did not describe the appellant accused either in their statement recorded under s 161, CrPC or prior to holding of TI Parade before the Magistrate. Although, they claimed in their testimonies, that they had seen the appellant in the full moon light, but this fact was not mentioned by them in their statements recorded under s 161 CrPC The identification of appellant accused in TI parade was highly doubtful. He was acquitted of the charges under ss 399, 392 and s 307 read with s 149, IPC .[51]

32. Conviction

The accused persons posed themselves as officers attached to the detective department. On the strength of a police belt and police monogram, they looted certain articles from the complainant. The stolen articles, one police belt and monogram, were recovered from the accused. The evidence of the complainant was found to be clear and cogent and was corroborated by evidence of other witnesses. The conviction of the accused3360 under ss 170 and 392 read with s 34, IPC, was found proper.[52] Articles looted in the robbery were recovered from the possession of the accused, the recovered articles were identified by the complainant as articles of theft. The accused could not furnish an explanation as to how he came into possession of articles recovered from his possession. Accused was convicted for offences under ss 392 and 302, IPC .[53] Accused persons and deceased were travelling in the same tractor. The accused persons robbed him and threw him in the canal. The deceased even after being thrown in the canal tried to save himself desperately. He wanted to come out of the canal by catching the grass. He was kicked on the face and again thrown in the canal. The fact that he was in an inebriated condition was not in dispute. He could not swim to the shore to save his life. Accused appellant was convicted under ss 302 and 392, IPC .[54] Victim was travelling in TSR. Accused driver of the TSR along with three other co-accused robbed the victim of his valuables at knife point, pushed down the victim and tried to flee away, but after chase was arrested. Valuables of the victim and the offending weapon knife were recovered from his possession. Accused in furtherance of common intention with other co-accused committed the offence. Conviction under ss 392 / 34 and 397 / 34, IPC was held proper.[55] The accused appellant robbed the deceased of money and tractor and after committing robbery threw the deceased and one more person into canal. On the basis of the disclosure statement made by the accused, the dead body of the deceased was recovered from the place of occurrence, the tractor and 'Barma' belonging to the deceased were recovered from the possession of the accused. The case of the prosecution against the accused appellants was held to be proved beyond reasonable doubt, the accused appellants were convicted for offences under s 392 read with s 397, IPC, sentence of seven years RI was imposed.[56]

The evidence of the victim, her husband, the factum of recovery of the vehicle used in the commission of offence clearly established the commission of offence by the appellants, on a public road, not a highway, committed during sunset and sunrise that is, at about 9.00 p.m. At that time when PW2 and PW3 were going on scooter, the accused appellants intercepted the victim and robbed cash, and ornaments on point of knife. The conviction of the appellants under s 392, IPC was upheld.[57] In the instant case the accused appellant with motive to rob the deceased of her ornaments, on the pretext of taking the deceased to Chikamangalur, took her in the taxi, on way committed her murder and robbed her of her ornaments and valuables. Circumstantial evidence, the recovery of the dead body and gold jewellery of the deceased on the pointing out of the accused proved the case beyond reasonable doubt. However, death sentence awarded by the courts below was converted into life imprisonment.

Accused A1 along with some others armed with weapons entered the house of the complainant PW1, inflicted knife injuries and looted articles. The prosecution evidence established that the gathering of mob outside the house of PW1 was an3361 unlawful assembly, which was armed with deadly weapons. The same would clearly fall within the ambit of ss 141 and 148, IPC . Accused A1 was convicted for offences under ss 148, 392 and 452, IPC .[58]

Circumstantial Evidence--Robbery and Murder--Conviction upheld

The prosecution case was that the four appellant accused persons robbed the deceased of her jewellery and murdered her in the field. There was evidence of the eye-witnesses that they had seen appellants accused coming out of the field of the deceased. There was also recovery of the jewellery. The witnesses also identified the appellants accused in test identification parade. Omission of the jewels in details in FIR was held of no consequence. Appellants accused persons were convicted under ss 392 and 302, IPC .[59]

33. Acquittal of Some Accused and Conviction of Other

Where the evidence on record was not attributing any overt act on the part of two co-accused persons except bare allegation of their presence at the time of occurrence, and their involvement in alleged crime was doubtful, they are held entitled to acquittal under s 392 . However, evidence established that the main accused committed robbery of Rs 2,000/- by putting the victim to instant fear of death by putting (bhujali) weapon at his neck, he alone would be liable to be convicted under s 392 .[60]

34. Accused Convicted under Section 394 cannot be Convicted under Section 392

The offence of simple robbery is punishable under s 392 and that of robbery accompanied by hurt, under s 394 . When the accused is convicted under s 394 he should not be convicted under s 392, for the offence under s 392 is a minor offence in relation to the offence under s 394, and all the ingredients of the offence punishable under s 392 are covered in the offence under s 394, IPC .[61]

35. Accused Convicted for Robbery cannot be Convicted for Theft

Commentary under the same heading in s 380, ante, may be referred to.

36. Double Conviction

Where the accused entered the garden of the complainant and threatened to kill the farm servant, who was on watch, and then made away with the complainant's property leaving the servant tied up hand and foot, it was held that they could not be convicted of wrongful confinement in addition to robbery. They could be convicted only under s 392, IPC .[62] Theft and taking and retention of stolen goods form one and the same offence and cannot be punished separately. On conviction and sentence3362 under s 392, the conviction and sentence under s 441, IPC, cannot be sustained.[63] An offence under s 392 is a lesser offence in relation to s 395, IPC, and the accused can be convicted under the latter section.[64]

A person, who commits robbery being armed with a sword, for which he has no licence, can be convicted of robbery and of carrying arms without licence and sentenced separately.[65] If an accused, while carrying away the stolen property, is apprehended by the owner of the property and thereupon he (i.e., accused) strikes him (i.e., owner of the property) with a knife and kills him, he can be convicted both under ss 392 and 302, IPC .[66]

37. Sentence

It is well-settled that the question of sentence is primarily a question of discretion of the trial court and unless that discretion has been capriciously exercised and the sentence awarded is manifestly inadequate, the appellate court would not be justified in enhancing it. A sentence of 5 years rigorous imprisonment for offence under s 392, IPC, awarded by the trial court can by no stretch be castigated as one which is unduly lenient or inadequate.[67]

The accused, a student of eleventh standard in a higher secondary school, appeared to have fallen in bad company and along with another person robbed a person of his wrist watch. The accused was 20/22 years old and was in jail for about 8 months. On these facts, the sentence of the accused was reduced from 2 years of imprisonment to the one already undergone.[68]

Where the appellant was a young man of 32 years of age and he had a previous conviction of a similar nature to his discredit, and the looted property was returned soon after the commission of the offence, it was held that the ends of justice would be met if the sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment is reduced to a term of three years rigorous imprisonment.[69] However, a sentence of seven years awarded to an accused, involved in a robbery committed on a highway between sunset and sunrise, which must, in all cases, be considered as a very serious crime, is not excessive.[70]

However, in a highway robbery where a taxi-driver was robbed of cash and a wristwatch though the sentence of three months and 17 days rigorous imprisonment imposed by the trial court under s 392 read with s 34, IPC, was found ridiculously and shockingly inadequate but since the accused had already undergone the custody for 3 months and 17 days, the offence was committed 11½ years ago and no overt act was attributed to the accused, the sentence was enhanced from a period of 3 months and 17 days rigorous imprisonment (period already undergone) by the accused in a manner that an additional fine of Rs 8000 was imposed and in default to undergo imprisonment for one year.[71]3363

38. Concurrent Sentence

The fact that the accused was already undergoing sentence in respect of two other offences is no ground to direct that the sentence in the offence of robbery would run concurrently with the sentence in respect of other offences.[72]

39. Alteration of Conviction from Section 392 read with Section 397 to Section 392

Commentary under the headings in s 397, post, may be referred to.

40. Alteration of Conviction from Section 392 to one under Section 411

Where the complainant in his evidence has not identified the accused person as the person who threatened him while taking the scooter from him at gun point but the recovery of the scooter from the possession of the accused was established, the conviction of the accused under s 392 read with s 34 was altered to one under s 411, IPC .[73]It is true that in cases where the recovery has been immediately effected, the court can draw an inference under illust (a) to s 114 of the Evidence Act and convict the accused for the substantive offence of theft or robbery or dacoity or dacoity with murder, etc, as the case may be. However, in a case where the recovery is not immediate and is affected after six days of the incident and identity of the accused is not established, the conviction of the accused is liable to be altered from s 392 to s 411, IPC .[74]

41. Alteration of Conviction from Section 392 read with Section 397 to one under Section 411

Commentary under the same heading in s 397, post, may be referred to.

42. Alteration of Conviction from Section 392 read with Section 397 to one under Section 412

Commentary under the headings in s 397, post, may be referred to.

43. Alteration of Conviction from Section 395 to one under Section 392

If it is not adequately proved that five or more persons had taken part in committing the robbery, the offence will not be converted into a dacoity.[75] Where, out of six persons put up for trial under s 395, IPC, three were acquitted, the conviction of the remaining three was altered from dacoity to one of robbery.[76]3364

If seven persons are charged for the offence of dacoity and six of them are acquitted as no case is made out against them, the conviction of the seventh accused as a dacoit cannot also be sustained.[77]

Where four out of the five accused persons were acquitted, the conviction of the remaining one accused under s 395 was not found proper and so was altered from s 395 to one under s 392, IPC .[78]

The allegation as per the prosecution case was that five accused persons robbed the complainant of his wrist watch and currency notes and ran away. Two of the five accused were acquitted. Therefore, it was not proper to convict the remaining three accused under s 395, IPC . Their conviction was altered from s 395 to one under s 392, IPC .[79] When the five accused were charged under s 395 but four out of them were acquitted, the conviction of the fifth accused under s 395, IPC, was set as side and instead he was convicted under s 392, IPC .[80]

44. Alteration of Conviction from Section 392 to one under Section 379

Where the accused pushed the complainant and took away his goat, the conviction of the accused under s 392, IPC, is liable to be altered to one under s 379, IPC, because the mere fact of pushing the complainant does not constitute the offence of wrongful restraint.[81]

45. Alteration of Conviction from Section 394 to one under Section 392

The prosecution case was that B and C robbed P and caused abrasions on him by a knife. The doctor's evidence showed that the abrasions were caused by a blunt object. The trial court held that the abrasions were caused when P was pushed in the bush by B and C and convicted B and C under s 394 read with s 34, IPC . Holding that such conclusion could not reasonably be drawn in favour of the prosecution when that was not the case of the prosecution itself, the High Court altered the conviction of B and C from one under s 394 read with s 34 to one under s 392 read with s 34, IPC .[82]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 393.

Attempt to commit robbery.--

Whoever attempts to commit robbery shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

Attempts for offences under the IPC are punishable under s 511, IPC where no express provision is made for punishment of such attempts. This section expressly3365 provides for punishment for an attempt to commit robbery. Section 511 would not apply to it. Robbery stands on a different footing from dacoity in this respect as an attempt at dacoity is punishable as a dacoity.

2. 'Attempts'

Commentary under the related headings in s 511, post, may be referred to.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate,etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the..day of at attempted to commit robbery (mention the facts constituting the attempts) on AB and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 393 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Where the accused were charged with offences under s 393 (attempt to rob), s 394 (for robbery) on the same night, at one place, and under s 397, for a robbery at another place while armed with deadly weapons, it was held that the charges under ss 393, 394 and 397, IPC, could not be joined unless they formed parts of the same transaction and, therefore, there was a misjoinder of charges.[83]

5. Section 393 and Section 398 --Cases

The incident had taken place at about 7 am. The two appellants ran away when the witnesses reached the spot and were apprehended. After being apprehended, they were taken to the police station, where they were arrested. In such a case, there can be no doubt about the identity and therefore, the objection of the appellants based on the identification parade cannot be sustained. It is not a case where the appellants had succeeded in obtaining the property. They were unfortunately apprehended before they could succeed. That is the reason why they have been charged for attempt to commit robbery under ss 393 and 398, IPC . Nothing, therefore, turns on the absence of seizure of stolen property from their possession. The conviction of the accused was found proper.[84] The accused armed with a pistol tried to commit robbery, the hue and cry was raised by the inmates of the house. The accused fired a shot in the air. The accused was apprehended on the spot along with a pistol by neighbours and passerbys. Therefore, the question of identity of the accused did not arise as all the three witnesses have consistently deposed that the accused was armed with a deadly weapon, i.e., pistol, tried to commit robbery. The conviction of the accused under s 393 read with s 398, IPC, was upheld.[85] Where the appellant accused attempted to loot the informant at the point of dagger, PWS identified him and caught him3366 red-handed, and after seeing police, he attempted to run away, his conviction under ss 393 and 397, IPC was held proper.[86]

The very identification of the accused appellant was doubtful. The accused appellant was convicted solely on the evidence that the murder weapon which had been recovered at his instance had been matched with the bullet recovered from the dead body. Recovery of offence weapon was itself doubtful. The case of the acquitted co-accused was similar. The accused appellant was also acquitted of the charges under ss 393, 398 and 302, IPC .[87]

6. Sentence

Where the accused was aged about 18 years and no criminal antecedents were alleged against him, he was already in jail for 18½ months, the sentence of 3 years rigorous imprisonment was reduced to the period of custody already undergone by him.[88]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 394.

Voluntarily causing hurt in committing robbery.--

If any person, in committing or in attempting to commit robbery, voluntarily causes hurt, such person, and any other person jointly concerned in committing or attempting to commit such robbery, shall be punished with imprisonment for life, or with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.3367

Comments

1. Scope

This section applied to cases where, during the course of robbery, voluntary hurt is caused.[89] There may be a dacoity without hurt being caused, but in the case of an offence under this section, hurt is one of the essential elements and if no hurt is caused, no offence would be made out.[90] However, even if hurt is caused voluntarily, no offence under this section is committed where the victim does not offer resistance against the dispossession of movables during the course of robbery.[91] Similarly, no conviction can be sustained under this section if there is no convincing evidence that the ears of the victim were chopped off before her death. To attract the applicability of this section, hurt must be caused to a living person. If, after death, her ears were chopped off for removing the ornaments from her body, the accused cannot be held guilty under this section.[92] Where the accused caught hold of the complainant and brought him down from his horse and beat him with fists and kicks and two of them deprived him of his watch and Rs 40 in cash, it was observed that giving a beating to the complainant and making him fall down from the horse were certainly acts which facilitated the commission of the theft and, therefore, their conviction under s 394, IPC, was proper.[93] Where the accused while committing robbery, beat the complainant with stones and used bows and arrows, which they carried as the conventional weapons of the community to which they belonged, only when they were chased, but none of the chasers were injured, it was held that they could be guilty only under s 394 simpliciter, and not under ss 394 / 397, IPC .[94] Where the accused financiers forcibly removed the vehicle from the possession of the complainant on default in payment of installments, the accused did not resort to arbitration clause provided in the hypothecation deed, held the accused committed offence under s 304, IPC .[95]

PW4 had categorically stated that she knew the accused J six years prior to the incident. He had come to their house many times. Therefore, there was no difficulty in identifying accused J and naming him in the first information report. The conviction of the accused for offences under ss 394 and 302, IPC was held proper.[96]Section 394 describes punishment for voluntarily causing hurt in committing or attempting to commit robbery. The offence under this section is more serious offence than one under s 392 . Section 394 postulates and contemplates the causing of harm during commission of robbery or in attempting to commit robbery when such causing of hurt is hardly necessary to facilitate the commission of robbery. Section 394 applies to cases where during the course of robbery voluntary hurt is caused. Section 394 classifies two distinct class of persons. Firstly, those who actually cause hurt and secondly, those who do not actually cause hurt but are "jointly concerned" in the commission of offence of robbery. The second class of persons may not be concerned in the causing of hurt, but they become liable independently of the knowledge of its likelihood or a reasonable belief in its probability.[97]3368

2. Section 392, Section 394 and Section 397 Compared

In cases of robbery, the legislature has provided three different degrees of punishment which may be inflicted. Under s 392, IPC, the punishment may be extended to fourteen years imprisonment. Under s 394, IPC, the punishment may be extended to imprisonment for life, and under s 397, IPC, the punishment cannot be less than seven years. Section 392 is the general section, and the other two sections specify the same offence under aggravated circumstances. With reference to s 394, it is for the magistrate in the exercise of his discretion to decide whether he will dispose of the case himself or commit the accused to the sessions court. Under s 397, the effect of a sentence of imprisonment of not less than seven years being provided takes the case out of the jurisdiction of the magistrate.[1] If a magistrate finds that an accused has caused grievous hurt in committing robbery, he is bound to commit him to the court of sessions under s 397 and has no discretion to the contrary. It is illegal to treat the grievous hurt as a simple hurt and convict the accused under s 394 .[2]

The jurisdiction of a magistrate to try an accused under s 394, IPC, is, however, not ousted by the fact that the accused is also liable to be charged under s 397, IPC .[3]

3. Doubtful Recovery of Stolen Articles

Commentary under the same heading in s 392, ante, may be referred to.

4. 'Jointly Concerned'

Under this section, not only the persons, who cause hurt, are liable, but also the persons, who are jointly concerned in committing or attempting to commit a robbery are made punishable.[4] To constitute an offence under s 394, IPC, violence or hurt must be caused by a person while he is committing, or attempting to commit, a robbery. Other persons, who join him in committing such robbery, are also liable for the offences of robbery. Merely because one person removed the money from the pocket of the complainant does not mean that it was his solitary act, not connected with the offence in question, for which he alone should be held guilty, and not the others.[5] Similarly, where, out of four persons, who committed robbery two went about bullying and ill-treating the inmates and two kept guard on house tops, and one of those who were on the house tops fired a gun and killed one of the villagers, it was held that all the accused were guilty under this section.[6] Even if an accused is not a direct participant in a dacoity, he can be convicted under s 395, IPC, if he allows his vehicle to be used by the dacoits with knowledge to the effect that they have returned with the booty.[7]

5. Quashing of FIR

A large number of cases are coming before the court where the complaints against the police personnel are that they are robbing persons or extracting money from them3369 forcibly. The duty of police personnel is to protect the public and not loot them. The court should take a serious view against police personnel who are committing dacoity or theft against people. Thus, where the FIR showed that the two GRP personnel beat up and robbed a sum of Rs 50 from the complainant and they also robbed other persons, the Division Bench of the High Court of Allahabad declined to quash the FIR and dismissed the writ petition filed by the two GRP officials against the FIR.[8]

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

13. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate,etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the..day of., at., voluntarily caused hurt to AB in committing (or in attempting to commit robbery or were jointly concerned with any other person in doing so, and thereby committing an offence, punishable under s 394 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

The error in the charge of mentioning of wrong timing of occurrence does not vitiate the trial, particularly when the accused knew from the very beginning as to what charge he was facing.[9]3370

14. Accused Charged under Sections 394 / 34 can be Convicted under Section 394

The accused charged under s 394 read with s 34, IPC, can be convicted under s 394, IPC, particularly when no argument/objective to such conviction is made before the magistrate or before the additional sessions judge and no prejudice is caused to the accused persons.[10]

15. Accused Charged under Section 394 can be Convicted under Section 326

On reading ss 319 and 320, IPC, there can be no doubt that 'hurt' includes 'grievous hut'. If a person by voluntarily causing hurt in committing or in attempt to commit robbery can be convicted under s 394, IPC, it becomes incomprehensible that he will escape from the mischief of that section if he commits robbery and voluntarily causes grievous hurt to the victim, while committing or attempting to commit robbery, so it has to be held that the offence of grievous hurt under s 326 is included in s 394, IPC . Therefore, by application of s 222(1), CrPC 1973, an accused charged with the offence under s 394 can be convicted under s 326 although no charge under s 326, IPC, was framed against the accused.[11]

16. Proof

To secure a conviction under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed, or attempted to commit, robbery; and
(b) the accused (or someone jointly concerned in doing so) caused hurt;
(c) the hurt was caused voluntarily.[12]

Non-production of weapon before court or non-examination of medical officer is irrelevant. The non-examination of officer who effected seizure of articles or effected panchanama of the spot is also not material.[13] The allegation against the accused were that after giving two lathi blows to the complainant from behind and after snatching the crippling gold chain from around the neck of the complainant, the accused tried to flee away. The gold chain with its hard hooks could not have been snatched away from around the neck without causing injury. The complainant did not suffer any injury around his neck. The theory of chain-snatching was found doubtful and so was not believed.[14]

Prosecution story was that the accused respondent committed murder of the deceased, amputated her legs and took away her silver anklets. Case was of circumstantial evidence. Evidence of last seen was found not reliable as such rejected. Prosecution evidence as to the time of the occurrence was scanty. The recovery of khurpi offence weapon was also found doubtful. Acquittal of the accused respondent for offences under ss 394 and 302, IPC was upheld.[15]3371

Prosecution case was that the appellant accused assaulted the complainant with iron rod on head, caused injuries and looted bag which contained gold items and cash. The looted articles and the cycle used by the accused in the commission of offence were recovered on the disclosure statements made by the appellant accused, he was also identified by the injured in the TI parade. Conviction of the appellant accused under s 394, IPC was held justified.[16]

Accused persons armed with weapons entered the bank premises. Members of the public apprehended the accused when they tried to flee away on alarm. Weapons were also recovered from the accused persons. The Bank Manager had no reason to depose against accused appellants. Conviction of the accused under s 393 / 34, IPC was upheld.[17]

17. Notes on the Site Plan

The notes on the site plan prepared by the investigating officer in accordance with the various situations pointed out to him by the witnesss are statements recorded by the police officer in the course of investigation, and are hit by s 162 . These notes can be used only for the purpose of contradicting the prosecution witnesses concerned in accordance with the provisions of s 145, Evidence Act, and for no other purposes. Therefore, where this was not done, and the witnesses were never confronted and contradicted with this record, the notes on that site plan cannot be used to contradict the account given by the witnesses in court in regard to the distances from which they saw the occurrence.[18]

18. Plea of Alibi

The plea of alibi involves a question of fact and when both the courts below concurrently found that fact against the accused, the Supreme Court cannot, on an appeal by special leave, go behind that concurrent finding of fact.[19] Plea of alibi is not tenable particularly when duty register and duty certificate of the department in question were not produced and defence witnesses were not creditworthy.[20]

19. Non-examination of the Investigating Officer

It is always desirable for the prosecution to examine the investigating officer. However, non-examination of the investigating officer is not fatal to the prosecution case, nor is it a ground to disbelieve the ocular witnesses.[21]3372

20. Acquittal

Discovery of loose silver coin at the instance of the accused without the evidence of identification of the said coin as stolen property is not sufficient for conviction under s 394 .[22]

There was evidence that at the time of arrest, appellants accused were brought to the hospital and shown to PW4. The test identification parade was really of no consequence because the appellant M had already been shown to the witnesses. That being only piece of material which was used for conviction of M, conviction was not sustainable, the conviction of the accused M for offences under ss 394 and 302, IPC was set aside.[23]

The prosecution failed to prove charge under s 394, IPC against the appellant accused beyond reasonable doubt. Recovery made did not inspire confidence, TI parade report did not corroborate the prosecution case. Accused was acquitted of the charge under s 394, IPC .[24]

21. Conviction

The two appellants accused had snatched a cash box containing Rs. 5 lakhs from the complainant who had withdrawn the amount from the bank. The appellants fired at the witnesses and snatched the gun of the gunner. After chase the two appellants along with the looted cash and gun of the gunner were arrested. The witnesses identified the two appellants. Their conviction under ss 394 read with s 397, IPC was upheld.[25]

22. Double Conviction

A person, who has been convicted and sentenced under s 394, cannot be further convicted and sentenced under s 324, IPC . Likewise, an offence punishable under s 394 necessarily includes the offence punishable under s 392, and a person, who is convicted under both the sections, can be legally sentenced only under s 394, IPC . A sentence cannot be passed under both the sections.[26] Where, however, a gang of four robbers, armed with deadly weapons, raided a house and went fully prepared to commit murder in the event of resistance and two of them actually killed one person, it was held that each of the robbers was equally guilty of the offence of murder and were rightly sentenced under ss 302 and 394, IPC .[27]

23. Accused Convicted under Section 394 cannot be Convicted under Section 392

Commentary under the same heading in s 392, ante, may be referred to.

24. Probation

A convict convicted for an offence under s 394, IPC, cannot derive the benefits of s 4(1) of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958, so as to entitle him to be released on probation of good conduct.[28]3373

25. Sentence

The question of sentence is a matter of discretion and it is well-settled that when discretion has been properly exercised by the trial court along accepted judicial lines, the appellate court should not interfere, except in cases where strong reasons persists.[29]

Sentence of four years rigorous imprisonment to a young accused aged 22 years is neither excessive nor unreasonable.[30] When the accused was aged about 23 years at the time of the incident, having no criminal antecedents and the offence was committed 13 years ago, the sentence of the accused was reduced from seven years rigorous imprisonment to three years rigorous imprisonment.[31] The accused were aged about 22 and 23 years old at the time of occurrence and they did not assault any one of the witnesses except two simple injuries received by one person, and the accused persons had no antecedents and they were not hardened criminals which is why the sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment was reduced to four years rigorous imprisonment.[32]

Consecutive sentences in respect of convictions under ss 394 and 397, based on the same set of facts, would be illegal and the case would be covered by s 71, IPC .[33]

Section 6 of the Probation of Offender Act rules out the benefit of the provisions of the Act being given to a person who is guilty of having committed an offence punishable with life imprisonment or death. Since the offence under s 394, IPC, is punishable with life imprisonment as such the benefit of probation cannot be extended to the accused.[34] In a case where the accused were convicted under s 394, IPC, the request of defence to let out them on probation of good conduct or to send them to borstel school was declined by the Apex Court.[35]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 395.

Punishment for dacoity.--

Whoever commits dacoity shall be punished with imprisonment for life, or with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The ingredients of the offence of dacoity and the various aspects of the requirements for committing the offence have been discussed under s 391, IPC . This section provides simply for the punishment for the offence. The section is to be read along with ss 397 and 398, IPC which prescribe the minimum sentence for the offences. In the case of an attempt at dacoity and of causing grievous hurt, the offence would be under s 395, and not under ss 395 / 511, IPC .[36]3375

2. Mandatory Requirement

The perusal of s 395, IPC reveals that it is mandatory that there must be 5 or more persons to commit the robbery. In other words, there must be 5 or more persons and injuries should have been caused to the injured.[37] In dacoity six or seven persons were alleged to have committed offence, the conviction of the sole appellant for offence under s 395, IPC was held not legal exercise. Conviction of the sole appellant recorded by court below was set aside.[38]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable exclusively by the court of sessions.

If a district magistrate frames a charge under s 395, IPC, he is bound to commit the accused to the court of sessions. He cannot assume jurisdiction by reducing the charge to s 384, IPC . Jurisdiction is determined not by the final result reached, but by the charge under which the trial is held.[39] Under the new procedure, the committing magistrate merely commits the case to the court of sessions and it is the court of sessions which frames the charges. If, in the course of any inquiry or trial before himself the magistrate finds that the case should be committed to the court of sessions, he shall commit it as laid in s 323, CrPC .

The offences under ss 395 and 450, IPC, are triable exclusively by the court of sessions. Obviously, the magistrate cannot proceed with the trial of the case and direct the recording of evidence before charge.[40]

4. Duty of State in Improving Investigation/Prosecuting Agency

There is no improvement in the system because of lack of proper and penetrating supervision of the performances of the investigating/prosecuting agency. Unless the state government takes serious note of such lacuna, diligent follow-up action against the erring persons by monitoring the matter in detail in each individual case, then the fear of no action which has resulted in complacence of the investigating officer, the supervising officer and the prosecutors, ultimately results in casualty of justice delivery system in criminal cases. State, being the protector of each individual as well as of the whole society, its inaction to combat the perpetrators of crime by providing window exits to culprits through such lapses amounts to magna negligentia culpa est. Before criticism term it as magna culpa dolus est. The state government must exercise its authority to avoid 'much ado about nothing'.[41]

5. Cancellation of Bail--Justification

Where the accused persons allegedly exhorted the informant by demanding money and in that process committed dacoity, the magistrate acting hastily granted bail to two of the accused, while rejecting the prayer of the co-accused for bail on the ground that the offence involved is exclusively triable by the sessions court, the3376 magistrate cancelled the bail of the said two accused, the impugned order cancelling the bail was passed by the magistrate only to cover hasty order of bail which is not sustainable.[42]

6. Quashing of Criminal Complaint

Where the accused persons, being supervisors of Kuchinda Co-operative Agriculture Rural Development Bank under r 104 of the Orissa Co-operative Societies Rules 1965, were competent to break open the lock and seize property, they lawfully entered inside the house of the complainant and seized the articles in discharge of their official duties, and a complaint lodged against them under s 395, IPC, the order of the trial court taking cognizance for the said offence was quashed by the High Court on an application under s 484, CrPC, filed by the accused person.[43]

7. Identification of an Accused

Commentary under the same heading in s 392, ante, may be referred to.

8. Test Identification of Accused on Bail

There is no bar for conducting test identification parade in respect of accused who are on bail.[44]

9. Precautions in Holding Test Identification Parade

The High Court of Bombay has incorporated the procedure for test identification of an accused person which has been indicated by the Government of Maharashtra, Home Department, on 16 August 1963. The offence of robbery and dacoity are offences detrimental to social security and are on an increasing trend, thus, the Bombay High Court found it necessary to mention the procedure for holding the test identification parade of the accused for the purpose of awarding the possibility of commission of any error in future by the investigating officers.[45]

10. Importance of Evidence of an Identification Parade

The evidence in respect of the identification parade is quite important in a criminal trial, because now a days, on account of increasing number of crimes and the resultant prosecutions, the witnesses who identify the suspects before the court as the accused, are examined in court after a very long lapse. In majority of cases, the dacoits or culprits are strangers to the victim. When they are examined in the court of oath, they are required to identify the dacoits or culprits after a lapse of days, months and years. Not only that, they are required to face a barrage of question posed to them during cross-examination by experts in law. Some witnesses who are clever enough make a request for refreshing their memory by reading respective identification parade memorandum, but unfortunately on many occasions they do not3377 even know that they have such a right to refresh their memory. In number of cases the person who conducts the examination-in-chief forgets to refresh their memory. In number of cases it happens that such witnesses do not make a request to refresh their memory during the examination-in-chief and face the barrage of questions asked during cross-examination. The test identification parade memorandum is the document which establishes a nexus between the act done by him before some months or some years and the fact which is required to be deposed in the court in the examination-in-chief or cross-examination. It has to be kept in mind always that in a majority of cases, those witnesses are not well versed with niceties of court procedure. In majority of cases the panch witnesses are from lower strata of the society like farmers, workers, workmen and other common persons and they are required to face experts in law.[46]

11. Identification of Culprit by Witnesses--Important Points

The identification of the accused by witnesses involves serious consideration on a number of points:

(a) Whether the witness was having coolness of the mind at the time of happening of the incident in question?
(b) Whether he was having sufficient light for observing the features of the culprits vividly?
(c) Whether he was having coolness of the mind, suitability of the mind for storing the impression of the features of the culprits in his mind and brain?
(d) Whether the witnesses had sufficient opportunity and time to observe the features of the culprits and was having stability of the mind to store the impression in his mind and brain?
(e) Whether the culprit was previously known to him or was total stranger?
(f) Whether the culprit was having the special features of distinctly marking his identity life squint eyes, limping legs, shortened hands or feet or scars of face, blindness of one of the eye, stammering style of speaking of different voices, high distinctive voices. A person can identify the culprit at the time of happening of the incident like dacoity, burglary, murder, assault or of pick pocketing by observing such features. At the time of commission of the rape there would be different criteria because of the nearness of the body and face of the culprit and the victim. There may be possibility of the culprit being a man of acquaintance, but in cases of dacoity and burglary, generally the persons are strangers and therefore, close scrutiny and caution is very much necessary at the time of examination of the evidence in respect of the legal identification parade.[47]

Where the evidence of the two witnesses shows that they were frightened, the situation was panicky and the culprits were altogether strangers to them. This situation of panic and fright may shorten the ability to identify the culprit's impression and features in the mind becomes obscure. The capacity of witnesses to identify the culprit after a gap of some months when examined on oath in the court3378 depends on such factors, and conclusion is to be drawn in view of the facts and circumstances of each case.[48]

12. Delay in Holding Test Identification Parade--Effect

Commentary under the same heading in s 392, ante, may be referred to.

13. Identification of Accused by Witness--When not Believed

The following are the instances when identification of the accused/dacoits by the prosecution witnesses was not believed by the court:

(a) The dacoits were covering their faces and according to the prosecution witness the torches were focused downward by the dacoits and as such, in such means of light the possibilities of identification is more doubtful.[49]
(b) The prosecution witness stated that they saw the accused at the time of dacoity and in the identification parade but not in between. The identification parade was held within a month of the arrest of the accused. There was no evidence that accused was not produced in the court for obtaining remand within this period or the identity of the accused was concealed from the witness when he was brought before the court for remand.[50]
(c) The prosecution witnesses saw the accused for the first time at the time of commission of offence but no test identification parade was held. Possibility of identification of the accused in a night of darkness was extremely remote.[51]
(d) It was doubtful that the single eyewitness had the occasion to clearly see the miscreants so that he could identify at least two of them in the test identification parade which took place two months after the incident.[52]
(e) There was no explanation as to how the injured witness could see the miscreants inside a driver's cabin in the darkness of night.[53]

(f) There is unexplained delay in holding test identification parade.[54]

(g) The witness identified the accused standing on dock during trial, in the absence of test identification parade, particularly when neither the name of the accused is mentioned in the FIR, nor any looted property recovered from his possession.[55]

(h) Identification of the accused is done by means of flashing of torch in the dark hour of night.[56]3379

(i) The incident took place all of a sudden and when the dacoits boarded the car, the inmates of the car were frightened as dacoits were armed with weapons. Thus, the capacity of the witnesses identifying the culprits was very much weak, keeping in view the panic situation created in their frightful mind.[57]

(j) The chance of the inmates of the house identifying dacoits in torch light flashed by the dacoits is very remote.[58]

(k) The incident took place at night and culprits covering their faces with monkey caps at that time. The suspects and other persons mixed with them were not asked to cover their faces at the time of the test identification parade. The identification parade was conducted in respect of seven suspects, though the investigating officer asked to conduct the parade with only five suspects. There was also possibility of witnesses seeing the accused prior to the test identification parade.[59]

(l) The accused person had amputated legs and this distinctive feature in their bodies was not taken note of in the test identification parade. Further, the accused having small pock marks on his face was not mixed up with persons with such distinctive feature while conducting the identification parade. The possibility of public witnesses seeing the accused in jail was also not ruled out.[60]

(m) The complainant could not identify the accused in the test identification parade.[61]

(n) There was a delay in holding test identification parade and the magistrate who conducted it was not examined.[62]

(o) No link evidence was adduced to show that the accused was not shown to any witness between the time of his arrest and the time of his lodging at jail.[63]

(p) The witnesses failed to identify in court some of the accused identified in the test identification parade. Photographs of eight of the accused were published in a daily newspaper prior to the test identification parade, the ratio of persons mixed in the said parade was also found to be quite low.[64]

(q) The dacoity was committed in the month of November, admittedly the night of offence was a dark night. The presence of the electric bulbs in the complainant's house was not shown in the site plan, the evidence of the witnesses was inconsistent. The date of arrest of the accused was postponed, after arrest the appellant accused were detained at the police station. Hence the evidence of test identification parade was found not3380 reliable. Appellants accused were given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 395, IPC .[65]

14. Identification of Accused by Witness--When Believed

Following are the instances where identification of the accused by prosecution witnesses was believed by the court:

(a) The accused persons though strangers to the victim had not covered their faces with a mask and the victims had every opportunity to see them in light of the vehicle, which was on. The evidence of the witnesses in court coupled with the identification parade was found reliable.[66]

(b) The witness was the wife of the deceased in a dacoity and murder case. She stated in her evidence that she had known the accused persons, they being her neighbours, and she had seen their faces in the light of burning flames of dalan and she also heard them when she was prevented from providing water to her father-in-law.[67]

(c) The witnesses had sufficient opportunity to see and identify the accused person in light of their torches and on account of their burning kharis of crop.[68]

(d) The identifying witnesses had sufficient opportunity to see the dacoits for over fifty minutes in their house and they did not find any difficulty in remembering their features. The identification parade was held after taking necessary precautions and in a manner which was fair to the suspects as well as the identifying witnesses.[69]

(e) The accused were named in the FIR and identified by the prosecution witness in court and the evidence of the witness was found reliable and trustworthy.[70]

(f) All four eyewitnesses had sufficient opportunity to see and identify the dacoits in the light of a lantern.[71]

(g) The dacoits spent considerable time in the house of the complainant and his wife had sufficient opportunity to observe them along with their weapons of crime. The presence of electric light in the house was also established.[72]

(h) The witnesses could recognise the dress colour of the accused, they could also recognise the accused who were known to them and there was possibility of light emanating from a bulb on one pole falling on the faces of the accused. The discarding of evidence of witnesses by the High Court on the ground that the accused were wearing khaki uniform and hats, and that the hats must have cast shadow on the faces of accused is not proper.[73]3381

(i) The evidence of the magistrate who held the identification parade disclosed that proper precautions had been taken and the accused persons had been properly identified by the identifying witnesses. There was no material on record to indicate that the accused persons were shown to the witnesses prior to holding the identification parade.[74]

(j) The test identification parade was conducted with promptitude immediately after the accused were apprehended. There was no material on record to show that identifying witnesses had a chance to see the accused earlier at the test identification parade.[75]

(k) The accused were kept in Baparda custody and thereby it cannot be said that they were shown to the witnesses prior to the identification parade. The evidence on record clearly proved the presence of sufficient light for witnesses to identify the accused persons.[76]

(l) The prosecution witness identified the accused as a dacoit in the identification parade conducted by the magistrate but failed to recognise him before the trial court and trembled when the accused stared at him. The testimony of the magistrate regarding conducting a proper test identification parade was reliable and was held to constitute substantive evidence. Further demand of the witness was taken note of by the trial court.[77]

(m) The accused spent considerable time in the house where dacoity was committed, the prosecution witnesses, thereby getting ample opportunity to identify them. The short delay of 20 days in conducting identification parade was explained.[78]

(n) Prosecution case was that accused appellants armed with fire arms committed murder of two persons, injured one and committed loot of valuable moveables. PW5 identified the accused appellants in TI parade and also before the court. Death of the deceased was due to gun shot injuries. Complainant and members of his family identified the moveables recovered on the disclosure statements made by accused. Accused appellants were convicted under ss 395, 396 and 397, IPC .[79]

(o) There was sufficient time for the identification of the accused by the witnesses during the course of commission of dacoity. Dacoity was committed in temple, the inmates of the temple were witnesses. The Special Executive Magistrate had supervised the TI parade. There was evidence that the accused were kept baparda after their arrest till then were produced in the TI parade. TI parade was held after the arrest of the accused. The delay in holding TI parade was explained. The conviction of A2, A4 and A5 for offence under s 395, IPC was upheld.[80]3382

(p) In a bank dacoity, the appellant accused were identified by the bank officials, customers, injured witnesses, corroborated by the recovery of huge amount of cash from the possession of the accused.[81]

15. Value of Proof by Identification

When practically, the accused persons are not identified, although the commission of dacoity is established, the participation of the accused persons in the dacoity is not proved beyond reasonable doubt.[82]

Where a person, who is not known from before, is accused of an offence, his identification is not of considerable importance because it is sometimes the sole evidence for the prosecution. This is particularly so in dacoity cases. When the prosecution witnesses have correctly identified the accused at the identification parade as well as in court, there is no good ground to disbelieve the testimony of such witnesses.[83] If a witness is able to pick out the accused in the identification parade, his assertion gets added weight and if he fails to do so and cannot reasonably explain his failure, his assertion is completely weakened.[84] A witness would not, however, be able to formulate his reason for identification since it is based upon general untranslatable impression of the mind and it would be fatuous to discredit such identification on the ground that reasons are not being formulated for them.[85] Statement made at the identification parades, being not made on oath, is admissible not as substantive evidence against the accused, but merely as evidence to corroborate or contradict the statements made in court. They provide a very good piece of corroborative evidence and greatly enhance the creditability of identification evidence given in court.[86]

The sworn testimony of witnesses in court as to the identity of the accused, who were strangers to the witnesses, generally speaking, requires corroboration which should be in the form of earlier identification proceedings.[87] Where the accused offers for test identification parade and the prosecution is reluctant to hold it, the testimony of the prosecution witnesses is rendered doubtful with the result that the conviction of the accused is liable to be set aside.[88]

There is no rule as to the minimum evidence required in order to prove identification. A Bench from Allahabad[89] has emphasised on having at least two good identifications.3383

Where the suspects are known to the eyewitnesses, the holding of test identification parade is a waste of time and a total farce, and no reliance should be placed on such identification parade.[1] If therefore, the so called test identification parade is no more than a farce and there is no other evidence on record to connect the accused with the crime of dacoity, his conviction cannot be sustained.[2] If the only evidence, on which the appellants have been convicted under ss 395 and 397, IPC, is the evidence of their identification by the witnesses in court, as corroborated by similar identification in the test identification by the magistrate during investigation, and that evidence is not reliable at all, they have to be acquitted.[3] However, if the accused has been arrested on the spot and there is no doubt about his identity, his conviction under s 395 is perfectly justified.[4] Even if the test identification parade and test identification of looted articles is not firmly proved, but is supported by the witnesses in their deposition in court, it would not be rejected. Conviction of the accused under s 395, IPC was upheld.[5]

Where there was strong possibility that the accused persons after arrest and before TI parade, were shown to the witnesses, no value was attached to the result of TI parade, the appellants accused were acquitted of the charge under s 395, IPC .[6]

It may be pointed out that in the absence of any description of the culprits having been given by these witnesses during their examination by the police under s 161, CrPC, the fact that they have chosen to give some description when examined just before the parade cannot be considered as a circumstances to strengthen the evidence of identification in the court. Any description coming forth from these witnesses after considerable time after the arrest of the accused cannot be considered as significant in as much as by that time such description could have been made available to them by any of the police officials associated with the arrest of the accused.[7]

16. Identification of Dacoits in Torch Light

The identification of dacoits in torchlight flashed by them is very remote. The light which will be reflected around would not be so much as to give witnesses or scared inmates an opportunity to look at the faces of the dacoits properly so that features of their faces will be exposed in broad focus. Moreover, scared inmates of the house could not be in such a psychological mood to look at the faces of the dacoits. In all circumstances, therefore, chances of the inmates identifying the dacoits in torchlight flashed by the latter, is very remote.[8]

When the dacoits had covered their faces and torches were focussed downward by them, in such means the possibility of identification of the dacoits is more doubtful.[9] Thus, the identification of the accused by means of flashing of the torch in the dark hour of night is not trustworthy.[10]3384

It is not acceptable that in a moment of stress and sudden cries, the witness would have identified the accused from a distance of 8-10 paces in the feeble light of torch. If the miscreant could shoot dead the neighbour who had simply rushed up on hearing shouts, then it does not fit in the scheme of things that the witness would have been spared without any harm, despite the fact that the accused had guns and when his house was the object of robbery. They would not have spared him unharmed if he was flashing a torch towards them, at a distance of 8-10 paces.[11]

17. Factum of Light and Identification Evidence

When the solitary witness clearly stated to have identified the dacoits in the light of lantern and thereafter, that witness identified the petitioner in test identification parade also, the conviction on the basis of the evidence of solitary witness and on his solitary identification is proper.[12] Testimony of witnesses about the lanterns burning in their house is proof of source of light for identification of the accused persons.[13]

18. Identification of Case Property

When the witnesses are not asked to state identification marks of their respective properties before showing the properties put up for test identification as required under r 35(3) of Criminal Rules of Practice, the properties recovered are not proved to be robbed at the time of incident.[14] The articles which were put on test identification parade were not recovered from the dacoits, rather the identified articles in the test identification parade were not produced in the court.[15]

None of the discovery memos contained the signatures of the accused persons, independent witnesses were not examined. Held, it was not established beyond reasonable doubts that the ornaments seized by the police were in fact seized at the instance of the respective accused persons as per their disclosure statements. The identification of the articles could not be attributed to the accused persons. Acquittal of the accused on the charge of dacoity under s 395, IPC was held proper.[16]

19. Failure to Hold Identification of Recovered Property--Effect

Normally, the identification of the recovered case property from the accused during investigation should be conducted but it cannot be laid down as an inflexible rule of law that failure to hold identification of recovered property renders the evidence of recovery unworthy of acceptance.[17] However, when the looted ornaments were kept in the iron safe and were not in daily use, the identification of the same for the first time in court without a prior test identification parade to ascertain their ownership, is not sufficient to fasten the accused with the offence.[18]3385

20. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Sessions Judge,etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the.day of., at., you committed dacoity, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 395 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

A charge of dacoity under s 395, IPC can be combined with a charge under s 120B, IPC . A conspiracy to commit dacoity is different from dacoity.[19]

An offence under s 395, IPC comes into existence only when an act of dacoity is committed by five or more persons jointly and a charge under s 149, IPC is, therefore, a mere surplusage.[20] The charge cannot, however, be said to be defective merely because of non-mention, in the charge, of the fact that dacoity was committed by five or more persons.[21] Where the FIR did not mention that theft was committed by any of the accused persons, the trial court was held not justified in framing charge under ss 395 / 397, IPC against the accused.[22]

Where the accused acts in good faith, there would be no criminal intention for a charge under s 395, IPC .[23]

21. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused

(i) committed robbery, or
(ii) attempted to commit robbery, or
(iii) was present and aiding such commission or attempt; and

(b) the accused did so conjointly with four or more other persons.[24]

In the absence of proof/finding about the involvement of five or more persons an accused cannot be convicted for offence under s 396, IPC .[25] In cases of dacoity, strict proof is required. The fact that the accused person had absconded, does not raise any presumption as to his guilt. Similarly, the making of a statement before several witnesses incriminating himself and producing in their presence, some stolen property is not convincing or conclusive proof of his guilt.[26] It is not safe to up hold the conviction of an accused when the prosecution has failed to establish its case beyond all reasonable doubt.[27] Where there was no identification of the accused by3386 any of the prosecution witnesses and they were not named in the FIR, nor was any property recovered from their possession, it was held that their conviction could not be based solely upon the testimony of the two complainants.[28]

The evidence that the accused was standing in a large crowd which overflowed into public street, burnt the records in the post office, destroyed its books, carried away postage stamps, broke open a seed store and carried a part of its contents, is not satisfactory evidence to prove that he was actually committing a robbery or even aiding in the commission of a robbery.[29] When the documentary evidence fully supports the defence plea that the accused was in possession of the plot in question on the relevant date, that the complainant had no right to trespass upon the land belonging to him, and that the accused had not exceeded the right of private defence of person and property, no case under s 395, IPC, can be said to have been made out.[30]Where, however, a large number of persons armed with deadly weapons, forcibly took away fishes from a tank and the witnesses, when protested, were threatened with dire consequence and even with the fear of death if they tried to interfere with the act of theft, sought to be committed by the accused, and no document of title was produced to support their claim of title, it was held that a case of dacoity was made out.[31] In the instant case accused appellants 18 in number had committed dacoity in a train. The two prosecution witnesses examined in the case were deliverymen of a courier service, who had kept bundles at the entrance of the coach. They had conversation and opportunity to see the accused persons as the latter had asked the PWS to remove the two bundles kept by them at the entrance of the coach, one of the PWS was injured in the firing made by the accused persons. The two PWS identified 9 accused appellants, they were convicted for offence under s 395, IPC . One accused was not identified by the prosecution witnesses, as such he was given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 395, IPC .[32]

Where the accused persons got stolen articles recovered, the evidence of witnesses as to the arrest of the accused and the recovery of stolen articles was reliable and the informant had identified the accused persons and recognised the case property in the test identification parade, the conviction of the accused persons under s 395, IPC, was found proper.[33]

Where other accused persons were acquitted for want of adequate evidence, the conviction of the appellant accused against whom sufficient evidence was available on record on the charge under s 395, IPC was upheld.[34] Where the testimony of PW1, a ten years old girl, was found reliable corroborated by the recovery of articles looted during the commission of dacoity, PW1 also identified the appellant accused in test identification parade, conviction of the appellant under s 396, IPC was held proper.[35]

In bank dacoity there was evidence of PWS that the accused persons entered the bank premises, were armed with weapons. All the accused persons were identified in3387 test identification parade, there was no unusual delay in holding the parade. Accused persons committed offence punishable under s 397, IPC .[36]

22. Importance of Number of Accused Persons

If it is not adequately proved that five or more persons had taken part in committing the robbery, the offence will not be converted into a dacoity.[37]

Where, out of six persons, put up for trial under s 395, three were acquitted, the conviction of the remaining three was altered from dacoity to one of robbery.[38] If seven persons are charged for the offence of dacoity and six of them are acquitted as no case is made out against them, the conviction of the seventh accused as a dacoit cannot also be sustained.[39]

Less than five persons cannot be convicted as dacoits unless it is proved that at least five persons took part in its commission.[40] Where there is evidence of five or more persons being connected with a dacoity, then whosoever was concerned in the crime would be guilty of the offence under this section.[41] However, the mere fact, that the evidence was not sufficient to convict all those actually charged, would not affect the number of persons engaged.[42] If the evidence shows that more than five persons were involved, the fact that the court convicts only four persons and acquits the others, will not make the offence less than a dacoity.[43]

23. Known Persons Committing Dacoity

There is no hard and fast rule that known persons would not go to commit dacoity without taking care of concealing their faces. It depends on the temperament of a person. There can be hardened criminals. When a known person is desperate and very much inimical, he can go to commit dacoity without taking the usual precaution of covering his face.[44]

However; when there is no evidence to show that the accused though named in the FIR was a hazardous character who could have gone to commit dacoity at the house of the known person with an open face, the possibility cannot be ruled out that there3388 was some bad blood between the prosecution witnesses on one hand and the accused on the other, which led to his naming in the FIR as one of the dacoits.[45]

The accused persons were belonging to the same village and were nextdoor neighbours and allegedly committed dacoity concealing their identity by painting their faces. The prosecution did not disclose eminent enmity between the parties which could be considered as motive for the crime. It is not probable that the neighbours who choose to commit the crime due to enmity with the person, would himself participate in the crime. Rather in such case where there is enmity, usually a neighbour would set up other persons to get the crime committed. The non-disclosure of motive, coupled with delay in lodging the FIR and also non-disclosure of identity of the accused person to the villagers, who came there soon after the occurrence makes the prosecution case doubtful with possibilities of false implication of the accused person.[46]

24. Recovery of Huge Quantity of Case Property--Effect

Appellants accused persons entered into the house of the deceased at midnight, looted gold, silver ornaments, assaulted the deceased leading to his death. Ornaments were recovered from the possession of the appellants accused. The appellants accused did not claim the recovered property as their own. The PWS identified the accused appellants in test identification parade and also identified the recovered ornaments. There was no possibility of false plantation by the police. Some delay in identification parade or identification of property is likely in cases of dacoity at mid night and the recovery of the ornaments. The delay is natural in such cases, it is not fatal as to throw the prosecution case outright. Conviction of the appellants accused under ss 395 and 396, IPC was held proper.[47]

25. Gap between the date of Dacoity and date of Recovery of Stolen Articles--Reasons

It needs to be noted that hardly there exists any standard pattern in dacoity between the date of the incident and the date of recovery of stolen articles from the accused. It depends upon the nature of booty the culprit comes into possession, his immediate necessities, his ability to dispose off the same and availability of the persons to receive such stolen property, particularly, where the culprit has notoriety to his credit. To prevent any chance of a third person coming to know of the theft or dacoity, the culprit may delay the disposal of the stolen property. In certain cases, he may intend to retain the same. Therefore, it all depends on the attendant circumstances and no uniformity can be contemplated in this regard. In the present case, the dacoities were committed by gangs. Various dacoities were committed by gangs with different combinations. They were very much aware that having regard to the frequency of instances and the nature of dacoities, the hunt for them is very severe. The instances did not depict an ordinary case of theft by an individual out of dire necessity. The crimes were committed in an organised manner. They used a vehicle and had the experience of committing theft within the state and outside. In many places, cash was stolen from the houses of victims. Since immediate necessities are taken care of by3389 the stolen cash, the accused may not be in dire necessity of disposing of the other stolen articles. Therefore, it can be said that the time lag between the date of the incident and date of recovery had improbabilised the very possession of the stolen articles by the accused.[48]

26. Recovery of Stolen Property--Presumption of Dacoity

Considering the circumstances that the recovery of property which was the subject-matter of dacoity was recovered from the possession of the accused within 24 hours of the incident, the inference that the said accused had committed dacoity can legitimately be raised.[49]

In Lachhman Ram v State of Orissa ,[50] the Apex Court found that there were dacoities on the same night in the houses of the complainants one after the other in quick succession and the dacoits looted and bolted away. The dacoits belonged to Delhi and had come to commit dacoity at far off places in the state of Orissa. The looted property by these dacoits, were recovered from them and this had been established beyond doubt. Their lordships said that in view of the clear findings, the factum of recovery of articles at the instance of the accused persons in the presence of police officers and panch witnesses who have deposed to the same, is itself sufficient to bring the case not only under the provision of s 412, IPC but also under s 395, IPC with the aid to s 114 of the Evidence Act because the recoveries were made very soon after the occurrence. The judgment of the court did not refer to what time had lapsed between the dacoity and recoveries of the looted articles.

In Earabhadrappa v State of Karnataka ,[51] the Apex Court said that the nature of presumption under illust (a) to s 114 of the Evidence Act must depend upon the nature of the evidence adduced. No fixed time limit can be laid down to determine whether possession is recent or otherwise, and each case must be judged on its own facts. The question as to what amounts to recent possession of stolen property sufficient to justify the presumption of guilt, varies accordingly as the stolen article is or is not calculated to pass readily from hand to hand.

Where the important factors were that it was on the night of dacoity that murder was committed as a part of the transaction of dacoity committed by large number of persons and a large number of ornaments of gold and silver and cash were looted, most of the inmates of the house were beaten and one lady died as a result thereof, the accused persons were arrested within 2-4 days and they led to the recovery of the looted articles which had apparently been apportioned between them, the inference of dacoity has to be taken, inter alia under s 114, illust (a) of the Evidence Act against the accused.[52]Thus, when the prosecution has established beyond reasonable doubt that valuable articles which were robbed from the house of the victim after committing dacoity were possessed by the respective accused persons within a short time after the commission of dacoity, which even amounts to 'soon after' the commission of dacoity, thus attracting the presumption under s 114 of the Evidence Act, that they themselves are the dacoits.[53]3390

27. Non-examination of Investigation Officer

When the non-examination of the investigation officer has in no way prejudiced the accused, it is not fatal to the prosecution case.[54]

28. Non-examination of Doctor

When perhaps due to non-examination of the doctor the accused was convicted under s 395 and not under s 397, the accused, therefore, can have no grievance about non-examination of the doctor.[55]

29. Value of Evidence of Approver

Though an approver is a competent witness, he being a participant in the offence and usually an interested and infamous witness, his evidence requires corroboration from other evidence.[56] Granting pardon and examining the approver is at best a necessary evil in view of both the approver's escape from punishment and natural suspicion with which any court looks upon it.[57] The accused's producing stolen property from the place which was not in his possession, or the evidence of witnesses alleging to have recognised the accused at the time of dacoity, when his name was not mentioned in the FIR, would not be sufficient corroboration of an approver's testimony to base a conviction thereon.[58] The statement of the approver, that after the dacoity, he was offered rupees hundred which he took, is not a confession that he had committed dacoity. Such a statement cannot be taken into consideration as against the other accused.[59]

30. Value of Evidence of Co-accused

It is well-settled that no conviction can be based on the confession of a co-accused if there is no other evidence which connects the accused with the dacoity.[60]

However, this view of the Bombay High Court is contrary to the view taken by the Andhra Pradesh High Court that the confession of a co-accused should be used as a piece of corroborated evidence and conviction based solely on confession of a co-accused is liable to be set aside.

The rule for relying on confession of an accused for the purpose of conviction of another accused is that the confession should be used as a piece of corroborative evidence which would mean that if there is any evidence against an accused person, that evidence may be corroborated by the confession of another accused person, courts should not begin the process of dealing with conviction of a person on the basis of a confession made by a co-accused. The beginning of the process has to be done with some cogent evidence which may then be corroborated with such confession.[61]3391

In Hari Charan v State of Bihar ,[62] which was also followed in Param Hans Yadav v State of Bihar ,[63] the Supreme Court while dealing with confession of a co-accused for the purpose of convicting the other accused, held:

> Thus, the confession may be regarded as evidence in that generic sense because of the provisions of s 30, the fact remains that it is not evidence as defined by s 3 of the Act. The result, therefore, is that in dealing with a case against an accused person, the court cannot start with the confession of a co-accused person; it must begin with other evidence adduced by the prosecution and after it has formed its opinion with regard to the quality and effect of the said evidence, then it is permissible to turn to the confession in order to receive assurance to the conclusion of guilt which the judicial mind is about to reach on the said other evidence.that the confession of a co-accused person cannot be treated as substantive evidence and can be pressed into service only when the court is inclined to accept other evidence and feels the necessity of seeking for an assurance in support of its conclusion deducible from the said evidence.

31. Evidence not Believed for Section 395 may be Relied on for Section 400

Commentary under the same heading in s 400, post, may be referred to.

32. Acquittal

Where the informant himself could not identify the accused persons and the accused were not found in possession of the looted articles, they were regular visitor to shop of the informant. Thus, their alleged attempt to commit dacoity without covering their faces becomes doubtful. Guilt of accused cannot be said to have been established and they were entitled to acquittal.[64] Appellant accused was not identified by the prosecution witnesses. Only evidence against the accused was recovery of stolen properties, on the disclosure statement made by the accused. Although the recovery of stolen articles may indicate that the theft and murder might have been committed at the same time, it is not safe to draw an inference that the person in possession of the stolen property had committed the murder. It also depends on the nature of the property so recovered. Suspicion should not take the place of proof. Accused appellant was acquitted of offences under ss 395, 396 and 397, IPC .[65] Where the PWS in whose house dacoity was committed failed to identify the accused persons, the confession alleged to be made by the accused was found not voluntary, appellants accused were acquitted of the charge under s 395, IPC .[66] Where in a bank dacoity case, the PWS deposed before the court that the persons present in accused box, were not the persons who committed dacoity, the confessional statement of the accused led to recovery of some amount, the accused were acquitted of the charge under s 395, IPC .[67]Where the PWS deposed before the court that the accused appellants named in FIR had covered their faces which got untied during the course of commission of dacoity, and were identified but no specific role or overt act was3392 assigned to the appellants, held the prosecution case was not proved beyond reasonable doubt, appellants accused were acquitted.[68]

Prosecution case was that the accused appellants entered the house of the complainant on the pretext of conducting income tax raids and looted cash and jewels, no TI parade was conducted in the case, the PWS after seven years identified the appellants accused before the court, the accused were acquitted of the charge under s 395, IPC .[69]

Allegation was that the accused persons forcibly entered into the house of the informant and took away cash and golden ornaments. The testimony of the informant, her father and other material witnesses suffered from inconsistencies. Accused persons were acquitted of the charge under s 395, IPC .[70]

In any eventuality, once the prosecution case rests solely on the disclosure statements leading to recovery, it has to apply uniformly to all the persons who have been arrayed as accused. The sequence of events in such like incidents and the consequent recoveries are crucial and if the evidence is inseparable and indivisible, then it cannot be used selectively.[71]

Where the informant himself could not identify the accused persons, the accused were not found in possession of looted articles, they were regular visitors to shop of the informant, thus their alleged attempt to commit dacoity without covering their faces becomes doubtful, guilt of the accused cannot be said to have been established and they were entitled to acquittal.[72] Where the complainant and none of the PWS did not identify the accused during trial before the court, the conviction of the accused on the basis of statement of witnesses recorded in case diary was found not sustainable, hence was set aside.[73]

33. Conviction

An accused cannot be convicted for an offence under s 395, IPC, if there are inherent improbabilities in the prosecution evidence regarding his participation in the crime.[74] In Nanhey v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[75] the third accused was also held to be entitled to acquittal because it was found that the finding against him was inconsistent with the one on the basis of which the other two accused had been acquitted. In Kalya Shankaraya alias Shankar Laxman Shinde v State of Maharashtra ,[76] the charge against the appellant, as also against the other accused, was that all of them committed dacoity. The charge was not that these accused, or any of them, along with some unidentified persons committed this offence. The remaining accused were3393 acquitted. In these circumstances, it was held that the appellant could not be convicted under s 395, IPC, in the absence of any charge against him for any individual act. However, in Nagnath Sudam Suryawanshi v State of Maharashtra ,[77] the order of conviction, recorded by the trial judge on the basis of his conclusion that the accused had committed the offence of dacoity, was not interfered with inspite of the fact that the articles were recovered soon after the commission of the offence. Likewise, in Jugal Gope v State of Bihar ,[78] it was held that the appellate court would be justified in convicting the accused and reversing the order of acquittal, passed by the trial court, if it is perverse and it is fully proved by the evidence on record that they had participated in the dacoity.

Where the identification of accused by witnesses was believed and currency notes worth Rs 40,000/-, one pistol and a black coloured bag used to keep looted money was recovered from accused persons, the involvement of accused in a bank dacoity was proved beyond doubt. There conviction under ss 395 / 397 and 450 of IPC and ss 25 / 28 of the Arms Act was found proper.[79] Where the accused forcefully entered the house of the complainant, looted articles, he was identified by the PWS and recovery of looted articles from his possession was proved, deshi katta was recovered from him, he was convicted for offences under ss 395 and 397, IPC .[80]

Dacoity conviction proper

Appellants accused had committed dacoity in a temple in Mathura (UP). Witnesses had identified them in test identification parade and also before court. The defence plea that on the same evidence other co-accused has been acquitted was rejected as the case of the co-accused was distinguishable. Their conviction under s 395, IPC was held proper.[81]

Prosecution case was that accused appellants armed with fire arms committed murder of two persons, injured one and committed loot of valuable moveables. PW5 identified the accused appellants in TI parade and also before the court. Death of the deceased was due to gun shot injuries. Complainant and members of his family identified the moveables recovered on the disclosure statements made by accused. Accused appellants were convicted under ss 395, 396 and 397, IPC .[82]

Dacoity at Petrol Pump--Accused Convicted

Appellants accused faced trial for offence under s 395, IPC on allegations that they attacked petrol pump and looted cash. In test identification parade, the appellants accused were properly identified by complainant worker at petrol pump and one more witness. Conviction of the accused appellants under s 395, IPC was held proper.[83]3394

Bank Dacoity--Accused Convicted

In broad day light dacoity was committed in Dena Bank, Bangalore, a cash of Rs. 13,95,720/- was looted. Appellant accused was identified by Bank Manager and one witness. A sum of Rs. 40,000/- and bank slips were recovered from the possession of the accused. Mere delay in holding TI parade was held of no significance. Conviction of the accused appellant under s 395, IPC was upheld.[84]

34. Effect of Acquittal of Some of the Accused on Conviction of Others

If five persons have been acquitted, only one person cannot be convicted under s 395, IPC .[85] In any eventuality, once the prosecution case rests solely on the disclosure statements leading to recovery, it has to apply uniformly to all the persons who have been arrayed as accused. The sequence of events in such like incidents and the consequent recoveries are crucial and if the evidence is inseparable and individual, then it cannot be used selectively.[86] When out of the ten accused persons involved in the dacoity, the case of four accused person was split and they were acquitted, the same witnesses were examined in the case of the remaining accused persons and the order of acquittal passed in favour of the four accused persons was not challenged, the remaining six accused persons were also entitled to an acquittal.[87]

35. Double Conviction--Under Sections 395 and 412

Where, though a person is not guilty under s 395, IPC for committing dacoity, looted property is found in his possession and he has knowledge that it is looted property, he can be held guilty under s 412, IPC ; but where he is convicted under s 395 for committing dacoity and it was in the course of that dacoity that the property which was found in his possession, came to him, he cannot be held guilty both under ss 395 and 412, IPC .[88]There is, however, no statutory prohibition for conviction, both under ss 395 and 412 . Where the act of dacoity, in respect of which there has been a conviction under s 395, does not necessarily involve a transfer of possession of the property, which is punishable under s 412, and the evidence relating to the participation in the robbery, is distinct from that relating to subsequent possession and it is quite likely that there is a separate act of division of the spoils by which the possession of the stolen property was transferred, simultaneous conviction under ss 395 and 412, IPC, is not illegal.[89]

36. Double Conviction--Under Sections 395 and 342

If wrongful confinement is committed in the course of dacoity, there is nothing in the IPC, or in the Code of Criminal Procedure, which says that no separate sentences would be necessary for the separate offence found to have been committed by the accused. Section 71 , IPC, will not apply to the case as the offence under s 342 has no connection at all with the offence under s 395 .[90]3395

The normal sentence in a case of dacoity is rigorous imprisonment for 5-7 years.[1] When the trial court taking into account the mitigating factors has passed sentence of just 3 years rigorous imprisonment for the offence under s 395, IPC, there is no good ground to reduce the sentence to a lesser term or to substitute it by any amount of fine. The offence of dacoity whether it be an aggravated form of theft or an aggravated form of extortion could not be encouraged. A liberal attitude cannot be taken in regard to such offences on any sentencing policy.[2]

37. Sentence (Deterrent)

Heavy and deterrent sentences should be passed in cases of serious dacoities.[3] Where, in a very serious dacoity, two persons were wounded with shots and two with spears, and three fingers of one of the persons who had been shot, were completely blown away, the sentence of imprisonment for life was held to be justified. It was observed that if a dacoity is a very serious one, the maximum sentence or something approaching the maximum sentence should be passed under s 395 .[4] Where the accused committed a dacoity in broad daylight and stole a large sum and a maund of gur, a sentence of six years was held to be justified,[5] and the fact that the accused returned a part of the property, looted in a dacoity the next day, was not held to be a mitigating circumstances to reduce the sentence passed.[6] Similarly, the circumstances, that all, except the three accused, have been acquitted by the High Court, was held not to mitigate against the conviction of the three accused for dacoity in Sakru v State of Uttar Pradesh .[7] In Israful Sheikh v State of Bihar ,[8] no reduction in sentence; was considered necessary in view of the facts that the appellant played an important role in the commission of the dacoity, and did not hesitate in injuring even the informant, and a lot of properties, looted by the dacoits, was recovered from his house on his own extra-judicial confession. However, three years rigorous imprisonment was considered to be a proper sentence. Dacoity is a serious offence, in such cases no leniency is desirable in the matter of punishment. The defence plea that the sentence awarded be reduced to the sentence undergone, as the incident was old and accused appellants had served half of the sentence was rejected.[9] In Moti v State of Madhya Pradesh [10] where the accused were found to be novices in their maiden venture of committing a dacoity, it was held that a more severe sentence could turn them into hardened criminals.

In a case of road dacoity in which innocent passengers of a bus, quiet unaware of the catastrophe lurking over their heads were robbed of their belongings, the fact that the accused had faced rigour of the prosecution for about 14 years was not accepted to be sufficient to take a lenient view for awarding the sentence, so the sentence of imprisonment of 10 years rigorous imprisonment inflicted upon the accused was upheld.[11]3396

38. Sentence (Lenient View)

Where the accused convicted for offence under s 395, IPC has suffered trauma and harassment of criminal litigation for almost 31 years, to meet the ends of justice, his sentence for offence under s 395 was modified to one of the period undergone.[12] In Nand Kumar v State ,[13] looking at the young age of the appellants and the amount of property involved and that they had undergone sufficient period of imprisonment for about three years and were on bail when their appeal was being considered, it was thought to be in the interest of justice that they should not be sent to jail again and that the ends of justice would be met if the substantive sentence of the appellants was reduced to the period already undergone by them. Where the accused, while carrying away the stolen property, exploded a cracker to frighten the inmates of the house, who wanted to pursue them, and there was no attempt on their (accused's) part to cause injury to any of the inmates of the house or other persons at the time of commission of the offence or even thereafter, it was held that the ends of justice would be served if the sentence is reduced to imprisonment, already undergone by the accused.[14] As the occurrence was twenty eight years old, the appellants had not caused injury to any one, sentence imposed by the High Court was reduced to three years RI.[15]

To enhance the sentence of 2½ years rigorous imprisonment to seven years rigorous imprisonment by merely saying that the 'ends of justice' demand it, is to continue the question, and not to meet it. In the absence of any speaking order in the appellate court's substantial enhancement, the sentence imposed by the trial court for stated reasons, none of which has expressly been dissented from, or can be called impertinent, should be restored.[16]

The fact that dacoity under consideration is only a 'technical dacoity', and not a real one, or the fact that the offender was a young man who acted under the dominating will of his senior is a mitigating circumstances.[17] If the accused is a young man of 23 years and there is no previous misconduct alleged against him, he deserves some reduction in his sentence.[18] One of the grounds for reducing the sentence to that already undergone, in Nagnath Sudani Suryawanshi v State of Maharashtra ,[19] was that the articles in the dacoity were ordinary and of common use. Where a dacoity was committed by the accused, under the influence of liquor and no serious injuries were caused and property of small value was taken away, the sentence of seven years was reduced to two years rigorous imprisonment.[20] Three years rigorous imprisonment was held sufficient to meet the ends of justice where no3397 injury was caused.[21] Similarly, where the accused, although armed with a gun, did not actively participate in the dacoity by using his gun, sentence awarded to him was reduced to the sentence of imprisonment already undergone by him.[22] In cases of rioting and dacoity committed while the accused suffer from a gross outrage on their religious feelings, comparative leniency may be made in sentence.[23] An approver in a dacoity case is entitled to some leniency.[24]

The accused suffering acute mental agony, and pain besides financial hardship by facing trial and appeal for 18 years are entitled to leniency so their sentence under s 395, IPC, was reduced from 4 years rigorous imprisonment to 2 years rigorous imprisonment each.[25] Where the minor injuries were caused to some of the policemen as the crowd pelted stones at the police party for not being able to enjoy the pop-light, there was no real desire to attack the police party in the special circumstances of the case, and the Apex Court reduced the sentence of imprisonment awarded to under different sections to the period already undergone but enhanced the fine imposed under s 395, IPC, to Rs 750 for each accused and in default of payment of fine, rigorous imprisonment for four months.[26] Where the incident was of the year 1998, the sentence of 7 years awarded by the trial court was reduced to the period of 5 years.[27]

39. 'And Shall also be Liable to Fine'

A sentence of fine only under s 395 is clearly illegal.[28] In Re Narayan Singh Amar Singh's case, it was expressed that though imposition of fine in addition to a jail sentence is obligatory, yet a token fine of only one rupee is utter contempt of the requirement of s 395, IPC, and, therefore, the fine imposed must bear a reasonable relationship with the enormity of the crime.[29] However, a sentence of fine is not appropriate in dacoity cases because dacoits are persons of little or no means. Where there are also sentences of long-term imprisonment, it simply means that a sentence of fine will cause hardship and sufferings to the unfortunate members of their families.[30]

42. Alteration of Conviction from Section 395 to one under Section 384

If the substantive evidence of the complainant does not refer to the allegations that the accused persons had looted away the articles or movables of the victims, they cannot be convicted under ss 395 / 149, IPC . If, however, his evidence and his statement in the FIR show that the appellants surrounded him and his party and extorted a sum of money as a price for sparing them and that this amount was paid to them, their conviction, in these circumstances can be altered from one under ss 395 / 149 to that under ss 384 / 149, IPC .[31]

43. Alteration of Conviction from Section 395 to Section 412

Where the description of the accused was not given in the FIR and the belated test identification was improper, however, in view of the recovery of articles and ornaments at the instance of the accused persons on the basis of their memorandums which have been proved, the conviction of accused persons was altered from s 395 to s 412 .[32]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 396.

Dacoity with murder.--

If any one of five or more persons, who are conjointly committing dacoity, commits murder in so committing dacoity, every one of those persons shall be punished with death, or imprisonment for life, or rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section, which deals with dacoity with murder, the liability of the other accused persons, is co-extensive with that of the actual murderer. Similarly, any death, caused3399 by a dacoit in a dacoity is murder and is attributable to all of them, if it is proved that they were 'conjointly committing' dacoity,[33] even though they may have participated in dacoity, and not in murder.[34] It does not matter whether murder is committed in the immediate presence of the other accused persons.[35] In the case of committing dacoity (attempting to commit robbery conjointly by more than five persons is dacoity) if murder is caused, all persons who have conjointly committed the offence of dacoity are liable to be punished under s 396,

IPC . Dacoity begins as soon as an attempt is made to commit robbery by a gang of five or more persons and if a person is murdered during the attempt, every member of the gang is guilty under s 396, IPC .[36] It also does not matters whether the particular dacoity charged under s 396 was inside the house, or outside the house, when the dacoity was committed, or whether the murder was committed inside or outside the house, so long as the murder was committed in the commission of that dacoity.[37] It is not even necessary that the murder should have been with the previous contemplation of the perpetration of the crime.[38] It may be remembered that the offence of dacoity starts with the entry of the raiders into the premises, where they propose to commit dacoity, and ends with departure from the premises. So long as the culprits remain on the premises, the process of dacoity continues.[39]

The offence of murder is by specific language included in the offence under s 396 . IPC . It will have the same connotation, meaning and ingredients as contemplated under the provisions of s 302, IPC .[40]

2. 'In so Committing Dacoity'

The question, whether murder was committed during the course of committing dacoity, is a pure question of fact to be determined by the special circumstances of each case.[41] In deciding the question whether the transaction of murder is distinct from the transaction of dacoity, the helpful facts are whether the dacoits retreated without plunder and the murder was committed while retreating, the lapse of interval between the attempt at dacoity and murder, the distance between the places of the attempt at dacoity and murder, and whether the dacoits abandoned the booty, and the lapse of the interval between the abandonment of the booty and the commission of the murder. However, each fact should not, by itself, be treated as invariably3400 conclusive.[42] The question to be considered is whether the retreat was so separated by time or space from the offence, which was the common object of the assembly, as not to form part of it. Where there is no such separation and is the continuation of the actual dacoity, the case would fall under this section.[43] If there is nothing to show that murder was so dissociated by time or space from the dacoity that it can be said that one chapter had closed and a new chapter had begun, the case would fall under this section.[44]

Murder committed by dacoits while carrying away the stolen property is murder committed during the commission of the dacoity.[45]A shot fired in order to keep off the rescue party and allow the theft to be committed is an act committed in committing the dacoity.[46] Where, however, a police outpost was fired at by the accused, injuring four constables and killing one, not with the object of taking away the guns and rifles, but to show how powerful the communists were, and ultimately removed the rifles and guns, it was held that the death was committed before the dacoity, and not in commission of the dacoity.[47]

3. 'Offender' under Section 396 and 397 --Distinction

Commentary under the same heading in s 397, post, may be referred to.

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

5. Jurisdiction

An offence under this section may be inquired into, or tried by, a court within whose local jurisdiction the offence was committed or the accused person is found [s 181(1), CrPC 1973]. Where dacoity was committed in British India, though murder, which was committed soon after dacoity in attempting to carry away the stolen property, was committed in a native state, it was held that the British India court had jurisdiction to try the offenders under s 396 .[48]

6. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Session Judge,etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:3401
> That you, on or about theday of, conjointly, with four or more other persons, committed dacoity and, in so committing dacoity, murder was committed by one of you, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 396 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge

The accused persons were initially charged under ss 302 and 392, IPC . Subsequently, the charge was altered to one under s 396, IPC . The complexion of the charge had remained unaltered. In the absence of any prejudice caused to the accused persons, the trial cannot be said to be vitiated.[49]

7. Dying Declaration

When there is no evidence to show that the dying declaration was recorded when the deceased was mentally fit to give a statement, such dying declaration is not admissible. For further commentary, s 302, vol 3, may be referred to.

8. Murder by one Dacoit--All Dacoits Liable

If a dacoit in the progress of, and in pursuance of the commission of a dacoity commits a murder, all his companions who are participating in the commission of the same dacoity may be convicted under this section, although they may have no participation in the murder beyond the fact of participation in dacoity. It is not necessary for the prosecution in such a case to establish either any common intention envisaged in s 34 or common object contemplated in s 149, IPC . It is not necessary that the murder should have been within the contemplation of all or some of them when the dacoity was planned, nor is it necessary that they should have actually taken part in, or abetted, its commission. Indeed they may not have been present at the scene of the murder, or may not have known even that murder was going to be, or had in fact been committed. However, nonetheless they all will be liable for enhanced punishment, provided a person is in fact murdered by one of the members of the gang in commission of the dacoity.[50]

9. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove,[51] that:

(a) a dacoity was committed;
(b) any one of five or more persons committed murder; and
(c) the murder was committed while committing the said dacoity.[52]

The prompt recovery of articles soon after the dacoity from the house of the accused raises a strong presumption of the complicity of the accused in dacoity.[53] Non-examination of investigating officer would not be fatal in absence of prejudice to the accused persons.[54]3402

Appellant accused was not identified by the witnesses. The only evidence was of recovery of stolen articles on the disclosure statement made by the accused appellant. Only evidence against the accused is recovery of stolen properties, then although the circumstances may indicate that the theft and murder might have been committed at the same time, it is not safe to draw an inference that the person in possession of the stolen property had committed the murder. It also depends on the nature of the property so recovered, whether it was likely to pass readily form hand to hand. Suspicion should not take the place of proof. The acquittal of the accused appellant for offences under ss 395, 396 and 397, IPC recorded by the High Court was not set aside.[55]

When the testimony of the sole eyewitness, the wife of the deceased was found reliable and trustworthy, the fact that she suffered certain mental illness after the incident cannot be a ground to discard her testimony when she was got treated in the hospital when the said eyewitness also had every opportunity to identify the accused persons being her neighbours and also having seen their faces in the light of burning flames of dalan, the conviction of the accused under s 396, IPC, was found proper.[56] Appellants accused armed with deadly weapons entered into the house of the informant, caused injuries to the informant, fatal injury to his brother and father, also committed loot in the house. The evidence of witnesses was found reliable, their evidence could not be discarded because they were related to the deceased. Appellants were convicted for offence under s 396, IPC . Conviction was held proper.[57] Where the witnesses knew the accused from before, the accused can be easily recognized even in insufficient light. The identification/recognition of the accused in the light of lantern and flash of torch light was believed.[58] There was clear evidence of the PWS that the accused took away cash, ornaments, assaulted members of the family of the informant, killed the deceased, accused was convicted for offence under s 396, IPC .[59] In a bank dacoity case, the non-recovery of cash/money, failure of the prosecution as to how the accused utilized money/cash robbed is not fatal.[60] As there was long standing enmity between the parties, the manner of committing dacoity and the participation of the appellants accused was found doubtful. Accused persons were acquitted of the charge under s 396, IPC .[61] As the dacoits during the commission of the dacoity remained inside the house for an hour, the facial expression were imprinted on the mental screen of the PWS, the testimony of the PWS was found reliable, conviction of the appellants accused under s 396, IPC was held proper.[62]

If the evidence of identification fails to connect the accused with the dacoity, the mere fact that the property stolen in a dacoity is found with him after about six weeks, is no ground for holding him guilty of dacoity. Such a person is, however, guilty under s 411, IPC .[63] Where the common object of the dacoits including the accused who committed dacoity, was to resist all opposition even to the extent of3403 committing murder and one of the dacoits committed murder, it was held that all of them were responsible for that act.[64] If, however, the prosecution has not been able to establish any nexus between the death of the deceased and the commission of the dacoity or even his injuries, the charge under s 396, IPC, must fail.[65] Accused persons included a person aged 74 years, a boy aged 13 years, there was long standing enmity between the parties, identification of the accused persons in the light of lantern was found doubtful, there was every possibility of false implication, accused persons were acquitted of the charge under s 396, IPC .[66] Where six persons were alleged to have committed dacoity, two of them were simply acquitted, the remaining four accused appellants could not be convicted for offence under s 396, IPC .[67] Where in a dacoity with murder case, FIR was lodged against unknown persons, accused A2 was arrested after a period of ten years, no TI parade was held, his identification by the prosecution witnesses for the first time in the court was found not reliable since he was unknown to the witnesses, his conviction under s 396, IPC was set aside.[68]Merely because the act of the accused has a civil profile would not denude it of its criminal outfit. Criminal and civil proceedings are separate and independent of each other and the pendency of a civil suit cannot bring to an end of criminal proceedings even if they arise out of the same set of facts.[69]

The dacoits having remained present in the house for an hour the witnesses had ample opportunity and occasion to see them, the witness had been assaulted by the dacoits he had an opportunity to see them from close quarters, the facial expressions of the accused having been imprinted on the mental screen of witnesses, they would not have been erased from their memory within a period of two months. The identifying witnesses correctly identified the accused appellants at the TI parade as well as at the time of their testimony in the court. Accused appellant were convicted under s 396, IPC .[70]

When there is absolutely no material on record to show that the accused persons formed an unlawful assembly with the common object of dacoity in the house of the deceased and when nothing has been stolen; nothing has been removed from any of deceased by any member of the said assembly or any article, leaving aside the guns, was stolen from the said house, the conviction of the accused under s 396, IPC, is not proper.[71]3404

Accused persons entered the premises, looted articles and licensed gun, and killed two persons. All the witnesses stated that they had otherwise known the accused persons and they were not strangers to them. In the moonlight and lantern light they clearly identified them. Therefore, the TI parade was really not necessary in this case. Dying declaration of the deceased was found reliable. Conviction of the accused appellants under s 396, IPC was held proper.[72]

10. FIR Against unknown Persons--Accused Acquitted

FIR about dacoity was filed against unknown persons. The accused appellant was arrested after 10 years. No test identification parade was held. In the absence of TI parade the identification of the accused by the witness for the first time in the court was found not reliable. Accused A2 was acquitted of the charge under s 396, IPC .[73]

11. Circumstantial Evidence

Commentary under the related headings in s 302, vol 3, may be referred to.

