Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF MISCHIEF

S. 437.

Mischief with intent to destroy or make unsafe a decked vessel or one of twenty tons burden.--

Whoever commits mischief to any decked vessel or any vessel of a burden of twenty tons or upwards, intending to destroy or render unsafe, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby destroy or render unsafe, that vessel, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine3721

COMMENTS

1. Scope

Under this section, mischief to a decked vessel or an undecked vessel of a burden of twenty tons or upwards, with intention to destroy or render it unsafe, has been treated as a serious kind of mischief and has been made severely punishable. The coasting crafts in some areas of India have got decked vessels, but in other places they are undecked. Those of substantial size are intended to be covered by this section. It is not intended to cover the cases of small crafts, like boats and canoes, etc.

Under this section, attempt to commit a mischief stands on the same footing as committing a mischief.

A ship is covered by the term 'vessel'.[70]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of session judge,etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you committed mischief, to wit... (specify it), to a decked vessel (or to a vessel of a burden of...tons), to wit... (specify it), intending to destroy (or render unsafe) the said vessel (or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby destroy it or render it unsafe), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 437 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this Court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

4. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed mischief (s 425, IPC) against the vessel in question;
(b) the said vessel was either decked or of a burden of an least 20 tons; and
(c) by mischief the accused intended to, or he knew it to be likely that he would thereby, destroy it or render it unsafe.

Punishment for the mischief described in section 437 committed by fire or explosive substance.--

Whoever commits, or attempts to commit, by fire or any explosive substance, such mischief as is described in the last preceding section, shall be punished with [71][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.3722

COMMENTS

1. Scope

The causing of mischief to vessels by fire or explosive substance being more serious, this section provides punishment only for the aggravated form of the same offence which has been made punishable under the preceding s 437 .

2. Procedure

Commentary under the same heading in s 437, ante may be referred to.

3. Charge

The charge would be in the same form as under the preceding s 437, IPC, with the only exceptions that it has also to be mentioned that the mischief was committed by fire or by an explosive substance and that ' s 438, IPC ' has to be substituted for ' s 437 '.

4. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed, or attempted to commit, mischief (s 425, IPC);
(b) the said mischief was committed, or attempted, by fire or by an explosive substance;
(c) it was committed, or attempted to be committed, to a decked vessel or an undecked vessel of a burden of twenty tons or upwards; and
(d) by the mischief the accused intended to, or he knew it to be likely that he would thereby, destroy the said vessel or render it unsafe.

71 Substituted by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Schedule for 'transportation for life' (wef 1-1-1956).

OF MISCHIEF

S. 439.

Punishment for intentionally running vessel aground or ashore with intent to commit theft, etc.--

Whoever intentionally runs any vessel aground or ashore, intending to commit theft of any property contained therein or to dishonestly misappropriate any such property, or with intent that such theft or misappropriation of property may be committed, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

This section provides punishment for running a vessel aground or ashore with a criminal intention either to commit theft or misappropriate any property, contained therein, or with the criminal intention that such theft or misappropriation is committed. The offence may be committed by the person, who runs the vessel, or by3723 any other person of whom the person, running the vessel, or by any other person of whom the person, running vessel, would be an abettor. The intentional stranding of the vessel in question is the condition for the operation of the section.

2. Procedure

Commentary under the same heading in s 437, ante may be referred to.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of session judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the... day of ..., at..., you intentionally ran the vessel, or wit... (describe it), aground (or ashore) with the intention to commit theft of (or to dishonestly misappropriate) any property, contained therein, or with intent that such theft (or dishonest misappropriation) may be committed, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 439 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

4. Proof

To secure a conviction under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused ran aground or ashore the vessel in question; and
(b) he did so with intent to commit theft, or criminal misappropriation, of the property, contained in the said vessel, or with intent that such theft, or misappropriation, of property might be committed.

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF MISCHIEF

S. 440.

Mischief committed after preparation made for causing death or hurt.--

Whoever commits mischief, having made preparation for causing to any person death, or hurt, or wrongful restraint, or fear of death, or of hurt, or of wrongful restraint, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

This section provides punishment for an offence of mischief aggravated by reason of the intent or motive for which the mischief is committed. The various offences, with the intention to commit which the mischief is committed, have been specified in the section. The offence under s 427, IPC is comparatively a minor offence against the offence under this section.[72]3724

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the... day of...,at..., you committed mischief after having made a preparation, to wit... (describe it), for causing to AB, death/or hurt/or wrongful restraint/or fear of death/or free of hurt/or fear of wrongful restraint, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 440 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you tried by this court on the said charge.

4. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove[73] that:

(a) the accused committed mischief as defined in s 425, IPC ; and
(b) the said mischief was committed after making a preparation for causing, to the person in question, death/or hurt/or wrongful restraint/or fear of death/or fear of wrongful restraint.

While proving mischief, care should be taken to show:

(i) intention, or knowledge of likelihood, to cause wrongful loss or damage to the person concerned;
(ii) causing of the destruction of some property or any such charge in any such charge in any property or in the situation thereof; and
(iii) such charge resulting in destruction or diminishing of the value or utility or any property or affecting it injuriously.

Thus for proving mischief, either destruction of property, or some change in the property or in its situation, which had the effect of destroying or diminishing the value or utility, or in any event affecting it injuriously, has necessarily to be proved.[74]

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 441.

Criminal trespass.--

Whoever enters into or upon property in the possession of another with intent to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession of such property, or having lawfully entered into or upon such property, unlawfully remains there with intent thereby to intimidate, insult or annoy any such person, or with intent to commit an offence, is said to commit "criminal trespass". 3725

STATE AMENDMENTS

Orissa--For s 441, substitute the following section, namely--

" S. 441 . Criminal trespass.-- Whoever enters into or upon property in possession of another with intent to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession of such property, or, having lawfully entered into or upon such property, unlawfully remains there with intent thereby to intimidate, insult or annoy any such person, or with intent to commit an offence, or, having lawfully entered into or upon such property, remains there with the intention of taking unauthorised possession or making unauthorised use of such property and fails to withdraw such property or its possession or use, when called upon to do so by that another person by notice in writing, duly served on him, is said to commit 'criminal trespass'".--[Vide Orissa Act 22 of 1986, s 2 (w.e.f. 6-12-1986)].

Uttar Pradesh.--For s 441, substitute the following new section, namely--

" S. 441 . Criminal trespass.--Whoever enters into or upon property in possession of another with intent to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession of such property, or, having lawfully entered into or upon such property, unlawfully remains there with intent thereby to intimidate, insult or annoy any such person, or with intent to commit an offence, or, having entered into or upon such property, whether before or after the coming into force of the Criminal Laws (Uttar Pradesh Amendment) Act, 1961, with the intention of taking unauthorised possession or making unauthorised use of such property fails to withdraw from such property or its possession or use, when called upon to do so by that another person by notice in writing, duly served upon him, by the date specified in the notice, is said to commit 'criminal trespass'". [Vide Uttar Pradesh Act 31 of 1961, s 2 (w.e.f. 13-11-1961)].

COMMENTS

1. Scope

Ordinarily, trespass into, or upon, the property of another person is an infringement of a civil right. However, if it is committed with criminal intention of a certain kind, it is treated as a criminal offence. This section defines criminal trespass as:3726

(a) entering into, or upon, property in the possession of another, or
(b) having entered into, or upon, such property lawfully, remaining there unlawfully, with intent either:

(i) to commit an offence, or
(ii) to intimidate, insult or annoy any such person.[75]

There are three aggravated forms of this offence, namely:

(i) 'house-trespass' aggravated on account of the nature of the property concerned,
(ii) 'lurking house-trespass' aggravated by reason of the manner of entering, or leaving, the property, and
(iii) 'house-breaking' aggravated by reason of the means of entering, or remaining, and by reason of the particular intention of the trespasser.

There are five further aggravated forms of each of these three kinds of offences for which separate punishments are prescribed.[76]

To constitute an offence of criminal trespass, there must be an unauthorised 'entry', or if the entry has been lawfully and legitimately obtained, there must be an unlawful 'remaining', either directly or constructively, against the will of the person in possession. In either case, the unlawful entry, or unlawful remaining, must be with intent to:

(a) commit an offence, or
(b) intimidate,
(c) insult, or
(d) annoy, any person in possession of the property.[77]

Where there is unlawful entry without the necessary intent followed by unlawful remaining with one of the intentions prescribed or unlawful entry with the necessary intent followed by unlawful remaining also with the necessary intent, neither type is covered by the plain words of this section.[78] It is, however, immaterial whether the criminal intention accompanies or succeeds the entry. An unlawful remaining must follow a lawful entry.[79] A trespass is not criminal unless it is done with intention to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult, or annoy any person in the possession of property.[80] Intimidation, insult, or annoyance, etc., as contemplated by this section, must be the aim, and not a natural consequence, of the unauthorised entry or unlawful remaining.[81] Mere knowledge on the part of the accused, that he was likely3727 to cause annoyance, would not, by itself, be sufficient unless the evidence of such knowledge, coupled with other facts, is such as to lead the court to infer therefrom the requisite intent. Thus, intention is the sine qua non.[82] Where it was found that the striking workmen unlawfully remained in the factory premises after working hours and intended to intimidate, insult, or annoy, and commit offences, with the ultimate object of bringing pressure on their employers to concede their demands, it was held that the workmen committed criminal trespass.[83] It was stated in Jaipur Spinning and Weaving Mills Ltd v State of

Rajasthan ,[84] that when the workmen entered the premises of the mills in three shifts every day after the mills had been closed by the declaration of lockout, they could be said to have no other intention except to cause annoyance or throw insult to the employers, thereby attracting s 441, IPC . If, however, the entry be bona fide, there is no offence.[85] However, the plea of bona fide claim can only arise where the trespass is not of an aggravated kind and is supported at least by a plausible show of title, or by such circumstances, as would justify an inference that the intention of the accused was not to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult, or annoy, the person in possession, but merely to vindicate what they conceived to be their legal right.[86]

2. Section 427 Distinguished from Sections 441 and 447

Commentary under the same heading in s 427, ante may be referred to.

3. 'Enters into or Upon'

It is not necessary that entry should be personally effected by the accused. It may be an entry by any agent under his order. Thus, when the accused got people to build on the land of the complainant in spite of protests, it was held that he committed criminal trespass even if he did not personally set foot on the land.[87] A contrary view3728 was taken in Shwe Kun v Emperor [1] wherein it was held that the mere sending of a servant to plough in land would not be an entry by the master, who cannot be convicted of the substantive offence, and this view was followed in Maung New v Maung Po Hla ,[2] in which it was said that in such a case, the principal or the master would be guilty of abetment. It is submitted that the view, taken by the Allahabad High Court seems to be correct. When a person, who trespasses upon the property of another, is a servant and acts in so doing under the orders of his master for the purpose of his employment, s 447, IPC, would not apply,[3] because none of the intents, mentioned in s 441, may be attributed to him.[4] It is the intention of the accused that is the deciding factor to constitute the offence of criminal trespass under s 441 .[5]

Remaining in possession of property after unlawful entry is not a fresh offence of criminal trespass. The offence is complete as soon as there is unlawful entry,[6]there being no fresh act of trespass on a subsequent date.[7] Therefore, an accused cannot be prosecuted again for remaining thereon if he has already been convicted under s 441 . The plea of autre fois convict will be open to the accused in such cases.[8]

4. 'Property'

The word 'property', in this section, does not mean only immovable corporal property; it includes also a ferry-boat. Where the accused made an attack on the lessee of a ferry, drove him away and then forcibly occupied and took possession of the ferry-boat, it was held that he was guilty of criminal trespass.[9]

Property, which cannot be the subject-matter of theft and mischief, cannot be the subject-matter of criminal trespass. Thus, taking fish from a public river is no offence under s 379, or s 447, IPC, even if the complainant may have fishery rights, the river being not in his possession.[10] The section has no application where incorporeal rights are concerned.[11]

5. 'In Possession of Another'

'Possession', in s 441, IPC, means actual physical possession of some person other than the alleged trespasser.[12] A person has to be in possession of the property in3729 question in the sense that he is entitled to exclude another if that other person enters it[13] because the act, intended to be done, which makes the trespass criminal, must be done to the person in possession and on the property. The fact, that the house in question was allotted to the complainant under an award, is, therefore, of no material consequence,[14] the reason being that the offence of criminal trespass can only be committed against a person who is in actual possession of the land in question,[15] and has not merely a power of control such as a trust scheme vests in a trustee,[16] because it is an offence against possession over property, and not against the ownership thereof.[17] Mere occupation even if illegal cannot be criminal trespass.[18] When the accused was found in possession of disputed land before to its allotment to the complainant, the offence of criminal trespass is not made out.[19] If the intention of the3730 accused is to intimidate, insult or annoy a person who is not in possession of the property, then the essential ingredient of criminal trespass would be lacking.[20] However, a person can be in possession through his wife, servant, agent, licensee or other person, i.e., a tenant.[21] If a person has only a right to some property, he is not in actual possession within the meaning of s 441 .[22] In Mahadeo v Emperor ,[23] it was held that the trespass can be committed if the intent is to annoy a person who is in possession of the property through his tenants. Where a person enters upon property in the possession of a tenant with intent to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy that tenant, he is guilty of the offence of criminal trespass, and a complaint by the landlord is sufficient to set the law in motion just as much as a complaint by the tenant.[24] Similarly, the disturbance of the tenant's right to cultivate by the landlord is an offence and the entry into the property with an intention to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession would amount to criminal trespass.[25] However, once the tenant has left the property and it is lying vacant, the real owner has a right to enter upon the land and take possession. He commits no offence in doing so.[26] Where an owner enters into his own land, permissively used or occupied by someone else but not in the possession of another, he commits no offence.[27] Likewise, a member of joint family does not commit an offence of criminal trespass by entering the house which forms the joint property; he may be guilty of this offence when he enters the room, ordinarily occupied by another member of the family.[28] If a person is himself in possession of the property which he kept locked, entry therein would constitute criminal trespass if it is to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession.[29] However, the mere taking of unlawful possession will not amount to either criminal trespass or house-trespass unless it is with intent to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession of the property in question.[30] Where the field in which the assault took place was in the exclusive possession of the accused persons, the accused cannot be termed as trespassers.[31]

6. Possession

The term 'possession', may have different meaning in different contexts. It has not been possible to work out any precise definition of 'possession', which can be3731 uniformly applicable to all situations in the context of all statutes.[32] In this regard, it would be useful to refer to the observations made by the Supreme Court in Superintendent and Remembrancer ofLegal Affairs v Anil Kumar Bhunja :[33]

> 'Possession' is a polymorphous term which may have different meanings in different contexts. It is impossible to work out a completely logical and precise definition of 'possession' uniformly applicable to all situations in the contexts of all statutes. Dias and Hughes in their book on Jurisprudence say that if a topic ever suffered from too much theorizing it is that of 'possession'. Much of this difficulty and confusion is (as pointed out in Salmond's Jurisprudence, twelfth edn, 1966) caused by the fact that possession is not purely a legal concept. 'Possession', implies a right and a fact; the right to enjoy annexed to the right of property and the fact of the real intention. It involves power of control and intent to control.'

According to Pollock and Wright, 'when a person is in such a relation to a thing that, so far as regards the thing, he can assume, exercise or resume manual control of it at pleasure, and so far as regard other persons, the thing is under the protection of his personal presence, or in or on a house or land occupied by him or in any receptacle belonging to him and under his control, he is in physical possession of the thing.

While recognising that 'possession' is not a purely legal concept but also as matter of fact, Salmond (twelfth edn, p 52) describes 'possession, in fact', as a relationship between a person and a thing. According to the learned author, the test for determining 'whether a person is in possession of anything is whether he is in general control of it.

7. Possession through Court

Possession, obtained in due course of law through court, even for few minutes constitutes possession within the meaning of s 441 .[34]Possession is not lost because trespassers come and plough the land in an almost impossible position if, after getting possession of the land through civil court, a single act of trespass is deemed sufficient to take away his possession and to deprive him of recourse to the criminal courts.[35] Where formal possession is delivered by the civil court to a decree-holder in execution of a decree, the possession of the judgment-debtor is at an end.[36] Possession delivered to the complainant in execution of the decree is sufficient to show that it was the complainant who was in peaceful possession of the portion of the house which had been locked by him.[37]

8. Joint Possession

A co-sharer, who builds a house on the common land in spite of the flat refusal of permission by other co-sharers, is not guilty of an offence under s 447 .[38] Ex-communication from caste per se does not deprive a Hindu wife of her right of joint3732 enjoyment of her husband's house so as to make her trespasser if she enters his house to claim maintenance.[39] If the managing partner dies, the firm or the remaining partners must then collectively be considered to be in possession for purposes of this section.[40] However, a joint owner of land, who enters upon the land with the intention of doing a wrongful act to his fellow-owners, does commit trespass.[41] In Emperor v Gopalrao Venkatesh ,[42] the accused, in company with eight other persons disguised as his tenants and labourers, entered the land, of which one of the accused was joint owner, and overawed the complainant and bullied him and his workman and tried to expel them. It was held that a joint-owner of property is entitled to have joint possession restored to him in a civil court, but he is not justified to take the law into his own hands to recover the possession; if he does so, he becomes liable for criminal trespass.

9. Presence of the Complainant not necessary at the time of entry of the Accused

The law does not require that the intention of the accused must be to annoy a person who is actually present at the time of criminal trespass.[43] In Rash Bihari Chatterjee v Fagu Shaw ,[44] the complainant, after protected litigation, took delivery of possession, and obtained actual physical possession, of the land in dispute from the accused on 3 February 1963. For two weeks, i.e., from 3 to 17 February 1963, the complainant was in possession of the land. The accused were on the land on the night of 16 February 1963, and on 17 February 1963; they were found making preparations for construction of bamboo structures on the same land and some bamboo pegs had already been posted. In these circumstances, it was held that even if the land in dispute was lying vacant, its actual possession was with the complainant and there was no doubt that the intention of the accused was to annoy the complainant, who was in possession of the land, and, therefore, the accused committed and offence of criminal trespass. In Veerathaiah v Ramaswami Iyengar ,[45] it was held that neither s 441, nor s 442, IPC, requires that the person in possession of the building must be present at the time of entry. Where the complainant was in peaceful possession of the house in dispute and, when, after locking it up, he was temporarily absent, the accused broke the wall as well as the lock and effected forcible entry into it, it was held that the possession of the complainant over the house was not interrupted even when he was temporarily absent at the time of forcible entry.[46] It is not correct to say that no annoyance is caused if the owner is not present at the time of trespass.[47] The intention 'to annoy' may be there in spite of the fact that the person, against whom the intention is held, may not be actually present at the time of entry.[48]3733

10. Property sealed by Municipal Corporation--Breaking seal by Owner

The premises were sealed by officers of municipal corporation. The petitioner or anybody else on his behalf, was excluded from having access to the premises by operation of sub- ss 1 and 3 of s 345A of the Delhi Municipal Corporation Act 1957.[49]Thus, the de facto control and dominion over the premises was transferred to the deputy commissioner of Delhi Municipal Corporation or the complainant. The accused may be the owner, but he ceased to be in possession of the premises. The act of sealing the premises involved the power to control and intent to control. The moment the premises were sealed by the officers of the Delhi Municipal Corporation, in exercise of their lawful duty, they assumed possession and actual control of the premises. Sub- section 3 of s 345A of Delhi Municipal Corporation Act clearly provided that no person is entitled to remove seals except by an order of the commissioner or by the Appellate Tribunal or by the administrator. Admittedly, no such order was passed by any of these authorities. That being so, the offence of criminal trespass as defined under s 441 and punishable under s 448, is made out.[50]

11. Possession of Tenant--Orissa Act (22 of 1986)

The rigour of s 441, IPC, as amended by the Orissa Act 22 of 1986 shall not be applicable to the following cases:

(a) Statutory tenants whose tenancy is governed by any statute. They are protected by tenancy laws like Public Premises Eviction Act, etc.
(b) Tenant who has entered into possession by virtue of a lease. Rights of such a tenant are governed under the provision of the Transfer of Property Act and the Specific Relief Act and he acquires a right of possession. After determination of tenancy by notice, he would become 'tenant holding over', 'tenant on sufferance' or 'tenant at will', as the case may be. His possession being juridical, is protected. He can be evicted only in due process of law. The possession of such tenant cannot be equated with that of trespassers).
(c) Person who has entered into possession by virtue of some covenant like, agreement to sell, Will etc. and/or put forth a genuine right over the property possessed.

If a person claims a right of title coupled with possession, till the dispute is adjudicated, his possession cannot be conclusively said to be that of a trespasser and his right to possess would be subject to the result of the suit or legal proceeding.

However, the said section shall be applicable to the following category of persons:

(a) Person who was permitted to possess a property for a particular period and after lapse of the said period, he was called upon to handover possession by issuance of quit notice.
(b) Person, who was put possession by means of a 'licence' and who fails to handover possession after expiry of the term of licence and/or after receiving quit notice from the landlord.3734
(c) Person who was in 'permissive possession' and who fails to handover possession even after receiving a notice to quit.[51]

The possession of a tenant does not become illegal or unlawful, but is in the nature of a 'judicial possession' and as such even after expiry of tenancy cannot be evicted except in accordance with law. Since the possession is not illegal or unlawful but juridical, the possession of such tenant cannot be said to be that of a trespasser.[52]

The Court directed the State Government to initiate prosecution of certain persons.[53]

12. Importance of Notice--Uttar Pradesh Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1961

In order to apply this section, as amended in Uttar Pradesh, it is necessary to find that the intention of the accused was to take unauthorised possession of land or to make unauthorised use of it.[54] No offence under this section would be committed if the allegations, made in the complaint, do not show that the trespasser had dispossessed the complainant from land with the intent to intimidate, insult or annoy him.[55] However, it is nowhere insisted that the complainant must categorise the elements of the offence sought to be charged against the accused.[56] Before a person is convicted of an offence under s 447, IPC, by invoking the first part of s 441, IPC, the prosecution should prove the dominant intention of the accused. It is immaterial that he had, or could have, the knowledge that his conduct or action might result in annoyance or intimidation.[57] The second part of s 441, IPC, would be attracted if the prosecution has been able to prove that the notice was duly served.[58] It must necessarily be proved that service of notice was sufficient.[59] If the trespasser is found to have taken possession of a property in possession of another during the absence of that another while the property was lying uncared for, an offence of 'criminal trespass' will be made out if it is proved that the accused had entered into, or upon, the property with the intention of taking unauthorised possession, or making unauthorised use, of such property and he failed to withdraw from such property when the person, in constructive possession, served, on the trespasser, a notice calling upon him to withdraw from the property.[60]Section 441, as amended in Uttar Pradesh thus, provides for a civil trespass getting converted into a criminal trespass on the service of notice on the trespasser to vacate the property.[61] Where the accused wrongly occupied a house of complainant and did not vacate even after notice given to him, it was held that the accused would be guilty under s 441, but the occupation3735 did not amount to house-trespass, under s 442, by continuing in occupation of the house.[62] However, if the accused continues in possession of the disputed premises in assertion of his bona fide title, he commits no offence of criminal trespass.[63]

The notice, contemplated by s 441, cannot be given by a police officer with whom a report might have been lodged about the trespass.[64]

13. 'Data Specified in Notice'--Uttar Pradesh Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1961

If a specific date is not specified in the notice, compliance of the provisions of s 441 of the IPC as amended by Uttar Pradesh Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1961 will be lacking.[65] The notice, referred to in s 441, IPC, as amended in Uttar Pradesh, is required to specify the date calling upon the trespasser to vacate the property and if he fails to do so by the date, he will be deemed to be a trespasser and liable to be convicted and sentenced under s 447, IPC . The expression 'by the date specified in notice' contemplates that the date must be specified and it is not sufficient that it should be left for calculation. If date is not specified, then it will not be a proper compliance of the provisions of s 441, as amended by the Uttar Pradesh Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1961.[66] In a case, where the entry is lawful, it may become unlawful if the person in possession fails to withdraw from such property or its possession or use when called upon to do so by that another person by notice in writing, by the date, specified in the notice.[67]

14. Possession of Tenant after Termination of Lease

In the case of MC Cholkalingam v V Manickavasagam ,[68] the Hon'ble Supreme Court considered the meaning of the words 'lawful possession' used in r 13 of the Madras Cinemas (Regulation) Rules 1957 in relation of a tenant or a licensee while disposing of a civil appeal. The following view of the Hon'ble Supreme Court makes the position clear:

> 'Lawful possession cannot be established concomitant existence of a lawful relationship between the landlord and the tenant. This relationship cannot be established against the consent of the landlord unless, however, in view of special law, his consent becomes irrelevant. Lawful possession is not litigious possession and must have some foundation in a legal right to possess the property which cannot be equated with a temporary right to enforce recovery of the property in case a person is wrongfully or forcibly dispossessed from it. This court in Lallu Yeshwant Singh's case,[69] had not to consider whether juridical possession in that case was also lawful possession. We are clearly of opinion that judicial possession is possession protected by law against wrongful dispossession but cannot per se always be equated with lawful possession.'3736

A Division Bench of Andhra Pradesh High Court also considered the nature of possession of a tenant after the termination of lease while deciding a second appeal in the case of Mogilipuvvi Annapurnaiah v Malampati Narasimha Rao :[70]

> such a tenant is a 'tenant by sufferance.' He cannot be deemed to be 'holding over' when there is no proof of extension of lease in his favour. Possession of a tenant by sufferance is a 'judicial possession', the possession of such a tenant should be protected by the courts. It is always better that a 'person' is driven to a court of law rather to permit him to forcibly evict a tenant. A tenant by sufferance is entitled to remain in possession of the demised premises till he is evicted in the course of law. Thus he is entitled to a decree for permanent injunction restraining the landlord from interfering with his possession.

Section 6 of the Specific Relief Act envisages that persons are not permitted to take forcible possession. They must obtain such possession as they are entitled to through a court. A person, who has no due including trespasser, cannot be evicted by force even by a person who has a right to occupy the land.

In the case of Ramnath v Angan ,[71] the Hon'ble Supreme Court reiterated that if tenant continues to occupy the premises even after expiry of period of lease without consent of landlord, he becomes tenant by sufferance and he is liable to pay rent for the period of his occupation and a suit filed for ejectment of such tenant within 12 years from the termination of the tenancy is not barred by time.

The question whether possession after termination of the lease is lawful possession or is unauthorised possession definitely arises not only in civil cases, but also in criminal cases. Section 441 , IPC does not definitely relate to a dispute of landlord and tenant in regard to the recovery of possession and damages, but it excludes such cases by intentional ingredient in its phraseology if a person enters into or upon a property with intention of taking unauthorised possession or making unauthorised use of such property fails to withdraw after receiving a written notice, only then he is said to commit criminal trespass.[72]

Mere serving a notice in writing upon accused/tenant to deliver the possession of the premises on a specified date and time does not establish an effect to constitute the offence of criminal trespass. Such a dispute is dispute of rend and ejectment cognizable by a civil court on a motion by landlord. It does not at all fall within the ambit of s 441, IPC . The possession of tenanted premises after expiry of period of lease is not unauthorised, and the tenant cannot be said to have committed trespass in such a situation.[73]

The possession of a tenant does not become illegal or unlawful, but is in the nature of a 'judicial possession' and as such even after expiry of tenancy cannot be evicted except in accordance with law. Since the possession is not illegal or unlawful but juridical, the possession of such tenant cannot be said to be that of a trespasser.[74]3737

15. 'With Intent'

In the absence of any evidence of any criminal intent on the part of accused, no offence of criminal trespass can be held to have been made out against the accused.[75] This section speaks of intention, and not of knowledge.[76] It would be utterly wrong to import the element of knowledge into s 441 .

The court has to look to the state of the mind of the accused and see whether his conduct was such as to lead to the inevitable conclusion that he acted with one or other of the intents specified in s 441 .[77]In order to establish that the entry on the property was with intent to annoy, intimidate or insult, it is necessary for the court to be satisfied that causing such annoyance, intimidation or insult was the aim of the entry; it is not sufficient for that purpose to show merely that the natural consequence of the entry was likely to be annoyance, intimidation or insult, and that this likely consequence was known to the person entering. In every case, where entry causes annoyance or insult, it cannot be said to be actuated by the intention to cause the said insult. There is distinction between knowledge and intention, and that distinction must be kept in mind in deciding whether, in a particular case, entry was with the requisite intention. As the said intention has always to be gathered from the circumstances of the case, it cannot be accepted that the likely consequence of the act and its possible knowledge must necessarily import the corresponding intention.[78] Where the accused crept into the house late in the night on the invitation of an unmarried and sui juris daughter of the complainant with whom he intended to have sexual intercourse, it was held that the mere fact, that he knew, or ought to have known, that, if discovered, his presence in the house might cause annoyance to the owner or other inmates of the house, is, by itself, not sufficient to bring his case within s 441 .[79] Similarly, where there was no evidence to the effect that the re-entry of the accused, i.e., the evicted tenant, into the house of the landlord was with the intention of committing any offence or of intimidating, insulting or annoying the landlord, it was held that even if the re-entry of the accused was unlawful, such unlawful taking of the house was neither criminal trespass, nor house trespass and3738 even the knowledge of the accused was not material.[80] An intention to commit an offence or to annoy, insult or intimidate may be inferred from circumstances.[81] Intention, which is a state of mind, can never be proved as a fact; it can only be inferred from facts which are proved. It may well be that in doing a particular act, a man may have more intentions than one. Therefore, to bring a case within s 441, the intention being the essential ingredient,[82] it must be proved before a conviction is recorded under s 447 .[83] Where the dominant intention of the accused was to take possession of a house after some civil litigation, and not to commit any offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy the complainant, it was held that the case did not fall under s 448 .[84] However, where the relationship of master and servant has ceased, any assertive action, attended with threats of injury and violence on the part of the labour with a view to prevent the willing workers from entering into the factory premises and the supervisory staff of the management from looking after their property, and further their unauthorised occupation of the premises, to the exclusion of the management, cannot but be regarded as disclosing an intention to commit offences.[85]

16. Criminal Intent--Inference may vary from case to Case

The circumstances, from which criminal intent may be inferred, may vary from case to case. The conditions, under which a presumption of fact may arise, may be indicated, but they cannot be rigidly laid down. If a man occupies premises without any shadow of right, knowing fully well that he has no right, and, if he evinces hostility or violence in the act of occupation or in continuing in possession, after having been prohibited by the person authorised to exclude him from possession, the natural inference is that the required criminal intention is there. Where, however, the facts and circumstances of a case indicated that the accused was likely to have occupied a property with the knowledge or reasonable belief, that he has some right, and continues to occupy it for some period of time without any show of force or hostility on either side or any objection by the person entitled to exclude him from possession, the more natural inference will be that the criminal intention was absent. In each case, the question is one of fact.[86]

17. 'To Commit an Offence'

Where the judgment-debtors entered the house of the decree-holder with intent to remove the attached cattle constituting an offence under s 424, they were held guilty3739 of the offence under s 441 .[87] The cultivation of waste land in a village, contrary to the orders of the revenue authorities, may amount to criminal trespass.[88] The existence of a bona fide claim of right does not always exclude the presumption of a criminal intent. An entry with the intention of causing wrongful restraint is sufficient to support a conviction.[89] Similarly, an entry by one man on another's property, accompanied by the cutting down of trees in that property, is a criminal trespass.[90] Likewise, entering a cattle-pound with intent to commit an offence under s 24, Cattle Trespass Act, amounts to criminal trespass.[91] If, however, the entry is bonafide, no offence is committed.[92] In taking a minor child by the father from the custody of the mother, no offence is committed as the dominant intent of the accused in entering the house is not to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy, but the bonafide exercise of a right.[93] Where the accused persons execution creditors, in company with an authorised bailiff, broke open complainant's door before sunrise with intent to distrain his property, it was held that they were not guilty of the offence of criminal trespass, there being no finding of any of the intents, required to constitute the offence of criminal trespass.[94]

18. 'To Intimidate'

The word 'intimidate', in this section, must be understood, in its ordinary sense, to 'overawe, to put in fear, by a show of force or threats or violence', and it may include the use of actual force unaccompanied by threats.[95] Entering the house of the complainant and throwing his servant out is not only intimidating the complainant or his servants, but also causing annoyance to him. The criminal intent can be gathered from these very acts.[96] In Gopal Pandey v Boddam ,[97] during a civil suit brought by A against B, certain persons on behalf of A went armed on premises belonging to B, without his leave, for the purpose of getting materials for a hostile application against B. It was held that they intended to intimidate B's servants and that their trespass was3740 criminal. In State ofMaharashtra v Tanba Sadashio Kunbi ,[1] the accused, Vice-Chairman of the School Committee, beat two of the boys in the absence of the Headmaster. When the Headmaster returned, he reprimanded the accused. The accused started abusing him and tried to catch hold of his shirt and was about to use physical force and also threatened him physical harm as soon as he came out of the school. It was held that this was clear evidence of the accused having the criminal intention which makes the trespass a criminal trespass within the meaning of ss 441 and 442, IPC . In Jaladhar v Bhubaneswar ,[2] the accused entered a newly built house during the temporary absence of the complainant and when the complainant returned and remonstrated them, they chased him out with lathis. It was held that the possession of the house was with the complainant and the accused clearly intimidated him. If a person encroaches upon a substantial portion of the land acquired by a municipal board, removes the wire-fencing done by that board, resists the re-fencing of the same and becomes prepared to beat the employees of that board, his action, per se, can be said to be with an intention to intimidate, insult and annoy the municipal employees within the meaning of this section.[3] However, the cultivation of Government land without permission does not amount to criminal trespass unless there is evidence that the entry upon the land was with any of the intents specified in s 441 .[4] Similarly, if the land, acquired by the Government, has not been demarcated and the person in occupation has not been evicted, such occupation, as continued, does not amount to criminal trespass.[5] Where a person, having some easementary right of passage though the property, squatted there and the complainant questioned him regarding the propriety of his conduct, it was held that intimidation could not be inferred from these facts.[6] An encroachment on Government land by building a pyal thereon,[7] or enclosing a public pathway,[8] would not constitute criminal trespass if the intent to commit an offence, or to intimidate, insult or annoy is lacking. When a man's intention is to save his family and property from imminent destruction, it cannot be said that because he commits civil trespass on his neighbour's land and cuts a portion of his neighbour's property, which he ordinarily would not be justified in doing, he is guilty of any criminal offence.[9] Where, during very serious communal disturbance, the complaint left the premises padlocked, never communicated with the landlord and never paid any, rent, and the accused landlord entered the premises by removing the padlock, it was held that the landlord must have believed that the tenant had abandoned the premises and could not, therefore, be convicted for criminal trespass.[10]Where the accused's intention in doing the act complained of was to assert his title and gain and hold possession of the premises as against the complainant, it was held that he was not guilty.[11] Where the complainant entered upon the land of the accused to effect repairs to a fence serving as boundary between the lands of3741 parties with no intention to annoy, etc,[12] or where the accused, armed with weapons, rushed into a house to rescue his companion, who had gone unarmed to point out the house to the police, when the companion shouted on being attacked or apprehending attack,[13] or where the complainant was entertaining the Chief Minister and the accused, who was the landlord, entered the house to complain about the non-payment of rent by the complainant for a long period,[14] or where some accommodation was vacated by a tenant and the landlord took possession but refused to give possession to an allotee, to whom the accommodation was allotted by the rent controller (even if the new allotment had been made prior to the landlord's taking possession),[15] or where a tenant, who had been duly ejected by process of law, re-entered upon the land and cultivated it without consent of the ejector, but without the required intention,[16] or where the accused entered upon the land with a view to remove the crops planted by him,[17] or where the accused entered upon a vacant land with the consent of a person asserting his title thereto and put up a water-pandal on it,[18] or where the accused entered into a land, unyoked the bullocks of his tenant and drove them away,[19] it was held that no offence of criminal trespass was committed.

19. 'To Annoy'

The word 'annoy' must be taken to mean annoyance that would generally and reasonably affect an ordinary person, and not what would specially and exclusively annoy a particular individual.[20] The term 'annoyance' cannot be equated with uncertainty.[21] The annoyance is not intended to be instantaneous, i.e., at the moment of entry. It may happen subsequently.[22]

An intention to annoy, which must be distinguished from an intention to obtain improper gain, does not follow necessarily from an intention to obtain land unlawfully, but must be made out by some independent evidence.[23] It must be a question of fact in each case whether the intention was to annoy.[24] When an offender for the first time comes upon the land of the rightful owner to dispossess him forcibly without any semblance of legal right, the entry into the property is to annoy the person in possession of such property.[25] When a person takes his loaded cart into the field of another in which crop is standing, there is bound to cause annoyance to the owner of the field.[26] When the accused, knowing that another person is lawfully in possession of property, illegally enters into possession of it in the absence of that person, his intention cannot be anything else but that of annoyance to the person in3742 possession.[27] Where the possession has been delivered to the complainant in due course of law, re-entry, by the accused, into the property by placing, inside the premises, the goods which had earlier been taken out in the course of said delivery of vacant possession, is only a criminal trespass with the intention of causing annoyance to the complainant.[28] The presumption of the necessary intention may be drawn where a person, who has absolutely no interest in land in possession of others, forcibly takes possession inspite of the protests of the owner.[29] Where, however, the object of the meeting, which was held inside the area, set apart for the office compound of the sub-divisional officer, was not to cause any annoyance to the sub-divisional officer or his staff but was only to carry on canvassing for the election through propaganda, it was held that the case did not come within the mischief of s 441 .[30] Where the sole intention of the striking employees was to put pressure on their employers to concede their demands, it was held that even if the strikers might know that the strike may annoy the employers, it is difficult to say that such knowledge would necessarily lead to the inference of intention requisite for constituting criminal trespass.[31] In Shambhu Nath v Ram Kanud Guho ,[32]A, who claimed certain land as his own, built a hut thereon. B likewise claimed the land. It was held that A was not to annoy B. In Sukhdeo Sharma v State ,[33] an advocate entered the office-room in the house of a magistrate at night and surreptitiously inspected papers in a pending file without any desire to tamper with the file. His intention was to leave without allowing an opportunity, to the magistrate, of coming to know of his action. It was held that there was no deliberate intent to annoy and he was not guilty of criminal trespass.

20. 'Unlawfully Remains there with Intent...To Commit an Offence'

The remaining must be unlawful.[34] The second part of s 441 would apply where the entry is lawful, but subsequently the trespasser insists on remaining in possession with intent thereby to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession of the property.[35] Where the accused, who was a tenant on sufferance, entered the quarter by right, but remained there unlawfully, it was held that this would not, without proof of the requisite intent, make his wrongful stay punishable as a criminal trespass.[36] If a person enters a house at the invitation of another and thereafter a quarrel breaks out between them in the house, no offence of house trespass is committed.[37] If the dominant intention was merely to make an entry peacefully, no offence of criminal3743 trespass would be made out. If any offence is committed after the entry is made, the person, committing the offence, would be guilty of it, but not of criminal trespass unless the court is also able to find that the intention was, from the very beginning, to commit that offence. Where the original entry on the property was lawful but the accused remained there to gamble, and then created a row afterwards and caused annoyance, it was held that the accused was not guilty of criminal trespass.[38] However, in Re Bashika, it was held that where the entry in the house was lawful but accused remained there unlawfully and committed an offence, i.e., assault, he was guilty of house-trespass.[39]

Where the accused lawfully entered the house but unlawfully remained there, intimidated, insulted and annoyed the owner of the house, offence under s 441, IPC was made out.[40]

21. No Conviction for Civil Trespass by a Criminal Court

Trespass, if not accompanied by any of the intentions, mentioned in s 441, IPC, is not only a civil trespass. If it is, however, committed with any of the said intentions, it is criminal trespass. Similarly, one of the criminal intentions, referred to in s 441, IPC, must be present to constitute a criminal trespass.[41] Where, in the absence of the complainant, the accused makes an unlawful entry into his (i.e., complainant's) room, his (i.e., accused's) initial trespass is civil. If, however, he subsequently threatens the complainant, while continuing to occupy the room after being asked by the complainant to quit the same, his subsequent act converts the civil trespass into a criminal trespass.[42] Where the accused trespassed upon the field of the complainant and the finding was that the intention of the accused primarily was to take possession of the field in dispute,[43] or where, in spite of a notice served upon the accused by chairman of the municipality not to hold meeting at a certain place, the accused held the meeting to pass a resolution of condolence on the death of a leader's wife,[44] or where the complainant, a zamindar, obtained only a formal possession of holding of the accused in execution of a decree but the accused entered on the holding and subsequently succeeded in appeal,[45] it was held that no offence of criminal trespass was committed. If a person is allowed to enter the house by the house owner, he commits no criminal trespass. If he overstays, the remedy to the house owner is by way of a suit for eviction in the civil court.[46] Similarly, where a person, who has promised to vacate the house in his possession within the period, specified in the notice, served on him by the new house owner, fails to do so, he commits no criminal trespass.[47] Where the accused all along asserted their prescriptive right to fish in a lake free of rent and the complainant failed to establish the relationship of landlord and tenant,[48] or where the accused admittedly had a claim of right to the land of3744 which he took possession (vis, that he was a lessor entitled to re-enter on the expiry of a lease),[49] or where the accused went on a land with the sanction of the person who asserted his title to the property as against the complainants,[50] or where a tenant claimed to be in possession and the landlord trespassed to take possession over the land and no criminal intention was attributed to him,[51] or where the accused entered the field claiming as an occupant on the basis of a sale from the original occupant while the complainant was her mere sub-tenant (shikmi-holder) for the previous year,[52] or where the accused entered into possession of the land again, after having been in possession for a period of eight years, having been dispossessed for only one year, in exercise of a bona fide claim of right,[53] it was held that the dispute was of a civil nature.

22. Disputed Rights--Duty of the Criminal Court

It is not the function of the criminal court to decide any question of disputed right. Its primary duty is to determine whether the offence complained is made out by the evidence produced before it.[54] The mere assertion of a claim of right, however, not a sufficient defence to a charge of criminal trespass; it must be a claim made in good faith, that is to say, it must be a claim in which the person must have himself believed that it cannot be legally untenable.[55] The criminal court has to see whether the claim of the accused is bona fide, if the claim is not bona fide and it is a mere cloak to cover the real intent, it would be of no avail, if it finds the claim to be bona fide, it has to consider the question of the entry and decide it with reference to the circumstances and facts of the case.[56] Where the complainant was admittedly in possession of a plot of land and the accused, having entered the land, caused widespread damage to the rabi cultivation of the complainant, it was held that even if the accused believed, bona fide, that they were entitled to possession of the land, that could not give them any right to cause damage to the standing crop of the complainant and their entry; on the land under the possession of the complainant for the said purpose could only be regarded as an act of criminal trespass.[57]3745

23. Civil Courts' Finding--Not Binding on Criminal Court

The finding in a civil suit being not binding on a criminal court, an injunction, passed by a civil court, does not debar the criminal court from going into the same question again.[58] The criminal court may not be competent to adjudicate on civil rights or title to the property but to say that pendency of a civil suit will automatically oust the jurisdiction of the criminal court, is too broad a proposition of law to meet with approval.[59]

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 442.

House-trespass.--

Whoever commits criminal trespass by entering into or remaining in any building, tent or vessel used as a human dwelling or any building used as a place for worship, or as a place for the custody of property, is said to commit "house-trespass".

Explanation.--The introduction of any part of the criminal trespasser's body is entering sufficient to constitute house-trespass.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

'House-trespass', which is defined in this section, is only an aggravated form of 'criminal trespass' inasmuch as that the punishment under it is severer.[60] There are five aggravated forms of the offence of house-trespass, four of them by reason of the gravity of the offence, for committing which there was the intention to commit trespass (ss 449-451, IPC), and the fifth by reason of making preparation for causing hurt, etc., or fear of it (s 452, IPC). The essential ingredients of the offence under this section are as under:

(a) the accused must commit criminal trespass as defined in the preceding s 441, IPC ; and
(b) the criminal trespass must be in any building, tent or vessel used as a human dwelling or any building used as a place for worship or as a place for the custody of property. In other words, the building should be the building used as a human dwelling or as a place for worship or as a place for the custody of property, while the tent or the vessel should be used as a human dwelling only.

As stated in the commentary under the preceeding s 441, IPC, mens rea is an essential ingredient to constitute the said offence of criminal trespass. In the absence of any evidence of criminal intent on the part of the accused no offence of criminal trespass can be held to have been made out against the accused, and in the absence of evidence of criminal trespass no offence of house-trespass under s 442, IPC, can be3746 held to have been established against the accused.[61] In Kamalammal v Menakshi Ammal [62] the accused, who had obtained a civil court decree for possession, broke open the lock without legal process of execution and got into the upstairs portion of the house. It was held that the undoubted civil right, vested in the accused was sufficient to negative the mens rea, which was necessary to constitute the offence under s 442, IPC, and, therefore, the accused was entitled to acquittal. Where the owner in charge of a house professed to be an accomplice and invited another to his house to commit an offence,[63] or where, for execution of a decree, the accused went with the civil court amin for the purpose of attaching the cattle,[64]or where a sub-inspector searched the accused's house for cocaine but omitted to record his reasons, as required by s 53 of the Excise Act for not first obtaining a search warrant from a magistrate,[65] it was held that it did not amount to house-trespass as the requisite intention was not there. Where the accused entered a lock-up with the intention of conveying food to a prisoner detained there, it was held that this was not house-trespass as this was not punishable under the Prisons Act.[66] An accused, who is in the habit of visiting the casualty ward and seeing the doctor often, cannot be said to commit house-trespass.[67] Where, during the absence of the complainant, certain persons came in possession of the house and established there a boy, alleged to be the adopted son of the father of the complainant, it was held that there was no house-trespass.[68] However, where A enters B's house under a forged warrant of arrest and takes away B, he commits house-trespass as here A intended to commit an offence under s 339 .[69] Where a police officer entered the house of a suspicious character at midnight to see if he was at home, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section such conduct being annoying and insulting.[70]

As mentioned in the second paragraph above, the accused must enter into, or remain in, any building tent or vessel, used as a human dwelling.[71] In Hiralal v State ,[72] it was held that an entry, and remaining, upon roof of a house does not constitute house-trespass though it may constitute house-breaking (s 445, IPC), but the above case, which does not lay down any general preposition, was dissented from, in Dinesh Thakur v State of Bihar ,[73] on the ground that the roof is part of the building, and this dissenting note was confirmed in Sathe Tanti v State of Bihar. [74] The latter decision justifies its dissent, and it does so correctly, on the reasoning that roofs of houses in villages are are to be used for the purpose of storing and drying things, theft of which has to be held as theft in a dwelling house.3747

The introduction of any part of the criminal trespasser's body entering is sufficient. To put in hand,[75] or finger,[76] or to put a foot over the threshold, is a sufficient entry. To remove a trap-door does not, however, amount to a house-trespass as to constitute this offence the introduction of some part of the criminal trespasser's body is necessary.

In an offence under this section, it is not within the province of the magistrate to decide whether the complainant has title to the land in question or not; he is only concerned with the question of possession of the complainant as far as the offence of criminal trespass is concerned.

2. 'Building'

Whether a particular property comes within the definition of a 'building' is a matter which must be decided on the facts of each case.[77] In Makkhan v Emperor ,[78] it was observed that what is a building within the meaning of s 422 must always be a question of degree and circumstances, and it is, therefore, impossible to lay down a general definition. However, the ordinary meaning of the word 'building' is an enclosure of brick or stonework covered in by a roof.[79] However, it is not necessary that either bricks or stones should be used to make the walls of a house before it can be called a 'building' because it may well be made of mud.[80]

A thatched hut built for the purpose of residence is a building.[81]

The determining factor as to whether a place is part of building, used as a human swelling, is not the existence of shutters, or the fact that the door was shut or open, at the time of entry by the accused, but the nature of the structure as a whole, and the purpose for which it was intended to be, and was being, used.[82] The mere rigging up an awning without any thatch or iron roof,[83] or tin-shed open on three sides adjoining a shop,[84] or the mere surrounding of an open space of ground by a wall or fence of any kind,[85] will not make it a building. Similarly, an open space before a thatched house with some thorny bushes placed round about the with no roof above and with no door or gateway, even of thorn, is not a building.[86]

3. Sahan--Whether a Building

Judicial opinion is divided whether a walled compound of a house is a building. The Allahabad High Court says that an open unroofed space, which is the outer sahan of the house, with some sort of kacha boundary wall having no doors or door-levels,[87]3748 or a courtyard formed by some thorns to mark the boundary of the courtyard in front of a thatched house,[1] is not a building. Similarly, the Lahore High Court observes that a walled courtyard not provided with a door,[2] or a courtyard enclosed by low walls on three sides only,[3] or a courtyard partly surrounded on the front by a mud wall with no roof over it, nor any door or gateway,[4] is not a building or a house. On the other hand, it has been held in several cases that sahan would come within the meaning of the term 'building', i.e., an unroofed courtyard in an Indian house, which is surrounded, on all sides, by rooms, is a building.[5] So also, the courtyard of a house where the complainant lived and tethered his cattle,[6] or a courtyard consisting of a walled enclosure with four kothas or chambers opening into it, and an outer door or a gate leading into a side street[7] would be a building.

4. Compound--Whether a Building

The word 'compound' is not included in the expression 'building...used as a human dwelling'.[8] Similarly, entering into an ordinary compound is not a house-trespass.[9] However, where a wara formed an indivisible part of the building and was surrounded on all the four sides by a wall and entrance and exit were effected through a small gate of phalla which was kept locked at night, it was held that though the wara was unroofed, it was a 'building' within the meaning of s 442 .[10]

5. Outer Verandah--Whether a Building

An extreme view, that every outer verandah is necessarily a building used as a human dwelling or as a place for custody of property or that it can never be such a building, should be avoided and cannot be accepted. The question, whether a particular outer verandah answers the requirements of s 442, IPC, should be determined on the general considerations with due regard to the actual user of the verandah as also its adaptability to user for residence or custody of property having due regard to the general notions of the people in relation to residence and custody of the property.[11]

6. Dalan, Porch or Portico--Whether a Building

Dalan, or an entrance hall, surrounded by a wall with two doorways, without doors used for the custody of property, would be a 'building'.[12] Similarly, entering into a porch or portion of a building, enclosed by walls, would be a house-trespass.[13]3749

7. Enclosure for Cattle--Whether a Building

Where the accused made his way into the cattle enclosure, entrance being effected by making a hole in the hedge, his intention being to commit theft of the cattle, it was held that a cattle fold or pen with a thorn hedge around it was not a building and the accused was not guilty under s 442, but only under ss 379 / 511 .[14] However, in Empress v Duillee ,[15] it was held that a cattle yard, which was originally walled on four sides and in which in one side there was a gap stopped with thorns, was a building, used as a place for the custody of property, within the meaning of s 442 .

8. Dehlij--Whether a Building

Dehlij, by itself, indicates nothing more than an entrance into a building and it cannot be regarded as the building itself. At the most, it can be said that it is an entrance which leads to ingress and egress from the building itself.[16]

9. Wehara--Whether a Building

A wehara used for the custody of property is a building.[17]

10. 'Tent'

Commentary under the same heading in s 380, ante, may be referred to.

11. 'Vessel'

A ferry-boat is not a vessel within the meaning of s 442, IPC as it is not used as a human dwelling.[18]

12. 'Used as a Human Dwelling'

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 443.

Lurking house-trespass.--

Whoever commits house-trespass having taken precautions to conceal such house-trespass from some person who has a right to exclude or reject the trespasser from the building, tent or vessel which is the subject of the trespass, is said to commit "lurking house-trespass".

COMMENTS

1. Scope

House-trespass, which has been defined in the preceding s 442, IPC, may be aggravated by being committed in a surreptitious, or in a violent manner. The former3750 aggravated form of house-trespass is designated as lurking house-trespass, and the latter as house-breaking. Again house-trespass in every form may be aggravated by the time at which it is committed. Trespass of this sort has always, for obvious reasons, been considered as a more serious offence when committed by night than when committed by day. Thus, there are four aggravated forms of house-trespass, i.e., lurking house-trespass, house-breaking, lurking house-trespass by night, and house-breaking by night. It may be further be stated that there are five aggravated forms of the offence of lurking house-trespass, vis, (i) by reason of its being committed during night; (ii) by the gravity of the offence; (iii) by reason of being accompanied by preparation; and (iv) for causing grievous hurt or attempting to cause death or grievous hurt.

Lurking house-trespass, which is defined in this section, i.e., s 443, IPC, is made punishable under s 453, IPC, and punishments are enhanced according to the gravity of the offence for committing which it was made (ss 454 and 455, IPC). Another aggravated form is the one in which grievous hurt is caused or an attempt is made to cause death or grievous hurt (s 459, IPC). In such cases, all person, jointly concerned in lurking house-trespass, become punishable (s 460, IPC).

A house-trespass must have all the elements of the offence of criminal trespass as defined in s 441, IPC, i.e., there must be the intention to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy. However, in committing the offence of lurking house-trespass, the question of criminal trespass with the intention to intimidate, insult or annoy can hardly arise, although it is not wholly inconceivable. Generally, the offender enters a house to commit an offence after taking precautions against detection. Hiding in a corner of a porch is within the definition of this section.[19] In order to constitute lurking house-trespass, the offender must take some active means to conceal his presence.[20] Where the accused, seeing the chaukidar asleep in the verandah, snatched a pair of shoes from under the bed and then ran away, when the chaukidar was in the process of waking, and there was nothing to indicate that he took any active steps to conceal his presence, his conviction was altered to one under s 451, IPC .[21]

2. 'Right to exclude or Reject'

These words have not been used in s 441, IPC where the words used are 'property in the possession of another'. In this section, the offence is committed if precautions are taken to conceal the house-trespass 'from some person who has a right to exclude or reject'. It appears that such a right can be exercised by the owner or joint owner and perhaps also by those who are interested in possession. It is not clear if taking precautions to conceal from other persons would be covered by the section.3751

Lurking house-trespass by night.--

Whoever commits lurking house-trespass after sunset and before sunrise, is said to commit "lurking house-trespass by night".

COMMENTS

1. Scope

Lurking house-trespass by night is considered to be more serious form of the offence and is punishable under s 456, IPC . Higher punishments are prescribed in respect of the offence again according to the gravity of the offence which was intended to be committed.

By 'night' is meant the period between sunset and sunrise.

In order to constitute lurking house-trespass, the offender must take some active means to conceal his presence. The mere fact that a house-trespass was committed by night, does not make the offence one of lurking house-trespass by night.[22] Where the accused entered a dwelling-house to steal clothes and utensils and removed some of the articles, but before he could take them away, an alarm was made and he was caught, it was held that his conviction ought to have been under s 380, and not under s 457, IPC .[23] If the house-trespass is a 'lurking house-trespass' because the offender had taken some active steps and means to conceal his presence, it becomes automatically lurking house-trespass by night under this section if it is committed after sunset and before sunrise.[24] Where an assistant sub-inspector entered the office of the thana in the darkness of the night in an unearthly hour and participated in the commission of theft, it was held that it amounted to lurking house-trespass by night, and the case clearly came within the scope of s 457, IPC .[25]

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 445.

House-breaking.--

A person is said to commit "house-breaking" who commits house-trespass if he effects his entrance into the house or any part of it in any of the six ways hereinafter described; or if, being in the house or any part of it for the purpose of committing an offence, or having committed an offence therein, he quits the house or any part of it in any of such six ways, that is to say--

First.--If he enters or quits through a passage made by himself, or by any abettor of the house-trespass, in order to the committing of the house-trespass.

Secondly.--If he enters or quits through any passage not intended by any person, other than himself or an abettor of the offence, for human entrance, or through any passage to which he has obtained access by scaling or climbing over any wall or building.

Thirdly.--If he enters or quits through any passage which he or any abettor of the house-trespass has opened, in order to the committing of the house-trespass by any means by which that passage was not intended by the occupier of the house to be opened.3752

Fourthly.--If he enters or quits by opening any lock in order to the committing of the house-trespass, or in order to the quitting of the house after a house-trespass.

Fifthly.--If he effects his entrance or departure by using criminal force or committing an assault or by threatening any person with assault.

Sixthly.--If he enters or quits by any passage which he knows to have been fastened against such entrance or departure, and to have been unfastened by himself or by an abettor of the house-trespass.

Explanation.--Any out-house or building occupied with a house, and between which and such house there is an immediate internal communication, is part of the house within the meaning of this section.

Illustrations

(a) A commits house-trespass by making a hole through the wall of Z's house, and putting his hand through the aperture. This is house-breaking.
(b) A commits house-trespass by creeping into a ship at a port-hole between decks. This is house-breaking.
(c) A commits house-trespass by entering Z's house through a window. This is house-breaking.
(d) A commits house-trespass by entering Z's house through the door, having opened a door which was fastened. This is house-breaking.
(e) A commits house-trespass by entering Z's house through the door, having lifted a latch by putting a wire through a hole in door. This is house-breaking.
(f) A finds the key of Z's house door, which Z had lost, and commits house-trespass by entering Z's house, having opened the door with that key. This is house-breaking.
(g) Z is standing in his doorway. A forces a passage by knocking Z down, and commits house-trespass by entering the house. This is house-breaking.
(h) Z, the door-keeper of Y, is standing in Y's doorway. A commits house-trespass by entering the house, having deterred Z from opposing him by threatening to beat him. This is house-breaking.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

House-breaking is only an aggravated form of house-trespass inasmuch as the punishment under it is severe still.[26] There are two forms of this offence, namely:

(a) house-trespass effected by an entry in any one of the six ways specified in the section; and3753
(b) leaving the house in any of the six specified ways after being there for the purpose of committing an offence or after committing an offence there.

The two forms of the offence may, thus, be analysed as follows:

(a) (i) an entry in any one of the six ways specified in s 445, IPC, (ii) into property as specified in s 442, IPC (subject to the explanation to s 445, IPC), and (iii) with one of the intents specified in s 441, IPC ; and
(b) the person so leaving had the intention to commit, or had committed, an offence punishable under the IPC or under any special or local law (s 40, IPC).

2. Law of Canada

The following are offences under the Code:

- breaking and entering a place with intent to commit an indictable offence therein,
- breaking and entering a place and committing an indictable offence therein, or
- breaking out of a place after committing an indictable offence therein, or entering the place with intent to commit an indictable offence therein.

Actus reus

'Break' means to break any part, internal or external, or to open any thing that is used or intended to be used to close or to cover an internal or external opening. Entry through an open door wide enough to allow the accused to enter without any further opening is not 'breaking'. Entry through a public entrance during store hours with intent to hide and remain until store is gets closed in order to then commit theft is not 'breaking'.

A person 'enters' as soon as any part of his body or any part of an instrument that he uses is within any thing that is being entered into; and a person shall be deemed to have broken and entered if he obtained entrance by a threat or an artifice or by collusion with a person within, or he entered without lawful justification or excuse by a permanent or temporary opening. The Code's provision is constitutional, except for the reverse onus that is inoperative. Entering an underground parking garage of an apartment building by following in a tenant's car constitutes obtaining entrance into the building by 'artifice'. Entry through a public entrance during store hours with intent to hide and remain until store is closed in order to then commit theft is not 'breaking'. 'A permanent or temporary opening' was held to include a doorway that was uncovered and open in a partly-built house because the door had not yet been installed.

'Place' means:

- a dwelling house;
- a building or structure or any part thereof, other than a dwelling house;
- a railway vehicle, a vessel, an aircraft or a trailer; or
- a pen or an enclosure in which fur-bearing animals are kept in captivity for breeding or commercial purposes.

An area enclosed by a permanent fence and building is a 'place'. A tent is a 'place'. If it is used as a temporary residence by persons to sleep, it is a 'dwelling house'. A partly-built house is not a dwelling house within the meaning of s 2 of the Criminal Code of Canada for the purposes of s 348(1)(a), where the 'house' had not yet been occupied as a dwelling house because it was only partially completed. An unoccupied, parked motorhome is not a 'place' under s. 348(3)(b) .3754

'Structure' in s 348(3) of the Criminal Code does not include a lot that could be entered simply by walking around a chain barrier.

Doctrine of recent possession

The unexplained recent possession of stolen goods standing alone will permit the inference that the possessor stole the goods. The inference is not mandatory. It may, but need not be drawn. If an explanation is offered for such possession that could reasonably be true, no inference of guilt may be drawn even where the trier of fact is not satisfied of the truth of the explanation. The Crown would have to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt by other evidence. The doctrine applies equally to charges of possession of stolen property and to breaking and entering and committing theft. Where the circumstances are such that the issue arises whether the accused is the thief or merely a possessor, it will be for the trier of fact to decide in light of all the evidence which, if either inference should be drawn. The doctrine requires proof of possession by the accused. Explanations for possession made by the accused to the police upon being found in possession can be brought out in cross-examination of the police witnesses. Recency is a question dependent upon all the circumstances, including the nature of the goods and how quickly they would pass into innocent commerce. The doctrine of recent possession does not offend s 11(d) of the Charter.

Evidence that an accused broke and entered a place or attempted to break and enter a place is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, proof that he broke and entered the place or attempted to do so, as the case may be, with intent to commit an indictable offence therein. Similarly, evidence that an accused broke out of a place is, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, proof that he broke out after committing an indictable offence therein, or entering with intent to commit an indictable offence therein. This latter presumption contravenes s 11(d) of the Charter, but is saved by s 1 .

These presumptions merely establish a prima facie case. The burden of proof does not shift. The accused need only raise a reasonable doubt with evidence that is not rejected or disbelieved. The presumption is not available where the indictment specifies a particular indictable offence. The point of entry is the time at which the accused's intention is to be ascertained. The application of the presumption at that point, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, supplies the proof of the requisite intent. Evidence of alcohol and drug consumption and irrational behaviour is 'evidence to the contrary' tending to negative the requisite intent. The fact the accused did not commit an offence after entering the premises does not constitute 'evidence to the contrary'.

Defence

Intoxication is not a defence to a charge under s 348(1)(b), an offence of general intent (unless a specific intent for an indictable offence is alleged), but is a defence under s 348(1)(a) .

Procedure and punishment

If the offence is committed in relation to a dwelling house, the offence is indictable and the maximum sentence on conviction is life imprisonment. If the offence is committed in relation to a place other than a dwelling house, then the accused is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 10 years or of an offence punishable on summary conviction. A home invasion3755 scenario is an aggravating circumstance on sentencing. Therefore, if the dwelling house is occupied and that the accused knew or was reckless as to whether the dwelling house was occupied and that the accused used violence or threats of violence in committing the offence, he would be guilty of an indictable offence and would be punished with imprisonment for a term not exceeding 10 years.

Home invasion

'Home invasion' cases call for a particularly nuanced approach to sentencing. They require a careful examination of the circumstances of the particular case in question, of the nature and severity of the criminal acts perpetrated in the course of the home invasion, and of the situation of the individual offender. Whether a case falls within the existing guidelines or range -- or, indeed, whether it may be one of those exceptional cases that falls outside the range and results in a moving of the yardsticks -- will depend upon the results of such an examination. In cases of this nature, the objectives of protection of the public, general deterrence and denunciation should be given priority, although the prospects of the offender's rehabilitation and the other factors pertaining to sentencing must also be considered. A stiff penitentiary sentence is generally called for.

A charge of breaking and entering with intent to commit an indictable offence includes a charge of being unlawfully in a dwelling-house. A charge of breaking and entering and theft does not include the offence of possession of property obtained by crime. The offence of breaking and entering with intent to commit an indictable offence was found to be a 'lesser included offence' on a count of break and enter and aggravated assault and a count of break and enter and assault causing bodily harm. Being unlawfully in a dwelling house with intent to commit an indictable offence is a 'lesser but included offence' in comparison to the offence of unlawfully breaking and entering a dwelling house and committing assault causing bodily harm.

In R v Ausland ,[27] it was observed: 'It is apparent from these latter cases that the courts, in dealing with the break and enter sections of the Code, have interpreted the word 'structure' to include, in certain circumstances, spaces enclosed by a fence. In our view, however, to extend the meaning further to include unenclosed spaces, like the yard in the present case, would go too far and rob the word 'structure' of any effective meaning. At the very least, a structure must be something that can be broken into and entered. In this case, entry to the lot could have been gained by simply walking around the barrier created by the chain. As the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal noted in Thibault, a structure that is not also a building consists of the area enclosed and the thing that encloses it - in that case, a fence. Here, both elements are missing. The fact that the yard is patrolled does not convert an open space into a structure.'

In R v Rodney ,[28] it was stated: 'We agree with the submission of the respondent that the purpose of the combination of the offence of breaking and entering with intent and the presumption created by s 348(2)(a) is to deal precisely with the situation where the accused has broken and entered, yet committed no offence. Here, the appellant offers nothing more than the fact no offence was committed. To say that that constitutes evidence to the contrary would be to ignore the presumption and essentially gut it of any meaning.'3756

3. Specified ways of House-breaking

There are six ways in which an entry or an exit may be made to make an offence of house-breaking. Each of them has been explained by illustration to the section. They may be classified as follows:

(a) by some act of the offender, or his abettor, by:

(i) making a passage [cl firstly, illust (a)], or
(ii) opening a passage by any means by which it was not intended by the occupier to be opened [cl thirdly, illust (e)], or
(iii) by opening any lock [cl fourthly, illust (f)], or
(iv) by unfastening a passage fastened against entrance or departure [cl sixthly, illust (d)];

(b) by adoption of some abnormal passage not otherwise intended (e.g., scaling or climbing any wall) [cl secondly, illusts (h) and (c)]; and
(c) by use of criminal force or committing or threatening an assault [cl fifthly, illusts (g) and (h)].

4. Clause Firstly

Making a hole through a wall for passage or exit would bring the case under this clause [refer to illust (a)]. However, where a hole is made in a wall but the passage is blocked by beams and the hand is not put right through the hole, the offence would be only of an attempt to commit house-breaking and the illustration would not apply to the case.[29]

5. Clause Secondly

For example, apertures intended solely for the admission of light or air [refer to illusts (b) and (c)]. A window intended likewise to serve as a door would not come under this clause. Apertures, constructed for the purpose of receiving goods into a cellar or warehouse,[30] or chimneys, may be cited as further examples of passages not intended for human entrance. It is immaterial whether the passage in question is open or close when the trespasser seeks to enter.

Effecting an entrance into a house at night by scaling a wall constitutes house-breaking by night under s 445, IPC .[31]

6. Clause Thirdly

The passage must have been opened by the trespasser or by one abetting him. Therefore, to enter through a door or window intended for human entrance, which the trespasser finds open, is not house-breaking, and it has been held that a further opening so as to admit of the entrance of the person in question does not constitute a breaking.[32] However, a door or window is not open if it is shut, though not fastened. To push, or pull open, it is a breaking.[33]3757

7. Clause Fourthly

Commentary under s 442, ante, may be referred to.

8. Clause Fifthly

Where the accused, who entered into a house at night with a vessel under his arm, effected his departure from the house after knocking down a person who stood in the doorway, it was held that the conviction of the accused for house-breaking by night was good.[34]

9. Clause Sixthly

If the door is unfastened by turning the key of a lock, the entry thereby effected falls under cl 'fourthly'. Loosening/unfastening any other fastening, which the owner has provided, as the drawing or lifting up a latch, would be house-breaking under the English law[35] and would fall under this clause.

The term 'fastened' implies something more than being closed, such as chaining the shutters or tying them with a rope or bolting them or locking the door. Where the accused entered into the house by merely pushing in the shutters of the door, it was held that this does not come under any of the six clauses of s 445, and the case would fall under s 451, IPC .[36]

10. Explanation

The property entered must be of the kind specified in s 442, IPC ; but if it is a dwelling-house, it will, for the purpose of this offence, include only the actual house and buildings occupied with it, and connected with it, by 'an immediate internal communication'.

House-breaking by night.--

Whoever commits house-breaking after sunset and before sunrise, is said to commit "house-breaking by night".

COMMENTS

1. Scope

'House-breaking', as contemplated by the proceeding s 445, IPC, if committed after sunset and before sunrise, is 'house-breaking by night'. Therefore, the commentary under the preceding section may be referred to.

2. Conviction for House-breaking by Night and Murder

Where the accused persons, being police constables, allegedly committed the offences of house breaking by night and murder of the deceased, and the evidence of3758 the eye-witnesses including the injured witnesses proved the participation of the accused, though the name of the accused persons was not mentioned in the FIR, their complicity was proved by the investigating officer and the use of the official rifles by the accused in the incident was established and the recovery of fire-arms and empty cartridges further proved culpability of the accused persons. All the three accused were found missing from the place of duty after the incident and each one of them had played active role. In view of the said evidence, it would not be necessary to prove motive on the part of the accused persons. The conviction of the accused persons under ss 446 and 302, IPC was found proper.[37]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 447.

Punishment for criminal trespass.--

Whoever commits criminal trespass shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

The preceding ss 441 to 446, IPC define the various kinds of the offence of criminal trespass. This and the following sections prescribe punishment for those offences. This section provides for punishment for the simplest kind of criminal trespass in which there are no aggravating features of the offence as defined in ss 442 to 446, IPC . If there is criminal trespass and it is not of a kind covered by ss 442 to 446, it would be punishable under this section. Where, however, the Court does not give a specific finding that the trespass was for committing one of the acts, mentioned in s 441, IPC, the conviction is bad in law as it is not every trespass which is punishable.[38] In deciding criminal intention, the court has to take all the circumstances into consideration. When all, that the accused did, was to plough the land and spread manure asserting that one of them was in possession of the land in lieu of his wages, it was held that it was not reasonable to conclude that the dominant intention of making the entry was to annoy the complainant.[39] Where the accused had a customary right to draw water from a particular well and they went there variously armed to assert their legal right when the opposite party enclosed the entire land by thorny bushes to close their (accused's) access to the well in order to infringe their right, it was held that they had committed no criminal trespass because they had only3759 asserted their legal right to draw water from a well.[40] However, the mere assertion of a claim of right to the property in dispute is not in itself a sufficient answer to the charge under this section. If the Court reaches the conclusion that the accused was not acting in the exercise of a bonafide claim of right while entering upon the land in dispute, it will have no option but to convict the offender if the other ingredients of criminal trespass are established.[41]

2. Essentials

In order to satisfy the conditions of s 441, IPC, it must be proved that the person entered in possession over the premises with an intent to commit an offence. Mere occupation even if illegal cannot amount to criminal trespass.[42]

3. Section 427 Distinguished from Sections 447 and 448

Commentary under s 427, ante, may be referred to.

4. Sections 447 and 448

Commentary under the heading in s 448, post, may be referred to.

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable by the person in possession of the property trespassed upon, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily. The Court cannot acquit the accused under this section without taking evidence despite the absence of accused and prosecution witnesses.[43]

6. Person Competent to make a Complaint of an Offence under Section 447

Any person is competent to make a complaint for an offence under this section even if he may have not been in possession of the property trespassed upon, and even if the offence may have been committed against a third person.[44]There is no authority for taking the offence of mischief and trespass out of the general rule which allows any person to complain of a criminal act.[45]

7. Bar under Section 84(2) of Delhi Land Reforms Act 1954

A bare reading of s 84(2) of the Delhi Land Reforms Act 1954 makes it abundantly clear that where a person against whom a decree of ejectment has been executed and he re-enters or attempts to enter upon such land, he shall be presumed to have committed an offence within the meaning of s 441 of IPC . This section is not a carte blanche for any person to walk into and trespass upon anyone's property, be it3760 agricultural land or otherwise. The section is a deeming provision in case of admitted re-entry after a decree of ejectment has been executed. The same is not a bar to taking action in case of trespass under s 441, IPC . Therefore, when the accused intentionally encroached upon the gram sabha land, the order framing charge against him under s 447, IPC and the proceedings emanating therefrom are not barred under s 84(2) of the Delhi Land Reforms Act 1954.[46]

8. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons-case, framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 of CrPC 1973 may be referred to.

9. Proof

In order to establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the property in dispute was in the possession of a person other than the accused;
(b) the accused entered into, or upon, that property or remained there unlawfully after entering the same lawfully; and
(c) the accused did so with intent:

(i) to commit an offence, or
(ii) to intimidate, insult or annoy such person.

10. Possession of Complainant

In a prosecution for criminal trespass, the complainant must establish beyond reasonable doubt that he was in possession of the disputed plots.[47] In such case, it is necessary to determine whether the accused had been in possession prior to, and up to, the date of occurrence.[48] The complainant/injured was a khatedar of the field and the accused persons entered into it for grazing cattle with the intention to annoy the complainant, and so were guilty of the offence under s 447, IPC .[49] However, where there is ample evidence to hold that there is dispute between the parties over the possession of the disputed land, the entry of an accused over the disputed land cannot be said to be criminal trespass.[50] Where the field at which the assault took place, was in the exclusive possession of the accused person, they cannot be termed as trespassers and their acquittal under s 447, IPC, is proper.[51] If it is found that the accused were the joint tenants, perhaps it cannot be stated that they committed the offence of criminal trespass because, being the joint tenants, they had every right to go over their land and to grow crops.[52] Where, however, the right and title of the complainant to a tamarind tree was established in a civil suit and the accused took away its usufruct, it was held that the criminal court was not entitled to disregard the decree of the civil court declaring rights to the property and, therefore, the acquittal3761 of the accused was had in law.[53] However, the finding, given on the question of possession in proceedings under s 145, CrPC, cannot be treated as conclusive and binding on the court trying the offence under s 447, IPC, even if the two cases are based on the same occurrence. The court trying the offence of criminal trespass, must come to its own conclusion on the material placed before it. It may be relevant for such court to consider the order, made under s 145, CrPC, but, without anything else, no conviction can be justifiably founded upon such order or the findings related to it.[54]

A complaint was filed against accused appellant under ss 447, 427 and 506, IPC with allegations that the accused appellant demolished the compound wall existing on the complainant's land and was harassing and threatening. The complainant's evidence showed that the complainant was not in possession of the disputed plot on the date of alleged incident, as such the allegation of demolition of compound wall was baseless. There was no allegation of threats or intimidation in the complaint. The complaint filed in the case was frivolous; it was a total abuse of process of law. Complaint was quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[55]

11. Right of Private Defence

When the evidence on record shows that the accused persons were in possession of the land, and their defence probabilised that they were defending their possession when attacked by the prosecution party, it was held that they have a right of private defence of property as well as of person.[56]

12. Intention

Intent of the accused being the essence of the offence of criminal trespass, it is not enough to show that the accused entered into the property in the possession of another person; it must further be shown, or found from the evidence in record, that the main intention was to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy such person.[57] One or the other of the said intents must be expressly found upon evidence and must not be left to inference.[58] There must be a clear finding as to intention of the accused. The antecedent circumstances, as also the conduct of the parties, must be considered in such a case.[59] Unless there is a finding that the accused persons entered on the land with the intention of cutting the betel leaf creepers, or with the intention of causing annoyance to the complainant, or that mischief was done, there can be no conviction under either s 447, or s 427, IPC .[60] It is, however, impossible to produce direct evidence of intention, unless the accused himself gives expression to it. It has, in most of the cases, to be inferred from circumstances.[61] Where the applicant entered into possession of the disputed land on the basis of issue of CH Form no 23, it was held that there could be no intention on the part of the applicant to3762 enter upon the disputed land either to intimidate, or to cause annoyance to, the complainant.[62] Likewise, where there was a bonafide dispute of a civil right and the accused exercised his right of way, it was held that he had no criminal intent to commit the offence of criminal trespass.[63]

13. Quashing of Proceedings

When the allegations were that the accused persons on instigation of the main accused committed criminal trespass and demolished the wall and the order of cognizance against the main accused was set aside by the High Court, the order of cognizance against the co-accused is also liable to be quashed.[64]

14. Acquittal

Where admittedly the land in question was actually in possession of the opposite party and they were ploughing it, even though allegedly by force, the trial court found that the witnesses were ignorant as to who were in possession of the land in question, and there was litigation pending between the parties as regards the same land, hence the acquittal of the accused persons was found proper.[65] When the accused persons, after purchase, get the rights over the plot, s 447, IPC is not attracted.[66]

15. Conviction

An offence under s 447, IPC, being distinct and separate from other offences, the accused can be convicted under s 447 even if they may have been acquitted of the charges under ss 143, 294 and 426, IPC .[67] If, however, the accused, charged with stealing rice plants, is acquitted, his conviction for criminal trespass would be inconsistent with his acquittal for theft.[68] Where the accused were charged with the commission of an offence under s 147 but were convicted under s 47 for trespass without being called upon to plead to the case of trespass, it was held that the conviction of the accused under s 447, IPC, was illegal.[69] Where the evidence showed that the accused went to the offices of the collectorate not with any intention to cause any annoyance or injury to the persons present there, but to put forth their grievances, to those persons, regarding the rise of prices of essential commodities, it was held that they could not be held guilty of an offence under this section.[70] Where, however, the dominant intention of the accused was to intimidate the complainant to cause alarm and prevent him from laying any foundation to construct the house on the site and to coerce him to come to terms, it was held that he could be convicted under s 447, IPC, for criminal trespass.[71]3763

16. Double Conviction

Where once an accused is convicted of criminal trespass, he cannot be convicted of a trespass by remaining on the land after the previous conviction.[72] Similarly, where the accused entered on forest land and cut down some reserved trees, it was held that the accused could not be held guilty of offences both under s 32, Forest Act, and s 447, IPC, the offence under the latter section being included in that under the former.[73] There is, however, nothing wrong in convicting and sentencing a person separately under ss 143 and 447, IPC . Criminal trespass committed by the members of an unlawful assembly cannot be said to be a part of the offence of being a member of the unlawful assembly.[74]

17. Probation

The accused persons were convicted under ss 447, 325 / 34, 324 / 34, IPC*etc.*, keeping in view the nature of the offence, the character of the offenders and the fact that the incident took place about 20 years ago, the accused were directed to be released on probation of good conduct under s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958.[75] In appropriate cases, when releasing an accused on probation on account of their suffering prolonged litigation, compensation under s 5 of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958 (20 of 1958) can also be awarded.[76]

18. Sentence

The punishment should be governed by the circumstances attending the commission of the offence and the nature of the offence.[77] Considering the high-handedness of the accused in not only taking forcible possession of the house but also forfeiting the goods belonging to a third person lying there, the sentence of fine of Rs 10 and Rs 25 for offences under ss 47 and 379, IPC, respectively, were enhanced to one month's rigorous imprisonment for each offence in addition to the sentence of fine passed by the Trial Court.[78] However, where the accused who were poor agriculturists were convicted under s 447, IPC, for trespassing on the land of the complainant and ploughing over the paddy grown by the complainant and cutting the boundaries of the 'Ails', it was held that in view of the nature of the offence and the status of the accused persons the sentences of rigorous imprisonment for one month and fine of Rs 100 each were much too severe and should be reduced to fine of Rs 100 each.[79]

Inadequate sentences can do harm to the system. Law must meet the challenges that criminalisation offers. Maudlin sentiments bordering on tottering weakness cannot masquerade or reformative sentiments cannot do service, for a rational sentencing system. Misconceived liberation cannot be countenanced.[80] Where the accused persons in furtherance of their common intention caused grievous hurt to the3764 victim requiring hospitalisation for about four weeks and thus committed offences punishable under ss 447, 323, 324 and 326 read with s 34, IPC, the imposition of sentence by the magistrate till rising of the Court would be a 'flea bite' or worse, so the sentence imposed by the Trial Court was set aside and case was remitted to it for imposition of an appropriate sentence.[81]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 448.

Punishment for house-trespass.--

Whoever commits house-trespass shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

Under s 443, IPC lurking house-trespass and house-breaking are aggravated forms of ordinary house-trespass. Sections 448 to 452, IPC prescribe punishments for ordinary house-trespass, the offences of lurking house-trespass and house-breaking being treated on the same footing.

This section provides for punishment for the simplest form of house-trespass which is the first aggravated form of the criminal trespass.[82]Section 448, IPC protects any and every house from trespass.[83]

In a case of criminal trespass, the dominant intention of the accused must be to commit an offence, or to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession of the property trespassed upon. If and when the trespasser has such blameworthy mind in effecting the entry into the property in possession of someone else, he is said to have committed the offence of criminal trespass. However, the mere entry upon land, made under a bonafide claim of right, however ill-founded in law the claim may be, does not become criminal merely because a foreseen consequence of the entry is annoyance to the occupant.[84] If the police has locked a room as a result of a dispute between the parties and the lock has beer broken open for removing the articles inside the room, it cannot be said that an offence under s 448, IPC, has not been3765 disclosed.[85] However, no offence of house-trespass can be said to have been committed when the officers and employees of the electricity board, under proper authority and for the performance of their public duties, enter the premises of a house to remove meters as any intent to commit an offence, or to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession of the property would in such a case be lacking on the part of the officers and employees.[86] For similar reasons, this section does not cover the entry of municipal board's authorities for purpose of demolition of an unauthorized structure,[87]or the act of a tenant in demolishing wall of the landlord ordered so to be demolished by the municipality,[88] the former being an act in exercise of the lawful authority, and the latter being for the protection of the tenant's own interest. Where, on refusal of the discharged employee of an institution to vacate his quarter, another man of the institution had to break open the lock of the discharged employee to take possession of the quarter, it was held that no offence under s 448, IPC, had been constituted.[89] However, where the complainant went to the house on the date of the occurrence and was threatened and driven away by the accused and his companions, who had unlawfully trespassed into the house after its possession had been duly delivered to the complainant through the court amin, it was held that the accused committed an offence under s 448, read with the second part of s 441,[90] because entering into somebody's house with the purpose of causing annoyance amounts to an offence of criminal trespass and entering into his/her house with that object amounts to house-trespass.[91] However, a husband entering the house where his wife is residing cannot be an offence under s 448, when there was neither judicial separation between the two, nor any other order of a competent court banning him from entering the conjugal house.[92]

2. Section 447 and Section 448

It is needless to say that s 48 takes in all the legal ingredients of s 447, IPC . Therefore, ss 448 and 447 cannot be said to be distinct and separate offences, where one is an aggravated form of the other. Infact, normally an offence under s 448 cannot be committed without trespass into the property in which the house in question is situated. Therefore, when an offence which is inherently connected and integrated with an offence is proved, it is upto the Court to convert the offence according to the facts disclosed in such cases.[93]

3. Section 427 Distinguished from Sections 447 and 448

Commentary under s 427, ante, may be referred to.

4. Availability of Civil Remedy--Effect

On account of pendency of the existing land dispute between the parties, it cannot be inferred that the criminal proceedings under ss 148, 379 and 448, IPC, were initiated3766 by the complainant to harass the accused persons, particularly when the proceedings before the magistrate are at the initial stage. In such circumstances, the inherent powers of the High Court under s 452, CrPC, should not be exercised to quash the criminal proceedings.[1] The fact that civil remedy is available to the complainant is hardly a ground to throw away the prosecution of the accused for the criminal offence under s 448, IPC .[2] However, when the dispute between the parties is about some adoption, possession and succession to property, and facts appear to be essentially of civil nature, and the complaint under ss 448 and 506, IPC, does not disclose any offence alleged in the complaint, the criminal proceedings are liable to be quashed under s 482, CrPC .[3] One S gifted his property to a trust with condition that he would stay in the house till his death and the trust can take over possession after his death. During his lifetime he invited his brother's wife who was a widow to stay in the house with him. After the death of S, the widow continued to stay and she was served with a notice to quit by the trust. On her failure to comply with the notice, a complaint under s 447, IPC, was filed. On these facts the Apex Court opined that it was essentially a civil matter which could be properly adjudicated upon by a competent civil court. To initiate criminal proceedings, in the circumstances, appears to be only an abuse of process of the court.[4]

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable by the person in possession of the property trespassed upon, and is triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

6. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons-case, framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC 1973, may be referred to.

7. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) criminal trespass, as defined in s 441, IPC, was committed;
(b) the property, in respect of which trespass was committed, was a building, tent or vessel; and
(c) if the property, in respect of which criminal trespass was committed, was a building, such building was used:

(i) as a human dwelling, or
(ii) as a place for worship, or
(iii) as a place for the custody of property; or

(d) if the property, in respect of which the criminal trespass was committed, was a tent or a vessel, such tent or vessel was used as a human dwelling only.3767

In order to constitute the offence of criminal trespass, there must be proof of intention to commit an offence or to intimidate or insult or annoy the person in possession of the disputed property. When a person enters, without any legal justification, upon property in the established possession of another, he must be referred to have had an intention to annoy the person in possession.[5] In the absence of a definite finding that some specific offence was intended to be committed by the accused, the element of s 448, relating to intent to commit an offence, cannot be said to be established.[6] Where, therefore, there is no express finding that the accused intended to cause annoyance, the conviction under this section is unsustainable.[7] When the entry is made bonafide without any intent on the part of the accused to insult, annoy or intimidate, no offence is made out. Mere knowledge, that such entry might result in such consequences, is not enough.[8] The accused was alleged to have trespassed into his family house and attacked his mother with a knife. There was no evidence to show that the entry of the accused into the family house was unlawful. The acquittal of the accused was found proper.[9]

The complainant was allotted a shop by the rehabilitation department in his capacity as a displaced person. He was not allowed to enter into his own shop by the accused persons. The accused persons though entered into the shop lawfully, but retained it unlawfully and dishonestly for more than 37 years. Thus, they were guilty of offence under s 448 read with s 34, IPC .[10] Where the evidence proved that tenant entered the house and committed rape; the prosecutrix committed suicide, the appellant was convicted under ss 448 and 354, IPC .[11]

The complainants were the owners of the shops and were carrying wholesale business of crockery in the shops. Evidence proved that the accused persons taking advantage of the riots, trespassed into the premises by breaking open locks and committed theft of property kept in the shops and continued in illegal possession of shops for two years. Their conviction for offence under ss 379 and 448, IPC was held proper.[12]

8. Landlord Tenant Disputes

In a proceeding under this section, if the accused takes the plea that he was the tenant of the landlord (complainant), the landlord (complainant) can show that there was infact no relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties.[13] The accused was a tenant in the house of the complainant and was alleged to have occupied one more room illegally. The complainant, however, denied in evidence the factum of any door being there in that room, so the question of its having broken by the accused does not arise. The pendency of the earlier civil litigation between the parties was also not3768 disclosed before the court, so the acquittal of the accused under s 448, IPC, was found proper.[14] If an owner got into possession of an accommodation as soon as it is vacated by one tenant and does not allow another to occupy it, the accommodation can never be said to be in the possession of the other, and the owner cannot be said to have been guilty of an offence under this section.[15]

9. When Dominant Intention of Accused is to Cause Hurt and not Trespass

Where it has been found out that the dominant intention of the accused was to cause hurt, the offence under s 448, IPC, is well established.[16]

10. Quashing of Proceedings

Where on perusing the complaint petition and considering the submissions of the learned counsel for the accused, it was found by the High Court that the prosecution is not bonafide and has been brought about only to wreck personal vengeance on account of delivery of possession effected against the complainant in execution of the decree, in order to secure the ends of justice, the order of Trial Court summoning the accused was set aside.[17]

11. Probation

The accused persons entered into the shop lawfully but retained it unlawfully and dishonestly for more than 37 years. On the facts and circumstances of the case the release of the accused persons on probation was found proper.[18] However, when the accused persons, below 21 years of age, were evicted from the house in question in execution of the decree of the court with police help, then re-entered the house and caused damage, the benefit of probation was declined as they took the law in their own hands.[19] When the accused has acted like a ruffian while committing house-trespass and started living in the house in open defiance of law, no leniency in sentence deserved to be shown to the accused and no benefit of probation should be extended as it is not meant for ruffians.[20] However, keeping in view the fact that they were first offenders, the accused persons convicted under ss 323, 342 and 448, IPC, which are not grave or tenuous offences, the benefit of probation was extended to them by the Punjab and Haryana High Court.[21]

12. Sentence

This section provides for imprisonment or fine or both, the imprisonment extending to one year and the fine to one thousand rupees. Discretion has been vested in the court to give suitable and adequate sentence within the limits set by law. Where the facts warrant a deterrent sentence to be given, judicial discretion must be applied and3769 such sentence, as would be appropriated, should be awarded.[22] If an ex-tenant quietly re-enters the premises with the intention of asserting his rights, he does not deserve any indulgence of the court to take a lenient view on the point of sentence.

The sentence of fine of Rs 200 in such a case is not excessive.[23] When the accused committed the offence under s 448, IPC, in a very high-handed manner soon after delivery of possession of the house in favour of the complainant effected by the civil court, serious notice should be taken of his said act. Only a sentence of fine would not do in such a case. Similarly, the accused was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for one month and pay a fine of Rs 100. In default of payment of fine he was to undergo rigorous imprisonment for a further period of 15 days.[24] Where the accused took the law in his own hands and acted like a ruffian by breaking open the lock of the house and started to live in it with his family in open defiance of the law, the sentence of fine of Rs 1000, in default rigorous imprisonment for three months was declined to be reduced and the benefit of probation was also declined to the accused.[25]

13. Alteration of Conviction from Section 448 to one under Section 447

Section 448, IPC, is an aggravated form of s 447, IPC . Therefore, when an offence inherently connected and integrated with an offence, is proved, it is upto the court to convert the offence according to the facts disclosed in such cases. Therefore, when an accused is charged with offences under s 448 read with s 149, IPC but commission of the offence under s 447 read with s 34, IPC, is proved on record of the case, the conviction of the accused recorded by the trial court under s 448 read with s 148, IPC can be altered or one under s 447 read with s 34, IPC .[26]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 449.

House-trespass in order to commit offence punishable with death.--

Whoever commits house-trespass in order to the committing of any offence punishable with death, shall be punished with [27][imprisonment for life], or with rigorous imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

This and the following two sections provide for aggravated form of house-trespass to be determined by the gravity of the offence for which house-trespass is committed. Lower punishments are prescribed in the next two sections by reason of the lesser3770 seriousness of the offence. This section prescribes the highest punishment for house-trespass committed in order to commit the most serious offence, namely, the offence which is punishable with death.

2. 'In order to the Committing of any Offence'

An act can be said to be committed 'in order to the committing of an offence' even though the offence may not be completed. If a person commits a house-trespass with the purpose of the committing of theft, but has failed to accomplish the purpose, it will be proper to say he has committed the house-trespass in order to the committing of theft. The words 'in order to' have been used to mean 'with the purpose of'. If the purpose in committing the house-trespass is the commission of an offence punishable with death, the house-trespass becomes punishable under this section. If the purpose in committing the house-trespass is the commission of an offence punishable with imprisonment for life, the house-trespass is punishable under s 450, IPC . Similarly, ss 451, 454 and 457, IPC will apply if the house-trespass, or lurking house-trespass, or lurking house-trespass by night, or house breaking by night is committed for the purpose of the offence indicated in the said sections. Whether the purpose was actually accomplished is quite irrelevant in these cases. Therefore, the fact, that the murder was not actually committed, will not affect the applicability of this section.[28]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of sessions judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you committed house-trespass by entering into (or unlawfully remaining in) the building/tent/vessel of AB, to wit... (describe it), used as a human dwelling/place of worship/place for the custody of property, to wit...(specify it), in order to the committing of the offence of...(specify it), which is punishable with death, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 449 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this Court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

5. Trespass and Murder

Where the accused persons allegedly trespassed into the shop of the deceased and assaulted him with knife and iron rod, the eye-witnesses though related to the deceased had narrated the alleged incident and the subsequent events on the same lines, the presence of the eye-witness at the scene of the offence was established and their evidence was corroborated in all material particulars. The accused persons had developed a grudge against the deceased due to illicit relationship between the deceased and the wife of the main accused. The conviction and sentence of the3771 accused persons under ss 449, 302 and 34, IPC was found proper.[29] Where the prosecution case was that the accused remained in the house of the deceased on the fateful night and committed murder of the deceased and looted the amount and thereafter fled away after locking the house from outside, the key found at the instance of the accused was the key of the lock which was put from outside on the door of the deceased. The evidence of recovery of stolen money of the deceased was also found to be reliable. Besides this, there was recovery of blood stained clothes of the accused person on the basis of the disclosure statement of the accused. The motive behind the commission of offence was that the deceased was denying to return back the amount of the accused. Hence, the conviction of the accused was found proper.[30] Where the purpose of the house trespass committed was to commit robbery and not any offence punishable with death, it was held that the offence under s 449, IPC was committed.[31]

6. Trespass and Rape

Where the appellant accused working as a mason in the house of the prosecutrix entered into the house of the prosecutrix, raped her and committed the murder of the brother of the prosecrtrix, his conviction under ss 302, 376 and 449, IPC was upheld.[32]

7. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed house-trespass as defined in s 441, IPC ; and
(b) he did so in order to the committing of an offence punishable with death.

8. Acquittal

Where the accused, being the relative of the deceased and his wife, is stated to have been living with them in one and the same house having a common mess, the question of trespass into the house by the accused does not arise at all and the conviction and sentence held and awarded by the trial court under s 449, IPC had was done away by the High Court.[33] Where the purpose of the house trespass committed was to commit robbery and not any offence punishable with death, held offence under s 449, IPC was committed.[34]

9. Conviction

The accused was alleged to have entered into the hut of the deceased and killed him by inflicting axe injuries. The witness proved that the accused was seen coming out of the hut of the deceased with an axe. The recovery of weapons of offence at the instance of the accused was proved. The conviction of the accused under ss 304 and 449, IPC, was found proper.[35] Where the prosecution evidence clearly established3772 beyond reasonable doubt that the three accused persons entered into a criminal conspiracy to commit robbery of valuables belonging to the deceased-victim and for that purpose committed criminal trespass into the victim's house and robbery, the conviction of the accused persons under ss 449, 392 and 120B, IPC, was found proper.[36]

10. Sentence

When an accused is convicted under ss 304 and 449, IPC, it is not necessary to award separate sentence under s 449, IPC .[37] Where the accused committed criminal trespass and robbery and other offences, the sentence of rigorous imprisonment for 5 years under s 449, IPC, was found proper, but directed to run concurrently with the sentence of imprisonment awarded for the other offences.[38] The accused was convicted under ss 302 and 449, IPC, and the sentence of rigorous imprisonment of 10 years awarded to the accused under s 449, IPC, was found proper.[39] When the accused was sentenced to life imprisonment and a fine of Rs 5,000/- was imposed under s 302, and was sentenced to four years rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 1,000 was imposed under s 449, IPC and the accused was in custody, his wife and mother had passed away and his minor children were rendered destitute, in view of the said factors and also the fact that the accused was under suspension from service and must have been in financial crisis, the order of sentence with regard to fine was set aside.[40]

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 450.

House-trespass in order to commit offence punishable with [41][imprisonment for life].--

Whoever commits house-trespass in order to the committing of any offence punishable with [42][imprisonment for life], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

The preceding section prescribes punishment for house-trespass in order to commit the most serious offence, namely, the offence which is punishable with death. This section prescribes punishment for house-trespass in order to commit the next lower grade of the offence, i.e., the offence which is punishable with imprisonment for life.3773

2. 'In order to the Committing of any Offence'

Commentary under the same heading in s 449, ante, may be referred to.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

4. Charge

The charge is the same as in the case of an offence under the preceding s 449 with the only exception that the nature of the offence, in order to commit which the house trespass was committed, is to be varied and specified.

5. Non Consideration of charge under Section 450 in Rape Case--Effect

The non-consideration of charge of house trespass under s 450, IPC, by the sessions court, while ordering acquittal under s 376, IPC is immaterial. When the purpose for which the accused is said to have entered the house of victim itself does not constitute an offence falling under s 376, IPC, this aspect may fall into insignificance and evidently that may be the reason why this aspect was not adverted to by the trial judge. Even otherwise, it will not alter the situation in any way and hence the mere non-consideration of charge under s 450, IPC may not be of any serious consequence.[43]

6. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed house-trespass as defined in s 442, IPC ; and
(b) he did so in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment for life.

The accused was proved to have trespassed into the house to commit rape on the prosecutrix, and then committed rape on her. His conviction under s 376 and s 450, IPC, was found proper.[44] Where the appellants had forcibly entered the house of the deceased, they were convicted under s 450, IPC .[45] The quarrel took place between the accused and the deceased who was his younger brother for the partition of their parental house. The accused entered into their parental house and inflicted injuries on the head of the deceased thereby causing his death. The evidence showed that the said house was not inaccessible to the accused and his family members, since fire-wood, food-grains etc., were lying stored/collected in the said ancestral/parental house so no offence of criminal trespass was made out. The accused though convicted under s 304, Pt II was acquitted under s 450, IPC .[46] Where prosecution case was that the accused persons entered the house, threatened the prosecutrix a3774 minor girl, and raped her, there was consultation and deliberation filing FIR, medical evidence in the case did not support the prosecution's version, accused persons were acquitted of the charges under ss 450, 506 and 376, IPC .[47]

7. Sentence

The normal sentence for an offence appears to be one-third of the prescribed sentence, however, it is subject to the facts and circumstances of each case.[48] A sentence of 5 years rigorous imprisonment under s 450, IPC, is not harsh.[49] The accused was found guilty of offences under ss 376 and 450, IPC . After the incident, the accused lost one half of his lower limbs and also his employment on account of his conviction. Keeping in view the facts and circumstances of the case the accused was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for seven years under s 376, IPC, and rigorous imprisonment for five years under s 450, IPC . Both the sentences were directed to run concurrently.[50] The accused was found guilty under ss 354 and 450, IPC . He had remained in jail for about 8 months. For the offences under ss 354 and 450, IPC, the accused was sentenced to the period already undergone by him in custody.[51]

Where the accused had trespassed into the house during midnight to commit the offence of rape, there appeared to be certain exaggerations in the evidence of the prosecution regarding the incident, on the facts and circumstances of the case the sentence of 10 years rigorous imprisonment awarded to the accused under s 450, IPC, by the trial court was reduced to three years rigorous imprisonment.[52]

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 451.

House-trespass in order to commit offence punishable with imprisonment.--

Whoever commits house-trespass in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if the offence intended to be committed is theft, the term of the imprisonment may be extended to seven years.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

This section is applicable to cases in which house-trespass is committed for any offence (other than the one punishable with death or imprisonment for life) which is punishable3775 with imprisonment, the extent of the imprisonment being immaterial. The punishment is severe if the offence, intended to be committed by house-trespass, is theft which is punishable with imprisonment for three years under s 379, IPC and with greater punishment under the subsequent sections. The punishment prescribed under this section is the lowest as against that prescribed in the two preceding sections.

For the applicability of this section, any offence, punishable under the IPC, is an 'offence' even if it is not punishable with imprisonment for more than six months.[53] If an accused enters the house, when the house-owner is away, with the intention of committing sexual intercourse with the wife of the house-owner, he commits the offence under this section.[54]

There is nothing in s 452, IPC to suggest that the use to which the house is put makes any difference. It is not the requirement of s 452, IPC that for a trespass to be an offence the house must be a private place and not an office.[55] Where the accused appellant entered the Lottery Workers Union Office and assaulted the complainant, the appellant accused was convicted under ss 452 and 307, IPC . The acquittal of the accused of charge under s 452, IPC merely on the ground that the incident occurred in Lottery Workers Union Office and not at any private place was not sustainable under s 452, IPC .[56]

A person who commits house trespass can be convicted under the section only if he is found guilty of committing any offence punishable with imprisonment. If criminal trespass into a dwelling house is committed with the intention of committing any offence punishable with imprisonment then the offence punishable under s 451, IPC is complete even if the offender does not succeed in committing the offence he intended to commit.[57]

Offence under s 451, IPC is complete when criminal trespass into a dwelling house has been committed with the intention of committing any offence punishable with imprisonment.[58]

2. 'In order to the Committing of any Offence'

Commentary under the same heading in s 449, ante, may be referred to.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section, if committed in order to the committing of an offence (other than the theft) punishable with imprisonment, is cognizable, bailable, compoundable, with the permission of the court before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, by the person in possession of the house trespassed upon, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily. If, however, the offence under this section is committed in order to commit a theft, it is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and is triable by a magistrate3776

4. Charge

The offence under this section, if committed in order to commit an offence (other than the theft) punishable with imprisonment, being triable as a summons case, framing of a formal charge is not necessary (s 251, CrPC 1973). If, however, the offence is committed in order to commit a theft, the charge, though framed by the magistrate, and not by the sessions judge, would be in the same form as under s 449, except that the nature of the offence, for committing which the house-trespass was committed, is to be varied and specified.

5. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section,the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the house-trespass, as defined in s 442, IPC, was committed; and
(b) it was done in order to the committing of an offence punishable with imprisonment or theft.

Facts of such a nature as would justify the inference that some offence, punishable with imprisonment, was intended over and above the house-trespass itself, has to be proved.[59] A strong suspicion as to the motive, with which the accused entered another person's house, is insufficient to warrant a finding of conviction for the offence punishable under this section.[60] The accused voluntarily entered the house of the deceased and caused injuries by giving a lathi blow on his head causing his death. The conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II, s 451, IPC was found proper.[61]

Evidence of prosecution witnesses proved that the accused persons armed with sticks went to the house of the complainant for assaulting him; the accused persons were convicted for offence under s 451, IPC .[62]

6. Trespass in order to Commit Adultery--Cases

When the prospective offence is adultery, it is necessary to show that there was no consent or connivance on the part of the husband of the woman concerned.[63] The onus to show that there was no consent, or connivance, of the husband is on the prosecution.[64] However, where the husband caught hold of the accused and fought with him until the father of the accused intervened and took him away, it was held that it can safely be presumed that the husband neither consented to, nor connived at, the offence of adultery.[65] Similarly, in some cases, it has been held that a man, who enters the house of another at night with intent to commit adultery with his wife, is guilty of an offence under s 451, IPC if, in such a case, it is shown that the husband was, at the time of the occurrence, absent from the house in the legitimate pursuit of his occupation, the reason being that it can then safely be presumed that he neither3777 consented to, nor connived at, any adultery or immorality on the part of his wife.[66] Where, however, the husband was not the complainant and did not eventually appear to give evidence as a witness and there was nothing in the findings to indicate that there was no connivance or consent on the part of the husband of the woman, it was held that the charge under s 451 could not be sustained.[67] Where the accused admittedly entered for adultery and the complainant refused to lay a complaint, it was held that the magistrate had rightly refused to convict the accused of the charge of house-trespass.[68]

7. Conviction

Where the complainant charged the accused with house-trespass with the intention of committing theft and the magistrate disbelieved the allegation as to theft, it was held that the offence, which the accused had the intention of committing, was a substantial ingredient of the offences under s 451 and s 457, IPC and a conviction under these sections could not be maintained, unless there was an express finding on this point, and, therefore, the conviction was altered to one under s 448 .[69] Where an accused is charged both under s 380 and s 451, conviction under s 380 to separate conviction under s 451 is called for, the ingredients of both the sections being the same.[70]

The prosecution case was that when PW2, daughter of the complainant, was sleeping in her room inside the house at night, the appellant along with two other co-accused, entered the house of the complainant and committed theft of the golden chain which PW2 was wearing. FIR was lodged sixteen days after the incident when the police came to the complainant with that golden chain. The complainant or PW2 did not know about the theft of the chain even though PW2 was wearing the chain when it was stolen. Held, the chain in question was being worn by PW2. It was stated to have been stolen while she was sleeping. It was inconceivable that she would not realize that she had lost her chain. The appellant was acquitted of the charges under ss 380 and 451, IPC .[71]

8. Probation

One accused was convicted under ss 451 and 323, IPC, while the other under s 451, IPC . The remaining accused persons were convicted for the serious offence under s 304, Pt II alongwith ss 451 and 323, IPC . The occurrence took place 18 years back, so the first two accused persons were convicted under s 451 and s 323, IPC, and under s 451, IPC, respectively, and were released on probation.[72] However, where the accused did not spare even a 12 year old girl, entered her house and started running3778 his hand upon her shoulder with a view to gratify his lust, the court declined to release the accused on probation of good conduct.[73]

9. Sentence

The accused were convicted under s 304, Pt II, ss 451 and 323, IPC, and sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 2 years and fine of Rs 2000 in default six months rigorous imprisonment, rigorous imprisonment for six months and fine of Rs 250 and in default one month rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 250 in default 1 month rigorous imprisonment, respectively. The occurrence took place 18 years back so the sentence of imprisonment under ss 304, Pt II and s 451, IPC, was reduced to the period already undergone by the accused. The sentence of fine under all three counts, however, was maintained.[74] The trial court convicted the accused under ss 354 / 451 / 323, IPC, and sentenced him to undergo rigorous imprisonment for one year under s 451, IPC, and also to pay a fine of Rs 2000, in default to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 4 months, sentence of imprisonment was to run concurrently with the sentence of imprisonment awarded for the other offences. Keeping in view the fact that the accused faced trial for the last six years, the sentence of imprisonment was slashed and brought down to rigorous imprisonment for six months by the High Court.[75]

10. Alteration of Conviction from Section 354 to one under Section 451

Commentary under the same heading in s 354,vol 3, may be referred to.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 452.

House-trespass after preparation for hurt, assault or wrongful restraint.--

Whoever commits house-trespass, having made preparation for causing hurt to any person or for assaulting any person, or for wrongfully restraining any person, or for putting any person in fear of hurt, or of assault, or of wrongful restraint, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

Making preparation for the commission of an offence has always been treated as an aggravated form of that offence. Thus, the committing of theft after making3779 preparation for causing death, hurt or restraint is made specifically punishable under s 382 . Similarly, lurking-house trespass, or house-breaking, after making preparation for hurt, etc., is made punishable under s 455, IPC, and the same offences, when committed at night, are made punishable under s 458, IPC . This section prescribes punishment for committing house-trespass after making preparation (a) for causing, to any person, hurt, assault, or wrongful restraint; or (b) for putting him (i.e., any person) in such fear (i.e., fear of hurt, assault, or wrongful restraint). The offence under this section can be committed only in relation to the person in whose possession the house is.[76]

For a conviction under this section, it is necessary to prove that the dominant intent of the accused was to cause hurt to, or to assault, or to wrongfully restrain, any person, or to put him in such fear.[77] There must be clear evidence of preparation for causing hurt, etc. The fact, that a person enters another man's house and commits an assault, does not necessarily mean such preparation because it may be a case of post hoc ergo propter hoc.[78] Trespassing into the shop of the complainant for the purpose of assaulting him would not be sufficient to support a conviction under this section though it might be for a conviction under s 448 .[79] Where the accused went armed to the house of his father-in-law primarily for the purpose of forcibly taking away his wife, and not to cause hurt to, or to assault, her and, by going armed, the accused intended to intimidate the inmates of the house and thus facilitate his object of taking away his wife with him, it was held that the accused could be held guilty only under s 448, IPC .[80] Similarly, where the accused entered the house of the complainant to intimidate him to withdraw a case filed by him and a scuffle took place resulting in injuries to two persons, but there was no evidence to prove that the house-trespass was committed after making preparation for causing hurt, it was held that the accused was guilty of offences under ss 324 and 448, and not under s 452 .[81] Where, however, the accused went with a forged warrant for the arrest of a prostitute and took her away, it was held that entry into the house with a forged warrant constituted house-trespass and as she was put in fear of arrest and there was wrongful restraint, the accused was guilty of the offence under this section.[82]

Criminal trespass is committed by the accused when they entered the house of an individual with a view to insult, intimidate or annoy such owner of the house/property. If the accused entered the house of an individual to insult, intimidate or annoy any person other than the owner of the property, it would not constitute criminal trespass. Once the conduct of the accused is not criminal trespass, it would not be house trespass and would not become punishable under s 452, IPC .[83]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate.3780

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of..., at ..., you committed house-trespass by entering into (or unlawfully remaining in) a building/tent/vessel, to wit ...(describe it), of AB, used as a human dwelling/place of worship/place for custody of property, to wit... (specify it), having made preparation for causing hurt to (or for assaulting/wrongfully restraining) the said AB (or for putting him in such fear), and that you, thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 452 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

4. Accused Charged under Section 452 can be Convicted under Section 426

Accused charged under ss 452 / 149 can be convicted under ss 452 / 34 .

Where the accused persons were charged under ss 300 / 149 but the charge under ss 300 / 149 was not proved as less than five accused were convicted, they can be convicted for the offence under s 452 with the aid of s 34 of the IPC .[85]

5. Intimately Connected Charges and Failure to Prove Common Object

In Passang Lama v State of Sikkim ,[86] the charges against the accused under s 147 for rioting, under s 448 for house breaking, and under s 452 for house-trespass after making preparation for causing hurt were all intimately connected with the charge, under s 302, of having formed unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object to cause the death of a constable. It was found that there was no common object of the accused to cause such death. It was held that, because of this finding, the other charges, including those under ss 448 and 452, automatically fell down.

6. Proof

Before an accused can be convicted of an offence under s 452, IPC, he should be found by the court to have entered into a building, tent, or vessel, used as a human dwelling. Where, in the FIR filed soon after the incident, there was no mention that there existed chhappar on the disputed land and that the accused had entered into that chhappar, and it was only during the course of evidence that it was developed that a chhappar existed and the accused had entered into that chhappar, it was held that he could not so convicted of an offence under s 452, IPC .[87]

7. Right of Private Defence

The allegations in the complainant were that the accused persons alongwith another group of persons raided the house and committed house trespass. A cross FIR was3781 lodged by the accused persons alleging house trespass and causing hurt by the complainant party. In view of the registered sale deed in their favour, the probability was that the accused persons were in possession of the disputed house being its purchaser, and so there was the probability that the complaint raided the disputed house by inflicting fire arm injuries and took its possession from the accused persons. Therefore, the right of private defence was available to the accused persons. The accused persons were found entitled to the benefit of the doubt and were acquitted of the charge under s 452, IPC .[88]

8. Acquittal

The allegation against the accused persons were that they armed with a lathi and crow-bar entered into the house of the complainant and assaulted the deceased. The eyewitness wife of the deceased did not support the prosecution case. There was no explanation for the delay of five days in the FIR reaching the court. The parties were on inimical terms so the uncorroborated evidence of the interested eyewitness also made the prosecution case suspicious. The conviction of the accused under ss 452, 304, Pt II read with s 149, IPC, was not found proper.[89] The allegations were that the accused alongwith other persons came and threw acid on the informant and assaulted the inmates of the house. The name of the ocular witness stated that the accused persons assaulted the inmates inside the house. The prosecution was pending for more than 22 years, so the accused persons were found entitled to be acquitted.[90]

Prosecution case was that five persons including the appellant accused persons armed with lathi, revolver and knife entered the temple, tied the priest (complainant) of the temple with rope and took away collection box. Admittedly, no injury was caused to the complainant. The testimony of the complainant and the sole witness examined in the case was inconsistent and contradictory. Conviction of the appellant accused under ss 452, 392 and 397, IPC was set aside.[91]

9. Conviction

The accused persons forcibly entered into the house of the deceased, broke open the room which was bolted from inside, and thereafter, assaulted him. Their conviction under s 452, IPC, was found proper.[92] The occurrence took place in a house where the accused attacked the injured by firing a shot. Both eye witnessed were undisputedly present in the house at the time of the incident. Their evidence was found reliable and the conviction of the accused under ss 307 and 452, IPC, was found proper.[93] Accused A1 along with some others armed with weapons entered the house of the complainant PW1, inflicted knife injuries and looted articles. The prosecution evidence established that the gathering of mob outside the house of PW1 was an unlawful assembly, which was armed with deadly weapons. The same would3782 clearly fall within the ambit of ss 141 and 148, IPC . Accused A1 was convicted for offences under ss 148, 392 and 452, IPC .[1]

10. Probation

An accused aged 20 years was convicted under ss 452 and 397, IPC . The report of the probation officer showed that the accused belonged to a middle class respectable family, but fell into undesirable company and was influenced by movies eulogising crime. The accused was held entitled to the benefit of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958 (20 of 1958).[2] Where the incident took place in a fit of anger, and all the parties were educated and also distantly related and the incident was not such as to direct the accused to undergo the sentence, the accused were released on probation by directing them to execute a bond of one year for good behaviour.[3]

11. Sentence (Deterrent)

Deterrent punishment should be awarded under this section.[4] A prison sentence being compulsory under this section, imposing only a sentence of fine is an error of law.[5] The sentence, that has to be imposed under this section, is to be one of imprisonment, and it is optional for the court to impose fine or not.[6] A sentence of two years rigorous imprisonment could not be considered to be excessive where one of the offenders was armed with pistol and two with spears.[7]

12. Sentence (Lenient)

The accused was convicted under ss 325 and 452, IPC, but during the pendency of civil appeal before the Supreme Court he was acquitted under s 325, IPC, on account of a compromise with the injured. The offence under s 452, IPC, was not compoundable, but the sentence of the accused under s 452 was reduced to the period already undergone by him.[8]

The accused persons were acquitted of the offences under ss 322 / 149, IPC, in view of the said offence lawfully compounded by the parties, but their conviction under ss 147 and 452, IPC, was found proper as these are non-compoundable offences. Keeping in view the facts that the incident took place 20 years ago and the accused persons were in custody as convicts for at least six days and had already deposited the fine, their sentence was reduced from six months rigorous imprisonment under s 452, IPC, to the period of imprisonment already undergone by them.[9] Where the incident took place almost 20 years ago and the cause of incident was a simple altercation about loss caused to the crops of the accused by donkeys belonging to the prosecution party, since all accused were of 60 to 65 years old of age, the sentence of imprisonment awarded by the trial court was reduced to the period already undergone3783 by them.[10] Keeping in view the very old age of the accused who was more than 77 years of age, the sentence of four years rigorous imprisonment was reduced to six months rigorous imprisonment and made concurrent with the sentence awarded under s 323 read with s 34, IPC .[11]

Appellant accused No. 7 along with other accused, armed with deadly weapons, entered the house of the deceased, killed two persons and inflicted multiple injuries on the injured persons. Reduction of sentence from 3 years to one year by the High Court was wholly unjustified. The sentence of three years awarded by the trial court was restored.[12]

13. Alteration of Conviction from Section 452 to one under Section 451

When there was nothing to show that the accused had trespassed into the house of the victim to commit an offence under s 354, IPC, by making the requisite preparation to commit the said offence, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 452 to s 451, IPC .[13]

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 453.

Punishment for lurking house-trespass or house-breaking.--

Whoever commits lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

This section prescribes punishment for the offences of lurking house-trespass and house-breaking, defined under ss 443 and 445, IPC respectively. As all the aspects of the said offences have been discussed under the said sections, the relevant commentary there may be referred to.

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

3. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251CrPC, 1973 may be referred to.

4. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove, in respect of lurking house-trespass, that:3784

(a) the accused committed house-trespass as defined in s 442, IPC, and
(b) he did so after taking precautions to conceal such house-trespass from some person who had a right to exclude or reject him (s 442, IPC); or in respect of house-breaking, that:

(a) the accused committed house-trespass as defined in s 442, IPC, and
(b) he effected his entrance into the house, or any part of the house, in any of the six ways, described in s 445, IPC, or if he was there for the purpose of committing an offence, or he had committed an offence there, he quit the said place in any of the said six ways.

The prosecution must prove that the accused had the intention to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy the person in possession of the property trespassed upon.[14]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 454.

Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking in order to commit offence punishable with imprisonment.--

Whoever commits lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if the offence intended to be committed is theft, the term of the imprisonment may be extended to ten years.

STATE AMENDMENT

Tamil Nadu-- Section 454 of the Act, shall be renumbered as sub-section (1) of that section and after sub-section (1) as so renumbered, the following sub-section shall be added, namely--

"(2) Whoever commits lurking house-trespass or house-breaking in any building used as a place of worship, in order to the committing of the offence of theft of any idol or icon from such building, shall notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), be punished with rigorous imprisonment which shall not be less than three years but which may extend to ten years and with fine which shall not be less than five thousand rupees:

Provided that the court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment for a term of less than three years."--[Vide TN Act 28 of 1993, s 4 (wef 13-7-1993)].

COMMENTS

1. Scope

This section, which corresponds to s 451, IPC, which prescribes punishment for the same kind of offences in respect of simple house-trespass, provides for higher punishment for similar offences in respect of lurking house-trespass (s 443, IPC) and3785 house-breaking (s 445, IPC). It covers the case of the first aggravated form of the said offences. While this section deals with lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by day, s 457, IPC deals with those offences when committed by night. Lurking house-trespass, or house-breaking, if intended to commit the offence of theft, is made more severely punishable. The case would be covered under this section if the offence of theft is not intended, but is also actually committed.[15]

2. Section 454 and Section 11 of the Public Premises (Eviction) Act (40 of 1971)--Distinction

The ingredients of offences under s 454, IPC, and under s 11 of the Public Premises (Eviction of Unauthorised Occupents) Act 1971 are quite different. In the first case, the entry must be to commit an offence or to cause insult, intimidation or to annoy the occupant, and in the second case there is re-entry after having been evicted from a public premises under the Act.[16] Both in case of art 20(2) of the Constitution of India as well as under s 26 of the General Clauses Act, to operate as a bar, the second prosecution and the consequent punishment thereunder must be for the same offence, i.e., an offence whose ingredients are the same. Thus, the discharge of the accused under s 454, IPC, is not proper.[17]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate when the lurking house-trespass, or house-breaking, is committed in order to commit an offence (other than the theft) punishable with imprisonment, and by a magistrate of the first class when the lurking house-trespass, or house-breaking, is committed in order to commit a theft.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you committed lurking house-trespass by entering into (or remaining in) a house in the possession of AB used as a human dwelling in order to the commission of the offence, to wit...(mention it), punishable with imprisonment, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 454 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed lurking house-trespass, as defined in s 443, or house-breaking, as defined in s 445 ; and
(b) he did so in order to commit an offence, punishable with imprisonment, or for committing a theft.3786

Intention being the gist of the offence under this section, it must be proved in all cases. Where there was no evidence to prove that the complainant was the tenant of the accused in respect of the shop in question, the possession of the room in question remained with the accused, so the conviction of the accused under s 454, IPC, was not found proper.[18]

6. Conviction

Where the accused was caught with some jewels, while he was leaving the house, but there was neither any evidence of house-breaking, nor of the essential elements of lurking house-trespass, it was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under s 380, and not of an offence under this section.[19] Similarly, when a boy of about 11 or 12 years of age was found in a room which contained only some ordinary papers, it was held that no offence was made out against the boy.[20] If there is no evidence on record that accused was seen near the house of complainant on the day of theft and stolen property was recovered at the instance of accused 3 months after the incident, the accused is liable to be convicted under s 411, IPC, and not under ss 454 and 380, IPC .[21] However, where, under the order of a magistrate under s 145, CrPC, the police locked the house in question and handed over the key to the supurdar and the accused, on refusal of the supurdar to give the key to him on his demand, broke open the lock and took forcible possession of the house, it was held that the accused had rightly been convicted under s 454, IPC .[22]

Offence under s 454, IPC includes offence under s 380, IPC . Where accused is convicted under s 380, IPC, separate conviction under s 454, IPC is not required.[23]

7. Alteration for Conviction from Sections 454 and 380 to Section 411

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 455.

Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking after preparation for hurt, assault or wrongful restraint.--

Whoever commits lurking house-trespass, or house-breaking, having made preparation for causing hurt to any person, or for assaulting any person, or for wrongfully restraining any person, or for putting any person in fear of hurt or of assault or of wrongful restraint, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.3787

COMMENTS

1. Scope

This section corresponds to s 452, IPC which deals with offences of similar kind in respect of house-trespass. The committing of the offences of lurking house-trespass and house-breaking are treated as more serious offences when committed by night than those committed by day. No such distinction has been made in respect of house-trespass. Similarly, while s 451, IPC deals with the offence of house-trespass, whether committed by day or by night, ss 455 and 458, IPC deal with offences of lurking house-trespass or house-breaking when comitted by day and by night respectively.

The offences under ss 454 and 455, IPC are cases of aggravated forms of criminal trespass and an entry in or upon a property in order to be a crime must be shown to have been made with the intent to commit the same or to insult or annoy or intimidate the complainant. It is necessary to show that causing of such annoyance, intimidation or insult was the aim of the entry.[24]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

3. Pendency of Civil Proceedings--Criminal Proceedings not to be Stayed

The criminal proceedings are not to be stayed during pendency of civil proceedings simply because identical facts will be tried in both the proceedings, reason being that objects and approaches in the two types of proceedings are different and criminal proceedings need an early disposal.[25]

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you committed lurking house-trespass/house-breaking, in the building in possession of AB, and used as a human dwelling (or used for the custody of property), having made preparation for causing hurt to AB (or for assaulting any person/for wrongfully restraining any person/for putting any person in fear of hurt or assault or wrongful restraint), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s 455 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Though a conviction under s 457, IPC, cannot be sustained without specification of the intention in the charge, a conviction under s 455 is not vitiated due to the want of specification of the intention in the charge.[26]3788

5. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the procesution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed lurking house-trespass (s 443, IPC) or house-breaking (s 445, IPC); and
(b) he did so after making preparation for causing hurt to, or assaulting, or wrongfully restraining, some person, or for putting some person in fear of hurt, assault or wrongful restraint.

Where the accused persons armed with various weapons entered the police wireless station after breaking open the doors and windows and assaulting the inmates, they must be deemed to have shared the common object of committing lurking house-trespass and therefore liable to be convicted under s 455 read with s 149, IPC .[27]

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 456.

Punishment for lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by night.--

Whoever commits lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

This section corresponds to s 453, IPC which prescribes punishment for lurking house-trespass by day, or house-breaking by day, while this section prescribes punishment for the same offence when committed during the night. Neither of these two sections deals with other aggravated forms of these offences.

2. Ingredients

The necessary ingredients for an offence under s 456, IPC, are entry into any building, tent or vessel, used as a human dwelling, with any of the following intents, namely:

(a) to commit an offence, or
(b) to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession of such property, after having taking precautions to conceal such house-trespass from some person, who has a right to exclude or eject the trespasser from the building, tent or vessel, and such trespass was after sunset and before sunrise.

Similarly, entry with any of the intents, specified in s 441, IPC, is the primary ingredient to constitute an offence under s 456, IPC . Unless the entry into the house was with any of the intents, specified in s 442, IPC, there cannot be any offence under s 456, IPC .[28]3789

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you committed lurking house-trespass by night (or house-breaking by night) by entering into the house (or unlawfully remaining in the house) in the possession of AB, and used as a human dwelling, after sunset and before sunrise, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 456 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct you be tried by this court on the said charge.

To sustain a conviction under this section, it is not necessary to specify the criminal intention in the charge as it should be in a charge under s 457, IPC ; it is sufficient if a guilty intention, as is contemplated in s 441, IPC, is proved.[29] Similarly, a conviction under s 456, IPC would not be bad for want of specification of the intention in the charge.[30]

5. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed lurking house-trespass (s 443) or house-breaking (s 445, IPC); and
(b) it was committed after sunset and before sunrise.

To sustain a charge under s 456, IPC, the court must come to a definite finding as to what was the particular intention, with which the entry effected, and if the intention was to annoy the inmates, such a finding should be clearly mentioned in the judgment, and if, on the other hand, the intention was to commit some other offence, such as adultery or unnatural offence with the inmates of the house, a finding to that effect must be recorded, based on evidence, and a vague statement, that the accused must have intended to annoy or insult the inmate, would not suffice.[31]

Mere presence of the accused in the house of the complainant would not constitute offence under s 456, IPC In the instant case the accused at an odd time was found present in the house of the complainant. There was lack of evidence showing that the accused went to the house of the accused with an ulterior motive and intention. The accused was acquitted of the charge under s 456, IPC .[32]

Though the prosecution must prove the existence of one or more of the intentions mentioned in s 441, the proof need not be direct. It will be enough if it is proved, like3790 any other fact (and the existence of intention is a fact), by the evidence of conduct and of surrounding circumstances.[33] In Mulla v Emperor ,[34] the accused who was a complete stranger, was found inside the complainant's house at 2 am having entered the house by a door which the complainant had taken care to secure at night. The accused alleged that he went with the intention of pursuing an intimacy with a widow. He was held guilty under this section. In Ishri v Emperor ,[35] the accused was found inside the house of the complainant at midnight and his presence was discovered by the wife of the complainant crying out that a thief was taking away her hansuli. The accused was not there with the consent, or at the invitation, or for the pleasure, of the complainant. It was held that the accused was properly convicted under this section, it being for him to show that his intention was, under the circumstances, innocent.

6. Legality of Conviction under Section 456 when charge is under Section 457

On the question whether, in cases in which the charge against the accused is under s 457, the conviction of the accused can be made under s 456 by reason of the offence being a minor offence, there is a difference of opinion. In an early Calcutta case, Jharu Sheikh v Emperor ,[36] it was held that a charge, under s 456, of entering the house with an object, not specified, but which is presumed to be criminal, cannot be sustained when the person is being tried for the specific charge, under s 457, IPC, of theft in a dwelling house and house-breaking with intent to commit theft. He would be seriously prejudiced by not knowing what really is the charge against him. This view was followed, in Calcutta, in later cases. It was held that when a charge has been definitely framed under s 457, in which theft is alleged, the accused cannot be convicted, under s 456, IPC, of house-trespass with some other object without an amendment of the original charge, unless the court is satisfied that he was not, in any way, been prejudiced in his defence by the omission to amend the charge.[37] Where the magistrate found that the charge of theft, or the charge of house-breaking with a view to commit theft, broke down and it appeared that there was another object, it was held that he was duty-bound to give the accused notice by drawing up a charge, clearly stating what it was, that he was accused of doing.[38] In Patna and Sind also, the above view was followed and it was held that it is illegal for a Court of Appeal to alter a conviction under s 457 to one under s 456 .[39]

On the other hand, in a Calcutta case, Karali Prasad Guru v Emperor [40] it was held that although the specific intent, mentioned in the charge, namely, the intent to commit theft, may not be established, yet it is competent to the court to convict the accused under s 456 in conformity with s 238 of CrPC 1898 (corresponding to new s 222 o) of 1973 CrPC, and the only consideration is whether the accused had been prejudiced at the trial by the conviction for a minor offences. In dealing with the case3791*Jharu Sheikh v Emperor* ,[41] it was pointed out that it must be limited to its special circumstances. In Narayanan v State of Kerala [42] also the same view was taken. It was held that if the circumstances of a particular case warrant the inference that the entry was with intent to commit any offence within the meaning of s 441, IPC, conviction under s 456, IPC will be proper even if the charge may be under s 457 . To the same effect is the view taken in Punjab[43] and Allahabad.[44] In cases in Patna also, the contention, that when the charge indicates that the trespass was committed with the intention of committing theft, the accused should not be convicted for having committed trespass with the object of committing an offence, was rejected.[45] In Orissa, it was held that an offence under s 456 could be a minor offence if the intention, with which the entry was effected, as specified in the charge under s 457, and the intention, with which the entry was effected, as found, by the trying magistrate, for convicting an accused under s 456, have something in common. However, where the said two intentions differ fundamentally, it is always a question whether prejudice has been caused by convicting the accused of an offence involving an intention different from that specified in the original charge.[46] It is submitted that the latter view seems to be correct. If it is not, therefore, established that the accused trespassed into a house at night with the sole intention to commit a theft, he cannot be held guilty of the major offence under s 457, IPC . However, if it can be fairly presumed that the entry was made with intent to commit some other offence, he would be guilty of the minor offence under this section.[47]

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 457.

Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by night in order to commit offence punishable with imprisonment.--

Whoever commits lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if the offence intended to be committed is theft, the term of the imprisonment may be extended to fourteen years.

STATE AMENDMENTS

Tamil Nadu--Section 457 of the Act, shall be renumbered as sub-section (1) of that section and after sub-section (1) as so renumbered, the following sub-section shall be added, namely--

"(2) Whoever commits lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night in any building used as a place of worship, in order to the committing of the offence of theft of any idol or icon from such building, shall, notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), be punished with rigorous imprisonment3792 which shall not be less than three years but which may extend to fourteen years and with fine which shall not be less than five thousand rupees:

Provided that the court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment for a term of less than three years." [Vide TN Act No 28 of 1993, s 5 (wef 13-7-1993)].

Uttar Pradesh--Section 457 of the principal Act shall be renumbered as sub-section (1), of that section and after sub-section (1) as so renumbered, the following sub-section shall be added, namely--

"(2) whoever commits lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night in any building used as a place of worship in order to the committing of the offence of theft of any idol or icon from such building, shall, notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), be punished with rigorous imprisonment which shall not be less than three years but which may extend to fourteen years and with fine which shall not be less than five thousand rupees:

Provided that the court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment for a term of less than three years." [Vide Uttar Pradesh Act No 24 of 1995, s 11].

COMMENTS

1. Scope

This section prescribes punishment for yet another aggravated offence of lurking house-trespass or house-breaking. The section corresponds to s 454, IPC which deals with the same offence when committed by day, while this section deals with it if committed by night. The offence under this section is graver than that under s 456, IPC also as that section makes the offence punishable ordinarily while an offence would fall under this section only if the offence, for committing which the lurking house-trespass or house-breaking was committed, is punishable with imprisonment or is an offence of theft itself. House-breaking by night with the purpose of abducting a woman, being an offence punishable with imprisonment, will be covered by this section.[48]

2. Ingredients

Following are the ingredients for the offence under s 457, IPC :3793

(a) there was lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night; and
(b) the house-trespass or house-breaking was in order to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment.[49]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

4. Quashing of Complaint

The complainant was earlier booked by the forest officers under the Forest Act and stated to have no complaint against the forest officers in the said case. Five days after the registration of the case under the Forest Act, the complainant (accused) filed a complaint against the forest officers alleging offences under ss 447, 457, 323 read with s 34, IPC . The facts showed that the complaint was lodged as a counter measure and was vague also, so the same was found liable to be quashed.[50]

5. Joint Trial

Offences under ss 380 and 457, IPC, committed at different times, are not offences of the same kind and they cannot, therefore, be charged together and tried at one trial.[51] However, a person, accused of an offence under s 457, can be legally charged and tried with persons accused of receiving or retaining stolen property under s 411 .[52]

6. Principle of Joint Criminal Liability not Applicable to this Section

Offence under this section is not of such a nature to which the principle of joint criminal responsibility, embodied in s 34, IPC, is applicable.[53]

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you committed lurking house-trespass by night (or house-breaking by night) by entering into the house belonging to AB, and used as a human dwelling (or used for the custody of property), after sunset and before sunrise, in order to commit the offence of...(mention it), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 457 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Failure of the prosecution to prima facie show that the disputed room and the furnitures and fixtures contained therein were in possession of the de facto complainant prior to the incident, showed that the major ingredient of the offence3794 remained unfilled, so the order of the trial court framing charge under ss 457 and 380 against the accused person was found illegal.[54]

8. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed either lurking house-trespass (s 443, IPC) by night (s 444, IPC) or house-breaking (s 445) by night (s 446, IPC); and
(b) he did so in order to commit an offence of theft or any other offence punishable with imprisonment.

Where, however, the discovery of the stolen articles, at the instance of the accused, not only proved that he knew where the incriminating articles were, but also materially supported the story given by the approver, it was held that the conviction of the accused both under s 457, and s 380, IPC, was justified.[55] Where the door of a shop was found broken open, it was held that the conviction should be for house-breaking by night, and not simply for lurking house-trespass by night.[56] Where the accused, with a view to support a fraudulent claim of title to a house, broke into it during the temporary absence of the owner, assaulted the owner's servant, who was in charge of the house, and took forcible possession of it, it was held that he was rightly convicted of the offence of house-breaking under s 457 .[57] Reliance placed on the statement of hostile witness in a case under this section, read with s 380, was not found unjustified when the testimony of those witnesses generally supported the prosecution case.[58]

9. Concealing Presence by Accused is a Must

A mere unnoticed entry in the house, though sufficient to raise a suspicion that such entry would have been by sealing or climbing over, the wall cannot be one with having taken precautions to conceal the house-trespass from occupants of the house.[59]

In order to constitute lurking house-trespass the offender must take some active means to conceal his presence. In order to constitute lurking house-trespass, the offender must take some active means to conceal his presence. Where the accused made no attempt to conceal himself, offence punishable under s 457 is not committed.[60]

10. Acquittal

Where the criminal intention is an ingredient of an offence, it is on the prosecution to prove that intention just as much as any other ingredient. The entry of one person into the house of another will not be presumed criminal at all, unless there are3795 circumstances from which an inference of criminality can be drawn.[61] The mere fact that the accused was with the party of burglars in the village, is no proof that he was one of the burglars.[62] The accused persons were alleged to have committed lurking house-trespass with intention to commit theft. The prosecution failed to prove that articles recovered from accused persons were stolen articles. The conviction of accused persons were found nor proper.[63] From the mere possession of stolen goods, a presumption of an offence of lurking house-trespass by night, or of house-breaking by night, as is contemplated in this section, cannot be drawn though a person, found in possession of stolen goods soon after the theft, may be presumed to be either a thief or a receiver of the stolen goods, unless he can account for his possession.[64]

The prosecution case was that the complainant was running a medical shop on a rental basis. The owner of the shop was alleged to have broken open the lock of the shop and had given its possession to other accused persons for running the beetal shop. However, the evidence on record showed that the accused persons were in possession of the said shop since 1983 and the medicine shop was closed in the year 1982. The accused was found to be entitled to the benefit of the doubt.[65] It is difficult to believe that the accused entered the room at midnight only to commit an offence under s 323, IPC, so the conviction of the accused under ss 323 and 457, IPC, was set aside.[66] When there was no direct or circumstantial evidence to show that the accused was found in a nearby place where the alleged incident took place, the acquittal of the accused was found proper.[67]

11. Conviction

The conviction should be based on evidence which is reliable and believable.[68] When the movements of the accused near the scene of crime at or about the time of occurrence are not spoken to by any witness, there can be no particle of evidence in support of the conviction.[69] In Ghasita v Emperor ,[70] the accused made his way into an open thronged enclosure in which goats and sheep were kept. The owner was disturbed before the accused was able to carry out his object and he fled. It was held that the only offence, of which he could be convicted, was one of attempted theft under ss 379 / 511, IPC, and not under s 457 . Unless there is evidence to show that the accused has committed a house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, he cannot be convicted under s 457 .[71] If there is no evidence to connect the accused with the preparation of the offence of house-breaking and theft, except the recovery of stolen property, he cannot be convicted under ss 457 and 389, IPC .[72] If an accused is charged for entering into a house with the intention of committing theft and such3796 intention is not proved, the court cannot convict him of the offence of having made the entry with some other object such as causing annoyance to the inmates even if the accused knew that his presence may cause annoyance.[73] If, a cattle-shed, which was broken open, was used for custody of agricultural implements, the conviction under s 457, IPC, would not be illegal.[74]

Three accused persons entered the house of the victim forcibly, lifted her, carried her to the shop of one accused, committed rape on her; the testimony of the prosecutrix was found reliable and the accused were convicted under ss 366 / 457, 376 / 34, IPC .[75]

12. Double Conviction

This section makes punishable lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment, and if the offence, intended to be committed, is theft, the punishment is higher while s 380 makes punishable a theft committed in a dwelling-house. The two offences do not fall under s 71, IPC, and, therefore, the conviction under both the sections is not illegal.[76] In Emperor v Ajudhia ,[77] it was held that it was better to concentrate on the gravest offence and accordingly the court convicted the accused under s 457, but acquitted him under s 380 . In Emperor v Zor Singh ,[78] the court, explaining its previous view, observed that it did not rule that a conviction and sentence under each of the ss 380 and 457 for offences, arising out the same transaction, was absolutely illegal; it did so only in the interest of simplicity and convenience. In an Oudh case, Sital v Emperor ,[79] it was held that there is no connection between ss 457 and 380 and, an offence of theft being no part of an offence under s 457, separate conviction under both the sections is proper. In a Patna case, Idris v Emperor ,[80] it was held that there was nothing to prevent the court from passing separate sentences under ss 457 and 380 . Similarly, in a Madras case, Re Natesa Mudaliar,[81] it was held that there was no prohibition of separate sentences being passed under ss 380 and 457 . In an Assam case, Birendra Chandra De v State ,[82] also, a conviction both under ss 457 and 380 was upheld.

An offence under s 457, IPC, as also an offence under s 380, IPC, will be said to have been committed where the thief commits the theft by breaking open the house during night if breaking open the house is inevitable for committing the theft.[83]

13. Legality of Conviction under Section 456 when charge is under Section 457

Commentary under the same heading in s 456, ante, may be referred to.3797

14. Probation

An accused was convicted under ss 457 and 354, IPC . Taking into consideration the gravity of the offence and also the fact of brutal commission of such offence it was not considered expedient to give them the benefit of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958 (20 of 1958).[84] Burglary is a serious offence. Whenever it is detected, the person concerned must be given a deterrent punishment. It is not proper to release the burglar on probation of good conduct.[85]

15. Sentence (Deterrent)

Where the rigorous imprisonment for a period of two years is the sentence imposed and the set off for the period undergone was also granted, the sentence imposed was held absolutely justified.[86] Where a policeman was convicted of a serious offence of burglary, it was held that sentence of five years rigorous imprisonment was not excessive.[87] The accused was found guilty under ss 376 and 323, IPC, and also under s 450, IPC, by the trial court. The High Court in appeal maintained the conviction and sentence of the accused under ss 376 and 323, IPC, but altered his conviction from one under s 458 to one under s 457, IPC, and sentenced him under s 457, IPC, to undergo five years rigorous imprisonment and to pay a fine of Rs 1000 and in default of it to undergo one month's imprisonment.[88] Where the accused took an active part in abducting and torturing the complainant and also demanded ransom like his confederates and was convicted under ss 365 and 457, IPC, the sentence of three years rigorous imprisonment awarded to the accused under s 457 was not reduced for want of any just ground.[89]

16 Sentence (Lenient)

Where, the accused was not successful in committing theft of any article, a substantive sentence of rigorous imprisonment for nine months was held to be too severe, and was reduced to three months.[90] The occurrence took place 15-16 years ago and the accused faced the ordeal of a very long trial, so the sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment awarded under s 457, IPC, was reduced to rigorous imprisonment for three months.[91] When retrial is ordered with regard to the plea of guilty, a sentence higher than the one, passed at the original trial cannot be passed. Higher sentence, in a retrial, can be passed only when retrial is ordered on any other ground.[92]

17. Alteration of Conviction from Section 458 to one under Section 457

Commentary under the same heading in s 458, post, may be referred to.3798

18. Alteration of Conviction from Section 457 to one under Section 380

If an accused, charged under s 457, IPC, is not found guilty of lurking house-trespass, he may not be convicted under s 457, IPC, but his conviction can be altered into one under s 380, IPC .[93]

19. Alteration of Conviction from Section 457 to one under Section 456

Where the accused in the dead of night was found concealing himself in another man's house where some amount was kept, he cannot be convicted under s 457, IPC, unless it is shown that the amount was kept there to the knowledge of the accused. However, on the failure of the accused to justify his presence there, the presumption could be drawn that he made the entry with intent to commit some offence to make him liable to be convicted under s 456, IPC . Therefore, under the circumstances, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 457, IPC, to one under s 456, IPC .[94]

20. Alteration of Conviction from Section 459 to one under Section 457

When the accused entered into the complainant's house after breaking window of house, he was apprehended when a neighbour came to the spot by over-powering him, while trying to escape from the clutches of complainant, the accused caused simple injuries with scissors, but there was no evidence on record that the accused caused grievous hurt to the complainant while committing lurking house trespass, so he was liable to be convicted under s 457, and not under s 459 .[95]

Lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by night after preparation for hurt, assault, or wrongful restraint.--

Whoever commits lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, having made preparation for causing hurt to any person, or for assaulting any person, or for wrongfully restraining any person, or for putting any person in fear of hurt, or of assault, or of wrongful restraint, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to fourteen years, and shall also be liable to fine

COMMENTS

1. Scope

This section applies to an aggravated form of the offences under ss 452 and 455, IPC . Section 452 deals with cases of simple trespass after preparation for causing hurt, or assault, or wrongful restraint, to any person or putting any person in such fear. Section 455 deals with a similar case of lurking house-trespass, or house-breaking,3799 by day, while this section deals with the same offences when committed by night.[1] This section applies only to the house-breaker who has himself actually made preparation for causing hurt, or assault, or wrongful restraint, to any person, and not to his companions who have not themselves made such preparation.[2] Where the accused dug a hole in the wall of the complainant's dwelling-house, during the night, in order to make their entry to commit a theft in the house, but the accused were interrupted before they could complete it, it was held that the accused's acts did, in law, amount to an attempt, and not a mere preparation.[3]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

3. Joint Trial

Where one of the accused was charged under s 458 and the other under s 411, IPC and the magistrate found that s 458 was not applicable to the former, it was held that he should have tried the two accused separately.[4]

4. Charge

Same as in the case of an offence under s 455, IPC, with the only changes that words 'by night' would be added after the words 'lurking house-trespass', or 'house-breaking', as the case may be, and ' s 458, IPC ' would be substituted for ' s 455, IPC '.

Section 458, IPC is not a cognate offence for the offence prescribed under s 398, IPC . Conviction of the appellant accused under s 458, IPC, where charge was framed under s 398, IPC, without framing charge under s 458, IPC was not justified; the conviction was therefore, set aside.[5]

5. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed lurking house-trespass by night (s 444, IPC) or house-breaking by night (s 446, IPC); and
(b) he did so after having made preparation for:

(i) causing hurt to any person, or
(ii) assaulting any person, or
(iii) wrongfully restraining any person, or
(iv) putting any person in fear of hurt, or assault or wrongful restraint.

6. Acquittal

The accused were charged under s 458 alongwith major charges under ss 366, 323, 342 and 376, IPC . The trial court convicted the accused under s 458, but acquitted3800 them of all other charges. When the major charges against the accused are not proved, it cannot be said that accused entered the house after making preparation for causing injuries or for wrongfully restraining the prosecutrix. Thus, the Appellate Court acquitted the accused persons of the charge under s 458, IPC, also.[6]

7. Conviction

Where the accused, whose house was about two miles away from the place of the complainant, entered the complainant's house at night by jumping a wall, or removing the door chain, and was caught armed with a firearm, it was held that the accused had no purpose except to commit theft and that he was guilty under s 458 .[7]

8. Alteration of Conviction from Section 458 to one under Section 457

Where there is no evidence on record that the accused had committed lurking house-trespass having made preparation to assault, the conviction of the accused is liable to be altered from s 458, IPC, to one under s 457, IPC .

9. Compensation

Once the Court has imposed fine as part of the sentence for offence under s 458, IPC, the Court by applying the provisions of s 357(3), CrPC cannot direct the accused convict to pay further compensation to the victim.[8]

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 459.

Grievous hurt caused whilst committing lurking house-trespass or house-breaking.--

Whoever, whilst committing lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, causes grievous hurt to any person or attempts to cause death or grievous hurt to any person, shall be punished with [9][imprisonment for life], or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

This section provides for a further aggravated form of the offence for which provision has been made in ss 455 and 458, IPC for committing lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by day and by night respectively. There, the offence results from making preparation for causing hurt, etc. For an offence under this section, whether committed by day or by night, the accused must cause, or attempt to cause, grievous hurt, or must attempt to cause death, to any person. This section does not require the making of preparation for committing the offence as required under ss3801 455 and 458. This and the following sections prescribe the highest term of imprisonment in cases of house-trespass and house-breaking.

This section is not applicable where a grievous hurt is caused after the offence has been committed.[10]The offence is complete when the act of entering into the house is complete. A person, who has completed a forcible entry into a house, should not be deemed, by reason of violence, subsequently used, to have used violence while house-breaking, and, therefore, the offence under s 459 would not be committed.[11] The causing of the grievous hurt, or the attempt to cause death or grievous hurt, must be done in the course of the commission of the offence of lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, and at the time when such lurking house-trespass, or house-breaking, is being committed. The section will not be applicable where the act of the accused is no more than an attempt. Thus, where the accused, while engaged in making a hole in the wall of the house of the complainant, immediately, upon being disturbed by the chaukidar, attempted to make their escape, one of the accused firing off a pistol and the other two attempting to prevent their apprehension by using their lathis, it was held that the accused were not guilty under ss 459 / 511 or ss 460 / 511, but only under ss 452 / 511, IPC .[12] Where the accused had committed criminal trespass in a house and caused grievous hurt while struggling with the complainant in the courtyard of his house and it was not clear from the evidence whether the courtyard was a part of the house, in which there was criminal trespass, it was held that the accused could be convicted only under s 457, and not under s 459 .[13]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of session judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you, while committing lurking house-trespass/house-breaking, caused grievous hurt to AB (or attempting to cause death or grievous hurt to AB) and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 459 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

4. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused committed lurking house-trespass or house-breaking;
(b) he caused grievous hurt, or attempted to cause death or grievous hurt to some person; and3802
(c) he did so whilst engaged in committing lurking house-trespass or house-breaking.

The murder was committed on a chowk which was not exclusively owned and possessed by the complainant party and the accused also had right of way through it. The trial court did not frame any charge under s 460, IPC . The accused cannot be convicted either under s 460 or s 459, IPC, under these circumstances.[14]

5. Sentence

Where the accused was in jail since about 4 years, the sentence of imprisonment was reduced from 10 years' rigorous imprisonment to five years' and the fine imposed upon the accused was also reduced from Rs 5000 to Rs 3000.[15]

6. Alteration of Conviction from Section 459 to one under Section 457

Commentary under the same heading in s 457, ante, may be referred to.

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 460.

All persons jointly concerned in lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by night punishable where death or grievous hurt caused by one of them.--

If, at the time of the committing of lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night, any person guilty of such offence shall voluntarily cause or attempt to cause death or grievous hurt to any person, every person jointly concerned in committing such lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night, shall be punished with [16][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

COMMENTS

1. Scope and Applicability

This section does not provide for an offence; it merely lays down a principle of constructive liability.[17] It prescribes enhanced penalty for the joint offenders who commit, or who are concerned in, house breaking by night, or lurking house-trespass by night, in the course of which death or grievous hurt is caused or is attempted to be caused. To attract this section, it matters a little as to who actually causes the death or3803 the grievous hurt.[18] It does not exclude, from such enhanced penalty, the person who caused or attempted to cause, death or grievous hurt. The words 'every person, jointly concerned in committing such lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, shall be punished' establish beyond doubt, that all persons, who commit house-breaking by night, or lurking house-trespass by night, whatever other offences they might have also committed, would be liable to be punished under this section.[19] This section can be invoked only if, from the evidence, it is clearly possible to conclude that, before the commission of the lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, the offenders did not have the common intention to commit any other offence and one of them, during the course of commission of the offence, caused death of, or grievous hurt to, any person.[20]

Under s 460, IPC, constructive liability is imposed on persons jointly concerned in committing house trespass at night, in the course of which death or grievous hurt is caused. The section applies to persons who actually committed house trespass at night and the act of causing death or grievous hurt by any one of the intruders would make others, who did not cause the injury, equally liable.[21]

Where an accused commits lurking house trespass or housebreaking by night and also commits murder, he would be convicted under s 302, IPC even if he is not convicted under s 460, IPC .[22]

2. Essential Ingredients

To constitute an offence under this section, two things are necessary, namely, the person charged should have been committing lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night along with some other person, and while the person charged was so committing lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, he, or some other person, committing such offence along with him, voluntarily caused or attempted to cause death of, or grievous hurt to, some person.[23]

3. Time Duration of Offence

The offence, to which this section applies, must be limited to the time during which the criminal trespass continues; it cannot be extended so as to include any offence, committed prior, or subsequent, to the commission of house-breaking by night, or lurking house-trespass by night.[24] Where the accused committed house-breaking by night and, on alarm being raised, they left the house and stabbed a person who was trying to seize them in the courtyard, it was held that as the stabbing was done after the house-breaking was complete, s 460 did not apply and the accused were guilty of the offences under ss 456, 458 and 326, IPC,[25] and not under s 460 .3804

4. The Section does not apply to Single Individual

The section will not apply to the case of a single individual who alone commits lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, and during such commission, causes, or attempts to cause, death of, or grievous hurt to, any person.[26]

5. Section does not apply to a Person not Committing Lurking House-trespass or House-breaking

On the analysis of s 460, IPC, it can be said that this section applies to those persons who have actually committed lurking house trespass at night and not to those who may have accompanied their associates, but did not commit the offence. Indeed, it applies to actual doers, and not the others.[27] The section applies to those persons who have actually committed lurking house-trespass at night, or house-breaking at night, and not to those persons who may have accompanied their associates only, but did not commit the offence.[28]

6. Common Intention not Necessary

If all, or any of, the persons, committing lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, in which death has been caused, are charged under s 302, or s 304, the necessary intention, requisite under the said sections, must be proved against them. To establish an offence under s 460, it may not be necessary for the prosecution to establish common intention or object. Suffice it will be establish that the accused jointly and committed the offences stated in s 460, IPC .[29] In Muhammad v Emperor ,[30] several accused, armed with dangs and chhavis, stealthily entered a house at night with the preliminary intention of forcibly taking away a woman. While in the house, some of them caused death and grievous hurt and then they went away after scaling the wall of the courtyard of the house. It was held that the common intention to commit an offence under s 302, or s 304, IPC, could not possibly be imputed to them, and they were guilty only under s 460, IPC .

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of session judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:3805
> That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you were jointly concerned with other persons in committing lurking house-trespass by night (or house-breaking by night) by entering into the house in the possession of AB, and used as a human dwelling, and that, at the time of doing so, any of the persons, so jointly concerned, voluntarily caused death of (or attempted to cause death of, or grievous hurt to), the said AB, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 460 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

When a charge under s 460, IPC, is not framed by the trial court against the accused, he cannot be convicted under s 460, IPC .[31]

9. Proof

Before holding a person to be guilty of offence under s 460, IPC, the prosecution must prove that:

(i) that the accused committed lurking house trespass by night; or house breaking by night;
(ii) that he caused, or attempted to cause, death or grievous hurt;
(iii) that he did above whilst engaged in committing lurking house trespass by night or house breaking by night;[32]
(iv) that two or more persons were jointly concerned in committing the said offence.

The accused were alleged to have entered into the house of the deceased during the night, and assaulted the deceased and hung him with a rope and caused the death of his daughter. The confessional statement made by one accused was found reliable. The motive of the crime was that the deceased had sought temporary injunction restraining the accused from opening the gate, window and drainage towards the disputed land of the deceased. The accused were held guilty of offences punishable under ss 460 and 302 read with s 34, IPC .[33]

The offence committed was lurking house-trespass and murder. Offence was committed between 1 a.m.

to 4 a.m. Sole eye-witness of the occurrence disclosed the name of the accused after three days, he was not able to see after evening, his testimony was found not reliable; conviction of the accused for offence under ss 302 and 460, IPC recorded by the Court below was not proper, and was set aside.[34]

10. Conviction

Section 460, IPC not being an exception to s 302, IPC, if a person, committing house-breaking by night, also actually commits murder, he must attract the penalty for the latter offence under s 302 . He cannot escape the punishment provided for murder merely because the murder was committed by him while he was committing the offence of house-breaking.[35] It was never intended that a person, who commits murder, whilst committing a burglary, should be punished merely for burglary, and3806 not for murder.[36] If, on the other evidence the court is satisfied that the accused is guilty of murder, then s 460, IPC, is out of place.[37]

11. Double Conviction

A person cannot be convicted of offences both under ss 460, and 304/34, IPC, as the charge under s 460, IPC .[38]

12. Sentence

The accused entered the house of the deceased during night time where he assaulted the deceased and hung him with a rope and also caused the death of his daughter. On being convicted under ss 460 and 302 read with s 34, IPC, they were sentenced for each offence with a sentence of life imprisonment and fine of Rs 10,000 each. In default of payment of fine, they were to further undergo rigorous imprisonment for one year.[39] The accused persons convicted under ss 460 and 382, IPC were already in jail for six months. They had gone through a lot of mental and financial strain during the prolonged proceeding lasting eleven years. The sentence of three years rigorous imprisonment awarded to them by the trial court was reduced to the period already undergone by them in jail and they were also sentenced to pay fine of Rs 1000 each and in default to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months.[40] The accused was sixteen and a half years old at the time of commission of the offence. He became a victim of bad company and was also in jail for three and a half years. Therefore, the substantive sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment awarded to the accused was reduced to the period already undergone by him.[41]

13. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 460

If the evidence against the accused is not sufficient to justify a conviction for murder and if the actual offender cannot be ascertained, the conviction may be made under this section.[42]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 461.

Dishonestly breaking open receptacle containing property.--

Whoever dishonestly or with intent to commit mischief, breaks open or unfastens any closed receptacle which contains or which he believes to contain property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.3807

COMMENTS

1. Scope

This section deals with the opening of any fastened receptacle either dishonestly (such as for committing theft) or merely for committing mischief. This would be an offence by the mere fact of opening a fastened receptacle independently of the offence of theft or mischief which may be committed after the opening.

2. 'Dishonestly'

Commentary under s 24, vol 1, may be referred to.

3. 'Mischief'

Commentary under s 425, ante, may be referred to.

4. 'Breaks open or Unfastens'

The words 'breaks open or unfastens' would indicate that although there may be no lock, there must be some other manner in which the receptacle must be so closed by some device like a chain or bolt which has to be unfastened or break open. There would be offence if it is done dishonestly or with the intent to commit mischief. Where the accused, who was an inmate of his uncle's house, broke open the chest and picked out property from it, it was held that he was guilty under this section and s 379, and not under s 457 .[43]

5. 'Receptacle'

The term 'receptacle' indicates that which receives or holds anything for rest or deposits; a storing place, depository, a container, any space, open or close, that serves for reception and keeping.[44] However, the meaning of the word 'receptacle' cannot be extended to shops.[45] It would, however, include a safe or box, chest, etc., and may also include a room.[46]

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

Under the old Code of Criminal Procedure, the offences under this and the next sections were bailable offences. Under the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, the offence under the next section, i.e., s 462, IPC, is bailable as it was previously. However, the offence under this section is non-bailable. It does not seem to be correct that the aggravated form of an offence under s 462, IPC, is made bailable while a simple offence under s 462, IPC, which is triable as a summons case, is made non-bailable. It is submitted that the legislature should remove this defect in the First Schedule of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, as soon as possible.3808

7. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC 1973 may be referred to.

8. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) there was a closed receptacle;
(b) it contained property or the accused believed that it contained property;
(c) the accused broke it open or unfastened it; and
(d) he did so dishonestly or with intent to commit mischief.

Of Offences Against Property

OF CRIMINAL TRESPASS

S. 462.

Punishment for same offence when committed by person entrusted with custody.--

Whoever, being entrusted with any closed receptacle which contains or which he believes to contain property, without having authority to open the same, dishonestly, or with intent to commit mischief, breaks open or unfastens that receptacle, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

COMMENTS

1. Scope

The proceeding section and this section deal with the same offence, namely, the opening, or unfastening, of any closed receptacle. This section is only a more aggravated form of the offence. It involves an element of trust, and a person, to whom the receptacle is entrusted, is punished more severely if he opens it without authority, and with a dishonest or mischievous intention.

An offence under s 462, IPC is an aggravated form of the offence made punishable under s 461, IPC . If somebody dishonestly or with intent to commit mischief breaks open or unfastens any closed receptacle which contains or which believes to contain property can be punished under s 461, IPC, and if he was entrusted with the custody of the said receptacle, he can be punished under s 462, IPC .[47]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate.

3. Quashing of Proceedings

The accused while applying for a succession certificate was alleged to have intentionally excluded the complainant from being impleaded as a legal heir. The3809 dispute raised was purely of a civil nature, so the filing of the criminal case was found to be an abuse of the process of law, therefore, the complaint filed under ss 427, 462 and 467, IPC, was quashed.[48]

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you being entrusted with a closed receptacle, to wit... (describe it), by AB, which contained (or which you believed to contain) property, to wit ...(mention it), dishonestly (i) broke open (or unfastened) the said receptacle, without having authority to open the same, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 462 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, besides proving the facts mentioned for an offence under s 461, IPC, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) he accused was entrusted with the receptacle in dispute; and
(b) he opened or unfastened the receptacle without having authority to open the same.3810

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [1][* * *] Property Marks

TOPICAL INTRODUCTION

This chapter, headed as 'Of Offences Relating to Documents and to Property Marks', contains thirty-one sections divided into three groups. The first group of ss 463 to 477A relates substantially to forgery. The second group of ss 479 to 489 deals with offences in respect of property and other marks. The third group of ss 489A to 489E sets out offences pertaining to currency-notes and bank-notes.The penalty for the offences in the first group, namely ss 463 to 477A, varies according to the gravity of the offence. Thus, forgery of the record of a court of justice, or of a public register of the kind, specified in s 466, ranks with forgery for the purpose of cheating, provided for in s 468, because both the offences are punishable with imprisonment which may extend to seven years. However, under s 463, forgery for the purpose of harming reputation is regarded as a less serious offences entailing the punishment of imprisonment for three years while, under s 465, forgery of valuable security, will, etc., is deemed to be a grave offence meriting the punishment of imprisonment which is also the punishment for the offence of fraudulent cancellation, etc., of will, authority to adopt, or valuable securityunder s 477 .By s 91 read with the First Schedule of the Information Technology Act 2000 (21 of 2000), the legislature has inserted the words 'electronic record' in ss 463, 464, 466, 468 to 471, 474, 476, 477A, etc., to make these offences applicable to forged electronic record in addition to the forged documents. However, there seems to be no recorded case as yet decided by any High Court or Supreme Court, so the effect of these amendments is yet to come by way of authoritative judgments of the High Court.[2]

Forgery.--[3][

Whoever makes any false documents or false electronic record or part of a document or electronic record, with intent to cause damage or injury], to the public or to any person, or to support any claim or title, or to cause any person to part with property, or to enter into any express or implied3811 contract, or with intent to commit fraud or that fraud may be committed, commits forgery.

Comments

1. Scope

The term 'forgery' as used in the statute is used in its ordinary and popular acceptation.[4] Forgery is the making of a false document or false electronic record in order that it may be used as genuine. Blackstone defines it as the fraudulent making or alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another man's right.[5] At Common Law, the making of a written instrument, which purports to be that which it is not, in order to defraud is forgery.[6]For purpose of the (English) Forgery Act 1913, forgery is the making of a false document in order that it may be used as genuine, and in the case of seals and dies, mentioned in the Act, the counterfeiting of a seal or die.[7] This definition is substantially the same as in our IPC . The forgery of a certified copy falls within the terms of this section.[8]

An accused can be punished for committing forgery only if he falls within the meaning of 'whoever makes'. The prosecution has, therefore, to establish that only the particular person, charged with having committed forgery, has committed the forgery.[9] The original document should be placed before the court to establish the offence of forgery. A photostat copy which has came into being as a result of improvement in scientific photographs of the document is not sufficient for this purpose.[10]3812

2. Law of Canada

It is an offence to commit forgery by making a false document, knowing it to be false, with intent:

- that it should in any way be used or acted on as genuine, to the prejudice of any one whether within Canada or not,
- or that a person should be induced, by the belief that it is genuine, to do or to refrain from doing anything, whether within Canada or not.

Forgery is complete as soon as a document is made with such knowledge and intent notwithstanding that the person who makes it does not intend that any particular person should use or act on it as genuine or be induced, by the belief that it is genuine, to do or refrain from doing anything. Forgery is complete notwithstanding that the false document is incomplete or does not purport to be a document that is binding in law, if it is such as to indicate that it was intended to be acted on as genuine. Authorized signings, including those that do not expressly indicate the proxy signatory, do not constitute the offence of forgery. Such documents lack the falsity inherent in a forgery.

False Document

A 'document' refers to any paper, parchment or other material on which is recorded or marked anything that is capable of being read or understood by a person, computer system or other device, and includes a credit card, but does not include trade-marks on articles of commerce or inscriptions on stone or metal or other like material. A 'false document' means a document:

- the whole or a material part of which purports to be made by or on behalf of a person who did not make it or authorize it to be made, or who did not in fact exist,
- that is made by or on behalf of the person who purports to make it but is false in some material particular,
- that is made in the name of an existing person, by him or under his authority, with a fraudulent intention that it should pass as being made by a person, real or fictitious, other than the person who makes it or under whose authority it is made.

A document that merely contains a lie is not always a 'false document', and thus a forgery under ss 366 and 368 . However, a document that is false in reference to the very purpose for which it was created is one that is false in a material particular within s 321 and may be a forgery.

A 'false document' is a document that is false in some material particular, including the very purpose for which it was created. For an offence to lie, the document must be 'forged', not merely false. Documents, although false, are not 'forged' within the meaning of the offence, absent evidence of prejudice, or of intent to cause prejudice. The intent to cause prejudice requires an element of moral blameworthiness that goes beyond negligence or incompetence. A document that merely contains a lie is not always a 'false document'.

Making a false document includes:

- altering a genuine document in any material part;3813
- making a material addition to a genuine document or adding to it a false date, attestation, seal or other thing that is material; or
- making a material alteration in a genuine document by erasure, obliteration, removal or in any other way.

A person does not, however, commit forgery if he or she in good faith, makes a false document at the request of a police force, the Canadian Forces or a department or agency of the Federal Government or of a provincial government.

Uttering Forged Document

With regard to a document that a person knows or believes is forged, it is an offence to:

- use, deal with or act on it as if it were genuine;
- cause or attempt to cause any person to use, deal with or act on it as if it were genuine;
- transfer, sell or offer to sell it or make it available, to any person, knowing that or being reckless as to whether one of the preceding offences will be committed; or
- possess it with intent to commit an offence under any of the preceding offences.

The place where a document was forged is not material. A 'document' refers to any paper, parchment or other material on which is recorded or marked anything that is capable of being read or understood by a person, computer system or other device, and includes a credit card, but does not include trade-marks on articles of commerce or inscriptions on stone or metal or other like material. This offence requires only an intent to deceive, not an intent to defraud or cause prejudice. Simply because a document is false it does not constitute a forged document. Forged documents require proof of an intention to cause prejudice.

Example Situations

A valid cheque becomes a forged document when an unauthorized endorsement is placed upon it. An authorized proxy signature does not constitute a forgery even where it does not indicate on its face that the signatory is acting for another. Such authorized signings may be technically misleading but they lack the essential falsity which is inherent in a forgery.

Making Forgery Instruments

It is an offence to make, repair, buy, sell, export, import or possess any instrument, device, apparatus, material or thing that they know has been used or know is adapted or intended for use by any person to commit forgery.

Actions by Public Officer

A public officer will not be guilty of a forgery offence if he or she committed the relevant actions for the sole purpose of establishing or maintaining a cover identity in the course of employment.[11]3814

3. Law of Australia

In New South Wales, the offence of forgery is committed by a person who makes a false document with the intention that the person or another will use it:

(1) to induce some person to accept it as genuine; and
(2) because of its being accepted as genuine:
    (a) to obtain any property belonging to another,
    (b) to obtain any financial advantage or cause any financial disadvantage; or
    (c) to influence the exercise of a public duty.

Inducing a person to accept a false document as genuine includes a reference to causing a machine to respond to the document as if it were a genuine document. It is not necessary to prove that the accused intended so to induce a particular person to accept a false document as genuine. Using or possessing a false document, knowing that it is false, for the purposes listed above, is also an offence.

It is a further offence for a person to:

(1) make, or have in his or her possession, any equipment, material or other thing designed or adapted for the making of a false document:
    (a) knowing that it is so designed or adapted; and
    (b) with the intention that the person or another person will use the equipment, material or other thing to commit the offence of forgery;

(2) without reasonable excuse, make or have in his or her possession any equipment, material or other thing designed or adapted for the making of a false document, knowing that it is so designed or adapted; or
(3) possess any equipment, material or other thing that is capable of being used to make a false document, with the intention that the person or another person will use the equipment, material or other thing to commit the offence of forgery.

These further offences apply to equipment, material or another thing designed or adapted for the purpose of making a false document whether or not it is also designed or adapted for another purpose. They also apply to a person who intends to commit such an offence even if committing the offence concerned is impossible, or the offence is to be committed at a later time. However, it is not an offence to attempt to commit such an offence.

The essence of the crime of 'making a false document' contrary to s 83A(1) is not simply that the document is false in the sense that it contains material untruths about past facts; rather its essence is to be found in the fact that the document 'tells a lie about itself' in the sense that it purports to be something which it is not (that is, not 'an authentic document'). Thus the gravamen of the offence is to be found in sub s(6) which sets out the various ways in which a document can be 'made false' for the purposes of the offence which marks the offence out from related offences, such as false accounting (s 83) and 'obtaining financial advantage by deception' (s 82).[12]3815

4. Effect of Amendments made by the Information Technology Act 2000

Section 91 read with First Schedule of the Information Technology Act 2000 (21 of 2000) the amendments pertaining to electronic record have been incorporated in ss 463, 464, 466, 468 to 471, 474, 476, 477A IPC*etc*. These offences are triable by the courts of magistrates and the appeal against the judgment of the trial court lies before the sessions court, so the practical position is that it would take someone to push the cases pertaining to electronic record from the trial court viz. the sessions court to the High Court and Supreme Court to get authoritative law/judgments on these sections.

It is perceived that digital technology, electronic record and new communicating systems which though have taken their roots in cities of this country but their large scale exploitation is yet to take effect. With the spread of electronic governance, new communication system and digital technology, a revolution would occur in business transaction by increasing use of computers. This would obviously lead to offences pertaining to forgery of electronic record in some cases as is prevalent in documents which are tackled in existing law. The legislature, therefore, had to take precaution in the matter and make necessary amendments in the IPC with the help of s 91 read with Sch I of the Information Technology Act 2000. However, the law in regard to these amendments is yet to take off due to a dearth of cases pertaining to electronic record. However, in due course of time, results of these amendments would have a salutary effect and it is expected that the offences of forgery etc pertaining to electronic record would be interpreted similarly as offences pertaining to documents.

5. Essential Ingredients

In order to constitute forgery, the first essential is that the accused should have made a false document. The false document must be made with an intent to cause damage or injury to the public or to any class of public or to any community.[13] To constitute a offence under this section, the following elements of the offence are necessary, namely:

(a) the making of a false document or false electronic record or part of a document or electronic record; and
(b) such making should be with intent:
    (i) to cause damage or injury to the public or to any person, or
    (ii) to support any claim or title, or
    (iii) to cause any person to part with property, or
    (iv) to cause any person to enter into any express or implied contract, or
    (v) to commit fraud of that fraud may be committed.

From the above, it is clear that apart from making a false document or a part of a document, the accused should intend to cause damage or injury either to the public or to any person, etc.[14] Thus, the making of a part of a document with intent to commit fraud or that fraud may be committed it constitutes 'forgery'.[15] To constitute the offence of forgery under this section, it is not enough to prove that the person3816 charged with the offence knew that the document might be damaging or injurious to another; it must also be proved that such was his intention.[16]

The basic elements of forgery are: (1) the making of a false document or part of it and; (2) such making should be with such intention as is specified in the section viz: (a) to cause damage or injury to: (i) the public, or (ii) any person; or (b) to support any claim or title; or (c) to cause any person to part with property; or (d) to cause any person to enter into an express or implied contract; or (e) to commit fraud or that fraud may be committed.[17]

6. Three Questions

The definition of the offence of forgery declares the offence to be completed when a false document or false part of a document is made with specified intention. The questions are: (i) is the document false? (ii) is it made by the accused? and (iii) is it made with an intent to defraud. If at all the questions are answered in the affirmative, the accused is guilty.[18]

7. Two Different Classes of Intent

The section contemplates two quite different classes of intent. The words, in the section, relating to intent are every wide and of far-reaching import.[19] The fabrication of false document is criminal only when certain intentions can be attributed to the person who fabricates it. The question of intention is one of fact.[20]It is no forgery if the act is done under the honest belief that the party doing it had right to do it, although in point of that fact he had really no such authority.[21] Of two probable intentions, one more immediate and probable and the other remote and less probable, the court should not attribute to the accused the remoter intention.[22]

8. Definition in Section 463 is subject to Section 464

The definition in s 463 is itself subject to the definition in s 464, IPC in which the two essential elements are that the act should be done 'dishonestly or fraudulently'. In other words, whichever of the intents in s 463, IPC may be applicable, the act itself must be done dishonestly or fraudulently to sustain a conviction for forgery.[23] Where there is an intention to deceive and by means of the deceit to obtain an advantage, there is fraud; and if the document is fabricated with such intent, it is forgery.[24] Where, however, the accused abstracted a certain document from the3817 judicial record in order to substitute another in its place, and his intention was only to weaken a criminal case, brought against him, by discrediting the witnesses, produced by the complainant, it was held that he could not be convicted of forgery in respect of the document as he did not make it with any of the intents mentioned in s 463 . The offence committed by him would be one of fabricating false evidence.[25]

9. Distinction between Sections 463, 465 and 471 and Sections 193 and 196, IPC

It is true that some of the ingredients of the act of fabricating false evidence which is penalised under s 193, IPC and of making a false document and thereby committing forgery within the meaning of ss 463 and 464, IPC are common. A person by making a false entry in a book or record or by making any document containing a false statement may, if the prescribed conditions of s 463 are fulfilled, commit an offence of forgery. However, the important ingredient which constitutes fabrication of false evidence within the meaning of s 192, IPC beside causing a circumstance to exist or making a false document--to use a compendious expression--is the intention that the circumstance so caused to exist or the false document made may appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding, or before a public servant or before an arbitrator and lead to the forming of an erroneous opinion touching any point material to the result of the proceeding.[26]

10. Sections 463 , 464, 465, 471IPC and Section 146(p) of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act (23 of 1961)--Distinction

Commentary under the same heading in s 465, post, may be referred to.

11. Document

Section 29 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

12. Electronic Record

Section 29A, vol 1 may be referred to.

13. 'Makes any False Document or False Electronic Record or Part of a Document or Electronic Record'

Under this section, not only the maker of a forged document but also the maker of a part of such document is declared guilty of forgery if he has made any such document or any part of it, with the required intent. It is, therefore, immaterial whether the person, who makes a part of the forgers statement, was present at the time when the forged document was completed.[27] However, until a false document is made either in whole or in part, there cannot be any forgery. Mere preparation for the commission of a possible crime of forgery cannot, by itself, be forgery or the abetment of forgery.[28] Similarly, a charge of forgery cannot lie against a person who3818 was not the writer of the forged document or who did not sign the forged name. If a kabuliyat, which need be signed by two witnesses, is signed by a third witness, it can have no effect on the validity of the document even if the name was fictitious; and if the third signature was intended to be used in future as evidence that the third witness (the zamindar) himself was a witness to the kabuliyat, that might bring the case within the definition of fabricating false evidence for the purpose of being used in a judicial proceeding or it might be a preparation for the offence of cheating; but it certainly does not amount to forgery.[29] If, however, a date is appended to a document but it was written on a later date, the offence of forgery would be complete.[30]

The production, in court, of a writing would be 'evidence' within the meaning of s 29 and the writing is a document within the meaning of s 29, and s 463, IPC .[31]

For the purpose of a charge of forgery, it is immaterial that a document contains recitals which are false in other respects. The question, whether a sale, recited in a document, did take place on the date specified, has no bearing on the question whether the document is a false one within the meaning of s 464 .[32]

14. Document must be made Dishonestly or Fraudulently

In order to constitute an offence of forgery, the documents must be made dishonestly or fraudulently. But dishonest or fraudulent are not tautological. Fraudulent does not imply the deprivation of property or an element of injury. In order to be fraudulent, there must be some advantage on the one side with a corresponding loss on the other. Every forgery postulates a false document either in whole or in part, however, small.[33]

15. False Description in Document

The intent to commit forgery involves an intent to cause injury. A person makes a false document who dishonestly or fraudulently signs with an intent or cause to believe that the document was signed by a person whom he knows it was not signed. A false description makes a document of forgery when it is found that the accused by giving such false description intended to make out or wanted it to believe that it was not he that was executing the document but another person.[34]

16. 'With Intent to Cause Damage or Injury to the Public or to any Person'

The connection between the forgery and the injury must not be too remote.[35] The mere fact of damage or fraud affecting the person committing it is immaterial, eg, forgery by a partner, if it affects other persons besides.[36] It is the intention which3819 constitutes the gist of offence; it is immaterial whether damage, injury or fraud is actually caused.[37] If a person signs a telegram in another name and there is nothing to show that it was done with intent to injure him and, in fact, it did not injure him, there can be no conviction for forgery.[38] Where an application for permission for construction of premises was filed by a person under a direction or instruction of another with a mistaken name, there was no finding that signatures by the said person were made on the application to cause harm to the person on whose behalf they were made or without their knowledge or that they were untrue, the mere denial of signature by the person on whose behalf it is purported to be made was not found sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the person submitting the application had committed the forgery.[39]

The intents, recited in this section, include, among various alternatives, an intent to cause damage or injury; but the phrase does not govern other intents. It is an intent complete in itself.[40] If an accused, in order to make good a false defence and to cause justice to miscarry, fabricates a document by putting false dates and spurious postmarks on an envelope, he does it with one of the intents referred to in s 463, IPC . He makes a false document with the intention of causing injury to the complainant or to the public.[41]

17. 'With Intent...to Support any Claim or Title'

The term 'claim' is not limited, in it's application, to property only,[42] nor is the term limited, in its application, to a claim to property.[43] The claim may be a claim to anything, as, for instance, a claim to the custody of a child, or a claim to a woman as the claimant's wife, or a claim to the custody of a child as being the claimant's child, or a claim to be admitted to attendance at a law class in a college or university or other examination, or a claim to the possession of immovable or any other kind of property.[44] There is no difference in principle between the case of a man making a false certificate in order to obtain employment[45] and the case of a false certificate in order to obtain admission to law class.[46] If, in order to support even a true claim or a genuine title, a false document is created, it is forgery. Whether a document is a false document, does not depend upon the adjudication of the court on the claim or title which is intended to be propped up by the false document.[47] Even if a document is fabricated by an accused person to confirm an existing title to property, the execution of the document would be dishonest or fraudulent and the document would be a3820 forgery.[48] Where the accused realised that his claim was likely to be an unenforceable one unless he altered the date of the bahi, which he did, it was held that his intention was infact to convert an illegal or doubtful claim into an apparently legal one. As this action was dishonest within the meaning of the IPC, he was convicted for forgery.[49]

18. 'With Intent to Cause any Person to Part with Property'

This is the usual intention in forgery and all the illustrations to s 464, IPC, with the exception of illust (k), afford examples of a forgery with such an intention though the more immediate intention in illusts (f), (g), (h) and (i) is to support a title to the property in question. However, it is not an essential quality of the fraud, mentioned in this section, that it should result in, or aim at, the deprivation of property.[50] It is also not necessary to constitute a forgery that the property, intended to be taken away by means of forgery, should be in existence when the false document is made.[51]

19. 'With Intent... to Cause any Person... to Enter into any Express or Implied Contract'

Where a person makes a false document and uses it with the object of obtaining a situation in the police force, it is made and used with intent to cause a person as a police officer. The act of the person, therefore, comes within the terms of s 463 and is, indeed, the precise illust (k) given under s 464 .[52]

20. 'With Intent to Commit Fraud or that Fraud may be Committed'

The expression 'intent to defraud' implies conduct coupled with intention to deceive or thereby to cause injury. In other words, defraud involves two conceptions namely, the deceit and injury to the person deceived, ie, infringement of some legal right possessed by him, but not necessarily deprivation of property.[53] Unless there is an element of fraud, the making of a false document does not amount to be forgery, the reason being that one of the intents, contemplated by s 463, IPC, is that the false document must be made with intent to commit fraud or that fraud may be committed.[54] In the absence of element of fraud, no case of forgery can, therefore, be said to have been made out.[55] Where there is an intention to deceive and by means of the deceit to obtain an advantage, there is fraud; and if a document is fabricated with such intent, it is forgery.[56]3821

The offence of forgery is complete if a false document is, infact, made with intent to commit fraud though it may not have been made with any of the other intents, specified in s 463 .[57] In Empress v Muhammad Saeed Khan ,[58] false entries in the character roll of the accused were held to be made with the intention of committing fraud as the intention was to deceive the superior officer of the accused and by means of such deception to secure his advancement in the service and, thus, gain an advantage for him at the sacrifice to others. The entries were, therefore, a forgery within the meaning of s 463 .

21. Intention to Cause Injury--If Essential

The expression 'intent to defraud' implies conduct coupled with intention to deceive and thereby to injure. In other words, 'defraud' involves two conceptions, namely, deceit and injury to the person deceived, ie, infringement of some legal right possessed by him, but not necessarily deprivation of property.[59] It was pointed out, in Emperor v Abdul Hamid ,[60] that the observations of Mookerjee J in Emperor v Surendra Nath Ghosh ,[61] do not lend support to the view that in the absence of proof of injury, no conviction for forgery can be sustained. Where fraud is the element relied upon for the application of both ss 463 and 464, it is sufficient to prove that the accused wanted to secure advantage to himself, but not also that he intended to cause injury to another.[62] It is immaterial for the fraudulent character of a deception for criminal purposes that loss, injury or risk of loss to someone else be proved unless the nature of the fraud committed is definitely expressed to be with the intention of causing damage or injury, as being one of the intents of s 463 . It is not essential that the element of injury should always be proved.[63] However, in Abdul Razak v Empress ,[64] an element of injury was regarded as an essential ingredient of the offence of forgery. Forgery for the purpose of a competitive examination necessarily imports the risk of injury to other candidates.[65] However, in Nga Tun Sein v Emperor ,[66] a process-server, who forged the names of a certain person, on whom he was to serve notice, was not held guilty of the offence of forgery because forgery3822 involves something more than deceiving; intent to commit fraud involves an intent to cause injury. In another case from Rangoon, Maung Tint v King ,[67] it was held that the element of risk or injury to the public is not an essential ingredient in the definition of forgery. The intention to gain an advantage is a necessary constituent of fraudulent intention in the absence of intention to cause injury. In Madras, the majority of a Bench of five judges was inclined to take the view that either an intention to secure a benefit on the one hand or to cause loss or detriment on the other, by means of deceit, is an intent to defraud, but on the facts of the case they held that both the intentions were present in the case.[68] Where the accused made an endorsement on a deed of mortgage, which it did not bear at the time when it was filed in the criminal court, and the endorsement, if genuine, would have been a full discharge of the debt due on the mortgage, it was held that it must be concluded that the accused made the endorsement with two intents, one of which was to get rid of liability under the deed, and this was, at least, an intent to cause damage or injury or, at least, to commit fraud.[69]

Appellant accused A3, Monica Bedi, had obtained fake passport with the help of accused A4 to A9. However, three was no evidence that accused A7 prepared false document with intent to cause damage or injury to the public or to any person, or to support any claim or title, or to cause any person to part with property, or to enter into any express implied contract or with intent to commit fraud. The ingredients of s 463, IPC were not satisfied in the case. The conviction of the accused A7 under s 465, IPC was found not sustainable.[70]

22. Concealment of Fraud

It is a fraud to conceal fraud, that has already been committed, and to make a party believe that no fraud has been committed. Any document made with the intention of advancing such a purpose is made fraudulently and with intent to commit fraud.[71]

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

S. 464.

Making a false document.--

[72][A person is said to make a false document or false electronic record--3823

First.--Who dishonestly or fraudulently--

(a) makes, signs, seals or executes a document or part of a document;
(b) makes or transmits any electronic record or part of any electronic record;
(c) affixes any [73][electronic signature] on any electronic record;
(d) makes any mark denoting the execution of a document or the authenticity of the [73][electronic signature], with the intention of causing it to be believed that such document or part of document, electronic record or [73][electronic signature] was made, signed, sealed, executed, transmitted or affixed by or by the authority of a person by whom or by whose authority he knows that it was not made, signed, sealed, executed or affixed; or

Secondly.--Who, without lawful authority, dishonestly or fraudulently, by cancellation or otherwise, alters a document or an electronic record in any material part thereof, after it has been made, executed or affixed with [73][electronic signature] either by himself or by any other person, whether such person be living or dead at the time of such alteration; or

Thirdly.--Who dishonestly or fraudulently causes any person to sign, seal, execute or alter a document or an electronic record or to affix his [73][electronic signature] on any electronic record knowing that such person by reason of unsoundness of mind or intoxication cannot, or that by reason of deception practised upon him, he does not know the contents of the document or electronic record or the nature of the alteration.]

Illustration

(a) A has a letter of credit upon B for rupees 10,000 written by Z. A, in order to defraud B, adds a cipher to the 10,000 and makes the sum 1,00,000 intending that it may be believed by B that Z so wrote the letter. A has committed forgery.

(b) A, without Z's authority, affixes Z's seal to a document purporting to be a conveyance of an estate from Z to A, with the intention of selling the estate to B and thereby of obtaining from B the purchase-money. A has committed forgery.

(c) A picks up a cheque on a banker signed by B, payable to bearer, but without any sum having been inserted in the cheque. A fraudulently fills up the cheque by inserting the sum of ten thousand rupees. A commits forgery.

(d) A leaves with B, his agent, a cheque on a banker, signed by A, without inserting the sum payable and authorises B to fill up the cheque by inserting a sum not exceeding ten thousand rupees for the purpose of making certain payments. B fraudulently fills up the cheque by inserting the sum of twenty thousand rupees. B commits forgery.3824

(e) A draws a bill of exchange on himself in the name of B without B's authority, intending to discount it as a genuine bill with a banker and intending to take up the bill on its maturity. Here, as A draws the bill with intent to deceive the banker by leading him to suppose that he had the security of B, and thereby to discount the bill, A is guilty of forgery.

(f) Z's will contains these words--"I direct that all my remaining property be equally divided between A, B and C". A dishonestly scratches out B's name, intending that it may be believed that the whole was left to himself and C. A has committed forgery.

(g) A endorses a Government promissory note and makes it payable to Z or his order by writing on the bill the words "Pay to Z or his order" and signing the endorsement. B dishonestly erases the words "Pay to Z or his order" and thereby converts the special endorsement into a blank endorsement. B commits forgery.

(h) A sells and conveys an estate to Z. A afterwards, in order to defraud Z of his estate, executes a conveyance of the same estate to B, dated six months earlier than the date of the conveyance to Z, intending it to be believed that he had conveyed the estate to B before he conveyed it to Z. A has committed forgery.

(i) Z dictates his will to A. A intentionally writes down a different legatee from the legatee named by Z, and by representing to Z that he has prepared the will according to his instructions, induces Z to sign the will. A has committed forgery.

(j) A writes a letter and signs it with B's name without B's authority, certifying that A is a man of good character and in distressed circumstances from unforeseen misfortune, intending by means of such letter to obtain alms from Z and other persons. Here, as A made a false document in order to induce Z to part with property, A has committed forgery.

(k) A without B's authority writes a letter and signs it in B's name certifying to A's character, intending thereby to obtain employment under Z. A has committed forgery inasmuch as he intended to deceive Z by the forged certificate, and thereby to induce Z to enter into an express or implied contract for service.

Explanation 1.--A man's signature of his own name may amount to forgery.

Illustrations

(a) A signs his own name to a bill of exchange, intending that it may be believed that the bill was drawn by another person of the same name. A has committed forgery.
(b) A writes the word "accepted" on a piece of paper and signs it with Z's name, in order that B may afterwards write on the paper a bill of exchange drawn by B upon Z, and negotiate the bill as though it had been accepted by Z. A is guilty of forgery; and if B, knowing the fact, draws the bill upon the paper pursuant to A's intention, B is also guilty of forgery.
(c) A picks up a bill of exchange payable to the order of a different person of the same name. A endorses the bill in his own name, intending to cause it to be believed that it was endorsed by the person to whose order it was payable: here A has committed forgery.
(d) A purchases an estate sold under execution of a decree against B. B, after the seizure of the estate, in collusion with Z, executes a lease of the estate to Z at a nominal rent and for a long period, and dates the lease six months prior to the seizure, with intent to defraud A, and to cause it to be believed that the lease was granted before the seizure. B, though he executes the lease in his own name, commits forgery by antedating it.
(e) A, a trader, in anticipation of insolvency, lodges effects with B for A's benefit, and with intent to defraud his creditors; and in order to give a colour to the transaction, writes a promissory note binding himself to pay to B a sum for value received, and antedates the note, intending that it may be believed to have been made before A was on the point of insolvency. A has committed forgery under the first head of the definition.3825

Explanation 2.--The making of a false document in the name of a fictitious person, intending it to be believed that the document was made by a real person, or in the name of a deceased person, intending it to be believed that the document was made by the person in the lifetime, may amount to forgery.

Illustration

A draws a bill of exchange upon a fictitious person, and fraudulently accepts the bill in the name of such fictitious person with intent to negotiate it. A commits forgery.

[74][Explanation 3.--For the purposes of this section, the expression "affixing [75][electronic signature]" shall have the meaning assigned to it in clause (d) of sub-section (1) of section 2 of the Information Technology Act 2000].

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section, being a part of the definition of forgery, defined in the preceding s 463, IPC, has to be read with that section as it answers the question 'when is a false document or false electronic record made?' meaning thereby that the section defines the first element in forgery, viz, making a false document or false electronic record. A false document or false electronic record can be made in the following three ways, namely:

(a) by making, signing, sealing or executing a document; or
(b) by alteration of a document; or
(c) by causing a person, who is innocent of the contents, or nature of the alteration, of a document, to sign it.3826

A person is said to have made a 'false document', if: (i) he made or executed a document claiming to be someone else or authorized by someone else; or (ii) he altered or tampered a document; or (iii) he obtained a document by practicing deception, or from a person not in control of his senses.[76]

In whichever of the said three ways the document is made, it must be so made with a dishonest or fraudulent intent.[77] Moreover, if the making takes the first form, viz, that of execution, there must be a further intention, viz, to cause it to be believed that the document was executed by the person by whom, or at the time at which, it purports to have been executed.

Reading ss 463 and 464, IPC together, the following elements are necessary to constitute the offence of forgery:

(a) 'making' of a false document or false electronic record in one of the above three ways specified in s 464, IPC (a false document is not 'made' until it has been executed or altered;
(b) accompanying dishonest or fraudulent intention, ie, an intention by means of the making to cause wrongful loss or wrongful gain to someone or injuriously to deceive someone, though the person in question need not necessarily be the same person who will ultimately suffer from the forgery;[78]
(c) it is the execution of the document which is false, the specific intention therein stated and referred to above; and
(d) a principal or ulterior intent of one or other of the kinds specified in the preceding s 463, IPC .

Every false or fabricated document is not a forged document; there must be acts that constitute the document a false or fabricated one, that is to say, the case must fall within the definition of making a false document in s 464 and such false document must also possess the character or tendency described in s 463 .[79] Similarly, in order to constitute an offence of forgery under ss 463 and 464, the document must be made dishonestly or fraudulently and these words must be read in the sense in which they are defined in IPC in ss 24 and 25, respectively.[80] The disjunctive use of the two words 'dishonestly' and 'fraudulently' inclines in favour of the view that the latter word 'fraudulently' is not a mere surplusage.[81] The offence of forgery is complete as soon as a false document has been made though no use of the document is, as a fact, ever made.[82] Of course, until false document is made in part or in whole, there cannot be any forgery. Mere preparation for a possible crime of forgery without false document in part or in whole, cannot, by itself, be either forgery or abetment of3827 forgery.[83] Similarly, mere filling in of the body of a permit will not amount to making of a false document unless it be also shown that when the accused wrote out the body of the permit, he did so dishonestly or fraudulently and that he had the intention of causing it to be believed that such part of the permit was made by a person, by whom, or by whose authority, it was not, to his knowledge, made.[84] Likewise, the mere making of a false statement in a document would not bring the same within the ambit of s 464, IPC, and would not amount to forgery.[85] Same is the position when the signature on the certificate is genuine and authorship of the certificate is established.[86]

Section 464 of IPC which defines the offence of 'forgery: encompasses a dishonest or fraudulent act of a person in making a document with the intention of causing it to be believed that such document was made, signed, sealed etc by or by the authority of a person by whom or by whose authority he knows that it was not made, signed, sealed, executed etc. The action of the accused SK in making the endorsement in the Investment Renewal Form of Vyasa Bank, in the light of the surrounding facts and circumstances noted, prima facie, amounted to making of a document with an intention of causing it to be believed that the same was made by or by the authority of the joint account holder S.[87]

To constitute the offence of preparation of a false documents, document should be made or executed claiming to be some one else or authorized by somebody else. Where document is executed by a person without claiming to be some one else or authorized by somebody else, it will not be a false document, it will not be a forgery also. Where a person sells a property knowing that it does not belong to him and thereby defrauds person who purchases property, person defrauded has a right to complain fraudulent act of cheating. However, that does not mean that when such a purchaser complains of defrauding, it is a false document or that forgery was committed.[88]

Section 29, and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

5. Electronic Record

Section 29A, vol 1, may be referred to.3828

6. To make a False Document

The word 'makes' does not mean anything more than makes, that is to say, creates or brings into existence.[89] This view is consistent with illustration (c) to this section.[90]Under this section, making of a false document is not restricted to the act of signing it.[91] In Re Riasal Ali,[92] it was, however, observed that the 'making of a document or part of a document' does not mean writing or printing it, but signing or otherwise executing it; it is the fixing of the seal or the signature of some person to the document or part of a document knowing that the seal or the signature is not of him and that he gave no authority to affix it. However, this last cited authority is a weak one as it did not consider the definition of 'document' in s 29 .[93]

7. Causing False Document to be made--Distinct from Making it

A person to be guilty of forgery, under the first clause of this section, must make a false document or part of a false document and not merely cause it to be made. Making a false document is one thing and causing it to be made is another.[94]

8. Untrue or False Statement in Document--Not Amounting to Making of False Document

The making of a document, untrue in certain particulars, is not necessarily the making of a false document within the meaning of the IPC . To constitute such a document a false document, it must be shown that it was made with such an intention as is implied in the term 'fraudulently' or in the term 'dishonestly'. A mere intention to deceive is not sufficient.[95] The mere making of false statement in a document would not make it a false document.[96] The fact that a document contains false recitals or statements, which induce a person so deceived to part with property, would not make it an offence of forgery.[97] Therefore, when false pay bills were prepared by the accused containing false claims, the offence committed cannot be said to be forgery because the accused had not made signatures or writings of another or had not unauthorisedly altered the pay bills in material particular. When the pay bills in question were written and signed by the accused himself, the same could not be said to be false documents and hence no offence of forgery can be said to have been committed by the accused.[98]3829

9. Importance of Nature and use of Document--Cases

What constitutes the 'making' of document depends entirely upon the nature and use it is intended for. In LK Siddoppa v Lalithamma ,[1] the accused got printed marriage invitations in the names of two persons without authority from either of them and issued the invitations to friends and relations notifying the celebration of marriage of the accused to the complainant, an eligible, handsome and young woman, inheriting considerable property. It was held that there was clearly possible injury or risk of injury to the complainant, and the marriage invitations, being forged documents, fell within the definition of a false document in s 464 . Where a person forges a copy of a fictitious resolution of a co-operative society by copying only the body of the resolution, he makes part of a false document and prepares, therefore, a false document.[2] If, however, it is not proved that the accused knew that the resolution of the co-operative society, which he copied, did not exist, he cannot be convicted under s 464 .[3] Where the maker of a copy has no authority to make its copy, a false copy is not a false document.[4] A wrong entry of payment in a muster-roll will not make the document a forged one.[5] Where a Mohammadan executes a kabirnama in favour of a woman, who is not his wife, with the intention of supporting a claim to her property, the document is not a false document within the meaning of s 464 .[6]

10. Document Prepared to Conceal Fraud

If a document is prepared with the intention of concealing a fraud, that had already been committed, and, thus, to enable the person, who made 'wrongful gain', to retain the property that he had acquired by unlawful means, it amounts to a false document and the person, making it, is guilty of forgery.[7] The Supreme Court in RK Dalmia v Delhi Administration ,[8] a case where false entries were made to cover up the diversion of funds and to conceal further the dishonest act, already committed, agreed with the observations in Emperor v Ragho Ram .[9] Therefore, the cases, holding that in such a case no false document is made, cannot be considered to be good law.[10] If a person3830 executes a false valuable security to render inoperative a genuine valuable security, the act is a forgery. In such a case, fraud is committed for the purpose of counter-acting fraud and the person using the false document cannot make use of such a defence to charge of forgery.[11]

11. 'Dishonestly'

For the purpose of forgery, it is sufficient to show that there was a criminal intention to cause wrongful gain to one or wrongful loss to another. It is not necessary that wrongful gain or wrongful loss should actually be caused.[12]

12. 'Fraudulently'

The expression 'defraud' involves two elements, namely, deceit and injury to the person deceived. Injury is something other than economic loss and it will include any harm whatever caused to any person in body, mind, reputation or such other. A benefit or advantage to the deceiver will almost always cause loss or detriment to the deceived.[13] Where, therefore, a document is prepared with the intention to deceive and by means of deceit, an advantage is obtained then there is fraud, and judged from this standpoint the preparation of a forged bail order by the utilisation of which the person concerned obtained an advantage of being released by deceiving the courts and society at large cannot but be said to have made the document fraudulent thereby attracting s 466, IPC .[14] In order to do a thing fraudulently, it is not necessary that the person, doing it, should intend, or the doing of it should have, the necessary consequence of causing wrongful loss to any person. To ascribe, to the word 'fraudulently', the meaning, given to the word 'dishonestly', would be attributing redundancy to the legislature.[15]The decisions, which proceed on the ground that an act is not fraudulent unless it causes, or is intended to caused loss to someone, would seem to take too narrow a view of the meaning of the word 'fraudulently' as used in the IPC .[16] Except so far as loss or detriment is necessarily involved when an advantage is obtained, and intention of causing loss in a matter of remote inference.[17] Where it is found that the element relied on for the application of both ss 463 and 464, it is sufficient to prove that the accused wanted to secure an advantage to himself; it is not necessary to show that he intended to cause injury to another.[18] To3831 constitute, in law, an intent to defraud, there must be a possibility of some person being not only deceived, but also injured, by the forgery.[19] In Sanjiv Ratnappa v Emperor ,[20] the accused, a sub-inspector of police, altered the case diary after the inception of proceedings against him in order to create evidence in his own favour. It was held that no offence under s 465, IPC was committed because the element of fraud, as defined in the IPC, was absent. There was no question of any injury being caused to the deputy superintendent of police who was inquiring into the case as a result of alteration of the case diary. It was emphasised that the word 'defraud' involves two conceptions, deceit and injury, to the person deceived, ie, and infringement of some legal right of that person. In Kotamraju Venkatrayudu v Emperor ,[21] a certificate for admission to a university examination was forged. The majority of the judges held that 'there was intent to obtain advantage and the corresponding injury to the university' and, therefore, the act may be said to have been done fraudulently. The making of a false certificate with intent to procure employment in government service is fraudulent within the meaning of s 474 .[22] In Chothamal Narayanji v Ramchandra Govindram ,[23] the accused, a tenant, submitted an application in the name of his landlord and forged the signature of the landlord's son to a statement to the effect that the landlord had no objection to the grant of electricity in the premises of the tenant. It was laid down that in order that an act may be done fraudulently, there must be deception actual or intended, and injury or risk of injury, though not to any particular person. As the act of the accused involved deception and injury risk of injury to the electric department by way of litigation by the unwilling owner, the accused was held guilty of forgery. Commentary under s 25, vol 1, may be referred to.

13. Intention to Defraud

The term 'fraudulently' is equivalent to 'with intent to defraud'.[24] An intent to defraud means something more than deceit. The object, for which deceit is practised, has to be considered. The advantage, intended to be secured, must be something to which the party, perpetrating the deceit, is not entitled either legally or equitably.[25] An intention to defraud being an essential ingredient, it is rally. An intention to defraud or not is a question of fact to be determined with reference to the special circumstances of each case.[26] Certificates (honorary degrees without examinations), though false in material particulars and given by the accused, running bogus institutions, would be false documents in law only if they were made dishonestly or fraudulently vis-a-vis the persons who received them.[27] Where the accused altered3832 the date of birth in an original certificate, granted by the university to successful candidates at the matriculation examination, in order to qualify for appearance at a competitive examination, the original document so altered was held to be a false document.[28] In Naga Ba Thein v Emperor ,[29] the accused, who made an application for appointment in the land records department containing false statement, attached several certificates to the application, one of which was clearly a forgery, with the intention to obtain a lucrative appointment by means of the deception, namely, to cause wrongful gain to himself. It was held that the act of the accused being dishonest, he was rightly convicted under ss 465 and 471, IPC .

14. 'With the Intention of Causing it to be Believed'

The first clause of this section requires that the making of the false document should be with the intention of causing it to be believed that the document, or a part of it, was made, signed, sealed or executed, (a) by, or by the authority of, a person by whom, or by whose authority, he (ie, the accused) knew that it was not made, etc; or (b) at a time, at which he (ie, the accused) knew that it was not made, etc. The section will not apply to cases where a public officer, or a person, acting for a public officer, whose duty it is to make entries in public books, knowingly makes a false entry; it would, however, certainly apply to cases where the document is forged by some unauthorised person with a view to make it appear that it was duly issued by a public officer.[30] Therefore, in order to bring the case in the first clause of s 464, IPC, it must be proved that a document or part of it has been made with the intention of causing it to be believed that it was so made by, or by the authority of, a person by whom, or by whose authority, he (ie, accused) knew that it was not made.[31] Where a written statement, filed in court, is removed and another substituted to make it appear that the substituted one is the sufficient to show that there was an intention to defraud gene original, the case is covered by the first clause of this section.[32] Where, however, a person, the executant of a document, attaches a false description to his name and it is not possible to say that he, in the circumstances, intended to make out that it was not he, who was executing the document, but a fictitious person, he does not come within the purview of this section.[33] In order to bring a document within the four comers of the first clause, the document must be created with a view to make it appear that it was made by some other person, who, the accused knows, did not make it.[34] In Empress v Appasami ,[35] the accused, by falsely representing himself to be one3833 VAD, induced the officer of the Madras university to deliver, to him, a ticket, entitling him to enter the examination room for the matriculation test, the papers of VAD. It was held that as, by writing the examination paper, the accused made a false document with the intention of causing it to be believed that the document was made by VAD, he was guilty of forgery under s 465, IPC . In Venkaraju Venkatasami v Emperor ,[36] certain persons, however, signed a bail bond in names, which were not their own, after informing the magistrate that their names were those with which they subsequently signed. There was no intention to cause the magistrate to believe that the bail bond was signed by any person, real or fictitious, other than those persons. The conviction for forgery was, therefore, set aside.

15. Accused not Writer of or Signatory to Document--Effect

A charge of forgery cannot lie against a person who is not the writer of the forged document or who has not signed the forged name.[37] Where forgery is committed not by the hand of the accused himself, but by witness in the case, the accused cannot be convicted of forgery unless it is proved that he himself made a document, or part of it, with the intention of causing it to be believed that such document, or part of such document, was made by the authority of a person by whose authority, he knew, it was not made.[38]

16. 'Signed, Sealed, or Executed, by, or by the Authority of a Person'

For forgery, a signature must be made by a person who knows that he has not got authority from the person whose signature he purports to make on the document.

Where, therefore, A was present when B made a signature for A on a document, it was held that there could be no question of want of authorisation, or forgery, in law.[39] If, in a petition for transfer of a lease of fishery, the son signs his father's name, the document is not a false document unless the son writes his name dishonestly or fraudulently. If the son has his father's authority to sign and there is no suggestion that the has acted fraudulently, he cannot be convicted for forgery.[40] In very case of forgery, where the question of authority is raised, it is essential to prove not only the lack of authority, but also the dishonest intention, with probably more that usual care. Mere abuse of authority would not necessarily lead to the conclusion that there is forgery. It is not forgery where the act is done under the honest belief that the party, doing it, has a right to do it although, in point of fact, he had no such authority.[41] Where, however, the accused fraudulently made a false order, purporting to be from a district superintendent of police to subordinate officials, with the intention of causing it to be believed that it was made with the authority of the district superintendent of police, knowing that it was not made with his authority, and intended thereby to commit fraud, or that fraud may be committed, it was held that3834 he was guilty of forgery.[42] Filling in, without any authority or with an excess of authority, the body of a blank cheque, to which a signature is attached, is forgery.[43] The signing of a vakalatnama in the name of co-decree-holders, without their authority to do so, and delivering it with instructions to file a petition, to the effect that the debt had been satisfied and that the case may be struck off the file, is forgery as it is made with intent to commit fraud.[44]However, a person, who consents to act under a mookteamamah and attaches his own name in token of such consent, does not, thereby, become the maker of the mookteamamah or a forger if the mookteamamah turns out to be forged.[45]

17. Attesting a Forged Document/Signature

A person, who merely attests a forged signature on a document of receipt, cannot be convicted of forgery. Before attestation can amount to forgery, one of the essential requirements is that it must be made or signed by a person by whom it does not purport to be made or signed. In the case of a forged attestator, it cannot be said that the document was signed by a person by whom it does not purport to be made or signed.[46] The bare fact of attestation is not sufficient to justify an inference that the attestator knew that he was attesting a forged document unless there are facts besides the mere fact of attestation, to show that it was probable that the attestator had the guilty knowledge imputed to him.[47]

18. 'At a Time at Which...it was not made, Signed, Sealed or Executed'

The words 'at a time at which he knows that it was not made, signed, sealed or executed' are to be read distributively, and are not to be governed by the preceding words 'by, or by the authority of, a person', etc.[48] To execute a document purporting to have been executed on a date other than the one on which it was actually executed is itself a forgery.[49] In order to make a false document, the date, put on a document, must differ from the date on which the document was prepared.[50] If a date is appended to a document, but it was written on a later date, the offence of forgery would be complete.[51] It is forgery to make a deed fraudulently with a false date, when the date is material, although the deed is, infact, made and executed by and between the persons by and between whom it purports to be made and executed.[52] Where, however, there is no evidence that the endorsement, made on a bill by the accused, was made dishonestly or fraudulently with the intention of causing it to be believed that the endorsement was made at a time at which he knew that it was not3835 made, the accused cannot be held to have made a false document.[53] A document does not become false merely because it is ante-dated unless it was made dishonestly or fraudulently.[54] If there is nothing to show that the ante-dating of the document had, or could have had, any operation to the prejudice of anyone, the necessary element of dishonestly or fraud is wanting.[55] A document, ante-dated to defeat the provisions of an Act, does not in the absence of proof that this was done dishonestly or fraudulently regarding the persons, affected by it, is not making a false document under s 464 .[56] Where the accused altered the date of a document (a lease) under the impression that only by so doing the document would be received in evidence, but the alteration not only by so doing the document would be received in evidence, but the alteration not only did not help his case, but actually ruined it, it was held that as there was no element of dishonesty or fraud on the part of the accused, he could not be convicted under s 471 .[57] Where all that was proved, was that a forged Will was admittedly written long after the date, which was inserted in the body of the Will as the date of execution, but there was no evidence to raise a presumption against the accused of complicity in a fraud, the accused was not held guilty of forgery.[58] The mere fact, that the document was written on a paper, which bore a small embossed stamp, denoting a later date, would not be conclusive evidence, that the paper was not made at an earlier date, and would not be sufficient to support a charge of forgery.[59]

A complainant, who alleges forgery in respect of a document by ante-dating it, is not obliged to confine himself to the evidence of witnesses named on the petition of complaint.[60]

19. 'Alters a Document in any Material Part'

In order to fall within the ambit of the second clause of this section, there must be alteration of a document by cancellation or otherwise after it has been made or executed.[61] The alteration to be material must be one which alters, or attempts to alter, the character of the instrument itself, which affects, or may affect, the contract which the instrument contains or of which it furnishes the evidence.[62] The interpolation of the name of the witness in a document, which need not be attested, is not a material alteration so as to render the document void and bring the case within3836 the second clause of s 464 .[63] However, the alteration of the date in a bond is an alteration in a material part thereof though the alteration is not made for the purpose of saving limitation.[64] Likewise, the alteration of the date in a bond, in order to bring the bond within time for registration, is not forgery if it is not done 'dishonestly or fraudulently', and there is no intention to support a false claim by a false bond.[65] Similarly, alteration of a sale-deed, subsequent to its registration, by substitution of the right number of the plot sold for the wrong number, without affecting the identity of the property, conveyed by the deed, cannot be a false document within the meaning of s 464 .[66] However, deliberate tampering with a document to support a claim in court, however just that claim may be, is a fraud, both upon the Court and the opposite party, though done to counteract another fraud.[67]

20. Mere Alteration in Document does not Constitute Offence of Forgery

To attract the second clause of s 464 there has to be alteration of document dishonestly and fraudulently. So in order to attract the clause 'secondly' if the document is to be altered, it has to be for some gain or with such objective on the part of the accused. Merely changing a document does not make it a false document. Therefore, presuming that the figure '1' was added as was done in this case, it cannot be said that the document became false for the simple reason that the appellant had nothing to gain from the same. She was not going to save the bar of limitation. Proceedings against the appellants for offences under ss 420, 467 468 and 471 were quashed on petition under s 482 CrPC .[68]

21. Altered Document need not be Legally Effective and Valid

Nothing in this section requires that a document, altered within the meaning of the section, should be legally effective and valid in order that the alteration should, in the circumstances set out, constitute the offence of making a false document.[69] A document, which has not been completed and remains ineffective, can nevertheless attract the provisions of the second clause of s 464 .[70]

22. 'Cause any Person to Sign, Seal, Execute or Alter a Document'

In this class another, who is innocent of the contents of the document or the nature of alteration, by reason of: (a) unsoundness of mind, or (b) intoxication, or (c) deception practised on him, is made to sign, seal, execute or alter a document. If a person inserts a paper in a heap of papers, placed before an officer for his signature, and there is no sort of deception, practised on the officer, to prevent him from knowing3837 the nature of the document, the paper is not a false document within the third clause of this section and he is not guilty of an offence of forgery.[71]

23. Explanation 1

Explanation I embodies the rule that a person may commit forgery even when he signs in his own name.[72] The fraudulent intent, with which such a signature is appended to a document, renders the document false. This is strikingly brought out in illust (d) where B executes the lease in his own name, but as it was ante-dated to defraud a purchaser of the same property, sold under execution of a decree against B, by causing it to be believed that the lease was granted before the seizure of the property by the purchaser, B committed forgery by ante-dating the lease. Another example in illust (e) and it illustrates the rule generally enunciated in the first clause of this section. Where a bill of exchange, payable to Henry Davis got into the hands of another person, who endorsed it to Mead, who discounted it in good faith, it was held that such false endorsement, made with a view to defraud, was undoubtedly a forgery because it purported to have been endorsed by a different person from the man who actually endorsed it.[73] An instrument may be false by reason of the defendant representing his own signature thereon to be that of some other person, existent or non-existent, or by reason of the defendant having filled blanks therein a manner different from that authorised or after his authority had expired.[74]

From the two illusts (h) and (e) and expln I it will be clear that the legislature intended to cover cases under the offence of forgery whenever the person was the creator of a document even though the document was made by himself in his own name and signed in his own name. These two illustrations with expln I, therefore, make the scope of definition 'making a false document' very wide and it cannot be said that Pt I of s 464 is the only provision defining the words 'making the false document'.[75] In illust (d) to this section, the forgery consists in exceeding the authority given.

The five illustrations to the explanation show the working of the rule embodied in it.

The act of an accused in selling the property in the absence of any authority is covered by the definition of making a false document within the meaning of s 464, cl first, illust (b).[76]

24. Explanation 2

By this explanation, a false document may be made in the name of a fictitious person or a deceased person,[77] the intention being to cause it to be believed that the document:

(a) if made in the name of a fictitious person, was made by the real person,[78] or3838
(b) if made in the name of a deceased person, was made by the deceased in his lifetime.

A perusal of explanation 2 of s 464 shows that for the offence to get attracted 'making of a false document is essential'. When this aspect is missing in the complaint, the complaint against the accused under ss 465 and 468 is liable to be quashed.[79] As to a charge of forgery, it is wholly immaterial whether the name forged is that of a fictitious person, who never existed, or of a real person. It is as much forgery in the one case as in the other provided the fictitious name is assumed for the purpose of fraud in the case under trial.[80] Where, however, the accused signed a document as a patwaree, but he was not a patwaree at the relevant time, it was held that the assigning, the accused, the character of a patwaree was not equivalent to the making of a false document in the name of a fictitious person.[81] Where, before signing a bail bond, the accused gave their names to the magistrate and signed the bail bond in those very names, it was held that there was no intention to cause the magistrate to believe that the bail bond was signed by any person, real or fictitious, other than the accused even though they signed the bond with names which were not their own. The conviction for forgery was, therefore, set aside.[82]

An idol being a 'person' within the meaning of s 11, if a person signs a document in the name of an idol, he commits forgery under this section.[83]

25. Explanation 3

This explanation classifies the expression 'affixing digital signature' which shall have the same meaning assigned to it in cl (d) of sub-s 1 of s 2 of the Information Technology Act 2000 which is as follows:

(d) "Affixing electronic signature", with its grammatical variations and cognate expressions means adoption of any methodology or procedure by a person for the purpose of authenticating an electronic record by means of digital signature.

As per s 2(1)(p) of the said Act

(p) "digital signature" means authentication of any electronic record by a subscriber by means of an electronic method or procedure in accordance with provision of section 3 .

Section 3 of Information Technology Act 2000 is as below:

S. 3 . Authentication of electronic records.--

(1) Subject to the provision of this section, any subscriber may authenticate an electronic record by affixing his digital signature.

(2) The authentication of the electronic record shall be effected by the use of asymmetric crypto system and hash function which envelop and transform the initial electronic record into another electronic record.

Explanation.--For the purposes of this sub-section, "hash function" means an algorithm mapping or translation of one sequence of bits into another, generally smaller, set3839 known as "hash result" such that an electronic record yields the same hash result every time the algorithm is executed with the same electronic record as its input making it computationally infeasible--

(a) to derive or reconstruct the original electronic record from the hash result produced by the algorithm;

(b) that two electronic records can produce the same hash result using the algorithm.

(3) Any person by the use of a public key of the subscriber can verify the electronic record.

(4) The private key and the public key are unique to the subscriber and constitute a functioning key pair.

(wef 17-10-2000) for the following:'A person is said to make a false document--First--Who dishonestly or fraudulently makes, signs, seals or execute a document or part of a document, or makes any mark denoting the execution of a document, with the intention of causing it to be believed that such document or part of a document was made, signed, sealed or executed by or by the authority of a person by whose authority he knows that it was not made, signed, sealed or executed, or at a time at which he knows that it was not made, signed, sealed or executed; or Secondly--Who, without lawful authority, dishonestly or fraudulently, by cancellation or otherwise, alters a document in any material part thereof, after it has been made or executed either by himself or by any other person, 'whether such person be living or dead at the time of such alteration; or Thirdly--Who dishonestly or fraudulently causes any person to sign, seal, execute or alter a document, knowing that such person by reason of unsoundness of mind or intoxication cannot, or that by reason of deception practised upon him, he does not know the contents of the document or the nature of the alteration'.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

S. 465.

Punishment for forgery.--

Whoever commits forgery shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The aggravate forms of forgery are made punishable under ss 466 to 469, IPC . This section provides a mild punishment for the offence of forgery not falling in the said ss 466 to 469, IPC .

2. Sections 463 , 464, 465, 471, IPC and Section 146(p) of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act (23 of 1961)--Distinction

It is clear from a perusal of s 146(p) of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act 1960 and ss 463 and 464, IPC, that they are two distinct offences which are capable of being committed with different intentions by different sets of persons and it could not be contemplated by the legislature of the state of Maharashtra who intended to repeat pro tonto the provisions of ss 465, IPC, by enactment of s 146 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act. Hence, the sanction of the registrar under s 148(3) of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act is not necessary before the magistrate who can take cognizance on a private complaint of offences under ss 465 3840 and 471, IPC, alleged to have been committed by a party to any proceeding before the registrar's nominee.[84]

3. Distinction between Sections 463, 465 And 471 and Sections 193 and 196, IPC

Commentary under the same heading in s 463, ante and s 196, vol 2, may be referred to.

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is non- cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable and triable by a magistrate of the first class, and may also be tried summarily.

5. Complaint--When to be filed by the Court

Section 195(1)(b)(ii) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, provides that no court shall take cognizance of any offence described in s 463, IPC, when such offence is alleged to have been committed in respect of a document, produced, or given in evidence, in a proceeding in any court except on the complaint, in writing, of that court,[85] or of some other court to which that court is subordinate.

If, however, the prosecution is confined to an offence under s 463, IPC, committed prior to production of the disputed document in court, no complaint of the court is required.[86]

Complaint to institute criminal proceedings should not be refused on the ground that the document, denounced as forgery, was only tendered in evidence, and not judicially considered by the court. However, it is necessary, before complaint can be filed, to see whether there are prima facie good grounds for holding criminal proceedings. If there are no such grounds, no complaint by the court should be filed.[87]

A sub-registrar under the Registration Act is not, for general purposes, a court. Therefore, the complaint of the sub-registrar is not necessary for forgery in respect of a forged document presented for registration in his office.[88] However, an income-tax collector is a revenue court and his complaint will be required for offences specified in s 195(1)(b)(ii), CrPC 1973.[89]3841

6. Forgery before Production of Document in Court--Complaint should not be made by the Court

Commentary under the same heading in s 468, post, may be referred to.

7. Civil Profile and Criminal Outfit

The law is now well settled. The civil profile which is discernible from the factual matrix of the case should not outweigh the criminal outfit. Merely because a given set of facts would give rise to a civil profile, the criminal case cannot be quashed at the threshold on that premise, as each is an independent remedy, but not mutually exclusive.[90] Therefore, when the acts alleged against the accused persons come within the expression 'mismanagement' for which there is an effective remedy under s 11 of the Andhra Pradesh (Telangana Area) Public Societies Registration Act 1350F, it will not denude of its criminal outfit for the alleged misappropriation of funds of the club. Therefore, criminal proceedings initiated under ss 405, 465 and 420, IPC, against the accused persons cannot be quashed on the ground of availability of an alternate civil remedy.[91]

8. Quashing of Complaint

The allegations in the complaint were that the accused had represented some writing to be that of the Maharaja, which was not so in fact. For making a false document, the person concerned has to make, sign, seal or execute the same. However, it was not alleged in the complaint that the accused has himself written the manuscript and represented it to be that of the Maharaja. The allegations made in the complaint, even if true, did not make out the case of forgery punishable under s 465, IPC . The complaint was, therefore, quashed.[92] But where the complainant entrusted the accused to look after the title suit instituted by her in the court, and the accused forged the signatures of the complainant with a view to falsely induce the court to believe that the said signatures were genuine signatures of the complainant and, obtained the order by adopting such deceitful means causing loss to the party concerned against whom the order of injunction was obtained, therefore, prima facie the offence of forgery was made out against the accused and the criminal complaint against the accused could not be quashed.[93]

9. Joint Trial

The joint trial of the user of a forged receipt, the scribe, and the attesting witnesses is illegal, and not a mere irregularity curable under s 465(1), CrPC 1973.[94] Where, however, the offences of forgery, abetment of cheating are committed by the accused in pursuance of a conspiracy and the charges are based on a series of acts, committed by them with one continuous purpose and design, and the acts are so connected together in point of time that they really form one transaction, all the accused can be jointly tried.[95]3842

10. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC 1973, may be referred to.

11. Discharge

If the accused and the party, whose signature is alleged to have been forged, contend that there is no forgery, the accused is entitled to be discharged.[96] When the material on record revealed that the signatures were forged but neither handwriting expert nor the witnesses stated that they were forged by the accused, the order framing the charge was quashed.[97]

12. Proof

As there are three classes of a false document, the points requiring proof of an offence under this section, may be divided into the following three classes, set out below alternatively under A, B and C.

A

The prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused made, signed, sealed, or executed the document, or electronic record or any part of the document, or electronic record or made a mark denoting execution thereof;
(b) he did as above with the intention of causing it to be believed that such document, or electronic record or any part of such document, or electronic record was made, signed, sealed or executed:
    (i) by, or by the authority of, a person by whom, or by whose authority, he knew that, it was not made, signed, sealed or executed, or
    (ii) at a time, at which, he knew that, it was not made, signed, sealed or executed;

(c) such other person did not make, sign, seal or execute the disputed document, or electronic record or did not authorise such making, etc, or such making, etc, was not at the particular time;

(d) the accused knew that the document or electronic record was not made, signed, etc, by, or by the authority of, the other person or that it was not so done at the particular time; and

(e) the accused did as in (a) and (b) dishonestly or fraudulently and with any of the intents specified in s 463, IPC .

B

The prosecution must prove that:

(a) the document or electronic record was made or executed by the accused himself or by another person;3843

(b) subsequent to the making or execution of the document or electronic record, the accused altered it by cancellation or otherwise;

(c) such alteration was in a material part of the document or electronic record;

(d) the accused had not lawful authority to make the alteration; and

(e) the accused did as in (a) and (b) dishonestly or fraudulently and with any of the intents specified in s 463, IPC .

C

The prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused caused a person to sign, seal, execute or alter a document or electronic record;

(b) such person, when doing as in (a), did not know the contents of the document or electronic record or the nature of the alteration;

(c) such ignorance was due to unsoundness of mind or intoxication or the deception practised upon him;

(d) the accused knew of such ignorance and the reasons therefore; and

(e) the accused, when causing the person to sign, seal, etc, acted dishonestly or fraudulently with any of the intents specified in s 463, IPC .

In order that a charge of forgery under s 465, IPC can be sustained, it has to be proved in the first instance that there was forgery within the meaning of s 463 which again implies that there was the making of a false document in terms of s 464 .[1] Where a document is relied on by the accused, it is his duty to prove it; but when the prosecution alleges it to be forged, it is the duty of the prosecution to prove the forgery beyond all reasonable doubt.[2] In a prosecution for forgery, it is not enough to show that the genuineness of the document is improbable; it should be proved for a certainty that it is forged.[3] Likewise, it is not enough to prove that the accused wrote the body of the false document; it must be further proved that the accused fraudulently obtained the signatures of the persons, who signed the document, or made those signatures himself.[4] The accused prepared letters on the letter head of the minister whereupon invitations were written to invite actors for cultural show, but the letter did not bear signatures of minister, the conviction of the accused under ss 465 and 471, IPC, was not found proper.[5] The allegations were that the accused entered into a criminal conspiracy with the co-accused, the object of which was to cheat the government by sale of tools to ITI at inflated rates. There was no evidence showing that the co-accused had purchased the tools from ITI at inflated rates from the firm of the accused. The stock register containing entries on the basis of original bills cannot be relied upon when the original bills are not produced on these facts, the conviction of the accused was thus set aside.[6]3844

13. Handwriting Expert's Evidence--Value

To base a conviction upon the evidence of an expert in handwriting is, as a general rule, very unsafe.[7] Mere similarity of handwriting without any other evidence of complicity in the conspiracy, in pursuance of which the forgery is committed, is insufficient to justify a conviction for forgery.[8] A court ought not to accept blindly the evidence of a handwriting expert and should usually require substantive evidence before making it the basis of a conviction.[9] It is no doubt true that there is nothing, in law to prevent a court from recording a conviction on expert evidence alone. However, as a rule of caution, it is imprudent to convict a person, charged with forgery, solely on the basis of experts testimony. If, in a case of forgery, the evidence of the handwriting expert is materially corroborated and confirmed by other evidence, there is nothing, in law, to debar the court from recording a conviction on the basis of such expert testimony.[10] In Lalta Prasad v Emperor ,[11] the court refused to convict the accused on the uncorroborated evidence of the handwriting expert.

14. Accused taking Shelter of 'Market Practice'

The accused persons may try to take shelter behind what they may describe as 'market practices'. Such practices even if existing, cannot take the place of statutory and regulatory functions. There is no public interest involved in such practices and they cannot be a substitute for compliance with the regulatory or statutory prescriptions. An attempt may be made to show that there was subsequent disapproval of the market practices: at the point of time when the transactions took place there was no embargo. It may be their stand that the practices were a part of accepted norms. But there is nothing plausible in these explanations. A practice even if was prevailing, if wrong, is not to be approved. The subsequent clarifications do not in any way put seal to the approval of the practices adopted in the past, on the other hand, it condemns it.[12]

15. Conviction

Where the accused was charged on three counts under ss 419, 420 and 465, IPC, and the magistrate refused to believe the only evidence of fraud and consequent dishonestly, implied in the charges under ss 419 and 420, IPC, it was held that there could be no fraudulent intent, which is an essential ingredient of s 465, and a conviction under s 465 on the same evidence could not survive.[13]

Proof of fraud by positive and express evidence cannot be expected in the large majority of cases and in such cases circumstantial evidence is the only means available. However, such evidence must not fall short of proof and no conviction can3845 rest on mere suspicion and conjecture, however strong those may be.[14] When the prosecution has not satisfactorily proved its case against the accused, he must be acquitted of the offences under ss 466 and 471, IPC .[15] If a person writes the body to a forged bail bond and is in possession of the genuine bail bond, there can be very little doubt that he forged it.[16]

16. Probation

The accused was convicted under s 465, IPC, for making forged endorsements regarding identification and attestation of sureties and signatures of advocates. Keeping in view the fact that the offence was a serious one, the benefit of s 360, CrPC, was not extended to the accused.[17]

17. Sentence

The offence of forgery, being serious and difficult to detect, calls for a deterrent punishment.[18] In Velayuathan Nair v State ,[19] the accused was convicted under ss 409, 463 and 477A, IPC, and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for five years. Considering the circumstances that the amount involved was only a sum of Rs 100, that the crime was committed more than six years ago, and that the accused had to bear the suspense of a protracted trial, the sentence was reduced to one year rigorous imprisonment. Where a tenant forged an application to the electric department in the name of his landlord in order to obtain connection in his premises, it was held that the consideration, that the tenant will be paying for the electricity consumed in the portion of the leased premises and no material injury would result to the landlord from the electric connection, may effect the sentence.[20] In Jalaluddin v State ,[21] the accused, a postmaster, received a certain money order at his post office but, instead of paying the amount due thereunder to the payee, committed criminal breach of trust of the same. In order to show that the amount was paid to the claimant, the accused forged certain entries in the relevant register. He was also alleged to have put his own thumb-impression on the money order form stating that it was that of the claimant. The accused was convicted under ss 409 and 465, IPC . For the offence under s 465, he was sentenced to one year rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 100, and, in default of payment of fine to further rigorous imprisonment for 15 days. This sentence was held not be excessive. In Ireagbam Nabakumar Singh v Government of Manipur ,[22] the accused had been convicted under ss 420 and 465, IPC, in five cases in respect of offences, committed in relation to five different persons, and was sentenced consecutively in each of the cases. Considering the nature and the number of offences committed by the accused, the High Court refused to order the sentence to run concurrently.3846

Where the offence was committed 20 years ago and the accused was in jail for a few months, the sentence of rigorous imprisonment for one year was reduced to the period already undergone by the accused.[23]

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

S. 466.

Forgery of record of Court or of public register, etc.--[24][

Whoever forges a document or an electronic record], purporting to be a record or proceeding of or in a court of justice, or a register of birth, baptism, marriage or burial, or a register kept by a public servant as such, or a certificate or document purporting to be made by a public servant in his official capacity, or an authority to institute or defend a suit, or to take any proceedings therein, or to confess judgment, or a power of attorney, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[25][Explanation.--For the purposes of this section, "register" includes any list, data or record of any entries maintained in the electronic form as defined in clause (r) of sub-section (1) of section 2 of the Information Technology Act, 2000.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with a graver form of forgery than that dealt with in the preceding s 465, IPC . The gravity is due to the importance of the document forged. The offence has, however, to be distinguished from that punishable under s 167, though the words 'purporting to be', in this section, are somewhat vague. The section is not, however, intended to apply to a public officer, or a person acting for a public officer, whose duty it is to make entry; it is intended to apply to cases where a certificate, or other document described in the section, is forged by some unauthorised person with a view to make it appear that it was duly issued by a public officer. The former is provided for by s 192 .[26] It has, however, been held, by the former Chief Court of Punjab in Man Singh v Empress ,[27] that whoever, whether a public servant or a private individual, tampers with a public register so as to commit forgery is punishable under this section. It is, of course, necessary that the element of fraud or dishonestly, as3847 explained in IPC, must be present in the mind of the offender to bring his act under this section and s 471 [28] to tamper with the record of a proceeding in a court of justice in order to obtain, from that court, a decision, which otherwise it would not make, is a public mischief, falling within the scope of this section.[29]

2. 'Document'

When the document which is alleged to have been forged is a letter addressed by the Assistant Executive Engineer, BDA, to the President, Nandini Layout BDA Site Allottees Association (Regd), Rajajinagar, Bangalore, the document squarely falls within the description of 'the document purporting to be made by a public servant in his official capacity' as enumerated under s 466 of IPC .[30] But a rough sketch of a pedigree of the accused's family which, in a tentative way, bore the forged signatures of two deputy collectors, serving as practice for a finished forgery, is not a document falling within the description in ss 466 or 467, IPC .[31]

3. Electronic Record

Section 29A, vol 1 may be referred to.

4. 'Court of Justice'

A plaint is a part and parcel of the record of a suit in a court of justice and once it is filed in court, it cannot be altered, or amended, without the special sanction of the court. Alterations and substitutions, in such plaint, after it is filed, constitute an offence under this section.[32]

5. 'Register of marriage'

Forging a document purporting to be a 'register of marriage' falls under s 466 although the register is a private one, and is not kept by a public servant as such.[33]

6. 'To Constitute or Defend a Suit...to Confess Judgment'

The expression 'to institute or defend a suit, or to take proceedings therein, or to confess judgment' has to be associated with the word 'authority' preceding the expression. The expression cannot be associated with other documents indicated in the section.[34]

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.3848

8. Limitation

The offence under s 466, IPC entails maximum punishment of seven years and no limitation is prescribed under s 468(1), CrPC for the offences punishable above three years. So the bar contained under s 468(1) of CrPC is not attracted.[35]

9. Complaint--When to be filed by the Court

Though s 466, IPC, is not mentioned in s 195, CrPC, there can be no dispute that the offence under s 466, IPC, is an aggravated form of forgery, described in s 463, and, therefore, if the rest of the conditions, specified in the said s 195, are satisfied, an offence under s 466, would fall within the ambit of the above s 195 and a prosecution would be barred at the instance of a private individual.[36]

10. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the...day of...., at..., forged the document, Ex..., which purported to be a record (or proceeding) of/in a court of justice (or a register of birth/baptism/marriage/burial, or a register kept by a public servant as such, or a certificate or document purporting to be made by a public servant in his official capacity, or an authority to institute or defend a Suit, or a take any proceedings therein, or to confess judgment or a power of attorney), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 466 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance, of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

11. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the document or electronic record in question was a forgery;
(b) the accused forged the same; and
(c) the said document or electronic record was one of the kinds mentioned in this section.

Where, therefore, a document is prepared with the intention to deceive and by means of deceit, an advantage is obtained, then there is a fraud and judged form this standpoint the preparation of a forged bail order by the utilisation of which the person concerned obtained an advantage of being released deceiving the courts and the society at large cannot but be said to have made the document fraudulently thereby attracting s 466, IPC .[37]

12. Acquittal

The prosecution cannot be permitted to take an indefinite stand by saying that somebody else might have committed forgery, and the accused might have abetted3849 him.[38] If there is no evidence to the effect that the accused had himself forged document in question, no offence under this section can be said to have been committed by him.[39] Where the Chief Minister antedated his order by overwriting, but the concerned file did not leave the office of the Chief Minister, there was no evidence that anyone was unduly favoured or anyone seemed to gain undue advantage by use of such overwriting, the Chief Minister cannot be held guilty for offences under s 453 or s 466, IPC .[40]

13. Conviction

If a person commits two offences, he can be convicted of each of them, more especially when they are separate transactions and the commission of one does not necessarily involve the commission of the other. Similarly, a forger can be convicted both of forgery and of using, as genuine; the forged document.[41] However, the court should not convict the accused both under ss 466 and 467, IPC it may choose whichever of the two sections appears to it to be more suitable.[42]

14. Probation

The accused, a stenographer of the High Court prepared a forged bail order with the help of which the person concerned was released from jail and accused was convicted under ss 466 and 468, IPC . However, in view of the fact that the incident took place 27 years ago and accused had no bad antecedents and the trial court had extended to benefit of probation to the accused, though the High Court acquitted the accused, the apex court granted the benefit of probation to the accused.[43]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

S. 467.

Forgery of valuable security, will, etc.--

Whoever forges a document which purports to be a valuable security or a will, or an authority to adopt a son, or which purports to give authority to any person to make or transfer any valuable security, or to receive the principal, interest, or dividends thereon, or to receive or deliver any money, moveable property, or valuable security, or any document purporting to be an acquittance or receipt acknowledging the payment of money, or an acquittance or receipt for the delivery of any moveable property or valuable security, shall be punished with [44][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.3850

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section deals with a class of documents, broadly nine in number, different from those specified in the preceding s 466, IPC . The law regards this class of documents as more important. This is reflected in the severe punishment provide for the offence in this section. The section applies if the document forged purports:

(a) to be:
  (i) a valuable security,[45] or

(ii) a Will, or
(iii) an authority to adopt a son; or

(b) to give authority, to any person:
(i) to make, or transfer, any valuable security, or
(ii) to receive the principal, interest or dividends on a valuable security, or
(iii) to receive, or deliver, any money, moveable property or valuable security; or

(c) to be:
(i) an acquittance, or receipt, for acknowledging the payment of money, or
(ii) an acquittance, or receipt, for the delivery of any movable property or valuable security.