12. Circumstantial Evidence--Accused Denying Established Facts, in the Statement under Section 313 , CrPC --Effect

In a case of circumstantial evidence when the accused offers an explanation and that explanation is found not to be true, then the same offers an additional link, in the chain of circumstances to complete the chain.[74] The false answer offered by the accused when his attention was drawn to a circumstance, renders that circumstance inculpating him. In such circumstances, the false answer can also be counted as providing a missing link for completing the chain.[75]

13. Test Identification (TI) Parade

Test Identification in the case though was held 14 days after the incident but within two days after the arrest of the accused. Judicial Magistrate who conducted TI parade was examined in the case, witnesses identified the accused in TI parade and in court. Appellant accused was convicted under s 396, IPC .[76]

The dacoits at the time of commission of dacoity had covered their face. The minor daughter of the deceased could not identify the accused. Identification by another witnesses was also doubtful, the accused were unknown. The conviction of the appellant recorded by courts below was set aside.[77]3405

14. Reliability of Witness

The Hon'ble Supreme Court in the case of Vadivel Thevar v State of Madras ,[78] has observed that generally speaking oral testimony may be classified into following categories:

(a) Wholly reliable.
(b) Wholly unreliable.
(c) Neither wholly reliable nor wholly unreliable.

Thereafter, the Hon'ble court proceeded to observe as follows:

> In the first category of proof, the court should have no difficulty in coming to its conclusion either way--it may convict or may acquit on the testimony of a single witness, if it is found to be above reproach of suspicion of interestedness, incompetence or subornation. In the Second category, the court equally has no difficulty in coming to its conclusion. It is the third category of cases, that the court has to be circumspect and has to look for corroboration in material particulars by reliable testimony, direct or circumstantial. However, where there are no such exceptional reasons operating, it becomes the duty of the court to convict, if it is satisfied that the testimony of a single witness is entirely reliable

When the single eyewitness produced by the prosecution is not found reliable, the accused persons are liable to be acquitted.[79]

Where the evidence of the witnesses is found reliable, their evidence cannot be discarded merely because they are related to the deceased.[80]

15. Double Conviction

When while committing dacoity, murder is also committed, the punishment would be provided under s 396, IPC . In other words, s 396, IPC includes in itself, the ingredients of punishment for offence under s 395, IPC . Section 396 is a magnified version of s 395 as murder is also committed while committing dacoity. If, therefore, accused is held guilty for an offence under s 396, IPC and convicted accordingly, he cannot be convicted under s 395, IPC also.[81] The offence under s 395 is covered by s 396 . A separate sentence for that offence is improper as a man is not to be punished twice for the same criminal act.[82] If a person, concerned in a dacoity, unintentionally commits murder, he is liable to punishment under s 396 ; he cannot be separately convicted for murder under s 302 and of dacoity under s 395 .[83]

It is apparent that the accused cannot be convicted simultaneously for the offence under s 396 and also for the offence under s 302, IPC, unless there is specific evidence that one of the accused inflicted injuries on the deceased with the necessary3406 intention or the knowledge so that, that particular accused could be fastened with the offence under s 302, IPC .[84]

However, the offence under s 120B read with s 3, IPC, being a separate offence from the offence of participation in a particular dacoity, a separate sentence can be awarded to run consecutively for participation in separate dacoities, and to this can also be added a consecutive sentence of participation in conspiracy.[85] Entering into a conspiracy to beat and rob is perse an offence under s 120B even if the offences which had formed the object of the conspiracy, are not committed at all. If, however, the accused have actually carried out their conspiracy and are convicted and sentenced separately for several acts which constituted the object of the conspiracy, separate sentence for offences under s 120B will not be called for.[86]

16. Accused Charged with Section 396 Cannot be Convicted under Section 302

Where the FIR allegation and the documents under s 173, CrPC, collected by the prosecution clearly indicate that the accused person allegedly committed dacoity with murder and on the basis of allegations in the FIR and evidence collected during investigation, they were charged under s 396, IPC, but the prosecution could not prove that dacoity took place and two deceased were murdered, during commission of dacoity, it was held that the evidence no doubt show that the two deceased were murdered, the accused persons cannot be convicted under s 302 merely on the basis of these proved facts as no charge under s 302 was framed nor evidence led to show that they committed murder, if the accused persons are convicted under s 302, IPC, it would be denial of fair trial.[87] However, where no prejudice has been caused to the accused, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC would not be set aside merely for want of framing of a specific/alternate charge for an offence under s 302, IPC .[88]

17. Sentence

In a serious case of dacoity, any leniency in sentence would not only be undesirable but also would be improper. The passage of time cannot wash away gravity of offence. Conviction held proper.[89]

The offence under this section is punishable with death, or imprisonment for life, or a rigorous imprisonment for ten years. The section does not envisage rigorous imprisonment for a term exceeding ten years, there is no middle course between ten years rigorous imprisonment and imprisonment for life. Rigorous imprisonment for fourteen years cannot be awarded.[90] Courts will not be justified in not inflicting extreme sentence on grounds which are purely matters of grace and clemency.[91] The fact that murder was committed because the criminal was being brought to bay and in3407 the desire to escape, is not an extenuating circumstances.[1] Youth was not considered to be a ground for reduction of sentence of death in Emperor v Sheo Shanker .[2]

Where the accused betrayed a helpless old lady and murdered her before the dacoity and there was no question of any resistance by the said lady, the case was found amongst the rarest of rare cases and extreme penalty of death was awarded.[3] Where the appellant had committed dacoity and committed murders of five inmates of the house, deceased included two children, had no consideration for human lives, held the case fell within the category of rarest of rare cases, imposition of death sentence was held proper.[4]

The court should not hesitate in giving the maximum penalty of death in cases in which murders are committed.[5] It does not, however, mean that all the accused convicted under this section, must be sentenced to death.[6]

Where the case of dacoity with murder was not found amongst the rarest of rare cases, the sentence of death was reduced to imprisonment for life.[7]

Where no date for hearing of accused on the point of sentence was fixed, no opportunity of hearing was given to the accused, it is a valuable right of the accused which cannot be denied for speedy trial. Therefore, the sentence of life imprisonment was reduced to rigorous imprisonment for ten years and fine of Rs 2000/-.[8] Where the accused were already in custody for more than 7 years, and no proper opportunity was given to the accused persons to be heard on the point of sentence, however, remand of case for the said purpose was not necessary after a lapse of seven years from the date of conviction. Keeping in view the nature of the case specially that it was an unintentional murder of a child in course of the alleged dacoity, the sentence of life imprisonment reduced to sentence of 10 years rigorous imprisonment with a fine of Rs 5,000/-.[9] When the accused were from a poor section of society and they were coolies with no criminal antecedents, the sentence of life imprisonment awarded to them by the trial court was reduced to rigorous imprisonment for a period of 10 years.[10] Where the accused faced trial for a period of 15 years and thereafter, the reference and appeals have remained pending for two years, the sentence of death awarded to the accused under s 396, IPC, was reduced to one of life imprisonment.[11]

18. Consolidation of (Concurrent) Sentence in Different Cases

Sometimes, the same accused is convicted and sentenced in different cases. The question arises that if the sentences of imprisonment are awarded against the accused in different cases, whether it can be allowed to run concurrently.3408

The law in this regard is settled through a catena of decisions. In V Venkateshwarlu v State of Andhra Pradesh ,[12] a Division Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court had an occasion to consider the power and parameters of the court in directing the sentences to run concurrently. On an exhaustive review of the case law, Jayachandra Reddy J, as he then was, speaking for the Bench, held as under:

> It must be remembered that section 427 , CrPC, provides for directing the sentence awarded in the subsequent case to run concurrently with the previous sentence. It may be that the subsequent convicting court was not > apprised about the existence of the previous sentence. At any rate ordering of sentence to run concurrently does not amount to altering the finding. It may be noted that section 31 , CrPC, provides for ordering the sentences to run concurrently in a given case. Likewise, under section 427 , CrPC, while awarding a sentence in a subsequent case in respect of the person who is already undergoing sentence in a previous case, a discretion is given to the subsequent convicting court to give such a direction and order the sentence to run concurrently with previous sentence. As laid down in the above decisions, even after such a sentence has become final, nothing prevents the High Court to exercise its suo motu revisional jurisdiction or entertain an application under section 482 , CrPC, and give the necessary directions as provided under section 427 , CrPC

However, as regard the exercise of power to direct the sentence to run concurrently, their lordship held as under:

> In the instant case, the petitioner is convicted for the offence of dacoity in both the cases. Having regard to the nature of the offence, we do not think that this is a fit case where we should exercise our inherent power or suo motu revisional power in favour of the petitioners.

A Full Bench of the Madhya Pradesh High Court in Sher Singh v State of Madhya Pradesh [13] held that such a course of action is permissible under s 437(1), CrPC, and the power can be exercised even when the matter is brought before the High Court in an application under s 482, CrPC .

In Gandikota Narsaiah v Superintendent Central Prison, Warangal ,[14] Bilal Nazki J took the view that though the High Court has the power to direct the sentences to run concurrently, it is not advisable to exercise such power in cases of dacoity.

In Ammavasai v Inspector of Police ,[15] the Hon'ble Supreme Court affirmed the view that consolidation of sentences against the same accused in various cases is permissible. As regard exercise of that power, it had struck a balance between the wholesale consolidation of sentences and total denial of the facility. The sentences in various cases were clubbed into two groups depending on the number of cases in which the respective appellants are involved and the sentences in the cases of each group were directed to run concurrently. The resultant sentences in the respective groups were ordered to run one after the other.

Thus, when the accused is found to have committed offences under ss 395, 412, 399, 400 and 402, IPC, in different places and at different times, their sentences can be directed to run concurrently in the interest of justice by way of consolidation of sentences.[16]3409

However, the same High Court in an earlier case took a contrary view and was of the opinion that if the sentence given to the accused in an offence committed during a period of two years is directed to run concurrently, it will be a licence to offenders particularly to those who appear to be professional dacoits. The present petitioner has also been convicted in three cases of dacoity and if the court directs that the sentence should run concurrently, it will be a licence for such offenders to go on committing offences for number of years before they are caught by the police. Whether they commit one offence or dozen offences they will know that they have to suffer only one set of sentence and this will be a dangerous trend. Therefore, the sentence of imprisonment in all cases would not be directed to run concurrently.[17]

19. Alteration of Conviction from Sections 396 / 149 to Sections 396 / 34 --Propriety of

When all the five accused are proved to have participated in the murder and dacoity, though out of them the trial of one juvenile accused has been split, the conversion of conviction of the accused from s 396 read with s 149, IPC, recorded by the sessions court to one under s 396 read with s 34, IPC, by the High Court is not proper.[18]

20. Alteration of Conviction from Section 396 to one under Section 395

Where the accused persons were convicted by the trial court under ss 302 / 149 and s 396, IPC, etc, but on an appeal being filed, the High Court found the accused guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder and not of murder, so altered the conviction of the accused persons from ss 302 / 149 to ss 304 / 149, Pt II, IPC . Further, in view of the conclusion arrived at by the High Court that the offence committed by the accused persons was not murder, the conviction of the accused persons was also altered from s 396 to one under s 395, IPC .[19]

21. Alteration of Conviction from Section 396 to one under Section 394

A reading of s 396, IPC shows that for the conviction of the said offence, there should be a minimum five persons. The number factor is often as crucial in law as in politics. A solitary number in the latter may bring down a government, while in the former a charge under s 396, IPC . When in a trial under s 396 against six accused persons, two accused are acquitted, the remaining four accused cannot be convicted under s 396, IPC . In such circumstances the conviction of the four accused persons by the trial court under s 396 is liable to be altered to s 394, IPC .[20]

22. Alteration of Conviction from Section 396 to one under Section 411

Where three days after the incident, recovery of looted property was effected, the Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the Allahabad High Court upholding the conviction and sentence of the accused for the offence under s 396, IPC, and instead convicted him for one under s 411, IPC .[21] When the offence of dacoity with murder was not proved against the accused, but the recovery of looted property was3410 established from the possession of the accused, and the accused could not account for such possession, the conviction of the accused under s 396 was altered to one under s 411, IPC .[22]

Where the evidence established against some of the accused persons showed that they were found in possession of looted property within a very short time, their conviction under s 3 was altered to one under s 411, IPC .[23]

23. Alteration of Conviction from Section 396 to one under Section 392 and Section 302

Where two of the three miscreants committed murder and robbery, the trial court convicted all the accused persons under s 396, the conviction of the said two accused was altered from s 396 to one under ss 392 and 302, IPC .[24]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 397.

Robbery or dacoity, with attempt to cause death or grievous hurt.--

If, at the time of committing robbery or dacoity, the offender uses any deadly weapon, or causes grievous hurt to any person, or attempts to cause death or grievous hurt to any person, the imprisonment with which such offender shall be punished shall not be less than seven years.

Comments

1. Scope

The plain reading of s 397 of IPC as well as per the settled legal position, it is merely a rider to s 394 of IPC . It does not create any substantive offence. It is complimentary3411 to ss 392 and 395 of IPC which create substantive offence. But merely because the offence committed falls in the area which could be covered under s 392 of IPC, has been committed by a mob of the persons who have been charge-sheeted are more than five in number, by itself would not attract s 397 of IPC . The facts stated by each prosecution witness and the complainant should be weighed and some sifting permissible can be done.[25] A conviction under s 397 is equally good whether the number of thieves be five or less than five.[26] The provisions of this section are attracted if, at the time of committing robbery or dacoity, the offender uses a deadly weapon, or causes grievous hurt to any person, or attempts to cause death or grievous hurt to any person.[27] A deadly weapon must have been used at the time of committing robbery or dacoity, and not before its commission.[28] Unless it is proved that the accused was armed with a gun or a deadly weapon at the time of commission of robbery or dacoity to threaten the persons robbed or their companions, the accused cannot be convicted under s 397, IPC .[29]

2. Sections 392, 394 and 397 Compared

Commentary under the same heading in s 394, ante, may be referred to.

3. Neither new Offence Created nor Constructed Liability is Attracted

The provisions of s 397, IPC, does not create any new substantive offence as such but merely serves as complementary to ss 392 and 395, IPC by regulating the punishment already provided for dacoity by fixing a minimum term of imprisonment when the dacoity committed was found attendant upon certain aggravating circumstances viz., use of a deadly weapon, or causing of grievous hurt or attempting to cause death or grievous hurt. For that reason, no doubt the provision postulates only the individual act of the accused to be relevant to attract s 397, IPC and thereby inevitably negates the use of the principle of constructive or vicarious liability engrafted in s 34, IPC .[30]

4. Ingredients of the Offence

The ingredients of the offence are as under:

(1) The commission of robbery or dacoity as described in ss 392 and 395, IPC respectively;
(2) The accused -

   (a) used a deadly weapon, or
   (b) caused grievous hurt, or
   (c) attempted to cause death or grievous hurt;

(3) he did so at the time of committing the robbery or dacoity.[31]3412

5. 'Offender'

The term 'offender' in s 397, IPC, is confined to the offender who uses any deadly weapon. The use of a deadly weapon by one offender at the time of committing robbery cannot attract s 397 for the imposition of the minimum punishment on another offender who had not used any deadly weapon.[32] The expression 'the offender' used in s 397 pertains to the actual offender or accused persons who at the time of committing robbery or dacoity uses any deadly weapon or causes grievous hurt to any person or attempts to cause death or grievous hurt to any person and it does not include all such persons who participate in the commissions of such robbery or dacoity.[33] Since the accused A-1 did not use any weapon in the commission of the offence, his conviction under s 397, IPC was set aside.[34]

The sentence for offence under s 397 of the IPC cannot be awarded to those of the members of the group dacoits who did not use any deadly weapon. Guilt under s 397 can be attributed only to that offender who uses any deadly weapon or causes grievous hurt to any person during course of the commission of the robbery. The provision postulates that only the individual act of accused will be relevant to attract s 397, IPC .[35]

6. 'Offender' under Section 396 and Section 397 --Distinction

Unlike s 396, IPC, in which the principle of vicarious liability is explicit and which stipulates that if during the commission of dacoity, one or more of the persons committing dacoity commits murder, then all would be liable for identical punishment. Section 397 , IPC, contains the principle of individual liability. The words used in it are the 'offender'. In other words, before s 397 can have any application, prosecution has to establish as to who was that offender or accused person who during the course of commission of robbery or dacoity was armed with a deadly weapon or caused grievous hurt to any person or attempted to cause the death or grievous hurt to any person.

A comparison of the language used in ss 396 and 397, IPC, justifies this inference. Had the legislature intended that the expression 'the offender' used in s 397 should include all such persons participating in the offence of robbery or dacoity, then it could have used language similar to that contained in ss 396 and 397 in place of its present text which would instead have read as follows: 'If at the time of committing robbery or dacoity any person uses any deadly weapon or causes grievous hurt to any person, or attempts to cause death or grievous hurt to any person every one of those persons participating in the commission of such robbery or dacoity shall be punished with imprisonment which shall not be less than seven years.'3413

The difference in the language used in ss 396 and 397, leaves no room for doubt that the expression 'the offender' used in s 397 pertains to the actual offender or accused person who at the time of committing robbery or dacoity uses any deadly weapon or causes grievous hurt to any person or attempts to cause death or grievous hurt to any person and it does not include all such persons who participate in the commission of such robbery or dacoity.

It would also be pertinent to point out that the Apex Court in the decision reported in Phool Kumar v Delhi Administration ,[36] has also taken the same view in paragraph five. The Apex Court observed thus:

> A difficulty arose in several High Courts as to the meaning of the word 'uses' in s 397 . The term 'offender' in that section as rightly held by several High Courts, is confined to the offender who uses any deadly weapon. The use of a deadly weapon by one offender at the time of committing robbery cannot attract s 397 for the imposition of the minimum punishment on another offender who had not used any deadly weapon.[37]

7. Distinction between Section 397 and Section 394

The liability under s 397, IPC is individual, and not constructive. This would become crystal clear from an analysis of the text of s 397, IPC . However, a perusal of the text of s 394, IPC would show that not only the person who causes hurt but an associate of his/her would be equally liable for the mischief contemplated by the section. Thus, unlike s 397 (wherein, the liability is only individual), the liability under s 394 is both individual and vicarious.[38]

8. Distinction between Sections 397 and 398

Commentary under the same heading in s 398, post, may be referred to.

9. 'Uses'

What is essential to satisfy the word 'uses' for the purposes of s 397, IPC is the robbery being committed by an offender who was armed with a deadly weapon which was within the vision of the victim so as to be capable of creating a terror in the mind of victim, and not that it should be further shown to have been actually used for cutting, stabbing, shooting, as the case may be.[39] The word 'uses', in s 397, should be given a wider meaning, and should not be confined merely to cutting, stabbing or shooting, as the case may be, but also to carrying the weapon for the purpose of overwhelming the victims of dacoity. If a dacoit is armed with a deadly weapon, then undoubtedly, he inspires the victim with the feeling of fear and his power of resistance is, to a great extent, paralysed.[40] This would be so even though a3414 gun,[41] or a revolver,[42] is not actually fired. It is sufficient if a deadly weapon is carried for the purpose of overpowering the person robbed.[43] If a knife is used for the purpose of producing such an impression upon the mind of a person that he would be compelled to part with his property, that would amount to using the weapon.[44] If a dangerous weapon is so exhibited as to intend that the persons sought to be robbed are likely to be further intimidated and the commission of the robbery might be facilitated, the case would fall under this section.[45] The section does not require the uses of a deadly weapon to be against the person robbed.[46]

10. Attempt to Cause Grievous Hurt

Attempt to cause grievous hurt attracts application of s 397, IPC, actual causing of grievous hurt is not necessary for application of s 397, IPC .[47]

11. The Expressions 'Accused with Deadly Weapon' in Section 398 and 'Uses Deadly Weapon' in Section 397

Commentary under the same heading in s 398, post, may be referred to.

12. Brandishing a Knife to Commit Robbery is use of Knife

Brandishing a knife in order to commit robbery amounts to use of knife. Even if the victim is not stabbed and at knife point he is robbed or looted, the offence under s 397 is made out. It is not necessary that in order to attract s 397, IPC the deadly weapon is to be used in the sense that by use of it the person has to be injured. The use of weapon is also there when the weapon is brandished and a person is robbed/looted under the fear of his life caused by weapon.[48] Appellant accused had pointed pistol towards the victim and robbed him of his cash and PAN Card. Even though the pistol in FSL examination was not found in working order, the appellant accused was convicted for offence under s 397, IPC .[49]

13. 'At the Time of Committing Robbery or Dacoity'

If, at the time of committing robbery or dacoity, the accused do not use any deadly weapon, or do not cause grievous hurt to any person, or do not even attempt to cause death or grievous hurt to any person, and cause the injuries only when they are about to be apprehended by the crowd, no offence against the accused under this section is constituted.[50]3415

14. 'Deadly Weapon'

A clasp knife',[51] or a knife,[52] depending, of course, upon its size,[53] or a dagger,[54] or a revolver,[55] or a hatchet,[56] has been held to be a deadly weapon. Guns and swords are, of course, deadly weapons.[57] However, plain sticks are not deadly weapons.[58]

A knife is often described as a pocket-knife, pen-knife, table-knife, kitchen-knife etc. It cannot be denied that a knife can be used as a weapon of offence. It can cut, it can pierce, it can be deadly. To say that a knife to be a deadly weapon should be of a particular size, would perhaps be not a correct statement.[59] Use of a knife at the time of commission of robbery does not ipso facto bring the case under s 397, IPC . The prosecution is required to prove that the knife used falls in the category of 'deadly weapon' within the meaning of s 397, IPC .[60]

As to lathis with which dacoits are frequently armed, it has been generally held that they do not fall within the meaning of deadly weapons.[61] It has, however, been held, in a Nagpur case,[62] that in a country like India, where many murders, if not most, are committed with sticks, lathis are deadly weapons within the meaning of s 397, IPC . However, the view of the Supreme Court[63] is that in the absence of other descriptions given to the weapon, merely describing the weapons as bamboo sticks or lathis is not enough to make the weapons lethal or deadly.

15. 'Causes Grievous Hurt'

It may be noted that the term 'voluntarily' has not been used in this section. Evidently, if, at the time of committing the robbery or dacoity, grievous hurt is caused even though not directly from the violence caused by the offender, the case would be covered by the section. Thus, if a fracture is caused not from the blows given by the offender but by reason of the fall, the case would fall within the purview of this section.[64] Any hurt which endangers life is a grievous hurt. The term 'endangers life' is much stronger than the expression 'dangerous to life'. Apart from that in s 397, IPC 'attempt' to cause grievous hurt attracts its application. The question whether the accused attempted to cause death or grievous hurt would depend upon the factual scenario. If the knife blow was given to a women on the chest just below the nipple, considering the place where injury was inflicted, i.e., on the chest, s 397, IPC is attracted.[65]3416

16. 'Such Offender'

The words 'such offender', at the end of this section, indicate that the case of that dacoit alone, who has been directly, and not vicariously guilty of using any deadly weapon, or of causing grievous hurt to any person, or of attempting to cause death or grievous hurt to any person, falls within the scope of this section.[66] The provisions of this section cannot, therefore, apply constructively.[67]

17. Constructive Liability

To render s 397, IPC, applicable, it must be proved that the offender himself committed the act and not that he was vicariously liable under s 397 . It does not create a substantive offence but merely prescribes minimum sentences for the accused who actually uses the deadly weapon or causes or attempts to cause grievous hurt to a person in the course of committing robbery or dacoity. It, thus, postulates individual acts of the accused. It has no scope for constructive liability. The individual act of an offence covered by s 397 does not make his fellow miscreants liable under s 397 .[68]

The term 'offender', in s 397, is confined to the offender who uses any deadly weapon. The use of a deadly weapon by one offender at the time of committing robbery cannot attract s 397 for the imposition of the minimum punishment on another offender who had not used any deadly weapon.[69]

Thus, it can be said that s 397 cannot be applied constructively and relates only to the offender who actually uses the weapon himself. Section 34 or s 149, IPC, have no application to a case covered by s 397, IPC .[70]

18. FIR

When the FIR contained the signature of the complainant, it cannot be said to be unreliable merely because the complainant stated before the court that his brother had accompanied him to the police station and lodged the report.[71]

19. Age of Accused

The estimate of an accused given in the statement recorded under s 313, CrPC, should be accepted as correct and the court would not be justified in substituting it by3417 its own estimate.[72] Where the date of occurrence was 10 November 1982; the date of birth of accused in school register was shown as 26 August 1969, and accused gives his age as 17 years in his statement under s 313, CrPC, made in December 1983, the radiologist in his report dated 16November 1983 stated the age of the accused as not more than 16 years on the date of occurrence, no evidence was produced by the prosecution to rebut the date given in the school register. On these facts, it was held that the accused was not more than 16 years of age at the date of commission of the offence and the case was triable only by a children's court under the Children Act.[73]

20. Non-recovery of Weapon of Offence

It cannot be accepted, simply because the knife used in the commission of the offence could not be recovered that the weapon was not used at all. When there is unimpeachable evidence in the case that knives were used by accused persons, non-recovery of the knives is not fatal to the prosecution case. Therefore, there is no question of reduction of sentence from s 392 read with s 397 and s 34, IPC, to one under s 393 read with s 34, IPC .[74]

Allegations were that the appellant accused entered the house of the complainant, intimidated inmates of the house and decamped with stolen articles viz. ornaments. Weapon of knife was not recovered nor produced in the court. Section 397 , IPC was not attracted in the case. Conviction of the appellant under s 397, IPC was altered to one under s 392, IPC .[75]

21. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

22. Identification of the Accused

Commentary under the relevant headings in s 392 and s 395, ante, may be referred to.

Where there was abnormal delay in holding of TI parade, the offence was committed on 2.8.2004, the accused persons were arrested on 28.10.2004, but the first TI parade was held on 9.11.2004 and the second TI was held on 20.1.2005, no credence was given to the result of identification parade and the accused were acquitted of the charge under s 397, IPC .[76]

23. Charge

A substantive charge of the offence of robbery or dacoity, as the case may be, should be framed, and the following paragraph should be added:

> That, at the time of committing robbery/dacoity, you used deadly weapon, to wit, (or caused grievous hurt to(name the person), or attempted to cause death or grievous3418 hurt to(name the person), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under ss 392 / 395, read with s 39, of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

Section 397, IPC has reference not only to the offence of dacoity, but also to the offence of robbery. Where it is proposed to use s 397, either s 395 or s 392 should definitely be referred to in the charge so that the accused persons may know exactly what they have to meet.[77] A charge, if not so framed, would be defective,[78] but not when the accused have sufficient notice of the facts and no prejudice is caused to them.[79]

When the charge under s 397, IPC was framed against the accused, he can be convicted under s 394 read with s 397, IPC, inspite of the fact that he has not been charged under s 394, IPC .[80]

There can be no charge or conviction under s 397, standing by itself, as this section creates no separate offence.[81]

An order for framing charge is revisable.[82]

24. Discharge

Where the facts of the case showed that a mob of over 40 persons, due to anger against some media persons snatched their video camera and some individual accused snatched a gold chain, this would not constitute offence of robbery. So the accused were entitled to be discharged from charge under s 397, IPC .[83]

25. Trial

A person accused of an offence under s 397, can, at the same trial, be by reason of s 221 (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, tried for an offence under s 394, IPC . Where the court can take cognizance of an offence under s 397 on the chargesheet submitted by the police, it can also try the accused for an offence under s 394, IPC .[84] Jurisdiction for trial is regulated by s 181(1), CrPC 1973.

26. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed robbery or dacoity; and
(b) in committing the robbery or dacoity, he:

(i) used a deadly weapon, or
(ii) caused grievous hurt to any person, or
(iii) attempted to cause death or grievous hurt to any person.3419

Where the allegation against the three accused persons were that, they entered the shop armed with a knife and snatched a sum of Rs 400 from the hands of the complainant, the entry of the third accused into the shop in question was doubtful due to contradictory statements of witnesses and his identity has not been proved, the third accused was therefore, entitled to the benefit of the doubt.[85]

The fact that the accused were arrested, more than a week after the date of dacoity with gun-shot injuries on their persons, may lead to an inference that they were concerned in some transactions in which the injuries were received, but not to the inference that they were present in the village on the date on which the particular dacoity took place, and that the injuries were received by them when committing the dacoity.[86]

When there are grave and serious infirmities and contradictions in the statement of prosecution witnesses and the only independent witness has not supported the prosecution as he turned hostile, it would not be safe to base conviction under s 392 read with s 397, IPC, on the statement of these witnesses.[87] When there is no evidence to show that at the time of committing robbery the accused used any deadly weapon or caused grievous hurt or made any attempt to cause death or grievous hurt to any person, the offence under s 397, IPC, is not made out.[88]

However, when witnesses uniformly stated that the accused played a leading role in snatching money from the complainant with a lethal weapon in his hand, the conviction of the accused under s 392 read with s 397, IPC, was found proper.[89]

Where after the dastardly acts of rape and murder the prosecutrix was relieved of her ornaments, the acts of the accused cannot be robbery as it was not done with the idea of depriving the girl of her ornaments, therefore, the charge under s 397, IPC, must fail.[90]

27. Conviction

Section 397, IPC does not create a separate offence. It has to be read with the principal offence and with the aid of s 397, IPC . Thus, where the accused was convicted under a charge under s 392 and sentenced to undergo five years rigorous imprisonment. Again, in the same case, he was convicted on the charge under ss 392, 397, IPC, and sentenced to undergo seven years rigorous imprisonment. This is not proper and a technical mistake has been committed by the trial court, therefore, the conviction and sentence under s 392 simplicitor was set aside and the conviction and sentence of the accused under ss 392 / 397, IPC, was maintained.[91] Victim was travelling in TSR. Accused driver of the TSR along with three other co-accused robbed the victim of his valuables at knife point, pushed down the victim and tried to flee away, but after chase he was arrested. Valuables of the victim and the offending weapon knife were recovered from his possession. Accused in furtherance of common intention with other co-accused committed the offence. Conviction under3420 ss 392 / 34 and 397 / 34, IPC was held proper.[1] Where the stolen properties viz. gold and silver ornaments were recovered from the house of the appellant accused, the stolen properties had distinctive marks, were also identified by the dacoity victims, medical evidence also proved injuries sustained by the victims, of dacoity, appellants accused were convicted under s 397, IPC .[2]

Where twelve appellant accused carrying deadly weapons intercepted the vehicle of the victims carrying large amount of cash, robbed the victims of their money, incident was fully proved, accused appellant were identified during trial of the case, their conviction under s 397, IPC was upheld.[3] Where the appellant accused attempted to loot the informant at the point of dagger, PWS identified him and caught him red-handed, and after seeing police, he attempted to run away, his conviction under ss 393 and 397, IPC was held proper.[4]

The prosecution case was that the petitioner had not taken steps for the preparation of the pension papers of the complainant. There was nothing to show/infer that the petitioner was entrusted any property which he used dishonestly. There was no evidence to show that the accused had threatened to destroy the pension papers of the complainant. No case under s 408, IPC*prima face* was made out, cognizance and process issued against the petitioner were set aside.[5]

Prosecution case was that accused appellants armed with fire arms committed murder of two persons, injured one and committed loot of valuable moveables. PW5 identified the accused appellants in TI parade and also before the court. Death of the deceased was due to gun shot injuries. Complainant and members of his family identified the moveables recovered on the disclosure statements made by accused. Accused appellants were convicted under ss 395, 396 and 397, IPC .[6]

An accused cannot be convicted under s 397, IPC alone. It is only an enabling section to provide the minimum sentence of seven years in cases of robbery and dacoity where the offender uses a deadly weapon, or causes hurt to any person, or attempts to cause death, or grievous hurt to any person. Thus, the accused can only be convicted under s 395 with the aid of s 397, and not merely under s 397, IPC .[7] The sentence should be under s 395, or one of the preceding sections, read with this section.[8]

If a person is charged only under s 395, IPC, he cannot be convicted under this section.[9]

28. Acquittal

Appellant accused was not identified by the witnesses. The only evidence was of recovery of stolen articles on the disclosure statement made by the accused appellant.3421 Where only evidence against the accused is recovery of stolen properties, then although the circumstances may indicate that the theft and murder might have been committed at the same time, it is not safe to draw an inference that the person in possession of the stolen property had committed the murder. It also depends on the nature of the property so recovered, whether it was likely to pass readily form hand to hand. Suspicion should not take the place of proof. The acquittal of the accused appellant for offences under ss 395, 396 and 397, IPC recorded by the High Court was not set aside.[10]

On the day of the occurrence at about 6.30 p.m., accused appellants were alleged to have committed dacoity at the house of the complaint, caused injuries and looted cash and ornaments worth Rs 50,000/-. Two of the accused also committed rape on two girls. The evidence showed that the accused were neighbours of the victim, the parties were on inimical terms. There was no evidence to substantiate the charge of rape. Oral evidence was full of contradictions. FIR was also delayed, was lodged long after the incident, in fact law was already set on motion after the telephonic message was received. Conviction of the accused under ss 395 / 397, IPC was not justified, was set aside.[11] In a serious case of dacoity, any leniency in sentence would not only be undesirable but also would be improper. The passage of time cannot wash away gravity of offence. Conviction was held proper.[12]

Prosecution case was that five persons including the appellant accused persons armed with lathi, revolver and knife entered the temple, tied the priest (complainant) of the temple with rope and took away collection box. Admittedly no injury was caused to the complainant. The testimony of the complainant and the sole witness examined in the case was inconsistent and contradictory. Conviction of the appellant accused under ss 452, 392 and 397, IPC was set aside.[13]

Where no question/suggestion was put to the accused in their examination under s 313 CrPC, accused were acquitted of the charge under s 397, IPC .[14]

Where the solitary eye-witness in the case failed to identify the accused at dock, the accused was acquitted of the charge under ss 397 and 302, IPC .[15]

29. Probation

Where the accused was a young man of 20 years and was convicted under ss 452, 397, IPC, and sentenced to seven years imprisonment, he hailed from a middle class respectable family having an atmosphere of educational culture, the report of the probation officer was also in his favour, the benefit of the Probation of Offenders Act was extended to the accused.[16]3422

30. Sentence--Plea-Bargaining not Permissible

When s 392 has to be read with s 397, IPC, in certain cases the court cannot award a sentence less than seven years of imprisonment. Neither the trial court nor the High Court has jurisdiction to bypass the minimum limit of sentence prescribed by law on the premise that a plea-bargain was adopted by the accused.[17]

Although by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2005 (2 of 2006), the provisions of plea-bargaining have been inserted in the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, but the offence under s 397 being punishable with the imprisonment for a minimum period of seven years, the legal position has not changed and the option of plea-bargaining is not available to the accused.[18]

31. Sentence

Section 397, IPC only makes the sentence more stringent so the imposition of a separate sentence for offences under ss 392 and 397, IPC, is illegal.[19] A person convicted under s 397 cannot be sentenced for a period of imprisonment less than seven years.[20] When the accused persons committed the offence of robbery by using deadly weapons, the award of sentence of three years is not legal. So, the sentence was enhanced to seven years rigorous imprisonment.[21]

However, when the weapon in possession of the accused were described as bamboo sticks or lathis

which was not enough to make the weapons lethal or deadly and there was no case that the accused inflicted or attempted to inflict grievous hurt, the limitation prescribed under s 397, IPC, for imposing minimum sentence of seven years cannot be applied.[22]3423

In ordinary circumstances, a sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment is the minimum sentence which should be passed.[23] However, if there are mitigatingcircumstances, the appropriate Government, in an appropriate case, may, in exercise of its powers under s 432 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, remit or reduce the sentence of the convict.[24]

Where five persons of a family were brutally murdered, a minor girl was raped and then murdered, award of death sentence was held proper.[25]

In a case where a highway robbery is committed and passengers are looted by use of a knife of unusual proportion, a deterrent punishment is called for.[26]

In broad daylight and a high handed act of robbery on the public road, the accused are not entitled to any leniency.[27] The accused brandished a knife and demanded money from the complainant. On seeing the police, the accused started running away but was chased and caught red- handed. As the minimum sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment was awarded by the sessions court under s 397, IPC, the same was held not to be interfered with.[28]

32. Concurrent Sentence

Commentary under the same heading in s 392, ante, may be referred to.

33. Alteration of Conviction from Section 392 Read with Section 397 to one Under Section 392

Where the accused were convicted under ss 392 read with 397, IPC, but there was no evidence that at the time of committing robbery the accused used any deadly weapon or caused grievous hurt or made any attempt to cause death or grievous hurt to any person, the conviction of the accused was altered from under ss 392 read with s 397 read with s 34, IPC, to one under s 392 read with s 34, IPC .[29]

When the knife used for a robbery was found to be not a deadly weapon, the conviction of the accused under s 392 read with 397, IPC, was altered to one under s 392 .[30] In the absence of proof that pistols used were fire arms and hence deadly weapons, the conviction of the accused under ss 394 and 397 was modified to one under s 392, IPC .[31]

34. Alteration of Conviction from Section 394 Read with Section 397 to one Under Section 394

Where the prosecution witness stated that the accused gave a knife blow on his left thigh but the weapon was not recovered by the police, under these circumstances, it3424 could not be held that the weapons used by the accused in the commission of robbery was a 'deadly weapon', therefore, the conviction of the accused under s 394 read with s 397, IPC, was altered to one under s 394 .[32] Where the accused had not used the dagger for committing robbery though he subsequently inflicted injury on a constable with the dagger while being apprehended, the conviction of the accused was altered from ss 394 and 397 to one under s 394, IPC .[33]

In the absence of evidence establishing use of a deadly weapon and causing grievous injury to the victim, the conviction of the accused under ss 397 / 34 was altered to one under s 394, IPC .[34]

35. Alteration of Conviction from Section 397 to one under Section 412

Where the prosecution witnesses failed to identify the accused at the test identification parade, but the articles which were the subject-matter of dacoity were recovered at the instance of the accused giving rise to the presumption that he was a receiver of the property, the conviction of the accused under s 397 was altered to one under s 412, IPC .[35]

36. Alteration of Conviction from Section 392 Read with Section 397 to one under Section 411

Where there was no direct evidence of involvement of accused persons in the commission of robbery and only some of the robbed property was recovered from the accused, drawing presumption under s 114, Evidence Act, the conviction of the accused under s 392 read with s 397, IPC, was altered to one under s 411, IPC .[36]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 398.

Attempt to commit robbery or dacoity when armed with deadly weapon.--

If, at the time of attempting to commit robbery or dacoity, the offender is armed with any deadly weapon, the imprisonment with which such offender shall be punished shall not be less than seven years.

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section also, like the preceding s 397, does not, by itself, create a substantive offence.[37]Sections 397 and 398 always revolve around the provisions of s 395, IPC .[38]3425

Where a dacoity has been committed, and not merely attempted, and weapons are not merely carried, but are actually used, s 397, and not s 398, would apply.[39] A man cannot be convicted of abetting an offence under s 398, IPC .[40]

2. Distinction between Sections 397 and 398

The distinction between the provision of ss 397 and 398, IPC will appear from a comparison of the provisions of the two sections as follows:

	Section 397		Section 398
(a)	If, at the time of committing robbery or dacoity,	(a)	If, at the time of attempting to commit robbery or dacoity,
(b)	The offender uses any deadly weapon, or causes grievous hurt to any person, or attempts to cause death or grievous hurt to any person,	(b)	The offender is armed with any deadly weapon,
(c)	The imprisonment with which such offender shall be punished shall not be less than seven years.	(c)	The imprisonment with which such offender shall be punished shall not be less than seven years.

It will thus appear that s 397, IPC would be attracted to cases in which robbery or dacoity has been committed, while s 398 would apply only to an attempt to commit robbery or dacoity.[41] Secondly, s 397 would operate where the offender, at the time of committing robbery or dacoity, uses the deadly weapon while, on the other hand, s 398, IPC would apply when, at the time of attempting to commit robbery or dacoity, he is merely armed with a deadly weapon though he has not used it at all.

3. 'Offender'

The word 'Offender', appearing in this section, can refer only to the person who is proved to have been armed with a deadly weapon, and not to any other who, in combination with such person may have attempted to commit robbery or dacoity.[42]

4. 'Deadly Weapon'

Commentary under the same heading in s 397, ante, may be referred to.

Where knives were seized from the possession of the accused, but it was not shown that the knives seized were deadly weapons to attract the provisions of s 398, IPC, conviction of the accused for offence under s 398, IPC was held not justified, hence was set aside.[43]3426

A person cannot be convicted for offence under s 498, IPC unless he is armed with a deadly weapon while committing or attempting to commit robbery or dacoity.[44]

5. The Expressions 'Accused with Deadly Weapon' in Section 398 and 'Uses Deadly Weapon' in Section 397

Section 398 uses the expression 'armed with any deadly weapon' and the minimum punishment provided therein is also seven years if at the time of attempting to commit robbery the offender is armed with any deadly weapon. This has created an anomaly. It is unreasonable to think that if the offender who merely attempted to commit robbery but did not succeed in committing it attracts the minimum punishment of seven years under s 398, if he is merely armed with any deadly weapon, while an offender so armed will not incur the liability of the minimum punishment under s 397, IPC if he succeeded in committing the robbery. But then, what was the purport behind the use of the different words by the legislature in the two sections, viz, 'uses' in s 397 and 'is armed' in s 398, IPC . In our judgment the anomaly is resolved if the two terms are given the identical meaning. There seems to be a reasonable explanation for the use of the two different expressions in the sections. When the offence of robbery is committed by an offender being armed with a deadly weapon which was within the vision of the victim so as to be capable of creating a terror in his mind, the offender must be deemed to have used that deadly weapon in the commission of the robbery. On the other hand, if an offender was armed with a deadly weapon at the time of attempting to commit a robbery, then the weapon was not put to any fruitful use because it would have been of use only when the offender succeeded in committing the robbery.[45] Knife has been held deadly weapon for the purpose of s 398, IPC .[46]

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions. For local jurisdiction, s 181(1), CrPC 1973, may be referred to.

7. Identification of an Accused

Commentary under the same heading in s 392, ante, may be referred to.

8. Charge

The form of the charge would be the same as under the preceding s 397 with necessary modifications.

To justify a conviction under s 398, IPC, there must be a charge framed of the offence in which the carrying of arms is distinctly illegal. Where the accused are charged and convicted for an offence punishable under s 395, IPC, they cannot be punished under s 398, IPC .[47]3427

9. Proof

To establish a charge under this section the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused attempted to commit robbery or dacoity; and
(b) he was armed with a deadly weapon at that time.

The accused attempted to commit robbery armed with a deadly weapon in the post office. The evidence showed that on shouts being raised other persons also came to the place of occurrence, and the accused was overpowered and caught red- handed. From the possession of the accused two chits written in Hindi were recovered in which the demand for handing over whatever cash was lying in the post office was made, failing which the employees of the post office would be murdered. In such type of cases when there are minor discrepancies in the evidence of the prosecution witnesses, the same cannot help the accused, particularly, when the evidence of the complainant and the other witnesses who were present at the time of the incident is found otherwise reliable. Therefore, the conviction of the accused under s 398, IPC, was found proper.[48]

10. Acquitted

Though PW3 complainant PSI has stated in his evidence that he secured the presence of CWS 1 and 2 as panchas at the scene of offence itself and seized 3 MO nos. 1 and 2 knives from the possession of accused nos. 1 and the said CWS 1 and 2 were not examined to prove the seizure of MO Nos. 1 and 2 under the panchnama Ex P1, PWS 4 and 5 did not depose anything about the Police apprehending the accused at the scene of offence itself and seizing of MO Nos. 1 and 2, the two knives from the person of accused nos. 1 and 3. Though it was alleged that the said four persons were holding knives and clubs also, no club was said to have been seized from any of the accused nos. 2 and 4. Besides this, no evidence whatsoever was produced on record by the prosecution to establish that MOS 1 and 2, the knives said to have been seized from the person of accused nos. 1 and 3 were deadly weapons so as to attract the penal provisions of s 398, IPC . Conviction of the accused appellant by the trial court recorded under s 398, IPC read with s 511, IPC was set aside.[49]

The very identification of the accused appellant was doubtful. The accused appellant was convicted solely on the evidence that the murder weapon which had been recovered at his instance had been matched with the bullet recovered from the dead body. Recovery of offence weapon was itself doubtful. The case of the acquitted co-accused was similar. The accused appellant was also acquitted of the charges under ss 393, 398 and 302, IPC .[50]

The prosecution case was that the appellants accused attempted to commit dacoity and also attempted assaults on the lives of the constables. There were serious discrepancies in the evidence of the PWS, the prosecution had suppressed the genesis of the crime. The prosecution case was found doubtful and accused appellants were acquitted of the charges under ss 398, and 307/34, IPC .[51]3428

11. Sentence

The fact that the accused was poor or only 19 years old at the time of the offence or he has to maintain his old parents and he is the only earning member of his family, are no grounds for imposing a lesser sentence. In our country lakhs of people are living below the poverty line, but they do not indulge in these types of activities of loot and robbery. Even if the accused had not fired from his tamancha or was unable to loot a paise, that could not be a ground for imposing a lesser sentence.[52]

In cases where the offender is armed with a deadly weapon, the legislature has prescribed a minimum sentence of seven years for an attempt to commit robbery. It would not be proper to exercise discretion to inflict a lesser punishment if the offender is found guilty of robbery.[53]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 399.

Making preparation to commit dacoity.--

Whoever makes any preparation for committing dacoity, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

Dacoity is the only offence which the legislature has made punishable at four stages, i.e., preparation [s 399, IPC], assembling for the purpose of committing dacoity [s 402, IPC], attempt at dacoity [s 395 read with s 398, IPC], and commission of dacoity [s 395 read with s 397, IPC]. The last two stages are treated alike and come within the detention under s 395, IPC .[54]3429

This section provides for punishment for preparation of the offence of dacoity. Dacoity is one of those offences in which preparation alone is an offence which is not the case with any other offence except those under ss 122 and 126, IPC .

Preparation, which is punishable, is only for the offence of dacoity, and not for any lesser offence like house-breaking or robbery.[55] In the words, in 'preparation for committing dacoity', it is implicit that the persons making preparation have conceived the design of committing dacoity. In other words, the section contemplates that there is a general design to commit dacoity or engage in an expedition for that purpose though the plans of the dacoits are not matured.[56] It is not necessary that the persons shown to be making the preparation should be five or more in number. It is, however, necessary to prove that the raid, for which they were making preparation, was to be committed by five or more persons; otherwise, it would not be a dacoity, but merely a robbery.[57]It is also not necessary that the accused should have done an overt act towards the commission of dacoity. The law requires that they should have done some act to get ready for a dacoity. The prosecution need not prove what part the accused took. It is sufficient if it is shown that the accused was a member of the gang who made preparation for dacoity.[58] If five or more persons of different castes and places move about, armed with guns and a lot of ammunition and torches, and are found assembled at night, in a solitary place and begin to run when challenged by the police, then there are very strong circumstances for coming to the conclusion that the accused assembled for the purpose of and were all set for committing a dacoity.[59]

2. Section 399 and Section 402 Compared and Contrasted

The legislature wanted to draw a distinction between preparation for a dacoity and assembling for committing dacoity. There may be preparation for dacoity without any assembling. For example, five persons in their respective villages are asked by a person to make preparations, one by purchasing a gun, another by getting torches, the third by buying masks, the fourth by buying gun-powder, and the fifth by collecting lathis, each with the intention of committing dacoity. Each one of them would be guilty of preparation for dacoity.[60]Section 402 contemplates a stage when the whole project still lies in the realm of design and intention without any attempt having yet been made to give a concrete shape.

However, the project advances a step further when one of them does some act amounting to a preparation even if it be by himself. In certain circumstances, the assembly may itself amount to preparation, for example, when five or more persons, after having planned a dacoity and after having collected the necessary arms and implements, agree to assemble at a forsaken temple in a jungle in order to proceed therefrom to the place of the raid, and, in pursuance of that agreement, do, in fact, assemble there. The assembly, in such a case, would not be an assembly as contemplated by s 402, but would be an act of preparation and the person may be charged under s 399 .[61] Thus, the offence falling under s 402 and the one falling under3430 s 399, would probably involve almost similar ingredients, the only difference being that under s 402, mere assembly without other preparation is enough, whereas s 399 is attracted when some additional step is taken only in the course of preparation.[62] The offence under s 402 is complete as soon as five or more persons assemble together for the purpose of committing a dacoity. Preparation for committing a dacoity may take place before or after the dacoits assemble together.[63] However, a mere assembly without further preparation is not a preparation within the meaning of s 399 . If this were so, s 402 would be redundant. Section 402 applies to the case of mere assembling without proof of other preparations. Similarly, a person may be guilty of preparation though not of dacoity, or of an assembly though not of preparation.[64]Whether a case falls under s 402 or s 399 depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. It is not always easy to find out with what intention and purpose the persons had assembled because very rarely there would be direct evidence in this respect. The purpose or intention, with which the crime is committed, has to be deduced from the facts and circumstances of each case. If persons merely assemble with the object of committing a dacoity, the case may be covered by s

402, but may not be covered by s 399 without there being any preparation in that direction. Essential requirements of s 399 are that the accused had made some preparation and that the preparation was for the purpose of committing dacoity. As to what particular act or kind of steps would constitute preparation, no hard and fast rule can be laid down. Once the circumstances make out that the persons assembled had conceived the design of committing dacoity, then any step, taken with the intention or purpose of forwarding that design, would justify the court in coming to the conclusion that there had been preparation within the meaning of s 399, IPC .[65]

From the above discussion, it is clear that in order to establish an offence punishable under s 399, IPC, some act amounting to preparation must be proved and what must be proved further is an act for which preparation was being made was a dacoity, that is to say, robbery to be committed by five or more persons. The prosecution has to establish under s 402, IPC that there had been an assembly of five or more persons constituted for the purpose of committing dacoity, and that the accused persons were members of that assembly. If there is no clear and acceptable evidence of any assemblage of the appellants with three or more persons for the purpose of committing dacoity, then the appellants cannot be held liable under s 402, IPC .[66]

3. 'Preparation'

What is made punishable under this section is the making of a preparation for committing dacoity.[67] Preparation consists in devising or arranging means necessary for committing an offence,[68] and an attempt is a direct movement towards the3431 commission, after the preparations are made.[69] The test for determining whether the acts constitute attempt or preparation is that if overt acts, already done, are such that if the offender changes his mind and does not proceed further in its progress, the acts, already done, would be completely harmless, they would constitute only preparation, and not attempt, where, however, the thing done is such that, if not prevented by an extraneous cause, would fructify into commission of the offence, it would amount to an attempt to commit an offence.[70] If a single person, when he intends in his own mind to commit robbery conjointly with four other persons and having formed such intention, does some act towards achieving that end, he can be said to have made some preparation for committing dacoity.[71]The mere act of delivery of speeches by a naxalite for increasing membership of his cult and inviting them to adopt unlawful means, including commission of dacoity, does not amount to preparation.[72]

Mere assembling of accused persons and the recovery of weapons from their possession would not constitute offence under ss 399 and 402, IPC unless evidence proves that they were planning to commit dacoity. The possibility that they might have collected there, for the purpose of murdering somebody or committing some other crime, cannot be eliminated. The order discharging the accused persons was upheld.[73]

The prosecution is required to establish by evidence direct or indirect or from standing circumstances that the accused had assembled for preparation of dacoity. Mere assembly and mere recovery of fire arms are not sufficient to prove the charge.[74]

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

5. Sanction

No sanction under s 196, CrPC 1973, is necessary when the evidence led in the committing court, goes to show that the alleged offences fall within the purview of ss 120B and 399, IPC .[75] But in the absence of proof of valid sanction for prosecuting the accused persons under s 39 of the Arms Act, the charge under s 25(1B)(a) and s 25(1B)(b) of Arms Act also fails.[76]

6. Separate Appeals filed--one Appeal Decided--Effect on Other Appeal

Where out of the five accused convicted under ss 399 and 402, IPC, one accused preferred an appeal and other four accused preferred separate joint appeal, but both appeals were not connected or consolidated due to official error. The appeal of one3432 accused was allowed and his conviction and sentence were set aside, holding that whole prosecution story was concocted and was not worth believing. The principle of stare decisis applies in the matter, so in the joint appeal of the other four accused, observing that the assembly of the accused persons for the purposes of committing dacoity at the alleged date, time and place was not established, the joint appeal was also allowed.[77]

7. Identification of Accused

Commentary under the relevant heading in s 392 and s 395, ante, may be referred to.

The prosecution witnesses did not describe the appellant accused either in their statement recorded under s 161 CrPC or prior to holding of TI Parade before the Magistrate. Although, they claimed in their testimonies, that they had seen the appellant in the full moon light, but this fact was not mentioned by them in their statements recorded under s 161 CrPC . The identification of appellant accused in TI parade was highly doubtful. He was acquitted of the charges under ss 399, 392 and s 307 read with s 149, IPC .[78]

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Session Judge,etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.day of., at., made preparation, to wit. (mention the acts), for committing dacoity, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 399 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused took some step which amounted to preparation; and
(b) he did so for the purpose of committing dacoity.

In order to convict a person of the offence under s 399, IPC, the prosecution is bound to prove that the accused was making or had made preparation for committing dacoity. In the absence of any evidence on record to show that any of the accused was devising or arranging any means or measures for committing the dacoity, it cannot be said that the prosecution has proved that they were making, or had made, preparation for committing dacoity by showing the mere fact that they were sitting in the waiting hall at the railway station and started running away at the sight of the constable and were caught after a chase, and that a country-made gun, a whistle and a torch of five cells were recovered from their possession.[79] The prosecution must prove that there were persons who had conceived the design of committing dacoity. Where there was no evidence of any conspiracy between the accused to commit dacoity, none of the accused were seen at any time prior to their arrest in the village3433 in which they were arrested, no implements of house-breaking were recovered from any of them and none of them was a previous convict, it was held that the prosecution had failed to prove that the accused had conceived the design of committing dacoity.[80] Mere assembling of accused persons and the recovery of weapons from their possession would not constitute offence under ss 399 and 402, IPC unless evidence proves that they were planning to commit dacoity.[81] Where a group of persons were warming themselves around the fire in the open fields and some of them ran on seeing the headman's party and two of them were found carrying firearms and cartridges, it was held that the facts did not amount to proof of preparation for committing dacoity.[82] When 7-8 accused persons assembled at a place for committing dacoity, it cannot be believed that no injury could take place on either side.[83]

Similarly, the mere fact that certain persons (more than five in number) were found at 10 am in the campus of a school, quite dose to the market, does not, by itself, prove that they had assembled there for the purpose of committing dacoity or for making preparations to accomplish that object. The possibility that they may have collected for the purpose of murdering somebody or for committing any other offence, cannot be ruled out. In the absence of any legal evidence to support the charge, they cannot be convicted under ss 399 and 402, IPC .[84]

It is unbelievable that the accused person would be talking at the pitch of the voice so as to be audible by the police hiding or concealing nearby. The fact that inspite of the alleged possession of arms, the accused did not use them after the police fired two shots, makes the prosecution case unreliable. There was no public witness examined by the prosecution and not a single penny was recovered from the accused persons, which was improbable. On these facts, the accused persons were found entitled to an acquittal.[85] When the prosecution case about the occurrence, arrest of the accused and recoveries alleged to be made is highly doubtful, the accused are entitled to be acquitted under ss 399 / 302, IPC .[86] However, when the accused were arrested on the spot, the testimony of the police official who was the architect of the raid was corroborated by duly proved GD entry and articles recovered from the spot, the defence set up by the accused was found false, the accused were found liable for conviction under ss 399 and 402, IPC .[87]

In Chaturi Yadav v State of Bihar ,[88] eight persons, including the accused were found in the school premises, which was quite close to the market at 1 a.m. and some of them were armed with guns, some had cartridges and others ran away. In these circumstances, it was held that their mere presence, with some weapons, in the school premises at 1 a.m. did not, by itself, establish that they assembled there for making preparation, to commit dacoity. In Choltuy Modi v State of Bihar ,[89] some3434 persons were found present, with weapons, at that place, at night, which was under construction. In these circumstances it was held that their mere presence with weapons at that place, at night was not, by itself, sufficient to establish that they had assembled there, for the purpose of making preparation, to commit dacoity. In Brijlal Mandal v State of Bihar ,[90] the accused were found sitting in the waiting hall of a Railway Station armed with various types of weapons. They were apprehended, but there was no proof that they had assembled for making preparation, to commit dacoity and no other offence. In these circumstances, it was held that they did not commit the offences, punishable under ss 399 and 402, IPC .

10. Each case to be Judged on its own Merit

Each case must be considered on its own merits and must rest, in ultimate analysis on its own particular facts.[91]Accordingly, no hard and fast rule can be laid down that any particular act, or any particular kind of steps, towards the commission of an offence is necessary to constitute 'preparation'.[92] What can be stated broadly on the basis of an authority in Ramchandra Madkami v State of Orissa [93] is that the making of the preparation should be shown to the satisfaction of the court by such act as the collection of men, arms, provisions, etc, which, coupled with other circumstances plainly manifests an intention to commit dacoity. Where the accused were found concealed in day time in a room, armed with weapons and no plausible explanation was offered by anyone of them regarding their presence in the house and one of them fired a gun when the sub-inspector opened the door, it was held that the burden of proof lay heavily upon the accused to show that their intentions were innocent, and that they had assembled in the house not for the purpose of committing any dacoity, but for some other ostensible lawful purpose.[94] Such presumption is, however, rebuttable, and it is open to such persons to show that they had assembled for a lawful purpose.[95] Where a band of armed men, miles away from their own village with unlicensed firearms, attempted to conceal their presence and threatened those who enquired who they were, resisted the pursuit and fired at those who pursued, it was held that the only reasonable inference was that they were dacoits and had made preparation to commit dacoity.[96]

11. Accused Possessing Deadly Weapon--Effect

The possession of chopper or knife or an axe or a dagger or a spear, by itself, is not sufficient to show that persons possessing such weapons are the members of a gang of dacoits and had assembled for committing dacoity. Since the possession of such day to day use weapons can be properly explained, especially by villagers/labourers, some more natural evidence, credible and specific evidence is necessary to attract offences under ss 399, 402, IPC .[97]3435

12. Accused Possessing Instruments of House-breaking--Effect

Member of a gang, taking into their possession, instruments of house-breaking and arms and actually proceeding to the place near the scene of the contemplated dacoity, would be guilty under this section,[1] and the mere fact that the accused charged with dacoity, did not carry instruments of house-breaking, or that they were not arrested near the place of the contemplated dacoity, is not sufficient for concluding that the accused did not assemble there after preparing for dacoity.[2]

However, the mere fact that the accused were arrested together and some of them were in possession of unlicensed weapons, but not in possession of any material required for committing house-breaking, would not necessarily lead to the inference that they had collected for the purpose of committing dacoity or that they had made preparation to commit dacoity.[3]

13. Police Party Hearing Conversation of the Accused--Evidence not Reliable

In cases falling under ss 399 / 402, IPC, the police usually come with a stereotyped story that on receiving secret information that a gang of dacoits would commit dacoity at the house of a person and that the gang would assemble at another place and the usual story of taking the witnesses, making them a part of the raiding party etc, and the conversation imputed to one of the dacoits was that it was now time that they should go to commit the dacoity at the house of the targeted person and thereupon the accused were challenged and had been overpowered and some of them were arrested and recoveries of various arms were made from their possession. However, it is difficult to believe that the dacoits would unnecessarily enter into a conversation as to where they were to commit dacoity and that too in such a loud voice that the police party hiding at a considerable distance would be able to hear them and that even if they discussed the details of what they were to do and also take the name of the person whose place the dacoity was to be committed, for they would discuss such matters only in whispers.[4]

When the accused persons were at a distance of 50 to 60 yards,[5] 40 to 80 paces,[6] or 45 to 76 paces,[7] or 25 to 30 paces,[8] the evidence of police officials who formed the raiding party, about the hearing of conversion amongst the dacoits was discarded and3436 was not at all found convincing keeping in view the distance between the raiding parties and, the alleged dacoits.

Where the accused persons were alleged to have assembled in the dharamshala and were planning to commit dacoity, it is doubtful that they were speaking so loudly that their conversation would be heard outside by the police.[9] However, where there was a common wall of the verandah and the two rooms in the verandah and the place where the police party had taken position, the accused though were not visible but only their voice was audible, it was quiet natural and possible that talks of the accused amongst themselves were quiet audible to the police party.[10]

14. Accused Neither Attempting to flee on Seeing Police, nor Resisting Arrest--Evidence Unreliable

The testimony of police inspector is rendered doubtful due to the fact that though the accused persons were alleged to be armed with country made pistols, cartridges and jute bonds and making preparations to commit dacoity, yet they neither attempted to flee nor resorted to firing to avoid their arrest. The prosecution evidence also does not show that any resistance was offered by the three accused persons in their arrest. This renders the prosecution story extremely doubtful.[11]

15. Crime Number Mentioned in Arrest Memo but not on Seizure Memo--Effect

When deadly weapons like pistol and tangi were seized from the accused persons, on arrest memos of the accused persons the crime number was mentioned which created serious doubt that the accused persons were not arrested on the spot, whereas on seizure memos, no crime number was mentioned. If seizure memo and the arrest memo are kept in juxtaposition it would reveal that one of the document was manufactured. So, the conviction of the accused persons was liable to be set aside.[12]

16. Accused not Firing at Police Party--Prosecution Case Doubtful

This is rather unlikely when bad characters had actually assembled and were preparing to commit dacoity, they would keep their arms and ammunitions in their jholas or not take out the same even on being challenged by the station officer particularly when they were beaten with lathis in the process of arrest.[13] The fact that inspite of the alleged possession of arms, the accused did not use them after the police fired two shots,[14] or the dacoits did not notice the presence of the police and did not open fire is difficult to believe and makes the prosecution case unreliable.[15]3437

17. Non-Recovery of Coins and Currency Notes from Accused--Effect

The important point is that when the police party did not recover a single penny from the possession of any of the accused persons, non-recovery of coins or currency notes from the pockets of the accused persons makes the prosecution story doubtful.[16]

18. Non-Obtaining Signature of Accused on Seizure Memo and Non- supply of its Copy to Accused--Effect

When neither signatures of the accused persons were obtained on the seizure memo, nor copy thereof was furnished to any of the accused persons, it is a serious lacuna in the prosecution case.[17]

19. Delay in Sending Parcel to CFSL

Delay of 12 days in sending the parcel by moharir malkhana to CFSL is a serious lacuna in the prosecution version. This lapse casts serious doubt about the truthfulness and credibility of the prosecution version.[18]

20. Non-examination of Moharir Malkhana

Non-examination of moharir malkhana and failure of the prosecution to even file his affidavit to testify to the safe custody of the recovered country-made pistol is also a serious lacuna in the prosecution version.[19]

21. Non-Deposit of CFSL form in Malkhana

Non-depositing the CFSL form in malkhana nor sending it along with the sample parcel to the office of the CFSL puts a serious question mark on the credibility of the prosecution version.[20]

22. Discarding Defence Evidence in Routine--Not Proper

Totally discarding the defence evidence without proper analysis or consideration and to proceed with the basic presumption that the defence witnesses always lie and the prosecution witnesses always tell the gospel truth is neither justified nor legitimate nor proper.[21]

23. Conviction

A conviction of an accused can be made both under ss 399 and 402, IPC .[22] Where a charge against the accused was for two separate offences laid in an alternative form,3438*i.e.*, one under s 399 (for making preparation for committing dacoity), but the charges were treated not alternatively but as additional, it was held that the acquittal of the accused under s 399 did not involve an acquittal under s 402, IPC, and the conviction under the latter section was not vitiated by repugnancy.[23] The accused appellants residents of different villages armed with lethal arms had gathered at an unearthly hour in a desolate place under a tree with no explanation for their conduct whatsoever much less an acceptable one. The prosecution evidence was cogent and reliable. Accused appellants were convicted under ss 399 and 402, IPC . Sentence of five years imposed was found harsh, hence was reduced to three years RI.[24]

24. Non-Examination of Independent Witnesses

Non-availability of independent witness is not fatal in each and every case and statements of the police personnel should not be discarded in the absence of independent witness, if same are found to be trustworthy and police has furnished proper explanation for non-availability of independent witnesses.[25]

25. Probation

The accused, a young man and student was convicted under ss 399 and 402, IPC and there was no previous conviction to his credit. To avoid the prospect of his becoming a hardened criminal in the company of other criminals in the jail, the accused was released on probation under the Uttar Pradesh First Offenders Probation Act (6 of 1938).[26]

The conviction of an accused under s 399 is not illegal by the mere fact that he has been charged under s 398, IPC, and not under s 399, IPC, if no prejudice is caused to him.[27]

26. Sentence

The usual sentence in a case for an offence under s 399, IPC, unless it is attended with violence, is four years rigorous imprisonment. The sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment was considered excessive, and was reduced accordingly, in Khusali v State of Uttar Pradesh .[28] The nature of the offence, the circumstances in which it was committed, the age, the character and the antecedents of the offender must be taken into account in determining the sentence.[29]However, the fact, that the accused is a youthful first time offender, is not, by itself, enough for imposing a lenient sentence. Where the act constituting the offence, was an act of daring and reprehensible nature, with well-planned preparation and deliberate effort, it was held that it would be misplaced sympathy and unjust leniency if the sentence of imprisonment passed is reduced.[30] Where, however, the accused were quite young3439 and there were no previous convictions, the sentence under ss 399 and 402 were reduced to three years.[31] The accused were sentenced to undergo four years rigorous imprisonment under s 399 and three years rigorous imprisonment under s 402, IPC, and both sentences were ordered by the trial court to run concurrently. Keeping in view that the accused remained in custody for a period of three years and three months. The High Court reduced his sentence of imprisonment to the period already undergone.[32] However, the sentence of two years rigorous imprisonment is on the lesser side and there is no scope to reduce it.[33]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 400.

Punishment for belonging to gang of dacoits.--

Whoever, at any time after the passing of this Act, shall belong to a gang of persons associated for the purpose of habitually committing dacoity, shall be punished with imprisonment for life, or with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The section was intended by the legislature to provide for punishing those who belong to a gang of persons who make it their profession to commit dacoities.[34] Similarly, the offence is entirely a creature of statute,[35] and is intended to break up the gang, by punishing their associates who share their purpose.[36] Association for the habitual pursuit of dacoity is the gist of the offence.[37] In other words, the essence of the section is the agreement habitually to commit dacoity, and not the actual commission for attempted commission of dacoities.[38] The existence of such an agreement and the participation of any person in that agreement may be inferred from the established circumstances.[39]

Being a member of a gang of dacoits is a definite offence under this section, and, therefore, it cannot be permitted that instead of the specific charge being tried in a3440 proper court on proper evidence, the accused should be indirectly punished by the proceedings under a preventive section like s 110, CrPC 1973.[40]

2. 'Shall Belong'

The expression 'shall belong' in the section, implies something more than the idea of casual association. It involves the notion of continuity (rather than of permanency) and indicates a more or less intimate connection with the body of persons, extending over a period of time, sufficiently long, to warrant the inference that the person affected had identified himself with a band, the common purpose of which is the habitual commission of dacoities.[41] A person may belong to a gang of dacoits without having actually participated in the commission of even one dacoity. A clever member of the gang may always remain in the background while organising the operations of the gang, giving them active assistance for the purpose of meeting together, furnishing them with weapons and also screening them after commission of the offence and helping them in the disposal of the looted property.[42] However, a person cannot be said to belong to a gang of dacoits in respect of whom the court is satisfied that his connection with the gang was limited and was always intended to be limited to a series of acts, none of which amounted either to dacoity or to the abetment of dacoity.[43] Similarly, persons, who merely assist and shelter the dacoits,[44] or who, being without means of livelihood, associate with them by joining them in drinking,[45] or who meet them at fairs, weddings and liquor shops,[46] cannot be held to belong to a gang of dacoits. Likewise, the general criminality of a tribe or caste cannot be imputed to individual members operating in gangs.[47] Merely, being seen getting on a boat with four persons, who had on their own admission being convicted of belonging to a gang of dacoits, is not sufficient evidence against those so seen.[48] As to a receiver of stolen property, it cannot be laid down as a general proposition that if he receives stolen property from a gang of dacoits, he is a member of the gang.[49] However, the atoos (receivers of stolen property), who did not merely receive stolen property for their own benefit, but identified themselves with the gang and had held possession of the stolen property in the interests of the gang, were held to come under s 401, IPC .[50]

3. 'Gang'

The word 'gang' means 'any' band or company of persons who can go about together or act in concert'. The essence of the word 'gang' in this section is that the3441 persons should act in concert and two or more persons can, therefore, constitute a gang.[51] The identity of the gang concerned in dacoities in question must be established.[52] If it is established that a gang, however small, was formed for the purpose of habitually committing dacoities, all persons who thereafter join the gang in one or more cases, would be within the ambit of this section.[53] However, it does not mean that a person, who joins the members of such a gang in committing theft, becomes ipso facto a member of such gang. An accused person may take part in a theft with one or more members of a gang without himself becoming a member of that gang.[54]

4. 'Habitually'

For attracting the provisions of the section, it must be shown that the association of the accused with the gang was not casual, but was intended to be habitual. Habit is a fact in issue to be proved.[55] The habit must be proved by an aggregate of facts and though the charge may be of a single offence, the period, over which the association extends, is often very long and the longer the period, the better it is to establish habit.[56]

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

6. Jurisdiction

Any offence of belonging to a gang of dacoits may be tried by a court within whose local jurisdiction the offence was committed or the accused person is found [s 181(1), CrPC 1973]. Where the accused was charged under this section for belonging to a gang, associated for the purpose of habitually committing dacoities, with the headquarters of the gang in a district of West Bengal, but several of the dacoities, forming the subject-matter of the charge, were committed in the district of Dhanbad in Bihar, it was held that there was no irregularity in holding the commitment inquiry and trial at Dhanbad. Section 179 , CrPC 1973, neither controls, nor is controlled by, s 181, CrPC 1973, they having a cumulative effect and are not mutually exclusive.[57]

7. Joint Trial

Where fourteen persons were tried at one trial under this section and, during a period of about 21 months, four serious dacoities were committed at four different places,3442 two of which were accompanied by murders, and the prosecution had alleged that the accused had taken part in one or more of these dacoities, it was held that the joint trial of all the accused, though not illegal, was improper. It would have been better to try separately the accused persons for having committed offences under ss 396 and 397, IPC, in respect of the dacoities in which, it was alleged, they took part.[58]

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Sessions Judge,etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about theday of,at, belonged to a gang of persons, associated for the purpose of habitually committing dacoity, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 400 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the congisance of this court.
> I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Proof

To sustain a conviction on a charge under this section, there must be (a) proof of association; and (b) proof that the association was for the purpose of habitually committing dacoities and the habit must be proved by an aggregate of facts.[59] It is necessary to prove that a gang of dacoits existed and the accused belonged to that gang.[60] It is not, however, necessary to prove that the accused had taken part in any particular dacoity.[61]

The association and the purpose of the association may be proved by direct evidence,[62] or by proof of facts from which they can be reasonably inferred.[63] The question whether the accused belongs to a gang of dacoits, ultimately depends on whether, from all the proved facts and circumstances, it can be reasonably held that he identified himself so much with the object of the gang and facilitated them in the commission of the offences so as to become a member of the gang. For this purpose, his intimate association with the gang before the commission of the dacoities, his subsequent association with them after the commission of the offence, the facilities given by him in disposing of the looted property and in screening the dacoits would all be relevant pieces of evidence along with the other evidence of his past activities.[64] The mere fact that women lived as wives or mistresses with men, who are dacoits, is not sufficient for a court to hold that they belong to a gang of persons3443 for the purpose of habitually committing dacoity unless it is proved that the women were themselves associated with their husbands or protectors for the purpose of habitually committing dacoities.[65]

10. Evidence not Believed for Section 395 may be Relied on for Section 400

To prove the charge under s 400, IPC it is not necessary to prove that the accused must have taken part in any particular dacoity. Evidence which though not believed for the purpose of conviction under s 395, may yet be relied upon for the purpose of proving the charge under s 400, IPC .[66]

11. Sentence

There are many points which have to be considered in determining what is an adequate sentence. Among these may be noted the following:

(i) how long has the accused belonged to the gang;
(ii) what dacoities have been committed by the gang since the accused joined it;
(iii) in how many of these dacoities did the accused actually take part (if the accused are separately prosecuted for every dacoity, in which they have been concerned as members of the gang, this point must be left out of consideration);
(iv) what was the character of the dacoities in which the accused actually took part; and
(v) whether they were accompanied with murder, culpable homicide, grievous hurt, torture or any acts of a specially brutal character or were the dacoities of ordinary character.[67]

In cases under s 400, IPC, against a gang consisting of desperate men prepared to go to any lengths in carrying out their crimes, the heaviest possible sentence should be passed.[68] If the offence is, in itself, from its nature, more serious than the charge of committing dacoity, the maximum penalty, prescribed under the section, should be awarded.[69] A sentence of two, three or four years is grossly inadequate.[70]

It is not illegal to pass separate sentences on a person, proved to have been a member of the gang of dacoits and participated in particular dacoity, in which case it will be at the discretion of the court whether two sentences should run concurrently.[71]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 401.

Punishment for belonging to gang of thieves.--

Whoever, at any time after the passing of this Act, shall belong to any wandering or other gang of persons associated for the purpose of habitually committing theft or robbery,3444 and not being a gang of thugs or dacoits, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The preceding section applies to persons belonging to a gang associated for the purposes of habitually committing dacoity, while this section relates to person belonging to similar gangs associated for the purpose of habitually committing theft or robbery. The section expressly excludes a gang of thugs and dacoits. A provision for the punishment of thugs, as defined in s 310, IPC, has been made in s 311, IPC for being habitually associated for the purpose of committing robbery or child stealing. For belonging to a gang of dacoits, the case is covered by s 400, IPC .

Before a person can be convicted under s 401, IPC, it should be proved that he belonged to a gang. Individual adventures of theft or robbery are not sufficient. It must be proved that he carries on his activities in conjunction with other thieves or robbers. Where individuals operate separately, they cannot be said to be members of a gang, a gang being an association of certain persons.[72] A resort to the provisions of s 401, IPC by the police for the purpose of sweeping into a wide net, a large number of persons, whom they suspect, or who gave them trouble, is not to be encouraged.[73]

It is not necessary for a conviction under s 401 that the person convicted must have taken part in any one theft or robbery.[74] Nor is it necessary that each individual member of the gang should be proved to have habitually committed theft in company with other members. Once it is established that a gang, however small in number, was formed for the purpose of habitually committing theft, all persons, who thereafter join the gang in one or more cases of thefts, come within the purview of this section.[75]

A conviction under this section cannot be considered to be bad in law merely because the evidence on record also justifies conviction of a specific offence under s 379 or s 392, IPC .[76]

2. Section 401 Distinguished from Section 110,CrPC 1973

The difference between the two sections is that under this section, it is necessary to prove that several persons have associated together for the purpose of habitually3445 committing theft or robbery and their activities have, in fact, materialised into active robberies or thefts or attempts at such offences whereas s 110, CrPC, being only a preventive section, evidence of strong suspicion and evil repute, that such person or persons engage in criminal activities, is enough to render them liable to be bound down to be of good behaviour. This section is punitive, while s 100, CrPC 1973 is preventive.[77] There can be no ground under s 110, CrPC, rather than under this section.[78] There is also no bar to the subsequent punishment of a person bound in proceedings under s 110, CrPC, for an offence under this section.[79] If, however, the accused is tried and acquitted or discharged of an offence under s 401, then it would not be open to the police to proceed against him under s 110, CrPC .[80]

3. Essential Ingredients of an Offence under Section 401

The essential ingredients[81] of an offence under this section must be as follows:

(a) there should be, in existence, a gang of persons;
(b) such a gang should be associated for the purpose of habitually committing theft or robbery; and
(c) the accused should belong to that gang.

Essentially, the ingredients of the offence under this section are the same as for the offence under the preceding s 400, IPC, except that in one case the purpose of association is habitual commission of dacoity while in the other it is habitual commission of theft or robbery.[82]

4. 'Shall Belong'

Commentary under the same heading in s 400, ante, may be referred to.

5. 'Habitually'

Commentary under the same heading in s 400, ante, may be referred to.

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

7. Joint Trial

A joint trial of different sets of persons under ss 401 and 413, IPC, is illegal.[83] Where, however, two cases are started against persons, the accused being members of a gang, under s 401, IPC, it is not only permissible to combine the two trials, but3446 also convenient and proper because all the accused being members of one gang, they can conveniently be tried together in one trial.[84]

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Magistrate,etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about theday ofat, belonged to a gang of persons, to with (specify whether wandering or other gang), associated for the purpose of habitually committing theft (or robbery), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 401 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.[85]

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Proof[86]

To sustain a conviction on a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) there existed a gang of persons,
(b) those persons were associated for the purpose of committing theft or robbery;
(c) the theft or robbery was to be committed habitually; and
(d) the accused was member of such gang.

The gist of the offence being association for the purpose of habitually committing theft or robbery,[87] the essential requisites are the proof of association and the proof that the association was for the purpose of habitually committing theft.[88] Hence, habit is a fact in issue to be proved for this purpose and habit being equivalent to character, it may be reasonably said that the character of an accused is itself a fact in issue for proving a charge under this section.[89]

In the absence of direct evidence, the purpose of association may be established by proof of acts from which this may be reasonably inferred. Similarly, the prevalence of theft in a certain area and its rise and fall, coinciding with the action taken against the members of the supposed gang, are as much relevant circumstances as are the convictions obtained against certain members.[90] Where, in addition to direct evidence, there was evidence that large number of thefts were committed by the accused within a comparatively short time, it was held that it would give rise to an inference that the accused must have been associated for the purpose of habitually committing theft.[91]3447

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF ROBBERY AND DACOITY

S. 402.

Assembling for purpose of committing dacoity.--

Whoever, at any time after the passing of this Act, shall be one of five or more persons assembled for the purpose of committing dacoity, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with the assemblage of persons for the purpose of committing dacoity.[1] Presence of at least five persons, assembled for the purpose of committing dacoity, is an essential ingredient for the operation of this section.[2] Similarly, before the members of an assembly can be punished under this section, it must be shown that there was agreement to commit dacoity,[3] and the purpose of the assemblage must be to commit dacoity, and no other offence.[4] Thus, no conviction under this section can be recorded simply on the basis of the fact that a certain number of persons, some being armed, are apprehended at the platform of a railway station.[5] However, where some of the accused merely came to the assembly on the direction of other persons and there was no evidence that there was any previous consultation or agreement between them for assemblage at the particular place for the purpose of committing dacoity, and there was no other circumstance except the mere fact of assemblage for commission of dacoity, it was held that they were guilty only under s 402, but not under s 399 .[6] After assembling for the purpose of committing dacoity and proceeding to a certain distance on their way to their destination, it is possible that the idea be abandoned or the process be intercepted. Once the destination is reached or almost reached, preparation becomes complete and till then there would be mere assemblage. In that case, conviction can be made under s 402, and not under s 399 .[7]3448

2. Section 399 and Section 402 Compared and Contrasted

Commentary under the same heading in s 399, ante, may be referred to.

3. 'Assembled for the Purpose of Committing Dacoity'

Before the members of an assembly can be convicted of an offence under this section, it is essential for the prosecution to show that they had assembled for committing dacoity, and for no other offence.[8] Mere assembling of accused persons and the recovery of weapons from their possession would not constitute offence under ss 399 and 402, IPC unless evidence proves that they were planning to commit dacoity. The possibility that they might have collected there, for the purpose of murdering somebody or committing some other crime, cannot be eliminated. The order discharging the accused persons were upheld.[9]

Where several persons were found at 11 pm on a road just outside the city, all carrying unlicensed arms (guns and swords), concealed under their clothes, and none of them could give any reasonable explanation of his presence at the spot, it was held that they were guilty under this section.[10] Similarly, where, after darkness had set in, a number of persons, armed with a gun, came to a grove and, on being surprised by the police, four of them were caught and a gun and some gun-shots, gun-powder and dagger, etc, were recovered from their possession, it was held that they were guilty under this section.[11] Likewise, where the accused, residents of different distant villages, were caught and a lot of ammunition was recovered from some of them and they were all armed and gave entirely improbable reasons for their being caught in the particular village, the case was held to be proved against them.[12]

The accused appellants holding sticks in the hands, had gathered at a desolate place in the dead of night, tried to stop PW1. The appellants were residents of different villages, had gathered with lethal arms at an unearthly hour in desolate place under a tree with no explanation for their conduct whatsoever much less an acceptable one. The accused appellants were convicted for offences under ss 399 and 402, IPC .[13]

The accused persons armed with country made pistols at night had assembled near one Ashram Bridge, were planning to commit dacoity in the town. At about 11.30 p.m., the police party after hearing the talks of the accused persons inter se intercepted and arrested the accused persons with fire arms viz. country made pistols. The testimony of the police officials (PWs) was believed, the police officials (PWs) had no enmity with the accused persons. The accused persons could not explain their presence at such odd hours. Non-availability of independent witness is not fatal in each and every case and statements of the police personnel should not be discarded in the absence of independent witness, if same are found to be trustworthy and police3449 has furnished proper explanation for non-availability of independent witnesses. PWS deposed that no independent person was available on the spot. The conviction of the accused appellants under ss 399, 402, IPC and s 25 of the Indian Arms Act was held proper.[14]

4. 'Five or More Persons'

To bring the case within s 399 of IPC, it is not necessary that persons shown to be making the preparations should be five or more in number. It is, however, necessary for the prosecution to prove that the raid for which the persons prosecuted were making preparation was to be committed by five or more persons, for otherwise it would not be dacoity but merely robbery, and mere preparation for committing robbery, unless it ends in an actual attempt, is not punishable by law.[15]

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

9. Identification of the Accused

Commentary under the relevant headings in s 392 & s 395, ante, may be referred to.

10. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Sessions Judge,etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about theday of, at, were one of five (or more) persons, assembled for the purpose of committing dacoity, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 402 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Where the charge under s 402 fully covers the ingredients of ss 417 and 148, IPC, the absence of a specific charge under s 147 would not prejudice the accused.[16]3450

11. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove,[17] that:

(a) five or more persons had assembled;
(b) they did so for the purpose of committing dacoity, and for no other purpose;[18] and
(c) the accused was one of five or more persons so assembled.

The first and third elements have to be factually established.[19] The purpose of an assembly for committing dacoity can be gathered only from the circumstances because it is difficult to give any direct evidence of such purpose.[20] When there is no reliable evidence to show that the purpose was to commit dacoity and the circumstances established in the case are equally consistent with the innocence of the accused, the accused cannot be held guilty because it is a well-settled principle of law that if there are two hypotheses where one is in favour of the accused and the other against him, and the one in favour of him must be accepted.[21] Where, from the evidence in a trial for dacoity, the utmost that could be urged against the accused, was that they met in order to discuss the possibility of committing a dacoity, but there was no evidence to prove that they had assembled for the purpose of committing a dacoity, it was held that they were not guilty of the offence under s 402 .[22]

The absence of identification of the accused, who have been in jail from the date of arrest, would be a fatal defect in the prosecution case because in such a case, it cannot be held that they were the persons who collected at the place alleged for the purpose of committing dacoity.[23]

12. Acquitted

The prosecution story was that the police nabbed the dacoits from the grove where they had assembled to commit dacoity. Adjoining grove holders or land holders who were said to have been present in the grove at the time of occurrence were not examined by the prosecution. The SO who had prepared plan to arrest the accused dacoits and who had filed FIR was also not examined. The accused dacoits did not offer any resistance when they were alleged to be arrested. One accused had enmity with the co-accused as such his participation was improbable. Acquittal recorded by the High Court after setting aside the conviction of the accused under ss 399 / 402, IPC recorded by the trial court was held proper.[24]

The incident was daylight incident which occurred at 12.30 p.m. within the limits of city police station. No public/independent witness was examined by the prosecution to prove the incident and the arrest of the accused appellant. The3451 investigation of the case was vitiated as it was done by the complainant himself. Out of six accused persons four were armed with deadly weapons, but, they did not offer resistance, nor caused injuries to the police party. The accused persons after seeing the police party did not try to run away. The prosecution case was not proved beyond reasonable doubt, the conviction of the appellant for offences under ss 399 / 402, IPC was set aside.[25]

17. Sentence

When the accused remained in custody altogether for a period of 3 years and three months, the sentence of rigorous imprisonment for 4 years reduced to period already undergone.[26]

A lenient sentence may be given if the accused are young and have no previous convictions against them.[27] In Khusali v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[28] the sentence of five years was considered excessive and it was reduced to three years rigorous imprisonment. In Harnandan v State ,[29] with the observation that it is only in cases under s 395, IPC, that a sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment is generally awarded, the court, to meet the ends of justice, reduced seven years and five years rigorous imprisonment to five years and three years' respectively and five years rigorous imprisonment to five years and three years rigorous imprisonment under ss 399 and 402, IPC, respectively.

The accused appellants residents of different villages armed with lethal arms had gathered at an unearthly hour in a desolate place under a tree with no explanation for3452 their conduct whatsoever much less an acceptable one. The prosecution evidence was cogent and reliable. Accused appellants were convicted under ss 399 and 402, IPC . Sentence of five years imposed was found harsh, was reduced to three years RI.[30]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL MISAPPROPRIATION OF PROPERTY

S. 403.

Dishonest misappropriation of property.--

Whoever dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use any movable property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Illustrations

(a) A takes property belonging to Z out of Z's possession, in good faith believing, at the time when he takes it, that the property belongs to himself. A is not guilty of theft; but if A, after discoverings his mistake, dishonestly appropriates the property to his own use, he is guilty of an offence under this section.

(b) A, being on friendly terms with Z, goes into Z's library in Z's absence, and takes away a book without Z's express consent. Here, if A was under the impression that he had Z's implied consent to take the book for the purpose of reading it. A has not committed theft. But, if A afterwards sells the book for his own benefit, he is guilty of an offence under this section.

(c) A and B being joint owners of a horse, A takes the horse out of B's possession, intending to use it. Here, as A has a right to use the horse, he does not dishonestly misappropriate it. But, if A sells the horse and appropriates the whole proceeds to his own use, he is guilty of an offence under this section.

Explanation 1.--A dishonest misappropriation for a time only is a misappropriation within the meaning of this section.

Illustration

A finds a Government promissory note belonging to Z, bearing a blank endorsement. A, knowing that the note belongs to Z, pledges it with a banker as a security for a loan, intending at a future time to restore it to Z. A has committed an offence under this section.

Explanation 2.--A person who finds property not in the possession of any other person, and takes such property for the purpose of protecting it for, or of restoring it to, the owner, does not take or misappropriate it dishonestly, and is not guilty of an offence; but he is guilty of the offence above defined, if he appropriates it to his own use, when he knows or has the means of discovering the owner, or before he has used reasonable means to discover and give notice to the owner and has kept the property a reasonable time to enable the owner to claim it.

What are reasonable means or what is a reasonable time in such a case, is a question of fact.

It is not necessary that the finder should know who is the owner of the property, or that any particular person is the owner of it: it is sufficient if, at the time of appropriating it, he does not believe it to be his own property, or in good faith believe that the real owner cannot be found.

Illustrations

(a) A finds a rupee on the high road, not knowing to whom the rupee belongs. A picks up the rupee. Here A has not committed the offence defined in this section.3453
(b) A finds a letter on the road, containing a bank note. From the direction and contents of the letter he learns to whom the note belongs. He appropriates the note. He is guilty of an offence under this section.
(c) A finds a cheque payable to bearer. He can form no conjecture as to the person who has lost the cheque. But the name of the person, who has drawn the cheque, appears. A knows that this person can direct him to the person in whose favour the cheque was drawn. A appropriates the cheque without attempting to discover the owner. He is guilty of an offence under this section.
(d) A sees Z drop his purse with money in it. A picks up the purse with the intention of restoring it to Z, but afterwards appropriates it to his own use. A has committed an offence under this section.
(e) A finds a purse with money, not knowing to whom it belongs; he afterwards discovers that it belongs to Z, and appropriates it to his own use. A is guilty of an offence under this section.
(f) A finds a valuable ring, not knowing to whom it belongs. A sells it immediately without attempting to discover the owner. A is guilty of an offence under this section.

Comments

1. Scope

Section 403, IPC speaks about dishonest misappropriation of property. This section defines criminal misappropriation and prescribed penalty for it. Criminal misappropriation takes place when the possession has been innocently come by, but where, by a subsequent change of intention, or from the knowledge of some new fact with which the accused was not previously acquainted, the retaining becomes wrongful and fraudulent. The essence of the offence of criminal misappropriation is that the property of another person comes into the possession of the accused in some neutral manner and is misappropriated or converted to his own use by the accused.[31]

The offence of dishonest misappropriation of property, with which this section deals, is distinguished from the foregoing offences of that, extortion, and robbery by the fact that whereas the taking must be dishonest in those offences, the taking of the3454 property is not necessarily dishonest (and to emphasise the distinction it may, therefore, be termed an innocent taking) under this section, but an innocent taking is followed by a dishonest misappropriation or conversion of the property thereby obtained. It may be that a person takes possession of a thing because it has been delivered into his possession by the former possessor under some relation of trust or confidence, existing between the parties, as to the thing in question, as where a man hands over his property to an agent, bailor or carrier for some specific purpose. In such a case, a subsequent dishonest misappropriation is termed 'criminal breach of trust', an offence which falls under ss 405 to 409, IPC . Therefore, the original taking, in offences falling under this section, is the taking possession of a thing by someone otherwise than in consequence of a delivery of possession thereof in pursuance of a fiduciary relation between a former possessor and himself. The three illustrations to the main section illustrate such an innocent taking:

(i) In illust (a) [illust (p) to s 378, IPC], the taking is not dishonest because it is under a bonafide, though mistaken, claim of right.
(ii) In illust (b) [illust (m) to s 378, IPC], the taking is dishonest because he intends to take the book with the implied consent of Z.
(iii) In illust (c), A takes the horse in the exercise of a valid claim of right, as owner to its use.

The English law on this point is different. A dishonest misappropriation, following an innocent taking, is not criminal (though it is a civil injury for which a civil action lies) unless it has been expressly declared an offence by some statute law. Therefore, many acts of criminal misappropriation, which are punishable under IPC, are not punishable under the English Law. In India, if a change of intention occurs, i.e., intention becomes dishonest from honest, the offence of criminal misappropriation is committed.[32] In Emperor v Anant Narayan ,[33] the accused misappropriated a certain sum of money and, in order to conceal the misappropriation, also falsified the accounts. It was held that the offence of falsification of accounts was included in the offence of criminal misappropriation and the entire transaction should be considered as an offence of criminal misappropriation. The agent, including a commercial agent, who has been entrusted with the goods for the purpose of sale, may be guilty of dishonest conversion if, under the terms of entrustment, he is bound to hand over the sale proceeds to his constituent after deducting his commission.[34] However, a person cannot be convicted of misappropriation if his agent commits an offence of misappropriation.[35]

Section 403, IPC is in no way restricted to appropriating property to one's own use.[36] If a person sets apart an article for the use of another person, of which article he is a trustee of the complainant, he misappropriates it even though he has not put it to his own use,[37] because setting apart by one person for the use of some other person, other than himself and the true owner, is misappropriation.[38] The offence of3455 dishonest misappropriation may be committed by a person in respect of the property possessed by a deceased person at the time of his death by dishonestly appropriating the money entrusted to him although the accused does not bring such money to his own use.[39]

When the accused gets into possession of property on the basis of a certificate of heirship, there can be no case of dishonest misappropriation of property within the meaning of this section.[40] Likewise, an offence of criminal misappropriation falling under this section, is not made out in the case of property of a partnership firm, exclusively possessed by one of the partners, because, until dissolution, the property, which is appropriated by one of the partners, cannot be said to be another's property.[41] A partner has undefined ownership along with other partners over all the assets of the partnership. If he chooses to use any of them for his own purposes, he may be accountable civilly to the other partners, but he does not thereby commit any misappropriation.[42] Where, however, a partner takes money from the partnership and utilises it for his own purpose, but enters in the accounts of the firm that it was drawn and utilised for the purpose of the partnership, he is liable to prosecution for criminal misappropriation of partnership property.[43]

A charge for dishonest misappropriation cannot lie against a managing member of a joint Hindu family until accounts have been taken and shares allotted. He may be liable to a charge of misappropriation if misappropriation takes place after a division of property.[44] If such property is in the sole possession of the father and is sold, there is no dishonest misappropriation.[45]

2. Object

The framers of IPC framed this section to keep 'dishonest misappropriation of property' distinguished from 'theft'. They observed: 'If we call it theft, we speak the popular language; if we call it misappropriation of property not in possession, we avoid an anomaly and maintain a line which in the great majority of cases is reasonable and expedient. On the whole, we are inclined to maintain this line'.

3. Essence of the Offence

The essence of an offence under this section is that the property of another person comes into the possession of the accused in some neutral manner and is misappropriated or converted to his own use, by the accused. No entrustment is required for this offence to be constituted unlike the offence defined in s 405 .[46] In other words, it must first be shown that the property, which did not belong to the accused, came in his possession and it was subsequently misappropriated by the accused.[47] Where, however, a person, in a crowded gathering, picks up from the3456 floor, a purse, containing articles of appreciable value, from the club, takes no action to discover its owner and is arrested a short while after, he is not guilty either under s 379, or of criminal misappropriation, as these circumstances alone cannot establish that the person intended to appropriate or convert the property to his own use.[48]

4. Ingredients

If s 403, IPC is analysed, it is gathered that it has following ingredients which reads thus :

(i) The property must belong to a person other than accused;
(ii) the accused must have misappropriated property or converted it to his own use; and
(iii) there must be dishonest intention on the part of the accused.[49]

5. Criminal Misappropriation Distinguished from Theft

In cases of theft, mere removal of property from the possession of a person with dishonest intention is enough, while under s 403 there must be further misappropriation or conversion.[50] Where property, lost by the owner, is found in the possession of the accused, the offence committed is not theft, but criminal misappropriation, as the property is not taken away from the possession of the owner.[51] However, the taking of cattle, turned out to graze in the pasture or jungle, is theft, and not criminal misappropriation, because they are still in the possession of the owner unless the contrary is shown.[52]

6. Criminal Breach of Trust Distinguished from Cheating, Theft and Criminal Misappropriation

Commentary under the same heading in s 405, post, may be referred to.

7. Criminal Misappropriation Distinguished from Criminal Breach of Trust

Entrustment is an essential element of the offence of criminal breach of trust and the essence of the offence of criminal misappropriation is that the property of another person comes into the possession of the accused in some neutral manner and is misappropriated, or converted to his own use, by the accused.

No entrustment is required for this offence.[53] Similarly, dishonest conversion of property, over which a person gets dominion otherwise than by entrustment, constitutes criminal misappropriation, and not criminal breach of trust.[54]

8. Criminal Misappropriation Distinguished from Cheating

In order to constitute the offence of cheating, it is necessary that the intention to deceive and thereby dishonestly obtain delivery of the property should exist at the3457 time when such delivery is sought. If no such intention exists at that time and possession is obtained innocently, the offence will in the absence of fiduciary relations between the parties, be one of criminal misappropriation.[55] Where money is paid to a person by mistake and such person, either at the time of the receipt of money or at any time subsequently before its refund, discovers the mistake and determines to appropriate the money, he is guilty of criminal misappropriation, but not of cheating.[56] The distinction would turn upon the fraudulent or dishonest inducement which is the essence of cheating. In a case, where a person is induced for delivery of certain goods and the goods taken thereafter are converted by the accused for his own use or misappropriated, the offence would be one of cheating rather than of misappropriation.[57] However, in Rajendra v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[58] it was held that it cannot be said that criminal misappropriation cannot be committed if the accused has dishonest intention at the time of taking possession of the article in question. If the prosecution proves a case of s 403, IPC, the accused, by proving that he had a dishonest intention at the time of taking delivery of the article, cannot change the nature of the offence of criminal misappropriation into that of cheating.

9. 'Dishonestly'[59]

The chief element for conviction under s 403 is the dishonest misappropriation of property or conversion to one's own use.[60] Therefore, in order to constitute an offence under s 403, IPC, there must be a wrongful gain to the person who commits the offence or there must be wrongful loss to another person. Thrust of the provision is to gain/loss. So long as the case property has not been recovered from the accused, it cannot be said that, he had an intention of causing wrongful gain by taking the said property particularly when no witness has taken the case property.[61]

Where there is merely an intention to deprive the owner temporarily of the use of property, dishonesty is not made out.[62] It means that mere retention of money, short of evidence of dishonesty, does not amount to an offence under this section.[63] Mere delay in payment of money, entrusted to a person, where there is no particular obligation to pay it at a certain date, does not amount to, and does not furnish by itself, a sufficient proof of misappropriation.[64] Where the accused found two logs of3458 wood drifting in a river and took possession of them and the logs were left by him in front of his house unused and exposed for several months, it was held that there was no dishonest intention.[65] Unless dishonest intention on the part of the accused is established, it cannot be assumed that his intention was dishonest.[66] A criminal complaint cannot, however, be thrown out merely because a remedy to recover the amount through the civil court is open.[67]

It is not necessary that the wrongful loss or gain should have actually accrued before completion of the offence of criminal misappropriation. All that is required is that there should be an intention of causing such gain or loss which would amount to dishonesty.[68]Loss to one person, though a normal result of an act of misappropriation by another, is not an ingredient of the offence of criminal misappropriation. The offence is complete if the conversion is done with the intention of causing wrongful gain to the offender, irrespective of any loss which may ensue to any other person.[69]

10. 'Misappropriates'

'To misappropriate' means 'improperly setting apart for one's use to the exclusion of the owner'.[70] Where a woman handed over a ticket to the accused in order that he might tell her whether it was right, and the accused pretending to return it, substituted therefore his own ticket and kept her ticket for a longer distance, it was held that there was criminal misappropriation.[71] Where the accused, who were brothers obtained a necklace from a goldsmith on the false representation that their mother (who had already died) wanted it for getting the design copied for the wife of one of them on the promise of returning it in the evening but did not do so, it was held that it having been proved that the accused had obtained delivery of the necklace and dishonestly misappropriated it, they were guilty under s 403 .[72] Where the judgment-debtor, whose standing crops were attached, harvested them, while attachment was in force and was convicted of theft, it was held that the accused was guilty of the offence under s 424, and also of criminal misappropriation under s 403 .[73] Actual manner of misappropriation need not be proved.[74]

Where an employee withdrew the amount deposited by him as security during his appointment, without the permission of the employer and before adjustment of the amounts between the employer and the employee, it was held that it amounted to criminal misappropriation.[75] Where a servant retained, in his hands, money which he3459 was authorised to collect and which he did collect from the debtors of his master, because money was due to him as wages, he was held guilty of criminal misappropriation.[76]

11. No Misappropriation by Joint Owners or Partners

Since no joint owner can commit misappropriation in respect of the property which he holds jointly with other co-owners, likewise no partner can commit misappropriation of partnership property belonging to him and his other partners. So the offence under s 403 is also not made out.[77]

12. 'Converts to his Own Use'

This expression means the appropriation and dealing with the property of another without right as if it were one's own property.[78] The essence of conversion is that the property in question is converted to the use and benefit of someone else other than the person who is entitled thereto, the thing being thereby wrongfully appropriated, i.e., misappropriated. Where railway receipts were made over to the accused for taking delivery of goods and the railway authorities delivered the goods to him, the mere intention to misappropriate in holding the goods would not amount to misappropriation or conversion.[79] In the absence of any overt act on the part of the accused, no inference of dishonest motives can be imputed to him simply because he has retained certain documents in his custody.[80] Where, however, two notes were stolen, from A, by B (not a bonafide holder for valuable consideration), tendered them in payment for certain articles, purchased by him from C, who not knowing B, refused to accept them, whereupon B brought D, who was known to C, and the purchase was made by him, it was held that D thereby converted the notes to his own use.[81]

13. 'Any Moveable Property'[82]

The offence under this section consists in the dishonest misappropriation of conversion of movable property and therefore, before a conviction can be recorded, it must be proved that the article for which the charge is made was movable property.[83] What is not property at all cannot be the subject of criminal misappropriation. It is doubtful if a document, which has become valueless, can be said to be a movable property at all in the sense of this section.[84]

The property must be in the ownership of another person. Ownerless property, which does not belong to any one, for example, animals ferae naturae, cannot be the subject of criminal misappropriation. Similarly, abandoned property cannot be the subject of criminal misappropriation.3460

14. Explanation 1

According to this explanation, a dishonest misappropriation for a time only is 'misappropriation' within the meaning of this section. Accordingly, it is no answer to a charge of criminal misappropriation that the money, after the matter was reported to higher authorities, was subsequently disbursed for the purpose for which it was entrusted.[85] However, even to constitute temporary misappropriation, it must be shown that the accused retained the amount or converted it to his use dishonestly.[86] Retaining of the articles by the accused for some time does not mean that he has misappropriated them or converted them to his own use.[87] Dishonesty can, however, be inferred from false accounting, absence of bonafide or reasonable explanation for non-accounting.[88] Where the accused, an income tax clerk, who was under a duty to receive moneys, paid by assessees, and to enter such receipts in the remittance book and pay the moneys into the treasury immediately, retained two sums for several months without entering them into the book and paid up the money when he knew that the detection was inevitable, it was held that he was guilty under this section.[89] Where a court amin collects a large sum of money and does not pay it into court until five months have lapsed, it is a fair presumption that he has misappropriated the amount unless he can explain his action.[90] However, this presumption may be negatived by evidence to the effect that the delay was caused by forgetfulness or that it was acquiesced in by the person to whom the money was due.[91] Temporary retention is, however, not necessarily misappropriation. The fact that the accused found a thing and merely retained it in his possession without conversion to his own use, would not amount to criminal misappropriation.[92]

15. Explanation 2

This explanation clarifies as to what extent a person, who finds property, not in possession of any other person, and takes such property, can be considered to be liable under this section. It makes it clear that:

(a) there will be no offence if:

(i) a person takes the property for the purpose of protecting it, or for the purpose of restoring it to the owner, and
(ii) does not take or misappropriate it dishonestly; but

(b) there will be an offence under this section if a person appropriates the property to his own use:

(i) when he knows, or has means of discovering, the owner, or
(ii) before the has used reasonable means to discover, and gives notice to, the owner and has kept the property for a reasonable time to enable the owner to claim it.3461

Thus, where the accused finding a gold mohur in an open plain, sold it the next day to a saraf for the full value and appropriated the sale-proceeds, it was held that no offence under this section was committed. It was observed that it might have been different if the mohur had been found on a thorough-fare in which case the finder would naturally believe that the property has been recently lost and the owner would be discoverable.[1] In Mahadev Govind Nagarkar v Emperor ,[2] the accused found a spanner lying on a public road. He tried to sell it. It was held that the accused was not guilty of the offence under this section because it was not such a case where the accused could be said to have reasonable means of discovering, and giving notice to the owner of the spanner of having found it. Where a sub-inspector of police, who found a lawaris bullock, sold it after keeping it for twenty days when no owner turned up even after he advertised it, it was held that he was not guilty.[3] In Sirajul Haque v Emperor ,[4] it was observed that a person finding a property, is not bound to adopt extraordinary means for the discovery, nor is he bound to discover the owner by means of advertisement. Thus, a person, who takes possession of cattle found wandering in the village, cannot be convicted under this section.[5]

With respect to the question as to when the appropriation of the stray cattle can be the subject of a charge under this section, it may be stated that when any stray animal is found and is taken into possession by the finder thereof, he may, in the first instance, do it with no criminal intent. If afterwards, he changes his intention and converts the animal to his own use, he commits an offence under this section. The finder of an article should take some steps in order to ascertain who the true owner is. If, after he has taken such steps, the true owner is not discovered, then, under certain circumstances, the finder may retain the article and, in such a case, he would not be held guilty of criminal misappropriation. However, if he acts with reference to the article found in such a way that the true owner may never discover that it had been picked up by him, then he undoubtedly attempts to create a situation where the conversion of the article to his own use would be easy. In such a case, the conduct of the finder is criminal conduct and he would come within the ambit of s 403 .[6] Where the finder of a missing bullock not only tried to sell it knowing it fully well that it did not belong to him and without making an enquiry as to who the real owner was, but also set up his title to the bullock, it was held that he was guilty under this section.[7]

16. Constructive Liability

When there is nothing on record to indicate that in the action of misappropriation of property by the accused, the co-accused persons had also joined or that they had shared the intention with which the accused had taken away the watch and the cash of the victim, the accused having done the said acts beyond any intention of the others, he alone would be liable for that extra act under s 403 and not the other three accused persons who had not shared any common intention of criminal misappropriation and so were found entitled to an acquittal under s 403 read with s 34, IPC .[8]3462

17. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, by the owner of the property misappropriated, with the permission of the court before which such prosecution is pending, and triable by a magistrate, and may be tried summarily.

It is open to the magistrate, if he holds some doubt, to hold an enquiry under s 202, CrPC 1973, before summoning the accused, to find out whether a primafacie case is made out.[9] Where it is alleged that the complainant lent a jewel to the accused, who dishonestly retained it and converted it to his own use, primafacie an offence under s 403 or s 406, IPC is made out and it must be gone into and tried.[10]

18. Jurisdiction

The offence under this section, being dependent upon the act, which has been done, and not upon the consequence which has ensued, can be tried in the court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction it has been committed. Section 179 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, does not, in terms, apply to the offence under this section.[11]

19. Quashing of Complaint

Commentary under the headings in s 406, post, may be referred to.

20. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case. Section 251 , CrPC may be referred to.

21. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove[12] that:

(a) the property in question was the property of the complainant;
(b) the accused misappropriated, or converted to his own use, that moveable property (even though for a time); and
(c) he did so dishonestly.

Dishonesty may be proved by evidence or may be provided from reasonable circumstances; but it can never be assumed as a matter of course.[13] Not only the prosecution has to prove that the accused received money and has not accounted for it, but has also to prove that he converted it to his own use. Proof of receipt and failure to account is naturally a long way towards the proof of misappropriation.[14] Where there is no finding that the accused had misappropriated or converted the properties in question to his own use, the conviction of the accused merely on the ground, that he had the intention of doing go, is bad in law. To have an intention of3463 doing a wrong and to do a wrong are two different things.[15] Where some bales of cloth, which were in the custody of the railways, were later recovered from the godown of the accused, but a charge under s 411, IPC was not established, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under s 403, IPC, there being no proof of misappropriation or conversion or any evidence of dishonest intention.[16] If, however, the evidence is sufficient to establish that some property, such as money, mentioned in the charge, has been misappropriated, it cannot be said that because the exact amount is not specified, the accused cannot be convicted.[17] Similarly, the mere fact that the complainant had agreed to give time to the accused to pay, is not sufficient to hold that there was no misappropriation.[18] If it is fully proved that soon after the death of the owner of goats, they were found in possession of the accused who also sold them, he can be held guilty under s 403, IPC .[19]

22. Conviction

An accused charged under s 379, IPC, can be convicted under this section if the facts alleged and proved constitute the offence.[20] Similarly, a conviction under this section may be made where the charge is under s 395,[21] or under s 406,[22], or under s 408,[23] or under s 409,[24] or under s 411,[25] or under s 414, IPC .[26]

23. Alteration of Conviction from Section 406 to Section 403

24. Alteration of Conviction from Section 408 to Section 403

26. Sentence

A sentence of fifteen months with fine for attempting to commit misappropriation was considered to be severe and was reduced to six months rigorous imprisonment.[27]3464 Where the accused, 25 years of age, misappropriated cattle, it was held that the offence was not a minor one and the sentence of one year was justified.[28]

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL MISAPPROPRIATION OF PROPERTY

S. 404.

Dishonest misappropriation of property possessed by deceased person at the time of his death.--

Whoever dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use property, knowing that such property was in the possession of a deceased person at the time of that person's decease, and has not since been in the possession of any person legally entitled to such possession, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if the offender at the time of such person's decease was employed by him as a clerk or servant, the imprisonment may extend to seven years.

Illustration

Z dies in possession of furniture and money. His servant A, before the money comes into the possession of any person entitled to such possession, dishonestly misappropriates it. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

Comments

1. Scope

The preceding s 403, IPC deals with criminal misappropriation in general. This section deals with an aggravated form of that offence. It specially provides for protection to the property of a deceased person and the offence is punishable with three years' imprisonment as against a punishment of two years under s 403, IPC . The punishment is made much higher in the case of criminal misappropriation by a clerk or a servant and it may be up to seven years. A person may commit the offence of dishonest misappropriation of money, possessed by a deceased person at the time of his death, although he does not bring such money to his own use.[29] Removal of ornaments from a dead body, a dead body not being a person, amounts to dishonest misappropriation of the property possessed by the deceased and falls within the ambit of this section.[30] Where, however, murder and robbery are committed in the course of the same transaction by the same person, the offence would fall under s 392, IPC, and not under this section.[31]

Under this section, all the elements, required to constitute the offence of criminal misappropriation in respect of the property of a living person, are necessary.[32]3465

2. Object

The object behind this section is to afford protection to property which, by reason of its being peculiarly placed, needs protection where the person, who could look after it, is dead and the person, who expected and is entitled to look after it, has not appeared on the scene, there being a change available to strangers to dishonestly misappropriate and convert the same to their own use. Under such circumstances, if such strangers are allowed to do so, the subsequent owner may lose that property entirely.[33] Where a certain bridge over a river gave way, causing death of several persons, and a wrist watch, a gold ring and cash, taken from one of the dead bodies by a Mullah of the river, were soon after taken by the accused, a police constable, by use of violence and he handed over the articles only after arrival of a search party and, prior to that, there was no entry to that effect in the general diary, it was held that the accused was rightly convicted under ss 394 and 404, IPC .[34] In Re Karri Mangadu,[35] it was observed that though this section was intended to punish servants and strangers, who can possibly have no right or interest in the effects of a dead man and misappropriate such effects, yet it was not intended to punish near relatives who take possession of and deal with, the deceased's effects under the claim of an independent ownership or claim to succeed as heir to the deceased. Thus, where the mother of the deceased took possession of his movables and discharged one of the debtors of her son from his obligation and there was dispute with a daughter-in-law as to who was entitled to the assets, it was held that the mother could not be convicted under this section.[36] Where the accused persons were the sons of the deceased, and not strangers or outsiders, and the question of their legitimacy had not been decided, it was held that when they took the plea that they acted in good faith, such plea could not be lightly brushed aside.[37]

3. 'Dishonestly'

Commentary under the same heading in s 403, ante, may be referred to.

4. 'Misappropriates'

Commentary under the same heading in s 403, ante, may be referred to.

Where the appellant accused misused the ATM card of the deceased taken out from the belongings of the deceased, the picture of the appellant in close circuit was identified by the PWS as that of the appellant, he had withdrawn Rs 20,000/- from the account of the deceased, he was convicted under s 404, IPC .[38]

5. 'Converts to his Own Use'

Commentary under the same heading in s 403, ante, may be referred to.

6. 'Property'

According to the High Courts of Bombay, Calcutta and Madhya Pradesh, the word 'property', used in this section, means only 'movable property', and not 'immovable3466 property'.[39] However, according to the Allahabad High Court, the section contains no such express limitation.[40]

7. 'Person Legally Entitled to such Possession'

Though a person may not have title to the property in the sense of title to the ownership of the property, yet he may be legally entitled to possession thereof. Thus, where a curator is appointed by the district judge under s 196 of the Indian Succession Act 1925, and he, being authorised to take possession of the property, takes possession thereof, he is legally entitled to possession.[41]

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

The offence under this section being not compoundable, the court cannot permit the withdrawal of the prosecution on a compromise made with the accused.[42]

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate,etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about theday of, at, you dishonestly misappropriated (or converted to your own use) property, to wit (specify the property), knowing that such property was in the possession of AB deceased at the time of his death and had not since been in possession of any person, legally entitled to such possession, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 404 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Note: In the case of criminal misappropriation by a clerk or servant, employed by the deceased at the time of his death, words to that effect may be added in the charge.

No specific mention of any property in the charge is a fatal defect.[43]

10. Proof

To secure a conviction under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the property in question was in the possession of the deceased person at the time of his death;3467
(b) such property had not passed to the possession of any person, highly entitled to its possession;
(c) the accused had knowledge of the said facts; and
(d) he dishonestly misappropriated, or dishonestly converted to his own use, the said property.

In the absence of proof of any of the said four requirements, the charge under this section must fail.[44] When the prosecution has failed to prove facts and circumstances to establish charge under ss 404 and 201, IPC, against one accused and that under s 404 against another accused, the order of conviction and sentence passed by the courts below was set aside by the Supreme Court.[45] The prosecution has to establish the knowledge on the part of the accused that the property in question was in possession of the deceased person at the time of his death and had not since been in the possession of any person legally entitled to such possession. Without establishing this fact, the prosecution would not be entitled to claim conviction. The mere recovery of the ornaments, belonging to the deceased and last worn by that person, would not be sufficient.[46] However, the Division Bench of the Madhya Pradesh High Court observed that when after the recovery of gold and silver articles at the instance of the accused which have been identified as that of the deceased and the accused had not claimed these ornaments to be his own, the accused would be liable under s 404, IPC .[47]

When the accused misappropriated the jewellery of his deceased mother by removing the same from her person after murdering her, the conviction of the accused under ss 302 and 404, IPC, was found proper.[48]

11. Acquittal

The case of the prosecution was that immediately after committing the offence of murder, the accused took the cycle of the deceased and kept it in the house of a prosecution witness saying that he would collect the cycle again. But the accused had never stated that the cycle belonged to the deceased, nor the cycle was identified as that belonging to the deceased and nobody has deposed about the ownership of the cycle. Therefore, the prosecution has failed to establish the offence against the accused under s 404 of the IPC .[49]

12. Sentence

The incident took place nearly 15 years ago and there was nothing to indicate that the accused had any adverse criminal antecedents, so the accused was sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for two years.[50]3468

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL BREACH OF TRUST

S. 405.

Criminal breach of trust.--

Whoever, being in any manner entrusted with property, or with any dominion over property, dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use that property, or dishonestly uses or disposes of that property in violation of any direction of law prescribing the mode in which such trust is to be discharged, or of any legal contract, express or implied, which he has made touching the discharge of such trust, or wilfully suffers any other person so to do, commits "criminal breach of trust".

[51][Explanation 1.--A person, being an employer [52][of an establishment whether exempted under section

17 of the Employees' Provident Funds and Miscellaneous Provision Act, 1952 (19 of 1952), or not] who deducts the employee's contribution from the wages payable to the employee for credit to a Provident Fund or Family Pension Fund established by any law for the time being in force, shall be deemed to have been entrusted with the amount of the contribution so deducted by him and if he makes default in the payment of such contribution to the said Fund in violation of the said law, shall be deemed to have dishonestly used the amount of the said contribution in violation of a direction of law as aforesaid.]

[53][Explanation 2.--A person, being an employer, who deducts the employee's contribution from the wages payable to the employee for credit to the Employee's State Insurance Fund held and administered by the Employees' State Insurance Corporation established under the Employees' State Insurance Act, 1948 (34 of 1948), shall be deemed to have been entrusted with the amount of the contribution so deducted by him and if he makes default in the payment of such contribution to the said Fund in violation of the said Act, shall be deemed to have dishonestly used the amount of the said contribution in violation of a direction of law as aforesaid.

Illustrations

(a) A, being executor to the will of a deceased person, dishonestly disobeys the law which directs him to divide the effects according to the will, and appropriates them to his own use. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

(b) A is a warehouse-keeper, Z, going on a journey, entrusts his furniture to A, under a contract that it shall be returned on payment of a stipulated sum for warehouse-room. A dishonestly sells the goods. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

(c) A, residing in Calcutta, is agent for Z, residing at Delhi. There is an express or implied contract between A and Z, that all sums remitted by Z to A shall be invested by A, according to Z's direction. Z remits A lakh of rupees to A, with directions to A to invest the same in Company's paper. A dishonestly disobeys the directions and employs the money in his own business. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

(d) But if A, in the last illustration, not dishonestly but in good faith, believing that it will be more for Z's advantage to hold shares in the Bank of Bengal, disobeys Z's directions, and buys shares in the Bank of Bengal, for Z, instead of buying Company's paper, here, though Z should suffer loss, and should be entitled to bring3469 a civil action against A, on account of that loss, yet A, not having acted dishonestly, has not committed criminal breach of trust.

(e) A, a revenue-officer, is entrusted with public money and is either directed by law, or bound by a contract, express or implied, with the Government, to pay into a certain treasury all the public money which he holds. A dishonestly appropriates the money. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

(f) A, a carrier, is entrusted by Z with property to be carried by land or by water. A dishonestly misappropriates the property. A has committed criminal breach of trust.3470

Comments

1. Scope

The offence under this section is committed when a person, who is entrusted, in any manner, with property or with dominion over it, dishonestly misappropriates it, or converts it to his own use, or dishonestly uses it, or disposes it off, in violation of any direction of law, prescribing the mode, in which the trust is to be discharged, or of any lawful contract, express or implied, made by him, touching such discharge, or wilfully suffers any other person so to do.[54] What follows is that ownership or beneficial interest, in respect of which criminal breach of trust is alleged to have been committed, must be in some person, other than the accused, and the latter must hold it on account of some person or, in some way, for his benefit.[55] It cannot, however, be said that it is impossible, under all circumstances, for a person to commit criminal breach of trust in respect of his own property. Where the accused, who pledged promissory notes with the complainant as security for a loan, induced him to hand them over to him (i.e., the accused) by pretending that he required them to collect money from his debtors with the aid of which he would pay cash to him (i.e., the complainant), it was held that the possession of the promissory notes, even without endorsement, in the hands of the person, with whom they were pledged, was of some value to the complainant as it gave him control over the accused and so long as they remained with him, they prevented the accused from using them to discharge the debts due by him to other creditors in preference to him and that the complainant had, thus, some sort of beneficial interest in the property and when he gave the notes to the accused for a definite purpose and the accused dishonestly disposed them of in violation of the legal contract, there was both entrustment and dishonest misappropriation.[56]

In cases of criminal breach of trust, a distinction has to be made between the person entrusted with the property and a person having control or general charge over the property. In case of entrustment of property, if it is found that the property is missing, the person, to whom the property has been entrusted, will, without further proof, be liable for accounting for the sums, whereas, in the case of a person having supervisory or general control over a certain property, he would be liable only when it is shown that he misappropriated it or was party to criminal breach of trust committed in respect of it by any other person.[57]3471

A criminal act can be dealt with under the provisions of the IPC if necessary ingredients to constitute an offence under this section are brought out or established even if the same criminal act is an offence under the provisions of another statute. Merely because the Carriers Act 1865, declares the liability of a carrier for loss, occasioned by the criminal acts of himself or his servant or agent, it cannot be said that the same criminal act cannot be dealt with under the provisions of the IPC if necessary ingredients are brought out or established.[58]

2. Ingredients

The following essential ingredients[59] are absolutely necessary to attract the operation of the section:

(a) the accused must be entrusted with property or dominion over property; and
(b) the person so entrusted (i.e., the accused) must:

(i) dishonestly misappropriate, or convert to his own use, that property, or
(ii) dishonestly use or dispose of that property or wilfully suffer any other person to do so in violation of--

(1) any direction of law, prescribing the mode, in which such trust is to be discharged, or
(2) any legal contract made touching the discharge of such trust.

However, rendering of the accounts is not a necessary ingredient of the offence under this section.[60] It is necessary, of course, to show both entrustment and dishonest misappropriation, or conversion to his own use, by the accused. In the absence of any allegation of misappropriation or conversion, the offence will not be constituted.[61] Even if the prosecution succeeds in proving entrustment, it would fail to bring home the guilt unless it is proved that the accused has misappropriated the amount entrusted.[62] The entrustment, which has to be shown, should be in respect of the property of another person.[63]

The essential ingredients in order to constitute a criminal breach of trust are (i) that the accused was entrusted with property or with dominion over property; (ii) dishonestly misappropriated or converted that property to his own; (iii) dishonestly using or disposing of that property or wilfully suffering any other person was so to do a violation, (a) of any direction of law prescribing the mode in which such trust is3472 to be discharged, (b) of any legal contract made touching the discharge of the trust.[64] The basic requirement to bring home the accusations under s 405 are the requirements to prove conjointly (i) entrustment and (ii) whether the accused was actuated by dishonest intention or not, misappropriated it or converted it to his own use to the detriment of the persons who entrusted it.[65]

If at the very initiation of the negotiations, it was evident that there was no intention to cheat, the dispute would be of civil nature. Such a conclusion would depend on the evidence to be led at the time of trial.[66]

The essential ingredients of the offence of criminal breach of trust are (1) entrustment with property or with any dominion over property; (2) and dishonest misappropriation thereof.[67] To constitute an offence of criminal breach of trust, there must be an entrustment, there must be misappropriation or conversion to one's own use, or use in violation of a legal direction or of any legal contract and the misappropriation or conversion or disposal must be with a dishonest intention.[68]

In the commission of the offence of criminal breach of trust, two distinct parts are involved. The first consists of the creation of an obligation in relation to the property over which dominion or control is acquired by the accused. The second is a misappropriation of dealing with the property dishonestly and contrary to the terms of the obligation created.[69]

Mere showing of a person's dominion over the property is not enough, it must further be shown that the dominion of the person was the result of the entrustment.[70]

3. Section 405 not Repealed by Section 5(1)(c) of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947 (Now Section 13 of the said Act)

The offences under this section and s 5(1)(c) of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947 are not identical; they are distinct and separate offences. Therefore, there is no scope for the speculation about the repeal of this section by the said s 5(1)(c) of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947.[71]3473

4. Criminal Misappropriation Distinguished from Criminal Breach of Trust

Commentary under the same heading in s 403, ante, may be referred to.

5. Criminal Breach of Trust and Cheating--Distinction

It is seen that for identifying the concept of criminal cheating, as provided under s 416, IPC, the ingredients of fraudulent dishonest intention has become the basic sine qua non and if it is there or, identified; then it is to be further ascertained that as a result of which the person so represented must be made to deliver any property to the other and that the inducement must be inherent with intention to keep the same or to utilise the said property for the use and utilisation of the person, who made such an inducement with such intention. Whereas, in the concept of criminal breach of trust, as defined under 405, IPC voluntary entrustment following dominion over such property by one to the other person has become necessary to be identified and that the property has become necessarily disentitled, misappropriated or converted in such a way as provided by the section. If the ingredients set out in the above sections of law are identified, upon the materials placed by the prosecution, then, ss 406 and 420, IPC, respectively, being the punishment sections come into operation.

However, while doing such legal exercises, it has become imperative for the court to see that criminal breach of trust and cheating, though, generally involves dishonest intention, but, both are mutually exclusive and different in the basic concept, in the context that criminal breach of trust is voluntary, and cheating is purely on the basis of inducement with dishonest intention. Both the concepts of law for the respective offences are totally distinct, different in nature and accordingly, mutually exclusive with each. Unless and until there are adequate materials available and made before the court of law, both the offences can be dealt with together.[72]

6. Criminal Breach of Trust Distinguished from Cheating, Theft and Criminal Misappropriation

The offence of criminal breach of trust is akin to cheating, theft and criminal misappropriation, but differs from them in important respects. In criminal breach of trust, the property is lawfully acquired or acquired with the consent of the owner, but dishonestly misappropriation by the person to whom it is entrusted. In cheating, the property is wrongfully acquired in the first instance by means of a false representation. In theft, the property is taken without consent of the owner and the dishonest intention to take property exists at the time of such taking. In criminal misappropriation, the property is innocently acquired, often casually or by chance, but by a subsequent change of intention, the remaining becomes wrong and3474 fraudulent.[73] Thus, if ornaments are handed over to the accused in the confidence that they would be returned after having been used for a particular purpose, the subsequent failure to return would become an offence of criminal breach of trust.[74] Where the accused induced the complainant to entrust a gold mohur to him so that he might induce the complainant's boy to stop weeping and misappropriated it, it was held that there was no deception and that the offence was not under s 420, but one under s 406 .[75] Where, however, movable property of the accused was attracted in execution of a decree and was placed in the custody of another person, who died, and the accused appropriated it to his own use, it was held that the accused was guilty of theft, and not criminal breach of trust under s 406, IPC .[76]

7. Criminal Breach of Trust Distinguished from Section 105, Insurance Act

The offence under s 409, IPC, and that under s 105, Insurance Act 1938 are not the same. If the offences are distinct, there is no question of the rule of double jeopardy as embodied in art 20(2) of the Constitution of India being applicable to bar the two trials under these offences.[77] A perusal of ss 104 and 105, Insurance Act makes it clear that they are not identical with the offences punishable under ss 405 and 409, IPC . Further, the offence of conspiracy punishable under s 120B, IPC is not reproduced in the Insurance Act. The complainant insurance company could not, therefore, be expected to prosecute the accused under s 105, Insurance Act rather than under ss 405, 409 and 120B, IPC, if the latter offences were suitable to the facts of the case.[78]

8. 'In any Manner'

The expression 'in any manner' is used, in this section, in a wide sense including all cases in which property is voluntarily handed over for a specific purpose.[79] The section does not limit the offence to the case of persons who are entitled to be called trustees in the technical sense.[80] The section contemplates the creation of a relationship whereby the owner of the property makes it over to another person to be retained by him until a certain contingency arises or to be disposed by him on the happening of a certain event.[81] As long as the accused is given possession of property3475 to deal with it in a particular manner, the ownership being in the person other than the accused, he can be said to be entrusted with that property.[82]

Where a person, who under a definite agreement, was to manage a large property and to spend a specific portion of its income on certain religious and educational objects, converted to his own use some portion of the share of the profits, which he should have devoted to those objects, it was held that he could be convicted of an offence of criminal breach of trust.[83]

9. 'Entrusted'

Where the first ingredient of criminal breach of trust i.e. entrustment is missing, the same would not constitute a criminal breach of trust.[84]

The term entrustment is not necessarily a term of law. It may have different implications in different context. In its most general signification all it imports is the handing over possession for some purpose which may not imply the conferring of any proprietary right at all.[85] The word 'entrusted' has to be understood in a wider sense; all that is necessary is that the ownership or beneficial interest in the property, which is subject matter of the offence should be in some person other than the accused.[86]

The word 'entrusted', being not a term of art embraces all cases in which a thing is handed over by one person to another for a specific purpose.[87] It not only covers the relationship of a trustee and beneficiary between the complainant and the accused, like master and servant, guardian and ward, and pledger and pledgee, etc.[88] It connotes that the accused holds the property for, and on behalf of, another.[89] Hence, in all such transactions like that of a consignor and consignee, bailor and bailee and hirer and hiree, there is an element of trust implied in the transaction[90] because in all such relations, the property entrusted to the accused is 'property of another person'.[91] In order to constitute a legal entrustment, therefore, the complainant must be owner of the property; there must be a transfer of possession; such transfer must be an actual transfer, and not a fictional or notional one; such transfer must be made to somebody who has no right except that of a custodian, and such entrustment must be3476 made to a person, and not to a company or firm. These are the panchsheel of a legal entrustment.[1] Mere transaction of sale cannot amount to an entrustment; 'entrustment' means that the person handing over any property, or on whose behalf that property is handed over to another, continues to be its owner and the person handing over the property, must have confidence in the person, taking the property, so as to create a fiduciary relationship between them.[2]

There cannot be any entrustment of a property for its use or disposal contrary to the law or an illegal purpose with the owner of the property retaining dominion over the property. The moment he parts with the property for an illegal purpose, the entrustment as referred to in the Penal Code has no application.[3]

10. 'Entrustment' also Governed by the Words 'or with any Dominion over the Property'

Non-payment of wages does not constitute an offence under s 406 IPC .[4]

The word 'entrustment', in the section, governs not only the words 'with the property', immediately following it, but also the word 'or with any dominion over the property', occurring thereafter.[5] Similarly, the managing director of a company has substantial dominion over property of the company, including the amounts received from the subscribers,[6] and dominion is as good as entrustment for purposes of this section. But if there is nothing in the terms and conditions of the partnership deed to indicate that dominion of the partners over the partnership property was the result of any entrustment, the present section is not attracted. Therefore, if in the absence of such a specific agreement a partner receives money belonging to the partnership he cannot be said to have received it in a fiduciary capacity. Therefore, he cannot be said to have been entrusted with the dominion over the partnership property.[7]

11. Valid Entrustment

For a valid entrustment, it is not necessary that the accused should receive the money directly from the complainant.[8] Where, under the terms of a contract, some goods were entrusted to the accused, who was to sell those goods, obtain money for them, and hold that money on account of the complainant, it was held that though he did not actually receive the money from the complainant, he was 'entrusted' with it within the meaning of this section.[9]3477

12. Bank Loan

In cases of bank loan(s), there is no entrustment of the property so as to commit breach of trust, no offence under s 406, IPC is committed. Mere failure to pay loan does not amount to breach of trust as defined in s 405, IPC .[10]

13. Question of Fact--Cases

Whether in a particular set of circumstances, any property or money, passing from one to another, would amount to entrustment is not a question of law, but a question of fact.[11] Where the complainant, a goldsmith, gave some ornaments to the accused who was his intimate friend, for a function with a promise by the accused to return the ornaments after the ceremony, but the accused subsequently failed to return them, it was held that this amounted to entrustment under s 406 .[12] Where a certain amount was paid to the accused for buying paddy and supplying it to the complainant but the accused dishonestly converted the money to his own use and did not supply the paddy, it was held that the accused had been entrusted with the money and was guilty of criminal breach of trust.[13] Where an arrangement was made between the vendor and the vendee that the property would pass to the vendee on payment, and the vendor disposed of the property prior to the payment to the vendor, it was held that it was an offence under s 406, IPC .[14] However, no question of entrustment arises in money, given, without any condition as to its use, by the parties in response to an appeal made by a bishop. Such money becomes the property of the bishop.[15] A mere transaction of sale,[16] or of purchase (of cement),[17] cannot amount to an entrustment. Similarly, a mere payment by a debtor to a creditor is no entrustment.[18] Where the distillers obtained a permit, for the movement of molasses, from the excise commissioner, to be used as raw material for manufacturing spirit, which was to be sold to the warehouses or licensed vendors under the terms of the licences, granted to them, it was held that the distillers had paid for the molasses, as also for the transport of the molasses, to the distilleries and it could not, therefore, be said that property in molasses or dominion over them was entrusted to them.[19]

The appellant was the Chairman of the Maharashtra State Electricity Board (MSEB), respondent no. 2 was a company which had entered into various contracts with MSEB for installation of low tension load management system. Respondent 2 had deposited3478 an amount of Rs. 5 lakhs with the MSEB as security deposit in lieu of bank guarantee to be used for tenders to be filed by respondent 2 from time to time in the future. As dispute arose between the MSES and the respondent 2, the latter informed MSES that they were not interested in participating in any tender and sought refund of the said amount of Rs. 5 lakhs. The Chief Engineer, MSEB, informed respondent 2 that the deposit of Rs. 5 lakhs had been adjusted by MSEB against the dues payable by respondent 2 to MSEB. On receipt of the said communication, respondents 2 to 4 filed complaint against the appellant and other senior officials of MSEB under ss 405 and 409 read with s 34, IPC . Held, the amount of Rs. 5 lakhs was deposited by the complainant company with MSEB and there was nothing in the complaint which may even remotely suggest that the complainant had entrusted any property to the appellant or that the appellant had dominion over the said money of the complainant, which was dishonestly converted by him to his own use, so as to satisfy the ingredients of s 405, IPC . The complaint did not disclose the commission of offence by the appellant under s 405, IPC punishable under s 409, IPC . The complaint against the appellant was quashed on petition under s 482, CrPC[20]

14. Own Property--No Offence

One cannot commit an offence, under this section, in respect of his own property. Where, according to the agreement, the accused (i.e., the retailer) obtained supplies of sugar, on payment, to the authorised dealer, at the rate, fixed by the authorities from time to time, it was held that the accused was not guilty of the offence under this section, for the excess sugar alleged to have been found in his ration shop, because the sugar was purchased by him and it was his property.[21] An offence of the criminal breach of trust will be made out only if any amount paid is held by the depositee as a trust, and not as his own property. If the amount is paid in such a manner that the depositee becomes its full owner and is free to use it in any way he likes, but the same is not paid back under some pretext, then it is not a case of criminal misappropriation or a criminal breach of trust, but only that of a breach of contract which will give rise to a civil liability.[22] Property given by a husband to his wife at the time of marriage, becomes the property of the wife and no question of the wife misappropriating the same dishonestly can arise and no offence is committed by her under s 406, IPC, if she refuses to return the same to her husband after divorcing him.[23] Where the complainant advanced some money to a jeweller towards the cost of the gold and the cost of making it into a chain, but the jeweller neither delivered the chain on the date fixed nor returned the money, it was held that although the accused was guilty of dishonest and dishonourable conduct, he could not be said to have misappropriated the money because it was paid to him and it became his own money.[24] Similarly, where the money, deposited with a company, is to be utilised by the company as its own by giving it to other members as loan and depositors can get the equivalent amount back after a stipulated time along with interest, the money as3479 such cannot be termed as 'entrusted' to the company.[25] In Kamal Faker v Crown ,[26] a sum of money was paid as compensation for compromise of a criminal case, to the complainant by the accused. The court, however, refused permission for compromise. It was held that the compensation money could not be said to have been paid in trust to make out a case of criminal breach of trust.

Where, there were business dealings between parties in which the complainant had been supplying goods to the accused on making payment by accused by cash/draft/cheque, one such cheque issued by accused was dishonoured, the complaint under ss 406 / 420, IPC, was filed, there was no entrustment of goods and the transaction was of mere sale of goods, the criminal prosecution by the complaint was found to be an abuse of the process of the court so the complaint was quashed.[27]

15. Quashing of Complaint--Civil Dispute Regarding Non-payment of Amount under Contract etc[28]

There were two independent contracts, one between the principal company and the contractor company and another between the contractor company and the sub-contractor. On completion of work, the sub-contractor demanded payment from the contractor company, due to a non-payment of the same, filed a criminal complaint, alleging that the contractor company through its person in-charge/accused having received the payment from the principal company has misappropriated his (sub-contractor's) money. When admittedly, the two contracts were independent of each other and payment under one has no relevance qua the others, therefore, even if the principle company has made the payment to the contractor company, under its contract with the latter it will not give rise to a plea of misappropriation of money because that money is not money or movable property of the sub-contractor/complainant. It cannot be said that there was any dishonest intention on the part of the accused person/contractor company/office bearer of the contractor company or other to have misappropriated or converted the movable property of sub-contractor/complainant to their own use. Further, the dispute being about recovery of money was purely of a civil nature. Since, the basic ingredient of ss 403, 406 and 420, IPC, were not satisfied, the order, taking cognizance of offences and issuance of summons to the office bearer of the contractor company was quashed.[29]

16. Customary Gifts in Cash or Kind--No Entrustment

Some gifts in cash or in kind are customarily given in certain communities as well as in certain families. Gifts which are customarily given at the time of engagement, tilak or marriage must therefore, be regarded as gifts according to custom prevalent in the concerned communities or families for the purpose of creating human relationships with the members of that family. These gifts cannot be regarded as entrustment, nor can they be regarded as dowry. These gifts are not intended to be consideration for marriage. Therefore, various amounts which were given by the complainant and his relatives to the prospective bridegroom, his maternal uncle, and grandfather and the amount which were spent on sweets and fruits and the amount which was spent for3480 arranging the band did not amount to entrustment for the purpose of s 406, IPC . If every voluntary gift whether of money or goods or of food of any kind, is regarded as a entrustment or as dowry, the very customary human interaction which is essential for creating the human relationships will end in place of entering into relationships, and people would avoid them and grave injustice would be caused to the people.[30]

17. 'Property'[31]

The word 'property', in this and other sections of IPC, is used in a much wider sense than the expression 'movable property'. There is no reason to restrict the meaning of the word property to movable property only when it is used without any qualification in s 405 or in any other section of the IPC . Whether the offence, defined in a particular section of the IPC, may be committed in respect of any particular kind of property, will depend not on the interpretation of the word 'property', but on the fact whether that particular kind of property can be subject to the acts covered by that section. It is in this sense that the word property in a particular section covers only this type of property with respect to which the offence contemplated in that section, can be committed'.[32] Where there was evidence of the informant only that he had seen the accused setting fire to his house, there were material contradictions in the evidence and the case diary, appellants accused were held entitled to be acquitted of the charge under s 436, IPC .[33]

A chose-in-action, like a debt, is included within the expression 'property'.[34] Similarly, a cancelled cheque falls within the meaning of the term expression 'property'. As used in s 405, IPC, even if it is worth no more than the value of the paper upon which it is written.[35] In order to establish a charge of dishonest misappropriation or criminal breach of trust, it is not necessary that the accused should have actually taken tangible property such as cash from the possession of another and transferred it to his own possession. The transfer of certain amount from the account of another to one's own account in a bank is sufficient to constitute the offence.[36]

A blank cheque is a property.[37]

18. Sale Proceeds of Entrusted Property[38]

The scope of the section is wide enough to include the sale proceeds of the property entrusted. Even if the goods have been entrusted for sale and they are sold, the trust does not cease to exist.[39] In Suganmal Bhojraj v Emperor ,[40] a person was given, by3481 his master, a currency note of the value of rupees one thousand for depositing the same in his, i.e., master's credit. He, instead of depositing, changed it into notes of smaller denominations and distributed them among his two confederates and himself. It was held that it was idle to say that the trust was extinguished immediately when the change in the value of the note was made.

Even if property is mortgaged to bank, sale thereof by the mortgagor is not barred by law. Sale of mortgaged property would not amount of breach of trust punishable under s 406 IPC .[41]

19. 'Dishonestly'[42]

Unless dishonest intention is shown, an offence under s 405, IPC, cannot be made out.[43] Every breach of trust, in the absence of mens rea, is not criminal.[44]

When a person misappropriates to his own use the property that does not belong to him, the misappropriation is dishonest even though there was an intention to restore it at some future point of time.[45] The court should ascertain whether the state of mind in which the accused was, did not exclude the existence of dishonest intention which is an essential ingredient of the offence of criminal breach of trust. Evidence is certainly relevant for purpose of ascertaining whether the state of mind of the accused render it possible or likely for him to have entertained dishonest intention when he dealt with the moneys entrusted to him. If the accused was really unable to form the criminal intention, he cannot be guilty of the offence under s 406 . [46]

In Mohanlal Mulchand v Mehta Kanaiyalal Pranshanker ,[47] certain title-deeds were entrusted to the accused for the purpose of making inquiries about some land. The accused did not return the documents and said that he had lost the bundle and that the task was not completed. It was found that the accused had used the title-deeds to harm the transferee. Under these facts, it was held that the offence was complete when the documents were used to harm the transferee, and that taking of money was not necessary to constitute the offence. The prosecution is not bound to establish the mode in which the accused has appropriated the amount of entrustment.[48] Dishonest misappropriation may be inferred from the established facts.[49] Dishonest intention was held to have been proved in the case of a post- master who entered an amount in the savings bank pass book of a depositor without entering the same in his account book.[50] Where the accused took a gold jewel from a goldsmith for showing it to his wife and placing an order for a similar jewel, but failed to return it and retained it with him towards some debt due to him by the goldsmith and claimed it to be his own, it was held that the accused was guilty of dishonestly retaining it and claiming3482 it to be his by misappropriating it.[51] Where, however, the accused took away some ornaments for approval and promised to return them in the evening the same day, the mere retention of the property without misappropriation was held not to constitute criminal breach of trust.[52] The false denial of the loan is compatible with the absence of criminal misappropriation.[53]

20. 'Misappropriate'

Even if misappropriation is found temporary, it would constitute offence of criminal breach of trust.[54]

Actual manner of misappropriation need not be proved.[55]

Where the complainant did not allege that the accused misappropriated the amount entrusted to him by the complainant, no offence under ss 406 and 420, IPC was committed.[56]

21. Hire-purchase Cases

The mere failure of a person to produce a meter, installed on his premises by an electric company, does not, by itself, constitute an offence of criminal breach of trust. This section does not embrace the case of a man who takes an article on hire and fails to produce it. There must be some evidence that he acted dishonestly.[57] Where the accused made defaults in payment of instalments for a gramophone purchased by him, and did not immediately produce the machine when demanded, but produced it in court, it was held that mere non-payment of monthly instalments could not be considered a criminal offence.[58] It was held, in S Mitter v State ,[59] that the mere non-payment of monthly instalments would not be a criminal offence if the hirer is entitled to keep and possess the article and fulfils the order condition of the hire-purchase agreement. Where, however, a hirer of a sewing machine sold to guilty of criminal breach of trust,[60] under the hire-purchase agreement, the hirer is simply for the use of goods and has the option to purchase the same. The finance charge representing the difference between the cash price, and the hire-purchase price is not interest but represents a sum which the hirer has to pay for the privilege of being allowed to discharge the purchased price of goods by installments. The repossession of the vehicle by the financer as per the terms of the hire-purchase agreement does3483 not attract criminal breach proceedings against the financer for committing criminal breach of trust, cheating and theft of vehicle.[61]

22. Civil Liability

The return of the deposit to the brother of a depositor under circumstances, indicating the best of intentions and an absence of moral turpitude, may render a person civilly liable to the depositor, but not to a criminal breach of trust.[62] Where the accused retained some money against a debt, which was due to him from the complainant, and there was nothing to show that in doing so he acted dishonestly, it was held that no offence of criminal breach of trust was made out.[63] Refusal by an agent to refund money to the person, paying it to him on behalf of his principle, would not make the agent criminally liable, the money so received being property of the principal.[64] a mere non-compliance by the creditor with the request of the debtor to make an endorsement of payment on the promissory note does not amount to an offence of criminal breach of trust.[65] When there was no dispute regarding payment of price, but the dispute related only to non-conveyance of form H, the dispute being of a civil nature, no liability under ss 406 and 409, IPC, arose.[66] The mere failure on the part of the employer to return a deposit, made by the employee, at the time of the termination of his service is not, by itself, sufficient for a conviction under s 406 .[67] Where materials for execution of a contract for construction of a primary school were issued by the government, to a contractor and the contractor utilised only a, part of the materials and appropriated the rest, it was held that under the rules, the materials issued became the property of the contractor and the failure of the contractor to use them and to account for them created only a civil liability and there was no offence under s 406, IPC .[68]

The act of criminal breach of trust per se may involve a civil wrong but a breach of trust with an ingredient of mens rea would give rise to a criminal prosecution as well.[69]

23. Arbitration Clause in the Agreement--No Effect on Criminal Proceedings

Civil and criminal proceedings both go side by side. Merely because of the arbitration clause, it cannot be said that the criminal proceedings cannot proceed.[70] The provision incorporated in the agreement for referring the dispute to arbitration is not an effective substitute for a criminal prosecution when the disputed act is an offence. Arbitration is a remedy for affording relief to the parties effected by breach3484 of the agreement, but the arbitrator cannot conduct a trial of any act which amounted to an offence albeit the same act may be connected with the discharge of any function under the agreement.[71] Mere pendency of arbitration proceeding or availability of civil remedy would not be a ground to discharge the accused under s 406, IPC .[72] However, when arbitration proceedings are going on for more than 17 years and the matter is purely of a civil nature, the proceedings under s 406, IPC, based on such matter are liable to be quashed.[73]

24. Both Criminal and Civil Proceedings can Run Side by Side

The civil and criminal remedies are not mutually exclusive, but clearly co-extensive and essentially differ in their content and consequence. The object of the criminal law is to punish an offender who commits an offence against a person, property or the state for which the accused on proof of the offence is deprived of his liberty and in some cases even his life. This, however, does not affect the civil remedies at all for suing the wrong doer. It is an anathema to suppose that when a civil remedy is available, a criminal prosecution is completely barred. The two types of action are quite different in content, scope and import.[74] The availability of civil remedy provided under the Punjab Co-operative Societies Act under which ss 54 and 55 is for recovery of embezzled amount, does not debar criminal prosecution of the accused under s 408, IPC .[75]

Merely because the act of the accused has a civil profile would not denude it of its criminal outfit. Criminal and civil proceedings are separate and independent of each other and the pendency of a civil suit cannot bring to an end the criminal proceedings even if they arise out of the same set of facts.[76]

25. Pendency of Civil Suit--Criminal Case should be Stayed[77]

Where a civil suit is instituted before the lodging of the FIR and the facts are intimately connected, the proceedings in the criminal case should be stayed. Where the parties had gone to civil court and where the entire dispute was likely to be thrashed out and competing interest conclusively determine that it was proper to have the matter decided in civil court and allow the complainant to get the complaint revived after decision by the civil court.[78]

26. Every Breach of Trust not a Criminal Breach of Trust

Every breach of trust gives rise to a suit for damages, but it is only when there is evidence of mental act of fraudulent misappropriation that the commission of embezzlement of any sum of money becomes a penal offence punishable as criminal3485 breach of trust.[79] A mere breach of contract is not synonymous with criminal breach of trust.[80]It is the mental act of fraudulent misappropriation that distinguishes an embezzlement, amounting to a civil wrong or tort, from the offence of criminal breach of trust.[81] If there is no mens rea, or if other essential ingredients are lacking, the same set of facts would not sustain a criminal prosecution, though a civil action may lie.[82] a mere failure to repay the loan would not constitute a criminal breach of trust.[83] Where the managing agents spent moneys upon business of the company with the knowledge and acquiescence of the directors and it was not proved that the managing agents acted dishonestly, it was held that they were not liable for criminal breach of trust even though there had been a breach of contract causing loss to the policy holders of the company.[84]

The mere fact, that the payment was delayed is no ground for imputing a criminal intention on the part of the accused,[85] when there is no particular obligation to pay it at a certain date. [86]

27. Refusal to Return the Property Entrusted--No Criminal Breach of Trust

A bare perusal of s 405, IPC shows that in order an offence of criminal breach of trust may be said to have been committed, it must be shown that the alleged offender was entrusted with property or with any dominion over property and that he dishonestly misappropriated or converted to his own use that property, or he dishonestly used or disposed of that property in violation of any direction of law prescribing the mode in which such trust is to be discharged, or of any legal contract, express or implied, which he has made touching upon the discharge of such trust, or will fully suffers any other person so to do.

It shows that in addition to entrustment of the property in favour of the accused, the accused should have dishonestly misappropriated the property or converted that3486 property to his own use or dealt with the property in the manner prescribed in s 405, IPC . Mere refusal to return the property, which was entrusted to him does not satisfy the requirements of s 405, IPC . Failure to return the property may be occasional on account of several reasons. A person, who is called upon to return the property, which was entrusted to him may not receive the notice requiring him to return the property or for reasons beyond control, he may not be in a position to return the property by actually carrying it to the person, who entrusted it. In any case mere failure to return the property does not constitute an offence of criminal breach of trust under s 405, IPC . It is a quite different matter if from the act of not returning the property, it is inferred that the person to whom the property was entrusted is unable to return the property, because he has misappropriated it or that he is unable to return it, because he is converting the property for his own use in a dishonest manner. The offence under s 405 is therefore, committed when the property which was entrusted to the accused was actually misappropriated or dishonestly converted for his own use or is otherwise dealt with in the manner indicated by s 405, IPC . The date on which the notice for return of the property was served has little relevance so far as the point of time of commission of the offence under s 405, IPC, is concerned. The learned munsiff and judicial magistrate was therefore, not justified in coming to the conclusion that the offence of criminal breach of trust under s 405 was committed on a date which was five days prior to 20 March 1990.[87]

Stridhan

Property gifted before, at or after the marriage to the wife are her stridhan property, and the husband cannot claim return of the property. Where the wife with her stridhan properties, had gone to her parents' house, the husband cannot prosecute the wife or her parents for offence under ss 405 and 406, IPC .[88]

Misappropriation of stridhan properties constitutes offence of criminal breach of trust punishable under s 406, IPC .[89]

Case of the complainant was that she had entrusted her gold ornaments to her daughter-in-law. But the evidence showed that the complainant had entrusted her ornaments to her son. The accused daughter-in-law was given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 406, IPC .[90]

28. No Criminal Breach of Trust on mere failure to Return Entrusted Property

Mere failure/omission of the accused to return entrusted property is not sufficient to constitute an offence under s 405, IPC . The prosecution has to go further and show that the accused, dishonestly misappropriated or converted the said property to his own use or dishonestly used or disposed it off.[91]3487

29. No Criminal Breach of Trust if the Amounts Received Fall Outside the Scope of the Trust

Where the president of a municipality, after purchasing some articles for the municipality and paying its price, obtained a certain amount form the vender as brokerage for which he gave the vendor a receipt, it was held that this amount was paid for his personal use, and not for the benefit of the municipality, and he was not guilty of criminal breach of trust.[92] Where the accused, a booking clerk, recovered an amount in excess of the legal charge and did not credit the same to the railways, it was held that he could not be convicted of the offence under s 405, the railways having no beneficial interest in the money dishonestly recovered in direct contravention of their own instructions.[93] In Surendra Pal Singh v State ,[94] the accused realised certain sums from the cultivators as canal dues in his capacity as a canal amin and deposited the amount, which was really due from cultivators in the treasury, but did not deposit the excess amount recovered by him, it was held that the excess amount was never due to the government and was never the property of the government at any stage and the accused had never become its trustee on behalf of the government or on behalf of the cultivators.

The accused was, therefore, not guilty under s 409 though he could be punished under s 420, IPC . In Labhu v Emperor ,[95] a licensee from a municipal committee was to write receipts relating to the sale transactions of cattle in a fair. He was to pay the price of each receipt book at the rate of annas eight per receipt in advance, but he charged one rupee from each purchased. It was held that the accused was not entrusted with any property or with dominion over any property and merely making wrong entries in the receipt books could not possibly bring his case within the purview of ss 403 and 405, IPC .

30. No Criminal Breach of Trust if Action of the Accused is in Good Faith

A person, who is pleading a claim or right, may be acting without dishonest intention if he is asserting bona fide what he believes to be a lawful claim even though it may be unfounded in law or in fact.[96] If the accused has some claim to the property over which he still retains dominion, there would be no offence unless the claim is merely a pretence, and not bona fide, even if it turns out to be sustainable in law.[97] In a case of criminal misappropriation, the question is whether the wrongful detainer of the money was with a dishonest intention or only on a wrong opinion that the accused was justified in keeping back money adjudged to him under a decree. Where the accused admitted that he had collected the money, but claimed that he meant to retain what was due to him, the accused was held not to be guilty.[98]3488

32. No Criminal Breach of Trust when Goods sold to Accused

In a sale transaction between the-complainant and the accused, the goods in question were sold by the complainant to the accused on credit but the cheques issued by the accused towards payment of the amount due, bounced. The goods admittedly were sold by the complainant to the accused which meant that the title in the property passed to the accused the moment the sale was completed. It may be pertinent to remember that passing of the title in movable property is not dependent on the payment of sale considerations and it is completed when an offer to purchase at a price is accepted by the buyer and the delivery of goods or payment of price or both may be postponed under the agreement, as contemplated under s 5 of the Sale of Goods Act. Thus, the question of commission of any offence under s 409 or under s 406, IPC, in respect of goods sold does not arise.[1]

33. Partners, Ordinarily not Liable for Criminal Breach of Trust in Respect of Partnership Property

Partners of the firm do not hold property in trust for each other.[2] In case a partnership, every partner has dominion over the partnership property by reason of the fact that he is a partner. This is a kind of dominion which every owner of property has over his property. However, it is not dominion of this kind which satisfaction the requirements of s 405 .[3] Ordinarily, a partner cannot be held guilty of criminal breach of trust[4] unless there is any special agreement between the parties for the entrustment of property, or dominion over it, to any partner (i.e., the accused) and the necessary ingredients, justifying a charge for criminal breach of trust under s 406, IPC, are present,[5] because the mere existence of dominion over the property, like that of any other partner is not enough. It is further to be shown that his dominion was the result of entrustment.[6] If, therefore, there is no proof of special agreement for3489 entrusting any property, or dominion over property, to any partner, the receiving of any money, belonging to the partnership, will not make a partner guilty of the offence of criminal breach of trust.[7] It is no criminal offence to withhold payment of a partner's share in the profit. He can only claim a dissolution of partnership and an account and payment to him on what is found due on taking the account.[8] In M Rahaman v RD Khambatta ,[9] the complainant alleged that there was an agreement (partnership) between him and the accused, in which they were partners, that he provided funds to the accused and the accused bought and sold timber, but when he demanded money the accused put him off on this pretext or that. On these facts, it was held that no prima facie case was made out for a criminal case, and the dispute was of a civil nature. A working partner, dishonestly misappropriating the property of the firm, entrusted to him is liable for committing criminal breach of trust.[10] However, where the facts of the case relate only to an ordinary partnership dealing, there would be no offence.[11]

It was alleged that the complainant and the accused appellants were partners of the firm. The appellants accused conspired to deprive the complainant of his share of a dissolved firm. The evidence showed that the new firm was dissolved at its very inception. As such there was no question of depriving the complainant of his profits of partnership firm. The criminal proceedings were quashed.[12]

Where dispute between the accused and the complainant arose out of partnership business, allegations in complaint did not constitute offence under ss 405 / 406, IPC, and criminal proceedings were quashed.[13]

34. Partner when Liable in Respect of Partnership Property

The contention that one partner cannot commit criminal breach of trust against the other partners, though prima facie alluring, but may not be tenable on the facts of a given case. A partnership firm is not a legal entity, but a legal mode of doing business by all the partners, until the firm is dissolved as per law and the accounts settled, all the partners have dominion in common over the property and funds of the firm. Only after the settlement of accounts and allotment of respective shares, the partner becomes an owner of his share. However, criminal breach of trust under s 406 is not in respect of property belonging to the partnership firm, but in an offence committed by a person in respect of the property which has been especially entrusted to such a person under a special contract and he holds that property in fiduciary capacity under a special contract. If he misappropriates the same, it is an offence.[14]3490

Whether a partner can be said to have been entrusted with property must depend upon whether there is any special agreement between the parties. If there is no special agreement, he does not receive the property in fiduciary capacity. If there is, however, a special agreement between the partners, then it can be said that a partner is entrusted with the property or with dominion over it. For example, if, by the terms of the partnership agreement, one partner is given the sole right to the possession of the partnership assets or to receive moneys on behalf of the partnership, then such partner may be said to have entrusted another partner with money if he gives such other partner money for such specific purpose.[15] Where, however, one partner is given authority by the other partners to collect moneys or property of the firm, he is entrusted with dominion over the property and if he dishonestly misappropriates, then he comes within the ambit of s 406, IPC .[16]

35. Partners Liable for Third Party

Where the loan was taken by the partnership firm for construction of a plant and installation of machinery from a financial corporation against hypothecation of the said plant and machinery, the removal of machinery from the premises without the consent of the financial corporation in violation of the terms of the mortgage deed, attract the offence under s 406, IPC, committed by the partnership firm. Merely because one of the accused had withdrawn from the partnership firm subsequently, it could not be said that he was not liable.[17]

36. Prosecution of Company

Complaint under ss 405 and 420, IPC for criminal breach of trust and cheating respectively, was filed against the company and its Board of Directors. In the complaint no specific liability was imposed on the officers of the company, if the alleged offence was committed by the company. Held, in the absence of specific details about the same, no person other than the company could be prosecuted under the alleged complaint.[18]

As held by majority of the Constitution Bench in Standard Chartered Bank v Directorate of Enforcement [19] the company can be prosecuted even in a case where the Court can impose substantive sentence as also fine, and in such case only fine can be imposed on the corporate body.

37. Mohammedan Co-owners

The rule, that a co-partner cannot be convicted of an offence under s 406, IPC, in respect of a partnership business, does not apply to a Mohammedan co-owner as he has a specific share in the property left by a Mohammedan deceased.[20]3491

38. Pledgee--Whether Liable for Criminal Breach of Trust with respect to Property Pledged

A pledge may, according to the terms of pledge, be liable for a conviction under s 406 if he commits a breach in respect of the trust.[21] If a pledge, even after payment of the loan, uses the pledged ornaments as a pledge in respect of a completely independent transaction, he definitely uses the ornaments in violation of the legal contract, creating the trust, and would be guilty under s 406 .[22] In Abinash Chandra Kumar v Dham Buksh Mohammad , [23] the pledgee, on payment of the loan, asked the pledger to come the next day for getting back the ornaments and denied the pledge the very next day. It was held that the pledgee was guilty of criminal breach of trust. His criminal liability, however, depends on the terms of the pledge, Where certain articles were pledged with the accused, who was given the right to sell the article if the interest payable remained in arrears for three months, and he sold the articles in default of payment and credited the balance of the sale proceeds after deducting the amount of principal and interest, it was held that the accused was not guilty of any offence as there was nothing to show dishonest intention because he acted in good faith.[24] In Re Gokauarapu Peravya,[25] after a decree was obtained by the complainant, agreements were made in writing between the parties to the effect that the money due had been paid and the jewels pledged with the complainant, were delivered to the accused. Subsequently, the complainant alleged that the agreements were sham transactions and that the jewels were given to the accused who had undertaken to sell them and pay the sale proceeds to the complainant in discharge of his decree debt. It was held that the magistrate ought not to have taken upon himself to decide the question whether agreements in writing represented a real transaction between the parties or merely a benami arrangement between them. The accused was, therefore, acquitted.

Whether a pledgee can pledge what is pledged to him is a question which depends upon the facts of a particular case.[26] In the absence of any express condition to the contrary, it is open to the pledgee to make a sub-pledge of the property pledged with him. He has perfect legal right to deal with the pledged property in any manner he chooses so long as he is within the rights that can be exercised by a bailee.[27] a pawnee or a pledgee has the right to make the sub-pledge to the extent of his interest in the pledged property.[28]3492

39. Goldsmiths not Preparing Ornaments in Terms of Contract--How far Liable for Criminal Breach of Trust

If a goldsmith, who is given gold for preparing ornaments, dishonestly converts it to his own use in violation of the implied contract, he is guilty of criminal breach of trust because there is clearly an entrustment of gold to him for preparing ornaments, desired by the person who gives gold.[29] In this case the complainant had given three gold chains weighing 6.5 tolas to the appellant accused for making a new design chain after melting the old chains. Neither the three old chains nor a new gold chain were returned to him. The complainant sent a telegram and a legal notice asking the appellant accused to return the gold chains. When the accused appellant did not return the old chains nor gave a new one, the complainant filed complaint for offence under s 406, IPC . The High Court held that in such cases the burden was on the accused to rebut the allegation made against him. The High Court was right in directing the trial Court to decide the case on merits in the light of the statements of witnesses and evidence on record.[30] Where the accused to whom silver had been entrusted for making an ornament, introduced copper, it was held that the offence committed was of criminal breach of trust, and not of cheating.[31] However, where the accused was entrusted with some gold and he gave a receipt in token of his having received the gold and also promised to get the ornaments prepared within fifteen days, but he did not prepare the ornaments and even denied having received the gold, it was held that the existence of dishonest intention was proved beyond reasonable doubt. The very fact that receipt was given when gold was taken, would show that it was a bona fide transaction between the goldsmith and the customer and subsequently the accused was not able to fulfil his part of the contract.[32]

40. Suparddar--How far Liable for Criminal Breach of Trust with Respect to Property Entrusted to him

As to whether a person, to whom property is entrusted for return when necessary, the question of criminal liability has to be considered in the light of the terms of the agreement made with him. The mere fact, that there is a civil liability, does not necessarily absolve one from criminal liability.[33] In Indrajit Singh Kohli v State ,[34] a truck, seized from the possession of another person, was made over to the custody of the accused on executing a bond by him to the effect that he would produce the same whenever required. However, when he was called upon to produce the truck, he did not do so and remained untraced for sometime. It was held that the existence of other remedies by way of forfeiture of the bond or imposition of penalty did not exclude a criminal liability for an offence of criminal breach of trust. Where some property, attached in execution of a decree of the civil court, was handed over to the accused for safe custody and he refused to produce same when demanded at the time of auction, it was held that it amounted to repudiation of the trust, reposed in him, and3493 he was, therefore, guilty under s 406 .[35] Where, however, some movable property, attached in execution of a decree, was placed in the charge of the accused, and he evaded the service of notices, issued to him for producing the same at the time of auction-sale, and did not produce the property, it was held that as the property had not been misappropriated, or converted to the use of the accused, or used or disposed of in any manner contrary to the terms of the trust, the accused was not guilty under s 406 .[36] The offence would not be committed unless it is proved that the accused had dishonestly used the property in violation of the terms of the supardnama.[37] In Shashi Bhushan Maity v State ,[38] it was held that when the accused denies the execution of the Zimmanama and the entrustment depends entirely upon the existence and genuineness of the Zimmanama, the prosecution must produce good evidence in proof of execution of the Zimmanama. Unless the Zimmanama is considered to be a valid document, validity entrusting the accused with the custody of the property under consideration, the accused cannot be convicted of a criminal breach of trust, sought to be created by the Zimmanama itself.

41. Mortgage and Hypothecation and Breach of Trust

In the case of mortgage or hypothecation, the ownership does not pass to the persons in whose favour the mortgage or hypothecation is created, but it does create 'a beneficial interest' in his favour, if the property is removed without his consent and in violation of the terms of the agreement in that regard, prima facie, the offence of criminal breach of trust is made out.[39]

42. Dishonour of cheque

The cheques issued by the appellant/accused towards purchase price were dishonoured. There was neither allegation nor proof that the appellant had intention to cheat the respondent from the very beginning. Held, no offence of criminal breach of trust or cheating was committed. Appellant was acquitted of the charges under ss 405 and 420, IPC .[40]

Where the accused had promised to repay the amount, cheque issued was dishonored and amount was not made available in the account despite several reminders, prima facie case for proceeding under ss 406 and 409, IPC was made out.[41]

43. Blank cheque

Where a person misappropriates the amount of a blank cheque for a purpose other than for which the cheque was issued, he commits the offence of criminal breach of trust punishable under s 406, IPC .[42]3494

44. Misappropriation, even for a Short Period, is a Criminal Breach of Trust

The law makes a very clear provision for offences of temporary misappropriation and breach of trust and similarly in cases where the property has been removed fraudulently and dishonestly and theft or robbery has taken place, the law envisages that the offence is complete when the ingredients of the section are satisfied.[43] Deprivation, even for a short-period, falls within the scope of this section.[44] To establish dishonesty, it is not necessary that the prosecution should establish an intention to retain permanently the property misappropriated. An intention to wrongfully deprive the owner of the use of property for a time, and secure the use of property for his own benefit for a time may be sufficient.[45]The offence would be committed even where the act of the accused was to cause wrongful loss to the complainant for the time being only.[46] A village officer of a temple remitting revenue collections to the treasury after excessive delay would be guilty of an offence under s 408 .[47] Where a patwari collected some cesses and process fees and made some other collections, did not deposit the amounts in the treasury for some months, it was held that he was guilty under s 409 as wrongful loss covers a temporary wrongful gain.[48] A naib nazir, receiving moneys in his capacity as such but not entering in the proper register, and not handing it over to his successor,[49] or a VP clerk, keeping the money for more than ten days and denying its receipt,[50] would be guilty of an offence under s 409 . Where the accused, in December 1957, received certain amounts as repayment of taqavi loan, but wrongly stated that they were received in April 1958, it was held that false explanation was sufficient to prove the element of dishonesty.[51]

45. Prosecution not to Prove Actual Manner of Misappropriation

The actual manner of misappropriation, it is well settled, is not required to be proved by the prosecution. Once entrustment is proved, it was for the accused to prove as to how the property entrusted to him was dealt with in view of s 405 of the IPC . If the accused had failed to produce any material for this purpose, the prosecution should not suffer therefor.[52]

46. 'In Violation of any Direction of Law'

These words relate, and are limited, to the words 'dishonestly uses or disposes of that property.'[53] Where the secretary of a society advanced money, against the rules of the society, to the person not entitled to it, the argument that there was no criminal offence as the society had ratified the advances, could not be upheld.[54]3495

Any act of omission or commission on the part of any authority of the Bank would amount to acting in violation of any direction of law. A direction of law need not be a law made by Parliament or a legislature; it may be made by an authority having the power therefor; the law could be a subordinate legislation, a notification or even a custom. Indisputably, the higher authorities of the Bank were entrusted with or otherwise had dominion over the properties of the Bank. They were dealing with public funds. Indisputably again they were required to apply the same in terms of the circulars issued by the Bank as also the Reserve Bank of India. It has been accepted at the Bar that failure on the part of the officers of the Bank to abide by the directives issued under the circulars would result in civil action. Subjecting the bank to a civil liability would thus attract one of the ingredients of criminal breach of trust. There cannot be, however, any doubt whatsoever that a mere error of judgment would not attract the penal provision contained in s 409, IPC . The materials brought on record by the parties must be judged keeping in view the aforesaid legal position.[55]

47. 'Legal Contract'

A mere breach of contract, or a mere breach of conditions of a permit, is not necessarily synonymous with the criminal breach of trust.[56] The section refers to legal contract. There is, however, controversy on the question whether in cases of illegal contracts, the misappropriation would be covered by s 405 . In some cases, it has been held that there will be criminal breach of trust. Where the complainant left his flock of sheep in possession of the accused to prevent them from being taken in execution of a decree and the accused misappropriated the sheep to his own use, it was held that the fact that the trust was created for an illegal purpose, will not justify the accused in selling the animals and appropriating the sale proceeds to his own use.[57] It was held in Mahadev Koshti v Narayan ,[58] that the question of criminal responsibility wholly stood on a different footing. The trust contemplated by ss 405 and 406, IPC, need not be in furtherance of a lawful object. On the other hand, it has been held by the Madras High Court that a person cannot be convicted under this section if the contract is a wagering contract.[59] The violation of a contract must be in respect of a legal or valid contract in order to amount to a criminal breach of trust. It should not be for a criminal purpose (e.g., purchase of stolen property, etc.).[60]

48. 'Contract, Express or Implied'

Entrustment need not be express; it may be implied.[61]

49. 'Wilfully Suffers any other Person so to do'

'Wilfully' means that an act is done deliberately and intentionally, and not by accident or inadvertence.[62] 'Wilfully', presupposes a conscious action while even by3496 negligence one can allow another to do a thing.[63] Mere acts of negligence in complying with the relevant rules would not suffice to hold one responsible on the ground that he willingly suffered the embezzlement.[64] In Kedarnath v State [65] the accused was a manager cum accountant and was responsible for the entire administration of a brick kiln, for which a high standard of care was required. The inspection notes of his work repeatedly warned him and useful suggestions for avoiding losses were made. He was given correct advice but he chose to disregard it. In these circumstances, it was held that the conduct of the accused was deliberate, and even if it be assumed that someone else committed that misappropriation, the accused wilfully suffered him to do so.