This section, embracing a number of documents, provides punishment for forgery not only of a document purporting to be a valuable security, but also of any document which purports to give authority, to any person, 'to receive or deliver any money'.[46] A clerk, putting false entries in his savings bank passbook in order to make up the requisite balance for giving the same as security for his service, was held guilty of an offence under the section.[47]3851

Where the accused, the supervisor of a society, made a false debit entry to the effect, that a sweeper had been paid Rs 2, obtained the thumb impression of his nephew and certified that the thumb-impression was that of the sweeper, it has been held that accused was guilty under s 467, IPC .[48] The forgery of a document, even if the person, for whom it was forged, had no intention of using it, was held to be an offence under this section.[49] Where the accused, desiring to get the impersonator's affidavit to be attested by an oath commissioner, identified the impersonator as deponent, it was held that his conviction under s 467 read with s 114, IPC, was justified.[50] Similarly, where it is well established that the sale-deed in question is a forgery and the only person to be benefited by the forgery is the accused himself, it is impossible to hold that forgery was committed without his instigation.[51] However, the writer of the body of a forged receipt cannot be convicted of an offence under s 467, IPC in the absence of evidence that he was present at the execution of the receipt or that he helped any person to use it.[52] In the absence of evidence to show that the accused wrote the signature of the landlord on a disputed rent-receipt, his admission, that he wrote the body of the document, is not sufficient to support a charge under s 467 .[53]

Execution of such document (purporting to convey some property of which one is not the owner) is not execution of a false document as defined under s 464, IPC . If what is executed is not a false document, there is no forgery. If there is no forgery, then neither s 467 nor s 471, IPC is attracted.[54]

2. Blank Paper Signed by a Partner and used by Other Partner

The use of a blank paper, signed by a partner of a firm, by another partner, having carte blanche to use such blank paper as he chose, for the firm's business is legitimate; such user will not constitute offences under ss 467 and 471, IPC .[55]

3. Document

Section 29, and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

4. Accused taking Shelter of 'Market Practice'

Commentary under the same heading in s 465, ante, may be referred to.3852

5. 'Forges A Document'

If a person attests a forged Will and writes an attestation clause to show that the attestation was at the instance of the alleged testator, such written attestation is not only a part of the document, purporting to record the attested Will, but is also, in itself, a document, having regard to its definition in s 29, IPC .[56]

6. 'Purports to be a Valuable Security'

The words, in this section, are 'which purports to be', and not 'which is', a valuable security.[57] An unregistered document may not be a valuable security until it is registered; it still purports to be a valuable security.[58] Deed of agreement for purchase of shares is not a valuable security.[59] The certificates, which the accused has been found to have forged, to get admission in the college of the university could not be described as, 'valuable security'.[60] Even though a document (receipt or pronote) does not contain the signature of the executant across the adhesive stamps, not the adhesive stamps otherwise cancelled, the document, as it stands, purports to be a valuable security within the scope of this section.[61] The document under this section must, therefore, purports to be a valuable security; its validity or invalidity, in law is not relevant.[62] To constitute an offence under ss 466 / 477, IPC, the nature of the user is immaterial.[63] A lottery ticket, the product of which would enable the holder thereof to receive amount of the prize,[64] purports to be a valuable security even though it is product out of time, and payment thereon may be refused. Forgery of such a ticket (by altering the numerals on it) falls under this section.[65] A kabuliyat, even if the period, for which it extend, has passed away, may be a valuable security.[66] A hundi is a valuable security and the offence of forging is falls under s 467, IPC .[67] A document, which purports to be one whereby tenants acknowledge themselves liable to pay enhanced rent, is a valuable security.[68] A deed of divorce is valuable security, presenting such a document for registration and obtaining registration would be 'using' within the meaning of s 471, IPC .[69] A discharge certificate, purporting to have been signed by a fictitious nominee in an insurance3853 policy, is, on the face of it, a valuable security or 'document purporting to be an acquittance or receipt, acknowledging the payment of money' within the meaning of s 467 .[70] However, the deed of agreement for purchase of shares of a company is not valuable security. For further commentary, s 30, vol 1, may be referred to.

7. Copy of Valuable Security

It is the original document which is a valuable security, and not a copy of it, the accused cannot be convicted under s 467 for forging a copy of a valuable security.[71] The copy of a valuable security is not itself a valuable security.[72]

8. 'Will'

Commentary under s 31, vol 1, may be referred to.

9. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, when the valuable security is a promissory note of the Central Government, and non-cognizable in any other case, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

10. Sanction for Prosecution of Government Servant

Commentary under the same heading in s 420, ante, may be referred to.

11. Anticipatory Bail

Commentary under the same heading in s 471, post, may be referred to.

12. Complaint--When to be filed by the Court

Section 463, IPC defines 'forgery', while ss 464, 466 and 469, IPC are penal provisions under different set of facts. All complaints in respect of 'forgery', as defined in s 463, IPC, if detected in respect of a document, which has already been filed in any proceeding in any court, can be taken cognizance of only in accordance with s 195(1)(b)(ii) of CrPC .[73] The expression 'forgery' is used as a general term in the said s 463 and this section (ie, s 463, IPC) is referred to in a comprehensive sense in s 195(1)(b)(ii), CrPC, so as to include all the species of forgery and this includes a case falling under s 467, IPC .[74] A court cannot, therefore, take cognizance of an offence under s 467, IPC, against an accused in violation of the said provisions of s 195(1)(b)(ii) .[75]3854

13. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) do hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you forged a document Ex..., purporting to be a valuable security (or a will made by... (or an authority, given by... to..., to adopt a son; or an authority, given by... to..., to make, or transfer, a valuable security, or to receive the principal, interest or dividends thereon, or to receive or deliver any money, moveable property, or valuable security (or a document purporting to be an acquittance or receipt acknowledging the payment of money, or an acquittance or receipt for the delivery of any moveable property or valuable security) to wit...), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 467 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

A charge under s 467 is vitiated if the intention is nowhere set out.[76] The mere fraudulent preparation of a deed of sale, with intent to cause injury to certain persons, does not amount to forgery of a valuable security, unless that document be a false document.[77]

There must be a separate charge for every alleged item of forgery; this means that there must be independent evidence of user of each document.[78] If an accused forges two withdrawal cheques on two different dates, there should be two distinct charges or one charge with two heads.[79] An offence under s 467, read with s 109, namely, abetment of forgery, is distinct from the user of the document which is an offence under s 471, IPC . The former offence is complete when the document is written and signed. Where the user of the document is a subsequent act, it is a distinct and separate offence for which an accused is entitled to be separately charged.[80]

14. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the accused committed forgery (vide s 465, IPC); and
(b) the document falls within one of the kinds specified in this section.

To justify a conviction under s 467, IPC, the accused must be shown to have made a false document. It is an essential ingredient in the making of a false document that it should be made dishonestly or fraudulently and with one of the intents set out in s 463, IPC . The prosecution must give some evidence from which the dishonestly, or fraudulency, of the transaction and some, or one, of the intents set out in s 463, IPC can be legitimately inferred.[81] The accused was an officiating manager in a nationalised bank. He was proved to have forged signatures on two FDRS, and an another FDR he obtained signatures of the victim by misrepresentation.3855

The plea that the accused was a good person and increased business of the bank etc were found irrelevant to discredit documentary evidence proved on record. The conviction of the accused was found proper.[82] If what is executed is not a false document, there is no forgery. If there is no forgery, then neither s 467 nor s 471, IPC is attracted.[83]

The accused an accounts clerk in the bank withdrew money from the complainant-account holder's account by using a withdrawal form and misappropriated the form. The forged signature on the withdrawal form was not proved to be made by the accused, but the signatures on the reverse of the withdrawal form acknowledging the receipt of money, however, was proved to be made by the accused. The accused was held liable to be convicted under s 467 read with s 109 and s 471, IPC .[84] The accused, a bank employee, took a blank bank draft. The second accused forged the signature of the agent on it. The third accused opened the account in the name of a fictitious person, and encashed the forged bank draft. All three accused were found guilty under ss 467, 468, 420, 120B, IPC .[85] In a case of encashment of forged bank draft, the co-conspirator-accused admitted to have a forged signature on a blank bank draft, his plea that he only tried to oblige the other accused and did not know anything more about the offence was not found acceptable.[86]

15. Benefit to Accused, Loss to Any One

Section 467, IPC does not require the prosecution to prove that the accused, who commits forgery, has benefited thereby or any loss has occasioned to anyone thereby.[87]

16. Proof--Importance of Handwriting Expert's Report

Where, besides the testimony of the handwriting expert, there are intrinsic good reasons in the document itself which prove the document conclusively to be a forged document and there remains no doubt that the document was scribed by the accused for the dishonest motive of defeating a certain suit, the accused can be convicted of an offence under s 467, IPC .[88] To establish a case of forgery it is incumbent on the prosecution to obtain opinion, regarding the document, of the handwriting expert.[89]

However, when the signature of the complainant is proved to be forged, merely because the handwriting expert could not positively say that which of the accused persons committed the forgery, the accused persons are not entitled to be acquitted.[90] The conviction cannot be based, merely on the basis of the handwriting expert's opinion.[91] However, when the forensic report as to the writing of the accused,3856 matched with that of the disputed writing on the forged document, the charges under ss 409 and 467, IPC cannot be quashed.[1]

17. Proof--Forging Valuable Security

Section 467, IPC relates to the offence of forgery of a document which purports to be a valuable security. If the body of a blank paper ticket, giving details of the journey and the cost of the ticket is filled in without the signature of the station master, or a person authorised by him, appended thereon, such a document cannot be deemed to be a valuable security. Thus, if in such a case, the prosecution fails to lead evidence that the signature at the place of the station master was in the handwriting of the accused, or, in other words, it was forged by the accused, the accused cannot be held guilty under s 467, IPC, because in the absence of any such proof, it cannot be said that the accused was guilty of forging a valuable security.[2] A deed of agreement for purchase of shares is not a valuable security.[3] The certificates which the accused has found to have forged, to get admission in a college of the university could not be described as, 'valuable security'.[4]

18. Presence of Accused

The writer of a forged receipt cannot be convicted of an offence under s 467, IPC (simpliciter) in the absence of evidence that he was present at the execution of the receipt or that he helped any person to use it.[5] Such evidence has to be a strong evidence because the oral evidence, which runs counter to an admission, contained in writing, signed by a party, in the very nature of things, is a very weak piece of evidence and cannot be accepted without a grain of salt.[6]

19. Proof--Accused Entitled to Plead want of Dishonest or Criminal Intention

There is no estoppel which bars an accused from pleading that he had no dishonest or criminal intention or in other words that he was only foolish, and not criminal.[7]

20. Acquittal

Considering the fact that nearly 18 years had elapsed and mental agony was suffered by the accused, the acquittal of the accused by the Trial Court need not be disturbed.[8] A person cannot be convicted under s 467, IPC, unless his act is shown to have been done dishonestly or fraudulently as required by s 464 .[9] Where the charge that the accused forged a nikah form did not mention the circumstance in which it was forged and thus was vague, even when the oral evidence was adduced at the trial no3857 evidence was produced to prove that charge, there was no legal evidence on the basis of which the accused would be convicted, for these reasons the conviction of the accused under s 467, IPC, was set aside.[10]

21. Conviction

None can be convicted under s 467, IPC, unless it is found that he participated, in any manner, in the act of forging a disputed document.[11] If the accused is not proved to have forged the document, under consideration, within the meaning of s 463 read with s 464, IPC, he cannot be convicted under s 467, IPC . In Swaminath v State ,[12] there was no evidence worth the name that the appellants had actually thumb-marked the sale-deed in place of the complainants and the prosecution had not proved any sign or seal of the appellants on the sale-deed in question. In these circumstances, it was held that the appellants had not forged the sale-deed and, therefore, none of them could be convicted under s 467, IPC .

If the charges against a person is that he abetted the offence of forgery by another and abetment is proved against that person, he must be convicted of the charge under ss 467 and 109, IPC, even though the prosecution is not successful in establishing the particular means, or instrument, selected for the abetment of the offence of forgery.[13] A person, who has not made, signed, or executed a false document but has been instrumental in getting the false document dishonestly or fraudulently made, cannot be convicted under s 467 . He is guilty of abetment and his conviction under s 467 may be altered to one under s 467 read with s 109, IPC .[14] However, if an accused is not found guilty on the charge under ss 467 / 109, IPC, he cannot be convicted of the charge under ss 467 / 471, IPC, because the offence of abetment of forgery is plainly quite different form the offence of using a forged document as genuine.[15] Where, however, charges are framed against the accused under ss 120B / 467, IPC, for the offence of conspiracy to forge a valuable security as well as for abetment under ss 467 / 109, and after the recording of evidence, the charge under ss 120B / 467 is cancelled, the accused can still be convicted, under s 109, IPC, for abetment by conspiracy.[16]

There was evidence that the appellant Junior Engineer entered into criminal conspiracy with the co-accused Assistant Engineer for preparation of false muster roll, and as such false muster rolls were prepared showing names of casual labourers who had not even worked. Accused appellant verified, consigned muster-rolls, gave false certificates. He was convicted under ss 120B, 467, 468, 471 and 420, IPC held proper.[17]

22. Relative Scope of Conviction under Section 467 and Section 471

Commentary under the same heading in s 471, post, may be referred to.3858

23. Relative Scope of Conviction under Section 468 and Section 467

Conviction under s 468, IPC, cannot be converted into a conviction under s 467, IPC, the reason being that the term of imprisonment, under s 467, being larger, s 467, cannot be said to be a minor offence of s 468, IPC .[18]

24. Relative Scope of Conviction under Section 167 and Section 467 / 471

Commentary under the same heading in s 471, post, may be referred to.

25. Separate Conviction for Separate Offences

An accused can be convicted, at one and the same time, of forging a document under s 467 and of using the same as genuine under s 471 .[19] The offences are separate offences and separate sentences may be passed on an accused.[20] However, a person cannot be convicted both under the provisions of s 167 and ss 467 / 471, IPC, as the offence under s 167 is included in the latter offence.[21]

26. Sentence (Deterrent)

Section 467 requires that some imprisonment should be awarded if a person is convicted under the section. A sentence of fine alone is not in accordance with law.[22] Where an accused, a reader holding MSC and Phd degrees was convicted for offences of attempting to issue counterfeit university degrees, it was held that the award of sentence by the sessions court, till rising of the court was too lenient, the award of sentence by the High Court for 3 years was found just and reasonable.[23] In another case, where the accused was found guilty of forging a money-order and collecting file amount, it was held that though the offence was committed out of sheer economic compulsion, the gravity of the offence fully justified 6 months imprisonment.[24] In Ram Narain v State of Punjab ,[25] the accused was convicted for the charge under s 467 read with s 471, IPC and sentenced to 4½ years rigorous imprisonment.

A sentence of five years rigorous imprisonment under s 467 is not too severe for an offence of deliberate forgery of will.[26]

27. Sentence (Lenient)

Where a postman was convicted under ss 409 and 467, IPC, and the sum embezzled was only a petty sum of Rs 10, the circumstances, that he had lost 10 years of3859 service, pension and gratuity, were taken into consideration and the sentence of six months rigorous imprisonment on each count, which was to run consecutively, was altered to one which was to run concurrently.[27] In Mangleshwari Prasad v State of Bihar ,[28] the sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment awarded to the accused under s 409, IPC, and four years rigorous imprisonment under s 467, IPC, were considered excessive and, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, it was deemed just to reduce the sentences to those of three years rigorous imprisonment each with respect to those offences. In Pirabhu Dial v Emperor ,[29] maintaining the conviction of an accused under s 467, the Punjab Chief Court, having regard to the facts that the accused was a man who had previously enjoyed a good reputation, reduced the sentence from two years rigorous imprisonment (including one month's solitary confinement) to one year rigorous imprisonment (with one month's solitary confinement). Where the accused, who was convicted under s 467 and sentenced to one year rigorous imprisonment, was only a tool in the hands of the principal offender, who was still absconding, and the accused had been in jail for seven months from the date of his conviction and had been in remand for another eight or nine months prior to conviction, it was considered just by the High Court to reduce the sentence to the period already undergone.[30] The accused Manager and Assistant Manager of a Co-operative Society had misappropriated amount by forging documents. The High Court had sentenced the accused to one year SI and a fine of Rs 10,000/-. As per direction of the court the appellants deposited the entire embezzled amount, were now aged 74 years also not keeping good health, the sentences imposed were reduced to the period already undergone.[31]

The accused, an officiating manager in a nationalised bank with a wife and two children, committed the offence 10 years ago. He was dismissed from service. He also deposited the entire amount involved in the case. The sentence was therefore reduced from 2 years rigorous imprisonment to one year rigorous imprisonment.[32] Where the offence was committed 20 years ago, the sentence of 2 years rigorous imprisonment awarded by the trial court was reduced to the period already undergone by the accused.[33] The accused was 50 years old and had also lost his employment so the sentence of two years rigorous imprisonment was reduced to six months rigorous imprisonment.[34]

28. No Separate Sentence for Forged Alternative Drafts

Forged documents, which are alternative drafts of one document, do not call for separate punishment.[35]3860

29. Alteration of Conviction from Section 471 read with Section 467 to One under Section 471 read with Section 465

Where the certificates which the accused was found to have forged, to get admission into college could not be described as a valuable security, the conviction of the accused under s 471 read with s 467 was altered to one under s 471 read with s 465, IPC .[36]

S. 468.

Forgery for purpose of cheating.--

Whoever commits forgery, intending that the [37][document or electronic record forged] shall be used for the purpose of cheating, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

Probably, the scope of this section cannot be more adequately denned than by referring to the observations, made in Bisheswar Dayal v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[38] that a document can be said to be forged only if it purports to be signed or sealed by a person who, in fact, never signed or sealed it. Similarly, when an accused issues the receipts in question and has also the authority to issue the same, the charge under this section cannot be made out.

The offence under this section being an aggravated form of the offence of forgery, simpliciter, defined in s 463, IPC, the section does not require that the cheating should be by the forger himself. He can, therefore, be convicted of an offence under this section even if he is not found guilty of cheating.[39] When a person makes a false document, as contemplated by ss 463 and 464, IPC by signing and issuing the passengers' tickets, he can be convicted both under ss 467 and 468, IPC .[40] A schoolmaster, who forges an attendance register for the purpose of obtaining a3861 government grant, is punishable under this section.[41] There may be no direct evidence to the effect that the accused forged the signatures on the receipts of the persons concerned. However, once it is proved that those persons did not exist, then the only conclusion to be drawn is that the signatures do not purport to be of the persons, in whose names they stand, and such a case is clearly covered by the preceding s 467, and also by this section if it was done for cheating.[42]

The offence under this section is complete as soon as there is a forgery with the intent mentioned in the section. When the intended cheating, or an attempt to cheat, takes place, another distinct offence is committed.[43]

It is only that person who commits forgery, thereby creates a document with an intention of using that document for the purpose of cheating, who comes within the scope of such section and not the person who has impersonated another.[44]

2. Accused taking Shelter of 'Market Practice'

Commentary under the same heading in s 465, ante, may be referred to.

3. Document

Section 29 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

4. Electronic Record

Section 29A and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

5. 'Document forged shall be used for the purpose of Cheating'

'Forgery', committed for the purpose of cheating, falls within the purview of this section,[45] as when a person's object is to deceive his employer by falsifying the account-books in his custody and such deception is likely to cause damage to his employer, he can be convicted of forgery with intent to cheat.[46] However, 'forgery' committed subsequent to cheating, does not come within the scope of this section. In Hurmukh Rai v Crown ,[47] the accused falsely read out to an octroi inspector, the contents of an invoice so as to make it appear less than what it was, and afterwards altered the invoice so as to make it correspond with what he dictated to the octroi inspector. It was held that as the alteration was made, after the offence of cheating was complete, for the purpose of saving himself or concealing the offence of cheating, the accused was not liable to be punished for forgery for the purpose of cheating under s 468, IPC .[48]

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.3862

Offence under this section is non-compoundable so lok adalat has no jurisdiction to pass order in a case involving this and other non-compoundable offences.[49]

6. Anticipatory Bail

Commentary under the same heading in s 471, post, may be referred to.

7. Complaint--When to be filed by the Court

Commentary under the same heading in s 467, ante, may be referred to.

8. Forgery before Production of Document in Court--Complaint should not be made by the Court

The bar contained in s 195 (1)(b)(ii), CrPC, is not applicable to a case where forgery of a document was committed before the document was produced in court. The scope of preliminary inquiry envisaged in s 340(1), CrPC, is to ascertain whether any offence affecting the administration of justice has been committed in respect of a document produced in court or given in evidence in a proceeding in that court. In other words, the offence should have been committed during the time when the document was in custodia legis.[50] Therefore, when the forgery of a document is alleged to have been committed before the document was produced in the court, the bar contained under s 195, CrPC is not attracted and the magistrate can take cognizance of the offence under s 468, IPC, pursuant to the chargesheet filed by the police against the accused.[51] To say that irrespective of the fact, whether such an offence was committed at a point of time before which the document was either produced or given in evidence before the court or after the production or giving in evidence of such a document in a judicial proceeding, it is only the court, which received such a document that could complain, is inconsistent with the scheme of s 195 of CrPC . In a given case if document is forged and a party who is likely to be affected by the creation of such a document makes complaint, before such a document is actually used by the maker for deriving any benefit out of such a document by producing the same before a court or some other public authority, the prosecution would certainly be legal, if such a document is to be produced before a court subsequent to the initiation of the prosecution, there is nothing in the law, which prohibits the continuation of the prosecution.[52]

9. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings

The accused was alleged to have a forged power of attorney in respect of sale of property to the complainant. The case of the accused throughout was that he never sold the property in dispute, so the question of execution of the alleged power of attorney did not arise. There was a compromise in which the complainant himself stated that he did not claim any right or title in the property in dispute, on the basis of an agreement to sell. The complainant also had no objection to the quashing of criminal proceedings. Under the circumstances, the FIR registered under3863 ss 420 / 468 / 471, IPC, against the accused as well as proceedings emanating therefrom were quashed.[53] If bald allegations are made in the complaint that shares of the complainant have been transferred on forged signatures, but there is not an iota of material to indicate how all or any of the accused were involved in the alleged forgery, the complaint made under ss 406, 420, 467, 468 and 120B, IPC, is liable to be quashed.[54]

10. Complaint not Quashed under Section 482 , CrPC 1973--Cases

The allegations were that the complainant land owner was induced by the accused (BPCL) to lease out his land for opening a petrol outlet on the assurance that he will be given a dealership, the complainant was also made to give a bank guarantee of rupees four lakhs, but finally the scheme was changed and the dealership was given to some other person. On these facts it could not be said that intention of the accused was bonafide since the very beginning so the order of the magistrate taking cognizance of the offence under ss 468, 420 etc was found proper.[55]

11. Revision--Power of the High Court

In its revision jurisdiction, the High Court can call for and examine the record of any proceedings for the purpose of satisfying itself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of any finding, sentence or order. In other words, the jurisdiction is one of supervisory jurisdiction exercised by the High Court for correcting miscarriage of justice. However, the said revisional power cannot be equated with the power of an appellate court nor can it be treated even as a second appellate jurisdiction. Ordinarily, therefore, it would not be appropriate for the High Court to re-appreciate the evidence and come to its own conclusion on the same when the evidence has already been appreciated by the magistrate as well as the sessions judge in appeal, unless any glaring feature is brought to the notice of the High Court which would otherwise tantamount to gross miscarriage of justice.[56] Therefore, the High Court while exercising revisional jurisdiction cannot while acquitting the accused direct that the accused must be deemed to have been in continuous service without break and should be paid his full pay and allowances during the period of his suspension.[57]

12. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and officer of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the... day of..., at..., you forged a document, Ex..., intending that it shall be used for the purpose of cheating, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 468 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.3864

An FIR was lodged against the accused and no allegations were made against the co-accused, the branch manager of a bank, who was impleaded as the co-accused in the trial of the accused for commission of forgery. The accused admitted his guilt before the trial court but did not state anything against the co-accused. The trial court dismissed the application of the co-accused made under s 239, CrPC, but did not discuss as to what 7 witnesses (PW1 to PW7) stated against the co-accused. Therefore, the order of the trial court rejecting the prayer of discharge of the co-accused was quashed and the matter was remitted to the trial court for passing a fresh order in accordance with law.[58]

13. Report of Finger Print Expert not put to Accused in his Statement under Section 313 , CrPC -- Effect

Section 313, CrPC provides that the accused is required to be given an opportunity to explain any circumstance appearing in the evidence against him. If the prosecution intends to use the finger print report of expert as a piece of evidence, as circumstance appearing against the accused persons, then it should have been put to the knowledge of the accused by the court by pointing out the accused about the said report so that the accused persons could have explained the circumstances.[59]

14. Proof

The prosecution has to establish (i) that the accused committed forgery; and (ii) that he did so with an intention that the document forged shall be used for the purpose of cheating. The object of s 468, IPC was to find out as to whether the accused deceived someone by making false documents. If the prosecution were to establish forging of the documents and intending to use such forged documents for the purpose of cheating, then only the accused is liable for being convicted.[60]

Prosecution is required to prove that:

(a) the disputed document a electronic record is a forged document;
(b) the accused forged the document, (vide s 465, IPC); and
(c) he did so intending that the document or electronic record forged shall be used for the purpose of cheating (vide s 417, IPC).

To secure a conviction under s 468, IPC, a heavy burden lies upon the prosecution to prove the ingredients of s 463 . If there is no convincing evidence to show that the alleged forged permits were signed by the accused, he cannot be convicted under s 468, IPC .[61] Where an accused is charged with an offence of forgery, it is not for the prosecution to establish all the ingredients of forgery. It is not for the accused to show that the signatures on the disputed document are of genuine persons.[62] When once, however, it has been found that there was a conspiracy and, in the course of the conspiracy and in order to achieve the object of the conspiracy, the certificates at the back of AR 3s were forged in order to give impression to the excise officer of the place, from where the goods had been transported, that the goods were received at the destination, all the conspirators, irrespective of the identity of the man, who3865 forged the certificates, shall be guilty of the offence. To prove conspiracy, it is not necessary that there should be direct communication between each conspirator and every other but the criminal design alleged must be common to all. Viewed in that light and having regard to the circumstance that the forging of the certificates was not extraneous to the object of the conspiracy, the conspirators are criminally responsible for the offence under s 468, IPC .[63]

Accused A5, head constable, had submitted false inquiry report on application for passport, he was convicted under ss 419, 420, 468, read with ss 109 and 120B, IPC .[64]

15. Acquittal

If there is no evidence to show that the handwriting on the cheque in dispute was of the accused or that he was connected with the forgery and presentation of the forged cheque, he cannot be convicted on the basis of mere recovery of the bank token.[65] Where the accused, an LIC agent, was charged with cheating LIC, by entering into conspiracy with the co-accused, a development officer, on the ground that insurance policies were got issued on the basis of fake and forged documents and received premium commission and bonus in respect of those policies, the accused was found entitled to be acquitted when the forging of the documents was done by the co-accused and there was no acceptable evidence that the co-accused did that with the knowledge and consent of the accused.[66] Where the accused was alleged to have forged hall tickets to enable some other students to appear for examination in place of actual students, the hall tickets seized from accused were not of relevant examination in progress, and there was no evidence to show as to for what purpose hall tickets were used, the accused was acquitted.[67]

Where the accused, a bank employee, was charged with the offence of misappropriation of money of its account holders and there was nothing to show that he alone was responsible for the transactions, the prosecution had not established that the accused destructed or altered the records, and the account holders from whose accounts the accused was alleged to have mis-appropriated the funds were not examined, further the relevant ledgers and folios were not produced in the court to prove the withdrawal of money by the accused, and the witnesses not supporting the prosecution case were not declared hostile, there was no evidence on record to show that the signatures on the documents were that of the accused, on these facts, the acquittal of the accused was found proper.[68] Appellant accused, Bank Manager, was alleged to have sanctioned loan for obtaining pecuniary advantage. Evidence showed that the loan sanctioned was secured by collateral security, the senior officer of the bank after conducting pre-sanction inspection had recommend the sanction of loan. Held, the appellant had not sanctioned loan dishonestly for obtaining pecuniary advantage. Appellant was acquitted of charges under ss 120B, 420 and 468, IPC .[69] Where the co-accused BDO on the loan applications verified by the accused Gram Sewak, sanctioned loan and the co-accused Branch Manager of the bank disbursed3866 the loan, there was no evidence of any conspiracy between the three accused, the two co-accused BDO and the Branch Manager were acquitted of the charge under s 120B, IPC . The accused Gram Sewak was guilty of forging loan application under s 468, IPC, for the purpose of cheating under s 471, IPC .[70] The prosecution case was that the appellant accused had written the challans, but there was no evidence to prove that the said challans were prepared by the accused for his own interest and the property ie the amount mentioned in the challans were transferred in favour of the accused appellant or the same was used for his personal purposes. Held, no case was made out against the appellant accused for offence under ss 468 and 471, IPC .[71]

The accused chairman and member of a subordinate staff selection board in conspiracy with the accused, a candidate, increased the numbers awarded in *viva voce*test and included him in the list of selected candidates for pecuniary benefits. The act of the three accused persons did not amount to offence of forgery, the accused persons prepared false record of the final result and committed cheating, they were guilty of offence under s 218, s 420, s 477A and s 120B, IPC .[72]

16. Conviction

When the accused being an accounts clerk-cum-cashier allegedly manipulated cash memos, AC bills etc for passing amount for payments therein, the accused in his statement under s 313, CrPC, admitted that the writings on the cash-memos were in his hand and handwriting expert also opined, and the evidence of other witnesses showed that the cash-memos and other documents in question were forged to inflate the respective amounts shown therein with an intention to use such documents for cheating, the conviction of the accused was found proper.[73] The accused, working as an upvaid in ayurvedic aushadhalaya, was proved to have prepared bogus medical bills for government servants. There were concurrent findings of the courts below, that a trap was laid and tainted money was recovered from the accused. The conviction of the accused under ss 120B and 468, IPC, was found proper.[74] The first accused, a bank employee, took a blank bank draft. The second accused forged the signature of the agent on it. The third accused, opened a bank account in the name of a fictitious person and encashed the forged draft. All three accused were found guilty under ss 467, 468, 471 etc.[75] The accused procured a government job reserved for Scheduled Castes by producing a false caste certificate that he belonged to the Scheduled Caste. He served the government for a period of 8 years till the fraud was detected. There was cogent and convincing evidence on record that the accused did not belong to that caste. The accused was found liable to be convicted for offences under ss 419 and 468, IPC .[76] The accused, a stenographer of the High Court prepared a forged bail order by utilisation of which the person concerned obtained the advantage of being released from jail. The accused was found guilty under ss 466 and 468, IPC .[77]3867

There was evidence that the appellant junior engineer entered into criminal conspiracy with the co-accused assistant engineer for preparation of false muster roll, and as such false muster rolls were prepared showing names of casual labourers who had not even worked. Accused appellant verified, consigned muster-rolls, gave false certificates. He was convicted under ss 120B, 467, 468, 471 and 420, IPC held proper.[78]

Where the accused forged income tax refund vouchers and enchased them, he was convicted for offences under ss 468 and 486, IPC .[79]

17. Relative Scope of Conviction under Section 468 and Section 467

Commentary under the same heading in s 467, ante, may be referred to.

18. Relative Scope of Conviction under Section 468 and Section 471

Commentary under the same heading in s 471, post, may be referred to.

19. Probation

The accused, a stenographer of the High Court prepared a forged bail order with the help of which the person concerned was released from jail and the accused was convicted under ss 466 and 468, IPC . However, in view of the fact that the incident took place 27 years ago and the accused had no bad antecedents and the trial court had extended the benefit of probation to the accused, the High Court acquitted the accused, however, the apex court granted the benefit of probation to the accused.[80]

20. Sentence (Severe)

A sentence of six months rigorous imprisinment, passed on an accused under ss 419 and 468, was not considered severe, in Aswini Kumar Gupta v Emperor ,[81] in view of the gravity of the offence (forging answer-papers at the university examination). In Madhavan Ayyappan v State ,[82] the accused, who executed a sale-deed of property, belonging to the complainant, in favour of another person, was awarded a sentence of one year rigorous imprisonment. The High Court raised it to two years rigorous imprisonment. In Jagan Nath v Emperor ,[83] in view of the particular circumstances of the case, a sentence of five years rigorous imprisonment, imposed on the accused, at whose instance another person forged a letter purporting to be from a governor for defrauding an officer, was maintained. Where an accused, a reader holding M Sc and Phd degrees was convicted for offences of attempting to issue, counterfeit university degrees, it was held by the Supreme Court that the award of sentence, by the sessions court, till rising of the court, was too lenient and award of sentence by the High Court for 3 years' was just and reasonable.[84]3868

21. Sentence (Lenient)

The offence of production of forged documents in court took place about 9 years before, so the sentence of rigorous imprisonment for 6 months was reduced to that of two months rigorous imprisonment.[85] In view of the lapse of 30 years from the date of the incident, the sentence of imprisonment for 3 years was reduced to the period already undergone by the accused.[86] Where the accused committed the offence 20 years ago and had also deposited, the disputed amount with the aggrieved corporation, the sentence of imprisonment was reduced to the period already undergone by the accused, but a fine of Rs 2000/-was imposed and in default the accused was to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 1 month.[87] Where the accused aged about 68 years had no family and had weak economic conditions, there was no material showing that the accused was involved in any other or similar offences, and he had almost undergone the substantive sentence of imprisonment, looking at the age, economic position and the family background of the accused while maintaining the conviction and the sentence of imprisonment, the sentence of fine was modified and the fine was reduced from Rs 5,000/- to Rs 1,000/- for each of the offences and in default thereof to undergo 7 days rigorous imprisonment.[88] Where the accused was on the verge of retirement and had school going children and was not a previous convict, the sentence of one year rigorous imprisonment was reduced to 3 months rigorous imprisonment.[89]

Where the accused appellants were convicted for offence of criminal conspiracy, cheating and forgery, the occurrence took place 15 years before, the appellants had remained in custody for about one month, sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[90]

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

S. 469.

Forgery for purpose of harming reputation.--

Whoever commits forgery, [91][intending that the document or electronic record forged] shall harm the reputation of any party, or knowing that it is likely to be used for that purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The section punishes a person who commits forgery with (1) intent that the document or electronic record forged shall harm the reputation of any party; or (2) knowledge that the said document or electronic record is likely to be used for that purpose. 3869

Accused was charged under s 469, IPC for sending forged e-mail, he intended to harm the reputation of the complainant. The message did not disclose intent to harm the reputation of the complainant. The accused was discharged.[1]

2. 'Document'

Commentary under s 29, vol 1, may be referred to.

3. Electronic Record

Section 29A, vol 1, may be referred to.

4. 'Harm the Reputation'

In this section, 'harm' is to the reputation of the aggrieved party.[2]

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

6. Complaint--When to be filed by Court

Commentary under the same heading in s 465, and s 467 ante, may be referred to.

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the ... day of .... at ..., you forged a document. Ex ..., intending that the same shall harm the reputation of AB (or knowing that it is likely to be used for the purpose of harming the reputation of AB), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 469 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge

8. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the document in question is a forgery (vide s 465);
(b) the accused forged it; and
(c) the accused did so intending that the said forged document should harm the reputation of any party or that he knew that it was likely to be used for that purpose. 3870

Forged [3][document or electronic record].--

A false [3][document or electronic record] made wholly or in part by forgery is designated "a forged [3][document or electronic record]".

Comments

1. Scope

A document may be false, either wholly or in part, and if it is made with any of the intents, specified in s 463, the offence of forgery is committed. As a corollary, this section defines 'a forged document' to make use of such 'a forged document' as genuine punishable as an offence under the next s 471 .

This section is inclusive of other ss 465 to 471, which define an aggravated form of forgery.[4]

Using as genuine a forged [3][document or electronic record].--

Whoever fraudulently or dishonestly uses as genuine any [3][document or electronic record] which he knows or has reason to believe to be a forged [3][document or electronic record], shall be punished in the same manner as if he had forged such [3][document or electronic record].

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes the dishonest or fraudulent use of a false document as genuine when there is evidence of its use by the offender. The offence of using, as genuine, a3871 forged document is complete once the document is produced or given in evidence.[5] According to the Allahabad High Court, the concluding words 'as if he had forged such document', in the section, indicate that the section is directed against some person other than a person proved to be the actual forger. Accordingly, a forger cannot be punished both for forging a document (s 465, IPC) and for using it as genuine (s 471, IPC).[6] The former Punjab chief court took the same view.[7] The Madras High Court dissented from this view and held that s 471 only lays down that the sentence, that can be imposed for the offence of using a forged document as genuine, is the same as the sentence that can be imposed for the offence of forgery and that separate sentences may be passed on an accused person who had been convicted at the same trial of both the offences.[8] However, the Madras High Court has held that a person, who abets the forgery of a document, sought to be used by him as genuine, cannot be convicted under s 471 .[9] The view of the former judicial commissioner's court at Nagpur is not uniform. It took the Madras view that a person can be convicted both of forgery and of using as genuine a forged document.[10] It also took the contrary view in Digambar v Emperor ,[11] and Ismail Panju v Emperor ,[12] following the Allahabad view in Empress v Umrao Lal .[13] The Mysore High Court also took the view of the Madras High Court.[14] It is submitted that the Madras and Mysore view is to be preferred and that separate sentences may be passed on an accused person who has been convicted, at the same trial, of both the offence, ie, an offence under s 465 and an offence under s 471, IPC .

Where the co-accused BDO on the loan applications verified by the accused Gram Sewak sanctioned loan and the co-accused Branch Manager of the bank disbursed the loan, there was no evidence of any conspiracy between the three accused, the two co-accused BDO and the Branch Manager were acquitted of the charge under s 120B, IPC . The accused Gram Sewak was guilty of forging loan application under s 468, IPC, for the purpose of cheating under s 471, IPC .[15]

3. Distinction between Sections 463, 465 and 471 and Sections 193 and 196, IPC

4. Section 471 Distinguished from Section 182

The offence under this section is complete the moment the document is filed and it is not dependent upon the public servant's action upon the document whereas for bringing it within the ambit of s 182, IPC, one has to go a step forward and to show that the public servant has acted upon that document. The ingredients of both the sections are, therefore, different. In other words, it means that the offence under s 471, IPC, is distinct from the offence under s 182, IPC, and as such the bar of filing complaint by the public servant in accordance with s 195, CrPC, can have no application.[16]

5. Sections 463 , 464, 465, 471IPC and Section 146(P) of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act (23 of 1961)--Distinction

Commentary under the same heading in s 465, ante, may be referred to.

6. Essential Ingredients

The ingredients of s 463 of IPC and the ingredients of s 471 of IPC are separate and distinct.[17] The essential elements[18] of an offence under this section are as follows:

(a) the document (or electronic record) in question must be a forged document or (electronic record;);
(b) the accused must have used the same as genuine; and
(c) he must have so used the same fraudulently, or dishonestly,
(d) he knew, or had reason to believe, that it (i.e., the document or electronic record) was a forged document or (electronic record).

The prosecution case was that the appellant accused had written the challans, but there was no evidence to prove that the said challans were prepared by the accused for his own interest and the property ie the amount mentioned in the challans were transferred in favour of the accused appellant or the same was used for his personal purposes. Held, no case was made out against the appellant accused for offence under ss 468 and 471, IPC .[19]

7. Accused taking Shelter of 'Market Practice'

Commentary under the same heading in s 465, ante, may be referred to.

8. 'Fraudulently or Dishonestly uses as Genuine any Document'

Dishonesty or fraud is a necessary ingredient of an offence punishable under this section.[20] There must be a fraudulent or dishonest use of a forged document as3873 genuine before a conviction can be had under the section.[21] The word 'fraudulently' is used, in this section and s 464, together with the word 'dishonestly', and presumably in a sense not covered by the latter word.[22] It must mean something different from 'dishonestly' and must be taken to mean 'with intent to defraud'.[23] The Calcutta High Court, in Lolit Mohan's case, dissented from the Allahabad rulings in Empress v Jiwanand ,[24] and Empress v Girdhari Lal .[25] Another Allahabad decision, belonging to this group, is Empress v Mazahar Hussain .[26] If AB, knowing that a bill is forged, utters it to CD and means that CD should believe it to be genuine, the court is bound to infer that AB did it with intent to defraud.[27] It is worth mentioning here that however good a person's title to property may be, yet if, in the course of an action brought against him, he uses the forged document by way of supporting his title, though there may be no necessity for the use of it, he clearly uses it fraudulently.[28] If a party to a suit sets up two different titles and supports one of them with a false document, he commits an offence under s 471, IPC, even if it be found that the other title is good.[29] Where the accused knowing that the mark list in question was not a genuine document, made use of that forged document to get admission for an MBBS course, it was held that he committed the offence punishable under s 471 .[30] Where, however, the evidence showed that the offender had ante-dated a document and his only object was to clear up the position between himself and his brothers, and there was neither dishonesty, nor fraud on his part, he was not held guilty under ss 465 and 471 .[31]

The term 'fraudulently', in this section, does not necessarily connote injury to the person deceived; it may, but it need not, do so.[32]An act may be fraudulent even though it does not cause any loss or injury or intended loss or injury to any one.[33] Neither the acquisition, not the deprivation, of property is an essential ingredient of an offence under this section.[34] The section applies to the case of a person who appears before some other person, or before a court, and endeavours to induce that person or court to do some act which he or it would not do if he or it knew of the3874 forgery.[35] If a person, by deceiving another, derives any advantage from the deceit, which he could not have had if the truth had been known, and thereby causes injury to the mind, body or reputation of the deceived, he commits fraud.[36] In Empress v Abbas Ali ,[37] the accused, for the purpose of appearing in an examination and to secure a certificate of fitness to serve as an engine-driver of ocean-going steamers, forged a testimonial of service and good character. He was held guilty under s 471, IPC . A bench clerk received a sum of money paid as fine and misappropriated it. He forged a false receipt for the purpose of misappropriating that money. His conviction under ss 467 and 471, IPC, was upheld.[38] An offence is committed under s 471 whenever a document, known, or believed, by the accused to have been forged, is used as genuine with the intention that some person thereby should be deceived.[39] The fact that the accused held a decree which was capable of execution on the date, on which it was filed, namely, 21 July 1938, does not prevent the alterations in the certified copy of the decree, filed on behalf of the accused from being fraudulent or the accused's user of it from being fraudulent.[40] Where, however, the alteration of the date of a document not only did not help the accused, but actually ruined his case, the element of 'dishonestly' or 'fraud', as required under the provisions of s 464, was held to be wanting, and, therefore, the accused could not be convicted under s 471, IPC .[41]

9. Document

Section 29 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

10. Electronic Record

Section 29A, vol 1, may be referred to.3875

11. 'Uses'

The expression 'uses...any document', in this section, is apparently used in the sense of its being put forward in some way for one of the purposes mentioned in s 463, IPC .[42] It must be shown that the accused used the document as genuine with full knowledge that it was a forged one. The use is very necessary.[43] It is, however, not necessary that the forged document should be used in judicial proceedings. Since the section is in general terms, the use of a forged document can be made anywhere.[44] It is also not at all necessary that the court should accept the document produced before it or filed in court. If a person puts forward a document as supporting his claim in any matter, whether the document is acted upon by the court or used in evidence is immaterial.[45] It is also not necessary that the user must be an effective one.[46] To constitute an offence under ss 467 / 471, IPC, the nature of the user is not material.[47] Whether there has been user must depend upon the circumstances of each case.[48]

12. Used Document must be Fraudulent or Dishonest

The use of a document as genuine must be fraudulent or dishonest. The use of a forged document, which is contemplated by this section, is such use as causes wrongful loss. The use of a forged document will be fraudulent and dishonest under this section even though the document itself is unnecessary for the case of the party, who uses it, and though he, infact, has a perfectly good title without it. Therefore, in order to bring a person within the purview of s 471, it is enough if he files a forged document which he knows or has reason to believe that it is a forged document.[49] It is incorrect to say that even though the other elements, envisaged by s 471, IPC, are satisfied, the person, filing the document, would not be guilty of an offence under s 471, IPC, if there is nothing to show that the forged document, admittedly filed by the offender and intended to be used as evidence subsequently in support of his case, was 'exhibited' as a document and the court had an opportunity to record its finding as to whether it was a genuine or a forged document. Similarly, the mere filing of a document is enough to bring the party, filing it, within the mischief of this section.[50] In Idu Jolaha v

Emperor ,[51] it was held that the filing of forged documents with a plaint is user of them within the meaning of this section. It was observed that inasmuch as documents, filed with a plaint, may be rejected or their use refused at a3876 subsequent stage of the case and the first step forwards admission being the filing of them with the plaint, the filing of documents with a plaint is user. In Baju Jha v Emperor ,[52] it was held that s 471, IPC, applies to a user of a document for the purpose of securing an acquittal, and its applicability is not restricted to user for the purpose of producing material gain or material loss to another, and that the obtaining of an acquittal is very distinctly the obtaining of an advantage and brings the case within the definition of 'dishonestly' in s 24, IPC . It was, therefore, held that s 471, IPC, applies not only in cases where the document has been given in evidence, but also in cases where it has been produced, and that the ambit of the word 'produced' is very wide as to include documents filed or presented, but either rejected or not taken into account by the court. In Mobarak Ali v Emperor ,[53] it was held that the filing of a forged document as the basis of a plaint or as a necessary sequel to the pleas in the plaint constitutes a user of it within the meaning of s 471, IPC, and it is incumbent on the person, using it, to show that he filed the document in all good faith believing it to be genuine. However, the mere fact, that a litigant is interested in establishing the contents of a forged document, filed by him, in support of his case, does not raise the presumption that he filed it knowing it to be forged. There must be the using of a document by a person who knows or has reason to believe that it is forged. The element of fraud or dishonesty must be present in the mind of the accused.[54] At least, in certain circumstances, mere filing of a document may constitute a user.[55] It is so when the accused files the document in a court with the intention of relying on it at the trial even though the document itself is not actually used.[56] Of course, the mere filing of a list of (forged) documents is not the same thing as the filing of the document themselves.[57] Likewise, a mere statement, that a document is a genuine document, does not amount to using it as genuine.[58] Where an accused mentions a document in his affidavit of this document in his possession and is forged, by the opposite party, to refer to this document in his evidence, it is not a user of the document. All, that can be inferred from the mention of the document, is that the accused, at the particular stage, has made preparation for using the document.[59] However, the use of a forged document, clearly referred to in another document, to support a false claim constitutes an offence under s 471 .[60] Presentation of forged3877 document (of sale) before a sub-registrar is sufficient evidence of user.[61] An accused person may not have physically presented a forged document for registration but if the evidence shows that he actively participated in the process of presentation, he can be properly convicted under s 471, IPC .[62] It is user whether a party files a document personally or, as more usually happens, through a legal representative. Further, such legal representative will be presumed to have filed the document with the knowledge and authority of his client until the contrary is shown.[63] The mere production of the document in support of the claim made by the accused is sufficient for the purpose of determining the guilt under this section. It matters a little whether the document was presented by the accused himself, or by his agent expressly authorised in that behalf, or whether it was produced by the accused of his own motion or pursuant to the order to the court.[64] However, if the accused's pleader has cross-examined upon some document produced and put, in evidence, by the prosecution, the accused, by such action, does not make himself liable to be prosecuted for using a forged document under s 471, IPC .[65]

13. Use of Document must be Voluntary

The use of a document contemplated by s 471 must be a voluntary one, and not the mere production of the document in compliance with an order of the court.[66] The production, voluntarily and mainly to secure the accused's ends, of a forged title-deed in answer to a citation, in which no particular deed is specified, is user within the meaning of s 471, IPC .[67] Where the accused was told to produce copies of revenue records in support of his complaint of trespass and it was found that the accused had knowingly produced forged copies as genuine, the accused was held guilty under s 471, IPC .[68] In Emperor v Mohil Kumar Mukerjee ,[69] Page J, not acquiescing in the reasoning of the Madras decisions,[70]observed that if the person, who had been served with the summons, fails to disclose that he believes that the document is forged document and fraudulently or dishonestly puts forward the document as being a genuine document, he does not act involuntarily; he deliberately uses the document of a criminal purpose. To hold otherwise would be to afford a ready method by which the provision of s 471 can be evaded. It is submitted that if the Calcutta view is to be followed, a person will be impelled on the horns of a dilemma; if he fails to produce the forged document in obedience to a summons, he3878 would be punishable under s 175, IPC and if he does produce, in the circumstances, the forged document, he would run the risk of prosecution of an offence under s 475, IPC . The correct view seems to be that the production contemplated by s 471, is a voluntary one as reflected in the decisions of the Madras High Court. The Supreme Court, in S Dutt v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[71] appears to have approved the view that there can be no user of document within the meaning of s 471 unless the document is produced voluntarily. Their lordships of the Supreme Court cited the authorities in assistant session judge, North Arcot v Ramammal ,[72] and Ma Ain Lon v Ma On Lu ,[73] and concluded that even if the document was used, the use was neither dishonest nor fraudulent and the expert's conduct did not come within the purview of s 471, IPC . However, the Supreme Court has held, in Jagannath Prasad v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[74] that a person, who produces documents, cannot be heard to say that because he was required to prove his case by the best evidence, he produced forged documents. It cannot be said in such a case that the forged documents were not 'used', the production of a document (kabuliyat) is voluntary when the forged document is produced in a civil suit by conspiracy between the accused, one of them being made the custodian of the document to get over some technical difficulty. In such a case, the accused can be held guilty of using the forged document as genuine.[75]

14. Use of Copy or Attested Copy of a Document

Section 471, IPC does not lay down that the use, contemplated by it, can only occur when the original itself is produced. Where it is possible to produce an attested copy which will serve the purpose of the original document, there would be use of the forged document as genuine though through the attested copy.[76] When a person files a copy of a document, he is using, in substance, the original itself if the filing is with the knowledge that the copy is a copy of a forged document. The filing of a certified copy with the knowledge that it is copy of a forged document amounts to user of the document.[77] The copy of a forged document is not itself a forged document though its user in certain conditions may amount to an offence under s 471, IPC .[78] Thus, where the offender uses a copy of a document, knowing, or having reason to believe, that the entries in the original documents were forgeries, he would be guilty of an3879 offence under s 471, IPC .[79] It is worth mentioning here that it is necessary to prove that the use has been dishonest or fraudulent and that the person, putting in the copies, knew, or had reason to believe, that the originals were forged.[80]

15. 'Which he knows or Has Reason to believe to be a Forged Document'

To constitute an offence under s 471 of IPC, that there must be a false document made wholly or in part by forgery, is designated as a forged document.[81] Before a conviction can be had under this section, it is necessary to prove that the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that the document used was a forgery.[82] If the document is known to be not genuine and it is used, it is sufficient for holding him guilty of an offence under this section.[83] Where the mark sheet was forged by the father of a student so as to be used for securing admission in a medical course, the total marks in the forged mark sheet were showing more marks than that which the student could get even if he secured cent percent marks, the said mark sheet purported to have been drawn up after re-valuation, however, indicated the same date of seal as that of the original mark sheet, the plea thus, by the accused, ie, student and his father about their not knowing the said mark sheet to be forged was found not sustainable.[84] Appellant accused knowing that the marks list was a forged document was not a genuine document, made use of marks list, to get admission for MBBS course. Held, the appellant committed the offence punishable under s 471, IPC .[85] A person, who, in a civil suit, used, as genuine, a document (purporting to be a receipt in which he fraudulently altered the dates and added witnesses), knowing it to be a forged document, commits an offence under s 471, and not under s 196, IPC .[86] If a person, as the guardian of his minor daughter, causes a forged Will to come into existence intending that such Will may cause the judge, before whom the suit is filed, to form an opinion that the Will is a genuine one and therefore his minor daughter is entitled to the property, he is guilty of an offence under ss 467 and 471, IPC .[87] A clerk forged entries in his savings bank pass-book, with a view to enhance his bank balance, and gave the same as security for his service. He was held guilty of the offence under this section.[88] If a person negotiates a hundi, knowing it to be a forged document, he is guilty of an offence under s 471, IPC .[89]

Where the accused, after obtaining a prescription from a doctor for one tube of morphia, altered the words, 'one tube' to 'four tubes', presented the prescription to a chemist and obtained from him four tubes of morphia, it was held that the accused used, as genuine, a document which he knew to be forged, and, therefore, his3880 conviction under ss 465 / 471, IPC, was justified.[90] Presentation of a forged deed of divorce for registration and obtaining registration thereof is an offence under this section.[91] However, the mere fact, that the purchaser of a property is in possession of a document, which is shown to be a forgery would be no evidence of the guilt of the purchaser;[92] it would not show that he knew, or he had reason to believe, that it was a forged document in the absence of sufficient material on the record.[93] In the case of Chait Ram v State of Haryana ,[94] it was emphasised that the accused must have the requisite guilty knowledge of the forged character of the document at the time when such forged document is presented by him; it is immaterial if, at a subsequent point of time, he comes to know its forged character. The mere fact, that the document was forged, would not conclude the matter unless it is also established that the accused knew, or be had reason to believe, that the document was a forged document.[95] The mere fact, that the suspicions of a person ought to have been aroused by the sight of the document, is prima facie evidence that he knew, or he had reason to believe, that the document was a forged document.[96] In order to punish a person under s 471, it is not necessary that the accused himself should have made or created the forged document.[97]

Where the accused placed a forged draft before bank for its encashment, knowing fully well that it was a forged document, he committed offence under s 471, IPC .[98]

16. Jurisdiction

Where a complaint was filed by a partner of a firm alleging that a forged document, viz, dissolution deed was filed in the High Court of Calcutta by another partner in a pending proceeding, the metropolitan Magistrate at Calcutta had territorial jurisdiction to take cognizance of the said complaint. The facts that the said document was forged outside Calcutta or that the production of document was not voluntary but in response to the direction of the High Court were immaterial. Further, how far the use of document was voluntary cannot be decided while testing territorial jurisdiction.[99]3881

17. Abetment

When, the endorsements on a certain passport have been made with a view to help the person having his photograph on the passport, to travel to foreign countries, to which he is not entitled to travel, such endorsements are obviously made dishonestly and fraudulently and therefore, the offence under s 471 read with s 109, IPC, must be deemed to have been committed.[1] Where, however, the endorsement on the passports are not satisfactorily proved to be in the handwriting of the accused, nor it has been showed that he had any connection with the passport holders, he cannot be held liable under s 471 read with s 109, IPC .[2]

18. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the magistrate of the first class.

19. Sanction for Prosecution of Government Servant

Commentary under the headings in s 409 and s 420 ante, may be referred to.

20. Anticipatory Bail

The accused was a tenant of a disputed property. The allegations were that he constructed a false document of an agreement to sell the tenanted property. The CBI investigation was pending. The landlady disputed the execution of the alleged agreement to sell, and the expert report showed that her signatures on the photocopy of agreement produced were forged. The accused successfully acquired title to the property, through process of the civil court by using that document. Under these circumstances, the anticipatory bail was declined to the accused, against whom the offence under ss 420 / 467 / 468 / 471 read with 120B, IPC, were alleged in the FIR registered by the CBI.[3]

21. Complaint--When to be filed by Court

According to s 195(1)(b)(ii), CrPC, no court shall take cognizance of an offence punishable under s 471, IPC, when such offence is alleged to have been committed in respect of a document, produced, or given in evidence, in a proceeding in a court except on a complaint, in writing, of that court or of some other court to which that court is subordinate. Similarly, when an offence under s 471, IPC, is alleged to have been committed in respect of a document, produced, or given in evidence, in a proceeding in a court, a complaint by the court is essential.[4]Section 195(1)(b)(ii), CrPC, is not, however, confined to cases in which the offence under s 471, IPC, mentioned in the clause, is committed in respect of the disputed document after it has been so produced, or given in evidence, in a proceeding in a court, meaning thereby that the offence under s 471, IPC, may have been committed in respect of the document in question when it was in the custody of the court. Complaint by the court will be necessary even when the offence under s 471, IPC, may have already been3882 committed in respect of that document outside the court, and later on produced, or given in evidence, in court in a proceeding between the parties,[5] with the result that if there is breach of the provisions of s 195(1)(b)(ii), CrPC, the proceedings are illegal and ought to be quashed.[6] However, the necessity for a complaint by the court would not arise when the offence under s 471, IPC, is alleged to have been committed in respect of a document, not produced, or not given in evidence, in a proceeding in court.[7] If, during the course of proceedings which are subsequently declared ultra vires and illegal, an offence under s 471, IPC, is alleged to have been committed, it cannot be said that it was committed in relation to a judicial proceeding.[8] A complaint by the court is, similarly, not necessary when the offence under s 471, IPC, is said to have been committed in respect of the copy of a forged document, produced, or given in evidence in a proceeding in court. By the production of a copy of a forged document in evidence, the forged document itself cannot be said to be given in evidence.[9]

It is well settled that where an accused commits some offences which are separate and distinct from those contained in s 195, s 195 will affect only the offences mentioned therein unless such offences form an integral part so as to amount to offences committed as a part of the same transaction, in which case the other offence also would fall within the ambit of s 195, CrPC . Thus, where the accused had removed the used court-fees stamps and reused some of them in new cases and they were charged for the offences under ss 262, 263, 467, 471, 420, 120B, IPC, however on the facts narrated by the registrar of the High Court in his complaint, no offence under ss 467, 471 and 120B, IPC, was at all revealed, consequently the proceedings against the accused were quashed by the High Court under s 482 as far as offences under ss 467, 471 and 120B, IPC, were concerned, not because they were converted by s 195, CrPC, but because allegations contained in the complaint did not constitute those offences and the High Court further directed that other offences mentioned above did not require a complaint under s 195, CrPC, and would have to be tried, the order of the High Court was legal and fully justified. The fact that some persons aided and abetted the detaching of the used stamps from the old files, re-using them in the other cases does not involve any process of forgery or use of a forged document.[10]

If a complaint is filed only under s 193, IPC, but it contains facts which constitute an offence under s 471, IPC, the omission specifically to refer to s 471, IPC, does not prevent the court, trying the case, from holding that on those facts, an offence under s 471, IPC, has been made out.[11]3883

22. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings

The accused obtained an appointment on the basis of a false certificate. The said certificate was issued by the head master of the school whose signature on the certificate was found genuine and his authorship of the certificate was established. The contents of the certificate were, therefore, not forged, though they may be incorrect. The proceedings under ss 464 and 471, IPC, were quashed.[12] The accused was authorised to send telex messages in the discharge of his duty and accordingly he sent the telex message in his own name using his own powers and not in the name of his superiors, nor in the name of somebody else in the bank. As he was duly authorised or empowered to send such a message, therefore, even from the allegations in the complaint, no offence under ss 463 and 471, IPC, was made out against the accused. The accused was first chargesheeted in a departmental inquiry and was terminated from service within one year of the alleged offence. Everything that was necessary for filing a complaint was available at the end of one year but there was unreasonable delay in filing the complain. The complaint and order of issue of process against the accused was, therefore, quashed.[13] When the execution of power of attorney is in the name of a dead person, the complaint filed by the legal heirs is maintainable and it cannot be quashed on the ground that the complainant was not a person directly affected.[14]

23. Joint Trial

Where a person commits forgery and another abets it and uses the forgery document as genuine, the offences are parts of the same transaction, and both can be tried together.

24. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the... day of..., at..., fraudulently (or dishonestly) used, as genuine, a document. Ex..., which you knew (or which you had reason to believe), at the time when you used it, to be a forged document, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under ss 465 (or 466 or 467) and 471 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

This section does not specify the punishment but declares that the offender 'shall be punished in the same manner as if he had forged such document', ie, as forgery of the document to which the offence related. Thus, a charge under this section should not be laid under this section alone, but under this section coupled with s 445 or s 466 or s 467 according to the nature of the document used.[15] The charge should, as far as possible, follow the penalty section which, in the case of an offence under s 471, is3884 s 465, but all the definitions of forgery need not be imported into the charge.[16] Offence under s 471, IPC is an inferior offence of similar nature to the offence punishable under s 467, IPC . Where an accused is charged under s 467, IPC, he can be convicted under s 471, IPC, even though no charge under s 471, IPC has been framed.[17]

In Empress v Raghunath Das ,[18] the accused was charged under s 471 for using, as genuine, eleven forged rent receipts. These receipts were put in by him in three sets in three suits, pending against him, on different occasions. The receipts in each set were put in each suit simultaneously together with a written statement in the particular case. Three charges were framed against him in respect of each set of receipts. He was convicted and sentenced on the said three charges. It was contended, on appeal, that a separate charge should have been made for each one of the documents and that, consequently, the trial should be set aside as being contrary to law, inasmuch as it was really a trial of eleven offences of using forged receipts. It was held that the using charged were merely the putting of each set of documents, in each suit, simultaneously together with the written statement in each case, and as there was nothing to show that any of them was used at any other time, there was no valid ground for questioning the correctness of the conviction.

A person, who fabricates false evidence for the purpose of being used at any stage of a judicial proceeding, commits an offence under s 193 . No useful purpose is served by prosecuting a person, under s 193 or s 196, and also under s 471, in respect of the same document. In such a case, if, at the discretion of the court, a complaint is filed, inter alia, under ss 193 and 471 and process is ordered to issue under those sections, the magistrate would be right in discharging the accused under s 471 on the prosecution not pressing the complaint under s 471 .[19]

25. Proof

To secure a conviction under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the document or electronic record in question was forged document or electronic record (vide s 465);
(b) the accused used the said forged document or electronic record as a genuine document or electronic record;
(c) he knew, or he had reason to believe, that it was a forged document or electronic record when he used it; and
(d) he used it fraudulently or dishonestly.

The prosecution must prove, first of all, that the document in question was a forged document, and not merely that it was a false document.[20] It is not sufficient for the prosecution to establish that the disputed document was not genuine document.[21] Consequently, it is necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused had made3885 the forged document, or that somebody else had made it, with one of the intentions, stated in s 463 .[22]

When an accused person has been booked under s 471, IPC, the prosecution ought to have established that a forged document has been used by him as a genuine one. In the absence of the proof with regard to the forgery, which is attracted by s 467, no conviction under s 471, IPC would be based.[23] To establish an offence under s 471, IPC, the prosecution must adduce cogent and convincing proof that the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that the document, which he used, was a forged document.[24] The prosecution must affirmatively show that the accused either knew, or he had reason to believe, that the document in question was a forged document when he used it.[25] In a case in which the accused was charged for dishonestly using as genuine a pattah (lease) which he knew to be forged and in which there was a fraudulent insertion of a certain word (pahar), it was held that it was not necessary to prove that he personally inserted the word; it was sufficient if it was inserted with his knowledge.[26]

To constitute an offence under s 471, IPC, the prosecution must prove the following ingredients:

(i) That the document was forged one.
(ii) That the accused person used such document fraudulently or dishonestly.
(iii) That the accused used the document, in question, as a genuine one.

(iv) That the accused knew or had reason to believe that it was a forged document.[27]

26. Acquittal

The accused prepared letters on the letter head of the minister whereupon invitations were written to invite actors for a cultural show but the letters did not the bear signatures of the minister, the conviction of the accused under ss 465 and 471, IPC, was not found proper.[28] In the revision petition, the company being the respondent was represented by a named person who was the assistant secretary of the complainant company before its amalgamation and general manager in the new company. In these circumstances, if that person signed a vakalatnama without mentioning his designation and name of the company, he could not be said to have committed offences under ss 467, 471 or 193, IPC .[29] The accused, an assistant manager in a financial corporation was alleged to have provided a loan to a small scale enterpreneur who had made a false claim of purchase of new machinery which was infact old machinery purchased by him. No part of the mortgage deed, however, suggested that the loanee, the small scale enterpreneur, was required to purchase new3886 machinery. Machinery, even, if, an old one was found sufficient to meet the liability of the financial corporation. The inspection report prepared by the accused nowhere mentioned that plant and machinery was new so the inspection report cannot be said to be a false or a forged document. The conviction of the accused was not found proper and so was set aside.[30] Temporary embezzlement by the accused clerk employed in the office of Deputy Superintendent of Police of a paltry sum viz Rs 1839 for a period of 21 days was held covered by s 95, IPC . The accused was granted benefit of s 95, IPC, and acquitted of charges under ss 409, 471, 477, IPC .[31]

27. Conviction

Where the appointment on compassionate ground was obtained by producing forged documents/testimonials, the conviction of the accused was found proper.[32] Where the acts, found by the magistrate, for which the accused was committed for trial, to the session court, for which he was tried by the court and for which he defended himself, and which were raised for consideration on appeal to the High Court, are all one and the same, the High Court as a of appeal, can come to the conclusion that the acts constitute the substantive offence under s 471, rather than an attempt of which the accused had formally been charged and convicted, provided the accused is not prejudiced by alteration of the findings.[33] Where the accused used the forged certificates by handing them over to the victims, which led them to believe that they were genuine appointment letter, it was held that a clear case under s 471, IPC, was made out.[34] When, however, the prosecution has failed to prove entrustment of the cheque book to the accused or the forgery of the cheque in question, he cannot be convicted under s 471, IPC .[35]

Where, in respect of serious defaulcation of properties of a co-operative society, entering into conspiracy by the accused to cause defaulcation was one of the charges which failed, the conviction of the chairman of the managing committee of the society under ss 408, 409, 467 and 471, IPC, on the basis of vicarious liability was improper when he was not charged under s 120B and there was no direct evidence convicting the accused-chairman with the acts of commission and omission for which he was convicted.[36]

There was evidence that the appellant junior engineer entered into criminal conspiracy with the co-accused assistant engineer for preparation of false muster roll, and as such false muster rolls were prepared showing names of casual labourers who had not even worked. Accused appellant verified, consigned muster-rolls, gave false certificates. His conviction under ss 120B, 467, 468, 471 and 420, IPC held proper.[37]

The accused forged a document alleged to be a confidential letter issued by the director of education directing payment of salary of others to be paid to the accused. The alleged signatory of the letter in his statement before the court stated that the document did not bear his signature so there was no need to send the document for3887 expert examination. A number of incriminating documents and seals were also recovered from the possession of the accused. The conviction of the accused under s 471, IPC, was found proper.[38] The accused was proved to have submitted a bill regarding leave travel concession without actually undertaking travelling and therefore was found guilty under s 471, IPC .[39] The cheques issued in the name of the supplier were encashed by accused no 1 by opening the account in the bank in the name of the supplier. The writings on the withdrawal slip and signatures on it tallied with that of accused no 1. The pass book issued by the bank in the name of supplier was seized from accused no 1. The other accused no 2, an account holder of the bank, recommended accused no 1's forged name to the bank. As accused no 1 and accused no 2 worked in the same company, accused no 2 knew accused no 1's correct name. The connection of both accused no 1 and accused no 2 under ss 419, 468 and 471, IPC, was found proper.[40] If the accused persons knowing the mark list to be forged, use it for the purpose of obtaining a seat in the medical college, their conviction under s 471 was held proper.[41]

28. Relative Scope of Conviction under Sections 468 and 471

A charge under s 471, IPC, is wholly dependent upon the charge under s 468, IPC, and, therefore, if a charge of forgery under s 468 fails, the one of use of forged document as genuine cannot survive.[42] If an accused is charged and convicted under s 468 by the trial court, the conviction cannot be altered to one under s 471 because an offence under s 471 is entirely different from that under s 468 and the accused, not having had notice thereof, would be prejudiced.[43] However, where the allegations against the accused are of such a nature that it is doubtful whether he has committed the offence under s 468 or whether it is doubtful whether he has committed the offence under s 468 or whether he is also guilty of the offence under s 471, he can be convicted of the cognate offence under s 471, though he is only charged for the offence under s 468, IPC .[44] Where, however, a document (a receipt), alleged to be produced at an octroi naka, is proved to be a forgery but there is no evidence that the accused actually forged it, or that he even knew, when he presented it, that it was forged and it was shown as to how the forged document, if it did, came into his hands, and further the accused contends that the case was false and malicious, there is a large margin of doubt to the benefit of which the accused is entitled. The conviction under s 468 or s 471 cannot, therefore, be allowed to stand.[45]

29. Relative Scope of Conviction under Sections 467 And 471

Where the accused was charged for an offence under s 467, IPC and it appeared in evidence that he committed an offence under s 471, IPC, for which he might have been charged under s 221(1), CrPC, he may be convicted of the offence under s 471 3888 though he is not charged with it.[46] Where, however, the charge has been framed under s 467, and not under s 471, IPC, and the charge does not even mention that the accused used the sale deed in question as genuine, they cannot be convicted under s 471, IPC .[47] Where the charge was for abetment of forgery, an offence which was complete when the document was written and signed, and the conviction was for the subsequent act of user which was a distinct and separate offence, the accused was held entitled to be separately charge.[48] If the certificates, which the accused is found to have forged to seek admission in a college, cannot be said as 'valuable security' within the meaning of s 3, he cannot be convicted under s 471, read with s 467, IPC, though he can be convicted under s 471, read with s 465, IPC .[49]

A person, who has been convicted under ss 467 / 109, IPC, cannot be further convicted of the independent offence under s 471 .[50]

30. Relative Scope of Conviction under Sections 471 and 474

Convictions under ss 471 and 474, IPC, cannot also stand together; they must be charged in the alternative and there cannot be convictions for both.[51]

31. Relative Scope of Conviction under Sections 167 and 467 / 471

The offence under s 167, of a public servant, framing an incorrect document with intent to cause injury, is included in the offence, under s 471, of using, as genuine, a document. A person, therefore, cannot be convicted both under the provision of s 167 and ss 467 / 471, IPC .[52]

32. Sentence

No specific sentence is presented under this section and accused found guilty under s 471, IPC, is liable to be punished with sentence under ss 465, 469, as the case may be. If a document is used fraudulently or dishonestly and if it purports to be a valuable security, the punishment provided by s 467, and not that provided by s 465, would be that to which the accused would be liable under s 471, IPC .[53] A person, who dishonestly uses as genuine a forged document, can be punished under s 471 with the punishment provided by s 465 .[54] Under ss 467 and 471, fine is compulsory and when there is defaulcation of particular amount, the fine should be a good multiple of the amount, unless there is an independent recovery or reimbursement.[55]3889

33. Sentence (Severe)

The offence under s 471, IPC is a grave one which requires to be repressed with the severest punishment allowed by law.[56] However, the extenuating circumstances can legitimately be taken into account while considering the quantum of sentence to be imposed.[57] Protracted criminal litigation is sometimes a factor which calls for reduction of punishment, but the same cannot be laid down as a universal proposition.[58] Where one accused was convicted under s 471 and sentenced to four years' rigorous imprisonment and another accused was convicted for abetment of the same offence and another accused was convicted for abetment of the same offence and sentenced to 2½ years rigorous imprisonment, die sentences were considered to be not at all severe.[59] In Satya Narain Mishra v State ,[60] the accused, on the basis of information supplied by him, obtained a certain appointment. Certificates, in support of the information produced later, proved to be forged, and not genuine ones. The accused was found guilty of an offence under s 471 and sentenced to six years rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 2,000. In view of the facts and circumstances of the case, the sentence was not considered severe. In Madhav Hayawadaur Hoskot v State of Maharashtra ,[61] a sentence of three years was considered just and proper when a reader, holding MSC and Phd degrees was convicted for attempting to issue counterfeit University degrees.

34. Sentence (Lenient)

Where, the accused had already been punished for the major offence under s 406, his sentence for an offence under s 471, IPC was reduced from eighteen months' rigorous imprisonment to six months' imprisonment.[62] In Boni Hampana Gowda v Emperor ,[63] the court, while confirming a conviction under s 471 as the accused was found technically guilty of the offence, took, into consideration, the fact that the accused did not make effective use of the forged documents and allowed an ex parte decree to be passed against him, and, therefore, a sentence of three years' rigorous imprisonment was considered unduly sever, and it was reduced to the period already undergone (one month). In Sajan Lall Biswas v Emperor ,[64] a person, acting under the influence of this master, filed, before the police, a forged document, basing a claim to possession thereon, to influence the police, but withdrew it as soon as the case came before the magistrate. A sentence of six months rigorous imprisonment for an offence under s 471, IPC, was considered just and proper.

The forged Will was prepared and executed in favour of the accused, but the accused neither took any benefit on the basis of said forged Will not the said forged3890 Will was acted upon in any civil proceedings. The accused faced trial for more than 26 years and also remained in jail for a period of more than 7 months.

On these facts the sentence of 3 years rigorous imprisonment awarded to the accused was reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone by him.[65] The accused, an officiating manager in nationalised bank was having wife and two children, the offence was committed by him 10 years back.

He was dismissed from service. He also deponent entire amount involved in the case. The sentence was therefore reduced from 2 years rigorous imprisonment to one year rigorous imprisonment.[66]

The accused used tampered marksheet as a true certificate and got admission in polytechnic course. The past and present record of the accused student was good and he had already lost his career and was now married so the sentence of imprisonment of the accused was reduced to the period already undergone by him.[67] The accused submitted a bill regarding leave travel concession without actually undertaking the traveling. The offence was committed about 10 years before and accused had undergone 3 months rigorous imprisonment. Under these circumstances the sentence of imprisonment was reduced to 6 months rigorous imprisonment to the period already under gone by the accused, while maintaining the sentence of fine Rs 500/- in default of payment of which, accused was to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 2 months.[68]

If a document is used fraudulently or dishonestly and if it purports to be a valuable security, the punishment provided by s 467, and not that provided by s 465, would be that to which the accused would be liable under s 471 .[69] A person, who dishonestly uses as genuine a forged document, can be punished under s 471 with the punishment provided by s 465 .[70] Under ss 467 and 471, IPC, fine is compulsory and when there is defalcation of particular amount, the fine should be a good multiple of the amount unless there is an independent recovery or reimbursement.[71]

35. Alteration of Conviction from Section 471 read with Section 467 to One under Section 471 read with Section 465

Where the certificates, which the accused was found to have forged, to get admission into college could not be described as valuable security, conviction of accused under s 471 read with s 467 was altered to one under s 471 read with s 465, IPC .[72]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

S. 472.

Making or possessing counterfeit seal, etc., with intent to commit forgery punishable under section 467 .--

Whoever makes or counterfeits any seal, plate or other instrument for making an impression, intending that the3891 same shall be used for the purpose of committing any forgery which would be punishable under section 467 of this Code, or, with such intent, has in his possession any such seal, plate or other instrument, knowing the same to be counterfeit, shall be punished with [73][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

By this section, any person, who makes or counterfeits, or has, in his possession, any seal, plate or other instrument for forging a valuable security, Will, etc, specified in s 467, is liable to punishment.

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and officer of the magistrate, etc) charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the... day of..., at..., you made (or counterfeited) a seal (or a plate or an instrument), Ex..., for making an impression, intending that the same shall be used for the purpose of committing a forgery, punishable under s 467 of the Indian Penal Code (or had, in your possession, a seal (or a plate or an instrument), Ex..., intending that the same shall be used for the purpose of committing a forgery, punishable under s 467 of the Indian Penal Code), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 472 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

4. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the accused made, or counterfeited, the seal, plate, etc., or he had the same in his possession knowing the same to be counterfeit;
(b) such seal, plate, etc., was made for making an impression;
(c) he intended to use such seal, plate, etc., for the purpose of committing forgery; and
(d) such forgery was punishable under s 467 .3892

5. Conviction

Where the accused, found in possession of counterfeit seals and forged documents, could give no satisfactory explanation as to how he became possessed of them, it was held that it could be reasonably inferred that he kept them with an intention to defraud and, therefore, his conviction under s 472, or s 473, could be maintained alternatively.[74]

73 Substituted by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Schedule, for 'transportation for life' (wef 1-1-1956).

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

S. 473.

Making or possessing counterfeit seal, etc., with intent to commit forgery punishable otherwise.--

Whoever makes or counterfeits any seal, plate or other instrument for making an impression, intending that the same shall be used for the purpose of committing any forgery which would be punishable under any section of this chapter other than section 467, or with such intent, has in his possession any such seal, plate or other instrument, knowing the same to be counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes a possessor, a maker, or a counterfeiter of a seal, plate or an instrument when his intention is to commit a forgery punishable under any section, other than s 467, of ch XVIII of the IPC . If his intention is to commit a forgery punishable under s 467, his offence is punishable under the proceeding s 472 .

2. 'Counterfeits'

Section 28 and commentary under it in vol 1, may be referred to.

3. 'Possession'

Related headings in s 27, vol 1, may be referred to.

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

5. Charge

The form of charge under the preceding s 472, IPC may be adopted substituting 'any section of Ch XVIII, other than s 467 of the Indian Penal Code ' for the words ' s 467 of the Indian Penal Code ', wherever they occur, and ' s 473 for s 472, IPC '.3893

6. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the accused made, or counterfeited, the seal, plate, etc., or he had the same in his possession knowing the same to be counterfeit;
(b) such seal, plate, etc., was made for making impression;
(c) he intended to use such seal, plate, etc, for the purpose of committing forgery; and
(d) such forgery was punishable under any section of ch XVIII, other than s 467, IPC .

7. Conviction

Where the accused, found in possession of counterfeit seals and forged documents, could give no satisfactory explanation as to how he became possessed of them, it was held that it could be reasonably inferred that he kept them with an intent to defraud and his conviction under s 472, or s 473, alternatively, could be maintained.[75] In Emperor v Krishnappa Khandappa ,[76] in a government reserve forest the accused was found near the sandalwood trees with the counterfeit mark in his possession. It was held that it must be taken that he had the intention of using the same for the purpose of imprinting the tress with false marks and was, therefore, guilty under this section.

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

S. 474.

Having possession of document described in section 466 or 467, knowing it to be forged and intending to use it as genuine.--

[77][Whoever has in his possession any document or electronic record, knowing the same to be forged, and intending that the same shall fraudulently or dishonestly be used as genuine, shall, if the document or electronic record is one of the description mentioned in section 466 of this Code], be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if the document is one of the description mentioned in section 467, shall be punished with [78][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.3894

Comments

1. Scope

By this section, a person, having possession of a forged document of the description (record of court or of public register, etc), mentioned in s 466, knowing that such document is forged and 'intending that the same shall fraudulently or dishonestly be used as genuine', incurs the punishment prescribed. It is not necessary that the document should be used in the said sense by very person who has possession of it; such user may well be by other person to whom the document had been disposed of for fraudulent use.

The making of a false certificate with intent to procure an employment in a government service is fraudulent within the meaning of s 25, and the certificate is a forged document within the meaning of s 474 .[79]

2. 'Possession'

Related headings in s 27, vol 1, may be referred to.

3. 'Document'

Section 29 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

4. Electronic Record

Section 29A, vol 1, may be referred to.

5. 'Knowing the same to be Forged'

For a conviction under this section, it has to be shown that the accused knew that the disputed document, which was found in his possession, was a forged one.[80] However, the mere fact, that the disputed document, found in the possession of the accused, was a forged one, is not sufficient for drawing a conclusion that the accused knew this fact when it was in his possession.[81]

6. 'Fraudulently'

Commentary under the same heading in s 464, ante, may be referred to.

7. 'Dishonestly'

Commentary under the same heading in s 464, ante, may be referred to.

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, when the document in question is of a description, mentioned in s 467, and cognizable in any other case, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.3895

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the... day of..., at ..., you had, in your possession, the document... (describe it as mentioned in s 466, or s 467, of the Indian Penal Code), knowing the same to be forged and intending that the same shall fraudulently (or dishonestly) be used as genuine, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 474 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

10. Proof

To support a charge under this section, it is necessary for the prosecution to prove that:

(a) the document or electronic record in question was forged (vide s 465);
(b) the accused was in possession of the said document or electronic record;
(c) he knew that it (ie, the said document or electronic record) was a forged document or electronic record;
(d) he intended that the said document or electronic record shall fraudulently or dishonestly be used as genuine; and
(e) the document or electronic order was of the description mentioned either in s 466, or s 467, IPC .[82]

The intention can seldom be proved by direct evidence. An intention to use a forged document as genuine may, however, be inferred from the facts of the case and the conduct of the accused.[83] However, the guilty intent cannot be inferred from suspicions and surmises.[84]

11. Conviction

A conviction for an offence under this section cannot stand if the forged document concerned is not a document of the descriptions mentioned in s 466, or s 467, IPC .[85]

12. Relative Scope of Conviction under Section 471 and Section 474

Commentary under the same heading in s 471, ante, may be referred to.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

S. 475.

Counterfeiting device or mark used for authenticating documents described in section 467, or possessing counterfeit marked material.--

Whoever counterfeits upon, or in the substance of, any material, any device or mark used for the purpose of authenticating any document described in section 467 of this Code, intending that such device or mark shall be used for the3896 purpose of giving the appearance of authenticity to any document then forged or thereafter to be forged on such material, or who, with such intent, has in his possession any material upon or in the substance of which any such device or mark has been counterfeited, shall be punished with [86][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section makes it an offence to counterfeit device or mark for authenticating documents, mentioned in s 467, IPC, namely, a valuable security, a Will, an authority to adopt a son, etc, as well as the possession of counterfeit-marked material, (in either case) with the intention of giving authenticity to the document in question, then forged or to be forged. The section is supplementary to s 472, IPC and is another instance of making mere preparation, which may be necessary for forging a document of the kind, mentioned in s 467, punishable as an offence. The provisions of this section, which are likely to overlap sometimes those of s 472 and other sections, create a special offence and prescribe the penalty therefor. The section is to be invoked in a proper case arising under it. Where the document is one which is not mentioned in s 467, the next section would be attracted.[87]

A document is authenticated by affixing the signature or seal of the executing. The object of the section is to prevent the forgery of a person's signature by engraving it on a plate or other substance or forging it on a paper so that it may be used for the purpose of forging a document. If the substance is a seal or a plate, the offence would also come within the terms of s 472, but this offence may be committed in circumstances not covered by that section, when a person forges only the signature of another upon a document which is forgery. However, whatever the substance on which the authentic device or mark has been counterfeited, the document must be of the kind which is mentioned in s 467 .

The counterfeiter must intend that the counterfeiting device or mark shall be used for this purpose of giving the appearance of authenticity to a document described in s 467 then forged or thereafter to be forged, on material counterfeited by the device or mark or the counterfeiter must have, in his possession, such material with the same intent. Without proof of such intention, there can be no conviction under this section. Thus, an innocent agent cannot be guilty of the offence.[88] However, there must be reliable evidence to trace the document and seals found in the possession of the accused.[89] It is not enough to show that documents, found in the accused's3897 possession, were forgeries; it must be further established that the accused intended that the documents should be fraudulently and dishonestly used as genuine.[90]

2. Possession

Related headings in s 27, vol 1, may be referred to.

3. Mere Possession not Enough

The possession, by an accused, of a number of documents, suspected to be forged, is no evidence that he has forged the particular document, with the forgery of which he is charged. The documents, which are evidence not of a crime, actually proved, but only of one suspected, cannot be properly admitted as evidence and must be excluded from consideration.[91] The discovery of certain suspicious documents in the possession of a witness for the accused and alleged to belong to the same faction can be no evidence against the accused.[92]

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

5. Complaint--When to be Filed by the Court

In view of s 195(1)(b)(ii), CrPC, no court can take cognizance of any offence, described in s 475, or s 476 of the IPC, when such offence is alleged to have been committed in respect of a document, produced, or given in evidence, in any court, except on the complaint, in writing, of that court, or of some other court to which that court is subordinate.

The statutory power of the police to investigate cognizable offences; under ss 471, 475 or 476, IPC, is in no way barred by virtue of the provisions of s 195(1)(b)(ii), CrPC (2 of 1974).[93]

6. Charge

The following form of the charge may be used:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the... day of..., at..., you counterfeited, upon (or in the substance of) a material, to wit ... (describe it), a device (or mark), to wit..., used for the purpose of authenticating a document, to wit..., being a document described in s 467 of the Indian Penal Code (or you had, in your possession, a material, to wit..., upon (or in the substance of) which a device (or mark), to wit..., had been counterfeited, for the purpose of authenticating a document, to wit..., being a document, describes in s 467 of the Indian Penal Code), intending that such device (or mark) shall be used for the purpose of giving3898 the appearance of authenticity to such a document, then forged (or thereafter to be forged) on such material, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 475 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

A charge under this section should be framed in the terms of that part of the section which is applicable to the case, and should distinctly specify the particular papers, bearing a counterfeit mark or device, which it is alleged that the accused had in his possession with the intent mentioned in the section.[94]

7. Proof

The points, requiring proof when the offence falls under the first part of the section, are that:

(a) the accused counterfeited a device or mark upon, or in the substance of, any material;
(b) such device or mark was used for the purpose of authenticating any document described in s 467, IPC ;
(c) the accused intended to use it for giving the appearance of authenticity to such document; and
(d) such document was then forged or was thereafter to be forged.

The points, requiring proof when the offence falls under the second part of the section, are that:

(a) the accused was in possession of the document described in s 467, IPC and referred to in the charge;
(b) the device or mark had been counterfeited on such document;
(c) the device or mark was such as was used for the purpose of authenticating a document described in s 467, IPC ; and
(d) the accused intended that the device or mark should be used for the purpose of giving the appearance of authenticity to any document either then forged or thereafter to be forged.[95]

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

S. 476.

Counterfeiting device or mark used for authenticating documents other than those described in section 467, or possessing counterfeit marked material.--

Whoever counterfeits upon, or in the substance of any material, any device or mark used for the purpose of authenticating [96][any document or electronic record] other than the documents described in section 467 of this Code, intending that such device or mark shall be used for the purpose of giving the appearance of authenticity to [97][any document or electronic record] then forged or thereafter to be forged on such material, or who, with such intent, has in his possession any material upon or in the substance of which any such device or mark has been counterfeited, shall be punished with imprisonment of either3899 description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is almost exactly the same as the preceding one, the only difference being that the document or electronic record in respect of which the offence is committed is 'any document or electronic record other than the documents or electronic record described in s 467, IPC . The section is intended to prescribe a reduced penalty for the offence dealt with in the preceding section as the document or electronic record in respect of which it is committed, is not as important as the documents described in s 467, IPC . Otherwise, the two offences are identical and the commentary under the preceding section may be read as a commentary under this section also.

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class. It is strange that the more serious offence under s 475, IPC is bailable, while a simple offence under this section is non-bailable.

3. Electronic Record

Section 29A, vol 1, may be referred to.

4. Complaint--When to be filed by Court

Commentary under the same heading in ss 465, 467, ante, may be referred to.

5. Charge

The form of charge given under s 475, IPC may be adopted, substituting 'being a document other than those described in s 467 of the Indian Penal Code ' for the words 'being a document described in s 467 of the Indian Penal Code ', and 'punishable under s 476 of the Indian Penal Code ' for the words 'punishable under s 475 of the Indian Penal Code '.

6. Proof

The points, requiring proof for an offence under this section, are the same as those stated under the preceding one, with the only difference that instead of proving that such device or mark was used, or was such as was used, for the purpose of authenticating a document or electronic record described in s 467 of the IPC, it has to be proved that such device or mark was used, or was such as was used, for the purpose of authenticating a document or electronic record other than those described in s 467 of the IPC .3900

Fraudulent cancellation, destruction, etc., of will, authority to adopt or valuable security.--

Whoever fraudulently or dishonestly, or with intent to cause damage or injury to the public or to any person, cancels, destroys or defaces, or attempts to cancel, destroy or deface, or secretes or attempts to secrete any document which is or purports to be a will, or an authority to adopt a son, or any valuable security, or commits mischief in respect to such document, shall be punished with [1][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The section is hardly an instance of forgery, the essence of which is making a false document, and not its fraudulent cancellation or destruction. In fact, no offence under this section is committed by the destruction of a document which is a forgery.[2] Where the accused, who executed a kabala in favour of the complainant and presented it for registration, took it back from the sub-registrar on some pretext and tore the same to pieces, it was held that it was inadvisable that a charge under s 477, IPC, inter alia, should be inquired into by a criminal court.[3] An offence under this section is committed when the cancellation, destruction, etc, is done fraudulently or dishonestly or with intent to cause damage or injury to the public or to any person. The essential ingredients[4] of an offence under this section are as under:

(a) there must be a document which is, or which purports to be, a Will, or an authority to adopt a son, or a valuable security;

(b) the accused must have:
(i) cancelled, destroyed, defaced, or secreted such document; or
(ii) attempted to cancel, destroy, deface, or secret such document; or
(iii) committed mischief in respect of such document; and

(c) the accused must have done such act fraudulently or dishonestly or with intent to cause damage or injury to the public or to any person.

2. 'Fraudulently'

Section 25 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.3901

3. 'Dishonestly'

Section 24 and its commentary under s 24, vol 1, may be referred to.

4. 'Damage'

Damage means pecuniary damage.[5]

5. 'Injury'

Section 44 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

6. 'Public'

Section 12 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

7. 'Person'

Section 11 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

8. Document

Section 29 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

9. 'Secretes or Attempts to Secrete any Document'

A person may secrete a document not only when the existence of the document is unknown to other person and for the purpose of preventing the existence of the document coming to the knowledge of anybody, but also when the existence of the document is known to others. In the latter case, he may secrete it for the purpose, for example, of preventing it from being produced in evidence or for the purpose of raising difficulties in the way of its being produced in evidence. However, it is not necessarily enough to show that on an occasion, upon which it became his duty to produce the document, he failed to discharge that duty though that may be a cogent piece of evidence in certain circumstances. The fact that a man injures himself by denying the existence of a document, which, to his knowledge, is in his custody, would be a still more cogent piece of evidence. However, whether the offence of secreting a document is committed or not must depend, in each case, upon the facts.[6]

10. 'Purports to be'

The section uses the words 'purports to be', and not 'is'; this is significant. It is not necessary that the document in question must be valid and enforceable. This section is attracted even if the document is not sufficiently stamped.[7]3902

11. 'Will'

The fraudulent secretion of any document purporting to be a Will, quite apart from its validity, constitutes an offence within the meaning of this section.[8]

12. 'Valuable Security'

In order that the accused may be prima facie guilty of the offence under this section, the document destroyed must be a valuable security.[9] The tearing up of a patta (lease),[10] or a promissory note,[11] or a paper being a rough account showing indebtedness,[12] or account stated in which balance is admitted to be due,[13] or a bahi bearing thumb-impressions of accused,[14] or a registered conveyance,[15] amounts to the destruction of a valuable security within the meaning of the section. It is immaterial that the document is unstamped and inadmissible for enforcement of a legal claim,[16] or is invalid for want of consideration.[17]

13. 'Mischief'

Commentary under s 425, ante, may be referred to.

14. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

15. Sanction for Prosecution under Section 477 --Whether Necessary

Where the offence under this section is no part of the duty of a public servant, nor committed while he was acting in the discharge of his official duty, no sanction is necessary for his prosecution.[18]

16. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the ...day of..., at..., you fraudulently (or dishonestly) (or with intent to cause damage (or injury) to AB (or to the public) cancelled (or destroyed/defaced/secreted/attempted to cancel/attempted to destroy/attempted to deface/attempted to secret/committed mischief in respect to) a document. Ex..., which is (or which purported to be) a will (or an authority to adopt a son/a valuable security),3903 and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 477 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

17. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the document in question is, or purports to be, a Will, or an authority to adopt a son, or a valuable security;
(b) the accused cancelled, destroyed, defaced, or secreted, it, or attempted to cancel, destroy, deface or secrete the same, or committed mischief in respect to it; and
(c) he did so fraudulently or dishonestly or with intent to cause damage or injury to the public or to any person.

In the absence of proof of the said intention, the charge under this section must fail.[19] In the prosecution of a honorary accountant of a co-operative housing society for an offence under s 471 read with ss 468, 408 and 477, IPC, when, certain important aspects of the case were overlooked by the trial court, the High Court was justified in having a reappraisal of evidence and coming to its own conclusions on these points contrary to those of the trial court.[20]

Temporary embezzlement by the accused clerk employed in the office of Deputy Superintendent of Police of a paltry sum viz. Rs. 1839/- for a period of 21 days was held covered by s 95, IPC . The accused was granted benefit of s 95, IPC, and acquitted of charges under ss 409, 471, 477, IPC .[21]

18. Sentence

If the act of an accused, which constitutes forgery and is the basis of his conviction under s 467, IPC, is the same as the act which amounts to fraudulent destruction or defacement or cancellation and is the basis of his conviction under s 477, IPC, it is erroneous to treat the act as constituting two separate offences for which two separate sentence can be awarded.[22] It is submitted that the authority of this decision is weak. Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

[23][S. 477A.

Falsification of accounts.--

Whoever, being a clerk, officer or servant, or employed or acting in the capacity of a clerk, officer or servant, wilfully, and with intent to defraud, destroys, alters, mutilates or falsifies any [24][book, electronic record, paper, writing], valuable security or account which belongs to or is in the possession of his employer, or has been received by him for or on behalf of his employer, or wilfully, and with intent to defraud, makes or abets the making of any false entry in, or omits or alters or abets the3904 omission or alteration of any material particular from or in, any such [25][book, electronic record, paper, writing], valuable security or account, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.--It shall be sufficient in any charge under this section to allege a general intent to defraud without naming any particular person intended to be defrauded or specifying any particular sum of money intended to be the subject of the fraud, or any particular day on which the offence was committed.]

Comments

1. Scope

By this section, falsification of accounts with intent to defraud is made punishable even if there is no evidence to prove misappropriation of any particular sum on any particular occasion. The section is divided into two parts as it speaks of two offences which are distinct, and not interdependent. The first part makes the falsification of account, etc, an offence even if it may cover several entries,[26] and the second part makes it an offence to make a false entry in, or to omit or to abet the omission or alteration of any material particular from, or in, any book, paper, writing, valuable security or account.

2. Object

This section, introduced, for the first time, by s 4 of Act 3 of 1895, was added to remove a glaring defect in law, noticed in an unreported Calcutta case of Shama Churn Sen, in which the accused, who was shown to have defrauded a bank to the extent of 3 lakh rupees, had nevertheless to be acquitted because it was not proved3905 that the said three lakhs of rupees had been abstracted upon any one particular occasion or in any particular sum. The section was consequently enacted to meet such cases and to make the falsification of accounts punishable even though there is no evidence to prove misappropriation of any specific sum on any particular occasion.[28]

3. Section 477A and Section 409 --Distinction

A comparison of the ingredient of an offence under s 409, IPC, with that of s 477A, IPC, makes it apparent, that the ingredients of the two offences are different from each other and the only common point is the capacity of the accused being that of an employee. In one case, he dishonestly misappropriates the property in violation of the trust and in the other he falsifies the account with intent to defraud, etc.[29] The trial of the accused for offences under s 477A, IPC, cannot be held to be barred by his conviction for an offence under s 409, IPC, in respect of the same transaction.[30]

4. Essential Ingredients

The essential ingredients to constitute an offence under this section are as follow:

(a) the offender must be a clerk, officer or servant or employed, or acting, in the capacity of a clerk, officer or servant; and
(b) he must wilfully, and with intent to defraud;
  (i) destroy, alter, mutilate or falsify any book, paper, writing, valuable security or account which:
    (1) belongs to, or is in possession of, his employer; or
    (2) has been received by him for, or on behalf of, his employer; or

  (ii) make, or abet the making of, any false entry in, or omit or alter, or abet the omission or alteration of any material particular form, or in, any book, paper, writing, valuable security or account.

5. 'Clerk Officer or Servant': A Partner, Whether can be held liable under Section 477A

The term of s 477A, IPC, apply not only to a clerk, officer or servant, but also to a person acting in the capacity of a clerk, officer or servant. The section speaks of a person who is 'employed, or acting, in the capacity of a clerk officer or servant'. That being so, the scope of the section extends to persons who act in the above capacities, and it is not confined to persons who are employed in the said capacity.[31] Under s 477A, IPC, if a person, even if he be a partner in a firm, fills the capacity of its clerk or servant, he comes within the purview of the section. If a partner, as such partner, is appointed to manage the business of the firm or to write its accounts and if3906 he, acting as its servant, falsifies the accounts, he would be liable under the section.[32] If a partner has dishonestly falsified the books of accounts of the firm and has tried to defraud his partners, he can charged with the commission of an offence under s 477A, IPC .[33] On the other hand, according the decision in CV Krishnan v Virji Kunverji ,[34] the section applies, in terms, to falsification of accounts by a clerk, officer or servant employed under somebody else, and it is not applicable to the case of falsification of accounts by a partner. According to this decision, if a partner cannot, in the absence of a special agreement, be charged with an offence of criminal breach of trust, it would be difficult to say that he can be found guilty of falsification of accounts which can only be committed by a clerk, officer or servant in respect of his employer's books of account. Similarly, a partner cannot be clearly guilty of the offence of falsification of accounts and the offence can only be committed by somebody in the employ of another person as a clerk, officer or servant, and the falsification can only be committed in respect of the books of accounts of the employer. According to the Allahabad High Court in Hari Prasad v State ,[35] only such a person would be guilty under s 477A, IPC, who is employed by the partnership firm in any of the capacity namely as a clerk, officer or servant. According to this decision, there has to be some basis of service; it may be honorary or on remuneration. If a person, who is a partner, has also taken upon himself the status of a clerk, servant or officer of the partnership firm, he can be held guilty of an offence under s 477A, IPC, if other ingredients of the offence are made out against him. It is submitted that the view, expressed in CV Krishnan v Virji Kunverji ,[36] and Hari Prasad v State ,[37] overlooks the clear language of the section which speaks of a person 'being a clerk, officer or servant, or employed, or acting, in the capacity of a clerk, officer or servant' and these words are wide enough to include a person acting in the capacity of a 'clerk, officer or servant', though not employed as such, that is to say, 'the basis of service' is not the crux of the matter as held in the Allahabad case. Nor, regard being had to the words, can it be held, from decisions in cases under s 406 or s 420, IPC, as was done in the Calcutta cases, that a partner cannot be held guilty of an offence under s 477A . A person, who is a partner of a firm, can also act in the capacity of a clerk officer or servant. The contrary view, expressed in the above two cases, would lead to the startling result that a partner of a firm, though appointed as the manager of a partnership firm and charged with the duty of keeping the documents of the firm, can with impunity, falsify the accounts of the firm. As pointed out by Ramaswami J, in Abdul Azeez v State ,[38] the emphasis is on the words 'in the capacity of a clerk, officer or servant', and if a partner is appointed as such to manager the business of the firm or to write its accounts, he acts as its servant; and if he falsifies the accounts, he is liable to be punished under s 477A, IPC . It is sufficient to satisfy the words of the section that the person charged under it is one who undertakes to perform, and does perform, the duties of a clerk or servant, etc,3907 whether in fact he is a clerk or servant, though he is under no obligation to perform such duties and receives no remuneration.[39] Therefore, as held in Momindra Mohan Biswas v Srish Chandra Das ,[40] the mere fact, that a partnership existed, is no answer to a property proved case to a charge of falsification of accounts by one partner, who is in charge of the account books, though he is not a clerk, or servant, etc. There may be occasions when a person, who is not a regular servant, may yet be acting as such.[41]

6. Employment with more than one Employer

To be a full-time servant of a certain employer does not bar a person to become a servant of any other employer. An agent of an insurance company, even if he is a full-time servant of some other company, is a servant of the insurance company as he, as agent of the insurance company, receives payment for doing work.[42]

7. 'Wilfully'

To constitute an offence under this section, the falsification of accounts, etc., should be made wilfully as well as with an intent to defraud.[43] 'Wilfully' means 'intentionally' or 'deliberately',[44] and not accidentally or inadvertently,[45] whereas the expression 'with intent to defraud' contains, two elements, viz, deceit and injury.[46] A person is said to deceive another when, by practicing suggestio false or suppressio veri or both, he intentionally induces another to believe a thing to be true which he knows to be false or does not believe to be true. 'Injury' denotes any harm whether illegally caused to any person in body, mind, reputation or property.[47] The deprivation of property, actual or intended, is not a necessary ingredient to defraud.[48] Where an accused prepares a false traveling allowance bill, presents it to a sub-treasury and withdraws the amounts, he commits an offence under s 477A, IPC, and the mere fact, that he subsequently returns the entire amount, is not a matter to be considered.[49]Where, however, the intention of the manager of a company, in offering a bribe to an electric inspector, was not to cause injury to the company but, on the contrary, to promote its interests, the act of the accused was held not to fall within the ambit of s 477A, IPC .[50]3908

8. 'With Intent to Defraud'

The expression 'intent to defraud' should not be restricted only to cases of 'deceit and injury to the person deceived' or to exclude all cases where the deception is intended to secure advantage to the deceiver.[51] Where, by me falsification of accounts, the accused derived an advantage for sometime, which he could not have derived if the books had been falsified, and the falsification was with intent to defraud, his conviction under s 477A, IPC, was held to be justified.[52] An act, that is calculated to conceal fraud already committed and to make the party defrauded believe that no fraud had been committed, is a fraudulent act and the person, responsible for the acts, acts 'with intent to defraud'.[53] Accordingly, falsification of accounts to cover immediate or remote commission of criminal breach of trust falls within the mischief of s 477A .[54]

Intent to defraud can be established both by false entries and omission to make entries in the accounts.[55] Where, as against the actual payment of Rs 254.48, the deposit, in the relevant receipt, was entered as Rs 110 only, the accused, a head clerk cum accountant, was held to have falsified the receipt with an intent to defraud.[56]

9. 'Falsifies'

The expression 'falsify' applies to the preparation of a new document containing false information. To 'falsify' means 'to render falls' and a new document, containing false information, is correctly described as a false document and the act of operating such a document is called the falsification of the document.[57] If a person falsifies the balance-sheet of a bank by showing as profit a certain sum which was not profit, he falsifies them.[58] Where the accused, an official for the procurement of paddy entrusted with a certain sum of money for the purpose, purchased paddy from a party, showed, in the counterfoil of his receipt book, a quantity less than the quantity shown correctly in the receipt issued to the party, for covering misappropriation of the difference, and falsified the accounts which he was bound to maintain, he was held guilty of an offence under s 477A .[59] Where the accused, after the commencement of an inequality against him, made false entries, in the register, showing payments to the credit of the collector, for concealing non-payment, it was held that they were made with intent to defraud.[60] Where the falsification of accounts by a sub-postmaster was in furtherance of a prior fraud, namely, criminal breach of trust, it was held that me intention of the accused was to defraud, and, therefore, he3909 was guilty of the offence under s 477A, IPC .[61] Where, however, a patwari, in flagrant disregard of revenue rules, made unauthorised entries in the revenue registers, but there was a strong presumption of his bonafides, it was held that he could not be said to have fraudulently altered any book or register within the meaning of s 477A, IPC .[62]

Where the accused working as postal assistant, a public servant, entrusted with the money of the depositors, made false entries in the pass books of the depositors in his possession, misappropriated the amount of deposit of depositors, he was convicted under ss 409 and 477, IPC .[63]

10. Falsification--How Effected

The falsification, punishable under this section, may be effected by:

(a) destruction; or
(b) alteration; or
(c) mutilation; or
(d)
    (i) the making of a false entry, or

(ii) omission or alteration of a material particular, or
(iii) abetment of (i) or (ii) above noted.

11. Falsification must be Willful or Fraudulent

Whatever be the nature and extent of the falsification, it must not have been due to mere carelessness or negligence; it must be made both wilfully and fraudulently.[64]If a person, bound to maintain a register, omits to make certain entries therein and the omission is intentional so that a false balance may be shown and the real surplus may not be disclosed, it is a positive act of falsifying accounts.[65] However, mere omission to make an entry cannot necessarily lead to the conclusion that the document in question has been falsified.[66] If the conduct of an accused merely points to negligence on his part in the performance of his duties, he cannot be said to have committed an offence of falsification of accounts.[67]

12. 'Any Book, Electronic Record, Paper, Writing, Valuable Security or Account which belongs to, or is in Possession of, the Employer, or has been received by him for, or on behalf of, his Employer'

The falsification, punishable under this section, must be of any 'book, paper, writing, valuable security or account' and they must were at the time when they were3910 falsified.[68] If the papers, in which falsification is alleged, cannot be regarded as belonging to, or being in possession of, the offender's employer, no case under s 477A, IPC, can be said to have been made out.[69]

13. Electronic Record

Section 29A, vol 1, may be referred to.

14. 'Valuable Security'

Section 30 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

15. 'Abets'

Section 109 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

16. 'Omission'

Section 33 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

17. Explanation to the Section

By virtue of the explanation to the section, it is sufficient to allege a general intent to defraud. In a prosecution for an offence under this section, it is not necessary to prove that any particular person or persons were defrauded by a statutory report. It is sufficient if, in the opinion of the court, the report had that tendency.[70]

18. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

19. Sanction for Prosecution under Section 111, Karnataka Co-operative Societies Act (11 of 1959)

Section 111 of the Karnataka Co-operative Societies Act 1959 (11 of 1959) mandates that before the sanction is accorded, the accused must be given an opportunity of being confronted with the charges against him and of tendering an explanation if the authority is satisfied that the accused has acted in good faith, that the sanction shall not be granted.[71] Since the consequences of a prosecution are extremely serious, the law mandates that a proper enquiry following the rules of natural justice be held prior to the grant of sanction and this is a mandatory safety provision from the point of view of the accused, but it is of equal importance to the department and the society in order to avoid unnecessary legal proceedings. When this mandatory pre-condition is not followed, then the prosecution will be vitiated.[72]3911

20. Revision--Power of the High Court

Commentary under the same heading in s 468, ante, may be referred to.

21. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the ...day of..., at..., you, being a clerk (or an officer, or a servant, or employed or acting in the capacity of a clerk, officer or servant) wilfully, and with intent to defraud, destroyed (or altered, mutilated or falsified) a book (or paper, writing, valuable security or account), to wit..., which belonged to (or which was in the possession of) your employer AB (or which was received by you for, or on behalf of, your employer AB) (or you wilfully, and intent to defraud, made (or abetted the making of) a false entry, to wit..., in (or you omitted/altered/abetted the omission or alteration of a material particular from, or in,) a book (paper/writing/valuable security/account), to wit...), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 477A of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

This section refers to two kinds of offences, namely, (a) falsification of accounts; and (b) making of a false entry. The two offences are distinct, and not interdependent. The offence of falsification of accounts is one offence although it may cover several entries. Therefore, where, in a case, there were eight items of falsification, eight charges for falsification of accounts were not required, and a single charge under s 477A was held to be sufficient.[73]

22. Joinder of Charges under Sections 477A and 409

If the act, constituting the offence under s 409, IPC, and those constituting the offence under s 477A, are 'so connected together as to form the same transaction' within the meaning of s 220(1), CrPC, an offence under s 409, IPC, can be joined in the same charge with an offence under s 477A, IPC . The real and substantial test is the continuity of action and purpose.[74]

23. Proof

Since the section is in two parts, there are two distinct and independent offences,[75] and, therefore, the points, requiring proof, depend upon the offence falling within the particular part of the section. If the offence falls within the first part of the section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused was a clerk, officer or servant, or he was employed, or he acted, in such capacity;3912
(b) the accused destroyed, altered, mutilated or falsified the book, paper, writing valuable or account in question;
(c) the book, paper, etc, belonged to, or was in the possession of, his employer or was received by him (ie, the accused) for, or on behalf of, his employer; and
(d) the accused did as in point (b) above wilfully and with intent to defraud.

If, however, the offence falls within the latter portion of the section, prove points (a), (c) and (d) in the above manner. So far as point (b) is concerned, prove that the accused made, or abetted the making of, any false entry in, or altered, or abetted, the omission or alteration of some material particular from, or in, the book, paper, writing, valuable security or account in question.

It must not only be proved that false entries were made, but also that they were made with an intent to defraud.[76]

When a person is charged with the falsification of accounts any number of falsifications may be proved in order to sustain the principal charge of falsification.[77] It is, however, necessary to produce, in evidence, the document alleged to be falsified. Where the very important document, whereof falsification has been missing, it will be impossible to hold the accused guilty of the offence under this section.[78] In a case of alleged criminal conspiracy and forgery of Rs 52,000/- belonging to the High Court, it was not established that the accused was entrusted with receipt of stamps by the Registrar of the High Court. No evidence was produced before the trial court to show that the accused has in any manner conspired with the accused and had made false entries in the register. The Registrar of the High Court was not examined as a witness. The conviction of the accused under ss 477A and 120B, IPC, was set aside.[79] The evidence of employees of the concerned branch of the bank cannot be rejected merely on the ground that they were working under the accused branch manager.[80]

24. Acquittal

Accused no 1, a student having secured less marks in the examination, applied for revaluation of the examination sheets. Accused no 2, the dealing clerk, sent the answer script of another in place of Accused no 1, by giving a confidential code. The revaluation was done and accused no 1 stood benefited. Accused no 1 was tried separately and was acquitted, it was not possible to say that accused no 1 obtained any benefit or there was any mens rea involved, in so far as accused no 2 is concerned, in sending the answer script for revaluation of another student instead of accused no 1. No appeal was filed by the state against acquitted of accused no 1. The entire case had become rather doubtful due to his acquittal. Accused no 2 was, therefore, also given the benefit of the doubt and acquitted of the charges under ss 477A, 420 and 120B, IPC .[81] In Re M Gangadhariah,[82] the false entries in the3913 current deposit book were admittedly made by another accused who was not charged with the offence of having made those entries or with an offence under s 477A, IPC . It was held that the charge, that the accused made those entries, could not be sustained, especially when there was no evidence to the effect that the other accused made the entries under instructions from the accused. Unless it is proved that the alterations made by a person (a money order issue clerk in a sub-post office) in the money order issue journal as also in the copy of the hand to hand receipt book are in the handwriting of that person, he cannot be convicted under s 477A, IPC .[83] If an accused is charged under this section for substituting used court-fee stamps in place of the new stamps on requisitions and vakalatnama under the Public Demands Recovery Act, but there is no alteration or falsification of any register or form of account, the acts of the accused cannot be brought within the scope of s 477A, IPC .[84]

25. Conviction

A charge under s 477A, IPC, is more or less dependent on the charge under s 467, IPC . If, therefore, an accused is not found to have an intention to defraud anybody by falsifying the account books, no case under s 477A, IPC, is made out.[85] Similarly, where the charge of criminal breach of trust fails, the charge of falsification of accounts must also fails.[86] Where, however, the facts, on which the allegation rests, are not so integrally related that if a part of the case is not proved, the rest must fail, the accused can be convicted even if a part of the prosecution case is not proved.[87] Where the accused's writing on the questioned documents has been proved not only by the experts, but also by some other persons, well acquainted with the writing of the accused, and the court also finds a large measure of similarly and clear resemblance in almost all the characteristics in his disputed and admitted writings, conviction under s 477A, can be sustained.[88] Where the charge, framed under s 467 at the trial, mentions about entries of false or imaginary sale notes and other false entries in transport permits with intent to defraud the government of its revenues, then even if there should be some doubt as to whether the permit in question amounts to falsification of accounts, there may be a case to be tried on the question whether the entries, made therein, were false and thereby the latter part of s 477A was contravened. A conviction of the accused for such contravention would not be illegal.[89]

The accused chairman and member of a subordinate staff selection board in conspiracy with the accused a candidate increased the numbers awarded in *viva voce*test and included him in the list of selected candidates for pecuniary benefits. The act of the three accused persons did not amount to offence of forgery, the accused3914 persons prepared false record of the final result and committed cheating, they were guilty of offence under s 218, s 420, s 477A and s 120B, IPC .[90]

26. Conviction for Falsification of Accounts and Misappropriation of Funds

The accused was an accountant in the company and was responsible for accounts and amounts received and entrusted to him. The entrustment of the amount and making of false accounts in respect of amounts received from a dealer firm was established against the accused, so the accused was found guilty under ss 409 and 477A, IPC .[91] Where the evidence on record showed that the accused was the custodian of cash and account books, the handwriting of the accused was also proved by the witness who was acquainted with it and the report of the Accountant-General clearly showed that there was manipulation in entries made by the accused, the fact that the accused had sometimes deposited money after the detection of misappropriation supported the allegation of misappropriation, thus conviction of the accused was found proper.[92]

27. Sentence (Deterrent)

Where the accused were in league and omissions and commissions in accounts were resorted to with the common objective of defrauding the payment of sales tax, etc, and indulging in black-marketing activities, a deterrent sentence was held to be called for and the High Court confirmed the sentence of fine which was proportionate to the means of the accused and the gravity of the offences.[93] In State v Atmaram Vaikunth Bhende ,[94] the accused was sentenced under s 477A on three charges to two months rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 1,000 or in default to four months rigorous imprisonment. The accused requested, in appeal, that the substantive sentences, passed on him, may be enhanced and the sentences, awarded in default of payment of fine, may be reduced in order to get the advantage of remissions under the Jail Rules. The High Court held that this was not a sufficient ground for reducing the sentences, awarded to the accused, in default of payment of fine.

28. Sentence (Lenient)

Where the accused deposited the amount found short in the office cash, taking a lenient view, as the incident occurred 18 years ago, the sentence imposed against the accused was reduced from rigorous imprisonment for three years to rigorous imprisonment for one year.[95]

An accused aged 50 years had lost his employment and therefore he engaged himself privately for a part-time job and was the only bread earner of the family, therefore, the sentence of 2 years rigorous imprisonment was reduced to 6 months rigorous imprisonment.[96] Keeping in view the fact that the accused faced trial and appeal for a total period of about 14 years, the sentence of imprisonment was reduced3915 from 2 years rigorous imprisonment to 18 months.[1] In a case of technical breach arising out of shortage of amount, the entries made by the accused post master did not reflect a certain amount. The accused was not found with any disproportionate assets to his known source of income. He faced the agony of trial for a period of ten years and lost his job. He fully reimbursed the entire amount found to be short. As a result of his conviction he lost his job which is synonymous with 'economic death'. Therefore, the accused deserved maximum leniency in grant of sentence and sentence of fine of Rs 200 in default rigorous imprisonment for 2 months was found proper.[2] Where the accused was young and immature at the time of commission of the offence, the offence was committed about 18 years ago, the sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment was substituted for 2 years rigorous imprisonment imposed on the accused.[3]

S. 479.

Property mark.--

A mark used for denoting that moveable property belongs to a particular person is called a property mark.

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines 'property mark'. A 'property mark' is a mark which is used for denoting that the property, impressed with that mark, belongs to a particular person.[6] In other words, the property mark signifies a right of property, the object of it being to protect one's goods against fraudulent imitation by another. The mark may be used by a manufacturer as well as a merchant. A property mark may be put on any article owned by a person. It is, however, not confined to that article; it extends to all kinds of movable property, belonging to the person, owning the property mark, whether the property is of one kind or of different kind. A mark, used at the time when it is fixed, does not cease to be a property mark if the ownership of the article ceases.[7]

2. 'Property Mark' Distinguished from 'Trademark'

Concept of a ' trademark' is distinct from 'property mark'. The function of a trademark is to give an indication, to a possible purchaser, as to the manufacture or quality of the goods, or the trade source from which the goods come, or the trade hands through which they pass on their way to the market. On the other hand, a3916 property mark means a mark used for denoting that a movable property belongs to a particular person. The distinction is that whereas the former denotes the manufacturer or quality of the goods to which it is attached, the latter denotes the ownership in them. The former concern the goods themselves, while the latter concerns the proprietor.[8]

3. 'Movable Property'

The term 'movable property' in this section is intended to include a class or category of properties falling under one ownership, not merely the parts of it which may pass from the hands of the owner into other hands. The class is stable though the units are ambulatory. The term, as used in the section, is intended to include collective class noun, ie, nouns that express a number of objects of the same class together. Thus, in the case of a bank selling bars of gold, their property consists not merely of the gold which they import, but of other movable properties also, falling into one class--movable property of the bank.[9]

4. Intending Purchaser, Need not Actually be Deceived

Section 480, IPC, does not necessarily require that any intending purchasers, should actually be deceived, it is sufficient, if the deception in question is reasonably calculated to cause it to be believed that the goods, so have a connection with the course of trade of a person with whom they have not any connection. If it is clear, from a simple look, that the get-up of the offending labels or wrappers is closely similar to the get-up of the complainant's goods, and in general appearance, labels and colour selection and other essential details of the wrappers of the offending mark so closely resemble those of the complainant's mark, that they are likely to deceive an unwary purchaser who is acquainted with the trademark and who trusts his memory, in such a case such use is an offence of counterfeiting trademarks punishable under the IPC .[10] It is not necessary to prove actual sale for the purpose of bringing the charge under s 482 or s 485, IPC, home to the appellant. It would be enough if circumstances are proved to establish that the tins were actually stored for sale.[11] It may be observed that the elements of the offences charged do not require proof of any person having actually deceived. It is enough if the circumstances proved are sufficient to establish that prospective buyers were likely to be deceived.[12]

Using a false trade mark.--

[Rep. By the Trade and Merchandise Marks Act, 1958 (43 of 1958), s 135 and Sch. (Wef 25-11-1959).]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

[OF] [* * *] PROPERTY AND OTHER MARKS]

S. 481.

Using a false property mark.--

Whoever marks any moveable property or goods or any case, package or other receptacle containing moveable property or goods, or uses any case, package or other receptacle having any mark thereon, in a manner reasonably calculated to cause it to be believed that the property or goods so marked, or any property or goods contained in any such3917 receptacle so marked, belong to a person to whom they do not belong, is said to use a false property mark.

Comments

1. Scope

The section defines what is meant by using a false property mark. The substance of the offence consists in user of the mark in a manner calculated to make it appear that the movable property or goods, etc, so marked, or the movable property or goods, contained in any case, package, or receptacle so marked, belong to a person to whom they do not belong.

2. Essential Ingredients

The essential ingredients of an offence under this section are as under:

(a) the accused must mark any movable property, or goods, or any case, package or other receptacle, containing such movable property or goods, or use any case, package or other receptacle having any mark thereon; and
(b) such marking or using must be in a manner reasonably calculated to cause it to be believed that the property or goods, etc., so marked, or the movable property or goods contained in any case, package, or receptacle so marked, belong to a person to whom they do not belong.

3. 'Movable Property'

Movable property would mean corporeal property, and not incorporeal property, in this section.[13]

Punishment for using a false property mark.--

Whoever uses [14][] any false property mark shall, unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.3918

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides punishments for 'using a false property mark' which has been defined in the preceding s 481, IPC . Such 'using' becomes punishable unless the person, so using the false property mark, can show that he acted 'without intent to defraud'. The maker of an article, who uses, on that article, the mark of another maker intending thereby to induce a belief in the purchasers that the article was made by such other maker, becomes amenable to this section. The offender cannot say in defence that his article is as good as, if not superior to, similar article made by the other maker if the offender intends to practice deception and use the mark for this purpose. If the property marks differ from each other to such an extent that there can be no deception to anyone, no offence is committed.

2. 'Whoever'

The word 'whoever', in this section, means the same thing as 'every person who' and shows that the provisions of the section apply to persons generally. In law, a corporation (which includes a limited company) is a person. Therefore, a body corporate can be lawfully prosecuted and, on conviction, punished for an offence under the section.[15]

3. 'Without Intent to Defraud'

There is no intent to defraud if there is a bona fide dispute as to the right to use a mark. In such a case, action should be taken in a civil court.[16]

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, with the permission of the court before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, by the person to whom loss or injury is caused by the use of false property mark, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

5. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC may be referred to.

6. Duty of the Court

In all cases where it is alleged that the same kind of goods are being sold off under a counterfeit trademark, it is the duty of the court to find out whether the mark is counterfeit having due regard to the similarly or otherwise of the marks and the circumstances connected with the case. It may also be mentioned that normally a customer does not see two similar labels or marks side by side--in order to make a comparison and note the difference between the two. It is only a general notion that he may have heard about the labels and the designs on them and when he is offered something as being goods that he wants, he uses his ordinary recollection in order to arrive at a conclusion whether he gets the goods that he asks for. The principle in all these3919 cases is, what is the effect of the particular trademark on an unwary purchaser, and whether that purchaser would be deceived by the use of that particular trademark.[17]

7. Proof

The prosecution should prove that:

(a) the accused marked movable property, or goods in question, or some case, package or receptacle, containing movable property or goods, or the accused used some case, package or receptacle bearing such mark;
(b) the accused did as above in a manner reasonably calculated to cause it to be believed that the property or goods so marked, or the movable property or goods, contained in some case, package or receptacle, so marked, belonged to some person; and
(c) such property or goods, etc, did not belong to that person.

8. Burden of Proof

Subject to certain recognised exceptions, the principle of criminal jurisprudence is that the prosecution must prove the guilt of the accused beyond all reasonable doubt.[18] However, this principle has been departed from in this section which places, upon the accused, the burden to prove that he is innocent and that he acted without intent to defraud. The receptacles which were found on search of the shop of the accused were genuine receptacles used by company A for selling their product. The allegation was that the stuff manufactured by A was abstracted from the tins and spurious stuff was put in its place. The mark of the company A was maintained in the receptacles and only the stuff inside was changed. The receptacles had on it the registered trademark of company A. It was proved that the company had exclusive right to the use of the mark and the invented word thereon. On these facts it was held that the charges under ss 482 and 485, IPC, were established against the accused and the burden was on accused to prove that he had acted without intent to defraud.[19]

9. Settled Position of Law

The settled position in law is that, where a manufacturer is selling his goods under a certain trademark, the question, whether another manufacturer of such goods using similar mark is likely to deceive public that they are purchasing the goods so manufactured by the former, is a question of fact to be decided on the evidence adduced; the vital element in such a case is the likelihood or possibility of deception or confusions; this may depend on a number of matter as well as the question of similarity of the marks or of the get up; witnesses can be called to prove the circumstances and place in which the articles are sold, the classes of person, who buy them and whether they include persons who are illiterate or ignorant or the reverse, the manner in which the public are accustomed to ask for the article and any other matters which will assist the court to decide whether deception is probable; evidence of actual deception may be available and if available may be very valuable; there is no such person as an expert in human nature, and a witness cannot be called to say that it is likely that purchaser of the goods will be deceived; the test of comparison of3920 the marks side by side is not a sound one, since a purchaser will seldom have two marks actually before him when he purchases; the marks, with many difference may yet have an element of similarly which will cause deception, more especially if the goods are in practice asked for by a name which denotes the mark or the device on it. Section 480 , IPC, does not necessarily require that any intending purchasers should actually be deceived; it is sufficient, if the deception in question is reasonably calculated to cause it to be believed that the goods so marked have a connection with course of trade of a person whom they have not any such connection; if it is clear, from a simple look, that the get-up of the offending labels or wrappers is closely similar to the get-up of the complainant's goods and in general appearance, labels and colour selection and other essential details of the wrappers of the offending mark so closely resemble those of the complainant's mark, that they are likely to deceive an unwary purchaser who is acquainted with the trademark and who trusts his memory, in such a case such use is an offence of counterfeiting trademark punishable under the IPC ; the matter must be considered from the point of view of the ordinary unwary purchaser and the totality of the impression gained on seeing the labels and wrappers in question when offered for sale.[20]

10. Proof of Actual Sale--Not Necessary

It is not necessary to prove actual sale for the purpose of bringing the charge under s 482 or s 485, IPC, home to the accused. It would be enough if circumstances are proved to establish that the tins bearing counterfeit trademark were actually stored for sale. The elements of the offences charged do not require proof of any person having been actually deceived. It is enough if the circumstances proved are sufficient to establish that prospective buyers were likely to be deceived.[21]

11. Conviction

The fact that the complainant who had not registered his title 'Basant Bahar' as a trademark, but loosely used the word trademark in his averments, did not affect the case.[22] If the facts alleged by the complainant are proved, the mere wrong mention of the provision of law will not absolve the accused.[23] Where, the complainant had successfully put into the market a scent 'Basant Bahar', packed in a carton with distinctive features, the accused who originally put another scent into the market, titled as 'Pushpa Raj', finding that it was not being sold, copied the title 'Basant Bahar', with all the distinctive features, on the carton, with the difference, that he put his own manufacturers name, and when it was proved that his scent was inferior in quality and sold with the intention of palming off his scent as the one manufactured by the complainant, the accused was found guilty under ss 482 and 486, IPC .[24]3921

12. Sentence

The measure of punishment for an offence under this section should be the damage caused to the complainant.[25]

S. 483.

Counterfeiting a property mark used by another.--

Whoever counterfeits any [26][] property mark used by any other person shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

Section 483 is restricted to the offence of counterfeiting property marks.

2. 'Counterfeits'

Section 28 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

3. Procedure

The offence under section 483 , IPC is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, with the permission of the court before which the prosecution for such offence is pending by the person whose trade or property mark is counterfeited, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

4. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.

5. Duty of the Court

Commentary under the same heading in s 482, ante, may be referred to.

6. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the accused counterfeited the property mark in question;
(b) the said property mark was the property of some other person; and
(c) it was so used by that other person.3922

7. Settled Position of Law

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

[OF] [* * *] PROPERTY AND OTHER MARKS]

S. 484.

Counterfeiting a mark used by a public servant.--

Whoever counterfeits any property mark used by a public servant, or any mark used by a public servant to denote that any property has been manufactured by a particular person or at a particular time or place, or that the property is of a particular quality or has passed through a particular office, or that it is entitled to any exemption, or uses as genuine any such mark knowing the same to be counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The offence under this section is an aggravated form of the offence punishable under the preceding s 483 . The aggravation is due to the property mark being that of a public servant. In other respects, it generally follows the last two sections.

The section is made up of two offences, namely, (i) counterfeiting a property mark of a public servant, and (ii) using counterfeit property mark as genuine. The terms of the section are wider than those of the preceding two sections which deal only with property marks, while this section deals not only with property marks as such but also with other used by a public servant to denote certain things with reference to a property. It, thus, protects all marks, whether property marks or other marks, if they are used by a public servant to denote that:

(a) Any property has been manufactured by,

(i) a particular person; or
(ii) at a particular time or place.

(b) The property is of a particular quality; or
(c) The property has passed through a particular office; or
(d) The property is entitled to any exemption.

A property mark used for any other purpose will be outside the protection intended by this section. The 'Agmark' label (prescribed by the government to denote a certain grade to ghee) is really a label prescribed by the Central Government and cannot be said to be a public servant. A person, counterfeiting such a label, cannot be held to have committed an offence under this section.[27]

A familiar example of a property mark used by a servant is the broad arrow exclusively used by government to denote that the property, to which it is affixed, is the property of government, for instance, military vehicles display this mark. Since the Government of India is a manufacturer or merchant, it has to protect its manufacture or merchandise by using appropriate property marks. In some cases, the3923 use of a mark by government is necessary to protect its customs and other duties so that if a person, in order to get exemption from such duties, uses a false government mark on his goods thereby inducing officers of government to pass the goods free of duty, he commits the offence under the section.

2. 'Counterfeits'

Section 28 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the ... day of ..., at ..., you counterfeited a mark (or property mark), to wit ..., used by a public servant, to wit ..., to denote that some property was manufactured by a particular person (or at a particular time or place), to wit ... (or that the property is of a particular quality, to wit ..., or that the property has passed through a particular office, to wit... or that the property is entitled to a particular exemption, to wit ...) (or used, as genuine, a mark (or property mark), to wit ..., knowing the same to be counterfeit), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 484 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the accused counterfeited the mark or property mark in question;
(b) such mark was used by a public servant; and
(c) the said mark was used to denote that the property had been manufactured by a particular person or at a particular time or place, or that the property was of a particular quality, or that the property had passed through a particular office, or that the property was entitled to a certain exemption;

or prove that:

(a) the accused used the mark or property mark in question;
(b) such mark was used by a public servant;
(c) the said mark was used to denote that the property had been manufactured by a particular person or at a particular time or place, or that the property was of a particular quality, or that the property was entitled to a certain exemption;
(d) the accused used the said mark as genuine; and
(e) when the accused used it, he knew the same to be a counterfeit.3924

Making or possession of any instrument for counterfeiting a property mark.--

Whoever makes or has in his possession any die, plate or other instrument for the purpose of counterfeiting a property mark, or has in his possession a property mark for the purpose of denoting that any goods belong to a person to whom they do not belong, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.]

Comments

1. Scope

The section follows the line of ss 235, 265 and 472, IPC, which relate to possession of instrument for counterfeiting coins, stamps, and forging documents. The IPC regards the possession of instruments for counterfeiting coins and making, or possession of, any instrument for counterfeiting a property mark as equally serious though it regards counterfeiting of stamps as more serious. All the four sections embody the principle that it is better to punish preparation for an offence than to wait for the consummation of the offence itself.

The section falls into two parts. The first part constitutes the act of making, or of possessing, an instrument of counterfeiting a property mark, an offence and the second part makes the possession of a property mark for denoting goods as belonging to a person, to whom they do not belong, an offence.

2. 'Any Die, Plate or Other Instrument'

Even though a mark may be a combination mark, possession of moulds for counterfeiting a part of the mark will amount to an offence under this section.[29]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and tribal by a magistrate of the first class.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:3925
> That, on or about the ... day of ..., at ..., you may (or had in your possession) a die (or plate or instrument), to wit ..., for the purpose of counterfeiting a property mark, to wit ... (or had, in your possession, the property mark. Ex ..., for the purpose of denoting that certain goods, to wit ..., belonged to AB, to whom they did not belong). And that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 485 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Duty of the Court

Commentary under the same heading in s 482, ante, may be referred to.

6. Proof

The prosecution has to either prove that:

(a) the accused made, or had, in his possession, the die, plate or other instrument in question, and
(b) such die, etc, was for the purpose of counterfeiting a property mark;

or prove that:

(a) the accused had, in his possession, the property mark in question,
(b) he possessed such property mark for the purpose of denoting that goods, bearing such mark, belonged to some person, and
(c) such goods did not belong to that person.

The onus of establishing the elements of the offence under the section rests entirely upon the prosecution. It can, however, in the circumstances of a case, discharge this onus by praying, in aid, explanation 2 to s 28 . The foundation for the presumption under the said explanation must be laid by the prosecution by calling relevant evidence.[30]

7. Settled Position of Law

Commentary under the same heading in s 482, ante, may be referred to.

8. Proof of Actual Sale--Not Necessary

Commentary under the same heading in s 482, ante, may be referred to.

9. Double Jeopardy

It may be that a person may be in possession of different sets of counterfeit labels of trademark on different occasions at different places. If such a person be found in possession, he will be deemed to have committed a distinct and separate offence under s 485, IPC in respect of each set of counterfeit labels found with him at different places. It cannot be said that a second prosecution in respect of another set of counterfeit labels found with a person would amount to a prosecution for the same3926 offence twice, violating s 403, CrPC 1898[31] or Art 20 (2) of the Constitution of India .[32]

10. Sentence

No protection can be afforded if the accused is let off with light fines for such offences, though there may be cases, when the offence is committed inadvertently in which case, a small fine may be justified. When, however, there is a systematic policy of pursuing another in using his trademark, it becomes a different matter, and a higher fine should be imposed.[33]

Comments

1. Scope

The provisions of this section are aimed at a retailer who connives with a fraudulent wholesaler or manufacturer in palming off on an unsuspecting public goods which purport to be other than what they are.[35] A person who makes no attempt at substitution but only offers the spurious article at a lower price as being a different and cheaper article, does not come within the mischief of the section.[36] In order to fall within the ambit of the section, it is not necessary that the mark in question should be the exclusive property of anybody. The only consideration of importance3927 under the section is whether the mark in question has come to be so identified with the goods of another person using the mark as to be regarded as a distinctive mark to denote those particular goods.[37]

Mens rea in its ordinary sense, that is to say, in the sense of a dishonest intention or an intention of deceiving or cheating, does not form an essential ingredient for an offence under this section.[38]It is sufficient to show that there was an intention on the part of the accused to do the act forbidden by the section.[39] A finding, that the prosecution has failed to prove that there was any intention on the part of the accused to defraud or to cheat, is not inconsistent with the existence of mens rea in the sense of an intention to do a thing forbidden by law.[40]Every man is presumed to intend the consequences of his act. The very fact that the accused has kept, in his ship, goods, containing counterfeit marks, would show, by necessary implication, that he had an intention to do an act which is forbidden by the statute.[41]

2. 'Whoever'

The word 'whoever' means 'every person who' and would include a limited company or a corporation. A body corporate can lawfully be prosecuted and, on conviction, punished for an offence under s 482 or s 486, IPC .[42]

3. 'Possession'

Section 27 and its commentary in vol 1, may be referred to.

4. 'Goods'

'Goods' in this section, include books.[43]

5. 'Counterfeit Property Mark'

A counterfeit property mark is one, by means of whose resemblance to a genuine article it is intended to deceive or lead a purchaser to imagine that the counterfeit is, in reality, the genuine article.[44] Mere differences in detail may not prevent two marks from being essentially the same. What degree of resemblance is necessary is a matter incapable of definition a priori.[45] The test, therefore, is whether there is such a resemblance as to deceive a purchaser using ordinary caution.[46] If there is no doubt that the intention of the accused was to deceive and the accused are unable to bring themselves within the exceptions in s 486, it is clearly a case of 'counterfeit' within the meaning of s 28 .[47] A thing is not ordinarily counterfeit unless it bears, on the face3928 of it, the resemblance of validity, and such as to deceive an average person on an ordinary observation. Where the differences are patent and obvious on ordinary observation to an unintelligent person, the offence under this section is not committed.[48]

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, with the permission of the court before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, by the person whose trade or property mark is counterfeited, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

7. Charge

The offence under this section being liable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.

8. Duty of the Court

Commentary under the same heading in s 482, ante, may be referred to.

9. Burden of Proof

Under this section, the onus is not thrown upon the complainant to show that the accused acted dishonestly; the onus is thrown upon the accused to bring himself within the exceptions stated in cll (a) and (b), read together, or cl (c). If the accused discharges the onus, he commits no offence under the section. The onus arises as soon as the essential ingredients of the offence are proved.[49] Where marks on articles, recovered from a person, are not proved to be counterfeit, there is no question of the person proving his innocence.[50]

10. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the accused sold, or exposed for sale, or had, in his possession, for sale, the goods or things in question;[51]
(b) such goods or things, or the case, package or other receptacle, in which such goods were contained, had some property mark, affixed to, impressed upon, them; and
(c) such property mark was a counterfeit.3929

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

[OF] [* * *] PROPERTY AND OTHER MARKS]

S. 487.

Making a false mark upon any receptacle containing goods.--

Whoever makes any false mark upon any case, package or other receptacle containing goods, in a manner reasonably calculated to cause any public servant or any other person to believe that such receptacle contains goods which it does not contain or that it does not contain goods which it does contain, or that the goods contained in such receptacle are of a nature or quality different from the real nature or quality thereof, shall, unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is framed in general terms and would include offences punishable under other sections, for instance, under s 482, IPC . The section aims mainly at punishing smugglers of contraband goods without payment of duty by using false marks. A person, who imports goods into this country and makes a false mark thereon to cause it to appear that the goods are not dutiable, is liable to punishment under this section, while one who makes use of goods so marked is liable to punishment under the next section.

This section is more comprehensive than s 482 or s 486, IPC . It punishes the false marking of a case, package or receptacle, containing goods, in a manner reasonably calculated to deceive a public servant or any other person. It is not required that the mark should be trademark or property mark. The criminally of the act arises from the nature of the mark and the purpose for which it was made on the case, package or receptacle, containing the goods. The false belief, sought to be induced, is:

(a) that the receptacle contains goods which it does not contain, or
(b) that it does not contain goods which it does contains, or
(c) that the goods, so contained, are of a nature or quality different from the real nature or quality thereof.

The intention need not be proved for it is presumed from the mark and the manner of using it. The presumption can be rebutted by the accused by proving that he acted without intent to defraud. A person, making a false mark upon any receptacle, containing goods, can escape punishment under the section only if he proves that he acted without intent to defraud.[52]3930

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the ... day of ..., you made a false mark, to wit..., upon a case (or package or other receptacle), to wit ..., containing goods, in a manner reasonably calculated to cause a public servant (or any other person), to wit..., to believe that such receptacle contained goods, to wit .... which it did not contain (or that it did not contain goods, which it did contain) (that the goods, contained in such receptacle, were of a nature (or quality) different from the real nature (or quality) thereof) and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 487 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

4. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the accused made some mark upon some case, package or other receptacle containing goods;
(b) such mark was a false mark; and
(c) the accused did as in point (a) above in a manner reasonably calculated to cause some public servant, or some other person, to believe that:

(i) the receptacle contained goods which it did not contain, or
(ii) it did not contain goods which it did contain, or
(iii) the goods, contained in the receptacle, were of a nature or quality different from the real nature or quality thereof.

The accused may prove in defence that he acted without intent to defraud.

Punishment for making use of any such false mark.--

Whoever makes use of any such false mark in any manner prohibited by the last foregoing section shall, unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be punished as if he had committed an offence against that section.3931

Comments

1. Scope

The section punishes a person who makes use of a false mark in any manner prohibited by the previous section, namely, s 487, IPC . As in other relevant sections, the section does not require that the user of the mark should actually defraud anyone; it is sufficient if the use is reasonably calculated to cause any person to believe the goods so marked or any goods, contained in a receptacle, were of a nature or quality different from the real nature.[53]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate.

3. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings

Where the allegation against the accused were of storage of rice in a railway wagon for obtaining transit permit by using false documents, there was no material in the FIR to show such allegations. The admission by the deputy secretary of Food and Supply Department, was that he had issued the transit permit under his signature, negated the allegation regarding commission of the offence. The FIR and investigation commenced thereon for offences under ss 463, 465 and 488, IPC, were quashed.[54]

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the ... day of ..., at ..., you made use of a false mark, to wit.... upon a case (or package or other receptacle), to wit..., containing goods, in a manner reasonably calculated to cause a public servant (or any other person), to wit ..., to believe that such case contained goods, to wit ... which it did not contain (or that it did not contain goods which it did contain) (or that the goods, contained in such receptacle, were of a nature (or quality) different from the real nature (or quality) thereof), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 488 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Duty of the Court

Commentary under the same heading in s 482, ante, may be referred to.

6. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the accused made use of some mark upon some case, package or receptacle, containing goods;3932
(b) such mark was a false mark; and
(c) the accused did as in point (a) above in a manner reasonably calculated to cause some public servant, or some other person, to believe that:

(i) the receptacle contained goods which it did not contain, or
(ii) it did not contain goods which it did contain, or
(iii) the goods, contained in the receptacle, were of a nature or quality different from the real nature or quality thereof.

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

[OF] [* * *] PROPERTY AND OTHER MARKS]

S. 489.

Tampering with property mark with intent to cause injury.--

Whoever removes, destroys, defaces or adds to any property mark, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause injury to any person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

Tampering with any property mark is motivated by a criminal intention, the object being to remove the identity of the property and conceal the crime committed. The section is confined only to property marks. A familiar example of a mark is the broad arrow mark on property to denote that it is the property of the government.

Unlike other sections in the group of ss 479 to 489, IPC, a criminal intention or knowledge is an essential ingredient of the offence punishable under this section. When a property mark is removed, destroyed or defaced, or added to, with the intention or knowledge that thereby injury may be caused to any person, the offence described in the section is committed.

2. 'Property Mark'

Commentary under s 479, ante, may be referred to.

3. 'Injury'

Where the term of a contract, between an author and a publisher, assigning the copyright of books of the author to the publisher, are so wide that it is difficult for the court to hold, on the facts of the case, that, in removing the name of the author from the books, the intention of the publisher was nothing but to cause injury to the author, and not to exercise a right, which, the publisher honestly believed, was available to him under the contract, a charge under s 489, IPC, cannot stand against the publisher.[55]3933

4. 'Person'

Commentary under s 11, vol 1, may be referred to.

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate and may also be tried summarily.

6. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.

7. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the mark in question is a property mark;
(b) the accused removed, destroyed, defaced, or added to, such mark; and
(c) he did so intending thereby to cause injury to some person or he did so knowing that he might cause injury to some person.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

[56][OF CURRENCY-NOTES AND BANK-NOTES]

S. 489A .

Counterfeiting currency-notes or bank-notes.--

Whoever counterfeits, or knowingly performs any part of the process of counterfeiting, any currency-note or bank-note, shall be punished with [57][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.--For the purpose of this section and of sections 489B,[58][489C, 489D and 489E], the expression "bank-note" means a promissory note or engagement for the payment of money to bearer on demand issued by any person carrying on the business of banking in any part of the world, or issued by or under the authority of any State or sovereign power, and intended to be used as equivalent to, or as a substitute for, money.3934

Comments

1. Scope

This section is similar to ss 231 and 255, IPC, which deal with the same offence with respect to a coin and a stamp respectively, penalises a person who counterfeits, or knowingly performs any part of the process of counterfeiting, any currency-note or bank-note. The expression 'currency-note' is large enough in its amplitude to cover the currency notes of 'any country'.[59]

2. Object

Sections 489A to 489E deal with various economic offences in respect of forged or counterfeit currency notes or bank notes. The object of legislature in enacting these provisions is not only to protect the economy of the country, but also to provide adequate protection to currency notes and bank notes.[60] Possession of fake currency is a direct threat to the economy of the country.[61] It is an offence against symbol of sovereignty and does not deserve any sympathy of the court in matter of sentence.[62]

3. Pith of the Offence

The pith of the offence under s 489A, IPC is that it is not necessary to show that the deception actually took place, rather the intention to practice deception by causing one thing to resemble another is quite sufficient and the counterfeit must be of such a character that it would be possible to palm it of as genuine.[63]

4. Absence of Security Thread from Currency Notes --Effect

It is a matter of common knowledge that genuine currency notes have security thread and absence of the same by itself would show that the currency notes were counterfeit in nature.[64]

5. 'Counterfeits'

From the definition in s 28, IPC, of the word 'counterfeit', it is clear that counterfeit is a process by which one thing is caused to resemble another thing. It supposes that there is an original. The act of counterfeiting is the effect of producing another so as to resemble the original and the object of which is to practise deception or knowing it to be likely that the deception will thereby be practised. In other words, counterfeit does not connote an exact reproduction of the original counterfeited. The difference between the counterfeit and the original is not, therefore, limited to a difference existing only by reason of faulty reproduction. For the purpose of the IPC there can be counterfeiting even though the imitation is not exact and though there are differences in detail between the original and the imitation so long as the resemblance is so closed that the deception may thereby be practised.[65]3935

6. Detecting Counterfeit Currency

Forged or counterfeit currency can be ascertained by the following facts:

(a) Water mark was totally absent in the said currency notes.
(b) The quality of the paper was inferior.
(c) Security thread was absent.
(d) Number panels were not in alignment.
(e) There were more notes than one bearing the same number.
(f) The quality of the printing was inferior.[66]

Fake currency notes can be detected by the fact that the notes were photo copies as per the report of the Reserve Bank of India, their paper was rough and thick, size of the notes was slightly shorter than that of genuine ones, water mark was not available and the colour of the notes was different.[67]

7. 'Performs any Part of the Process of Counterfeiting'

Section 489A not only deals with complete act of counterfeiting, but also covers the case where the accused performs any part of the process of counterfeiting. Therefore, if the material shows that the accused knowingly performed any part of the process of counterfeiting, s 489A becomes applicable.[68] These words would mean 'part of any process which could have ended in producing a counterfeit'.[69] A clumsy and crude attempt to produce the impression of a currency-note only to cheat another person of his money cannot be called a process of counterfeiting so as to constitute one of the elements of the offence under this section.[70]

8. Explanation

A traveler's cheque issued by a bank to its customer is not a 'bank-note'.[71]

9. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and triable by the court of sessions.

10. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of sessions judge, etc.) hereby charge to (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the ... day of ..., at..., counterfeited (or knowingly performed a part of the process of counterfeiting, to wit ...) a currency-note (or a bank-note) of the value of ... rupees, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 489A of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.3936

11. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the note in question is a currency-note or bank-note; and
(b) the accused counterfeited it or knowingly performed any part of the process of counterfeiting it.

For convicting a person under s 489A, IPC, the prosecution is required to prove that the accused was knowingly performing any part of the process to counterfeit currency notes. For proving the offence of conspiracy, there must be some convincing evidence of the prosecution to prove that it was pre-arranged plan of all or some of the accused either for preparing fake currency or for their circulation. Only on the basis of circumstance like some persons were found in possession of counterfeit currency notes at or about the same time, inference cannot be drawn that all of them had engaged themselves in a conspiracy. However, if an accused is found in possession of counterfeit currency notes, it is upto him to furnish satisfactory explanation regarding the possession. This proposition is also applicable in respect of the material which can be used for preparing fake currency notes and the process which can be used for making fake currency notes. If there is no such explanation, a person found in possession of such material and counterfeit currency notes can be convicted for offence under s 489A of IPC .[72]

When the prosecution witness was working as the treasurer in the Reserve Bank of India and treasurer has expertise to detect fake and counterfeit currency notes, he had given valid grounds on the basis of which he had come to the conclusion that the currency notes were counterfeit and in one of them security threat was absent, his evidence should be believed.[73]

The very existence of the fake notes amounting to lakhs and lakhs of rupees indicate that all the accused under a criminal conspiracy are bent upon selling and introducing the fake notes in the market.[74]

12. Acquittal

A conviction under this section cannot stand unless it is proved that the accused counterfeited a currency-note or a bank-note or he knowingly performed a part of the process of counterfeiting a currency-note or a bank-note.[75] Where there is total lack of evidence on the record that the three accused persons had counterfeited the currency notes or knowingly performed any part of the process of counterfeiting it and conviction under s 489A, IPC cannot be maintained unless it is proved that the accused persons really intended to counterfeit and either did counterfeit or performed any part of the process of counterfeiting, and there is also total lack of any evidence that the three accused persons have conspired together with the main accused in counterfeiting currency notes or knowingly participated in performing any part of the process of counterfeiting currency notes, the conviction of the three accused persons under ss 489A and 120B, IPC is illegal in view of the evidence on the record and the same was liable to be set aside.[76] Where the evidence did not establish that the3937 material recovered from the accused appellant could be used for printing currency notes, the accused appellant was acquitted of the charges under ss 489A, 489C and 489D .[77]

Charge against the accused was of making forged currency note of Rs 100/- and 50/-. Co-accused placed in similar situation and facing same charge already acquitted. The accused was also entitled to acquittal of the charge under ss 489A, 489C and 489D, IPC .[78]

13. Conviction

When the evidence of the investigating officer and an artist was providing material to corroborate the evidence of the accomplice, it clearly meets the requirements of s 114(b) in the background of s 133 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872. Thus, the accused can be convicted.[79] Where an accused is found in possession of counterfeit currency notes he can explain his possession, if he fails to furnish any explanation he would be convicted under s 489A, IPC .[80] If the accused persons do not furnish explanation that they were in possession of fake currency notes for other purpose, the court would infer that the accused intended to use the fake currency notes as genuine one.[81]

From the accused appellants fake currency notes, and machinery used for preparing fake currency notes were recovered, they were found guilty and convicted under ss 489-A, 489-B, 489-C and 489-D, IPC .[82] Where the accused was in possession of counterfeit currency notes and the material which revealed that he was involved in the preparation of fake currency notes, he was convicted under s 489A .[83]

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

[OF CURRENCY-NOTES AND BANK-NOTES]

S. 489B .

Using as genuine, forged or counterfeit currency-notes or bank-notes.--

Whoever sells to, or buys or receives from, any other person, or otherwise traffics in or uses as genuine, any forged or counterfeit currency-note or bank-note, knowing or having reason to believe the same to be forged or counterfeit, shall be punished with [84][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may be extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.3938

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes traffic in forged or counterfeit currency-notes or banknotes or using them as genuine. Similar offence, relating to coins, is punishable under ss 239 and 241, IPC, and that, relating to stamps, under s 258, IPC . This section, thus, resembles ss 239, 241 and 258, IPC . The offence under this section is committed only when the false currency is distributed as if it were a genuine currency. [85]A person, who purchases, for value, a forged note, knowing it to be forged, is ordinarily expected to make money out of the transaction by circulating the note as a genuine one. A perfectly honest man such as a mere collector of curios, who does not intend to put the instrument into circulation, may come within the ambit of the section.[86] It will be noticed from the language of the section that the buyer and seller of a forged currency-note are punishable under this section.

The main distinction between s 489B and 489C, IPC is that in order to establish a charge under s 389B, the prosecution is required to prove the sale, purchase, receipt, trafficking or use of counterfeit currency as genuine, whereas to prove a charge under s 489C of IPC, the prosecution has to prove possession of counterfeit currency with the requisite knowledge and with intention to use the same as genuine or intending that the same may be used as genuine. If in a given case, someone finds currency notes lying somewhere and picks them up with intention to use the same as genuine, while believing the same to be counterfeit currency, he would be guilty of the offence punishable under s 489C of IPC . If however someone consciously receives such counterfeit currency from another person with the requisite knowledge, he will be guilty of the offence punishable under s 489C of the IPC . The question as to whether possession of counterfeit currency in a particular case falls within the purview of s 489B or 489C of IPC, depends upon facts of each case including the explanation, if any, given by the accused as to how he came into possession of counterfeit currency notes.[87]

2. Object

Section 489B, IPC relates to using as genuine forged or counterfeited currency notes or bank notes. The object of the legislature in enacting this section is to stop the circulation of forged notes by punishing all persons who knowing or having reason to believe the same to be forged, do any act which could lead to their circulation.[88]

3. 'As Genuine'

The words 'as genuine' govern only the verb 'uses' which immediately precedes it, and not all other verbs used in the opening portion of the section.[89]

4. 'Knowing or Having Reason to believe the same to be Forged or Counterfeit'

Mens rea is very essential for conviction of economic offences under ss 489B and 489C of IPC . These provisions are not meant to punish unwary users or possession of3939 fake currency notes and bank notes.[90] The knowledge or reason to believe that the note was forged has to be proved to fix the liability under ss 489B and 489C . Unless it is found that the accused had the knowledge or reason to believe that the said questioned note was a forged one, the question of his palming it off as genuine could not arise.[91] The mens rea of offences under ss 489B and 489C is, 'knowing or having reason to believe the currency notes or bank notes are forged or counterfeit'.

Without this mens rea, selling, buying or receiving from another person or otherwise trafficking in or using as genuine forged or counterfeit currency-notes or bank-notes is not enough to constitute an offence under s 489B, IPC .[92] Where the prosecution fails to establish that the accused was either knowing or having reason to believe that the currency notes which have been recovered by the Police are forged or counterfeited, the accused cannot be convicted. In the instant case the counterfeit notes were not recovered from the physical possession of the accused passenger but from the back seat of the commercial vehicle, co-accused driver of the vehicle had already been acquitted, the accused was entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 489B, IPC .[93] Under ss 489B and 489C, guilt is sought to be fastened on the accused on the ground of 'knowledge' or 'reason to believe' that any currency-note or bank-note is forged or counterfeited. The two expressions are more or less ejusdem generis though 'knowledge' will stand on a slightly higher plane than 'reason to believe'. Suspicion or doubt cannot, however, be raised to the level of 'reason to believe' so as to foster liability on a person under s 489B or s 489C . If an uneducated rustic person in the usual course of business gets a currency-note, which he finds to be suspicious, and tries to get rid of the note, he will not be guilty either under s 489B, or s 489C, IPC .[94] An ordinary prudent man would not be in position to make out that the notes in his possession are counterfeit or fake. Where it could not be said that the appellant possessed the requisite mens rea of selling, buying or receiving from other person or otherwise trafficking forged or counterfeited currency notes as genuine, he was acquitted of the charges under ss 489B and 489C, IPC .[95]

In this case, allegation was that appellant accused had come to deposit fake and counterfeit notes in bank. There was no evidence on the record to show that the appellant accused had culpable knowledge that the notes were fake. After it was detected by the machine that the notes were fake, the appellant accused continued to stay in bank on the askance of the Bank Manager, till the Police arrived. The envelope containing fake notes was not kept under sealed cover in Malkhana, was sent to CFSL after twenty days. Possibility of the tampering of notes at Malkhana could not be ruled out. Conviction of the appellant accused under ss 489B and 489C, IPC was set aside.[96]3940

The appellant accused was a passenger in a vehicle from which fake currency notes were recovered. There was no evidence that the appellant accused had kept the fake currency notes in the vehicle. Other passengers travelling in the vehicle were not examined. Co-accused driver of the vehicle was already acquitted in the case. Conviction of the appellant accused under ss 489B and 489C, IPC was found not sustainable and was accordingly set aside.[1]

5. Sections 489B , 489C, IPC, and Provisions of the Passport Act--Distinction

The offences under the Passport Act are distinct offences from the offences under ss 489B and 489C, IPC . Therefore, when the prosecution has not been able to establish the entry of the accused into Pakistan and return therefrom, contrary to the provisions of Passport Act, this fact would not affect the basis of charge under ss 489B and 489C, IPC . Since they are distinct and separate offences, the acquittal of accused under the Passport Act has thus no effect on his prosecution under ss 489B and 489C, IPC .[2]

6. Detecting Counterfeit Currency

Commentary under the same heading in s 489A, ante, may be referred to.

7. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under the preceding s 489A, IPC .

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the ... day of ..., at ..., sold, to AB (or bought, or received, from AB, or trafficked in, or used, as genuine) a forged (or counterfeit) currency-note (or bank-note), to wit ..., knowing (or having reason to believe) the same to be forged (or counterfeit), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 489B of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Mere Possession not Enough

Under s 489B, IPC the burden is on the prosecution to prove that at the time when the accused was passing the note he knew that it was a forged one. The mere possession of it by him does not shift the burden to the accused to prove his innocent possession of the forged note.[3]3941

10. Proof

The prosecution is required to prove[4] that:

(a) the currency-note or bank-note in question was forged or counterfeit;
(b) the accused sold to, or bought, or received, from, some person, or trafficked in, or used, as genuine, such note; and
(c) when he did so, he knew or had reason to believe such note to be forged or counterfeit.

Before a person can be convicted for an offence under section, it has to be established that he was aware of the forged or counterfeit nature of the currency-note, or bank-note, which he offered for sale or exchange.[5] Mere possession of counterfeit notes is not essential, intention to use counterfeit currency notes is essential ingredient of offence under s 489B, IPC . Where there was no evidence which suggested that the appellant accused made effort to use the counterfeit currency notes, he was acquitted of the offence under s 489B, IPC .[6] If the currency-note or bank-note is of the kind and quality which any innocent person may take and present innocently, the prosecution must show that the accused was criminally in possession of such note.[7] The fact that the note was fake was confirmed only after examining five experienced persons in that field, will clearly go to show that there is no apparent sign in the note or any ordinary man to come to the conclusion that it is a counterfeit note. Therefore, when the accused, an ordinary man who is not in the field of examining notes every day was found in mere possession of counterfeit note, the presumption that the accused had knowledge that note was counterfeit cannot be drawn.[8] The accused was found in possession of forged currency notes, and did not offer explanation as to where they came from, the silence on the part of the accused in such circumstances which would weigh against him in the consideration of the prosecution evidence lead before him. Therefore, the conviction of the accused under ss 489B and 420, IPC, was found proper.[9]

Where no independent witness to prove recovery was examined, the official witnesses examined in the case had made contradictory statements regarding the place of seizure, time and manner of seizure, appellant was acquitted of the charge under s 489C, IPC .[10]

No independent witness was examined to prove the recovery of notes from the accused. The prosecution witnesses did not state that the notes after seizure from the accused were sealed. The notes were not subjected to any chemical or electronic test.3942 Held, the prosecution failed to prove the guilt of the accused. Accused was entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charges under s 489B and 489C, IPC .[11] The prosecution case was that 1040 currency notes were recovered from the possession of the accused but government record showed 1038 currency notes only. The inspector deposed about the hurry in counting of currency notes and possibility was one or more notes might be less. Mere defect in investigation was no ground for acquittal of the accused.[12]

11. Conviction

In a case of trafficking in currency-notes in pursuance of a conspiracy on a charge under s 489B read with s 120B, IPC, the fact that several conspirators played different roles, is wholly irrelevant in considering the charge. The several incidents should not be separated and considered in isolation. In such a case, if one of the accused is convicted under s 489B, it is redundant to convict him under s 489C, IPC also.[13] Where the CBI in presence of independent witnesses recovered huge amount of counterfeit currency notes from the possessions of the accused and report of the expert sufficiently corroborated that those notes were really counterfeit notes and from the evidence of prosecution witness sufficient reasons to hold that accused had not only in his possession those counterfeit currency notes, but he had the real intention to put those currency notes into circulation for his material gain and thereby having regard to the prosecution evidence the accused was found guilty of both the offence under ss 489B / 511 of the IPC as well as s 489C of the IPC .[14] Where an accused is found in possession of counterfeit currency notes he can explain his possession, if he fails to furnish any explanation he would be convicted under s 489A, IPC .[15] If the accused persons do not furnish explanation that they were in possession of fake currency notes for other purpose, the court would infer that the accused intended to use the fake currency notes as genuine one.[16]

12. Sentence

The accused convicted under this section is liable to be punished with imprisonment for life or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to 10 years and the accused is also liable to pay fine.

The offence of counterfeiting currency notes for using them as genuine or trafficking in them, or possessing them are all grave offences, and cannot be lightly viewed. Such offences vitiate the economy of the country and are matters of serious concern. They are rarely detected and are perhaps a tip of the iceberg. The award of 7 years imprisonment cannot be said to be on the higher side.[17] A sentence of 7 years is not disproportionately severe depending upon the facts and circumstances of the case.[18] Where an accused is found guilty of manufacturing, selling and introducing3943 fake currency notes, in such heinous offence, the accused should serve the sentence of imprisonment imposed upon him for full term.[19]

13. Sentence (Lenient)

The accused was about 60 years of age at the time of his conviction by the trial court and was an old man of 73 years of age at the time of decision in appeal by the Supreme Court. He was also suffering from diabetes and also met with an accident and was unable to walk without a support, so the sentence of imprisonment of 7 years rigorous imprisonment was reduced to 3 years rigorous imprisonment.[20]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

[OF CURRENCY-NOTES AND BANK-NOTES]

S. 489C .

Possession of forged or counterfeit currency-notes or bank-notes.--

Whoever has in his possession any forged or counterfeit currency-notes or bank-note, knowing or having reason to believe the same to be forged or counterfeit and intending to use the same as genuine or that it may be used as genuine, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

Section 489C deals with possession of forged or counterfeit currency notes or bank notes. It makes possession of forged and counterfeited currency notes or bank notes punishable. Possession and knowledge that the currency notes were counterfeited notes are necessary ingredients to constitute offence under ss 489C and 489D .[21]

The section punishes the possession of any forged of counterfeit currency-note or bank-note, knowing, or having reason to believe, the same to be forged or counterfeit and intending to use the same as genuine or that it may be used as genuine. Similar provisions are contained in ss 242, 243 and 259, IPC .[22]

2. Object

Commentary under the same heading in s 489A, ante, may be referred to.3944

3. Sections 489B , 489C, IPC, and Provisions of the Passport Act--Distinction

Commentary under the same heading in s 489B, ante, may be referred to.

4. Detecting Counterfeit Currency

Commentary under the same heading in s 489A, ante, may be referred to.

5. Section not Restricted to Indian Currency

As was observed by the Supreme Court in State of Kerala v Mathai Verghese ,[23] the expression 'currency notes' is large and wide enough in its amplitude to cover the currency notes of any country. Section 489C is not restricted to Indian currency notes alone, but it includes dollar also and it applies to American dollar bills.[24]

6. 'Possession'

The term 'Possession' as used in s 489C, IPC, bears a sense at variance from that in civil law. It would amount to criminal possession if the possessor had knowledge or reason to believe that the notes were forged and if his continued possession was with the intention of paying it on to the public. If the notes were of such a nature that a mere look at them would convince anybody that they were fake notes, it can be presumed that he had knowledge or reason to believe that they were counterfeit currencies.[25]

7. 'Forged or Counterfeit Currency-note'

The expression 'any forged or counterfeit currency-note', used in this section, takes, within its ambit, not only forged or counterfeit Indian currency-note, but also forged or counterfeit foreign currency-note. If the conditions, specified in the section, are satisfied, the possession of forged or counterfeit foreign currency-notes would be an offence under this section.[26] Therefore, the contention that s 489C will not apply to American dollar bills is not well-founded.[27]

8. Mere Possession is not Enough

Mere possession of forged currency-notes or bank-notes is not an offence. It becomes criminal only when it is coupled with an intention to use them as genuine. The prosecution must establish affirmatively all the ingredients of the offence under the section.[28] Therefore, when the accused, an ordinary man who is not in the field of examining one every day was found in mere possession of counterfeit note, the presumption that the accused had knowledge that note was counterfeit cannot be3945 drawn.[29] It should be borne in mind that mere possession of forged notes is not an offence under the IPC and in order to bring the case within the purview of s 489-C of IPC . It is not only necessary to prove that the accused was in possession of forged notes, but it should be further established (a) that at the time of his possession he knew the note to be forged or had reason to believe them to be so; and (b) that he intended to use them as genuine or that they might be used as genuine.[30]

Where the evidence did not establish that the material recovered from the accused appellant could be used for printing currency notes, the accused appellant was acquitted of the charges under ss 489A, 489C and 489D .[31]

9. Mere Possession not Enough for Presumption that Currency is Counterfeit or Forged

Whether the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that the currency-notes, in his possession, were forged or counterfeit is not a matter of presumption as the Supreme Court has held, in M Mammutti v State of Karnataka ,[32] that when there is no evidence of any witness to show that the counterfeit notes were of such a nature or description that a mere look at them would convince any person of average intelligence that they were counterfeit notes, such a presumption cannot reasonably be drawn. It must be established that (a) the accused was in exclusive possession of the counterfeit currency-notes; and (b) the accused was in possession thereof with knowledge of their being counterfeit.[33] The fact that the note was fake was confirmed only after examining five experienced persons in that field, will clearly go to show that there is no apparent sign in the note or any ordinary man to come to the conclusion that it is a counterfeit note.[34]

Driver of the vehicle cannot be prosecuted for offences under ss 489B and 489C, IPC unless evidence shows that he was one of the accused persons, and the3946 counterfeit currency notes seized were in their possession with the knowledge of the driver.[35]

10. Special type of Mens Rea

When the notes were obviously forgeries, this is something which is not in doubt at all. Even a gullible person would not be fooled into believing that these notes were genuine. The size of the notes was different and so was their colour. Many of them had the same number. In this view of the matter possession of such poor quality forged notes would not require any special type of mens rea for the purpose of conviction.[36]

11. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

12. Separate Trial

An offence under this section being distinct from an offence of receiving stolen property under s 411, IPC, the two offences should be tried separately.[37]

13. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of sessions judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the ... day of ..., at ..., you had, in your possession, a forged (or counterfeit) currency-note (or bank-note), to wit .... knowing (or having reason to believe) the same to be forged (or counterfeit) and intending to use the same as genuine (or that it may be used as genuine), and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 489C of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

14. Proof

The prosecution has to prove[38] that:

(a) the currency-note or bank-note in question was forged or counterfeit;
(b) the accused was in possession of the same;
(c) at the time of his possession, he knew, or he had reason to believe, that it was forged or counterfeit; and
(d) he intended to use it as genuine or that it might be used as genuine.3947

The onus lies on the prosecution to prove circumstances which lead clearly, indubitably and irresistibly to the inference that the accused had the intention to foist the currency-note or bank-note on the public.[39] A person would not become punishable even when the requirements in the opening part of the section are established unless it is proved that he also intended to use the forged or counterfeit currency-note or bank-note as genuine or that it may be used, if not by himself, then by someone else, as genuine.[40] Where it was clear that the accused was aware that the large number of currency-notes, which were found in his possession, were counterfeit, it was held that the only reasonable inference to be drawn was that the accused was in possession of the notes with the intention of using them as genuine or that they might be used as genuine.[41] However, if the case for the prosecution itself is that the accused got counterfeit notes, made or manufactured with the express object of foisting them on a third person, an enemy of theirs, the requisite intention under this section would be absent.[42]

Where two number of one thousand and thirty seven number of one hundred rupees notes of Indian currency were alleged to be recovered from the possession of the appellant accused, but the evidence of the police where the alleged currency notes were recovered was full of contradictions and inconsistencies, the two public witnesses did not support the recovery, were declared hostile, accused appellant was acquitted of the charges under ss 489C and 489B, IPC .[43]

The printing press on which the fake printing notes were being printed was functional at the time when the raid was committed. Due to passage of time the printing press lying in Police malkhana became non-functional. It did not affect the prosecution case and it could not be held that no offence was committed.[44]

15. Conviction

If on the facts proved, it is a matter of some doubt, whether the accused can be charged under s 489B, IPC, or, in addition, alternatively under s 489C, IPC and this, for some reason, has not been done, ss 221 and 222, CrPC, may be invoked to convict the accused under s 489C, IPC, which is a minor offence as compared to the one under s 489B, provided it appears, from the evidence, that he committed it and no prejudice to the accused is caused thereby.[45] From the accused appellants fake currency notes, and machinery used for preparing fake currency notes were3948 recovered, they were found guilty and convicted under provisions of ss 489A, 489B, 489C and 489D IPC .[46]

Where fake currency notes were recovered from the possession of the appellants accused, seizure lists were prepared in the use, the appellants in their statement made under s 313, CrPC did not furnish any explanation as to how they came into possession of the currency notes, the conviction of the three appellants under s 489C, IPC was upheld.[47]

16. Acquittal

Charge against the accused was of making forged currency note of Rs 100/- and Rs 50/-. Co-accused placed in similar situation and facing same charges already acquitted. The accused was also entitled to acquittal of the charge under ss 489A, 489C and 489D, IPC .[48] In the instant case the counterfeit notes were not recovered from the physical possession of the accused passenger but from the back seat of the commercial vehicle, co-accused driver of the vehicle had already been acquitted, the accused was entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 489C, IPC .[49]

17. Sentence

The accused was of about 60 years at the time of his conviction by the trial court and was an old man of 73 years at the time of decision in appeal by the Supreme Court. He was also suffering from diabetes and had also met with an accident and was unable to walk without a support so the sentence of imprisonment of 7 years rigorous imprisonment was reduced to 3 years rigorous imprisonment.[50]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [* * *] Property Marks

[OF CURRENCY-NOTES AND BANK-NOTES]

S. 489D .

Making or possessing instruments or materials for forging or counterfeiting currency-notes or bank-notes.--

Whoever makes, or performs any part of the process of making, or buys or sells or disposes of, or has in his possession, any machinery, instrument or material for the purpose of being used, or knowing or having reason to believe that it is intended to be used, for forging or counterfeiting any currency-note or bank-note, shall be punished with [51][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.3949

Comments

1. Scope

The wording of s 489D, similar to that in ss 233, 234, 256, 257 and 485, IPC is wide and would cover a case where a person is found in possession of a machinery, instrument or material for the purpose of being used for counterfeiting currency-notes even though the machinery, instrument or material, so found, are not all the article required for the purpose of counterfeiting.[52] To constitute an offence under this section, it is not necessary that the accused should be in possession of a complete outfit for the manufacture of counterfeit notes. The possession of even a single implement will suffice if it is shown that such implement was intended to be utilised for the work of counterfeiting.[53] From materials of counterfeiting in his possession which the accused cannot explain but which, in the opinion of the expert, can be used to counterfeit a five-rupee currency-note, the dishonest intention of the accused can be presumed.[54] The intention must, in almost every case, depend on facts, particularly on the nature and number of the articles found, the suitability for counterfeiting work and for innocent purpose. If the nature of the articles is such as to render them peculiarly suitable for counterfeiting work and useless for any other purpose can be suggested, the intention to use them for counterfeiting may be fairly inferred subject, of course, to rebutment by the accused. There may be cases, where, though the ultimate object of the possessor may clearly be counterfeiting the particular articles found are of such crude or imperfect nature as to indicate unmistakably that the work was only in an experimental stage and that they could not be intended for utilization in the preparation of the counterfeit.[55]

In the case of counterfeiting of a currency-note, both ability and materials of a particular kind are required. If those materials and ability are not present, it cannot be said that an act, performed without the ability to counterfeit and without materials which may help to a useful counterfeiting, would be an attempt.[56]

Where the computer printer and CD are discovered at the instance of the accused, the demonstration of methodology adopted for printing counterfeit currency notes in the presence of the panchas, given by him would not be regarded as his confession, but would be treated as discovery of fact within the meaning of s 27, Evidence Act.[57]

2. Object

Commentary under the same heading in s 489A, ante, may be referred to.3950

3. 'Possession'

Commentary under s 27, vol 1, may be referred to.

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by the court of sessions.

5. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of sessions judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the ... day of ..., at ..., you made (or performed any part of the process of making, or bought or sold or disposed of, or had, in your possession,) a machinery (or instrument or material,) to wit ..., for the purpose of being used (or knowing or having reason to believe that it was intended to be used) for forging (or counterfeiting) a currency-note (or bank-note), to wit..., and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 489D of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

6. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the thing in question was a machinery, instrument or material, necessary for, or used in, forging or counterfeiting a currency-note or bank-note;[58]
(b) the accused made, or performed, some part of the process of making, or bought, or sold, or disposed of, or had, in his possession,[59] the machinery, instrument or material in question; and
(c) the intention of the accused was that such machinery, instrument or material might be used for the purpose of forging or counterfeiting currency-notes or bank-notes or that he knew, or he had reason to believe, that the same was intended to be used for such purpose.

The burden lies on the prosecution to prove the state of mind of the accused that he had possession of materials for the purpose of counterfeiting a currency-note.[60]3951

Where the evidence did not establish that the material recovered from the accused appellant could be used for printing currency notes, the accused appellant was acquitted of the charges under ss 489A, 489C and 489D .[61]

Charge against the accused was of making forged currency note of Rs 100/- and 50/-. Co-accused placed in similar situation and facing same charge already acquitted. The accused was also entitled to acquittal of

the charge under ss 489A, 489C and 489D, IPC .[62]

7. Sentence

An offence under this section being rather serious in nature and anti-social in character apart from the question of loss of revenue, it must be put down with a stern hand and the offender must be dealt with adequately. Accordingly, a sentence of rigorous imprisonment for three years was considered light and it was enhanced to five years while maintaining the fine.[63] However, where no fine is imposed on the other accused and when a substantial term of imprisonment has been awarded to one of the accused, it is not necessary to attach a sentence of fine to it.[64]

[OF CURRENCY-NOTES AND BANK-NOTES]

Making or using documents resembling currency-notes or bank-notes.--

(1) Whoever makes, or causes to be made, or uses for any purpose whatsoever, or delivers to any person, any document purporting to be, or in any way resembling, or so nearly resembling as to be calculated to deceive, any currency-note or bank-note shall be punished with fine which may extend to one hundred rupees.

(2) If any person, whose name appears on a document the making of which is an offence under sub-section (1), refuses, without lawful excuse, to disclose to a police-officer on being so required the name and address of the person by whom it was printed or otherwise made, he shall be punished with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees.

(3) Where the name of any person appears on any document in respect of which any person is charged with an offence under sub-section (1) or on any other document used or distributed in connection with that document it may, until the contrary is proved, be presumed that person caused the document to be made.]

Comments

1. Scope

In a country like India, with a large mass of illiterate and ignorant persons, it was considered undesirable that photo-prints and other reproductions of currency-notes and bank-notes should be permitted to go uncharged before it menaces the safety of3952 the currency. This section puts a stop to this practice by making it a punishable offence. Even non-furnishing of information to police about the particulars of a person who printed an apparently fake document is made punishable under sub-s (2) of s 489E, IPC . Under s 39(ix) of CrPC, every person, aware of the commission of, or the intention of any other person to commit, any offence punishable under s 489A to s 489E, IPC, both inclusive (that is to say, offences relating to currency notes and bank notes) shall, in the absence of any reasonable excuse, the burden of proving which excuse shall lie upon the person so aware, forthwith give information to the nearest magistrate or police officer of such commission or intention. However, the punishment provided under s 489E(1) and s 489E(2), IPC is a paltry sum of Rs 100 and Rs 200 respectively. There is an urgent need to enhance the monetary punishment prescribed in this section.

2. Object

Commentary under the same heading in s 489A, ante, may be referred to.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

4. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.39533954

Comments

1. Scope

Generally, contracts are matters of civil law and do not attract the applicability of criminal law. Some breaches of contract are, however, very likely to cause evil, such as no damage, or very high damage, can repair and are also very likely to be committed by person from whom it is exceedingly improbable that any damage can be obtained. Such breaches of contract are, it is conceived, proper subject, for the penal law. Persons, who contract to take care of infants, of the sick and of the helpless, lay themselves under an obligation of a very peculiar kind, and may, with property, be punished if they omit to discharge their duty. The misery and distress, which their neglect may cause, is such as the largest pecuniary payment would not repair; they generally come from the lower ranks of life and would be unable to pay anything. To such a situation, this section is attracted.

2. 'Lawful Contract'

The applicability of this section is attracted in the case of contracts when they are legal. The lawfulness of the contract has to be determined according to the provisions of the Indian Contract Act 1872. One of the conditions of a valid contract is that it must be for consideration. A purely gratuitous contract for attending on, or for supplying the wants of a disabled or helpless person will not bring it within the purview of this section.3955

In Empress v Soloman ,[1] the complainant engaged the accused as an ordinary cook. When the complainant's wife was seriously ill, the accused left the complainant's service for the reason that his own child was ill. Though he left in the morning, he sent, in the evening, another cook to do his work. There were, apparently, other persons, procurable without much trouble, who could cook for the complainant's wife. In these circumstances, it was held that the contract was not one as contemplated by this section.

3. 'Voluntarily'

Commentary under s 39, IPC, vol 1, may be referred to.

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable by the person with whom the offender has contracted, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

5. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.

6. Proof

To prove an offence under this section, it must be proved that:

(a) the accused entered into a lawful contract;
(b) such contract was to attend on, or to supply the wants of, a person;
(c) such person was then helpless or incapable of providing for his own safety or of supplying his own wants;
(d) such helplessness or incapacity was by reason of:

    (i) youth, or
    (ii) unsoundness of mind, or
    (iii) disease, or
    (iv) bodily weakness; and

(e) the accused voluntarily omitted to attend on, or to supply wants to, such person.

Chapter XX

Of Offences Relating to Marriage

TOPICAL INTRODUCTION

This chapter consists of six offences relating to marriage. It aims at securing purity and sanctity of marriage. Traditionally, in Indian society, much importance is attached to faithfulness of the marriage partners. The offences under this chapter penalise conjugal infidelity. This chapter consists of the following six offences:

(a) Section 493 : Cohabitation caused by a man deceitfully inducing a belief of lawful marriage;
(b) Section 494 : Marrying again during lifetime of husband or wife;
(c) Section 495 : Bigamy with concealment of former marriage from the person with whom the subsequent marriage is contracted;
(d) Section 496 : Marriage ceremony fraudulently gone through without lawful marriage;
(e) Section 497 : Adultery;
(f) Section 498 : Enticing or taking away or detaining with criminal intent a married woman.

In addition to the above six sections of this chapter, s 304B, s 375 (read with exception), s 376B, s 406 (when offence relates to breach of trust of stridhan and dowry articles etc.) and s 498-A, IPC also deal with offences relating to marriage. Out of the six offences, both husband and wife are equally liable under s 494, IPC, if either of them marries again during subsistence of marriage. As against it, though a woman is a consenting party in the offence of adultery, it is only the man who is liable. When a woman is not a consenting party then the offence is rape and not adultery under s 497, IPC . However, despite being a consenting party and, even if she has seduced and instigated the man to commit adultery, she is not guilty of abetment by virtue of the last line of s 497, IPC .

Of Offences Relating to Marriage

S. 493.

Cohabitation caused by a man deceitfully inducing a belief of lawful marriage.--

Every man who by deceit causes any woman who is not lawfully married to him to believe that she is lawfully married to him and to cohabit or have sexual intercourse with him in that belief, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.3957

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes the offence committed when a man, either married or unmarried, induces a woman to become, as she thinks, his wife, but in reality his concubine. If a person deceives a woman to believe that a certain ceremony, which he causes to be performed by some accomplice, constitutes a valid marriage and, thus, induces her to cohabit, or to have sexual intercourse, with him, he commits an offence under this section.[1] For attracting the provisions of this section, it is not at all necessary that the woman must be of, at least, sixteen years of age at the time of commission of the offence. Whether the woman, upon whom the deceit is practised by the man, is a minor or a major is, therefore, irrelevant. A minor can be induced to believe, or deceived, just as much as an adult can be induced to believe or deceived. A minor may be deceived more easily than an adult.[2]

2. Section 493 and Section 496 --Distinction

Commentary under the same heading in s 496, IPC, post, may be referred to.

3. Ingredients

The basic ingredients necessary to be established for bringing home the offence under s 493, IPC, are catalogued as follows:

(a) the accused practised deception;
(b) such deceit was to induce the woman to believe that she was lawfully married to him;
(c) there was cohabitation or sexual intercourse as a result of the deception.[3]3958

4. Essence of the Section

Section 493, IPC, is one of the offences relating to marriage. The section does not penalise mere cohabitation or sexual intercourse with a woman who is not lawfully married to him. The section is attracted only when certain other ingredients are also associated therewith. The section envisages the case when a man deceitfully induces a woman to have sexual intercourse with him causing her to believe that she is lawfully married to him. The essence of the section is therefore the deception caused by a man on a woman in consequence of which she is led to believe that she is lawfully married to him while infact, they are not lawfully married. In order to establish deception, there must first be allegations that the accused falsely induced her to believe that she is legally wedded to him.[4] The appellant had filed a complaint for offence under s 493, IPC, the respondent husband had obtained ex parte decree of divorce, but the ex parte decree of divorce was recalled such that the marital ties continued to exist between the parties, and there was no question of deceit or deception on the part of the respondent. No case for offence under s 473, IPC was made out against the respondent husband.[5]

Intercourse with wife would not fall in the category of rape. But if intercourse has been committed under suppression of fact of first marriage, it would amount to offence under ss 493 and 495, IPC .[6]

Prosecution case was that the appellant accused accepted the complainant as his wife, ill treated and assaulted her. The complainant was not the legally married wife of the appellant, and she also admitted that no cohabitation took place with her in the house of the appellant at any point of time. Appellant was acquitted of the charge under s 493, IPC .[7]

5. Lower Caste of Prosecutrix no Ground for Dominating her will by Accused

Merely becasue the prosecutrix is a member of the Scheduled Caste it cannot be said that the accused was in a position to dominate her will and exploit her sexually.[8]

6. Position of Husband

The husband may be in a position to dominate the will of his wife. But it cannot be said that the husband sexually exploits his wife for the reason that he is in a dominating position.[9]

7. Autre Fois Acquit

Even when the marriage of both parties is bigamous, the spouse of both being alive, there is only one offence. Thus, where N, having a living wife G, married a woman3959*P*, who had a living husband D, and a complaint, filed by D against N and P was allowed to be compounded with the permission of the trial court, it was held that although the magistrate's granting of permission to D to compound the offence without giving a hearing to G was clearly improper and erroneous, another complaint by G was not maintainable because it was barred by the principle of autre fois acquit. As only one offence had resulted from the second marriage, there could be no question of a second prosecution with respect to the same offence.[10]

8. Section 493 and Clause Fourthly of Section 375 --Distinction

This section is closely analogous to s 375 (clause fourthly), IPC, which provides that sexual intercourse with a woman would be rape if done 'with her consent, when the man knows that he is not her husband and that her consent is given because she believes that he is another man to whom she is or believes herself to be lawfully married'. The said s 375 (clause fourthly) provides for cases in which the woman believes the man to be 'another man' when the man knows that he is not that other man. It is, thus, a case of false impersonation. On the other hand, s 493, IPC, does not contemplate a case of false impersonation. It is not a case in which the woman considers the man to be 'another man'. It is applicable only to those cases in which the man deceitfully creates a belief in a woman, who is not lawfully married to him, to the effect that she is lawfully married to him. This would not be a case of impersonation. The cases of impersonation would be covered under s 375 (clause fourthly), IPC . However, both ss 375 (clause fourthly) and 493, IPC, relate to cases in which the consent is obtained by fraud. The difference lies in the nature of the fraud. Under the former section, the fraud lies in impersonation for another man. In the latter section, there is no question of difference of personality. It is the same man who deceitfully induces the belief of a valid marriage between him and the woman.

9. 'Who by Deceit Causes any Woman...to believe that she is Lawfully Married to Him'

Section 493, IPC, envisages the case when a man deceitfully induces a woman to have sexual intercourse with him causing her to believe that she is lawfully married to him. The essence of the section is therefore the deception caused by a man on a woman in consequence of which she is led to believe that she is lawfully married to him, while in fact they are not lawfully married. In order to establish deception there must first be allegations that the accused falsely induced her to believe that she is legally wedded to him. In a case where both the man and woman fully knew that they are not husband and wife and no ceremony of marriage took place between them, there is no question of one of them believing otherwise.[11] The prosecutrix alleged that the accused misled her that she was married to him and had sex with her. On the other hand, the evidence showed that the prosecutrix had gone with the accused of her own free will and resided with the accused at different places for several days. Evidence was lacking to show that the accused had misled the complainant. Held, no offence under s 493, IPC was made out.[12]3960

This section is not intended to punish a person for contracting a marriage which turns out to be illegal. It punishes him only for obtaining the body of the woman by deceitfully assuring her that he had acquired that right by jus mariti. If it is found that the woman was lawfully married to the accused and the circumstances of the case show that no deception was practised on her, he cannot be convicted under this section.[13] The essence of the offence under this section consists in the practice of deception by a man on a woman, in consequence of which she is led to believe that she is lawfully married to him even though, in fact, they are not lawfully married. To prove deception, it must be conclusively established that the accused, either dishonestly or fraudulently, concealed certain facts or made a false statement knowing it to be false if for instance it can be found that the accused knew that the ceremonies, which he, with the complainant, underwent, did not constitute a valid marriage, the necessary guilty intention may be inferred.[14] However, the subsequent conduct in deserting the complainant and in even repudiating the marriage though an important piece of evidence, would not suffice, by itself, to show that the accused, when he participated in the ceremonies, intended to deceive the complainant.[15]

10. 'To Cohabit or have Sexual Intercourse'

Both the terms 'cohabit' and 'have sexual intercourse' are connected by the word 'or'. Ordinarily, the term 'cohabit' is often treated as conveying the idea of sexual intercourse; but here it seems that the words are not exactly identical. Cohabitation, which means living together, may under this section, be deemed to cover the taking of marital liberties, even short of sexual intercourse.

11. Cohabitation with Woman by Promising her Marriage

The evidence that the accused had cohabitation with the woman by promising her marriage or by indicating to others that she was his wife does not constitute proof of the fact that he by deceit caused the said woman to believe that she was lawfully married to him.[16]

12. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of first class.

13. Complaint--By whom to be made

Under s 198, CrPC, no court shall take cognizance of an offence under s 493, IPC, except upon a complaint made by the aggrieved person, provided that where such person is under the age of eighteen years, or is an idiot or a lunatic, or is, from sickness or infirmity, unable to make a complaint, or is a woman who, according to the local customs and manners, ought not to be compelled to appear in public, some other person may with the leave of the court, make a complaint on her behalf.3961 However, if proper complaint has been made and, pending enquiry, the complainant dies, the enquiry would not abate on account of the complainant's death. The mother of the complainant can be allowed to conduct the prosecution.[17] As made clear by s 198, CrPC, for all or any of the offences under ss 493, 494, 495, 496, 497 and 498, IPC, an aggrieved person can be either the husband or the wife and none else other than those falling under the proviso to s 198(2), CrPC . Complaint filed by a third person would not be maintainable.[18]

14. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings

The allegations against the accused were that on a promise of marriage he performed sexual intercourse with the informant for about one year. In the meanwhile the informant became pregnant and when she requested the accused for marriage, he stalled the matter and denied paternity of the child. The informant lodged an FIR. However, the informant neither in the FIR, nor in her statement under s 161, CrPC, alleged that she was induced by the accused and made to believe that she was married to the accused nor she ever believed that a ceremony of marriage was performed between her and the accused. Thus, the basic requirement of deception leading to consent by the woman for sexual intercourse was not made out and charge framed against the accused under s 493, IPC, was quashed.[19]

The accused was alleged to have married the complainant by exchanging garlands in a temple and living with her for some days. Later, the accused allegedly asked her to bring money and threatened to kill her in case she returned empty handed. He manhandled her and drove her out of his house. The ingredients of the offence under s 493, IPC, relating to cohabitation intending to deceive about marital status were prima facie not present, so, the order of the magistrate taking cognizance under s 493, IPC, was set aside.[20]

15. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate,etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you, by deceit, caused a woman AB, who was not lawfully married to you, to believe that she was lawfully married to you and to cohabit (or to have sexual intercourse) with you, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 493 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Section 493, IPC, provides punishment for the offence of co-habitation caused by a man deceitfully inducing a belief of lawful marriage. Therefore, there must be prima facie evidence on record to show that:

(a) accused cohabited with prosecutrix;3962
(b) at the time of such cohabitation, he knew that he was not legally married to her;
(c) the prosecutrix consented to cohabitation believing that she is his wife; and
(d) such belief in her was induced by deceit on the part of the accused.[21]

Where in the FIR it is not stated in so many words about the belief in the mind of the prosecutrix about a lawful marriage but in her statement under s 161, IPC, prosecutrix has stated that when the accused embraced and kissed her she resisted but when he put vermilion on her head and declared her as his wife with the assurance to accept her publicly after getting a job thereafter, she submitted for sexual intercourse. The aforesaid statement of the prosecutrix is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of law as provided in s 493, IPC, to constitute that offence. Under such circumstances accused's contention about absence of a prima facie case for the offence under s 493, IPC, is without any merit. Therefore, framing of charge against the accused was found proper.[22]

Where the prosecutrix was conscious of the fact that the accused was married with someone else and was residing with her, there was no deception on the part of the accused for inducing the prosecutrix to believe that she was his lawfully wedded wife. The framing of charge under s 493, IPC, against the accused was found improper.[23]

16. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused cohabited, or had sexual intercourse, with the woman in question;
(b) the accused was not lawfully married to the said woman;
(c) the accused, by deceit, caused the said woman to believe that she was lawfully married to him; and
(d) the said woman cohabited, or had sexual intercourse, with him in that belief.

It is not necessary to establish the factum of marriage according to personal law but the proof of inducement by a man deceitfully to a woman to change her status from that of unmarried to that of a lawfully married woman and then make that woman cohabit with him establishes an offence under s 493, IPC .[24]

17. Acquittal

Where admittedly the complainant used to have sexual intercourse with the accused even before the alleged exchange of garlands, the only witness brought on record in support of exchange of garlands had not corroborated fully that the accused and the complainant actually exchanged garlands in his presence, and there was no material on record to support the prosecution version that actually any marriage took place to give an impression that the complainant was legally married wife of the accused, and further the accused has denied such a relation and decided not to accept the3963*panchayati* made by the villagers, therefore, it could not be said that she was induced to believe by the accused to be his legally married wife and to submit herself to sexual intercourse. So, the accused was entitled for acquittal.[25]

18. Conviction

Where the evidence of the prosecution witnesses disclosed that the accused by coming to the residence of the victim girl in the absence of her parents put vermilion on her forehead and induced her to believe that by such putting of vermilion on her forehead he has married her and thus, obtaining consent, caused sexual intercourse with her, thus the evidence on record amply proved that the prosecution had been liable to prove that the accused had practiced deceit and by that deceit made the prosecutrix, who is not his wife, believe herself to be lawfully wedded to him and thereby she had sexual intercourse with the accused. The accused was convicted under s 493, IPC .[26]

Upon being acquainted with the complainant, the accused had developed a close relationship with the complainant. He used to visit the complainant from time to time and he promised the complainant that he would marry her. The appellant accused had got a form with regard to marriage registration signed by the complainant. The form was signed by the appellant accused and he also induced the complainant to sign the form so as to get married. The afore-stated fact made the complainant believe that the appellant accused had married her and, therefore, she had started residing with him as his wife. In fact, the appellant did not marry the complainant. The persons related to the complainant and the accused were also made to believe that the complainant was the wife of the appellant, though rituals necessary for Hindu marriage had never been performed. Admittedly, no marriage had taken place between the complainant and the appellant but only on the basis of the documents signed by the complainant at the instance of the appellant accused, the complainant was made to believe that she was the lawfully married wife of the appellant accused. The appellant was convicted for offence under s 493, IPC .[27]

Chapter XX

Of Offences Relating to Marriage

S. 494.

Marrying again during lifetime of husband or wife.--

Whoever, having a husband or wife living, marries in any case in which such marriage is void by reason of its taking place during the life of such husband or wife, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Exception.--This section does not extend to any person whose marriage with such husband or wife has been declared void by a court of competent jurisdiction,

Nor to any person who contracts a marriage during the life of a former husband or wife, if such husband or wife, at the time of the subsequent marriage, shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years, and shall not have been heard of by such person as being alive within that time provided the person contracting such subsequent marriage shall, before such marriage takes place, inform the person with whom such marriage is contracted of the real state of facts so far as the same are within his or her knowledge.3964

Andhra Pradesh-- In Andhra Pradesh, the offence under s 494, IPC, which is not a cognizable offence is made cognizable, non-bailable in view of the State amendment brought to the First Schedule appended to CrPC 1973. [Vide Andhra Pradesh Act No 3 of 1992, s 2 (wef 15-2-1992).]3965

Comments

1. Scope

This section makes the offence of bigamy punishable both as regards a person, having a wife living, marrying another, and as regards a wife, having her husband living, remarrying, in any case in which such remarriage would be void by reason of its taking place during the life of such wife or husband. If a woman, having a living husband, marries another man, the person, to whom the woman is remarried, cannot be punished under this section. He can only be charged with abetment of the offence of bigamy.[28]Section 494,IPC, aims to encourage monogamy, and to deprecate/discourage practice of polygamy.[29] Where a spouse contracts a second marriage while the first marriage is still subsisting, the spouse would be guilty of bigamy if it is proved that the second marriage was a valid one in the sense that the necessary ceremonies, required by law or by custom, had been actually performed.[30] The section would come into play only if the second marriage becomes void by virtue of the fact that it had taken place in the lifetime of one of the spouses.[31] The section would not be attracted to a marriage between a man, who has a living wife, and woman, who has a living husband, with whom her marriage subsists, such a marriage being no marriage at all.[32] If the second marriage of a Hindu cannot be said to have been solemnized, that marriage will not be void by virtue of s 17 of the Hindu Marriage Act 1955, and, therefore, the provisions of this section cannot be attracted.[33]

Judges should be particularly careful to see that ss 494, 497 and 498, IPC, are not abused for the purpose of private spite or persecution.[34]

2. Bigamy--Non-filing of complaint by wife

Where the husband contracts second marriage during the lifetime of the first wife, the non-filing of the complaint under s 494, IPC by the first wife does not mean that the offence is wiped out, and monogamy sought to be achieved by means of s 494, IPC merely remains in the statute book.[35]

3. Applicability

As regards its applicability, the section makes no distinction on the basis religion.[36] The section applies to Hindu,[37] Christians,[38] Jews,[39] and Parsis,[40] of either sex, and3966 Muslim females. A Muslim wife, marrying during the subsistence of an earlier marriage, can be punished under this section. Similar is the case with a Muslim husband who marries a fifth wife during the subsistence of four earlier marriages. Again, a Muslim, who marries under the Special Marriage Act 1954, is liable to punishment under the section if he marries during the subsistence of the first marriage.[41] It may be noted that the section applies only to those cases in which a second marriage is 'void' during the lifetime of a spouse. It does not apply to cases in which the polygamous marriages are permitted. However, the punishment, provided by this section, cannot be evaded by pleading Islam, unless the plea is founded on some exemptions recognised by law.[42]

The provisions of the Hindu Marriage Act are not applicable to the Gond community, second marriage in the community is valid as per customary law, and the provisions of s 494, IPC, are not attracted.[43]

4. Section 494 and Section 496 --Distinction

Commentary under the same heading in s 496, post, may be referred to.

5. Section 494 and Section 498A --Distinction

The offence under s 494, IPC, is a distinct offence from s 498A, IPC . These two offences are not cognate offences and therefore, one cannot be considered to be a major offence and the other to be a minor offence, and so would not attract the legal position that the person can be convicted for the minor offence if the major offence is not established.[44]

6. Section 494 , IPC And Sections 11 and 15 of the Hindu Marriage Act 1955

Section 494 , IPC, will only apply in case either spouse having the other spouse living, again marries and such marriage is void by reason of it taking place during the lifetime of the first wife under s 11 of the Hindu Marriage Act, a marriage solemnised in contravention of the conditions specified in cll (i), (iv) and (v) of s 5 of the Hindu Marriage Act is null and void and can be so declared by a decree of nullity on a petition presented by either party thereto, there is no provision in the Act making a marriage solemnised in contravention of s 15 of the Act as void. A marriage solemnised in contravention of s 15 of the Hindu Marriage Act is not void and therefore, even prima facie no case under s 494, IPC, is made out.[45]

7. Section 494 , IPC and Article 25 of the Constitution

The rule of monogamous marriage amongst Hindus was introduced with the proclamation of Hindu Marriage Act 1955. Section 17 of the Hindu Marriage Act provided that any marriage between two Hindus solemnised after the commencement3967 of the Act shall be void if at the date of such marriage either party had a husband or wife living, and the provisions of ss 494 and 495 of the IPC (45 of 1860), shall apply accordingly. The second marriage solemnised by a Hindu during the subsistence of first marriage is an offence punishable under the IPC . Freedom guaranteed under art 25 of the Constitution is such freedom which does not encroach upon a similar freedom of the other persons. Under the constitutional scheme, every person has a fundamental right not merely to entertain the religious belief of his choice, but also to exhibit his belief and ideas in a manner which does not infringe the religious right and personal freedom to others.[46]

Making a convert Hindu, who has taken second wife after conversion, liable for prosecution under s 494, IPC is not against Islam, the religion adopted by such person upon conversion. Saying that it would be against Islam demonstrates the ignorance about the tenets of Islam and its teachings. The concept of Muslim law is based upon the edifice of Shariat. Muslim law as traditionally interpreted and applied in India permits more than one marriage during the subsistence of one, though capacity to do justice between co-wives in law is condition precedent. Even under the Muslim law plurality of marriage is not unconditionally conferred upon the husband. It would, therefore, be doing injustice to Islamic law to urge that the convert is entitled to practice bigamy, notwithstanding the continuance of his marriage under the law to which he belonged before conversion. The violators of law who have contracted the second marriage cannot be permitted to urge that such marriage should not be made subject-matter of prosecution under the general penal law prevalent in the country.[47]

8. Essential Ingredients

To constitute an offence under this section, the following essential ingredients[48] must exist:

(a) the accused spouse must have contracted the first valid marriage;
(b) the accused spouse must have also contracted a second marriage when the previous valid marriage was subsisting, meaning thereby that there must be, at the time of second ceremony of marriage, a previous valid subsisting marriage;[49] and
(c) both marriages must be valid in the sense that the necessary ceremonies, required by the personal law, governing the parties, had been duly performed.[50]

In the absence of any of the said ingredients, no offence under this section would be committed, i.e., if the first marriage is null and void, there would be no offence of bigamy in contracting a second marriage.[51]

9. Precedent

In the case of State of Punjab v Surinder Kumar [52] while considering the question of precedents, the Supreme Court has observed that 'a decision is available as a precedent only if it decides a question of law'.

In the case of Amica Quarry Works v State of Gujarat [53] the Supreme Court has laid down that:

> The ratio of any decision must be understood in the background of the facts of the case. It has been said long time ago that a case is only an authority for what it actually decides, and not what logically follows from it.

A three-judge Bench of the Supreme Court in the case of State Financial Corporation v Jagdamba Oil Mills ,[54] has observed thus:

> Courts should not place reliance on decisions without discussing as to how the factual situation fits in with the fact-situation of the decision on which reliance is placed. Observations of the Courts are not to be read as Euclid's theorems nor as provisions of the statute. These observations must be read in the context in which they appear. Judgments of Courts are not to be construed as statutes. To interpret words, phrases and provisions of a statute, it may become necessary for the judges to embark into lengthy discussions but the discussion is meant to explain and not to define. Judges interpret statutes, they do not interpret judgments. They interpret words of statutes, their words are not to be interpreted as statutes. Circumstantial flexibility on additional or different fact may make a world of difference between conclusions in two cases. Disposal of cases by blindly placing reliance on a decision is not proper.

Similarly in the case of Divisional Controller, KSRTC v Mahadeva Shetty ,[55] the Apex Court has observed thus :

> The decision ordinarily is a decision on the case before the Court, while the principle underlying the decision would be binding as a precedent in a case which comes up for decision subsequently. Therefore, while applying the decision to a later case, the Court dealing with it should carefully try to ascertain the principle laid down by the previous decision. A decision often takes its colour from the question involved in the case in which it is rendered. The scope and authority of a precedent should never be expanded unnecessarily beyond the needs of a given situation. The only thing binding as an authority upon a subsequent Judge is the principle upon which the case was decided. Statements which are not part of the ratio decidendi are distinguished as obiter dicta and are not authoritative. The task of finding the principle is fraught with difficulty as without an investigation into facts, it cannot be assumed whether a similar direction must or ought to be made as measure of social justice. Precedents sub silentio and without argument are of no moment. Mere casual expressions carry no weight at all. Nor every passing expression of a Judge, however, eminent, can be treated as an ex cathedra statement having the weight of authority.

Keeping in view these well settled principles along with the basic fact that in criminal cases normally the law of precedent is not applicable, as facts of each case always differ, except in respect of technical pleas like jurisdiction, limitation, etc., any pronouncement whether of Apex Court or High Court in a criminal case is mainly based on appreciation of evidence and may not have the effect of binding precedent but have to be considered as guidelines or guiding principles of the Supreme Court. It is not as if none of the pronouncements of the Supreme Court in respect of criminal cases have binding precedent. Even in criminal cases where the Supreme Court declares law regarding question of jurisdiction of court, law of limitation, procedural aspect, etc, it may have binding precedent effect in other cases wherein similar situation is placed. But the fact remains that even in these latter cases, the court is required to see the facts and circumstances of each case and only if they are similar or on parity, it has to implement or follow the binding precedent of the Supreme Court.[56]

In the case of Naib Singh v State of Punjab ,[57] the Apex Court has made it clear that there is nothing like precedent in criminal case but there are certain guiding principles. In the case of Shankarlal v State of Maharashtra ,[58] the Supreme Court has observed that 'legal principles incantations and their importance lies more in their application to a given set of facts than in their recital in the judgment'.

Considering all these decisions of the Supreme Court on the question of precedents or binding nature of its pronouncement, it has to be reiterated that though normally under art 141 of the Constitution of India, the pronouncement of the Supreme Court, which is the law of the land, has binding force on all other courts in the country, it is only the law declared which would be binding on other courts. Hence, so far as the pronouncements of the Apex Court in criminal cases especially like in respect of sentence, amount of compensation, etc, are concerned, normally they do not have any binding force on other courts except being considered as guidelines or guiding principles.[59]

10. Religion--Marriage under Hindu Law

Religion is a matter of faith stemming from the depths of the heart and mind. Religion is a belief which binds the spiritual nature of man to a supernatural being, it is an object of conscientious devotion, faith and pietism. Devotion in its fullest sense is a consecration and denotes an act of worship. Faith in the strict sense constitutes firm reliance on the truth of religious doctrines in every system of religion. Religion, faith or devotion are not easily interchangeable. If a person feigns to have adopted another religion just for some wordly gain or benefit, it would be religious bigotry. Looked at from this angle, a person who mockingly adopts another religion where plurality of marriage is permitted so as to renounce the previous marriage and desert the wife, he cannot be permitted to take advantage of his exploitation as religion is not a commodity to be exploited. The institution of marriage under every personal law is a scared institution. Under Hindu law, marriage is a sacrament. Both have to be preserved.[60]3970

11. Islam--A Progressive and Pious Religion--Effect on a Hindu Converting To Islam

The plea that making a convert Hindu liable for prosecution under the IPC would be against Islam, the religion adopted by such person upon conversion, if raised, demonstrates the ignorance about the tenets of Islam and its teachings. The word 'Islam' means peace and submission. 'In its religious connotation it is understood as submission to the will of god'. According to Fyzee,[61] in its secular sense, the establishment of peace. The word 'Muslim' in Arabic is the active principle of Islam, which means acceptance of faith, the noun of which is Islam. Muslim law is admittedly to be based upon a well recognised system of jurisprudence providing many rational and revolutionary concepts, which could not be conceived by the other systems of law in force at the time of its inception. Sir Ameer Ali in his book Mohammedan Law[62] has observed that the Islamic system, from a historical point of view was the most interesting phenomenon of growth. The small beginnings from which it grew up and the comparatively short space of time within which it attained its development marked its position as one of the most important judicial systems of the civilised world. The concept of Muslim law is based upon the edifice of Shariat. Muslim law as traditionally interpreted and applied in India permits more than one marriage during the subsistence of one, though capacity to do justice between co-wives in law is a condition precedent. Even under the Muslim law, plurality of marriage is not unconditionally conferred upon the husband. It would, therefore, be doing injustice to Islamic law to urge that the convert is entitled to practice bigamy notwithstanding the continuance of his marriage under the law to which he belonged before conversion. The violators of law who have contracted the second marriage cannot be permitted to urge that such marriage should not be made subject-matter of prosecution under the general penal law prevalent in the country. The progressive outlook and wider approach of Islamic law cannot be permitted to be narrowed by unscrupulous litigants, who apparently are found to be guilty of the commission of the offence under the law to which they belonged before their alleged conversion. It is nobody's case that any such convertee has been deprived of practising any other religious right of the attainment of spiritual goals. Islam which is pious, progressive and respected religion with rational outlook cannot be given a narrow concept as has been tried to be done by the alleged violators of law.[63]

12. A Muslim Woman, when not Liable under this Section

A Muslim woman, marrying, during the lifetime of her husband, during the period of iddat, would not be guilty of bigamy.[64] In Abdul Gani v Azizul Haq ,[65] the marriage was dissolved by the apostasy of a Mohammedan husband and the woman married during the iddat. It was held that as the second marriage was not a legal marriage, the woman cannot be said to have gone through the form of second marriage, when her legal husband was alive, and, therefore, she was not guilty of bigamy under s 494, IPC . In Badal Aurat v Empress ,[66]B, a Mohammedan girl, whose father was dead,3971 was given in marriage by her mother to J some years before she attained puberty. Prior to her attaining puberty, J was sentenced to a term of imprisonment for theft. The marriage with J was never consummated. B then married P. On being released from jail, J requested B to return to him, but she refused to do so. It was held that she had the option of either ratifying or repudiating the marriage with J on attaining puberty, and that no offence under s 494, IPC, is proved.

13. Apostasy--Effect on Marriage under Hindu Law

The first marriage has to be proved to be subsisting at the time of the second marriage. In most cases, the change of religion by one of the parties does not involve a dissolution of marriage. There are, however, cases in which the change of religion by one party automatically results in termination of the first marriage. In such cases, a subsequent marriage would be taken out of the purview of s 494, IPC . The previous marriage would not be deemed to be subsisting any longer. This depends upon the religion to which the parties to the marriage belong. According to Hindu law, marriage is not dissolved by apostasy. When a Hindu becomes a Mohammedan, his status is not allowed to be governed by the laws of the new faith, but continues to be subject to the law and custom to which he was originally subject.[67] The conversion of a Hindu wife to Mohammedanism does not ipso facto dissolve her marriage with her husband and she cannot, during his lifetime, enter into a valid contract of marriage with another person.[68] The marriage of a chamar woman is not dissolved with her chamar husband by her becoming a convert to Islam and if she marries a second time during the lifetime of her chamar husband, she would be guilty of an offence under s 494, IPC .[69] The rights of a Hindu husband are not affected, in any way, by the conversion, to Islam, of his wife and she cannot refuse to live with him.[70] Where a Hindu woman was duly married according to Hindu rites and, subsequent to the marriage, the woman became a convert to Mohammadanism and then married a Mohammedan, it was held that there is no authority in Hindu law for the proposition that an apostate is absolved from all civil obligations, and, so far as the matrimonial bond is concerned, the same would be contrary in the sprit of that law which regards it as indissoluble, and that the marriage is not, under the Hindu law, dissolved by conversion of the wife to Mohammadanism.[71] In another case, it was held that a marriage, solemnised in India according to one personal law, cannot be dissolved according to another personal law simply because one of the parties has changed his or her religion.[72] Where a Brahmin went through a Hindu marriage ceremony with a Brahmin girl but converted to Christianity, it was held that she continued to be his wife.[73] Now, under s 13 of the Hindu Marriage Act 1955, the husband or wife is entitled to, get the marriage dissolved if the other party ceases to be a Hindu by conversion to another religion. Till then, conversion per se does not operate as dissolution of the marriage. Where the marriage of the complainant with the accused was admitted and there was nothing to show that the parties had taken recourse to3972 s 13 of the Hindu Marriage Act 1955, or had secured a valid divorce according to the custom, the marriage must be considered to be subsisting.[74]

14. Apostasy--Effect on Marriage under Christian Law

A Christian marriage is also not dissolved by the apostasy of one of the parties. Where, therefore, the accused, a Christian wife, renounced Christianity and embraced Islam and then married a Mohammedan, it was held that the subsequent marriage was bigamous.[75]

15. Apostasy--Effect on Marriage under Mohammedan Law

Muslim law took strict view of apostasy, till a change in the law was made under s 4 of the Dissolution of Muslim Marriage Act 1939. Under the Muslim law, so far as the apostasy of the husband was concerned, there was no doubt that it led to the dissolution of marriage.[76] This law was recognised to be the Muslim law prior to passing of the Act and is still in force. The apostasy of the husband to any religion other than Islam was, and is, sufficient to dissolve the marriage. Thus, where the husband apostatised and the wife contracted another marriage, it was held that she was not guilty of bigamy as the marriage stood dissolved by apostasy of the husband.[77] On the question as to whether the apostasy of the wife caused a dissolution of the marriage, there was some difference of opinion amongst the Muslim jurists. They are discussed by Ameer Ali[78] who was of the view that the marriage of a Muslim with a Kitabi woman (such as Jew and Christian) should not affect the status of marriage by apostasy to such a religion. This view was, however, not accepted by the High Courts in India and it was held that apostasy of either party to any religion dissolved the marriage. Apostasy to any non-Kitabi religion like Buddhism,[79] or Hinduism,[80] would, of course, dissolve the marriage. Thus, a marriage stood dissolved on apostasy to Christiantity,[81] or if Islam is renounced and no religion is professed.[82]The Dissolution of Muslim Marriage Act 1939, has however, made a provision in respect of the apostasy of the wife. Under s 4 of the Act, the apostasy of a Muslim woman 'to a faith other than Islam' shall not now operate to dissolve the marriage except in the case of a woman converted to Islam who re-embraces the former faith, whether Kitabi or non-Kitabi.

16. 'Marries'

The word 'marries', in the section, means marries by some form of marriage known to, or recognised by, the personal law of the parties concerned.[83]3973

Similarly, the expression 'whoever...marries', in this section, means whoever marries validly or whoever marries and whose marriage is a valid one.[84]

17. Second Marriage--When Bigamous

There is some difference between the first marriage, the subsistence of which gives the complainant a right to file a complaint under this section and a second marriage, which can be said to be bigamous for the purpose of the section. In the case of first marriage, it has to be proved that the marriage was legally valid, i.e.,

(a) there were no legal impediments to the contracting of such marriage; and
(b) the marriage was performed according to the minimum ceremonies necessary for its validity.

If the marriage is not found to be valid according to either of the said test, no offence of bigamy will be made out. On the other hand, in the case of a second marriage, it is not necessary that the marriage should be otherwise valid according to law apart from the fact that a spouse is living (the fact, that parties are within the prohibited degrees, will not prevent the marriage from being bigamous), but it is necessary that the ceremonies, essential to a marriage, are duly performed. Thus, while the absence of legal impediments is required for determining the validity of the first marriage, the impediments are not to be considered for treating a second marriage as bigamous. The section does not refer to a valid marriage. A bigamous marriage cannot be a valid marriage.[85] If the first marriage is valid, it would be bigamy to marry again, notwithstanding any special circumstances, which, independently of the bigamous character of the marriage, may constitute a legal disability in the parties or make the form of marriage resorted to inapplicable to their case.[86] It was held, in Payari v Faqir Chand Alakha ,[87] that the section does not require that the second marriage with the person concerned must otherwise be valid according to law. However, the validity of form of marriage is required in the case of both the marriages. Where, therefore, either of the two marriages is found to be not duly solemnised, the position would be that in the eyes of law, there is only one legal and valid marriage making the charge of bigamy unsustainable.[88]

While it is not necessary, in order to attract the provision of this section, to prove that the second marriage was legally valid (i.e., without any legal impediments), it is necessary to prove that the accused went through some form of marriage the parties is a must for a conviction on a charge of bigamy; which, but for the existence of the impediment of the first marriage, would have been recognised as marriage, valid in form by the law, under the form, of which it was celebrated.[89] In other words, in order that an offence under this section may be committed, it is necessary, atleast, that all the ceremonies, which are necessary to be performed in order that a valid marriage may take place, ought to be performed and, ordinarily, all these ceremonies3974 would amount to a valid marriage, but for the fact that the marriage becomes void on account of the existence of a previous wife.[90]

Where a spouse contracts a second marriage when the first marriage is still subsisting, the spouse would be guilty of bigamy under s 494, IPC, if it is proved that the second marriage was a valid one in the sense that the necessary ceremonies, required by law or by custom, have been actually performed. The voidness of the marriage under s 17 of the Hindu Marriage Act 1955, is, in fact, one of the essential ingredients of s 494, IPC because the second marriage will become void only because of the provision of s 17 of the Hindu Marriage Act.[91] Merely going through certain ceremonies, with the intention that parties be taken to be married, will not make the ceremonies prescribed by law or approved by any established custom.[92] Similarly, mere keeping of a concubine or mistress is not sufficient to attract the provisions of the section.[93] If there is no satisfactory evidence of the performance of ceremonies of a valid marriage, no offence under s 494, IPC, would be made out.[94] Proof of getting the marriage registered at a caste organisation by payment of necessary fees is not sufficient to prove that the marriage in question was contracted.[95]

The test for deciding whether all the necessary ceremonies for a valid marriage were performed is: will the union through the alleged marriage constitute a valid marriage if the other spouse were not living? This can be determined by a applying the test: will the wife, if former wife were not living, be entitled to claim maintenance as a married wife and will the children, born of the union, be deemed born in or out of wedlock? If these tests are satisfied, it will be open to the court, while considering the facts of an individual under this section, to presume that all the necessary ceremonies had been undergone.[96] If the marriage is valid according to the customary rites, it would be complete and binding. In the Reddy community in Telangana area, the essential ceremonies must be tying of mangalsutra and putting the toe-ring, throwing rice over each other's head and the ceremony connected with the yoke. If these ceremonies are performed, the marriage of a Reddy couple gets completed and is binding on the parties.[97]3975

18. First Marriage under Mohammedan Law--Second Marriage under Special Marriage Act 1954 is Bigamous

Section 43 of the Special Marriage Act 1954 is given below:

> S. 43 . Penalty on married persons marrying again under this Act.--Save as otherwise provided in Chapter III, every person who, being at the time married, procures a marriage of himself or herself to be solemnised under this Act shall be deemed to have committed an offence under section 494 or section 495 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860 (45 of 1860), as the case may be, and the marriage so solemnised shall be void.

It is no doubt true the personal law applicable to Muslims in India does contemplate of four marriages by a muslim male. Notwithstanding the fact that personal law permits a Muslim male to contract four marriages, if a second marriage is contracted under the Special Marriage Act 1954*vis-à-vis* the fact that a Muslim male has a legally wedded wife who has been married to him under the Mohammedan law, s 494, IPC, has to claw at the erring male. The accused cannot take refuge behind the falacious contention that he had contracted the second marriage with a Muslim woman by virtue of the exception enshrined in Mohammedan law. Mohammedan law does not claim precedence over Special Marriage Act 1954 keeping in view that the accused solemnised his first marriage under Mohammedan law and he contracted his second marriage under the Special Marriage Act. There being no saving clause for the accused to purge him of the charges under s 494, IPC, the accused is liable to be punished under s 494, IPC .[1]

19. First Marriage under Special Marriage Act 1954--Second Marriage under Mohammedan Law is Bigamous

Section 44 of the Special Marriage Act lays down:

> S. 44 . Punishment of bigamy.--Every person whose marriage is solemnized under this Act and who, during the lifetime of his or her wife or husband, contracts any other marriage shall be subject to the penalties provided in sections 494 and 495 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860 (45 of 1860), for the offence of marrying again during the lifetime of a husband or wife, and the marriage so contracted shall be void.

Dealing with a case arising under s 16 of the Old Special Marriage Act 1872, which is in *pari materia*with s 44 of the present Act, a Division Bench of the Madras High Court in Vaidyanathan v Abdul Allam [2] held:

> Section 16, Special Marriage Act, provides that a person married under it, who, during the lifetime of his or her wife or husband contracts another marriage, shall be subject to the penalties provided in ss 494 and 495, Penal Code, for the offence of marrying again during the lifetime of a husband or wife, whatever may be the religion which he or she professed at the time of the second marriage. Therefore, a person married under the Special Marriage Act commits bigamy if he marries again during the lifetime of his spouse, and it matters not what religion he professes at the time of the second marriage... The Special Marriage Act clearly only contemplates monogamy and a person married under the Act cannot escape from its provisions by merely changing his religion.

If a Muslim male marries under the Special Marriage Act 1954 and then enters into a second marriage under Mohammedan law, he would be liable to be prosecuted for the offence of bigamy.[3]

Where the parties are Muslim, charge of bigamy would fail.[4]

20. Second Marriage must be Void in Law

To constitute an offence of bigamy, the second marriage must be void by reason of its taking place during the lifetime of a former legal wife or husband, as the case may be. The void nature of the second marriage is, in fact, one of the essential ingredients of this section.[5]

The voidness of the marriage under s 17 of the Hindu Marriage Act is in fact one of the essential ingredients of s 494, IPC, because the second marriage will become void under this provision of law. What s 17 of the Hindu Marriage Act contemplates is that the second marriage must be according to the ceremonies required by law. If the marriage is void, its voidness would only lead to civil consequences arising from such marriage. Section 17 of the Hindu Marriage Act has to be read in harmony and conjunction with s 494, IPC . Therefore, merely because the second marriage is void under s 17 of the Hindu Marriage Act, it cannot be said that s 494, IPC, will not be attracted.[6]

However, the word 'void' is not to be used in the technical sense in which it is used in the Mohammedan law. The IPC makes no distinction between a void marriage and an invalid marriage, and the term 'void' used therein covers marriages of both classes.[7] A second marriage would not be bigamous (i.e., void) when the accused spouse contracts it (a) after the marriage with the former husband or wife has been declared void by a court of competent jurisdiction; or (b) during the life of a former husband or wife if such husband or wife, at the time of subsequent marriage, shall have been continually absent from such person (i.e., the accused spouse) for the space of seven years and shall not have been heard of by such person (i.e., the accused spouse) as being alive within that time and the person contracting such subsequent marriage (i.e., the accused spouse) has, before the second marriage has taken place, informed the person, with whom such marriage is contracted, the real facts so far as the same are within his or her knowledge. In the latter case, all that is necessary to prove is this that the spouse had been continuously absent for seven years and had not been heard of as alive by the accused,[8] and the facts above mentioned had not been concealed from the second husband or the second wife.[9] However, it is immaterial whether the accused made any inquiries or had reasonable ground for believing the spouse to be dead.[10]3977

21. Second Marriage Solemnised before Coming into Force of the Hindu Marriage Act--No Bigamy

The Hindu Marriage Act 1955 came into operation on 18 May 1955. It is only after that by virtue of s 17 of the Act that a second marriage by a Hindu during subsistence of the first marriage would attract the provisions of ss 494 and 495, IPC . Therefore, bigamy was not an offence prior to coming into force of the said Act, so the second marriage solemnised before coming into force of the said Act does not attract the provisions of s 494, IPC .[11]

22. Want of Mens Rea--Whether a Good Defence to a Charge of Bigamy

This section makes no reference to intention, knowledge, fraud or deceit; it constitutes the mere contracting of the second marriage a crime. However, it does not mean that the normal presumption, that a penal statute requires mens rea even though it contains no express words to that effect, should not be given effect to.[12]

Mens rea, i.e., guilty knowledge, is a necessary ingredient of the offence under s 494, IPC .[13]

An honest belief on reasonable grounds as to invalidity of previous marriage, just as an honest belief on reasonable grounds that the spouse is dead, is a good defence.[14] Such bona fide belief is not, however, sufficient unless proper and reasonable enquiry had, in fact, been made,[15] and if, by reason of a mistake of facts, it was thought that the previous marriage had been declared void by a court of competent jurisdiction the accused cannot be said to have committed an offence of bigamy.[16] Similarly, if a person, charged with bigamy, believes that he was legally free to marry again, it cannot be said that the crime was committed either intentionally or recklessly and the question whether the belief was unreasonable is irrelevant.[17] The plea of the accused, that he entered into the second marriage in all good faith and after the honest impression that his earlier marriage with the complainant had been put an end to by the order of dissolution, passed by a court of competent jurisdiction, was accepted as a valid defence in Janki Amma v Padmanabban .[18] In Kachu Muhammad Kunja Ismail v Mohammad Kadeja Umma ,[19] the accused took learned opinion that she could effectively divorce the complainant and went through with the formalities thereof. She then gave notice to the complainant, waited for some time and then married the co-accused. It was held that there could be no criminal knowledge that her first marriage with the complainant was subsisting when she entered into the second marriage and so the accused were not guilty. It has been held, in Surinder Kaur v Mohinder Singh ,[20]3978 that the bona fide belief of the accused, that he was not married previously, would constitute a valid defence.

23. Abetment

When the record does not disclose any material relating to abatement on the part of the accused persons in the alleged second marriage, the complaint as against them is liable to be dismissed on merits.[21] When the prosecution witnesses whispered nothing in their testimony about the part played by the accused nos 3 to 8 in the performance of marriage between accused nos 1 and 2, except stating that they blessed the couple, viz., accused nos 1 and 2, the blessings will not tantamount to the abetment of the commission of the offence of bigamy under s 494 read with s 109, IPC .[22] Just because the mother of the accused was present at the time of marriage could not be said that she was there only to commit abetment of the offence to be committed or committed by the accused. The accused persons, in the absence of any material to show that there was an instigation or that there was any intention either in aiding or in commissioning of the offence, cannot be said to have abetted the offence on mere association with the accused persons.[23] Merely allowing one's premises to be used for the purpose of marriage, does not prove abetment of a bigamous marriage.[24]

Evidence of PW3 showed that the accused A1 re-married with accused A5 in the presence of the other co-accused, after his marriage with the complainant was dissolved, but the other co-accused (A3 and A4) had no knowledge that the decree of divorce had already been set aside by the Court. The other co-accused (A3 and A4) could not be held guilty of abetment of bigamy. They were held entitled to benefit of doubt. Their conviction under s 494 read with s 109, IPC was set aside.[25]

Prior knowledge of the existence of first marriage is necessary. In the absence of knowledge of first marriage, a person cannot be convicted for the offence of abetment of offence under s 494 read with s 109, IPC .[26]

If the complainant has specifically stated that the accused alongwith others abetted the act of main accused to commit the offence of bigamy punishable under s 494, IPC, there was sufficient ground for the magistrate to issue process against the accused under ss 494 / 109, IPC .[27]

24. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, with the permission of the court before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, by the husband or wife of the accused spouse, and triable by a magistrate of the first class. The complaint should be made by the aggrieved person to the magistrate, who shall follow the procedure laid down in s 200, CrPC onwards and it does not include3979 a police report, i.e., report under s 173(2), CrPC . No doubt, in the explanation to s 2(d), CrPC, a report by police officer, which discloses a non-cognizable offence, shall be deemed to be a complaint, but this explanation is not applicable in cases under ch XXII of the IPC .[28]

As made clear by s 198, CrPC, for all or any of the offences under ss 493, 494, 495, 496, 497 and 498, IPC, an aggrieved person can be either the husband or the wife and none else other than those falling under the proviso to s 198(2), CrPC . Complaint filed by a third person would not be maintainable.[29]

Section 494 of IPC provides the sentence, which may extend to seven years. Therefore, the magistrate is required to follow the procedure which has been indicated for the trials connected with warrant case procedure.[30]

25. Compounding of Offence

The accused was convicted and sentenced under s 494, IPC . In the appeal before the Supreme Court, the parties compromised, and the Supreme Court permitted compounding of the offence and directed the accused to pay Rs 40,000 to the complainant-wife as compensation besides awarding cost of Rs 5000.[31]

26. Interpretation of Law by the Supreme Court Relates back to the Date of the Law

The decision in Sarla Mudgal v Union of India [32] holding that the second marriage of a Hindu husband after conversion to Islam without having his first marriage dissolved under law, would be invalid, the second marriage would be void in terms of the provision of s 494, IPC and the apostate-husband would be guilty of the offence under s 494, IPC, does not lay down any new law. It cannot be said that the second marriage by a convert male Muslim has been made offence only by judicial pronouncement. The court has only interpreted the existing law which was in force. It is settled principle that the interpretation of a provision of law relates back to the date of the law itself and cannot be prospective from the date of the judgment because concededly the court does not legislate, but only give an interpretation to an existing law. It cannot therefore be said that the decision in Sarla Mudgal v Union of India has to be given prospective operation and that the decision cannot be applied to persons who have solemnised marriage in violation of the mandate of law prior to the date of judgment.[33]

27. Complaint--By Whom to be Filed

Under s 198, CrPC, no court shall take cognizance of any offence falling under ss 493 to 498, IPC, (both inclusive) except upon a complaint made by some person3980 aggrieved by such offence.[34] The section specifies certain circumstances under which the person, other than the aggrieved husband or the aggrieved wife, can file a complaint for prosecuting the accused spouse under ss 493 to 498 aforesaid. Non-compliance of the provisions of s 198 of CrPC, is fatal to the proceedings under s 494, IPC . If a person, other than the aggrieved person, initiates proceedings under s 494, IPC, he must comply with the provision of the proviso to s 198(1), CrPC . Merely because the court took cognizance of the offence under s 494, IPC, alleged against the accused persons, it cannot be presumed or implied that the court granted the required leave. In the absence of anything on record to show that the leave was asked for by the complainant and granted by the court which took cognizance of the said offence and in view of the mandatory provision of s 198, CrPC, and the absence of anything to show that the complainant was really an aggrieved person in the case, the court cannot take cognizance of the offence under s 494, IPC, and abetment thereof alleged against the accused person. Accordingly,[35] the court has no locus standi but to dismiss such a complaint.

Section 494,IPC, does not say that the complaint for commission of offence under the said section can be filed only by wife living and not by the woman with whom subsequent marriage takes place during the lifetime of the wife living and which marriage is void by reason of its taking place during the lifetime of such wife. The complaint can also be filed by the person with whom second marriage takes place which is void by reason of its taking place during the lifetime of the first wife. The woman with whom second marriage is performed can file complaint for offence under s 494, IPC .[36] A second wife can also file a complaint.[37]

In prosecution for bigamy, complaint by aggrieved person is necessary, charge cannot be framed on the basis of police report. Police report cannot be treated as complaint. Cognizance of offence on police report and conviction under s 494, IPC was found unsustainable, and was set aside.[38]

Section 495 deals with the offence of bigamy where it is found that subsequent marriage is contracted by concealing former marriage. In such a case, the second wife is the aggrieved person and can file a complaint.[39]

28. Second Complaint

The second complaint would not be completely barred. There is no statutory bar in filing a second complaint on the same facts. In a case where a previous complaint is dismissed without assigning any reasons, the magistrate under s 203, CrPC may take cognizance of an offence and issue process if there are sufficient grounds for proceeding. Second complaint could be dismissed after a decision has been given3981 against the complainant in the previous matter upon a full consideration of his case.

Further, second complaint on the same facts could be entertained only in exceptional circumstances, namely, where the previous order was passed on an incomplete or on a misunderstanding of the nature of complaint or it was manifestly absurd, unjust or where new facts which could not, with reasonable diligence, have been brought on record in the previous proceedings, have been adduced.[40]

29. Filing of Complaint--Effect of Andhra Pradesh State Amendment

What was non-cognizable offence under s 494, IPC, was made cognizable in view of state amendment brought to First Schedule appended to CrPC . State amendment having received assent of President is valid and would prevail even in wake of any repugnancy between state law and Central law in so far as the state of Andhra Pradesh is concerned. Offence under s 498A, IPC, is cognizable but it is not cognizable elsewhere in the country. In view of the state amendment, the investigating agency is entitled to investigate offence alleged under s 494, IPC . There are certain limitations for court to take cognizance. Section 198 , CrPC bars the court from taking cognizance of any offence falling under ch XX of IPC and relating to institution of marriage with avowed object of preserving institution of marriage. This bar enjoined under s 198, CrPC, is for the court and not for the investigating agency. Although the agency is at liberty to register a case and conduct investigation into an offence under s 494, IPC, the court is precluded from taking cognizance of said offence in view of mandatory provisions of s 198, CrPC . There has been no amendment to s 198, CrPC, so as to bring same in consonance with state amendment brought to s 494, IPC, as has been done in respect of offence under s 498A by incorporating s 198A, Crpc . Section 198 , CrPC being a legislation of Parliament would prevail in the event of any inconsistency between the state law and Central law since both subjects pertain to the Concurrent List. Thus when initial cognizance taken by court, being bad in law, it results in acquittal of the accused.[41]

30. Filing of Complaint--First Husband or Wife Proper Person

Ordinarily, the proper person to make the complaint, in the case of bigamy, is the first husband or the first wife, as the case may be.[42] When the offence of bigamy is committed by the husband, the first wife is the aggrieved party. She is, in such a case, competent to file a complaint.[43] A complaint by the wife against her husband or committing bigamy is maintainable even if her marriage with him was in violation of the provisions of s 5(iii) of the Hindu Marriage Act 1955, the reason being that the contravention of the same, does not render the marriage void ab initio or voidable.[44]3982

31. Complaint by other Person--Validity

A complaint can be filed by another person with the leave of the court if the complainant is a pardanashin lady and does not want to appear in public.[45] However, when the aggrieved party, whether the first husband or the first wife, is already dead, a complaint on his or her behalf is not maintainable.[46] Where, however, the complainant died after filing the complaint, the mother of the complainant was allowed to conduct the prosecution.[47] However, a complaint by the father,[48] or the mother,[49] or the brother,[50] of the first husband was not held to be maintainable, neither of them being aggrieved persons.

As per proviso (c) to sub-s 1 of s 198, CrPC, where the person aggrieved by an offence punishable under s 494, or s 495, IPC, is the wife, the complaint may be made on her behalf by her father, mother, brother, sister, son or daughter or by her father's or mother's brother or sister or with the leave of the court by any other person related to her by blood, marriage or adoption. Therefore, although when the person aggrieved by the offence is the wife, the complaint can be filed by her or without leave of the court by her father, mother, brother, sister, son or daughter or by her father's or mother's brother or sister. The complaint can be made by any person related to her by blood, marriage or adoption but only with the leave of the court. Thus, the complaint filed by the mother's brother of the aggrieved wife without leave of the court is valid by virtue of proviso (c) to sub-s (1) of s 198, CrPC .[51]

32. Complaint on Suggestion of Police or Secondcomplaint--Validity

A complaint in respect of an offence under s 494, IPC, is not bad because it was written on the suggestion of the police.[52] However, a second complaint cannot be entertained when the first complaint, made by the complainant, was dismissed on the ground that the complainant failed to prove his alleged marriage with the accused spouse.[53]

33. Investigation of any Cognizable Offence with Offence under Section 494, by the Police--Complaint under Section 198 , CrPC not Necessary

Sub- section 4 of s 155, CrPC, creates a legal fiction and provides that although a case may comprise several offences of which some are cognizable and others are not, it would not be open to the police to investigate the cognizable offence only and omit the non-cognizable offences. Since the whole case (comprising cognizable and non-cognizable offences) is to be treated a cognizable, the police had no option but to investigate the whole of the case and to submit a chargesheet in respect of all the3983 offences, cognizable or non-cognizable both, provided it is found by the police during investigation that the offences appear, prima facie, to have been committed.

Sub- section 4 of s 155, CrPC, is a new provision introduced for the first time in the Code of 1973. This was done to overcome the controversy about investigation of non-cognizable offences by the police without the leave of the magistrate. The statutory provisions are specific, precise and clear and there is no ambiguity in the language employed in sub-s 4. It is apparent that if the facts reported to the police disclose both cognizable and non-cognizable offences, the police would be acting within the scope of its authority in investigating both the offences as legal fiction enacted in sub-s 4 provides that even non-cognizable case shall, in that situation, be treated as cognizable.[54]

The Supreme Court in Praveen Chandra Mody v State of Andhra Pradesh [55] has held that while investigating a cognizable offence and presenting a chargesheet for it, the police are not debarred from investigating any non-cognizable offence arising out of the same facts and including them in the chargesheet.