It is not necessary for the purpose of s 405, IPC that the property must be physically with the accused. All that is required, is that he should have dominion over it and it may be disposed of under his direction and in case he acts in violation of any direction of law, prescribing the mode in which such trust is to be discharged, and the property is accordingly disposed of, he is clearly liable for criminal breach of trust.[66] In the last cited case, the act of preparing false vouchers on the basis of exaggerated amounts, paid to various persons, was held to amount to criminal breach of trust within the meaning of s 405, IPC .

50. Explanations 1 and 2

The position of law prior to the coming into force of s 9 of the Employees Provident Funds and Family Pensions Fund (Amendment) Act 1973, adding expln 1 to this section, was that para 32(3) of the Employees Provident Funds Scheme 1952 created only a fiction of entrustment,[67] with the result that the sum deducted from the wages of an employee by the employer, could not be an entrustment so as to attract the provisions of s 405, IPC, though it did amount to an entrustment under the said paragraph.[68] Similarly, the mere fact that the employer made a deduction from the employee's wages but failed to make a deposit, was insufficient to hold that he committed criminal breach of trust because such deduction did not, by itself, constitute trust,[69] The employer in whose possession the deductions were, could not be regarded as having been entrusted with the sum.[70] After expln 1 was added to this section in 1973, the position has radically changed and the employer, who deducts the sums out of the wages of an employee, is regarded as having been entrusted with the sum and if he dishonestly misappropriates the said sum, he is liable for criminal breach of trust.[71] The position is further clarified by making insertions in expln 1 by Act 33 of 1988, s 27 wef 1 August 1988 by retaining expln 1, but clarifying with such3497 insertion that now an establishment which is exempted under s 17 of the Employees Provident Funds and Miscellaneous Provisions Act 1952 (19 of 1952) or not, who deducts the employees' contribution from the wages payable to the employee for credit to a Provident Fund or Family Pension Fund established by any law for the time being in force, shall be deemed to have been entrusted with the amount of the contribution so deducted by him and if he makes default in the payment of such contribution to the said Fund in violation of the said law, shall be deemed to have dishonestly used the amount of the said contribution in violation of a direction of law as aforesaid. Similar would be the position with regard to expln 2 which is obviously an extension of its principle to the Employees State Insurance Fund.

Where there was a controversy between the parties with regard to the question, whether contingencies on the happening of which money would be payable by the employer to the complainant employee did actually happen, the mere non-payment of contribution in such a case does not amount to an offence under s 409, IPC, so the criminal proceedings initiated are liable to be quashed. [72]

The expression 'person' appearing in expln 2 clearly refers to the principal employer defined in the ESI Act.[73]

Non-remittance of the provident fund money deducted from the salary of the employees is an offence punishable under s 406, IPC, and subsequent remittance of the amount, even if accepted, would not condone the offence.[74] Where the petitioner had not deposited the employees contribution of fund, but remitted all dues in response to the notice received from the Employees State Insurance Corporation, the Amnesty Scheme exonerated the petitioner of the offence under s 85 of the Employees State Insurance Act 1948 and also under s 405, IPC .[75]

51. Director of a Company not Liable for Non-deposit of Provident Fund Amount

In view of the definition of the employer[76] the employer is the occupier of the company in question and he is a person who has ultimate control over the affairs of the company in view of the definition of the employer and in view of expln 1 to s 45, IPC, the employer is the person who deducts the employees' contribution under the Act from the wages payable to the employees for credit to the Provident Fund or Family Pension Fund established under the law and, therefore, in no way the directors of the company can be held liable for the prosecution under ss 406 and 409, IPC, as there was no entrustment to them in terms of expln 1 to s 405, IPC .[77] In this connection, reference can be made to the case of Employees State Insurance Corporation v SK Agarwal. [78]Section 2(e) of the Act appears to be pari materia to s 2(17) of the Employees State Insurance Act. The Apex Court in Employees State Insurance Corporation case has held that in view of the definition of the employer under s 2(17) of the Employees' State Insurance Act and in view of expln 2 to s 405, IPC, the expression employer does not include the director. The ratio laid down by3498 the Apex Court, is wholly applicable in view of the definition of the employer under s 2(c) of the Act and in view of expln 1 to s 405, IPC . The directors of the company in no way can be held liable for criminal prosecution for non-deposit of contribution of the employees for contravention of the provisions of the Employees Provident Fund Act.[79] But a contrary view is taken by the Calcutta High Court:[80]

> A director of a company can very well figure as an accused in an FIR for such offences. Of course ultimately if no material is found against the director in course of investigation about his involvement, he may not be chargesheeted. That apart a company cannot act on its own. It always acts through human agency. A company being a juristic person is incapable of having a particular state of mind, namely, the mens rea under Section 405IPC Essential ingredient of the offence under Section 405 is a particular state of mind, namely, dishonest misappropriation or conversion or use or disposal of the property in question. A company, being a juristic person, is incapable of having such state of mind and hence the company cannot be proceeded against for the offences under Section 406 and 409IPC where particular mens rea is an essential ingredient. Therefore, it is only the natural persons through whom the company committed the offences in question are liable to be proceeded against for offences under Section 406 and 409 . It may be pertinent to mention here that mens rea like dishonest misappropriation or conversion or use or disposal of the property in question is not an ingredient for the offences contemplated under the provisions of EPF and MP Act and hence, for offences under the said Act a company can be proceeded against, though it cannot be proceeded against for the offences under the Indian Penal Code . Therefore, the contention that a director only cannot be proceeded against and it is the company only which can be proceeded against for the offences under Sections 406 / 409 sounds like an absurd proposition and the same is untenable in law.

52. Company -- Liability of other directors

The complainant had taken loan from the company against his shares, had repaid the loan but his shares were not returned. Agreement relating to share was entered into between the complainant and one director of company. Other directors of the company cannot be prosecuted on the principle of vicarious liability.[81]

53. Partners of a Firm not Liable in the Absence of Necessary Averments in the Complaint

When the principal employer is not being prosecuted, the partners cannot be prosecuted without any specific allegation. Even if there was slightest suggestion in the complaint that the partners were actively involved in the business of the firm along with the principal employer then the complainant would be justified in prosecuting the partners. in the absence of any such averment, it is difficult to hold that the partners in the facts and circumstances of the case can be prosecuted, while the principal employer is not prosecuted. Under s 2(17)(i), Employees State Insurance Act the principal employer is the manager of the factory for the purposes of Factories Act. The manager of the factory need not be the partners.[82]3499

In the matter of Sham Sunder v State of Haryana [83] the Supreme Court held as follows:

> It is, therefore, necessary to add an emphatic note of caution in this regard. More often it is common that some of the partners of a firm may not even be knowing of what is going on day to day in the firm. There may be partners who are not required to take part in the business of the firm. There may be ladies and minors who were admitted for the benefit of partnership. They may not know anything about the business for the firm. It would be travesty of justice to prosecute all partners and ask them to prove under the proviso to sub-s 1 that the offence was committed without their knowledge. It is significant to note that the obligation for the accused to prove under the proviso that the offence took place without his knowledge or that he exercised all due diligence to prevent such offence arises only when the prosecution establishes that the requisite condition mentioned in sub-s 1 is established. The requisite condition is that the partners were responsible for carrying on the business and were during the relevant time in charge of the business. In the absence of any such proof, no partner can be convicted. We, therefore, reject the contents urged by counsel for the state.

Reliance was also placed in a Division Bench judgment[84] in the matter of ESIC v S Narayana Rao , the Karnataka High Court held in para 7 as follows:

> It is now necessary to consider the liabilities of the present respondent in the light of the decisions referred to above. Again going back to the definition of the term 'occupier' under the Factories Act as it stood before insertion of the proviso in the year 1987 the person who has ultimate control over the affairs of the factory as the occupier. In our view, therefore, it is necessary for the complainant to allege and protest who exactly was in ultimate control over the affairs of the factory, if at all one is sought to be made liable as an occupier. As we have already pointed out from the definition of 'principal, employer', there may be managing agent appointed by the occupier or the owner, there may be legal representatives of a deceased-owner or occupier and where a person has been named as manager of the factory the person so named. Therefore, the complainant cannot ask the court to fit the accused into any one of the category and say that he was responsible for obeying one of the requirements under the statute. As we have already pointed out the evidence of PW 1 and the inspector is totally silent in this behalf. What he stated was that the respondent was a managing director and nothing more. The term 'principal employer' does not include in its definition the managing director. He does not say who was the occupier of the factory. He does not say who was having ultimate control over the affairs of the factory and does not even say that the respondent was the principal employer. Therefore, it is not possible to make out from the complaint and much less even from the evidence as to the capacity in which the respondent was sought to be prosecuted.

While the principal employer will be strictly liable, the partners can be made liable if there are averments in the complaint that they have also participated in the commission of the offence.

54. Death of Complainant--Proceeding can be Continued by Another Person

There is no specific provision in the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898, to deal with a situation wherein a complainant dies, therefore, s 302 of Code of Criminal Procedure, could be invoked and the complaint can be permitted to be continued by the mother of the complainant.[85] There are also decisions of various High Courts3500 where a similar view is taken, that on the death of the complainant the prosecution can be entrusted on some other person.[86]

55. Complainant Company Amalgamating with another Company--Successor Company can Continue Prosecution

There is no provision in the Code of Criminal Procedure that the complaint abates on the death of the complainant. The fact that the old company has ceased to exist in the eyes of law is almost like the death of the complainant. In such a case the court can very well invoke the power under s 302, CrPC, and entrust the conduct of prosecution of the case to another person. Thus, where the complainant company had amalgamated with another company and now a new company has come into existence, it is open to the transferee company to file appropriate application under s 302, CrPC, before the magistrate for permission to continue the prosecution. It is not a case of the transferee company being substituted for the original complainant company. The name of the original complainant should continue on record. However, it can be mentioned that 'original complainant company now represented by the transferee company', for conducting the prosecution. On such application being filed by the transferee company, the magistrate shall permit the transferee company to continue the prosecution according to law.[87]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL BREACH OF TRUST

S. 406.

Punishment for criminal breach of trust.--

Whoever commits criminal breach of trust shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.3501

Comments

1. Scope

The pre-requisite for the applicability of s 406 of IPC would be fulfilment of the condition under s 405 .[88] This section deals only with the punishment for the offence of criminal breach of trust which has already been defined in the preceding s 405 . The following three sections, i.e., ss 407, 408 and 409, IPC, relate to the aggravated forms of criminal breach of trust and punishment thereof. They being a specific section, all the cases which are not covered by those sections, fall within the purview of this section.

An agreement to the effect, that if there is embezzlement, the person who embezzles, will not be prosecuted and the matter will be referred to arbitration, cannot exclude the applicability of this section, the reason being that to permit such an agreement to operate would be contrary to s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872.[89] Similarly, the fact that the amount involved in a case is petty, cannot be a reason for not taking cognizance under this section.[90] Likewise, the fact that the employer had taken a bond for the amount misappropriated, will not prevent the prosecution or conviction of the accused under this section.[91] Where a teacher having worked in an educational institution for several years, resigns, the education institution has no right to retain the original testimonials of the teacher, refusal to return original testimonials would constitute an offence under s 406 IPC .[92] Similarly, a criminal complaint cannot be thrown out merely because a remedy to recover the amount through civil courts is open to the complainant. [93]

As all the aspects as to the ingredients, which constitute the offence of criminal breach of trust, have been dealt with under the commentary of the preceding section, the commentary under this section is more or less confines to practice and procedure only.

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, compoundable, by the owner of the property, in respect which the breach of trust has been committed, with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

An accused had obtained a loan of Rs 22,000 under the literate unemployment scheme and the goods purchased by this loan were hypothecated, but the accused sold the goods and committed criminal breach of trust. During pendency of trial under s 406, the accused compromised with the complainant and paid the loan amount to the complainant. On the basis of the compromise, the trial court acquitted the accused of the charge under s 406, IPC . The state filed the appeal on the ground that under s 320(2), CrPC, permission for compounding the offence under s 406, IPC, can only be granted where the value of property does not exceed Rs 250, which was not the case before the trial court. Without expressing the opinion on merits the Rajasthan High Court declined to interfere with the trial court order as the accused3502 was acquitted on the basis of compromise and since payment was made outside the court and no purpose will be served in proceeding further against the accused.[1]

A prosecution of the secretary of a co-operative society for an offence of criminal breach of trust can be initiated either at the instance of the authority of the society or that of the registrar.[2] However, the offence under this section not being within the purview of s 195(1)(b), CrPC 1973, the court has no jurisdiction to make a complaint under s 340(1) of the said Code.[3]

3. Limitation

Under s 468(2)(c), CrPC, the period of limitation is 3 years if the offence is punishable with imprisonment for a term exceeding one year but not exceeding three years. For the offence under s 406, IPC, the maximum punishment provided is imprisonment for 3 years or fine or both. Under s 469, CrPC, the limitation shall commence from the date of offence. The offence under s 406, IPC, would be committed by the accused as and when the accused refused to return the dowry articles to the complainant and misappropriated the same. When there is nothing on record to show that more than 3 years prior to filing of the complaint, the accused had refused to return the dowry articles to the complainant, it cannot be said that on that account, the complaint had become time barred.[4]

So far as the provision of s 406, IPC, is concerned, till the articles are resumed or accounted for, the cause of action will continue. To this demand the question of limitation of 3 years would not apply.[5]

4. Sections 206 and 406, IPC --Difference Between

Commentary under the same heading in s 206, vol. 2, may be referred to.

5. Jurisdiction

Offences are ordinarily triable by a court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the offence is committed.[6] Where a person is, however, accused of the commission of any offence by reason of anything, which has been done, and of any consequence, which has ensued, the offence may be tried by a court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction any such thing has been done or any such consequence has ensued.[7] The gravamen of the offence of criminal breach of trust lies in dishonest misappropriation.

Mere entrustment, with no dishonest misappropriation, would not make the offence complete to give jurisdiction to the court where entrustment of property was made. The offence under s 406, IPC, may be inquired into or tried by a court within whose local jurisdiction the offence was committed or dishonest misappropriation of entrusted property was done.[8] Where the accused, an area manager of a branch office, was to remit an account for money to the company received by him3503 to the head office, the police station having territorial jurisdiction over the place of the head office can investigate the offence in view of s 181(4), CrPC .[9] In respect of offences of criminal misappropriation and criminal breach of trust, a specific provision has been made in s 181(4) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973. The offence may be tried by a court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction:

(a) any part of the property, which is the subject of the offence, was received or retained by the accused; or
(b) the offence was committed.

Where there is no evidence to show when and where the offence of criminal breach of trust in respect of the goods, which were entrusted to the accused, who failed to deliver them intact, was committed, the place of delivery must be presumed to be the place where the offence took place unless the accused proves that the offence was not committed at that place.[10] In State v Gulabchand Swarupchand ,[11] a trust, with its head office at Bombay, owned temples in Rajasthan. The trustees sent some money to the accused who were the honorary managers and constructive trustees of those temples. The accused were prosecuted under s 406 at Bombay, with the allegations that the accused had spent only a fraction of the amount on the construction work in the temples and had misappropriated the remainder and also sold silver bars and sheets sent to them in Rajasthan. It was held that as the allegations did not disclose that any offence of criminal breach of trust was committed at Bombay, the Bombay court had no jurisdiction to entertain the complaint. In Ram Charon v Devendra Kumar ,[12] the accused, a commission agent at Delhi, sent certain goods to the complainant at Najibabad in Bijnor district under a railway receipt, consigned to self to be obtained through a bank, which was an agent of the accused, and the payment, though made to a bank in Bijnor district, was received at Delhi, it was held that the accused had received the amount within the jurisdiction of the Bijnor court and the case was triable there. In Sundar Lal v Emperor ,[13]it was held that the accused could be tried by a court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction any part of the property was received by him. The offence is not triable at a place where neither the entrustment nor any positive act of conversion of the money takes place.[14]

6. Jurisdiction--Dowry/Stridhan Cases

Where the complaint under s 498-A, s 406, s 506, IPC against the husband and in-laws was filed at place 'A', the complainant after marriage resided with the opposite3504 party at place 'B', the complaint alleging offences alleged to have taken place at place 'B', the complainant left her husband's place and was residing at place 'A', the FIR did not disclose any demand of dowry or commission of any acts constituting the offence at place 'A', thus logic of s 178(c) relating to continuing offence does not apply. Since no part of the cause of action arose at place 'A', the complaint filed at place 'A' is not maintainable.[15] In the case of Y Abraham Ajith v Inspector of Police, Chennai ,[16] the Apex Court dealt with a similar set of facts. In the said case, the Hon'ble Supreme Court has clearly held that the crucial question is 'whether any part of the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction of the concerned Court. In terms of s 177 of the Code, it is the place where the offence was committed. In essence it is the cause of action for initiation of the proceedings against the accused.' It further held that the expression 'cause of action' is, therefore, not a stranger to criminal cases. The cause of action consists of a bundle of facts, which give cause to enforce the legal inquiry for redress in a court of law. In other words, it is a bundle of facts, which taken with the law applicable to them, gives the allegedly affected party a right to claim relief against the opponent, it must include some act done by the latter since in the absence of such an act no cause of action would possibly accrue or would arise.

7. Jurisdiction--Failure to Render Account--Cases

On the question whether the failure to render accounts at a particular place would give jurisdiction at that place, there is some controversy. Analysing the provision of s 405, the Allahabad High Court observed, in Mohru Lal v Emperor ,[17] thus:

> This section falls into two parts. The first part is a positive part and deals with dishonest misappropriation or conversion of property, to charge a person under this part of the section, there should be an allegation that, at a particular time and place, that person had dishonestly misappropriated, or converted to his own use, the property which was entrusted to him. Now, the second part of the section may be a negative part. It consists of dishonestly using or disposing of the property in violation of (a) any direction of law, or (b) any legal contract touching the discharge of the trust.

Thus, where the direction of law or the contract requires that the accused should dispose of the property at a particular place, then the court having jurisdiction at that place will have jurisdiction to try the offence of the second part of s 405, IPC, if there is a charge to the effect that the accused has failed to comply with the direction of the law, or the legal contract, and has failed to carry out his duty at that place.[18] The view expressed in the last cited case, was doubted in Hira Lal v State ,[19] in which it was observed that both parts of s 405 are positive in nature. In the first case, the positive part consists in criminal misappropriation and conversion of the property, and in the second case, the positive act consists in dishonestly using or disposing of the property in violation of any direction of law or prescribed mode of trust of legal contract. The using or disposing of property dishonestly are definitely acts, and not3505 omissions.[20] The view taken in Hira Lal v State ,[21] was followed in Madras where it was held that where the charge is of non-accounting and there is no specific' allegation of misappropriation at any particular place, the venue of the trial will be the place where the accounting has got to be done and has not been done.[22] In Lahore also, it was held that where an accused is under a liability to render accounts at a particular place and fails to do so by reason of having committed an offence of criminal breach of trust, which is alleged against him, the court, within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the place is situated, may enquire into and try the offence under s 181(4) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[23]

A contrary view has, however, been taken by some other High Courts. It has been held in Calcutta that neither failure to account, nor breach of contract, however dishonest, is actually, and in itself, an offence, which s 405 defines, but merely evidence of that offence. The court, having jurisdiction at a place, where the accused fails to account, cannot have jurisdiction.[24]

8. Quashing of Complaint/FIR

While the exercising power under s 482, CrPC, the High Court has to look at the object and purpose for which such power is conferred on it under the said provision; the exercise of inherent power is available to the High Court to give effect to any order under the Code of Criminal Procedure or to prevent abuse of the process of any court or otherwise to secure the ends of justice. This being the position, the exercise of power under s 482, CrPC, should be consistent with the scope and ambit of the same. In appropriate cases, to prevent judicial process from being an instrument of oppression or harassment in the hands of frustrated or vindictive litigants, exercise of inherent power is not only desirable but necessary also, so that the judicial forum of court may not be allowed to be utilized for any oblique motive. When a person approaches the High Court under s 482, CrPC, to quash the very issue of process, the High Court on the facts and circumstances of a case has to exercise the powers with circumspection to really serve the purpose and object for which they are conferred.[25] An FIR cannot be quashed merely on the ground that the petitioner has been wrongly shown as an offender in the FIR. If the FIR discloses a prima facie case of cognizable offence, it cannot be quashed merely on the ground that someone has been wrongly arrayed as an accused or that in law no such case is maintainable against a particular accused though it is maintainable against some other accused. In such a case only remedy available to an accused is to pray for discharge after chargesheet is filed against him.[26]3506

The position of law regarding quashing of criminal proceedings by taking recourse to s 482, CrPC, has been crystalised in the celebrated judgment in State of Haryana v Ch Bhajan Lal ,[27] wherein following guidelines have been enumerated by the Hon'ble judges of the Apex Court:

(a) Where the allegations made in the FIR of the complaint, even if they are taken at their face value and accepted in their entirely do not prima facie constitute any offence or make out a case against the accused.
(b) Where the allegations in the first information report and other materials, if any accompanying the FIR do not disclose a cognizable offence, justifying an investigation by police officers under s 156(1), CrPC except under an order of a magistrate within the purview of s 155(2), CrPC .
(c) Where the uncontroverted allegations made in the FIR or complaint and the evidence collected in support of the same do not disclose the commission of any offence and make out a case against the accused.
(d) Where, the allegations in the FIR do not constitute a cognizable offence but constitute only a non-cognizable offence, no investigation is permitted by a police officer without an order of a magistrate as contemplated under s 155(2), CrPC .
(e) Where the allegations made in the FIR or complaint are so absurd and inherently improbable on the basis of which no prudent person can ever reach a just conclusion that there is sufficient ground for proceeding against the accused.
(f) Where there is an express legal bar engrafted in any of the provisions of the Code or the concerned Act (under which a criminal proceeding is instituted) to the institution and continuance of the proceedings and/or where there is a specific provision in the code or the concerned Act, providing efficacious redress for the grievance of the aggrieved party.
(g) Where a criminal proceeding is manifestly attended with mala fide and/or where the proceeding is maliciously instituted with ulterior motive for wreaking vengeance on the accused and with a view to spite him due to private and personal grudge.

Where allegations in the complaint did constitute a cognizable offence justifying registration of a case and investigation thereon and did not fall in any of the categories of cases enumerated above, calling for exercise of extraordinary power or inherent powers, quashing of FIR was not justified.[28]

The complainant alleged that he entrusted Rs 5000 to the accused, Mayawati, who was vice-president of a political party (Bahujan Samaj party) on her assurance that she would give him a party ticket but the said purpose was not found mentioned in3507 the receipt relied upon. The case of the accused, on the other hand, was that the complainant being the district president of that party had deposited the said amount in the party's account to meet election expenses. On these facts, the Allahabad High Court was of the view that no offence under s 406, IPC, is made out so the order taking cognizance of the said offence by the trial court was quashed by taking recourse to s 482, CrPC .[29] However, in a case where the cheques issued by the accused company to another company were dishonoured and there was admission of the accused company that it issued cheques to the complainant company in spite of knowledge of insufficient funds, the investigation into the offence was not complete and the chargesheet was also yet to be filed so the prayer for quashing of proceedings under s 406, IPC, etc, was declined.[30] In the face of specific allegations that after the maturity of amount in fixed deposits the accused persons have neither paid the principal amount nor interest, it cannot be said that the accused, a director of a finance company was in any way concerned with the alleged collection of deposit of amount from the public at large so the criminal proceeding against them under ss 406 and 420, IPC cannot be quashed.[31] When the materials collected are sufficient for raising strong suspicion to form a presumptive opinion as to the existence of the factual ingredients constituting offences of criminal breach of trust and criminal conspiracy etc., the order forming charge against the accused cannot be quashed by taking recourse to s 482, CrPC .[32]

A complaint was filed against the accused under ss 405 and 420, IPC . It was not the case of the complainant that the accused had been entrusted with the amount in the chit fund in any manner directly or indirectly, nor there was any agreement between the complainant and the accused in respect of money deposited by him in the chit fund. There was no allegation that the accused ever induced the complainant to enroll as a member of the chit fund established by her brother. Therefore, the allegations in the complaint did not disclose commission of any offence either under s 405 or under s 420, IPC . The complaint was found liable to be quashed under s 482, CrPC .[33] When the averment made in the complaint do not show that the accused person were entrusted with any property which they dishonestly misappropriated or converted to their own use, the order taking cognizance of the offence under s 406, IPC, against the accused was quashed.[34]

9. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings--Dowry/Stridhan Cases

When there are inherent improbabilities regarding entrustment of dowry articles to the accused persons, the allegations in the complaint if taken on face value show inherent contradictions, showing that the accused person were dragged in the complaint merely due to their relationship with the husband of the complainant, the complaint under ss 406 and 498A read with s 34, IPC, against them was quashed.[35]

Where the documents on record falsified averments made by the complainant in her FIR that she was harassed or maltreated by accused persons in connection with3508 dowry demand, and, the complainant admitted in her letter that she had brought all her belongings at the time of leaving her matrimonial home, the criminal proceedings against the accused and the in-laws of the complainant under ss 498A / 406, IPC, and ss 4 and 6, Dowry Prohibition Act were quashed.[36]

When the complainant, on account of destruction of her marital life has tried to involve all close relatives of her husband, including his mother and sisters by alleging that dowry articles were entrusted to all the accused persons, the allegations were found to have been made with an oblique motive to rope in his close relatives in order to wreck vengeance from the husband, the complaint qua all the accused except the husband of the complainant and his brother were quashed.[37] When in the summoning orders it is not disclosed as to how primafacie any criminal liability can be fastened on the accused and no reason has been given while summoning the accused persons for the offence under ss 406 / 34, IPC, on the face of it, the sketchy and non-speaking order cannot stand the test of judicial scrutiny and is therefore liable to be quashed.[38] In the complaint under s 406, IPC, the complainant alleged that the ornaments of his sister were handed over to her husband and her parents for safe custody as proposed by them while they were staying at his house and they misappropriated the ornaments, but it was not stated who handed over the ornaments, either the sister of the complainant or the complainant himself or his father. The complainant's sister whose ornaments were alleged to have been misappropriated by the accused persons had neither made any complaint, nor was she examined before the inquiring officer in support of the complaint case. The complainant was not examined for four months after the filing of a divorce case by the husband of the complainant's sister. The allegations contained in the complaint were not found to constitute any specific offence against the accused persons so the proceedings were quashed against the accused person under s 482, CrPC .[39] Allegations were that the husband and the appellants in-laws did not return the dowry ornaments. Complaint was filed after nine years of marriage. If the articles were in possession of the husband, there was no question of the present appellants being in possession of the dowry ornaments, there was no mention of the date on which the said ornaments, if any, were entrusted to the appellants or even the date when they were demanded back and were refused to be given back by the appellants or any one of them. As regards the offence under s 498A, IPC was concerned, the Court did not find any material or allegation worth the name against the appellants. All the allegations were against the husband. The proceedings against the appellants in-laws were quashed.[40]

It was alleged in the complaint that the accused husband and father-in-law ill-treated the complainant for non-fulfilment of dowry demand and retained her stridhan. There was no averment about entrustment of any kind of property by the complainant to the accused and that the accused persons misappropriated the same. Charge sheet also stated that the complainant had refused to take articles back when the offer was made to her by the Investigating Officer. Held, the very pre-requisite of entrustment of the property and its misappropriation by the appellants were lacking3509 in the case. Charge sheet against the accused persons was quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[41]

filed complaint against the husband for offence under ss 406 and 420, IPC for misappropriation of dowry articles given at the time of marriage and cheating. Held, the allegations made in the FIR were for harassing the accused residing in Canada. The articles of dowry must be in the possession of the complainant. FIR was quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[42]

From the allegations made in the complaint it was clear that the appellants, father-in-law, mother-in-law and husband were entrusted with the property and had exercised dominion over the property belonging to the respondent complainant and further that the appellants had unlawfully retained the same. The complaint also alleged retention of cash and other gifts received by the respondent-complainant at the time of her marriage to the accused appellant no. 2 husband. In the face of the said averments made in the complaint petition, it could not be said the complaint filed by the respondent was short of the necessary allegations to prima facie sustain the case of commission of the offence under s 406 by the appellants. Complaint was not quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[43]

When the property/dowry articles are alleged to be entrusted to the accused persons at the time of marriage of the complainant and is not returned on demand of the same, primafacie material against the accused for the offence under s 406, IPC, is present. Therefore, taking cognizance against the accused persons by the court is not illegal.[44]

10. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings--Compromise in Non-compoundable Offence

The whole scheme of compounding the offence is dealt with and regulated by s 320 of CrPC . The provisions of s 320, CrPC are exhaustive in nature and sub-s 9 of s 320, CrPC, is couched in a mandatory form and it lays down that no offence shall be compounded except as provided by this section. The offences punishable under ss 498A / 406, IPC, are non-compoundable. In Ram Lal v State of Jammu and Kashmir ,[45] it was held by the Apex Court that an offence which the law declares to be non-compoundable, even with the permission of the court, cannot be compounded at all. This judgment has been cited with approval in the decision of the Supreme Court in SN Mohanty v State of Orissa ,[46] that criminal proceedings in respect of non-compoundable offence cannot be terminated on the ground of mutual settlement between the parties as it would run in the teeth of the statutory prohibition contained in sub-s 9 of s 320, CrPC . Thus, what is prohibited or interdicted by the legislature in3510 direct terms cannot be obviated in an indirect manner by invoking provision of s 482, CrPC .[47]

Thus, when the wife primafacie discloses offences under ss 498A / 406 / 34, IPC, the criminal proceedings in respect of the said offences cannot be quashed under s 482, CrPC, on the basis of a compromise between the parties.[48] However, such a compromise is a mitigating factor for awarding the sentence on the lower side.[49]

The earlier position that criminal proceedings or FIR or complaint cannot be quashed under s 482, CrPC, in cases where parties have compromised an offence which is non-compoundable under s 320, CrPC, has now been changed. Recently, the Apex Court has held that a High Court in exercise of its inherent powers can quash criminal proceedings or FIR or complaint, and s 320, CrPC 1973, does not limit or affect the powers under s 482, CrPC .[50] Relying upon this decision, the Full Bench of the Delhi High Court has also held that the High Court by its inherent powers can quash criminal proceedings if parties have compromised the matter in matrimonial cases such as offences under ss 498A and 406, IPC .[51]

11. Quashing of Complaint--Civil Dispute Regarding Non-payment of Amount under Contract etc[52]

There were two independent contracts, one between the principal company and the contractor company, and another between the contractor company and the sub-contractor. On completion of work, the sub-contractor demanded payment from the contractor company due to the non-payment of the same, filed a criminal complaint, alleging that the contractor company through its person in-charge/ accused having received the payment from the principal company has misappropriated his (sub-contractor's) money. When admittedly, two contracts were independent of each other and payment under one has no relevance qua the other, therefore, even if the principal company has made the payment to the contractor company, under its contract with latter, it will not give rise to plea of misappropriation of money, because the money is not money or movable property of the sub-contractor/ complainant. It cannot be said that there was any dishonest intention on the part of the accused persons/contractor company/office bearer of the contractor company or they have misappropriated or converted the movable property of sub-contractor/ complainant to their own use. Further, the dispute being about recovery of money was purely of a civil nature. Since, the basic ingredient of ss 403, 406 and 420, IPC, were not satisfied, the order, taking cognizance of offence and issuance of summons to the office bearers of the contractor company was quashed.[53]

The allegations in the complaint under ss 406 and 420, IPC, were of non-payment for construction work done under the agreement. The plea of the accused was that the part payment was already done and the balance amount was withheld due to sub-standard work. The controversy between the parties appeared to be a civil dispute as3511 there was total absence of criminal dishonest intention to do the contract right from the inception of the agreement. The order taking cognizance of offences was found illegal and liable to be quashed.[54]

If from the overall reading of the complaint, it can easily be measured that if at all there is anything, it is only a breach of agreement which would lead to civil litigation and not a criminal case, the order passed by magistrate directing police investigation under s 156(3), CrPC, is liable to be quashed.[55] Where the allegations were that the accused persons refused to execute sale deed after taking money, there was no evidence on record to show that the intention of the accused was dishonest and to misappropriate the amount, the complainant had not proved mensrea, a mere failure to keep promise subsequently cannot be presumed to be an act leading to cheating. Further, the complainant had not given his correct address thereby creating doubt. The criminal proceedings under ss 406, 415 were quashed.[56]

Where, there were business dealings between parties in which the complainant had been supplying goods to the accused on making payment by cash/draft/cheque, and one such cheque issued by the accused was dishonoured, the complaint under ss 406 / 420, IPC, was filed, there was no entrustment of goods and the transaction was of mere sale of goods, the criminal prosecution by the complainant was found to be an abuse of the process of the court so the complaint was quashed.[57] When, it was a dispute between principal and agent of accounting, the dispute was of civil nature and there was total absence of mensrea and criminal offence of misappropriation was not made up, the agent cannot be harassed for such a dispute by resorting to criminal proceedings, so the proceedings were found liable to be quashed.[58]

It is a well-settled principle of law that the allegations relating to a bona fide civil dispute, even assuming the facts to be substantially correct, should be quashed in exercise of the High Court's inherent powers.[59] The entrustment of raw materials to the accused was made in pursuance of an agreement between the parties and not on account of trust or safe custody, the consequent failure of the accused to account for raw materials supplied would constitute a civil wrong/breach of contract but not attract the ingredients of ss 420 and 406, IPC . Such a criminal complaint is liable to be quashed.[60]

12. Quashing of Complaint--When Instead of Civil Suit Complaint is filed

When on reading both the complaints, it is clear that the complaints are filed only in order to recover outstanding dues of the complainant, the complainant instead of drafting a plaint has filed aforesaid complaints before the learned magistrate by changing its nomenclature from civil suit to criminal case, and nowhere, in the3512 aforesaid complaints, the complainant has stated as to on which date the incident in connection with ill-treatment to his manager had taken place, even nothing is stated as to on which date the manager of the complainant went to the office of the accused for the purpose of demanding money, the dispute in question is nothing but a dispute regarding non-payment of dues of the complainant, which can be said to be the dues of an unpaid seller. The complainant, therefore, after affixing appropriate court fee stamp, as required by law, should have filed money suit for obtaining money decree. Instead of that the complainant has rushed to the criminal court. so the complaint is liable to be quashed.[61] Where the offences of criminal breach of trust and cheating are not made out in a matter of cancellation of dealership and appointment of another person as dealer when the security is duly refunded to the complainant firm, such a grievance is purely of civil nature. Crafty drafting of a civil dispute may give colour of a criminal dispute, but that does not make a dispute amenable to criminal court. Such disputes are not to be encouraged. In such cases, the entire criminal prosecution is liable to be set aside.[62]

13. Quashing of Complaint/FIR When both Civil and Criminal Remedies Exist

The law is now well-settled. The civil profile which is discernable from the factual matrix of the case should not outweigh the criminal outfit.

Merely because a given set of facts would give rise to a civil profile as well as a criminal profile, the criminal case cannot be quashed at the thresh-hold on that premise, in as much as each is an independent remedy but not mutually exclusive.[63] A guilty intention is an essential ingredient of the offence of cheating and the criminal breach of trust. The prosecution must establish the *mens rea*on the part of the accused. Every act of breach of trust may not result in a penal offence of criminal breach of trust, unless there is evidence of manipulating act of fraudulent misappropriation. An act of breach of trust involves a civil wrong in respect of which the person may seek his remedy for damages in civil courts, but any breach of trust with a mensrea gives rise to a criminal prosecution as well.[64] A criminal case may arise even when breach of contract is also there and there is no bar for the prosecution under the criminal law.[65] Where the respondent accused was alleged to have misappropriated paddy entrusted for milling, the respondent could not be acquitted merely on the ground that the dispute arose out of breach of contract.[66]3513

The case of breach of trust or cheating are both a civil wrong and a criminal offence, but under certain situations where the act alleged would predominantly be a civil wrong, such an act does not constitute a criminal offence.[67]

14. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings-- Section 167(5) , CrPC (West Bengal) Amendment by Act 24 of 1988

Under s 167(5), CrPC (West Bengal) Amendment, it is provided that if in any case exclusively triable by a sessions court or a case under ch XVIII of IPC, the investigation is not concluded within the period of three years from the date of arrest of the accused, the magistrate shall make an order stopping further investigation into the offence and shall discharge the accused unless the officer making the investigation satisfies the magistrate that for special reasons and in the interest of justice, the continuation of the investigation beyond the period mentioned in the sub-section is necessary. The law on this question, however, has now been settled by the Apex Court by means of a number of recently pronounced judgments. In Durgesh Chandra Shah v BC Saha ,[68] it has been held that the above provisions of s 167(5), CrPC, would be applicable in a case where the investigation is still pending and not where it has been completed. Investigation had been completed but the investigating officer was not being able to submit the report in final form for the technical reason that the sanction order required for the starting of the prosecution against the accused, a public servant, from the government was being awaited by him. In substance, therefore, the investigation has been made complete. Hence, strictly viewed, having regard to the spirit underlying the above decision of the Supreme Court, the provision of s 167(5), CrPC, should not be made applicable to the facts of the present case.[69]

However, the Apex Court has pronounced a more radical interpretation of the language of this section in a Division Bench judgment reported in Nirmal Kanti Roy v State of West Bengal .[70] It has been held by the Hon'ble Supreme Court therein that the order stopping further investigation into the offence and the consequential order of discharge are not intended to be an automatic sequel to the failure to complete the investigation within the period fixed in the sub-section. It is further held that the succeeding words in the sub-section confer power on the court to refrain from stopping such investigation, if the investigating officer satisfies the magistrate of the fusion of the two premises namely,

(a) that in the interest of justice it is necessary to proceed with the investigation beyond the period shown in the sub-section; and
(b) that there are special reasons to do so, and the Apex Court took the view that the time schedule shown in s 167(5) of the CrPC was not to be treated with rigidity and it was not mandatory that on the expiry of the period indicated therein the magistrate should necessarily pass the order on the accused.

On the other hand, before passing an order of stoppage of investigation the magistrate shall consider whether on the facts of that case, further investigation would be necessary to foster interest of criminal justice. The magistrate at that stage3514 must look into the record of investigation to ascertain the progress of the investigation so far registered, and if a substantial part of the investigation was by then over, the magistrate should seriously ponder over the question whether it would be conducive in the interest of justice to stop further investigation and discharge the accused.[71]

15. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings against Director of Company

Where the allegations against the directors of a company were that they had not deposited ESI contributions deducted by them from wages of the employees of company, the directors cannot be regarded as 'principal employer'. Therefore, the proceedings for criminal breach of trust against them are liable to be quashed.[72]

16. Quashing of Complaint against Company

Mensrea is necessary to constitute the offence under ss 406, 420 . A company being a juristic person and not a natural person cannot be said to have the requisite mens rea. So, the complaint alleging the said offences against the company is liable to be quashed.[73]

17. Liability of Managing Director, employee(s)

For supply of goods demand drafts were drawn in the name of the company. The prosecution case was that the goods were not supplied. Complaint for offence under s 406, IPC was filed against the Managing Director of the company. Held, in the absence of any provision in the statute the Managing Director or the employees of the company cannot be held vicariously liable for the offence of the company. The prosecution was quashed.[74]

18. Procedure

Offences under ss 406, 494 and 498A are triable by a Magistrate, First Class and as all these offences are punishable with imprisonment for a term exceeding two years, the case has to be tried as a warrant case. The procedure for trial of warrant case by a Magistrate instituted on a police report is provided under ch XIX, Pt A of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[75]

19. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adapted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the...day of..., were entrusted with... (mention the amount or property) between... day of...and...day of..., were entrusted (specify the amount or the different items, where they are more than one) and committed criminal breach of trust3515 in respect of the said money or property, and thereby committed an offence under s 406 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Section 405 covers dishonest misappropriation, dishonest conversion, dishonest use or disposal in violation of a direction of law or a legal contract, and dishonestly suffering any other person to do so. Where a charge under this section does not indicate which of these several offences is intended and does not state who made the alleged entrustment, or who suffered from the alleged breach of trust, it is indefinite and embarrassing.[76] When the charge neither mentions the date of entrustment, nor of the misappropriation, but refers to 13 July 1957 as the date on which the accused was in employment, the implication is that it is on or about that date that the entrustment or misappropriation took place.[77]

20. Alternative Charges under Section 406 to Section 409 and Section 420 --Not Illegal

Commentary under the same heading in s 409, post, may be referred to.

21. Joint Trial

If two or more persons embezzle money jointly in respect of several items, they can be tried jointly as the offence is committed in the course of the same transaction.[78]

22. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove[79] that:

(a) the accused was, in any manner, entrusted with:

(i) property, or
(ii) any dominion over property;

(b) he:

(i) misappropriated it, or
(ii) converted it to his own use, or
(iii) used, or disposed of, the property, or
(iv) wilfully suffered any person so to do;

(c) he did so in violation of:

(i) any direction of law, prescribing the mode in which the trust was to be discharged, or
(ii) any legal contract, express or implied, which he had made, touching the discharge of the trust; and

(d) he did so dishonestly.

The onus of proving never shifts,[80] and the prosecution must prove, beyond reasonable doubt, the guilt of the accused.[81] There must be a definite finding of a3516 definite sum, traced to the accused, in order to form the basis of his conviction.[82] The prosecution must prove entrustment by adducing cogent evidence.[83] It is not, however, necessary to prove that any specific sum of money, received on particular dates from particular person, has been embezzled. It is sufficient that a general deficiency is found.[84] However, the mere fact that the accused fails to account for the money, entrusted to him, is not, in law, sufficient to establish that he committed the offence of criminal breach of trust, in the absence of other evidence, unless some kind of conversion, i.e., a wrongful diversion to his own purpose or the purpose not consistent with the law of contract, is proved.[85] Similarly, the mere fact that, after honouring the hundies, amounts have not been paid to the complainant, is not sufficient to come to the conclusion that the accused have acted dishonestly with an intention of misappropriation or converting the amounts in question for their own use. This would, at the most, amount to a breach of contract between the parties.[86] It would be illegal to place the onus on the accused and convict him because he fails to discharge it. Where the accused pleads that he had rendered accounts as an agent and had paid the sum in question, the prosecution must prove that the sums were not paid.[87] The prosecution cannot rest content with proving merely false entries, to bring home to the accused that money had been misappropriated, without further evidence to prove that the accused attempted to suppress all traces of his embezzlement.[88] The mere fact that certain amounts were in the hands of the accused and the accounts submitted were incorrect, would not lead to the inevitable inference that the accused committed the offence of criminal breach of trust in respect of those items.[89] However, it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove in what manner money, alleged to have been misappropriated, has actually been disposed of by the accused. If it is shown that the money, entrusted to the accused, was not accounted for, nor returned by him in accordance with his duty, if unspent, it lies on the accused to prove the defence.[90] Once it has been proved that the money was entrusted to a person, the burden rests on him to show as to what he did with the money, and if he3517 completely denies having received the money, the presumption is that he misappropriated or converted it to his own use.[1] If any explanation, which the accused chooses to give, is not proved beyond doubt, he cannot claim to be innocent; but if his explanation throws any reasonable doubt on the prosecution story, he would be entitled to an acquittal not because he proves the facts and circumstances but because the prosecution has failed to establish his guilt beyond reasonable doubt.[2] In such a case, the benefit of doubt must go to the accused.[3] However, if the prosecution has made out a case overwhelmingly, there can be no reasonable doubt on the mere ground that the accused is ready with an explanation.[4] It is, however, not fair for the prosecution to press a case of criminal breach of trust against an accused when the complainant is not a witness.[5]

In a prosecution for criminal breach of trust, direct evidence of dishonest conversion to the accused's own use of the money, entrusted to him, can seldom be found and such dishonest intention and conversion have to be inferred from the proved facts and circumstances of each case.[6] Intention can only be inferred from the circumstances. In a case of criminal breach of trust, failure to render a satisfactory account on the part of the accused is a circumstance pointing to the guilt of the accused.[7] a false explanation by the accused may be sufficient to prove an element of dishonesty required for his conviction for an offence of criminal breach of trust.[8] However, mere retention of money is not, by itself, sufficient to conclude that the accused is guilty of criminal breach of trust. Where it is not clear from the evidence what the accused did with the money when it was in his possession, it cannot be assumed, in the absence of the evidence to show, or the circumstances to infer, that he misappropriated the amount dishonestly.[9] Whether such an inference should be drawn would depend on the particular facts of an individual case.[10] Wrong entries in accounts may raise strong suspicion, but they cannot justify a conviction.[11]

The accused had taken loan under hire purchase agreement from the Corporation for five machines. He did not repay the total amount of loan but sold one cutting3518 machine worth Rs. 80,007/- which was the property of the Corporation. Held, the accused committed an offence under s 406, IPC .[12]

Where the guarantors gave power to the bank to set off/and or adjust the loan amount from the FDS, in case the debtor did not repay the loan and accordingly the bank adjusted FDS amount toward the loan amount, bank was not guilty of offence under s 406, IPC .[13]

23. Repayment of Amount by Accused--Effect

The fact that repayment has been made, in itself is not an indication of lack of dishonest intention. Sometimes, it so happens that with a view to create confidence the repayments are made so that for the future transactions the money can be dishonestly misappropriated. This is a part of the scheme and the factum of repayment cannot be considered in isolation. The repayment can be a factor to be considered while awarding sentence, but cannot be a ground for proving innocence of the accused.[14] Subsequent remittance of defaulted provident fund money, even if accepted, would not condone the offence.[15]

24. Conviction

When more than one accused are convicted on a charge under this section, it is necessary to consider the case of each accused separately.[16]

The decision of a criminal case should not wait till civil cases are decided because the criminal case is not one in which the court is concerned with the interest of the complainant or with any dispute between the complainant and the accused.[17]

25. Alteration of Conviction from Section 406 to Section 403

When it is definitely proved that the accused dishonestly misappropriated, or converted to his own use, the sum of money, which it was not his responsibility to realize, he can be held guilty under s 403, but not under s 406, IPC .[18] If the accused are charged under s 406, but it is found that the case does not fall under this section, there being no entrustment, the accused can be convicted under s 403 if there is dishonest misappropriation.[19]

26. Probation

Usually, imprisonment should be given in a case of embezzlement, but if the benefit of s 360, CrPC 1973, is given to the accused, the discretion need not be interfered with after lapse of much time.[20] When a huge amount has been misappropriated by a3519 white collar person, and the offender on account of his young age, or on account of it being his first offence, is released on probation, it is customary on the court to insist upon the accused to repay the amount to the aggrieved complainant.[21]

27. Sentence

The fact that the accused is a man of some status, is no ground to show leniency in the matter of sentence. Where the accused, a secretary of a co-operative society, was convicted under s 406, it was held that a sentence of Rs 175 and imprisonment till rising of the court was an inadequate punishment entirely.[22]

The accused convicted under s 406, IPC, for committing criminal breach of trust in respect of a truck was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for a period of four years.[23] Where the accused faced trial for a period of two decades, their sentence under ss 406 and 120B, IPC, was reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone by them.[24]

In Chahajulal v State of Rajasthan ,[25] the sentence of one year rigorous imprisonment, in default of fine, passed by a munsif magistrate, was, however, held to be in excess of his power.

Where the accused were convicted in respect of criminal breach of trust of dowry articles and other offences but the parties compromised and the husband and wife sorted out their differences taking a lenient view, the sentence of rigorous imprisonment of six months and fine of Rs 500 was reduced to the sentence of the period of imprisonment already undergone by the accused.[26]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL BREACH OF TRUST

S. 407.

Criminal breach of trust by carrier, etc.--

Whoever, being entrusted with property as a carrier, wharfinger or warehouse-keeper, commits criminal breach of trust in respect of such property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This and the following two sections relate to the more aggravated forms of criminal breach of trust, by reason of the offender holding a particular office, for which higher punishments have been prescribed. However, the fact that the accused held the particular office in question and that he received the property in that capacity, has to be proved. This section deals with the cases of persons, who are in the nature of3520 bailees, to whom certain goods are entrusted for the purpose of safe storage or for conveyance of the goods to other places.

2. 'With Property'

Commentary under the related headings in s 405, ante, may be referred to.

3. 'Carrier'

The expression 'carrier', in this section, includes all types of carriers, whether a common carrier or a private carrier.[27] A carrier is one who holds himself out as a carrier of the goods of all persons, who think him fit to employ him for hire, the goods tendered for carriage being in the nature of goods which he publicly professes to carry.[28] The term 'carrier' has been defined in the Carriers Act 1865, as 'a person, other than the government, engaged in the business of transporting, for hire, property from place to place by land or inland navigation, for any person indiscriminately'. Railways are also carriers, but their civil liability is defined and limited by law under the provisions of the Indian Railways Act 1890. Therefore, any individual railway servant, responsible for criminal misappropriation, may be independently prosecuted, but not as a carrier under this section.

To bring a case under this part of the section, it is necessary to prove that the goods were entrusted to the accused as a carrier, failing which the accused, if his criminal breach of trust is established, can only be convicted under s 406, and not under this section.

4. 'Wharfinger'

'Wharfinger' means the occupier of a wharf, and a 'wharf includes all wharves, quays, docks and premises in which goods when landed from ships, may be lawfully placed.[29] a wharfinger necessarily remains in charge of goods, while they are in transit, and they have to be transferred after being loaded or unloaded.

5. 'Warehouse-keeper'

A warehouse is a place licensed for the storage of goods under some statute. Warehouses are either public or private. Private warehouses are simply places of business for businessmen or tradesmen, compelled to keep large stock of goods, e.g., even a shed with tarpaulin roof used for the shelter of goods in warehouse.[30] Goods, such as grains, excisable commodities, or other materials, are kept in godowns which would be warehouses, and if they are entrusted to the keepers thereof, they would be covered by this section.

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, compoundable, by the owner of the property, in respect of which the breach of trust has been committed,3521 with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution is pending, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

7. Jurisdiction

On a close reading of the provisions of sub-s 4, of s 181, CrPC in respect of the offence of criminal misappropriation or criminal breach of trust, the court within whose local jurisdiction the offence was committed or any part of the property which is the subject-matter of the offence was received, retained or was required to be returned or accounted for by the accused person gives jurisdiction to the court to try the offence, in other words, the court in whose local jurisdiction the place of entrustment is made or place of misuse or misappropriation takes place or the place where delivery is to be effected in each of the courts in whose local jurisdiction any one of the contemplated contingencies take place, will have jurisdiction to try the offence.[31]

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you were entrusted with... (specify the property), as a carrier/wharfinger/warehouse keeper, and you committed criminal breach of trust in respect of that property, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 407 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

The veracity of the statement of witnesses recorded by the police which forms part of the final report cannot be disbelieved at the stage of framing of charge. The said documents bear a primafacie incriminating material to enable the court to frame a charge.[32]

9. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) the accused was entrusted with property in question;
(b) the said property was entrusted to him as a carrier/wharfinger/or warehouse-keeper; and
(c) he committed a criminal breach of trust in respect of that property.

10. Conviction

Where the accused, a driver of truck, killed the representative of the consignor travelling in the truck along with consignment of goods and concealed his body and clothes, the evidence of cleaner establishing the said facts, his evidence was found reliable and corroborated in all material particulars, the evidence of the owner of truck, consignor and other witnesses also corroborated the evidence of the cleaner,3522 the recovery of goods was effected on the basis of the statement of the accused. The conduct of the accused in making false statements regarding the deceased and the consignment of goods further substantiated the prosecution case. The conviction of the accused for murder and breach of trust in respect of goods entrusted to him was found proper.[33]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL BREACH OF TRUST

S. 408.

Criminal breach of trust by clerk or servant.--

Whoever, being a clerk or servant or employed as a clerk or servant, and being in any manner entrusted in such capacity with property, or with any dominion over property, commits criminal breach of trust in respect of that property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This is an aggravated form of the offence of criminal breach of trust which has already been defined in s 406, IPC . By virtue of the position of a clerk or servant, enjoying a position of confidence, protection to the public is offered, against an abuse of such position, under this section.

Mens rea is essential to constitute the offence under this section.[34] If a servant above the age of 12 years commits criminal breach of trust, he can be held guilty under this section.[35] Criminal breach of trust committed by a regular salaried employee of a registered co-operative society, would fall under this section, and not under s 409, IPC, as he is not in any of the persons enumerated in s 409, IPC .[36] a person can also be charged for abetment of criminal breach of trust by a servant under this section if the essential elements which constitute abetment exist.[37]

Demand or collection of excess profit, does not amount to cheating or criminal breach of trust.[38]

2. 'Clerk or Servant'[39]

A person, to whom the work of making purchases is given by a firm and who is remunerated for his services by a commission on the purchases made by him, would3523 be a servant of the firm.[40] Even a working partner, who has not contributed anything to the partnership business and to whom capital is entrusted by other partners, at their discretion, in such sums at such times, as they thought fit, would be a servant or clerk within the meaning of this section.[41] a broker, i.e., a person who brings together a buyer and a seller, is not necessarily a servant.[42] However, the president of a co-operative society, though an agent, and not a servant, according to its bye laws, should be charged under this section.[43] Similarly, the secretary,[44] or the salesman,[45] of a co-operative society can be charged under this section.

3. 'In any Manner'

Commentary under the same heading in s 405, ante, may be referred to.

4. 'Entrusted'

Entries in books of accounts without any oral evidence, as to the nature of business and mode of keeping accounts are not sufficient to prove entrustment.[46]

5. 'Property'

Commentary under the same heading in s 405, ante, may be referred to.

6. 'Commits Criminal Breach of Trust'

Commentary of s 405, ante, may be referred to.

The prosecution case was that the petitioner had not taken steps for the preparation of the pension papers of the complainant. There was nothing to show/infer that the petitioner was entrusted with any property which he used dishonestly. There was no evidence to show that the accused had threatened to destroy the pension papers of the complainant. No case under s 408, IPC*primafacie* was made out, cognizance and process issued against the petitioner were set aside.[47]

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, compoundable, by the owner of the property, in respect of which the breach of trust has been committed, with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution is pending, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

8. Revisional Jurisdiction of the High Court

In its revisional jurisdiction, the High Court can call for and examine the record of any proceedings for the purpose of satisfying itself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of any finding, sentence or order. In other words, the jurisdiction is one of3524 supervisory jurisdiction exercised by the High Court for correcting miscarriage of justice. However, the said revisional power cannot be equated with the power of an appellate court, nor can it be treated as a second appellate court jurisdiction. Ordinarily, therefore, it would not be appropriate for the High Court to re-appreciate the evidence and come to its own conclusion on the same when the evidence has already been appreciated by the magistrate as well as the sessions judge in appeal, unless any glaring feature is brought to the notice of the High Court which would otherwise tantamount to gross miscarriage of justice.[48]

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about... the day of ..., at..., you were a clerk/servant of (or were employed, as a clerk/servant, by) AB and were, in such capacity, entrusted with the property or with any dominion over that property)... (specify the property), and that you committed a criminal breach of trust in respect of that property and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 408 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

Where the accused, working as head secretary of the society for one month was alleged to have misappropriated a sum of Rs 6,759 and 65 paise and had deposited the said amount before the audit was completed, there was a considerable delay of about 7 years in framing a charge, which was vague and without material on record in support of framing the charge, the charge was misconceived, so the same was quashed.[49]

10. Clubbing and Joinder of Charges

Clubbing of charges on consolidated transactions for a period of five years does not vitiate the trial when there is neither failure of justice, nor prejudice to the accused.[50]

The joinder of two charges, one under s 408, IPC (for committing criminal breach of trust by a servant) and the other under s 465, IPC (for making false documents for committing criminal breach of trust) would be valid when the two offences arise out of the same transaction.[51] However, the joinder of a charge under s 408 for criminal breach of trust, which is first completed, with an offence of cheating which is committed afterwards, against two separate persons is illegal.[52] Charges under ss 408 and 477A, IPC can, however, in the circumstances of a particular case, be tried together and the joint trial of all the accused under these sections will be proper and lawful.[53]3525

To establish an offence under this section, prove[54] that:

(a) the accused was, or was employed as, a clerk or servant of the person reposing trust in him;
(b) the accused, in the said capacity, was entrusted, in any manner, with the property in question or with domain over it; and
(c) the accused dishonestly misappropriated that property, or converted it to his own use, or used it, or disposed it of, or wilfully suffered some other person so to do, in violation of:

(i) any direction of law, prescribing the mode, in which such trust was to be discharged, or
(ii) any legal contract, express or implied, which he had made, touching the discharge of such trust.

The only circumstance that the key of the store used to remain during the night with the accused, the president of a co-operative society, is not sufficient to prove charge under s 408, IPC, beyond a reasonable doubt against him.[55]

12. Entries in Books of Account--Evidentiary Value

In the absence of any oral evidence to show that the books of account were regularly kept in the course of business as required under s 34, Evidence Act and/or any other oral evidence to prove the entrustment of the amount with the accused, the charge of breach of trust under s 408, IPC, cannot be said to have been established against him.[56] Mere admission of signatures made by the accused below debit entries in the books of account is not sufficient to conclude that the amount was handed over to the accused when such an admission is made by the accused in the statement under s 342, CrPC 1898 (now s 313, CrPC 1973) as such a statement should be read as a whole and should not be dissected and considered only in part where that part is inextricably connected with the other part which is not taken into consideration.[57]

13. Conviction

There must be evidence of dishonest misappropriation before a clerk or servant can be convicted under this section. He cannot be convicted on the basis of any presumption.[58] He cannot also be convicted on the basis of inadmissible evidence.[59] However, the mere fact that other co-accused have been acquitted, is no ground for acquitting an accused.[60] In Kantilal Gandalal Shah v State of Gujarat ,[61] a wrong cross-entry was made by the accountant on the instructions of the manager who was3526 in charge of the funds of the co-operative society. It was held that this fact was susceptible of the inference that the manager (i.e., the accused) wanted to misappropriate the amount with the result that he could be convicted under this section. In Nga Aung Thein v Emperor ,[62] a railway servant who was supplied a water proof coat for his use by the railway department, pawned it. It was held that the delivery of the waterproof coat was an entrustment, made to the servant, and he was, therefore, guilty of the offence for pawning it. In Wazir Singh v Emperor ,[63] the accused who received money in the capacity of an accountant and general agent of the Ramnagar State, failed to account for a deficiency in the accounts. He was held guilty under this section. It was further held, in Wazir Singh v Emperor ,[64] that persons who show deficiency in accounts, can be convicted of criminal misappropriation even when it cannot be shown that they had misappropriated any specific sum. However, where an employee of a zamindar handed over the account paper to his master at the time of leaving his service and showed the money, which he had put in as a security for his service and had withdrawn it as an item of expenditure, it was held that there was no dishonest intention and he was not guilty under this section.[65]

14. Probation

Keeping in view the facts and circumstances of the case and a favourable report of the probation officer based on data collected by him, the benefit of the Probation of Offenders Act can be extended to the accused.[66]

The accused, a secretary of Mandali (co-operative society), who misappropriated the amount of the Mandali, for which villagers had deposited out of their earnings after putting their hard labour, is not entitled to the benefit of probation.[67]

15. Sentence

The punishment provided in this section is a sentence of imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, accompanied with a fine. The circumstances of any particular case, may, however, warrant for a lenient view. In a case, where the accused was a young man and a law graduate and had never committed any misappropriation before, it was held that a serious notice of the lapse need not be taken and a sentence of one month rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 500 would be adequate.[68] Where the incident took place nearly 13 years ago, the accused had been in jail for few days, the amount involved mainly of Rs 9,341 was a petty one and as a result of prosecution, the accused had lost his job, although the acquittal recorded by the trial court was not found proper, yet the High Court3527 declined to interfere bearing in mind the larger interest of justice and the mitigating factors referred to before.[69]

However, when the accused, being a secretary of Mandali (co-operative society), who misappropriated the amount of the Mandali, which the villagers had deposited out of their earnings after putting their hard labour, the sentence of 1 year rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 5,000 awarded to the accused was found just and reasonable and not seen as a harsh sentence.[70]

Accused convicted under s 408, IPC had been facing trial, appeal and revision for last 31 years. Accused belonging to respectable family had become old. Sentence of imprisonment was reduced to the period already undergone.[71]

16. Alteration of Conviction from Section 408 to Section 403

An accused charged with an offence under s 408, IPC can be convicted under s 403 by the trial court. If the trial court has convicted the accused under s 408, but the offence under s 408 is not proved against the accused, though the offence under s 403 is established, the conviction of the accused under s 408 recorded by the trial court can be altered to s 403, IPC .[72]

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL BREACH OF TRUST

S. 409.

Criminal breach of trust by public servant, or by banker, merchant or agent.--

Whoever, being in any manner entrusted with property, or with any dominion over property in his capacity of a public servant or in the way of his business as a banker, merchant, factor, broker, attorney, or agent, commits criminal breach of trust in respect of that property, shall be punished with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.3528

Comments

1. Scope

This section also relates to an aggravated form of criminal breach of trust which has already been defined in s 405, IPC . In the commission of the offence of criminal breach of trust, two distinct parts are involved. The first consists of the creation of an obligation in relation to the property, over which dominion or control is acquired by the accused, while the second part deals with the misappropriation of the said property dishonestly and contrary to the terms of the obligation created.[73]

In order to sustain conviction under s 409, IPC, two ingredients are to be proved; namely, (i) the accused, a public servant or a banker or agent was entrusted with the property of which he is duty bound to account for; and (ii) the accused has3529 committed criminal breach of trust. What amounts to criminal breach of trust is provided under s 405, IPC .[74]

This section can be invoked only if it can be shown that the accused, being in any manner entrusted with property or with dominion over property in his capacity as a public servant, committed criminal breach of trust in respect of that property.[75] However, it is not necessary that misappropriation must necessarily take place after the creation of a legally correct entrustment or dominion over property. The entrustment may arise in 'any manner whatsoever'. That manner may, or may not, involve fraudulent conduct of the accused. This section covers dishonest misappropriation in both types of cases, i.e., those cases where the receipt of property is itself fraudulent or improper and those cases where the accused misappropriates what may have been quite properly and innocently received. All, that is required, is that may be described as 'entrustment' or acquisition of dominion over-property in the capacity of a public servant who, as a result of it, becomes charged with a duty to act in particular way or at least honestly.[76] It is wrong to say that a mistaken receipt or money in official capacity does not create an obligation upon the receiver as a public servant. It is enough if the payment is made by a person, dealing with a public servant in his capacity as a public servant, even if it is made on an erroneous assumption which the public servant concerned does nothing to remove. Section 409 , IPC, is meant for the protection, among others, of those dealing with public servants purporting to have the authority to act in a certain way in exercise of their official capacities. A legal defect in the scope of the ostensible authority of a public servant does not prevent an entrustment to, or an obligation to be fastened upon, a public servant in his capacity as a public servant if the fact of the case establishes the required nexus or connection between acts which create the obligation and the capacity.[77]

In the case of criminal breach of trust by a public servant, the acquisition of dominion or control over the property must also be in the capacity of a public servant. This is not the same thing as having the authority, as a public servant, to get the control or dominion over property annexed with an obligation. The 'entrustment' results from what the person, handing over money or property, is made to think, understand, and believe about the purpose for which he hands over money or property to a public servant if this takes place because, and due to exercise of the official authority, the requirements of s 409, IPC, are satisfied. Ordinarily, it is the ostensible or apparent scope of a public's authority when receiving property, and not its technical limitations under some internal rules of the department or office concerned, and the use made by the servant of his actual official capacity which would determine whether there is a sufficient nexus or connection between the acts complained of and the official capacity so as to bring it within the ambit of this section.[78]3530

Prosecution case was that the appellant accused, an Assistant Inspector in Agricultural department, had misappropriated the seeds and manures kept in the godown of which the appellant was incharge. However, the prosecution failed to prove the exact quality of receipt of seeds and manure kept in the godown. The evidence did not prove that the appellant had dishonestly or fraudulently misappropriated the seed or the manure kept in the godown. The appellant was acquitted of the charge under s 409, IPC .[79]

Where an offence, alleged to have been committed by a public servant, falls within the ambit of this section and also under s 5(1)(c) of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947, it is open to the prosecution to prosecute him either under this section (i.e., under the general law) or under s 5(1)(c) of the said Act, and it is not necessary that the prosecution must prosecute him under the said s 5(1)(c) which provides for a light punishment.[80]The fact that an act may fall both under s 409, IPC, and under s 16(7) of the Madras Pawn Brokers Act, does not take away the weight to prosecute the accused under a more onerous provision like s 409 of the IPC .[81]

2. Intention to Misappropriate at a Future Date

This section (i.e., s 409, IPC) does not include an intention to misappropriate at a future date. Where the accused, who was the president and the treasurer of a co-operative society, made certain entries, intending to make it possible for him, at a later date, to appropriate the moneys of the society, but nothing was then misappropriated, it was held that the accused could not be held guilty of an offence under this section.[82]

3. Crucial Word

So far as the offence under s 409, IPC is concerned, it must be proved that a person entrusted with property or with any dominion over property, in his capacity as public servant commits criminal breach of trust in respect of such property, as defined in s 405, IPC, meaning thereby that he dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use that property, or dishonestly uses or disposes of that property in violation of any direction of law prescribing the mode in which such trust is to be discharged, or of any legal contract, express or implied, which he has made touching the discharge of such trust, or wilfully suffers any other person so to do. The crucial word used in s 405, IPC is 'dishonestly' and, therefore, it implies the existence of mensrea, that is to say a guilty mind.[83]

4. Breach of Condition of Loan Agreement

Once a security is delivered to the creditor, and merely on the pretext of breach of the conditions of the loan agreement, such security or part thereof is disposed of without the knowledge and/or consent of the debtor, it could amount to a case of criminal breach of trust. However, when, the proceeds from the sale of the securities were3531 credited to the account of the debtor to discharge his liability in respect of the debt arising out of the loan agreement, and there was no retaliation of whatsoever nature by the debtor in relation to such acts on the part of the creditor, it cannot be said that the disposal of such part of the securities would per se amount to criminal breach of trust or cheating.[84]

5. Award Passed by Arbitrator

Once undisputedly the court was seized with the matters and the parties were before the court and the claim by the creditor in proceedings before the court was restricted to the amount due and payable under the unchallenged award lawfully passed in the arbitration proceedings, there can be no case of either criminal breach of trust or cheating and certainly not in relation to the subject-matter of the transaction in which the arbitration award was passed and followed by the proceedings for recovery of the amount on account of dishonour of the cheques which were deposited by the creditor towards the repayment of the loan amount obtained by the debtor under the loan agreement, duly confirmed by the arbitration award.[85]

6. Abetment

In an appropriate case, the conviction of an accused may probably be altered to one of abetment for an offence under s 409, IPC . However, such an alteration of conviction under s 409, IPC, into one of abetment thereof is not desirable as the same would imply a definite finding of guilt against an accused who is not before the court, despite the fact that evidence of such abetment is established on record.[86]

7. 'In any Manner'

Section 409, IPC, covers dishonest misappropriation in both types of cases:

(a) where the receipt of property is improper or fraudulent, and
(b) where receipt of property is proper and honest.

What is required is 'entrustment'.[87]

8. 'Entrusted with Property'

One of the essential conditions of the offence of criminal breach of trust is that the property, which is the subject-matter of the offence, must have been entrusted to the accused and trust of some kind is necessary.[88] 'Entrustment', in s 409, is used in a wide sense and includes all cases in which property is voluntarily handed over for a specific purpose and is dishonestly disposed of contrary to the terms on which possession has been handed over to the accused.[89] In view of the wider sense given to the term 'agent', even an independent contractor who dishonestly disposes of the3532 property entrusted can be treated as an agent and so liable under s 409, IPC .[1] An offence under this section presupposes an entrustment or bailment.[2] Money, handed over to the postal money order clerk for remittance, in his capacity as the money order issue clerk of the post office, would be an entrustment.[3] The entrustment of money by a person to the post master for opening a new savings bank account would amount to 'entrustment' within the meaning of this section.[4] Similarly, the supply of postage stamps to extra departmental vendors is an entrustment, pure and simple.[5] Money, collected by a person, authorised to collect it on behalf of another, is similarly an entrustment.[6] The expression 'entrustment' carries with it the implication that the person, handing over any property or on whose behalf that property is handed over to another, continues to be its owner. Further, the person handing over the property must have the confidence in the person taking the property so as to create a juridical relationship between them.[7] Entrustment to a person is virtually the same thing as placing the money under charge of such person, in Amrut Sakharam Sanap v State of Maharashtra ,[8] the appellant had taken charge of the treasury with all the cash therein, but on a day of holiday, he gave the key to accused number 1, and the evidence was that the appellant opened the currency chest the previous day. It was held that the mere giving of the key did not amount to giving charge of the treasury and that the appellant was himself liable for the loss of money from the chest. If a police officer takes charge of the property of a dying person and misappropriates it, he must be deemed to have been entrusted with the property in his capacity as a public servant.[9] It is not necessary that the property, in respect of which criminal breach of trust is committed, should be the property of the government; the only requirement is that it should be entrusted to a public servant in his capacity as such.[10] However, where the goods were entrusted to a firm and there was no personal entrustment of the goods to the manager, it was held that he could not be criminally liable under s 409, IPC .[11]

Where a public servant fails to pay the revenue collected into treasury within a reasonable period of time, it can be concluded that he used the money fraudulently for his own use and is guilty of breach of trust.[12]

Charge against the accused was that he violated the directions issued in a Circular Order regarding verification of loan applications. Unless the circular order has been communicated, accused cannot be held guilty for offence under s 409, IPC .[13]

Allegation was that the Chairman of the Electricity Board had directed not to return the money deposited by the complainant with the Board, the complainant was deprived of its use, attracting offence under s 409, IPC . There was no allegation that3533 the complainant entrusted the money to the accused, which was converted by the Chairman of the Board to its own use. No offence under s 405, IPC was made out.[14]

Where money or other property is obtained by deception, there can be no question of entrustment.[15] The mere fact that the senior officer had taken a bank draft and that authorisation had been given in his favour by his superior officer, would not establish entrustment or his dominion over the property (diesel oil). However, when oral and documentary evidence showed that the delivery of diesel oil was given to junior officer who in token thereof had signed not only on the cash memo but also on the register itself, establishes entrustment or dominion of the property upon the junior officer.[16]

9. Fair price shop dealer -- Selling rice in open market

The appellant accused, an agent entrusted with the distribution of rice under the 'Food for Work Scheme' (FFWS) to the workers on production of coupons, sold rice in open market without ration cards. Appellant accused was convicted under s 409, IPC .[17]

10. Entrustment with Property--Firm with Chief Minister as Partner Purchasing Land of Government Company

The chief minister was charged under s 409, IPC for her firm having purchased a plot belonging to TANSI, a government company. The properties in question belongs to TANSI, a corporation which is a separate and distinct entity from the government. and the properties are held by it as owner and has complete control over the same except when the said properties are to be alienated, approval of the government has to be obtained as provided under the Articles of Association of the said corporation. In a case of this nature, where there is no dominion over the properties by a chief minister or a minister, it cannot be treated as entrustment of the properties creating a trust which is an obligation annexed to the ownership of the properties and arises out of the confidence reposed and accepted by the owner. Indeed there is no material in the whole case to come to the conclusion that any such trust has been or deemed to have been created in respect of the said properties and that the relationship between chief minister and TANSI is one of trustee and beneficiary. Therefore, the ingredients of s 409, IPC are not attracted to the case at all. There is absolutely no entrustment of the properties in any manner, which allows a dominion over it except approving or disapproving, an act on the part of the corporation either to sell or to alienate the properties. It cannot be said that a public servant who holds a particular portfolio and has an element of supervisory control in certain matters, has a dominion over the property so as to exercise any legal incidents attached to the right of ownership. Therefore, there was no entrustment of the said properties and it cannot be said that chief minister had dominion over the said properties either as the chief minister or as the minister of industries and in any case, the evidence does not3534 establish the ingredient of dishonest disposal or conversion of property for personal use. Thus the charge under the aforesaid section is not established.[18]

11. Entrustment with Property -- Fortuitous or Intervening Situation Incapacitating Accused--Effect

If due to a fortuitous or intervening situation, a person to whom money is entrusted is incapacitated from carrying out the job, that will not bring in application of s 405, IPC, unless misappropriation, or conversion to personal use or disposal of property is established.[19]

12. Prosecution not to prove Actual Manner of Misappropriation

It is fairly well settled position in law that actual mode of entrustment or misappropriation is not to be proved by the prosecution. Once entrustment is proved, it is for the accused to prove as to how the property entrusted was dealt with.[20]

13. On Proof of Entrustment Accused to Account for the Property

The law is well settled that once entrustment of property is proved, the prosecution is no longer obliged to establish the precise mode of conversion or misappropriation by the accused of the property entrusted to him. Conviction of a person for the offence of criminal breach of trust may not, in all cases, be founded merely on his failure to account for the property entrusted to him, but where he is unable to account or renders an explanation for his failure to account which is untrue, inference of misappropriation with dishonest intent may readily be made.[21]Once it is proved that the amount was entrusted to the accused, then under s 106 of the Evidence Act it has to establish as to what happened to the said amount and that fact lies within the knowledge of the accused, the burden of establishing the fact is upon him.[22]

14. Mere Retention of Property--Temporary Retention

The gist of the offence of criminal misappropriation is dishonest intention. Mere retention of property is not enough. It is, however, necessary that the prosecution must establish that there was intention on the part of the accused to retain the amount permanently. Temporary retention is also sufficient.[23] Temporary embezzlement by the accused clerk employed in the office of Deputy Superintendent of Police of a paltry sum viz. Rs. 1839/- for a period of 21 days was held covered by s 95, IPC . The accused was granted benefit of s 95, IPC, and acquitted of charges under ss 409, 471, 477, IPC .[24]3535

15. 'Public Servant'

The secretary of a co-operative society under the Karnataka Co-operative Societies Act 1959 (11 of 1959) being a paid employee of the society is a public servant.[25] a patwari, whose duty is to collect land revenue and cases due on the land in his village under the land revenue code, is a public servant.[26] Similarly, a naib nazir,[27] or the president of a municipality, where he is not removable except by the local government,[28] or the pradhan of a *gram sabha*under the Uttar Pradesh Panchayat Raj Act,[29]gram sachiv of panchayats in the State of Haryana,[30] or a receiver in an insolvency case,[31] is a public servant within the meaning of this section. However, the president of a co-operative society,[32] or its secretary,[33] or a village shroff, whose duty is to assist in collecting the public revenue in cash and to give receipts, but not authorised to receive the public revenue in kind,[34] or the kurnam of a government village receiving moneys from certain raiyats as revenue on unassessed lands,[35] or a person authorised to sell food grains under the direction of the government to be distributed among the members, constituting a local unit in pursuance of an agreement, entered into by them with the government, under which they merely act as arhatiyas,[36] or a person, who is temporarily carrying on the duties of a branch postmaster purely as a nominee of permanent extra departmental branch postmaster without any authority being given by the government by a letter of appointment,[37] or the son of a person who is an extra departmental agent of a post officer accepting certain amount from a party for being remitted to another person but misappropriating it,[38] is not a public servant within the meaning of this section. For further commentary, s 21, vol 1, may be referred to.

16. Mere negligence of a public servant

Mere negligence of a public servant does not amount to criminal breach of trust punishable under s 409, IPC .[39]

17. Public servant -- Exonerated in departmental proceedings

Where the accused public servant has been exonerated in departmental proceedings on the same charges on which FIR has been filed, criminal proceedings would be quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[40]3536

Departmental proceedings and criminal proceedings can go on simultaneously. After the acquittal of an employee in a criminal proceeding, departmental proceedings against the employee can be initiated.[41]

18. Inducing Subscriber of Mobile Phone

Admittedly, a subscriber is given a mobile phone instrument and connection with an understanding that the subscriber has exclusive right to use the phone. If the accused allegedly induced the subscriber to opt for the services provided by Tata Tele Services Limited (TTSL), an offence under s 409 of IPC, cannot be said to have made out. Section 405 of IPC, defines 'criminal breach of trust'. The offence of criminal breach of trust requires entrustment with property and dishonest use or disposal of the property by the person to whom the property is entrusted. Both these things are absent. There is no allegation that the property in respect of which the second respondent has right was entrusted to TTSL or its employees who are the petitioners herein.[42]

19. 'Banker'

The word 'banker', used in s 409, IPC, signifies any person who discharges any of the functions of the customary business of banking.[43] The relationship between a depositor and a bank is the simple relationship of a creditor and a debtor. It cannot be said that there is an entrustment to the bank for any particular purpose.[44] Money, when paid into a bank, ceases altogether to be the money of the customer; it is then the money of the banker who is bound to return in equivalent, by paying a similar sum to that deposited with him, when he is asked for it. The money placed in the custody of a banker, is for all intents and purposes, the money of the banker to do with it as he pleases.[45] Similarly, no criminal proceedings can lie against the manager of a bank for having used the money for the purpose of other business.[46] There are, however, many cases in which a banker may also be a trustee and his case may fall under s

409, IPC . Thus, when a bank takes deposits from its customers, it takes it on the understanding that the deposit is not to be used to pay dividend to the shareholders at a time when the bank being insolvent, cannot legally pay dividend.[47] Where the managing director of a bank got his son to present a pronote for Rs 3,000 to the bank, treating it as an addition to the profits reducing his remuneration on paper from Rs 4,050, and thus deceiving; the shareholders into declaring dividend larger than the profits warranted; it was held that the accused was3537 guilty under a 409.[48] Where a municipal committee endorsed a war bond to a bank with the instruction to sell it at its market value but the director of the bank pledged it with another bank against cash payment and the amount was utilised to meet some urgent; demands made on their bank, it was held that making use of the amount in a manner, which was contrary to the instructions, was an offence under s 409, IPC .[49]

20. Banker's Lien

The Madras High Court in N Mohammad Hussain Sahib v Chartered Bank Madras held:[50]

> The general lien of bankers over any goods bailed to them is embodied in s 171 of the Contract Act . The question is whether any such lien may be over money deposited by the customers... Whether the right of the bank is called a lien or set off, the said right can be exercised only by the bank by getting the funds deposited in its branch by the customer transferred to it with the consent of the customer. It is held that it is not open to the customer to call upon the bank to exercise any such lien or set off. In Canara Bank v Taraka Prabhu Publishers Pvt Ltd ,[51] the Andhra Pradesh High Court has held that in a case of recovery of loan by a bank, the bank can transfer the amount deposited in the current account to its loan account for set- off. The bank has right of set-off in terms of contract to recover the debt due to it. In Punjab National Bank v Surendra Prasad Sinha ,[52] wherein their lordships have held that adjustment of FDR securities deposited by a guarantor thereafter by the bank on maturity of the said deposits is not a criminal breach of trust. Their lordships have observed that the creditor has right of adjustment in view of the liability still subsisting and there is no dishonest intention in adjusting the amount. From the above decisions and also when from the averments made in the complaint, it is abundantly clear that there existed a relationship of creditor and debtor and the demands are mutual and between the same parties. Therefore, the bank has a lien or right of set off and there can be no dishonest intention on the part of the bank to misappropriate the amount to constitute an offence under s 409, IPC .[53]

21. Should the Bank Enforce Liability against Principal first and then against the Guarantor?

In State Bank of India v Indexport Registered M/s ,[54] a decree was obtained and executed. The said order was challenged before their lordships on the ground that the decree holder had first exhausted the remedy by way of executing a mortgage decree loan and then proceeded against the guarantor. Negativing this contention their lordships overruled the decision, in Union Bank of India v Manku Narayana ,[55] and held:

> The decree for money is a simple decree against the judgment-debtors including the guarantor and in no way subject to the execution of the mortgage decree against the judgment-debtor no 2. If on principle a guarantor could be sued without even suing the principal debtor there is no reason, even if the decretal amount is covered by the mortgaged decree, to force the decree-holder to proceed against the mortgaged property3538 first and then to proceed against the guarantor. It appears the above quoted observations in Manku Narayan's case,[56] are not based on any established principles of law and or reasons, and in fact, are contrary to law. It, of course, depends on the facts of each case how the composite decree is drawn up. But if the composite decree is a decree which is both a personal decree as well as a mortgage decree, without any limitation on its execution, the decree-holder, in principle, cannot be forced to first exhaust the remedy by way of execution of the mortgage decree along and told that only if the amount recovered is insufficient, he can be permitted to take recourse to the execution of the personal decree.

Where the complainant was the guarantor of the bank and he has debited the amount, and subsequently after the case was filed before the debt recovery tribunal, the said amount was remitted back to the account of the complainant. It may be true that subsequent conduct of the bank's directors in remitting back the amount may not be a mitigating circumstances to proceed against the bank's directors etc, but the fact clearly discloses that there was no dishonest intention on the part of the bank's directors etc, to misappropriate this amount for themselves.[57]

22. Adjustment of FDR Securities of Guarantor by Bank against Time-bound Loan--No Offence under Section 409

Section 3 of the Limitation Act only bars the remedy but does not destroy the right which the remedy relates to. The right to the debt continues to exist notwithstanding the fear that the remedy is barred by limitation. Therefore, when the principal debtor did not repay the bank loan, the bank as creditor can adjust it at maturity of the fixed deposit receipt deposited by the guarantor with the bank as security, though the debt became barred by limitation at the time of maturity of the said FDRS, it is not obligatory to file a suit to recover the debt. Such adjustment would not amount to offences punishable under ss 109, 114 and 409, IPC .[58]

It is also salutary to note that the judicial process should not be an instrument of oppression or needless harassment. When the complaint was made important impleading the chairman, the managing director of the bank by name and a host of officers, there lies a responsibility and duty on the magistrate to find whether the concerned accused should be legally responsible for the offence charged for vindication of justice and maintenance of law and order, but it would not be the means to wreck personal vengeance. Therefore, in case of default of payment of bank loan, when the debt became time-barred and the bank had adjusted the debt from the FDRS in its possession which were deposited by the guarantor by way of security, after their maturity, any complaint made by the guarantor impleading the chairman, managing director of the bank and a host of officers on the charges under ss 109, 114 and 409, IPC, the complaint being filed as vendetta to harass the persons needlessly, the complaint was quashed.[59]

23. Civil Suit Filed by Bank Compromised--Complaint under Sections 409 and 420 Quashed

Where in a complaint filed against the accused for offences of criminal breach of trust and cheating it was alleged that a floating charge was made by accused-debtor on the3539 goods by way of security in favour of the bank to cover up credit facility and the goods were deposited, the offence of cheating cannot be said to have been made out because the property in respect of which criminal breach of trust can be committed must necessarily be the property of some person other than the accused or the beneficial interest in or ownership of it must be in some other person and the offender must hold such property in trust for such other person or for his benefit. Moreover, as the case was basically a matter of civil dispute and the banks had already filed suits for recovery of dues of the banks on account of credit facility and the said suits had been compromised on receiving payments from the concerned companies, the compromise decrees passed in the suits instituted by the banks, for all intents and purposes, amounted to compounding of the offence of cheating. Consequently, the complaint for both offences under ss 409 and 420, IPC, was liable to be quashed. It was more so when the banks had not chosen to file any case against the debtor and though the FIRS were filed in the years 1987 and 1989, investigation was not completed though there was no impediment in completing the investigation.[60]

24. 'Agents'

The relationship of principal and an agent may be constituted by:

(a) express appointment of the principal or by a person duly authorized by the principal to make such appointment,
(b) implication of law from the conduct or the situation of the parties or from the necessity of the cases, or

(c) subsequent ratification by the principal, of acts done on his behalf.[61]

The 'director of a company' is not only an agent but is also in the position of a trustee, and being a trustee of the assets which have come to his hands, he has control and dominion over the same.[62] The trustee or manager of a temple is the agent of the deity. If such trustee or manager misappropriates temple jewels, he is guilty under s 409, and not of theft.[63] However, the position of the lambardar is not that of a trustee in order to make him liable for criminal breach of trust if he does not hand over, to the government the money received from the landowners. His position is similar to that of a lessee and the dispute, relating to the payment of the money, is that of a civil nature.[64] The mere fact that a stockist of cement is under the control and supervision of the government under the provisions of any Control Order, would not make him an agent of the government.[65]

Though a person charged may have been entrusted with the property in his capacity of an agent, yet it is not necessary that he should continue as an agent at the time of committing the criminal breach of trust.[66]3540

25. Agent and Servant--Distinction

An agent is not a servant as a servant acts under the direct control and supervision of the master and is bound to confirm to all reasonable orders, given to him in the course of his work, while the agent, though bound to exercise his authority in accordance with all the lawful instructions, which may be given to him from time to time by his principal, is not subjected, in its exercise to the direct control or supervision of the principal.[67]

The difference between the relationship of master and servant and principal and agent may be said to be this--A principal has the right to direct what work the agent has to do, but a master has the further right to direct how the work is to be done. The position is further clarified in Halsbury's Laws of England.[68]

An agent is to be distinguished on one hand from a servant and on the other from an independent contractor. A servant acts under the direct control and supervision of his master, and is bound to conform to all reasonable orders given to him in the course of his work; an independent contractor, on the other hand, is entirely dependent of any control or interference and merely undertakes to produce a specified result, employing his own means to produce that result. An agent though bound to exercise his authority in accordance with all lawful instructions which may be given to him from time to time by his principal, is not subject in its exercise to the direct-control or supervision of the principal. An agent as such is not a servant, but a servant is generally for some purposes his master's implied agent, the extent of the agency depending upon the duties or position of the servant.[69]

29. Acquittal under Section 409 --Accused cannot be Convicted under Section 5(1)(c) of the Prevention of Corruption Act

When the allegations in the FIR are not substantiated by oral evidence and the accused are acquitted for the offence under s 409, IPC, their conviction under s 5(1)(c) of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947, which is based on similar ingredients cannot be sustained.[70]3541

30. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

31. Two FIRS

When two FIRS are lodged with different investigating agencies and the offences under both the FIRS are one and the same, it is only then that the second FIR is not maintainable.[71] However, when the two FIRS do not contain common factors as to the offences in question, it cannot be said that the second FIR should be discarded,[72] and quashed.[73]

When the second FIR is lodged for the harassment of the accused, it is liable to be quashed to prevent the abuse of process of law.[74]

32. Identification of Accused

Where the accused was a sarpanch of a gram panchayat and a public figure in the locality and the prosecution witness identified him in court, no further evidence was necessary like an identification parade to connect the offence with the accused.[75]

33. Inordinate Delay in Filing Complaint--Proceedings Quashed

Where the amount for which the accused was charged with criminal breach of trust was received by the bank with interest within one month of commission of offence, the complainant was terminated from service on account of the aforesaid Act within 7 to 8 months of the offence, the filing of the complaint after a gap of five years, prima facie appeared to be intentional and only to harass the accused. It is true that the period of limitation is prescribed for each kind of offence and since the offence under s 409, IPC, is punishable with life imprisonment or imprisonment which may extend to 10 years, the complaint filed by the complainant was within limitation, but filing a complaint within limitation cannot itself be justified in the peculiar fact and circumstances, after five years.[76]

34. Sanction to Prosecute--Essential if Offence Committed in the Discharge of Official Duty

Under s 197(1), CrPC 1973, when any public servant, who is not removable from his office save by or with the sanction of the government, is accused of any offence, alleged to have been committed by him while acting, or purporting to act, in the discharge of his official duty, no court shall take cognizance of such offence except with the previous sanction of the Central Government or of the state government, as the case may be. It is not, however, every offence committed by a public servant that requires sanction for prosecution under s 197(1), CrPC, nor even every act done by him while he is actually engaged in the performance of his official duties. If the act3542 complained of is directly concerned with his official duties, so that, if questioned, it can be claimed to have been done by virtue of the office, then sanction would be necessary, and that would be so irrespective of whether it was in fact a proper discharge of his duties because that would really be a matter of defence on merits which could have to be investigated at the trial and cannot arise in the grant of sanction which must precede the institution of the prosecution.[77] a public servant can only be said to act or purport to act in the discharge of his official duty if his act is such as to lie within the scope of his official duty. The test may well be whether the public servant, if challenged can reasonably claim that what he does, he does by virtue of his office.[78] In explaining the test for determining the necessity of sanction, the Supreme Court observed, thus:

> The offence, alleged to have been committed, must have something to do or must be related, in some manner, with the discharge of official duty...There must be a reasonable connection between the act and the official duty. It does not matter even if the act exceeds what is strictly necessary for the discharge of duty as this question will arise only at a later stage when the trial proceeds on merits. What we must find out is whether the act and the official duty are so interrelated that one can postulate reasonably that it was done by the accused in the performance of the official duty though possibly in excess of needs and requirements of the situation.[79]

35. Sanction to Prosecute--Discharge of Official Duties

It is not, however, that every offence committed by a public servant requires sanction for prosecution under s 197(1), CrPC, nor even every act done by him while he is actually engaged in the performance of his official duties. If the act complained of is directly concerned with his official duties so that, if questioned, it can be claimed to have been done by virtue of the office, then sanction would be necessary, and that would be so, irrespective of whether it was in fact a proper discharge of his duties because that would really be a matter of defence on merits which could have to be investigated at the trial, and cannot arise in the grant of sanction which must precede the institution of the prosecution.[80] A public servant can only be said to act or purport to act in the discharge of his official duty if his act is such as to lie within the scope of his official duty. The test may well be whether the public servant, if challenged, can reasonably claim that what he does, he does by virtue of his office. In explaining the test for determining the necessity of sanction, the Supreme Court observed thus:

> The offence, alleged to have been committed, must have something to do or must be related, in some manner, with the discharge of official duty...There must be a reasonable connection between the act and the official duty. It does not matter even if the act3543 exceeds what is strictly necessary for the discharge of duty as this question will arise only at a later stage when the trial proceeds on merits. What we must find out is whether the act and the official duty are so interrelated that one can postulate reasonably that it was done by the accused in the performance of the official duty though possibly in excess of needs and requirements of the situation.[81]

The sanction of the appropriate government or competent authority would be necessary to protect a public servant from needless harassment or prosecution. The protection of sanction is an assurance to a honest and sincere officer to perform his public duty honestly and to the best of his ability. The threat of prosecution demoralizes the honest officer. The requirement of sanction by the competent authority or appropriate government is an assurance to the honest officer who does his public duty to further the public interest. However, the performance of official duty under the colour of public authority cannot be camouflaged to commit crime, since, his public duty may provide him an opportunity to commit crime. The court while it proceeds in the trial or inquiry, as the case may be, applies its mind and records a finding that the crime and the official duty are not integrally connected.[82]

36. Sanction to Prosecute--Cases

In Shreekantiah Ramayya Munipalli v State of Bombay ,[83] the three accused, who were in charge of military stores and to whom they had been entrusted in various capacities, were alleged to have entered into a conspiracy to defraud the government of those properties by selling them to a particular person who subsequently became the approver. It was alleged that the money had been paid and then the stores were passed out to the depot and the money was pocketed by the accused, and not credited to the government. It was evident that the entrustment was in the official capacity and there could be no disposal, lawful or otherwise, save by an act done, or purporting to be done, in an official capacity. In these circumstances, it was held that the sanction to prosecute them was necessary. However, in Jaimi Veerabhadraswamy,[84] it was held that no sanction to prosecute the president of a panchayat board, who had collected subscriptions for the war fund and subsequently misappropriated them, was necessary because the collection of subscriptions for the war fund could not be deemed to be an official duty which had to be performed by the president of the panchayat board. Similarly, in Gumshidayya Shantivirayya Kulkarni v Emperor ,[85] no sanction was held to be necessary where an officiating kulkarni of a village used money, collected on account of revenue, for his own purpose, instead of sending it to the treasury, because he could not be said to be acting in the discharge of his official duty. Likewise, where the accused embezzled funds entrusted to him by various depositors for crediting into their savings bank account, it was held that as the accused intended to act in direct opposition to his duty and his office merely3544 provided him with the opportunity of committing it, no sanction was necessary.[86] Similarly, in Shamboonath Mishra v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[87] it was held:

> When the public servant is alleged to have committed the offence of fabrication of record of misappropriation of public fund, etc, it cannot be said that he acted in discharge of his official duties because it is not the official duty of the public servant to fabricate the false records and misappropriate the public funds, etc in furtherance of or in discharge of his official duties. The official capacity only enables him to fabricate the record or misappropriate the public fund. It does not mean that it is integrally connected or inseparably interlinked with the crime committed in the course of the transaction.

37. Sanction not Condition Precedent

As noted in State of Madhya Pradesh v MP Gupta ,[88] sanction under s 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 is not a condition precedent for an offence under s 409, IPC .[89]

38. Sanction--Determination of Necessity from Stage to Stage

The complaint may not disclose that the act constituting the offence, was done or purported to be done in the discharge of official duty, but the facts, subsequently coming to light on a police or judicial enquiry or even in the course of the prosecution evidence at the trial, may establish the necessity for sanction. Whether sanction is necessary may have to be determined from stage to stage. The necessity may reveal itself during the progress of the case.[90]

39. Public Servant not Removable with Prior Sanction of Government--no Sanction Required

A bare perusal of s 197(1), CrPC 1973[91] shows that before the accused can challenge his prosecution on the ground of want of sanction, he has to show that he was a public servant not removable from the office except by or with the prior sanction of the government. When undoubtedly the accused was a public servant but there is nothing on record to show that he could be removed from his office only by the government or with the prior sanction of the government, he cannot be convicted under s 409, IPC .[92] The question whether the accused are removable from their office save by or with the sanction of the government is a question of fact, which can be dealt with by the trial court after objection is taken before it and parties are given the opportunity of being heard.[93]3545

40. Acquittal of Accused for want of Sanction--No Bar under Section 300 , CrPC 1973 for fresh Trial

Section 300, CrPC 1973 provides that a person who has once been tried by a court of competent jurisdiction for an offence and convicted or acquitted of such offence shall, while such conviction or acquittal remains in force, not be liable to be tried again for the same offence, nor on the same facts for any other offence.[94]

In Yusofalli Mulla Noorbhoy v The King [95] wherein the accused appellant was tried in the court of presidency magistrate under s 13(1) read with s 5 of the ordinance for the offence of hoarding. He was also separately charged under s 13(1) read with s 6 of the ordinance for the offence of profiteering. He pleaded not guilty. The magistrate proceeded with the case. Thereafter, the accused was acquitted on the ground that this chargesheet was filed without proper sanction. Thus, it is the incompetence of the prosecution to proceed against the accused without sanction as provided for in law. Thereafter, fresh prosecution was initiated against the accused appellant for the same offences and on the facts after obtaining fresh prosecution sanction, but the learned magistrate acquitted the appellant holding that the fresh prosecution was barred under s 403 of CrPC). The privy council following the decision of the federal court delivered in Basdeo Agarwalla v King Emperor [96] came to the conclusion that sanction was bad and the prosecution incompetent, hence the order of acquittal was passed without jurisdiction and could only operate as order of discharge and thus fresh prosecution was not barred. Similar view was taken by the Hon'ble Supreme Court in Baij Nath Prasad Tripathi v State of Bhopal ,[97] wherein it was held that the whole trial was null and void in absence of prosecution sanction and it cannot be said that there was any conviction or acquittal in force within the meaning of s 403, CrPC 1898 (new s 300, CrPC 1973). Such a trial does not bar a subsequent trial. Following the view of the Privy Council and the Supreme Court, the Hon'ble Apex Court held in Mohammad Safi v State of West Bengal ,[98] that where the accused, was tried earlier by a special judge on the basis of a chargesheet under s 409, IPC, was acquitted after the conclusion of the trial not on merits but on the erroneous conclusion that the court had no jurisdiction to take cognizance of the offence on the police challan, the subsequent trial and conviction of the accused for the same offence by the court were not barred by the provisions of s 403, CrPC . The earlier trial was no trial at all and the order passed therein was not an order of acquittal as contemplated by s 403(1) of old CrPC . Thus, the judgment was not on merits and the accused petitioner was acquitted only on account of improper sanction, s 300(1), CrPC is not attracted.[99]

41. Sanction to Contain Necessary Facts

Ordinarily, the facts constituting the offence charged, should be shown in the sanction. If, however, such facts are not shown on the face of the sanction, the prosecution must prove by extraneous evidence, that those facts were placed before3546 the sanctioning authority and it was only after examining those facts that the authority granted the necessary sanction to prosecute the accused.[1]

42. Non-examination of Authority Granting Sanction

When the sanctioning authority accords sanction to prosecute the accused who was not available in India, but another prosecution witness, who was acquainted with the signatures of the sanctioning authority to prove the sanction order and she also gave the details mentioned in the sanctioning order regarding the various documents placed before the sanctioning authority who in turn perused all the records and accorded sanction after proper application of mind, it was not obligatory on the part of the prosecution to examine the sanctioning authority.[2] When the sanction order clearly revealed that the sanctioning authority had applied its mind after careful examination of the materials and accorded sanction to prosecute the accused, the failure to examine the sanctioning authority would not vitiate the legality of the sanction order.[3]

43. Gazette Notification under Section 6 of Delhi Special Police Establishment Act (25 of 1946)--Not Mandatory

Under s 3 of the Delhi Special Police Establishment Act 1946 (DSPE Act), the Central Government is required to empower or specify the offences or class of offences which are to be the subject-matter of investigation by the Delhi Police establishment and this has to be done only by publication of notification in the Official Gazette. However, no such mandatory requirements is there insofar as the extension of power under s 5 or the consent of the state government under s 6 is concerned. Provision of s 3 of the DSPE Act does not control or is a parental provision so far as the ss 5 and 6 are concerned. As the words under ss 5 and 6 denote, the power under these provisions can be exercised by just an order or communication, as the case may be. Under s 5 of the DSPE Act there is no requirement of gazette notification by the Central Government for extending the area of operation of the special force and as per s 6 of the DSPE Act it is left to the wisdom of the state government whether to accept such extension. The Gazette publication in this regard either under s 5 or s 6 is not at all necessary. Therefore, in the absence of Gazette notification under s 6 of the DSPE Act, filing of the case or the investigation does not automatically become void ab initio.[4]

44. Jurisdiction

By virtue of s 181(4), CrPC 1973, an offence of criminal misappropriation, or of criminal breach of trust, may be inquired into, or tried by a court within whose jurisdiction the offence was committed or any part of the property, which is the subject of the offence, was received or retained, or was required to be returned or accounted for, by the accused person.

In HS Tiwari v State of West Bengal ,[5] the complaint was filed under ss 408 and 409, IPC regarding misappropriation of sales tax amount of a company. The offence3547 was non-accounting and there was no specific allegation of misappropriation in any particular case. It was held that the venue of the trial will be the place where the accounting has to be done and has not been done.

In Brij Kishore v Chandrika Prasad , the accused was the Zilledar of a Zamindar who was a resident of Lucknow. The accused used to make collections of rent in villages owned by the Zamindar in Partapgarh and Allahabad districts. He did not account for the moneys realised by him, to the widow of the deceased Zamindar in spite of repeated demands. It was held that the accused, being under a duty to keep accounts and deposit the amounts at Lucknow, committed the offence at Lucknow and the court of Lucknow was, therefore, competent to try the case. For further commentary, the same heading in s 406, ante, may be referred to.

45. Jurisdiction--Special Court

The jurisdiction of the special court under s 83A of the Andhra Pradesh Co-operative Societies Act 1964 (7 of 1964) extends to taking cognizance of the offence under the said Act only. However, the jurisdiction of the same special court under s 83 of the said Act extends to any offence whether punishable under the said Act or under the IPC . Similarly, cognizance of offence under ss 120B and 409, IPC, by the special court is not barred.[6]

Sub- section 3 of s 4 of the Prevention of Corruption Act empowers a special judge to try any offence, other than an offence specified in s 3 with which the accused may, under CrPC, be charged at the same trial. Under s 220, CrPC, if one of a series of acts so connected together as to form the same transaction, and more offences than one are committed by same person, he may be charged with and tried at one trial for every such offence, and under s 223, CrPC, persons accused of the same offence committed in the course of the same transaction, as well as persons accused of an offence and persons accused of abetment, or of an attempt to commit such an offence may be charged and tried together. Thus, the special judge has jurisdiction to try the offences punishable under ss 420 / 409 / 120B, IPC, together, with the offences punishable under the Prevention of Corruption Act.[7]

46. Anticipatory Bail

Where the allegations against the accused are serious and the embezzled amount is very high, the chances are that in case the accused is arrested and subjected to custodial interrogation, some misappropriated amount may be recovered at the instance of the accused, there being no good grounds for enlargement of the accused on anticipatory bail.[8]

47. Bail

Where the amount misappropriated by the accused was very large, the trial reached the final stage and was likely to conclude soon, the enlargement of the accused on bail at that stage may result in their fleeing from justice to avoid higher punishment3548 and facing recovery proceedings at the hands of the complainants, the bail was therefore refused.[9]

Accused accountant in Treasury alleged to have passed bills not in accordance with the provisions of Bihar and Financial Rules was not enlarged on bail.[10]

48. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the... day of at..., you were entrusted with property (or dominion over property)... (specify the property) in your capacity of a public servant (or in the way of your business as a banker/merchant/factor/broker/attorney/or agent) and that you committed criminal breach of trust in respect of that property and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 409 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

If there is no mention in a charge, against two persons, under s 409 read with s 34, IPC, that there was joint entrustment of property, the charge of criminal misappropriation of property in furtherance of common intention must fail. Criminal misappropriation of property entrusted is not such a criminal act which can be done by several persons in the absence of evidence to prove joint entrustment.[11] However, the fact that relevant provision of the handbook is not mentioned in the charge, would not invalidate it.[12] If criminal breach of trust relates to several separate entrustment during a year, it is better to frame the charge regarding each of the separate deliveries, showing the dates of each entrustment separately, but failure to do so does not vitiate the trial, unless it is shown that such a defect in the charge has occasioned the failure of justice.[13] The findings of the disciplinary authority in the departmental inquiry conducted against the accused is not relevant at the stage of framing charge under s 409, IPC .[14]

Where the accused, a power of attorney holder of a firm of which his brother was a proprietor submitted the quotation for supply of a generator set and it was supplied and was found to be defective, and the accused did not take any steps for supply of new generator set nor did he return the amount, and instead he had deposited the entire quotation amount in the bank account of the firm but subsequently withdrew it and closed the account, it was held that primafacie case under s 409 / 420 was made out against him, and the accused, through the power of attorney holder cannot absolve himself of civil and criminal liability.[15]3549

49. Joinder of Charges under Sections 409 and 477A

If an accused is charged with several offences under s 409, IPC, and some offences under s 477A, IPC, and they arise out of the same acts and form part of the same transaction, the charge would not be invalid if no prejudice is caused to him.[16] The several acts of falsification of accounts, committed to conceal embezzlement, can be regarded as part of the same transaction.[17] If false entries are made for the purpose of covering a defalcation, their plurality would not preclude them from being joined in one charge.[18] a charge of criminal breach of trust, in respect of a lump sum of money, made of different items, can, therefore, be linked to charges of falsification of accounts under s 477A, IPC, in respect of each of the items.[19] However, the offence of fabrication of false evidence, relating it to items, partly or wholly unconnected with the charge of criminal breach of trust, is undoubtedly a distinct offence.[20]

Where the accused is charged under ss 409, 468 and 477A, IPC but is convicted only under s 409, and the legality of the charges is challenged in appeal, only the charge under s 409 has to be seen as to whether it is properly framed.[21]

50. Alternative Charges under Section 406 to Section 409 and Section 420 --Not Illegal

It is always open for a criminal court to frame charges alternatively. A person can alternatively be charged under ss 406 to 409 or under s 420, IPC . The offence under ss 406, 408 or s 409 and the offence under s 420 could not go together, but if the alternative charge is framed, it could not be said that the alternative charge is illegal or invalid.[22]

51. Proof

In order to secure a conviction under this section, the prosecution must prove[23] that:

(a) the accused was either a public servant or a banker, merchant, factor, broker, attorney or agent;
(b) he was, in such a capacity, entrusted with property in question or with dominion over it;[24] and
(c) he committed criminal breach of trust in respect of that property.[25]

Circumstances of strong suspicion without very definite evidence, are not sufficient to justify a conviction even though the accused offers no explanation for them.[26] Absence of an explanation by the accused for the shortage of the articles, kept in the godowns, cannot be presumed to be a misappropriation of those articles by the accused. The prosecution must prove the factum of misappropriation of the entrusted articles.[27] Criminal liability can be fastened only when it is established that the goods have been dishonestly misappropriated, and not otherwise. A lapse in the discharge of official duty, which may be either due to inadvertence, negligence or overwork, stands on different footing and must be clearly distinguished from criminal liability.[28] A mere error of judgment would not constitute offence of criminal breach of trust.[29]Proof of mensrea is essential.[30] It is essential to show that actual loss was sustained. When there is absence of any reliable and independent material and it was impossible to arrive at a finding whether any loss at all had been sustained as a result of the alleged misappropriation, the material on record falls of short of bringing home the guilt to the accused.[31]

In cases of criminal breach of trust/failure to account for money, proved to have been received by the accused, or giving of a false account as to its use is generally considered to be a strong circumstance against the accused, but it is not conclusive.[32] However, retention, for a sufficiently long time, of money, entrusted to the accused to be used for a particular purpose, would justified the inference that the accused had dishonest intention.[33] Where, however, he has given a reasonable explanation for such retention, no case of criminal breach of trust against him can be sustained.[34]Where, therefore, the clerk of a cattle-pound had temporarily retained money with him, as his father and wife were ailing and he himself was not on the date of deposit, it was held that mere retention of money was enough to bring the act of the accused under s 409 .[35] However, where a registration clerk in a post office failed to give any explanation for the shortage in money, advance to him for the purchase of stamps, it was held that he was guilty of criminal breach of trust.[36] The conduct of a postman, who repaid the misappropriated amount of money order, after a complaint against him had been lodged with his higher authorities, was held to be a clear indicator of his dishonest misappropriation.[37] However, mere non-production of money, which3551 was rightly in the hand of the accused, was not held to amount to a crime of misappropriation when he was never asked to hand over the balance.[38] However, the making of false entries in the kharidi of the tehsil and other papers, embezzling various sums of money at different times by not crediting them to the bank, or the making of entries regarding false expenditure, was held to be an offence of criminal breach of trust in State v Sheikh Dadan .[39]

Where a public servant removes public property from office to his own house for personal use and fails to account for it, he commits offence under s 409, IPC .[40]

The appellant was the Chairman of the Maharashtra State Electricity Board (MSEB), respondent no. 2 was a company which had entered into various contracts with MSEB for installation of low tension load management system. Respondent 2 had deposited an amount of Rs. 5 lakh with MSEB as security deposit in lieu of bank guarantee to be used for tenders to be filed by respondent 2 from time to time in the future. As dispute arose between the MSEB and the respondent 2, the latter informed MSES that they were not interested in participating in any tender and sought refund of the said amount of Rs. 5 lakhs. The Chief Engineer MSEB informed respondent 2 that the deposit of Rs. 5 lakhs had been adjusted by MSEB against the dues payable by respondent 2 to MSEB. On receipt of the said communication, respondents 2 to 4 filed complaint against the appellant and other senior officials of MSEB under ss 405 and 409 read with s 34, IPC . Held, the amount of Rs. 5 lakhs was deposited by the complainant company with MSEB and there was nothing in the complaint which may even remotely suggest that the complainant had entrusted any property to the appellant or that the appellant had dominion over the said money of the complainant, which was dishonestly converted by him to his own use, so as to satisfy the ingredients of s 405, IPC . The complaint did not disclose the commission of offence by the appellant under s 405, IPC punishable under s 409, IPC . The complaint against the appellant was quashed on petition under s 482, CrPC .[41]

Where the accused working as postal assistant, a public servant, entrusted with the money of the depositors, made false entries in the pass books of the depositors in his possession, misappropriated the amount of deposit of depositors, he was convicted under ss 409 and 477, IPC .[42]

52. Onus of Proof on Prosecution and Accused--Distinction

The onus lies on the prosecution to prove not only that money was paid to the accused in trust but also that he did not apply it for the purpose, for which it was given,[43] and dishonestly misappropriated, or converted, to his own use, that money.[44] In cases of criminal breach of trust, the prosecution must always prove dishonest misappropriation. It is not enough if it merely establishes that the accused received3552 money.[45] The mere fact of there being a large deficit of salt without distinct proof of a criminal misappropriation is not sufficient to convict the accused under this section,[46] because criminal liability has to be strictly proved, and it cannot be based upon conjectures or probabilities.[47]

The onus of proving all the ingredients of an offence is always upon the prosecution and it never shifts to the accused.[48] Prosecution has to prove them beyond reasonable doubt.[49] Where, however, a fact is specially within the knowledge of the accused, it is he who has to prove it.[50] However, the burden on the accused is not a higher one and it can be discharged even by reason of the fact that the explanation offered by him is reasonable and palpable,[51] the test being whether the defence version is reasonably probable.[52] It is governed by the theory of balance of probabilities. If the explanation of the accused is reasonably probable, then he is entitled to an acquittal even though he does not establish his case beyond reasonable doubt.[53] However, if the court finds that his explanation, regarding the amount in question is false, an inference of misappropriation with dishonest intention can reasonably be drawn against him.[54] If, however, on the material on record, the conclusion is that the accused has failed to establish that he, in fact, paid the amount, entrusted to him, for fish fries and the prosecution has failed to establish that the version of the accused is untrue, the accused is entitled to the benefit of doubt as the onus on the accused is not as heavy as it is on the prosecution.[55] Where, therefore, there is a doubt whether the conduct of the accused was dishonest or merely negligent, the benefit of doubt must go to the accused.[56]

It is not necessary or possible in every case to prove as to in what precise manner the accused had dealt with or appropriated the goods. In a case of criminal breach of trust, the failure to account for the money, proved to have been received by the accused or giving a false account of its use is generally considered to be a strong circumstance against the accused. Although onus lies on the prosecution to prove the charge against the accused, yet where the entrustment is proved or admitted it would be difficult for the prosecution to prove the actual mode and manner of misappropriation and in such a case the prosecution would have to rely largely on the truth or falsity of the explanation given by the accused.[57]3553

53. Repayment of Amount by Accused--Effect

When there is only delay in payment by the accused, criminal liability is not attracted.[58] However, after committing the criminal breach of trust in respect of the money over which the accused had complete dominion, the refund of the amount after detection would not absolve him of the offence.[59] Return of amount misappropriated by public servant would not absolve him of the offence of criminal breach of trust.[60]

54. Entries in Stock Register of Society--Need Corroboration[61]

Entries in books of accounts without any oral evidence as to the nature of the business and mode of keeping accounts are not sufficient to prove entrustment.[62] When the entries in the stock register of the society were produced before the trial court but it was not known as to who made these entries and on which date and under what circumstances, s 34 of the Evidence Act comes into play for the reason that none of the entries has been proved nor any corroboration done by the prosecution. On this evidence the conviction of accused under s 409, IPC, is not proper.[63]

55. Acquittal

Where the accused being incharge of a godown was alleged to have misappropriated fertiliser bags and disposed them dishonestly, and he was not in exclusive charge of the goods which he used to keep at the siding after unloading the same from the railway wagon, and the oral and documentary evidence on record did not show the manner in which verification of stock was made and how it accounted for torn and damaged bags of fertilizer. The evidence also showed that all bags unloaded, except six bags, were transported to godown and for the shortage of six bags recovery had already been made from the transport contractor, under such circumstances the accused was found entitled to be acquitted.[64]

In charge for embezzlement of funds under s 409, IPC and acceptance of illegal gratification under s 13(1)(c) of Prevention of Corruption Act, on comparison the signatures of the accused were found on the receipt issued by him, but the amount mentioned in the receipt did not reconcile with the amount alleged to be embezzled. The charges against the accused were not proved beyond reasonable doubt, the accused was acquitted of the charges.[65]

Allegation was that the accused incharge of seed Centre misappropriated sale deeds of the Centre. Only oral evidence was filed to show that the accused was incharge of seed Centre, no documentary evidence was filed. The prosecution also3554 did not prove stock registers, sale registers, though they had been seized. Acquittal of the accused on charge of s 409, IPC was held proper.[66]

56. Conviction

The accused, a sub-post master, did not deposit the amount collected by him for depositing it with the post office and did not make the relevant entries in the post office record, the non- deposit of amounts was detected in inspection of relevant records and no proper explanation was given by the accused. The conviction of the accused was found proper.[67] Where the accused, who were entrusted with certain amount for purchasing some shares of some companies, failed to deliver the share's scripts, it was held that the accused were guilty of an offence under s 409 .[68] A public servant, misappropriating whole, or part of, money, entrusted to him in the capacity of a public servant, is guilty of the offence of criminal breach of trust.[69] A court amin, collecting a large sum but not paying the same into the court for five months, was held guilty under this section.[70] Where a postman, who was under a duty to return VP parcels to the post master if they were not delivered to the addressees, himself signed the postal receipts and made it appear that they were received by some person for, or on behalf of, the addresses and retained them for himself, it was held that he was guilty of criminal breach of trust.[71] Where the head constable of a police station, entrusted with a sum for the purpose of building some quarters at the police station, obtained materials free of cost and appropriated a part of the amount to himself as the price, he was held to be guilty under this section.[72] A constable, dishonestly misappropriating, to his own use, the pay of his thana police, entrusted to him, was held guilty of criminal breach of trust.[73] In Emperor v Ganga Prasad ,[74] the clerk in a record room made over a document, forming a part of record in his custody, to a person, who though entitled to the documents, had to present an application on stamped paper in order to secure its return in a legal manner. It was held that the clerk was guilty under this section. However, where it was proved that some money was handed over to the money order issued in a post office and he was thus entrusted with the money, but it was not proved that he had misappropriated the sum, the accused was not held guilty.[75] In ReMuthusami Udayanm,[76] a village munsif collected two small amounts, one on 15 March 1937 and another on 17 April 1937, and remitted the amounts, to the treasury, on 21 May 1937, and 24 April 1937, respectively, before any complaint was received. It was held that the retention of the3555 amounts in the interval did not justify a conviction under s 409 . In Chandika Prasad v Emperor ,[77] the accused, who was a head clerk of a government school and had dominion over a sum of money, appropriated money drawn from the bank for payment of a particular bill towards the payment of another bill of the same firm. It was held that this did not amount to embezzlement though it was the violation of the account rules on the subject. Where the money was intact with the brother of the accused and that, on that very day, when the accused was arrested, the entire amount was surrendered to the sub-inspector for the disbursement of salary of the three constables, it was held that it was not safe to uphold the conviction under s 409, IPC .[78]

57. Conviction for falsification of Account and Misappropriation of Fund

Commentary under the same heading in s 477-A, post, may be referred to.

58. Probation

The offence under s 409, IPC is punishable with imprisonment for life or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years and also with fine. In that view of the matter the benefit of probation under s 360, IPC, cannot be made applicable to an accused convicted under s 409, IPC .[79]

59. Sentence

The sentence for an offence under s 409, IPC, is imprisonment for life or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years and also fine. However, the measure of the sentence is usually governed by the nature of offences committed and the circumstances of their commission and it cannot be laid down as a hard and fast rule that a sentence is not to exceed a certain period of imprisonment when the law itself has laid down the extent up to which a sentence can be inflicted for a certain offence, and has left the discretion to the court to adjust the sentence according to the circumstances of each case,[80] though, of course, the imposition of a sentence of imprisonment is made compulsory.[81]

60. Sentence (Deterrent)

The Supreme Court, in Shivanarayan Luxminarayan Joshi v State of Maharashtra ,[82] held that the appellate court while considering the question of sentence, must bear in mind the gravity of the offence also, which has its impact on the public, and particularly the persons who are deprived of their deposits. It should not reduce the sentence on the ground that the accused have practically served out about a year and3556 after a lapse of eight years it would not be desirable to send them back to jail. An offence of criminal breach of trust by a person, in charge of public moneys, is one of a serious nature crime and calls for a severe sentence.[83] Where the accused was a public servant and the offence, committed by him, was a serious one, a sentence of rigorous imprisonment for a term of one year and a fine of Rs 200, and, in default, a rigorous imprisonment for one month more, was held to meet the ends of justice.[84] Similarly, where an accused was sentenced in separate trials for offences of criminal breach of trust regarding various items and the sentences, totaling eleven years, ran consecutively, it was held that the sentence could not be said to be severe.[85] When the secretary of a co-operative society misappropriated large sums of money, and on detection by an audit committee paid the amount, the argument on behalf of the accused that he was the only bread-earner in the family and a lapse of 15 years would be a good ground for a lenient view etc, was found unsustainable.[86] The mere lapse of time cannot ipsofacto entitle the accused to reduction of sentence. Imposition of sentence of two years rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 5000 upon the accused who misappropriated the amount to the tune of Rs 74,000 is not arbitrary, unreasonable, unduly harsh or excessive with the offence involved.[87] Where accused is found guilty and convicted under s 409, IPC for selling the food grains of fair price shop(s) in open market, in such cases no leniency in awarding sentence should be shown.[88]The sentence of imprisonment till rising of the court and a fine of Rs 500 in default of payment of fine and rigorous imprisonment for six months, imposed on the accused convicted under s 408, IPC, for committing breach of trust of 1500 quintals of paddy entrusted to him is inadequate.[89]

61. Sentence (Lenient)

Where the offence was committed 15 years ago by the accused who was now of 60 years of age, and he had deposited the misappropriated amount with interest even before the FIR was filed, only the sentence of fine of Rs 4000 was imposed on the accused.[90] However, where the offence under s 409, IPC, was merely a technical one, a sentence of simple imprisonment till rising of the court and a fine of Rs 500 and, in default, a further sentence of one month rigorous imprisonment was held to be adequate.[91] In State v Mangal Khan ,[92] a constable, using uniform after dismissal from service, was sentenced to simple imprisonment till the rising of the court. Where a high public official, who was liable to be dismissed from his office, was convicted, it was held that a sentence of one day's rigorous imprisonment and fine of3557 ten thousand rupees would meet the ends of justice.[1] Where the offence was committed sixteen years ago in 1963 and the amount misappropriated by the appellant was only a sum of Rs 120, it was held that ends of justice would be met by reducing the sentence of three months rigorous imprisonment to the period of one month's imprisonment, already undergone by the appellant.[2] The sentence of eighteen months for a senior member of the Bar, aged sixty, convicted under this section, was reduced to nine months in NN Burjorjee v Emperor. [3] In Ganeshbhai Shankarbhai v State of Gujarat ,[4] the accused, who, after his acquittal, secured another employment, was convicted by the High Court in an appeal against acquittal. The Supreme Court reduced the sentence to that already undergone. A sentence of five years for an accused, charged in respect of property of a value of less than one hundred rupees, after a protracted trial for more than six years, was reduced to one year in Velayudhan Nair v State .[5] The incident took place about 15 years ago and the accused faced the agony of the trial before the trial court as well as the appeal inquiry before the High Court, the sentence of imprisonment under s 409, IPC, was reduced from two years rigorous imprisonment to 1½ years, i.e., 18 months.[6] The accused convicted on the allegation that he misappropriated a sum of Rs 13,400 from the bank having remitted the entire amount misappropriated to the bank, the sentence of rigorous imprisonment for one year awarded to the accused was therefore reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone by the accused.[7] The Gram Sachiv for gram panchayats in Haryana was convicted under s 409, IPC, for collecting amount towards house tax and committing breach of trust and was sentenced to 6 months rigorous imprisonment and fine. He had already undergone custody for 4½ months rigorous imprisonment. The Apex Court reduced the sentence of imprisonment to the period already undergone.[8] The accused Manager and Assistant Manager of a Co-operative society had misappropriated amount by forging documents. The High Court had sentenced the accused to one year S.I. and a fine of Rs.10,000/-. As per direction of the Court the appellants deposited the entire embezzled amount, were now aged 74 years, also not keeping good health, the sentences imposed were reduced to the period already undergone.[9]The trial court sentenced the accused to undergo six years rigorous imprisonment with fine of Rs 2500. The offence was committed 20 years ago so the sentence of imprisonment reduced to the period of custody already undergone by the accused, but the fine was enhanced to Rs 10,000 in default of which the accused was to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months.[10] The accused aged 50 years lost his employment so he engaged himself privately for a part-time job to earn income for his family, so the sentence of imprisonment was3558 reduced from two years rigorous imprisonment to six months rigorous imprisonment.[11]

62. Sentence--Fine of three Times of Amount involved achieve three-fold Objective

Traditionally, a conviction under s 409, IPC, would invariably attract a jail sentence of varying duration according to the amount involved; the inevitable result being that the accused spends a period of time in jail at state expense, the benefit by virtue of retention of the property, and the complainant or the aggrieved institution is the worst effected having to write off the loss that has occurred. In our considered view, a court must aim at offsetting these factors while in no certain terms conveying the message that crime does not pay by ensuring that there is no unjust enrichment occurring to the accused and that the party is made to part with much more than what has been taken away. In property offences and where misappropriation of money is involved, an accused would cheerfully sit in jail at state expense and then come out and benefit from the unjust enrichment and it is this aspect that the courts need to take cognizance of. While it is unfair and unnecessary to burden the state by maintaining the accused in a jail for years together and increasing the number of unemployed thereafter. It appears far more rational to us that the threefold objective would be achieved by imposing a fine on accused of at least three times the amount involved in the offence and by not prescribing the default sentence because again, experience has shown that many an accused would find it more profitable to stay in jail for some time rather pay up a heavy fine. Similarly, by following such a procedure the aggrieved party or the institution can be adequately compensated. Undoubtedly, this formula is a departure from the prevalent procedure but one which is most essential in the present context.[12]

63. Concurrent Sentence in Several Cases

Sentence in a number of cases against the same accused with respect to acts committed at different places and at different times may be ordered to run concurrently, and not consecutively, as the cumulative effect would be too severe.[13]

64. 'And shall also be Liable to Fine'

The expression does not mean that a sentence of fine must be imposed in every case of conviction under this section; it only means that there is a liability to be fined. Such an expression has been used in the IPC only in connection with those offences where the legislature has provided that a sentence of imprisonment is compulsory. In regard to such offences, the legislature has left a discretion for the courts to impose also a sentence of fine in appropriate cases in addition to the imposition of a sentence of imprisonment which alone is obligatory.[14]3559

65. Alteration of Conviction When not Done--Cases

The conviction of the accused for an offence under s 409 and in the alternative under s 427, IPC, is bad, in as much as mischief is not a minor form of criminal breach of trust.[15] Where an accused was charged with an offence under s 409, IPC, but the facts indicated that the offence committed was of cheating, it was held that the conviction could not be altered to one under s 420, which is not an offence minor to the offence under s 409, IPC .[16]

66. Alteration of Conviction from Section 409 to Section 403

The offence under s 403, IPC, is a minor offence compared with the one under s 409, IPC .[17] Therefore, when the offence under s 409 is not proved but that under s 403 is established, the conviction of the accused under s 409 recorded by the trial court can be altered to one under s 403, IPC, by the appellate court, even though no charge under s 403 is framed against the accused.

Where joint family firm of two brothers, one of whom was the accused, was appointed as a government stockist of food grains and the stock was found short by a certain quantity, it was held that the accused was guilty under s 403 and not under s 409, IPC .[18]

67. Alteration of Conviction from Section 409 to Section 420

In the case of Sunil Kumar Paul v State of West Bengal ,[19] the chargesheet framed against the accused was only under s 409, but the appellate court had found the accused guilty of the offence punishable under s 420 instead of s 409, IPC, and convicted the accused under that section and the said decision has been approved by the Apex Court by observing as under:

> Where a public servant was charged and tried by the Special Court for an offence under section 409 , IPC, but a charge under section 420,IPC, could have been framed by the Special court under section 236 , CrPC on the basis of the allegations in the charge-sheet, the trial court or the appellate court can, in law, convict the accused of that offence instead of an offence under section 409 , IPC, if it be of the view that the offence of cheating had been established. This would be in accordance with the provisions of section 237 , CrPC .[20]

68. Alteration of Conviction from Section 409 to Section 406

The accused, a president of a co-operative society was proved to have dishonestly retained the money belonging to the society, was not found to be a public servant, so his conviction under s 409, IPC, was altered to one under s 406, IPC .[21]3560

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF THE RECEIVING OF STOLEN PROPERTY

S. 410.

Stolen property.--

Property, the possession whereof has been transferred by theft, or by extortion, or by robbery, and property which has been criminally misappropriated or in respect of which criminal breach of trust has been committed, is designated as "stolen property", whether the transfer has been made, or the misappropriation or breach of trust has been committed, within or without India. But, if such property subsequently comes into the possession of a person legally entitled to the possession thereof, it then ceases to be stolen property.

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines 'stolen property' by saying that the property:

(a) the possession whereof has been transferred by theft, or by extortion, or by robbery, or
(b) which has been criminally misappropriated, or in respect of which criminal breach of trust has been committed, is 'stolen property'.[22]

Where the transfer has been made, or the misappropriation or the breach of trust has been committed, in India, or without India, it ceases to be such stolen property if it subsequently comes into the possession of the person legally entitled to it.[23]

Property, which has been abandoned, would not be 'stolen property' within the meaning of this section, and the person in possession of it cannot be prosecuted under s 411 .[24] Likewise, the proceeds of stolen property do not constitute stolen property if their possession was not transferred by the theft, etc, in question and they have not been the subject-matter of an offence. Thus, the property would not continue to be stolen property if the form, in which it is received, has undergone a change. Consequently, money obtained upon forged money orders, is not stolen property.[25] Likewise, money received as a result of selling stolen property, would not be stolen property.[26] Similarly, property, into or for which stolen property has been converted or exchanged, is not stolen property.[27] On the other hand, the mere change of form of the property would not necessarily mean that the property is not stolen property. Mutton, obtained by killing sheep, which was stolen alive, would be stolen property.[28] Similarly, an ingot of gold or silver, obtained by melting gold or silver3561articles, which were stolen, does not cease to be stolen property.[29] Where, therefore, a servant, who was entrusted with a currency note of one thousand rupees, changed it into notes of smaller denominations and lost the exchanged notes at gambling to other accused, it was held that the accused were rightly convicted of an offence under s 411, IPC .[30]

2. 'Property'

Commentary under the relevant headings in s 378, ante, may be referred to.

Commentary under the same heading in s 405, ante, also may be referred to.

3. 'Whether the Transfer has been made, or the Misappropriation or Breach of Trust has been Committed, within India or without India'

This clause was inserted in 1882. Till then, the view was expressed in some early cases that if a theft or the offence of criminal breach of trust, or of criminal misappropriation, was committed outside India, the receiving of that property would not be covered by s 411, as it would not be stolen property within the meaning of this section, and the court in India would have no jurisdiction.[31] a contrary view was, however, taken in some cases that although the charge of theft or robbery, etc, by which the property was removed, could not be tried in India, the offence under s 411 could be tried here. Thus, where a Nepali subject, who had stolen cattle in Nepal, brought them into Indian territory, it was held that he could not only be tried for theft per se but could also be convicted of dishonestly retaining the stolen property.[32] It was to make the position clear that the above clause was added in 1882. After addition of the above clause, a person can be tried for retention of stolen property in India even if the offence of theft might have been committed outside India.[33]

4. When does Property Cease to be Stolen Property

Stolen property must be stolen property at the time of receipt. It ceases to be stolen property if, after the theft, it comes into possession of the person entitled to it. In that case, it loses its character as stolen property, and if it then passes into the hands of another person without being again stolen, the person who receives it would not be guilty under s 411, IPC, although, in such a case, he may be guilty of obtaining the property again through some other criminal offence like theft, extortion, etc.

The person, into whose lawful possession the stolen property subsequently passes, need not necessarily be the person from whom it was stolen.

Comments

1. Scope

The preceding section explains as to what 'stolen property' is. This section prescribes punishment for a person who dishonestly receives, or dishonestly retains, any stolen property, knowing, or having reason to believe, the same to be stolen property. To constitute an offence under this section:

(a) the stolen property must be found in possession of the accused;
(b) some person, other than the accused, must possess that property before the accused got possession of the same; and
(c) the accused must dishonestly receive it, or must dishonestly retain it, knowing, or having reason to believe, that the said property is stolen property.[34]

However, the mere demand of gratification by the accused to help the complainant to recover his buffaloes does not render him liable under this section.[35]

2. Relative Scope of Section 411 and Section 413

Commentary under the same heading in s 413, post, may be referred to.

3. Section 411 Distinguished from Section 412

Sections 411 and 412, IPC, overlap in the sense that they punish the person who receives, or retains, a property, knowing, or having reason to believe, it to be stolen. Section 412 is, however, an aggravated form of s 411 because it punishes a receiver or retainer of stolen property who has come in possession thereof through a dacoity or knowing that it was the subject of a dacoity, whereas, s 411 punishes a person who has come in possession of the property through a thief or knowing that it was the subject of a theft. Dacoity is an aggravated form of theft.[36] In s 412, the prosecution has to prove that the accused knew that the article in question were stolen in dacoity. It is an essential ingredient of s 412, as compared to the ingredient of s 411, IPC .[37]

4. Section 411 Distinguished from Section 124, Bombay Police Act (22 of 1951)

An offence under s 124, Bombay Police Act 1951 (22 of 1951), is an offence of a minor character, while an offence contemplated by s 411, IPC, is an offence of a serious nature. The facts which are required to be proved under s 124, are not the same which are required to be proved under s 411, IPC . There is no section under the Bombay Police Act giving the police discretion either to charge under s 124, Bombay Police Act or s 411, IPC . If an offence falls within s 411, IPC, the police would not charge the accused under s 124, Bombay Police Act.[38]3564

5. 'Dishonestly'

Where a person is accused of an offence under this section, he cannot, where the circumstances do not raise a presumption that he received the property, knowing the same to be stolen, be convicted of the offence merely because he is found to be in possession of the stolen property and does not account for his possession. The prosecution must prove that the property was stolen and the accused dishonestly received it, or, having received it honestly, dishonestly retained it. In either case, the accused must receive it from another person.[39] The finding of the court must be that the accused has either dishonestly received, or has dishonestly retained the stolen property.[40] Similarly, a conviction under this section is possible only if the court comes to the conclusion that the accused either received, or retained the stolen property with dishonest intention.[41] Where stolen property is found with a person, who admits its receipt, it may be fairly presumed that the receipt was a dishonest one unless the receiver's conduct is satisfactorily explained.[42] Usually, the possession of stolen property is a sufficient fact upon which the court can draw the inference of dishonest intention.[43]

6. 'Receives or Retains'

In the term 'retention', dishonesty supervenes after the act of possession, while in the case of 'reception' dishonesty is contemporaneous with the act of acquisition.[44] The offence of dishonest retention of stolen property is, therefore, complete without any guilty knowledge at the time of receipt.[45] If a person has honestly come into possession of stolen property and then retains it after discovering that it was stolen property, he would be guilty under this section.[46] However, the prosecutor need not prove that the property was dishonestly received as distinct from dishonestly retained; it is enough to prove the facts which justify the inference that the accused either dishonestly received the property or, having received it honestly, dishonestly retained it.[47] A man who dishonestly receives property and then retains it, must obviously continue dishonestly to retain it. It would be different, however if the reception of property is innocent. Then it would be for the prosecution to show at what stage the guilty knowledge of the receiver supervened to make the retention dishonest.[48]

7. 'Stolen Property'

Commentary of s 410, ante, may be referred to.

The expression 'stolen property' covers property obtained by theft, robbery, extortion, criminal misappropriation and criminal breach of trust.[49]3565

8. 'Knowing or having Reason to Believe'

Mere possession of stolen property by the accused is not sufficient for a conviction under this section unless the court records a finding to the effect that the accused possessed the stolen article dishonestly, knowing, or having reason to believe, that they were stolen articles.[50]

The word 'knowledge' means a 'mental cognition' and not necessarily a 'visual perception'. It implies a notice to the receiver of such facts as could not but have led him to believe that the property was stolen and could not but have been dishonestly obtained.[51] The word 'believes' is much stronger than the word 'suspect' and involves the necessity of showing that the circumstances were such that a reasonable man must have felt convicted in his mind that the property with which he was dealing was stolen property.[52] It lies on the prosecution to prove the presence of certain facts from which the accused can be said to have drawn the inevitable conclusion that the property was stolen property. It may be sufficient to show that the circumstances were such as to make him believe that the property was stolen.[53] Mere suspicion is, however, not enough.[54] It is not also sufficient to show that the accused was careless, or that he had reason to suspect that the property was stolen, or that he did not make sufficient inquiry to ascertain whether it had been honestly acquired.[55] a person who has purchased stolen property openly in the presence of others, cannot be said to have purchased it knowing it to be stolen or having reason to believe that it is stolen.[56] Where two persons, going in a rickshaw, were found with stolen property and one of them implicated the other in a confession, it was held that the presence of such accused with some stolen goods with the other accused was highly suspicious, but was not incompatible with his innocence.[57] Where a person in possession of an animal sold it, the mere fact of his denial of possession will not be sufficient.[58] Where the only evidence against the accused was that he was with his co-accused before and after the theft, it can hardly warrant his conviction under s 411, IPC .[59]

Likewise, where the only evidence against the accused was that he had taken some stolen oxen to his well and put up there for the night, and that he subsequently promised to have the oxen restored to the complainant, it was held that this was not sufficient for a conviction under this section.[60]3566

The ten accused persons were labourers, had committed dacoity and had collected silver chips and cash etc. Accused 8 presented four silver chips (weighing 1 kg. each) to the appellant, a jeweler for sale. Held, for an agricultural labourer, to present four silver chips, weighing 1 kg. each at the shop of a jeweler, would clearly result in a grave suspicion that the same did not belong to him. For a labourer, it would be unthinkable to own 4 kg. of silver. As such when the appellant, a jeweler, received 4 kg. of silver from an agricultural labourer, it was obvious to him (the appellant), to infer that the same did not belong to accused 8, the appellant had sufficient cause to entertain a reasonable belief that the same was stolen property. As there was no reason for the appellant to infer that the silver chips were obtained during commission of dacoity, the appellant was convicted under s 411, IPC and not under s 412, IPC .[61]

9. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, compoundable, by the owner of the property stolen, with the permission of the court before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, and triable by a magistrate, and may be tried summarily where the value of the property does not exceed two hundred rupees.

10. Jurisdiction

A charge of receiving stolen property may be inquired into, or tried by a court within whose local jurisdiction the offence was committed or the stolen property was possessed by any person who received, or retained, it, knowing, or having reason to believe, it to be stolen property.[62] Where property was found to have been stolen at Patna and the offence of receiving stolen property was committed at Calcutta, it was held that the Patna court had jurisdiction in respect of the case under s 411 .[63] Where, however, a person was not prosecuted for thefts committed in British India, and property was found in his possession outside British India, it was held that he could not be tried in British India under s 411 .[64] Where property in respect of which criminal breach of trust was said to have been committed, was handed over by the complainant at Imphal but the offences under ss 407 and 411, IPC, were committed at Gauhati, it was held that the court at Imphal had no jurisdiction to try the case under s 411, IPC .[65] Where property was stolen in a running train and was recovered at three place outside the jurisdiction of the court and it was not established at which place the theft was actually committed, it was held that the magistrate had no jurisdiction to try the offence.[66]

11. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of the magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> 3567That on or about the...day of...at...you dishonestly received (or retained) stolen property... (specify the property), belonging to AB, knowing (or having reason to believe) that the said property was stolen property, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 411 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

The charge should set forth that the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that the property, which he received, or retained, was stolen property,[67] but an omission to mention this fact will not vitiate the trial.[68] The charge should also state that the articles found in possession of the accused were the property of a certain person.[69]

When a distinction in the locality is made in bangles and churies and the recovery memo describes the article as bangles but in the charge they are described as churies, the conviction of the accused cannot be sustained.[70]

As both receiving and retaining constitute one offence, the accused is not entitled to claim the nature of his offence specified and it is sufficient if he is charged for receiving or retaining and evidence is adduced to prove the guilty knowledge at some period antecedent to its recovery by the police. Similarly, no material prejudice can be said to have been caused by the omission to mention that the accused persons dishonestly received the incriminating stolen articles.[71]

12. Effect of Non-framing of Charge

When no charge was framed against the accused under s 411 of the IPC or any section relating to dishonest misappropriation or receiving of stolen property, his conviction under s 411, IPC is illegal and unsustainable.[72]

13. Proof

In order to secure conviction under this section, the prosecution must prove,[73] that:

(a) the property in question was the 'stolen property' within the meaning of the preceding s 401, IPC ;
(b) the accused received, or retained, the said stolen property, knowing, or having reason to believe, the same to be stolen property;
(c) before the accused received the said stolen property, it was in possession of somebody else; and
(d) the accused received, or retained, the said stolen property dishonestly.3568

14. Property Recovered must be Stolen Property

The prosecution must prove, first of all, as a fact that the property in question was the stolen property. It must prove that it was the very property,[74] and not the similar property, which was stolen from a certain person. Where the evidence produced on behalf of the prosecution was to the effect that the articles recovered were similar to those that were stolen and no identification proceedings in respect of them were conducted before a magistrate, it was held that it was not possible to hold that the articles recovered were the very articles that were said to have been stolen and the accused were entitled to benefit of the doubt and acquittal.[75] The mere fact that some cereals found in the house of the accused, corresponded with the alleged stolen cereals, would not be sufficient to establish the identity of the stolen cereals.[76] Likewise, the mere fact that certain medicinal ampoules, marked with government hospital identity marks, were found in a chemist shop, is not sufficient to convict the owner of the shop under s 380 or s 411, IPC . There must be evidence that the ampoules of the particular description were found missing or remained unaccounted for in the hospital stores.[77] If the prosecution does not discharge, by satisfactory evidence, its burden of proving that the article alleged to have been sold by the accused was stolen property, the other question, whether the accused knowingly sold it, would not arise.[78] a person receiving property, which is not stolen property within the meaning of the preceding s 410, would not be guilty of an offence under s 411, IPC, although he erroneously believed it to be stolen when he received it.[79] Unless the alleged stolen property is clearly shown to have been of the complainant's and to have formed part of what has been stolen, a conviction under this section is not sustainable.[80]

In the absence of sufficient evidence of theft, an accused cannot be convicted under s 411 .[81] There can be no offence of dishonestly receiving stolen property unless the property, which is alleged to be the subject of such receiving, answers the description of 'stolen property' under s 410, IPC . Only such property, possession whereof has been transferred by theft or extortion or criminal misappropriation or other offences allied to them, as mentioned in s 410, falls within the definition of 'stolen property.'[82] However, once the property is proved to be stolen property, it would not be necessary for the prosecution to prove from where the accused received the stolen property or the time when he did receive that.[83] There must be a finding of fact that the property in possession of the accused is stolen property.[84] Where the accused was charged for having received rubber, the produce of the government forests, but it was3569 not proved that the rubber came from the government forests or that it was the stolen property, it was held that the conviction under s 411 was not maintainable.[85] a person cannot be convicted of an offence under s 411, IPC, merely on showing that he was in possession of certain property and failed to account for its possession. The prosecution must prove that the property was stolen and that the accused received or retained it dishonestly.[86] The mere fact that some fish-plates were found in possession of the accused, would not be sufficient if it is not proved that they were stolen property.[87] Where articles are such as any cloth merchant might stock and sell, the accused cannot be convicted unless it is established, beyond all possible doubt, that the bundles, containing the cloth, were stolen from his shop.[88] Where goods, dispatched by railway, were found missing and large quantities of shawls, mufflers, bed sheets, etc, were recovered, within a few days, at the instance of the accused and there was no adequate explanation for the presence of such large quantities of articles with silk and paper labels of the consignor on most of the shawls and mufflers and certain manuscript writings, on the labels of the bed-sheets, written by someone, connected with the consignor, it was held that the circumstances were sufficient to justify the finding that the property was stolen property.[89] However, it is impossible to identify sweets and, therefore, conviction, under s 411, IPC, in respect of stolen sweets cannot be maintained.[90] Similarly, currency notes are unidentifiable properties and if there is no evidence that they had any mark of identification, the conviction on the mere production of currency notes cannot be sustained.[91] Where the property, alleged to be stolen, is of an ordinary make (like an arsi or toe ring), the uncorroborated evidence of the complainant as to its identification is not sufficient. Identification of ordinary articles, which are commonly possessed by other people, is not of much value.[92] It is the duty of the prosecution to establish that the goods recovered from the possession of the accused belong to somebody else.[93] Conviction cannot be based on evidence of recovery alone if the recoveries are not, in any way, sufficient to connect the accused with the crime.[94] If stolen property is recovered not from the house of the accused but from the house of another person (a woman), and the memorandum of seizure is honestly and faithfully prepared to record the fact as to from whom the seizure was made, it is incumbent on the prosecution to establish the connection of the accused with the other person (the woman) so as to fasten the seizure on the accused.[95]3570

Where the accused No. 3, a broker, had received Rs. 32 lacs as stolen property from the Canara Bank by cheating, he was convicted under s 411, IPC .[1]

15. Knowledge of the Accused that he Received Stolen Property

It must be proved that the accused had knowledge, or reason to believe, that the article, which he received, or retained, was a stolen article.[2] Even if stolen property is shown to have been directly brought into shop of the accused from the place of theft, the prosecution has still to prove that in respect of the property recovered from his possession, the accused had reason to believe that it was stolen property. The mere fact that the partner of the accused paid the cartman who brought the goods is not sufficient; nor the presence of the accused in the shop proves his complicity in the crime.[3] The onus is on the prosecution to prove beyond doubt the guilt of the accused. The onus never changes.[4] Recovery of articles from the tunes of an old house accessible to all and sundry, will not conclusively establish the fact of recovery from the possession of the accused.[5]

16. Possession of Property by Someone else before Accused Received it

In case the recovery is recent, then it is not necessary to prove that some person other than the accused had possession of the property before the accused got possession of it. If, however, the recovery is not recent, then it is necessary to prove that some person, other than the accused, had possession of the property before the accused got possession of it.[6]

17. Accused not Required to prove that he Received or Retained the Property Honestly

It is for the prosecution to prove that the accused received, or retained, the stolen property dishonestly, and the onus is not on the accused to show that he received, or retained, it honestly.[7] It is not upon the accused to prove how he came to possess the property which is said to be stolen property.[8]The prosecution must establish its case that there were different acts of receiving and the burden is not on the accused to establish that there was only one act of receiving when he was found with the property forming the subject matter of different thefts.[9] In cases in which the accused cannot be called upon to offer an explanation, his failure to account for the possession does not relive the prosecution of the burden of proving that his3571 possession was dishonest.[10] The presumption of guilty knowledge of an accused cannot be made against an accused from an exculpatory statement made by a co-accused against him.[11]

18. Presumption under Illustration (A) to Section 114 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872

Illustration (a) to s 114 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, shows that where the accused is found to be in possession of stolen property, a presumption may be made either of his being a thief or having received the property knowing it to be stolen. Which of the presumption should be drawn in any particular case, whether of theft or of receipt of stolen property, would depend on the circumstances, the length of time that has elapsed after the theft, how much stolen property is found in the possession of the person in question, the circumstances which lead to the discovery and other facts connected with the discovery of the property.[12] For instance, if a person is found near about the place of commission of theft immediately before or after the commission of the crime and is subsequently found to be in possession of the stolen property which he fails to give any satisfactory explanation, the presumption may be drawn that he is a thief. However, if the only evidence against him is his recent possession of stolen property, the better presumption would be that he was a receiver of the stolen property.[13] If a person is found in possession of stolen property two months after the theft and gives no account of how he came into possession of it, but denies his possession, he should be convicted under s 411, and not s 379 .[14] Where, soon after commission of a theft, a person is found in possession of stolen property, the position that ordinarily arises is not that he has received it knowing it to be stolen, but that he has stolen. The inference that he is a receiver ought not to be drawn unless there is some circumstances to show that he had not obtained it direct from the owner or the person in possession, but from some other person who was himself the actual thief.[15] Where the prosecution failed to establish that some articles, proved to be stolen property, found in the possession of the accused, were received at different times and from different persons or from the same person at different times, and there was room for doubt that they may have been received at one and at the same time, it was held that the accused was receiver of stolen property knowing it to be stolen.[16]

Where an accused does not explain his possession of stolen properties, presumption would be drawn that he is either a receiver of stolen property or a thief.[17]3572

19. Proof of Necessary Facts to Attract Presumption Under Illustration (A) to Section 114, Evidence Act

In order that a presumption under illust (a) to s 114 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, may be drawn, the prosecution should establish that:

(a) the article recovered was a stolen property,
(b) the accused had the exclusive possession of the said stolen property,
(c) the said possession of the accused was a recent one, and
(d) there was forthcoming no proper explanation from the accused when he was called upon to account for it.

Unless the prosecution proves that the articles recovered from the premises of the accused are stolen properties, no presumption under illusts' (a) to s 114 of the Evidence Act 1872, would arise.[18] Illustration (a) to s 114 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, comes into play only if it is proved that the accused was in possession of the stolen property soon after the theft. The court may, in such a case, presume that he received it with the knowledge that it was stolen property.[19]Before a presumption under illust (a) to s 114 of the said Act is drawn, there must be proof on record that the articles found in possession of the accused had been stolen. In the absence of such proof, no presumption, as aforesaid, can be drawn from the mere recovery of certain ornaments from the possession of the accused.[20] It is the duty of the prosecution to establish that the goods recovered from the possession of the accused belong to somebody else. Unless and until such goods are produced in court and their identity is established by cogent evidence produced by the prosecution, the accused cannot be said to be in possession of the stolen property.[21] If articles recovered from the possession of an accused are identical with those mentioned in the list of stolen properties given by the complainant, it cannot be doubted that he was in possession of such stolen property and he would be guilty under s 411, IPC .[22] In Re Dakshinamoorthy[23] the owner of the cycle had identified the dynamo light as his own and spoke of the initials found on the dynamo light. In view of the undoubted ownership of the dynamo light by the owner of the cycle, the legal presumption under illust (a) to s 114 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, was drawn. However, when the identity of stolen property has been established, it is difficult to see how the accused can be convicted of the offence of receiving stolen property.[24]

20. Accused to be in Exclusive Possession to Attract Presumption under Section 114, Evidence Act [Illustration (A)]

As stated above, the second element to attract the applicability of illust (a) to s 114 aforesaid is that the accused must be found to be in the exclusive possession of the stolen property. If it is not so, the presumption under the above illustration cannot be drawn. Where the house from which the alleged recovery was made, had been in possession of other members, including the father of the accused, the accused was3573 held not to be in exclusive possession of the recovered property.[25] Similarly, when there is nothing to show as to which out of the three accused was in actual physical possession of the stolen property at the time of recovery, none of them can be convicted under this section.[26] When the recovery of a looted gun from the tenanted room of the accused was found doubtful, the accused was found entitled to be acquitted.[27] Where, however, the property was recovered at the instance of the accused only six days after the commission of the robbery from an uninhabited place which was covered with shrubs and bushes, the presumption against the accused was drawn.[28] Where the police recovered stolen property from a house at the instance of the accused, the fact that the house was not of the accused but was that of his brother-in-law would not absolve him.[29] However, when the recovery of stolen article from the accused is doubtful, the accused is not liable to be convicted.[30]

21. Time Gap Between Date of Offence and Recovery of Stolen Property--Effect

The presumption under illust (a) to s 114 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, cannot arise unless the accused is in possession of the the goods soon after the theft. If several months have passed or if the accused is able to give a reasonable explanation, the presumption will not arise.[31]The length of time, though not the factor on which the presumption depends, is a matter of considerable importance and has frequently affected the making of, or refusing to make, a presumption. No hard and fast rule can, however, be laid down that after the expiry of any particular period, no presumption under illust (a) to s 114 of the Evidence Act 1872, can be drawn.[32] The question of recent possession of a stolen article depends not only on the lapse of time but also upon the nature of the property and the concomitant circumstances of each particular case.[33] The question as to what amounts to recent possession sufficient to justify a presumption in any particular case, varies according as the stolen article is, or is not calculated to ready possession from hand to hand. The importance to be attached to possession, as giving to possession, as giving rise to the presumption of guilt, must vary with the circumstances of each individual case. The strength and nature of presumption varies according to the seriousness of the offence and the nature of the property involved.[34] Thus, where valuable gold and silver jewellery of distinctive workmanship was found in possession of the accused buried under the earth, the efflux of eight months' time was not found to be sufficient to take the case out of the ambit of the illustration.[35] The recovery of jewels three weeks after the3574 dacoity and identified by the owners would, in the absence of, an explanation by the accused, be sufficient for conviction under s 411 .[36] Two and a half months after a dacoity is not a long time and where two articles, a lota (engraved with the name of the victim of dacoity) and a shirt/were recovered from the possession of the accused, the presumption against the accused was drawn.[37] Where a revolver was stolen in October and was recovered from the possession of the accused the following May, it was held that it was not possible to say that the distance of time between October and May is so short that a presumption under illust (a) to s 114 of the Evidence Act, must necessarily arise; but if the accused is not able to account for the possession of article which is not easily obtained in the market without extra caution, such a presumption can arise.[38] Where it was proved from the evidence that the accused was in possession of the article, shortly after they were stolen but they were recovered from him more than four years after the theft and conflicting explanations were given by the accused, it was held that the accused must have known fully well that the article were stolen and was, therefore, rightly convicted under s 411 .[39] Where a loose diamond and a diamond ring, lost about two years ago, were found in possession of the accused and he gave a false explanation regarding their possession, the accused was held guilty under s 411, IPC .[40] Where the accused was found, soon after the theft, in possession of not only one or two articles but a very large number of stolen articles, it was held that he was himself the thief, and not the receiver of stolen articles.[41]Where the accused were found in possession of the goods within two days of the theft and they had not been able to furnish any explanation for their possession, illust (a) to s 114 of the Evidence Act was held applicable.[42] Such a presumption was drawn even when the recovery was made after eight months of the occurrence in Alisher v State of Uttar Pradesh .[43] Where, however, the accused, who were engaged in collecting arms and explosive substances, were found in possession of a stolen revolver and the theft of the revolver was not at all recent, it was held that the mere fact of possession was not sufficient for a conviction under s 411, IPC .[44] Recovery of watches after a period of four months from the time of the alleged theft was found to be insufficient for drawing a presumption under illust (a) to s 114 of the Indian Evidence Act in Ravindran v State . [45]

22. No Proper Explanation of Possession of Stolen Property by Accused--Effect--Section 114, Illustration (A), Evidence Act[46]

When the accused was found in the possession of stolen property after 3 days of incident, he is liable to be convicted under s 411 .[47] Where the accused did not give3575 any explanation whatsoever for the established fact that he was in possession of the stolen cycle within a short period of its thefts, the presumption under illust (a) to s 114 of the Evidence Act was drawn.[48] If there is no direct evidence to connect the accused with the murder of the deceased and the articles of the deceased are recovered from the possession of the accused without any explanation from the accused for their possession, he can be held guilty for an offence under s 411, IPC .[49] Where the gun, belonging to another person, was recovered from the possession of the accused and he gave no explanation for its possession, he was held to have been rightly convicted under s 411, IPC .[50] Where the prosecution evidence is that the witnesses, who had gone in search of the stolen bullocks, along with the complainant, saw the accused, at a distance of six miles from the residence of the complainant, driving the said bullocks, the accused can be convicted under this section, though not under s 457 .[51]Where the accused has raised the defence that the article was pledged with him, the Supreme Court held that pawn brokers are ordinarily and in normal course expected to maintain some books of account or some documents which would contain the particulars of the transactions, relating to the pledge, and if there is no indication or suggestion by the accused that he was maintaining any such books of account or documents, the court would be justified in holding that the explanation given by the accused could not reasonably be true, and, therefore, a presumption could immediately be drawn in accordance with illust (a) to s 114 of the Evidence Act .[52] The explanation of possession given by the accused whether true or not, must be so reasonably convincing as to throw a doubt on his guilt. A mere denial of the prosecution story, or any assertion inconsistent with facts proved by the prosecution, cannot amount to an explanation to make the presumption unavailable to the prosecution under illust (a) to s 114 of the Evidence Act .[53] Where property, sufficiently identified to be the property of one person, is found in possession of another person without leave or licence or any legal permission of the owner, it is for the party in whose possession it is found, to duly account for the possession; and unless he can do so, a court may fairly infer, in such circumstances, that it was with guilty knowledge that the accused took that which he knew not to be his own.[54] Where the stolen property is found with a person who admits having received it, it may be fairly presumed that the receipt was a dishonest one unless the receiver's conduct is satisfactorily explained.[55] Where a currency note was given to a person for being kept in his custody to be deposited in the treasury, and later on, the note was recovered from the outer courtyard of the accused, it was held it was for the accused to prove that the note belonged to him and that he took the possession over the note honestly.[56] It would not be sufficient for the accused to give an account, so shadowy in character as to require no rebuttal.[57] Where the accused, from whom stolen3576 property was recovered, and was not been able to give an account for his possession but gave three explanations at three different stages, the presumption was made against him.[58] Where the nature of the property or the circumstances indicate that possession is not in the natural course of things but is incriminatory, the fact that a false explanation for possession is given by the accused, renders the prosecution case stronger.[59]

In a case where the court is to convict a person for his failure to offer an explanation for the possession of the goods, it is incumbent upon it to ask the accused to give his explanation and when the accused fails to offer a reasonable explanation, only then it should draw any presumption. The answer may be furnished by the accused on his own accord; and if he does not do so, the trying magistrate has to ask him under the provisions of s 313, CrPC 1973, to explain the circumstances appearing in evidence against him.[60] If an accused puts forward a reasonable explanation, the court must decide whether the story is reasonably enough to have put the prosecution upon enquiry. If it is reasonably enough to have put the prosecution upon enquiry, and is not proved false, accused must be acquitted.[61] Where the accused is not asked to offer an explanation, his conviction cannot be maintained.[62] The accused can, however, be called upon to offer an explanation only when there is a prima facie case against him. When there is no evidence at all as to his knowledge, the accused must be acquitted upon the evidence of prosecution without calling upon him to enter upon his defence.[63] In such cases, the fact that the accused, when asked to explain his possession, gives an explanation which may be held to be satisfactory, would not be a sufficient ground for his conviction.[64] Before any explanation can be expected from the accused, the prosecution must establish that the property was stolen property,[65] and that he was in possession of the stolen property.[66] Where the accused was deaf and dumb, it was held that no presumption could be drawn against him because the accused's infirmity prevented him from putting forward any explanation that he might have to offer as no one could communicate with him.[67]

23. 'Can Account for its Possession'

The word 'can account for its possession' does not mean that the accused must prove positively that he received the property in the manner indicated by him. If the explanation given is not inherently improbable or palpably false, and the court trying the case finds it to be reasonably true, the adverse presumption shall be deemed to have been rebutted. The meaning of the word 'reasonably true' appears to be that the explanation must be sufficient to cast a doubt on the guilt of the accused, and in that3577 case, the benefit of doubt shall go to him.[68] It is not necessary for the accused to prove affirmatively that he received the goods innocently. It is sufficient if he has given an explanation which might raise a doubt in the mind of the court as to his guilt.[69] Where the accused was found wearing a sweater stolen from a student, it was held that the presumption, arising against him, was sufficiently rebutted by the accused by giving, as his explanation, that he got possession of it by purchase from another person which fact was found to be correct.[70] If serious doubts are created in the mind of the court, the presumption would be rebutted.[71] If the explanation which the accused gives may possibly be true, the onus is still on the prosecution to prove the guilt of the accused.[72]

24. Presumption of Robbery

Commentary under s 392, ante, may be referred to.

25. Conviction

If the only piece of evidence against an accused is the recovery of stolen property and there is no other circumstance proved against him, he can properly be convicted under s 411 .[73] Where the only circumstance proved against the accused was that the ornaments recovered from his possession, were duly identified as belonging to the deceased, about a fortnight after his death, it was held that he could only be convicted under s 411, IPC .[74] The fact that a child has been tried for theft and discharged on the grounds of want of understanding, is no bar to the conviction of a person under s 411, IPC, for receiving the stolen property.[75] However, the mere circumstance that stolen property was recovered on information, supplied by the accused to the police, is not sufficient for convicting an accused under s 411, IPC .[76] To point out a stolen property from a place, which is accessible to others, would be insufficient for the conviction of the accused.[77]The mere knowledge of the place of concealment does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that the person having such knowledge, actually received the stolen properties or participated in the act of concealment.[78]3578 Where, however, the accused hands over the stolen property to the police of his own accord in order to assist them in their investigation, the presumption would rather be that he had a clear conscience in the matter.[79] There may be circumstances in which a presumption may be made that the accused had guilty knowledge and may be convicted under s 411 . Where the accused, who had been declared to be an absconder, made a disclosure statement, in consequence of which certain articles identified to have been stolen, were discovered hidden in a forest, it was held that the presumption against him would be made.[80] Where the accused took the police to his field and dug out stolen property, a presumption was made against him.[81] Where stolen utensils were taken out from a public stream by the accused when others failed to do so from the place of concealment in the stream, it was held that this alone was sufficient to support the conclusion that it was within the exclusive knowledge of the accused as to where the utensils were kept concealed in the stream, and a presumption could be made against him.[82] Where the only presumption that can be drawn is that the accused knew that the goods which he held were stolen goods, and not that they were stolen in a dacoity, he can be convicted only under s 411, IPC .[83] There was no evidence to show that the appellants accused NR and A had full knowledge that the ornaments purchased by them were of subject to dacoity. These ornaments were recovered from them and accused N claimed the property as purchased from some person under receipt but that person was not examined as a defence witness. Held, accused NR and A can at best be charged under s 411, IPC for receiver of stolen property. Conviction of the aforesaid appellants accused under s 412, IPC was converted into one under s 411, IPC .[84]

In a charge against the accused of having committed offences under ss 380 and 457, it becomes essential to prove by some evidence that he has committed house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night. However, if there is no evidence to convict the accused with the preparation of the offence of house breaking and theft, except recovery of stolen property, then he cannot be convicted under ss 457 and 380, IPC, though it may be possible that he may be convicted under s 411 .[85]

26. Double Conviction

Theft and retention of stolen goods form one and the same offence and cannot be punished separately.[86] Similarly, if a person is proved to have dishonestly misappropriated property, he cannot be convicted for the offence of dishonestly retaining it.[87] A person who commits theft, robbery or dacoity cannot also be receiver of stolen property or receiver of property subject matter of dacoity, if he is convicted3579 under s 394 or under s 397, IPC, he cannot be convicted for offence under ss 411 or 412, IPC .[88]

27. Probation

Where the recovery of stolen articles from the possession of the accused was effected, and the accused was first offender and 20 years old on the day of conviction and the stolen articles recovered from his possession were not valuable, keeping in view that the accused belonged to a poor agriculturist family consisting of five brothers, sister and father, the accused was found entitled to be released on probation of good conduct.[89]

28. Sentence (Deterrent)

Cases under s 411, IPC, especially when property found is property stolen from a railway train, call for deterrent punishment.[90] The offence of receiving cattle, which are stolen property, should not be dealt with leniently. A sentence of fine would be a direct encouragement to indulge in cattle theft or in the sale of stolen property.[91]

29. Sentence (Lenient)

It is no ground for passing an enhanced sentence merely because the accused is a member of a criminal tribe.[92] A sentence of six months' rigorous imprisonment is not proper on a youthful first offender.[93] Where the accused was a college student, aged 19 years, when he committed the offence, his sentence was reduced to the period already undergone keeping, in view, his young age. It was remarked that youthful age is a factor which deserves consideration and a long period of incarceration in the present condition of prisons may brutalize the boy and blunt his finer sensibilities so that the end product may perhaps be more criminal than the one at the point of entry.[94] Where a period of 12 years has elapsed from the date of the incident and the accused has remained in jail for a period of 10 months, the sentence of rigorous imprisonment for two years awarded by the trial court was reduced to the period of custody already undergone by the accused.[95] An accused found in possession of stolen copper pot containing Rs 200 in cash from a temple, though found entitled to a lenient view since the value of stolen property was Rs 600 only, but considering the fact that it was stolen from a temple, the sentence of fine alone of Rs 2000 and in default to undergo rigorous imprisonment for three months was imposed against the accused.[96] The offence was committed almost 19 years back when the accused was of the age 27-28 years. He had already suffered imprisonment for a period of about nine months. Therefore, the sentence of imprisonment of rigorous imprisonment for3580 two years awarded by the trial court was reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone by the accused.[1]

The value of the property may be considered for sentence. When it is small, a light sentence may be passed.[2]

30. Alteration of Conviction

A person, who is charged under s 302, IPC, may be convicted under s 411, IPC, for having received ornaments which were removed from the body of the deceased and recovered from his possession. Where, however, the accused was originally charged under s 380, IPC, and was also charged under s 302 but the charge under s 380 was separated from the charge of murder and the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 380, it was held that although the charge under s 411 was a minor charge for an offence under s 380, IPC, the doctrine of autre fois acquit prevented the accused from being convicted of the lesser offence of s 411, IPC .[3] Where the accused was charged with the murder of a boy under s 302 and also under s 411, IPC, of being in possession of ornaments stolen from the boy, knowing them to be stolen, and he admitted that the deceased was at his house immediately before his death, but said that the boy fell from the roof, and that he subsequently threw his corpse into a tank, and produced the ornaments which the boy was wearing at the time of the occurrence, from a hole near the tank, it was held that the accused could not be convicted for murder for want of sufficient evidence, but he was guilty under this section.[4]

31. Alteration of Conviction from Section 454 and Section 380 to one under Section 411

Where, there was no evidence on record that the accused was seen near the house of the complainant on the day of death, the recovery of stolen property at the instance of the accused was effected after three months of alleged commission of theft, the conviction of the accused under ss 454 and 380, IPC, was altered to one under s 411, IPC .[5]

32. Alteration of Conviction from Section 457 to one under Section 411

Where the prosecution evidence was that the witnesses who had gone in search of the stolen bullocks, along with the complainant saw the accused at a distance of six miles from the residence of the complainant, driving the said bullocks along the road, it was held that the only conclusion, which could be drawn, was that he was in possession of stolen bullocks knowing them to be stolen, and, therefore, he could be convicted under this section, and not under s 457, IPC .[6]3581

33. Alteration of Conviction from Section 412 to one under Section 411

Commentary under the same heading in s 412, post, may be referred to.

34. Alteration of Conviction from Section 395 to one under Section 411

When the ornaments and coins recovered at the instance of the accused appellants, are of a nature, which are usually worn and kept by villagers, it was held that it was not safe to convict the accused under s 395, IPC, simply on the basis of the recovery of those articles after a period of 2½ months of the occurrence. Accordingly, the conviction of the accused from s 395, IPC, was altered to one under s 411, IPC .[7]

35. Alteration of Conviction from Section 396 to one under Section 411

Where the recovery of looted property was effected from the accused three days after the incident, the conviction of the accused under s 396 was altered to one under s 411, IPC .[8] Where the offence under s 396 was not established against the accused but the recovery of the looted firearm from the accused was established, the conviction of the accused under s 396, IPC, recorded by the trial court was altered to one under s 411, IPC .[9]

36. Alteration of Conviction from Section 411 to one under Section 380

Where, however, the accused was convicted for an offence under this section but on the facts found by the court, if the accused had been convicted under a wrong section, the High Court altered the conviction to one under s 380, IPC .[10]

37. Alteration of Conviction from Sections 454 and 380 to Section 411

Commentary under the same heading in s 380, ante, may be referred to.