The High Court was thus clearly in error in quashing the charge under s 494, IPC, on the ground that the trial court could not take cognizance of that offence unless a complaint was filed personally by the wife or any other near relation contemplated by cl (c) of the proviso to s 198(1), CrPC .

Therefore, when the police has investigated the offences punishable under ss 498A, 109, 494 and 120B, IPC, taking cognizance by the additional chief judicial magistrate of the offences including the offence under s 494, IPC, on the basis of the police report is not without jurisdiction.[56]

34. Allegations in Complaint

There must be specific allegation, by the husband or wife, of the charge of bigamy.[57] It is not however, necessary that the complainant should specify precisely the section under which the person, complained against, should be charged and it would be sufficient if he has laid, before the magistrate, matter which, if proved, would be sufficient to warrant a conviction under s 494, IPC .[58] Where a complaint was made for taking or keeping the wife of the complainant, but, in the course of the proceedings, it appeared that the wife had committed bigamy, it was held that the magistrate could proceed under s 494, IPC, without a further complaint.[59]

35. Transfer of Cases

Separate cases were filed in different courts of the state for the offence of bigamy by the first wife as well as the second wife and her father, against the accused persons as a result of an alleged second marriage. The cases were at different stages and pending disposal since long. Observing that it would be inconvenient and expensive to the complainant parties, if either case is transferred to another city at such a belated3984 stage, the Rajasthan High Court declined the transfer petition of the accused filed under s 407, CrPC (2 of 1974).[60]

36. Limitation

Section 494,IPC, is punishable with imprisonment for seven years, so in view of sub-s 3 of s 468, CrPC, the limitation provided in s 468, CrPC, is not applicable to the offence under s 494, IPC .[61]

37. Quashing of Complaint

Where a complaint was filed against the accused for having committed the offence of bigamy alleging that the complainant after hearing the chanting of shlokas and mantras went near the assembly and inferred that her husband was marrying another woman, there was no averment in the complaint that customary rites and ceremonies prevalent in the caste or tribes were performed, the order of issuing process under ss 494 and 109, IPC, was quashed by the High Court by exercising jurisdiction under art 226 of the Constitution of India and s 482, Crpc 1973 (2 of 1974).[62]

When the allegations in the complainant disclose an offence of bigamy, mere pendency of dispute about the legitimacy of the marriage between the complainant wife and the accused-husband in a civil suit cannot be a ground to quash the complaint.[63]

First wife filed complaint for offence under s 494, IPC and ss 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1981 after the ex parte decree of divorce against him had become final. Allegations of demand of dowry and harassment were made after the expiry of two years from the date of the alleged incident. Complaint was quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[64]

38. Jurisdiction

The question of jurisdiction is governed by s 182(2) of CrPC . The provision is reproduced below:

S. 182 . Offences committed by letters,etc.--

(1) Any offence which includes cheating may...
(2) Any offence punishable under section 494 or section 495 of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860) may be inquired into or tried by a court within whose local jurisdiction the offence was committed or the offender last resided with his or her spouse by the first marriage, or the wife by the first marriage has taken up permanent residence after the commission of the offence.

It may be noticed that s 182(2), CrPC, as it originally stood, conferred jurisdiction only on the court within whose local jurisdiction the offence was committed or the offender last resided with his or her spouse by the first marriage. The clause 'or the wife by the first marriage has taken up permanent residence after the commission of3985 the offence' was incorporated by the Amending Act of 1978. Eventually this was done to facilitate the first wife to file a complaint at a place where she had taken up residence after the husband married again. The intention of the Parliament clearly is to make it convenient for the deserted wife to prosecute the offending spouse. A hypertechnical view is likely to defeat the very spirit of the Act. If there is sufficient material from which permanent residence of the first wife can be inferred at a place within the jurisdiction of the court, then the court ought to decide the question of jurisdiction in favour of wife notwithstanding the fact that her written complaint does not specifically make such averments.[65]

The words 'has taken up permanent residence after commission of offence' in s 182(2), CrPC, would not mean only after commission of the offence of bigamy. If the wife was living permanently at her maternal town even before the alleged offence of bigamy was committed by her husband, the complaint by the wife filed in the court at her maternal town is maintainable.[66]

It is necessary for a court to satisfy itself on the point of jurisdiction before it entertains a complaint under s 494, IPC .[67] The court must itself see that it has got jurisdiction. If the complaint petition does not disclose the existence of territorial jurisdiction, the magistrate has got power to dismiss it; he can drop the proceedings even after issue of process without giving further opportunity for adducing evidence. If, however, the complaint petition and the statement, on oath are silent as to facts, relating to the existence of territorial jurisdiction, the magistrate cannot drop the proceeding after issue of process without giving further opportunity to the parties to lead evidence to establish existence, or otherwise, of territorial jurisdiction.[68]

39. Jurisdiction--Meaning and Importance of Words 'Offender' and 'Last Resided'

The court, within whose jurisdiction the offence takes place, or where the offender last resided with his/her spouse by first marriage, has jurisdiction to try the offence.[69] A reading of sub-s (2) of s 182, CrPC, as a whole indicates that to bring a case within the second limb of sub-s (2) of s 182, CrPC, the offender must have last resided with his spouse of the first marriage within the jurisdiction of the court in which the complaint is filed. The word 'offender' is a general word and therefore, it must receive the general construction and meaning. The legislature has carefully used the word 'offender' here and not the word 'husband'. A husband becomes an offender so far as the wife is concerned in the matrimonial matter when he marries another woman during the subsistence of the first marriage. The word 'offender' must be read, it is submitted, as offending husband. However, for the commission of the second marriage, during the subsistence of the first marriage, either of the spouses would not become an offender. If the significance and importance for the word 'offender' as used in the section, is given effect to, then, it can only mean that a complaint can be laid in a court within whose jurisdiction the offender (husband), after the commission of the offence, last resided with his wife of the first marriage3986 and otherwise not. The context in which the word 'offender' is used also gives help to understand this word.[70]

The words 'last resided' would mean the place of stay after contracting the second marriage and not the place of stay prior to it. The stay of the accused with the first wife within the jurisdiction of a court, before contracting the second marriage, cannot be equated to mean offender having 'last resided' within the meaning of s 182(2), CrPC . Therefore, the court within whose jurisdiction the accused stayed with his first wife has no jurisdiction to take cognizance of the complainant under s 494, IPC .[71]

40. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the...day or..., at..., you already having a wife (or husband). A living, married B, marriage with whom was void by reason of its taking place during the lifetime of A, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 494 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

The charge should mention the place where the bigamous marriage was performed.[72]

41. Proof

In order to secure a conviction under this section, it must be proved[73] that:

(a) the accused was already married to some person;
(b) the person, to whom he or she was married, was living on the date of subsequent marriage;
(c) the accused married second person; and
(d) the subsequent marriage was void by reason of its taking place during the lifetime of the first spouse.

Where the evidence of the witnesses examined to prove the second marriage showed that essential ceremonies had not been performed, the accused could not be convicted on the charge of bigamy. Admission of second marriage made by the accused is no evidence for the purpose of proving marriage in an adultery or bigamy case.[74]

42. Valid and Subsisting First Marriage

The prosecution must show first of all that at the time of subsequent marriage, the first valid marriage was subsisting. Where proof of either marriage is unsatisfactory, there ought to be no conviction.[75] Where the evidence was found to be interested,3987 discrepant and unreliable, the order of acquittal was upheld.[76] Due solemnisation of the bigamous marriage, complained of, with all the necessary ceremonies and rites has to be established as a fact by the complainant and even the factum and validity of the complainant's own marriage with the accused has also to be proved in case the same is not admitted by the accused.[77] It is incumbent upon the complainant to establish that both the marriages, pleaded by him or by her, were solemnised in accordance with the customary rites and ceremonies either prescribed by the Hindu law governing the parties or recognised by the custom, obtaining the community of which the parties belong. An admission of either the first or the second marriage by the accused is no evidence of marriage.[78] The first marriage of the complainant and his alleged wife or husband must be strictly proved.[79] There must be, at the time of subsequent marriage, a previous subsisting valid marriage.[80] The prosecution must prove that the person, who remarried had contracted a first marriage and that the husband or wife of the first marriage was living on the date of subsequent marriage.[81] The onus is heavy upon the prosecution to prove that the complainant was a legally married wife of the accused and that, during the subsistence of the marital tie, the accused entered into another marriage duly solemnized in accordance with law.[82] The allegation of a prior marriage by a man with a woman giving the status of a wife to the woman must be seen if the alleged prior marriage had been solemnised after due observance of the rites and ceremonies. If it be found that the alleged prior marriage has not been so solemnised, the mere fact that the accused had lived with such a woman with whom some ceremonies of marriage had been performed, will not satisfy the essential ingredient to prove the charge under s 494, IPC, that there was a wife living as obviously such woman cannot claim the status of a legally married wife.[83] There must be proper proof of the solemnization of not only the first marriage, but also of the second marriage in accordance with the essential religious rites applicable to the parties.[84] It is the prosecution who has to prove both the marriages.[85]

43. Proof of Second Marriage with Essential Ceremonies--Necessity of

In the prosecution for bigamy, the second marriage has to be proved as a fact and it has also to be proved that the necessary ceremonies and rites had been performed. In a bigamy case, second marriage as a fact, that is to say, the rites and ceremonies, constituting it, must be proved.[86] Proof of solemnisation of second marriage is3988 imperative.[87] The prosecution must establish that the essential ceremonies for a valid marriage were gone through by the accused on a date on which either party to the marriage had a living spouse.[88] Both the marriages of the accused must be valid in the sense that the necessary ceremonies required by the personal law governing the parties must have been duly performed.[89] If adequate proof is not adduced by the complainant of a valid marriage, a conviction under s 494, IPC, cannot be made.[90] The essential ceremonies, constituting second marriage, must be proved as a matter of fact.[91] It must be shown that the subsequent marriage was solemnised upon due performance of the essential ceremonies upon which only a marriage becomes a valid marriage.[92] The second marriage being an essential ingredient of the offence of bigamy, that marriage has to be clearly proved by the prosecution.[93] It is not, however, the law that such proof must be by direct evidence, and not by other means. Besides the direct and circumstantial evidence, the court can take, into consideration, opinion evidence, the pre-trial admissions of the accused and the statement of the accused, made by him under s 313 of CrPC, the condition however being that on the basis of opinion evidence alone the court cannot hold the factum of marriage to be proved. In Rabindra Kumar Bhattacharjee v Prativa Bhattacharjee,[94] the court negatived the contention that the ceremony of saptapadi in the second marriage must be proved by convincing proof. Where there is celebration or solemnisation of a marriage, which has been intended by the party to be binding on them, and the form is not wholly opposed or against the custom of the community or caste of the parties, the presumption, that the ceremonies were complete and the marriage is legal, arises.[95] The fact that a report was made mentioning the first marriage and expressing the apprehension of accused's intention to marry the girl again, is a strong corroboration of the truth of the prosecution evidence.[96] There is a strong presumption in favour of the validity of a marriage if, from the time of such marriage, the parties are recognised by the people concerned as man and wife and such presumption applies also as to the question whether the formal requisites of a valid marriage ceremony were satisfied.[97] A marriage may be established by preponderating repute and by conduct even though the repute may be divided.[98] However, the mere tying of thali is not enough to establish that the marriage has been3989 solemnised.[1] Likewise, a marriage cannot be proved by statements which relate to the existence of any relationship or by the opinion of any person given out or even expressed by conduct as to the existence of such relationship of any person, although that person has special means of knowledge of the subject, or by the admissions made by the parties to the marriage, who may, at times, be actuated by ulterior motives, but, if, in addition thereto, or independently, any evidence of parents of the parties, regarding celebration or solemnisation of a marriage is available, it would go a long way in establishing the factum of marriage.[2] If the fact of the ceremony having taken place is proved, the law will presume that the ceremony was complete and regular in every respect. It is then for the person, seeking to invalidate the marriage ceremony on the ground of some vital defect or omission, to prove such defect or omission.[3]

44. Admission of Accused about Second Marriage--Effect

Mere admission of an accused, that he contracted second marriage, is not enough.[4] In the absence of any evidence to show that any of the material ceremonies, which are necessary to be performed in a saklang marriage, had been performed, mere admission by the accused, that he married the woman, will not satisfy the ingredients necessary to be established by the prosecution in an offence under this section.[5] Similarly, the statement of one witness, that he was present at the time of marriage, is not sufficient to prove a formal marriage.[6]

45. Mere Statement of Prosecutrix about Second Marriage is not Enough

A mere statement of the prosecutrix that her marriage with the accused was solemnised as per Hindu rites is not enough when she has not deposed anything as to how the marriage was solemnised and whether the essential ingredients of saptapadi and homa were performed or not particularly when no other witness of the prosecution has deposed as to how the complainant had married the accused and whether the essential ceremonies were gone through, these facts show that that the prosecution has failed to prove the performance of valid marriage between the complainant/prosecutrix and the accused.[7]3990

46. Evidence of Relationship under Section 50 of the Evidence Act not Admissible for Offence under Sections 494 to 498

In the case of Rabindra Kumar Bhattacharjee v Prativa Bhattacharjee ,[8]it was held that in view of the proviso of s 50 of the Evidence Act, the above section cannot be invoked to prove the factum of solemnisation of so-called second marriage. Therefore, the evidence under s 50 is not admissible in a proceeding before a court under s 494, IPC .[9]

47. Marriage Contracted under Section 7A, Hindu Marriage Act (1955) (As Inserted by Madras Act 21 of 1967)--Proof of Second Marriage in Accordance with Religious Rites and Ceremonies not Necessary

The provision of s 7A(1) of Hindu Marriage Act 1955 was made applicable to Tamil Nadu with effect from 7 January 1968. According to this section, where a marriage is solemnized in the presence of relatives or friends of other persons by a declaration by the parties to the marriage that each other takes the other to be his spouse or by garlanding each other or putting the ring upon any finger of the other or by the tying of thali such a marriage is valid. The exchange of garlands or putting the ring on the finger or tying the thali are traditionally recognized as various stages of a marriage ceremony among a majority of the people, who live in the villages bringing into existence a binding marriage, and such marriages are convered by s 7(A)(1) of the Hindu Marriage Act. Even a mere oral declaration in any language understood by the parties that each takes the other to be his wife without any other act or ceremony will be a valid marriage under s 7(A)(1) of the Hindu Marriage Act. Execution of a document by the spouses will amount to a declaration within the meaning of this section (vide the commentaries of the learned author Justice Alladi Kuppuswami in his book Mayne's Hindu Law and Usage[10]). In view of the change in law in s 7A of Hindu Marriage Act with effect from 7 January 1968, the proof of solemnisation of second marriage in accordance with the essential religious ceremonies and rites applicable to parties is not a must for conviction for the offence of bigamy.[11]

Section 7A of the Hindu Marriage Act as inserted by Madras Act XXI of 1967 indicates four kinds of valid marriage and it includes a mere oral declaration or garlanding each other or putting the ring on the finger or by tying thali. It is therefore clear that an oral declaration without exchange of garlands or the tying of thali or without any other ceremony could be a valid marriage. Under s 7A(1) of the Hindu Marriage Act as amended by Madras Act XXI of 1967 it is not necessary that the mere oral declaration should also be accompanied by exchange of garlands or by putting the ring on the finger or by tying of thali. The various sub-cll of s 7A(1) of Hindu Marriage Act as amended by Madras Act XXI of 1967 are disjunctive.[12]

48. Civil Court Finding that Wife failed to Prove Second Marriage of the Husband Binding on Proceeding under Section 494

The finding of the civil court recorded in a petition under s 9 of the Hindu Marriage Act, that no second marriage took place between the accused-husband, the3991 complainant and the alleged second wife would be binding on the criminal court dealing with the complaint for bigamy filed by the complainant's first wife, irrespective of the fact that the appeal filed by the first wife in civil proceedings was pending.[13]

49. Value of Certificate of Marriage

In some cases, there are statutory provisions for certificates of marriage. A certificate of marriage is, however, not the only way of proving a marriage; but it is usually the best way.[14] The production of the marriage certificate has sometimes been insisted upon.[15]It should, however, be proved that the pastor, who solemnised the marriage, was person authorised, by s 5 of the Christian Marriage Act, to do so.[16] In the case of a Christian marriage, the evidence of the clergyman, who solemnized the marriage, and an extract from the marriage register were found to be sufficient.[17] Where, however, the marriage has not taken place before the marriage officer, the certificate, granted by him under s 16 of the Special Marriage Act 1954, based merely on declaration of the parties, cannot be said to be any proof of marriage because the certificate merely records the declaration which is itself no proof of marriage.[18]

However, recitals or the contents of the Hindu marriage register extract, kept under s 8(1) of the Hindu Marriage Act are admissible in evidence with regard to the declaration made by the accused husband and wife that they are married, which would squarely come within the purview of s 7(A)(1) of the Hindu Marriage Act 1955 as amended in the state of Tamil Nadu and the extract of marriage register is a public document within the meaning of s 74 of the Evidence Act and can satisfactorily establish the fact that the marriage between accused husband and wife was a valid marriage under s 494, IPC .[19]

50. Acquittal

The allegation of the wife was that her husband performed marriage with another lady in a Kali Temple by the exchange of garlands, but no evidence was adduced on behalf of the complainant to show that at the time of marriage saptapadi around the sacred fire was performed which was an essential element of solemnisation of marriage under Hindu law. So, the order acquitting the accused was found proper.[20]

51. Decree of Divorce Obtained by the Accused--Effect

The question of bigamy arises if a person marries again, while the first marriage is still subsisting and the first wife is living.[21] Where a legally divorced husband agrees for marriage with another lady, no offence under s 494, IPC is committed.[22]3992

The contested or ex parte decree of divorce passed by a competent court entitles the divorced husband and wife to remarry without attracting the offence under this section. Thus, where allegations against the accused-wife were that she had remarried and was living with her second husband in adultery, and the wife produced the ex parte decree of dissolution of her first marriage, it was held that till the ex parte decree of divorce was set aside, the earlier marriage of the accused-wife stood dissolved and the accused-wife committed no offence in remarrying.[23] But when the wife remarries during the pendency of the appeal against the decree of divorce inspite of the knowledge of the pendency of the appeal, such remarriage is not permissible and she can be punished for bigamy. An order issuing process against her for the offences under s 494 is justified.[24] However, when an attempt is made to introduce the theory of divorce by an unregistered document, it is not divorce in the eyes of law,[25] and so cannot help the accused. Under s 13 of the CPC, the judgment of the foreign court is binding on the courts in India, except under certain circumstances. If the marriage of the accused-husband with the complainant wife is dissolved by a decree of divorce by the district court at Sweden and no appeal is preferred by the complainant-wife, the marriage of the accused-husband with another lady after expiry of the period for preferring an appeal does not amount to a bigamous marriage.[26]

52. Conviction

When the complaint is under s 498, IPC, the court cannot convict the accused under s 494, IPC .[27] In KPAhmed Koya v KP Ameena Beebi ,[28] the accused entered into the second alliance in the bona fide hope and belief that she is doing the right thing as her former alliance was no longer subsisting. In these circumstances, she was exonerated.

53. Sentence (Deterrent)

Bigamy being a serious offence, the court should not take a lenient view regarding sentence once it is proved.[29] In this country, it is not infrequent that the husband marries a second wife and leaves the first wife to her fate to lead a life of untold miseries for the rest of her life. No sympathy can be shown to such a person. The attitude of such persons, who marry a second wife, is not only a cavalier one, but also a wanton one. Such persons allow themselves to be under the impression that the long arm of the law cannot touch them inasmuch as there can be no proof of the solemnisation of the second marriage. This luxury of marrying a second wife at the cost of the first wife must be dealt with sternly.[30]3993

54. Sentence (Lenient)

A nominal sentence should, however, be given when offence committed is largely technical, arisen purely on vindictive motive.[31] In Narotam Singh v State of Punjab ,[32] VR Krishna Iyer J, directed the offender to pay Rs 40,000 to the victim's wife to be regarded as sufficient repatriation and also awarded costs in a sum of Rs 5,000 as compensation for accused husband's sexual aberration to serve as correctional responsibility on him. This direction was made in view of the fact that the offence was permitted by the Supreme Court to be compounded and that the appellant was a businessman most likely to wreck his business if imprisoned for two years as confirmed by the High Court. In another case, considering the age of the husband, who was twenty-two years old and who undertook to keep his first wife with him, it was not thought to be appropriate to send him immediately to jail. It was thought proper to give him an opportunity of becoming a better citizen by releasing the accused on probation for a period of one year. It was stated that the rationale of the offence under s 494, IPC, is to deter a spouse from breaking the home by taking another spouse. A second marriage, where it is prohibited by law, in effect amounts to disowning the first marriage. If the accused is sent to jail, the wrong will not be remedied and the gap between the husband and wife will get still more enlarged and will become unbridgable. On the other hand, if they live together, the wrong done to the wife will get undone and the effect of the crime will be nullified.[33]

The accused suffered the agony of a trial for 14-15 years and also lost his job due to conviction for the offence. The sentence of imprisonment under the circumstances was reduced from 1 year rigorous imprisonment to one month simple imprisonment.[34] The first marriage of the accused with the complainant was celebrated during their childhood. The second marriage of the accused was performed at the instance of the parents of the accused and the second wife. These circumstances call for a lesser sentence to be awarded to meet the ends of justice. Therefore, the sentence of imprisonment of two years rigorous imprisonment awarded to the accused-husband was reduced to six months rigorous imprisonment while maintaining sentence of fine of Rs 2000.

The sentence of rigorous imprisonment for six months to the parents of the accused was reduced to the imprisonment till the rising of the court while maintaining the sentence of fine of Rs 1,500 each.[35] Where a custom prevailed in the community for bigamy which is prohibited under law, keeping in view this fact and other attending circumstances, including the fact that the accused had already undergone 15 days imprisonment, the sentence of 1 year imprisonment was reduced to the period already undergone by the accused and in lieu of the remaining sentence, a fine of Rs 1,000 was imposed which was to be paid to the complainant, in default of which, the accused was to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 6 months.[36]

S. 495.

Same offence with concealment of former marriage from person with whom subsequent marriage is contracted.--

Whoever commits the offence defined in the last preceding section having concealed from the person with3994 whom the subsequent marriage is contracted, the fact of the former marriage, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

STATE AMENDMENT

Andhra Pradesh-- In Andhra Pradesh, the punishment is imprisonment for 10 years and fine. The offence is cognizable, non-bailable, triable by the Magistrate of First Class and non-compoundable. --

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides for a higher punishment for the same offence, which is committed under the preceding s 494, IPC, by reason of an aggravated factor. The authors of the IPC have justified the making of the punishment more severe by illustrating the difference made in the case where, in contracting a subsequent marriage the fact of the former marriage is concealed. They observed:

> The married man, who, by passing himself off as unmarried, induces a modest woman to become, as she thinks, his wife, but in reality his concubine, and the mother of an illegitimate issue, is guilty of one of the most cruel frauds than one can be conceived. Such a man should be punished with exemplary severity.

A woman, who does not use all reasonable means in her power to inform herself of the fact of her first husband's alleged demise and contracts a second marriage within sixteen months after cohabitation with her for husband, without disclosing the fact of the former marriage to her second husband, is liable to enhanced punishment under this section.[37]

If there is no offence within the meaning of the preceding s 494, the provisions of this section will not be attracted.

2. Evidence of Relationship under Section 50 of the Evidence Act not Admissible for Offence under Sections 494 to 498

Commentary under the same heading in s 494, ante, may be referred to.

3. 'Having Concealed from the Person with whom the Subsequent Marriage is Contracted'

Concealment may be made in different ways, but this section requires that there should be an element of deceit in not giving the necessary information. This would3995 require a proper understanding. Thus, where a child of ten years married again during the lifetime of her husband, the marriage being negotiated and caused to be performed by the mother of the accused, the child was held not to have attained sufficient maturity of understanding to judge the nature and consequences of her conduct on the occasion of the second marriage.[38]

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

5. Complaint--By Whom to be Filed

Under s 198 of CrPC, no court can take cognizance of an offence under s 495, IPC, except upon a complaint made by the aggrieved person subject to some specified exceptions. Section 198 of CrPC may be referred to.[39]

As stated above, in the case of bigamy, the first wife is the aggrieved person. It is she who can object to the bigamous conduct of her husband in entering into a marriage with another woman during her lifetime. A complaint, filed by the second wife, is not competent, she being not falling under the category of the aggrieved persons.[40] However, when the husband contracted second marriage keeping second wife in dark about the first marriage, the second wife is aggrieved person within the meaning of s 198, CrPC, and competent to lodge the complaint against her husband under s 495, IPC .[41] The brother of the husband of the woman, who commits bigamy, is also not an aggrieved person and, therefore, incompetent to file a complaint.[42]

As made clear by s 198, CrPC, for all or any of the offences under ss 493, 494, 495, 496, 497 and 498, IPC, an aggrieved person can be either the husband or the wife and none else other than those falling under the proviso to s 198(2), CrPC . Complaint filed by a third person would not be maintainable.[43]

6. Quashing of Complaint

Where the connected matter remained pending for years before the court and after its disposal, the complaint under s 497, IPC, has been filed, the delay itself cannot be a ground for quashing the proceedings.[44] If the complaint is filed by a legally competent person in terms of s 198, CrPC, and the trial court took cognizance of offences including the offence under s 495, IPC, on the basis of prima facie evidence on record, the complaint cannot be quashed by taking recourse to s 582, CrPC .[45] The complaint was filed by the wife against the accused under ss 420, 406 and 495, IPC . Her father assured the accused that his daughter would withdraw the complaint. On3996 this assurance, the accused withdrew the complaint which he filed. However, his wife did not withdraw the complaint. As there was no legal or moral obligation on the part of the wife to withdraw the complaint, the criminal proceedings or the complaint cannot be quashed on the ground that the father of the complainant had assured the accused that the complaint against him would be withdrawn.[46]

7. Jurisdiction

A plain reading of s 177 and sub-s 2 of s 182, CrPC, shows that sub-s 2 of s 182, CrPC, is a provision complete by itself regarding the place of inquiry and trial of offences punishable under s 494 or 495, IPC . Sub- section 2 provides three venues for inquiry and trial of the offences under s 494 or s 495, IPC, viz., the court within whose local jurisdiction the offence was committed, or the offender last resided with his or her spouse by the first marriage, or the wife by the first marriage has taken up permanent residence after the commission of the offence. Out of these, the first venue that is the court within whose local jurisdiction the offence was committed is the same as the venue stipulated under s 177, CrPC, dealing with the ordinary place of inquiry or trial. In order to decide whether a court has jurisdiction to try offences under s 494 or s 495, IPC, one need require to consider the application of sub-s 2 of s 182, CrPC . There is no need to consider the application of s 177, CrPC, as it is covered under the first venue stipulated in sub-s 2. In this view, sub-s 2 cannot be said to be supplemental to s 177, CrPC, but supplement to it unlike sub-s 1 of s 182, CrPC, which is supplemental to and not supplement to s 177, CrPC .[47]

8. Charge

The charge would be in the same form as the one under the preceding s 494 with the addition of the words 'that you concealed, from B, the fact of the former marriage with A', and substitution of ' s 495 ' for ' s 494 '.

9. Proof

The requirements of the proof would be the same as in the preceding s 494 with the addition that it has also to be proved that the accused had, before contracting the subsequent marriage, concealed the fact of the former marriage.

Unless both the marriages are established along with the fact of concealment, the charge under s 495, IPC, cannot be established. If the second marriage is not established, the main ingredient of the offence would be lacking and, therefore, the charge under this section cannot be found to have been established.[48] However, if there is an admission of both the marriages by the accused, then strict proof of both the marriages would not be required.[49]

Chapter XX

Of Offences Relating to Marriage

S. 496.

Marriage ceremony fraudulently gone through without lawful marriage.--

Whoever, dishonestly or with a fraudulent intention, goes through the ceremony of being married, knowing that he is not thereby lawfully married,3997 shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

STATE AMENDMENT

Andhra Pradesh-- In Andhra Pradesh, the punishment is imprisonment for 7 years and fine. The offence is cognizable, non-bailable, triable by the Magistrate of First Class and non-compoundable.--[Vide s 2 of the Andhra Pradesh Act 3 of 1992 (wef 15-2-1992)]

Comments

1. Scope

This section, analogous to s 493, IPC, appears to apply to cases in which a ceremony is gone through which would, in no case, constitute a marriage and in which, one of the parties is deceived by the other into the belief that it does constitute a marriage or effect is sought to be given by the proceeding to a collateral fraudulent purpose. If the ceremony gone through would, but for the previous marriage, have constituted a lawful marriage, and if both parties were aware of the circumstances of the previous marriage, s 494, and not this section, applies.[50] A case of bigamy is not contemplated by this section.[51] Where it is intended that there should be a valid marriage, and not that there should be only a show of marriage for some ulterior and fraudulent purpose, the case does not come under this section.[52] The essence of the offence is that the marriage ceremony should be fraudulently gone through and that there should be no lawful marriage.[53] To establish a charge under s 496, it is enough to show that the marriage may be set aside on the ground of fraud or declared a nullity; it is incumbent upon the prosecution to go further to prove that the accused knew that there was no valid marriage and he had gone through a show of marriage with a fraudulent or ulterior object in view.[54]

2. Section 494 and Section 496 --Distinction

An offence under s 494 is different from an offence under s 496, IPC . If the accused intends that there should be a valid marriage and honestly goes through the necessary ceremonies during the lifetime of the other spouse, then it may be a case under s 494, IPC, but if the accused only intends that there should only be a show of marriage and3998 dishonestly or fraudulently goes through the marriage ceremony knowing fully well that he is not legally married, then it is an offence under s 496, IPC .[55]

3. Section 493 and Section 496 --Distinction

The nature of the offence under s 493, is different from that under this section and is distinguishable in the following respects:

Section 493	Section 496
(a) It prescribes a punishment for the man only.	(a) Both man and woman may be punishable.
(b) It makes no reference to any particular ceremony being performed.	(b) The performance of some ceremony known to be insufficient is a condition.
(c) To cohabit or to have sexual intercourse is a necessary ingredient.	(c) There is no reference to it. Going through a mock marriage is itself sufficient.
(d) The word used is 'deceit'.	(d) The mock marriage must be made 'dishonestly or with a fraudulent intention'. There may be dishonest or fraudulent intention on the part of both the parties to cause wrongful loss or wrongful gain to some other person.

Under s 493, IPC, what is required is that by deceitful means, the accused must induce a belief of lawful marriage and then make the woman cohabit, or have sexual intercourse, with him. Under s 496, IPC, the offence consists in dishonestly, or with a fraudulent intention going through the ceremony of being married, knowing that he is not thereby lawfully married. The offence under the former consists in giving a false assurance of marriage to a woman and thereby procuring sexual intercourse with her, whereas the offence under the latter consists in fraudulently going through the ceremony itself knowing that it was not lawful.[56]

4. Evidence of Relationship under Section 50 of the Evidence Act not Admissible for Offence under Sections 494 to 498

Commentary under the same heading in s 494, ante, may be referred to.

5. Conduct and Character of Accused

The conduct and character of the accused cannot be the sole consideration in reaching a conclusion as to whether the accused had deceitfully induced the complainant woman to believe that legal marriage was performed, and that on such a3999 belief the woman was induced to cohabit with him. The conduct of the accused, though reprehensible, cannot per se, lead to a finding of guilt of the accused in the matter of commission of the alleged offence under s 493 and s 496, IPC . In any case it cannot be decisive of the matter.[57]

6. 'Dishonestly'

Commentary under s 24, vol 1, may be referred to.

7. 'With a Fraudulent Intention'

Commentary under s 25, vol 1, may be referred to.

8. 'Goes through the Ceremony of Being Married'

Some sort of ceremony is necessary. In Re Vellai Mudali,[58] the accused seized the girl, pushed her down and tied a tati round her neck, and then let her go. He had intended to marry her, but he was rejected and she was about to be married to somebody else. The accused acted in the above manner apparently to spite the girl and her parents. It was held that the act of the accused in tying the tati round the neck, in the said circumstances, did not amount to going through the ceremony of being married, knowing that he is not thereby lawfully married, within the meaning of this section. The accused must be presumed to have known fully well that, according to the custom of the community, that act did not constitute a ceremony of being married.

9. Procedure

Commentary under the same heading in s 495, ante, may be referred to.

10. Complaint--By whom to be Filed

Commentary under the same heading in ss 494, 495, ante, may be referred to.

11. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the ... day of ..., at ..., you dishonestly (or with a fraudulent intention) went through the ceremony of being married to AB, knowing that you were not thereby lawfully married, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 496 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

12. Proof

In order to establish an offence under this section, it must be proved that:

(a) the accused went through a ceremony of being married to the complainant;
(b) the said accused, at that time, knew that he/she was not thereby married; and4000
(c) the said accused did so dishonestly or with a fraudulent intention.

In order to convict an accused of an offence under this section, the evidence must be sufficiently clear to show that the accused had deceitfully induced a belief of lawful marriage in the complainant and it was in such belief that she had cohabited with him.[59]

13. Sentence

The sentence under this section is imprisonment of either description which may extend to seven years, and also a fine. However, a lenient view may be taken in the peculiar facts and circumstances of a particular case. In Ashwin NanabhaiVyas v State of Maharashtra ,[60] the Supreme Court, keeping in view the facts that the trial lasted nearly seven years involving a lot of expenses, that the litigation must have also caused mental agony to the accused, that the complainant had died, and the tribulation suffered by complainant who subsequently became wife of the accused, reduced the sentence of one year's rigorous imprisonment to that already undergone by him.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XX

Of Offences Relating to Marriage

S. 497.

Adultery.--

Whoever has sexual intercourse with a person who is and whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the wife of another man, without the consent or connivance of that man, such sexual intercourse not amounting to the offence of rape, is guilty of the offence of adultery, and shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both. In such case the wife shall not be punishable as an abettor.

STATE AMENDMENT

Andhra Pradesh-- In Andhra Pradesh, the punishment is imprisonment for 5 years, or fine, or both. The offence is cognizable, bailable, triable by the Magistrate of First Class and non-compoundable. --[Vide s 2 of the Andhra Pradesh Act 3 of 1992 (wef 15-2-1992)]4001

Comments

1. Scope

Adultery is an offence which is committed by a third person against a husband in respect of his wife and of which a man alone can be held guilty,[61] meaning thereby that it is an infringement of the rights of a husband towards his wife and the law of this country regards it as an offence.[62] The object of the law is to inflict punishment on those who interfere with the sacred relation of marriage,[63] the reason being that as adultery is an anti-social and illegal act, no peace loving citizen or person of good morals would like that it should be permitted to be indulged in.[64] This is the reason that this section makes it punishable and all classes of persons, irrespective of their caste, creed and colour, if they commit this offence, are governed by the section.[65]

'Living in adultery', as stated in s 13(1)(i), Hindu Marriage Act 1955,[66] or in s 125, CrPC,[67] in matrimonial cases, has a different and wider meaning than 'adultery' in this section.

Enticement and detention are not ingredients of an offence under this section.[68] It is sexual intercourse which is a necessary ingredient of the offence under this section. Nothing short of it would justify a conviction for adultery.[69] In a case of adultery, sexual intercourse must be proved,[70] the sexual intercourse required for adultery being identical to the sexual intercourse required for rape.[71]

2. Section 497 and Section 22 Indian Divorce Act 1869

Only one form of adultery has been made punishable by s 497 . It will be noted that under that provision a married woman is not guilty of adultery even as an abettor. If there is consent or connivance of the husband, then there will be no offence of adultery. There is no reason why this specialised definition of adultery should be extended to the interpretation of s 32 of the Indian Divorce Act 1869. It may be noted that under that section the husband may obtain a decree of judicial separation on the ground of adultery committed by the wife, though as we have seen under s 497, IPC, the wife will not be guilty of the offence of adultery under s 497, IPC . This itself shows that the narrow definition of adultery in s 497, IPC, cannot be applied to the interpretation of the terms of s 22 of the Indian Divorce Act 1869. Further, the principle underlying the relief of judicial separation on the ground of adultery of the spouse, makes it immaterial whether the woman with whom the husband has sexual relationship is a married woman. The offence under s 497, IPC, is against the husband with whose wife another man has committed adultery. However, wider considerations apply when a husband or wife seeks judicial separation or dissolution4002 of the marriage on the ground of adultery. In the latter case, it is the violation of the marriage tie which is relevant.[72]

3. Section 497 , IPC and Section 23, Indian Contract Act 1872

In England, adultery is not an offence under criminal law, whereas in India it is. If the adultery, past or future, is the consideration for an agreement entered into in India, this would make it not merely an immoral but an illegal agreement and the contract would be void.[73]

4. Evidence of Relationship under Section 50 of the Evidence Act not Admissible for Offence under Sections 494 to 498

Commentary under the same heading in s 494, ante, may be referred to.

5. 'Connivance'

Connivance, as applied to matrimonial cases, may be defined as the willing consent to a conjugal offence or a culpable acquiescence in a course of conduct reasonably likely to lead to the offence being committed.[74] As pointed out by Lord Chelmsford, in Gipps v Gipps ,[75]connivance is a figurative expression meaning a voluntary blindness to some present act or conduct, or to something going before the eyes, or to something which is known to be going on, without any protest or desire to disturb or interfere with it. To constitute connivance, the facts established must lead to a direct and necessary inference that adultery would be committed with the person charged.[76] If a husband permits the adulterer, knowing him to be such, to visit his wife, he will be guilty of active connivance.[77] Where there exists a state of things as would raise a reasonable apprehension in the mind of a reasonable man that adultery may result and yet the husband does not interfere, he would be guilty of connivance.[78] Where it was admitted that the husband was aware of his wife's adultery and, being fully apprised of what was going on, took no active steps to prevent it and acquiesced in it, it was held that there had been connivance on the part of the husband, on his wife confessing, on the very night of the marriage, her guilt of adultery, left her in her parental home and did not object to her living with the co-respondent as husband and wife and further, when she wanted to marry the co-respondent, he not only not objected to it but also was a willing and consenting party thereto, it was held that the husband had connived in the so-called marriage of the wife with the co-respondent.[79]

Mere toleration, after adultery had begun, is not connivance,[80] nor is abstention from taking steps to prevent adultery.[81] From the fact, that the husband had left his wife about ten years ago and was living with his new wife and did not care to take her back, no inference of connivance can be drawn.[82] Where a man entered the house4003 of another at night with intent to commit adultery with his wife and her husband was absent in the legitimate pursuit of his occupation, it was held that it may safely be presumed that such husband neither consented to, nor connived at, any adultery or immorality on the part of his wife.[83] Where the husband, returning from his legitimate pursuit, caught the accused coming out of his house at 10 pm in the night and the accused was rescued only by the intervention of his father and the matter was later reported also to the police, it was held that the husband had not consented to, nor connived at, adultery by the accused.[84]

6. 'In such case the Wife shall not be Punishable as an Abettor'

Ordinarily, the wife would, in cases of adultery, be an abettor and could have been tried as such. This section, however, makes an express exception in the case of the wife who shall not be punishable as an abettor. The framers of the IPC explain as to why this course was adopted. They point out that it would be weighing the scale against woman, which scale was already too much depressed, by making women punishable for committing the offence of adulator. Women, according to them, were more often than not mere passive tools in the hands of men and placed as they were, it was impossible for them to assist the blandishments that men might hold out against them.[85] The married woman cannot commit the offence of adultery or its abetment. So far as she is concerned, adultery is only a serious breach of marital tie according to the social ideas of the community.[86]

7. Trespass in Order to Commit Adultery--Cases

Commentary under the same heading in s 451, ante, may be referred to.

8. Wife cannot be Prosecuted for Adultery

Only a man can be proceeded against and punished for the offence of adultery. A woman is completely immune to the charge of adultery and she cannot be proceeded against for that offence.[87]

9. Wife not Punishable as an Abettor--Constitutional Validity

Gender is a sound classification and although there can be no discrimination in general on that ground, the Constitution itself provides for a special provision in that case of women and children by cl 3 of art 15 of the Constitution . Articles 14 and 15 of the Constitution of India thus read together validate the last sentence of s 497, IPC, which prohibits women from being punished as an abettor of the offence of adultery.[88]4004

Section 497, IPC cannot be said to be violative of art 14 of the Constitution on the ground that it makes an irrational classification between men and women in that:

(a) section 497 confers upon the husband the right to prosecute the adulterer but, it does not confer any right upon the wife to prosecute the woman with whom her husband has committed adultery;
(b) section 497 does not confer any right on the wife to prosecute the husband who has committed adultery with another woman; and
(c) section 497 does not take in cases where the husband has sexual relations with an unmarried woman, with the result that husbands have, as it were, a free license under the law to have extra-marital relationship with unmarried woman.

It cannot be said that in defining the offence of adultery so as to restrict the class of offenders to men, any constitutional provision is infringed. It is commonly accepted that it is the man who is the seducer, and not the woman. This position may have undergone some change over the years, but it is for the legislature to consider whether s 497, IPC should be amended appropriately so as to take note of the transformation which the society has undergone. True, the forty-second report of the Law Commission shows that there can be two opinions on the desirability of retaining a provision like the one contained in s 497 on the statue book. However, the section cannot be struck down on the ground that it is desirable to delete it.[89]

The fact that a provision for hearing the wife is not contained in s 497 cannot render that section unconstitutional as violating art 21 .[90]

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable by the husband of the woman, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

11. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings

The allegations against the accused-wife were that she had remarried and was living in adultery with her second husband. The wife produced the ex parte decree of dissolution of her first marriage. Till the ex parte decree of divorce was set aside, the earlier marriage of the accused-wife stood dissolved, so no offence was committed by the accused-wife by remarrying. Therefore, the proceedings initiated against the accused-wife and others on the FIR was quashed.[91]

12. Complaint--By whom to be Filed

If the offence, alleged to have been committed by the accused, is one falling either under s 497, or under s 498, IPC, then a complaint by the aggrieved party is a must and in the absence of such a complaint, no court can take cognizance of the complaint. Under s 498(2) of the CrPC, for the purpose of s 198(1), CrPC, no person other than the husband of the woman shall be deemed to be aggrieved by an offence punishable either under s 497, or s 498, IPC .[92]4005

The report, made by the husband of the woman, to the police cannot be regarded as a complaint, the reason being that it is not made to the magistrate and the subsequent appearance of the husband before the magistrate and making statement in support of the police case cannot amount to a complaint within the meaning of s 2(d) of the CrPC and cognizance of an offence under s 497, IPC, without a complaint made by the husband is barred by s 198, CrPC .[1] If an accused is acquitted of rape on the finding that it was a case only of adultery, the accused cannot be convicted under this section if there was no complaint by the husband to give jurisdiction to the magistrate.[2]

If a complaint, made by the husband, described in its heading as one under ss 366 and 368, fulfills all the requirements of a complaint under s 497, IPC, and clearly makes an accusation of an offence under this section, then if the adultery complained of is proved, a conviction under this section will not be illegal on the ground that there has been no complaint as required by s 198, CrPC .[3] However, a complaint for an offence under this section, if it does not anywhere state facts which constitute adultery as contemplated by the section but merely mentions the section, does not amount to a complaint as required by s 198, CrPC . Such an invalid complaint will not entitle a magistrate to take cognizance and proceed further.[4]

If a marriage is proved, the desertion of the husband by the wife for one year will not dissolve the marriage tie and a complaint by the husband for adultery will be maintainable.[5]

13. Wife of Adulterer cannot Prosecute her Husband--Yawning Gap in Section 198 , CrPC 1973

Although the husband of adulteress is given a right to prosecute the adulterer, the wife of the adulterer is not given the right to prosecute her husband in view of the bar under s 198(2), CrPC, and this section is not even discriminatory.[6] There is yawing gap as contained in the provisions of s 198, CrPC, which can be only filled by the legislature.

In view of Punjab and Haryana High Court, right should be conferred on the wife so as to move a legitimate complaint under s 497 or s 498, IPC against her husband who had betrayed and had withdrawn from her society and company by becoming disloyal to her. This type of yawning gap has become more necessary to fill when the society is thinking of giving due rights to the women with the passage of time. A copy of order of Punjab and Haryana High Court was declared to be sent to the Ministry of Law to look into this matter so as to make proper amendment in s 198, CrPC . A copy of the order was also to be sent to the National Commission for4006 Women (New Delhi) with a request to take up this matter with the Ministry so as to examine whether suitable amendment can be brought about in s 198, CrPC .[7]

14. Right of Hearing of Married Woman/Wife of Adulterer

Although s 497, IPC does not contain a provision for hearing the married woman with whom the accused is alleged to have committed adultery, that does not justify the proposition that she is not entitled to be heard at the trial. If the wife makes an application in the trial court that she should be heard before a finding is recorded on the question of adultery, the application would receive due consideration from the court. There is nothing either in the substantive or the adjectival criminal law, which bars the court from affording a hearing to a party, which is likely to be adversely affected, directly and immediately, by the decision of the court. In fact, instances are not unknown in criminal law where, though the prosecution is in the charge of the public prosecutor, the private complainant is given permission to oversee the proceedings. One more step, and the wife could be allowed a hearing before an adverse finding is recorded that, as alleged by her husband the accused had committed adultery with her. The right of hearing is a concomitant of the principles of natural justice, though not in all situations. That right can be read into the law in appropriate cases.[8]

15. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate,etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the ... day of ..., at..., you had sexual intercourse with AB, who is the wife of CD and whom you knew (or had reason to believe) to be the will of CD, without the consent (or connivance) of her husband CD, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 497 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

In a charge of adultery under s 497, IPC, it is not always possible, nor indeed necessary, to specify the date. It is enough if the charge specifies the dates between which the offence was committed.[9] The omission to state the precise dates cannot, therefore, prejudice the accused.[10] However, the omission to state s, which constitute adultery, as contemplated by s 497, IPC, would invalidate a complaint disentitling the magistrate to take cognizance and proceed further.[11]

16. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused had sexual intercourse (not amounting to rape within the meaning of s 375, IPC) with a woman;4007
(b) such woman was the wife of another person;
(c) the accused knew, or he had reason to believe, that the said woman was the wife of another person; and
(d) the said sexual intercourse was without the consent or connivance of that another person, meaning thereby the husband of the woman and complainant in the case.

If the only direct evidence produced against the accused is found unreliable and untrustworthy and the other evidence on record is not sufficient to prove the charge of adultery, the accused is entitled to be acquitted.[12] When a person makes allegations of adultery, burden lies on him to establish the same.[13]

17. Direct Proof Rarely Possible

Direct proof of adultery is rarely possible.[14] It does not, however, mean that idle gossip would prove adultery.[15] There must be more evidence showing opportunity and desire to commit the offence or access by the man to the woman, etc.[16] What establishes an accusation of adultery is, among other matters, evidence of prior or subsequent acts of undue familiarity and opportunities for adultery in the context of other evidence of a circumstantial nature.[17] Where there was considerable attachment between the woman and the accused, and they slept in the same bed for 15 nights, it was held that there was sufficient evidence to hold that sexual intercourse took place between them. The act of sexual intercourse is not committed in public or in the presence of witnesses.[18] The admission of the accused coupled with the evidence of the witnesses to the effect that the two lived together as husband and wife, leads to the inevitable presumption that acts of adultery must have been committed.[19] Where, the woman was seen alone in a naked condition with the accused who also was naked, it was held to have been clearly established that the accused was having sexual intercourse with her.[20] Where a young man found, in the company of a young woman, whose husband was away, and had been, on more occasions than one seen together and in suspicious circumstances, the prosecution version was accepted.[21] However, no inference of adultery can be drawn from the mere fact of residence of the woman with her children in the house of the man with whom she is alleged to have committed adultery. Such an inference can be drawn if it is established that the man and woman used to occupy the same room, if not the same bed.[22] Where the4008 only evidence was a letter written affectionately by the complainant's wife to the accused, it was held that conviction on such evidence was bad.[23]

18. Proof--Marriage between Complainant and Woman

In a prosecution under s 494, and s 497, IPC, it is absolutely necessary on the part of the prosecution to give strict proof of legal marriage between the complainant and the woman, the reason being that a presumption, arising under the first part of s 50 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, as to the marriage is particularly excluded in cases in which relationship of husband and wife is in issue. In the absence of such evidence, mere statement of the complainant, that he was legally married to the woman under consideration, cannot, therefore, be relied upon.[24] The absence of a denial, on the part of an accused, on such a point as marriage between the parties in a criminal trial for adultery, would not, by itself, be sufficient to establish the existence of marriage between the complainant and the woman under consideration.[25] The question, whether there was a valid marriage between the two persons, is a question of fact, and not a question of law.[26] The marriage must be proved as an event which took place, and not merely as the state in which the parties were living, and if it is sought to prove it by oral evidence, that evidence must, in accordance with s 60 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, be direct, that is to say, must be the evidence of an eyewitness.[27] It will have to be proved that the woman was married on one of the approved forms of marriage, recognised as valid by the law and custom governing the parties. Mere statements of witnesses, that she was the wife of a certain person, would not be enough.[28] Similarly, there is very little value in the statements of the husband and the wife for proving the marriage.[29]

19. Proof--Accused's Knowledge that Woman is Wife of Another Person

The third essential element, which the prosecution has to prove, is that the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that the woman was the wife of another person.[30] It is, however, not necessary that the adulterer should know whose wife the woman is. It would be sufficient if he knows that the woman is a married woman.[31] If an accused alleges that he had contracted natra with the woman according to the customs of his caste, the court should determine whether the accused honestly believed that the woman was the wife of another man.[32] Where the accused has reason to believe that the woman is the married wife of another person, sexual4009 intercourse by him with her, whether with or without her consent, would be an offence under s 497, IPC .[33]

20. Proof--Sexual Intercourse by Accused with Wife of Complainant

In addition to what has been stated earlier, the complainant has further to establish that the accused had sexual intercourse with his wife without his consent or connivance.[34] Adultery per se is not an offence in India. To come under s 497, IPC, the adultery must be without the consent or connivance of the husband of the woman.[35] The court has to satisfy itself, before convicting a person of an offence under s 497, IPC, that there was no consent or connivance by the complainant.[36] Strict proof is, however, not necessary. Whether the prosecution succeeds in proving the absence of consent or connivance must, in the ultimate analysis, be a question of fact to be answered in the context of facts and circumstances of individual cases.[37]

21. Conviction

If an accused is charged only under s 498 and evidence fails to establish that charge but the same is found sufficient to establish a charge under this section, the provision of s 221(2), CrPC, can be availed of for the purpose of convicting him under this section.[38] However, an accused, charged under ss 376 and 452, IPC, cannot be convicted under ss 497 and 452, IPC, when the offence of rape under s 376, IPC, has not been established.[39] Likewise, a person convicted of adultery under this section need not be convicted under s 498, IPC .[40]

Every act of sexual intercourse amounts to an offence of adultery; if a person has several sexual intercourses with a woman, it cannot be said that the offence is a continuing offence.[41] The act of the accused in subsequent acts of adultery would be distinct offences for which he would be convicted and sentenced.[42] It is, however, undesirable that there should be successive prosecutions.[43]

22. Sentence

The sentence prescribed for the offence by the law in force, when it was committed, must be taken into account in determining the sentence.[44]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XX

Of Offences Relating to Marriage

S. 498.

Enticing or taking away or detaining with criminal intent a married woman.--

Whoever takes or entices away any woman who is and whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the wife of any other man, from that man, or from any person having the care of her on behalf of that man, with intent4010 that she may have illicit intercourse with any person, or conceals or detains with that intent any such woman, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The provisions of this section, like those of the preceding s 497, IPC, are intended to protect the rights of the husband, and not those of the wife. The gist of the offence under this section appears to be the deprivation of the husband of his custody and proper control over his wife with the object of having illicit intercourse with her.[45]The offence under this section is complete if it appears that the accused went away with the woman in question in such a manner as to deprive her husband of the control of his wife; the fact, that the woman accompanied the accused of her own free will, does not diminish the criminality of the act.[46]

It would not be within the ambit of this section to hold the woman guilty of abetment. In spite of the absence of express exemption, she must be treated as exempt because this offence is, as compared to adultery under the preceding s 497, a minor offence and it would be inconsistent to exempt her from the one without exempting her from the other.[47]

2. Section 366 Distinguished from Section 498

Commentary under the same heading in s 366, vol 3, may be referred to.

3. Section 498 and Section 366 --Comparison and Contrast

Section 366, IPC deals with cases where the woman kidnapped or abducted is an unwilling party and does not respond to the criminal intention of the accused. In such4011 cases, the accused intends to compel the victim afterwards to marry any person against her will or to force or seduce her to illicit intercourse. In other words, s 366, IPC is intended to protect women from such abduction or kidnapping. If it is shown that the woman, who is alleged to have been abducted or kidnapped, is a major and gave her free consent to such abduction or kidnapping, it may, prima facie, be good defence to a charge under the said s 366, IPC . On the other hand, s 498, IPC is intended to protect not the rights of the wife, but those of her husband; and so prima facie, the consent of the wife to deprive her husband of his proper control would not be material. It is the infringement of the rights of the husband, coupled with the intention of illicit intercourse, that is the essential ingredient of the offence under s 498, IPC . It may also be pointed out that the offence under s 498, IPC is a minor offence as compared with the offence under s 366, IPC .[48]

4. Evidence of Relationship under Section 50 of the Evidence Act not Admissible for Offence under Sections 494 to 498, IPC

Commentary under the same heading in s 494, ante, may be referred to.

5. Essential Ingredients

In Alamgir v State of Bihar ,[49] the Supreme Court pointed out three ingredients of an offence under this section. They may be stated as under:

(a) the offender must take, or entice away,[50] or conceal, or detain, the woman of another person from such person or from any other person having the care of her on behalf of the said person;
(b) the offender must know, or he must have reason to believe, that the said woman is the wife of another person; and
(c) the taking, enticing, concealing, or detaining, of the said woman must be with the intent that she may have illicit intercourse with any person.

It may be pointed out that if the intention of illicit intercourse is not proved, the presence of the first two ingredients would not be enough to sustain the charge under this section. It is only if the said intention is proved that it becomes necessary to consider whether the two other ingredients are proved.[51]

What has been stated above is sufficient to make it clear that four kinds of cases are contemplated in this section. A woman may be taken away, or enticed away, or concealed, or detained. In either of the said four classes of cases, the consent of the woman would not matter if it is shown that the said consent is induced or encouraged by the offender by words or acts or otherwise. Whether any influence, preceding from the offender, has operated on the mind of the woman or has co-operated with or encouraged her inclinations, would always be a question of fact. If, on evidence, the court is satisfied that the act of the woman in leaving her husband was caused either by the influence of allurement, or blandishment, proceeding from the offender, that may be enough to bring his case within either of the three classes of cases mentioned in this section. In this connection, when the consent or free will of the woman is4012 relied upon in defence, it is necessary to examine whether such alleged consent or free will was not due to allurement or blandishment or encouragement preceding from the offender.[52]

The taking or enticement of the wife must be from the control of the husband before an offence can be convicted under s 498 . If, however, there is no such control of the husband over the wife, then it is difficult to say that the enticement of the wife would be punishable under this section.[53] However, a wife, living in her husband's house, or in a house, hired by him at his expenses, for her occupation, is, during his temporary absence, living under his protection so as to bring the case within the ambit of this section.[54] If the wife goes to her parents house with the intention of returning to her husband's house and is enticed away while staying at the parent's house, she can be said to have been taken away from a person, having the care of her on behalf of her husband, and the accused would be guilty under s 498, IPC .[55] Where, however, a husband has openly discarded his wife for many years and the wife has been recognised as an agent to go anywhere she likes and she is enticed away by the accused from there, it cannot be said that her father had care of her on behalf of her husband.[56]

6. 'Takes'

The main ingredient of the offence under this section is taking or enticing away the wife from the husband by a person.[57] There is no definition, in the IPC, of the word 'taking'. It is apparently intended to mean something different from 'enticing'. It cannot, however, mean 'taking by force' because this would amount to abduction.[58] Where the accused not only provided the means, namely, a boat, in which the complainant's wife was taken away from the complainant's relation's house, but also brought it to the house and himself went away with her in the boat from the house, it was held that he 'took' her away within the meaning of this section.[59] The offence is complete if the accused 'takes away' another man's wife with the intent that she may have illicit intercourse with him.[60] Where a woman, unwilling to live with her husband, may be even for good reasons, goes away and lives with another person who is willing to take her as his wife, the other person should be held to have 'taken' her within the meaning of this section.[61] There must be some influence, physical or moral, brought to bear, by the accused, to induce the wife to leave her husband in order that her leaving may amount to taking away by the accused. When there is no evidence of any physical or moral persuasion on the part of the accused and the wife left her husband because he was ill-treating her, it was held that the offence, under4013 this section was not committed.[62] It is not enough that the woman left her husband's house, or that she was afterwards seen passing alone with the accused, if it is not shown that she left by reason of any act or assistance proceeding from the accused.[63]

7. 'Entices'

The main ingredient of s 498, IPC, is taking or enticing away the wife from the husband by a person.[64] Where the accused told the wife of the complainant that he could not continue the liaison in the house of her husband any longer and if she wanted to maintain the friendship, she would have to agree to desert her husband's roof and go over to the accused and live with him, in which case he would keep her as his mistress, it was held that it amounted to enticement.[65] In Empress v Poddee ,[66] the woman did not care for her husband and was perfectly willing to exchange her life of drudgery and hard living for that of a prostitute. Likewise, she would have had no opportunity of doing so and, but for the accused, an old procuress, she would have remained quietly, if not contentedly, in her husband's house. It was held that the accused was guilty of enticing the woman and she was convicted under s 498, IPC . It is enough if the woman is induced to actually leave her husband's protection with the intent that she may have illicit intercourse with any person. It does not matter whether the person, enticing her away, is her paramour or only a third party or whether she will meet a paramour.[67] However, the fact, that the woman was living in the same house with the accused and his relatives, would not prove that she was enticed away by any or all of them.[68] Similarly, the mere fact, that the wife, who went away of her own accord from her husband's house, was in the company of the accused in a part of her way, is not sufficient to show that the accused took or enticed the woman away within the meaning of the section. There must be some tangible evidence of taking or enticing.[69] Where a woman, who had been discarded by her husband and was living with her father and brother, eloped with the accused, it was held that the elopement was a joint adventure and that there was no enticement.[70]

8. 'Any Woman who is, and whom he Knows or has Reason to believe to be, the Wife of Any Other Person'

Before a conviction can take place under this section, it must be established that the accused knew or had reason to believe that the woman, taken, or enticed, away, was the wife of some other man.[71] There must be evidence of some kind from which the inference may be drawn that the accused knew the woman to be a married woman. Mere presumption, that he must have known this fact, is not sufficient.[72] Where the4014 accused lived in a neighboring village and belonged to the same brotherhood as that of the woman, it was held that he must be presumed to have the necessary knowledge that the woman was a married woman.[73]

9. 'With Intent that she may have Illicit Intercourse with any Person'

The essential ingredient of the offence under this section is that the wife may be taken, or entice, away, concealed, or detained, with the specific intent that she may have illicit intercourse with any person.[74] It must established beyond all reasonable doubt that the accused took away the woman with the intention of having illicit intercourse with her.[75]

Sexual intercourse between the woman and any person other than the one to whom she has been given in marriage, during the lifetime of her husband, would be illicit intercourse within the meaning of this section.[76] Even if the re-marriage of a married woman is only invalid, any intercourse between the re-married woman and the person, whom she remarries, would be illicit, and if the intention of the person, enticing the woman away, is to re-marry her, his intent should be that she would have illicit intercourse.[77]

10. 'Conceals'

Commentary under the heading 'Wrongfully Conceals or Confines' in s 368, vol 3, may be referred to.

11. 'Detains'

The word 'detains' may denote detention of a person against his or her will. However, detention, in the context of this section, must mean keeping back a wife from her husband, or from any other person, having the care of her on behalf of her husband, with the requisite intention. Such keeping back may be by force; but, it need not be by force. It can be the result of persuasion, allurement, or blandishment, which may have either caused the willingness of the woman, or encouraged her initial inclination, to leave her husband.[78] The persuasion, allurement, or blandishment necessary to make out such detention, must be with the intent to have illicit intercourse.[79] To keep any person's wife with the promise of marriage or upon the understanding that she will be married is an allurement and persuasion.[80]4015

12. 'Such Woman'

The words 'such woman', in this section, means such woman whom the accused knows, or has reason to believe, to be the wife of any other man; the detention of such a woman with the requisite intent is an offence made punishable under this section.[81]

13. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable by the husband of the woman,[82] and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

Once a compromise is made in respect of an offence under this section, any further proceedings before the magistrate on the ground that the complainant had been forced into the compromise would be ultra vires.[83]

14. Complaint--By whom to be made

Cognizance of offences under Ch XXI, IPC can be taken only on complaint of an aggrieved person.[84]

A report of an officer is not a complaint where there is no complaint to a magistrate by the husband or guardian.[85] Where a complaint was filed by the father of the woman and the husband, when he came into the witness box, approved of the complaint, it was held that the conviction under s 498 was bad in law in the sense that the complaint had been made by a person who was not authorised, in law, to make such a complaint at all.[86] Where the complaint was of the offences of kidnapping a minor girl and theft of her jewels and there was no complaint of an offence of enticing away a married woman for the purpose of having illicit intercourse with her, it was held that there was no complaint under s

198 of CrPC .[87] If, however, a petition contains an allegation of facts, which if proved by evidence would constitute an offence under s 498, such petition is a complaint. The fact that there are also other allegations which constitute a more serious offence, such as an offence under s 366,[88] or under s 494,[89] will not make the complaint any the less a complaint. It is not necessary that the complaint should specify also the section under which it has been made. What is necessary is only this much that the complaint should mention the allegations which, if proved, would constitute an offence under s 498, IPC .[90] Similarly, where the husband was not a complainant, but it appeared4016 from his deposition when he appeared as a witness in a case under s 366, IPC, that he wanted the conviction of the accused for committing adultery with his wife, it was held that the deposition of the husband was a complaint on which the accused could be convicted under s 498, IPC .[1] A contrary view has, however, been expressed in other cases. The fact that the husband appeared as a witness in the prosecution of the offence of rape, cannot be regarded as amounting to the institution of a complaint for adultery.[2]

15. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.

16. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, it must be proved[3] that:

(a) the woman, in relation to whom the offence has been committed, was the wife of another person;
(b) the offender knew, or he had reason to believe, that the said woman was the wife of another person;
(c) the said woman was taken, or enticed away, or concealed, or detained, from--

    (i) that man, or
    (ii) a person having the care of her on behalf of that man; and

(d) the said taking, enticing, concealing, or detaining, was with intent that the said woman may have illicit intercourse with any person.

17. Proof--Complainant is to be the Lawful Husband

A complainant is incompetent to prosecute another man under s 498 for enticing away a woman unless he establishes that he is the lawful husband.[4] If the marriage of the woman to the complainant was violable, and not void, and could, under certain circumstances, be repudiated by her, the elements of an offence under this section would not be established.[5] In Karan Singh v Emperor ,[6] it was held that when the woman, who renounced the faith of Islam, ceased to be the wife of the complainant, the accused were at liberty to take her away from the house of her father. Similarly, the marriage of a woman, before expiry of the period of iddat, would be null and void.[7] Where a Mohammadan complainant admitted that he had married six times, but had pronounced divorces of two of his wives which were revocable, it was held that the complainant was not the husband of the sixth woman so married.[8] However, chadar andazi marriage with a widow is recognised as valid among some Rajputs of Kangra district in Punjab,[9] and a complaint by the husband under this section would4017 be maintainable.[10] A marriage with a maternal aunt by chadar andazi ceremony is, however, not valid among the Aroras of Punjab.[11] A person, who has purchased a married woman, is not competent to file a complaint.[12] However, an inter-caste marriage between persons of different castes, especially when recognised by the caste, to which the husband belongs, would be valid, and a complaint by such a husband would be maintainable.[13] Divorce is permitted among Khatiks and a karewa of the divorced woman with the complainant would be valid for a complaint under this section.[14] The marriage of a Mohammadan girl, performed during her minority by her mother, would be subsisting till she exercises the option of repudiating the marriage after puberty, and a person, enticing her for the purpose of having illicit intercourse before the exercise of such option, would be guilty under this section.[15]

18. Proof--Validly Married Wife

The expression 'wife', in ss 497 and 498, IPC means a legally and validly married wife, and, therefore, in a prosecution under these sections, the factum as well as the legality and validity of the marriage must be strictly proved beyond any reasonable doubt.[16] The evidence of the complainant and the woman would not be sufficient even though there is admission of the accused.[17] The evidence of the complainant and two witnesses, to the effect that the marriage, in the nikah form, was solemnised by applying vermilion on the forehead of the bride followed by a feast, was held to be insufficient in Prahlad Barman v Emperor. [18] Proof only of the factum of the marriage is not sufficient. It must also be proved that the marriage had been celebrated strictly in accordance with the requirement of customs and law applicable to the parties.[19]Chadar andazi form of marriage is not a legal marriage, unless custom is proved justifying such a marriage.[20] There may arise a presumption that by cohabitation for a period of 18 years, a marriage has taken place, but persons cannot be convicted on a presumption of this kind.[21] No amount of evidence as to habit and repute can establish a marriage in a case where no valid marriage is possible.[22]4018

19. Proof--Valid Marriage

Marriage is a mixed question of law and fact, and when a marriage has to be proved, the witnesses must depose to the facts and leave the court to decide whether they constitute a valid marriage.[23] Where no proof was adduced as to the marriage of the woman with the complainant except that she was referred to as his wife, it was held that the prosecution must fail for want of strict proof of marriage.[24] The legality of the marriage would, however, be satisfactorily proved by the unrebutted evidence of the woman, the husband and their parents, describing the marriage in detail.[25] Where there was the evidence of the complainant, the woman, and her mother, who were aware of the fact of the marriage, and the accused neither cross-examined the witnesses as to the fact or validity of the marriage, nor otherwise impugned it, it was held that the marriage was sufficiently proved.[26] Where the evidence consisted of the statements of the husband and the wife regarding the marriage and the evidence was not subjected to cross-examination by the accused, it was held that the evidence was sufficient to establish the relationship of husband and wife.[27]

20. Proof--Enticement and Illicit Intercourse

The enticement, etc, for illicit intercourse must be proved. Intention or knowledge is, however, not a tangible thing; it has to be gathered from the facts and surrounding circumstances.[28] Where the woman deposed that she was removed in a car to Bangalore and was kept there in a house where they lived as man and wife for a number of days, it was held that this clear evidence showed that the accused did so with intent to have illicit intercourse with the woman.[29] The fact that the accused and the woman stayed together at night at the house of a relation of the accused, was held to be sufficient to show that there was criminal intent.[30] The intention may be held to be proved from the spirit of love letters written by the accused to the complainant's wife.[31] However, the mere fact, that the woman in question was seen outside the house of the accused, is not sufficient to hold the accused guilty under this section.[32]

21. Conviction

When it is neither proved nor shown that the enticement was for the purpose of having illicit intercourse, no conviction under s 498, IPC, is sustainable.[33] A person, who is prosecuted under ss 366 and 376, IPC, cannot be held guilty of having committed an offence under s 498, IPC, if the offence with which he was charged, is not established.[34] Where the accused are charged under s 366A, IPC, they cannot be convicted under s 498, IPC, if no complaint is made.[35]4019

22. Sentence (General)

The determination of the right measure of punishment depends on various factors, which cannot be dealt with exhaustively. Nor is it possible to lay down any mathematical formula to measure the penalty in each case, except laying down some guidelines by way of illustration. The determination of the right measure of punishment in a particular case, though guided by variety of considerations, not excluding the predilection of the presiding judge, is a matter of discretion. However, it is a judicially balanced discretion and, therefore, the courts should always bear in mind the necessity of proportion between an offence and the penalty. Punishment fall broadly into two classes:

(i) those in which the courts have favored the passing of lenient sentence and the observance of moderation; and
(ii) those in which the courts have encouraged the passing of heavy or deterrent sentence.

Under the first category will come sentences which are technically 'corrective' or 'normal', while under the latter category--'exemplary' or 'deterrent' and 'punitive'. In deciding the measurement of punishment, the court ought to take into consideration the nature of the offence, the circumstances in which it was committed, the degree of deliberation shown by the offender and his age, character, means, culture and the antecedents.[36] The question of sentence is normally in the discretion of the trial court. It is for the trial court to take into account, all relevant circumstances and decide what sentence would meet the ends of justice in a given case. Though the High Court has, in its revisional jurisdiction, power to enhance such sentence, this power can be properly exercised only if the High Court is satisfied that the sentence imposed by the trial court is unduly lenient or that in passing the order of sentence, the trial court had manifestly failed to consider the relevant facts. It would not be right for the High Court to interfere with the order of sentence, passed by the trial court, merely on the ground that if it had tried the case, it would have imposed a slightly higher or heavier sentence.[37]

23. Sentence (Lenient)

Ordinarily, corrective punishments are given when the offender is of immature understanding and might have committed the offence on the spur of the moment due to temporary lapse. Awarding severe sentence in such a case would not be in the interest of the society, for it would convert mere delinquents into hardened criminals, thus defeating the purpose of law. Nominal punishment is awarded when the offence is purely technical without the necessary mens rea of a criminal.[38] A light sentence was held to be sufficient to meet the ends of justice when the abducted woman was an active abettor,[39] or where the woman was not on good terms with her husband and went to the accused of her own accord,[40] or where the woman of undoubtedly bad character, married to an immature boy, was abducted and detained not against her4020 wishes,[41] or where the woman was of loose moral character and was dissatisfied with the complainant and was willing to marry the accused.[42]

24. Sentence (Deterrent)

A deterrent sentence is proper, when the offence is the result of deliberation and pre-planning, is committed for the sake of personal gain at the expense of the innocent, is a menace to the safety, health or is difficult to be detected or traced.[43] The prevalence of a particular crime in a particular area or during a particular period should also be taken into account. For example, theft of cycle, though ordinarily is not such a grave offence, yet may call for exemplary punishment if it becomes widespread at any time in any place. A deterrent sentence is wholly justifiable when the offence is the result of deliberation and pre-planning, is committed for the sake of personal gain at the expense of the innocent, is a menace to the safety, health, or moral well being of the community, or is difficult to be detected or traced.[44] When the accused had enticed away a married woman, the punishment of fine of Rs 200 was found grossly inadequate and was enhanced to 6 months rigorous imprisonment.[45] Where the accused, who had promised to return the complainant's wife, did not do so but concealed her, it was held that a sentence of six months rigorous imprisonment was not excessive.[46]40214022

Chapter XX-A[1]

Of Cruelty by Husband or Relatives of Husband

TOPICAL INTRODUCTION

Section 498A has been engrafted in the IPC in a situation where the national conscience was disturbed by the intensity and volume of instances of wife beating, bride burning and cruelty of different degrees and variations directed against women that necessitated a law to punish such acts. Whereas religion and custom prescribed marriage to be a bond founded on love and the concept of sharing, local experience indicated, in some strata of society particularly, that it had been transformed into a license to ill-treat. Law as an instrument of fostering social order is also required to be used as a channel for doing good and conversely for curbing evil.[2]It was by the Criminal Law (Second Amendment) Act 1983 (46 of 1983), which received the President's assent on 25 December 1983, that s 498A was inserted in the IPC . The statement of objects and reasons of the said amending Act referred to the increasing number of dowry deaths, which was a matter of serious concern. The extent of the evil was commented upon by the joint committee of both the Houses to examine the working of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961. It was found that cases of cruelty by the husband and relatives of the husband which culminate in suicide by, or murder of, the hapless woman concerned, constitute only a small fraction of cases involving such cruelty. An offence in the nature of abetment to commit suicide may also attract the provisions of s 306, IPC, which was already in the statue book. It was, therefore, proposed to suitably amend the IPC, Crpc, and the Indian Evidence Act 1872 to effectively deal with not only the cases of dowry deaths, but also the cases of cruelty to a married woman by the relatives of her husband. It was with a view to achieving this object that, inter alia, s 498A was inserted in the IPC . The other amendments effected by Criminal Law (Second Amendment) Act 1983 were to ss 174 and 176 of the CrPC and the insertion of s 198A of the CrPC and s 498A of the IPC thereof. As far as the Indian Evidence Act 1872 is concerned, after s 113, s 113A was inserted raising a presumption against the husband that he or his relative had abetted the suicide by the married woman.[3] The legislature has tried to amend the law in order to curb the vice of husband or the married woman by their husband or the relatives of her husband which may culminate in suicide by or murder of the hapless woman concerned. It can be safely said that this amendment of the criminal law and the rule of procedure was necessitated to meet the social challenge to save the married4023 woman from being ill-treated or forced to commit suicide by the husband or relatives of the husband generally in order to coerce her to fetch more dowry or on her refusal to do so kill herself keeping in view that the ill-treatment of married woman is usually confined within the four walls of her matrimonial home which in most of the cases are located far away from the home of her parents and there is no likelihood of availability of any evidence. The legislature in its wisdom has rightly enacted s 113A of the Evidence Act, raising a presumption against the husband or the relatives of the husband for the abetment of suicide by a married woman within a period of seven years of her marriage if she has been treated with cruelty by her husband or such a relation in order to coerce her to fetch more dowry or on her refusal to do so. Thus, it cannot be said by any stretch of imagination that s 498A of the IPC or s 113A of the Evidence Act has introduced invidious classification qua the treatment of a married woman by her husband or relatives of her husband vis-à-vis the other offenders.[4] This chapter consists of only one section, viz, s 498A, IPC but the importance of this chapter and section can be judged by the fact that these are in rampant use in matrimonial cases. The basic purpose underlying this chapter is to prevent woman from cruelty at the hands of their husband and his relatives. However, it is seen that the provisions of this chapter are sometimes misused by the victim-wife to unnecessarily implicate the relatives of the husband, the tendency of which should be discouraged. This view finds support from the under mentioned authorities.[5]

Chapter XX-A

Of Cruelty by Husband or Relatives of Husband

[6][S. 498A.

Husband or relative of husband of a woman subjecting her to cruelty.--

Whoever, being the husband or the relative of the husband of a woman, subjects such woman to cruelty shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.--For the purposes of this section, "cruelty" means--

(a) any wilful conduct which is of such a nature as is likely to drive the woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (whether mental or physical) of the woman; or

(b) harassment of the woman where such harassment is with a view to coercing her or any person related to her to meet any unlawful demand for any property or valuable security or is on account of failure by her or any person related to her to meet such demand.]40244025

Comments

1. Scope

Section 498A was grafted in the IPC specifically to deal firmly and effectively with all cases of cruelty towards and harassment of women.[7] The section, however, is especially worded in order to encompass even the class of cruelty committed through the litigate process.[8] The definition of 'cruelty' figuring in the explanation appended under s 498A, IPC is not vague as the perusal of cl (a) would show that the prosecution has to establish, first the wilful conduct of the offender, secondly, that the nature of such conduct was likely to drive a woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life or limb (whether mental or physical). Thus, on proof of these facts to the satisfaction of the court under the circumstances of a particular case the husband or relatives of the husband shall be presumed to have treated the woman with cruelty. The wilful conduct certainly implies the establishing of a motive to treat such a woman with cruelty. The gravity of such conduct is also reflected in the wording of cl (a) of the explanation that such conduct should be likely to drive a woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (whether mental or physical) of a woman. Consequently, the definition under cl (a) cannot be said to be vague as it rules out minor differences between the wife and husband or the latter's relatives. In cl (b), the definition of cruelty pertains to harassment of a married woman with a view to coercing her or any person related to her to meet the unlawful demand of dowry or for any property or valuable security or on account of her failure of any person related to her to meet such a demand. Thus, on the given facts of a particular case the court has first to form an opinion that as a matter of fact such harassment has close nexus with coercing a married woman to meet the unlawful demand of her husband or relatives of the husband qua any property or valuable security. Thereafter the presumption of treating her with cruelty will arise. Obviously, the legislature has defined the term 'cruelty' while keeping in view the object which was required to be achieved. Thus, the ordinary dictionary meaning of 'cruelty' would not be applicable to hold that it is vague being interpreted in so many ways.[9]

This section has no retrospective application[10] and does not violate art 14 of the Constitution of India .[11] The mens rea is an essential ingredient of offence under s 498A, IPC .[12] The refusal to return streedhan despite repeated requests attracts the continuing offence, so fresh limitation will start running from the day the wife makes a demand from the accused for the return of streedhan.[13] It is not every harassment or4026 every type of cruelty that would attract s 498A, IPC . It must be established that the beating and harassment was with a view to force the wife to commit suicide or to fulfil illegal demands of her husband and his relatives.[14]

Cognizance of offences under ch XXI, IPC can be taken only on complaint of an aggrieved person.[15]

There is gross abuse of the provisions of s 498A ; often resorted to harass the husband and his relatives. As observed by the Supreme Court in a case[16] a serious relook of the entire provision is warranted by the legislature. It is also a matter of common knowledge that exaggerated versions of the incident are reflected in a large number of complaints. The tendency of over implication is also reflected in a very large number of cases. The criminal trials lead to immense sufferings for all concerned. Even ultimate acquittal in the trial may also not be able to wipe out the deep scars of suffering of ignominy. Unfortunately a large number of these complaints have not only flooded the court but also have led to enormous social unrest affecting peace, harmony and happiness of the society. It is high time that the legislature must take into consideration the pragmatic realities and make suitable changes in the existing law.

2. Amendment

Section 498A is the only section in ch XXA and both were inserted in the IPC by the Criminal Law (Second Amendment Act) 1983 (46 of 1983). The assent of the President was received on 25 December 1983 and publication in the Gazette of India, (Extra) was made on 26 December 1983.

3. Statement of Objects and Reasons

The statement of objects and reasons of the Criminal Law (Second Amendment) Act 1983 (46 of 1983) opens with the following observations:

Statement of Objects and Reasons

> The increasing number of dowry deaths is a matter of serious concern. The extent of the evil has been commented upon by the joint committee of the House to examine the working of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961. Cases of cruelty by the husband and relatives of the husband which culminate in suicide by or murder of the hapless woman concerned, constitute only a small fraction of the cases involving such cruelty. It is therefore, proposed to amend the Indian Penal Code, the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Indian Evidence Act suitably to deal effectively not only with cases of dowry deaths but also cases of cruelty to married women by their in-laws.

After setting out the above, para 2 mentions the proposed changes. The Indian Penal Code was proposed to be amended by making cruelty to a woman by her husband, or any relative of her husband, punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years and also with fine. Wilful conduct of such a nature by husband or any relative of the husband as is likely to drive the woman to commit suicide or cause grave physical or mental injury to her and harassing a woman by her husband or any relative of her husband with a view to coercing her or any of her relatives to meet any unlawful demand of property was to be made punishable as cruelty. That is4027 why s 498A came to be inserted in the IPC . A perusal of the said provisions makes it clear that what is made penal is the conduct of the husband or the relative of the husband who subjects such a woman to cruelty. The word 'cruelty' has been defined in the explanation to s 498A, IPC . Clause (a) thereof deals with any wilful conduct which is of such a nature as is likely to drive the woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (whether mental or physical) of the woman. Clause (b) deals with harassment of the woman where such harassment is with a view to coercing her or any person related to her to meet any unlawful demand for any property or valuable security or is on account of failure by her or any person related to her to meet such demand. It is common knowledge that despite prohibition of the pernicious social evil of demand or payment of dowry under the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961, number of dowry deaths was escalating. It had become a subject of grave concern to the enlightened section of the society. It therefore, received anxious consideration of the joint committee of both the houses of Parliament. As a result of constant harassment, humiliation etc. at the hands of the husband or his relatives, the married woman used to become helpless and being unable to bear with it, was driven to commit suicide. The existing law was found to be inadequate even though s 306, IPC, stood on the statute book and Dowry Prohibition Act 1961 was enacted. It was in this background that s 498A was inserted in the Penal Code.[17]

4. Constitutional Validity

The provision of s 498A of the IPC is not unconstitutional and ultra vires.[18] The classification of the husband and his relatives, of a married woman, as a separate class under s 498A, IPC, is not at all discriminatory and there is no violation of the guarantee enshrined under art 14 of the Constitution . There is a valid justification for classifying the husband and his relatives as a separate class for the purposes of s 498A, IPC . Normally, in the offences committed within the four walls of the matrimonial home, where others have no easy access, there is no discrimination or anything obnoxious to the doctrine of equality, so as to violate the guarantee enshrined in art 14 of the Constitution .[19]

5. Object

The object of the provisions is prevention of the dowry menace.[20]

6. Section 498A has Prospective Application

According to art 20 (1) of the Constitution of India :

> (1) No person shall be convicted of any offence except for violation of a law in force at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence, nor be subjected to a4028 penalty greater than that which might have been inflicted under the law in force at the time of the commission of the offence.

The penal provision, therefore, can have no retrospective effect.[21] A bare perusal of s 498A, IPC, leaves no doubt that the legislature intended the operation of this provision to be prospective in nature and not retrospective because in the latter case, it would have specifically stated so. Thus, these penal provisions of s 498A are certainly prospective in nature and would not be attracted where the alleged act of cruelty towards the wife by the husband or the latter's relatives took place prior to the insertion of s 498A in the IPC . These acts may otherwise be punishable under the then existing provisions of the IPC,[22] if according to the chargesheet, the offence of s 498A, IPC, was committed between 11 March 1976 and 11 December 1983. Chapter XXA containing s 498A has been introduced in the IPC by the Amending Act 46 of 1983, which came into force on receipt of the assent of the President on 20 December 1983. It is, therefore, clear that s 498A, IPC, at the time when the offence is said to have been committed.[23]

7. Section 498A and Section 304B --Distinction

Section 304B and s 498A, IPC are not mutually exclusive. These provisions deal with two distinct offences. It is true that 'cruelty' is a common essential to both sections and has to be proved. The explanation to s 498A, IPC gives the meaning of 'cruelty'. In s 304B, IPC there is no such explanation about the meaning of 'cruelty' but having regard to the common background to these offences the meaning of 'cruelty' or 'harassment' will be the same as given in the explanation to s 498A under which 'cruelty' by itself amounts to an offence and is punishable under s 304B . It is 'dowry death' that is punishable and such death should have occurred within seven years of the marriage. No such period is mentioned in s 498A and the husband or his relatives would be liable for subjecting the woman to 'cruelty' anytime after the marriage.[24]Section 498A to some extent overlaps with s 304B but it cannot be said that sufficient provision has already been incorporated in the IPC in the shape of s 498A so as to deprive the court from recording the conviction under s 304B read with s 116, IPC .[25] The ingredients of s 304B are totally different than that of s 498A, IPC . The scope of s 498A is wider as compared to s 304B, IPC .[26]

8. Section 498A and Demand of Dowry

Section 498A has nothing to do with demand of dowry.[27]4029

9. Section 498A and Section 306 --Distinction

The basic difference that lies between the two sections is that of 'intention' under s 498A, IPC, where cruelty committed by the husband or his relations compels the woman to commit suicide, while under s 306, IPC, suicide is abetted and intended.[28]

10. Mens Rea

The intent to injure is the most important element of cruelty contemplated under s 498A, IPC .[29] The sole constituent of the offence under s 498A is 'cruelty' which means 'wilful conduct'. The word wilful contemplates obstinate and deliberate behavior on the part of the offender for it to amount to cruelty.

Thus mens rea is an essential ingredient of the offence.[30] Though intention to cause injury is not an essential ingredient, regard may be had as to the actual intention or knowledge on the part of the offending spouse as to actuator probable effect whether it would cause injury to physical or mental health. Again acts or conduct should be judged from the angle of a person possessing ordinary intellectual capabilities.[31] Lord Denning, a celebrated and legendary judge of this century, says:[32]

> When the conduct consists of direct action by one against the other, it can then properly be said to be aimed at the other, even though there is no desire to injure the other or to inflict misery on him. Thus, it may consist of a display of temperament emotion or perversion whereby the one gives vent to his or her own feelings, not intending to injure the other, but making the other the object at whose expense the emotion is relieved.

> When there is no intent to injure they are not to be regarded as cruelty unless they are plainly and distinctly proved to cause injury to health... when the conduct does not consist of direct action against the other but only of misconduct indirectly affecting him order, such as drunkenness, gambling or crime, then it can only properly be said to be aimed at the other when it is done not only for the gratification of the selfish desires of the one who does it, but also in some part with an intention to injure the other or to inflict misery on him or her. Such an intention may readily be inferred from the fact that it is the natural consequence of his conduct, specially when the one spouse knows, or it has already been brought to his notice, when the consequence will be, and nevertheless he does it, careless and indifferent whether it distresses the other spouse or not. The court is, however not bound to draw the inference. The presumption that a person intends the natural consequences of his acts is one that may not be drawn.

> If in all the circumstances it is not the correct inference, then it should not be drawn. In cases of this kind, if there is no desire to injure or inflict misery on the other, the conduct only becomes cruelty when the justifiable remonstrances of the innocent party provoke resentment on the part of the other, which evidence itself in actions or words actually or physically directed at the innocent party.4030

11. Abetment

The allegation against the accused that because he was having doubt in his mind that his wife eloped with someone for a particular period and so he was rarely talking to his wife are not sufficient to hold that the act of the accused be considered as an abetment or the accused was guilty under s 498A or s 306, IPC .[33] Where the main offence is not proved, there would be no question of abetment as envisaged by s 114, Evidence Act.[34]

12. Limitation

When s 498A, IPC, is brought to use, in the case of cruelty on a woman, the law of limitation is not that rigid so as to not suit the aggrieved wife. A fair dose of liberalism is warranted, so that the law as an instrument comes in aid of the aggrieved due to gender inequalities.[35] Therefore, when the predominant reason which weighed with the trial court to dismiss the complaint under ss 420 and 498A, IPC, was that it was belated by two years and the four prosecution witnesses were interested in nature, and the order of trial court was confirmed by the High Court, the Supreme Court set aside the order of the High Court and remanded the matter back to it to dispose of the matter in appeal to merit after issuing notice to the accused.[36] The essence of the offence under s 498A, IPC, is cruelty as defined in the explanation appended to this section. It is a continuing offence and on each occasion on which the wife was subjected to cruelty, she would have a new starting point of limitation.[37] The refusal to return the streedhan despite repeated requests attracts the continuing offence. In the case of a continuing offence, a fresh limitation will start running from the day the wife makes a demand from the accused for the return of streedhan and their refusal to do so.[38]

Limitation period for taking cognizance for offence under s 498A, IPC is three years.[39]

13. Jurisdiction

If ill-treatment is given to the wife by the husband and his relatives at a different place, but the complaint is filed by the wife in court of the magistrate having jurisdiction where wife is living with her mother, the court of the magistrate has no jurisdiction to take cognizance of the alleged offence.[40] Simply because the husband and others did not call the wife to the matrimonial home, it cannot amount to harassment. These facts cannot clothe the magistrate's court within whose local jurisdiction the wife's parents' house is situated, with jurisdiction to entertain a complaint by her under s 498A, IPC .[41] However, if the offence under s 498A, IPC, was not committed at the place of abode of the wife where she was residing with her4031 parents and the husband belonged to and lived in another district of another state, the complaint filed by the wife in the court having jurisdiction at the place where she was residing, was competent as the consequences of the offence ensued upon the complainant at her present place of abode.[42] If one of the incidents pertaining to s 498A, IPC, took place in the territorial jurisdiction of the court, the said court is justified in entertaining the case.[43]

14. Acquittal in Police Case Bars Retrial in Complaint Case

Where there is a complaint case against the relatives of the husband on the same allegations against which the husband was earlier acquitted in the police case, and the accused were residing at a different place and no overt act was attributed to them in the complaint, it was held that when for the same incident another case had been instituted against the husband which ended in his acquittal, the same cannot be retried on the basis of complaint.[44]

15. When Complaint is not Maintainable Against the Husband, It is not Maintainable against other Accused

When in the complaint, the allegations were primarily directed to the husband, if that is not triable then the complaint as a whole becomes non-maintainable.[45] But the fact that the other accused persons, i.e., the mother-in-law and the father-in-law of the deceased are acquitted can be no ground to extend the benefit of the doubt to the accused husband.[46]

16. FIR

It is not unusual that a person acquitted under s 302 may be found guilty under s 498A read with s 306, IPC . Therefore, when a woman died within seven years of marriage and, though there were definite allegations by her father against his son-in-law and the latter's sister about the harassment of the deceased on the question of dowry, the registration of the case only under s 302, IPC, is not proper. The case ought to have been registered under s 498A read with s 306, IPC, besides s 302, IPC .[47] Each and every aspect of cruelty inflicted on the victim need not be mentioned in the FIR.[48]

17. Investigation

In view of sensitivity of such offences and viewing this problem from human and social point of view, and the law as it stands today, it is required that the investigation into these offences be vested in civil authorities like the executive magistrate and after his finding as to the commission of the offence, cognizance4032 should be taken. Till such a mechanism is evolved, no police officer below the rank of assistant commissioner of police for the offences under ss 498A / 406, IPC, and the deputy commissioner of police for the offence under s 304B, IPC, i.e., dowry death, should be vested with investigation and where minor school going children are named, they shall not be arrested and be sent to the court for taking cognizance and further proceedings. Their arrest ruins their future life and lowers them in their self esteem. The courts have dealt with the bail applications and prosecution of children merely for the fact that their names also figured in the complaint lodged by the wife. In certain cases, even grandparents of the husband who are in their eighties and nineties suffer this traumatic situation.[49]

18. Bail

Commentary under the same heading in s 304B, vol 3, may be referred to.

19. Offences under Section 498A / Section 406 should be made Bailable and Compoundable

To check misuse, s 498A, IPC could be made compoundable by the aggrieved under s 320(2), CrPC with permission of court. The court could then always refuse to grant permission to compound the offence where it is of the opinion that the application for compounding appears to be coerced or it is not bonafide, or where after a similar compromise on an earlier occasion, the present incident has occurred, and again the matter is being sought to be closed by a compromise. Need for permission by court before permitting compounding could obviate any malafide recourse to this provision.[50]

The desirability of making offences under s 498A, IPC compoundable under s 320, CrPC has also been emphasised in a Division Bench decision of the Allahabad High Court in the case of Madhurima Bhargava v State of Uttar Pradesh .[51] The following observations have been made in that decision:

> Although this is beyond our scope in this reference to suggest to make the offences in relation to marriage or married life compoundable, yet it would not be out of place to mention that in every provision of law relating to marriage, it has been provided that the Court shall first try to reconcile the dispute between the parties, i.e., husband and wife, to the marriage and if reconciliation is not possible then to proceed with the case. Reconciliation is nothing else but a compromise of compounding between the parties. The Family Court Act, in which all the family disputes are covered is specific example of this fact. This is with a view to maintain a matrimonial home than to break it and in view of these facts we can only suggest than an offence pertaining to marriages should be made compoundable.

In the light of all these observations and the facts and circumstances alluded to in this judgment, it would be proper to suggest to the Law Commission to consider the appropriateness of making offences under s 498A, IPC compoundable under s 320, CrPC, albeit with the permission of the court.[52]4033

The marital offences under ss 498 / 406, IPC be made bailable, if no grave physical injury is inflicted and necessarily compoundable. If the parties decide to either settle their disputes amicably to salvage the marriage or decide to put an end to their marriage by mutual divorce, they should be allowed to compound the offences so that criminal proceedings do not chase them if they want to start their marital life afresh or otherwise. The past should not haunt them nor should the hatchet they have buried be allowed to be dug up and mar their present life or future married life.[53]

20. Withdrawal from Prosecution

Where the public prosecutor has pleaded that there were bleak chances for the prosecution to succeed but has not stated in the application that it was in the public interest to withdraw from the prosecution, it shows that the public prosecutor was guided by the order of the Government of Andhra Pradesh and he had not considered the matter independently. The order by a magistrate showing non-application of mind on his part in allowing withdrawal from prosecution is illegal. More so, when the state government itself had revoked the withdrawal order subsequently.[54]

21. Concept of Dowry

The concept of dowry is intermittently linked with a marriage, and the provisions of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961 apply in relation to marriages. If the legality of the marriage itself is an issue further legalistic problems do arise. If the validity of the marriage itself is under legal scrutiny, the demand of dowry in respect of an invalid marriage would be legally not recognizable. Even then the purpose for which ss 498A and 304B, IPC and s 113B of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 were introduced cannot be lost sight of. Legislations enacted with policy to curb and alleviate some public evil rampant in society and effectuate a definite public purpose or benefit positively requires to be interpreted with certain element of realism too and not merely pedantically or hyper technically. The obvious objective was to prevent harassment to a woman who enters into a marital relationship with a person and later on, becomes a victim of the greed for money. Can a person who enters into a marital arrangement be allowed to take a shelter behind a smokescreen to contend that since there was no valid marriage the question of dowry does not arise? Such legalistic niceties would destroy the purpose of the provisions. Such hairsplitting legalistic approach would encourage harassment to a woman over demand of money. The nomenclature 'dowry' does not have any magic charm written over it. It is a label given to demand of money in relation to marital relationship.[55] Mere monetary demand is not in the nature of dowry and it attracts s 498A, IPC .[56]

22. Presumption of Marriage--Duty of the Court

It is the duty of the court to give effect to the legislative amendment which was directed towards punishing husbands who indulge in atrocities against their spouses and in the absence of evidence to the contrary all these provisions will have to be applied on the footing that the marriage is presumed to be a valid one and the parties4034 are presumed to be husband and wife unless the contrary is established. Unless this view is enforced it will lead to an atrocious situation with double injustice being done to the victim woman who led through ceremonies of marriage and imparted the status of wife in situation where she is not aware of te possible impediments and if those impediments are upheld to the benefit of the wrong doer husband, it would lead to the unthinkable and untenable conclusion of allowing a party to take advantage of his own wrong. That is not the scheme of the law and consequently, the provisions both of the IPC and the Dowry Prohibition Act would apply in all cases where there is evidence of a marriage between the parties unless and until it is established that the marriage in question was a void marriage. Even as far as the latter position is concerned drawing a parallel with the provisions relating to legitimacy of children in the case of void or voidable marriages, it would, in the interest of justice, perhaps be permissible to construe that even in cases where a marriage was declared void at a point of time after the commission of the offence that the court would still treat the parties as having deemed to be husband and wife as on the date of commission of the offence.[57]

23. Valid Marriage

In the absence of a valid marriage, s 498A does not come into operation.[58]

24. Proof of Marriage--Relative Position in Sections 498A , 494, IPC and Section 125 , CrPC

A plain reading of s 498A, IPC would go to show that the ingredients of the offence do not require the prosecution to strictly prove validity of a marriage in question inasmuch as in such a proceeding the main focus is on the elements of 'cruelty' within the meaning of that section which is alleged to have been perpetrated upon the women. This provision has nothing in common with the scope and objective of s 494, IPC, where main focus is on a second marriage during lifetime of a spouse. Thus, ingredients of such an offence under s 494 being purely related to incident of a second marriage required a stricter proof which is not the case in a proceeding under s 498A . If it is found that the parties were living together and a child was born out of their relation as in the present case, nothing more is required about their marital status in a proceeding under s 498A for the court to decide the question of cruelty on her and whether an offence under s 498A has been committed. The standard of proof as is required in a proceeding under s 494 is not at all necessary in a proceeding under s 498A, the objects and ingredients of the two provisions being entirely different. Thus, only prima facie proof of marriage as is required in a proceeding under s 125 of IPC would serve the purpose in a proceeding under s 498A .[59]

25. 'Relative of the husband'

The word 'relative' in s 498A would include father, mother, husband or wife, son, daughter, brother, sister, nephew or niece, grandson or granddaughter of an individual or the spouse of any person. It principally includes a person related by4035 blood, marriage or adoption. It would not include girl friend or concubine of the husband. As such a girl friend or concubine of the husband cannot be prosecuted for offence under s 498A, IPC .[60]

The expression relative of the husband further came up for consideration in the case of Vijeta Gajra v State of NCT of Delhi [61] and while approving the decision of the Supreme Court in U Suvetha, it was held that the word relative would be limited only to the blood relations or the relations by marriage.

The word 'relative of the husband' in s 304B, IPC would mean such persons, who are related by blood, marriage or adoption.[62]

The respondent, the brother of the aunt of the deceased, was held not to be a relative of the deceased's husband.[63]

Section 498 is a penal provision; hence its provision shall be construed strictly. A girl friend or a concubine is not a relative of the husband within the meaning of s 498A, IPC .[64]

26. Husband

The legislative intent is clear from the fact that it is not only the husband but also his relations who are covered by s 498A, IPC . Legislature has taken care of children born from invalid marriages. Section 16 of the Hindu Marriage Act 1955 deals with legitimacy of children of void and voidable marriages. Can it be said that legislature which was conscious of the social stigma attached to children of void and voidable marriages closed its eyes to the plight of a woman who unknowingly or unconscious of the legal consequences entered into the marital relationship. If such restricted meaning is given, it would not further the legislative intent. On the contrary, it would be against the concern shown by the legislature for avoiding harassment to a woman over demand of money in relation to marriages. The first exception to s 494, IPC has also some relevance. According to it, the offence of bigamy will not apply to 'any person whose marriage with such husband or wife has been declared void by a Court of competent jurisdiction'. It would be appropriate to construe the expression 'husband' to cover a person who enters into marital relationship and under the colour of such proclaimed or feigned status of husband subjects the woman concerned to cruelty or coerce her in any manner or for any of the purposes enumerated in the relevant provisions, ss 304B / 498A, IPC, whatever be the legitimacy of the marriage itself for the limited purpose of ss 498A and 304B, IPC . Such an interpretation, known and recognised as purposive construction has to come into play in a case of this nature. The absence of a definition of 'husband' to specifically include such persons who contract marriages ostensibly and cohabitate with such woman, in the purported exercise of his role and status as 'husband' is no ground to exclude them4036 from the purview of s 304B or 498A, IPC, viewed in the context of the very object and aim of the legislations introducing those provisions.[65]

Husband in ss 304B and 498A need not be a legally married person.[66]

27. Wife

For the purpose of s 498A, IPC, which is peculiar to Indian families, the victim spouse is always the 'wife' and the guilty is the husband and his relatives both near and distant, living together or separately.[67] If on the date of the alleged cruelty, the informant/victim ceased to be the wife of the accused on the basis of pronouncement of talaq by a written divorced deed and factum of talaq is admitted by the wife and allegation of cruelty being false and concocted, the FIR as well as the chargesheet against the accused is liable to be quashed.[68] Under r 64(ii) of the principles of Mohammadan Law,[69] it was stated that a shia male is permanently prohibited to the woman whom he has divorced by triple talaq.[70] Therefore, when both the parties are shias and undisputedly the accused-husband had divorced the complainant (wife), even if the complainant and accused were living together, they cannot be called as husband and wife, so the provisions of s 498A, IPC, and ss 4 and 6 of the Dowry Prohibition Act are not applicable to these facts.[71]

28. Second Wife

The prohibitory words 'woman... .of her marriage' and '...by her husband' used in s 304B, IPC and 'husband of a woman' used in s 498A, IPC, undoubtedly cover only a legally wedded woman and her husband having a valid marriage, and they also fit in the object and the policy of the two amending statutes (by which these two sections were inserted), and as such their import cannot be extended so as to include a woman married in fact, but whose marriage is void in law.[72] However, the expression 'wife' in s 498A, IPC must receive the same interpretation as in s 125, CrPC . If there is no evidence that the first marriage was legally performed in accordance with Hindu rites, it cannot be said that the victim (alleged second wife) was not the wife of the accused.[73] Second wife can be treated as the relative of the accused husband within the meaning of s 498A .[74] Even if the deceased wife is second wife not legally wedded of the accused, the provisions ss 304B and 498A, IPC are attracted.[75] The fact that the deceased was the second wife and not the legally4037 wedded wife of the accused is no ground to hold that the conviction under ss 304B and 498A is not attracted.[76]

29. Mistress

There is no reason why s 498A, IPC, cannot be applied to a case where a person inflicts such cruelty and harassment as to lead his mistress to commit suicide.[77] However, if the prosecution evidence at the best indicates that the deceased woman was living in the house of the accused as his woman but there was no evidence to indicate that she had married the accused or that her earlier marriage was not subsisting on that date to infer a relationship between the deceased and the accused husband and wife, the requirement of s 498A, IPC, is not fulfilled.[78] A person cannot be charged for offence under s 498A, IPC at the instance of a lady who is a kept or a concubine but not a wife.[79]

30. Foster sister

A foster sister is not relative of the husband by blood, marriage or adoption; she therefore cannot be prosecuted for offence under s 498A, IPC .[80]

31. Cruelty--Meaning

The New Webster's Dictionary has given the meaning to the word 'cruel' as follows, 'Disposed to give pain to others in body or mind; destitute of pity, compassion, or kindness; applied to persons; exhibiting or proceeding from cruelty, causing pain, grief or distress; inhuman, tormenting, vexing.'[81]

However, the ordinary dictionary meaning of 'cruelty' would not be applicable to hold that 'cruelty' figuring in the explanation appended to s 498A is vague.[82] It is not every harassment, every type of cruelty that would attract s 498A, IPC . It must be established that the beating and harassment was with a view to force the wife to commit suicide or to fulfil illegal demands of the husband and his relatives.[83] It is difficult to straightjacket the term 'cruelty' by means of a definition, because cruelty is a relative term. What constitutes cruelty for one person may not constitute cruelty for another person.[84] The expression 'cruelty' postulates such treatment as to cause reasonable apprehension in the mind of the wife that her living with the husband4038 will be harmful and injurious to her life. Therefore, to decide the question of cruelty the relevant factors are the matrimonial relationship between the husband and the wife, their cultural and status in life, their state of health, their interaction in daily life which dominate the aspect of cruelty.[85] Parameters of what constitutes cruelty in matrimonial affairs have been well carved out in American Jurisprudence.[86] These are:

The question whether the misconduct complained of constitutes cruelty and the like for divorce purposes is determined primarily by its effect upon the particular person complaining of the acts. The question is not whether the conduct would be cruel to a reasonable person or a person of average or normal sensibilities, but whether it would have that effect upon the aggrieved spouse. That which may be cruel to one person may be laughed off by another, and what may not be cruel to an individual under one set of circumstances may be extreme cruelty under another set of circumstances. Thus, to ascertain marital cruelty though ordinarily whole series of acts or conduct should be weighed to infer cruelty yet an isolated act can lead to inference of cruelty if its gravity or seriousness or of such a magnitude that it is likely to cause grave injury to physical or mental health of victim spouse. Composite picture should be drawn as to the acts, incident or conduct for ascertaining whether these amount to cruelty, physical or mental. Unless such kinds of physical or mental ill-treatments when taken together lead to the inference of persistent cruelty, charge of cruelty cannot stick.[87]

Cruelty can be mental or it can be physical. Mental cruelty is also of different shades. It can be verbal or emotional like insulting or ridiculing or humiliating a woman, depriving her of economic sources or essential amenities of life.[88]

32. Elements of Cruelty

A bare perusal shows that the word 'cruelty' encompasses any of the following elements:

(i) any 'wilful' conduct which is of such a nature as is likely to drive the woman to commit suicide; or
(ii) any 'wilful' conduct which is likely to cause grave injury to the woman; or
(iii) any 'wilful' act which is likely to cause danger to life, limb or health, whether physical or mental of the woman.[89]

33. Cruelty--Two Parts of

The expression 'cruelty' has been defined for the purpose of s 498A of the IPC . It is in two parts. The first part envisages the wilful conduct on the part of the husband or his relatives towards the woman, which may likely to drive the woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (whether mental or physical). The expression willful conduct, therefore, requires to be understood in conjunction with the other requirement viz. the consequence of such a conduct on the4039 wife. The second part contemplates the harassment of the woman, which harassment shall be with a view to coerce the woman or any person related to her to meet any unlawful demand for any property or valuable security or is on account of their failure to meet such demand. Therefore, harassment must be accompanied by unlawful demand for property or valuable security.[90]

34. Cruelty--Question of Fact

Whether one spouse has been guilty of cruelty to the other is essentially a question of fact. The impact of complaints, accusations or taunts on a person amounting to cruelty depends on various factors like the sensitivity of the individual victim concerned, the social background, the environment, education etc. Further, mental cruelty varies from person to person depending on the intensity of sensitivity and the degree of courage or endurance to withstand such mental cruelty. In other words, each case has to be decided on its own facts to decide whether the mental cruelty was established.[91]

35. Cruelty under Section 498A

A new dimension has been given to the concept of cruelty. The explanation to s 498A, IPC provides that any wilful conduct which is of such a nature as is likely to drive a woman to commit suicide would constitute cruelty. Such wilful conduct which is likely to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (whether mental or physical of the woman) would also amount to cruelty. Harassment of the woman where such harassment is with a view to coercing her or any person related to her to meet any unlawful demand for any property or valuable security would also constitute cruelty.[92] Cruelty would mean any willful conduct which was of such a nature as was likely to drive a woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health whether mental or physical to the woman.[93]

The cruelty as contemplated under s 498A, IPC, denotes the state of conduct, which is painful and distressing to the victim.[94] The basic purport of the statutory provision is to avoid 'cruelty' which stands defined by attributing a specific statutory meaning attached thereto as noticed herein before. Two specific instances have been taken note of in order to ascribe a meaning to the word 'cruelty', as is expressed by the legislatures: Whereas, expln (a) involves three specific situations viz.,

(i) to drive the woman to commit suicide; or
(ii) to cause grave injury; or
(iii) danger to life, limb or health, both mental and physical, and thus involving a physical torture or atrocity.4040

In expln (b) there is absence of physical injury but the legislature thought it fit to include only coercive harassment which obviously as the legislative intent expressed is equally heinous to match the physical injury: whereas one is patent, the other one is latent, but equally serious in terms of the provisions of the statute since the same would also embrace the attributes of cruelty in terms of s 498A .[95]

The ingredient of cruelty is common to s 304B and 498A, IPC, but the width and scope of the two sections is different, inasmuch as s 304B deals with cases of death as a result of cruelty or harassment within seven years of marriage, while s 498A has a wider spectrum and it covers all cases in which the wife is subjected to cruelty by her husband or relative of the husband which may result in death by way of suicide or cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (whether mental or physical) or even harassment caused with a view to coerce the woman or any person related to her to meet unlawful demand for property or valuable security. A person charged under s 304B can be convicted under s 498A, IPC also.[96]

36. Cruelty--Its Definition under Section 498A is not Vague

The definition of 'cruelty' figuring in the explanation appended under s 498A, IPC is not vague as the perusal of cl (a) would show that the prosecution has to establish firstly the wilful conduct of the offender, secondly that the nature of such conduct was likely to drive a woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life or limb (whether mental or physical). Thus, on proof of these facts to the satisfaction of the court under the circumstances of a particular case the husband or relatives of the husband shall be presumed to have treated the woman with cruelty. The wilful conduct certainly implies the establishing of a motive to treat such a woman with cruelty. The gravity of such conduct is also reflecting in the wording of cl (a) of the explanation that such conduct should be likely to drive a woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (whether mental or physical) of a woman. Consequently, the definition under cl (a) cannot be said to be vague as it rules out minor differences between the wife and husband or the latter's relatives. In cl (b), the definition of 'cruelty' pertains to harassment of a married woman with a view to coercing her or any person related to her to meet the unlawful demand of dowry or for any property or valuable security or on account of her failure or failure of any person related to her to meet such a demand. Thus, on the given facts of a particular case the court has first to form an opinion that as a matter of fact such harassment has close nexus for coercing a married woman to meet the unlawful demand of her husband or relatives of the husband qua any property or valuable security. Thereafter the presumption of treating her with cruelty will arise. Obviously, the legislature has defined the term 'cruelty' while keeping in view the object which was required to be achieved. Thus, the ordinary dictionary meaning of 'cruelty' would not be applicable to hold that it is vague being interpreted in so many ways.[97]4041

37. Cruelty-- Section 498A , IPC and Section 113A, Evidence Act

By virtue of explanation to s 113A of the Evidence Act, for the purpose of s 113A Evidence Act, 'cruelty' shall have the same meaning as in s 498A, IPC .[1]In a nut shell, the first requisite for attracting the presumption under s 113A of the Evidence Act, it must be proved that the wife was subjected to 'cruelty' as defined in s 498A, IPC .[2] Prosecution evidence did not prove that the deceased was subjected to cruelty by the accused. Simply because the accused husband and the deceased in the past used to quarrel, it by itself was not sufficient to attract the provisions of s 498A, IPC .[3]

38. Cruelty--What Constitutes--Relevant Factors

Section 498A of the IPC extends protection to the woman from the whims and caprices of man. This section was incorporated in the statute to fill in the lacuna in the existing law, so that if the wife commits suicide, the guilty does not escape. 'Cruelty' as defined in s 498A means any wilful conduct which is of such a nature as is likely to drive the woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb, or health whether mental or physical of the woman, or harassment of the woman where such harassment is with a view to coercing her or any person related to her to meet any unlawful demand, for any property or valuable security or is on account of failure by her or any person related to her to meet such demand. The expression 'cruelty' takes within its sweep both mental and physical agony and torture. The concept of cruelty varies from place to place and individual to individual and according to the social and economic status of the person involved. The question whether the act complained of was an act of cruelty has to be determined from the whole fact and relationship between the parties. The cultural and temperamental state of life among them is factors from where the cruelty has to be inferred and will depend on the facts of each case. The expression cruelty postulates such a treatment as to cause reasonable apprehension in the mind of the wife that her living with the husband will be harmful and injurious to her life. Therefore, to decide the question of cruelty the relevant factors are the matrimonial relationship between the husband and wife, their cultural and temperament status in life, state of health, their interaction in their daily life which dominate the aspect of cruelty.[4]

39. Cruelty--No Straitjacket Mould

The concept of cruelty varies from individual to individual also depending upon the social and economic status to which such person belongs. 'Cruelty' for the purposes of constituting the offence under s 498A, IPC need not be physical and even mental torture or abnormal behaviour may amount to cruelty and harassment in a given case.[5] It would also be unwise to categorise specific acts or conduct which are4042 capable of amounting to cruelty as such categorisation cannot be put in straitjacket mould. In this regard one is reminded of words of wisdom of Lord Tucker[6] who said:

> ...Judges have always carefully refrained from attempting a comprehensive definition of cruelty for the purpose of matrimonial suits and experience has shown the wisdom of this course. It is, in my view, equally undesirable if not impossible by judicial pronouncement to create certain categories of acts or conduct as having or lacking the nature or quality which render them capable or incapable in all circumstances of amounting to cruelty in > cases where no physical violence is averred. Every such act must be judged in relation to its surrounding circumstances, and the physical or mental condition or susceptibilities of the innocent spouse, the intention of the offending spouse, and the offenders knowledge of the actual or probable effect of his conduct on the other's health are all matter which may be decisive in determining on which side of the line a particular act or course of conduct lies, it is, generally speaking not possible to compartment acts for the purposes of relevance as being gross so as to constitute cruelty or less gross so as to constitute cruelty, though there may be extreme cases where the acts in themselves are so trivial as to justify dismissal of an action for lack of relevance without proof, it is with regard to the sufficiency of the facts and matters relied on as amounting in the aggregate to cruelty that I think consistorial causes are so different from many other types of action.

40. Cruelty--Relative Scope under Sections 498A, 306 and 304B

A single act of cruelty of a person can fall within the mischief of various offences. He can be guilty under s 498A, under s 306, IPC and that very act can further bring within the mischief of s 304B, IPC . It is true that expln (a) added to s 498 has some common elements with the provisions of s 306, but it cannot be said that s 498A alone has the compatibility with s 306, IPC . Explanation (b) added to s 498A would further show that this section has also the comparability which can lead to the offence under s 304, IPC . If harassment to a woman has been caused with a view to coercing her or any person related to her in order to meet any unlawful demand for any property or valuable security or on account of failure by her or any person to meet such demand, such harassment would amount cruelty under s 498A, IPC . Thus the legislature has drafted expln (b) which is more near to the provisions of s 304B so far as the demand of dowry etc. is concerned. Thus the short meaning of s 498A is that if a woman is subjected to maltreatment and such treatment can likely lead her to commit suicide or to cause herself grave injury or danger to her life, limb or health, such conduct on the part of the husband, whether mental or physical, will be considered as cruelty. If the husband surcharges the atmosphere of the family and that of the matrimonial home to such an extent that a self-respectable woman takes into her head to finish herself instead of daily sufferings, such an act will definitely come under s 498A, IPC . However, if in that direction the lady steps forward and tries to finish herself under the stress of cruelty, the husband is also guilty for cruelty attracting s 306 besides s 498A . If on account of cruelty and harassment under s 498A, a woman dies under abnormal circumstances within seven years of her marriage and it is shown that she was subjected to cruelty by her husband or his relative in connection with demand of dowry, the person can be convicted both under s 498A read with s 304B, IPC .[7]4043

41. Cruelty--Presence of Husband and his Relatives is not Necessary

If repeated demands for dowry are made and harassment is meted out to a woman, which may be physical or mental, it is an act of cruelty. It is not necessary that the husband or his relatives must be present at the time when the housewife is subjected to cruelty. If their act/conduct, omission/commission is of such a nature which results in mental and physical harassment, it will amount to an act of cruelty to a woman and it is immaterial that the woman is living at that relevant time at her matrimonial home or at her parents' house.[8]

42. Cruelty--Second Wife can be treated as Relative of Husband

The test under s 498A, IPC is whether in the facts of each case, it is probable that a woman is treated by friends, relatives, husband or society as a 'wife' or as a mere 'mistress'. If from the pleadings and evidence the court finds that the woman concerned is regarded as wife and not as a mere mistress, she can be considered to be a 'wife' and consequently as 'the relative of the husband' for purpose of s 498A, IPC . Proof of a legal marriage in the rigid sense as required under civil law is unnecessary for establishing an offence under s 498A, IPC . The expression 'marriage' or 'relative' can be given only a diluted meaning which a common man or society may attribute to those concepts in the common parlance, for the purpose of s 498A, IPC . A second wife who is treated as wife by the husband, relatives, friends or society can be considered to be 'the relative of the husband' for the purpose of s 498A of IPC . If she inflicts cruelty on the legally-wedded wife of the husband, an offence under s

498A, IPC will lie against her.[9]

43. Cruelty as a Ground for Divorce

The cruelty simpliciter is now a ground for divorce under s 13 of the Hindu Marriage Act (Act 25 of 1955). Section 13 provides, so far as it is material:

> " S. 13 . Divorce.--
> (1)Any marriage solemnised whether before or after the commencement of this Act, may, on a petition presented by either the husband or the wife, be dissolved by a decree of divorce on the ground that the other party--
> (i)...
> (i-a) has, after the solemnisation of the marriage, treated the petitioner with cruelty; or

Section 13(1)(i-a) of the Hindu Marriage Act uses the words 'treated the petitioner with cruelty'. The word 'cruelty' has not been defined. Indeed it could not have been defined. It has been used in relation to human conduct or human behaviour. It is the conduct in relation to or in respect of matrimonial duties and obligations. It is a course of conduct of one which is adversely affecting the other. The cruelty may be mental or physical, intentional or unintentional. If it is physical, the court will have no problem to determine it. It is a question of fact and degree. If it is mental, the problem presents difficulty. First the inquiry must begin as to the nature of the cruel treatment. Second the impact of such treatment in the mind of the spouse. Whether it caused reasonable apprehension that it would be harmful or injurious to live with the4044 other. Ultimately, it is a matter of inference to be drawn by taking into account the nature of the conduct and its effect on the complaining spouse. There may, however, be cases where the conduct complained of itself is bad enough and per se unlawful or illegal. Then the impact or the injurious effect on the other spouse need not be inquired into or considered. In such cases, the cruelty will be established if the conduct itself is proved or admitted.[10]

It will be necessary to bear in mind that there has been marked change in the life around us. In matrimonial duties and responsibilities in particular, we find a sea change. They are of varying degrees. Therefore, when a spouse makes complaint about the treatment of cruelty by the partner in life or relations, the court should not search for standard in life. A set of facts stigmatised as cruelty in one case may not be another case. The cruelty alleged may largely depend upon the type of life the parties are accustomed to or their economic and social conditions. It may also depend upon their culture and human values to which they attach importance. The judges and lawyers, therefore, should not import their own notions of life. As Lord Denning said in Sheldon v Sheldon 'the category of cruelty are not close'.[11] Each case may be different. We deal with the conduct of human beings who are not generally similar. Among the human beings there is no limit to the kind of conduct which may constitute cruelty. New type of cruelty may crop up in any case depending upon the human behaviour, capacity or incapability to tolerate the conduct complained of. Such is the realm of cruelty.[12]

These preliminary observations are intended to emphasise that the court in matrimonial cases is not concerned with ideals in family life. The court has only to understand the spouses concerned as nature made them and consider their particular grievance. As Lord Reld observed in Gollins v Gollins :[13]

> In matrimonial affairs we are not dealing with objective standards; it is not a matrimonial offence to fall below the standard of the reasonable man for the reasonable woman. We are dealing with this man or this woman.[14]

Justice Chandrachud (as he then was) in Narayan Ganesh Dastane v Sucheta Narayan Dastane [15] said:

> The court has to deal, not with an ideal husband and an ideal wife (assuming any such exist) but with particular man and woman before it. The ideal couple or a near-ideal one will probably have no occasion to go to a matrimonial court, for, even if they may not be able to draw their differences, their ideal attitudes may help them overlook or gloss over mutual faults and failures.[16]

Cruelty's definition has been adopted from English law, though for the purpose of divorce on the ground of cruelty, Indian law defines it as a conduct as to cause a reasonable apprehension in the mind of the petitioner that it will be harmful or injurious for the petitioner to live with the other party. Element that cruelty should be of such nature as to cause 'danger' to life, limb or health or as to give rise to4045 reasonable apprehension of such a danger does not exist in Indian laws of divorce. This ingredient is of much sterner and higher degree.[17] Supreme Court in NG Dastane (Dr) v S Dastane (Mrs) [18] has referred to this aspect of cruelty like this:

> The inquiry therefore has to be whether the conduct charged as cruelty is of such a character as to cause in mind of the petitioner a reasonable apprehension that it will be harmful or injurious for him to live with the respondent. It is not necessary, as under the English law that the cruelty must be of such a character as to cause 'danger' to life, limb or health or as to give rise to a reasonable apprehension of such a danger. Clearly danger to life, limb or health or a reasonable apprehension of it is a higher requirement than a reasonable apprehension that it is harmful or injurious for one spouse to live with the other.

44. Cruelty--Standard of Proof Higher in Criminal Law than in Civil Law

The principles are that:

(a) the standards of proof of cruelty are higher in degree in criminal law than in civil law under the matrimonial causes;
(b) the intention or mens rea on the part of one spouse to injure the other is not necessary element of cruelty in civil law for matrimonial causes while it is an essential element in criminal law;

(c) it is enough if cruelty is proved by preponderance of probabilities in civil law while in criminal trial the conduce of cruelty has to be proved beyond all reasonable doubt;

(d) it is immaterial in civil law whether the respondent's conduct was aimed at the other spouse or is due to warranted indifference attributable, perhaps, to selfishness or laziness while it is very much material in criminal proceedings; and

(e) for the relief of matrimonial cause in civil law the conduct of the spouse need not necessarily result in danger of life, limb or health, but a reasonable apprehension of such a danger is enough, whereas s 498A, IPC, contemplates such a conduct besides being 'wilful' to result in the likelihood of driving the woman to commit suicide to cause grave injury or danger to a life, limb or health.[19]

As stated earlier, for the purpose of s 498A, IPC, which is peculiar to Indian families, victim spouse is always the 'wife', and the guilty party is the husband and his relatives near or distant, living together or separately. Ingredients of cruelty as contemplated under s 498A are of much higher and sterner degree than the ordinary concept of cruelty applicable and available for the purposes of dissolution of marriage, i.e., divorce in constituting 'cruelty' contemplated by s 498A, IPC, the acts or conduct should be either such that may cause danger to life, limb or health or cause 'grave' injury or of such a degree that may drive a woman to commit suicide. Not only that such acts or conduct should be 'wilful', i.e., intentional. Similarly, to invoke provisions of s 498A, IPC, the tests are of stringent nature and intention is the most essential factor. The only test is that acts or conduct of guilty party should have4046 the sting or effect of causing grave injury to the woman or are likely to cause danger of life, limb or physical or mental health.[20]

45. Cruelty--Denial or Deprivation of Conjugal Rights

In order to arrive at a finding of cruelty by reason of denial or deprivation of conjugal rights where the husband and wife were living together, the court must have sufficient particulars before it. The mere fact that the couple did not have any issue inspite of a married life for four years does not necessarily indicate denial of conjugal life. In the absence of necessary particulars regarding the alleged denial of conjugal life, it will not be proper to record a finding of cruelty on the ground of such denial.[21]

46. Usual and common domestic discord

Usual and common domestic discord in matrimonial home(s), cannot amount to cruelty within the meaning of s 498A, IPC .[22]

47. Cruelty--Petty Quarrels

The evincing interest by the accused-husband in political activities, and the omnibus allegation such as, the accused-husband was ill-treating the deceased by beating, insulting and demanding her to bring money, would not come within the meaning of cruelty as defined under s 498A, IPC . In any marital life, it cannot be said that there was total harmony and it is not uncommon between the wife and husband to have some petty quarrels. Such petty quarrels cannot be termed as 'cruelty' to attract the provisions of s 498A, IPC .[23]

48. Cruelty--Suicide Note--Judicial Scrutiny

If in the entire writings contained in the suicide note a serious castigation is made against the victim's husband for being an addict to narcotic drugs, and she has made a general allegation against her mother-in-law and in a lesser degree towards the appellant. However, unfortunately she did not advert to any concrete instance which can be termed as cruelty as defined in s 498A of the IPC . The utterances said to have been made by the accused towards the deceased had been taken very seriously and in the suicide note she described such utterances as not worthy of reproduction.

It is not enough that the deceased felt those words hurting, it must be subjected to judicial security and the court must be in a position to hold that those words were sufficiently hurting enough as to amount to 'cruelty' falling within the parameters fixed in s 498A of the IPC . The area remains grey and vague. Not a single word said to have been spoken to be the appellant as against the deceased had been put on record by the deceased in the suicide note in spite of the fact that the said note is a very lengthy letter running into several paragraphs. The tenor and language of the suicide note would reflect that she was not an illiterate lady. As the court is rendered helpless to judge whether the words which accused heard from the accused would4047 amount to cruelty, it is far from possibility for the criminal court to hold that she is guilty of the offence of cruelty as envisaged in the section. It is also to be pointed out that the deceased did not mention a single deed which the accused would have done against her. All that is said against the accused is that he spoke something which she found objectionable. In the aforesaid circumstances, an offence against husband has not at all been proved.[24]

49. Mental Cruelty

Explanation (a) to s 498A, IPC specifically includes mental cruelty within the ambit of 'cruelty'. Causing mental torture to a wife to such an extent that it becomes unbearable would amount to cruelty. The husband should behave and conduct himself in the same manner which he expects from his wife. He should not exhibit male chauvinism and treat his wife like a chattel or slave. If he does so he would be guilty of cruelty under s 498A, IPC .[25] The Supreme Court has held in Pawan Kumar v State of Haryana [26] that cruelty or harassment need not be physical. Even mental torture in a given case would be a case of cruelty and harassment within the meaning of s 498A, IPC . Explanation (a) to s 498A itself refers to both mental and physical cruelty. 'Cruelty' in s 498A, IPC means such willful conduct by a person which is likely to drive a woman to commit suicide, cause grave injury or danger to her life or health which includes both mental and physical health.[27]

The Supreme Court of India laid down the following definition of 'mental cruelty' in V Bhagat v Mrs D Bhagat :[28]

> Mental cruelty can be broadly defined as that conduct which inflicts upon the other party such mental pain and suffering as would make it not possible for the party to live with the other. In other words 'mental cruelty' must be of such a nature that the parties cannot reasonably be expected to live together. The situation must be such that the wronged party cannot reasonably be asked to put up with such conduct and continue to live with the other party. It is not necessary to prove that the mental cruelty is such as to cause injury to the health of the petitioner.

> The word 'cruelty' is to be used in relation to human conduct or human behaviour. It is the conduct in relation or in respect of matrimonial duties and obligations. It is a course of conduct of one which is adversely affecting the other. The cruelty may be mental or physical, intentional or unintentional.

In S Hanumanta Rao v S Ramani [29] Supreme Court observed as under:

> Mental cruelty broadly means, when other party causes mental pain, agony or suffering of such a magnitude that it severs the bond between the wife and the husband and as a result of which it becomes impossible for the party who has suffered to live with the other party.

Further, mental cruelty varies from person to person depending on the intensity of sensitivity and the degree of courage or endurance to withstand such mental cruelty.4048 In other words, each case has to be decided on its own facts to decide whether mental cruelty was established.[30]

50. Harassment

The offence of 'harassment' is peculiar to Indian conditions and society where evil of dowry and its perpetuation through customary gifts or demands is widely prevalent and is eating the very vitals of matrimony and tearing the social fabric apart. To curb this evil, the acts of not only the husband but the entire household have been brought within the net of 'harassment of woman' if done to coerce her or her relatives to fulfil the unlawful demands for property of valuable security.[31] But the fact that the accused husband was given in adoption and after marriage, the accused husband and the deceased were living with the adoptive father falsified the story of harassment by natural parents.[32]

The word 'harassment' in ordinary sense means to torment a person subjecting him or her through constant interference or intimidation. If such tormentation is done with a view to coerce any person and in this case, the wife to do any unlawful act and in this case to meet the unlawful demand of property or valuable security, it amounts to 'harassment' as contemplated by s 498A, IPC . Word 'Coercion' means persuading or compelling a person to do something by using force or threats. Thus to constitute 'harassment' following ingredients are essential:

(a) woman should be tormented, i.e., tortured either physically or mentally through constant interference or intimidation;
(b) such act should be with a view to pursuade or compel her to do something which she is legally or otherwise not expected to do by using force or threats; and
(c) intention to subject the woman should be to compel or force her or her relatives to fulfil unlawful demands for any property or valuable security.[33]

Harassment need not be in the form of physical assault and even mental harassment also would come within the purview of s 498A, IPC .[34]

Mere absence of the nature of harassment is not enough to discard the evidences of near and dear ones of the deceased and non-mentioning of the details of harassment is not at all fatal to the case of prosecution to establish the charge under s 498A .[35] Harassment simpliciter is not cruelty, unless it is committed for the purpose of coercing a woman or any other person related to her to meet an unlawful demand for property etc.[36]

Evidence showed that the deceased wife was harassed for not giving consent for second marriage by the accused husband. She consumed poison and committed suicide. Husband accused was convicted under ss 306 and 498A, IPC .[37]4049

Where as per custom the complainant and the accused had entered into registered agreement of divorce, had been living separately for the last ten years, the complaint for harassment filed under s 498A, IPC was dismissed as devoid of substance.[38]

Even mental harassment would fall within the purview of s 498A, IPC .[39]

51. Criminality Attached to Harassment

So far as criminality attached to word 'harassment' is concerned, it is independent of 'cruelty' and is punishable in the following circumstances:

(a) where the harassment of woman is with a view to coercing her or any person related to her to meet any unlawful demand for any property or valuable security, or

(b) where the harassment is on account of failure by her or any persons related to her to meet such demand.[40]

52. Cruelty--Nexus with Harassment

Sub-clause (b) of the expln to s 498A, IPC provides that cruelty means harassment of the woman where such harassment is with a view to coercing her or any person related to her to meet any unlawful demand for any property or valuable security or is on account of failure by her or any person related to her to meet such demand. Sub-clause (b) does not make each and every harassment cruelty. The harassment has to be with a defined object, namely to coerce the woman or any person related to her to meet any unlawful demand. Hence, mere harassment by itself is not cruelty. Mere demand for property etc. by itself is also not cruelty. It is only where harassment is shown to have been committed for the purpose of coercing a woman to meet the demands that is cruelty and this is made punishable under the section. In other words, it is not every harassment or every type of cruelty that would attract s 498A . It must be established that the beating or harassment was with a view to force the wife to commit suicide or to fulfil illegal demands of the husband or his relatives.[41]

The deceased wife committed suicide by hanging at her matrimonial house. The allegation was that suicide was committed on account of unbearable torture on her mental and physical being by her husband and in-laws appellants. The deceased had been to her father's house with appellant husband on 15.10.2000 and they together stayed there till 20.10.2000. On 21.10.2000, the victim allegedly committed suicide at 8.30 a.m. During her stay in her paternal house with the appellant husband, she did not demand any money or her husband also had not given any hints that he demanded money through deceased by creating pressure on her to write a letter to her father. There was no history of torture or harassment caused to the deceased. There was no nexus between the death of the deceased and any overt act on the part of the accused appellants. The conviction of the appellants for offences under ss 304B and 498, IPC was found not sustainable; it was set aside.[42]4050

53. Cruelty--Nexus with Suicide

The term cruelty has been defined in the explanation to s 498A, IPC . Hence, it is not any and every cruelty that is made punishable, but only the cruelty as defined under the explanation. Explanation (a) provides that cruelty means any wilful conduct which is of such a nature as is likely to drive the woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (whether mental or physical) of the woman. Hence, under cl (a) the cruelty was to be of such a gravity as is likely to drive a woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health. If cruelty is by itself established and the fact of suicide is also established, it would not be sufficient to bring home the guilt of committing cruelty as defined in expln (a). A reasonable nexus had to be established between the cruelty and the suicide in order to make good the offence of cruelty. Alternately, the cruelty established has to be of such a gravity as is likely to drive a woman to commit suicide, etc. If suicide is established it has further to be established that it was occasioned on account of cruelty which was of sufficient gravity so as to lead a reasonable person placed in similar circumstances to commit suicide.[43]

The conduct that is likely to drive the woman to commit suicide is of much graver nature than that causing grave injury or endangering life, limb or physical or mental health. It involves series of systematic, persistent and wilful acts perpetrated with a view to make the life of the woman so burdensome or insupportable that she may be driven to commit suicide because of having been fed up with marital life.[44]

However, if there is a gap of three to four years between the incidents of cruelty and the suicide by the wife, it cannot be said that nexus or inter-connection between the two has been established.[45]

54. Cruelty--Sporadic Incidents of Ill-treatment

Sporadic incidents of ill-treatment by the husband do not attract the definition of cruelty. When it was no case of the prosecution that the wife committed suicide, and the alleged sporadic incidents of cruelty were aimed at pressuring the wife for divorce and not aimed at pressuring her to satisfy the demand of property, s 498A is not attracted.[46]

55. Cruelty--Instances

In the following instances, the accused husband/relatives of the husband were found liable to be convicted on the ground that they caused cruelty to the victim/wife:

(a) The husband was of a highly suspicious nature and made life difficult for the deceased wife by demeaning her, insulting her, calling her a prostitute, not allowing her to meet others, denying her family life and comforts.[47]

(b) The malicious and vexatious litigation were instituted against the wife out of vindictiveness. The wife was humiliated and tortured through execution of search warrants and seizure of her personal property.[48]4051

(c) The habit of taking drink and coming late at home much against the will of the wife, coupled with beatings and demanding dowry and harassment to bring money.[49]

(d) Physical/mental harassment to the wife, by her husband/parents-in-law.[50]

(e) Turning out the bride from matrimonial home and compelling her to reside in the house of her parents is also an act of cruelty under s 498A, IPC .[51]

(f) False allegations by the husband in the divorce petition, regarding the incapability of the wife to conceive amounts to cruelty under s 498A, IPC .[52]

(g) The accused harassed and coerced the deceased wife not only for the balance of the agreed dowry but also demanded additional dowry, the accused was found guilty of subjecting the deceased to cruelty within the meaning of cl (b) of expln to s 498A, IPC .[53]

(h) The failure of the parents of the deceased woman to meet the demand of scooter by her husband and father-in-law on the occasion of marriage of the deceased woman which was the immediate cause of her death would fall in the definition of the term 'cruelty'.[54]

(i) The minor child was taken away by the husband and his relatives from the custody of her mother in order to coerce her to meet her illegal demand for dowry.[55]

(j) The accused-husband and accused mother-in-law of the victim continuously taunted or teased the victim on one ground or the other drawing her to end her life. The victim-wife was forced to live in her parent's house and out of 11 months of her married life, she could live with her husband for a period of two months in different spells. Both the accused did not try to save the victim when she committed suicide by burning herself.[56]

(k) Cruel conduct of mother-in-law.[57]

(l) The act of the accused-husband in disregarding his basic duty to provide the wife and infant child with elementary means of sustenance inspite of having sufficient means which the accused deliberately and irresponsibly squandered on gambling and other vices and virtually starved his wife and infant child to death, amounts to matrimonial cruelty under s 498A, IPC .[58]4052

(m) Constantly nagging and harassing the deceased woman by her in-laws (accused) for not doing any work and to earn more money amounts to harassment and cruelty under s 498A, IPC .[59]

(n) The act of the accused mother-in-law along with the other two accused in harassing the deceased woman and refusing to send her to her parents house amounts to mental torture and agony punishable under s 498A, IPC .[60]

(o) The victim-wife had undergone tubectomy operation and so was unable to do household work. She was constantly beaten by the accused for her said inability which fact was also confirmed by medical evidence. The beating by the husband would amount to cruelty under s 498A .[61]

(p) The accused husband used to get drunk and beat his wife and abuse her consistently. The act of the accused constitutes cruelty within the meaning of s 498A, IPC .[62]

(q) Torture, harassment and insult to the victim-wife on account of suspicion by her in-laws of her pre-marital love.[63]

(r) Conduct of the accused-husband and his father in not accepting the wife and new born baby-girl for nine months after her delivery amounts to cruelty.[64]

(s) The act of the accused in keeping his concubine as his wife and bringing up a child constitutes cruelty within the definition as encompassed in s 498A .[65]

(t) Illicit relationship of husband with another woman.[66]

(u) Husband indulging in illicit relationship with maid servant in the presence and knowledge of wife.[67]

(v) The wife was tortured and harassed for not giving the articles demanded.[68]

(w) Most of the letters proved on record pertain to the demands made by the accused-husband.[69]

(x) Mere monetary demand is not in the nature of dowry and it attracts s 498A .[70]

(y) When the demand of money for purchasing motor cycle and the construction of house was proved by the evidence of independent4053 witnesses and the complainant was locked inside the house and assaulted by the accused.[71]

(z) The accused was habitual of beating his wife which amounts to cruelty within the meaning of the explanation to s 498A .[72]

(za) Where the father and the mother of the deceased deposed, corroborated by the dying declaration that the accused husband had demanded Rs. 1 lac for running piggery farm and as the demand was not fulfilled the deceased was subjected to harassment and so she committed suicide.[73]

(zb) Demand of money by the accused for repayment of loan is unlawful. The accused husband was convicted under s 498A, IPC .[74]

(zc) Husband, his parents and sister subjecting the complainant to cruelty with a view that she should leave the matrimonial home, so that the husband may marry his girl friend.[75]

(zd) Accused husband caused mental and physical trauma to deceased.[76]

56. Acts not Amounting to Cruelty--Instances

In the following cases the acts of the accused were not found to be amounting to cruelty within the meaning of s 498A, IPC :

(a) The taking of drink and coming home late much against the will of the wife may not, per se, amount to cruelty.[77]

(b) When it is not established conclusively that the beating and harassment meted out to the wife was with a view to force her to commit suicide or to fulfil the illegal demands of the accused.[78]

(c) Mere beating on one occasion is not sufficient to constitute cruelty under s 498A, IPC .[79]

(d) Simply, because the husband and the others did not call the wife to the matrimonial home, it cannot amount to harassment.[80]

(e) The accused asking his wife to get some money from her brothers so as to enable him to purchase a car for running it as a taxi, does not amount to a demand for dowry[81] or cruelty.

(ee) Husband asking wife to bring some article of insignificant value on stray occasion is not covered by cl (b) of expln to s 498 A and does not amount to cruelty.[82]4054

(f) The act of the husband of taking away his minor child without the consent of the mother, i.e., his wife does not amount to cruelty to the mother of the child under s 498A .[83]

(g) The accused having a doubt in his mind about his wife having eloped with someone for a particular period and therefore was rarely talking to her.[84]

(h) The act of the accused in telling his wife not to attend to the kitchen so as to prevent wastage does not amount to cruelty.[85]

(i) The accused-husband inserted his fingers and a stick in the vagina of his wife as a result of which she sustained severe bleeding injury.[86]

(j) Seeking divorce from the wife by alleging in the divorce petition that the wife was suffering from cancer, which turned out to be baseless, does not amount to cruelty under s 498A .[87]

(k) The allegation that the husband was friendly with another girl in the form of suggestion cannot be an aspect of cruelty.[88]

(l) The mere fact that the accused mother-in-law and sister-in-law of the victim wife had sympathised with accused-husband of the victim-wife for a demand of dowry does not satisfy the requirement of harassment on their part under s 498A, IPC .[89]

(m) The statement in the dying declaration of the victim-wife that she wanted to live separately but her husband was not prepared, and on that score he had beaten her in the afternoon the previous day, coupled with the statement that her grandmother disliked her, are not sufficient to substantiate the prosecution case that the victim-wife was meted out with ill-treatment punishable under s 498A, IPC .[90]

(n) Even if the accused has demanded as Rs 15,000 from his wife to be brought from her parents, it will not bring the case either within ambit of s 304B or s 498A, IPC, in the absence of evidence that she was being treated with cruelty on account of such demand.[91]

(o) The accused and deceased had lived for almost six years after the marriage. For a sheer half tola of gold, it is preposterous to expect the accused to inflict cruelty on deceased and it is unnatural to believe that version.[92]

(p) The admission by the brother of the wife that on returning to her maternal home for the first time after wedding, she did not complain of anything, but told that everything was normal completely demolishes the prosecution story of harassment on account of demand for dowry soon after her marriage.[93]4055

(q) As per the dying declaration of the deceased, she committed suicide following a quarrel with her brother-in-law one day prior to the said incident. However, in her dying declaration the deceased did not mention that the said quarrel or assault was in connection with any demand for dowry.[1]

(r) Where the evidence on record only disclosed that the husband entertained suspicion about his wife's chastity and therefore harassed her.[2]

(s) Dying declaration showing that the victim-wife had not breathed a word with regard to any 'torture' or 'harassment' by the accused persons on her and rather attributed the cause of death to her parents.[3]

(t) Ill-treatment by the husband suspecting fidelity of his wife and suspecting that his wife was pregnant through somebody else.[4]

(u) Father of the deceased categorically stated that the accused had never demanded any cash or property from him.[5]

(v) Where the accused husband having two wives permits the first wife to enter the house of the second wife, with a new born child, the act of the husband does not amount to cruelty.[6]

(w) The mere fact that the husband has developed some intimacy with another woman, during the subsistence of marriage and failed to discharge his marital obligations as such would not amount to 'cruelty' but it must be of such a nature as is likely to drive the spouse to commit suicide to fall within the expln to s 498A, IPC .[7]

(x) Wife wrote to the police that the accused husband was financially exploiting her and she was on the verge of starvation. Held, the said letter was not proof of cruelty, in the absence of any other evidence. Conviction of the accused husband under s 498A, IPC was set aside.[8]

(y) There was no allegation of any kind of physical torture. The evidence with regard to cruelty was absolutely sketchy and not convincing. It was alleged that the mother-in-law used to rob the deceased of her money which she earned as wages. As regards appellant no. 4 there was only one singular allegation that at one public place she had threatened the deceased that she would be divorced by her husband. The conviction of the appellants for offences under ss 498A and 306, IPC was found not sustainable and therefore, was set aside.[9]4056

(z) Allegation of illicit relation with other woman would be illegal and immoral, but not cruelty under s 498A, IPC .[10]

(za) Failure of the husband accused to take his wife to his place of duty/posting is not cruelty.[11]

(zb) Single act of cruelty would not attract the provisions of s 498A, IPC .[12]

(zc) Manhandling the deceased wife in the presence of her mother for not meeting demand of dowry.[13]

Husband or relative of husband of a woman subjecting her to cruelty.--

57. Tendency of Roping in Relatives of Husband should be Discouraged

The object of the provision is prevention of the dowry menace. But many instances have come to light where the complaints are not bonafide and have been filed with oblique motive. In such cases acquittal of the accused does not in all cases wipe out the ignomy suffered during and prior to trial. Sometimes adverse media coverage adds to the misery. The question, therefore, is what remedial measures can be taken to prevent abuse of the well-intentioned provision. Merely because the provision is constitutional and intra vires, does not give a licence to unscrupulous persons to wreck personal vendetta or unleash harassment. It may, therefore, become necessary for the legislature to find out ways how the makers of frivolous complaints or allegations can be appropriately dealt with. Till then the courts have to take care of the situation within the existing frame work.[14] For the fault of the husband, the in-laws or the other relatives cannot, in all cases, be held to be involved in the demand of dowry. In cases where such accusations are made the overt acts attributed to persons other than husband are required to be proved beyond reasonable doubt. By mere conjectures and implications such relations cannot be held guilty for the offence relating to dowry deaths. A tendency has, however, developed for roping in all relations of the in-laws of the deceased wives in the matters of dowry deaths which, if not discouraged, is likely to affect the case of the prosecution even against the real culprits. In their over enthusiasm and anxiety to seek conviction for maximum people, the parents of the deceased have been found to be making efforts for involving other relations which ultimately weakens the case of the prosecution even against the real accused.[15] Only the husband, his parents or at best close family members may be expected to demand dowry or to harass the wife but not distant relations, unless there is tangible material to support allegations made against such distant relations. Mere naming of distant relations is not enough to summon them in the absence of any specific role and material to support such role.[16]

The provision under ss 498A, 406 and 306, IPC were enacted with good intentions but the implementation has left a very bad taste and the move has been counter productive. There is a growing tendency amongst the women which is further4057 perpetuated by their parents and relatives to rope in each and every relative including, minors or distant relatives and in some cases against every person of the family of the husband whether living away or in another town or abroad or as many as 10 to 15 or even more relatives of the husband. Once a complaint is lodged under ss 498A / 406, IPC, whether there are vague, unspecific or exaggerated allegations or there is no evidence of any physical or mental harm or injury inflicted upon the woman that is likely to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health, it comes as an easy tool in the hands of the police and agencies like Crime Against Women Cell till they can obtain anticipatory bail as the offence has been made cognizable and non-bailable. Thousands of such complaints and cases are pending and are being lodged everyday.[17]

There is growing tendency to come out with inflated and exaggerated allegations roping in each and every relation of the husband and if one of them happens to be of higher status or of vulnerable standing, he or she becomes an easy prey for better bargaining and blackmailing.[18]

These grounds realities have persuaded the Delhi High Court to recommend to the authorities and law makers to review the situation and the legal provision.[19]

58. Remedy Worse than Perils or Disease

From time immemorial, cruelty, desertion and adultery have been grounds for divorce which were to be proved in civil courts. Now the police (and that too its lower functionaries) have been made the decision making authority to conclude whether the harassment or the cruelty as brought out in the statement of the complainant wife is sufficient to put all the relatives including school going minor brothers and sisters of the husband behind bars. Such was neither the intention nor the object of the legislation.[20]

It is rightly said sometimes that the remedies are worse than perils or disease. Time has come to take stock and review the provision. In one metropolis alone, thousands of divorce cases arising from the cases under ss 498A / 406, IPC, are pending in courts. There are equal or more number of marriages which are in limbo. What else is it if not a social catastrophy? This should be a matter of concern for social scientists, law makers and judges also. Sterner provisions have failed to make any dent. The menace and evil of dowry is still looming large.[21] In the words of the Supreme Court in Pawan Kumar's case[22] that in spite of stringent measures; sections of society are still boldly pursuing this chronic evil to fulfil their greedy desires.

59. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and triable by a magistrate of the first class. The case pertaining to this section is a warrant case.[23] Where the allegation was of demand of dowry, the accused applicant, elder brother of the deceased, not beneficiary of demand of dowry, was released on4058 bail.[24] Where FIR is filed for offences under ss 498A and 406, IPC, registration of FIR is mandatory.[25]

60. Arrest in cases under Section 498A , IPC --Supreme Court Guidelines

In the case of the Arnesh Kumar v State of Bihar [26], to ensure that police officers do not arrest the accused unnecessarily and Magistrate do not authorize detention casually, and mechanically, the Supreme Court issued the following guidelines :

(1) All the State Government to instruct its police officer not to automatically arrest when a case under Section 498A , IPC is registered but to satisfy themselves about the necessity for arrest under the parameters laid down above flowing from Section 41 , CrPC .;
(2) All police officers be provided with a check list containing specified sub-clause under Section 41(1) (b) (ii) ;
(3) The police officer shall forward the check list duly filed and furnish the reasons and materials which necessitated the arrest while forwarding/producing the accused before the Magistrate for further detention;
(4) The Magistrate while authorizing detention of the accused shall peruse the report furnished by the police officer in terms aforesaid and only after recording its satisfaction, the Magistrate will authorize detention;
(5) The decision not to arrest an accused, be forwarded to the Magistrate within two weeks from the date of the institution of the case with a copy to the Magistrate which may be extended by the Superintendent of Police of the district for the reasons to be recorded in writing;
(6) Notice of appearance in terms of Section 41A of CrPC be served on the accused within two weeks from the date of institution of the case, which may be extended by the Superintendent of Police of the District for the reasons to be recorded in writing;
(7) Failure to comply with the directions aforesaid shall apart from rendering the police officer concerned liable for departmental action, they shall also be liable to be punished for contempt of Court to be instituted before High Court having territorial jurisdiction.
(8) Authorizing detention without recording reasons as aforesaid by the judicial Magistrate concerned shall be liable for departmental action by the appropriate High Court.

The directions aforesaid shall not only apply to the cases under s 498A, IPC or s 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act, the case in hand, but also such cases where offences is punishable with imprisonment for a term which may be less than seven years or which may extend to seven years; whether with or without fine.

61. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings

In complaint for offence under s 498A, IPC allegation against the husband and her parents were for harassing the complainant for dowry which compelled the latter to leave her matrimonial home. The question whether the complainant in fact had been harassed and treated with cruelty is matter of trial, but at this stage it could not be4059 said that no case was made out. The quashing of proceedings before the trial is not permissible. The proceedings were not quashed on petition under s 482, CrPC .[27]

The brother-in-law and sister-in-law of the complainant were minors at the time of her marriage and also at the time of lodging the FIR. Neither of the two persons was alleged to have been entrusted with any dowry article nor did they allege to have ever demanded any dowry article. No specific allegation of demand of dowry, harassment or beating given to the complainant by these two accused persons has been made. Therefore, the FIR quo these two accused was quashed.[28] Where the Court did not find any material or allegation worth the name against the appellants, about cruelty all the allegations were against the husband, the proceedings against the appellants in-laws were quashed.[29]

The appellants sister-in-law and brother-in-law were residing at a different place, never resided with the complainant and her husband, their prosecution was malicious, hence was quashed under s 482, CrPC .[30]

Where there was no mention of specific dates as to when the alleged illegal demands of dowry were made and the complaint contained only vague allegations without any details, the complaint filed for the offence under ss 498A / 34, IPC, was quashed by the High Court by taking recourse to s 482, CrPC .[31] If on the date of the alleged cruelty, the informant or victim ceased to be the wife of the accused on the basis of pronouncement of talaq by a written divorced deed and factum of talaq is admitted by the wife and allegations of cruelty being false and concocted, the FIR as well as the chargesheet against the accused is liable to be quashed.[32] If the victim-wife and accused-husband are Mohammedan and prior to the date of the alleged cruelty, the accused-husband had already given talaq to the victim-complainant, the provisions of s 498A, IPC, are not attracted and the complaint or criminal proceedings against the accused are liable to be quashed.[33] The affidavit filed by wife nowhere stated about demand of dowry. FIR for offence under s 498A, IPC being frivolous was quashed.[34]

Where the wife had been living separately from accused husband since April 2011 due to strained relationship, the husband had already withdrawn petition for restitution of conjugal rights, the allegations of demand of dowry, criminal intimidation were devoid of force, the criminal proceedings were quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[35]4060

62. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings--Compromise in Non-Compoundable Offence

In some cases,[36] it was held that settlement of matrimonial disputes between parties of non-compoundable offences like ss 498A and 406, IPC which are non-compoundable under s 320, CrPC, is not a ground for quashing criminal proceedings by taking recourse to s 482, CrPC, by the High Court. However, later, the Apex Court has held that the High Court in exercise of its inherent powers can quash criminal proceedings or FIR or complaint and s 320, CrPC, does not limit/affect the powers under s 482, CrPC .[37] The court by exercising its inherent powers can quash criminal proceedings when parties have compromised the matrimonial case pertaining to offences under ss 498A and 406, IPC .[38] But still some High Courts have not permitted quashing of proceedings despite the compounding of offences between the parties.[39] However, in the absence of a genuine settlement between the parties, the complaint cannot be quashed in exercise of the inherent powers under s 482, CrPC .[40]

In the case of K Srinivas Rao v DA Deepa ,[41] the Supreme Court observed -

> We, therefore, feel that though offence punishable under Section 498A , IPC is not compoundable, in appropriate cases if the parties are willing and if it appears to the criminal Court that there exist elements of settlement, it should direct the parties to explore the possibility of settlement through mediation. This is, > obviously, not to dilute the rigour, efficacy and purport of Section 498A , IPC, but to locate cases where the matrimonial dispute can be nipped in bud in an equitable manner. The Judges, with their expertise, must ensure that this exercise does not lead to the erring spouse using mediation process to get out of clutches of the law. During mediation, the parties can either decide to part company on mutually agreed terms or they may decide to patch up and stay together. In either case for the settlement to come through, the complaint will have to be quashed. In that event, they can approach the High Court and get the complaint quashed. If, however, they choose not to settle, they can proceed with the complaint. In this exercise, there is no loss to anyone. If there is settlement, the parties will be saved from the trials and tribulations of a criminal case and that will reduce the4061 burden on the Courts which will be in the larger public interest. Obviously, the High Court will quash the complaint only if after considering all circumstances it finds the settlement to be equitable and genuine. Such a course, in our opinion, will be beneficial to those who genuinely want to accord a quietus to their matrimonial dispute.[42]

The accused husband and his relatives were convicted under s 498A, IPC . During pendency of appeal the parties entered into compromise. The Supreme Court exercising powers under art 142 of the Constitution of India quashed the proceedings under s 498A, IPC against the accused husband.[43]

63. Charge

> I, (name and particulars of the magistrate) hereby charge you (name and particulars of the accused) as follows:
> That you being husband or/and relative of the husband of the woman... (particulars of the woman) subjected the said woman to cruelty by wilful conduct which is of such a nature as is likely to drive the woman to commit suicide or caused grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (details of mental or physical cruelty be given here) of the woman, or harassed the said woman with a view to coerce her or any person related to her (give particulars of the person) to meet any unlawful demand for any property or valuable security (details of property or valuable security be given), and you have thereby committed an offence punishable under s 498A, IPC and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

The settled principle is that the material on record has to be considered to arrive at the conclusion whether there are sufficient grounds for proceeding against the accused. At this stage, the statements are to be accepted as they are. If the statements would result in conviction if they remain unrebutted, then the charge can be framed against the accused. The inquiry envisaged at this stage is not a roving inquiry. The approach has to be pragmatic.[44]Section 239, CrPC, provides that the magistrate while framing the charge should consider the documents placed by the police under s 173, CrPC, make such examination as may be necessary, and after giving the prosecution and the accused an opportunity of being heard he shall proceed to consider the framing of the charge.[45]

The charges under ss 306 and 498A, IPC, are independent of each other and acquittal in one does not lead to acquittal in the other. The acquittal on a charge under s 306 though not by itself a ground for acquittal under s 498A, but some cogent evidence is required to bring home the charge of s 498A as well without which the charge cannot be said to be maintained.[46]4062

However, the accused charged under s 302, IPC, cannot be convicted under s 304B or s 498A, IPC, in the absence of charge framed against him.[47]

64. Omission or Defect in Charge

Mere omission or defect in framing charge does not disable the criminal court from convicting the accused for the offence which is found to have been proved on the evidence on record. The CrPC has ample provisions to meet a situation like that. If from the statement of charge framed under s 304B and in the alternative s 498A, it is clear that all facts and ingredients for framing charge for offence under s 306, IPC, existed in the case, the mere omission on the part of the trial judge to mention s 305 with 498A, IPC, does not preclude the court from convicting the accused for the said offence when found proved. If in the alternate charge framed under s 498A, IPC, it has been clearly mentioned that the accused subjected the deceased to such cruelty and harassment as to drive her to commit suicide, the provisions of s 221 of CrPC take care of such a situation and safeguard the powers of the criminal court to convict an accused for an offence with which he is not charged although on facts found in evidence he could have been charged for such offence.[48]

The provision of sub-s 2 of s 221 read with sub-s 1 of the said section can be taken aid of in convicting and sentencing the accused no 1 of offence of abetment of suicide under s 306, IPC, along with or instead of s 498A, IPC .[49]

Section 215 allows criminal court to ignore any error in stating either the offence or the particulars required to be stated in the charge, if the accused was not, in fact, misled by such error or omission in framing the charge and it has not occasioned a failure of justice.[50]

65. Discharge

The accused, who is neither the husband nor the relative of the victim-woman, cannot be charged under s 498A, IPC .[51] If there is no allegation in the complaint that the harassment by the husband towards the complainant was to extract money or valuable security unlawfully from the complainant, the essential ingredients for constituting an offence under s 498A, IPC, being not alleged in the complaint by the wife, the framing of charge under s 498A, IPC, is liable to be set aside.[52] In cases attracting both ss 304B and 498A, IPC, from the point of view of practice and procedure and to avoid technical defects, it is necessary to frame charge under both the sections, but no separate sentence need be awarded under s 498A in view of the substantive sentence being awarded for the major offence under s 304B, IPC .[53] In no way, the incidents of harassment/cruelty that might have occurred two decades ago can be made a ground for punishing a person after 25 years and that to in a4063 matrimonial dispute. The order framing charge under s 498A, IPC, in such a case is liable to be set aside.[54]

If the magistrate has taken cognizance of the offence without taking note of the fact that the complaint was time-barred, finds that the complaint was barred by time because of which he cannot frame the charge, he can discharge the accused.[55] Where no specific allegation of torture and assault were made against the other accused persons in the complaint and the statement under s 161 of CrPC, the other accused persons were entitled to be discharged.[56]

The discharge of the accused for the offence under s 498A, IPC, on the ground that cruelty to which the complainant was subjected to was not in connection with or related to the demand of dowry, is not proper when the trial court and the appellate court failed to examine whether cruelty to which the complainant was alleged to have been subject to by the accused was of such a nature as was to likely to drive her to commit suicide or cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (whether mental or physical), and such an order of discharge is liable to be set aside.[57] There is not always a direct nexus between an offence under s 498A, IPC, and s 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act .[58]

At the stage of framing of charge, the prosecution case cannot be thrown out merely by observing that the averments or the allegations in the complaint/FIR are vague and indefinite in as much as the necessary particulars regarding the year, month, date or time have not been mentioned. If from a bare reading of the FIR it is evident that there are clear accusations of causing harassment and cruel treatment to the daughter of the complainant on account of insufficient dowry as well as further demands regarding refrigerator, cooler and coloured television etc., the discharge of the accused for the alleged offence under s 498A, IPC, is not proper.[59] Where the suicide note of the victim-woman showed that the main reason for suicide was suspicion of the husband about her fidelity, and there was no mention of the sister-in-law and her husband making any demand of dowry or subjecting the deceased to cruelty, the allegation against them by the relatives of the deceased woman were vague and do not give date or nature of cruelty or harassment for demand of dowry, the order framing the charge under s 498A read with s 34, IPC, against the sister-in-law and her husband was quashed.[60]

66. Proof

In order to prove the offence under this section the prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the accused is the husband or the relative of the husband of the victim woman; and
(b) he subjected the woman to cruelty by,4064

(i) any wilful conduct which was of such a nature as was likely to drive the woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (whether mental or physical) of the woman;
(ii) harassment of the woman with a view to coercing her or any person related to her to meet any unlawful demand for any property or valuable security or is on account of failure by her or any person related to her to meet such demand.[61]

To establish the offence under s 498A, IPC the prosecution has to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the husband or his relative has subjected the victim to cruelty as defined in cll (a) and (b) of the expln to s 498A, IPC .[62]

If there is no mention in the FIR about any demand of dowry by the husband and the evidence of the prosecution witness is also vague, the offence under s 498A, IPC, is not proved.[63] In order to bring home guilt to the accused to offence under s 498A, IPC, it is imperative for the prosecution to establish (1) that there was unlawful demand by him; and (2) the victim, i.e., wife was subjected to harassment with the definite object, i.e., to coerce her to meet unlawful demand. It is in this sense that the prosecution has to establish evidence on record of the factum of cruelty as well as harassment on account of non-fulfillment of demand.[64] The best evidence is of close friend or mother of the deceased. Naturally, a married girl would confide in to a close friend or mother. A mother, on the other hand, may not bring everything to the notice of her husband on the belief that things will improve.[65] Where no specific particulars regarding time, place and manner of any beating, cruelty or harassment of deceased for demand of dowry were given, the accused were acquitted of the charge under s 498A, IPC .[66]

Where evidence adduced in the case does not show that the deceased was subjected to cruelty and harassment before death, the accused (husband) would be acquitted of the charge under s 498A, IPC . The order of acquittal of accused husband for offence under s 498A, IPC passed by the trial court was held proper.[67]

Appellant was prosecuted on allegation that he tortured the deceased for non-fulfilment of the demand of dowry. The evidence of the witnesses on what the deceased told them about the demand of dowry would not be admissible under s 32(1), Evidence Act; the accused cannot be convicted under s 498A, IPC on the basis of such evidence.[68]

If the wife died within one year of marriage by consuming poison and there was no evidence to prove that there was any ill-treatment or cruelty on the deceased after her marriage for/on account of non-fulfilment of dowry demand soon before her death or any point of time, the deceased during her stay at her parents place never stated about4065 the alleged ill-treatment or harassment, the dying declaration was not worthy of credence as the same was made by her in an unconscious state of mind, the charges under ss 304B and 498A, IPC, were found not proved.[69] Where, no evidence was produced by the prosecution to show that the deceased-wife was treated with cruelty immediately prior to the occurrence by the accused, and the defence version was that the deceased had taken a poisonous substance for effecting an abortion, appeared to be probable, the conviction of the accused under s 498A was not found proper.[70] In view of the improvements in evidence adduced in the case, the accused no. 1 (husband) was convicted under s 498A, while accused no. 2 (father-in-law) and 3 (mother-in-law) were acquitted of the charge.[71]

The wife died of burn injuries while she was preparing tea, but prosecution evidence showed that the deceased was subjected to harassment in connection with the demand of dowry by the appellants, husband, his mother and brother's wife. The fact that the appellant brother's wife was living separately from the deceased was immaterial. The conviction of the three appellants under s 498A, IPC was held proper.[72]

The plea that there was no electricity in the village, therefore, there cannot be a demand for a TV set is not tenable since TV sets can be operated by using a battery.[73] The performance of muklawa of the younger sister of the victim-wife does not belie the case of harassment alleged against the accused. The non-production of the letters written by the deceased wife about ill-treatment is not sufficient to disprove the prosecution case.[74] Each and every aspect of cruelty inflicted on the deceased need not to be mentioned either in the FIR or spoken to by every witness put into the witness box. The infliction of cruelty is a continuous course of conduct and if one or the other of the witnesses have omitted to mention any one part of infliction of such cruelty, it would only show their retentive memory and cannot wipe out the case of infliction of cruelty altogether.[75] Merely because there is no consistency as to the exact amount demanded by the husband at different times, it is no ground to reject the evidence of such witnesses.[76] Death of the deceased was caused by strangulation and burning within seven years of her marriage at her matrimonial home. Evidence of the father and other relatives of the deceased about the persistent demand for Maruti car and harassment and cruelty meted out to the deceased was found reliable and believed. Both the husband and mother-in-law were convicted under ss 304B and 498A, IPC .[77]

The only evidence against the appellant husband was of a neighbor who was examined after about two months of the alleged date of occurrence. Though the evidence appeared to be sufficient to bring in application of s 498A, there was4066 definite inadequacy of evidence to attract s 304B, IPC . Conviction of the appellant husband under s 498A, IPC was maintained.[78]

Even if the accused has demanded Rs 15000 from his wife to be brought from her parents, it will not bring the case either within the ambit of s 304B or s 498A, IPC, in the absence of evidence that she was being treated with cruelty on account of such demand.[79]

67. Suicide Note

Suicide note written by the deceased in her handwriting signed by her exculpated the accused husband and in-laws. Reasonable doubt was created about prosecution story. Accused husband was acquitted of the charge under s 304B and s 498A, IPC .[80]

68. Non-examination of Neighbours and Independent Witnesses and Examination of close Relatives

The abuse and insult hurled at the daughter-in-law usually is not expected to be made public so that the neighbours may have occasions to criticise the improper conduct of the accused and hold them with disrespect and contempt.[81] Ordinarily, it is not expected that physical torture or the abuses hurled at the wife by the husband and the mother-in-law should be made in such a way as to be noticed by the tenant living in the adjoining portions of the house when it is also not the case of the prosecution that the deceased was physically assaulted so violently that the neighbours came to know about such assault and it is also not the case that abuses used to be hurled loudly so that the tenants had occasions to hear them. It was therefore not necessary to examine neighbour or tenants to prove the prosecution case.[82] The offence of ill-treatment, cruelty to the wife is committed in closed door, where one can hardly expect any witness, much less independent witness. While deciding whether a woman was ill-treated by her husband or his relatives, various factors and circumstances are to be considered by the Courts. The demand of dowry, physical or mental cruelty shown towards wife, conduct of the husband and also the conduct of the relatives, conduct complained of, are all relevant.[83]

Merely because the independent witnesses are not examined, by itself, will not be a ground to discard the consistent and trustworthy testimony of close relatives of the deceased, notwithstanding the fact that the independent witnesses are present at the time of marriage and negotiation.[84] In such cases only the relatives can be witnesses.[85] If the evidence about physical and mental torture of the deceased has come from the mother, elder brother and the close relations, such depositions by close relations, who may be interested in the prosecution of the accused, need not be4067 discarded simply on the score of the absence of corroboration by independent witness. Whether the evidence of interested witness is worthy of credence is to be judged in the special facts of the case.[86]

In cases of harassment and cruel treatment to the wife, the events can occur only within the precincts of the matrimonial abode and the plausibility or possibility of such an occurrence, being known to persons other than the members of the family-fold, is rather bleak, if not impossible and to expect proof of such event by gathering evidence from independent quarters, is to look for something, which in the ordinary course of events, cannot at all be expected to happen. In such a situation, the best person, expected to speak is the victim of harassment and cruelty, namely, the wife, and the other members of the family-fold cannot be expected to support the cause of such a suffering wife. The other possible evidence could be the testimony of the parents of the victim or other kith and kin, provided the victim was able to contact or communicate with them about the suffering and harassment meted out to her, immediately after the occurrence, serving as res gestate or all relevant facts for the purpose of proving the facts in issue.[87]

In a dispute involving close family members, independent witnesses are seldom forthcoming. Moreover, it cannot be ignored that independent witnesses are not available these days and the prosecution has to call upon close relatives or friends to come support its case.[88]

69. Incriminating Evidence not put under Section 313 , CrPC --Effect

If an incriminating statement is not put to the accused in his examination under s 313, CrPC, the entire statement has to be eschewed from consideration.[89] If the incriminating statement of the deceased-wife made against the accused had not been put to them in their examination under s 313, CrPC, requiring them to offer an explanation in that regard, it shall vitiate the conviction of the accused under s 498A, IPC, and the other accused person under s 302, IPC, when the conviction was recorded on the sole basis of the said incriminating statement.[90]

70. Acquittal

When the main ingredients of s 498A, i.e., subjecting a woman to cruelty for non-fulfillment of demand of dowry is absolutely missing in the case as against some of the accused persons, they are entitled to acquittal.[91] In the absence of direct evidence regarding harassment or ill-treatment by the accused towards his wife, the conviction of the accused under s 498A is liable to be set aside.[92] Where the version of the wife was that the accused-husband after consuming liquor gave beatings to her resulting in injuries to her on the head whereby she could not open her eyes, the medical report, however, indicated her injuries to be simple in nature, the mother of the complainant-wife4068 gave an exaggerated version about her alleged injuries, there were improvements and contradictions in the version given in the FIR and none of the villagers were produced to support the allegations of habitual beatings by the accused-husband, the order acquitting the accused for the offence under s 498A, IPC was found proper.[1] If the parents of the deceased-wife did not lodge any police complaint about the alleged demand and torture for the same but filed the complaint only after the death of the deceased-wife and there was complete inaction on the part of the village panchayats, elders of family, etc., the acquittal of the accused after giving them the benefit of the doubt under ss 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act and under s 498A, IPC, is proper.[2] Where there was no specific allegation of harassment or cruelty and no evidence was adduced to connect husband and father-in-law with offence under s 498A, IPC, both the husband and his father were acquitted of the charge under s 498A, IPC .[3] In a dowry death case where there was no evidence showing that the accused aunt of the husband of the deceased made dowry demand or was present when any such demand was raised, she was acquitted of the charge under s 498A, IPC .[4]

Prosecution evidence about the demand of dowry viz. a thin gold chain made after six years of marriage was full of inconsistencies and as such was not found reliable. The medical evidence adduced showed that the deceased was suffering from mental depression, had mental, epilepsy and psychosis problem. The husband and his relatives, respondents were acquitted for offences under ss 306 and 498A, IPC .[5]

The father deposed that there was no ill-treatment by the husband and parents-in-law, only brother-in-law and sister-in-law ill treated her. The husband and parents of the deceased were acquitted of the charges under ss 304B, 306 and 498A, IPC .[6]

If the evidence on record showed that the deceased woman was undergoing mental suffering and unhappiness largely due to incompatibility of temperament and attitude and there was no evidence that the accused persons subjected the deceased to any cruelty, the conviction of the accused under s 498A, IPC, was not proper.[7] The deceased wife died due to poisoning. There was no evidence showing demand of dowry or harassment. Letter written by the deceased to the appellant prior to death showed cordial relations between the two. Accused husband was acquitted for offence under s 498A, IPC .[8]

Except the bald statements of the mother and brother of the deceased, there was no other evidence showing that the deceased had been subjected to cruelty and harassment prior to her death, which compelled the deceased to commit suicide. The accused husband and other relatives were acquitted of charges under ss 304B and4069 498A, IPC .[9] Evidence did not prove demand of dowry, ill-treatment or harassment. The deceased had received 99% burn injuries, was suffering from mental illness, her dying declaration was also not found reliable. Accused appellant was acquitted of charges under ss 304B, 306 and 498A, IPC .[10]The deceased wife died of poisoning within seven years of marriage. There was no evidence that the deceased prior to her death was subjected to cruelty. Presumption under s 113B of Evidence Act could not be drawn. The husband, his father and mother were acquitted of charges under ss 304B, 306, IPC and 498A IPC .[11] Where the woman had committed suicide at her husband/in-laws place within three years of her marriage, the allegations were against husband and in-laws of causing harassment to the deceased in connection with demand of dowry, the prosecution evidence did not inspire confidence, appellants were acquitted of charge under ss 498A and 306, IPC .[12]

Where the medical evidence proved that the deceased-wife died due to consumption of a poisonous pesticide, and there was categorical admission by the parents of the deceased that the accused-husband had a liking for the deceased, and the evidence of the prosecution witnesses were full of inconsistencies, there was no specific evidence against the main accused, i.e., husband of the deceased for the offence under s 498A, IPC, all other accused were acquitted by the trial court, the accused-husband was also found entitled to be acquitted.[13] The complaint was lodged by the wife after filing a suit for divorce by the accused-husband. The complainant wife did not make any allegation of cruelty/harassment in reply to the divorce petition. The decree of divorce was passed by the family court in the meantime and application for reconciliation of marriage was rejected. The complainant-wife was living with her mother for a long time, on these facts the accused was liable to be acquitted for charges under ss 498A and 406, IPC .[14] If there is no sufficient evidence of the dowry demand and even less the evidence of cruelty available on record and no independent person has been called to give evidence and the evidence of interested witness was tainted, the charge against the accused person cannot be sustained.[15]

Deceased daughter-in-law set fire to herself; she committed suicide within two years of her marriage. There was evidence that the deceased was unhappy as her husband was poor and illiterate. The mother-in-law used to ask the deceased to run hand driven flour mill. There was no direct evidence that the accused abetted the deceased to commit suicide. The mother-in-law was given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under ss 306 and 498A, IPC .[16]

71. Conviction

Where the bride committed suicide within four months of marriage, the evidence of her father that the accused-husband and the brother-in-law of his daughter demanded a tape recorder and cash soon after the marriage was corroborated by the evidence of other witnesses. The deceased on several occasions within a short span of four months of her marriage informed her father about the constant harassment by the accused-husband and her brother-in-law, and showed marks of beating. These facts clearly established that the accused created such difficult and hostile environment that she was compelled to commit suicide. There was direct and reasonable nexus of commission of suicide with the act of cruelty. So, the conviction under ss 498A and 306, IPC was found proper.[18]Where soon before her death, the deceased wife was subjected to harassment in connection with demand to give consent for second marriage, and the result of such harassment persistently pestering the deceased wife to give consent for second marriage is spoken to by the witness, the same is acceptable and can be acted upon. The deceased wife had become frustrated, and she administered poison to her three minor sons and ended her life by consuming poison and committed suicide due to the act of the accused/husband on these facts. The acquittal of the accused was liable to be set aside by convicting him for the offence under ss 498A and 306, IPC . The court should also take judicial note of the fact that no wife will be prepared to give consent for second marriage and it is always their habit to possess their husband.[19] Where there was torture and assault to the victim lady by the husband and in-laws because of non-fulfillment of the demand of wrist-watch as a dowry after the marriage, which was proved by the evidence of witnesses, the conviction of the accused under s 498A and ss 3 and 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961 was proper.[20] When there was reliable evidence of the elder sister, grand father of the deceased, complainant and neighbours that the deceased was mentally harassed for dowry, cruelty was meted out to the deceased before the death, conviction of the appellant for offence under ss 498A, 304B and 306, IPC was held proper.[21]

There was reliable evidence of the father and also the dying declaration of the deceased establishing harassment meted out to the deceased by the appellant husband, his conviction under s 498A, IPC was held proper.[22]

Testimony of the father of the deceased that the accused husband and sister-in-law tortured the deceased for non-fulfillment of dowry demand was corroborated by FIR and the letter written by the deceased prior to death. Conviction of the two accused under s 498A, IPC was held justified.[23]4071

Where the wife for failure to satisfy dowry demand raised by her appellant husband was subjected to cruelty and set herself on fire, the theory of accidental fire by kerosene stove was ruled out, the appellant did not take any step to save her, the appellant was convicted under ss 306 and 498A, IPC .[24]

See also the cases where the accused was/were convicted on the charge under s 498A, IPC .[25]

Ordinarily, a woman is subjected to cruelty and physical violence by the husband, a married sister-in-law would not join her brother in giving beating to his wife. The father-in-law, mother-in-law, and married sister for want of evidence were acquitted of the charges under ss 498A and 304B, IPC .[26]

72. Accused Acquitted for other Offences cannot be Convicted under Section 498A on the same set of Evidence

The accused persons should not be convicted under s 498A, IPC on the basis of same set of evidences, which were not found trustworthy by the trial court for acquitting the appellants of the charges under ss 307 and 406 of the IPC and s 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961.[27]

73. Accused Charged with and Acquitted under Section 302 cannot be Convicted under Section 306 and Section 498A

The accused charged with s 302, IPC, and acquitted of the said charge, cannot be convicted under ss 306 and 498A, IPC . The reason is that the offences under s 498A and 306, IPC, are of distinct and different categories. While the basic constituent of an offence under s 302, IPC, is homicidal death and those of s 306 read with s 498A, IPC, is suicidal death and abetment thereof, the offences under ss 306 and 498A, IPC, are not minor offences in relation to the offence under s 302, IPC .[28]

74. Accused Charged under Section 302 or Section 304B cannot be Convicted under Section 306 or Section 498A

Commentary under the headings in s 304B, vol 3, may be referred to.

75. Accused Acquitted under Section 302 can be Convicted under Section 498A --Power of the Supreme Court under Article 142 of Constitution

If the police had framed chargesheet against the accused under s 302, IPC, and also alternatively under s 498A, but the trial court framed charge under s 302 which is4072 obviously for a graver offence and did not think it fit to frame any charge under s 498A, but the evidence on record clearly attracts the said charge under s 498A though the charge under s 302, IPC, is not established, the Supreme Court in exercise of the powers under art 142 of the Constitution of India instead of remanding the proceeding for re-trial after framing charge under s 498A and to obtain protraction of trial and multiplicity of proceedings against the accused, can convict the accused under s 498A, IPC .[29]

76. Accused Acquitted under Section 304B can be Convicted under Section 498A

If the accused is charged of causing dowry death under s 304B, IPC and also harassment and cruelty under s 498A, IPC but are found not guilty under s 304B, the offence under s 498A does not fail. If the charge under s 498A is established, the accused can be convicted under s 498A, IPC .[30] As the charge under s 498A, IPC is distinct from the offence under s 304B, IPC, an accused acquitted of charge under s 304B, IPC can be convicted under s 498A, IPC .[31]

77. Accused Charged under Section 498A can be Convicted under Section 306 as well

If the accused is convicted under s 498A for subjecting his wife to cruelty, on the same evidence, he can be convicted for abetment of suicide of his wife under s 306, IPC, with the aid of s 221, CrPC, and the presumption under s 113A, Evidence Act, can be raised against him. The fact that the specific charge under s 306 was not framed against the accused would not preclude the court from convicting the accused for the offence under s 306, IPC, found proved against the accused.[32] However, if only charges under s 498A and 304B, IPC, are framed against the accused, the conviction of the accused under s 306, is not proper, as s 306, IPC, cannot be said to be a minor offence in relation to s 304B, IPC, within the meaning of s 222, CrPC .[33]

78. Conviction under Section 498A, Section 306 and Section 304 --No Double Jeopardy

Commentary under the same heading in s 304B, vol 3, may be referred to.

79. Sentence--General

Dealing with the concept of corrective jurisprudence, Roscoe Pound[34] had observed that law regulates social interests, arbitrates conflicting interests, claims and demands. Criminal law reflects the wishes of interest groups, Friedman[35] observed that, 'State of Criminal law continues to be--as it should be--a decisive reflection of social consciousness of a society.' Jerome Hall[36] states that, 'Security of person and4073 property of all citizens is an essential requisite of good Government, and this can be achieved through the instrumentality of criminal law.'

It is true that the corrective machinery makes itself felt through its sentencing process, by deft modulation of sentences, stern where it should be, and tempered with mercy where it warrants to be. This is an area where precise scales or evaluation standards are not available. A computerised situation cannot be thought of. Changing vicissitudes have reigned the sentencing scene. From a draconian sentencing process which led to the hanging of a nine-year old girl in the sixteenth century, extreme attitudes of reformation and curative process had gained currency. As Jack Gibbs[37]stated, 'Any legal theory of behaviour must assume that people by and large do not want to be punished and will act so as to avoid fines, jail, whipping or electric chair. That means a threat of real punishment will deter.'

The classical school of criminology was based on hedonistic psychology. Man governs his behaviour by considerations of pleasure and pain.

John Spenser said[38] 'Algebric sum of pleasure and pain must be balanced.' Undoubtedly, there is a cross cultural conflict, where living law must find answers to new challenges and courts are required to evolve new heads of public policy. Viscount Simonds highlighted the imperatives and identified new heads of public policy in what is known as the Lady's Directory Case,[39] wherein it was observed that 'Reformative and curative jurisprudence have been found to be not entirely responsive. Deterrence is surely a component of the sentencing system.' In other words:[40]

> If one rascal out of 20 men might aggress at will, the higher forms of control would break down. Man after man would be detached from the honest majority. This deadly contagion of lawlessness would spread till social order lay in ruins. Law therefore is still the comer-stone of the edifice of order.

There appears to be further support from several other learned authors who explain the view that deterrence must form part of the sentencing process. In the words of Parker, CJ, 'protection of society and stamping out of criminal adventures must be the object of law and this must be achieved through a proper sentencing policy.' The same view was voiced by Butler J of the US Supreme Court Nice v Minnesota (sic):[41]

> Society could not long endure under such threats. If the courts did not protect the injured, the injured parties would then resort to private vengeance.

There can be little doubt, therefore, that overzealous judicial dispensation can invite ridicule.[42] Our Supreme Court, in the case of State of Punjab v Mann Singh ,[43] has observed:

> It is the duty of the court in every case to award proper sentence having regard to the nature of the offence, and the manner in which it was committed. There is no4074 compulsion that a jail sentence must be awarded and it is for this reason that the option of awarding either a jail sentence or a fine or both is left to the discretion of the court. If it appears to the court on an overall view of the case that a jail sentence would serve the ends of justice, such a punishment would be in order.

While awarding the punishment, the consequences of such punishment and the point of time when it is awarded are relevant. If it appears to the court that a heavy fine would be more in consonance with the facts of the case, like for instance where the wife has complained that she has suffered gravely, it may be some form of retribution to direct the husband to compensate her monetarily.[44]

80. Sentence (Lenient)

There is no compulsion that a jail sentence must be awarded and it is for this reason that the option of awarding either a jail sentence or a fine or both is left to the discretion of the court,[45] under s 498A, IPC . In appropriate cases the imposition of imprisonment till rising of the court and payment of fine of Rs 150, in default to suffer rigorous imprisonment for one month do not call for any interference.[46] Where the accused was convicted and sentenced under s 498A, he and the victim both remarrying and living happily with their families, the accused had remained in custody for a little over 2 months, the sentence of 6 months simple imprisonment imposed on him was reduced to the period already undergone.[47] Where the trial continued for about 11 years and thereafter the appeal remained pending for about 8 years, the sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[48] Where the accused husband convicted under s 498A, IPC had aged parents and also three children from the second wife, who are to be educated, the sentence of six months imposed by the Courts below was reduced to the period already undergone.[49] The husband appellant convicted under s 498A and sentenced to three years RI had already undergone sentence of two years and eight months, his sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[50]

Considering the age of the father-in-law and mother-in-law found guilty and sentenced to one year RI for offence under s 498A, the sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[51]

In a case of cruelty and alleged dowry death in which s 304B, IPC was not found to be attracted, the sentence of the accused under s 498A, IPC was reduced from three years imprisonment to three months imprisonment in the interest of the children of the accused and their safety in society.[52] In another case where the harassment to the wife was not complained of immediately, the sentence of imprisonment was reduced4075 to the period already undergone by the accused.[53] The prosecution was launched more than a decade before. The accused father-in-law and mother-in-law of the victim were aged 80 years and 75 years respectively. The accused had already undergone custody during pre and post trial period. Keeping in view the mitigating circumstances the sentence of imprisonment of 1½ years awarded to the accused person was reduced to the period already undergone by them.[54]

Where the incident took place about 14 years ago and both the accused-husband and his mother were in custody for about two months and the said accused-mother was aged 60 years, the sentence of imprisonment was reduced to the period already undergone.[55] Where, the complaint was recalcitrant to some extent in resolving dispute between the parties, the sentence of rigorous imprisonment of three years was reduced to rigorous imprisonment for six months.[56] The accused-husband was convicted under s 498A and sentenced to undergone imprisonment for six months. The aggrieved wife filed an affidavit in the court stating that she had the apprehension that if the sentence is to be undergone by him for the remaining period, the expected peace would allude the couple. Therefore, the Apex Court reduced the sentence to the period already undergone by the accused.[57]

81. Sentence(s) to Run Concurrently

Where the appellant husband was employed in Gulf countries, paid casual visits in India, there were differences between the appellant and the wife deceased, on the day of the incident, mediation was to take place, however, the wife committed suicide same day, the sentences awarded to the accused for offences under ss 498A and 306, IPC were ordered to run concurrently.[58]

82. Sentence (Deterrent)

The fact that the accused is neither a habitual criminal nor does he have any criminal antecedents is hardly any argument available while dealing with matrimonial cruelty, because, undoubtedly, in most cases the husband will not have a criminal record.[59] The essence of prescribing punishment for matrimonial cruelty in the IPC will be frustrated in unproven instances of cruelty where a court was to bend to the multifarious pleas for leniency. A proper and meaningful application of law will not permit misguided clemency.[60] The legislature has by amending the IPC and Evidence Act made penal law more strident for dealing with and punishing offence against married women. Such strident laws would have a deterrent effect on the offenders4076 only if they are so stridently implemented by the courts to achieve the legislative intent.[61] This is a class of offences which can only be categorised as atrocious. The court cannot be oblivious to the horrifying levels of suffering that the wife has been subjected to over a long period of time, the unpardonable level to callousness and brazenness that are involved in the infliction of such levels of cruelty which indicate that it is a reaction on the human mind, i.e., the mental torture undergone by the wife which is far more painful than even the worst forms of physical torture and that the commission of the suicide itself is indicative of the utter desperation to which the victim is subjected.[62]

A young girl in her early twenties ending her life with 100% burns within eight months of her marriage due to ill treatment by mother-in-law cannot be overlooked to show sympathy towards the mother-in-law found guilty for offences under ss 498A and 304B, IPC .[63]

If it appears to the court that the sentence imposed on the accused is grossly inadequate having regard to the gravity of the offence, it will not hesitate to impose an adequate sentence on the accused even though the effect of its order will be to send the accused back to jail once more.[64]

It was observed by the court in Roman v Francis :[65]

> Inadequate sentences can do harm to the system. Law must meet the challenges that criminalisation offers. Maudlin sentiments, bordering on tottering weakness cannot masquerade or reformative sentiments cannot do service for a rational sentence system. Misconceived liberalism cannot be countenanced.

The accused, a police officer and an educated person subjected his wife to incessant cruelty to the point of leaving no option but to commit suicide, was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for two years and pay a fine in the sum of Rs 10000, in default to undergo simple imprisonment for six months under s 498A, IPC .[66]

83. Accused Sentenced under Section 304B need not be Sentenced under Section 498A

From the point of view of practice and procedure and to avoid technical defects, it is necessary in cases attracting ss 304B and 498A, IPC to frame charges under both the sections. If the case is established the accused can be convicted under both the sections but no separate sentence need be awarded under s 498A in view of the substantive sentence being awarded for the major offence under s 304B, IPC .[67]

84. Appeal

In an appeal from an order of acquittal the powers of the High Court to reassess the evidence and reach its own conclusions are as extensive as in an appeal against an4077 order of conviction, yet, as a rule of prudence, it should always give proper weight and consideration to such matters as:

(a) the views of the trial judge as to the credibility of the witnesses;
(b) the presumption of innocence in favour of the accused, a presumption certainly not weakened by the fact that he has been acquitted at the trial;
(c) the right of the accused to the benefit of any doubt; and
(d) the slowness of an appellate court in disturbing a finding of fact arrived at by a judge who had the advantage of seeing the witnesses.

Where two reasonable conclusions can be drawn on the evidence on record, the High Court should as a matter of judicial caution, refrain from interfering with the order of acquittal recorded by the court below. In other words, if the main grounds on which the court below has based its order acquitting the accused, are reasonable and plausible, and cannot be entirely and effectively dislodged or demolished, the High Court should not disturb the acquittal.[68]

85. Second Revision at the Instance of the State--Suo Motu Powers of the High Court

Under s 397(1) read with s 401, CrPC, the revisional powers can be exercised by the High Court either on a petition made by a party or suo motu by the court. The bar contained under sub-s 3 of s 397, CrPC, would only debar a party from invoking the revisional powers of this court for second time having once availed such a remedy before the sessions judge. This bar will not operate to exercise suo motu powers by the High Court.[69] The Supreme Court in Krishnan v Krishnaveni ,[70] while dealing with the question whether the inherent powers of the High Court were still available under s 482, CrPC, in view of the bar of the second revision petition under sub-s 3 of s 397, CrPC, held that ordinarily when revision has been barred under s 397(3) of the CrPC, a person-accused/complainant cannot be allowed to take recourse to revision to the High Court under s 397(1), CrPC or under the inherent powers of the High Court under s 482, CrPC, since it may amount to circumvention of the provisions of s 397(3) or s 397(2), CrPC . It was further observed that the High Court has suo motu power under s 401 and continuous supervisory jurisdiction under s 482, CrPC . Similarly, when the High Court on examination of the record finds that there is grave miscarriage of justice or abuse of the process of the courts or the required statutory procedure has not been complied with or there is failure of justice or order passed or sentence imposed by the magistrate requires correction, it is but the duty of the High Court to have it corrected at the inception lest grave miscarriage of justice would ensure.

In view of the observations made by the Supreme Court in the above referred case, the suo motu powers under s 397 read with s 401, CrPC, have been preserved and the bar under sub-s 3 of s 397, CrPC, would not operate to exercise of such suo motu powers of the High Court.[71]4078

There is yet another significant aspect of the case when second revision petition has been preferred by the state. The Supreme Court in Krishnan v Krishnaveni ,[72] while dealing with words 'any person', appearing in sub-s 3 of s 397, CrPC, has held that the state does not fall within the ambit of 'any person' and, therefore, a second revision petition at the instance of the state would not be barred under sub-s 3 of s 397, CrPC .[73]

86. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 498A

If the charge against the accused for murdering his mistress was not established, but as per the case of the accused the deceased committed suicide, and in the circumstances of the case it could only be held that she committed suicide being unable to bear the cruelty and harassment meted out by the accused, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC, recorded by the trial court is liable to be altered to s 498A, IPC .[74]

87. Alteration of Conviction from Section 304B to Section 498A

Commentary under the same heading in s 304B, vol 3, may be referred to.

88. Alteration of Conviction from Section 306 to Section 498A

If the ingredients of abetment are totally found lacking in the commission of suicide by the wife, but the harassment to the deceased-wife by the accused is established, the conviction of the accused under s 306, IPC, is liable to be altered to s 498A, IPC, though the accused was charged with s 306 only and not under s 498A, IPC .[75]

89. Juvenile accused

Accused convicted under s 498A, IPC, was aged 17 years on the date of filing of FIR, her case ought to have been sent to Juvenile Board, her trial stood vitiated; as such her order of conviction was set aside.[76]40794080

Chapter XXI

Of Defamation

TOPICAL INTRODUCTION

It is a fundamental principle, long established that the freedom of speech and of the press which is secured by the Constitution does not confer an absolute right to speak or publish, without responsibility, whatever one may choose, or an unrestricted and unbridled license that gives immunity for every possible use of language, and prevents the punishment of those who abuse this freedom. Reasonably limited, it was said by Story in the passage cited, this freedom is an inestimable privilege in a free government; without such limitation, it might become a scourge of the republic.[1]Freedom of speech and expression under art 19(1)(a) of the Constitution cannot be taken to mean absolute freedom to say or write whatever a person chooses recklessly and without regard to any person's honour and reputation. Indeed the right has its own natural limitation. Article 19(2) of the Constitution in this behalf contains safeguards of reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right.[2]Under s 499, IPC, only such imputation as are malicious and reckless and not for public good, tranquillity or peace or public security or as are not made in good faith, have been brought within the definition of defamation which is but the abuse of the freedom of speech and expression punishable under s 500, IPC . Therefore, the provisions of s 499, IPC cannot be said to place any unreasonable restriction on the freedom of speech or expression. Hence, s 499, IPC, is not violative of art 19 of the Constitution . The Constitution does not grant immunity from all punishments of abuse of freedom of speech and the accused can be put to answer criminally for the breach of reasonable restrictions on his freedom of speech or for his abuse of the freedom of speech. Punishment is not a restriction in itself, but is indeed a consequence of the breach of restriction which the defaulter cannot escape.[3]Section 499, IPC has a large number of exceptions. They cover the entire field of privileges available in cases of defamatory statements. In fact, these privileges represent the freedom of speech and expression which is the foundation of all democratic institutions. However, while a considerable latitude is allowed in respect of these privileges, they are also subject to a large number of conditions. Loss of life and loss of reputation are two things which cannot be compensated in terms of money. Reputation, especially is something which is a treasure to a person.[4] The4081 provisions of this chapter act as deterrent against the commission of the offence of defamation. However, due to restrictions imposed in s 199, CrPC, it is the aggrieved person and when he is incapable, a proper person on his behalf can set the criminal law in motion against the person accused. The chapter consists of the following four sections:

(a) Section 499 : It defines the offence of defamation along with four explanations and three illustrations. The section also has ten exceptions to the offence of defamation.
(b) Section 500 : The offence of defamation as defined under s 499 is punishable under this section with simple imprisonment which may extend upto two years, or with fine, or with both.
(c) Section 501 : The offence under this section is distinct from an offence under s 500 .[5] Printing or engraving matter known to be defamatory is made punishable under this section though the sentence prescribed is the same as prescribed in the preceding section.
(d) Section 502 : The sale of printed or engraved substance containing defamatory matter is made punishable under this section. The sentence prescribed is the same as in the preceding two sections.

Chapter XXI

Of Defamation

S. 499.

Defamation.--

Whoever, by words either spoken or intended to be read, or by signs or by visible representations, makes or publishes any imputation concerning any person intending to harm, or knowing or having reason to believe that such imputation will harm, the reputation of such person, is said, except in the cases hereinafter excepted, to defame that person.

Explanation 1.-- It may amount to defamation to impute anything to a deceased person, if the imputation would harm the reputation of that person if living, and is intended to be hurtful to the feelings of his family or other near relatives.

Explanation 2.-- It may amount to defamation to make an imputation concerning a company or an association or collection of persons as such.

Explanation 3.-- An imputation in the form of an alternative or expressed ironically, may amount to defamation.

Explanation 4.-- No imputation is said to harm a person's reputation, unless that imputation directly or indirectly, in the estimation of others, lowers the moral or intellectual character of that person, or lowers the character of that person in respect of his caste or of his calling, or lowers the credit of that person, or causes it to be believed that the body of that person is in a loathsome state, or in a state generally considered as disgraceful.

(b) A is asked who stole B's watch. A points to Z, intending to cause it to be believed that Z stole B's watch. This is defamation, unless it fall within one of the exceptions.4082

(c) A draws a picture of Z running away with B's watch, intending it to be believed that Z stole B's watch. This is defamation, unless it fall within one of the exceptions.

First Exception.-- Imputation of truth which public good requires to be made or published.--It is not defamation to impute anything which is true concerning any person, if it be for the public good that the imputation should be made or published. Whether or not it is for the public good is a question of fact.

Second Exception.-- Public conduct of public servants.--It is not defamation to express in good faith any opinion whatever respecting the conduct of a public servant in the discharge of his public functions, or respecting his character, so far as his character appears in that conduct, and no further.

Third Exception.-- Conduct of any person touching any public question.--It is not defamation to express in good faith any opinion whatever respecting the conduct of any person touching any public question, and respecting his character, so far as his character appears in that conduct, and no further.

Illustration

It is not defamation in A to express in good faith any opinion whatever respecting Z's conduct in petitioning government on a public question, in signing a requisition for a meeting on a public question, in presiding or attending at such meeting, in forming or joining any society which invites the public support, in voting or canvassing for a particular candidate for any situation in the efficient discharge of the duties of which the public is interested.

Fourth Exception.--Publication of reports of proceedings of courts.--It is not defamation to publish a substantially true report of the proceedings of a court of justice, or of the result of any such proceedings.

Explanation.-- A justice of the peace or other officer holding an enquiry in open court preliminary to a trial in a court of justice, is a court within the meaning of the above section.

Fifth Exception.--Merits of a case decided in court or conduct of witnesses and others concerned.--It is not defamation to express in good faith any opinion whatever respecting the merits of any case, civil or criminal, which has been decided by a court of justice, or respecting the conduct of any person as a party, witness or agent, in any such case, or respecting the character of such person, as far as his character appears in that conduct, and no further.

(a) A says--"I think Z's evidence on that trial is so contradictory that he must be stupid or dishonest". A is within this exception if he says this in good faith, inasmuch as the opinion which he expresses respects Z's character as it appears in Z's conduct as a witness, and no further.

(b) But if A says--"I do not believe what Z asserted at that trial, because I know him to be a man without veracity;" A is not within this exception, inasmuch as the opinion which he expresses of Z's character is an opinion not founded on Z's conduct as a witness.

Sixth Exception.--Merits of public performance.-- It is not defamation to express in good faith any opinion respecting the merits of any performance which its author has submitted to the judgment of the public, or respecting the4083 character of the author so far as his character appears in such performance, and no further.

Explanation.-- A performance may be submitted to the judgment of the public expressly or by acts on the part of the author which imply such submission to the judgment of the public.

(a) A person who publishes a book, submits that book to the judgment of the public.
(b) A person who makes a speech in public, submits that speech to the judgment of the public.
(c) An actor or singer who appears on a public stage, submits his acting or singing to the judgment of the public.
(d) A says of a book published by Z--"Z's book is foolish; Z must be a weak man. Z's book is indecent; Z must be a man of impure mind." A is within this exception, if he says this in good faith, inasmuch as the opinion which he expresses of Z respects Z's character only so far as it appears in Z's book, and no further.
(e) But if A says--"I am not surprised that Z's book is foolish and indecent, for he is a weak man and a libertine". A is not within this exception, inasmuch as the opinion which he expresses of Z's character is an opinion not founded on Z's book.

Seventh Exception.--Censure passed in good faith by person having lawful authority over another.--It is not defamation in a person having over another any authority, either conferred by law or arising out of a lawful contract made with that other, to pass in good faith any censure on the conduct of that other in matters to which such lawful authority relates.

Illustration

A judge censuring in good faith the conduct of a witness, or of an officer of the court; a head of a department censuring in good faith those who are under his orders; a parent censuring in good faith a child in the presence of other children; a schoolmaster, whose authority is derived from a parent, censuring in good faith a pupil in the presence of other pupils; a master censuring a servant in good faith for remissness in service; a banker censuring in good faith the cashier of his bank for the conduct of such cashier as such cashier--are within this exception.

Eighth Exception.--Accusation preferred in good faith to authorised person.--It is not defamation to prefer in good faith an accusation against any person to any of those who have lawful authority over that person with respect to the subject-matter of accusation.

Illustration

If A in good faith accuses Z before a magistrate; if A in good faith complains of the conduct of Z, a servant, to Z's master; if A in good faith complains of the conduct of Z, a child, to Z's father,--A is within this exception.

Ninth Exception.--Imputation made in good faith by person for protection of his or other's interests.--It is not defamation to make an imputation on the character of another provided that the imputation be made in good faith for the protection of the interests of the person making it, or of any other person, or for the public good.4084

Illustrations

(a) A, a shopkeeper, says to B, who manages his business--"Sell nothing to Z unless he pays you ready money, for I have no opinion of his honesty". A is within the exception, if he has made this imputation on Z in good faith for the protection of his own interests.
(b) A, a magistrate, in making a report to his own superior officer, casts an imputation on the character of Z. Here, if the imputation is made in good faith, and for the public good, A is within the exception.

Tenth Exception.--Caution intended for good of person to whom conveyed or for public good.-- It is not defamation to convey a caution, in good faith, to one person against another, provided that such caution be intended for the good of the person to whom it is conveyed, or of some person in whom that person is interested, or for the public good.4085

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines the offence of defamation with the aid of four explanations and ten exceptions with more explanations and illustrations appended to the exceptions.[6] The framers of IPC observed that the essence of the offence of defamation consists in its tendency to cause that description of pain, which is felt by a person who knows himself to be the object of the unfavourable sentiments of his fellow-creatures, and those inconveniences to which a person, who is the object of such unfavourable sentiments, is exposed.[7]

The criminal law of India with regard to defamation depends on the construction of this section, and not on what is the English law on the subject.[8]4086

Whether the publication of defamatory words or uttering defamatory words, heard and listened to by people takes place in a proceeding in a court room or outside the court precincts does not matter as long as the defamatory words are intended to harm the reputation of another.[9]

2. Law of Canada

It is an indictable offence to publish a defamatory libel, or s 300 where the accused knows the libel to be false. A defamatory libel is matter published, without lawful justification or excuse, that is likely to injure the reputation of any person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule, or that is designed to insult the person of or concerning whom it is published. The libel may be expressed directly or by insinuation or irony in words legibly marked on any substance, or by any object signifying a defamatory libel otherwise than by words. The definition must be read in the context of the statutory purpose to protect the reputation of individuals. As a criminal statute, the Code must be interpreted so as to give the accused the greatest protection possible. The phrase 'or that is designed to insult the person' should be read as requiring proof of a grave insult. Defamatory libel is defined in a manner that provides an intelligible standard of conduct. The phrase 'is likely to injure' was constitutionally valid, and there was no need to show actual injury. A person 'publishes' a libel when he shows or delivers it, or causes it to be shown or delivered, with an intent that it should be read or seen by any other person.

Purpose

Parliament's primary aim was the protection of reputation rather than that of preventing breaches of the peace. The goal of protecting reputation is a pressing and substantial objective in Canadian society. Common law concepts and principles of libel are useful in interpreting ss 298-300 . The basic definition of libel is the publication to a third person of words or matter containing an untrue imputation against the reputation of another. There are two aspects of the mens rea of the offence: First, did the accused intend to defame the complainant? Secondly, did the accused knew that the statements they published were false?[10]

3. Section 499 is not Violative of Article 19 of the Constitution

Under s 499, IPC, only such imputations as are malicious and reckless and not for public good, tranquillity or peace or public security or as are not made in good faith, have been brought within the definition of defamation which is but the abuse of freedom of speech and expression punishable under s 500, IPC . Therefore, the provisions of s 499 cannot be said to place any unreasonable restriction on the freedom of speech or expression. Hence, s 499, IPC, is not violative of art 19 of the Constitution of India .[11]

5. Section 504 Distinguished from Section 499

Commentary under the same heading in s 504, post, may be referred to.

6. Ingredients

The offence of defamation consists of three essential ingredients:[12]

(a) there must be a making or publishing of an imputation concerning a person;
(b) such imputation must have been made by words, either spoken or intended to be read, or by signs or by visible representations; and
(c) the said imputation must have been made with the intention to harm, or with knowledge or reasonable belief that it will harm, the reputation of the person concerned.

For detailed commentary, text under the same heading in s 500, post, may be referred to.

Unless mala fide intention is specifically alleged, no offence under s 499, IPC is disclosed, especially when positive allegation is otherwise.[13]

7. Mens Rea

For the purpose of attracting the offence under s 499, IPC, mens rea is an ingredient to be proved. No offence of defamation will lie if there is no mens rea.[14] Where the accused is a bank, registered under the provisions of the Indian Companies Act and it is only a juristic person and not a real person, in such cases, mens rea cannot be attributed to a juristic person. If mens rea cannot be attributed to such person, then, no offence under s 500 of the IPC can be attracted against such persons.[15]

One of the essential ingredients to constitute an offence under s 499, IPC is either intention to harm or knowledge or reasons to believe that such imputation will harm the reputation of the other. Therefore, an artificial/juristic persons cannot be prosecuted for offence under s 500, IPC .[16]

Commentary under the same heading in s 300, vol 3, may be referred to.

8. Defamation and Contempt of Court

It has to be always kept in mind that the law of defamation under the IPC cannot be equated with the law of contempt of court in general terms.[17] The Privy Council in Surender Nath v Chief Justice and Judges of the High Court ,[18] observed that 'although contempt may include defamation, yet an offence of contempt is something4088 more than mere defamation and is of a different character'. Approving the aforesaid view Supreme Court in Bathina Ramakrishna Reddy v State of Madras held:[19]

> When the act of defaming a Judge is calculated to obstruct or interfere with the due course of justice or proper administration of law, it would certainly amount to contempt. The offence of contempt is really a wrong done to the public by weakening the authority and influence of courts of law which exist for their good. As was said by Willmot CJ Wilmot's Opinion p 256; Rex v Davis 30 at pp 40-41,'attacks upon the judges excite in the minds of the people a general dissatisfaction with all judicial determinations...and whenever man's allegiance to the laws is so fundamentally shaken it is the most fatal and dangerous obstruction of justice and in my opinion claim out for a more rapid and immediate redress than any judges as private individuals but because they are the channels by which the King's justice is conveyed to the people.

What is made punishable in the IPC is the offence of defamation as defamation and not as contempt of court. Contempt of court proceedings can certainly be taken under s 2, Contempt of Courts Act, quite apart from the fact that other remedy may be open to the aggrieved officer under s 499, IPC . However, a libel attacking the integrity of a judge may not in the circumstances of a particular case amount to a contempt at all, although it may be the subject-matter of libel proceeding. This is clear from the observation of the Judicial Committee in the case of the matter of a special reference from the Bahamas Islands.[20]

Even a person claiming the benefit of second exception to s 499 of the IPC, is required to show that the opinion expressed by him was in good faith which related to the conduct of a public servant in the discharge of his public functions or respecting his character so far as his character appears in that conduct. Under the law of contempt, statements made in pleading, petitions and affidavits of the parties, in a number of cases, have been held defamatory statements amounting to offences under the section, unless it is shown that they fall within any of the exceptions.[21] The statements made in an affidavit filed in the court was held to amount to a criminal contempt by this court in Re Sanjiv Datta Deputy Secretary's Ministry New Delhi & ors.[22] The benefit of the exception even under the law of defamation much less in contempt proceedings may not be available if the insinuations are made against an institutions of the state and not restricted to the person as an individual or a collection of persons.

9. 'Whoever'

Under this section, a wife can complain against the husband, and vice versa, if there is a defamation,[23] on the principle that the wife and husband do not constitute a single person for the purposes of criminal law.[24] However, a company cannot be held to have committed an offence under this section.[25]4089

10. 'By Signs or by Visible Representations'

Defamation of a person may caused by words, spoken or intended to be read, or by signs, or by visible representations. Words 'by signs or by visible representations' are wide enough to convey defamatory statements in the form of a statute, caricature, or effigy, etc. Thus, making and publicly exhibiting an effigy of a person, calling it by the person's name and beating it with shoes, would be defamatory.[26] A photo, published in a newspaper with a false caption depicting the complainant as one of the soldiers of goonda war, was held to be defamatory.[27]

11. 'Makes'

The word 'makes' has been used in s 499, IPC, in its etymological sense as connoting to make public or to make known to people in general.[28] The gist of the offence of defamation lies in the dissemination of the harmful imputation. When a defamatory statement is published, it is not only the publisher, but also the maker, who becomes responsible.[29] Even if a journalist types only from the written materials, received from a person or persons who remain anonymous, and gives shape to the article, he would still be held to be the maker of the article.[30] However, it has been held, in Sunilakhaya Chowdhury v HM Jadwet ,[31] that the word 'makes' is intended to refer to the originator of the imputation. The mechanic, or the compositor, or the press neither 'makes', nor 'publishes', the matter that may be impugned as defamatory.

In a petition under s 500, IPC, the question before the court is whether the respondent made the allegations, against the petitioner, as alleged in the petition, and, if made, whether they were false. Similarly, the burden is on the petitioner to prove that the respondent did make the allegations and that they were false. It is not upon the respondent to show that he did not make the allegations or that they were not false.[32]Section 499, IPC, brings under the criminal law, the person who makes defamatory imputation. There can be no offence of defamation unless the defamatory statement was either made or published by the accused. If there is no evidence that the accused has either made or published the defamatory imputation, the matter comes to an end and the further question of justification or whether there was express malice would not arise.[33]

12. 'Publishes'

The word 'publishes' means to make known to others. Though, in common parlance the word 'publication' is usually understood in the sense of making the contents known to the public, yet the meaning of this expression is not limited in law.[34] Publication of defamatory matter involves the communication of it to some person4090 other than the person to whom the defamatory matter relates.[35]For publication, it is sufficient if the accused intentionally does an act which has the quality of communicating the alleged libel to a third person or third persons generally.[36] The dictation of a letter by the writer of it is publication,[37] or imputations concerning a person, calculated to harm his reputation in a plaint,[38] or in a sworn affidavit in court,[39] or in an application to an officer,[40] would be sufficient publication. When the report is made to the police, it is certainly made known to a person other than the plaintiff and this would be sufficient publication.[41] When the accused instructs his lawyer to put the questions, which are put to the witness in court, it would certainly be publication by the accused. In other words, though it is the voice of the lawyer which puts the questions, it is mind and intent of the client--accused which make or publish the defamatory questions.[42] Similarly, the communication, by the accused, of the alleged and utterly irrelevant defamatory matter in a letter to the complainant's pleader amounts to publication to a third person within the purview of the section.[43] However, the mere posting of an allegedly defamatory letter would not constitute any part of the offence.[44]

The statement alleged to be defamatory is to be judged by standard of an ordinary, right thinking member of society. In the instant case it was not inferred that due to assertions in pleadings/evidence adduced in the case the complainant was lowered in estimation of right thinking members of society generally.[45]

Complainant, an auto-rickshaw driver was pelting stones at passing vehicles and caught on the spot. His pants came down when he was being pulled by his associates from the police jeep. Publication of the photograph of the complainant in the newspaper did not amount to defamation.[46]

Likewise, merely attesting the written statement or counter of a client to enable it to be filed in court, without anything more would not be sufficient to make out the offence of defamation against the lawyer where there is no allegation that the accused had anything to do with the preparation of the counter.[47] It may be stated here that the word 'publishes' in s 499, IPC, does not contemplate that the communications, which one is bound to make to others in the normal course of his legal duties, should fall within the ambit of this section, otherwise every officer, clerk and superintendent and everybody, who has to deal with a document and pass it on to others, would be taken to publish the same.[48] No publication can be said to have taken place for the counsel to give the contents of a written statement to his own client or to his own clerk in the4091 ordinary discharge of his duties as a lawyer or to handover the envelope, containing the written statements, to a clerk of another counsel.[49]

Where the alleged defamatory statement was telecast and re-telecast on T.V. Channel and news item appeared in the newspaper next day, prosecution of the newspaper for defamation without prosecuting the T.V. Channel was an abuse of the process of the Court.[50] Where the bank sent a telegram to the complainant, expressing concern of the bank to get dues cleared in time, held mens rea of offence was missing in the case, the act of the bank was in good faith, thus, no offence under s 499, IPC was committed.[51]

Publication includes pleadings, affidavits etc. when filed in Courts. Filing of an affidavit in Court is publication, as affidavit filed in Court is not a secret document.[52]

The dictation given by a lawyer to his clerk and transcription made by him of a per se libellous matter cannot amount to publication.[53]

Mere telecast of an alleged imputation by itself would not constitute offence of defamation unless it was intended to harm the reputation, notwithstanding such imputation will harm the reputation of the complainant.[54]

Publication--Freedom of Speech

Publishers, editors, journalists and reporters forming part and parcel of freedom of speech and expression, which no doubt includes freedom of press as well, are entitled to ventilate their views only within the permissible limits, permissible by law and not beyond thereto. They are expected to be careful and cautious while proceeding with publication of the matter and they cannot claim any special privilege as far as the law relating to defamation is concerned. It may be part of their lawful duties, but at the same time they also owe a duty to be careful and diligent in verifying such statements with care and caution before publishing them. Negligent and reckless allegations constituting defamatory statements can never be protected under the guise of any of the exceptions.[55]

Publication--May not always be made with Clarity

A libellous statement may not always be made with clarity. A degree of indirectness or innuendo may be there and this can very well be expected since defamation is an offence. It is reasonable to think that he who defames is not anxious to invite legal consequences and would be looking for loopholes. That, however, does not protect him from prosecution.[56]4092

Publication--Imputation per se Defamatory or Otherwise--Effect

The only effect of an imputation being per se defamatory is that it would relieve the complainant of the burden to establish that the publication of such imputations has lowered him in the estimation of the right thinking members of the public. However, even if the imputation is not per se defamatory, that by itself would not go to the advantage of the publisher for, the complaining person can establish on evidence that the publication has in fact amounted to defamation even in spite of the apparent deficiency. Similarly, the accused cannot contend that he is entitled to discharge on the ground that the imputations in the extracted publication were not per se defamatory.[57] Once a statement in the written statement has been filed in a court of law, that statement can be taken as published. If such a statement amounts to per se defamatory, it is the duty of the accused to establish that they are justified in making such a statement under any of the exceptions to s 499, IPC .[58]

Publication--Communication between Husband and Wife--Comparative Position in UK and India

In England the rule appears to be well-settled that except in certain well defined matters, the husband and wife are regarded as one and an action for libel disclosure by the husband of the libel to his wife is not publication. In Wennhak's case,[59] Manesty J observed: 'the maxim and principle acted on for centuries is still in existence viz, that as regards this case, husband and wife are in point of law one person'.

The learned judge examined the foundation of the rule and stated that it was, after all, a question of public policy or social policy.

However, the rule that husband and wife are one in the eye of law has not been adopted in its full force under our system of law and certainly not in criminal jurisprudence.[60]

In Queen-Empress v Buthi ,[61] it was held that there is no presumption of law that the wife and husband constitute one person in India for the purpose of the criminal law. If the wife, removing the husband's property from his house, does so with dishonest intention, she is guilty of theft.

In Abdul Khadar v Taib Begum ,[62] the Madras High Court again held that there is no presumption of law in India that a wife and husband constitute one person for the purpose of criminal law, and therefore the English Common Law doctrine of absolute privilege cannot prevail in India.

It must be remembered that the IPC exhaustively codifies the law relating to offences with which it deals and the rules of the Common Law cannot be resorted to for inventing exemptions which are not expressly enacted.

In Tinuvengada Mudali v Tripurasundari Ammal ,[63] a Full Bench of the Madras High Court observed that the exceptions to s 499, IPC, must be regarded as4093 exhaustive as to the cases which they purport to cover and recourse cannot be had to the English Common Law to add new grounds of exception to those contained in the statute. A person making libelous statements in his complaint filed in court is not absolutely protected in a criminal proceeding for defamation, for under the Eighth exception and the illustration to s 499, the statements are privileged only when they are made in good faith. There is, therefore, authority for the proposition that in determining the criminality of an act under the IPC the courts will not extend the scope of special exception by resorting to the rule peculiar English Common Law that the husband and wife are regarded as one.[64]

Publication--Communication to even one Person Sufficient

Publication does not require proof of communication to more persons than one.[65] A libel is deemed to be published as soon as the manuscript has passed out of the possession of the writer.[66]

Publication--Proof by Direct or Circumstantial Evidence

The question, whether there is publication, is one of fact, and the question may be decided either on direct evidence or on the circumstances of the case.[67] Where the officer, to whom an alleged defamatory letter was addressed, was not produced and there was no evidence at all on behalf of the prosecution to show that the letter was actually read by the addressee, it was held that the prosecution had failed to prove that there was publication of the imputation alleged.[68]

Publication--Communication to Complainant--No Defamation

Communication of a defamatory matter to the person defamed does not amount to publication and is, therefore, not an offence.[69] Where, in answer to a notice sent by the complainant demanding the price of certain ornaments, the accused not only denied the purchase of ornaments but also made highly defamatory allegation against the complainant, it was held that as the communication was made to the complainant himself, and not to a third person, and, therefore, it did not amount to publication and the accused was not guilty.[70] Similarly, where some villagers held a meeting and resolved to have no religious associations, in future, with the complainant because he had been ex-communicated, it was held that sending a copy of the resolution to the complainant was not defamation.[71] Where, however, the writer knows that the person defamed cannot read the defamatory matter and it has to be read by a third person, it4094 would be publication.[72] However, where there is nothing on the record to show that the accused knew that the complainant could not read the defamatory matter and it was to be read by some other person, the accused cannot be held guilty for publication of the defamatory matter.[73]

Publication--Communication to Spouse of Defamed Person Sufficient

Communication of the defamatory matter to the husband or wife of the person defamed is a sufficient publication. Where the accused wrote letters to the husband of a woman in which he alleged that she was a witch and by her secrecy she had caused the death of some relations of the accused, it was held that there was sufficient publication of defamatory matter.[74]

Publication--Both Originator and Repeater Liable

The mere fact that some similar accusation against the complainant had been made by some other person as well, would not be a valid defence for the accused. A wrong is not to be justified or excused by another wrong. Because one man does an unlawful act to a person, another is not permitted to do similar act to the same person.[75] The publisher of a libel is clearly responsible, irrespective of the fact whether he is the originator of the libel or is merely repeating it.[76] But where there was reproduction of an article of one newspaper by another newspaper and the newspaper publishing the original article tendered apology subsequently, which was also published by the newspaper in question, and the defamatory article in question was regarding a public question, it was the brain child of the newspaper first publishing it and not the newspaper in question which merely reproduced it. The offence of defamation was not made out and hence, the acquittal was proper.[77] The IPC makes no exception in favour of a second or third publication as compared with a first.[78] Exception 3 is not to be used so as to justify a writer repeating, in any circumstances, with impunity, the highly defamatory mis-statements of another, based on mis-statements of facts.[79] Where, after the distribution of certain leaflets which contained imputation against the complainant and which were clearly defamatory, the editor of a newspaper published them in the form of questions and required the complainant to clear himself by answering the questions, it was held that it amounted to a re-publication of the defamatory statements in the leaflets.[80] Merely because the accused did not himself utter the words complained of, he cannot escape liability for defamation. Even assenting to a third party's defamatory statements would be sufficient.[81] When a man is charged with an offence and acquitted after trial, the man, who repeats the charge, has to be on very sure ground if he wishes to plead that he repeats this charge in good faith.[82]4095

Every repetition of defamatory matter is a fresh publication and constitutes a fresh cause of action.[83] There is no bar to the prosecution of a person making a defamatory statement out of court on the ground that he repeated the statement, when appearing as a witness, and committed perjury.[84] In Jai Debi Kaur v Emperor ,[85] the accused presented an application to the Lt Governor in which she charged the complainant, a deputy collector, with instigating her opponent to bring false charges against her. On inquiry, she repeated the same statements before two magistrates. It was held that the statements, made by her to the two magistrates, were clearly publications of the original defamatory statement and there were thus three separate publications of the libel.

Publication--Notice to Employee to Join Inquiry

Where the public notice was issued asking the delinquent employee to receive the report of disciplinary inquiry, it being a legal requirement, without which the company could not have completed the departmental action, it was held that the publication of notice to fulfill such requirement cannot be treated as defamatory and the order summoning the accused was held liable to be quashed.[86]

13. 'Imputation'

An imputation ordinarily implies an accusation or something more than an expression of a suspicion. It is, however, rather difficult to draw the line. An expression of a suspicion may have the same effect, on the same mind of the person to whom the suspicion is communicated, as an accusation would have. Where the accused made a report at the police station that some property of his had been stolen from his threshing floor and that he suspected the complainant and the report resulted in the searching of complainant's house by the police, it was held that the accused must be deemed to have made an imputation within the meaning of this section.[87] Mere making of an imputation concerning a person is, however, not enough. It must, at the same time, be proved that the writing of the defamatory statement was intended to be read by person or persons other than the person to whom it was written and that it was published.[88] While it is correct that public spirited persons, residing in a locality, should not be discouraged and made to face protected prosecution if they, in good faith, believe that an activity of a person, residing there, is having influence or effect on others, and he or she, by his or her presence, is proving to be a veritable nuisance in the area, a balance has to be struck so that such acts of public good are not converted into hyper puritanism or licenciousness, which unfortunately has much come in vogue these days, or recklessly make all sorts of aspersions without due care and attention on others or for setting personal scores against them.[89]

However, calling any person shatir who is not a chess player is highly objectionable and offending, though not necessarily defamatory.[90]4096

Imputation--First and Foremost Question

The first and foremost question, which a court dealing with a criminal prosecution, involving the offence of defamation, must, therefore, answer, is whether the alleged material, described as defamatory, amounts to imputation within the meaning of this expression as used in s 499, IPC . Imputation ordinarily implies an accusation.[91] Imputation or accusation alone will, however, not suffice. To constitute the offence of defamation, the prosecutor will have to prove that the imputation or accusation was made with an intention or knowledge or belief as mentioned in ingredient (c) above. A person is not guilty of defamation by making the imputation or accusation unless he intends to harm, or he knows or has reason to believe that thereby he would harm, the reputation of another person. In other words, an imputation or accusation simpliciter without proof of the requisite intention, knowledge or belief, as covered by ingredient (c) of the definition, will not constitute the offence of defamation.[92]

Imputations Per Se Defamatory--Effect

It is trite that when a complaint is filed for offence under s 500 of IPC, court has to consider the material produced in support of it, its admissibility and circumstances and the context under which such imputation has been made besides the intention, if any, to make such imputation and whether the accusations made can be believed to have harmed the complainant's reputation. The only effect of an imputation being per se defamatory is that it would relieve the complainant of the burden to establish that the publication of such imputations has lowered him in the estimation of the right thinking members of the public.[93]

Imputation Defamatory or Not--Mixed Question of Fact and Law

The question whether an imputation or accusation is defamatory is a mixed question of law and fact. If there is a controversy as to whether the material, complained of, is defamatory, the court will first have to decide, as a question of law, as to whether the said material is capable of being understood in a defamatory sense. If the court decides this question in the affirmative, it will then only, proceed to determine whether the said material, containing a defamatory potential, had, in fact, harmed the reputation of the complaint within the ambit of the definition of such harm as given in expln 4. If the material is defamatory per se, for example, where the accused imputed commission of a felonious crime to the complainant, there is no difficulty in deciding the question of law mentioned above. The court will, at once, answer it by saying that the imputation of commission of felony by the accused is capable of being understood in no other but a defamatory sense. In such a situation, the court will be justified in taking the parties to evidence with a view to determine, as a question of fact, whether the said imputation had harmed the reputation of the complainant within the four corners of expln 4. If, on the other hand, the words of the alleged imputation are ambiguous, it becomes a question of some difficulty for the court to decide whether those words are capable of being understood in a defamatory sense. If the court decides, in the context of a particular complaint, that the words, in4097 question, are reasonably capable of bearing a defamatory meaning, it is only thereafter that it will address itself to the question of fact regarding harm to the reputation of the complainant.[1]

Imputation--Facts to be Considered by Court

Where the words are obviously defamatory, the court has to consider the following facts for arriving at a decision whether the words are defamatory:

(i) Circumstances and context: The court must be put in possession, not only of the words used, but also of the context in which they were used in order to find the intention and the effect of the words.[2] Spoken words, divorced from their context and surroundings, may appear to be slander, which, when controlled by the context and surroundings, are nothing of the sort.[3] The court should have regard to the time and place of publication, the relationship between the parties, and, in fact, the whole circumstances of the case.[4]

(ii) Words should be considered as a whole: Where some passages in a petition are alleged to be defamatory, the document should be read as a whole with a view to find out the main purport, and too much importance should not be attached to a few isolated passages here and there.[5] The accused is entitled to know specifically as to what are the words which are considered to be defamatory. Attention of the accused must be drawn pointedly to the expression considered to be defamatory.[6]

(iii) Alleged defamatory words,etc, should be interpreted in a manner in which a reasonable man would do: The test is, whether, under the circumstances in which the writing was published, reasonable man, to whom the publication was made, would be likely to understand it in the libellous sense.[7] Standard opinion is that of a reasonable man of normal intelligence possessed of a degree of the knowledge of circumstances of the case.[8] It is not sufficient that persons in one section only of the community might so understand them. The test to apply is reasonableness, whether the hearers or the readers, as the case may be, are few or many, expert or inexpert.[9] The court must consider what might be conveyed by the notice to a reasonable fair-minded man, and not what might be inferred from it by a man of a morbid or suspicious mind.[10]4098

Imputation regarding Insolvency

An imputation of insolvency against a person in the way of his trade is per se defamatory.[11]

Imputation Regarding Trade or Business

To say that a person indulging in black-marketing on an extensive scale all over the world,[12] or that he had been dishonest in the management of the affairs of the company and was trying to conceal that dishonesty by methods that were themselves dishonest,[13] would be defamatory. Where a letter sent by the accused, who had purchased a watch from a company, suggested that the company gave guarantees which were worthless, that it was a deceitful company and that persons, dealing with this company, should be on their guard take particular care to see that they are not cheated, it was held that such imputations were undoubtedly defamatory.[14] An imputation of dishonesty to a tradesman is actionable per se.[15] To ask a witness in cross-examination whether he was indulging in opium smuggling business or cloth smuggling trade is per se defamatory.[16]

Imputation Regarding Profession

To say in respect of an instructress in physical culture and dancing, that the future, including the social, religious and moral future, of the girls would be spoiled by attending the classes of the type, which she conducted, is to impute, to the complainant, an unfitness which is worse than attributing mere incapacity.[17]

Where the accused called the council badmash in an open court, the offence does not come under s 499, IPC, and the acquittal of the accused for the offence under s 500, IPC, is legal.[18] However, a statement made against a lawyer that after accepting the brief he betrays his clients' confidence and let his clients down is highly libellous.[19] An election poster against a rival candidate, a barrister, with the heading 'the hollowness of Mr--s' capacity as a barrister has been exposed' would amount to making a serious aspersion upon his professional status and is calculated to lower him in the eyes of the public as a barrister.[20] It is defamatory to publish an unskillful reproduction of an artist's work.[21]

Imputation Regarding Criminal Offence

The imputation of a criminal offence would be defamatory. Where the accused alleged that the complainant did harm to the poor, would not shrink from murder, appropriated government money, committed forgery, and so forth, it was held that he4099 could be convicted under s 500, IPC .[22] If a person is falsely charged with theft, he can prosecute the accused for defamation even though he is a man of low caste.[23] A charge of bribery and corruption would be defamatory.[24] Where an article in a newspaper alleged that a public servant had amassed a tidy amount by way of bribe, it was held that it was calculated to harm the reputation of the officer concerned and was defamatory.[25]

Imputation against Chastity

It would be defamatory to make any imputation against the chastity of a woman. To state that an unmarried well-connected Brahmin girl had not preserved her virgin purity,[26] or that a woman had miscarriage without any knowledge whether she was married or not,[27] or that the complainant, an unmarried Brahmin girl, aged thirty years, was the concubine of some persons,[28] would be defamatory. In Bola Nath v Emperor ,[29] the complainant, a European lady, was living with the son of the accused, a military officer, as his wife and subsequently married him after the death of her husband. She had made several attempts either for her suicide or for the murder of her husband. During interviews with the authorities, the accused said that she was of unsound mind and was, therefore, likely to murder her husband and that she was of loose moral character. It was held that there was no justification for charging the complainant with sexual immorality and the accused was guilty of the offence of defamation in respect of the second allegation.

Where the accused alleged that the complainant was having illicit connection with goondas, her paramours frequently coming to her at nights, and that her immoral activities reflected badly on the locality in which the accused lived, it was held that the accused was guilty under this section.[30]

The description of a person as illegitimate is a very serious imputation to make and such an imputation harms the reputation of the person against whom it is made. It also affects the reputation of the mother of the person and the mother's father. The imputation is all the more damaging when the parties concerned are people of high social status.[31] Similarly, when imputations of unchastity are made against a girl, the reputation of her father is naturally affected. There might be direct defamation and there might be indirect defamation. When an imputation is made against a particular person, that particular person is directly defamed. On the other hand, when an imputation is made, say, against the daughter of a person, that person is certainly indirectly defamed.[32]4100

Imputation against Caste

Statements have often been made which become a matter of importance for the member of the caste to consider their defamatory effect. Two questions have arisen frequently for consideration:

(i) whether the statements are defamatory; and
(ii) whether the statements are privileged under any of the exceptions.

The first question has been dealt here with respect to the statements about castes being or not being defamatory. The question of privilege has been discussed later under different exceptions.