38. Alteration of Conviction from Section 380 to one under Section 411

In Biri Singh v State ,[11] the bullocks were recovered from the accused only the next day of the theft, but there was also evidence to the effect that the bullocks were seen being taken the previous day by some other person. In these circumstances, the conviction under s 380, IPC, was altered to one under s 411, IPC . It was observed that in the absence of anything to justify a presumption of graver offence, presumption should be of a lesser offence. The maximum punishment completed in s 411, IPC, is imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend up to three years or fine or both. The sentence of rigorous imprisonment for a period of 18 months by no stretch of imagination can be said to be excessive when the fact that accused is not a first offender is taken into account.[12] The decision on appeal after about 10 years of recording conviction of the accused is not a good3582 ground to interfere with the sentence of imprisonment of three years imposed by the trial court.[13]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF THE RECEIVING OF STOLEN PROPERTY

S. 412.

Dishonestly receiving property stolen in the commission of a dacoity.--

Whoever dishonestly receives or retains any stolen property, the possession whereof he knows or has reason to believe to have been transferred by the commission of dacoity, or dishonestly receives from a person, whom he knows or has reason to believe to belong or to have belonged to a gang of dacoits, property which he knows or has reason to believe to have been stolen, shall be punished with imprisonment for life, or with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section prescribes punishment for an aggravated form of the offence punishable under the preceding s 411, IPC . The section covers two classes of cases, i.e.--

(a) receiving or retaining property which the accused knows, or has reason to believe, to have been transferred at a dacoity (irrespective of the person, whether the dacoit himself or any other person, from whom the property has been received), and
(b) receiving property, which the accused knows, or has reason to believe, to be stolen property, from a person whom the accused knows, or has reason to believe, to belong, or to have belonged, to a gang of dacoits.

Receiving stolen property from such a person would be covered by this section, irrespective of whether it was transferred by commission of a dacoity or theft.3583

Knowledge possessed by the accused that possession of property in question was transferred by commission of dacoity, is one of the essential ingredient of an offence under this section and unless there is proof of such knowledge, no conviction can be sustained.[14] Therefore, before convicting a person under this section, the court must come to the conclusion that the dishonest receiver of the stolen property was in possession of the same, knowing or having reason to believe that its possession had been transferred by the commission of dacoity.[15] Where appellants accused are alleged to have misappropriated stolen property of dacoity, their conviction merely on the basis of possession of property would be improper.[16]Where the ornaments stolen as a result of dacoity, were recovered from the possession of the accused, it was held that these two facts, by themselves, were not sufficient to show that the accused either knew, or had reason to believe, that the ornaments had been transferred by the commission of a dacoity and, therefore, his conviction under this section was not sustainable.[17] However, if the articles, recovered, from the possession of the accused, very soon after the dacoity has taken place, have been proved to have been stolen in the course of the dacoity, the case of the accused would clearly fall within the ambit of this section, and not under s 395, IPC .[18]

If the recovery of property stolen in the commission of dacoity is not conclusively attributable to the accused, no offence under s 412 IPC is made out.[19]

2. Section 411 and Section 412 --Distinction

Commentary under the headings in s 411, ante, may be referred to.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Sessions Judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the...day of..., at..., dishonestly received (retained) stolen property... (specify the property) knowing (or having reason to believe) the said property to have been transferred by the commission of dacoity (or dishonestly received, from AB, whom you knew (or had reason to believe) to belong to (or to have belonged to) a gang of dacoits property... (specify the property), which you knew (or had reason to believe) to have been stolen), and that you thereby committed an offence,3584 punishable under s 412 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove[20] that:

(a) the property, which is the subject-matter of the charge, was stolen property;
(b) the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that it was stolen property, possession of which was transferred by the commission of dacoity;
(c) the accused had received or retained such property; and
(d) he did so dishonestly.

Or in the alternative that:

(a) the subject-matter of the charge was stolen property;
(b) the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that it was stolen property;
(c) the property was received from a person who belonged, or had belonged, to a gang of dacoits;
(d) the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that the transferor belonged, or had belonged, to a gang of dacoits; and
(e) the accused received the property dishonestly.

The recovery of looted articles from the house of the accused and the identification of currency notes was not supported by deposition of witnesses and there was no other admissible evidence regarding theft of currency notes, the accused was found entitled to benefit of the doubt. However, the co-accused from whose house the looted articles were recovered and identified by the informant during test identification parade, was found guilty under s 412 and his conviction for the said offence was found proper.[21] Where recovery of money from the house of the accused was not proved to be the same which was looted from the possession of the informant, the accused was found entitled to be acquitted under s 412, IPC .[22] Where the article seized from the accused were not proved to be looted property, the conviction of the accused under s 412, IPC, was set aside.[23] The prosecution has to prove that the accused knew that the articles recovered from the accused were stolen in the dacoity. That is an essential ingredient of s 412, IPC, as compared to the ingredient of s 411, IPC .[24] Where there was no material showing that the accused knew or had reason to believe that the articles recovered were stolen in the course of dacoity, and the investigating officer did not mention the place of recovery in the3585 recovery memo, the alleged recovery of stolen articles was not proved hence the accused were found entitled to the benefit of the doubt.[25]

When it is not proved that the accused had knowledge that the ornaments recovered by him are stolen property, accused cannot be convicted under s 412, IPC .[26]

6. Conviction

When two robbed items were recovered at the instance of the accused, his conviction under s 412 was found proper.[27] Where certain property taken away in a dacoity, was found in the possession of the accused, he was held guilty under s 412, IPC .[28] In the instant case three accused A3, A4 and A5 were convicted for receiving property found stolen in dacoity perpetrated by accused A1 to A5.[29] In Chandrapal

v State ,[30] it was held that if an accused is charged alternatively with an offence under ss 395 and 412, IPC, and the former charge fails, there are usually circumstances to show that applying the presumption under s 114, illust (a), Evidence Act 1872, he may be convicted under s 412, IPC .

7. Double Conviction

Separate convictions and sentences under ss 395 and 412, IPC, with respect to the same property, are improper.[31] If an accused is convicted under s 395, he cannot be subsequently convicted under s 412 in respect of the production of the articles taken in that dacoity.[32] A person who commits theft, robbery or dacoity cannot also be receiver of stolen property or receiver of property subject matter of dacoity, if he is convicted under s 394 or under s 397, IPC, he cannot be convicted for offence under ss 411 or 412, IPC .[33]

8. Sentence

The offence under this section is punishable with imprisonment for life or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to 10 years and accused is also liable to pay fine. Where the accused remained in jail for three years and there was only a single identification of looted articles against him, the sentence of imprisonment of five years and fine of Rs 5000 and in default of which to undergo rigorous3586 imprisonment for one year awarded by the trial court was reduced to the period already undergone by the accused, but the sentence of fine was maintained.[34]

9. Consolidation of Sentence/Concurrent Sentences in Different Cases

An accused found to have committed offences under ss 395, 412, 399, 400 and 402, IPC, in different places and at different times can be given the benefit of running the sentences concurrently, in the interest of justice.[35]

10. Alteration of Conviction from Section 412 to One under Section 411

Where there was no evidence showing that the accused persons had full knowledge that the ornaments purchased by them were the subject matter of dacoity, the said ornaments allegedly were recovered from them and were claimed to be purchased from some person under receipt but that person had not been examined as a defence witness, the accused persons could be charged only for dishonestly receiving stolen property, hence their conviction under s 412 was altered to one under s 411 .[36]

Where the knowledge of the accused that the articles were stolen in a dacoity was not established, the only presumption that could be drawn was that the accused knew that they were stolen articles, the conviction of the accused under s 412, was, therefore, altered to one under s 411, IPC .[37]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF THE RECEIVING OF STOLEN PROPERTY

S. 413.

Habitually dealing in stolen property.--

Whoever habitually receives or deals in property which he knows or has reason to believe to be stolen property, shall be punished with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.3587

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides for a higher punishment for a person who is not a mere casual receiver of stolen property, but does so as a profession. Habitual offenders are punishable with higher punishment under some other provisions of IPC also, for instance, under ss 371, 400 and 401 of the IPC . The punishment is determined by the frequency of the occasions on which stolen property is dealt with.

2. Relative Scope of Section 411 and Section 413

A bare perusal of s 411 and s 413 indicates that while s 411 prescribes a punishment for dishonestly receiving stolen property knowing the same or having reason to believe the same to be stolen property, s 413 prescribes a punishment for an accused who habitually receives or deals in property which he knows or has reason to believe to be stolen property. One act of receiving stolen property knowing the same to be stolen property can attract s 411 of IPC, whereas a person who receives stolen property habitually or deals in such property knowing or having reason to believe that the property is stolen property can be punished under s 413 of the IPC .[38]

3. 'Habitually'

Commentary under the same heading in s 400, ante, may be referred to.

4. 'Stolen Property'

Commentary under s 410, ante, may be referred to.

5. Habitual Receiver of Stolen Property

A person cannot be said to be a habitual receiver of stolen goods who may receive the proceeds of a number of different robberies from a number of different thieves on the same day. In order to support a conviction under s 413 of the IPC, of being a habitual receiver of stolen property, it must be shown that the property was received on different occasions and on different dates.[39]

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

7. Same Trial under Section 411 and Section 413 --Permissibility

A prisoner cannot be tried at the same trial for receiving or retaining and habitually receiving or dealing in stolen property. The proper course is to try the accused first for the offence under s 411, and if he is convicted, to try him under s 413 putting in evidence the previous convictions under s 411, and proving the finding of the rest of the property in respect of which no separate charge, under s 411 could be made or tried by reason of the provisions of s 453 of the Code of Criminal Procedure . A3588 charge under s 413 at this stage cannot be maintained unless the previous conviction of the accused for commission of offence under s 411 is proved.[40]

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of sessions judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you were A habitual receiver (or dealer) in stolen property and that you, on or about the...day of..., at..., received (or dealt with) property, which you knew (or had reason to believe) to be stolen property, and you thereby committed an offence under s 413 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

The trial of a person both under ss 411 and 413, IPC, is bad. The proper course is to try the accused first for the offence under s 411 and, on his conviction thereunder, to try him under s 413 by putting in evidence the previous conviction under s 411 and proving the finding of the rest of the property for which no separate charge under s 411, IPC, could be made or tried.[41]

9. Framing of Charge both under Section 411 and Section 413 --Permissibility

It can very well be said that at the time of framing charge, the learned trial court, if evidence is on record with regard to number of cases pending or, in which the person accused is convicted can frame charge for offence under s 413, IPC along with s 411, IPC ; but, at the time of final adjudication, first of all, finding with regard to conviction for offence under s 411, IPC is required to be arrived at; and, thereafter, for the purpose of convicting the accused for habitually dealing in stolen property, after recording finding of guilt sentence can be awarded under s 413, IPC on the basis of established norms of habitually dealing in stolen property and the prosecution is required to prove the regular indulgence with regard to offence under s 411, IPC by way of producing the required evidence. Thus, at the stage of framing charge, it is not necessary that there must be conviction or finding against the accused for the purpose of framing charge under s 413, IPC .[42]

10. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused received, or dealt in, stolen property;
(b) he did so habitually; and

(c) he did so knowing, or having reason to believe, the property to be stolen.

A person who receives the proceeds of different robberies from a number of different thieves on the same day, is not a habitual receiver of stolen goods. In order to support3589 a conviction under this section, it must be shown that the property was received on different occasions and on different dates. The very essence of the offence is the habitual (constant) dealing which he knows, or has reason to believe, to be stolen.[43] Where the evidence did not establish that the appellant accused habitually dealt in or received the property which he knew or had reason to believe to be stolen property, his conviction under s 413, IPC recorded by the Court below was set aside.[44]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF THE RECEIVING OF STOLEN PROPERTY

S. 414.

Assisting in concealment of stolen property.--

Whoever voluntarily assists in concealing or disposing of or making away with property which he knows or has reason to believe to be stolen property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section brings within its scope persons who are not proved to be in possession of stolen property. The thief is naturally in possession of stolen property and so is the receiver of stolen property. However, there may be a category of persons who never get actual possession of the stolen property and yet they assist in its disposal. It is this category of persons to which this section applies.[45] It, therefore, applies only to person who, not having such possession as would sustain a charge of himself concealing, disposing of, or making away with it, voluntarily renders assistance in such dealing.[46] When a person is shown to stand in such relation to stolen property as falls short of possession, his manner of dealing with the property may warrant a charge of assisting in concealing or disposing of, or making away with, the property with guilty knowledge.[47] The section, however, does not cover a case where a person receives and disposes of stolen property entirely on his own account.[48] a person who has dishonestly received stolen property, cannot possibly be charged and convicted of voluntarily concealing or disposing of that property.[49] The section does not also apply to the case of a man, spending money stolen by another.[50]3590

When receipt or intention, not necessarily for disposal, is dishonest, s 411 is the appropriate section to apply. If, on the other hands, dishonest receipt or intention cannot be proved, but only dishonest concealment or disposal, s 414 is more appropriate.[51]

2. 'Voluntarily Assists in Concealing, or Disposing of, or Making away with, Property which he Knows, or has Reason to believe, to be Stolen Property'

This section makes it an offence to render voluntary assistance in regard to concealment, disposal of, or making away. The three expressions 'concealing', 'disposing of' or 'making away' have been purposely and deliberately employed. 'Concealing' means doing something in a stealthily manner, i.e., in a manner which is not open, natural, innocent and frank. The expression 'disposing of or 'making away' is meant to convey the idea of getting rid of a thing with an ulterior motive, i.e., getting rid of a property not in the normal manner in the usual course of dealing, but in a sinister fashion to which criminality can be attributed. And it is in this context that the legislature has employed the expression 'knows, or has reason to believe to be stolen property' in regard to the offender. In other words, it has been made an offence for anyone to render assistance voluntarily, i.e., with knowledge and consciousness and without any correction or compulsion. And it has been made an offence to voluntarily render assistance in regard to a property in respect of which he knows, or he has reason to believe, that it is stolen. More so when he is rendering this assistance by restoring to some duties or underhand means in a sinister fashion that is inconsistent with normal innocent conduct not tainted with any criminal significance.[52] In Empress v Rango Tamaji ,[53] it was observed that the word 'believe', in s 414, IPC, is much stronger than the word 'suspect' and involves the necessity of showing that the circumstances were such that a reasonable man must felt convicted in his mind that the property with which he was dealing was stolen property. It is not sufficient in such a case to show that the accused person was careless, or that he had reason to suspect that the property was stolen, or that he did not make sufficient enquiry to ascertain whether it had been honestly acquired.

3. 'Voluntarily'

Commentary of s 39, vol. 1, may be referred to.

4. 'Assists'

Except in the colloquial sense, a man cannot be said to assist himself. There must be another person whom he assists.[54] Where a hired taxi stopped at one place and some passengers in it got down and then attacked, injured and robbed some person, and in3591 spite of the cries of the victim, the driver drove away the car as he could do, it was held that the driver was guilty under this section for assisting the robbers to make away with the property.[55] Where the accused voluntarily assisted in concealing stolen railway pins in a certain person's house and field, with a view to having such innocent person punished as an offender, it was held that the accused was guilty both under ss 414 and 193, IPC .[56]Where the only part played by the accused, was that he, at the request of some other culprit, threw the bundle of stolen goods into a well, it was held that his act fell within the purview of s 414, IPC .[57]

Where the sand was being transported on truck without valid permit, document, the petitioner owner of the truck is guilty of offence under s 414, IPC, which is a cognizable offence, the police cannot be debarred from registering a case and investigating into the matter.[58]

Where the restrictions on the movement and storage of rice had already been abolished by the Government of India, the transport of rice from consignor to consignee from Delhi to Silliguri did not constitute any offence.[59]

5. 'Disposing of'

These words, in s 414, cannot be taken to include 'restoring to the owners'.[60]

6. Property

Dedicated bulls, being property can be the subject-matter of an offence under this section.[61]

7. Stolen Property

The appellant P was convicted for offence under s 414, IPC . The prosecution had not produced any material to establish the fact that the property recovered at his instance in fact belonged to the jeep which was stolen earlier or that the appellant had any prior knowledge that the goods recovered were actually stolen goods. Appellant P was questioned under s 313, CrPC but no specific question in regard to the ownership of the goods recovered was put to him. The Court did not found it safe to rely on the prosecution evidence to convict the appellant of the offence under s 414, IPC . The appellant was given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 414, IPC .[62]3592

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, compoundable, by the owner of the property stolen, with the permission of the court, before or which the prosecution for such offence is pending, and triable by a magistrate, and may be tried summarily where the value of such property does not exceed two hundred rupees.

9. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings/FIR

Where on account of an alleged offence of stolen coal without a licence, the coal in question was intercepted at the stage of transportation and both the trucks were seized and a case under ss 414 / 120B, IPC, and under s 7 of the Essential Commodities Act 1955 (10 of 1955) was registered against the accused person, and on completion of investigation the special judge took cognizance of the offences, the storage limit of coal was not prescribed at the relevant time so the violation of the provision of the unification order by the owner cannot arise, the allegation of theft of coal against the owner had also not been substantiated in the absence of specific evidence, the entire criminal proceedings and also the taking of cognizance by the special judge was quashed.[63] The petition under s 482, CrPC for quashing criminal proceedings, the Court is required to proceed on the presumption that the allegations made in the complaint are true and determine if the allegations so made disclose commission of any alleged offence.[64]

Where the criminal proceedings were instituted by one partner against another, alleging offence under ss 409 and 414, IPC, but the accused's domination as a result of entrustment or by special agreement was not proved, the dispute being of a civil nature the criminal proceedings were found not to be maintainable.[65]

10. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the...day of...,at..., voluntarily assisted in concealing (or disposing or making away with) the property... (specify the property), which you knew (or had reason to believe) to be stolen property, and thereby committed an offence under s 414 of the Indian Penal Code, and with in my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

3593

11. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the subject-matter of the charge was stolen property;
(b) the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that that property was stolen property; and
(c) he voluntarily assisted in concealing, or disposing of, or making away with, that property.

The prosecution must establish that the accused voluntarily assisted in concealing, or disposing of, property which he knew, or had reason to believe, to be stolen property.[66] It must prove that the accused had actual knowledge, or had reason to believe, that the property was stolen property.[67] It is not, however, necessary to establish that the property was stolen property if it can be shown that there were reasons to believe objectively that the property was stolen property. In such an event, it is not necessary to establish from whom the theft was committed, when it was committed, how it was committed and who committed it.[68] It is not necessary for a person to be convicted under this section that another person must be traced and convicted for an offence of committing theft,[69] as nothing turns on the circumstance that the co-accused were acquitted.[70]

12. Conviction

When the accused are prosecuted under ss 380 and 457, IPC, their conviction under s 414, IPC, without a charge thereunder, is not maintainable.[71]

13. Double Conviction

An accused cannot be convicted of offences under ss 411 and 414,[72] or under ss 370 and 414, IPC,[73] separately regarding the same property, the acts of the accused being parts of one continuous transaction. He cannot also be convicted of theft and of attempting to conceal stolen property.[74]3594

OF CHEATING

S. 415.

Cheating.--

Whoever, by deceiving any person, fraudulently or dishonestly induces the person so deceived to deliver any property to any person, or to consent that any person shall retain any property, or intentionally induces the person so deceived to do or omit to do anything which he would not do or omit if he were not so deceived, and which act or omission causes or is likely to cause damage or harm to that person in body, mind, reputation or property, is said to "cheat".

Explanation.--A dishonest concealment of facts is a deception within the meaning of this section

(a) A, by falsely pretending to be in the civil service, intentionally deceives Z, and thus dishonestly induces Z to let him have on credit goods for which he does not mean to pay. A cheats.

(b) A, by putting a counterfeit mark on an article, intentionally deceives Z into a belief that this article was made by a certain celebrated manufacturer, and thus dishonestly induces Z to buy and pay for the article. A cheats.

(c) A, by exhibiting to Z a false sample of an article, intentionally deceives Z into believing that the article corresponds with the sample, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to buy and pay for the article. A cheats.

(d) A, by tendering in payment for an article a bill on a house with which A keeps no money, and by which A expects that the bill will be dishonoured, intentionally deceives Z, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to deliver the article, intending not to pay for it. A cheats.

(e) A, by pledging as diamonds articles which he knows are not diamonds, intentionally deceives Z, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to lend money. A cheats.

(f) A intentionally deceives Z into a belief that A means to repay any money that Z may lend to him and thereby dishonestly induces Z to lend him money. A not intending to repay it, A cheats.

(g) A intentionally deceives Z into A belief that A means to deliver to Z a certain quantity of indigo plant which he does not intend to deliver, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to advance money upon the faith of such delivery. A cheats; but if A, at the time of obtaining the money, intends to deliver the indigo plant, and afterwards breaks his contract and does not deliver it, he does not cheat, but is liable only to a civil action for breach of contract.

(h) A intentionally deceives Z into a belief that A has performed A's part of a contract made with Z, which he has not performed, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to pay money. A cheats.

(i) A sells and conveys an estate to B. A, knowing that in consequence of such sale he has no right to the property, sells or mortgages the same to Z, without disclosing the fact of the previous sale and conveyance to B, and receives the purchase or mortgage money from Z. A cheats.3595

1. Scope

The offence of cheating, as defined in this section, contemplates two distinct forms of cheating, namely:

(a) a fraudulent or dishonest inducement of the person deceiving to act in one or the other of the two ways, specified in the section, in respect of his property, and
(b) an intentional inducement of the person deceived to act, or omit to act, to his injury.

Deception, which is the means of the offence, is common to both forms. Deception has in it the element of misleading, or of making a person to believe something which is not real. It implies causing of a person to believe as true something that is false.[75] To constitute an offence of cheating, the first and foremost element is deception. Unless there is deception, the offence of cheating cannot be made out.[76] In the explanation to the section, dishonest concealment of facts is a deception within the meaning of the section. Therefore, the prosecution must prove dishonest concealment of facts in order to secure a conviction for cheating.[77]

A misrepresentation from the very beginning is a sine qua non for constitution of an offence of cheating, although in some cases, an intention to cheat may develop at a later stage of formation of the contract.[78]

The offence of cheating is committed if property is obtained by a false statement or misrepresentation. It is no doubt true that to constitute deception, the false statement must be of an existing fact. However, a statement as to future conduct, which amounts to misrepresentation of fact, is nonetheless a statement of an existing fact. It follows that every promise by a person as to his future conduct implies a statement of intention about it. If a person makes a false representation regarding his future3596 conduct and thereby obtains property from another, the misrepresentation made by him would fall within the ambit of s 415, IPC . As already stated, the explanation to s 415, IPC, says that a dishonest concealment of facts is a deception within the meaning of the section. If an accused makes a false representation that he would deliver goods to the complainant on a future date which, he knows, he has no intention of doing, and thereby obtains property from the complainant, it would be reasonable to infer that the accused was acting dishonestly.[79] The language of the said s 415 makes it abundantly clear that where property is obtained by an accused by misrepresentation, it will be safe to infer that his intention was to deceive the other person into the belief that he would perform his part of the contract.[80] A promise as to future conduct not intended to be kept, amounts to cheating as much as a false representation to present intention.[81] A false representation by an accused with respect to future conduct amounts to cheating in terms of s 415, IPC .[82]

Money obtained by a person through deception may give rise to a civil liability, but that does not, and cannot, mean that he is immune from a criminal charge even if the prosecution succeeds in proving that he intended to dishonestly obtain money by misrepresentation.[83] It would be an error to suppose that the existence of civil proceedings between the parties,[84] or a civil remedy, should necessary exclude trial by a criminal court of a criminal offence. Where the accused obtained money on a hypothecation bond on a false representation that the property belonged to him, it was held that the accused was guilty under s 420, IPC .[85] It is only in case where the representation, on the basis of which money is obtained by the accused, was correct at the time when it was made, or was not false to the knowledge of the accused, and only subsequently the accused became dishonest or failed to carry out his part of the contract that the dispute can be said to be of a civil nature.[86]

No action can be initiated in criminal court unless intention to cheat is found present.[87]

2. Law of Singapore

Whoever by deceiving any person, fraudulently or dishonestly induces the person so deceived to deliver any property to any person or consents that any person shall retain any property or intentionally induces the person so deceived to do or omit to do anything which he would not do or omit if he were not so deceived and which act or omission causes or is likely to cause damage or harm to that person in body, mind, reputation of property is said to 'cheat'.

A dishonest concealment of facts is deception. Mere breach of a contract is not in itself sufficient to constitute original fraudulent intention.3597

Deception is the key element in the offence of cheating though deception is not specifically defined under the section the illustrations to the section suggest that it involves falsehood, misrepresentation both expressly and impliedly.[88]

Malaysia

As to the meaning of 'fraudulently', it refers to an act done with the intention to defraud. The phrase includes the mens rea, i.e. the intention to deceive and consequent injury or gain. However the loss need not necessarily be sustained by the person deceived.[89]

3. The Two Parts of Section 415 --Analysis

The section may be analysed as follows:[90]

Whoever, by deceiving any person, induces the person, so deceived,

(a) fraudulently or dishonestly:

(i) to deliver any property to any person, or
(ii) to consent that any person shall retain any property; or

(b) intentionally:

(i) to do, or omit to do, anything which he would not do, or omit, if he were not so deceived, and
(ii) such act, or omission, causes, or is likely to cause, damage or harm to that person in body, mind, reputation or property.

It would be found from the above analysis that there are the following two common elements in respect of cheating in either of the two ways:

(a) some person has been deceived, and
(b) as a result of such deception he is induced to do any of the acts specified in the section.

In other particulars, the two parts of the section are different. The main points of difference are as follows:

First Part

(a) It is necessary that the person deceiving acts fraudulently or dishonestly.[91]
(b) There must be reference to some property which the person deceived, delivers to any person or consents to its being retained by any person.
(c) A damage or harm is not necessary.

Second Part

(a) The act must be intentional.[92] The terms 'fraudulently' or 'dishonestly' do not find a place in the second part.3598
(b) No property may, at all, be involved.[93]
(c) Some damage or harm is necessary by any act or omission which the person deceived is induced to do or omit to do.

The form of cheating under the first part of the section consists of deceit coupled with fraudulent or dishonest inducing of the person deceived to do one or the other of the two things regarding the disposal of his property, whereas, the form of cheating under the second part of the section consists of deceit coupled with an intentional inducing of the person deceived to do, or omit to do, any act which act results, or which is likely to result, in damage or harm to that person in his body, mind, reputation or property. There are, thus the following two elements in the form of cheating under the second part:

(a) The person deceived is thereby intentionally induced to act, or to omit to act, in consequence of the deceit, i.e., there is deceit, followed by an action or non-action in consequence, which is intended by the deceiver. However, this by itself, is not cheating. The conduct contemplated by the deceiver, which follows in consequence of his deceit, may be to the advantage even of the person deceived. Deception in order to induce beneficial action is not cheating (a pius fraus is not fraud in law); and
(b) The act, or omission, of the person deceived, which is intended by the deceiver, must be one which is injurious to the person deceived, either in fact or in tendency, i.e., it must cause, or it must be likely to cause, 'damage or harm in body, mind, reputation or property'. These words have nothing to do with the first part of the section which deals with a delivery, or retaining, of property in consequence of the deceit. They refer only to the doing of, or omitting to do, anything else.[94]

The aforesaid distinction has been clearly brought out in the under noted cases.[95]

4. Essential Ingredients

To constitute an offence under this section, the following ingredients[96] must exist, namely:

(a) the accused must have deceived the complainant fraudulently or dishonestly or intentionally; and
(b) by means of such deceit, the complainant must have been induced to change his position:3599

    (i) by delivering any property to any person (including the accused himself) or by consenting that any person shall retain any property, or
    (ii) by doing, or omitting to do, anything which he would not do, or omit, if he were not so deceived, and such act, or omission, causes, or is likely to cause, damage or harm to the complainant in body, mind, reputation or property.

There must either be dishonest misrepresentation or dishonest concealment of facts on the basis of which the complainant (i.e., the person deceived) delivers any property to the offender or consents that the offender shall retain the property already delivered.[1] Deception is the quintessence of the offence under s 415 .[2]

Deception is a necessary ingredient for the offence of cheating under both parts of s 415, IPC .[3]

5. Mere Failure to Keep Promise is no Cheating

In order to constitute an offence of cheating the intention to deceive should be in existence when the inducement was made. It is necessary to show that a person had fraudulent or dishonest intention at the time of making the promise. Mere failure to keep the promise subsequently cannot be presumed as an act leading to cheating.[4]

6. Doctrine of Constructive Notice

What the court has to consider as to what were the facts and whether the person cheated did know the real facts or not. That he must be deemed to know certain facts because of the operation of law will not affect the case. That will only affect his right in the property which he acquires. The doctrine of constructive notice is intended to safeguard the interests of a third person, and not to exonerate the offender who obtains money by making a false representation.[5]

7. Wrongful Gain and Wrongful Loss

It must further be noted that as a result of the dishonest inducement of a person, there can be either wrongful loss to the complainant or wrongful gain to another person including the offender. Whether any one of these results follows on account of the deception practiced by the offender, then the offence of cheating would be complete.[6]3600

8. Requirement of Section 415

Section 415, IPC defines 'cheating'. The said provision requires: (i) deception of any person; (ii) whereby fraudulently or dishonestly inducing that person to deliver any property to any person or to consent that any person shall retain any property; or (iii) intentionally inducing that person to do or omit to do anything which he would not do or omit if he were not so deceived, and which act or omission causes or is likely to cause damage or harm to that person in body, mind, reputation or property. Deception of any person is common to the second and third requirements of the provision. The said requirements are alternative to each other and this is made significantly clear by use of disjunctive conjunction 'or'. The definition of the offence of cheating embraces some cases in which transfer of property is occasioned by the deception and some in which no transfer occurs. Deception is the quintessence of the offence.[7]

9. Cheating Distinguished from Extortion

Extortion, like cheating, requires that there is dishonest inducement. The act must also be done intentionally. Both s 383 and the second part of s 415, IPC use the word 'intentionally'. In both cases, consent is given. Thus, inducement, intention and consent are common elements in both the offences. The difference, however, lies in the modusoperandi. In extortion, consent is obtained by putting a person in fear of any injury while in the case of cheating, consent is obtained by deception. In the case of cheating, consent is willingly given, though by reason of deception it is not a consent. In the case of extortion, consent is not intended to be given but is obtained by putting the victim in fear. However, the obtaining of decrees by means of forged documents is neither cheating nor extortion as defined in the IPC .[8]

10. Criminal Misappropriation Distinguished from Cheating

Commentary under the same heading in s 403, ante, may be referred to.

11. Criminal Breach of Trust and Cheating--Distinguished

A person, who obtains property by trick from another, bears no resemblance to a trustee under s 405, IPC . The property, acquired by trick, cannot be the subject matter of a trust so as to bring the offender under s 409, IPC, for the appropriation of that property to his own use. For a criminal breach of trust, the person handing over the property must have confidence in the person taking the property so as to create a fiduciary relationship between them. That confidence cannot arise when the property is acquired by the offender by some trick. Such a trick prevents true consent from arising. If property is obtained by trick, or by any other lawful means, then there cannot be any entrustment, and if the offender appropriates that property to his own use, he cannot be said to have committed an offence of criminal breach of trust, the reason being that in such a case, there is no trust created by the owner of the property.[9]3601

12. Cheating Distinguished from Breach of Contract

The distinction between a case of mere breach of contract and one of cheating depends upon the intention of the accused at the time of the alleged inducement, which may be judged by the subsequent act but of which the subsequent act is not the sole creation.[10] Every breach of contract cannot be cheating. The concept of deception should exist in cheating from the very start of the transaction. If that is wanting, there would be no offence of cheating even though there is no payment of price of the goods taken on credit. [11] A mere breach of contract cannot give rise to a criminal prosecution.[12] Likewise, a mere dishonouring of a cheque by a bank, issued by the accused is not sufficient to make out a case of cheating against him unless the complainant connects the giving of the cheque with placing of the order by the accused and the supply of the goods thereunder. Giving of a cheque is nothing but a promise to pay. If the promise is not fulfilled, the right of the aggrieved party is to sue and to seek civil remedy. It does not give rise to any criminal action. Subsequent refusal to pay the price of the goods, already delivered, does not per se give rise to a criminal action.[13] Where, therefore, there is no cheating at the time of the agreement, the failure to return consideration of the agreement would not amount to cheating. Remedy only by way of damages would be available.[14]

The question whether the material on record discloses only a breach of civil liability or a criminal offence of cheating will depend upon whether the complainant, in parting with his money, acted on the representation of the accused and believed the truth thereof and whether this representation, when made, was in fact false to the knowledge of the accused and he had a dishonest intention from the outset.[15] Lending of the amount by the complainant to the accused is a clear case of contract, and if the same is not paid, it can only give rise to a civil liability as a result of breach of the contract. The mere fact that subsequent to the lending of the said amount, a cheque was issued by the accused and it was later dishonoured, cannot convert the civil liability into a criminal liability.[16] Incurring a debt with a promise to pay back within a certain period and failure on the part of the debtor to pay back within the stipulated3602 period does not make it a criminal offence. It is a pure civil liability enforceable through the civil courts.[17]

Where the complainant owed money to the accused on three bonds and alleged that he had paid an amount in full satisfaction of those bonds but the accused returned only two bonds and kept the third saying that he had not paid the debt due on it, it was held that the dispute was of a civil nature.[18] Non payment of amount due under a contract does not amount to cheating.[19] Where there is no clear and conclusive evidence of criminal intention of the accused at the time when the offence is said to have been committed and where the party said to be aggrieved, has an alternative remedy in a civil court, the matter should not be allowed to be fought in a criminal court.[20] A criminal court should not be used to collect a civil debt.[21] Merely because the conduct of a debtor has been highly unethical, the criminal process cannot be used against him in order to compel him to discharge a civil liability.[22] When the accused obtained money for bringing about a marriage but failed to do so or to return the money, the case was held to be one of civil liability.[23]

Where the accused made a contract of the marriage of his daughter to the complainant's brother and obtained some money and performed some ceremonies but later it was found that the girl was being married to another person, it was held that there was only a refusal to marry the girl to the complainant's brother, and it was only a breach of contract.[24] If the circumstances change and something intervenes in between the placing of the order by the accused and his refusal to take delivery of the goods, it would not be possible to draw an inference to the effect that the accused had no intention to take the delivery of the goods and honour the hundis of the complainant from the very beginning. If, in the meantime the market goes down and, therefore, the accused changes his mind not to take the goods under his order, it cannot be said that the accused had no intention of paying the price of the goods from the very start.[25] If, however, the circumstances continue unaltered from the beginning till the end, i.e., the satusquo continues till the final act or omission by the accused, it may be inferred that the accused had no intention of paying the price, from the very start of the transaction, when he ultimately refuses to take the delivery of the goods and honour the hundis of the complainant.[26] If, therefore, the evidence on the record shows that the complainant in parting with his money, had acted on the representations of the accused and in belief of the truth thereof and those3603 representations, when made, were in fact false to the knowledge of the accused and he (i.e., the accused) had dishonest intention from the very beginning, the offence of cheating is made out.[27] Where a girl, who was already married, was made to marry to another person from whom the accused had obtained money without disclosing that the girl was already married, it was held that he was guilty of cheating.[28] Where a person represented a girl to be the daughter of one woman when she was, within his knowledge, the daughter of another woman, it was held that he was guilty of the offence under s 416 .[29] Where the accused sold a minor married Rajput girl to the complainant representing her to be a Mahajan virgin, it was held that the accused were guilty of cheating.[30] Where an accused knows from the very beginning that the representation, which he is making to the complainant, is false and it is on the basis of that representation, that he obtains a certain sum of money from the complainant, the accused would be guilty of cheating. Such a willful misrepresentation of fact with the intent to defraud would clearly amount to cheating.[31]

To hold a person guilty of cheating, as defined in s 415, IPC, it is necessary to show that at the time of making the promise he had fraudulent or dishonest intention to retain the property or to induce the person so deceived to do something which he would not otherwise do. It must be shown that the accused had fraudulent or dishonest intention at the time of making the representation or promise and such a culpable intention right at the time of entering into an agreement cannot be presumed merely from his failure to keep the promise subsequently.[32] In the instant case the two appellants were senior employees of FCIL (Food Corporation of India Ltd) and it was alleged by IEL (Indian Explosive Ltd) that at the time of entering into the tripartite agreement, the appellants, by having suppressed the fact that FCIL was likely to be declared a sick company and was, in fact, declared to be so by BIFR, had dishonest intention to induce IEL to enter into the said agreement, which amounted to cheating. But there is not even a whisper let alone a specific averment that the appellants had dishonestly 'induced' IEL to enter into the said agreement/ arrangement. On the contrary, the complaint clearly revealed that IEL was fully conscious of the precarious financial health of FCIL at the time it had decided to enter into contract with FCIL and BCCL to ensure a regular supply of its basic raw material from FCIL so that its production of explosives did not suffer. A mere mention of the words 'defraud' and 'cheat' in the complaint, in the setting that these have been used, was not sufficient to infer that the appellants had dishonest intention right at the beginning when, demonstrably, after due deliberations a tripartite agreement was signed, which under the given circumstances at that juncture, was considered to be in the interest of all the three parties to the agreement. At best the present case was of breach of contract on the part of FCIL. No primafacie case was3604 made out against the appellants for offences under ss 420, 406 and 120B, IPC . The complaint was quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[33]

A person would not be convicted under ss 415 / 420, IPC if culpable intention of deceiving is found absent at the time when the initial promise was made.[34]

13. Criminal Breach of Trust Distinguished from Cheating, Theft and Criminal Misappropriation

Commentary under the same heading in s 405, ante, may be referred to.

14. 'Whoever'

A fraudulent representation may be made directly or indirectly. A fraudulent representation by a person acting as an agent for the accused would be by and on behalf of the accused.[35]When guilty intention is made an ingredient of an offence, it postulates that the accused person must have prior knowledge of the circumstances under which he is acting. The action taken by him must be voluntary. Nobody, who is forced to do an act by an outside agency or is dishonestly induced by somebody else to do a particular act, can be said to have done that act with the intention of doing it.[36]

A bank, being a juridical person, and not an actual person having a physical body, cannot be charged with cheating as it cannot be said to have the mensrea requisite for the offence of cheating.[37] Similar is the case with a company as it cannot be punished with imprisonment.[38] In the word 'whoever' occurring at the beginning of ss 415 and 120-B, IPC cannot include in its sweep juridical person like a 'company' as it is incapable of having the requisite mens rea to commit the offence of cheating.[39]

15. 'By Deceiving any Person'

Generally speaking 'deceiving' is to lead into error by causing a person to believe what is false or to disbelieve what is true and such deception may be by words or by conduct. A fraudulent representation can be made directly or indirectly.[40] A person is deceived when he is induced to believe as true which is untrue. Deception is an essential ingredient of the offence of cheating. A person may be deceived quite innocently, but such deception does not amount to cheating. If the person, making the representation, honestly believes the representation to be true, there can be no question of cheating.[41] Where, however, a person is deceived knowingly, then the deception may well amount to cheating. If the offender knowingly makes a false representation with a view that the other person should act upon it, then that would3605 amount to cheating.[42] In HS Gill v Manjit Singh ,[43] the accused knew that there was one loan outstanding against the property in dispute, but he did not disclose it to the purchasers. He rather falsely represented to them that it was free from all encumbrances. It was held that it was a dishonest concealment of fact which amounted to deception within the meaning of this section. In Sada Ram v Emperor ,[44] the accused, a minor, representing himself to be a major, obtained a loan from another person. On a suit being filed against him for recovery of the amount, he said in his defence that he was a minor at the time when he borrowed the money. It was held that his case fell under illust (f) to this section, as his intention from the outset was dishonest. Inducing a person to purchase a mixture of groundnut oil with rock oil by making the purchaser to believe that he was buying clean groundnut oil would be a deception.[45]

Misleading statements which withhold the vital facts, for intentionally inducing a person to do or omit to do something, would amount to deception.[46]

Deception is the quintessence of the offence under s 415 of the IPC .[47]

The accused was found at the shop of jewellery dealer with pieces of yellow alloy with intention to sell them as articles of gold, represented them as gold with fraudulent and dishonest intention to cheat the shop owner. Dishonest concealment of facts is a deception within the meaning of cheating. Held, accused committed the offence of cheating.[48]

The means of deceit are false representations. False representations may be made by a writing, words, or conduct.[49] The section does not, in any manner, limit the mode in which the deception may take place, nor does it make it necessary that the deception should be by express words; it may be conduct or implied in the nature of the transaction itself.[50] It may be inferred from all the circumstances including the conduct of the accused in obtaining property.[51] As to what is sufficient to constitute deception must be decided in each case on its own merits.[52] Dishonest intention cannot be inferred from the mere fact that the accused could not fulfil his promise.[53] Where the accused obtained some amounts from the complainant by bribing a certain person in order to get a post for the complainant and the accused did spend a large amount in payment of the bribe and the complainant was called for an interview for3606 the post, it was held that in obtaining the money, the accused did not practice any deceit and, therefore, no offence of cheating was made out.[54]

Deception is necessary element of cheating.[55]

A, pretending to be a dairy man, orders, by letter, two milk cans, from a dairy supply company, which he obtains. This is deceit expressed in writing. A, a married man, tells B, a woman, that he is unmarried and proposes himself to be married to her, whereby he obtains money from her, promising to furnish a house therewith. This is deceit by words. A purchases goods from B giving him a cheque on a bank, in which he has no account, thereby representing that he has an account in the bank and the cheque will be paid. This is deceit by conduct.

The question whether there was intention to deceive must be answered with reference to the date when the contract was made.[56]The dishonest intention must either precede or accompany the act of dishonesty, and not one which follows after.[57] The evidence must establish the existence of a fraudulent or dishonest intention at the time of commission of the act in respect of which cheating is alleged.[58]It has to be shown that the representation made was false to the accused's knowledge at the time when it was made, and the act would not come within the definition of cheating if the representation has turned out to be untrue at a future date.[59] It must be shown that the money was received with preconceived intention of denying it later on. If the intention is changed subsequently, it would not be cheating.[60] The mere taking money one day and dishonestly, running away the next day without repaying the same is not necessarily cheating. There must be an intention to deceive and defraud at the time of taking the money. The subsequent conduct would only be evidence of this previous dishonest intention.[61] Where the accused obtained some money in advance from the complainant on the representation that he would supply some paddy within a certain date but the arrangement failed and paddy could not be supplied, it was held that it could not be said that the accused had not made arrangement for the supply and, therefore, he was not guilty of cheating.[62] The facts may, however, warrant an inference that the accused's representation was false at the time of making it and that he had no intention of carrying out the promise.[63]

16. 'Fraudulently or Dishonestly'

It is a settled law, by catena of decisions, that for establishing the offence of cheating, the complainant is required to show that the accused had fraudulent or3607 dishonest intention at the time of making promise or representation.[64] The word 'fraudulently', being used in the section, together with the word 'dishonestly', must mean, if it has any meaning at all, something different from 'dishonestly'. The two terms being separately defined in ss 24 and 25, IPC, the word 'fraudulently' is not confined to a transaction in which there is wrongful gain on the one hand and wrongful loss on the other, either actual or intended.[65] The word 'fraudulently' is used in a sense not covered by the word 'dishonestly'; it is not confined to a transaction of which deprivation of property forms a part.[66] Where no pecuniary question arises, the element of dishonesty need not be established and it would be sufficient to establish that the act was fraudulent. However, where the allegation is that a person has dishonestly induced another to part with property, something different has to be considered and that is whether he has thereby caused a wrongful loss to the person, who parted with property, or has made a wrongful gain to himself. These are the two facets of the definition of 'dishonestly' and it is enough to establish the existence of one of them. The law does not require that both should be established.[67] The ingredients of the section will be attracted if there was mens rea for the accused to induce the complainant to part with the money making him to believe that it will be adjusted towards the debt.[68] In Ashutosh Mallick v Emperor [69] the accused by making a false representation that he was an employee of the Calcutta Municipal Corporation, obtained ten rupees as subscription from the health officer of the corporation towards the fund of a charitable society. The accused duly made over the amount to the said society. It was held that he was not guilty of cheating as there was neither wrongful loss, nor wrongful gain. If an act is done under a bonafide belief and there is no wrongful gain to the accused or wrongful loss to the complainant and there is no fraudulent conduct on the part of the accused, the case would not fall under s 415 .[70] The accused bank manager informed the loanee prior to the liquidation of loan amount that the pledged ornaments will be returned after clearance by the controlling office due to her husband's involvement in fraud, who was a former bank employee. The bank manager refused to return the ornaments for want of such clearance, cannot be said to have the dishonest intention in inducing the loanee to pay loan for delivery of ornaments.[71] Where the accused produced in a civil court, a forged bond which was a facsimile of a genuine bond and it had not been proved that the genuine bond had been discharged, it was held that the accused's act was not dishonest; it was nevertheless fraudulent.[72]

Demand or collection of excess profit, does not amount to cheating or criminal breach of trust.[73]3608

17. 'Induced'

Mere making of fraudulent representation is not sufficient. It has to be established that the accused made some fraudulent representation and as a result of that fraudulent representation the complainant was induced to part with some property or to do some act, which would not have been otherwise done and which act caused, or was likely to cause, damage or harm to the complainant in body, mind, reputation or property.[74] It must further be noted that as a result of the dishonest inducement of a person, there can be either wrongful loss to the complainant or wrongful gain to another person, including the offender. Whether any one of these results follows on account of the deception practiced by the offender, then the offence of cheating would be complete.[75] Where no inducement was made by the accused company, in fact the complainant had approached the accused for grant of license for running a health clinic and had deposited license fee, no case of cheating was made out, and criminal proceedings were quashed.[76] Where the evidence did not show that the accused ever induced the complainant fraudulently or dishonestly to give his services, no offence under ss 406, 420, IPC was committed by the accused.[77]

A case would not be a case of cheating if there is no inducement. In Sarda Saran v Emperor ,[78] the accused who was a temporary clerk at Lucknow, went to Kanpur on casual leave. He was appointed there as a permanent head clerk in the Kanpur Cantonment. He applied for extension of his leave at Lucknow, but the leave was not granted. His services at Kanpur were terminated on payment of salary for one month. On joining at Lucknow, he again drew his pay, but he made it clear that he had already drawn pay for a month at Kanpur and he would have to return one of the two sums. It was held that the accused had not induced the Kanpur authorities to pay him the salary. There was, therefore, no inducement and the accused was not guilty. However, in Swami Dhirendra Brahmchari v Shailendra Bhushan & Another ,[79] the applicants deposited an amount having being led to believe by the advertisement that the yoga teachers training course is recognised by the government. The FIR and evidence collected during investigation clearly brought out the parting off of the amount on the basis of fraudulent misrepresentation, the ingredient of cheating was found to be established.

18. Proximate Connection between Deception and Inducement

It is necessary to show that there is a proximate connection between deception practiced on the complainant and his being induced to part with some property. If the connection is too remote or very indirect, it would be difficult to say that the offence of cheating would be complete.[80]If the result is a mere possibility, and not a necessary consequence of the act, an essential element of the offence would3609 not be satisfied. This has to be determined with reference to the facts and circumstances of a particular case.[81] If damage or harm is dependent upon the future act of some other person, then such damage or harm is too remote. The section contemplates that the act is in itself likely to cause damage or harm and it is not dependent upon an entirely problematical action of some other person. To use a trite phrase, the act done or omitted to be done, must be the causa causans of the harm caused or likely to be caused.[82] It is necessary that the person deceived must have acted under the influence of the deceit and the damage must not be too remote.[83]

19. Damage or Harm must be the Approximate and Natural Result

The damage or harm, as aforesaid, caused, or likely to be caused, to the complainant in mind, body, reputation or property must be the necessary consequence of the act done by reason of the deceit practiced or must be necessarily likely to follow therefrom.[84] The damage or harm must be the approximate and the natural result of the act or omission; it does not include fake and contingent injury.[85] In AR Milton v Sherman ,[86] the accused, a married man, falsely representing himself to be a bachelor, was accepted, for the marriage of his daughter by the complainant. The complainant, when he found out that the accused was a married man, asked his daughter to give up the accused. The daughter, however, left the complainant's house and went to the accused. It was held that the seduction having taken place after the deception had been detected, it could not be said that it was the natural consequence of the deception and the accused was not guilty of cheating.

20. 'Person'

The government is a corporate body and comes under the definition of 'a person' in s 11, IPC . A government has to act through its servants. If the deception is practiced on a servant of the government and the servant is made to do anything which he would not have done if he had not been deceived, and the act causes damage to any property of the government, the act will amount to cheating.[87]

The person need not necessarily be ascertained when the false representation is made, e.g., a false representation may be made by an advertisement addressed to the public.[88]3610

21. 'Property'

The term 'property', in this section, includes movable property like money[1] as well as immovable property.[2] Whether an article is property does not depend upon its possessing the monetary value or market value as such. It would still be property if it has some special value for the accused.[3] Thus, a motor driving licence,[4] an import licence,[5] a passport,[6] an export quota,[7] and an income tax assessment order[8] are all property. An admission card to sit in an examination is property.[9] Similarly, some certificates obtained from the deputy inspector of schools by stating untruly that the accused had passed an examination in a certain year,[10] or a health certificate obtained from a health officer,[11] would be property. A warrant of attachment, issued by a civil court, would also be property.[12]

It is not necessary that the property, which a person has been induced to deliver must be of the person on whom deception has been practiced.[13]

22. Delivery of Property

For a person to be convicted under s 420, IPC, it has to be established not only that he has cheated someone but also that by doing so, he has dishonestly induced the person who was cheated to deliver any property etc.[14] It is possible that the offence may not fall under s 420, IPC, when there was no delivery of any property or valuable security by the person to whom representation was made.[15] It is of essence in the offence of cheating that the delivery of property should be by the person who himself was deceived by the accused.[16]

The word 'possession' does not occur in s 415, IPC, and it may be said that a man cannot give delivery of property, the delivery of which is not in his power or at his order. However, it appears to us that a man can give delivery through another, of property within the meaning of s 415, IPC, which is not in his possession, but which is at his order. If, for instance, A had an agreement with B that B will give delivery of certain goods in his possession on account of A on the receipt of delivery note from A, and C by deception obtains a delivery note from A or B and thereby gets3611 possession of goods from B, it appears difficult to us to say that he has not got delivery of property from or through A directly as a result of his deception of A.[17]

Section 420 of IPC clearly stipulates that whoever cheats and thereby dishonestly induces the person deceived to deliver any property to any person shall be punished. The assertion made in the complaint petition as quoted above would clearly reveal that the mode of business was credit basis. Thus, there was no inducement or deception to deliver any property. Thus the allegations made in the complaint petition, even taken on their face value, do not satisfy the ingredients of the offence alleged.[18]

23. Delivery of Property--Not always Necessary

It is worth mentioning here that it is not correct to say that unless there is delivery of property to any person, no offence of cheating will be made out. The person deceiving, if he intentionally induces the person deceived to do or omit to do anything which he would not do, or omit, if he were not so deceived, would nevertheless be guilty of the offence of cheating provided some damage or harm to that person is caused in body, mind reputation or property. Thus, where the accused dishonestly induced the complainant as well as his daughter to go into a ceremony of marriage by professing himself to be a bachelor and it was found that his first wife was alive and it resulted in damage or harm to the complainant and his daughter in body, mind, reputation or even property, the offence under ss 416 and 417, IPC, was held to have been made out.[19]

Where the accused, by making false promise to marry the victim, thereby inducing her to have sexual act with him which would undoubtedly cause harm to her mind and reputation, the offence of cheating is made out even though no parting of property is occasioned by deception.[20]

24. 'Intentionally'

A guilty intention is an essential ingredient of the offence of cheating. In other words, mensrea on the part of the accused must be established before he can be convicted of an offence of cheating.[21] In Mahadeo Prasad v State of West Bengal ,[22] it was held as follows:

> Where the charge against the accused is under s 420 in that he induced the complainant to part with his goods, on the understanding that the accused would pay for the same on delivery but did not pay, if the accused had at the time he promised to pay cash against delivery, an intention to do so the fact that he did not pay would not convert the transaction into one of cheating. However, if on the other hand he had no intention whatsoever to pay but merely said that he would do so in order to induce the complainant to part with the goods then a case of cheating would be established.3612

In Hari Prasad Chamaria v Bishun Kumar Surekha & ors ,[23] it was held that unless the complaint showed that the accused had dishonest or fraudulent intention at the time the complainant parted with the money it would not amount to an offence under s 420, IPC, and it may only amount to breach of contract. In GV Rao v LHV Prasad & ors ,[24] it was reiterated that guilty intention is an essential ingredient of the offence of cheating and, therefore, to secure conviction mens rea on the part of the accused must be established. It has been further held that in order to constitute the offence of cheating the intention to deceive should be in existence at the time when the inducement was offered. To hold a person guilty of the offence of cheating it has to be shown that his intention was dishonest at the time of making the promise. Such dishonest intention cannot be inferred from the mere fact that he could not subsequently fulfil the promise.[25] Under ss 420 and 415, IPC, the stage at which fraudulent or dishonest intention should exist in order to make out the offence of cheating, such intention must be shown to exist at the time of making of the inducement, otherwise, mere failure to keep a promise subsequently cannot be presumed as an act leading to cheating.[26] When the complainant himself stated that the accused who had taken the vehicle on hire-purchase had failed to pay certain instalments, the accused had no dishonest intention on the date of entering into the hire-purchase agreement to cheat or induce the complainant.[27]

The second part of the section does not refer to fraudulent or dishonest deception; it only requires that the inducement must be intentional and there must be an act which causes, or which is likely to cause, a damage or harm although the deceiver has not acted fraudulently.[28]

25. A Company and Corporate Bodies

The companies and corporate houses can no longer claim immunity from criminal prosecution on the ground that they are incapable of possessing the necessary mensrea for the commission of criminal offences. A corporation is virtually in the same position as any individual and may be convicted of common law as well as statutory offences including those requiring mensrea. The criminal liability of a corporation would arise when the offence is committed with regard to the business by a person or body of persons in control of its affairs. In such circumstances, it would be necessary to ascertain that the degree and control of the person or body of persons is so intense that a corporation may be said to think and act through the person or the body of persons.[29]Where the respondent company issued prospectus and invited large number of companies to make investments, but made misleading statements, withheld vital facts and caused loss to the investors to the amount of Rs. 500/- crores, it was held that the act of the respondent company amounted to offence of cheating3613 within the meaning of s 415, IPC . The order of the High Court quashing criminal proceedings under s 415, IPC was set aside.[30]

26. 'Act or Omission'

Commentary of s 33, vol 1, may be referred to.

27. Harm

Commentary of ss 87 and 95, vol 1, may be referred to.

28. Harm to the Person Deceived

It is not necessary to constitute an offence under s 415, IPC that the act, which the person deceived is induced to do, should actually cause harm to him. It is enough that the act, which the person deceived has been induced to perform, is likely to cause damage or harm to him. The dictionary meaning of the word 'likely' is 'probable'.[31] It is also not necessary that the accused should have intended to cause harm or damage. It is sufficient if the deceiver intentionally induces the person deceived to do, or omit to do, anything, and such act, or omission causes, or is likely to cause, damage or harm.[32]It is to be noted that all damage resulting, or likely to result, as a natural consequence of the induced act would make out a case of cheating.[33] If, however, no damage or harm is actually caused, nor is there any likelihood of its being caused, no case of cheating would be made out.[34]

Where a sanitary inspector asked the name and address of the accused for prosecuting him for causing nuisance and the accused gave a false name and address, it was held that the accused had not acted fraudulently in giving a false name and address nor could it be said that his act was likely to cause damage or harm to the reputation of the sanitary inspector as an efficient officer, and, therefore, no case of cheating was made out.[35] Similarly, an application for a loan to a bank with false particulars is not likely to cause any damage to the property of the bank.[36]

No offence of cheating can be said to have been committed if a third party on whom no deception has been practised, sustains pecuniary loss in consequence of the accused's act.[37] If a person is induced by deception to do, or omit to do, something and the act or omission causes, or is likely to cause, damage or harm to another person, no offence of cheating is committed.[38] a person, who practises deception on a3614 government servant which results in damage and harm to third party, cannot be punished under ss 419 and 420, IPC .[39]

29. 'Harm to...mind'

Damage or harm has not been defined in the IPC, but it covers both injury to the mental faculties and also mental pain just as damage and harm in body would cover wounds or other hurts and also physical pain.[40]

30. 'Harm to...Reputation'

Where, as a result of conspiracy among the accused, a doctor certifies a dying person as a first-class life, that act is likely to cause harm to his moral as well as to his professional reputation. It is something which the court will presume having regard to the natural events and human conduct.[41] However, in Kanumukkala v State of Andhra Pradesh ,[42] an accused, who was working on a temporary post in the medical services, applied for a permanent post to the public service commission making false representation as to his name, place of birth and father's name and also that he held a MBBS degree. After interview, he was selected for the post by the public service commission. It was held that there was no likelihood of causing any damage to the reputation of the public service commission by such appointment and the case did not fall under the latter part of s 415 even though he had deceived the commission by representing himself to be a duly qualified candidate and thus induced it to select him for the post. He was, however, held to be guilty under s 419, IPC .

31. Explanation: Dishonest Concealment

A dishonest concealment of facts is a deception within the meaning of this section. The explanation refers to a dishonest concealment of facts which it is the duty of the person concealing them to disclose to the person with whom he is dealing.[43] Secondly, the explanation refers only to actual deception, and not to the concealment of deception by someone.[44] a vendor of immovable property cannot be convicted of cheating if he omits to mention that' there is an encumbrance on the property unless it is shown that he was asked by the vendees whether the property was so encumbered and he had replied that it was not or that he sold the property on the representation that it was unencumbered.[45] Where there is no pleading in complaint petition or in FIR that property was sold with a predetermined intention of cheating, no offence under s 420, IPC is made out; FIR/complaint would be quashed.[46] The prosecution case was that the accused promised to provide certain amenities/facilities3615 to the purchasers of the flats which they did not. Held, the element of deception was lacking in the case. The allegations disclosed breach of contract, which did not disclose criminal liability.[47] In Ramkrishna Nandram v Ganesh Narain ,[48] a person mortgaged a house to A, but prior to that he suffered a decree (passed against him) creating a charge upon the mortgaged property and the mortgage deed contained a recital that the mortgaged property was not under mortgage or sale anywhere. It was held that it did not amount to cheating as the mortgagor was not bound to disclose the charge. Where the person, whose title was defective, mortgaged a house and agreed that the mortgagor would make good money from other property if the mortgagee was not able to recover it from the mortgage rights, it was held that the mortgagor was not guilty of cheating even though he knew at the time of borrowing the money that his title was defective.[49] Where, however, the accused not only refrained from mentioning the fact of the prior hypothecation of movable property but also fabricated evidence to prevent the person advancing the money from becoming aware of it, it was held that they were guilty of cheating.[50] Where some persons issued a prospectus inducing the public to purchase shares suppressing material facts from the public, they were held guilty of cheating.[51] Where some land was sold on the representation that it was free from all encumbrances but the land was already mortgaged under a registered deed, it was held that the accused was guilty of cheating.[52] Misleading statements which withhold the vital facts for intentionally inducing a person to do or omit to do something would amount to deception.[53](

In the instant case at the time of purchase meagre amount was paid by the accused. Cheque given to the complainant for the balance amount was dishonored. The intention of the accused right from beginning was not fair, but was to cheat the complainant. Cognizance taken for the offences under ss 406 and 420, IPC was held proper.[54]

Where a person sells property knowing fully well that he has no title to the property, he commits the offence of cheating.[55]

Where the accused entered into an agreement for the sale of a house to the complainant without disclosing to him at that time that, there was an injunction order of a civil court issued to them, under which they were prohibited from selling the property, and the complainant advanced money to the accused, it was held that it was the duty of the seller to inform the buyer that the accused could not then transfer the property to buyer in view of the injunction order, and that this amounted to dishonest concealment within the meaning of the explanation to s 415, IPC .[56] Where the accused first made a gift of his land to his son, whose name was mutated, and3616 subsequently sold it for consideration to the complainant without disclosing the gift, it was held that he was guilty under s 420, IPC .[57]

Of Offences Against Property

OF CHEATING

S. 416.

Cheating by personation.--

A person is said to "cheat by personation" if he cheats by pretending to be some other person, or by knowingly substituting one person for another, or representing that he or any other person is a person other than he or such other person really is.

Explanation.--The offence is committed whether the individual personated is a real or imaginary person.

(b) A cheats by pretending to be B, A person who is deceased. A cheats by personation.

Comments

1. Scope

The preceding s 415, IPC defined cheating generally. This section defines a particular specie of cheating which is an aggravated form of ordinary or simple cheating. The offence under this section is committed if:

(a) the accused pretended to be some other person; or
(b) knowingly substituted one person for another; or
(c) represented that he or any other person is a person other than he, or such other person, really is.

It is not necessary that the person personated is an existing or known person, whether alive [illust (a)] or dead [illust (b)]. Such personated person may be wholly imaginary or non-existent. A false personation need not be made in express words. It may be made by conduct or acts.

The two elements of this offence are cheating and personation. Personation, by itself, is no offence.[58] The offence of cheating by personation is made when an accused assumes a different status or character even though he does not change his name at any stage. The offence of cheating by personation was held to have been made where the accused represented himself to be a bachelor to the complainant though he was not.[59]

2. Illustrative Cases

(1) Cases of false personation

(a) The two accused induced a moharrir at a fair to write out a certificate of sale of a mare, giving wrong names of the seller and the purchaser,3617 and one of them affixed his thumb mark to the receipt in the name of the person who was named as the seller, it was held that the accused were guilty under this section as they deceived the moharrir and induced him to write a false certificate.[60]
(b) Where the accused posed himself to be a police officer and cheated several villagers out of money, he was held guilty of cheating and also of falsely personating as a public servant.[61]
(c) In Re Matameswara Rao,[62] the accused used a railway seasonal ticket, issued in the name of a different person, by pretending to be that person. He was held guilty under this section.

(d) Where a person, by falsely personating himself as another, dishonestly or fraudulently induced a health officer to deliver a health certificate to him, he was held guilty of an offence under this section.[63]

(e) The appellant personating as KK had forged two sale deeds. KK was the owner of the land and the sale deeds were executed in favour of one G. Held, the appellant committed the offence of cheating by personation punishable under s 419, IPC .[64]

(2) Cases of personation at examinations

(a) The accused sat for an examination and forged answer-books, purporting to be answered by another candidate, it was held that the accused was guilty of cheating by personating and also of forgery.[65]

(b) A, falsely representing himself to be B at a university examination, got a hall ticket under B's name and signed answer papers to questions with B's name, he was held guilty of forgery and cheating by personation.[66]

(3) Cases in which no offence was held to have been committed under s 416

(a) Where a servant purchased a stamp paper for his master, giving his master's name as if it had been his own, it was held that a conviction under this section was bad because, though there might have been personation, there was no cheating as there had been no fraudulent intent.[67]

(b) In Jagat Narayan v State ,[68] a money order, in favour of Balmukand, the real elder brother of the accused, arrived at the post office. The3618 accused personating himself as Balmukund, demanded its payments and he signed on the money order form in the name of his brother Balmukand and another accused put his signature on it as a witness. However, on further inquiry before the payment was made, the accused disclosed that he was not Balmukand. It was in evidence that the accused lived jointly with his brother Balmukand and was authorised by him to receive payment. It was held that it could not be said that the accused had dishonest intention and the offence under s 419 was not committed.

(c) In Thakur Mandal v Emperor ,[69] one M was an employee in a workshop. His services were terminated on account of reduction in the establishment and he obtained, and was granted, a certificate of discharge. M handed over the certificate to another person T who promised him to get him re-employed in the workshop. After waiting for about ten months, M demanded the certificate back from T, but the latter had given the certificate to the accused who had obtain employment by handing over the certificate, falsely alleging it to be his at the time of his appointment and, thus, falsely personating himself as M. It was held that in the absence of evidence to show that the appointing authority was induced to appoint the accused on the basis of the false certificate produced by him, he could not be said to be guilty under s 419 .

(d) In Re Loothy Bewa,[70] a intended to register a deed, but was too ill to do so, and B who was known to A and had the deed registered in her name. It was held that in the absence of anything to prove that it was intended to defraud anybody, B was guilty not of cheating by personation under s 419, IPC, but of an offence under s 93 of the Registration Act 1866.

(e) In Reg v Prema Bhika ,[71] it was held that a witness, falsely deposing in the name of another, is not guilty of cheating by false personation, but of an offence under s 193, IPC .

(f) In Emperor v Kutub Ali ,[72] the accused was a daftari in the office of the Accountant-General. An auction sale of waste paper was held in the office. The accused made a bid for the purchase under an assumed name and the sale was concluded in his favour. It was held that there was no rule prohibiting the purchase of such waste paper by an employee of the department and no offence of cheating by personation was committed.

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CHEATING

S. 417.

Punishment for cheating.--

Whoever cheats shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.3619

Comments

1. Scope

An offence of cheating has been defined in s 415, IPC, and the other three aggravated forms of cheating in ss 416, 418 and 420, IPC . Section 416 defines cheating by personation and s 419, IPC prescribes punishment for cheating by personation. Cheating, with knowledge that wrongful loss may ensue to the person whose interest the offender is bound to protect, is defined in s 418 in which punishment for this offence is also prescribed. And cheating, involving delivery of property or some valuable security, is defined in s 420, IPC which also prescribes the punishment for the offence. This section (i.e., s 417, IPC) provided for punishment for those cases of simple cheating which are not covered by any of the said sections, i.e., ss 419, 418 and 420, IPC .

Dishonest concealment by an accused is a deception punishable under this section.[73] Where there was deception and the deceiver's object was dishonest and fraudulent and he intended to retain wrongfully the excise duty, to which the state, under the statute, and notifications made thereunder, had a claim and which the state was entitled to recover under law, from a person who removed non-duty paid tobacco from a bonded warehouse to another bonded warehouse, it was held that he practiced deceit and, therefore, the offence under s 417, IPC, was made out against him.[74] However, no case against the appellant under s 417, IPC, was held to have been made out in Gopal Musalgaonkar v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[75] where the allegation against him was that he, representing himself to be an unmarried person, induced the complainant to have sexual intercourse with him. Her own evidence in the case was that she, prior to her marriage with him, was having intimacy with the appellant and also had sexual intercourse with him. In these circumstances, it was observed that it could not be believed that the complainant did not know about the appellant's relation whatsoever with another lady, and, therefore, no offence against the appellant under s 417, IPC, was made out.

2. Sections 417 and 420 --Distinction

Commentary under the headings in s 420, post, may be referred to.

3. Rape and Cheating

The accused allegedly posed as a police man and took the prosecutrix to a hut opposite a police station and committed offences under ss 376 and 417, IPC . Neither the prosecutrix, nor her companion raised any hue and cry or offer any resistance. After the said incident the prosecutrix went to the hospital instead of going to the police station. The facts and evidence given by the prosecutrix and her companion appeared very unnatural and disbelievable. The acquittal of the accused was found3620 proper.[76] The accused put vermilion on the head of prosecutrix and declared her as his wife with the assurance to accept her publically after getting a job. Thereafter, the prosecutrix who had initially resisted the accused, submitted herself to sexual intercourse. The prosecutrix was cheated in body, mind and reputation because of deception made by the accused with dishonest intention to sexually exploit her. Thus, a primafacie case existed against the accused for framing charge against him under s 417, IPC, and also under s 493, IPC .[77] The accused was alleged to have promised the victim of marriage and thereafter consent was given by her to have sexual intercourse with him. The evidence on record showed that the victim was an adult and the accused sincerely wanted to marry her but her parents were against it. It could not be said that the accused ever practiced any deception upon the complainant, nor it could be said that he made any attempt to create some false conception of facts in the mind of the complainant, on these facts the accused neither committed the offence of rape nor any offence of cheating under ss 376 and 420, IPC, respectively.[78] Evidence adduced in the case did not prove that the promise to marry the prosecutrix was false to the knowledge of the accused when the later made the false promise. Accused was acquitted of the charge under s 420, IPC . [79] However, in a somewhat similar situation, on account of a promise of marriage by the accused to the prosecutrix, he was held liable for the offence of cheating under s 417, IPC .[80]

Where an accused makes false promise to marry a woman, induces a woman to have sexual intercourse with him, he is guilty of offence of cheating punishable under s 417, IPC .[81]

Where the victim being a woman above 16 years of age, voluntarily consented to have sexual intercourse with the accused, she did not disclose anything to either the neighbours, villagers or to her parents till she was pregnant for three months, the evidence clearly establishes that there was no misconception of fact in the instant case and the victim was a consenting party and her conduct was nothing but an act of promiscuity on her part, she consciously consented to have sexual intercourse with the accused and her consent was not in consequence of any misconception of fact, it is clear, therefore, that the subsequent refusal by the accused to marry the victim would be of no consequence when it has not been established that the representation was false to the knowledge of the accused when it was made.[82] Accused appellant3621 was prosecuted on allegations that he wanted to marry the prosecutrix, on refusal he committed sexual intercourse on her. Later also he committed sexual intercourse with her. Held, if the promise of marriage was given and the girl had succumbed on that account, by itself, may not amount to cheating. Besides this, the girl has very specifically stated that even subsequently, she was ravished against her wishes. Therefore, the theory of promise of marriage and the consent for sexual intercourse will wither away. No offence under s 417, IPC was made out; appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 417, IPC .[83]

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, by the person cheated, with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution is pending for such offence, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

5. Jurisdiction

Commentary under the same heading in s 420, post, may be referred to.

6. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.

Where no prejudice is caused, to the accused, the mere fact that the charge mentioned that the accused deceived the postal authorities whereas s 415, IPC, envisages deceiving a person, does not vitiate the trial.[84]

Where the allegation was that accused had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix on promise of marriage, but there was no allegation that such promise was made by the accused at the time of the commission of the intercourse, no presumption of deception to constitute cheating under s 415, IPC can be raised for the purpose of framing charge. The Court was not justified in framing charge under s 417, IPC against the accused.[85]

7. Proof

To secure a conviction under this section, the prosecution must prove[86] deception of any person by the accused by:

(a) fraudulently or dishonestly inducing him:

(i) to deliver any property to any person, or

(ii) to consent that any person shall retain any property; or3622

(b) intentionally inducing him to do, which he would not do, or to omit to do, which he would not omit to do, if he were not so deceived, and which act or omission caused, or was likely to cause, damage or harm to him in body, mind, reputation or property.

The letters were prepared by the accused, on the letter head of the minister, whereupon invitations were written to invite actors for a cultural show. The letters did not bear the signature of the minister. The act of the accused did not cause or was likely to cause harm to any person in body, mind or reputation. Similarly, the conviction of the accused under s 417, IPC, was set aside and he was acquitted instead.[87]

OF CHEATING

S. 418.

Cheating with knowledge that wrongful loss may ensue to person whose interest offender is bound to protect.--

Whoever cheats with the knowledge that he is likely thereby to cause wrongful loss to a person whose interest in the transaction to which the cheating relates, he was bound, either by law, or by a legal contract, to protect, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is an example of the aggravated form of cheating, defined under s 415, IPC, viz, the intentional inducing of a person by means of deceit to do, or omit to do, something which is likely to cause injury to his property by causing a wrongful loss to him. The section provides for an abuse of trust by a person who is bound by law, or legal contract, to protect some interest. It is this fact which renders cheating an aggravated offence under this section. It presumes the existence of some position of confidence between the cheat and the person cheated. It may be noted that the section does not expressly define the kind of relationship between the parties (like trustee, banker, guardian, etc). All, that it requires, is that the position is one in which the offender stands in such a position as would necessarily involve, on his part, the protection of the interest generally of the person deceived. Where the directors, manager and accountant of a bank put, before the shareholders, balance sheets, which they knew to be materially false, misleading the public as to the true condition of the bank, and thereby induced the depositors to allow their money to remain on deposit, it was held that they were guilty of cheating under this section.[88] However, the guilty knowledge, which is essential for an offence under the section, cannot be presumed from the mere fact that the accused authorised the issue of a balance-sheet containing false entries. Such knowledge must be proved by the circumstances of the case.[89] Every breach of contract does not give rise to a criminal prosecution for cheating.3623 The element, which converts a breach of contract into an offence of cheating, is the dishonest or fraudulent intention of the accused which induces the complainant to enter into the contract. Mere non-payment by the purchaser of the price, or the balance of the price, of the articles purchased cannot constitute the offence of cheating in the absence of proof of any dishonest misrepresentation on the part of purchaser. If there is no proof of dishonest intention on the part of the accused at the time when he made the promise, which induced the complainant to do something which the complainant would not have done but for the promise, there can be no offence of cheating. Intention of an accused may no doubt be judged by his subsequent conduct, but mere subsequent conduct cannot be the sole creation to conclude his intention at the time of the initial promise.[90] Where a Mohammadan, with a view to secure a service with a Hindu, falsely represented himself to be an orthodox Hindu, who would not have engaged him if the fact that he was not a Hindu was known to him, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.[91]

There was no fraudulent intention on the part of the petitioner (accused) at the very inception of the transaction, dispute between the parties arose only during the course of the transaction, dispute was purely of civil nature. The complaint was quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[92]

2. Principal of Mission School Placing Order of Books for his Private Business--Effect

Where the accused was the principal of a mission school, he placed order with various publishers for supply of books for his private business using the letter heads of the school making them believe that the order was placed by the school, the evidence on record neither suggested that the accused had made any willful representation to defraud any publisher, nor there was any suggestion in the entire evidence that the mission school was made liable for payment of books. The element of cheating was found absent from the entire evidence. No wrongful loss was caused to the mission school. Mere breach of trust by mis-utilising the post and the position as the principal of a school cannot attract criminal liability. The order of conviction and sentence under s 418 was held liable to be set aside.[93]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, by the person cheated, with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution under this section is pending, and triable by a magistrate.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:3624
> That on or about the...day of..., at..., you cheated AB by... (specify the act constituting the offence) with the knowledge that you were thereby likely to cause wrongful loss to the said AB, whose interest in the transaction, to which the cheating relates, you were bound by law (or by a legal contract) to protect, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 418 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) the accused cheated the complainant;
(b) the accused was bound either by law, or by legal contract, to protect his (i.e., the complainant's) interest;
(c) the said interest was in relation to the transaction to which the cheating related; and
(d) the accused had knowledge that he was likely thereby to cause wrongful loss to the complainant.

In addition to what is stated above, the essential requirements, to be proved for an offence under s 417, are also to be proved.

Of Offences Against Property

OF CHEATING

S. 419.

Punishment for cheating by personation.--

Whoever cheats by personation shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section, which simply provides for punishment for an offence, defined in s 416, IPC, provides for punishment for the offence of simple cheating defined in s 415, IPC, which operates when all the ingredients of the offence of cheating under the said s 415 are made out.[1] Thus, though the mere giving out of a fictitious name may amount to personation, yet, in order to attract this section, there must be cheating in addition to personation. The prosecution must be for cheating as cheating is an essential ingredient of the offence.[2] Similarly, this section would cover cases of simple cheating by false personation.[3] If it, however, involves the delivery of property, which is covered by s 420, the offence would be punishable under that section, and not under this section. Thus, where A, representing himself to B,3625 obtained the delivery of some quantity of opium from an opium shop on B's ticket, he was convicted under s 420, IPC .[4]

For as to what constitutes an offence of cheating by personation, the commentary under s 416, IPC may be referred to.

2. Distinction between Sections 170 and 419

Cheating by personation (s 419, IPC) is an offence of a general character under which a person may pretend to be anyone other than what he really is. However, cheating by pretending to be a public servant (s 170, IPC) is a specific offence. It has all the ingredients of cheating by personation under s 419, IPC . However, when the personation is that of a public servant then the offence becomes one under s 170 .[5]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable, by person cheated, with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, and triable by a magistrate.

4. Nurse Acting in her Name, Pretending to be a Doctor--Effect

When the prosecution does not have a case that the accused pretended to be any other person existing or fictitious, and she was all the time during the alleged transaction, acting in her own name, though only a nurse, the accused had styled herself as a 'doctor' competent to treat patients. Even if she had pretended to be a doctor, though not really a doctor, she cannot be convicted for cheating by personation under s 419, IPC .[6]

5. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings

Where the allegations against the accused were that he made a representation to a railway retiring room attendant that he was an assistant commercial manager of the railways and the said attendant on the basis of such representation by the accused allotted him a room, primafacie an offence under s 419, IPC, was made out, so criminal proceedings cannot be quashed under s 482, CrPC .[7]

6. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
>
> That you, on or about the...day of..., at..., cheated AB by pretending yourself to be CD (or by knowingly substituting EF for CD (or by representing that EF was CD) and, by deceiving him fraudulently (or dishonestly), induced him to deliver... (describe the property) (or to consent that he shall retain... (describe the property) (or intentionally3626 induced him to do (or omit to do)... (name the act or the omission, as the case may be) which he would not do (or omit to do) if he were not so deceived by you and which act (or omission) caused (or was likely to cause) damage (or harm) to him in body, mind, reputation or property), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 419 of the Indian Penal Code, and within by cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Where the words 'cheated by personation' were not mentioned in the charge, it was held that no valid objection to the charge could be made when the entire recital was clear.[8]

7. Proof

To secure a conviction under this section, prove that the accused cheated the complainant by:

(a) pretending himself to be some other person, or
(b) knowingly substituting or representing one person for another.

In addition to the above, the prosecution has to further prove all that is required to be proved for establishing an offence under s 417, IPC .

To constitute an offence under s 419, IPC, all ingredients of s 415, IPC, must be present.[9]

A person by merely inducing the oath commissioner by wrong identification to attest the affidavit, does not commit an offence under s 419 as the act done by the oath commissioner of attesting the affidavit does not cause any damage or harm to the oath commissioner in body, mind, reputation or property.[10]

8. Acquittal

The accused took a loan of Rs 25,000 under an agreement, and gave the registration certificates of the lorry and motorcycle as security. The registration certificate of the lorry was in the name of the brother of the accused and the accused allegedly impersonated him. There was nothing in the agreement to show that the accused in any manner asserted that the lorry also belonged to him. The civil suit filed against the accused was decreed by the civil court. The dispute between the parties was of a civil nature, so the accused was found entitled to an acquittal.[11]

9. Conviction

The government appointed the accused to a post on its medical services on being induced by deception that he was fully qualified for the appointment. In consequence of the appointment, the government had to pay him a salary, which fell due. The accused, therefore, by deceiving the government, dishonestly induced the government to deliver property to him and thereby committed the offence of cheating under s 415, IPC, and since he had impersonated another person to secure the job, his3627 conviction under s 419, IPC, was maintained.[12] The accused procured a government job reserved for Scheduled Castes by producing a false caste certificate showing that he belongs to a Scheduled Caste. There was cogent and convincing evidence that the accused did not belong to the Scheduled Caste and had served the government for a period of 8 years, till the fraud and cheating was detected. The accused was found liable to be convicted under ss 419 and 468, IPC .[13] On account of supply of material to the company, the cheques were issued in the name of the supplier. The cheques were enclosed by accused A-1 by opening an account in a bank in the name of the supplier. The writing and withdrawal slip and signatures on it tallied with the handwriting of A-1, the other accused A-11, an account holder of the bank recommended A-1's forged name to the bank. As A-1 and A-11 worked in the same company, A-11 knew A-1's original name. Both A-1 and A-11 could be said to have jointly committed the offence, so their conviction under ss 419 etc was found proper.[14] Where the appellant representing hearsay as KK executed two sale-deeds in favour of a third person, he was convicted for offence under s 419, IPC .[15]

Appellant, accused A3, Monica Bedi obtained fake passport with the help of accused A4 to A9. The entire conspiracy was hatched for her benefit. Her conviction under ss 419, 420 and 120B, IPC was upheld.[16]

10. Sentence

Where the appellant representing himself as KK executed two sale-deeds in favour of a third person, he was convicted for offence under s 419, IPC . The appellant was aged 59 years, was suffering from osteoarthritis, had not derived any benefit by the execution of the sale-deeds, sentence of imprisonment was reduced to the period already undergone with fine of Rs. 50,000/-.[17] Appellant accused was convicted under ss 419 and 420, IPC for obtaining fake passport. As she had undergone more than two years' imprisonment, sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[18]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CHEATING

S. 420.

Cheating and dishonestly inducing delivery of property.--

Whoever cheats and thereby dishonestly induces the person deceived to deliver any property to any person, or to make, alter or destroy the whole or any part of a valuable security, or anything which is signed or sealed, and which is capable of being converted into a valuable security, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.36283629

Comments

1. Scope

Cheating as defined in s 415, IPC, is made punishable under s 417, IPC, which deals with cheating generally. Section 420 , IPC, deals with that species of cheating which involves delivery of property or destruction of valuable security.[19] In other words, this section deals with the aggravated form of cheating where, by the cheating, there is dishonest inducement of the person cheated to deliver any property to any person or to make, alter or destroy the whole, or any part of a valuable security or anything which is signed or sealed and is capable of being converted into a valuable security.[20]

The section is attracted even to a case of sale of forged railway tickets.[21]

If forgery is not there, allegation under s 420, IPC would fail because, forgery is the principal allegation, cheating being a consequential offence. If forgery goes, cheating cannot stand.[22]

2. Sections 420 and 511

A person commits the offence of 'attempt to commit a particular offence', when:

(a) he intends to commit that particular offence, and
(b) he having made preparations and with the intention to commit the offence, does an act towards its commission.