Among Hindus, it would cause the gravest harm to allege that a man was out of caste. It is defamatory and is not covered by s 95, IPC .[33] To say so would bring about disastrous consequences, such as deprivation of religious and social communication, and would be prima facie defamatory.[34] To say that to associate with the complainant will entail ex-communication of brotherhood and that after association with him, the members of the brotherhood will only be re-admitted to caste privileges on consenting to give up all connection with him in future and on performing proper penance,[35] or calling a parsutia kayestha,kori chamar with the result that none of the priests attended a religious ceremony at the complainant's house,[36] was held to be defamatory. However, unless the words used in respect of a Hindu are tantamount to saying 'you have become an outcaste or you have been ex-communicated from your caste', the words are not defamatory.[37]

Imputation Amounting to Vulgar Abuses

When the facts of a case clearly prove that the words uttered were only vulgar abuses without any intention to cause harm, no offence under this section is made out.[38] Where the defamatory words, prima facie libellous, are used in a street quarrel and are mere vulgar abuses, there is no deliberate intention to harm the reputation of the person defames.[39] Abuses having reference to the daughter or sister of the complainant, cannot be regarded as conveying any imputation as can, in any way, harm the reputation of the complainant.[40] To say that the complainant is beiman and badmash,[41] or is pichhiag and lawaris (which does not mean illegitimate),[42] or is chandal[43] or is dishonest or fraudulent,[44] does not lead to an offence under this4101 section. In Jagannath Misra v Ram Chandra Deo ,[45] at a meeting, convened by the complainant zamindar, to which the accused was not invited, the accused cried out loudly that the complainant was not only a liar but also ungentlemanly, barbarous and tyrannical. It was held that the words used were not defamatory. Of course, they amounted to an insult under s 504 . A remark, that the complainant had amassed wealth by sucking the blood of poor, is insulting and abusive, but not defamatory in law.[46] Where, however, vulgar abuses are uttered in the circumstances which tend to lower the person addressed in the estimation of the people present or to bring him into ridicule and contempt, they would amount to defamation.[47] In Bhewati v Umabai ,[48] there was a quarrel between A and B over their children in which A said to B that she was the wife of the former's husband. Similarly C, who was mother-in-law of A, said that B was the wife of her son. It was held that the imputation was a deliberate statement of fact and as it was made in the presence of several persons, it amounted to defamation. The fact, that the words, used by the writer of an article, are those of an abuse, does not, by itself take the article out of the definition of defamation.[49] The use of language of an obscene and insulting nature about a respectable mukhtar, amounting to saying that he was a worthless and despicable black guard, would harm the reputation of the mukhtar.[50]

Imputations not Amounting to Abuses

In all the representations made by the accused against the complainant, the words used are 'by wrongly guiding', 'wrongly informing', 'by irrelevant argument', 'abusive language', 'indecently', 'baseless allegation', 'not behaving in the manner required', 'as liked', 'insulting by abusive words', 'giving up the dignity and respect of Advocates', 'behaving improperly', 'uncivilized', 'shouted using abusive words' and 'insulted as liked'.[51] The said words cannot be said to be abusive words. Even if taken as abusive words, mere allegation that the accused had used abusive words or language cannot be taken to hold that the accused had used abusive words or language as the actual word(s) of abuse or abusive language is not spelled out.[52] So, when neither the abusive words, nor the words, which could tantamount to insult are spelled out in the complaint or in the sworn statement of the complainant (accused in the complaint alleging defamation), it cannot be said that by any insulting abusive words in the complaint, he defamed the complainant.[53]

Imputation--Superior Officers Noticing that Subordinate has Used Objectionable Language

It is well established that only such imputations as are malicious and reckless and not for public good, tranquillity, peace or public security or as not made in good faith, can be brought within the definition of defamation. The writing made must convey some imputation against the complainant with the intention to harm reputation. The4102 intention on the part of the accused to harm reputation or knowledge or reasonable belief that such an imputation will harm reputation of person concerned, is an essential ingredient of offence under s 499, IPC .[54] Where a bare reading of the entire noting sheet shows that the superintending engineer in exercise of superior authority had noted down that work order be finalised as the payment was not made to the contractor for the last one year in order to avoid legal complications, thereafter, the complainant had clearly used harsh language and in that background the senior officer, i.e., superintending engineer might have made the remarks 'who is this immature person to write such a language on the file', a superior officer's noting that a subordinate had used objectionable language in the file would not, in any manner, bring the remarks within the ambit of defamation punishable under s 500, IPC .[55]

Defamatory Imputation--Instances

It would be defamatory to characterise a person as goonda,[56] or to allege that the complainant sings indecent songs in the public, or is a drunkard and abuses girls and women and is a goonda,[57] or to describe a person in the heading of a defamatory pamphlet as sharif badmash,[58] or to say that Netaji Subhash Chandra Bose was a traitor,[59] or to call a person 'worthless' and 'despicable blackguard'.[60] A statement in an objection to the nomination of the complainant that the complainant was a drunkard, being in no way relevant to the election, was held defamatory to the complainant.[61] Where the accused called the complainant, who was named as one of his witnesses by the other party, a rogue, it was held that the expression used by the accused was defamatory.[62] The remark, that the complainant was a sort of a professional witness, whose evidence could be purchased, is clearly defamatory.[63]

The accused husband had filed petition for divorce against his wife, the daughter of the respondent no. 2. In the rejoinder and additional submission to the written statement, the accused made some serious allegations about the character of the respondent no. 2 and his wife, lowering their reputation in the society. Held, prima facie case for summoning the accused for offence under s 500, IPC was made out.[64]

14. 'Concerning any Person'

The defamatory matter to be actionable must be such that it contains an imputation concerning some particular person or persons whose identity can be established,[65] though it is not necessary that the matter should describe the complainant accurately by name.[66] A newspaper, however, in some cases, involves defamation of those who4103 are responsible for its publication.[67] A complaint for defamation is, therefore, maintainable by a corporation. However, certainly the scope of such a complaint by a corporation is not the same as that by individuals. If the management is bad, there is bound to be accusation of inefficiency and nepotism, etc. Such an attack does not amount to defamation.[68] The complainant must prove that the defamatory words refer to him[69] or where a name is mentioned, that it would be understood by those who know him to refer to him.[70] It would not be defamation if there is nothing in the writing to connect it with the complainant.[71] If the words complained of contain no reflection on a particular individual or individuals, and they equally apply to others belonging to the same class, an action for defamation will not lie. Where the accused published, in a paper, an account of an outrage on a woman, alleged to have been perpetrated by two constables of a thana, in which four constables were stationed, it was held that in the absence or proof that it was intended to charge any particular and identifiable constable with the alleged offence, the accused could not be convicted for defamation.[72]

Whether the words alleged refer to some ascertained or ascertainable person is a question of fact and the standard to be applied is--would reasonable people so understand it?[73] The cardinal rule is that the offence consists in using language which others, knowing the circumstances, would reasonably think to be defamatory of the person complaining of any injury by it.[74] Though the attack may be general, yet it may convey an innuendo at some particular person, and then, of course, a person so aggrieved can prosecute.[75] Where the words and picture designated the complainant in such a way as to let those who knew him understand that he was the person, the conviction of the accused was held to be proper.[76]

Where publication contains general allegations regarding certain persons of a class generally, it would not attract a definite class of persons to enable them to file a complaint under s 500, IPC .[77]

15. 'Intending to Harm, or Knowing or Having Reason to Believe that such Imputation Will Harm, the Reputation of such Person'

The essence of the offence of defamation is that the imputation must have been made either with the intention of causing harm, or with the knowledge or belief that the imputation would cause harm, to the reputation of the person defamed.[78] Mere publication of an imputation, concerning a person does not, of itself, constitute defamation. A person is not guilty of defamation unless he intends that4104 the words spoken should harm the reputation of a person or he knows, or he has reason to believe, that his words would harm the reputation of a person.[79] However, no intent to defame is necessary; it is sufficient if the imputation is published intending to harm, or knowing or having reason to believe that such imputation will harm, the reputation of the complainant.[80] To constitute 'defamation' under s 499, IPC, there must be an imputation and such imputation must have been made with the intention of harming or knowing or having reason to believe that it will harm the reputation of the person about whom it is made. In essence, the offence of defamation is the harm caused to the reputation of a person. It would be sufficient to show that the accused intended or knew or had reason to believe that the imputation made by him would harm the reputation of the complainant, irrespective of whether the complainant actually suffered directly or indirectly from the imputation alleged.[81] Where, immediately after the termination of a criminal case, the accused, on being asked, told his pleader in ordinary voice in conversation that the trouble arose out of a particular alleged elopement, it was held that he had not made any imputation with the intention of harming the reputation of anybody and had answered a very natural question, put to him by his legal adviser, and was, therefore, not guilty.[82]A distinction has, however, to be made between an attempt on the part of the accused to exaggerate their own position and their act of casting reflection on the complainant. What the prosecution has to establish is not that the accused have indulged in exaggeration, or even falsehood, in respect of their own position and importance, but that the imputation was calculated to harm his/her reputation.[83] It may be further noted that malicious publication, in the sense of active ill-will against the person defamed, is not a necessary constituent of the offence of defamation under s 499, IPC .[84] An imputation against another person, although made in the absence of actual ill-will, is not, on that account, to be accepted as being bona fide. Conscious violation of law to another's prejudice is sufficient, though there may be no malice in fact. When defamatory words are prima facie libelous, legal malice must be presumed until a case of privilege is made out.[85] To bring the publication of a scandalous imputation under the penal law, it is not necessary to prove that it was done out of any ill-will or malice or that the complainant had actually suffered from it.[86] If the statements are not prima facie libelous, evidence of malice would be inadmissible.[87]

Where the accused sent a letter to his brother complainant which contained certain imputation but there was no intention to cause harm to the reputation of the complainant, held the letter was not defamatory.[88]4105

Where the intention behind uttering the alleged defamatory words by the accused bank officers was not to harm/defame the complainant but to realize the unpaid amount from the complainant, no offence under s 499, IPC was made out.[89]

Proof of Actual Harm to Complainant--Not Necessary

To sustain a charge of defamation, it is not necessary to prove that the complainant actually suffered directly or indirectly from the scandalous imputation alleged; it is sufficient to show that the accused intended that the imputation should harm, or that he knew or had reason to believe that imputation made by him would harm, the reputation of the complainant.[90] A person who commits defamation, is not to be excused from the penalties attached to the offence merely because he has composed himself in respect of the modes of giving expression to the defamatory matter in such a way that little real injury results from the offence.[91] A person, who publishes defamatory matter against another in a case, not covered by any of the exceptions, cannot escape punishment on the ground that the reputation of the person attacked was so good, or that of the persons attacking so bad, that serious injury to the reputation was not in fact caused.[92] Explanation 4 merely describes the quality or nature of the imputation and not its actual effects.[93] It is not necessary to show that the words, as found to have been used by the accused, lowered the prestige of the complainant in the estimation of others.[94] It is sufficient if it is proved that the harm to the reputation of the complainant was intended,[95] whether the effect as intended or probable, is produced.[96]

16. Intention or Knowledge

In judging whether the accused had the requisite intention or knowledge, the circumstances under which, and the main object with which, the defamatory statements were made, and the background of the dispute between the parties should all be considered.[97] Where the tenor of a document shows that the publication tends to harm the reputation of a person, the court would be justified in gathering from the terms of the matter itself that the publishers intended to harm, or they knew or had reason to believe that the imputation would harm, his reputation.[98]

17. 'Harm'

'Harm' has to be to the reputation itself of the person defamed.[99] Words which do not disparage a man's reputation but occasion a pecuniary loss to him do not amount to4106 defamation.[1] Where a notice was published by the auctioneers that they would sell by public auction some goods on account, and at the risk, of the plaintiff, who, in spite of repeated demands and notice, had failed to pay for, and take delivery of, the goods which he had purchased, it was held that the words did not bear a defamatory meaning.[2] Even a false claim on a postcard, that the complainant should pay a certain sum of money to the accused, which the complainant owes to him, is not prima facie defamatory.[3] Indulging in exaggeration, or even falsehood, by the accused in respect of their own position and importance is not defamation. It must be proved that the imputation was calculated to harm the reputation of the complainant.[4] Mere denial from parenthood of bridegroom by a person whose name as father of bridegroom was printed on invitation card, was held to be no defamation.[5]

18. 'Reputation'

Reputation is a jus in rem, a right absolute and against all the world. A man's reputation is his property.[6] Hence, nobody can so use his freedom of speech or expression as to injure another's reputation.[7]

The term 'character', 'reputation' and 'rumour' are prone to be confused. 'Character' is what a person actually is and 'reputation' is what neighbors say, what he is. Thus, though a man may have, in fact, a good character, yet he may suffer from a bad reputation or vice versa. 'Reputation' is the common knowledge of the community or a general opinion in respect to a person. 'Reputation' being the community's opinion, is distinguished from mere rumor in two respects. On the one hand, reputation implies the definite and final formation of opinion by the community, while rumor implies merely a report that is not yet finally credited. On the other hand, a rumor is usually thought of as signifying a particular act or occurrence, while a reputation is predicated upon a general trait of character. A man's reputation, for example, may declare him honest and yet today's rumor may have circulated that this reputed honest man has defaulted yesterday in his accounts.[8] In other words, character is an expression of very wide import which takes in all the traits, special and particular qualities, impressed by nature of habit, which serve as an index to the essential intrinsic nature of a person. Character also includes reputation, but character and reputation are not synonymous.[9]

A civil dispute in a Civil Court was pending between the complainant and the accused about the property where a school run by the complainant was situated. Accused displayed a hoarding informing the parties about the pendency of the dispute in Civil Court and cautioned them to take admission in the school at their own risk. Held, there was no imputation actionable under s 499, IPC .[10]4107

19. Explanation 1

In order to amount to defamation under expln 1 to this section, the imputation alleged must not only harm the reputation of the person concerned if he were living, but also be 'intended to be hurtful to the feelings of his family or other relatives'.[11] This explanation would not be attracted if any of the said two elements is lacking.

20. Explanation 2

Company

As in the case of natural persons, reputation is an asset to companies, corporations and other bodies of persons and they are also entitled to the protection of their reputation. However, the reputation of a corporation is not, in all cases, similar to that of natural persons. A corporation cannot well suffer damage in mind or body.[12] An incorporated company may have a reputation for the good conduct of the business or undertaking of the company, and the company's reputation may be quite distinct from that of any of its officers, however highly placed.[13] A municipal board per se has hardly any reputation. If, however, a person makes any imputation so as to cause any special injury to the property of the board, then the board can maintain a complaint under s 500 .[14] It cannot, however, maintain a prosecution for words which reflect upon its members individually, and not upon it as a body, unless special damage has thereby been caused to it.[15] To use words which reflects upon it (i.e. the company) in the way of its property or trade or business would be defamatory.[16] If a company is defamed, one of the members may file a complaint on its behalf. If, however, the complaint is of an individual as such expln 2 has no application.[17]

Publisher cannot be absolved of liability for defamation on the mere ground that the Chief Editor and the Editor have not been prosecuted.[18]

Association or Collection of Persons

An association may be defamed by an imputation which lowers the moral character of the members of the association collectively. Thus, making such imputations about a student's welfare association would amount to a defamation of the members of the association as such, and the accused would be guilty under this section.[19] Where the accused published an article, in his paper 'Kaliyug', containing the expressions:

> How the justice stands at a distance as a helpless spectator of the show as to be manner, in which the illicit bribe money from plaintiffs and defendants enters into the pockets of4108 Public Prosecutors and Assistant Public Prosecutors, and the extent to which it reaches and to which use it is put.

It was held that the prosecuting staff of Aligarh, or, as a matter of fact, the prosecuting staff in the state of Uttar Pradesh, is certainly such as an identifiable group of collection of persons as is covered by expln 2.[20] Where the writer of the article in a paper implied that the girls of a particular college were habitually guilty of the misbehavior described in the articles, the inevitable effect on the reader must be to make him believe that it is habitual with the girls of the college to behave in this way. All the girls in the college collectively, and each girl individually, must suffer in reputation.[21] However, if a person complains that he has been defamed as a matter of a class, he must satisfy the court that the imputation is against him personally and that he is the person aimed at before he can maintain an action for defamation.[22] The test for the application of expln 2 is that the class or the association of persons must not be unidentifiable. If it is identifiable in the sense that it is definite, then the remarks in an article about it are defamatory of the class. And if the class collectively and individually will suffer in reputation on account of the article, a complaint by an individual member of that class is maintainable.[23] The imputation alleged against Syrian Christian community as a whole, which is an unascertainable body of persons, no member of that community could say that he was individually defamed or was an aggrieved person competent to file a complaint for defamation under s 499, IPC .[24] decided is, which was the class or body in respect of which the defamatory words were used and whether that body was a definite and an identifiable body or class so that the imputation in question can be said to its individual components enabling an individual members of it to maintain a complaint.

The Supreme Court, in GNarasimhan v TV Chokkappa ,[25] held that the question which must be

The article published by the accused highlighting ideological differences existing between members of the Christian group and the accused and members of a Christian fellowship centre, the accused having a different religious belief, does not amount to defamation.[26] The Kerala police is not a definite or determinable body, but it is an ever-changing body. Members of the police force are not static. Police personnel retire and new persons are enrolled. The character and composition of the Kerala police changed every now and then. Similarly, it cannot be said that the Kerala police is a definite and determinable body to attract explns 2 to 8 of s 499, IPC . A member of the Kerala police, therefore, is not entitled to file a complaint under expln 2 of s 499, IPC .[27]4109

Lawyers as a Class

The real test appears to be whether the class or body in respect of which the defamatory words have been used is a definite or determinate body so that the imputation in question can be said to relate to its individual members or components enabling an individual member of it to maintain a complaint. If the class or body in respect of which the defamatory words have been used is not a definite and determinate body, an individual member of such body cannot maintain an action for defamation unless he satisfies the court that the imputation has been made against him personally and he is the person aimed at.[28] Therefore, in order to maintain the prosecution for defamation as a member of the class that is the 'district lawyers' he must satisfy the court that the imputation is against him personally and that he is the person aimed at.[29] The advocates as a class are incapable of being defamed. If any publication can be shown to refer specifically to particular individual, then alone an action for defamation may lie, not otherwise. The portrayal of the lawyers in the film 'Nadan' does not have any relevance to lawyers as a class. The dialogues and visible representations point out only to advocates who indulge in such practices and the impugned portions of the film cannot lead any reasonable person to form an opinion that advocates are a despicable bunch.[30]

The words or imputations complained of must relate to some particular person or persons whose identity can be established. If such statement does not show any imputation aimed at any particular individual or individuals, but equally apply to others although belonging to the same class, it will not amount to defamation.[31] If the editorial did not refer to complainant personally or to any other individual but referred to the lawyers as a class and thus the alleged defamation could not refer to a determinate identifiable section/class of lawyers as distinguished from the rest of members of lawyers fraternity, such a complaint is not maintainable.[32]

21. Explanation 3

The essence of defamation is that it conveys a discreditable imputation. It is, therefore, immaterial in what medium the discreditable imputation is made. For example, a play, which is woven out of the imagination of an author, can possibly contain more deadly imputations against real persons than a mere narrative.[33] Where, in an article in department with his own underlings, the minister had made the appointment of a particular person and that this was but the prelude to further appointments of the like nature, it was held that the caption. 'So prospers the incorrupt administration of Minister Krishna Iyer' was obviously an ironical statement implying that the minister's administration was a bad administration riddled with corruption and nepotism.[34]4110

22. Explanation 4

The conjoint reading of s 499, IPC, with this expln 4, would make it clear, that in the complaint, there shall be an averment to the effect, that because of the imputation, the complainant's reputation had been lowered in the estimation of others.[35] Explanation 4 implies a fallen reputation, and, therefore, a person, who does not stand in high estimation of others, cannot get a fall if the imputation be such as may not bring his reputation to a level, below the one he enjoys.[36] Imputation communicated to the prosecutor only, cannot be treated as defamatory.[37] However, the defamatory words, uttered at a meeting in the presence of the complainant, a sarpanch, were held to be intended to defame the complainant.[38] If the words are prima facie defamatory, then one need not find out as to whether the imputation was likely to lower the moral or intellectual character of person defamed mentioned in expln 4.[39] Where, however, the meaning of the words, spoken or written, is doubtful as to its significance and some evidence is necessary to decide what the effect of the expression used would be and whether it is calculated to harm a particular person's reputation, it is possible that the principle, enunciated in expln 4, may, with propriety, be applied.[40]

Where the news published in the newspaper stated that there was illicit relationship between the Principal, teaching staff and students, and even amongst staff and students in the hostel, a prima facie case of defamation was made out, the defence plea that imputation was made in good faith, and as to whether expln 4 to s 499, IPC was attracted in the case was to be seen during the trial of the case. Proceedings under ss 500 and 501, IPC were not quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[41]

23. Exceptions to Section 499

This section has got a large number of exceptions. They cover the entire field of the privileges available in cases of defamatory statements. In fact, these privileges represent the freedom of speech and expression which is the foundation of all democratic institutions. However, while a considerable latitude is allowed in respect of these privileges, they are also subject to a large number of conditions.

There are many points, in respect of which the question is one which relates to a number of exceptions generally. One such point, relates to burden of proof. When an accused claims the benefit of any of the exceptions, the burden of proof is upon him.[42] In such a case, though the evidence, which the accused is required to produce to discharge this burden, is not of an that standard as is required of tile prosecutor, yet there must be material on the record to show that this burden has been discharged.[43] His plea is taken as established if a preponderance of probability is established, in favour of his plea, either by the evidence led by him or from the other4111 evidence on record.[44] Before dealing with each exception separately, points, which require consideration generally in respect of various exceptions, are noted below under the following heads:

(a) analysis of the exceptions;
(b) good faith generally;
(c) excessive publication;
(d) fair comments and related headings;
(e) definition and liability of editor and publishers etc, of newspapers in different headings.

The protection under exceptions 1 and 4 is not available when process is being issued in a defamation case.[45]

Chapter XXI

Of Defamation

S. 499.

Defamation.--

Analysis of the Exceptions

All the exceptions under this section may be classified in five groups,[46] all relating to occasions as to which qualified privilege is recognised:

(a) Exception 1 relates to the plea of justification;
(b) Exceptions 2, 3, 5 and 6 relate to the plea of fair comment on a matter of public interest;
(c) Exceptions 7 and 8 cover the cases of censure by a lawful authority passed in good faith and accusation made to a person in lawful authority in good faith;
(d) Exceptions 9 and 19 cover the cases of imputation made in good faith, by a person for the public good, and the case of caution intended for the good of the person to whom it is conveyed or for the public good; and
(e) Exception 4 covers the plea of fair report of the public proceedings.

Proof of Exceptions

Commentary under the same heading in s 500, post, may be referred to.

Good Faith Generally

It may be stated that good faith finds place in all the exceptions to this section except exceptions 1 and 4. Cases falling under the different exceptions have been dealt with there. The general features of good faith, which apply to the various exceptions, have been dealt with under s 52, IPC, which provides: 'Nothing is said to be done or believed in 'good faith' which is done or believed without due care and attention.'[47] The said s 52 excludes the element of negligence from the purview of 'good faith'. It implies not only an upright mental attitude which shows that ordinary prudence has been exercised according to the standards of a reasonable person. It contemplates an4112 honest effort to ascertain the facts, upon which exercise of the power must rest.[48] Mere subjective belief without any objective basis is not a dependable criterion. An unnecessary aspersion is indicative of want of good faith.[49] Due care and attention means that the libeler should show that he had taken particular steps to investigate the truth and had satisfied himself from his inquiry, as a reasonable man, that he had come to a true construction,[50] even though, on further searching investigation, it may not be found to be true.[51] An imputation against another person, although made in the absence of actual ill-will, is not, on that account, to be accepted as being made bona fide.[52] Simple belief or actual belief in the truth by itself is not enough. The accused can only succeed on producing proof of the truth of matter charged as libelous, and not by leading evidence to his own belief in its truth.[53] It is not good faith to make reckless and imaginary criticism on a man with charge of misconduct without any foundation or authority to justify the same.[54] There cannot be good faith when there is express malice or evidence of culpable negligence or recklessness in making defamatory statements, the plea of good faith can be negative on the ground of recklessness and want of due care and caution.[55]

Whether good faith has been proved is a question of fact.[56] A plea of good faith would be a question to be considered on facts and circumstances of each case,[57] and must be decided with reference thereto.[58] The court will consider, in view of what is said about good faith in s 52, IPC, whether the accused acted with due care and attention.[59] Allowances should be made for the intelligence of the accused, his capacity to reason, the circumstances under which he was placed, and the occasion which necessitated his making the imputation.[60]4113

Excessive Publication

A privilege under s 499, IPC, is destroyed if the publication has been unnecessarily wide and is published among persons who cannot be possibly interested in the statements made.[61] The manner in which an imputation is made and the nature of the medium that is selected for making it are very much material.[62] Publication, in newspaper, of a charge of bribery against a magistrate is not for protection of any person or for public good. The privilege would be destroyed because public action in the newspaper in such a case, is excessive.[63] Where the accused felt some suspicion about corruption in a society from the audit report and thought that the publication was necessary, but the accused made some embellishments, additions, etc., in the article in a newspaper, it was held that it was clearly a case of excessive publication which would take the case out of the privilege conferred by exception 9.[64] A court may find that an imputation is true and made for the public good, but, on considering the manners of the publication, it may hold that the particular publication is not for the public good and is, therefore, not privileged.[65] An excessive publication may destroy a caste privilege. The circulation of a warning to members of the caste against associating with the complainant till expiation for having crossed the seas would certainly be privileged. However, publication of the statement scattered and broadcast amongst people generally would destroy the privilege.[66]

Fair Comments and its Doctrine

Honest criticism ought to be, and is, recognised in any civilised system of law as indispensable to the efficient working of any public institution or office and as salutary for private persons who make themselves or their work the object of public interest.[67] The defense of fair comment is established if the facts on a matter of public interest have been truly stated. The test is whether the opinion, which is expressed in the comment, however exaggerated, obstinate or prejudiced it may be, was honestly held by the writer.[68] The doctrine of fair comment is based on the hypothesis that the publication in question is one which, broadly speaking, is true in fact, and is not made to satisfy a personal vendetta, and further the fact, stated therein, are such as would serve public interest.[69]

Fair Comments--Principles

Principles,[70] in respect of fair comment, may be stated as under:

(i) no kind of privilege attaches to the profession of press as distinguished from the members of the public;4114
(ii) in the context of a welfare state, the role of a newspaper editor is to give outlet to public feelings, to analyse public opinion and to create and educate healthy public opinion. This must be kept in mind in judging their liability;
(iii) defense of fair comment applies only to expression of opinion or imputation of character, but not to facts; and
(iv) fair comment cannot be built upon facts which are not truly stated.

If facts are themselves defamatory, they can be justified only by their truth.

The principles have been summarised by Garley thus:

'In order that a comment may be fair, the following conditions must be satisfied:

(i) it must be based on facts truly stated;
(ii) it must not contain imputations of corrupt or dishonorable motives on the person, whose conduct or work is criticized, save in so far as such imputation are warranted by the facts; and
(iii) it must be the honest expression of the writer's real opinion.'[71]

Fair Comments--Expression of Opinion Protected not the Assertion of Facts

A fair comment must be an expression of opinion, and not an assertion of facts. The defense of fair comment only protect statements of opinion; it does not extend to defamatory allegation of facts.[72] The distinction cannot be too clearly borne in mind between comment or criticism and allegation of facts, such as that disgraceful acts have been committed, or discreditable language used. It is one thing to comment upon, or criticise even with severity, the acknowledged or proved acts of a public man, and quite another to assert that he has been guilty of particular acts of misconduct.[73] Comment, in order to be justifiable as fair comment, must appear as comment, and must not be so mixed up with the facts that the reader cannot distinguish between what is report and what is comment.[74] Where a person makes the public conduct of a public man the subject of comment and it is for the public good, he is not liable for any action if the comments are made honestly and he honestly believes the facts to be as he states them and there is no wilful misrepresentation of facts or mis-statement which he must have known to be a mis-statement if he had exercised ordinary care.[75] Where the factual allegations against the minister (and the government) were all true, it was observed: 'it is certainly in public interest that anything shaky or unjust or improper in the conduct of a minister in making appointments should be brought to the notice of the country at large. It is in fact, criticism without which any democratic system is deemed to failure, and ministers inevitable suffer absolute corruption by their unscrutinised exercise of power'.4115

It was held to fall within the ambit of 'fair comments' and was saved by the second and third exceptions.[76] While a substantial latitude is permitted for fair comments, there are distinct recognised limitations to comments claimed to be fair.

In S Khushboo v Kanniammal ,[77] the accused appellant in a statement published in 'India Today' published in September 2005 endorsed pre-marital sex and called for its acceptance by the society. Held, it did not amount to offence of defamation under s 499, IPC .

Fair Comment--Unsubstantiated or False Statement of Facts

A plea of fair comment does not protect any false statement of facts, even if made in good faith.[78] There is a distinction between fair comment based on well-known or admitted facts and the assertion of unsubstantiated facts for comment. Where comment is made on allegation of facts which do not exist, the very foundation of the plea disappears.[79]

Fair Comments--'Public Interest', 'Public Good'

Defense of fair comment on matter of public interest cannot arise in respect of statements which are libelous and which are pointedly false.[80] In criminal cases, which are governed by the provisions of s 499, IPC, the words 'public interest' have not been used. The words used are 'public good'. This has been dealt with in exceptions 1, 9 and 10. To understand whether a libel is for public good, it is necessary to find out the circumstances that led to its publication,[81] and the court ought not to weigh any comment on it in a fine scale. Some allowance must be made for even intemperate language, provided, however, that the writer keeps himself within the bounds of substantial truth and does not misrepresent or suppress any facts.[82] Where the occasion is privileged, it is not necessary to justify every detail of the charge if the gist of the libel is proved to be, in substance, correct and the details, etc., which are not justified produce no different effect on the mind of the reader than the actual truth would do.[83]

Fair Comments--Position of Newspapers and Journalists

In the matter of defamation, the position of newspaper is not in any way different from that of the public in general. The responsibility, in either case, is the same.[84]4116 Journalist has no more, and certainly no less, freedom of opinion than is available to any other citizen.[85] He cannot, ordinarily, claim to belong to a privileges class entitled to special treatment.[86] However, a journalist is not necessarily deprived of his privilege merely because there are slight unimportant deviations from absolute accuracy of statement if those deviations do not affect the general fairness of the comment.[87] The editor of a local journal, controlling a media of publicity, helps in moulding the public opinion and his responsibility in the matter of publication is great. However, he can claim no better privilege in the matter of publication of libelous statements than his next door neighbor can claim.[88] The degree of care and attention is way less in the case of newspaper publication than that required from ordinary men.[89] The newspaper world should confine itself to allegations of facts which, before they are made public, have been thoroughly investigated and are reasonable believed by them to be capable of proof by responsible people willing to give evidence.[90] In Bibhuti Bhusan Das Gupta v Sudhir Kumar Mazumdar ,[91] in an issue of a weekly journal, a statement regarding the complainant was made that during the last municipal election he managed to get through the scrutiny of his nomination paper by taking recourse to falsehood. It was held that due care and attention should have dictated further inquiries into the allegation and as no such inquiry was made, the editor must be deemed to have acted irresponsibly. If the impugned statement is defamatory, absence of malice will not be a valid plea even for a journalist unless he can establish that his plea come within one of the exceptions to s 499, IPC .[92] Even subsequent contradiction would serve no purpose. If the accused has acted on a gossip and the complainant is thereby defamed, he cannot escape consequences on the ground that he has promptly contradicted the incorrect report.[93] A correction may prove want of malice, but it is not enough to prove good faith. The offence is committed with the publication of the libel and subsequent correction, which takes away the sting there from, may only go to mitigate the sentence.[94]

Where reports/articles published in the newspapers are defamatory, the accused have to face trial, the newspapers do not have any additional privilege.[95]4117

24. Definition of Editor and other Relevant Provisions of the Press and Registration of Books Act 1867

Section 1(1) of the Press and Registration of Books Act[1] defines 'Editor' as a person who controls the selection of the matter that is published in a newspaper.[2]Section 3 provides that every book or paper printed within India shall have printed legibly on it the name of the printer and the place of printing, and (if the book or paper be published) the name of the publisher and the place of publication. Section 5(1) says that:

> (1) Without prejudice to the provisions of section 3, every copy of every such newspaper shall contain the names of the owner and editor thereof printed clearly on such copy and also the date of its publication.

Sub-section (2) of s 5 makes it incumbent on the printer and publisher to appear before the authorities mentioned in that section and make a declaration. Section 6 provides authentication of every such declaration. Section 7 which is material, reads thus:

> S. 7 . Office copy of declaration to be*prima facie*evidence.--In any legal proceeding whatever, as well civil as criminal, the production of a copy of such declaration as is aforesaid, attested by the seal of some Court empowered by this Act to have the custody of such declarations, or, in the case of the editor, a copy of the newspaper containing his name printed on it as that of the editor shall be held (unless the contrary be proved) to be sufficient evidence, as against the person whose name shall be subscribed to such declaration, or printed on such newspaper, as the case may be that the said person was printer or publisher, or printer and publisher (accordingly as the words of the said declaration may be) of every portion of every newspaper whereof the title shall correspond with the title of the newspaper mentioned in the declaration, or the editor of every portion of that issue of the newspaper of which a copy is produced.

Section 8 provides the procedure of new declaration by persons who have signed the declaration and subsequently ceased to be the printers or publishers of newspaper. Section 8A says that where any person's name has appeared as an editor in a paper although he was not an editor, he shall within two weeks of his becoming aware that his name has been so published, appear before district presidency or sub-divisional magistrate and make a declaration that his name has been incorrectly published and get a certificate from the magistrate that the provisions of s 7 shall not apply to him. A conjoint reading of said provisions would reveal that legislature had taken into account the inconvenience and hardship to which a person aggrieved from a publication would be put if he is required to make fishing or roving inquiry about the person who personally would be responsible for making or publishing of a defamatory matter.[3] The presumption under s 7 of the Press and Registration of Books Act is not available against the person(s) holding the post other than that of an editor.[4]4118

Chairman of Newspaper Company

Merely because the accused is the chairman of a newspaper company, he cannot be imputed with knowledge of publication.[5] The complaint filed under s 501, IPC, is not maintainable against the chairman publishing the newspaper.[6]

Executive Editor

The word 'Executive Editor' is conspicously absent in the Press and Registration of Books Act 1867 (25 of 1867). In the absence of allegation showing that the accused-executive editor controlled selection of matter, the presumption under s 7 of the Press Act is not attracted.[7] Executive editor is supposed to have requisite knowledge in publication of objectionable matter and, therefore, process could be issued against him.[8]

Managing Editor, Resident Editor or Chief Editor of a Newspaper

Where there was no positive averment in the complaint that the managing director was having knowledge of, or he was directly responsible for publication of defamatory imputation, the order issuing process against him would be liable to be quashed, since the managing director of the newspaper could not be said to be concerned with the publication of news items, unless there is material on record to come to such conclusion.[9]The managing editor, resident editor or chief editor of a newspaper are not immune from prosecution for libellous matter published in the newspaper. Under s 7 of the 1867 Act, there is a presumption that the editor whose name is printed in the newspaper as editor shall be held to be the editor in any civil or criminal proceedings in respect of that publication and the production of a copy of the newspaper containing his name printed thereon as editor shall be deemed to be sufficient evidence to prove that fact, and as the 'Editor' has been defined as the person who controls the selection of the matter that is published in a newspaper, the presumption would go to the extent of holding that he was the person who controlled the selection of the matter that was published in the newspaper. However, at the same time, this presumption contained in s 7 of the Press and Registration of Books Act is a rebuttable presumption and it will be deemed as sufficient evidence unless the contrary is proved. That does not mean that there is statutory immunity against the managing editor, resident editor or chief editor against any prosecution for the alleged publication of any matter in the newspaper over which these persons exercise control. Though, a similar presumption cannot be drawn against the chief editor, resident editor or managing editor, nevertheless the complainant can still allege and prove that they had knowledge and they were responsible for the publication of the defamatory news item. Even the presumption under s 7 is a rebuttable presumption and the same could be proved otherwise. That by itself indicates that somebody other than editor can also be held responsible for selecting the matter for publication in a newspaper.[10]4119

The Karnataka High Court in Prabhu Chawla v AU Sheriff ,[11] has held as under:

> As per the definition of 'editor' in s 1(1) of the Act, 'Editor' means the person who controls the selection of the matter that is published in a newspaper. There is no reference to Resident Editor, Executive Editor, Managing Editor in the Act. There are no allegations against petitioners 1 to 3 in the complaint to show that they have any hand in selection of the matter that is published in the Indian Express Newspaper. In the absence of positive averments against the petitioners 1 to 3 who are described as 'Executive Editor', 'Managing Editor' and 'Resident Editor' and in the absence of presumption available under s 7 of the Act against them, the learned Magistrate could not have ordered process for the alleged offence under s 500, IPC . To ask the Executive Editor, Managing Editor and Resident Editor to undergo the trial because of issuing process against them would be oppressive.

From the scheme of the Press and Registration of Books Act (25 of 1867), it is evident that it is the Editor who controls the selection of the matter that is published in a newspaper. Every copy of the newspaper is required to contain the names of the owner and the Editor and once the name of the Editor is shown, he shall be held responsible in any civil and criminal proceeding.[12] Where the respondent editor had a hand in the publication of the defamatory news against the complainant, the order of the High Court quashing the complaint on petition under s 482, CrPC was set aside, and proceedings were restored.[13]

Unless there is positive allegation/evidence that the Chief Editor was responsible for selection, publishing and printing of alleged defamatory article, Chief Editor cannot be prosecuted for offence under s 499, IPC .[14]

Liability of an Editor and Publisher of a Newspaper

The duty of an editor is clear. He should be most watchful not to publish defamatory attacks upon individuals unless he first takes reasonable pains to ascertain that there are strong and cogent grounds for believing the information, which is sent to him, to be true, that proof is readily available, and that in the particular circumstances, his duty to the public requires him to make the facts known.[15] It is the duty of an editor of a newspaper to check up the news, or the information, that is supplied to him, before publishing the same in his paper, especially when the news might be of a defamatory nature because ultimately it is editor who would be held responsible for publishing any defamatory material in his paper. If he does not do that, he has to suffer the consequences for his neglect and remissness.[16] The plea of the editor that he was merely a publisher and not an author of the matter is not tenable.[17] There could be a presumption against the editor that he committed the offence, however, it is not so not against the chief editor and such presumption is a rebuttable4120 presumption.[18] However, it would be a sufficient answer to a charge if the editor proves that the libel was published in his absence and without his knowledge and that he had, in good faith, entrusted the temporary management of the newspaper during his absence to a competent person.[19] When the editor is on leave and has entrusted his duties to a responsible person who has accepted the full responsibility for the publication of the libel, the editor cannot be held to be criminally liable.[20] Where, on the material date, the accused editor had gone out and the news item was not printed by him, it was held that although the matter published was defamatory, the accused could not be held criminally liable.[21] When the news item reporting that the management of an education trust suspended the principal of a law college on the charges of dereliction of duty, is based on the report said to have been given by the secretary of the trust, and the editor of the newspaper had made no allegation against the principal nor did he have anything to do with the allegations made against the principal by secretary of trust, the editor cannot be held to have defamed the principal and such publication made in good faith does not attract the offences under s 499 and s 501 of IPC .[22]

Where a defamatory statement is published, whether in a newspaper or in pamphlets, or in books, the author, publisher, editor and owner are also liable.[23]

Where a defamatory statement is published, persons who are the actual source of information cannot escape the consequences of being liable for libel, since all persons who contribute in the commission of the offence are jointly and severally liable.[24]

Owner's Liability as Abettor

When the editor is appointed in good faith and is noted for his ability and honesty, the proprietor of the newspaper is not bound to scrutinise the articles that appear daily and cannot be convicted of abetment for the publication of the defamatory matter.[25] The owner in order to be liable under this section has to have direct responsibility for the publication of the defamatory statement and he must also have the intention to harm, or knowledge or reason to believe that the imputation will harm the reputation of the person concerned. The owner's liability will be attracted provided it can be shown that he was responsible for the publication with the necessary intent, knowledge or reasonable belief in the matter.[26] When the complainant himself did not allege in the complaint that owner/partner of the firm running daily newspaper had conspired with other accused (i.e., reporter, publisher4121 and editor) in defaming the complainant, issuance of non-bailable warrant against accused owner/partner of the said firm is not proper and so is liable to be quashed.[27]

25. Exception 1

In order to invoke the applicability of this exception, there are two conditions, namely that the alleged imputation regarding the complainant must be true and it must be made or published for the public good. It is a good defence in criminal cases that the words complained of are true and that it is for public benefit that the matters charged be published though the actual motive for publication was malevolence.[28] It is, however, to be noted that if any of the two conditions is not satisfied, exception 1 would not be attracted. Similarly, though the truth of a defamatory matter is a complete defence to an action for damages in a civil suit, it is not so in a prosecution for the crime of defamation.[29] No amount of truth will justify a libel unless its publication was for the public good.[30] Similarly, unless the justification of the articles alleged to be defamatory is conclusively established, even if they had been written for the public good, the case cannot fall under the first exception.[31]

Exception 1--Truthful Imputation

As stated earlier, the accused has to establish that the alleged imputation was true. If what is said is true, then justification is a good defence. On the other hand, if there is a doubt as to whether it is true, there is no defence at all.[32] If a statement contains only the truth but is incomplete and misleading, the accused cannot plead that the imputation, made by him on the complainant's character, was made in good faith or for the public good.[33] When truth is set up as a defence, it must extend to the entire libel and it is not sufficient that only a part of the libel is proved to be true.[34] In respect of a plea under this exception, Mears CJ, in Muhammad Nazir v Emperor ,[35] observed:

> The facts may be so strong that occasionally it may happen that counsel can advise the client to 'justify' (Exception 1 to s 499, Indian Penal Code). That most dangerous plea should never be put forward unless there is practical certainty of success.

The accused must be prepared to prove that all, that he has said, is true in substance and in fact.[36] In a case for appointment of a mukhia, a statement was made by the accused that the complainant was of bad character and a previous convict. It was proved that the complainant had committed adultery with his sister-in-law, by whom he was the father of an illegitimate child, and that he ought to have been convicted under s 497, IPC, and the statement was substantially true. It was held that the first exception in s 499, IPC, applied to the case.[37]4122

Exception 1--Public Good

The first exception exempts any imputation made or published for the public good. However, on consideration of the manner of the publication, ie, in a newspaper, the publication may not be for the public.[38] Whether the conduct of a particular individual should be publicly criticised and such criticism would be in public interest would vary with the circumstances of each case,[39] because whether it is for public good is a question of fact.[40] In a printed leaflet, it was stated that the complainant, the manager of a school, was, from the very beginning, withholding a portion of the salaries, due to the teachers, and that even after the system of direct payment, he induced the headmaster to deduct a portion of the amount from their salaries. The students, political parties and the public of different shades of opinion agitated in the matter. It was held that the publication was made for the public good.[41]

The question of public good has to be considered from the point of view of the good of the general public as contradistinguished from that of an individual.[42]

26. Exception 2

Whosoever fills a public position renders himself open thereto. He must accept an attack as a necessary, though unpleasant, appendage to his office,[43] because exposing the conduct of a public servant in discharge of his public duties as being unsatisfactory or reprehensible cannot but be said to be for public good.[44] Whenever a person accepts government service or a public office, he must try to imbibe the spirit of toleration and forbearance so as not to be carried away by emotion and sentiment and get provoked by the slightest criticism of his conduct in the discharge of his public duties. He should not be too hypersensitive so as to feel hurt by any and every imputation that is made against him; he should try to stand up to any fair comments, that are made in the interest of public good, even though the comments may not be palatable to the government official.[45] However, public affairs cannot be conducted by men of honour with a view to the welfare of the country if we were to sanction attacks upon them destructive of their honour and character and made without any foundation.[46] The accused published in his newspaper continuously a series of defamatory statements and personal criticisms upon the complainant, a collector. It was held that it was not good faith to make reckless or imaginary criticisms, on a man, with charge of misconduct without any foundation or authority to justify the same.[47] Where, however, it was alleged that the complainant, as patel, was guilty of acts of oppression against the villagers and had been taking bribes and4123 it was found that the accused did exercise due care and attention before he expressed his opinion and that the imputations were made in good faith for the public good, it was held that the accused was not guilty.[48]

Exception 2--Accused to Show 'Good Faith' also

Even a person claiming the benefit of the second exception to s 499, IPC is required to show that the opinion expressed by him was in good faith which related to the conduct of a public servant in the discharge of his public functions or respecting his character so far as his character appears in that context.[49]

Exception 2 and Contempt of Court

A broad and general proposition that a reply submitted to a contempt notice, in no case, amounts to contempt of court in the light of the second exception to s 499, IPC, which is contrary to the law of contempt as adjudicated upon by the courts from time to time and the limits prescribed by the Act and the judicial pronouncements. It has to be always kept in mind that the law of defamation in the IPC cannot be equated with the law of contempt of court in general terms.[50]

27. Exception 3

In respect of this exception, the authors of IPC observed:

> There are public men who are not public functionaries; persons, who hold no office, may yet... take a very active part in urging or opposing the adoption of measure in which the community is deeply interested. It appears clear to us that every person ought to be allowed to comment, in good faith, on the proceedings of these volunteer servants of the public with the same freedom with which we allow him to comment on the proceedings of the official servants of the public.[51]

In an Allahabad newspaper, an advertisement was published by the complainant in which he solicited the public to subscribe to a hospital of which he was the surgeon in charge, stating the number of successful operations which had been performed. It was held that as such advertisement had the effect of making such hospital a 'public question' and of submitting it to the 'judgment of the public', the accused, who had expressed himself in good faith in criticising the advertisement as unprofessional, was within the third, sixth and ninth exceptions to this section.

28. Exception 4

This is one of the two exceptions which do not make a reference to good faith. What is needed is that the report of the proceedings of a court of justice, or the result of any such proceedings, should be substantially true even though it may not be for public good.[52] In other words, the publication should be a substantially true report. It need not be true absolutely word by word; but taking the whole thing, it must be a4124 substantially true account.[53] If based on the contents of the FIR that impugned news item has been published, whether the allegations made are true or false need not concern the journalist while publishing the same. When the public authorities had taken cognizance of the complaint and have initiated necessary legal action and any of the proceedings relating to the crime that occured and if the report is published in the newspaper, it would not amount to defamation and squarely fall within the fourth exception to s 499, IPC .[54] It is also not necessary that the report should be contemporaneous, the reason being that law-books and reports of decisions, etc., are not published on the same day, or, very often, soon after the delivery of judgment in court.[55] In view of the above, only two things have to be proved by the accused, i.e., (a) that the report is substantially true account of the proceedings or the result of such proceedings; and (b) that the proceedings are of a court of justice.

The explanation, appended to exception 4, shows that the phrase 'court of justice' has been given a very wide interpretation by the section itself.[56]

This exception would apply not only to judgments and orders, but also to complaints and pleadings made by the parties concerned.[57]

29. Exception 5

This Exception, confined only to comments on cases which have been decided, and not on cases which are sub judice, deals with two classes of cases, viz.,

(a) with opinion respecting the merits of any civil or criminal case; and
(b) with the conduct of person connected with judicial proceedings and character deducible therefrom.

A declaration or an opinion expressed in his judgment by a magistrate or a judge is open to searching and severe observations, and may be freely criticized and commented upon by the editor of a newspaper. However, where the criticism is converted into an attack upon the judge or magistrate as a conspirator against justice, a traitor to his oath, a trickster, or a man who had maneuvered his procedure so as to defeat the truth, it is for the person, who has uttered these things, to justify them, or, under the IPC, to establish affirmatively that he believes them to be true, and that too an reasonable grounds.[58] Thus, where the accused made a petition to the deputy commissioner charging a munsif with conspiracy with the plaintiff to set up a false case in this court against the accused, who was a defendant in the case, it was held that the accused was guilty.[59]

30. Exception 6

This exception covers a wide range of subjects. The object of the exception is that the public should be aided by comments, in its judgment, of the public performance submitted to its judgment. Comment, otherwise defamatory, is justified on this4125 ground alone.[60] Good faith is an essential condition for claiming the benefit of this exception. The right involves two essentials, first, that the imputations should be commented on the work criticized, and secondly, that it should be fair, that is to say, that if it professes to be an inference drawn from the contents of that work, it must be an inference which it is possible to draw therefrom. It would be monstrous, for instance, for a critic to suggest as an inference from a mere grammatical inaccuracy in a work that its author was a swindler or a libertine. The excuse of fair comment may be forfeited by reason of mere recklessness in making an unwarrantable assertion. Good faith does not, however, require logical infallibility.[61]

A prospectus of a company, which invites the public to deal with the company, is not a matter merely for the prospective shareholders of the company, it is a scheme or a project placed before the public. The conduct of a private business, if it is of a sufficiently large extent, or if it concerns a sufficiently large number of persons, is a matter of public interest.[62]

31. Exception 7

This exception allows a privilege for censure by one person against another. The requirements for it are that:

(a) the person, passing the queasier, has authority over the other person;
(b) such authority was conferred by law or it arose out of a lawful contract made with that person;
(c) the conduct was in a matter to which such lawful authority related; and
(d) it was passed in good faith.

The lawful authority, contemplated by the exception, is fairly wide as would be evident from the illustration to the exception. Such authority may be deemed to be vested in a variety of relationships. Judge or any other judicial authority may be protected by some statutes or may gain the benefit of exception 9. This exception makes the position clear and the case may also be covered by this exception. A municipal engineer reported to the vice-chairman of the municipality that he had found that some stocks of metal had been taken away and he learnt on inquiry that the complainant, who was the contractor, had done this. It was held that if the report was made in good faith, the engineer was entitled to the benefit of the seventh and eighth exceptions.[63] Similarly, the adverse remarks given by a sub-divisional officer, regarding the work of a storekeeper, in the annual confidential report, sent to the chief engineer, were held as no defamation.[64] The accused, the guru or spiritual guide of the caste, to which the complainant belonged, issued a letter to the effect that as complainant's wife had been caught with a man of low caste, no one of her co-religionists should have any social intercourse with her, and in effect that she should be outcast. It was held that so far as the statement implied a censure on the conduct of the complainant's wife, they were justified by the authority, with which the4126 accused was vested as spiritual head of the community, and, therefore, the case came within the seventh exception.[65]

32. Exception 8

Under this exception, a legitimate complaint against a person to a person in authority is no defamation. A bona fide complaint to the postmaster-general to obtain redress for a grievance against a postal employee is privileged.[66] One, who wants to bring himself within this exception, must affirmatively establish that the complaint was preferred in good faith and that it was preferred to a person who had authority over the person complained against.[67] The accused must prove that the person, to whom the complaint was made, had lawful authority over the person complained against in respect of the subject-matter of the accusation.[68] Similarly, where the accusations were made, in a complaint, by the accused to the superior authority of the complainant, it was held that even if the complaint contained defamatory matter, it was privileged by exception 8 to this section.[69] When a counsel of the court, duly instructed by his client, thinks it necessary to state facts in a petition for the purpose of affording redress to him, he is protected under the eighth exception.[70] Where, however, the defamatory matter was contained in a communication, addressed by the accused, who was a member of the police force, to the district panchayat officer, alleging that the complainant was a woman of loose character and was having illicit connection with goondas, her paramours coming to her frequently at nights, it was held that the officer had no such lawful authority.[71] Accusation before the public by publication in a newspaper is not the sort of lawful authority contemplated by the exception.[72] No doubt, in political theory in the democratic form of government, a minister is, in the long run, responsible to the public. However, that is not the sort of lawful authority contemplated by the exception.[73]Likewise, where the accused informed the police and other persons that he suspected a respectable shopkeeper and his family of having committed or instigated the commission of burglary and theft, it was held that if there was good faith, the statements were privileged as the police had power to act upon them, but the privilege did not attach to the statements made to other persons.[74] Similarly, a complaint to a police constable is not privileged.[75]

As already mentioned earlier, the eighth exception would apply only if the statements complained of, are made in good faith.[76] Exceptions 8 and 9 would not4127 apply to a case if the accused has acted recklessly and without due care and caution.[77] Where the accused stated that the complainant was actuated by personal ill-will and malice against the accused in passing an order and it was found that the complainant by his previous conduct had given ample reason to the accused for believing, rightly or wrongly, that he was acting with personal ill-will against him, it was held that the accused was protected by exceptions 8 and 9.[78] A complaint was made to the president of a local board. It was suggested that the complainant was suffering from leprosy in order to disqualify him from nomination. The complainant had white marks on his foot. The president gave the matter his judicial consideration and ultimately decided that the complainant was a leper. It was observed that the case came very near to exceptions 8 and 9 to s 499, IPC .[79] In Romesh Roy v King ,[80] after a meeting, some 42 members of the locality presented a petition to the deputy commissioner of police stating that the complainant was living an immoral life and that a young girl was not his wife, but his mistress, and further that he and one other person were using the girl as a prostitute and living on her earnings. No enmity was proved and no motive ascribed as to why the accused should defame the complainant in this manner. It was held that the accused was entitled to the benefit of this exception. However, no plea of good faith can be advanced for claiming benefit under this exception in respect of a manner which is false within the knowledge of the person making it. Once the accusation is found to be false, it follows that it was not made in good faith.[81]

The accused and members of a housing society received letters which contained obscene material against the daughter of the accused. The accused and other members of the society approached the police authorities for guidance. Held, the approach made to the police was in good faith, and case was covered by exceptions 8 and 9 of s 499, IPC . No case for defamation was made out.[82]

33. Exception 9

Scope

Under this exception, it is not a defamation to make an imputation on the character of another if the imputation is made in good faith for the protection of the interest of the person making it, or of any other person, or for the public good.[83] The ingredients of this exception are that the imputation must be made in good faith and it must be for the protection of the interests of the person making it, or of any other person, or for the public good.[84] Good faith ends where malice begins.[85] Therefore, if one invokes4128 the aid of this exception on the ground that he published the impugned article in good faith and for the public good, he has to establish both good faith and public good.[86] If good faith is not established, it is not necessary to consider whether public good is involved.[87] The failure to prove good faith would exclude the application of the ninth exception in favour of the accused even if the requirement of public good is satisfied.[88] In other words, unless good faith is proved, an accused is not entitled to invoke the aid of this exception.[89] However, if defamatory statements are made in good faith and for public good, they are entitled to be protected under this exception even if they are found to be baseless and incorrect.[90] The truth of the imputation need not be proved by the accused for claiming the benefit of this exception.[91] If the impugned imputation has been made in good faith, i.e., after due care and caution, and the move behind it to safeguard the interest of his daughter, and not to defame the complainant, this exception would be attracted.[92] If having regard to facts and circumstances within his knowledge, the accused might, as an ordinary reasonable and prudent man, have drawn the conclusions which he has expressed in defamatory language for the protection of his own interests, he may fairly be held to have made out his good faith.[93] In KM Cherian v D Johnson ,[94] the report in connection with an offence, published in a daily, was made with the best of intentions and for the public good. It was factually true and the comment, if any, was based on the facts and supported by good faith. It was held that the accused was protected by the ninth exception.

This exception would cover not only such allegations of facts as can be proved true, but also expressions of opinion and personal inference.[95] The comment based on facts and supported by good faith would be protected by this exception.[96] However, if the allegations in a complaint are found to be false and made without due care and caution, they are not saved by the ninth exception.[97]4129

Actual loss of reputation is not required to be proved. An accused taking shelter of exception 4 to s 500, IPC, must show that the imputation alleged to be defamatory was made in good faith.[1]

Exception 9--Ingredients

The ingredients of the nineth exception are that (1) the imputation must be made in good faith; and (2) the imputation must be for the protection of the interests of the person making it or of any other person or for the public good.[2]

Exception 9--Burden of Proof of Exception is on Accused

A magistrate cannot, soon after examining the complainant and recording his/her statement, dismiss the complaint on the ground that the imputation falls under the ninth exception to s 499, IPC, because the burden, that the case comes under any exception, is on the accused.

Without there being any material in the complaint or in the sworn statement of the complainant, it is premature for a magistrate to hold that exception 9 to s 499, IPC, would apply.[3] It is for the accused to plead that he is protected under exception 9 to s 499, IPC . The burden to prove that his case falls within the ambit of the said exception is on him.[4]

Where the accused takes plea that the imputation/allegation alleged to be defamatory was made in good faith, the burden to prove the same lies on him. The said question cannot be decided by the High Court in proceedings under s 482, CrPC .[5]

Exception 9 Distinguished from Exception 1

The two requirements of the first exception are that the impugned statement must be shown to be true and that its publication must be shown to be for public good. The proof of truth, which is one of the ingredients of the first exception, is not an ingredient of the ninth exception. What the ninth exception requires an accused to prove is that he made the statement in good faith. Proof of truth of the impugned statement is not an element of the ninth exception as it is of the first. In dealing with the claim of the accused under the ninth exception it is not necessary and, indeed, it is immaterial, to consider whether the accused had strictly proved the truth of the allegations made by him.[6]

Exception 9 Distinguished from Exception 8

The point of difference between exception 8 and exception 9 is that whereas in the former the person, to whom the complaint is made, must have lawful authority to4130 deal with subject-matter of the complaint and take proceedings against that person (i.e., complainant), there is no such requirement to exception 9 where it is sufficient if a communication is made to a person for the protection of one's own interest in which the other also has an interest. This is clearly brought out by the illustrations to the exception.[7]

Exception 9--'Good Faith'

'Good faith' has to be proved by the accused.[8] Whether good faith has been proved by an accused person in his defense to a charge of defamation under s 500, IPC, is basically a question of fact,[9] and matter of evidence.[10] The law treats the onus as discharged if he succeeds in proving a preponderance of probability. As soon as that is established, the burden shifts to the prosecution which has still to discharge its original onus. In reality, the onus on the accused may well be compared to the onus on a party in civil proceedings.[11] However, before the onus can be said to have been shifted on the prosecution, there must be evidence to show that the accused acted with due care and attention. He has to establish as a fact that he made inquiry before he made the imputation and he has to give reasons and facts to indicate that he acted with due care and attention and was satisfied that the imputation was correct. The proof of the truth of the statement is not an element of the ninth exception as that of the first exception to s 499 . In the ninth exception, the person, making the imputation, has to substantiate that his inquiry was attended with due care and attention and he was thus satisfied that the imputation was true.[12] Simple belief or actual belief by itself is not enough. It must be shown that the belief in the impugned statement had a rational basis, and was not just a blind simple belief. It is so where the element of due care and attention plays an important role. If, before making a statement, the accused does not show due care and attention, that would defeat his plea of good faith. However, it must be remembered that good faith does not require logical infallibility. It is not possible to lay down any rigid rule or test for deciding whether an accused person acted in good faith. The question has to be considered on the facts and circumstances of each case, what is the nature of the implication made, under what circumstances did it come to be made, what is the status of the person who made the same, was there any malice in his mind when he did so, was any inquiry made by him before that, are there any reasons to accept his story that he acted with due care and attention, even in the absence of personal malice.[13] If it is quite apparent that what the accused has published in his newspaper was an accurate and true report of the proceedings of the assembly, the involvement of the complainant was disclosed by the preliminary inquiry made by the government, if the accused bona fide believing the version of the minister to be true published the report4131 in good faith, it cannot be said that they intended to harm the reputation of the complainant, so the offence of defamation is not made out against the accused.[14]

Exception 9--'For the Protection of the Interests of the Person making it, or of any other Person'

If the alleged imputation is not for the protection of the interests of the accused himself, or of some other person, or for the public good, the benefit under this exception cannot be claimed.[15] The protection of interest need not necessarily be the protection of one's own interest. It would be sufficient for purpose of this exception that the imputation may be made for the protection of interest of any other person.[16] Whether the accused was, protecting his interest is a question of fact to be decided by the court keeping in view the peculiar circumstances of a particular case.[17] Where the accused postman went to deliver a letter to the complainant but did not find the complainant at home, and on the second day the complainant misbehaved with him and hurled abuses at him, again on the third day the complainant misbehaved with the accused and hurled abuses, the endorsement made by the accused on the envelope about the conduct of the complainant that the complainant misbehaved and hurled abuses on the basis of his experience was held in good faith for the protection of his own interest and the said endorsement was covered under the ninth exception to s 499 and did not amount to defamation.[18] In a divorce suit filed against the wife on the ground of adultery, statements made by the accused against his father-in-law who was not a party to the suit and was not at all required to prove the matrimonial suit, cannot be claimed to have been made by the accused in the protection of his interest.[19] The accused was watching a civil case on behalf of his partner. The complainant, though not a witness, went and sat with the witnesses and began talking to them. The accused asked the court to stop it lest he should tamper with the witnesses. It was held that facts of the case showed that he was acting in good faith in the interest of his partner, who was the defendant in the suit, and the case was covered by exception 9.[20] Where the accused, in a civil suit, instituted by him, stated, when examined as a witness, that he did not want to examine the complainant as his witness as he had been bought by the other side, it was held that as the accused made the said imputation for the protection of his own interests, he was protected by the ninth exception of this section.[21]4132

Exception 9--'Public Good'

The words 'public good' find place in exceptions 1, 9 and 10 to s 499, IPC . Except in these three cases, the question, whether the alleged imputation was for public good, does not arise, at all, for consideration. 'Public good', contemplated in the said exceptions, must be of the general public as contradistinguished from what is regarded as a spiritual benefit by a particular act.[22]

Exception 9--'Public Good'--Instances

As specified in exception 1, whether it is for the public good is a question of fact to be decided by the court in view of the peculiar circumstances of a particular case.[23] If it is quite apparent that what the accused had published in his newspaper was an accurate and true report of the proceedings of the assembly, and it was a report in respect of public conduct of public servants who were entrusted with public funds intended to be used for public good and the news items were published for public good, the offence of defamation is not made out against the accused.[24] The accused, a regional manager of the Andhra Bank, issued a confidential circular to branch managers of his region that they should be vigilant while dealing the complainant and some other persons in their business transactions. The said circular had emanated after investigation by the vigilance department of the central office of Andhra Bank and was issued at the instance of the central and zonal office. There cannot be any doubt that such a circular was issued only in good faith and also for public good and to safeguard the interest of the public at large. The accused in such cases is protected under exception 9.[25] Where the accusation against the accused was that they were all opposed to the complainant on his being appointed as a village munsif and had written that the complainant was a rowdy and a law breaker, it was that the accused had acted in good faith for protecting the interests of the public.[26] Where, in a handbill, an appeal was issued by the accused dissuading the public from giving any subscription to the complainant, who neither maintained nor supervised the accounts of a society, it was held that it was for the public good that the society should be safe from being deprived of its money.[27] In Sanatam Daw v Dasarathi Tah ,[28] the accused, editor of a weekly paper, criticised the mismanagement of an electric company, of which the complainant was the director and managing partner, using the word chora karbari, by which is meant 'black marketing'. It was found that the company was the most inefficient and ill-managed company which charged the consumers at a very high rate. It was that the publication was made for the public good. If a statement made by a witness in a judicial proceeding is true in fact and also relevant to the matter under investigation, it is for the public good that it should be made.[29] In L Soma v Abraham Naidu ,[30] in a suit, filed by a Roman Catholic, for recovery of some money from the complainant, who was in charge of a fund called 'choir fund', during4133 a talk about compromise, the accused, who had attended the court as a witness, opposed the suggestion of the complainant's advocate that the money might continue with the complainant and stated that the complainant was heavily involved in debt and was an insolvent. It was held that the object of using the words was not to defame the complainant, but to protect the choir fund, and was, therefore, covered by exception 9.

The accused and members of a housing society received letters which contained obscene material against the daughter of the accused. The accused and other members of the society approached the police authorities for guidance. Held, the approach made to police was in good faith, and case was covered by exceptions 8 and 9 of s 499, IPC . No case for defamation was made out.[31]

Exception 9--Instances of Cases not Covered under 'Public Good'

Where, however, the accused had published in a newspaper, having a wide circulation, that the complainant along with other persons will attempt in some way or other to endanger his life and if he becomes the victim of a sudden tragedy or calamity, those persons should be considered as the cause, it was held that the publication was not for the public good.[32] Similarly, the advance publication of news with bold headings, in a newspaper, against the complainant when suspected case of murder against him is under investigation,[33] or the publication of a charge of bribery against a magistrate in a newspaper,[34] or the making of a defamatory report against a person by a police officer,[35] or denouncing of a brahmin as a maleksha for providing an alcoholic refreshment at a wedding reception for those of his guests who desired to partake of such beverages,[36] cannot be said for the public good.

Exception 9 and Statement made to Police

A statement made to the police under s 161 of the CrPC 1973 is not an 'absolutely privileged statement', but only 'qualified privilege' and the said statement does not come under the exception 9 of s 500 of the IPC .[37]

Applicability of Exception 9 to Advocates

A counsel owes a duty to his client and he must carry out faithfully his client's instructions. If his client makes serious allegations against another party in a suit, it is counsel's duty to plead those allegations in the plaint or written statement or other pleading. A counsel, however, must perform his duty with discretion. Quite clearly, he should not plead what are obviously irrelevant, wanton, wild and reckless allegations. On the other hand, it must be remembered that the counsel is not a judge in the case, and it is not for him to decide whether the allegations, made by his client, are true or false. He is bound, except in very exceptional circumstances, to accept his client's words.[38] Similarly, in the absence of express malice (which is not to be4134 presumed), a pleader is protected by exception 9.[39] When an advocate is charged with defamation in respect of words spoken or written by him in the performance of his professional duty, the court will presume that he acted in good faith unless there is cogent proof to the contrary, and the burden lies on the prosecution, in such a case, to prove the absence of good faith. The privilege, enjoyed by counsel in this respect, is, of course, not absolute, but so long as there is no material before the court to suggest that an advocate was actuated by malice or improper potties in making the imputation which form the subject-matter of the charge, he is presumed to have acted in good faith and is entitled to the benefit of the ninth exception.[40] When a lawyer is acting in the course of his professional duties and is compelled, subject to the disciplinary action of the court, to put forward every thing which may assist his client, good faith is presumed and bad faith is not to be assumed merely because the statement is prima facie defamatory.[41] The court, having due regard to public policy, would be extremely cautious before it deprives an advocate of the protection of exception 9.[42] A pleader, acting upon his own recollection of the evidence given by a witness two years before, is not deprived of the protection of this exception unless there is satisfactory evidence of actual malice and unless there is cogent proof that unfair advantage was taken, by him, of his position as a pleader for an indirect purpose.[43] There may, however, be circumstances which may show that the question or remark objected to was made wantonly or from private motive, but the greatest care ought to be taken to inquiry into the circumstances.[44] Even if the circumstances suggest recklessness or malice, further inquiry should be made and an opportunity if possible, should be given to a practitioner to offer an explanation before summons is issued.[45] It is the duty of a court when complaint is made against an advocate for having used defamatory words to presume that the remark or question objected to was made on instructions and in entire good faith. A pleader, who files a petition, containing defamatory statements on behalf of his client, cannot be prosecuted under s 500, IPC, where there is no allegation of any malice or absence of good faith on his part,[46] or where it is admitted that the pleader had no malice or grudge.[47] There can be no defamation unless the circumstances show that the remark was made wantonly or from a malicious or private motive.[48] Even the presence of malice will not override the presumption of good faith when the statement was obviously necessary in the interest of the client.[49] To rebut this presumption it is not sufficient merely to allege that the client knew the imputation to be untrue. There must be convincing evidence4135 that the pleader was actuated by an improper motive, personal to himself, and not be a desire to protect the interest of his client in the cause.[50]

Advocate Representing a Party as Counsel when not Protected by Exception 9

However, if it is specifically alleged that the advocate bears private malice towards the complainant and that the defamatory matter has been written and published wantonly, there would be a prima facie case for framing a charge.[51] An advocate, who makes defamatory statements in the conduct of a case, has no wider protection than a layman, that is to say, he has to bring his case within the terms of exception 9 to s 499, IPC, and s 105 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872.[52] If serious and untrue allegations are made by him, he brings himself open to a prosecution for defamation.[53] He has no absolute privilege on the prosecution for defamation.[54] It cannot be said that when a lawyer puts a question on the instructions of his client to a witness in cross-examination which is defamatory in character without there being any reasonable ground, it is a communication made for the purpose of the employment as lawyer. There must be a reasonable ground for putting a question, which is defamatory in character, and if there is no basis for putting such question, then it is difficult to state that such a communication, which is defamatory in character, is a professional communication and its disclosure is protected under s 126 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872.[55] A pleader must use a certain amount of common sense and caution in asking a defamatory question. Where the complainant, when he went into the witness-box, was asked whether he was a gambler, whether he was a thief and whether his wife was leading the life of a prostitute, etc., with utter recklessness and without regard to seeing whether there was any truth and the questions were asked not for the good of the case, set up by the complainant but with no other view than publicly to injure the reputation of the complainant, it was held that these questions were asked in absolutely bad faith and the pleader was guilty.[56] Bad faith may be inferred from entirely irrelevant defamatory remarks of a gratuitous nature. If made with a malicious intent, such remarks would not protect counsel from criminal defamation.[57]

A Pleader not Acting as a Counsel--Not Protected by Exception 9

A pleader would be liable for prosecution in making a defamatory averment in a pleading if he was not acting in his capacity as a counsel for his client.[58] Where a pleader for the complainant in a case wrote a letter to the trying magistrate to inquire when he would take up the case for trial, describing the accused a 'notorious4136 wrong-doer', it was held that the imputation was not made as a pleader and he was guilty under this section.[59]

Applicability of Exception 9 to a Client for Defamatory Statements of his Counsel

If the publication of an imputation concerning a third person is by the lawyer, the client cannot be charged directly with the offence of defamation because the client is, at the most, an abettor. It may happen in a particular case that the lawyer has a good defense, whereas the client might be still liable for abatement.[60]

Where an insinuation, that the complainant had been implicated in a case of robbery, was put in a question, asked by the pleader, who defended the accused, it was held that it was not proved that the question was put under his instructions, and even if it had been so put, the accused could not be convicted.[61] Where the accused's advocate, in cross-examining one of other part's witnesses, asked a defamatory question which was objected to by the witness and disallowed by the judge, and there was nothing to show that the imputation was not made in good faith with the belief that it was open for them to do so, it was held that the accused were entitled to the benefit of exception 9.[62] The court cannot assume against the client that he instructed the counsel in definite terms used by the counsel in his argument.[63] In a reply sent by the lawyer for the accused to a notice sent by complainant, the father-in-law of the accused, allegation of unchastity of the wife of the accused was made and it was also alleged that the complainant knew about her immoral conduct and also positively helped her in her immoral ways, it was held that the presumption, that the accused might be taken to have given instructions therefore, was not inevitable seeing that counsel's volition had intervened and it was unsafe to found criminal liability on the accused on such basis.[64]

If imputation, conveyed by the question to a witness in cross-examination by a lawyer on instructions of his client, are per se defamatory without there being reasonable ground for thinking that the imputations were well founded, the client is a principal offender, and not an abettor,[65] because defamation can be committed by proxy through the mouth of the lawyer.[66]

Applicability of Exception 9 to a Witness

So far as civil cases are concerned, the principle of absolute privilege to a witness has been recognised. The Privy Council laid it down that it concerns the public and the administration of justice that witnesses, giving evidence on oath in a court of justice, should not have, before their eyes, the fear of being harassed by a suit for damages; the only penalty, which they should incur, if they have given their evidence falsely, should be an indictment for perjury.[67] It was accordingly held by most of the High4137 Courts[68] that the statements made by witnesses in civil cases, are absolutely privileged. However, this doctrine of absolute privilege has not been applied in respect of witnesses in criminal cases. Their cases are governed by s 499, IPC . Thus, it has been held by the Madras High Court that a witness does not have the absolute privilege as regards the statements made by him; he has only a qualified privilege under exception 1 or exception 9 to s 499, IPC .[69] The same view was expressed in Allahabad,[70] Nagpur,[71] Calcutta,[72] Rangoon,[73] Madhya Pradesh[74] and Bombay.[75] In all these cases, the question as to whether a witness is entitled to the benefit of the exception has been considered on merits.

Applicability of Exception 9 to Pleadings, Petitions and Complaints, etc.

A complainant, making libelous statements in his complaint, is not absolutely protected so far as criminal proceedings are concerned.[76] Statements in an application for transfer against a magistrate are not absolutely privileged in criminal prosecution;[77] the benefit of this exception may be claimed if the statements fall within it.[78] Where allegations of adultery were made in a petition for divorce filed by the accused after his wife had left his house for the protection of the accused's interests, good faith may be presumed and the case would fall within the ninth exception.[79] The position is the same in respect of pleadings in civil courts. Thus, if false statement is made maliciously in a plain in a civil court, the statement would not be privileged.[80] Similarly, statement made in written statements in civil suits are not absolutely privileged; they may be proved to be such as to entitle the accused to the benefit of this exception. Where the allegation of the accused was that they were prosecuted at the instance of M who had kept the wife of one of the prosecution witnesses as his mistress, it was held that the statement, connecting any prosecution witness with M, should be deemed to have been made for the prosecution of the interest of the accused and was protected by exception 9 to s 499, IPC, if it was made in good faith.[81] The same would be the case with any application made in civil suits,[82] or affidavits filed by parties in judicial proceedings.[83]4138

34. Exception 10

This exception deals with cases, for instance, where one warns another against employing a third person in his service saying that he is a dishonest person.[84] To bring a case within this exception, it must be proved that the accused intended, in good faith, to convey a caution to one person against another, that such caution was conveyed by the proper means.[85] The gist of the tenth exception is that the imputation must be made in good faith,[86] and for the good of the person to whom it was conveyed and for the public good.[87] Where the complainant was put out of caste by a meeting of his caste fellows and the accused warned certain other members of the caste that if they took water from the hands of the complainant, they would also be liable to be put out of caste, it was held that the action of the accused was covered by the tenth exception.[88]

In order to bring a case within the scope of the tenth exception, it must be proved that the statement/publication was intended in 'good faith' to convey a caution to one person against another; that such caution was intended for the good of the person to whom it was conveyed, or of such person in whom that person was interested, or for the 'public good'.[89]

Where to the charge of defamation under s 500, IPC, the accused invokes the aid of tenth exception to s 499, IPC, 'good faith' and 'public good' have both to be established by him. The mere plea that the accused believed that what he had stated was in 'good faith' is not sufficient to accept his defence and he must justify the same by adducing evidence. However, he is not required to discharge that burden by leading evidence to prove his case beyond a reasonable doubt.

The degree and the character of proof which an accused is expected to furnish in support of his plea cannot be equated with the degree of proof expected from the prosecution in a criminal trial. The moment the accused succeeds in proving a preponderance of probability, onus which lies on him in this behalf stands discharged. Therefore, it is neither feasible nor possible to lay down a rigid test for deciding whether an accused person acted in 'good faith' and for 'public good' under the said exception.

The question has to be considered on the facts and circumstances of each case, having regard to the nature of imputation made; the circumstances on which it came to be made and the status of the person who makes the imputation as also the status of the person against whom the imputation is allegedly made. These and a host of other considerations would be relevant and required to be considered for deciding the appellants' plea of 'good faith' and 'public interest'. Unfortunately, all these are questions of fact and matters for evidence.[90]4139

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XXI

Of Defamation

S. 500.

Punishment for defamation.--

Whoever defames another shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides the penalty for the simple and plain act of defamation as defined in the preceding s 499, IPC .[91] Filing of private complaint under s 500, IPC, which ultimately was quashed would not amount to defamation. Equally, it cannot be stated that the service of summons on the said complaint would amount to defamation, as the service of summons was only in pursuance of the order of the court.[92] Accused had lodged complaint bonafidely as to demand for bribe. Complaint was dismissed and accused was acquitted giving benefit of doubt. Whenever any investigation is made on information supplied in good faith or without any mala fide intention, then the person who made the report cannot be prosecuted for the offence under s 500, IPC . No case for defamation under s 500, IPC was made out, and accused was acquitted of the charge under s 500, IPC .[93]4140

The maxim 'action personalis mortur cum persona' does not apply to criminal proceedings for offence of defamation punishable under s 500, IPC .[1]

2. Ingredients

So far as the ingredients of s 500, IPC, are concerned the complainant has to make out a case of:

(a) making any imputation concerning the complainant by the accused;
(b) that such imputation was made by words spoken or written or by sign or visible representations; and
(c) that such imputation was made with the intention of harming or with the knowledge or having reason to believe that it would harm the reputation of the complainant against whom such statement was made.[2]

3. Mens Rea

On a careful reading of the commencing portion of s 499, IPC, it is clear that to satisfy the ingredients, the requisite mens rea also would be essential.[3] A close reading of ss 499 to 501 of the IPC would reveal that the person publishing the matter must have the intention of defaming or he must have the knowledge or good reason to believe that such matter is defamatory to any person, group or any religion, etc.[4]

Artificial/Juristic Person

One of the essential ingredients to constitute an offence under s 499, IPC is either intention to harm or knowledge or reasons to believe that such imputation will harm the reputation of the other. Therefore, artificial/juristic persons cannot be prosecuted for offence under s 500, IPC .[5]

4. Section 500 and Section 504

The offence under ss 500 and 504, IPC, can co-exist and they are distinct offences committed in the cause of some transaction and the test is whether a normal person, in the position of the person insulted would have reacted to the use of the particular insulting words, by retaliating, in a violent manner whereby a breach of peace would have been caused.[6]

Where the accused called the counsel badmash in open court, the offence does not come under s 499, IPC, and acquittal of the accused for the offence under s 500, IPC, is legal. Perhaps the words have been articulated so as to cause harm to the person, in which case it might amount to an offence under s 504, IPC .[7]4141

5. Section 120B and Sections 500, 501 and 502

Commentary under the same heading in s 502, post, may be referred to.

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, and triable by the court of session if offence is committed against the President or the Vice-President or the Governor of a State or Administrator of the Union Territory or a minister in respect of his conduct in the discharge of his public functions when instituted upon a complaint made by the public prosecutor, and by a magistrate of the first class in any other case, and may also be tried summarily.

7. Power under Section 311CrPC --When not to be Exercised

The provisions of s 311 CrPC, are essentially intended in the interests of justice to bring to court all necessary evidence in respect of the case that is being tried by the court, and it is not intended to bring in any evidence before the court to implicate persons who were made parties to the proceedings at a very belated stage and long after prosecution against him is barred by time under the provisions of s 468, CrPC .[8]

8. Vicarious Liability

If a letter is issued on the letter pad of a partnership firm and if a person complains that the letter is defamatory and comes to the court for criminal prosecution for offences under ss 499 / 500, IPC, there cannot be any general vicarious criminal liability on the rest of the partners who did not sign the letter unless it is averted in the statements under ss 200 and 202, CrPC that the persons not signing the letter had also the criminal intent of defaming the complainant.[9]

9. Filing of Complaint, Issuing of Process against Accused is no Defamation

It cannot be contended that filing of private complaint under s 500, IPC, which ultimately was quashed, would amount to defamation. Equally, it cannot be stated that the service of summons on the said complaint which was taken on file by the judicial magistrate also, would amount to defamation, as the service of summons was only in pursuance of the order of the court.[10]

10. Complaint and its Contents

A complaint must contain the facts relied on as constituting the offence of defamation though it is not necessary to quote the section of the IPC . It is for the court to determine, on the facts, stated in the complaint, what offence has prima facie been committed. Where, on a complaint, purporting to be under ss 193 and 211, IPC, the magistrate, after hearing the evidence, framed a charge under s 500, IPC, and convicted him, it was held that the conviction was sound.[11] The complaint is good if the charge is quite specific and contains the words alleged to be defamatory. Matter,4142 need be made in a complaint of defamation.[12] The absence of averments in the complaint that because of alleged imputation in the news item, the complainants reputation had been lowered in the estimation of others leads to dismissal of complaint.[13] In Mohammed Gul v Fazley Karim ,[14] the complainant, filing a complaint with the allegation that the accused had filed a petition falsely implicating him in the specified acts and cases in order to disgrace him, made a prayer for an inquiry into the allegation and it was added that the complainant 'reserves' the right of bringing the case of defamation against the accused in future. It was held that it was a proper complaint. Where a complaint was made to the magistrate under s 211, IPC, that the accused had made a false charge, against him (the complainant), of poisoning his daughter-in-law with a view to injure his reputation, it was held that the magistrate could deal with it under s 500, IPC .[15]

Complaint--Infirmity in Filing of

The expression 'or from sickness or infirmity unable to make complaint' in the proviso[16] is in this context of crucial significance. Such 'infirmity' need not be on account of reasons of health or age alone. Any debility, disability, difficulty or inability must therefore fall within the sweep of the expression 'infirmity' appearing in the proviso. A larger meaningful, interpretation has got to be given for the proviso if the proviso were to be read and understood to cover such complaints in the name of the complainant being preferred by some other person holding the power of attorney of the complainant. The expression 'infirmity' cannot be read down to mean infirmity resulting from ill-health or age. The expression 'infirmity' in language cannot also be understood in any limited or restricted sense. 'A personal falling' is as per the Websters Dictionary 'infirmity' in language. The dictionary refers to AJ Toynbee's famous statement that 'one of the besetting infirmities of living creatures is egotism'. Infirmity under the proviso to s 199(1), CrPC, must therefore be held to hold within its sweep any deficiency, debility, disability, impossibility, difficulty or inadequacy, which the court finds to be reasonable and sufficient to dispense with the personal appearance of the complainant to present the complaint. Such a vibrant interpretation must be given to the expression 'infirmity' considering the purpose and purport of the proviso to sub-s 1 of s 199, CrPC .[17]

Complaint--Person Aggrieved

In cases other than those falling under s 199(2) of the CrPC, no court shall take cognizance of an offence of defamation except upon a complaint of the person aggrieved by the offence,[18] provided that where such person is under age of eighteen years, or is an idiot or lunatic, or is, from sickness or infirmity, unable to make a complaint, or is a woman, who, according to the local customs and manners, ought not to be compelled to appear in public, some other person may with the leave of the court, make a complaint on his or her benefit.[19]4143

The person, actually defamed, is, of course, a person aggrieved. An order, throwing out a complaint on the ground that it is not by a 'person aggrieved' because the complainant's name has not been directly referred to in the news item, complained of, would be unjustified.[20] But the Andhra Pradesh High Court has held that if the name of ther complainant is not referred in the news item, he is not a person aggrieved and the complaint filed by the complainant merely because he was one of the accused in a crime regarding appropriation of amount is not maintainable.[21] In the case of a co-operative bank, the manager, who is primarily concerned with the day-to-day management of the bank, is a person aggrieved.[22] In the case of defamatory matter published in a newspaper report, involving the proceedings of a conference, the chairman of the reception committee was, in his capacity as an active member, held to be a person aggrieved competent to file a complaint.[23] The true rule is that if a person complains that he has been defamed as a member of a class, he must satisfy the court that the imputation is against him personally and he is the person aimed at before he can maintain a prosecution for defamation.[24] The question, as to whether a person, who files a complaint of defamation, is aggrieved, is a question which should be determined with reference to the nature of the accusation and the special circumstances of each case. In the following synopsis the legal position of a complaint as person aggrieved depending upon his relationship with person defamed, is considered on the basis of case laws.

A complaint for defamation under s 500, IPC can be filed by an organization through its office bearers. A trust can be 'a person' aggrieved for the purpose of filing complaint for defamation.[25]

Where imputation made in public speech published in newspaper relates to a person, such a person is 'aggrieved person' who can file a complaint for offence under s 500, IPC .[26]

Complaint--Duty of Magistrate Taking Cognizance

The definition which has been given in s 499, IPC is to be read as a whole while considering the allegations made by the complainant in the complaint, and the magistrate has to consider whether the complainant has made out a prima facie case, for him to take cognizance of the complaint presented in his court and to issue a process by calling the accused indicated in the said complaint to court.[27]

Spiritual Head of Community Defamed--Complaint by an Individual of the Community

Where the editor of a paper made highly defamatory attack on the spiritual head of a certain community, an individual of that community was held not to be an aggrieved person.[28]4144

Wife Defamed--Complaint by Husband

If, one alleges of a person that his wife is a prostitute, that would amount to defaming him within the meaning of s 499, IPC . In such a case, the husband can maintain the complaint even in the absence of a complaint by the wife.[29] In Sukhendu Bikash Guha v Mahim Chandra Guha Deb Barman ,[30] it was, however, held that the court had no jurisdiction to take cognizance of a complaint by the husband of the woman unless the case came within the purview to s 198, CrPC 1898 [corresponding to the proviso to s 199(1), CrPC 1973]. Similarly, while the husband is entitled to file a complaint in the case of an imputation of unchastity of his wife, the question would be whether a husband can file a complaint where the imputation is not one involving chastity. In some cases, it has been held that the husband has such a right. Thus, it was held that it is undoubtedly defamatory of a high class thakur lady to state that she is ahirin, but the statement also defames her husband. It implies that the husband did not act, disgraceful in itself, in having the relationship of husband with a woman who was not a member of his own caste.[31] The imputation, the complainant's wife was a witch, practised witchcraft and destroyed the crops of the accused, was an imputation, affecting the complainant-husband, and he could validly make a complaint.[32] On the other hand, it has been held that while, on an imputation of unchastity, the party 'aggrieved' includes also the husband or other relative whose reputation is also affected and suffers injury, an allegation against a female, that she has stolen property, does not harm the personal reputation of her husband in any way and the husband cannot file a complaint without the leave of the court.[33]

Hindu Widow Defamed--Complaint by Brother

Where the alleged offence was defamation imputing unchastity to a Hindu widow, her brother, with whom she was residing at the time, was held to be a person aggrieved by such imputation.[34]

Daughter Defamed--Complaint by Father

However, where a woman had left her husband and was living separately by herself, her father was not held to be an aggrieved person.[35] In the case of a minor daughter, the case is, however, different. Where some persons presented a petition to the police containing defamatory allegations against a person's minor daughter, it was held that both the father and the daughter could file separate complaints. The defamatory allegations, with reference to the daughter, were calculated to harm the father's reputation also and could, therefore, legitimately form the subject-matter of his complaint.[36] If, however, the accused is acquitted on a compromise made by him4145 with the father of the girl, there would be no legal bar to a complaint by the girl.[37]

Person with Unknown Whereabouts Defamed--Complaint by Nephew

Where the whereabouts of the person defamed (Netaji Subhash Chandra Bose) were not known or he had not been heard of for a long time, a complaint made by his nephew was held to be competent as he lived in the same family and in joint mess with him and suffered incarceration for a number of years in the cause held dear by him.[38]

Pardanashin* Lady etc. Defamed--Complaint by Other Person

If the person aggrieved is a woman, who, according to the local customs and manners, ought not to be compelled to appear in public, some other person may, after obtaining express leave of the court, make a complaint on her behalf.[39] Thus, in the case of a defamed pardanashin lady, a complaint by her servant would be sufficient if he is duly authorised by her, even if the authorisation be oral.[40]

Company or Partnership Firm etc. Defamed--Complaint by Director or Partner etc.

The question as to who can be the complainant in cases where the defamation pertains to an association of persons or a body, corporate, has to be answered by reference to s 199 of the CrPC . The collocation of the words 'by some persons aggrieved' in s 199, CrPC, definitely indicates that the complainant need not necessarily be the defamed person himself. Whether the complainant has reason to feel hurt on account of publication is a matter to be determined by the court depending upon the facts of each case. If a company is described as engaging itself in nefarious activities, its impact would certainly fall on every director of the company and hence he can legitimately feel the pinch of it. Similarly, if a firm is described in a publication as carrying on offensive trade, every working partner of the firm can reasonably be expected to feel aggrieved by it, when the imputation of being engaged in trafficking of human kidneys is against the hospital which is a private limited company, it is too far fetched to rule out any one of its director, feeling aggrieved on account of pejorative hurled at the company.[41]

Association or Collection of Persons Defamed--Complaint by its Member

In order to attract expln 2 of s 499, IPC, an association or collection of persons must be a definite and determinable body, but it is an ever changing body. When the Kerala police is defamed, the complaint by a member of the Kerala police is not maintained.[42] If the imputations made was against the senior Christian community as a whole, the complaint filed by a member of that community who was not a person individually affected by the imputations, was not found maintainable.[43] Where the4146 allegation was against the Indian National Congress (I) and the complaint was filed by a member of the party against whom there was no individual accusation, the complaint was not found maintainable.[44]

Person Living Abroad Defamed--Complaint Through Attorney

The Madras High Court,[45] has taken the view that the mere residence of the complainant abroad does not justify his power of attorney holder making a complaint alleging commission of offence under the proviso to s 199(1), CrPC . However, recently Kerala High Court,[46] has taken a contrary view and has held that merely because a person is abroad and is hence unable to lodge a complaint within the time stipulated under the relevant provisions relating to limitation, no accused person can claim an unjustified advantage. In such a case, the word 'infirmity'[47] under the proviso to s 199 must certainly take into account the inability of the complainant to appear personally in court to present the complaint himself. Such a complainant can file complaint through his power of attorney.

Before a complaint can be dismissed as not maintainable, the court should be satisfied that the complaint is barred by any provision of law, and such provision may be contained either in the CrPC itself or in any other law.[48]

11. Necessity of Sanction under Section 197 , CrPC 1973

No sanction under s 197 of CrPC, is necessary unless the judge, magistrate or public servant commits the offence of defamation in his judicial or official capacity.[49] Where a judge was charged with using defamatory language to a witness during the trial of a suit, it was held that the complaint could not be entertained by the magistrate without prior sanction under s 197 of the CrPC as the judge was then acting in his official capacity and the words uttered by him were uttered as a judge, and not as a private individual.[50] The sanction of the court, appointing a receiver, is not, however necessary in order to proceed against him for a breach of the ordinary criminal law of the country, i.e., defamation.[51] If, the sanction for prosecution under ss 383 and 500, IPC, is clearly called for and when the accused is being prosecuted for these two offences alongwith the third offence under s 504, IPC, together, prior sanction under s 197, CrPC, would be necessary for the prosecution of the accused jointly for all the three offences.[52]

12. Stage for Deciding Question of Sanction

The Apex Court in the case of PK Pradhan v State of Sikkim [53] has observed:

It is well settled that question of sanction under s 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure can be raised any > time after the cognizance; may be immediately after4147 cognizance or framing of charge or even at the time of conclusion of trial and after conviction as well. But there may be certain cases where it may not be possible to decide the question effectively without giving opportunity to the defence to establish that what he did was in discharge of official duty. In order to come to the conclusion whether claim of the accused that the act that he did was in course of the performance of his duty was a reasonable one and neither pretended nor fanciful, can be examined during the course of trial by giving opportunity to the defence to establish it. In such an eventuality the question of sanction should be left open to be decided in the main judgment which may be delivered upon the conclusion of the trial.[54]

In view of the aforesaid dictum laid down by the Apex Court, the question of prior sanction can even be decided by the court either before trial, during the course of trial or at the time of delivering the judgment on the basis of the evidence to be recorded.[55]

13. The Complaint without Naming the Accused--Validity

Where there was publication of a report in a newspaper without specific name or explicit reference about the complainant, the contention that the identity of the complainant should be established, had been raised it was held that it is not always necessary to name the person. If the description and attendant circumstances suggest, with fair certainly, the identity of the person intended, that is sufficient to attract the offence. Explanation 3 to s 499, IPC states that an imputation in the form of an alternative or expressed ironically, may also amount to defamation. Defamation by innuendo is also not unknown to law. Therefore, the reference need not be explicit and if the description is such that a reasonable person, in the context in which it is made, would be able to understand it as a reference to a particular person, that would suffice.[56]

14. Death of Complainant--Effect

When certain defamatory allegations against a police officer as well as the police force in general are made, the only way, after the death of the complainant, is to continue with the trial and not to discharge the accused.[57] However, in criminal jurisprudence 'complainant' means only the person who makes complaint to the magistrate and who is examined as the complainant under s 200, CrPC . No one else can be deemed to be complainant, however interested he may be in the case and when the complainant dies the magistrate has no option but to acquit the accused in the summons case instituted in the complaint. The legal heir of the complainant in such a case cannot prosecute the case after the death of the complainant.[58] However, an appeal filed by the complainant against the acquittal of the accused of the offence under s 500, IPC, does not abate on the death of the complainant/appellant.[59] Where the complaint was filed regarding publication of defamatory statements affecting the complainant personally as well as his family, on the death of the complainant, the4148 allowing of an application by the wife of the complainant to continue the prosecution was found proper.[60]

15. Quashing of Complaint

The question regarding falsity or good faith is not required to be decided at the initial stage, because the fact that the allegations are false is to be proved by the accused by substantial evidence and allegations are made in good faith can be a defence of the petitioner and if pleaded during trial before the trial court and on substantial evidence alone the trial court can decide whether the imputations are made in good faith. Therefore, the complaint cannot be quashed.[61] The question about the date of commission of offence, for the purpose of limitation is to be considered by the trial courts, the aspect of good faith is a question of fact and matter of evidence, so the contention of protection of the accused under exceptions 8 and 9 to s 499, IPC, has to be dealt by the trial court and the complaint cannot be quashed by the High Court by taking recourse to s 482, CrPC .[62] However, when the complaint is filed under s 500 and the facts do not attract ss 34 and 120B, IPC, and there is no specific complaint against some of the accused persons, the process issued against them needs to be recalled and proceedings against them is liable to be dropped.[63] If the allegation, against the accused are that, he defamed the complainant by addressing in a public meeting that the person with the long moustache was a corrupt person, but the complaint did not show that the complainant, was the only member of the party, who was having long moustache, the alleged defamatory statement was absent in the newspaper report of the public meeting, the offence under s 500, IPC, was not made out and the order taking cognizance of the offence was found liable to be quashed.[64] If in the letter sent by a superior officer of the insurance company to the immediate officer of the complainant states about the misbehaviour by the complainant with the staff in the office of an insurance company and there is nothing per se defamatory in the letter nor any speaking circumstances are pointed out in the complaint itself, the complaint under s 499 read with ss 500 and 34, IPC, is liable to be quashed.[65]

Where complaint filed for offence under s 500, IPC, contains imputation which is likely to cause harm to the reputation of the accused, complaint would not be quashed at the thresh-hold.[66]

In writ petition filed by the respondent bank employee challenging his dismissal, the respondent nos. 10 and 11 filed affidavit representing the appellant bank, respondent filed complaint for offence under s 500, IPC alleging that the counter affidavit was defamatory. The respondent nos. 1 to 9, proposed accused are the directors of the bank. Held, the respondent nos. 1 to 9, directors of the company living at different places, could not be said to have shared common intention with the respondent nos. 10 and 11 in the preparation of the draft to defame the complainant. Section 34IPC, was held to be not attracted in the case. The proceedings of4149 complaint against the respondent nos. 1 to 9, directors of the company, were quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[67]

The accused was working as an executive editor at the time of the alleged publication of the defamatory article in the newspaper. There was no allegation showing that the accused controlled selection of the matter. The presumption under s 7 of the Press and Registration of Books Act is available in respect of the editor and not the executive editor or any person other than the editor. Therefore, the complaint for the alleged offence under s 500, IPC, including the summoning order of the accused was quashed.[68] If the complainant has concealed the material facts from the courts by reproducing only a portion of the sentence used by the accused, the criminal complaint under s 500, IPC, and order of summoning the accused are an abuse of process of the court and so are liable to be quashed.[69] If the connection of some of the accused persons with the disputed publication is too remote, the prosecution against them is liable to be quashed.[70] If the words or passages found in the defamatory articles are only verbatim reproduction of materials collected and relied upon by the CBI during investigation, no prima facie case is made out under ss 500, 501 and 502 read with s 341, IPC, and the complaint against the accused person is liable to be quashed.[71]

A complaint was filed for offences under s 499 and 502, IPC alleging that the report of the fact finding committee which dealt with farmers' deaths due to exposure to pesticides in Warangal district of Andhra Pradesh violated the provisions of ss 499 and 502, IPC . Held, the fact finding committee was not aimed at doing health study or in-depth scientific investigation, but to do an indicative study which would lead to a larger health study. The general tenor of the report indicated that the report was meant to focus on the harmful effects of exposure to pesticides. The report was not meant to harm, hurt or defame any individual or the manufacturing company. The complaint filed under ss 120B, 34, 500, 501 and 502, IPC lacked basic ingredients.[72]

When the complaint is not filed by an aggrieved person, the cognizance of the offence by the trial court is not competent so the complaint being barred by s 199, CrPC, is liable to be quashed.[73] If the complainant himself has not alleged in the complaint that the partner of the firm running the daily newspaper conspired with the other accused in defaming the complainant, the non-bailable warrant issued against the accused partner of the said firm is liable to be quashed.[74] The interview published in a film magazine may be defamatory against the Marwari community, but when the allegations in the complaint do not constitute the offence defined under s 499, IPC, and made punishable under s 500, IPC, the complaint and process issued against the court of magistrate is liable to be quashed.[75] The specific allegation made in the petition for divorce regarding adultery committed by the wife on a particular day does not amount to defamation when the matter whether the wife had committed4150 adultery was pending decision before the matrimonial court, therefore taking cognizance of the offence under s 500, IPC, and process issued against the husband was quashed.[76]

An advocate issuing reply notice on the instruction of his client in good faith, bona fide and without motive or private malice to harm the reputation of the complainant is protected by exception 9 to s 499, IPC, so the complaint under s 500, IPC, against him on the basis of averments in the reply notice is liable to be quashed.[77] In the absence of imputation constituting the offence of defamation in the complaint, the complaint is liable to be quashed.[78] Where the petitioner, a charitable trust, alleged that the co-accused spread defamatory statements against it via telephone, though no direct act was attributed to the accused, process was issued against her under s 499 read with s 34, IPC under the guise that she aided and abetted the co-accused, which was not proper, and the accused was living in a different town than the co-accused, she can hardly be held guilty of aiding and abetting defamation on the basis of vague statements of the complainant, the quashing of process issued against the accused was found proper.[79]

The question whether the alleged incriminating imputation has been made in good faith is purely a question of fact to be dealt with only by the court at the conclusion of the trial on the basis of materials placed before it. The proceedings, therefore, cannot be quashed under s 482, CrPC .[80] Where the accused has alleged that the school building was unsafe, and there was indiscipline amongst students and that the said school was a meeting place for both sexes and the principal was turning a deaf ear towards the character of the students, and they by making this type of poisonous propaganda the accused wanted that parents should not send their ward to such an institution, the action of the accused not being in good faith attracted the exception to s 499, IPC, the complaint against the accused cannot be quashed. If the averments in the complaint under s 500, IPC, make out a prima facie case, the applicability of the exceptions to s 499, IPC, can be gone into only during trial of the complaint and so, the complaint cannot be quashed by taking recource to s 482, CrPC .[81]

16. Limitation

There is no bar to the accused person raising the issue of limitation in the High Court in proceedings under s 482, CrPC and the same would be done at the earliest and if raised, ought to be adjudicated upon as a preliminary issue, and it cannot also be said that cognizance having originally been taken by one court and thereafter the case having been transferred to another court, the issue of limitation cannot be raised. The question of limitation can be raised not only at the earliest point of time before the trial court, but also even before this High Court to have the matter adjudicated in full.[82] Ordinarily, a complaint for defamation under s 500, IPC, should be filed within a period of three years from the date of commission of the offence [see4151 s 468(2) of the CrPC]. It is so when the complaint is made by the aggrieved person or by a person on his/her behalf with the leave of the court [s 199(1) read with s 199(6) of CrPC]. However, if the offence of defamation is alleged to have been committed against the President of India, the Vice-President of India, the Governor of a State, the Administrator of a Union Territory or a Minister of the Union or of a State or of a Union Territory, or any other public servant, employed in connection with the affairs of the Union or of a State in respect of his conduct in the discharge of his public functions, the public prosecutor, with the requisite previous sanction [s 199(4) of the CrPC], makes a complaint, in writing to the court of session, the same shall not be taken cognizance of by the said court unless it is made within six months from the date on which the offence is alleged to have been committed [s 199(5) of the CrPC].

Commencement of Limitation Period

On the basis of false complaint made by the opposite party making false charges, the period of three years of limitation would start running from the date of the alleged false complaint and not from the date of dismissal or withdrawal of the alleged false complaint.[83] In Surinder Mohan Vikal v Ascharj Ltd Chopra ,[84] the allegation in the complaint was that the defamatory matter against the complainant was contained in a complaint under ss 406 / 420, IPC . It was held that the period of limitation commenced to run from the date of the complaint under ss 406 / 420, IPC, and not from the date of acquittal thereunder.

If the complainant had knowledge in 1982 of the existence of the commission of the offence of defamation by the accused by publishing defamatory remarks, but the complaint is filed in the year 2000, there is an inordinate delay in filing the complaint against the accused, before the court, then the same is barred by limitation as required under ss 468 and 469, CrPC .[85] If an offence is made out in complaint under s 500, IPC, for defamation, s 468(2), CrPC, is attracted and the cognizance of offence should be taken within a period of three years from the date of occurrence. Thus, where the date of offence under s 500, IPC, was identified in as much as the defamation remarks were made against the applicant in a complaint filed before police by the accused, the starting point of limitation would be the date of complaint given to the police and not the date on which the evidence was given by the party before the magistrate nor the date of knowledge of the applicant about filing of such complaint when no such date of knowledge had been spelt out by the applicant in a private complaint filed by him for defamation. Two sub-cll to s 469, CrPC, provide only to the authorities under the law to investigate, and not to the private persons.[86] The period of limitation is to be determined from the date of presentation of the complaint and not with regard to the date when thr process is ordered to be issued by the magistrate.[87]

17. Jurisdiction

Where the transfer petition earlier filed before the Supreme Court was dismissed in limine and not on merits, the trial court has jurisdiction to go into the merits of the4152 issue pertaining to the territorial jurisdiction.[88] In case of defamation under s 499, IPC, the jurisdiction of the court in view of s 179, CrPC, will be at the place where the news item was printed and published.[89] The court at the place where the offending publication was delivered to and read by complainant where he was serving at the relevant time has jurisdiction under ss 179 and 190, CrPC, to try the offence under s 500, IPC .[90] The place where the newspaper containing the defamatory article is circulated gives jurisdiction to the court of that area to adjudicate upon the complaint under s 500, IPC .[91]

When the interview containing defamatory matter was published in newspaper, the prosecution for defamation can be launched by exercising jurisdiction over any one of the places where circulation of such newspaper is made.[92]

Section 179, CrPC, applies to those offences which, by their very definition, consist of an act and its consequence. In short, the act and its consequence must together constitute an offence. The offence of defamation consists not only of the incriminating statement alleged to have been made, but also its publication. The publication is a consequence of the statement said to be made by the accused. Therefore, the courts at the place where the alleged statement is made or published have jurisdiction to try the complaint.[93] In a defamation case the venue of the trial could be at the place where the letter was written and posted or also at the place where the letter was received and read.[94]

18. Bail

An offence under s 500, IPC, is a bailable offence. The Court is not bound to issue notice to the complainant and hear him before granting bail. Bail granted to the accused for offence under s 500, IPC, would not be cancelled merely because the complainant was not heard before releasing the accused on bail.[95]

19. Prosecution--Essentials

It is well-settled that a prosecution for defamation cannot be actually instituted unless the following sine qua non stand fulfilled, viz:

(a) an offence has been committed;
(b) its commission has become known; and

(c) its offender is identified.

A prosecution otherwise would be a still-born process which is bad ab initio.[96]4153

20. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary.

When there are defamatory allegations and prima facie material is available to proceed against a particular person, the discharge under s 204, CrPC, of accused by the magistrate is not proper and correct.[1]

21. Discharge under Section 258 , CrPC

One of the normal rules in summons cases is that once trial started, it should reach its normal culmination. Section 258 is included in ch 20 of the CrPC in the form of an exception to the aforesaid normal progress chart of the trial in summons cases. However, by s 258, CrPC, the power of court to discharge an accused at midway stage is restricted to those cases instituted otherwise than on complaints wherein no material witness was examined at all. Summons cases are generally of two categories. Those instituted upon complaints and those instituted otherwise than upon complaints. The latter category would include cases based on police reports. Section 256 is intended to cover those cases belonging to one category alone, i.e., 'summons cases instituted otherwise than upon complaints'. The segment separated at the last part of the section by the words 'and in any other case' is only a sub-category or division consisting of 'summons cases instituted otherwise than upon complaints.' That sub-category is not intended to cover all summons cases other than those instituted on police report. In fact, s 258, CrPC bifurcates only 'summons cases instituted otherwise than on complaints' into two divisions. One division consists of cases in which no evidence of material witness was recorded. The section permits the court to acquit the accused prematurely only in those summons cases instituted otherwise than on complaints wherein the evidence of material witnesses was recorded.

However, by s 258, CrPC, the power of court to discharge an accused at midway stage is restricted to those cases instituted otherwise than on complaints.[2] The only effect of an imputation being per se defamatory is that it would relieve the complainant of the burden to establish that the publication of such imputations has lowered him in the estimation of the right thinking members of the public. However, even if the imputation is not per se defamatory, that by itself would not go to the advantage of the publisher, for the complaining person can establish on evidence that the publication has infact amounted to defamation even inspite of the apparent deficiency. Thus, the accused cannot contend, at midway stage of trial that he is entitled to discharge on the ground that the imputations in the extracted publication were not per se defamatory.[3]

22. Proof

In order to secure a conviction for defamation under s 500, IPC, the prosecution must prove that:4154

(a) an imputation against a person (i.e., the complainant) was made or published by the accused;
(b) the said imputation was made by:

(i) word, spoken or intended to be read, or
(ii) signs, or

(iii) visible representations; and

(c) by the said imputation, the accused intended to harm, or he knew or he had reason to believe that such imputation would harm the reputation of the said person (i.e., the complainant).

The general remarks made by some authority regarding the competence of a subordinate would not amount to defamation.[4] This proof of exact words used in necessary only when the defamation depends solely on the shade of the meaning of the words used and their context. Where the exact words used and their context are not necessary, even the purport of the defamatory remarks would suffice.[5] In a defamation case, it is incumbent on the prosecution to prove affirmatively that the accused published the libel complained of, as this is one of the essential ingredients necessary to establish the guilt of the accused.[6] However, where it is alleged that publication was made by the handing over of the manuscript libel to the printer, publication is sufficiently proved by the production of the printed copy.[7] To prove publication of a libel through newspapers, it is sufficient to prove that the paper was delivered within the postal area under which the court had jurisdiction and it need not be proved that the article was read by some particular person.[8] Where, however, publication is made by a letter, it must be proved that the letter was published by the accused. If it is sent by post, it is essential to prove that the accused posted the letter.[9]

Secondly, before an offence under s 500, IPC, can be said to have been committed, it must affirmatively be proved by the prosecution that an imputation was made intending to harm, or knowing, or having reason to believe that such an imputation will harm, the reputation of the complainant.[10] However, the intention of a person has to be gathered from various circumstances as it cannot be possibly established by any direct evidence.[11] The intention may be properly inferred from articles in a newspaper themselves from the circumstances under which they were published.[12] Where the words or representations are per se harmful to complainant's reputation, the author thereof must be presumed to have intended this necessary result of his conduct.[13] In such a case, one need not find out as to whether the imputation was likely to lower the moral or intellectual character of the person defamed.[14]4155

The accused abused the complainant in the vilest terms consciously. The act of the accused harmed the reputation of the complainant and also lowered his prestige in the estimation of the society. Accused was convicted under s 500, IPC .[15]

23. Publication of Errata

Mere publication of errata by accused is not sufficient. The accused should also express regret for the original publication.[16]

24. When two Interpretations/Views are Possible

The words, from which an innuendo is to be extracted, must be fairly susceptible of the meaning sought to be put upon them by the innuendo. If there are two interpretations possible, that meaning which is not defamatory, should be preferred.[17] When two views are possible, one in favour of the accused and another to the contra, it is needless to say that benefit always to go in favour of the accused, and not in favour of the prosecution.[18]

25. Proof of Exceptions

The proof of exceptions and discharge of burden in relation thereto and the standard of proof required cannot be weighed in golden scales and the discharge of burden in such a case just cannot be equated with that of discharge of burden on the part of the prosecution.[19]

26. Evidence in Cases of Defamation

Before a petition under s 500, IPC, can be dismissed, the complainant is entitled to an opportunity to prove that the allegations made by the accused were really mala fide statements.[20] While the complainant is entitled to lead evidence to prove intention or knowledge required under the section, the accused is entitled to produce evidence, or to put questions in cross-examination of the complainant or his witnesses, to rebut it. However, he cannot lead evidence of, or put questions relating to, rumours and suspicions.[21] The accused should cross-examine the complainant upon every matter upon which evidence is intended to be brought to prove the truth of defamatory matter. If he does not do so, it would be a subject of serious consideration whether he should subsequently be allowed to tender proof as to the material incidents which he has not cross-examined.[22]

In a defamation case based on an allegation that a woman had illicit pregnancy, she cannot be compelled to submit to medical examination against her consent and her refusal to do so is no evidence against her.[23]4156

27. Acquittal

When there was no material showing the accused was author of the letter containing scurrilous remarks against complainant, acquittal of accused was found proper.[24] When there is 'no evidence of like making and publishing of the alleged defamatory statements by the accused, the gap in the evidence for the prosecution cannot be filled up by any statement made by the accused in his examination under s 313, CrPC . The omission to prove the making and publishing by the accused is more than an irregularity and is a defect which vitiates the conviction.[25] Where there was reproduction of article of one newspaper by another newspaper and the newspaper publishing the original article tendered apology subsequently which was also published by the newspaper in question, and the defamatory article in question was regarding a public question, it was the brain child of the newspaper first publishing it and not the newspaper in question which merely reproduced it. The offence of defamation was not made out and hence, the acquittal was proper. [26]

28. Probation

The accused was convicted under s 500, IPC, for making utterances intending to harm the reputation of the complainant. The offence was committed more than seven years ago and the accused was not a habitual offender, nor was he involved in any other criminal proceeding. Looking to the age, conduct, character and antecedents and all other relevant circumstances, the accused was directed to be released on probation on his entering into a personal bond of Rs 5,000 for maintaining good conduct for a period of two years.[27]

29. Sentence

Deterrent

Loss of life and loss of reputation are two things which cannot be compensated in terms of money. Especially reputation is some thing which is a person's treasure.[28] The editor of a newspaper, who does not express regret and makes serious allegations against the complainant, deserves a severe sentence.[29] A mere sentence of fine in the case of a journalist, publishing scandalous articles, getting wide publicity, will not, at all, be adequate.[30] When articles are published with a malicious motive to malign and damage the reputation of the complainant, the sentence to accused journalist till rising of court and fine of Rs 500 is too low. The object of sentence is reformative as well as deterrent and may be achieved in a particular case when the fine of Rs 500 is enhanced to Rs 10,000.[31] If the facts found by the court dispel any semblance of good faith and on the contrary indicate lack of prudence and dignity with which a person occupying the office of president of municipal committee (convicted under s 500, IPC) should act, the reduction of simple imprisonment from three months to4157 two months so that it would save him from disqualification of or continuing as president of the municipality was not warranted.[32] If the husband had made wanton allegations against his wife that she was not virgin at the time of marriage with accused and that she married the accused husband during subsistence of her marriage with former husband from whom she had a child and she had committed theft, do not warrant a lenient view to be taken against the accused. The accused was therefore sentenced to undergo simple imprsionment for two months and pay a fine of Rs 3000 and in default to undergo simple imprsionment for one month in each of the two cases.[33] Reckless comments are to be avoided. When one is proved to have made defamatory comments with an ulterior motive and without the least justification motivated by self interest, he deserves a deterrent sentence.[34] Where a series of defamatory statements and personal criticism of a public servant published without good faith, the maximum punishment should be awarded.[35]

Lenient

The courts should, at the time of passing sentence, keep in view, the position of the parties for not awarding a heavy sentence.[36] Where the accused had not been prompted by any malice or ill-will nor had they acted with wanton carelessness in allowing the mischievous statement to be at large without contradicting the same but, on the other hand, promptly published the contradiction the very next day,[37] or where the paper, in which the defamatory publication was made, had poor circulation and the accused had not been shown to be a habitual blackmailer and had also tendered a written apology,[38] a light sentence was held to be sufficient. Where the editor and publisher of a newspaper had nothing personal against the minister, to whom the alleged defamatory matter related, and the article was published ten years ago and the editor was 68 years old, the sentence of eight months' imprisonment, in the light of the said mitigating factors, was reduced to 13 days as already undergone.'[39]

Where the defamatory article in the newspaper was published in 1977 and appeal against the acquittal under s 500, IPC, was allowed in 1990, it was held that to send the accused editor to prison would be to make martyr of him so a sentence of fine of Rs 2000 and in default 4 months simple imprsionment was imposed.[40]

When the respondent editor of the newspaper convicted under s 500, IPC, was above the age of 74 years, and had closed down the business, he himself was not the author of the defamatory article, hence, sentence till the rising of the Court and fine of Rs 10,000/- was found sufficient.[41]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XXI

Of Defamation

S. 501.

Printing or engraving matter known to be defamatory.--

Whoever prints or engraves any matter, knowing or having good reason to believe that such matter is defamatory of any person, shall be punished with simple4158 imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

An offence under this section is distinct from an offence under the preceding s 500, IPC .[42] What is made punishable under that section is defamation, whether verbal or written.[43] However, if the matter is otherwise defamatory, the mere printing or engraving of it would fall under this section if the offender has good reason to believe that such matter is defamatory.[44] This section does not expressly refer to the publication of defamatory matter or to any intention to cause harm to the reputation of the person against whom imputations are made. One person may be guilty of defamation and another person, who prints or engraves it, would be only an abettor of that offence. By the provisions of this section, such abetment has been made an independent offence by itself. It is however, possible that a person may be guilty of both offences under ss 500 and 501, IPC, if he not only makes or publishes defamatory matter, but also prints or engraves it. If the publisher is also the printer of the newspaper, the case against him would also be covered by this section, it would not, in any way, affect his liability as a publisher under the preceding s 500, IPC . The publisher cannot escape his liability for the offence under s 500, if the case be otherwise proved against him, merely because of his having got the issue in question printed.[45] He cannot also escape his liability by alleging that he had entrusted the selection of news items to the editor.[46] In Gour Chandra Rout v Public Prosecutor ,[47] the accused, the editor printed and publisher of a newspaper, published statements, grossly defamatory of the Governor, which were not true, and the accused published the statement neither in good faith nor for the public good. It was held that the conviction of the accused as editor under s 500 and as the printer and publisher under s 501 was correct. Where, however, a declared printer was absent in good faith and the defamatory article appeared without his knowledge, it was held that this was sufficient for his acquittal.[48]

2. 'Good Reason to Believe'

In this section, there is an express provision that before a person can be held guilty, it must be shown that he knew, or he had 'good reason to believe', that the matter was defamatory. The expression 'reason to believe' has been expressly defined in s 26,4159IPC . It has, however, to be noted that the word 'good' has been further added. This evidently implies that there must be something more than what may be barely sufficient cause to believe within the meaning of the said s 26 . If the matter is per se defamatory, there is no need to prove that the printer knew that it was defamatory,[49] but if the accused is unable to read the language in which the matter is printed, it cannot be said that he understood the nature of the matter printed and would not, therefore, be guilty.[50]

Merely because the accused happens to be the chairman, he cannot be imputed with any knowledge about the publication of a defamatory statement, nor can he be made responsible for the same.[51] The complaint filed under s 501, IPC, is not maintainable against the chairman for publishing the newspaper.[52]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable by the person defamed, and triable by the court of sessions if the offence is committed against the President or Vice-President or the Governor of a State or Administrator of a Union Territory or a Minister in respect of his conduct in the discharge of his public functions when instituted upon a complaint made by the public prosecutor, and by a magistrate of the first class in any other case, and may also be tried summarily.

In case of a complaint made in respect of an offence under this section, the court is not competent to alter or amend the complaint and to treat it as one under the preceding s 500, IPC, the elements of the two offences being different.[53]

4. Section 120B and Sections 500, 501 and 502

Commentary under the same heading in s 502, post, may be referred to.

5. Complaint, its Contents, by Whom it is to be Made, and the Manner in which it is to be Made

Section 199, CrPC, may be referred to.[54]

6. Quashing of Complaint

Commentary under the same heading in ss 406, 420 and 500, ante, may be referred to.

7. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.4160

8. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) the accused printed or engraved any matter;
(b) the said matter was defamatory; and
(c) he did so knowing, or having good reason to believe, that it was defamatory of a person.

Under s 7 of the Press and Registration of Books Act 1867, a declaration, made by a person, to the effect that he is the printer of a newspaper, shall be sufficient evidence (unless the contrary be proved), as against that person, that he was the printer of every portion of every issue of the newspaper named in the declaration.[55] Such presumption may, however, be rebutted.[56]

9. Sentence

In KD Ghouri v Bhojo Motawani ,[57] the editor of the newspaper, besides publishing a contradiction to the effect that the news of arrest and detention of the complainant, published in his newspaper earlier, was baseless and wrong, expressed regret and felt sorry by saying that he had been misled by the correspondent and that he had no personal grudge against the complainant nor any intention to defame him by publishing the impugned news. It was, however, held that, looking at the harm and mental agony, which was caused to the complainant, who occupied a responsible post in the police department, a sentence of Rs 50 was too lenient and, therefore, it deserved to be enhanced.

Chapter XXI

Of Defamation

S. 502.

Sale of printed or engraved substance containing defamatory matter.--

Whoever sells or offers for sale any printed or engraved substance containing defamatory matter, knowing that it contains such matter, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

Section 499, IPC, ante, deals with the general offence of defamation, punishment for which is prescribed in s 500, IPC . Under the preceding s 501, a person, who prints or4161 engraves any matter, knowing, or having reason to believe, that such matter is defamatory, is made punishable. And this section deals with the offence of selling, or offering to sell, any printed or engraved substance, containing defamatory matter, knowing that it contains such matter. To constitute an offence under this section, in spite of the fact that the printed or engraved matter, sold or offered for selling, is a defamatory matter, it is essential that the offender should then know that the printed or engraved matter, which he sold, or which he offered for selling, contained defamatory matter. In the absence of such knowledge, no offence under this section is made. It is possible that the seller may not have the requisite knowledge though he might have sold a certain defamatory matter.

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable by the person defamed, and triable by the court of sessions if the offence is committed against the President or Vice-President or the Governor of a State or Administrator of a Union Territory or a Minister in respect of his conduct in the discharge of his public functions when instituted upon a complaint made by the public prosecutor, and by a magistrate of the first class in any other case, and may also be tried summarily.

3. Section 120B and Sections 500, 501 and 502

Where the accused were charged under s 120B read with ss 500, 501 and 502, IPC, and also under ss 500, 501 and 502, IPC, although the charge under s 120B could not be entertained by the magistrate for want of sanction required under s 196, CrPC, the magistrate could proceed with the trial in respect of the allegation of commission of the substantive offence under ss 500, 501 and 502, IPC .[58]

4. Complaint, its Contents, by Whom it is to be Filed, and the Manner in which it is to be Made

Section 199, CrPC may be referred to.[59] The complaint alleging offences under ss 499, 500, 501 and 502, IPC, need not disclose all the ingredients of the offences and if any fraudulent intention is alleged, that would be a matter of evidence, and in case any offence is committed by publishing the articles in the newspaper, there could be a presumption against the editor that he committed such offence, but not against the chief editor and such presumption is a rebuttable presumption.[60] Similarly, when a chairman of the board of directors of the company and its general manager are not shown as the editor, printer and publisher, the presumption under s 7 of the Press and Registration of Books Act 1867 (25 of 1867) for publication of defamatory news-item does not arise.[61]

5. Quashing of Complaint

Commentary under the same heading in ss 406, 420 and 500, ante, may be referred to.4162

6. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.

7. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) the accused sold, or offered for sale, any printed or engraved substance;
(b) the said substance contained defamatory matter; and
(c) he then knew that it contained such defamatory matter.