Such an act need not be the penultimate act towards the commission of that offence, but must be an act during the course of committing that offence.[23] When the accused on the basis of a false graduation certificate obtained permission to appear at the MA examination in English to the Patna University, he was found guilty of an attempt to commit cheating, punishable under ss 420 / 511, IPC .[24]

3. Section 420 , IPC and Sections 78 and 79 of the Trade and Merchandise Marks Act 1958 (43 of 1958)[25]

In view of ss 78 and 79 of the Trade and Merchandise Marks Act 1958 providing penalty for applying false trade descriptions etc and selling goods to which a false trademark or false trade description is applied, a charge under s 420, IPC, becomes wholly inept.[26]

4. Section 420 , IPC and Section 146 (o) of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act 1960 (24 of 1961)

Clause (o) of s 146 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act 1960 deals with an offence where an officer of the society wilfully recommends or sanctions for his own3630 personal use or benefit or for the use or benefit of a person in whom he is interested, a loan in the name of any other person. The real beneficiary under the loan is, therefore, not the person in whose name the loan is actually awarded. The beneficiary is either the officer himself or some other person in whom he is interested. It is, therefore, a different type of offence and has nothing to do with misappropriation, forgery or cheating which are offences under the IPC .[27]

5. Section 420 , IPC and Section 68 of the Railways Act 1890

Section 68 of the Railways Act 1890 points to contravention which is punishable under s 112(a) of the same Act. Section 68 prohibits the entering of a carriage as a passenger unless with a proper pass or ticket. Where a railway servant applied for and obtained a free pass for his wife and mother and handed over the pass to another woman, who was neither his wife nor his mother, and she used it, the railway servant is guilty under s 420, IPC, and not under s 68 of the Railways Act.[28]

6. Section 420 , IPC and Section 64 of the Post Office Act 1898

The proposition that where a particular set of acts or omissions constitute an offence under the general law and also under a special law, the prosecution should be under the special law, is consigned to cases where the offences are co-incident or practically so.[29] Where an accused was charged both under s 420, IPC, and s 64, Post Office Act, assuming that s 64, Post Office Act is a minor offence as compared to an offence under s 420, IPC, it would not be illegal to try the accused under the major offence of s 420, IPC, only.[30]

7. Section 420IPC and Essential Commodities Act 1955

Essential Commodities Act (EC Act) is a special provision, holds the field over the IPC . A person would not be simultaneously prosecuted under the IPC, when he is being prosecuted under the EC Act.[31]

8. Section 417 and Section 420 --Distinction

As already stated, s 417, IPC deals with cheating generally, prescribes punishment for simple cheating, while this section dealing with that species of cheating which involves delivery of property or destruction of valuable security, lays down the sentence for the aggravated form of the offence.[32] The latter kind of cheating being of a punishment. This section (i.e., s 420, IPC), being a special provision, is to be treated as an exception to the general rule enacted in s 417 . If a case falls within the ambit of any of the ss 418, 419 and 420, IPC, the offender must receive the punishment prescribed thereunder; he cannot claim that he should receive the lesser punishment provided for by s 417 .[33] The word 'fraudulently', used in s 415, finds no place in s 420 . A, for example, may, by a false representation, induce B to advance3631 money in such circumstances that he is exposing B to considerable risk of loss, but without the intention of causing wrongful loss. A would be acting fraudulently; and if he intended to cause wrongful loss, he would be acting dishonestly. In the former case, he would be punishable under s 417, and in the latter under s 420 .[34]

The vital difference between the offences under ss 417 and 420, IPC, is that whereas, an offence against the latter section is the cognizable one, that against a former is non-cognizable and investigation of it can only be undertaken by the police on the instructions of a magistrate, whereas in the other case, the police can act on their own motion under ss 154 and 156, CrPC .[35] Where, in pursuance of the deception, no property passes, the offence is one of cheating punishable under s 417, IPC . Where, however, in pursuance of the deception, property is delivered, the offence is punishable under s 420 .[36] It may also be noted that an offence under s 420, IPC, is a cognizable one while an offence under s 417, IPC, is only a non-cognizable offence.[37]

9. Cheating Distinguished from Breach of Contract

Commentary under the same heading in s 415, ante, may be referred to.

10. Essential Ingredients

To constitute an offence under the relevant section, the essential ingredients[38] are as follows:

(a) there must be deception (as contemplated in s 415, IPC) by the accused; and

(b) by the said deception, the accused must dishonestly induce the complainant:

(i) to deliver any property to any person, or
(ii) to make, alter or destroy the whole, or any part, of the valuable security or anything which is signed or sealed and which is capable of being converted into a valuable security.

The essential ingredients of the offence under s 420 are as follows:[39]

(a) There should be fraudulent or dishonest inducement of a person by deceiving him.3632
(b)
(i) The person so induced should be intentionally induced to deliver any property to any person or to consent that any person shall retain any property; or
(ii) The person so induced to do anything which he would not do or omit if he were not so deceived; and
(iii) In cases covered by second part of (a), the act or omission should be one which caused or was likely to cause damage or harm to the person induced in body, mind or property.[40]

The essential ingredients to attract s 420, IPC are: (i) cheating; (ii) dishonest inducement to deliver property or to make, alter or destroy any valuable security or anything which is sealed or signed or is capable of being converted into a valuable security; and the (iii) meansrea of the accused at the time of making the inducement. The making of a false representation is one of the ingredients for the offence of cheating under s 420 .[41]

The two essential ingredients of the offence under this section are:

(a) deceit, that is to say, dishonest or fraudulent misrepresentation; and
(b) inducing the person deceived to part with property.[42]

The offence of cheating is complete the moment the cheat obtains delivery of property as a result of his deception. The fact that he long afterwards returned it under pressure, cannot, in any way, affect his criminality.[43]

11. Mens Rea

There can be no dispute of the fact that the offence of cheating involves mensrea as an essential ingredient. This is obvious from the use of the words 'fraudulently' or 'dishonestly' or 'wilful'.[44] It is settled law that for the purpose of holding a person guilty under s 420, the evidence adduced must establish, beyond reasonable doubt, mensrea on his part.[45]

No action can be initiated in criminal court unless intention to cheat is found present. One A acting as agent of B executed sale deed in favour of one C. It was found that D, brother of B had already sold that property in favour of E. In complaint filed by C against B, for offence under s 420, IPC, it was held that criminal action was not maintainable as A had no intention to cheat. Criminal proceedings were quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[46] The complainant filed complaint with allegations that he had supplied potato seeds to the accused, but the accused had not paid the due amount, hence, cheated the complainant. There was business3633 relationship between the complainant and the accused for the last ten years, dispute never arose between the parties. Mere breach of contract canot give rise to criminal prosecution. There was absence of mensrea to cheat the complainant. The conviction of the accused appellant for offence under ss 406 and 420, IPC was set aside.[47]

12. 'Whoever'

Commentary under the same heading in s 415, ante, may be referred to.

13. 'Cheats'

Commentary under s 415, ante, may be referred to.

14. 'And thereby'

The words 'and thereby', in s 420, IPC, do not imply that some further act of delivery is necessary after the offence of cheating is completed because the offence of cheating is not complete unless the deception is effective. The said words are only designed to introduce a description of a particular sort of cheating, i.e., when the effect of cheating is to induce the delivery of the property or the making, alteration or destruction of a valuable security.[48]

15. 'Dishonestly'

If a transaction is entered into with a free volition of two parties but the representation subsequently turns out to be untrue, the case would not fall within the ambit of this section.[49] The section requires, as an essential ingredient of the offence, an ab initio dishonest intention on the part of the accused to knock out money from the complainant by means of fraudulent misrepresentation. This intention can be proved not only by the oral evidence of witnesses, but also by the surrounding circumstances, including those which precede and follow the transaction, whereby the complainant has been made to part with the money.[50] When the post-dated cheque, given by the accused for the price of the goods, sold to him, is dishonoured for want of sufficient amount in his account, the point for consideration is as to what was the intention of the accused at the time of the bargain. If, in spite of the dishonouring of the cheque, the accused is not in a position to pay off the amount, his conviction under s 420, IPC, is sustainable.[51] In Re HB Shamsundariah,[52] the accused was held guilty of cheating his superior officers when it was found that he gave a saving bank passbook with forged entries therein as security for his service. In Nag Shan v Emperor ,[53] the accused induced the complainant to pay him a ransom for3634 return of his stolen bullocks and thereafter, in spite of successive promises, failed to restore them. It was held that he could be convicted under s 420 . In Sher Singh v Emperor ,[54] the accused, by falsely pretending to be a pensioned subedar, deceived the complainant and dishonestly induced him to let the accused have, on credit, certain articles for which he did not intend to pay. He was held guilty under s 420, and not under s 417 . Where the accused, who had already sold his house to another person, executed a bainapatra in favour of the complainant and secured earnest money from him for the sale of the same house, it was held that the accused was guilty under this section.[55] Where the accused consigned smaller quantities of goods but by tampering with railway receipts showed larger quantities and the firms, to which the railway receipts were endorsed, drew large sums of money commensurate with the large quantities of goods specified in the forged receipts, it was held that the accused was guilty under s 420 .[56] When the accused made a fraudulent representation that his institution was recognised by the government and thereby induced persons to part with their money, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under s 420 .[57]

For the purpose of establishing the offence of cheating, the complainant is required to show that the accused had fraudulent or dishonest intention at the time of making promise or representation. Merely because the vendor before execution of the sale deed surreptitiously demolished constructions existing on the plot sold to the complainant, did not constitute any offence. Proceedings for offence under s 420, IPC were quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[58]

As 'dishonestly' involves wrongful gain or wrongful loss, obviously the term does not apply to a case where no pecuniary question arises.[59]There would be no element of cheating in the act of a person who sells some drugs in bottles containing a false statement as to the brand, etc, unless there is evidence to show that the buyers were induced to buy the drug by the representation that appeared on the label. [60] In Yusuf Dehlavi v Laik Ahmed Hashmi ,[61] the allegation of the complainant was that his son sent an all correct solution to a crossword competition run by the accused, but he was not awarded the first prize. It was held that the decision of the editor being final and binding under the rules, under which the editor was not to enter into any correspondence whatsoever with the competitors, there was no deception of any kind on the part of the accused. If the facts of the case, as disclosed in the complaint, do not admit of any other conclusion except that the goods supplied by the accused, were not according to the instructions of the complainant and were found to be defective, then no case is made out under s 420, IPC .[62] The admission that the accused paid a major part of the price and defaulted only in regard to the balance of3635 the price some time later, is rather an indication of absence of any motive of deception at the commencement of the business dealing.[63] Where the cheque was issued for the price of the goods, but the bank was subsequently instructed to stop payment, no offence of cheating was held to have been made out.[64] Similarly, the obtaining of a railway receipt, though by false representation, without causing any damage or harm to, or without imposing any additional liability upon, the railways, was held not to be an offence under s 420, IPC .[65]

After suit for ejectment had been passed against the accused in respect of the land under s 163 of the HP Land Revenue Act, he entered into conspiracy with the patwari of the area, and got his name entered over the land in respect of which ejectment decree had been passed. Accused was convicted under s 420, IPC .[66]

Where the accused, in the capacity of Bank Manager, wrongfully exceeded limit of discounted bill facility causing loss to the bank, no offence was committed as it was resorted to achieve projected targets of business by bank. Accused was acquitted of the charge under s 420, IPC .[67]

16. Mere failure to keep Promise

For the purpose of constituting an offence of cheating, the complainant is required to show that the accused had fraudulent or dishonest intention at the time of making promise or representation. Even in a case where allegations are made in regard to failure on the part of the accused to keep his promise, in absence of a culpable intention at the time of making initial promise being absent, no offence under s 420 of the IPC can be said to have been made out.[68]

17. Hire Purchase Agreement

The breach of condition of hire-purchase agreement does not amount to an offence of cheating.[69] When the complainant has himself stated in the complaint that the accused had taken the vehicle on hire-purchase and had failed and neglected to pay certain instalments, in other words, the accused had paid certain instalments to the complainant after taking the vehicle on hire-purchase agreement. Therefore, there was no dishonest intention on the part of the accused on the date of entering into hire-purchase agreement to cheat or induce the complainant.[70]3636

18. Void Contracts

Criminal prosecution for cheating can be based even on an illegal contract.[71] If A induces B to part with a sum of money on assurance that he would exert his influence over the income-tax officer so as to persuade him to assess B in a particular manner, the criminal court has only to see what offence has been committed by A, and it is immaterial whether the offence involves an illegal or void contract which cannot be enforced in a civil court.[72] It would be wrong to say that a party should not be allowed to prosecute on a charge of cheating when he would not be entitled to obtain, from a civil court, any relief for breach of the contract.[73]

19. Arbitration Clause in the Agreement--No Effect on Offence

One of the clauses in the agreement of the parties provided for reference to arbitration under the Arbitration and Conciliation Act 1996 (26 of 1996) for reference to arbitration in case of disputes or controversies between the parties, and the said clause was wide enough to cover all sorts of disputes arising out of the agreement. Merely because there was an arbitration clause in the agreement, that cannot prevent criminal prosecution against the accused even if an act constituting a criminal offence is made out primafacie.[74]

20. Dishonoured Cheques

When a person issues a cheque or post dated cheque, he impliedly represents to the payee that in the ordinary course of events, the cheque on its presentation to the bank on or after the date, mentioned in the cheque would be met and the amount mentioned therein would be paid to the drawer or his agent.[75] It would depend on the totality of circumstances brought out on record whether the intention of the accused was to cheat or whether the cheques had been issued with the intention of making the payments, but subsequently funds could not be raised.[76] Giving of a cheque on a bank as payment for goods or in payment of a debt does not amount to representation that the person giving the cheque, has money in the bank when he issues the cheque; it does, however, amount to representation that he has authority to draw the cheque on the bank for that amount and the cheque is a good and valid order for the payment of its amount and the cheque will be paid, i.e., the existing state of facts is such that in that ordinary course the cheque will be met.[77] If the failure to meet payment of the3637 cheque is not accidental, it must be presumed that the accused had been aware that the cheque would be dishonoured and he would be guilty under s 420 .[78] The accused issued a cheque and induced the complainant to pass a receipt, therefore, knowing that the cheque would be dishonoured for want of funds. When the cheque was dishonoured, the complainant lodged a complaint against the accused for an offence under s 420, IPC, and the magistrate issued process. The High Court refused to interfere with the criminal proceedings under s 482, CrPC .[79]

A cheque was issued in discharge of an existing debt, though account was closed at that time, as there was no deception following the concealment, no offence under s 415, IPC was committed.[80]

The intention of drawer at the time, when the cheque is issued, is a material test and if it appears from the circumstances that the drawer did not expect that the cheque would be cashed in the normal course, it would be primafacie proof of his intention to cheat.[81] Similarly, in the case of a hundi negotiated as payable on sight and drawn on a firm which the accused knows would not pay the hundi.[82] In such cases the prosecution has to establish facts which point primafacie to the conclusion that the failure to meet the cheque was not accidental but a consequence expected and, therefore, intended by the accused. It will then be for the accused to establish any facts which may be in his favour and which are especially within his knowledge and as to which the prosecution cannot be expected to have any information.[83] Where the bank dishonoured a cheque on the ground of absence of a rubber stamp of the drawer and there was no evidence to show that the accused had deliberately omitted to put the rubber stamp on it, it was held that its absence would not be inconsistent with the innocence of the accused.[84] Where, under the rules, a cheque could not be accepted but it was offered and dishonoured, it was held that there was no question of dishonest intention in delivering the cheque.[85] When the cheque was issued by the accused for price of returned articles in a business transaction and there was nothing to show any dishonest or fraudulent intention on the part of the accused, the dishonour of the cheque does not attract s 420, IPC, as the ingredients of cheating are not attracted.[86] However, the mere fact that the postdated cheques were dishonoured does not make the accused guilty of cheating.[87]

The cheques issued by the appellant accused towards purchase price were dishonoured. There was neither any allegation nor any proof that the appellant had intention to cheat the respondent from the very beginning. Held, no offence of3638 criminal breach of trust or cheating was committed. Appellant was acquitted of the charges under ss 405 and 420, IPC .[88]

21. Dishonoured Cheque--Effect of Section 138, Negotiable Instruments Act 1881 (26 of 1881)

Even after the introduction of s 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act 1881, prosecution under s 420, IPC, is maintainable in case of dishonour of cheques or postdated cheques issued towards payments of price of goods purchased or loan taken, or in discharge of an antecedent debt or towards payment of goods supplied earlier. If the charge-sheet contains an allegation that the accused had dishonest intention not to pay at the time of issuance of the cheque, and the act of issuing the cheque, which was dishonoured, caused damage to his mind, body or reputation, a private complaint or FIR alleging offence under s 420, IPC, for dishonour of cheques or postdated cheques cannot be quashed under s 482, CrPC, if the averments in the complaint show that the accused had a dishonest intention to cause damage to the complainant's mind, body or reputation, by issuing the cheque which was not honoured.[89] An offence under s 138, Negotiable Instruments Act, need not necessarily take within its wings the offence of cheating as defined under s 415, IPC, since issuance of a cheque without sufficient funds was not made an offence, unless it falls within s 415 and is also generally not regarded as morally wrong or corrupt. It could be said that the offence under s 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act will not normally involve moral turpitude.[90] When after going through the contents and the ingredients of s 420, IPC, knowing fully well that the prosecution cannot be maintained thirty days after the waiting period from the date of issuing of notice, the accused approached the culprit dishonestly making a request to wait till a certain date promising that he would repay the amount, there is a primafacie case for the offence under s 420, IPC . Therefore, the prosecution in respect of s 420, IPC is not liable to be quashed.[91]

The cheques were post-dated ones; they were issued in the year 1996. They were presented before the bank on a much later date, only on 10 January 2001. When the cheques were issued, the accounts were operative. Even assuming that the accounts were closed subsequently, the same would not mean that the appellant had an intention to cheat when the post-dated cheques were issued. The ingredients of s 420, IPC were not satisfied in the case.[92]

22. Offences under Section 138, Negotiable Instruments Act 1881 and Section 420 --Principles of Double Jeopardy and Issue of Estoppel do not apply

The two offences covered by s 420, IPC and s 138, Negotiable Instruments Act are quite distinct and different offences even though sometimes there may be overlapping and sometimes the accused person may commit both the offences. The3639 two offences cannot be construed as arising out of same set of facts. Therefore, s 300, CrPC is not a bar for separate prosecutions for the offences punishable under s 420, IPC and s 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act . The question of application of the principles of double jeopardy or rule of estoppel does not come into play. The acquittal of the accused for the charge under s 420, IPC does not operate as estoppel or resjudicata for a finding of fact or law to be given in prosecution under s 138 of the Negotiable Instruments Act . The issue of fact and law to be tried and decided in prosecution under s 420, IPC are not the same issue of fact and law to be tried in a prosecution under s 138 of the Act.[1] Pendency of civil suit for recovery of amount would not bar complaint under s 420, IPC for dishonor of cheque.[2]A person once tried for dishonour of cheque under s 138, NI Act, can be tried again for offence of criminal breach of trust, cheating and abatement; the bar contained in the doctrine of double jeopardy would not operate.[3]

A person once tried for dishonour of cheque under s 138, NI Act, can be tried again for offence of criminal breach of trust, cheating and abatement; the bar contained in the doctrine of double jeopardy would not operate.[4]

A person cannot be prosecuted again for offence of cheating under s 420, IPC when he had already been tried and convicted for the same offence on the basis of another cheque issued during the course of the same transaction.[5]

23. Admission in Government College Based on Fake Mark-sheet

Production of a fake mark list to obtain admission to a course in a government college amounts to dishonestly inducing the college authorities. The accused thus cheated and dishonestly induced the selection committee to make them believe that fake mark list was a true and genuine document. When the first accused had, with knowledge produced a fake document in order to deceive the selection committee headed by the prosecution witness to obtain admission, he has committed the offence punishable under s 420, IPC .[6] It cannot be held that the property for the purpose of s 405, IPC would be non-corporeal property. It will have to be either movable or immovable property or the property which is transferable, consumable or capable of being spent and not one of the type of mark sheet which is intangible, non-transferable or nonexpendable. Mark sheet which is intangible, non-transferable and non-expandable is not property.[7]

24. Interpolations in Marks in Selection(s)

The accused, the Chairman and a member of a Subordinate Staff Selection Board in conspiracy with the third accused, a candidate, increased the numbers awarded in vivavoce test and included him in the list of selected candidates for pecuniary3640 benefits. The act of the three accused persons did not amount to an offence of forgery; the accused persons prepared false record of the final result also, committed cheating and hence were guilty of offence under s 218, s 420, s 477A and s 120B, IPC .[8]

25. Cheating by Delivery of Spurious Cold Drink

Section 420, IPC deals with cheating which must be proceeded with dishonest inducement to deliver any property as a consequence of such cheating. Even if the payment made by the informant for the cold drink in question be deemed to be delivery of property, it is essential to show that the informant has been cheated by delivery of a spurious cold drink. The matter then reverts back to the issue of the drink being spurious or not. The basic premises for prosecution on basis of the drink being spurious, would be the report of the public analyst which is wanting in the present case.[9]

26. Obtaining Allotment of Plot by Filing False Affidavit

Where the accused by concealing the facts made false averments in affidavits that he did not own any plot in his own name or his wife's name or any dependent member and got the allotment of plot under LIG Scheme, the conviction and sentence of accused under s 420 was found proper.[10]

27. Commercial Frauds

In mercantile transactions, consignments are delivered on credit and very often the payment cannot be made on the due date, but that does not attract penal consequences.[11] Where the financial schemes of the accused are of a highly speculative nature and there are fraudulent acts and omissions on the part of the accused in commercial transactions, they would be guilty of cheating. Where two partners of a firm, representing it to be a scheduled bank, published two bogus schemes under which persons making some deposits, were to receive much higher amounts in instalments and several false representations were made to the public and material facts were suppressed by the accused and a large number of persons were induced to make deposits, it was held that the accused were guilty of the offence under s 420 .[12] However, where the allegation against the accused was that they dishonestly induced the complainant to supply five truck-loads of flour and did not make full payment of price, the mere commercial transaction cannot be the sole reason to hold that no offence of cheating under s 420, IPC, was made out, however, when there was no material showing that other partner of the firm had taken an active part in inducing the complainant to supply the goods intending not to pay the price thereof, the order taking cognizance of offence under s 420, IPC, against them was not found proper.[13] In Akhil Kishore Ram v Emperor ,[14] the accused advertised a gupt3641 mantra, by reading which objects could be achieved without any efforts, and over twenty-five thousand clients paid good money for them, but while sending the mantra, the accused also sent instructions which could not be observed without long training and preparation, it was held that the accused was guilty under s 420 . However, the schemes for the grant of loan at cheap rates of interest, although highly speculative and somewhat chimerical or of a snowball nature, would not be dishonest or fraudulent if nothing is concealed from and everything is disclosed to the public regarding the scheme.[15]

In this case, the accused no. 3, the broker deceived Canbank Mutual Fund (CMF) by making a false representation and dishonestly induced the official of CMF to deliver Rs. 32.50 lakhs in his favour as brokerage and he dishonestly received the amount and thereby committed an offence under s 420, IPC . He was convicted under s 420, IPC and sentenced to 3 years' RI.[16]

If at the very initiation of the negotiations, it was evident that there was no intention to cheat, the dispute would be of civil nature. Such a conclusion would depend on the evidence to be led at the time of the trial.[17]

28. Fraudulent Transactions of Sales

Where the accused, a power of attorney holder of a firm of which his brother was the proprietor, submitted a quotation for the supply of generator set, the generator set which was supplied was found to be defective and he did not take any steps for the supply of new generator set, nor did he return the amount, the accused had deposited the entire quotation amount in the bank account of the firm but subsequently withdrew it and closed the account, primafacie case under ss 409 / 420, IPC was made out against him. The accused, through a power of attorney holder cannot absolve himself of civil and criminal liability.[18] Where the accused contracted to deliver fully made machine-ginned cotton but in fulfilment of the contract the accused delivered an admixture of inferior stuff, it was held that the accused was guilty under s 420, IPC .[19] Where liquor was sold by measuring with a glass not of prescribed measure and which fraudulently misrepresented the capacity, it was held that the accused could be more appropriately tried for the offence of cheating.[20] Selling of milk, adulterated with equal water, would be a case of cheating.[21] It has, however, been held that if watered milk and sweetmeats of inferior sort are sold, it would not be an offence if the purchaser knows and is told that the milk is watered and the purchaser has tested the sweetmeats before buying.[22] Where a mixture of saccharine and bicarbonate of soda was sold as genuine goods through a broker who made over the money to seller, it was held that the seller, but not the broker, was3642 guilty of the offence under s 420 .[23] Where the accused represented that the total land was jot land, executed sale deed, had received the consideration in money, but it was found that the land sold comprised khas land pathway, held, case of cheating was made out.[24]

To constitute an offence under s 420, IPC, there should not only be cheating but as a consequence of such cheating, the accused should have dishonestly induced the person deceived (i) to deliver any property to any person, or (ii) to make, alter or destroy wholly or in part a valuable security (or anything signed or sealed and which is capable of being converted into a valuable security. Where a person executed a sale deed under the belief that he is the owner of the property and the transferee takes the sale deed under the same impression, the accused would not be convicted for the offence of cheating.[25]

Where the appellant accused induced the complainant and others, to purchase land, received amount from them as part payment of the sale deed in respect of the land which did not belong to the appellant, issued bogus receipt also, further neither executed the sale deed, nor delivered possession of the land; the act of the appellant amounted to cheating; the appellant had dishonest intention. He was convicted for offence under s 420, IPC .[26]

The accused, 'power of attorney holder' of main accused gave assurance to the complainant that the title of the accused to the property was clear and free from encumbrances and that the main accused was the sole owner of the property, while the title was not clear. Primafacie case of cheating was there, the complainant had a case to go to the trial. Complaint was not quashed.[27] Breach of agreement for sale would not be an offence under s 420, IPC .[28] Failure to execute sale deed in terms of agreement for sale would not be an offence punishable under s 420, IPC .[29]

A person selling liquor bottles with false labels representing them to be genuine would be guilty under s 420, IPC . The cheating is complete as soon as sale to the purchaser on the false representation is complete and the price paid.[30] Where, however, a house dealer refused an offer from a person for a mare but later on showed to the purchaser a telegram from his agent by which he induced the purchaser to give a higher price for the mare, it was held that no wrongful loss was caused to that person by reason of the fact that he was induced to give a higher price for the horse and the offence under s 420 was not committed.[31] The complainant made the allegation that he was duped by the accused company. He supplied a consignment to the accused and there was no dispute regarding payment of price. The dispute related only to the non-conveyance of form 'H', the dispute being of a civil nature, the intention to deceive the complainant was not evident on the part of3643 the accused to attract s 420, IPC .[32] Complainant filed complaint under s 420, IPC with allegations that the accused withheld payment of certain material supplied to him. Held, the dispute was of civil nature, the complaint was filed to exert pressure on the accused for payment, no offence under s 420, IPC was committed.[33]

29. Bank loan

Appellant accused Bank Manager was alleged to have sanctioned loan for obtaining pecuniary advantage. Evidence showed that the loan sanctioned was secured by collateral security, the senior officer of the bank after conducting pre-sanction inspection had recommended the sanction of loan. Held, the appellant had not sanctioned loan dishonestly for obtaining pecuniary advantage. Appellant was acquitted of charges under ss 120B, 420 and 468, IPC .[34]

The accused Bank Manager had sanctioned loan to Government employees, without making any inquiry, without inspecting the site, the accounts of the Government employees were not opened, the loan amount sanctioned was credited to the accounts of the co-accused. Held, the accused Bank Manager and co-accused entered into conspiracy and defrauded Bank, their conviction under ss 420 / 120B, IPC was upheld.[35]

30. Non-payment of Bank Loan

In order to attract s 420, IPC, it is incumbent on the part of the prosecution to establish that the accused had deceived the bank while taking loan or that they had acted dishonestly or fraudulently. The accused persons had not given wrong address; the units in question did exist. Mere non-payment of the loan amount itself cannot be construed as satisfying the ingredients of s 420 of the IPC .[36]

31. Advocate on Bank Panel -- Prosecution

An advocate on a panel of bank giving legal opinion in loan cases cannot be mulcted with criminal prosecution unless evidence shows conspiracy between him and the conspirators accused. The liability against an opining advocate arises only when the lawyer was an active participant in a plan to defraud the Bank. In the present case there was no such evidence. Charges framed against the accused advocate under ss 120B, 420, 467 etc. IPC were quashed.[37]

32. Introduction for Opening Account does not Amount to Abetment of Cheating done by Account-holder

Where the accused merely introduced the co-accused to a bank for opening an account, and the said co-accused after six months presented bogus drafts and3644 withdrew the amount, and there was no evidence showing involvement of the accused in the fraud committed by the co-accused nor did he instigate the co-accused to present the bogus drafts, and the bank passed a self cheque of the co-accused when there was no sufficient money in his credit by acting on bogus drafts, the accused cannot be held responsible for the loss sustained by the bank. So, the conviction of the accused for abetment of cheating was found not proper.[38]

33. Attesting Witness not Liable to be made Co-accused for Omissions in Sale-deed

Where in a case of cheating under s 420 read with s 120, IPC against the accused that inasmuch as the land was sold concealing the fact that a revenue suit was pending with respect to the said land, the attesting witness was sought to be arraigned as the co-accused on the allegation that he persuaded the complainant to purchase the land, it was held that the mere fact that because the attesting witness had put his signatures on the sale deed as an attesting witness cannot be said that he was aware of the fact that a revenue dispute was pending with respect to the subject land. It was not for the attesting witness to verify the correctness of the contents of the document. So, the attesting witness was not liable to be arraigned with the co-accused for trial under ss 420 / 120, IPC .[39]

34. Fraud in the Matter of Tickets

Traveling in a railway carriage of a higher class than that for which the fare has been paid,[40] or giving of some luggage to a co-passenger to evade the charge for overweight,[41] or traveling without a ticket,[42] would not amount to cheating and would be punishable under the provisions of the Railways Act. Where the accused, a student, presented a certificate, issued to another student, who was entitled to travel by rail at reduced rates, and, on its basis, received a pass, it was held that the accused was not guilty of cheating, there being no rule prohibiting the transfer of student's ticket.[43] Where, however, a passenger produced an old pass with an altered date and number, it was held that he was guilty of an attempt to cheat.[44] Where a railway employee obtained a free pass for his wife and mother but handed it over to another woman who used it, it was held that the accused was guilty under s 420 .[45] Where, after traveling without ticket, the accused presented a forged railway pass in the name of the servant of an assistant auditor which was not meant for him, it was held that the accused was guilty under ss 419 and 511, IPC .[46]

35. Fraudulent Claim of Divine Healing Power

If somebody offers his prayers to God for healing the sick, there cannot normally be any element of fraud. However, if he represents to another that he has divine powers and either directly or indirectly makes that another person believe that he has such3645 divine powers, it is inducement referred to s 415, IPC . Anybody who responds to such inducement pursuant to it and gives the induced money or any other article and does not get the desired result, is a victim of fraudulent representation. The court can in such a situation presume that the offence of cheating falling within the ambit of s 420, IPC, has been committed. It is for the accused, in such a situation, to rebut the presumption.[47]

36. Promoting Speculative and Unworkable Scheme

Promoters of a financial snowball scheme, which could run only so long as there would be a continuous uninterrupted and enormously progressive increase in subscribers but which could not go on indefinitely, would not be guilty of cheating, in the absence of false representation and dishonest concealment of facts either in the prospectus issued or in the conduct of the promoters, calculated to deceive the public and thereby induce it to contribute money to the scheme.[48] In the absence of misrepresentation or suppression of any material facts with a view to defraud or cheat the public, the promoters of a money circulation scheme are not guilty of cheating even if the scheme is speculative and unworkable. It is for the legislature to intervene if it wants to protect people who participate in these schemes knowing that sooner or later the schemes are bound to fail.[49]

37. Filing of False Return

Filing of false return and evasion of tax may be punishable under s 46 of the Kerala General Sales Act, but does not constitute offence under s 420, IPC .[50]

38. Matrimonial Disputes

There has been an outburst of matrimonial disputes in recent times. Small matrimonial skirmishes suddenly erupt which often assume serious proportions resulting in commission of heinous crimes, in which even elders of the family are involved with the result that those who could have been counseled are rendered helpless on their being arrayed as accused in a criminal case. There are many other reasons which need not be mentioned here for not encouraging matrimonial litigation so that the parties may terminate their dispute amicably by mutual agreement instead of fighting it out in a court of law where it takes several years to conclude. Therefore, the Supreme Court may interfere in appropriate cases by exercising the powers under art 136 of the Constitution of India to give justice to parties.[51]

39. Palming Off Woman by Misrepresenting her Caste

In an old decision of the Allahabad High Court in Empress v Sheoram [52] it was held by Mahmood J:

> That to palm off a young woman as belonging to a caste different to the one to which she really belongs, with the object of obtaining money, amounts to the offence of3646 cheating by personation as defined in s 416 of the Indian Penal Code, which must be read in the light of the preceding, s 415 .

In an another decision in Queen Empress v Ramka Kom Sadhu ,[53] it was held that a prostitute may be charged for cheating under s 417 if the intercourse was induced by any misrepresentation on her part that she did not suffer from syphilis. In Queen v Dabee Singh ,[54] the Calcutta High Court convicted a person under s 417 who had brought two girls and palmed them off as woman of a much higher caste than they really were, and married them to two Rajputs after receiving the usual bonus. It was further held that the two Rajputs who married the two girls on the faith that they were marrying a woman of their own caste and status, were fraudulently and dishonestly induced by deception to do a thing (that is to say, to marry woman of a caste wholly prohibited to them) which but for the deception practiced upon them by the accused, they would have omitted to do. In another case which was almost similar to the one as mentioned above, namely Queen v Puddomonie Boistobee ,[55] a person was induced to part with his money and contract marriage under the false impression that the girl he was marrying was a Brahmin. The person who induced the complainant into marrying that girl was held liable for punishment under s 417, IPC .

Where the accused-respondent palmed off his sister as a woman of a much higher caste than she really was and the petitioner married her on the faith that he was marrying the woman of his own caste and status, the petitioner was said to have been fraudulently and dishonestly induced by deception to do a thing, i.e., marrying woman of caste wholly prohibited to him, which but for deception practiced upon him by accused respondent, he would have omitted to do. The offence committed by accused falls under the second part of s 415 and quashing of FIR filed by the petitioner under s 482 by the High Court on ground that s 415 necessarily relates to property, is incorrect.[56]

41. 'Induced'

43. Inducement and Deception--Deception Need not be by Express Words

Section 420, IPC deals with cheating and dishonestly inducing delivery of property. The offence of cheating is made of two ingredients. Deception of any person and fraudulently or dishonestly inducing that person to deliver any property to any person or to consent that any person shall retain any property. To put it differently, the ingredients of the offence are that the person deceived delivers to someone a valuable3647 security or property, that the person so deceived was induced to do so, that such person acted on such inducement in consequence of his having been deceived by the accused, and that the accused acted fraudulently or dishonestly when so inducing the person. To constitute the offence of cheating, it is not necessary that the deception should be by express words, but it may be by conduct or implied in the nature of the transaction itself.[57]

44. 'Property'

Commentary under the same heading in s 415, ante, may be referred to.

45. Delivery of Property

Commentary under the same heading in s 415, ante, may be referred to.

46. Preparation of false Muster Roll

There was evidence that the appellant Junior Engineer entered into criminal conspiracy with the co-accused Assistant Engineer for preparation of false muster roll, and as such false muster rolls were prepared showing names of casual labourers who had not even worked. Accused appellant verified, consigned muster-rolls, gave false certificates. His conviction under ss 120B, 467, 468, 471 and 420, IPC was held proper.[58]

47. 'To Any Person'

Delivery of the property need not be to the same person who has made the representation or who has dishonestly induced the person deceived (i.e., the complainant) to deliver the property. Delivery of the goods can be made to any person.[59] He may be the offender himself; he may be his agent (like post office) also.[60] What is material is that the goods are parted with as a result of the dishonest inducement by the accused.[61]

The word 'delivery' conveys the import and implication of the change of hands of the property or its transfer from one person to another, either directly or indirectly. Where the accused induced the colliery manager to give away a jeep for use of some other party, who was known to the manager and who had not requisitioned the jeep, and the jeep was driven all along by a servant of the colliery manager, it was held that there was no delivery of the jeep to the accused, it being all along with the manager's driver, and the accused was guilty under s 417 and not under s 420 .[62] Property is delivered when something in the ownership or possession of one man is delivered into the ownership or possession of another.[63]3648

48. 'Valuable Security'

Commentary of s 30, vol 1, may be referred to.

49. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, compoundable, with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.[64] Offence under s 420, IPC is a compoundable offence. Where the parties subsequently entered into compromise, the compounding petition was allowed.[65]

The provision of s 218, CrPC, would apply only in such case where the distinct offences for which the accused is charged are being tried before the same magistrate and not before a different magistrate. Further, the case where different persons are alleged to have been defrauded by the accused cannot be regarded as committing a single series of transaction as each offence was a distinct one, so s 220, CrPC, also does not apply and the offences tried before the different magistrates cannot be directed to be transferred to be tried by a single magistrate.[66]

50. Compromise in Civil Suit does not Compound Offence of Cheating

A creditor, who files a complaint alleging cheating by the accused, is not precluded from seeking civil remedy for recovery of the amount advanced. In fact, he will be more interested in recovering his dues rather than in pursuing punitive action. In his endeavour to recover the money, he may enter into a compromise or arrangement for payment by the debtor in instalments. That automatically does not result in compounding of the offence. If a prayer is made for permission to compound the offence, the payment made in furtherance of such arrangement may be taken into consideration, while considering such prayer. The conduct of the debtor in meeting his obligation as per compromise before civil court is very much material. An offer of the debtor to repay the amount, when cornered is not sufficient to allow an offence to be compounded.[67]

51. Compounding of Offence under Tax Immunity Scheme--Subsequent Initiating of Criminal Proceedings is Double Jeopardy

The Kar Vivad Samadhan Scheme of 1998 sought to provide a quick and voluntary settlement of tax dues outstanding as on 31 March 1998, both in various direct tax enactments as well as indirect tax enactments by offering waiver of a part of the arrear taxes and interest and providing immunity against institution of prosecution and imposition of penalty. Immunity was granted to the persons in respect of whom the offence was punishable under ch IX or ch XVII of the IPC . In view of the compounding of criminal offence qua certificate obtained under the Kar Vivad Samadhan Scheme of 1998, the customs duty was paid by the accused Gujarat Cancer Society (GCS) and settled under Kar Vivad Samadhan Scheme. Despite acknowledging this fact, the CBI initiated criminal proceedings under the IPC against3649 GCS on the allegations of cheating the Government of India in terms of evasion of duty and by concealment of facts obtained customs duty exemption certificate, such proceedings initiated by CBI were held to be erroneous as they amounted to double jeopardy since pursuant to certificate granted to the accused under the said scheme alleged criminal liability stood compounded on the settlement with respect to civil issues.[68]

52. Jurisdiction

Chapter XIII, CrPC, deals with the jurisdiction of criminal courts in inquiries and trial. Section 177 , CrPC, stipulates general rule of jurisdiction whereas ss 178 to 182, CrPC, embody the exceptions. The general principle of law is that all crimes are to be tried by the court within the jurisdiction in which the offence had been committed. However, s 178, CrPC, says that when it was uncertain in which of several local areas an offence was committed or where an offence is committed partly in one local area and partly in another area, the court having jurisdiction over any one of such local area has the jurisdiction to try the offence. It means that the cases can be tried before either of the court and it is an exception to the general rule envisaged in s 177, Crpc . Section 182 , CrPC, is more specific regarding governing of the venue of trial in cases of cheating leading to delivery of goods. However, it does not say that the court wherein the property has been delivered alone have the jurisdiction to try the offence. It would indicate that the court within the jurisdiction of which the property had been delivered, also have jurisdiction to try the offence. By specifying the jurisdiction of a court by s 182(1), CrPC, the jurisdiction conferred on different courts in view of s 178, CrPC, is not all constrained or taken away. When part of the offence had been committed within the jurisdiction of one court and the remaining part within the jurisdiction of another court, both the courts have jurisdiction to try the offence in view of s 178, CrPC . The provisions of the statute should be read with as to harmonize one another and one section cannot be used to defeat another. The court has to give a harmonious construction to both the provisions so that the full effect may be given to both without one excluding the other there being no seeming conflict or repugnance in the two. When it was uncertain in which of several local areas an offence was committed or the offence has been committed partly within one local area, partly in another local area, both courts have jurisdiction to try the offence.[69] The matter had been considered by the Delhi High Court in Bhola Nath Arora v State ,[70] where it was held:

> In a case of cheating it could not be contended that s 182 being a more specific provision would only govern the venue of trial in cases of cheating leading to delivery of goods and as such it would exclude the general principle of jurisdiction under s 177 . On a mere juxta-position of the two ss 177 and 182 it is manifest that the latter provisions supplements and does not supplant the general rule. Therefore it is the duty of the court to give a harmonious construction to both the provisions so that full effect may be given to both without one excluding the other, there being no seeming conflict or repugnance in the two. Hence, when s 177 conveys a clear meaning it is not permissible to construe the same with reference to another section, i.e., s 182 for the purpose of controlling or diminishing the efficacy of the former.3650

In K Satwant Singh v State of Punjab [71] the question that had come up before the Supreme Court was whether the case can be tried either before the Lahore court or before the Simla court where the misrepresentation by the accused was at Simla and the consequence was at Lahore as the government of Burma was induced by the misrepresentation to deliver property at Lahore. There the Supreme Court held that the offence of cheating by the accused could have been tried either at Lahore or at Simla. In Satvinder Kaur v State (Govt of NCT of Delhi) ,[72] the Supreme Court held:

> A reading of ss 177 and 178, CrPC, would make it clear that section 177 provides for 'ordinary' place of enquiry or trial. Section 178,interalia, provides for place of enquiry or trial when it is uncertain in which of several local areas an offence was committed or where the offence was committed partly in one local area and partly in another and where it consisted of several acts done in different local area, it could be inquired into or tried by a court having jurisdiction over any of such local areas.

In view of s 178(a) and (d), CrPC, when it is uncertain in which of several local areas an offence was committed or where it consists of several acts done in different local areas, it may be inquired into or tried by a court having jurisdiction over any of such local areas. In the decision reported in Navinchandra N Majithia v State of Maharashtra ,[73] the Supreme Court had considered whether the Bombay High Court had jurisdiction to quash the complaint filed in Shillong. There the Supreme Court held that as part of the cause of action had occurred within the jurisdiction of the Bombay High Court, the Bombay High Court had the jurisdiction to quash the proceedings. Where the deception was practiced and inducement was made to the complainant for entering into an agreement relating to purchase of estate at place C, the court at place C, has jurisdiction to try the complaint pertaining to offence of cheating under ss 417 and 420, IPC .[74]

53. Jurisdiction of Gram Panchayat

Investigation of the case for offence under s 420, IPC is to be conducted by the police authorities where the allegations are of a serious nature and the appellants have duped the complainant of Rs. 30 lakhs. In such cases accused should be tried by the regular criminal Court only and not by the Gram Panchayat.[75]

54. Dropping of Proceedings by Magistrate

It is open to the accused to plead before the magistrate that process against him ought not to have been issued. The magistrate may drop the proceedings if he is satisfied on reconsideration of the complaint that there is no offence for which the accused could be tried. It is his judicial discretion. No specific provision is required for the magistrate to drop the proceedings or rescind the process. The order issuing process is an interim order, and not a judgment. It can be varied or recalled. The fact that process has already been issued is no bar to drop the proceedings if the complaint on the very face of it does not disclose any offence against the accused.[76] Where the allegations were that the accused fraudulently induced the complainant to purchase a3651 plot by falsely representing it to have been approved for commercial use, there was no evidence showing that the accused had any dishonest intention at the time the complainant paid the amount towards the sale consideration, the essential ingredients to prove the offence of cheating were absent. Likewise, the order of the magistrate dropping proceedings cannot be interfered with in revision.[77]

55. Sanction for Prosecution of Government Servant

No sanction under s 197, CrPC, for prosecuting an accused under ss 420, 468, 471 and 486 read with s 34, IPC, is necessary. For an offence under s 420, IPC, i.e., cheating, no government servant can claim to be purported to have acted in the discharge of duties keeping in view, the inherent ingredients of the offence of cheating.[78] The question whether the accused was still in service or had retired is also immaterial.[79] If a government servant is prosecuted for the act of certification of false bills which were sent to him for verification, the act of thus abetting the principal offenders cannot be said to have possibly been done in the discharge of official duties as a public servant.[80] Where a process server, authorised to recover only process fees, recovered an excess amount on a false representation and made false entries in the counterfoils of receipt, it was held that no sanction was necessary.[81] Where, however, a government servant submitted a false bill for encashment purporting to do so in the discharge of his duties as a clerk of the office, it was held that a sanction for prosecution under s 197 was necessary as the act of false representation, which resulted in the offence of cheating, being completed, was done in the course of his official duties by him.[82]

56. Accused Employed with Government Company or Public Sector Undertaking--No Sanction Required

In Mohd Hadi Raja v State of Bihar ,[83] the Supreme Court has held that though the public sector undertakings and government companies are held as state within the meaning of art 12 of the Constitution of India, no sanction is necessary under s 197, CrPC, to prosecute a person belonging to such undertakings or government companies, because those undertakings and government companies, being a juridical person and a distinct legal entity, stand on a different footing than a government department. The aforesaid judgment of the Supreme Court reveals that while considering the question involved, the Supreme Court has taken into consideration the definition of word 'Public Servant' as given under s 21 of the IPC . The Supreme Court has further observed in the judgment as under:

> It will be appropriate to notice that whenever there was felt need to include other functionaries within the definition of 'public servant', they have been declared to be3652 'public servant' under several special and local Acts. If the legislature had intended to include officers of instrumentality or agency for bringing such officers under the protective umbrella of section 197 , CrPC, it would have done so expressly.

Therefore, the criteria that is laid down by the Supreme Court in this regard is that, firstly, the officers of the public undertaking or government companies are not public servants and even if they are so unless they are included in s 197, CrPC, the protection of obtaining sanction or requirements of obtaining sanction would not be applicable to them.[84]

57. Quashing of FIR/Complaint/Criminal Proceedings under Section 482 , CrPC

Commentary under the relevant headings in s 406, ante, may be referred to.

58. Criminal Proceedings Quashed under Section 482 , CrPC --Cases

In a simple money transaction between seller and purchaser, no provision of IPC can be said to have been attracted. So, the complaint under ss 420, 406, 114, 506, IPC is liable to be quashed.[85] The complaint was filed alleging that there was a conspiracy between officials of the state financial corporation and the accused persons for purchasing unit at a price lower than market value to run a technical institute by the trust. The accused, principal of the said technical institution, took the premises on hire from other accused persons. There was no whisper about any role played by the said accused-principal in the said transaction. There was no prima facie evidence to establish conspiracy as alleged in the sale of the unit in favour of the accused persons. The proceedings against the accused-principal were quashed by the High Court taking recourse to s 482, CrPC .[86] The accused, a registered dealer, purchased certified seeds from a licensed company and sold the same to complainant at the fixed price. Merely because the seed does not give proper yield, it cannot be presumed that there was any cheating on the part of the accused who was neither having any dishonest intention to cheat, nor there was any wrongful gain to him. The basic ingredients of the offence under s 420 of the IPC were not made out. So, the complaint was quashed.[87] When neither any guilty intention can be attributed to the accused persons nor can there possibly be any intention on their part to deceive the complainant, no offence of cheating can, therefore, be said to have been committed by the accused persons and criminal proceedings against them are liable to be quashed.[88]

Mere non-payment of debt does not attract an offence under s 420, IPC, so the criminal proceedings are liable to be quashed.[89] When there was no allegation that the accused ever induced the complainant to enroll as a member of the chit fund established by the accused's brother, the allegations in the complaint did not disclose commission of an offence under s 420, IPC, the complaint was found liable to be quashed under s 482, CrPC .[90] When the complainant himself stated that the accused3653 had taken the vehicle on hire purchase from him had failed and neglected to pay certain instalments, the accused had no dishonest intention on the date of entry to cheat or induce the complainant and therefore complaint against the accused was quashed.[1] In a complaint against accused persons alleging non-payment of construction work done under the agreement, the plea was that part payment was already made by the accused and balance withheld alleging sub-standard work done. The controversy between the parties appeared to be a civil dispute since there was total absence of criminal dishonest intention to dupe the contractors right from the inception of the agreement. Therefore, the order taking cognizance of offence under ss 406 and 420, IPC, was quashed.[2] When the FIR does not disclose ingredient of offences alleged therein and punishable under s 420, IPC*etc*, it deserves to be quashed and set aside.[3] Where the averments in the complaint do not indicate that the complainants were fraudulently made to part with the amount, the complaint showed dishonouring of commitment and avoiding the contract by the accused, the dispute between the parties was wholly and purely of a civil nature alleging breach of contract, the FIR under s 420, IPC, was quashed.[4] When, in an essentially regular commercial transaction with no mala fides at all, the offence under s 420, IPC, is not attracted, the proceeding against the accused was quashed.[5] The complainant alleged that he was duped by the accused company. The complainant supplied the consignment to the accused but there was no dispute regarding payment of price. The dispute related only to non-conveyance of form 'H' and was of a civil nature. The criminal proceedings under s 420 etc were quashed.[6] The offence under s 468 is intimately connected with ss 422 and 465 . When the main allegation in the complaint is of forgery and cheating is the consequential offence, and if the offence of forgery goes, then the offence of cheating cannot stand and the complaint is liable to be quashed.[7]

The transaction between the parties was for supply of goods. Admittedly, except supply of Form IX-C, other terms and conditions of the contract had been complied with by them. Per se, supply or non-supply of Form IX-C of the Bihar Sales Tax Rules by the accused to the complainant had nothing to do with the transactions for which the parties had entered into a contract. Non-issuance of the said form ex-facie cannot give rise to commission of any offence, no offence under s 420, IPC is committed. If the appellant or their principal were obligated to act under a statute and failed to perform their duties, as the statute itself provides for a remedy, ordinarily3654 the same is required to be taken recourse to. Proceedings for offence under s 420, IPC on petition filed under s 482, CrPC were quashed.[8]

The complaint under s 420, IPC was instituted on allegations that the accused had no title to the property but had received Rs.60 lacs as advance from the complainant under agreement for sale. On the date of sale agreement, litigation about title to the suit property had not commenced, there was no primafacie case that the accused had deliberately suppressed information about dispute relating to the agreement property. Proceedings under s 420, IPC were quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[9]

59. Civil remedy

Merely because the allegations relating to transaction between the parties give rise to a civil action that would not be a bar to prosecution for commission of offence.[10] Where the facts of the case disclose a civil dispute and also criminal offence, criminal prosecution is not barred, cannot be quashed.[11] A civil dispute can give rise to both civil and criminal liability.[12] Pendency of a civil suit is not a bar for initiating criminal prosecution arising out of same set of facts. Both civil and criminal remedies are concurrent.[13]

60. Pendency of Civil Suit-- Complaint when Liable to be Quashed

Where the matter is purely of a civil nature and the ingredients of the offence of cheating have not been made out even as per the complaint, the suit between the parties is pending where even the accused persons have lodged counter-claims and, therefore, the complaint even prima facie does not disclose any offence allegedly committed by the accused persons under s 420, IPC, the summoning orders of the accused are liable to be quashed and the complaint of the complainant is liable to be dismissed.[14] The prosecution case was that the accused prepared a forged sale deed to usurp the land of the complainant. The purchasers had not filed a complaint. Question whether a person/vendor had a right to execute sale deed with regard to land is a pure question of civil nature. Proceedings for offence under s 420, IPC are abuse of the process of the Court.[15]

61. Criminal Proceedings not Quashed--Cases

Where the petitioner, a senior IPS officer was also the trustee of a charitable trust found by his family, a land, measuring about 26 bighas had been registered in the revenue records in the name of the trust and the petitioner's trust was beneficiary of such entries, the prima facie fraudulent action of land grabbing was done by the beneficiary in connivance of the revenue officials, the court should neither grant stay of arrest, nor the criminal proceedings can be quashed.[16] In the face of the admission3655 by the accused company that it issued cheques to the complainant company in spite of knowledge of insufficient funds and the fact that investigation by the police was still incomplete, the prayer for quashing the proceedings under s 420, IPC, was declined.[17] If a complaint in its entirety discloses commission of an offence, it cannot be quashed.[18] Inherent powers are meant to be exercised by the High court sparingly and with circumspection when there is reason to believe that process of law is being misused to harass a citizen.[19] The accused had received balls of cotton worth crores of rupees and sold the same to others and earned a huge profit, and even thereafter did not pay the money. Merely because the transaction was commercial and civil proceedings can be initiated against the accused, it cannot be said that the offence under s 420, IPC, is not made out against the accused. The order taking cognizance and issuance of process against the accused was found proper and the petition under s 482, CrPC, for quashing the same was dismissed.[20]

The allegations in the complaint were that the complainant-land owner was induced by BPCL-accused to lease out the land for opening a petrol outlet on the assurance that he will be given a dealership. The complainant was also made to give a bank guarantee of Rs 4 lakhs, but finally the scheme was changed and the dealership was given to some other person. On these facts it can be said that the intention of the accused was not bonafide since the very beginning, so the order of the magistrate taking cognizance, of the offence under ss 468, 420, etc was found proper and the petition for quashing the same, filed by the accused was dismissed.[21] The accused was alleged to have executed a sale deed on the strength of a fake power of attorney executed by an impostor. The accused was an active participant in the offence, so the High Court declined to quash under s 482, CrPC, the criminal prosecution of the accused under s 420, IPC .[22]

When the prosecutrix was cheated in body, mind and reputation because of deception by the accused with the dishonest intention to sexually exploit her and a primafacie case existed against the accused for framing charges under ss 417 and 493, IPC, the application of the accused under s 482, CrPC, for quashing the proceedings was dismissed.[23] The accused issued a cheque and induced the complainant to pass a receipt, therefore, knowing that the cheque would be dishonoured for want of funds. When the cheque was dishonoured, the complainant lodged a complaint against the accused for an offence under s 420, IPC and the magistrate issued process. The High Court refused to interfere with the criminal proceedings under s 482, CrPC .[24] Where the allegations in the complaint showed that the accused while selling immovable property to the complainant made a representation that out of the sale consideration, he would pay the amount due to the3656 co-operative bank under the mortgage but did not pay the said amount, and accused further made a false representation by entering into another agreement in which he asserted that the amount due to the co-operative bank has been cleared, the ingredients of the offence of cheating, primafacie was made out, so the High Court declined to quash the criminal proceeding.[25] The accused used a false certificate and thereby made false representation regarding her eligibility and obtained an appointment. The offence under s 420, IPC, is therefore attracted, and the charge against the accused cannot be quashed.[26]

62. Pendency of Civil Suit--Criminal Case should be Stayed

Commentary under the same heading in s 405, ante, may be referred to.

63. Magistrate Ordering further Investigation--Accused need not be Heard

Power of the police to conduct further investigation, after laying the final report, is recognised under s 173(8) of CrPC . Even after the court took cognizance of any offence on the strength of the police report first submitted, it is open to the police to conduct further investigation. This has been so stated by this court in Ram Lal Narang v State (Delhi Admn) .[27] The only rider provided by the aforesaid decision is that it would be desirable that the police should inform the court and seek formal permission to make further investigation.

In such a situation the power of the court to direct the police to conduct further investigation cannot have any inhibition. There is nothing in s 173(8), CrPC to suggest that the court is obliged to hear the accused before any such direction is made. Casting of any such obligation on the court would only result in encumbering the court with the burden of searching for all the potential accused to be afforded with the opportunity of being heard. As law does not require it, we would not burden the magistrate with such an obligation.[28]

64. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you cheated AB by dishonestly inducing him to deliver... (mention the property) to...(name the person to whom property in question was delivered) (or to make, alter or destroy the whole, or any part, of a valuable security or anything which is signed or sealed and which is capable of being converted into a valuable security), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 420 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.3657

Framing of alternative charge under ss 406 to 409 and s 420, IPC, is not illegal.[29] The court ought to make it clear in the charge in the first place that there was cheating and secondly that the person deceived was dishonestly induced either to deliver property to any person or to make, alter or destroy the whole, or any part, of a valuable security or anything which was signed or sealed and which was capable of being converted into a valuable security.[30] The charge should state that the property obtained was the property of the person deceived.[31] If the charge does not say that any person was deceived or any deceived person was dishonestly induced to deliver any property to any person, the charge is defective.

However, the defect is not material if the accused understands the charge and is not prejudiced.[32] If there is some apparent defect in the form of charge and there is no prejudice to the accused, it will not vitiate the trial.[33] Where the case set up against the accused was a general conspiracy to cheat the government of large sums of money but the allegations amounted to three charges of three different conspiracies, it was held that it was not a bad charge as the accused knew what the charge was.[34] Where the directors of a bank induced the depositors to make deposits in the bank, which was really insolvent, by means of false balance-sheets and false reports and were charged under s 420, it was held that the amendment of the charge, by adding the word 'and by intentionally keeping the bank open as a going concern after it had ceased to be solvent', was not bad in law and the accused were not thereby prejudiced in their defence.[35]

Where charge has been framed under s 409, IPC, but the evidence establishes the offence of cheating, the accused can be convicted under s 420, IPC instead of cheating.[36]

A charge under this section should mention the nature of the representation by which the accused was induced to make over goods.[37] It is not sufficient to set out, in the charge, only 'by deceiving with false representation and promises as well as by conduct'. Such an expression would be too vague and indefinite to give the accused proper notice of the manner of the deceit.[38] However, the trial of a case is not vitiated simply because the charge does not specify the instances of cheating and the manner thereof, vagueness of the charge being a mere irregularity.[39] If the charge makes an omission in giving the exact date but the month is given, the irregularity would be curable.[40] When, the complainant in his statement under s 161, CrPC stated that the accused, before the marriage, had informed that they originally belonged to the Parsi religion and later converted to Islam, the allegation of cheating by not disclosing3658 their original religion by the accused persons at the time of marriage was not well founded, so the order of the magistrate dismissing the petition for framing of charge under s 420, IPC, was found proper.[41] However, when the accused did not issue a qualifying certificate despite the fact that the complainant was declared successful in the examination and charges of misusing the money was primafacie established against the accused, the order framing charges under s 420, IPC, cannot be quashed.[42]

When the materials collected by the prosecuting agency are sufficient to raise a very strong suspicion to form a presumptive opinion as to the existence of the factual ingredients which constitute the offences under ss 420 / 120B, IPC, alleged to be committed by the accused persons, the circumstantial evidence on the record prima facie shows that the alleged criminal conspiracy was executed with ingenuity, deterring and adroitness, the order framing charge against the accused person was found proper.[43]

In a case of fraud and misappropriation of the government money, the charge against the accused was of dishonestly processing and verifying fake bills, the plea that the accused had signed the bills in question in the normal course of her duty and the accounts section was negligent in verifying them is not tenable because once a person signs on a document he or she is expected to make some enquiry before signing it.[44]

65. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, prove[45] that :

(a) the accused cheated some person (i.e., the complainant);

(b) he did so dishonestly; and
(c) he thereby induced the person deceived (i.e., the complainant):

(i) to deliver any property to any person, or
(ii) to make, alter or destroy the whole, or any part, of a valuable security or anything which was signed or sealed and which was capable of being converted into a valuable security.

The prosecution must prove that the complainant was cheated and thereby he was dishonestly induced to deliver money to the accused. Merely parting with money will not amount to cheating.[46] In a case under s 420, IPC, the burden is on the prosecution to show that delivery of property was made as a consequence of some false statements made by the accused or on the basis of the accused causing the complainant to mislead as to a matter of fact or leading him to certain errors. The statements or assertions must be false to the knowledge of the accused.[47] The prosecution must show not only that the accused cheated someone, but also that by3659 doing so he dishonestly induced the person deceived to deliver any property etc.[48] Dishonest intention on the part of accused at the time of making the representation to the complainant, on the basis of which the complainant parts with his property, is an essential ingredient of the offence. Mens rea on the part of the accused must be established before he can be convicted for the offence of cheating.[49] In the absence of proof of mensrea, there can be no conviction under s 420, IPC . Similarly, the prosecution must establish that the accused acted dishonestly in inducing the victims to part with their property.[50] An error of judgment, or a breach of performance of duty, 'per se', cannot be equated with dishonest intention.[51]

A dishonest intention cannot be inferred to a reasonable certainty from the mere fact that the accused could not fulfil his promise.[52]It is true that subsequent acts and the conduct of the accused may furnish materials for judging the intention of the accused at the time of the alleged promise or inducement, but his subsequent act is not the sole criterion for judging the said intention. So long as the criminal intention of the accused at the time of the alleged inducement or promise is not established, the accused cannot be held guilty of an offence under s 420 .[53] Similarly, from the mere circumstances that six post-dated cheques of the accused were dishonoured by his bankers, the offence of cheating cannot be made out.[54] Similarly, when there was no false representation in regard to the selection of the accused as drawing master possessing the minimum qualification for appointment as such, no offence of cheating was held to have been constituted.[55]

The prosecution must show that when the accused entered into a transaction with the complainant, he had no intention to pay the money and that he was actuated by a dishonest intention to cheat the complainant.[56] However, once a finding is categorically recorded that the accused had submitted false claims to the government for obtaining payment of money, no burden can be placed on the prosecution to establish that the accused had knowledge of the bogus nature of his claims. Knowledge involves the state of mind of the accused and no direct evidence of that knowledge can possibly be given by the prosecution.[57] Intention can be gathered only from the surrounding circumstances.[58] Though the subsequent bare denial of a transaction by the accused may not lead to the inference of dishonest intention on his part at the time of the bargain, it is permissible to utilise that denial in conjunction with the other circumstances in the case to find dishonest intention. It is open to the prosecution to show that the acts charged against the accused were parts of, and series of, similar acts committed by him at or about the time in question. Evidence of3660 such other acts, whether previous or subsequent to the frauds charged, is relevant for showing whether the intention of the accused was honest or fraudulent.[59]

Where there was no overt act to show that the accused endorsed the stand, taken by the other accused, nor was there any legal evidence to the effect that he had any knowledge regarding activity of the other accused, it was held that the mere fact that he accompanied the other accused, was not sufficient to hold him liable under ss 420 / 471 / 34, IPC . It was the duty of the prosecution, before the accused could be convicted under ss 420 / 471 / 34, IPC, to prove that he knew, from before, that the receipts used by the other accused were forged and that he shared the fraudulent intention with the other accused in passing as genuine, forged receipts, and obtaining donations from various persons on false pretexts.[60] Where the accused had sold some stolen shares on the false representation that they belonged to him, it was held that the prosecution had to show that the representation was false to the knowledge of the accused and was made in order to deceive the complainant and to induce him to buy.[61] If misrepresentation has to be proved for establishing a charge of cheating, it would be better to get the exact words used by the accused.[62] Where the accused persons, the employees of the municipal board, were alleged to have entered into conspiracy with private persons, for getting the land allotted to them thereby causing wrongful loss to the municipal board and the evidence on record showed that the allotment of land was in accordance with law, there was no evidence to show that any personal gain was obtained by the accused persons or there was any loss to the municipal board. The acquittal of the accused persons under ss 120B, 420 and 109, IPC, was therefore found proper.[63]

The appellant was not assigned any duty in respect of processing or signing the advertisement bills, but she in collusion with the co-accused processed and signed bogus bills worth Rs. 30,30,057 to cheat the Corporation, framing of charge against the accused under ss 420, 429, 468 and 471, IPC was held proper.[64]

Where prosecution evidence showed that accused made false documents for the purpose of cheating and these documents were used as genuine for obtaining passport, accused were convicted for offences under ss 120B and 420, IPC .[65]

66. Dishonest Intention must Exist from the very Beginning for Contract/ Agreement to be Fraudulent

Mere breach of contract cannot give rise to criminal prosecution for cheating unless fraudulent or dishonest intention is shown right from the beginning of the transaction, i.e., the time when the offence is said to have been committed.[66] Mere breach of contract simpliciter dos not constitute an offence.[67] To hold a person guilty3661 of cheating, it is necessary to hold that he had fraudulent or dishonest intention at the time of making the promise.[68] When there is nothing in the complaint to show that the intention of the accused from the very beginning was fraudulent or dishonest, the criminal complaint under s 420, IPC, is liable to be quashed.[69] In order to attract the offence under ss 420 and 415, IPC, the stage at which fraudulent or dishonest intention should exist is at the time of making inducement, otherwise, mere failure to keep a promise subsequently cannot be presumed as an act leading to cheating.[70]

67. Expert Evidence

Section 45 of the Evidence Act which makes opinion of experts admissible lays down that when the court has to form an opinion upon a point of foreign law, or of science, or art, or as to identity of handwriting or finger impressions, the opinion upon that point of persons specially skilled in such foreign law, science or art, or in questions as to identify of handwriting, or finger impressions are relevant facts. Therefore, in order to bring the evidence of a witness as that of an expert, it has to be shown that he has made a special study of the subject or acquired a special experience therein or in other words that he is skilled and has adequate knowledge of the subject.[71]

An expert is not a witness of fact. His evidence is really of an advisory character. The duty of an expert witness is to furnish the judge with the necessary scientific criteria for testing the accuracy of the conclusions so as to enable the judge to form his independent judgment by the application of this criteria to the facts proved by the evidence of the case. The scientific opinion evidence, if intelligible, convincing and tested becomes a factor and often an important factor for consideration along with the other evidence of the case. The credibility of such a witness depends on the reasons stated in support of his conclusions and the data and materials furnished which form the basis of his conclusions.[72]

The report submitted by an expert does not go in evidence automatically. He is to be examined as a witness in court and has to face cross-examination. The Supreme Court in the case of Hazi Muhammad Ikramul Haque v State of West Bengal ,[73] concurred with the finding of the High Court in not placing any reliance upon the evidence of an expert witness on the ground that his evidence was merely an opinion unsupported by any reasons.[74] Where, in the scheme of the state government to purchase disease affected apples from its growers and destroy them, and allegations were that some growers had obtained payments by showing inflated quantities of scabbed apples and thereby cheated the state, the expert's evidence as to the fruit bearing capacity of orchards in question, belonging to said growers was obtained. The expert visited the orchards only during the succeeding year and that too after the apple season was over. The expert neither made any scientific study nor research in3662 such assessment, nor did he undertake such job earlier. He did not even state, whether, he had undertaken any such work, prior to the case in question. No doubt as an officer of the horticulture department of the state government, he might have acquired some experience in the matter, but that was not sufficient to make him an expert, in the field and to give the label of expert evidence to his testimony. The report of the expert was found unreliable and inadequate to establish charges against the accused.[75]

68. Accused Charged under Section 420 but Convicted under Section 419 by Trial Court cannot be Convicted under Section 420 in Appeal

The offence punishable under s 420, IPC for cheating is not a minor offence in terms of s 222 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 to find the accused guilty under that section, instead of s 419 because the punishment provided for that offence under s 419 is imprisonment only for a term which may extend to three years, while that for the offence under s 420 may extend to imprisonment for seven years. When the accused is already acquitted by the trial court for the offence under s 420 and convicted under s 419 and the state had not filed an appeal against the order of acquittal under s 420, she cannot be convicted of the offence under s 420 in appeal.[76]

69. Conviction by Foreign Court -- If Bar?

Conviction of the accused by a foreign court for the offence would not bar prosecution of the accused under the Indian Penal Code .[77]

70. Acquittal

No conviction for cheating can be passed on mere surmises and conjectures.[78] The High Court can quash a conviction for cheating, even though there are concurrent findings of fact to the contrary, if there is nothing on the record to justify them.[79] If, for the purpose of an offence under s 477A, IPC, the court finds that the entries, made by the accused in the gate-passes, were made inadvertently and negligently, but not wilfully or with a view to defraud, and that finding becomes final, it would not be open to the court to find subsequently on the charge under s 420, IPC, that the entries on the gate-passes were not made inadvertently and negligently, but dishonestly. The findings of fact, to the effect that the gate-passes were made inadvertently and negligently, and not wilfully or with intent to defraud, which led to the acquittal of the accused on the charge under s 477A, IPC, must be that acquittal having become final, operate to the benefit of the accused and lead to his acquittal on the charge under s 420, IPC, also.[80] An accused cannot be convicted under ss 420 / 34, IPC, or under ss 471 / 34, IPC, when there is no evidence to establish that he had any knowledge regarding the activity of his co-accused and when the only evidence is that he merely accompanied the co-accused wherever the latter went for collecting donations.[81] Where there was no evidence at all to show that the accused practiced3663 any fraud on the complainant and thereby induced him to part with the cloth, nor was there any evidence to the effect that the accused knew that the complainant was not paid for the cloth, and the only circumstances was that he was the partner of the second accused and that they had hired a room where the cloth was stored, it was held that so much was not sufficient to show that the accused had any knowledge of the inducement, practiced upon the complainant by the second accused and, therefore, he could not be convicted under ss 420 / 34, IPC .[82] Unless there is evidence to show that the accused or any of them presented the bills in question at the treasury and took payment of the amount of those bills, it cannot be said that they had used those bills as genuine knowing them to be forged or that they had cheated the authorities in making the payment on the basis of these bills. In such a case, no charge under ss 420 and 471, IPC, can be sustained.[83] Similarly, if evidence is insufficient to prove the identity of the accused, alleged to have encashed the forged bill from the bank, his conviction under ss 420 and 471, IPC, cannot be sustained.[84]

71. Conviction

A conviction under s 420, IPC, would be valid, even if the charge under s 420 read with s 34, IPC[85] is defective unless prejudice is shown to have been caused to the accused.[86] Where the accused induced the complainant and many others from parting with their money as a part payment for the sale of land not owned by him, and the bogus receipt were also issued by him, the accused's intention was dishonest, so the conviction of the accused under s 420 was found proper.[87]

Appellant, accused A3, Monica Bedi obtained fake passport with the help of accused A4 to A9. The entire conspiracy was hatched for her benefit. Her conviction under ss 419, 420 and 120B, IPC was upheld.[88]

Appellant accused A3 Monica Bedi had obtained fake passport with the help of accused A4 to A9. There was clear evidence that accused A8 took delivery of the article (envelop) which contained the address passport addressed to one S, representing that he knew S (assumed name of the appellant Monica Bedi) and delivered the same. Thus the evidence established that the accused A8 participated in the conspiracy in securing the passport for the appellant. The conviction of the accused A8 under ss 420, 419 and 468, IPC read with s 109, IPC was held proper.[89]

72. Admonition

Where the accused had obtained a loan from a bank by fraudulent representation, but had refunded the same along with interest thereon and the bank had suffered no loss, the accused were only admonished under s 3 of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958.[90]3664

73. Sentence--Juristic Person

Section 420, IPC provides that the accused shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term, which may extend to 7 years. The word 'shall be punished' makes it compulsory for the court to impose punishment with imprisonment, if the accused is found guilty. To a juristic person like a construction company, punishment of imprisonment cannot be avoided, hence the prosecution of such a company under s 420, IPC, does not appear to be legal, permissible and justified.[1]

74. Sentence (Deterrent)

Some sentence of imprisonment is imperative under this section, and the court has discretion to add, or refrain from adding, a fine.[2] A sentence under the section being a matter of discretion, the higher court should not interfere with it, unless the discretion has been improperly exercised.[3] When the appellate court had already shown some leniency and reduced the substantive term of rigorous imprisonment from three years to two years, the fine had also been reduced from Rs 5,000 to Rs 3,000 with corresponding reduction in the default sentence from one year to six months, the High Court declined to show further lenience in the revision petition filed by the accused against the order of the appellate court (sessions court).[4]

75. Sentence (Lenient)

The circumstances may justify a lenient consideration.[5] A severe sentence should not be passed when the accused moves about in a business community as any severe sentence may ruin and destroy his credit in the market.[6] Where bigger persons are involved in a fraud for which the accused is tried and they are not brought to book, the circumstances will have a bearing on the question of sentence.[7] The Supreme Court speaking through VR Krishna Iyer J in Mohammad Giasuddin v State of Andhra Pradesh ,[8] has emphasised the need on the part of the judges to see that sentencing ceases to be downgraded to the cinderella status, and stated that there was need to personalise the sentence from a reformative angle. In Bhagwandas Keshwani v State of Rajasthan ,[9] the offences under s 420, IPC, and s 5(1)(d) read with s 5(2) of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947, now s 13 of Prevention of Corruption Act 1988 (49 of 1988) with which the accused were charged, were committed more than 12 years ago and the amount involved in the offence was merely a sum of Rs 21.89, The accused had undergone some rigorous imprisonment also, in these circumstances, one year rigorous imprisonment was reduced to the period already3665 undergone. In Triloknath Yadav v Republic of India ,[10] the petitioner was convicted under ss 420 and 471, IPC, and was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for one year on each count. The petitioner was aged about twenty-nine years and no previous conviction was proved against him. The case continued from June 1970, and the petitioner lost his job also. In the said circumstances, the sentence of imprisonment was reduced to one month on each count. In Babu Lal v State ,[11] the offence of cheating, committed by the petitioners, was more than four years old. It was also not disputed that the petitioners had already served sentence of imprisonment for a period of more than a month and one of the petitioners has also in all probability lost his job on account of his conviction. Keeping in view all the circumstances of the case, the sentence of imprisonment, awarded to the petitioners, was reduced to that already undergone.

Where the accused appellants were convicted for offences of criminal conspiracy, cheating and forgery, the occurrence took place 15 years before, the appellants had remained in custody for about one month, sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[12]

The occurrence took place 17 years ago, one of the accused was sick and his movements were restricted through a wheel chair. The other accused had committed the offence when he was a student and thereafter he got married and had a wife and children. The sentence of rigorous imprisonment of one year was therefore reduced to three months rigorous imprisonment.[13] The accused working as a development officer in LIC was found guilty of introducing false and fake insurance proposals to the corporation with a view to inflate business and gain promotion. The occurrence took place 20 years ago, so the sentence of two years rigorous imprisonment was reduced to six months rigorous imprisonment.[14]

The accused, an officiating bank manager defrauded the bank. The offence was committed 10 years ago and the accused was dismissed from service. He has a wife and two children and had deposited the entire amount. The sentence of rigorous imprisonment for two years was reduced to one year rigorous imprisonment, while maintaining the sentence of fine.[15] Where the offence was committed 30 years before, which is a long time and the outlook of a man may have changed entirely, the sentence of imprisonment was reduced from one year rigorous imprisonment to the period of custody already undergone by the accused but the sentence of fine of Rs 15000 and in default to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months was maintained.[16]

Offences under ss 420, 464, 468 and 471, IPC, for which accused was convicted, were of such nature that the accused could be released on probation. Accused had reached the age of 60 years, had been under suspension and faced trial for more than 12 years. Sentence imposed was reduced to the period already undergone.[17]3666

76. Sentence on Two Different Counts should Run Concurrently

Substantive sentence, if awarded for two offences under s 420, IPC, on two different counts, should run concurrently, and not consecutively, otherwise it would mean that the accused will suffer substantive imprisonment for double period.[18]

Dishonest or fraudulent removal or concealment of property to prevent distribution among creditors.--

Whoever dishonestly or fraudulently removes, conceals or delivers to any person, or transfers or causes to be transferred to any person, without adequate consideration, any property, intending thereby to prevent, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby prevent, the distribution of that property according to law among his creditor or the creditors of any other person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

Sections 421 to 424, are very similar to ss 206 to 210, IPC . They all relate to frauds, and some of the offences under these sections would fall under ss 206 to 210, IPC . Under ss 206 to 210, however, the forbidden acts constitute frauds upon courts of justice whilst those, forbidden under ss 421 to 424 are frauds upon creditors. It may be noted that ss 206 to 208, and s 210 deal with cases in which any forfeiture of fine or some decree or order is involved. Another fact to note is that those sections refer to fraudulent acts. The term 'dishonestly' has not been used in those sections. On the other hand, in ss 421 to 424, the words used are 'dishonestly or fraudulently'. These sections are mainly intended to protect a fraudulent or dishonest evasion of the claims of creditors. The section would not apply to the cases of creditors whose claims against the property are secured. It is only the unsecured creditors whose interest can be easily defeated by any fraudulent acts of the insolvent. The section covers benami transactions in fraud of creditors.[19]

2. 'Dishonestly and Fraudulently'

Commentary of ss 24, 25, vol 1, may be referred to.

3. 'Any Property'

The word 'property', in this section, is wider enough to include a chose-in-action. Movable property in a foreign state, belonging to the insolvent, will ordinarily vest in the receiver in insolvency, and if a dishonest or fraudulent transfer, removal or3667 concealment, or delivery, of such property is made by the insolvent without adequate consideration so as to prevent its distribution among his creditors according to law in India, the offence under s 421 would be established.

A contract for cutting of trees to be converted into charcoal is an agreement relating to movable property.[20]

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, and compoundable, by the affected creditors, with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

5. Jurisdiction

The jurisdiction of a magistrate is not affected by the provisions of the Insolvency Act. Where the Insolvency Act creates an offence, it is the insolvency court which has jurisdiction as to it. As to the offence under the IPC, the ordinary jurisdiction of the criminal courts cannot be held to be excluded unless expressly or by necessary implication the Insolvency Act repeals IPC for the purpose of those offences. Sections 421 to 424, so far from being replaced are recognised by the said Act as being operative and the prosecution of the insolvent for the offences, created by them, is distinctly contemplated. [21]

6. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.

7. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) the accused removed, or concealed, the property in question, or delivered, or transferred, or caused to be transferred, the property in question to any person;
(b) the said property was delivered or transferred without adequate consideration;
(c) he did as above dishonestly or fraudulently; and
(d) he thereby intended to prevent, or he knew it to be likely that he will thereby prevent, the distribution of the property among his creditor or the creditors of any other person.[22]

The property of a debtor cannot be distributed according to law save after the provisions of the relevant enactments have been complied with. It cannot be held without further proof that a shopkeeper, who has stocked his shop with goods obtained on credit and who sells those goods without making any payment to his3668 credit, has committed an offence, punishable under s 421, IPC . It has to be shown that the debtor acted dishonestly. It is not sufficient to show that his action may deprive the creditors of a recourse of which if they had acted in time, they might have availed themselves.[23]

Dishonestly or fraudulently preventing debt being available for creditors.--

Whoever dishonestly or fraudulently prevents any debt or demand due to himself or to any other person from being made available according to law for payment of his debts or the debts of such other person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The proceeding s 421, IPC dealt with the dishonest or fraudulent acts of removal, concealment, delivery or transfer of property for preventing there distribution thereof among the creditors. This section provides for any dishonest or fraudulent acts, calculated to prevent any claims by way of debt or demand, i.e., some chose-in-action, due to the accused or to any other person from being made available, according to law, to his creditors or to the creditors of that other person. The section, however, does not place any specific limitation on the manner in which the payment of a debt may be prevented.

2. 'Dishonestly and Fraudulently'

The mere transfer of his interest by a mortgagor cannot be said to be fraudulent or dishonest merely because he has, as a matter of fact, previously mortgaged his property.[24] In Re Nobin Chancier Mullick,[25] the accused entered into an agreement with the complainant to the effect that he would not compromise a certain suit between himself and another party, which was then pending, the reason being that he had assigned the benefit of this suit to the complainant as a security for the due payment of some monthly instalments of money.

Notwithstanding this agreement, he did afterwards compromise the suit. It was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section unless the compromise was made dishonestly or fraudulently. When a cheque, given in consideration of sale of property, is dishonoured but accused is prepared to pay cash, no offence under this section or under s 420 can be said to have been committed.[26]3669

3. 'Debt or Demand'

The term 'demand' is wider than 'debt'. It would cover all actionable claims as defined in s 3 of the Transfer of Property Act 1882, but is not continued to them. Unliquidated damages will, of course, not be covered by the term.[27]

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, by the affected creditors, with the permission of the court before which the prosecution for such offences is pending, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

5. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case. Section 251 , CrPC 1973, may be referred to.

6. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) some debt or demand was due to the accused or to any other person;
(b) the accused prevented its being made available, according to law, for payment of his debts of such other person; and
(c) he did so dishonestly or fraudulently.

Of Offences Against Property

OF FRAUDULENT DEEDS AND DISPOSITIONS OF PROPERTY

S. 423.

Dishonest or fraudulent execution of deed of transfer containing false statement of consideration.--

Whoever dishonestly or fraudulently signs, executes or becomes a party to any deed or instrument which purports to transfer or subject to any charge any property, or any interest therein, and which contains any false statement relating to the consideration for such transfer or charge, or relating to the person or persons for whose use or benefit it is really intended to operate, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section, like the preceding two sections, requires dishonesty or fraud as a necessary ingredient. It refers to some deed or instrument which involves a transfer3670 or the creation of any charge or interest in some property. Fraudulent deeds, which are covered by this section, relates to frauds of two kinds, namely, any false statement relating to:

(a) the consideration for the transfer or charge, or
(b) the person or persons for whose use or benefit it is really intended to operate.

Not only the actual executants of a deed or instrument of transfer, but also those, who become parties to any fraudulent or dishonest deed or instrument, fall within operation of this section. Similarly, even an attesting witness, who may be acting dishonestly or fraudulently, comes within the scope of the section. Similarly, transfers covered by the section, would include not only sale, mortgage or charge, but also leases creating such interest. For the operation of this section, it is, however, necessary that the deed or instrument must be one purporting to transfer, or subjecting, to any charge, any property or interest therein. Thus, where the accused executed a registered document, purporting to be a kabuliyat, in favour of the complainant, in respect of a certain land, which contained recitals designedly false, and, according to the accused, this kabuliyat was accepted by the complainant, it was held that though the case fell under s 193, IPC, it was not an offence under this section because the kabuliyat is not a document which purport to transfer, or which subjects, to any charge, any property or interest therein.[28]

If a case involve a question which may involve a right of a civil nature, it is not necessary that a civil suit must be instituted and determined as a condition precedent to invoke the provisions of this section.[29] Where the judgment-debtor, whose 28.90 acres of land was got attached by the complainant in execution of a decree executed a sale deed of only 6.70 acres of land in his favour with a false recital in the sale deed that the complainant had agreed to it as a compromise for satisfaction of the decree, it was held that the action of the accused judgment-debtor clearly fell within the purview of this section.[30] Similarly, also, where fraudulent transactions are resorted to defeat the claims for presumption, the accused are guilty of an offence under section.[31] It is, however, necessary that in such cases it must prove that there was a right for presumption in respect of the property sold. If the property is not subject to such a right, there would be no offence.[32]

2. Ingredients

The scope of s 423, IPC deals with two specific frauds in the execution of deeds or instruments of transfer or charge, namely, (i) false recital as to consideration; and (ii) false recital as to the name of beneficiary. These two ingredients should be present in the complaint petition and in the statements made on oath by the complainant and his witnesses.[33]3671

3. Dishonestly or Fraudulently

Commentary under the headings in s 415, s 422 ante, may be referred to.

4. 'False Statement'

The law does not make a false statement, contained in an instrument of transfer, punishable. It must be a statement relating to the consideration or to the person to be benefited thereby.[34] If a false statement does not relate to the consideration for the transfer, it would not fall under this section.

Where the accused created a charge in some land on taking a loan from the government by making a false statement as to the area of the land in their possession, it was held that the accused were not guilty under this section as the false statement did not relate to the consideration for this charge.[35] In Shibarani Debi v Ratnamala Debi ,[36] a Hindu widow, claiming to be the wife of one Dashrathi, executed some transfers of certain properties, left by the father of Dashrathi, which should have devolved on her in the ordinary course. It was alleged that she had married a second time and was, therefore, not Dashrasthi's widow and that she had made certain false statements, in the conveyances relating to the person or persons for whose use or benefit the documents were really intended to operate. It was held that the case did not fall under this section because the 'person or persons', in this section, must mean the purchasers, and not the vendor. However, in Legal Remembrancer v Ahi Lal Mandal ,[37] the accused tried to marry a woman, but failed. He executed a conveyance, transferring some property to the woman on account of her dower, in which the woman was described as his wife and the date, on which the marriage was also mentioned. It was found that no marriage had taken place and that the woman was the wife of another person. In these circumstances, it was held that the accused had acted fraudulently as there was an intention to deceive and mislead and that he was guilty under this section and also under s 193 .

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, by the person affected, with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, and triable by any magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

6. Pendency of Civil Suit is no Ground for Staying Criminal Proceedings

Where the complainant filed a civil suit based on the title of the property, the pendency of the civil suit is no ground to stay the criminal complaint filed by her under ss 193, 423, 468, 471 read with s 34, IPC, against the accused till the disposal of the civil suit wherein the defendant had based his claim on the agreement to sell. Both civil and criminal proceedings can go parallel to each other.[38]3672

7. Conviction in Time Barred Case is Non Est

Sub-section (1) of s 468, CrPC states that except as otherwise provided elsewhere in the Code, no court shall take cognizance of an offence of the category specified in sub-s 2 after the expiry of the period of limitation. Imprisonment for two years or fine or both is the punishment prescribed for an offence under s

423, IPC . The period of limitation is three years for taking cognizance of an offence under s 423, IPC (vide s 468(2) (c), CrPC). The provision is mandatory. For the reasons aforesaid, the cognizance having been taken beyond the period of limitation, the consequent trial leading to the conviction is without jurisdiction and non est in the eye of law.[39]

8. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings

Where the allegations against the petitioner, who was the head of a company were that the company floated a scheme, 'Reliance India Mobile Kar Lo Duniya Mutthi Mein' which agreed to provide certain services to the customers, it lured the general public to enter into an agreement and thereafter violated the terms of agreement as no service was provided under the said scheme, but there was no false recital in the said agreement as to consideration or as to the name of beneficiary, therefore, the said allegations made do not come within mischief of s 423 .[40]

9. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case. Section 251 , CrPC 1973, may be referred to.

10. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) there was a deed or instrument;
(b) it purported to transfer, or it subjected, to any charge, the property in question or an interest therein;
(c) it contained a false statement relating:

  (i) to the consideration for such transfer or charge, or
  (ii) to the person or persons for whose use or benefit it was really intended to operate;

(d) the accused had signed or executed it or had become a party to it; and
(e) he did so dishonestly or fraudulently.

Of Offences Against Property

OF FRAUDULENT DEEDS AND DISPOSITIONS OF PROPERTY

S. 424.

Dishonest or fraudulent removal or concealment of property.--

Whoever dishonestly or fraudulently conceals or removes any property of himself or any other person, or dishonestly or fraudulently assists in the concealment or removal thereof, or dishonestly releases any demand or claim to which he is entitled, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.3673

Comments

1. Scope

The section is connected with the preceding ss 421 to 423, IPC . Those cases, which are not covered by ss 421 and 422, IPC but which contain elements of dishonesty to fraud in dealing with property, fall within the purview of this section. The section contemplates two classes of cases, namely:

(a) concealing or removing any property or assisting in doing so (this must be either dishonest or fraudulent), and
(b) releasing any demand or claim to which the accused is entitled (this must be fraudulent, even though not dishonest).

The scope of this section is wider than that under ss 421 and 422, IPC, which deal with cases of fraud on creditors, because this section covers cases of persons other than creditors also. Therefore, concealment by debtor themselves is an offence. Similarly, taking away property by others with a view that it may not be attached if done with a dishonest intention would fall under the section.[41]

One of the necessary elements of s 424, IPC is that some dishonesty or fraud should be made out against the accused. If no dishonesty or fraud can be imputed, there would be no offence under this section.[42] In Re Ananda Muttussami Aiyam,[43] the accused had been in the habit of paying a money-rent to their landlords. The landlords resolved for their own advantage to devoid the produce and ordered the accused not to reap the crops except in the presence of the servants of the former. The accused did not agree to the alteration in the mode of paying the rent and proceeded to reap the crops as usual. It was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section. If the raiyats, holding on varam tenure, remove crops for the purpose of protecting them from injury or damage owing to delay or refusal on the part of the landlord to perform his part in the harvesting or division, such removal would not be dishonest within the meaning of this section.[44] If, however, the removal of property is dishonest, it may amount to an offence under this section.[45] If, therefore, a raiyat dishonestly removes or conceals the produce preventing the landholder from taking his due share, he is guilty of an offence under this section.[46] The mere fact that the accused removed a property in broad daylight, would not necessarily make the removal honest.[47] Where, however, the accused has openly taken the property in3674 exercise of his bonafide claim to inherit it, no offence under this section would be made out.[48]

A partner cannot be prosecuted under s 424, IPC for dishonestly and fraudulently concealing or removing the books of the partnership because the partners, being the joint owners of books, are entitled to retain them and the complaining partner has no more right to the books than the partner who has them in his possession.[49]

2. 'Dishonestly or Fraudulently'

Commentary under the headings in ss 415, 422, ante and commentary in ss 24, 25 vol I, may be referred to.

3. 'Dishonestly or Fraudulently Conceals or Removes any Property of Himself or any other Person'

Where there is a legal attachment, a third party, claiming to be the owner of movable attached, would be guilty of an offence under s 424 or s 379, IPC, as the case may be, if he removes them from the possession of the court or its agent.[50] Therefore, a judgment-debtor, cutting and removing the property, validly, attached in execution of a decree against him, commits an offence under this section.[51] If, however, the property is attached by a person, having no authority to attach it, the matter would be different because the attachment would then be without jurisdiction.[52] Where, therefore, the warrant, attaching the property, is an illegal one, the removal of the property attached cannot amount to an offence under s 424, IPC .[53] a judgment-debtor is entitled to remove his crops, which have not been validly attached, and the mere fact, that he has removed the crops, does not prove that he has done so dishonestly.[54] The word 'dishonestly', in this section, is used in a technical sense which is at variance with its popular significance as implying deviation from probity.[55]Intention has got to be proved. A dishonest intention may be presumed only if an unlawful act is done or if a lawful act is done by unlawful means.[56] In Wali Muhammad v Emperor ,[57] on the question, whether intention should be determined irrespective of the attachment being legal or illegal, the court observed that if a party, believing that an attachment has been legal, removes the property nevertheless, his object is to commit a wrongful object. However, if, in fact, there has been no attachment, or the3675 attachment, by reason of patent defects, is ineffectual, he deceives no one else but himself. A person cannot be said to do anything dishonestly within the meaning of the word, as defined in the IPC, if he has merely an intention to cause wrongful loss to someone when he cannot, or does not, in fact, cause any such wrongful loss. Consequently, no conviction under this section can be sustained if no dishonesty or fraud, under the circumstances of a case, can be imputed to the accused.[58]

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, by the affected person, with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

5. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case. Section 251 , CrPC 1973, may be referred to.

6. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) the accused:

(i) concealed or removed the property in question, or
(ii) assisted in the concealment or removal of the property in question, or
(iii) released any demand or claim to which he was entitled and

(b) he did so dishonestly or fraudulently.

Of Offences Against Property

OF MISCHIEF

S. 425.

Mischief.--

Whoever, with intent to cause, or knowing that he is likely to cause, wrongful loss or damage to the public or to any person, causes the destruction of any property, or any such change in any property or in the situation thereof as destroys or diminishes its value or utility, or affects it injuriously, commits "mischief".

Explanation 1.--It is not essential to the offence of mischief that the offender should intend to cause loss or damage to the owner of the property injured or destroyed. It is sufficient if he intends to cause, or knows that he is likely to cause, wrongful loss or damage to any person by injuring any property, whether it belongs to that person or not.

Explanation 2.--Mischief may be committed by an act affecting property belonging to the person who commits the act, or to that person and others jointly.

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines the offence of mischief and the next section provides the punishment therefore. Mischief, like most crimes, comprises a mental and a physical, element. To mental element is the intention, express or implied, to cause 'wrongful loss or damage'. The physical element is an act of destruction or injurious change to property.[59] While the mental element is the same in all kinds of mischief, the physical element, the act of destruction or change, may be of any kind of that physical element, the act of destruction or change, may be of any kind of that species of acts, and if the act is of the kind, specified in ss 427 to 440, IPC, the mischief is aggravated and, therefore, more severely punished than under s 426 .[60]

There are 14 aggravated offences of mischief,[61] which may be classified, as under by reason of:

(a) amount of damage caused (s 427, IPC);3677
(b) mischief in regard to animals (ss 428 and 429, IPC);
(c) mischief in regard to water supply and public works (ss 430 to 434, IPC);
(d) mischief by fire (ss 435 and 436, IPC);
(e) mischief in regard to decked vessels (ss 437 and 438, IPC);
(f) mischief in regard to any vessel, with intent to steal (s 439, IPC); and
(g) mischief with preparation for causing death, hurt, or wrongful restraint, or fear, of such death, hurt or wrongful restraint (s 440, IPC).

It will be clear from this analysis that the offence of mischief has to be considered from the following three different points of view, i.e.,

(i) value of the property (s 427, IPC);
(ii) nature of the property such as animals (ss 428 and 429, IPC), water supply, public roads, bridges and waterways, etc (ss 430 to 437, IPC); and
(iii) manner of causing mischief (ss 438 to 440, IPC).

The causing of wrongful loss by destruction, or change, of property does not, in all cases, become an offence under this section. A criminal liability may not arise if:

(a) there is no intention of knowledge requisite under the section;
(b) the act was the result of any accident;
(c) there was negligence in the performance of the act;
(d) there was a bonafide dispute about the property; or;
(e) there was a bonafide claim of right.

2. Ingredients

This section necessitates three things, viz:

(a) an intention, or knowledge or likelihood, to cause wrongful loss or damage to the public or to any other person;
(b) causing the destruction of some property or any change in it or in situation; and
(c) such change must destroy or diminish its value or utility, affect it injuriously.

No mischief can, therefore, be committed where the acts complained of amount to an invasion of civil right.[62] The mere fact, that any wrongful loss or damage is caused to property would not constitute mischief unless the intention of the alleged offender is to cause wrongful loss or damage to the person concerned. It is the duty of the criminal court, in such a case, to determine what was the intention of the alleged offender; if it comes to the conclusion that the accused was attempting to assert a bonafide claim of his right, then he cannot be found guilty of the offence of mischief.[63] If an accused honestly believes that he has a right to do what he does even though he does not, in law, have that right, he cannot be said to have had the necessary intention or knowledge that he was likely to cause wrongful loss or3678 damage. His claim should not, however, be a mere pretence or a colourable one; it must be one in assertion of a bonafide right.[64]Mens rea being an essential ingredient of the offence of mischief, the evidence of the same may be inferred from the overt act done by the accused.[65] If a person deals injuriously with property in a bonafide belief that it is his own, he cannot be convicted of mischief.[66] Where each of the contending parties claims ownership of the property in respect of which the offence is alleged to have been committed, it is unsafe to uphold the conviction.[67] Where the accused, acting in good faith and under a bonafide belief that he was entitled to the possession of a certain land, delivered to him by the court in consequence of his purchase at an auction sale, cut away a ripe crop, it was held that he was not guilty of the offence of mischief.[68] Where the accused was in the habit of taking the water from an opening to his fields under a permit out on one occasion he cut open the bound anticipating the grant of the permit, it was held that the accused could not be convicted of mischief because he acted in the bona fide belief that he would get the permit.[69]

3. Disputes of Tree and Crops

There are frequent disputes between landlords and tenants in respect of trees and crops. If a tenant, in the bona fide assertion of a customary right, cuts down an old tree, admittedly standing on his holding, he cannot be convicted of the offence of mischief.[70] Where a tree was removed under the order of the landlord and the servants removed it bona fide without any criminal intention, it was held that their conviction was bad in law.[71] Where the landlord, on surrendering a holding by a raiyat, uprooted the seeds sown by the under-raiyat, it was held that as the action of the landlord was a bona fide claim of right, his conviction was illegal.[72]

4. Claim of Right

The expression 'claim of right' does not refer to actual legal right. It means belief in a legal right.[73] However, so far as the offence of mischief is concerned, a claim of right, believed to exist, even though unreasonably, is a valid defence.[74] The question in cases in which the accused pleads a claim of right is whether there is semblance of such right, and only to this extent the criminal court would be within its right in3679 discussing the point.[75] Where water, draining from the complainant's mill, was polluting the water supply, damaging the crops and rendering the water unfit for drinking, it was held that the accused, in taking steps to prevent the contamination, acted under colour of right.[76] Where the accused removed some projected poles of a scaffolding over his land and threw down the cement which was on it, it was held that the must be deemed to have acted in bonafide exercise of what he believed to be his right and was not guilty of mischief.[77] Where, in the exercise of bonafide claim of right to bury a deceased person, the members of a congregation broke open the gate of a graveyard which they believed, was wrongfully closed against them by the priest, it was held that they committed no offence.[78]

5. Theft Distinguished from Mischief

Commentary under the same heading in s 378, ante, may be referred to.

6. 'Whoever Causes'

The physical element in mischief is an act causing destruction of, or change in, some property as the immediate result thereof, i.e., a direct result. The act itself must, in fact, constitute the injury;[79] it must not be too remote thereto. The illustration to the sections show that it is not intended to cover cases of negligence.[80]In each of the illustrations to the section, the loss or injury is the immediate result of the act in question.[81] 'Causes' involves some act done, some willful conduct.[82] The section contemplates some direct action on the part of the mischief done, either personally or through someone else, which leads to any of the results mentioned in the section. Where the damage to the complainant's wall is the result of the accumulation of water due to abnormal heavy rains, it cannot be said that the accused caused the destruction of the complainant wall by storing earth and other materials.[83]

7. 'Wrongful Loss'

'Wrongful loss', contemplated in s 425, IPC, need not, necessarily, consist in the infringement of an existing, present and complete right; it may be caused by, an act done now with the intention of defeating and rendering infructuous a right about to come into existence. Any person, who contracts to purchase property and pays a portion of the purchase money, has such an interest in that property although his title may not be complete; the destruction of such property may cause to him wrongful loss within the meaning of s 425 .[84] If a person cuts off the electric supply of another, the intention to cause wrongful loss to the opposite party is clearly there.[85] In3680*Mahadeo Singh v Emperor* ,[86] over the chabutra of a mosque, there was an image of a Hindu God which was surrounded by a wall. The accused widened the doorway in the wall by demolishing a part of the wall on both sides of the doorway. The wall around the image was the property of the Mohammedans and the Hindus whitewashed the wall from the outside. It was held that by breaking the wall and taking out the bricks, the accused caused wrongful loss to the Mohammadan public and, therefore, an offence under s 425, IPC, was committed. Where the accused removed the fishing stakes of the complainant from the sea but did not appropriate them, it was held that it amounted to mischief as it caused the wrongful loss of the fish, which the complainant would have caught, and the accused knew that his act was likely to cause that loss.[87] The dominant owner's action in removing the obstruction, willfully placed by the servant owner, amounts to mischief.[88] In Zipru Tanaji Patil v Emperor ,[89] the accused obtained a decree restraining the complainants from obstructing his right of way to certain land. The complainants obstructed the way in spite of the decree by putting in some dams across the way. The accused removed the dams. It was held that he was not justified in taking the law in his own hands, and as there was wrongful loss, the accused was guilty of mischief.

8. Wrongful Loss by Unlawful Means

The word 'damage', in s 425, IPC, is not superfluous and/or redundant. It is indicative of the fact that the purview of the offence of 'mischief' is not intended to be confined only to cases of 'wrongful loss'; it also covers, within it, all such cases of damages by unlawful means.[90]

Wrongful loss in s 425 must mean loss by unlawful means. There is nothing unlawful in the accused installing an oil-engine on his own property and its working causes damage to a neighbour's property, the accused may be liable to a civil suit for damages.[91]

9. Loss by Unlawful and Lawful Acts

It is neither unlawful (however malicious), nor an offence, to remove lateral support and cause damage unless the right to support has been acquired by prescription of 20 years.[92] The cutting off of those portions of the trees, growing on the neighbour's land, which overhang the house of the accused, is not mischief.[93]When the statement of complainant himself sowed that there was no plaster on the wall at the time of occurrence, the question of accused causing damage to the plaster of the wall by act of alleged digging of drain does not arise.[94] Digging a trench on one's own land,3681 though causing loss to another's adjacent land, cannot be said to be a mischief.[1] Where a joint owner of a parcel of land erected, on it, an edifice without the consent, and against the will, of another joint owner, who, after obtaining a decree for mandatory injunction from the civil court, got the edifice pulled down, it was held that there had been no causing of wrongful loss and the accused was not guilty of mischief.[2] A decree-holder got a decree for possession of land. He took out execution but, before it was concluded, the judgment-debtor raised a crop on the land which was taken away by servants of the decree-holder. It was held that they were not guilty of mischief as the crop, though raised by the judgment-debtor, really belonged to the decree-holder whose right thereto had been declared by a competent court.[3] Where a person obstructs a right of watercourse to which another person is entitled, and if the person, whose right is obstructed, destroys the obstruction, the loss, which may be caused in doing so, cannot be considered to be a wrongful loss.[4] Where the complainant is not legally entitled to the land or crop on it, the act of the accused in allowing his cattle to graze on the land is not wrongful loss and offence of mischief is not committed.[5] A mortgagee, openly cutting a few trees on the land, mortgaged to him, in order to repair another part of the mortgaged premises is not guilty of mischief.[6]

10. Damaging One's Own Estate

A man may commit mischief by damaging his own estate if he does so in order to cause, or knowing it to be likely to cause, wrongful loss to somebody else. However, it can hardly be said that a person commits mischief by causing damage to his own estate when it is under the court of wards whose only object is to preserve the estate for the benefit of the owner.[7]

The accused removing rocks from his own land for commercial purpose cannot be said to have committed mischief.[8]

The principal ingredients of an offence under s 425, IPC, is that there must be an intention to cause wrongful loss or damage to the public or to any person, meaning thereby that the mischief must be done to the property belonging to another person though act, whereby mischief is done, may have reference to the property belonging to the person committing the mischief.[9] The case of Empress v Rajcoomar Singh ,[10] is an obvious illustration of a person, having his right declared by civil court, destroying the property without being guilty of any mischief. No offence of mischief3682 is committed when a person pulls down his own wall and then rebuilds,[11] or puts his own chhan on fire and tried to falsely implicate others.[12]

11. Owner of a Land

It the owner of a land finds a trespasser on his land using the owner's tools, the owner would, no doubt, commit no offence of mischief in destroying, or removing, those tools even though by doing so he may deprive the trespasser of the means of benefiting by his trespass. However, the owner of the land would have no right, merely because of the trespass, to destroy whatever property of the trespasser he finds upon the premises. Such an act of his would amount to mischief.[13] Even if the owner of a land has a right to eject the trespasser, he has no right to destroy whatever property of the trespasser the owner finds on his land.[14] In Abdul Hussain Ibrahimji v Emperor ,[15] a well was dug by the complainant in the land which belonged to him. The accused, without proper inquiry, went recklessly upon the land and damaged the well by throwing stones and earth into it. It was held that even if accused delivered in good faith that the well was in his land and the complainant was a trespasser, he had no right whatever to damage the complainant's property in the fashion he did. However, the demolition of a wall, constructed by a trespasser upon the land of the complainant, was held not to amount to mischief in Empress v Shanker Lal. [16] If the site is a public path, and the complainant obstructs it wrongfully by building a wall upon it, the loss caused to him by the member of the public, who pull it down in order to exercise their right of way through the site, cannot be considered wrongful loss.[17]

12. Damage

The word 'damage', in s 425, IPC, is not superfluous and/or redundant. It is indicative of the fact that the purview of the offence of 'mischief' is not intended to be confined only to cases of 'wrongful loss'; it also covers, within it, all such case of damages by unlawful means.[18]

13. 'With Intent to Cause or Knowing that he is Likely to Cause'

The first and the foremost essential element of the offence of mischief is the intention to cause or knowledge that the accused is likely to cause wrongful loss or damage to the public or to any person.[19] Before a conviction can be filed for mischief under s 425, IPC, it must be proved that the accused intended to cause, or knew that he was likely to cause, wrongful loss to the public or to any person. If no intention or knowledge, requisite under the section, is established, no offence of mischief can be3683 said to have been made out.[20] The grazing of cattle on lands, rented from government, without payment of the capitation fee, which the grass-renter is entitled to collect, does not amount to mischief.[21] In Empress v Kaikhusro Cursedhi ,[22] an agent of a landlord, accompanied by a bailiff, broke open the door of a room, in the possession of a tenant, in execution of a distress warrant issued against the tenant for non-payment of rent. It was held that the conviction could not stand because the bailiff, if he improperly broke open the door, was acting mistakenly in what he supposed to be his duty and the landlord's agent, who assisted him, had neither the intention nor the knowledge which is an essential element for an offence of mischief. The gist of the offence of mischief lies in the intention. Where it was alleged that the injury to the property of the complainant was the result of an accident caused by the accused's stupidity, it was held that the question was one for adjudication solely in the civil court.[23] Where, owing to a collision of a lorry and a jeep caused by the rash and negligent driving of the lorry, hurt was caused to an occupant of the jeep, it was held that the offence of mischief was not committed as the requisite mens rea was absent.[24]

14. Intention not Necessary in Every Case

Intention is not necessary in every case. The terms of s 425, IPC, would be satisfied when there is a distinction on the point of the accused's knowledge, in which case the question of intention is material only as regards the sentence.[25] When a person drives a heavy vehicle, like a lorry, with hopelessly poor lights, it must be imputed that he had the knowledge that he was likely to cause wrongful loss or damage to any person though there could be no intention to cause wrongful loss or damage to any person.[26] Where the accused, after driving out a cow from his master's field, after it had reached the boundary, threw two stones at it, one of which fractured its leg, it was held that the accused was guilty of mischief.[27] It has, however, to be proved that the accused had caused destruction of, or change in, property as contemplated by the section. Unless such result of the accused's act is established, his intention or knowledge need not be considered.[28]

15. Intention and Knowledge

Mischief involves intention/knowledge of likelihood to cause wrongful loss or damage. It does not unnecessarily contemplate damage of a destructive character.3684 Mischief involves a mental act with a destructive animus, destruction with the object of creating wrongful loss or damage is obligatory to be established.[29]

A plain reading of s 425, IPC, would reveal that the offence described in the said section imports the act done willfully or with the knowledge that the said act is likely to cause injury. Therefore, mere negligence or carelessness on the part of the accused is not sufficient to constitute the offence described in the section.[30]

16. Owners of Cattle

Owner of cattle, who, knowing that their animals, not properly provided with fodder, are accustomed to stray in search of food, intentionally omit to secure their cattle or neglect to take reasonable precautions for their care and custody, may be guilty of the offence of mischief.[31] The omission or neglect, however, must be such as to have an active effect in conducing to the result as a link in a chain of fact from which an intention to bring about the result may be inferred.[32] In Re Gurram Liddugadu,[33] the accused grazed their cattle on waste lands on which the government had, by notification, prohibited the public from grazing cattle. The grazing caused a destruction of government property, viz, grass, and the accused knew that their action caused wrongful loss to the government. It was held that they were rightly convicted of mischief. The straying of cattle, causing loss or damage to some property by reason of negligence, would not, however, be a criminal offence.[34] The owner of an animal, which strays on another's land and causes damage to the crop thereon, does not, unless he has wilfully driven it upon the land, commit the offence of mischief.[35] It is not sufficient to show that the owner of cattle, which caused damage, was guilty of carelessness in allowing them to stray. The prosecution is bound to show that there was an intention to cause wrongful loss or damage.[36]

17. Negligent Act of Servant--Master not Liable

In the case of mischief, the master cannot be held vicariously liable if any damage is caused to the complainant by the careless and negligent act of the master's servant when no intention or knowledge, requisite for an offence of mischief, is proved against the master.[37]

If the damage is the result of the servant's negligence, his master is not criminally liable for it.[38]3685

18. Property

The word 'property', in s 425, IPC, means some tangible property capable of being forcibly destroyed; it does not include an incorporeal or intangible property such as an easement.[39] Further, the section has no application to an ownerless property. Where no one has any property or right in an animal, the killing of that animal does not come within the purview of s 425, IPC . The killing of a rhinoceros would not amount to mischief.[40] A bull left at large after branding it for public utility would be res nullius and killing of it would not amount to mischief.[41] However, a young calf, branded at the shradha of the father of the complainant and fed and kept by him, would not cease to be his property and killing of it would be mischief.[42] The tearing of a receipt of a registered article after taking delivery from a postmaster would be mischief.[43] Where the accused dug up some graves and removed the stones placed over them in order to extend his cultivation, it was held that the graves might be treated as property, and that the accused was guilty of mischief.[44] The value of the property involved is immaterial. Any value, however trifling it may be, is quite sufficient for an offence of mischief.[45]

19. 'Destruction of any Property'

As already pointed out, the property, which can be the subject of mischief, must be the one which can be destroyed and the section does not apply to cases of incorporeal or intangible rights, such as easements.

Grazing of cattle on land, which the government has prohibited to public from grazing cattle, causes a destruction of government property, i.e., grass.[46] A person commits mischief if he cuts bamboos on land which he claims, but of which possession, after an execution sale, has been legally made over to another person without any objection or formal intervention on his part.[47] Where the branches of complainant's trees are cut at the instance of the accused who knows that the cutting of the branches is likely to cause wrongful loss or damage to the complainant, the offence of mischief is complete.[48] As to the cutting of crops, it has been held that to3686 cut ripe crops, which are grown to be cut, is not to destroy them or affect them injuriously within the meaning of s 425 .[49] The taking may cause wrongful loss to the grower, and if it be dishonest, a conviction may be had for theft. However, it cannot be mischief.[50] If however, the crops, are not ripe, their cutting may amount to mischief.[51] The destruction of a document evidencing an agreement void for immorality may constitute an offence of mischief.[52] Where a lessee of the government held rights of fishery in a particular stretch of river and the accused, by diverting the water of that river, caused very large quantities of fish, both mature and immature, to be destroyed, it was held that when the accused deliberately changed the course and condition of the river in that manner to the detriment of the lessee, he was guilty of the offence of mischief.[53] If earth is dug from a land by digging into it to the depth of a man's height and heaped on another portion of the land so as to raise the level of that portion which has a lower level, mischief is caused.[54] However, the thinning out of common rides between different lands is an essential part of agriculture operations by cultivators at the time of ploughing or transplantation. Where the prosecution fails to adduce any evidence that by such an act of thinning cut, the accused intended to cause wrongful loss or damage to the complainant and there is also no proof that there was destruction of the ridge or any change in it to destroy or diminish its utility, the ingredients of the section are not made out.[55]

20. 'Change in any Property, or in the Situation thereof, as Destroys or Diminishes its Value or Utility'

The use of the word 'its' shows that destruction or damage should be in the same property which is either destroyed or the value thereof is diminished or is injuriously affected.[56]

The expression 'change in any property, or in the situation thereof, as destroys or diminishes its value or utility', in this section, does not necessarily mean a change in character, composition or form. If something is done to the property contrary to its natural use and serviceableness that destroys or diminishes its value or utility, it will amount to 'mischief'. It is not necessary for the purpose of s 425, IPC, that there must be material change in the property itself, nor does the said section require that value or utility of the property means its market value or utility. This position may be clarified by an example. If a miscreant loosens the nuts and bolts fixing the tyre of a motor car thereby making it impossible for the owner to drive the vehicle, he cannot certainly, in an indictment for 'mischief', be allowed to say that by his act, he did not change the nuts and bolts so as to destroy or diminish their value or utility because their market value or utility remains the same and they can be used in the self-same motor car by tightening them up again. If, therefore, the water supply is stopped by a positive act in the shape of turning the main pipe through operation of a wrench valve key, that would amount to bring3687 about some change in the property (i.e., pipeline), which diminishes its value or utility for the purpose for which it was being used, namely, supply of water and such an act would be 'mischief' within the meaning of s 425 .[57] Where a landlord cut off the electric connection of his tenant as the tenant had refused to pay the enhanced electric charges demanded by him, it was held that the cutting of the electric connection was with the intention of causing wrongful loss to the complainant and the same had resulted in causing such destruction of the property or such change in the property or diminution in its value or utility as to clearly come within the definition of s 425, IPC .[58] In Pothan v George ,[59] the accused removed the fuse from the metre and thereby diminished the flow of electricity to the room of the complainant. The accused was held guilty of mischief under s 425, IPC . Where the accused blocked a drain, through which the sullage water of the complainant's house passed from time immemorial, and obstructed the flow of the water, it was held that a drain was a property and the act of the accused in blocking it amounted to causing a change in the drain or its situation so as to destroy its utility to the complainant and, therefore, the accused was guilty of mischief.[60] In a case where large pieces of bricks are wantonly thrown at a house, it may be taken that the house, having been hit, is, to some extent, altered in condition and damaged, and thereby wrongful loss or damage is caused to the owner.[61] However, ploughing and sowing of fallow land covered with babla plants in possession of the complainant is not covered by s 425 .[62]Similarly, getting cattle put into cattle-pound is not causing such a change in the situation of property as diminishes its utility or value; the act does not do so per se, and the cattle when released are as useful as ever.[63] Certain Hindus present at a caste dinner, had sat down to partake of the food, which had been served to them, when certain other members of the caste came and threw down a shoe amongst the men who were seated. Their action had polluted the food and had, from a Hindu religious point of view rendered it unfit to be eaten. It was held that s 426 can have no application to the case. It deals only with a physical injury from a physical cause.[64]

21. Utility

'Utility' for the purpose of s 425, IPC, is utility as conceived by the owner, and not utility as conceived by the accused. The owner or possessor is entitled to his notion of utility of his goods and nobody can force his ideas of utility on him by taking his property from him and altering it in a manner in which he disapproves it.[65] The dumping, by the landlord's men, of a stall, which a fisherman had the right to3688 occupy, to prevent her from exercising her right would diminish the utility of the property to her and would amount to mischief.[66]

22. Breach or Violation of any Easementary Right

A breach or violation of any easementary right such as light and air will not amount to an offence of mischief as defined in s 425, IPC .[67]

23. 'Affects it Injuriously'

The digging of graves would injuriously affect them.[68] Where the accused caused injuries to a cow, belonging to the complainant, by stabbing it with a sharply pointed stake, it was held that the act of the accused affected the cow injuriously.[69] In B Sri Ram v Emperor ,[70] the accused dug out some earth from a plot, over which a clear cartway had been allowed under a compromise decree, and dug a new ditch on it, it was held that it could not be said that the land had not been affected injuriously by the creation of a pit on it.

24. Explanation 1

In view of expln 1 to this section, it is immaterial whether the land in question belonged to the complainant, or it was in possession of someone else, when the accused committed mischief by demolishing construction on it.[71]

25. Explanation 2

According to expln 2 to this section, mischief may be committed by an act affecting property belonging to the person who committed the act, or to that person and others jointly. In Baboo Lal v Emperor ,[72] the accused demolished the parda (i.e., common) wall, which, according to him, belonged to him exclusively and was constructed by him at his own cost. It was found that the disputed wall belonged to the complainant and accused both, and as the accused demolished it with intent to cause wrongful loss or damage to the complainant, he was guilty of mischief. It is worth mentioning here that the principal ingredient of the offence of mischief is that there must be an intention to cause wrongful loss or damage to the public or to any person, meaning thereby that mischief must be done to the property belonging to another person though the act, whereby mischief is done, may have reference to the property belonging to the person committing the mischief.[73] If a person blocks up a channel of water at a spot within his own land, preventing the complainant from irrigating his own land, he would be guilty of the offence of mischief.[74]3689

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF MISCHIEF

S. 426.

Punishment for mischief.--

Whoever commits mischief shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides only for punishment for mischief defined in the preceding s 425, IPC . The section covers only the cases of the simplest form of mischief in respect of property the value of which does not exceed Rs 50. If, however, the value of Rs 50 or upwards, the case would fall under s 427, IPC . Similarly, if there is a sort of mischief which is covered by any other section, relating to mischief (ss 428-440, IPC), the punishment would not be determined by this section.

For a conviction under the section, the law does not requires a finding as to the quantum of damage.[75]

2. Sanction for Prosecution

Commentary of s 197, CrPC 1973 may be referred to.[76]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable by the person to whom the loss or damage is caused, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

4. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case. Section 251 , CrPC 1973, may be referred to.

5. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, prove[77] that:

(a) the accused

(i) caused:

(1) destruction of the property in question, or
(2) such change in the property in question, or in the situation thereof, as destroyed or diminished its value or utility, or

(ii) affected the property in question injuriously; and3690

(b) he did so with intent to cause, or knowing that he was likely to cause, wrongful loss or damage to

(i) the public, or
(ii) the person in question.

A conviction for mischief cannot be sustained if there is no evidence of the required intent.[78] There must be clear proof of intention.[79] The question, whether there was intention to cause wrongful loss to the complainant, is one of drawing the necessary inference.[80] The knowledge, gathered by the court at the time of the inspection, may be used for appreciating the evidence in order to draw the necessary inference, but not for arriving at a finding.[81] Where, in a case regarding mischief to land, the defence raises a bonafide plea of right to land, the magistrate should determine whether the accused acted with any such an intent as is mentioned in s 425 .[82]

6. Conviction

The owner of a house, in which another person is in possession, is not entitled to demolish the wall of the house and trespass into it. His conviction under ss 426 and 448, IPC, would be justified.[83] Similarly, accused charged under s 379 [84] or s 452 [85] can be convicted under s 426 if he knew the case, for which he was being tried, and is not prejudiced. However, the accused, charged under ss 143 and 447, IPC, cannot be convicted under s 426 because the offence of mischief under s 426, IPC, is a totally independent offence.[86]

7. Double Conviction

Whether a person, charged under s 379, and also under s 426, IPC, can be convicted in respect of both offences, there is a conflict of opinions. One view says that killing of an animal, after theft of it has been committed, does not merit a double conviction for both the offences. This view has been taken by the Patna,[87] Madras,[88] Sind,[89] Burma,[90] Rangoon,[91] and Calcutta,[92] High Courts. A contrary view was, however, taken by the Bombay High Court. It was held that the stealing of a calf and subsequently killing it were two distinct offences and separate sentences for each were quite legal.[93]3691

8. Probation

In appropriate cases the benefit of s 6 of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958 should be given to the accused.[1] Accused was not a habitual offender, incident was 15 years old. Sentence of one year simple imprisonment imposed by Courts below was substituted by sentence of fine.[2]

9. Sentence

A person, who, behaving in a shocking and reckless manner, commits mischief, does not deserve a lenient sentence.[3]

10. Alteration of Conviction from Section 426 to Section 24 of Cattle Trespass Act 1871

Where in a case under s 24 of the Cattle Trespass Act the trying magistrate held that the cattle of the accused damaged the crop of the complainant but another ingredient, normally, 'seizure of cattle' was not proved and therefore convicted the accused under s 426, IPC, the appellate court took a different view and held that s 426, IPC, did not apply to the facts of the case and on the facts proved altered the conviction of the accused from s 426, IPC, to one under s 24 of the Cattle Trespass Act. The order of the appellate court was confirmed by the Orissa High Court on a revision being filed before it.[4]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF MISCHIEF

S. 427.

Mischief causing damage to the amount of fifty rupees.--

Whoever commits mischief and thereby causes loss or damage to the amount of fifty rupees or upwards, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The offence under this section is an aggravated form of the offence punishable under the preceding s 426, IPC, the only distinction between the two offences being the extent of the damage done.[5]

If a person puts a lock illegally and wrongfully and prevents the rightful owner to enter his house, the person, so obstructed illegally and wrongfully, has a right3692 to break open the lock and enter into his house. If he does, it amounts to a rightful act to thwart a wrongful act and if, in doing so, the lock is broken, he cannot be made liable for mischief. In a case when the unlawful encroachments are stealthily made and constructions set up to destroy or demolish the rightful title or interest of a party by a trespass, it is not an offence to remove it or to throw it out. The person in rightful possession has every right to dispossess or throw out a trespasser while the trespasser is in the act or process of trespassing. The act of dispossession or throwing out includes throwing of the material objects with which the trespass is committed. It is undoubtedly true that the trespasser may be thrown out. It would be equally true to say that if any articles or things are put in, in the process of trespassing, the person in rightful possession of the property has a right to throw away or to 'dispossess' the trespass or the symbolic articles put in by the trespass. Once the symbolic articles, put by the trespasser, are permitted to remain there, the act of trespassing may amount to assertion of right by the trespasser and, in order to throw the articles out, the true owner may be required to take recourse to the long and arduous remedies as provided under the law. Under these circumstances, if any unlawful constructions are made by a rank trespasser, the true owner, or person in rightful possession of land, has the right to throw out the materials and/or constructions. In such a case, no bonafide act of an accused can amount to that offence.[6]Where the accused cut away the branches of a tree, over hanging his paddy field, it was held that his act was neither mischief under s 447, nor trespass under s 447 of the IPC .[7] Where, however, some land, buildings and vats for manufacture of indigo were sold in execution of a mortgage decree and the mortgagors demolished the building and removed the vats, before the sale was confirmed, it was held that they were guilty under this section.[8]

The accused driver was driving the bus, the bus took deviation at the spot of the accident and hit the house. The injured passenger, PW, did not depose that the accused was driving the bus rashly and negligently. The defence version was that a boy was crossing the road and to avoid accident, the deceased driver drove the vehicle to the other side of the road and hit the house. The defence version being probable was believed, the accused appellant was acquitted of the charges under ss 279, 337, 338 and 427, IPC .[9]

2. Section 427 Distinguished from Sections 441 and 447

There is no nexus between the provisions of this section and those of ss 441 and 447, IPC, except that both fall under the chapter describing offences against property. In so far as this section is concerned, possession of the property, in relation to which the offence, described in it, is committed, is immaterial while the main ingredient of the offence under ss 441 and 447 is the disturbance of possession.[10]3693

3. Abetment

Where the accused was held guilty under s 167, IPC, and also under s 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947, (now s 13 of Prevention of Corruption Act 1988), considering all the facts and circumstances the accused was also held guilty under ss 427 / 109, IPC, as he did aid and abet in committing the mischief which caused a loss to the government.[11]

4. 'Loss or Damage to the Amount of Fifty Rupees or Upwards'

It is the loss, suffered by the complainant, the value of which has to be considered for the purpose of this section. Thus, where some fishing stakes of the complainant were removed from the sea by the accused, but were not appropriated by him, it was held that the loss, suffered by the complainant, was the pecuniary loss, the value of which was the fish which he would have caught and sold.[12]

The loss arising out of destruction, contemplated by this section, must be in reference to some other person, and not to the owner himself. Therefore, if the crop on the land has been sown by the petitioner and it has been destroyed by him without any intention of putting any body else to loss or injury, that, itself, would not amount to mischief within the meaning of this section.[13]

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, but compoundable, by the person to whom the loss or damage is caused, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

6. Quashing of Prosecution

Where on account of failure of power supply to the flour mill, the prosecution lodged a complaint under s 42(b) of the Electricity Act 1910 (9 of 1910) and ss 166 and 427, IPC, against the electricity board and its officers, the allegations in the complaint did not make out any of the offences alleged against the accused, the prosecution was pending for more than 12 years and was therefore liable to be quashed.[14] Where the complaint petition and submission showed that the prosecution is not bonafide and has been brought about only to wreak personal vengeance on account of delivery of possession effected against the complainant in execution of decree, to secure the ends of justice, the impugned order issuing summons against the accused persons was set aside.[15] Where the allegations were that the accused persons on instigation of the main accused committed criminal trespass and demolished the wall, the order of cognizance against the main accused was set aside by the High Court. Therefore, the order of cognizance against the co-accused was found liable to be quashed.[16]3694

7. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case. Section 251 , CrPC 1973 may be referred to.

The accused admittedly was the owner of land, he removed rocks for commercial purpose from his own land. On these facts no prima facie case against accused under s 427, IPC, is made out.[17]

8. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, the same facts must be proved as for a charge under the preceding s 426, IPC, and it must further be proved that the value of the property was of Rs 50 or upwards.

Where the complainant had no right to a certain ridge but he charged the accused of cutting the ridge, it was held that no charge of mischief was proved.[18]

The allegation against the accused was that he caused damage to the plaster of the wall of the complainant who was his neighbour by digging a drain along the wall. The statement of the complainant before the court showed that there was no plaster on the wall at the time of the occurrence. Therefore, there was no question of causing damage to the plaster of the wall by the act of alleged digging of drain by the accused. The incident took place 13 years ago and the parties maintained good neighbourly relations. The acquittal of the accused was found proper.[19] The allegation against the accused was that, he illegally constructed a boundary wall, encroaching upon and causing damages to the plinth and roof of the building of the complainant. The accused was constructing the boundary wall over his own roof, so the complainant was not justified in raising a protest over such construction. The complainant did not take any step either by local inspection or investigation to establish the fact of encroachment by the accused on his land, nor any step had been taken to measure or to know the extent of the so called damage. The acquittal of the accused was found justified.[20]

9. Acquittal

Where charges against the accused persons were of criminal trespass and causing damages to crops, admittedly the land in question was actually in the possession of opposite party and they were ploughing it, even though allegedly by force, the trial court found that the witnesses were ignorant as to who were in possession of the land in question, and for well considered reasons disbelieved the evidence of the complainant. There was also a litigation pending between the parties as regards the same land. On the consideration of evidence, the accused persons were acquitted by the trial court which decision was confirmed in the revision filed by the complaint.[21] Where the accused only removed a tea stall under the direction of the executive engineer, and the charge-sheet and the materials on record did not show that the3695 ingredients of s 427 stood satisfied, it was held that the accused did not commit an offence under s 427 .[22]

10. Sentence

Where the accused, belonging to a poor section of society, were facing criminal proceedings for more than six years and were not previous convicts, it was held that it would be in the interest of justice to reduce the sentence of fine awarded to them.[23]

Accused was convicted for uprooting 10,000 saplings planted by Van Panchayat. Conviction recorded by trial court was upheld, however sentence of one month RI imposed by trial Court was set aside and fine of Rs.100/- imposed was enhanced to Rs.500/-.[24]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF MISCHIEF

S. 428.

Mischief by killing or maiming animal of the value of ten rupees.--

Whoever commits mischief by killing, poisoning, maiming or rendering useless, any animal or animals of the value of ten rupees or upwards, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section and the next provide for cases of mischief towards animals. This section is a general section dealing with animals. The cases, which do not fall under the next s 429, IPC, would be covered by this section if the value of the animal in question is Rs 10 or upwards, but does not exceed Rs 50.

2. 'Poisoning'

Poisoning is itself sufficient to bring a case under s 428 or s 429, IPC, as the case may be. It is not necessary that as a result of the poisoning, the animal may be rendered useless or maimed. It is an offence complete by itself even if the injury caused may not have any serious effect.

3. 'Maiming'

Commentary under the same heading in s 429, post, may be referred to.3696

4. 'Rendering Useless'

The expression 'rendering useless' differs from 'diminishing utility', the expression used in the definition of 'mischief'.[25] Rendering temporarily useless would not be sufficient.[26] Causing of abrasions or scratches on the surface of the skin with lathi blows would neither render the animal useless, nor maim it. It would be an offence only under s 426 .[27]

5. 'Animal'

As 'Animal' denotes any living creature, other than a human being, within the meaning of s 47, IPC, a hen is an animal for the purpose of this section though it falls within the category of a bird in common parlance.[28]

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable, by the owner of the animal, with the permission of the court before which prosecution for such offence is pending, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

7. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case. Section 251CrPC 1973 may be referred to.

8. Proof

In order to secure conviction under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed mischief (s 425) by killing/poisoning/maiming or rendering useless the animal in question; and
(b) the value of the said animal was Rs 10 or more, but less than Rs 50, at the relevant time.

If the mischief is not proved to have been committed within the meaning of s 425, there would be no criminal offence. Where the accused threw a stone, or a lump of mud, at a buffalo, to drive it out of her backyard, and the animal, after running some distance, fell down and died, and the sole intention of the accused appeared to have been to drive the buffalo out of her backyard, it was held that the conviction of the accused under this section was not sustainable.[29] However, where the accused were using even dandas to strike on animal and kept on doing it for some time, it was held that they must be deemed to have knowledge of the possible consequence of their act and if the dandas, striking the leg of a mare, fractured the bone, it could not be said that there was no intention to maim the animal.[30]3697

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF MISCHIEF

S. 429.

Mischief by killing or maiming cattle, etc., of any value or any animal of the value of fifty rupees.--

Whoever commits mischief by killing, poisoning, maiming or rendering useless, any elephant, camel, horse, mule, buffalo, bull, cow or ox, whatever may be the value thereof, or any other animal of the value of fifty rupees or upwards, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The preceding s 428, IPC enacts the general provision for cases of mischief by injury to animals. This section makes the same provision for two kinds of cases, namely:

(a) certain specified animals; and
(b) animals of the value of fifty rupees or more.

The cases of animals of the value of less than fifty rupees and more than Rs 10 would be covered by the preceding s 428 and animals of higher value will fall under this section. However, so far as the specified animals are concerned, this section is made specifically applicable to them, irrespective of their value.

The words 'elephant', 'camel', 'horse', 'mule' and 'buffalo', etc., in this section, have been used to indicate both the male and female of the species. Thus, a mare is covered by the word 'horse'.[31] Similarly, their age is also immaterial. Thus, bull and cow would also include their young ones.[32]

A person, killing a buffalo, dedicated to a deity, is guilty under this section.[33] However, where a bull has been left, after branding it, for public utility and has not been dedicated to any deity, the killing of such a bull would not be a mischief within the purview of this section.[34] Where, however, a young calf was branded as a bull at the shradh of the complainant's father and it used to be kept at the complainant's own place even thereafter, it was held that as the bull had not ceased to be the property of complainant, the killing of such a bull was an offence under this section.[35]

Seizure of a wild animal by the two accused when they were transporting the same constitutes offence under s 429, IPC and the case can be registered under s 429, IPC, apart from the provisions of Wild Life Protection Act 1972.[36]3698

2. Ingredients

There are three ingredients to be proved against a person, who is charged for the offence punishable under s 429, IPC :

(a) the accused committed mischief as defined under s 425, IPC ;
(b) the mischief was committed by killing or maiming or rendering useless;
(c) a mischief was committed on the animals including goats of the value of Rs 50 or upwards.[37]

3. Section 429 , IPC and Section 51 of the Wildlife Protection Act 1978--Distinction

The offence envisaged by s 9(1) read with s 2(16) and s 51 of the Wild Life (Protection) Act 1972, in its ingredients and content is not the same or substantially the same as s 429, IPC . The ingredients of the offence under s 9(1) read with s 51 of the said Act require for its establishment certain ingredients, which are not part of the offence under s 429, IPC, and vice versa. Therefore, in the case of killing of the elephant, the fact that the police after due investigation, filed a final report stating that, no offence was made out under s 429, IPC, would not bar the initiation of fresh proceedings against the accused under s 9(1) read with s 51 of the Wild Life (Protection) Act 1972.[38]

4. 'Poisoning'

Commentary under the same heading in s 428, ante, may be referred to.

The prosecution case was that the accused mixed poison in a pond as a result of which the fishes died. Post mortem report of the fishes and report of the chemical analyst were not filed in the case. Conviction of the accused appellant on charge of offence under s 429, IPC was set aside.[39]

5. 'Maiming'

In its primitive meaning, the verb 'to maim' involves the notion of privation of some part of the body, useful for fighting.[40] It involves the notion of the privation of the use of some limb or member, involving a permanent injury, and not a mere disfigurement.[41] 'Maiming' now, thus, means the privation of the use of a limb or member, and implies a permanent injury. It does not mean merely 'wounding', but wounding or otherwise injuring, so as to entail a permanent injury.[42] To constitute a maiming, a permanent injury must be inflicted on the animal, but to constitute wounding the injury need not be permanent. This and the preceding section provide for killing, poisoning, maiming and rendering useless. Causing of wounds would not fall under these sections though that would fall under the general s 246 .[43] The3699 expression would fairly include the amputation of any member, or the injury of an animal, by which its speed, or endurance, or use, is permanently diminished. Where a pony's ribs were broken in such a way as to permanently diminish its usefulness and value, it was held that it had been 'maimed'.[44] Similarly, where accused cut the ears of asses clean off at their base so as to affect the hearing of the animals, it was held that they were guilty of 'maiming' the animal.[45] So also, where the accused poured some nitrous acid into the left ear of a mare and perhaps also into the left eye, which occasioned the immediate blindness of the eye, it was held that the injury done, to the eye of the mare, in the said manner, was maiming.[46] However, where nearly one-half of one ear of an animal is cut off without impairing its sense of hearing, the injury does not amount to 'maiming' within the meaning of the section.[47]

6. 'Rendering Useless'

Commentary under the same heading in s 428, ante, may be referred to.

7. 'Any other Animal'

The word 'any other animal', in this section, do not mean an animal of the kind already mentioned; they refer to an animal of a different genus altogether, such as a dog or a goat, but in respect of other kind of animals, not specified, the section would not apply unless the particular animal in question is shown to be of the value of Rs 50 or upwards.[48]

8. Intention and Knowledge

Mischief involves intention/knowledge of the likelihood to cause wrongful loss or damage. It does not unnecessarily contemplate damage of a destructive character. Mischief involves a mental act with a destructive animus. Destruction with the object of creating wrongful loss or damage has to be established.

The elements of mischief, as defined in s 425, have to be proved. If there is no intention or knowledge, required by s 425, this section will not be applicable.[49]

Merely because an accident has taken place on a public highway, would not be sufficient to prove the charge for the offence under s 429, IPC, unless evidence has been lead that the accused driving the vehicle had any grudge against the complainant or had the required intention or knowledge in causing the accident.[50]3700

9. Negligence

Negligence does not necessarily amount to mischief. However, negligence coupled with intention to cause wrongful loss or damage may, amount to mischief in certain circumstances.[51]

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable, by the owner of the cattle or animal, with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

11. Charge

The following form of the charge may be accepted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of..... at...., you committed mischief by killing/or poisoning/or maiming/or rendering useless an animal, to wit,....(mention/animal, if specified in the section, and its value of Rs 50 or more if not so specified), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 429 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

12. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed mischief (s 425, IPC) by killing/poisoning/maiming or rendering useless the animal in question; and
(b) the said animal was an elephant, camel, horse, mule, buffalo, bull, cow, or ox (irrespective of the value), or any other animal of the value of Rs 50 or upwards.

Where, there was no identification of the dogs which had bitten the goats, the intention or knowledge of or any role played by the accused was not established, the accused was found entitled to an acquittal.[52]

In the absence of evidence of the cow being killed or poisoned or maimed or rendered useless, the offence under s 429, IPC, is not established even assuming that some injuries were caused to the cow.[53]

13. Double Conviction

The offence under this section being different from the offence under s 116 of the Motor Vehicles Act 1939, s 26 of the General Clauses Act 1897, does not invalidate the simultaneous conviction under both the sections.[54] However, where an accused3701 has already been tried and convicted under s 5 of the Prevention of Cruelty to Animal Act 1890, he cannot be subsequently convicted under this section.[55]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF MISCHIEF

S. 430.

Mischief by injury to works of irrigation or by wrongfully diverting water.--

Whoever commits mischief by doing any act which causes, or which he knows to be likely to cause, a diminution of the supply of water for agricultural purposes, or for food or drink for human beings or for animals which are property, or for cleanliness or for carrying on any manufacture, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

A condition precedent to prove an offence under this section is that the accused has committed mischief as defined in s 425 .[56] It is not sufficient to show that wrongful loss has been caused to the complainant.[57] This section is intended to prevent a diminution of the supply of water for agricultural purposes or for drinking for human beings or animals. The offence is treated more seriously as an aggravated form of mischief.

2. 'Mischief'

Section 425,ante, and commentary under it may be referred to.

3. 'Act'

An 'act' includes an illegal omission which is equivalent to an illegal act.[58] Thus, where a bund was lawfully cut for irrigation by proper authorisation for twenty hours but it was kept open for some time more, it was held that it was an illegal omission for which the accused could be held guilty under this section.[59]

4. 'Diminution of the supply of Water for Agricultural Purposes', etc.

Before a person can be held to have committed an offence under this section, it must be shown that he has caused a diminution of the supply of water for agricultural purposes, etc.[60] If there is no evidence to show that any diminution of the supply of3702 water for agricultural purposes, etc., was caused, or was likely to be caused by the act done, by the accused, the accused would not be guilty under this section even if he may be found guilty under s 426, IPC .[61] Where wrongful loss is caused from diminution in the supply of water, the damage should not be presumed, but proved.[62] The placing, across the channel, of an embankment causes a change in the channel, which diminishes or destroys its value, and may cause a diminution of the supply of water for agricultural purposes.[63] Where there was evidence to show that the accused filled up the channel to cause diminution in the supply of water, it was held that it was sufficient for holding him guilty under this section.[64] Where the accused cut a bund, belonging to the complainant, which held water and which he required for the irrigation of his field, and let out some of the water and the supply of water was thereby diminished, they were held guilty under this section.[65] Where the accused not only dammed up a supply channel of water, but also diverted the water, the intention to cause wrongful loss was held to have been made out.[66] Where, however, the accused closed a water-course, without obtaining any permission to do so, thereby preventing water from finding its way to certain fields, below the place where he closed it, but there was nothing on the record to show that the person, to whom lower fields belonged, had any legal right to the water, intercepted by the accused, it was held that the offence of mischief was not made out.[67] However, where the accused formed an unlawful assembly with the object of enforcing, by criminal force or show of criminal force, their supposed right to take water against the order, as to turns issued by the tahsildar, it was held that they were rightly convicted of the offence of mischief under s 430 .[68] The taking of water which can only mean taking without any sort of right, is within this section and such taking evidences the intention to cause wrongful loss.[69] It is enough if the accused knew that by blocking a channel, through which the complainant had right to take water, wrongful loss would be caused to the complainant.[70]

The words 'diminution of the supply of water for agricultural purposes', in this section, cannot be limited to those cases only where the water had been allowed either to go waste or has been delivered for non-agricultural purposes. The section read as a whole, also refers to cases where the water is intended for use by particular persons for particular purposes, and is diverted by an accused person for his own purposes though of a like nature.[71]3703

5. Offence--When not Committed

Where there is a genuine dispute between the two parties in regard to a channel, the act of closing the channel is not an offence under this section.[72] Where the accused prevented the complainant from opening a sluice, which had been closed about a fortnight before the date of occurrence, it was held that this would not amount to an offence under this section.[73] Where the accused closed a water-course, by which water had been supplied to the complainant's land, but no damage was alleged to have been caused by the stoppage of water to any crop in the land, was held that no mischief had been committed by diminution of the supply of water.[74] Where the accused persons were alleged to have trespassed land in which a well was excavated by the ancestors of the complainant and were alleged to have demolished the well and constructed the wall of the tank of latrine on it, but the evidence of the witnesses produced by the complainant proved that the portion of the land in question was already sold to the accused persons who after purchase got the right over the said land. Regarding the mischief by restraining complainant in taking water for drinking purpose, it could not be proved as the well was damaged since the last ten years and was not in use of the villagers. Under the circumstances, the accused persons cannot be said to have committed the offence under s 430 .[75]

6. Matter which could only be decided by Civil Court

Where the complainant, in a complaint, filed against the accused for cutting supply of water, claimed that his ancestors had put up the bund which had been cut by the accused, it was held that the question, as to whether the bund was put up, or was not put up, by the ancestors of the complainant and whether the complainant was the only person entitled to the water and nobody else, was a matter, which could be decided only by the Civil Court, and it was not covered by this section.[76]

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable, by the person to whom the loss or damage is caused, with the permission of the Court, before which the prosecution for such offence is pending and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you committed mischief by doing an act, to wit.....(describe it), which caused (or which you knew to be likely to cause) a diminution of the supply of water of AB for agricultural purposes (or for food or drink, etc), and3704 that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 430 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

9. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed mischief under s 425, IPC ; and
(b) the said mischief caused, or the accused knew that it was likely to cause, a diminution of the supply of water:

(i) for agricultural purposes, or
(ii) for food or drink for human beings or for animals, which are property, or
(iii) for cleanliness, or
(iv) for carrying on any manufacture.

The mere fact that the accused, by cutting through a bund and permitting a portion of the water to escape, caused thereby a diminution in the supply of water for agricultural purposes to other persons, is not sufficient unless it is proved that wrongful loss or damage resulted to some person from diminution in the supply of water.[77]It is essential to show that the act had been done with intent to cause wrongful loss or damage to the public, or to any person or persons, or with knowledge on the part of the person, who does the act, that he is likely to cause such wrongful loss or damage.[78] No offence under this section can be said to have been committed unless the complainant shows that he had some right to carry water to his fields through the channel, and there was an intention on the part of the accused to cause wrongful loss.[79] A person cannot commit mischief upon himself.[80] Where the accused had cut a dam, which had been put up by the complainant with the sanction of the canal authorities, but it was not found that there was the required intent or knowledge or that there was any diminution of the supply of water for agricultural purposes, it was held that the conviction under this section could not be sustained.[81] Similarly, where the accused cut a tank bund in order to build a new sluice there, the existing sluice being out of order, it was held that this would be an offence under this section only if the intention, specified in s 425, IPC, as well as the other requisites of this section are established.[82]

10. Probation

Where the accused was convicted because he was found committing theft of canal water by inserting a plastic pipe in the canal, with the other end of it towards the paddy fields of his father, the accused aged 25 yrs was a first offender and had3705 already undergone sentence of nearly 1 month, so he was ordered to be released on probation for a period of 1 year on his furnishing a personal bond of Rs 5000, with one surety of the like amount.[83]

11. Sentence

Under this section, a sentence of daily fine for offence, which may be committed in future, is illegal,[84] because it is an adjudication in respect of an offence which has not been committed when such order is made.[85] In Baburao v Municipal Committee ,[86] it was observed that since no person can be punished for a thing which he has not done, but which he may possibly do in future, a daily fine, until the accused complies with the order, passed against him, is illegal. The proper course in a case of continuing breach, therefore, is to issue a notice to the accused for the days during which the breach continued, afford him an opportunity to defend himself and in case the offence is proved, punish him according to law. However, the imposition of recurring fine is clearly illegal.[87]

Interference with an acquittal in a case under s 430 would be justified only for substantial and compelling reasons evident from the record.[88]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF MISCHIEF

S. 431.

Mischief by injury to public road, bridge, river or channel.--

Whoever commits mischief by doing any act which renders or which he knows to be likely to render any public road, bridge, navigable river or navigable channel, natural or artificial, impassable or less safe for travelling or conveying property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This and the following sections provide for aggravated form of mischief by reason of the mischief involved being of a serious character. This section provides for mischief by injury to public road, bridge, river or channel. Causing obstruction on a public road by holding public meeting on, or at the side of it, is an offence punishable under ss 431 and 339, IPC .[89]3706

2. 'Public Road'

The words 'public road', used in this section, are public road, and not public way. A track to a jungle would not be a public road.[90] The word 'public' indicates the user, to which it is put; it does not indicate ownership.[91]

3. 'Bridge'

A bridge would cover any viaduct or aqueduct as is expressly mentioned in s 33 of the Malicious Damage Act 1861 (UK Act).

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

5. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of..., at...you committed mischief by doing an act, to wit.... (describe the act), which rendered (or which you knew to be likely to render) a public road (or bride, or a navigable river, or a navigable channel), to wit... (describe it), impassable (or less safe for travelling or conveying property), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 431 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

6. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed mischief (s 425, IPC); and
(b) it was committed by doing an act which rendered, or which the accused knew to be likely to render, the public road, bridge, navigable river, or navigable channel, in question, impassable or less safe for travelling or conveying property.

To establish an offence under this section, it is necessary to show that a mischief within the meaning of s 425, IPC was committed. If the act does not amount to mischief under s 425, it would not be an offence under this section.[92] Where the accused dug a trench on waste land, bordering upon the public road, in order to protect his land from drainage water and thereby incidentally caused damage to the public road, it was held that this was not sufficient to constitute the offence of mischief.[93] Where, however, the accused cut a road to allow water, accumulated in their field, to flow away, it was held that they committed offence under s 431 as by3707 cutting they had made the road impassable or less safe for travelling or conveying property.[94]

OF MISCHIEF

S. 432.

Mischief by causing inundation or obstruction to public drainage attended with damage.--

Whoever commits mischief by doing any act which causes or which he knows to be likely to cause an inundation or an obstruction to any public drainage attended with injury or damage, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is confined only to those acts mischief which cause an inundation or an obstruction to any public drainage. Public drainage would cover both natural and artificial drainage.

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of...,at..., you committed mischief by doing an act, to wit...(describe it), which caused (or which you knew to be likely to cause) an inundation (or an obstruction) to a public drainage, to wit...(describe it), attended with injury (or damage), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 432 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

4. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed mischief (s 425, IPC);
(b) the said mischief caused, or which the accused knew he was likely to cause, was an inundation or an obstruction to a public drainage in question; and
(c) the said inundation or obstruction was attended with injury or damage.

It must be proved that the inundation or obstruction was attended with injury. Where the accused erected a dam across a river but it did not injuriously affect the3708 property dammed, namely, the river, it was held that there was no offence under this section. The mere fact that it threatened damage to any property, did not constitute an offence.[1] It must also be proved that there was the requisite intention or knowledge. Where the accused, while extending a garden and laying the foundation of a house, encroached upon the inner slope of a river embankment, it was held that the house and the garden of the accused himself was the first to be swept away in the event of the dreaded breach and, therefore, guilty knowledge or intent could not be reasonably inferred.[2]

5. Acquittal

Where the accused were convicted for obstructing the natural flow of water causing inconvenience, due to the construction of the bandh in front of the house of the complainant, it was not proved that obstruction to public drainage would cause injury or damage or that, it was in the knowledge of the accused, that it would cause such injury, the conviction of the accused under s 432, IPC, was not found proper, so the accused was acquitted.[3]

Whoever commits mischief by destroying or moving any light-house or other light used as a sea-mark, or any sea-mark or buoy or other thing placed as a guide for navigators, or by any act which renders any such light-house, sea-mark, buoy or other such thing as aforesaid less useful as a guide for navigators, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section makes provision for mischief by destroying, moving or rendering less useful a light-house or a sea-mark, etc. It is intended to provide for safety of navigation by sea.

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person), as follows:3709

That, on or about the.... day of.....at, you committed mischief by destroying (or moving) a light-house (or the light used as a sea-mark/or the sea-mark/or the buoy, or thing, to wit....(describe it), placed as guide for navigators) (or you did an act, to wit.... And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

4. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed mischief (s 425, IPC); and
(b) the said mischief was committed:

(i) by destroying or moving the light-house, or the light, used as a sea-mark, or a sea-mark, or a buoy, or any other thing, placed as a guide for navigators, or
(ii) by an act which rendered such light-house, etc., less useful as a guide for navigators.

OF MISCHIEF

S. 434.

Mischief by destroying or moving, etc., a land-mark fixed by public authority.--

Whoever commits mischief by destroying or moving any land-mark fixed by the authority of a public servant, or by any act which renders such land-mark less useful as such, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section, being complementary to the preceding s 433, IPC, which relates to destruction or moving of a sea mark, deals with the destruction, or moving, of a land mark. The consequences of an offence under this section being less serious in comparison to an offence under s 433, the punishment is also light.

2. 'Fixed by the Authority of a Public Servant'

The offence under this section can be committed only if the land mark, in respect of which the offence is said to have been committed, was fixed by the authority of a public servant. Thus, the destruction, or removal, or boundary pillars, got fixed by a magistrate to demarcate land in a case under this section.[4] Similarly, the removal, by an accused, of a barricade, placed by the municipality on a piece of land in front of his house, which impaired the ingress to, and egress from, his house, was also not held to be an offence under this section.[5] If, however, the land mark has been fixed3710 by a public authority, any procedural irregularity in fixing it would not be a ground for the accused to take the law in his own hands.[6]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is non- cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

4. Charge

The offence under this section being triable, framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 of Criminal Procedure Code 1973 may be referred to.

5. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed mischief (s 425, IPC);
(b) it was committed by destroying or moving a land-mark or by doing an act which rendered it less useful as such; and
(c) the land-mark was fixed by the authority of a public servant.

Of Offences Against Property

OF MISCHIEF

S. 435.

Mischief by fire or explosive substance with intent to cause damage to amount of one hundred or (in case of agricultural procedure) ten rupees.--

Whoever commits mischief by fire or any explosive substance, intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, damage to any property to the amount of one hundred rupees or upwards [7][or (where the property is agricultural produce) ten rupees or upwards], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section contemplates an offence of mischief brought about by fire or explosive substance. The essential ingredient of the offence is intention on the part of the accused to cause, or knowledge on his part that he will, by his act, cause damage to any property, to an amount of rupees ten or more in case of agricultural procedure, or to an amount of rupees one hundred or more in any other case. The value, specified in the section, is in relation to the extent of damage suffered by the owner of the property;[8] it has no bearing on the value of the property itself. It makes no difference if the subject matter of mischief existed on land the ownership whereof is in dispute.3711 If a trespasser has left his walking stick or a watch on the field of another, the latter will not be justified in damaging or destroying those articles by fire. Therefore, an accused, setting fire to the complainant's hut on the disputed land, is liable to conviction under this section.[9]

If mischief by fire is caused to any property which attracts s 435, but with an intention to cause or with the knowledge that it is likely to cause destruction of any building, s 436 will be attracted, though only damage as contemplated in s 435 resulted. What is important is the intention or knowledge as mentioned in ss 435 and 436, IPC . Whether or not the intention or knowledge was to damage property mentioned in s 435 or building mentioned in s 436 is the relevant question. If mischief by fire is caused with intention or knowledge to damage property, s 435 is attracted. On the other hand, if the intention or knowledge is to cause destruction of any building, then s 436 would be attracted.[10]

This section covers cases which do not fall within the scope of ss 436, 437 and 438, IPC .

2. Part I of Section 285 Distinguished from Section 435,IPC

Commentary under the same heading in s 285, vol 2, may be referred to.

3. 'Mischief by fire or Explosive Substance'

The Indian Penal Code makes provision for mischief by fire or explosive substance in respect of:

(a) agricultural procedure to the amount of Rs 10 or upwards (s 435, IPC);
(b) any property to the amount of Rs 100 or upwards (s 435, IPC);
(c) building (s 436, IPC); and
(d) a decked vessel or a vessel of a burden of atleast 20 tons (ss 437 and 438, IPC).

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

5. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrateetc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you committed mischief by fire (or an explosive substance), intending thereby to (or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby) cause damage to a property, to wit... (describe it), to the amount of Rs 100 or more (or Rs 10 or more if the property is agricultural produce), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 435 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.3712

6. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed mischief (s 425, IPC);
(b) the said mischief was caused by fire or by an explosive substance;
(c) the damage caused thereby amounted to:

(i) Rs 10 or upwards if it was agricultural produce, or
(ii) Rs 100 or upwards if property is of any other kind.

7. Acquittal

Where the prosecution case was that the accused set fire to the rubber plantations of the complainant, it was alleged that he first put fire to dry leaves and carried the burning leaves in his hands to the plantation of the complainant, the distance between the two plantations was about 30 acres, there was unexplained delay of more than 5 years in lodging the FIR and the names of eyewitnesses were not mentioned in it, the accused was found entitled to the benefit of the doubt.[11]

Where there was a dispute between the management and the workers, and the workers set the official car on fire, causing serious burn injuries to the occupant of the car, resulting in the death of one such occupant, the descriptive particular of the culprit was not given in the statement of witnesses recorded on the date of occurrence, the prosecution failed to examine the witnesses escaping with negligible burns, the incident having occurred within seconds, so it could not be said that the witnesses were able to identify the culprits. The accused persons were found entitled to the benefit of the doubt and so were acquitted of the offences under s 302 and 435, IPC .[12]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF MISCHIEF

S. 436.

Mischief by fire or explosive substance with intent to destroy house, etc.--

Whoever commits mischief by fire or any explosive substance, intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, the destruction of any building which is ordinarily used as a place of worship or as a human dwelling or as a place for the custody of property, shall be punished with [13][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.3713

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with mischief by fire or explosive substance with intent to destroy a house, etc. The offence consists of not intentionally committing mischief by fire and thereby causing the destruction of a building, etc., but committing mischief by fire with the intention of causing the destruction of a building, etc. The intention is the most important element to constitute an offence under this section.[14] The mere neglect or carelessness on the part of the accused to prevent fire straying into the government forest will not come under this section.[15] Where, however, the accused, angry with his wife, went out and set fire to the eves of his house thereby causing risk to house owners in the neighbourhood but doing no actual mischief, it was held that the case fell under this section, and not under s 285 .[16] In Babu v Rex ,[17]it was observed that if the accused knew that he was likely, by his act, to destroy any neighbouring house, etc., an offence under this section was complete.

The essential ingredients of s 436 are:

(i) commission of mischief,
(ii) by fire or any explosive substances,
(iii) intending to cause or knowing that it is likely to cause destruction of the building,
(iv) which is ordinarily used as a place of worship or as a human dwelling or as a place for the custody of property.[18]

Actual destruction of the building is not always necessary to attract s 436 of the Indian Penal Code . It is also not necessary that the building should be destroyed by fire or severely damaged. It is sufficient if there was every likelihood of the building being destroyed by fire by the criminal act of mischief by fire. The intention to destroy any building or the knowledge of the likelihood of destruction of the building, are all matters for evidence. Intention or knowledge is a state of mind which could be decided only on appreciation of evidence or on consideration of the materials on record or both.[19]

2. Abetment

Under the Indian law, for an offence of abetment, it is not necessary that the offence should have been committed. A man may be guilty as an abettor, irrespective of whether the offence is committed.[20] Where the accused instigated another to commit the offence under s 436, IPC, the offence was committed not by the person instigated, but by someone else, the accused instigating the commission of offence was guilty of the offence of abetment, not under s 436 read with s 109, IPC, but under s 436 read with s 115, IPC, since the commission of the offence was not the consequence of his abetment.[21] Where, the accused was found to have given orders to3714 one B to set fire to the hut, the hut was set fire to and burnt, the charge against B under s 436, was not proved, so B was acquitted, but the accused was found guilty under s 436 read with s 109, IPC .[22]

3. 'Building'

The word 'build' in its ordinary dictionary meaning means, to erect as a house or bridge, to form or construct. Similarly, 'building' would necessarily mean a structure.[23]

The term 'building' occurs also in ss 380 and 442, IPC . The cases, relating to offence under ss 380 and 442, have been dealt with under those sections. They may also be referred to for the interpretation of the word 'building' in this section. The term has not been defined in the Indian law as the term is very indefinite.

The thatch-wall of an enclosure, in which there are several thatched huts, is a building'.[24]

Even a Kachcha, Jhumpa with a thatched roof closed by doors and shutters in which the grain and other articles were stored, comes within the meaning of 'building'.[25]

A structure, made of straw, and not of bricks and mortar, may be considered a building if it has got the necessary furnishings such as doors, bars, etc. However, a double-thatched shed, resting on bamboos or wooden pillars, having no door, etc., cannot be treated as a building.[26] But the definition of building does not include chappar or chhan (thatched roof).[27]

A cabin which is removable which might be made of wood will not be covered under the meaning 'building', which necessarily means the structure or an erection which is of permanent nature and is erected on the earth and some portion of it is embedded in the earth.[28] Similarly, a thatched sheltering place meant for temporary rest to keep watch over the harvested crop, stacked in the adjacent khaligram where there was no brick and mortar of even a finished wall, and, instead it was merely a thatched shed without any bars, doors, etc., do not come within the definition of building.[29] For further commentary, the text under the same heading in s 380, ante and s 442, post may be referred to.3715

4. Damage to joint property of Complainant and Accused

The dispute between the accused and the complainant about the ownership of the pardha wall would not entitle the accused to demolish the wall, when it is found that the wall was the common property of both.[30] Where the house was admittedly a joint property of the parties and the demolition of the wall and setting fire of the house which was in exclusive occupation of the informant by the accused persons cannot be said that as a mistake of law or a mistake of fact the wall of the said house was demolished and the house was set on fire by the accused persons rather the accused persons had taken law in their own hand and, therefore, liable to be convicted under s 436 .[31]

5. 'Ordinarily Used'

In order to convict an accused under this section, it is absolutely necessary to prove that the building, which the accused destroyed, came within one of the classes, mentioned in the section, and the words 'ordinarily used' do not mean that other buildings are, from time to time, used for such purposes; they mean that the particular building was itself used.[32]

6. 'Place of Worship'

For purposes of this section, mosques, temples, churches, synagogues, gurdwaras and other places, where the persons of different religions carry on their worship, would be places of worship. It is, however, important to note that before s 436, IPC can be attracted; there must be some building in which the worship is carried on. A case of the destruction by fire or explosive substance of any place of worship, for which there is no regular building, would fall under s 426 of IPC, and not under this section. A kyaung or nagoda would be a place of worship.[33] For further commentary, the text under the same heading in s 295, vol 2, may be referred to.

7. Mistake of fact or Law as to title or Possession

A claim of right as to ownership or possession of property may stem from a mistake of law or a mistake of fact or of both. A mistake as to title or possession, whether it arises from mistake of law or of fact, negatives mens rea. A person who puts forward a claim of right founded on mistake or ignorance of civil law pertaining to the matter need not necessarily establish that the mistake or ignorance arose inspite of reasonable diligence. The only thing necessary is that the mistake must be one which leads the accused to claim that he has a right to act as he does. A mistake as to criminal law only will not give rise to a claim of right; an error as to civil law may do so. So far as the offence of mischief is concerned, a claim of right believed to exist, even though unreasonably is a valid defence.[34]3716

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions. Offence under s 436, IPC is non-compoundable; and it cannot be compounded on the basis of compromise between the parties.[35]

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of session judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you committed mischief by fire (or by an explosive substance), to wit... (describe it), intending to cause (or knowing it to be likely that you would thereby cause) the destruction of the building, to wit... (describe it), which was ordinarily used as a place of worship (or as a human dwelling or as a place for the custody of property), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 436 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

In case of mischief by fire, with intent to cause the destruction of a dwelling house, the charge should lay the intent as an intent to cause destruction of a house used as a human dwelling, and not of a house simply.[36]

The allegations against the two shop owners were that they were negligent in switching off the main switch in their shops as a result of which fire broke out causing damage to an adjoining shop. The fact of the case showed that the shop was allotted to a second owner and was run by a first owner. The second owner was, therefore, not liable for the offence under s 436, IPC, and framing of charge against him was not found proper. However, there was a strong suspicion of commission of the offence by the first owner, so his discharge by the Trial Court was found improper.[37]

10. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed mischief as defined in s 425, ante;
(b) the said mischief was caused by fire or by explosive substance;
(c) the accused intended to cause, or he knew that he was likely to cause, destruction of a building which was ordinarily used as a:

(i) place of worship, or
(ii) human dwelling, or
(iii) place for the custody of property.3717

Where the evidence of the prosecution witnesses clearly showed that the accused persons have set fire to the house of the deceased, causing destruction to the property, the conviction of the accused persons under s 436, IPC, was found proper.[38]

Offence under s 436, IPC is a serious offence. Harsher being the punishment, stricter is the proof required to hold/convict the accused for offence under s 436, IPC .[39]

When the accused each and every time threatened to teach a lesson by setting fire to the complainant's house, it is clear that the accused had already made up his mind to destroy the house by fire.[40] Where the victim found that the appellant accused, standing in the front of her house, had set fire to the house and ran away, she had raised alarm which attracted other witnesses whose evidence was found consistent and reliable; the accused was convicted under s 436, IPC .[41]

Where the house of the deceased was set on fire, and one of the eyewitnesses was a widow of the deceased, and the other was her sister-in-law and their evidence was found to be truthful, some of the accused persons, named by them had been attributed with specific overt acts, so their conviction under ss 402 and 436 read with s 149, IPC, was found proper. However, some other accused persons, whose names were not given by the widow of the deceased, and who were only identified for the first time in court were found entitled to an acquittal.[42] Where the accused persons sprinkled and poured kerosene oil on the deceased's shop as well as on the person of the deceased, and set fire on the deceased and to the shop, the dying declaration of the deceased and the evidence of eyewitnesses were found reliable, the acquittal of the accused of the charges under ss 402 / 34 IPC, and ss 436 / 34, IPC, was found not proper and so was set aside, and the accused were convicted of the said offences.[43]

Where it was established that the accused persons were members of an unlawful assembly, and with a common object, they set houses on fire and killed 4 persons; the common object of the accused person, however, was proved to setting the houses on fire and not committing murder, the conviction of the accused person under ss 302 and 149, IPC was set aside, while that under ss 436 and 149, IPC, was confirmed.[44]

11. Group clashes/Arson -- Evidence

When an unlawful assembly or a large number of persons take part in arson or in a clash between two groups, in order to convict a person, at least two prosecution witnesses have to support and identify the role and involvement of the persons concerned. The normal test is that the conviction could be sustained only if it is supported by two or more witnesses who give a consistent account of the incident in question.[45]3718

12. Acquittal

No conviction under this section can be sustained in the absence of proof that the accused committed mischief by fire.[46] It is not safe to allow a conviction to stand if the Trial Court has laid considerable stress upon the previous chain of events which is not admissible in evidence.[47] When nothing incriminating has been found in the possession of the accused, nor any witness has seen them putting fire to the hut in question, they cannot be convicted under s 436 read with s 34, IPC .[48]

Where the sole eyewitness lodged an FIR after an unexplained long delay and deliberated with other witnesses before lodging the FIR, his claim of being injured while trying to extinguish the fire was not supported by medical evidence, the evidence of the sole eyewitness was not found reliable and the acquittal of the accused was found proper.[49]

Where the accused was alleged to have set fire to the hut of the complainant and the prosecution examined only a child witness who did not understand the sanctity of oath, the independent witness though available was not examined and there was old enmity between the complainant and the accused and the complainant was also involved in criminal cases, the acquittal of the accused was found proper.[50]

When a wooden cabin burnt by the accused, does not come within the definition of 'building', the accused cannot be convicted for the offence under s 436, IPC .[51] Where, merely a temporary structure for resting and supervision of the harvested crop by the side of the khalihan was raised, which was set ablaze in the absence of other evidence, bringing the said kucha and temporary structure within the encompass and definition of 'building' as defined under s 436, IPC, meant for human dwelling, the acquittal of the accused was found proper.[52]

The accused was alleged to have set fire to the hut. The presence of eyewitnesses at the spot at the time of occurrence was found doubtful. The evidence of the main eyewitness of seeing the accused at the spot was found improbable and his statement that the accused continued to stand at the scene of the occurrence after setting fire to the hut was found completely unreliable. There was also a possibility of false implication of the accused, so the acquittal of the accused was held proper.[53] Where the version given by the prosecution witnesses conflicted with each other regarding their perception of flight of culprits who had set the fire, the conviction of the accused in the circumstances could not be sustained.[54] Where other pieces of circumstantial evidence were found not proved, mere motive and conduct of the respondent were held not sufficient to record the conviction of the respondent for offence under s 436, IPC .[55]3719

The accused stated that it was none else but she herself who had set fire to the dwelling house of the informant. Held, it amounted to admission of fact on the part of the accused. Accused was convicted under s 436, IPC .[56]

13. Acquittal under Section 342 is No Bar to Trial under Section 436

Commentary under the same heading in s 342, vol 3, may be referred to.

14. Conviction

Where it was found that the accused, who was the member of an unlawful assembly, gave the order to set fire to a hut and the hut was actually set fire to by one member or another of the unlawful assembly, though the unlawful assembly, as a whole, did not have any common object of setting fire to the hut, it was held that the conviction of the accused for the offence under s 436 read with s 109, IPC, was not bad in law.[57]

The accused setting fire to the house of the victim is liable to be convicted under s 436, IPC .[58]

When the accused, the process servers of court, had set ablaze files in the subordinate judge court, and the chowkidar on duty on court premises had heard the accused abusing the judicial officers and uttering that they had set the files on fire, and he had rushed to the concerned court and saw the files burning, his version was fully corroborated by the other witnesses, some judges and court officials, and all the three accused were present in the court premises even after the duty hours without any justification, although the court work had been suspended on that day, they were under the influence of liquor which indicated their attitude towards their work place, their careless and indisciplined behavior. The fire had been lit by them with the intention to destroy the judicial record; therefore, the conviction of the accused was proper.[59]

15. Probation

Where the case has amicably been settled between the parties, the accused should be granted the benefit of probation.[60]

16. Sentence (Deterrent)

Setting fire to a residential building but, belonging to another, being a serious offence, capable of endangering lives of persons and destroying property, the court must take a serious view of the matter in the absence of extenuating circumstances.[61] In Ghafoor Khan v Emperor ,[62] the court refused to reduce a sentence of five years rigorous imprisonment by observing that arson in an Indian village is a crime which3720 cannot be too lightly punished as it causes incalculable damage to innocent persons, who can ill afford to lose the little property that they possess.

The accused persons who set the house of victim on fire were sentenced by the Apex Court to undergo rigorous imprisonment for seven years for the commission of the offence under ss 436 / 149, IPC .[63]

17. Sentence (Lenient)

The fact, that the accused is very old and suffering from paralysis, may be taken into consideration for giving a low sentence.[64] When the accused was an old man of 50 years of age facing trial for more than 4½ years, the sentence of imprisonment was reduced to two years instead of rigorous imprisonment for three years.[65]

Where the accused was a young boy aged about 19 years at the time of occurrence of the sentence of one year, rigorous imprisonment was awarded to him to meet the ends of justice.[66] Where the accused was a person belonging to the Scheduled Tribe and was a labour by profession and was not even in a position to pay the fine amount, the sentence of imprisonment already undergone by him was found quite sufficient to meet the ends of justice.[67]

Where the accused remained in custody as an under-trial prisoner for about three months, and he had been facing the agony of the prosecution for the last about sixteen years, there was no material on the file to show that after having been being released on bail, the accused had indulged in any such or similar activity. Considering all the circumstances of the case, the sentence of imprisonment imposed upon the accused was reduced to that already undergone by him, however, fine of Rs 2000 imposed upon the accused by the trial court was enhanced to Rs 60,000.[68] Offence under s 436, IPC is non-compoundable, but in view of the compromise arrived at between the parties, to maintain peace and harmony between them, sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[69]