8. Destruction of Defamatory Matter

In exercise of the powers under s 455 of the CrPC, the court may, on a conviction under this section or under the preceding section, order the destruction of all the copies of the thing in respect of which the conviction was made, and which are in the custody of the court or which remain in the possession or power of the convict. When, however, certain passages in a book are found to be defamatory, an order for destruction of all the copies of the entire book, and not merely the pages, containing defamatory passages, is illegal. Only the pages, containing defamatory passages, should be ordered to be destroyed.[62]41634164

Chapter XXII

Of Criminal Intimidation Insult and Annoyance

TOPICAL INTRODUCTION

The offences under this chapter are amongst the minor offences in the IPC . Except s 509, all the offences under this chapter are non-cognisable offences. Therefore, no FIR (First Information Report) is registered or matter investigated by the police, unless directed by a judicial magistrate, in respect of these non-cognisable offences. An investigation in respect of offences under this chapter is often preceded by private criminal complaints filed before judicial magistrates.This chapter consists of following 8 sections:

(a) Section 503 :	This section defines 'criminal intimidation'.
(b) Section 504 :	It pertains to punishment for intentional insult to provoke breach of peace.
(c) Section 505 :	This section makes statements conducing to public mischief, creating or promoting enmity, hatred or ill-will between classes whether committed at place of worship or otherwise, punishable under this section.
(d) Section 506 :	This section makes the offence of criminal intimidation as defined in s 503 punishable under this section. The latter part of this section being a more severe offence than the former is punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend for seven years or fine or both, as against the former part of this section which is made punishable with imprisonment for two years or with fine or both.
(e) Section 507 :	It makes criminal intimidation by anonymous communication, punishable under this section.
(f) Section 508 :	The punishment for causing or attempt to cause an act, by inducing any person to believe that he will be rendered an object of divine displeasure is prescribed under this section.

(g) Section 509 :	The uttering of word, gesture or act intended to insult the modesty of a woman is made punishable under this section.
(h) Section 510 :	The punishment for misconduct in public place by a drunken person is prescribed under this section.4165

Chapter XXII

Of Criminal Intimidation Insult and Annoyance

S. 503.

Criminal intimidation.--

Whoever threatens another with any injury to his person, reputation or property, or to the person or reputation of any one in whom that person is interested, with intent to cause alarm to that person, or to cause that person to do any act which he is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do any act which that person is legally entitled to do, as the means of avoiding the execution of such threat, commits criminal intimidation.

Explanation.-- A threat to injure the reputation of any deceased person in whom the person threatened is interested, is within this section.

Illustration

A, for the purpose of inducing B to desist from prosecuting a civil suit, threatens to burn B's house. A is guilty of criminal intimidation.

Comments

1. Scope

Criminal intimidation, which is defined in this section, seems to imply that the threat must be one which can be put into execution by the person threatening as the section speaks of avoiding the execution of the threat.[1]It is not, however, necessary that the injury should be one to be inflicted by the offender; it is sufficient if he can cause it to be inflicted by another and the infliction of it could be avoided by some act or omission that the person threatening desires.[2] In other words, there should be a clear indication as to what the accused would do and the complainant must feel as a reasonable man that the accused would convert his words into action if he fails to do what is required of him by the accused.[3] An accused cannot, however, be discharged on the score that his dominant intention in entering upon the land was that in his capacity as its owner, he had a right to do so.[4]

It is not necessary that the threat must be in the presence of the person threatened. If the threat is uttered in the presence of some person,[5] or is addressed to a neighbour with a view to be communicated to the person threatened,[6] it would be criminal intimidation of such person. When a man conveys threats to the pleader of a person, who is executing a decree against him, he may reasonably be presumed, in the4166 absence of evidence to the contrary, to intend those threats to be communicated by the pleader to his employer.[7] Whether, as a matter of fact, anyone was actually frightened cannot affect the question of the liability under s 503, IPC . It is the intention of the speaker that has to be considered in deciding whether what he stated comes within the mischief of the section.[8] Where the threats were given to the complainant not with an intention to alarm him, but with a view to deterring him from interfering with what the accused believed to be his exclusive right of passage through a door, it was held that the essential ingredients of intention of the accused to alarm the complainant was wanting.[9] Where an old and sick man of 74 years got excited and said that he would kill the complainant, it was held that nobody would take him seriously and nobody would get alarmed.[10] Where, upon a quarrel between two brothers, one of them ran off and fetched a sword, but the sword was snatched from his hands and he threatened to kill the complainant if he was free, it was held that the accused was not guilty under s 506, IPC, as the words, used by the accused, were uttered under circumstances which negatived any intention to intimidate.[11]

If the threat is held out to several persons to get them injured either in person, or in reputation or property, the person making the threat would be guilty of an offence under this section.[12] A firm cannot commit an offence under this section.[13]

2. Gist of the Offence

The gist of the offence is the effect which the threat is intended to have upon the mind of the person threatened, and before it can have any effect upon his mind it must be either made to him by the person threatening or communicated to him in some way. It would not be sufficient if the threat is not made to the person threatened and there is no evidence that it was intended that the words should be communicated to the complainant for the purpose of influencing his mind.[14]

3. Two Parts of the Offence

The offence of criminal intimidation is defined in this section. The section is in the following two parts:[15]

(a) the first part refers to the act of threatening another with injury to his person, reputation or property or to the person or reputation of any one in whom that person is interested; and
(b) the second part refers to the intent, with which the threatening is done, and it is of the following two categories:

(i) the first is intent to cause alarm to the person threatened; and4167
(ii) the second is to cause that person to do any act which he is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do any act which that person is legally entitled to do, as the means of avoiding the execution of such threat.

Ingredients of offence of 'criminal intimidation' as defined in s 503, IPC and punishable under s 506, IPC are as under:

(a) Threatening a person with any injury;

(i) to his person, reputation or property; or
(ii) to the person or reputation of any one in whom that person is interested.

(b) Threatening a person with injury;

(i) to cause alarm to that person, or
(ii) to cause the person to do any act which he is not legally bound to do as the means of avoiding the execution of such threat, or
(ii) to cause that person to omit to do any act which that person is legally entitled to do so as the means of avoiding the execution of such threat.[16]

4. Criminal Intimidation Distinguished from Extortion

Criminal intimidation, contemplated by this section, and extortion, defined in s 383, IPC, ante, though analogous, are distinct in the following manner:

Criminal Intimidation (s 503)

(a) Threatened injury is confined to:

(i) the person or reputation or property of the person threatened, or
(ii) the person or reputation of any person in whom the person threatened is interested.

(b) Threat must be to the person threatened or to any person in whom he is interested.
(c) Wrongful gain or loss may not be necessarily involved.
(d) Threat must be given with intent to:

(i) cause alarm to the person threatened, or
(ii) make that person, illegally to do, or omit to do, something.

Extortion (s 383)

(a) A person may be put in fear of (any) injury as defined in s 44, ante.
(b) Fear of injury not only to the person put in fear but to any other person is sufficient.
(c) Putting into fear must be done dishonestly (i.e., for wrongful gain or loss).
(d) Putting into fear must be intentional but the intention must be to induce delivery of some property, valuable security, etc.4168

5. No Criminal Intimidation without Threat of Injury

Section 44, IPC, defines 'injury' as any harm whatever illegally caused to any person in body, mind, reputation or property. Section 43 , IPC, declares that the word 'illegal' is applicable to everything which is an offence or which is prohibited by law or which furnishes ground for a civil action. Threatened harm should be shown to be illegal.[17] If the words, uttered by the accused, furnish, to the complainant, a ground for a civil action, there would be criminal intimidation, otherwise the accused must be acquitted.[18] The complainant must satisfy the court that the act complained of is an illegal act. A proposal by the managing committee of a society to refer, to the judgment of the general body, an act done by one of its members cannot be regarded as a threat to cause any illegal harm.[19] Where the accused told the complainant that he had come from the sarkar and would get him six month's imprisonment if he did not let his younger sister go, it was held that these words did not constitute either criminal intimidation (there having been no threat of injury) or any other offence known to law.[20] A thereat of getting a police constable dismissed from the police service is not such a threat of injury as is punishable under s 506, IPC .[21]A threat to commit suicide, if another person refuses to do a particular act, is not criminal intimidation unless the person be interested in the person making the threat.[22] In TG Studderi v JF Logan ,[23] the accused, after he was no longer in the employment of a company, adopted the course of circularising a number of firms and government departments making prima facie defamatory accusations against his former employer. For the purpose of self-protection, the firm instructed their solicitors, who warned the complainant, by letter, of the consequences of continuing to issue the said statements. It was held that the letter could not be regarded as a threat within the meaning of this section. A mere threat would not constitute the offence of criminal intimidation, unless it is a threat of an injury to the complainant causing him an alarm.[24] Mere abuse will not attract this section unless the essentials of the section are satisfied.[25] The commonly used word beiman may not, in the situation and circumstances of a particular case, amount to an offence under this section.[26]

6. Threat to Police

The section would have no application where the accused is charged with having threatened the police in general. However, where the threat is held out by the accused not to the police force in general, but to the members of the police force stationed at a particular place, the section would be applicable. It is not necessary for the speaker to know that any member, or the group of persons, who is intended to be frightened by the speech, was present among the audience.[27] In Nirmal Singh v Emperor ,[28] a police4169 officer, empowered to conduct an investigation, carried out a search, but not according to the provisions of the CrPC, and the accused resisted his doing so and compelled him under threats to draw up a search list saying that a search had been made and that nothing had been found. They were held guilty under s 506, IPC, though they were acquitted of the charge under ss 147 and 332, IPC .

7. Illustrative Cases of Criminal Intimidation

Criminal intimidation was held to have been caused where a municipal commissioner threatened a butcher that if he bought a cow from a Hindu, he would have him sent to the jail and would make it impossible for him to continue to live in the town, thus causing apprehension to him that he would be interfered with in the discharge of his lawful business in case he disobeys the municipal commissioner,[29] or where the accused, for the purpose of inducing the revenue inspector to desist from distraining his properties, threatened to kill him,[30] or where the accused took indecent photographs of girl by showing false love to her and threatened her father, in letters written to him, with publication of the photographs with intent to extort money from the latter,[31] or where the accused held out threats to both Hindus and Muhammadans to get them implicated and imprisoned if they kept to the terms of an ikramama (entered into by the parties to keep the peace during the Moharram festival),[32] or where the accused issued a notice, signed by himself as president of arbitration court, calling on the complainant to appear on a certain date and answer a claim, brought against him, failing which an ex parte decree would be passed against him,[33] or where the accused abused the complainant in such a way that he began to run away and was pursued by the accused with a brickbat in his hand and it was only the intervention of others that prevented the accused going any further,[34] or where a threat was given to bring a false charge against a person and to support it by fabricating false evidence.[35]

8. Illustrative Cases in which Criminal Intimidation was Held not to have been Caused

(a) Threat of Litigation

In Jowahir Pattak v Parbhoo Ahir ,[36] the accused threatened to ruin the complainant by cases. It was observed that it could not be assumed that by cases the accused meant false cases. If the cases were not false, the mere fact, that they were instituted for the purposes of prosecuting the complainant, would not bring them within the term of 'injury'. It was, however, held that if the threat was to ruin the complainant by false cases, the offence of criminal intimidation would be committed. However, in4170 a Bombay case,[37] it was held that the communication by a person that he was going to take revenge by false complaints cannot amount to threat or criminal intimidation.

(b) Threat of Social Boycott

Where the accused were trying to improve their lot by bargaining with the mirasdars to obtain better conditions and trying to persuade their fellow labourers not to work until they had secured better terms, it was held that they were entitled to enforce a social boycott against those who decided to work because that would not amount to an injury within the meaning of s 44, IPC, as this is not illegal.[38] Where the conviction was based upon two threats that the complainant would be socially boycotted and after his death no one would carry his dead body to the place of burial, if he continued to deal in foreign cloth; it was held that the conviction based upon these threats could not be sustained.[39]

(c) Threat about Caste

A mere threatening to bring a matter before the caste in order to get one expelled does not amount to criminal intimidation.[40] Where the accused said to the complainant 'give us your field or we will put you out of caste and injure you in person and reputation' and, on his refusal to do so, his ex-communication was pronounced, it was held that this did not amount to criminal intimidation, the injury threatened not falling within the definition of s 44, IPC .[41]

(d) Threat to go Away From Garden

Asking a person not to work in a private garden and threatening him to go away from the garden would not satisfy the requirements of ss 503 / 506, IPC .[42]

(e) Threat of Colleagues of Accused to Kidnap the Victim

If the prosecutrix, a major, has married the accused of her own free will and love and the offences under ss 363 and 366, IPC, are not made out, the fact that the colleagues of the accused had threatened to kidnap the victim does not prima facie constitute commission of the offence under s 506, IPC .[43]

(f) Threat Without Implementation

If the accused give only threats to cause death or grievous hurt but he does not act in pursuance thereof, the offence of criminal intimidation is not made out.[44]

(g) Mere threat causing No Alarm

The use of mere threat causing no alarm to the complainant is not an offence under ss 503 / 506, IPC .[45]4171

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XXII

Of Criminal Intimidation Insult and Annoyance

S. 504.

Intentional insult with intent to provoke breach of the peace.--

Whoever intentionally insults, and thereby gives provocation to any person, intending or knowing it to be likely that such provocation will cause him to break the public peace, or to commit any other offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides a remedy for abusive and insulting language and requires an intention to insult and thereby to give provocation to the person insulted and an intention that such provocation should cause, or the knowledge that such provocation is likely to cause, the person so insulted to break the public peace or commit any other offence.[46] The section does not merely deal with an insult or, at any rate, a gross insult. The section is intended to deal with persons who are as responsible for breaches of peace or the commission of offences as those who openly abet or incite them. To abuse a rowdy or bad-tempered person, who would be sure to respond with violence, is much more likely to be an offence than to abuse a helpless woman.[47] A person comes within the ambit of this section if the provocation offered by him is of such a character as to cause the person provoked to break public peace or to commit any other offence.[48] The requirements of the law is fulfilled if the insult is of a kind calculated to cause the other party to lose his temper and say or do anything violent. The public peace can be broken by angry words as well as by deeds.[49] A man, who pulls the beard of a Mohammedan in the public street, intentionally insults him, human nature being what it is, nothing is more likely than that a self-respecting person, who has his beard pulled, or his nose pulled, or is subjected to any other painful and humiliating treatment in public, should lose his temper and attempt to strike his assailant or retaliate.[50] However, if an official asks an outsider to vacate the inner counter of his office, he commits no offence under s 500, IPC, or under this section even if his subordinate may have permitted him. Even when some4172 subordinate has permitted him, the higher officer cannot keep quiet over an irregular work or improper conduct of a subordinate.[51]

For an offence under s 504, IPC, the complainant should disclose in the complaint the actual words uttered by the accused.[52] Where the accused persons abused and intimidated the complainant in a room and not within public view, no offence under s 504, IPC was committed, cognizance taken was held bad.[53]

Where, the accused calls the counsel badmash in open court, the offences under ss 499 and 500, IPC, is not made out, perhaps the words have been articulated so as to cause harm to the person and in which case it might amount to an offence under s 504, IPC .[54] However, mere abuse without the intention to insult or cause breach of peace is not an offence under this section.[55]

2. Section 504 Distinguished from Section 499

Although defamatory expressions are often involved in offences under both these sections, the object and purpose of the two sections and the ingredients of offences under the two sections are different. The following points of difference may be noted:

(a) Section 499, IPC, requires that there should be a publication of defamatory statement to a person other than the one defamed. In a case under this section, an insulting expression to the person insulted would be, and in most cases is, sufficient for bringing the case within the scope of the section.
(b) Both sections refer to intention and knowledge of the accused, but the elements in the two cases are different. Under s 499, IPC, there must be an intention or knowledge of harming the reputation of a person. Under this section, the question of reputation does not arise. All, that is required, is that there should be intention or knowledge about the words causing breach of the peace or the commission of some other offence by the person insulted.

In some cases under s 499, IPC, truth is a defence if there is a public good. In a case under this section, absolute truth and even public good would not be a sufficient defence. For further commentary, text under the heading ' Section 500 and Section 504 ' in s 500, ante, may be referred to.

3. Essential Ingredients

The essential ingredients to constitute an offence under this section are as follows:

(a) there should be an act or conduct on the part of the accused which may amount to an intentional insult;
(b) the said intentional insult, so caused, should be such as to give provocation to the person insulted and the provocation given should be of such a nature4173 as would cause the person, who is given provocation, to break the public peace or to commit any other offence; and
(c) the person, giving the insult, must intend, or know, that his act would cause a provocation of the nature mentioned above.

4. 'Intentionally Insults'

It is necessary that insult,[56] by which provocation is caused, should either be intended, or known to be likely, to lead to a breach of the public peace or the commission of some other offence by the person insulted. Without it, the insult, however provocative it may be, will not bring the offender within the mischief of this section.[57] What is material is not the reaction of the complainant, which might vary according to the sensitiveness of the individual insulted, but the intention of the offender to provoke, or his knowledge that he is likely to provoke, the person insulted to commit an offence[58]The intentional insult must be of such a degree that should provoke a person to break the public peace or to commit any other offence. The person who intentionally insults intending or knowing it to be likely that it will give provocation to any other person and such provocation will cause to break the public peace or to commit any other offence, in such a situation, the ingredients of s 504 are satisfied. One of the essential elements constituting the offence is that there should have been an act or conduct amounting to intentional insult and the mere fact that the accused abused the complainant, as such, is not sufficient by itself to warrant a conviction under s 504, IPC .[59]

If no allegation has been made in the complaint that the intentional insult was such as to give provocation for any breach of the peace, the section will have no application.[60] When the complainant simply says that when he presented his written objections before the accused, he tore them and abused him, no case under this section is made out.[61] Similarly, mere abuse, rudeness or insolence may not amount to an intentional insult within the meaning of this section if it does not have the necessary element of being likely to incite the person insulted to commit a breach of the public peace or any other offence.[62] The provision in this section clearly visualises that the intentional insult will have, in its background, the intention or the knowledge that such intentional insult would either provoke the person, to whom it is offered, to break public peace or to commit any other offence.[63] In Kishori Mohan v State of Bihar ,[64] taking a photograph with a garland of shoes in the neck, which photograph was shown neither to the public nor to the complainant, was not held to be a provocation as to induce the complainant to break public peace or to commit any4174 other offence. In Ram Dutta v Kripa Singh ,[65] refusal by some Hindus to have social intercourse with some Hindu sonars and excluding them from use of wells was not held to amount to an offence under this section.

The complainant had taken his father (patient) to the clinic of the appellant doctor, the appellant gave three injections to the patient, and the patient died. The complainant filed complaint for offence under ss 504 and 506, IPC . In the order issuing summons passed by the Magistrate, there was no mention of any threat extended by the accused to the complainant. Held, the accused could not have been summoned for offences under ss 504 and 506, IPC .[66]

5. Abusive Language and Intention to Cause

Abusive language, used with intention to cause provocation to the person to break public peace or to commit any other offence would come within the mischief of the section.[67] However, mere abuse, unaccompanied by an intention mentioned above, would not come within the purview of this section.[68] It is common experience that when rustic people have some quarrel or difference amongst themselves, they generally hurl insulting, abusive and/or filthy words against each other. Thus, from the mere use of such words in heated moments, it cannot always be inferred that the said words were used with the requisite intention stated in this section. An offence under this section by spoken words cannot be made out so long as it is not proved that those words were uttered with the specific intention of insulting a man and the offender intended by that insult to provoke the other person to break the public peace or to commit any other offence.[69] It is sufficient for the complainant to prove that the abusive language was such as would ordinarily provoke the man or woman, his or her decision to commit breach of peace.[70] The court has not to judge the temperament or the idiosyncrasy of the individual concerned. It should try to find out what, in the ordinary circumstances, would have been the effect of the abusive language used. The offence would be committed if the abusive language used is such as might ordinarily result in broken limbs or, at least, in an affray, and consequent breach of the peace.[71] Whether mere abuse on the public road would amount to an offence under this section would depend on several circumstances, such as the respective status of the parties, nature of the abuse and other factors.[72] Abusive words in the background, atmosphere and circumstances, in which they are used, may be likely to provoke a breach of the peace.[73]4175

6. Absence of Person Insulted--Effect

For an offence under this section, it is necessary that the insult should be delivered to the person insulted with the intention that he may be there and then provoked to commit an offence.[74] Where an accused, in the course of addressing a meeting, abuses certain persons, not present in the meeting, his conviction under this section is not sustainable.[75] If there is no evidence to show that the utterer asked the persons, before whom he uttered the abuse, to convey his insulting words, uttered in his absence, to the complainant, there is no offence committed under this section, such a request being essential.[76] In Mohammed Ibrahim Maracayar v Ismail Maracayar ,[77] it was held that the likelihood of the breach of the peace, contemplated by this section, must be immediately after the provocation or so soon afterwards that it must form part of res gestae. Where a father in Vellore wrote an insulting and provocative letter to his daughter in Madras, it was held that there was no likelihood of the breach of the peace contemplated by the section. To break the peace, the complainant would have to go all the way from Madras to Vellore.[78]

7. Forbearance or Restraint etc. by Person Insulted--Effect

The mere forbearance of the person insulted being provoked is not sufficient to protect the offender.[79] The offence cannot be taken away from the purview of the section simply because the insulted person exercised self-restraint or being terrified by the offensive attitude of the accused, he did not actually break the public peace or commit some other offence.[80] The fact that the complainant did not accept the provocation because he was a peacefully disposed man, would not make the accused any the less guilty if the insult offered was such as would be sufficient to the mind of an ordinary person to provoke a breach of the public peace.[81] The complainant, due to his attitude, culture, position, or other personal reason, may have exercised restraint and may not have reached to the words.[82] An offence under this section is committed if the accused intentionally insults and thereby gives provocation to any person, intending, or knowing it to be likely, that such provocation will cause him to break the public peace or to commit any other offence. Thus, the actual reaction, conduct and attitude of the person, on the occasion when he is insulted, are not relevant factors in a case of this nature.[83] However, the offence under this section does not depend upon the mere sensitive feeling of the offended, but upon the intention or knowledge of the offender.[84]4176

8. Per se Insult

If addressing a person by the words used by the accused per se goes to show that the person has been intentionally insulted and provocation has been caused to him, there is sufficient ground to proceed against the accused under s 504, IPC .[85]

Where the very words are filthy and abusive, the court can infer that the accused could not but intend by the use of such abuses that they wanted to provoke the complainant to break the public peace.[86]

9. Illustrative Cases falling under Section 504

Where an advocate, while cross-examining a witness, uses filthy words, exhibiting disrespect or indignity towards the witness's mother,[87] or where the word behuda was addressed to the complainant, who occupied the responsible and respectable position of the President at the meeting of a municipal committee, to which the complainant sharply reacted,[88] it was held that the case fell within the ambit of this section. Where seven accused went upon the land of the complainant, prevented him from irrigating his fields, and, when remonstrated, used abuse and threatened to strike, [89] or where the accused gave abuse to the complainant involving aspersions on the chastity of his mother and sister,[90] or where the accused, without any justification, first used the offensive expression pahle munh se bakko towards a police official, who had been instructed by the district authorities to serve a notice upon shopkeepers in the bazar,[91] it was held that there was intentional insult giving provocation to commit a breach of the public peace. The conduct of a barrister calling a witness a pig and threatening to kick him would amount to an offence under this section.[92] Calling a man beiman and badmash would fall under this section, and not under s 500, IPC .[93] In KD Upadhayaya v Bhagabati Chouhan ,[94] the accused entered the verandah of the dwelling-house of the complainant, abused him in filthy language, and threatened to beat him with shoes and later went into the courtyard and then went to the road near the house and continued to abuse him for about an hour and ultimately went away saying that they would come the next Sunday with more persons and recover the money due to them from him. It was held that the charge under this section was fully made out.

In the instant case, the accused attempted to destroy/desecrate the puja room of the complainant to cause hurt to religious sentiments of the complainant. Held, a prima facie case for initiation of proceedings under s 504, IPC was made out.[95]

Where the accused in the presence of other members of the family called the victim a prostitute, he was convicted under ss 504 and 509, IPC .[96]4177

10. Illustrative Cases not falling under Section 504

Mere discourtesy and bad manners do not amount to a criminal offence for which a person can be criminally punished.[1] When the charge is an insult by words, the words must amount to something more than what is called 'mere vulgar abuse'.[2]

Abusive words sala madhurchod are generally used in case of petty quarrels between the parties and by that it cannot be inferred that the accused intentionally expressed such abusive words so as to insult the complainant and also give provocation to him so as to break the public peace.[3]

Where the accused said to an assistant sub-inspector of police, during an investigation, 'You are a tyrant; justice cannot be expected from you',[4] or where the accused called Arora a Kirar, which word has sometimes a somewhat contemptuous signification,[5] it was held that the offence under this section was not committed. If an insult is only incidental, and not intentional, the case would not be covered by the section, particularly when the accused is not charged under this section.[6] Where the accused shouted at the complainant 'shameless fellow', 'I will sue you',[7] or where the complainant came to the shop wherein he became engaged in a dispute with its owner as a result of which he was asked to leave the shop,[8] it was held that no case under this section was made out.

Where the words uttered are mere vulgar abuses, a complainant under this section should be dismissed at the outset on the principle de minimis non curat lex which is contained in s 95, IPC .[9] Saying to the complainant 'you are telling a lie' would, on the same principle, be covered by s 95, IPC .[10] Where the accused said, in an insolent tone, to a deputy magistrate upon his expressing an unfavourable opinion at a local inquiry, 'Then, why do you make an enquiry, go away quietly.' it was held that the said s 95 covered the case.[11] Readiness to apologise is not an indication of the accused's guilt.[12]

Section 504 refers to intentional insult with intent to provoke breach of peace. The allegation in the complainant was that when he enquired from accused 1 and 2 about the sale deeds, they asserted that they will obtain possession of land under the sale deeds and he can do whatever he wants. The statement attributed to accused 1 and 2 cannot be said to amount to an 'insult with intent to provoke breach of peace'. The statement attributed to accused, even if it was true, was merely a statement referring to the consequence of execution of the sale deeds by first appellant in favour of the second appellant. No offence under s 504, IPC was made out.[13]4178

11. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognisable, bailable, compoundable by the person insulted, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

12. Sanction to Prosecute

The expression acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty 'must be interpreted liberally, otherwise strictly speaking there can be no case which can come within the scope of s 197, CrPC .[14]

The accused a public servant who was removable from service only by an order of the government asked the complainant, salesman of a co-operative society under his charge, to deposit certain amount to make up loss due to shortage of goods. Upon his depositing the amount he was again directed to deposit a further amount as price of certain articles misappropriated by him. When the complainant, went to the office with his written objection, the accused lost his temper, tore it, abused the complainant and said something which was not directed against the complainant. The complainant then filed a complaint under s 504 .

It was held: (a) that in the circumstances of the case sanction to prosecute under s 197, CrPC was necessary and the complaint was not maintainable in law for want of such sanction; (b) that even on the allegation in the complaint and the evidence no case was made out against the accused for being prosecuted under s 504 .[15]

Where the allegation in the complaint under s 504, IPC, is that insulting language was used by the magistrate while he was holding his coat and while the complainant was in the witness box, the absence of sanction is a bar to taking cognisance of the complaint, the test is whether the officer at that particular moment was actually engaged in or purporting to be engaged in the discharge of his official duty.[16] If the accused is prosecuted for the offences under ss 383 and 500, IPC, for which sanction for prosecution is clearly called for and simultaneously the accused is being prosecuted for these two offences along with the third offence under s 504, IPC, prior sanction under s 197, CrPC would be necessary for the prosecution of the accused jointly for all the three offences.[17]

13. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.

14. Commission of Heinous Offence by Assault--Charge under Section 504 Need Not be Framed

The offence punishable under s 504, IPC, is a distinct offence which comes under the category of misdemeanours. It is a non-cognisable offence. Using foul and provocative language against any person which has a tendency of provoking the person to commit an offence is punishable under s 504, IPC . In the natural course of events when any heinous offence is committed by assault, it is but natural that the4179 offender uses filthy and abusive language and technically such abusive words may attract the ingredients of offence under s 504, IPC, by overlapping. However, such act of use of abusive words should not be construed as a distinct offence. It has to be read and understood as a part of the higher offence committed by the accused and it does not warrant framing of a charge under s 504, IPC . Therefore, whenever higher offences are committed and in the course of the commission of an offence filthy and abusive language is used, which has the tendency of provocating the victim to indulge in retaliatory acts, no charge under s 504, IPC, need be framed. The said conduct is to be construed as a part of the higher heinous offence.[18]

15. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove[19] that:

(a) the accused intentionally insulted some person;
(b) he thereby gave provocation to that person; and
(c) he then intended, or he then knew it to be likely, that the provocation will cause him:

(i) to break the public peace, or
(ii) to commit any other offence.

Where the charge of insult is based on spoken words, it is necessary to refer the actual words used otherwise, the court would not be in a position to decide whether the words used amounted to intentional insult.[20] If the evidence, led on behalf of the complainant, does not specify the actual words, alleged to have been used by the accused in abusing the complainant, the charge under this section will not be proved.[21] Where, however, the insult may arise out of the conduct or action of the offender, irrespective of the words spoken, the proof of actual words may not be necessary.[22]

It is not the law that the actual words or language should figure in the complaint. One has to read the complaint as a whole and, by doing so, if the Magistrate comes to a conclusion, prima facie, that there has been an intentional insult so as to provoke any person to break the public peace or to commit any other offence, that is sufficient to bring the complaint within the ambit of s 504, IPC . It is not the law that a complainant should verbatim reproduce each word or words capable of provoking the other person to commit any other offence. The background facts, circumstances, the occasion, the manner in which they are used, the person or persons to whom they are addressed, the time, the conduct of the person who has indulged in such actions are all relevant factors to be borne in mind while examining a complaint lodged for initiating proceedings under s 504, IPC .[23]4180

The complainant did not mention in his complaint the abuse words used by the accused. The accused, a public servant, was entitled to the protection of s 197, CrPC . Processes issued against the accused were quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[24]

16. Acquittal

Mere allegation, that the accused abused the complainant in filthy language, is not sufficient to sustain a charge under this section.[25]

17. Conviction

When, from the evidence on record, it is absolutely clear that the complainant was abused by the accused in filthy language which, in the ordinary course of nature, is sufficient to insult to the extent required for the purpose of constituting an offence under this section, the conviction of the accused will be well founded.[26]

18. Sentence

A substantial fine, which was within the means of the accused to pay, was held proper when the accused, while under the influence of liquor, abused another person.[27]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XXII

Of Criminal Intimidation Insult and Annoyance

S. 505.

Statements conducing to public mischief.--

(1) Whoever makes, publishes or circulates any statement, rumour or report--
  (a) with intent to cause, or which is likely to cause, any officer, soldier, sailor or airman in the Army, Navy or Air Force of India to mutiny or otherwise disregard or fail in his duty as such; or
  (b) with intent to cause, or which is likely to cause, fear or alarm to the public, or to any section of the public whereby any person may be induced to commit an offence against the State or against the public tranquillity; or
  (c) with intent to incite, or which is likely to incite, any class or community of persons to commit any offence against any other class or community; shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

(2) Statements creating or promoting enmity, hatred or ill-will between classes.-- Whoever makes, publishes or circulates any statement or report containing rumour or alarming news with intent to create or promote, or which is likely to create or promote, on grounds of religion, race, place of birth, residence, language, caste or community or any other ground whatsoever, feelings of enmity, hatred or ill-will between different religious, racial, language or regional groups or caste or communities, shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.4181

(3) Offence under sub-section (2) committed in place of worship, etc.-- Whoever commits an offence specified in sub-section (2) in any place of worship or in any assembly engaged in the performance of religious worship or religious ceremonies, shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to five years and shall also be liable to fine.

Exception.-- It does not amount to an offence, within the meaning of this section, when the person making, publishing or circulating any such statement, rumour or report, has reasonable grounds for believing that such statement, rumour or report is true and makes, publishes or circulates it in good faith and without any such intent as aforesaid.

STATE AMENDMENT

Andhra Pradesh-- In Andhra Pradesh the offence is cognizable vide G.O. Ms. No. 732, dated 5-12-1991.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is of a statement miscellaneous in character. It may be noted that the chapter, in which this section is included, is headed 'Of Criminal Intimidation, Insult and Annoyance'. Sections 503 and 506 to 508, IPC, deal with criminal intimidation, s 504, IPC with insults, ss 509 and 510, IPC with annoyances, and this section is not covered by any of these heads. It deals with the security of the state or public order.[28] However, legitimate ventilation of grievance, which some section of the public may have against the local authorities, is not to be checked by initiating a prosecution under this section.[29]

2. Sections 153A and 505 Considered together

Commentary under same heading in s 153A, vol 1, may be referred to.

3. Constitutional Validity of Sub- section 1 of Section 505

Sub- section 1 of this section, as it exists presently, is free from the vice of unconstitutionality.[30]

4. 'Class'

The word 'class' is insignificant. Any definite or ascertainable class of citizens of India will come within this section.[31]4182

5. Exception

No doubt the statements, rumours and reports, referred to in this section, are of a highly mischievous character, but, having regard to the condition under which modern journalism and the discussion of public questions are necessarily carried on, it would be going too far to require the person, who publishes it, to prove its actual truth when the statement, rumour or report is published without any criminal intent. To require strict proof would be throwing an impossible burden upon him. It would, therefore, be sufficient for him to show that he had reasonable grounds for believing it, as, for instance, by showing that he made due inquiry before he published it. The exception grants immunity from prosecution if the accused had reasonable grounds for believing the allegations to be true and if he did not have the necessary intention as required in the section. Unless the contents of pamphlet amount to 'incitement of an offence', the persons, who have published and circulated the same, cannot be held guilty under this section.[32]

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable when the false statement, rumour or report is made, published or circulated with intent to create enmity, hatred or ill-will between classes and non-cognisable in any other case, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate.

7. Sanction of the Central or State Government Necessary before Cognisance of the Offence is taken by the Court

Under s 196(1) of CrPC, no court shall take cognisance of an offence punishable under this section (i.e., s 505, IPC) except with the previous sanction of the Central Government, or of the state government, who may, before according sanction under s 196(3) of CrPC, order a preliminary investigation by a police officer not being below the rank of an inspector.

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

[if the offence is under s 505(1)(a)]

That you, on or before the...day of..., at..., made (or published or circulated) a statement (or rumour or report), to wit... (mention the particulars), and that you did so with intent to cause, or which was likely to cause, an officer (or soldier or sailor or airman), to wit... (mention the designation of the officer, etc), in the Army

(or Navy or Air Force) of India to mutiny (or disregard, or fail in, his duty) as such officer, etc.

[if the offence is under s 505(1)(b)]

That you, on or before the... day of..., at..., made (or published or circulated) a statement (or rumour or report), to wit... (mention the particulars), and that you did so with intent to cause, or which was likely to cause, fear (alarm) to the public (a section4183 of the public), to wit.. .(specify it), whereby any person might be induced to commit an offence against the State (or public tranquillity),

[if the offence is under s 505(1)(c)]

That you, on or before the...day of..., at..., made (or published or circulated) a statement (or rumour or report), or wit... (mention the particulars), and that you did so with intent to incite, or which was likely to incite, a class (or community) or persons, to wit... (specify it), to commit an offence against another class (or community), to wit... (specify it),

[if the offence is under s 505(2)]

That you, on or before the...day of..., at..., made (or published or circulated) a statement (or report), containing rumour (or alarming news), to wit... (mention it), with intent to create (or promote), or which was likely to create (or promote), on grounds of religion (or race or place of birth or residence or language or caste or community, or on any other ground whatsoever), feelings of enmity (or hatred or ill-will) between different religious (or racial or language or regional) groups (or castes or communities).

[if the offence is under s 505(3)]

That you, on or before the... day of..., committed an offence, specified in s 505 (2) of the Indian Penal Code, in... (mention the place), a place of worship (or in an assembly, to wit..., engaged in the performance of religious worship or religious ceremonies), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 505 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognisance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Proof

In order to secure a conviction under this section, prove that:

[if the offence falls under s 505(1)(a), IPC]

(a) the accused made, published, or circulated, a statement, rumour or report; and
(b) he did so with intent to cause, or which was likely to cause, an officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of India:

(i) to mutiny, or
(ii) otherwise disregard, or fail in, his duty as such officer,

[if the offence falls under s 505(1)(b), IPC]

(a) the accused made, published, or circulated, a statement, rumour, or report;
(b) he did so with intent to cause, or which was likely to cause, fear (or alarm) to the public (or to a section of the public); and
(c) thereby a person was induced to commit an offence against the:

(i) State, or
(ii) public tranquillity,

[if the offence falls under s 505(1)(c), IPC]

(a) the accused made, published, or circulated, a statement, or rumour, or report; and
(b) he did so with intent to incite, or which was likely to incite, a class (or community) of persons to commit an offence against another class or community,4184

[if the offence falls under s 505(2), IPC]

(a) the accused made, published, or circulated, the statement (or report), containing rumour (or alarming news), in question; and
(b) he did so with intent to create, or which was likely to create, feelings of enmity or ill-will between different religious, racial, language or regional groups or castes or communities on grounds of:

(i) religion,
(ii) race,
(iii) place of birth,
(iv) residence,
(v) language,
(vi) caste or community, or on any other ground whatsoever

[if the offence falls under s 505(3), IPC]

(a) same as in the case of an offence under s 505(2), IPC ;
(b) same as in the case of an offence under s 505(2), IPC ; and
(c) the place, where the offence in question was committed, was a place of worship or an assembly which was engaged in the performance of religious worship or religious ceremonies.

Prosecution case was that the accused petitioner published a news item in the newspaper that some explosives were received from the house of the relative of the then Chief Minister of the State to malign the Chief Minister, to create communal disharmony in the State. Merely inciting the feeling of one community or group without any reference to any other community or group cannot attract the provision of ss 153-A or 505 . In the entire news item there was no reference to the two communities for the purpose of inciting the feeling of one community against the other. It only narrated about para-military forces operating in that area and recovering certain arms from the possession of persons including Ganga Charan Debbarma. Except the activity of the para military force and the role of certain persons including Ganga Charan Debbarma there is nothing to incite any community against the other. Ingredients of offence under s 153A and 505, IPC were not made out in the State.[33]

Of Criminal Intimidation Insult and Annoyance

S. 506.

Punishment for criminal intimidation.--

Whoever commits the offence of criminal intimidation shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both,

If threat be to cause death or grievous hurt, etc.-- And if the threat be to cause death or grievous hurt, or to cause the destruction of any property by fire, or to cause an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, or to impute unchastity to a woman, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

4185STATE AMENDMENTS

Uttar Pradesh--The following amendments were made by Notification No. 777/VIII 9-4(2)-87, dated 31-7-1989, published in U.P. Gazette, Extra, Part-4, Section (Kha) dated 2-8-1989.

"Any offence punishable under Section 506 , IPC, when committed in any district of Uttar Pradesh, shall be notwithstanding anything contained in the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 be cognizable and non-bailable."

Andhra Pradesh--In Andhra Pradesh the offence is non-bailable if committed in A.P. vide G.O. Ms. No. 732, dated 5-12-1991.

Comments

1. Scope

As to what constitutes criminal intimidation has already been discussed under s 503, IPC . This section provides only for the punishment of an offence of criminal intimidation. The punishment under this section has been divided into two categories by reason of the gravity of the offence involved, i.e., punishment extending to two years' imprisonment of either description in ordinary cases and punishment extending to seven years' imprisonment of either description in cases of threats of more serious offences.

A threat administered, but hedged by certain condition, does not bring a case within the mischief of this section.[34]

Asking a person not to work in a private garden and threatening that person to go away from the garden would not satisfy the requirements of s 506, IPC .[35]But where the accused threatens to commit suicide, in case complainant takes legal action against him for the amount legally recoverable, such an act attracts the ingredients of the offence under s 503, IPC punishable under s 506, IPC .[36]

Offences under s 506, IPC and s 27(i) of the Indian Arms Act, are independent and mutually exclusive under different penal laws.[37]4186

2. Ingredients

Commentary under in s 503, ante, may be referred to.

Mere allegation of extending threat to kill would not be enough to attract the provisions of s 506(2), IPC, the depth and gravity of the words uttered by the person extending threats are to be seen.[38]

3. Intention to Cause Alarm

In order to attract the ingredients of s 506, IPC the intention of the accused must be to cause alarm to the victim. Mere expression of words, without any intention to cause alarm, would not suffice. To constitute an offence under s 506, IPC, it must be shown that the person charged actually threatened another with injury to his person, reputation or property or to the person or reputation of any one in whom that person is interested, with the intention to cause alarm.[39] To hold a person guilty for offence under s 506, IPC, it is not necessary to prove that the other person whom accused threatened got frightened by result of the act done by the accused.[40]

Where in complaint it is not even mentioned that the accused had intimidated or threatened the complainant or any one else, in absence of basic ingredients of the section in the complaint, no case under s 506, IPC can be sustained.[41]

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognisable, bailable, compoundable by the person intimidated when it falls under the former part of the section and non-compoundable when it falls under the latter part of the section, triable by a magistrate when it relates in the former part of the section and by a magistrate of the first class. When it relates to the latter part of the section, and may also be tried summarily.

Although an offence under the latter portion of this section cannot be legally compounded under s 320 of the CrPC, yet a withdrawal from the prosecution may be allowed in a proper case.[42]

5. Sanction for Prosecution

It is only when all the three clauses of s 197, CrPC co-exist that the requirements of that section are fulfilled under which the ban imposed on the court from taking cognisance without a valid sanction from the concerned appointing or dismissing authority comes into operation. Merely because the accused is a public servant is not itself to place the complainant under the clutches of the provisions of s 197, CrPC . The protection under s 197, CrPC, cannot be extended in respect of accusations which tend to show that the act of the accused had absolutely no nexus whatsoever with his official duty.[43]4187

6. Notification of Uttar Pradesh State Government making Offence under Section 506 Cognizable and Non-bailable is Illegal

Section 506, IPC, as mentioned in the First Schedule to the CrPC, is declared to be a non-cognisable and bailable offence. However, it appears that by the Uttar Pradesh Government notification No 777/VIII 9-4(2)-87, dated 31 July 1989 published in the Uttar Pradesh Gazette, Extra Part 4, s (kha) dated 2 August 1989, it was declared to be a cognisable and non-bailable offence. The above notification purports to have been issued under s 10 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1932.

Section 10 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1932 gives power to the state government to declare certain offences including s 506, IPC to be cognisable and non-bailable, and on issuance of the said notification the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898 shall stand amended accordingly.

Section 10 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1932 does not give power to the state government to amend by a notification any part of the CrPC of 1898 has been repealed by s 484 of the Crpc, s 10 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1923 has become redundant and otiose. Hence, no notification can now be made under s 10 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1932. Any such notification is illegal for the reason given above. Hence, notification no 777/VIII 9 4(2)-87, dated 31 July 1989, published in the Uttar Pradesh Gazette, Extra Part 4, Section (kha), dated 2 August 1989 by which s 506, IPC, was made cognisable and non-bailable was declared to be illegal. Section 506 , IPC, has to be treated as bailable and non-cognisable offence.[44]

7. Notification of Chief Commissioner, Delhi Making Offence under Section 506 Cognizable and Non-bailable Made Imperative Wef January 2004

Right from 1898 and even when new Code was enacted in 1973, the legislature has not considered it imperative or necessary to convert the offence under s 506 from 'non-cognisable' and 'bailable' to 'cognisable' and 'non-bailable' which itself shows that s 10 of Criminal Law Amendment Act 1932 was a sort of temporary measure empowering the state government to declare this offence as cognisable and non-bailable having regard to the conditions prevailing in a particular area and at particular time. Had it not been so, the Parliament itself would have amended the schedule in 1973 categorizing this offence as 'cognizable' and 'non-bailable.' It is astonishing that the Delhi Government has continued to rely on the notification issued in 1933 and has never accorded any thought to see as to whether it has served the purpose or not and not even in 1973 when new CrPC was enacted repealing the old Code of 1898 and has bartered the liberty of citizens for flimsy allegation of an oral threat without any overt or covert act. Continuation of a notification for such a long period spanning for 70 long years without periodical review of the prevailing conditions amounts to denial of benefit of a law made by Parliament to the public at large and has practically nullified the original law enacted by the Parliament of India which even in 1973 had retained the character of offence under s 506, IPC as 'non-cognisable' and 'bailable.' This was neither the object of Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1932, nor the implication thereof. Section 10 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act empowers a state government to4188 meet out a particular situation and is a sort of curative measure to meet a particular situation and not a provision for subverting and nullifying the law enacted by the Parliament. The Division Bench of Delhi High Court has in Sant Ram v Delhi State [45] held that the effect of the passing of the CrPC was not to terminate the effect of the said notification as all notifications and laws previously in force are continued by s 484(2) of the new Code of 1973 and, therefore, in any case the notification issued under the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1932 is not at all affected by the repeal of the Criminal Procedure Code of 1898 in 1973. Legal validity of a notification under the provisions of ancillary law is one thing. Its justification and need is another thing, particularly when the nature of notification as in the instant case is such which is by way of temporary arrangement to meet out a particular situation. That is why the Delhi High Court did not propose to quash it but intends to recommend to the authorities for a review as to its necessity. Therefore, the Delhi High Court ordered that notification no 232-Home dated 11 January 1933 issued by the then Chief Commissioner of Delhi declaring the offence punishable under s 506, IPC as 'cognisable' and 'non-bailable' which has continued for 70 long years without any review of the factors and conditions that necessitated it, shall cease to be in operation from 15 January 2004 till the government reviews the overall situation and decides as to the necessity of its continuation.[46]

8. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings

If the complainant has not alleged in the complaint that the threats given by the accused caused alarm to her, the offence under s 506, IPC, is not made out against the accused and is liable to be set aside.[47] The investigation into the non-cognisable offence by a police-officer without order of the metropolitan magistrate is contrary to the provisions of s 155(2), CrPC, and, therefore, the investigation, filing of chargesheet and framing of charge under s 506, IPC, all are vitiated and as such the proceedings are liable to be quashed.[48]

9. Charge

As stated earlier, the offence under this section may be tried summarily [s 260(1)(vi), CrPC], and an offence, which is tried summarily, being triable as a summons-case, the framing of formal charge is not necessary (s 251 and 262 (1), CrPC).

10. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) the accused threatened some person;
(b) the said threat was of some injury to his (i.e., the said person's) person, reputation or property (or to the person or reputation of some other person in whom he (i.e., the said person) was interested); and4189
(c) he did so with intent:

(i) to cause alarm to that person; or
(ii) to cause that person to do any act which he was not legally bound to do, or to omit to do any act which he was legally entitled to do, as a means of avoiding the execution of such threat.

It is not essential for the prosecution to reproduce the exact words of the threat.[49]

11. Acquittal

If there is delay in filing a report and the complainant has embellished and exaggerated the case, the accused is entitled to the benefit of doubt.[50]

If the accused has entered the house of the victim on her invitation and there is an exchange of letters between the two, it could not be said that the accused trespassed and criminally intimidated the victim, so his conviction under ss 451, 506, 509, IPC, is improper.[51] The fact that colleagues of the accused had threatened to kidnap the victim does not prima facie constitute commission of the offence under s 506, IPC .[52] When the prosecution witnesses have failed to state that the accused had given a threat to the complainant and her children, the conviction of the accused for the offence under s 506, Pt II, cannot be sustained.[53]

The prosecutrix did not state in her testimony in positive manner that accused criminally intimidated her or threatened to kill her or threatened to cause her hurt. In face of such evidence it was found not expedient in the ends of justice to convict the accused for offence under s 506, IPC .[54]

12. Conviction

Where the accused substantially committed only one offence of criminal intimidation, but was charged under two heads and the magistrate convicted him under ss 506 and 507, IPC, and imposed punishments for both offences, it was held that his conviction under one of the sections was bad.[55] However, if a person at one time criminally intimidates three different persons and each person brings a separate charge against him, there will be an offence committed as against each person, and, therefore, the accused would be liable to conviction and sentence on each offence.[56]

There was evidence that the accused showed pornographic films on handicam containing nude photographs of the prosecutrix. The handicam and the cassettes were recovered from the house of the accused appellant. When the prosecutrix demanded the cassette from the accused, he refused to return and threatened with dire consequences. Accused appellant was convicted for offences under ss 292 and 506, IPC .[57]4190

13. Accused Convicted under Section 302 read with Section 34 cannot be Convicted under Section 506 read with Section 34

The court convicting the accused under s 302 read with s 34, IPC, should not also convict them under s 506 read with s 34, IPC, particularly when the charge under s 506 read with s 34, IPC, is with respect to the accused threatening the deceased.[58]

14. Probation

Looking at the object of the Probation of Offences Act 1958 and the trend of modern penology and criminal jurisprudence, the accused should not be deprived of the benefit of an order under s 4 of the said Act. The accused convicted under s 506 (1), IPC, was, therefore, released on probation.[59] In another case, taking into consideration the overall circumstances of the case, age, antecedents and the fact that the accused convicted under ss 451 and 506, IPC, had to support his family including his two sisters who were of marriageable age, the accused was directed to be released on probation of good conduct in terms of s 4(1) of the Probation of Offenders Act .[60]

15. Compensation

The accused being dissatisfied with the treatment given to his brother at the government hospital, gave a fist-blow resulting in dislocation of a tooth of the victim-assistant surgeon and was convicted for offences under ss 333 and 506, IPC . Although the benefit of probation under the Probation of Offenders Act 1958 was declined but keeping in view that the occurrence took place about 14 years ago, the sentence of imprisonment on both counts was reduced to the period already undergone but a fine of Rs 50000/- was added under s 357, CrPC, for the offence under s 333, IPC, to be paid to the victim-doctor as compensation.[61]

16. Sentence

A bare perusal of s 506, IPC makes it clear that Pt II of the section deals with a graver form of the offence of criminal intimidation which is punishable with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine or with both. The punishment prescribed for the offence under Pt I of s 506 is imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine or with both.[62]

A deterrent sentence should not be awarded unless there are waves of initiative crime or public tumult, or there is danger of a wide breach of the public peace or security.[63]

Of Criminal Intimidation Insult and Annoyance

S. 507.

Criminal intimidation by an anonymous communication.--

Whoever commits the offence of criminal intimidation by an anonymous communication, or having taken precaution to conceal the name or abode of the person from4191 whom the threat comes, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, in addition to the punishment provided for the offence by the last preceding section.

STATE AMENDMENT

Andhra Pradesh--In Andhra Pradesh the offence is cognizable vide G.O. Ms. No. 732, dated 5-12-1991.

Comments

1. Scope

This section supplements the preceding section which provides for punishment for criminal intimidation. This section deals with what is considered to be a more aggravated offence. This would be so:

(a) where communication is anonymous, or
(b) where the accused has taken precautions to conceal his name or abode.

The difficulty in ascertaining the person, who sends a threat, has been considered to be a good ground for awarding enhanced punishment. Communication, whether anonymous or pseudonymous, or containing wrong description and address, to prevent detection would all be covered by this section. The punishment of two years under para (1), and seven years in para (2), of the preceding s 506, IPC is, in each case, to be enhanced by two years under this section.

The sending of anonymous letters with a threat to the effect, that 'if you don't pay me the money demanded. God is going to punish you and your family with ruin and death', would not fall under this section as it would not be a criminal intimidation as defined in s 503, IPC which implies that the threat must be one which can be put into execution by the person threatening and the injury can be avoided by some act or omission of that person.[64]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognisable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class, and may also be tried summarily.

3. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.

4. Proof

In order to secure a conviction under this section, besides the points, which are required to be proved for establishing a charge under the preceding s 506, IPC, it has to be proved that the communication was anonymous or that precaution had been taken to conceal the name or abode of the person giving the threat.4192

Act caused by inducing person to believe that he will be rendered an object of the divine displeasure.--

Whoever voluntarily causes or attempts to cause any person to do anything which that person is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do anything which he is legally entitled to do, by inducing or attempting to induce that person to believe that he or any person in whom he is interested will become or will be rendered by some act of the offender an object of divine displeasure if he does not do the thing which it is the object of the offender to cause him to do, or if he does the thing which it is the object of the offender to cause him to omit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

(b) A threatens Z that, unless Z performs a certain act, A will kill one of A's own children, under such circumstances that the killing would be believed to render Z an object of divine displeasure. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

Comments

1. Scope

The section is analogous to s 503, IPC . It is a variety of criminal intimidation although the provisions are somewhat different. Under this section, there is no reference to any injury to the person, reputation or property of any person. It is only in respect of acts or omissions that this section becomes applicable if the result is brought about by creating a belief, in the complainant, of divine displeasure in case of non-compliance. Where the accused voluntarily attempted to cause a person to omit to do what he was legally entitled to do by inducing, in that person, a belief that he would be rendered, by the act of the accused, an object of divine displeasure if he did the thing which it was the object of the accused to cause him to omit to do, the act was held to be an offence under this section.[65] However, a threat to the effect, that 'if you don't pay me the money demanded from you. God is going to punish you and your family with ruin and death', cannot be brought under this section because the section requires that by some act of the offender the person warned must be led to believe that he will become, or will be rendered, an object of divine displeasure. The words 'by some act of the offender' would be read only with the words 'will be rendered' immediately preceding them and not with the words 'will become'.[66] On the same principle, a mere threat at large, that if a debts is not paid, then by the operation of divine laws, by the working out of destiny or karma, divine displeasure will fall upon the debtor, will not attract the section.[67] A person, who is4193 ex-communicated from the caste by the spiritual head or guru,[68] or who is given a warning of ex-communication by a priest,[69] does not become an object of divine displeasure by an act of the guru or priest. Where the accused left her illegitimate child exposed at the door of the house of its putative father in order to induce him to give her food for herself and her infant, it was held that she was not liable for conviction under this section as the woman's intent was to subject him to human, and not to divine displeasure.[70] However, where, in an election case, the candidate and his agent represented to the persons that he (i.e., the candidate) was Chalanti Vishnu and as such the representative of the Lord Jagannath and if the persons do not vote for him, they would be sinning the God and would also be committing sacrilege against dharma, it was held that the representation fell within the scope of this section.[71]

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognisable, bailable, compoundable by the person against whom the offence is committed, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

3. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.

4. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) the object of the accused was to cause a person to do, or omit to do, something;
(b) that person was not legally bound to do or omit to do that thing;
(c) the accused induced, or attempt to induce, that person to believe that he (or any person in whom he was interested) will become, or will be rendered, the object of divine displeasure;
(d) this would be so by some act of the accused; and
(e) he (i.e., the accused) did so voluntarily.

Word, gesture or act intended to insult the modesty of a woman.--

Whoever, intending to insult the modesty of any woman, utters any word, makes any sound or gesture, or exhibits any object, intending that such word or sound shall be heard, or that such gesture or object shall be seen, by such woman, or intrudes upon the privacy of such woman, [72][shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, and also with fine].4194

Comments

1. Scope

The IPC has made various provisions for the protection of women at different stages. The outraging of modesty, by assault or use of criminal force, on any woman is made punishable under s 354, IPC . In case of an unsuccessful attempt at rape, the offence is one under s 376 read with s 511, IPC . In the case of a completed offence of rape, the offence is punishable under s 376 . In case of annoyance caused by obscene acts or words in a public place, the offence is punishable under s 294 . That section, however, applies to men and women both. Intended insult to modesty of a woman is made punishable by this section. Every woman is presumed to be modest until the contrary is clearly proved. And even woman, immodest by profession or character, might still be insulted by the grossness of the offender's conduct or by reason of the publicity of the place where they are at the relevant time. This section makes intention to insult the modesty of a woman an essential ingredient of the offence. However, the question of an intention to insult the modesty of a woman would depend upon the terms of familiarity between the parties. Where the accused, in the middle of the night, entered the room of the complainant, a woman with whom he had previous acquaintance and who used to speak to strangers and give paansupari to visitors, it was held that the offence under this section was not committed.[73] Where, however, the accused entered into a woman's apartment and tried to catch hold of her and to persuade her by removing her garments, it was held that it constituted an offence under this section.[74] Likewise, where the accused sent, by post, to the complainant, an English nurse, a letter containing indecent overtures and containing the most lewd and filthy suggestions, it was held that an inference arises that the accused intended to insult the modesty of the complainant, who was an unmarried woman, who had no previous acquaintance with the accused, and who was not of a loose character, and he was, therefore, held guilty under this section.[75]

To constitute an offence under this section, there must be some individual woman whose modesty has been outraged. It is, of course, not necessary that individual woman or women should make a complaint. However, there must be an allegation that the action complained of has insulted the modesty of some particular woman or women, and not merely of any class or section of women, however small.[76] A4195 reading of the title of s 509, IPC itself shows that the section deals with an offence involving word, gesture or act which are intended to insult modesty of a woman. The offence under the said section will be attracted if a person intending to insult the modesty of a woman, utters any word, makes any sound or gesture, or exhibits any object, intending that such word or sound shall be heard, or that such gesture or object shall be seen by such woman.[77]

The accused petitioner, Vicar of the Church, in public asked the complainant 'Daisy, why are you peeping, why are you standing here? For peeping, nothing is being done here'. Held, the words uttered by the accused did not intrude upon the privacy of the complainant. Simply because the complainant thinks that the words uttered by the accused carried some other meaning, it cannot be said that the accused be put to trial. The proceedings initiated for offence under s 509, IPC were quashed.[78]

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'Shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, and also with fine' in the section have been substituted by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013 (13 of 2013), s 10 (wef 3-02-2013) for the words 'shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both'.

3. Legislative Object

The legislature found that a woman must be protected not only from physical aggressions made in the course of outraging her modesty, but she should also be shielded from various other acts which do not involve even a touch. Legislature was quite aware that a woman's modesty can be insulted or outraged in various ways. A mere word, a wink, a touch or even a look would suffice to insult the modesty of a woman. Physical advances may not be necessary in all cases. Everything depends on the intention of the mischief maker and the manner in which he conveys his intentions. It is evident that legislature intended that any aggression into a woman's modesty whether by any word, deed, touch or look needs to be curbed and deterred. That is why even a verbal attack on a woman, a gesture and other acts stated in s 509, IPC were brought under the said section. It is clear from a reading of s 509, IPC that by introducing the said provision, legislature intended that any sort of aggression into a woman's modesty whether by any word, deed or act should be deterred, as evident from the title to the section itself. Thus, the acts which are done intending to insult the modesty of a woman which may not necessarily involve even any physical advances are also brought within the sweep of a separate provision viz., s 509, IPC .[79]

4. Title of Section 509

A reading of the title of s 509, IPC itself shows that the section deals with an offence involving word, gesture or act which are intended to insult modesty of a woman. The offence under the said section will be attracted if a person intending to insult the4196 modesty of a woman, utters any word, makes any sound or gesture, or exhibits any object, intending that such word or sound shall be heard, or that such gesture or object shall be seen by such woman, or intrudes upon the privacy of such woman.[80]

The appellant accused, Director General of Police of the State of Punjab, in a dinner hosted by the Secretary to the Government of Punjab, gently slapped on the posterior of the prosecutrix in the presence of some guests. This act on the part of the accused did constitute the ingredient of s 354, IPC . The accused used criminal force with intent to outrage the modesty of the complainant and he knew fully well that gently slapping on the posterior of the prosecutrix in the presence of other guests would embarrass her. Knowledge can be attributed to the accused that he was fully aware that touching the body of the prosecutrix at that place and time would amount to outraging her modesty.

He was convicted under ss 354 and 509, IPC . However, he was granted probation and directed to pay Rs. 2 lacs as compensation to the prosecutrix.[81]

5. 'Gesture'

The word 'gesture' is ordinarily used to refer to making of body signs implying movement of the limbs etc. It is used to refer to body-language. But, writing of letters does not involve any body language and hence it may apparently appear that such act will not amount to 'making gesture' as referred to in s 509, IPC . But, what does the expression 'gesture' actually mean? Lord Denning, an English Judge cautioned in Seaford Court Estate's case[82] that 'the English language is not an instrument of mathematical precision'. To an Indian judge, English is even more intrinsic, being a foreign language. The meaning of the word 'gesture' as per the Concise Oxford Dictionary[83]is, 'a significant movement of a limb or the body; the use of such movements especially to convey feeling or as a rhetorical device; an act to evoke a response or convey intention'. It is thus clear from the above discussion that the word 'gesture' refers not merely to body signs. Though the word 'gesture' is ordinarily used to mean movement of the limbs or body to convey a person's feelings, it can also connote an act done by a person to convey his intentions. According to the dictionary meaning, an act done by a person to express his attitude or intentions also is a 'gesture'. A person can express his attitude or convey his intentions in a number of ways. For example, by speaking, giving, looking, writing etc. In that sense of the word, a person can make a gesture by doing an act without involving any body signs. Any act done by a person to express his attitude or convey his intentions is a gesture.[84]

6. 'Making a Gesture'

The writing of letter' to a woman, intending to insult her modesty can be construed as 'making a gesture' under s 509, IPC .[85] Also, going by the dictionary meaning, it4197 has to be concluded that writing of a letter can be treated as 'making a gesture' since by such act, the writer expresses his attitude or conveys his intentions.[86]

7. Section 509 and Section 376 Read with Section 511 and Section 376 --Relative Scope

When a person makes entry into an apartment occupied by a lady, the first and foremost rational inference that can be drawn in the circumstances must be that it was with the intention of committing some offence in relation to that lady. If it is only making gestures and uttering words requesting her to agree to commit some sexual offence, or remove any garment, then, in that event, it would amount only to an offence under s 509, IPC, but if he proceeds further and thereafter forcibly tries to commit rape, then the offences committed will be under s 376 read with s 511, IPC, and the last step would be when he actually succeeds in committing rape, then it would be an offence under s 376, IPC .[87]

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable, bailable, compoundable, with the permission of the court before which the prosecution for such offence is pending, by the woman whom it was intended to insult or whose privacy was intruded upon, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

9. Quashing of Criminal Proceedings

Offence relating to the modesty of a woman not being trivial, s 95, IPC, is not attracted. If the allegations in the FIR make out offences under ss 354 and 509, IPC, quashing of the FIR and complaint by the High Court is illegal in the absence of the finding that the allegation made in FIR were abused and inherently improbable.[88]

10. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. A charge under s 509, IPC does not call for interference in revision if it is founded on primafacie materials to show unnatural conducts of the accused, who allegedly by word, gesture and act intended to insult the modesty of the deceased, his daughter-in-law.[89]

11. Proof

In order to establish charge under this section, prove that:

(a) the accused uttered any word, or made a sound or gesture, or exhibited any object to a woman intending that it may be heard or seen by that woman, or he intruded upon the privacy of the woman; and
(b) he did so with the intention to insult the modesty of that woman.

4198

If there is a serious difference between the evidence of the complainant and her husband regarding the words used by the accused to insult the modesty of a Scheduled Caste woman, the accused is entitled to the benefit of doubt.[90]

12. Proof--Intention to Insult the Modesty of a Woman

The intention to insult the modesty of a woman is the essential ingredient of the offence. Similarly, if the court, on a consideration, of the evidence on record in its entirety and the overall facts and circumstances of the case disclosed therefrom, arrives at the finding that the accused had the aforesaid intention and for that he said something or uttered some words, it can justly hold the accused guilty under this section, no matter the exact words uttered by the accused are not placed on the record.[91]

Of course, the prosecution should make an honest effort to place, before the court, all materials showing the nature of the words complained of. Better it is, if the exact words are placed on record so that it may be easier for the court to assess therefrom whether the requisite ingredients of this offence are satisfied. However, this rule of fair practice should not be carried so far as to say that on the mere absence of the precise abusive or insulting words on records, even though the said omission is accidental or unintentional, the accused is entitled to an acquittal. If there is convincing evidence on record that actually obscene and slanderous words were uttered with the intention of insulting the modesty of a woman, then it would be improper, nay illegal, to reject such convincing evidence, and/or not to act on the same merely because the precise abusive words uttered by the accused are not placed before the court.[92]

13. Possibility of Two Versions--Effect

If two versions are possible, the one supporting the accused has to be preferred.[93]

14. Acquittal

If the accused has entered the house of the victim on her invitation and there has been an exchange of letters between the two, it could not be said that the accused trespassed and criminally intimidated the victim, and so his conviction under ss 451, 506, 509, IPC is improper.[94]

15. Probation

An accused convicted under ss 354 and 509, IPC, was extended the benefit of probation besides payment of Rs 2 lakh as compensation to the victim.[95]4199

16. Alteration of Conviction From Section 376 read with Section 511 to One under Section 509

Intruding upon the privacy of a woman and making indecent gestures would be a common ingredient both of s 509 and of s 376 ; and s 509, IPC, would be a minor offence compared to the offence under s 376 . Hence, the conviction of the accused under s 376 read with s 511, IPC, can be converted to one under s 509, IPC .[1]

17. Alteration of Conviction from Section 376 to one under Section 509

Chapter XXII

Of Criminal Intimidation Insult and Annoyance

S. 510.

Misconduct in public by a drunken person.--

Whoever, in a state of intoxication, appears in any public place, or in any place which it is a trespass in him to enter, and there conducts himself in such a manner as to cause annoyance to any person, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to twenty-four hours, or with fine which may extend to ten rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is intended to apply to cases in which annoyance is caused, in the state of intoxication, to any person. Intoxication and causing annoyance, in that state, to any person are the only elements in the offence. No mensrea is necessary. If, however, intoxication is involuntary and without the accused's knowledge or against his will, the accused may not be held guilty, under this section, for his annoying conduct because there would be no reason to inflict punishment under this section when the advantage of s 85, IPC, can be claimed even in respect of the worst type of offences. In fact, any act falling under that section would be no offence at all, that section being a general exception applying to all offences of any kind.

The section applies not only to public places, but also to private places in which the accused would be deemed to commit a trespass. This is not confined to cases of criminal trespass. If a person has no right to visit a place as of right, he would be guilty if he causes annoyance, in the state of intoxication, at such place, to any person. Merely being intoxicated would, of course, not amount to an offence. It is mainly the annoyance which brings the case under this section.

2. Section 510 , IPC and Section 34 of the Police Act (5 of 1861)

The difference between the two sections, namely, s 34 of the Police Act and s 510 of the IPC is that whereas under s 34 of the Police Act the fine can be extended to Rs 50 and imprisonment for eight days, under the latter section the fine can be only up to Rs 10 and the maximum imprisonment can be of 24 hours. Then s 34 of the Police Act categorically lays down that the police can arrest a person challaned under the4200 section without warrant whereas in the case of an offence under s 510, IPC there is no such power.[2]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognisable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate and may also be tried summarily.

4. Charge

The offence under this section being triable as a summons case, the framing of a formal charge is not necessary. Section 251CrPC, may be referred to.

5. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) the accused was in a state of intoxication;
(b) he appeared in a public place or committed trespass; and
(c) he caused annoyance there to any person.42014202

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XXIII

Of Attempts to Commit Offences

TOPICAL INTRODUCTION

In every crime, there is first, an intention to commit it, secondly preparation to commit it, thirdly, attempt to commit it. If the third stage, that is, attempt is successful, then the crime is complete. If the attempt fails the crime is not complete, but law punishes the person attempting the act. Section 511 , IPC is a general provision dealing with attempts to commit offences not made punishable by other specific sections. It makes punishable all attempts to commit offences punishable with imprisonment and not only those punishable with death. An attempt is made punishable, because every attempt, although it falls short of success, must create alarm, which by itself is an injury, and the moral guilt of the offender is the same as if he had succeeded. Moral guilt must be united to injury in order to justify punishment. As the injury is not as great as if the act had been committed, only half the punishment is awarded.[1]A culprit first intends to commit the offence, then makes preparation for committing it and thereafter attempts to commit the offence. If the attempt succeeds, he has committed the offence; if it fails due to reasons beyond his control, he is said to have attempted to commit the offence. Attempt to commit an offence can be said to begin when the preparations are complete and the culprit commences to do something with the intention of committing the offence and which is a step towards the commission of the offence. The moment he commences to do an act with the necessary intention, he commences his attempt to commit the offence. The word 'attempt' is not itself defined, and must, therefore, be taken in its ordinary meaning. This is exactly what the provisions of s 511, IPC require. An attempt to commit a crime is to be distinguished from an intention to commit it; and from preparation made for its commission.[2]The intention or mens rea alone is not punishable, but in some cases the second stage of action approaching crime, viz., 'preparation' is made punishable.[3] The third stage towards commission of offence is dealt with here.Section 511, IPC is the solitary provision included in the last chapter of the IPC under the title 'Of Attempts to Commit Offences'. It makes attempts to commit an offence punishable. The offence attempted should be one punishable by the Code4203 with imprisonment. The conditions stipulated in the provision for completion of the said offence are:

(a) The offender should have done some act towards commission of the main offence.
(b) Such an attempt is not expressly covered as a penal provision elsewhere in the Code.[4]

Besides s 511 there are several express provisions in IPC dealing with attempt to commit some specific offences.[5]

Of Attempts to Commit Offences

S. 511.

Punishment for attempting to commit offences punishable with imprisonment for life or other imprisonment.--

Whoever attempts to commit an offence punishable by this Code with [6][imprisonment for life] or imprisonment, or to cause such an offence to be committed, and in such attempt does any act towards the commission of the offence, shall, where no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such attempt, be punished with [7][imprisonment of any description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-half of the imprisonment for life or, as the case may be, one-half of the longest term of imprisonment provided for that offence], or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with attempts to commit offences which are punishable with any imprisonment under this Penal Code and in respect of which no express provision has been made, by this Code, for punishment. It means that the section would not cover cases in which the offender has attempted to commit an offence which is not an offence under s 40, IPC . An attempt to commit an offence which is an offence under a local law (i.e., an offence under the Bengal Food Adulteration Act), but which is not an offence under the Indian Penal Code, does not fall within the ambit of this section.[8]

The 'attempt' on the part of the accused is sine qua non for the offence under s 511, IPC .[9] The very policy underlying s 511, IPC seems to be for providing it as a residuary provision.[10]

Every offence, before it reaches its peak, passes through four stages, i.e.:

(a) the stage of possessing the intention to commit an offence,
(b) the stage of preparation to commit an offence,
(c) the stage of an attempt to commit an offence, and
(d) if the third stage is successful, the final stage of the commission of the offence itself.[11] Intention alone, or intention followed by preparation, is not sufficient to constitute an attempt to commit an offence.[12]

A person commits the offence of attempt to commit a particular offence when

(a) he intends to commit that particular offence; and
(b) he, having made preparations and with the intention to commit the offence, does an act towards its commission, such an act need not be the penultimate act towards the commission of that offence but must be an act during the course of committing that offence.[13]

4205

However, intention, followed by preparation, and further followed by an 'act done towards the commission of the offence' is sufficient.[14]There will be no offence unless there is some act or deed towards the commission of the offence. Besides proving that the accused was actuated by the intention (the mensrea) to commit a specific crime, the prosecution has further to prove that the offender's physical conduct reached the point which the law prohibits (the actus reus), i.e., there must be proof of something done by the offender, a deed which marks the commission of the particular offence. To constitute an attempt, there must be evidence of some overt act.[15]However, an attempt, once begun and a criminal act done in pursuance of it towards the commission of the act attempted does not cease to be a criminal attempt because the person, committing the offence, does repent before the attempt is completed,[16]or prevents its completion by doing some other act in pursuance of a changed intention.[17] If an accused is, at one stage, guilty of an attempt to cheat, nothing, that transpires, can subsequently affect his guilt.[18]

2. Conditions Stipulated

Section 511, IPC is the solitary provision included in the last chapter of the IPC under the title 'Of Attempts to Commit Offences'. It makes the attempt to commit an offence punishable. The offence attempted should be one punishable by the Code with imprisonment. The conditions stipulated in the provision for completion of the said offence are:

(a) The offender should have done some act towards commission of the main offence.
(b) Such an attempt is not expressly covered as a penal provision elsewhere in the Code.[19]

3. Policy Underlying Section 511

The very policy underlying s 511 seems to be providing it as a residuary provision. The corollary, therefore, is that if the action of the accused attracts and is covered by any of the offences prescribed in the Penal Code, he cannot be convicted under s 511 on account of the acts alleged against him. The act of the accused in asking the victim-woman to go and commit suicide had driven her to proceed to the railway track and end her life, the act being expressly made punishable under s 498A, IPC, the accused cannot be convicted under s 511 read with s 304B, IPC .[20]

4. Section 511 and Section 307 --Distinction

See commentary under same heading in s 307, Vol 3.4206

5. Stages of Crime

The act of an accused has to pass through four stages before a crime is committed. These stages are intention to commit crime, preparation to commit crime, attempt to commit crime and when the attempt is successful the crime is committed. The attempt is therefore the third stage of the crime. The attempt begins where preparation for crime ends but the crime is yet to be committed. Broadly speaking all crimes which consists of commission of affirmative acts are preceded over by some overt act or conduct which may be divided into three stages.

The first stage exists when the culprit first entertains the idea or intention to commit an offence. In the second stage, he makes preparations to commit it. The third stage is reached when the culprit takes deliberate overt steps to commit the offence. Such overt act or step in order to be 'criminal' need not to be the penultimate act towards the commission of the offence. It is sufficient if such act or acts were deliberately done, and manifest a clear intention to commit the offence aimed, being reasonably proximate to the consummation of the offence.[21]

A culprit first intends to commit the offence, then makes preparation for committing the offence and thereafter attempts to commit the offence. If the attempt succeeds, he has committed the offence; if he fails due to reasons beyond his control, he is said to have attempted to commit the offence. Attempt to commit an offence can be said to begin when the preparations are complete and the culprit commences to do something with the intention of committing the offence and which is a step towards the commission of the offence. The moment a culprit commences to do an act with the necessary intention, he commences his attempt to commit the offence.[22]

6. Intention

See the relevant headings of ss 124 and 81, Vol 1.

7. Preparation

See commentary of s 399, ante.

8. Attempt--Definition

The word 'attempt' is not itself defined, and must therefore, be taken in its ordinary meaning. This is exactly what the provisions of s 511 require.[23] An attempt to define 'attempt' has to be a frustrating exercise. Nonetheless a search to discover the characteristics of an attempt, if not an apt definition of attempt, has to be made.

In England, Parke B described the characteristics of an 'attempt' in Reg v Eagleton ,[24] as follows:

> the mere intention to commit a misdemeanor is not criminal. Some act is required and we do not think that all acts towards committing a misdemeanor indictable. Acts remotely leading towards the commission of the offence, are4207 not to be considered as attempts to commit but acts immediately connected with it are...

The dictum of Parice B is considered as locus classics on the subject and the test of 'proximity' suggested by it has been accepted and applied by English courts, though with occasional but audible murmur about the difficulty in determining whether an act is immediate or remote, vide, Lord Goddard CJ, in Gardner v Akeroyd :[25]

> ... it is sometimes difficult to determine whether an act is immediately or remotely connected with the crime of which it is alleged to be an attempt.

Parke B, himself appeared to have thought that the possible act before the achievement of the end constituted the attempt. This was indicated by him in the very case of Reg v Eagleton where he further observed:

> ...and if, in this case... any further step on the part of the defendant had been necessary to obtain payment... we should have thought that the obtaining credit... would not have been sufficiently proximate to the obtaining the money. However, on the statement in this case, no other act on the part of the defendant would have been required. It was the last act, depending on himself towards the payment of the money and therefore it ought to be considered as an attempt.

As general principle the test of the last possible act before the achievement of the end would be entirely unacceptable. If that principle be correct, a person who has cocked his gun at another and is about to pull the trigger but is prevented from doing so by the intervention of some one or something cannot be convicted of attempt to murder.[26] In Stephen's Digest of Criminal Law,[27] 'attempt' is defined thus:

> An attempt to commit a crime is an act done with intent to commit that crime, and forming part of a series of acts, which could constitute its actual commission if it were not interrupted. The point at which such a series of acts begins cannot be defined; but depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. An act done with intent to commit a crime, the commission of which in the manner proposed was in fact, impossible, is an attempt to commit that crime. The offence of attempting to commit a crime may be committed in cases in which the offender voluntarily desists from the actual commission of the crime itself.

Another attempt at definition was made by Professor Turner in (1934) 5 Cambridge Law Journal, at p

230, and this was substantially reproduced in Archbold's Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice, 36th edn. Archbold's reproduction was quoted with approval in Davey v Lee and was as follows:

> ...the actus reus necessary to constitute an attempt is complete if the prisoner does an act which is a step towards the commission of a specific crime which is immediately and not merely remotely connected with the commission of it, and the doing of which cannot reasonably be regarded as having any other purpose than the commission of the specific crime.

The Supreme Court held that it was not noticed in Archbold's (36th edn) nor was it brought to the notice of the divisional court which decided Davey v Lee. Prof Turner was himself not satisfied with the definition propounded by him and felt compelled to modify it as he thought that to require that the act could not reasonably be4208 regarded as having any other purpose than the commission of the specific crime went too far and it should be sufficient to show primafacie the offender's intention to commit the crime which is charged with attempting.[28] Editing 12th Edition of Russell on Crime and 18th Edition of Kenny's Outlines of Criminal Law, Professor Turner explained his modified definition as follows:

> It is therefore suggested that practical test for the actusreus in attempt is that the prosecution must prove that the steps taken by the accused must have reached the point when they themselves clearly indicate what was the end towards which they were directed. In other words, the steps taken must themselves be sufficient to show, primafacie, the offender's intention to commit the crime which he is charged with attempting. That there may be abundant other evidence to establish his mens rea (such as a confession) is irrelevant to the question of whether he had done enough to constitute the actus reus.

The Supreme Court was unable to see any justification for excluding evidence aliened on the question of mens rea in considering what constitutes the actusreus. That would be placing the actus reus in too narrow a pigeon-hole.[29] Well then, what is an 'attempt'? Kenny in his Outlines of Criminal Law defined 'attempt' to commit a crime as the 'last proximate act which a person does towards the commission of an offence the consummation of the offence being hindered by circumstances beyond his control.' This definition is too narrow. What constitutes an 'attempt' is a mixed question of law and fact, depending largely on the circumstances of the particular case. 'Attempt' defies a precise and exact definition. Broadly speaking, all crimes which consist of the commission of affirmative acts are preceded by some overt or covert conduct which may be divided into three stages.[30] In India, while attempts to commit certain specified offences have themselves been made specific offences, (e.g., ss 307, 308, IPC*etc*.) an attempt to commit an offence punishable under the Penal Code, generally, is dealt with under s 511, IPC . However, the expression 'attempt' has not been defined anywhere.[31]

9. Attempt--Its Description--Legislative Intent

An attempt may be described to be an act done in part execution of a criminal design, amounting to more than mere preparation, but falling short of actual consummation, and, possessing, except for failure to consummation, all the elements of the substantive crime. In other words, an attempt consists in it the intent to commit a crime, falling short of, its actual commission or consummation/completion. It may consequently be defined as that which if not prevented would have resulted in the full consummation of the act attempted. The illustrations given in s 511, IPC clearly show the legislative intention to make a difference between the cases of a mere preparation and an attempt.[32]4209

10. 'Attempts'--British and Indian Position--Settled Position

Under the English law, an act amounts to an attempt only when it reaches a stage when it must end in the commission of the offence if not interrupted, i.e., when it has reached the penultimate stage of the commission of the offence. This principle of the English law was applied in some early cases, but it was held in other cases that it was not applicable to cases under this section, i.e., s 511, IPC .

The controversy on this point is clearly brought out in two cases. In Empress v Riasat Ali ,[33] the accused gave orders to a press to print one hundred receipt forms similar to those which were formerly used by a coal company. He corrected one proof of those forms and was suggesting further correction in a second proof to assimilate them to the form then used by the company. It was held that he would not be guilty of an attempt at forgery till he had written at least a word in the name of the company upon the printed form because 'the actual transaction would have commenced which would have ended in the crime of forgery, if not interrupted'. This case was followed later in other cases.[34]

The contrary view was expressed in an Allahabad case,[35] in which the Calcutta view was dissented from and it was observed:

> The question is not one of mere proximity in time or place. Many offences can easily be conceived where, with all necessary preparations made, a long interval will still elapse between the hour when the attempt to commit the offence commences and the hour when it is completed. The offence of cheating and inducing delivery is an offence in point.[36] The time that may elapse between the moment when the preparations made for committing the fraud are brought to bear upon the mind of the person to be deceived and the moment when he yields to the deception practiced upon him may be a very considerable interval of time. There must be the interposition of inquiries and other acts upon his part. The act, whereby those preparations may be brought to bear upon the mind, may be several in point of number, and yet the first act, after preparation completed will, if criminal in itself, be, beyond all doubt, equally an attempt with the ninety and ninth act in the series.[37]

In the same case, Blair J observed:

> It seems to me that the section uses the word 'attempt' in a very large sense; it seems to imply that such an attempt may be made up of a series of acts, and that any one of those acts, done towards the commission of the offence, that is, conducive to its commission, is itself punishable and though the act does not use the words, it can mean nothing but punishable as an attempt. It does not say that the last act, which would form the final part of an attempt in the large sense, is the only act punishable under the section. It says expressly that whosoever in such attempt, obviously using the word in the large sense, does any act, etc, shall be punishable. The term 'any act' excludes the notion that the final act, short of actual commission, is alone punishable, and the notion that any of the other acts would be without the range of this section is probably derived from the rulings in the English cases.

This case[38] was followed in other cases.[39] In some cases, however, even though the principle in the Allahabad case[40] was followed, it was held that it must, in every case, be a question depending upon the circumstances whether a particular act, done with the requisite intention towards the commission of an offence, is sufficiently proximate to its commission to constitute an attempt or is so remote as merely to constitute preparation for its commission.[41]

The question has now been settled by the Supreme Court. Attempt to commit an offence can be said to begin when the preparations are complete and the culprit commences to do something with the intention of committing the offence and which is a step towards the commission of the offence. The moment he commences to do an act with the necessary intention, he commences his attempt to commit the offence.[42] The Supreme Court summarised the position thus:

> A person commits the offence of 'attempt to commit a particular offence' when (i) he intends to commit that > particular offence, and (ii) he, having made preparations and with the intention to commit the offence, does an act towards its commission; such an act need not be the penultimate act towards the commission of that offence, but must be an act during the course of committing that offence.[43]

According to this statement of the law laid down by the Supreme Court, a person would be guilty of attempt to commit an offence, if the commission of the offence is not possible, even if the accused is not interrupted in his act.

11. Attempt, how Made?

A culprit first intends to commit the offence, then makes preparation for committing it and thereafter attempts to commit the offence. If the attempt succeeds, he has committed the offence; if he fails due to reasons beyond his control, he is said to have attempted to commit the offence.[44]

12. When Act Accomplished is not possible or is not Crime--Position of its Attempt

An act, done with intent to commit a crime, the commission of which in the manner proposed is, in fact, impossible, is an attempt to commit that crime. The offence of attempting to commit a crime may be committed in cases in which the offender voluntarily desists from the actual commission of the crime itself.[45] The position would, however, be different in the case of attempting to do that which, if achieved, would not constitute a crime at all. Steps on the way to the commission of what4211 would be a crime, if the acts were completed, may amount to attempt to commit the crime, to which, unless interrupted, they would have led; but steps on way to the doing of something, which is thereafter done, and which is no crime, cannot be regarded as attempts to commit a crime.[46] It is possible to attempt to commit an impossible theft because theft is itself an offence under the Indian Penal Code . However, no criminal liability can be incurred under the Penal Code by an attempt to do an act, which, if done, would not be an offence under the Indian Penal Code .[47]

13. 'Attempt' Distinguished from 'Preparation'

Preparation consists in devising or arranging the means or measures necessary for the commission of the offence; the attempt is the direct movement towards commission after the preparation has been made.[48] There is a greater degree of determination in an 'attempt' as compared with a 'preparation'.[49]Mere intention, not followed by any act, cannot constitute an offence, and an indirect preparation, which does not amount to an act which amounts to a commencement of the offence, does not constitute either a principal offence, or an attempt or abatement of the same.[50]

There is no sharp or clear cut distinction between the two. The one shades into the other and the dividing line can only be decided with reference to the facts of each particular case.[51] In Re R Maccrea,[52] it was observed that it is very difficult to frame a satisfactory and exhaustive definition which may lay down for all cases where preparation to commit an offence ends and where attempt to commit that offence begins. In fact, definitions in such matters are dangerous things, and the only safe way of deciding, in any particular case, whether an 'attempt' to commit a crime has been made or not is to consider the facts of that case and to decide in accordance with the dictates of commonsense.[53]The test for determining whether an act constitutes an attempt or preparation is whether the overt acts already done are such that if the offender changes his mind and does not proceed further in its progress, the acts already done would be completely harmless.[54] The Supreme Court, in an earlier case, held that there is a thin line between the preparation for, and an attempt to commit, an offence. Undoubtedly, a culprit first intends to commit the offence, then makes preparation for committing it and thereafter attempts to commit the offence. If the attempt succeeds, he has committed the offence; if it fails due to reasons beyond his4212 control, he is said to have attempted to commit the offence.[55] It was further pointed out in the last cited case that the question whether a certain act amounts to an attempt to commit a particular offence is a question of fact dependent on the nature of the offence and the steps necessary to take in order to commit it.[56] Commentary under the same heading in s 122, Vol 1 and s 307, Vol 3 may be referred to.

14. Intention, Preparation and Attempt--Relative Scope and Distinction

It is true that mere intention to commit an offence is not a crime unless such intention is followed by an act. Mere intention is not suggestive of attempt.[57] An attempt to commit a crime is to be distinguished from an intention to commit it; and from preparation made for its commission. Mere intention to commit an offence, not followed by any act, cannot constitute an offence. The will is not to be taken for the deed unless there be some external act which shows that progress has been made in the direction of it, or towards maturing or effecting it. Intention is the direction of conduct towards the object chosen upon considering the motives which suggest the choice. Preparation consists in devising or arranging the means or measures necessary for the commission of the offence. It differs widely from attempt which is the direct movement towards the commission after preparations are made. Preparation to commit an offence is punishable only when the preparation is to commit offences under s 122 (waging war against the Government of India) and s 399 (preparation to commit dacoity). The dividing line between a mere preparation and an attempt is sometimes thin and has to be decided on the facts of each case. There is a greater degree of determination in attempt as compared with preparation.[58]

15. Beginning of Attempt

Attempt to commit an offence can be said to begin when the preparations are complete and the culprit commences to do something with the intention of committing the offence and which is a step towards the commission of the offence. The moment he commences to do an act with the necessary intention, he commences his attempt to commit the offence.[59]

16. 'Offence'

See commentary under s 40, vol 1.

17. 'Any Act'

The expression 'any act' excludes the final notion; the final act, short of actual commission, is alone punishable. The expression does not mean that the last act,4213 which would form the final part of an attempt in the large sense, is the only act punishable under this section.[60]

18. 'Does any Act Towards the Commission of the Offence'

A person commits the offence of attempt to commit a particular offence when:

(a) he intends to commit that particular offence; and
(b) he, having made preparation and with the intention to commit the offence, does an act towards its commission; such an act need not be the penultimate act towards the commission of that offence but must be an act during the course of committing that offence.[61]

In order to constitute 'an attempt' firstly, there must be an intention to commit a particular offence, secondly, some act must have been done which would necessarily have to be done towards the commission of the offence, and, thirdly, such act must be proximate to the intended result. The measure of proximity is not in relation to time and action but in relation to intention. In other words, the act must reveal, with reasonable certainty, in conjunction with other facts and circumstances and not necessarily in isolation and intention, as distinguished from a mere desire or object, to commit the particular offence though the act by itself may be merely suggestive or indicative of such intention, but that it must be, i.e., it must be indicative or suggestive of the intention.[62]

Therefore, the conclusion can conveniently be drawn, when a person intends to commit a particular offence and then conducts himself in such a manner which clearly indicates his desire to translate that intentional action and in pursuance of such an intention if he does something which may help him to accomplish that desire, then it can safely be held that he committed an offence of attempt to commit a particular offence. It is not necessary that the act which falls under the definition of an attempt should in all circumstances be a penultimate act towards the commission of that offence.[63]

19. 'Where no Express Provision is made by this Code'

Section 511, IPC is attracted when there is a no express provision made by the Penal Code for punishment of attempt to commit an offence. Therefore, when attempt to commit the offence of murder punishable under s 302, IPC or attempt to commit culpable homicide punishable under s 304, IPC is made punishable expressly under ss 307 and 308, IPC, respectively, the recourse to s 511 read with s 302 or s 304, IPC, cannot be taken.

20. Express Provisions of the Indian Penal Code Dealing with Attempts

The following are the express provision of the Penal Code dealing with attempts to commit offence:

(a) section 121 --attempt to wage war against the Government of India;4214
(b) section 124 --attempts wrongfully to restrain or overawe the President or Governor etc., to refrain them from exercising in any manner any of the lawful process;
(c) section 125 --attempts to wage war against any Asiatic power in alliance or at peace with the Government of India;
(d) section 130 --attempts to rescue state prisoner or prisoners of war;
(e) section 153A --attempts to promote disharmony or feeling of enmity etc between different religious groups or castes etc;
(f) section 196 --attempts to use as true or genuine evidence known to be false or fabricated;
(g) section 198 --attempts to use any certificate as true knowing the same to be false;
(h) section 200 --attempts to use any declaration knowing the same to be false;
(i) section 213 --attempts to obtain any gratification to screen an offender from punishment;
(j) section 239 --attempts to induce any person to receive any counterfeit coin;
(k) section 240 --attempt to induce any person to receive a counterfeit Indian coin;
(l) section 241 --attempt to induce any person to receive as genuine a counterfeit coin, which, when first possessed, the deliverer did not know to be counterfeit;
(m) section 307 --attempt to commit murder;
(n) section 308 --attempt to commit culpable homicide;
(o) section 309 --attempt to commit suicide;
(p) section 385 --attempt to put any person in fear of any injury to commit extortion;
(q) section 387 --attempt to put any person in fear of death or grievous hurt to commit extortion;
(r) section 389 --attempt to put any person in fear of any accusation in order to committing of extortion;
(s) section 391 --attempts to commit robbery conjointly by five or more persons;
(t) section 393 --attempt to commit robbery;
(u) section 394 --attempt to commit robbery and voluntarily causing hurt;
(v) section 398 --attempt to commit robbery or dacoity armed with deadly weapon; and
(w) section 460 --attempt to cause death or grievous hurt to any person while committing lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night.

21. Theory of Change of Mind

The time for giving necessary thought to effect change of mind is a consideration which cannot be lost sight of.[64] If the truck loaded with paddy being seized at4215 Samalkha is well inside the Punjab boundary there was no 'export of paddy' within the meaning of para 2(a) of the Punjab Paddy (Export Control) Order, 1959. There was merely a preparation on the part of the accused to commit the offence of export. It was quite possible that the accused might have been warned that they had no licence to carry the paddy and they might have changed their mind at any place between Samalkha Barrier and Delhi-Punjab boundary and not have proceeded further in their journey. The accused, therefore, cannot be convicted for attempt under s 7 of Essential Commodities Act 1945.[65] However, this test propounded by the Supreme Court should be understood with reference to the facts of the case. The offence alleged to be contemplated was so far removed from completion in that case[66] that the offender had ample time and opportunity to change his mind and to proceed no further, his earlier acts being completely harmless. The test is propounded with reference to particular facts of a case and not as a general rule. Otherwise, in every case where an accused is interrupted at the last minute from completing the offence, he may always say that when he was interrupted he was about to change his mind.[67] If the theory of change of mind is pressed to illogical ends, there would hardly be any space for the Penal clause of attempt to cover the distance between preparation and actual commission of the offence.[68] Therefore, where a truck carrying smuggled goods was intercepted at a place in Haryana from where the Punjab border was only 50 yards away, the accused was prosecuted for attempting to smuggle bajra from Haryana to Punjab, the theory of change of mind was not found applicable.[69]

22. Attempt--Series of Acts

An attempt to commit an offence is an act, or a series of acts, which leads inevitably to the commission of the offence, unless something, which the doer of the act neither foresaw nor intended, happens to prevent this.[70] Whenever the legislature declares a series of acts to constitute a crime, any person who has entered upon that series of acts must from that moment stay his hand, and if he proceeds to the completion of the series of acts, he is guilty of the crime.[71] The point at which such a series of acts begins cannot be defined, but depends upon the circumstances of each particular case.[72]

23. Illustrative Cases of Attempt to Commit Offence Classified under Different Heads

The question as to whether certain acts amount to an attempt to commit an offence or they amount only to preparation or some other offence has been discussed, in a large number of cases, in respect of different offences. Some of those cases are separately discussed below.4216

(a) Cheating

In Sudhir Kumar Mukherjee v State of West Bengal ,[73] the appellant was in the habit of signing chalans of lime stone in a company, without actually receiving the goods, and of getting the same verified by an officer of the company. It was held that this was the most important and crucial step towards cheating. However, when there is no proof that the accused himself forged the cash memo or caused it to be forged by any other person, his conviction under s 420, read with s 511, IPC, is liable to be set aside.[74] Where the accused presented some bills to the government knowing that they contained false representations as regards the number of gallons of linseed oil supplied, it was held that the presentation of each of the bills was an application for the payment of money under false pretense, and as soon as any of such bills was presented, the offence of attempt was committed.[75] Where the accused manufactured spurious trinkets and asked a goldsmith to buy them saying that they were of gold and that they were stolen property, which was also not true,[76] or where the accused sent railway receipts to A to Bombay for 300 bales of cotton, when he had only 200 bales, inducing A to pay the maximum amount which he would have naturally advanced in respect of 300 bales,[77]or where the accused informed the octroi superintendent that there was 16 mounds of sugar in his cart, whereas there was only 6, and by this act he attempted to deceive the superintendent and to induce him to grant a refund of 16 mounds of sugar instead of 6 mounds of sugar,[78] or where the accused, a nominee under a policy of life insurance, made false claim for the policy amount on the fraudulent misrepresentation, supported by false documents that the insured had died and false claim was put in the course of transmission by post,[79] or where the accused, having contracted to deliver a certain quantity of good cotton, delivered instead cotton heavily adulterated with rubbish and adulterated in such a manner that the fraud would be likely to escape the usual inspection but an agent, to whom delivery was offered, suspected the character of the goods and declined to accept them,[80] it was held that the offence of attempt at cheating was complete and the accused was guilty under s 420, read with s 511, IPC . In Re MacCrea,[81] the letters of administration were granted to one A, which letter of administration recited that a certain lost government promissory note was the property of one H. The accused knew this fact to be false and made use of these letters of administration and, with fraudulent intent, sent them to the Public Debt Office as the foundation for an application for payment of the money. It was observed that the accused not only intended to cheat, but had done an act towards that cheating. In Rahmat Ali v Emperor ,[82] the accused sold some silver coins to J and told him that he had in his possession 10,000 silver rupees which he had found buried in the ground. Later on, the accused brought a bag of coins and some coins were delivered while others were still in the bag. All the coins were not silver coins, but contained mixture of lead and zinc. It was held that the offence of attempt to cheat was fully established. In4217*Abhayanand Mishra v State of Bihar* ,[83] the accused applied to a university for permission to appear at the MA Examination representing that he was a graduate and that he had been teaching in a certain school. In support of his application, he attached certain forged certificates. The university authorities accepted the statements and gave permission, and proper admission card for him was dispatched. It was held that the preparation was complete when he had prepared the application for the purpose of submission to the university. The moment he dispatched it, he entered the realm of attempting to commit the offence of 'cheating'. He did succeed in deceiving the university and inducing it to issue the admission card. He just failed to get it and sit for the examination because the university was informed about his being neither a graduate nor a teacher. In Bashirbhai Mohamedbhai v State of Bombay ,[84] the accused represented to the complainant that he could duplicate currency notes. The complainant gave two currency-notes of Rs 100 each to the accused. The accused was trapped by the police. It was held that an attempt to commit the offence had actually been made and it could not be said that the accused had only made a preparation. The fact that the complainant had not been taken in and that the accused had failed in their attempt, is irrelevant in considering whether they had committed the offence of attempting to cheat. In Empress v Dhundi ,[85] at the Central Octroi Office, the accused made false representations with the object of obtaining a certificate to obtain a refund of octroi duty, but the octroi officers, finding the representations to be untrue, issued no certificate. It was held that the accused had only made preparation for attempt to cheating as he still had a locus poenitentiae.

If the accused had made the name-board on his nursing home with questionable educational degrees which he did not possess or if the accused got the prescribed slips printed describing himself as the holder of such degrees, then perhaps, such acts would only have reached the stage of preparation. However, when he released such prescription-slips to others or when he exhibited such name-board for others to read, he crosses the stage of preparation and transgresses into the realm of attempt attracting the offence under s 511 read with s 417, IPC .[86]

(b) Smuggling

In King v Hari Baisakh ,[87] the accused was found boarding a train, at Cuttack, with some handloom cloth, the transport of which, without permit beyond the province, was punishable. He had a ticket for Howrah, but the luggage was unbooked. It was held that in the absence of anything to indicate as to where the luggage was being transported, the accused could not be convicted of attempt to transport it beyond the province because it was just possible that he might have unburdened himself of the luggage at a wayside station. In State v Narain Singh ,[88] the accused carried cart-load4218 of jwar and wheat without permit towards border of the state and was stopped by authorities on the road at two furlongs from the border. It was held that in the absence of any evidence to show the intention of the accused to export the wheat and jwar, they could not be held guilty of the offence of attempt to export. In Malkiat Singh v State of Punjab ,[89] truck, carrying paddy from Punjab side to Delhi, was stopped at a distance of 32 miles from Delhi and the Delhi-Punjab border was, at that time, at a distance of 18 miles from Delhi. The export of paddy outside Punjab without a permit was prohibited at that time. It was held that there was no export and there was only a preparation, and not an attempt because it was quite possible that the accused might have been warned that they had no licence to carry the paddy and, on such warning, they might have changed their mind at any place between the place where the truck was stopped at the Delhi-Punjab border. In State v Haricharan Rakshit ,[90] the accused was travelling in the Puri-Howrah Express, with new cloth which was in excess of the permitted quantity for export to any place outside Orissa. It was held that the only reasonable inference that could be drawn was that he intended to take those articles also with him to Howrah and, therefore, he was guilty of attempt to transport cloth in contravention of the notification in question. In Vaikuntham Jaganadham v State of Orissa ,[91] the accused, a merchant of Salur in Madras Presidency loaded some bags of rice in a lorry in Orissa State and himself sat in it and, while it was proceeding towards Salur, it was stopped about 28 miles away from Madras border by the police and the rice was seized as transport outside Orissa was prohibited. It was held that there was a clear case of attempt to transport rice in question without a proper permit. The mere possibility, that before the lorry crossed Orissa border the accused might have changed his mind and thrown away the rice somewhere in Orissa, would not suffice to indicate that the act complained of was still in a preparatory stage, and had not ripened into an attempt. In State of Uttar Pradesh v Ram Chandra ,[92] the accused was transporting wheat by ferry boat from one block to another across the river and was stopped midstream. He was prosecuted for contravention of cl 3 of the Uttar Pradesh Wheat (Restriction on Movement) Order 1949. It was held that the act of the accused amounted to an attempt to transport the grain.

In State of Maharashtra v Mohd Yakub & ors ,[93] silver was transported in jeep and truck and the two vehicles halted near a bridge at a creek. Some small and heavy bundles were removed from the truck and kept on the ground. The customs officers surrounded them. At the same time, the sound of the engine of the mechanised sea-craft from the side of the creek was heard by the officers. There were a number of silver ingots lying under saw-dust bags in the truck. The Apex Court held that the accused had committed the offence of attempting to export silver out of India by sea in contravention of the provisions of the Customs Act and Foreign Exchange Regulation Act.4219

(c) Forgery

Where the accused, intending to procure a forged document, purporting to be executed by one C procured the attendance of a writer, purchased the stamp paper, caused another person to represent himself to the stamp vendor as C and the stamp vendor made an endorsement on the stamp, it was held that the accused had not gone beyond the stage of preparation.[94] To prepare, with the aid of others, a copy of an intended false document, to buy a stamped paper for the purpose of writing such false document, and to ask for information as to a fact to be inserted in such false document, do not constitute forgery nor an attempt to commit forgery as the law allows a locus poenitentiae.[95] Where, for obtaining a temporary appointment, the accused presented a paper, purporting to be a printed reproduction of a certificate from his former employer, which was never given, but it was not found that there was any intention to cause it to be believed that the printed paper was made by the authority, express or implied, of the person giving the certificate, it was held that the reproduction of the certificate did not constitute forgery.[96] On the other hand, it has been held in other cases that the acts amounted to forgery or an attempt at forgery. In Empress v Kalyan Singh ,[97] one A, calling himself B, accompanied by a man C, went to a stamp-vendor and purchased a stamp from him in the name of B. The two men then went to a petition-writer whom they asked to write for them a bond for Rs 50 payable by B to C. The petition-writer commenced to write the bond, but, his suspicion being aroused, did not finish it. It was held that C was rightly convicted of an attempt to commit the offence defined in s 467, IPC, and A of abetment of the said attempt. Where a forged document was filed by the accused, in a court, to support his plea of payment, it was held that the accused had done everything that was necessary to enable him to tender the document in evidence at the trial and, therefore, his prosecution had been rightly ordered under s 471 read with s 511, IPC, even though the document had not been actually tendered in evidence.[98] Where the accused instigated another person to personate C and to purchase, in C's name, certain stamped paper, in consequence of which the vendor of the stamped paper endorsed C's name on such paper as the purchaser of it and the accused did so with the intention that such endorsement might be used against C in a judicial proceeding, it was held that the offence of fabricating false evidence was complete and that M was properly convicted of abetting the commission of such offence rather than an attempt to commit it.[99]

(d) Illegal gratification

To ask for a bribe is an attempt to obtain one, and a bribe may be asked for as effectual in implicit as in explicit terms. Where B, who was employed as a clerk in the Pension Department, in an interview with A, who was an applicant for a pension, after referring to his own influence in that department and instancing two cases in which by that influence increased pensions had been obtained, proceeded to intimate that anything might be effected by 'kar-rawai', and, on the overture being rejected,4220 concluded by declaring that A would repent the rejection of it, it was held that the offence of attempting to obtain a bribe was consummated. The mere fact, that the accused might have foregone his intention, would not make it unconsummated.[1] The demand of some money by a civil court peon for serving summons on witness as identifier would be an attempt at obtaining illegal gratification.[2] When once a proposal has been made for the payment of an illegal gratification, whether it is completed by an agreement or not, the offence of an attempt to commit an offence is complete.[3] In Hargyan v Emperor ,[4] the accused made a proposal to G that if he paid Rs 200 and promised to say nothing about the payment of money and took no steps to trace the thieves, he would get him back his stolen buffaloes. G did not accept the proposal. It was held that the accused could not have done anything more and was guilty of an attempt to commit an offence under s 215, IPC, read with this section.

(e) Theft

Where the accused was caught, in night time, in the vicinity of some cattle which had been tethered on the complainant's square and near which complainant and his brother were sleeping, it was held that he could not properly be held guilty of an attempt to commit theft, but he had committed the offence of criminal trespass.[5] A person, entering an enclosure, which is not a building, with intent to commit theft of cattle cannot be convicted under s 457, IPC . He is, however, guilty of an offence under ss 379 / 511, IPC, as the attempt to commit theft may be said to have begun when he entered the enclosure.[6] Where the accused, who made his way into an open thorned enclosure in which goats and sheep were kept, fled away as the owner was disturbed before the accused was able to carry out his object, it was held that he could be convicted of attempted theft, but not of criminal trespass by night in a house or building.[7] When the accused tried to take a purse out of the pocket of a person, who however seized the purse when it was out of his pocket, it was held that the accused was not guilty of theft as he was unable to move the purse out of the possession of that person, but was guilty of an attempt.[8]

(f) House-breaking

In Walidad v Emperor ,[9] the accused was found on the roof of the complainant armed with an implement used for the purpose of committing burglary. There was no evidence to show that he had either commenced to dig a hole on the roof for the purpose of effecting his entrance inside the room or had otherwise commenced any act for jumping or getting into any portion of the premises. In these circumstances, it was held that the accused was guilty of criminal trespass punishable under s 447 and under ss 457 / 511, IPC . Where the accused, on reaching the roof of a house, started going down a ladder but retracted his foot-steps and jumped down from the back of4221 the roof, it was held that he was guilty of attempt to commit the offence of house-breaking.[10]

(g) Abduction

In Allu v Emperor ,[11] the accused, armed with chhavi, came to the roof of a woman, sleeping with her husband, and asked her to accompany them, to which she replied in the negative. They then lifted her up in order to carry her away, but upon her raising an alarm, dropped her on the roof. The accused were held guilty under s 366 read with s 511, IPC .

(h) Causing Disappearance of Evidence

Where the accused, who had brought a civil suit on the basis of a forged promissory note, removed it from the file when the file was at the house of an official, it was held that they were guilty under ss 201 / 511, IPC .[12]

Where the accused persons were found carrying the dead body of a murdered man and on being confronted and questioned, the accused left the body at a place which was near a public park and disappeared, the offence committed was held only as an attempt to cause disappearance of evidence of murder punishable under s 201 read with s 511, IPC .[13]

(i) Fabricating False Evidence

Facts, showing that the accused had dug a hole, intending to place salt therein, in order that the discovery of the salt so placed might be used in evidence against his enemy in a judicial proceeding, would justify his conviction of an attempt to fabricate false evidence as the accused had done an act towards the commission of the offence.[14] It is not, however, enough to justify the conviction of a police officer of an offence under ss 195 / 511, IPC, for taking the photographs of some persons, arrested in connection with a dacoity, on the surmise or probability that the photographs may have been taken with a view to the procuring of false evidence. It cannot be said that the taking of photograph was an act done 'towards the commission of the offence'.[15]

(j) Criminal Misappropriation

Where an accused, who was in charge of a godown, removed some bags of grain from a part of the godown and put them in another room in order that they might be clandestinely removed and sold to some dealer and the sale proceeds misappropriated, but without manipulating the registers accordingly, it was held that this was merely an act of preparation.[16]4222

(k) Bigamy

An act of causing the publication of banns of marriage is an act done in the preparation to marry, but does not amount to an attempt to marry. It would not amount to an attempt inasmuch as the accused may, before any ceremony of marriage is commenced, change his intention to marry.[17]

(l) Dowry Death

If the attempt by the wife to commit suicide failed, though there was a persistent demand of dowry, and it was also not the prosecution case that the accused were driving her intentionally to put an end to her life, the offence under s 304B read with s 511, IPC is not made out though s 498, IPC, is attracted.[18]

(m) Rape

If the acts of the accused result into pre-penetration emission, his act would be an act of attempt to commit rape.[19] The accused took the prosecutrix to his house, undressed her and rubbed his male organ on her private parts and the victim admitted in her cross-examination that when accused rubbed his male organ some white colour material leaked out. In the facts and circumstances, the accused was found liable for attempt to commit rape punishable under ss 376 read with s 511 IPC .[20] Where the prosecutrix, a girl of 11 years alleged full penetration, but medical evidence did not corroborate her evidence, yet injury was found near her private parts, the accused was found guilty under s 376 read with s 511, IPC, and not under s 376, IPC .[21] The accused put the prosecutrix on the bed, undressed himself and the prosecutrix at which the prosecutrix shouted and a person came there so the accused could not commit rape. The accused was found guilty of an offence of attempt to commit rape punishable under ss 376 and 511, IPC .[22] The accused forcibly tore the clothes of the prosecutrix, threw her on the ground and tried to force himself on her body from the legs side, the conviction of the accused for an attempt to commit rape was found proper.[23] It is essential that the testimony of the prosecutrix who alleges commission of rape by the accused should find corroboration through medical evidence. If no spermatozoa is found in the vaginal swab of the prosecutrix, the conviction of the accused under s 376, is liable to be altered to one under ss 376 / 511, IPC .[24] The prosecutrix deposed that the accused made her sit forcibly on his thighs, removed her underwear and tried to insert his private part into her private parts. The lady doctor who examined the prosecutrix deposed that there was no penetration in the private parts of the victim. Held, no offence under ss 376 / 511, IPC was made out, accused was convicted for offence under s 354, IPC .[25] The prosecutrix, a dumb witness, by signs indicated that the accused by lifting her lehenga and making her lie down 'did4223 something' in her private parts but she did not state that there was any penetration of penis in her vagina, the accused was held liable for attempt to commit rape under s 511 read with s 376, IPC .[26]

Accused was prosecuted on allegations that the accused conductor kidnapped the victim girl and raped her in bus. The medical evidence did not show that sexual intercourse was committed. Evidence showed that attempt was made by the accused appellant to commit rape. Accused was convicted for attempt to commit rape under ss 376 / 511 and 366, IPC .[27]

The accused charged with s 376, IPC, can be convicted under s 376 read with s 511, IPC, though he was not charged with the latter offence separately.[28] For further commentary, see under the heading 'attempt to commit rape' in s 376, Vol III.

In order to find an accused guilty of an attempt to commit rape under ss 376 / 511, IPC the Court has to satisfy itself that the accused when he laid hold of the victim, not only desired to gratify his passions upon her person, but that he intended to do so at all events and notwithstanding any resistance on her part.[29]

The charge of rape was not proved against the accused teacher. However, charge under ss 354 and 506, IPC was proved against the accused. Accused was convicted under ss 354 / 506, IPC .[30]

Evidence of the prosecutrix and other witness to whom the prosecutrix informed immediately after the incident proved that the accused committed rape on the complainant at knife point. Accused appellant was convicted under s 376 and s 511, Pt II, IPC .[31]

There was no evidence that the accused penetrated his private part into the private part of the prosecutrix. Medical evidence did not establish sexual intercourse. The accused merely put his finger into the private part of the prosecutrix. Held, no offence under s 376, IPC was made out. Accused was convicted under s 354, IPC .[32]

(n) Abetment of Suicide

The offence of abetment or attempt is made out when the offence abetted is committed in consequence of the abetment. If the wife of the accused had tried to commit suicide by jumping into the river due to cruelty of her husband but was saved, no offence under ss 306 / 511, IPC could be said to have been made out.[33]

(o) Slaughter

Making an animal ready for slaughter by tying it with a rope and throwing it down on the ground is nothing more than mere preparation for its slaughter. An attempt to slaughter must imply some act more proximate to the actual killing. Similarly,4224 merely arming oneself with a knife would only amount to preparation. The stage of attempt would be reached when the knife is raised or pointed at the animal with the intention of inflicting the fatal blow.[34]

(p) Adulteration

The act of S inviting P to come the next day to purchase diesel from his pump which did not contain sufficient quantity to fulfil the demand of P and the act of the other accused persons of mixing kerosene with the diesel to deliver that admixture to P is sufficient to attract the application of s 511 in which the word 'attempt' has been used in a larger sense so as to include any of the series of acts committed by the accused persons which may go to complete the offence as described in s 511, IPC, attracting s 420 read with s 511, IPC, and also s 23(c) of the Petroleum Act 1934.[35]

(q) Crossing the Border

There is no presumption that anybody who moved towards the border wanted to cross-over. The offence would commence only when a step was taken towards crossing the border and before that the action would amount to a mere preparation and not attempt to cross the border. Where a woman was going towards the border with the intention to cross-over to Pakistan but was arrested when she had 160 yards more to cover, it was held that offence under s 3 of the Ordinance Jammu & Kashmir Egress and Internal Movement (Control) Ordinance was not complete.[36]

(r) Sedition

Commentary of s 124-A, vol 1, may be referred to.

24. Procedure

The offence under this section:

(a) if committed by attempting to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment for life or imprisonment, is cognisable or non-cognisable, and bailable or non-bailable, according as the offence attempted is cognisable or non-cognisable, and bailable or non-bailable, and triable by the court by which the offence attempted is triable,
(b) if committed by attempting to commit an offence punishable with death, imprisonment for life, or imprisonment for more than seven years, is cognisable, non-bailable, and triable by the court of sessions,
(c) if committed by attempting to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment for three years and upwards but not more than seven years, is cognisable, non-bailable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class, and
(d) if committed by attempting to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment for less than three years or with fine only, is non-cognisable, bailable, and triable by a magistrate.4225

25. Sanction to Prosecute an offender under this Section--When Required

Where a sanction is required under any of the provisions of ss 195 to 199 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, for prosecution for any offence, a trial for attempt at committing such an offence should also not be maintainable without sanction. Therefore, no prosecution for an attempt at fabricating false evidence before a court would be maintainable without a sanction under s 195 of the said Code.

26. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate (or Session Judge), etc), hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the..., day of..., at..., attempted to commit the offence, to wit... (specify the offence attempted), and, in such attempt, did a certain act, to wit... (specify the act done), towards the commission of the said offence, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under... (specify the section punishing the offence attempted), read with s 511 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognisance of this Court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

This section, i.e., s 511, has to be mentioned in the charge along with the principal offence attempted.[37]

27. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, prove that:

(a) the accused attempted to commit some offence punishable with imprisonment under the Indian Penal Code or he attempted to cause such offence to be committed; and
(b) in such attempt, he did some act towards the commission of that offence.

28. Sentence

There can be no precedent in a discretion. The concept of punishment is multi-faced. What can suit one situation may wholly be unsuitable to another.[38]

Section 75, IPC, does not apply to an offence punishable under this section i.e. s 511, but previous conviction can be taken into account for a much higher sentence imposed for the offence.[39]

Where the offence of attempt to commit theft had taken place about 16 years back, the sentence of imprisonment for six months was modified paying fine only of Rs 1000.[40] The accused attempted to draw the pension of his uncle, a freedom fighter, by submitting forged papers but did not succeed and was convicted under ss 419 and 420 read with s 511, IPC . Keeping in view that the accused faced the agony of trial for about seven years and was in custody since 11 January 1995 to4226 31 March 1995, the sentence of RI for six months on each count was reduced to imprisonment for three months on each count of the charges.[41]

29. Attempt to Commit Rape

Sentence-General

Attempt to commit rape is definitely a serious offence. It touches the dignity and honour of a woman.[42] As per s 511, IPC, in a case of attempt to commit an offence, the extent of punishment would be half the sentence prescribed under the main offence.[43] The minimum sentence under s 376, would not be less than seven years, and in view of s 511, such sentence may be upto half the sentence imposable for the offence under s 376, IPC .[44]

Where accused is found guilty under ss 376 / 511, IPC for offence of attempt to commit rape, it would be appropriate to impose half of the punishment as envisaged under s 511, IPC, which comes to imprisonment for a period of 10 years.[45]

Sentence-Lenient

The occurrence took place about seven years back and keeping in view the possibility of social ostracisation, the young age of the accused who were in their early twenties and the fact that they were daily wagers, the sentence of RI of six months was awarded to them.[46] The accused were of tender age of 18-19 years and were not habitual offenders so the sentence of five years RI awarded under s 376 read with s 511 was reduced to 15 months imprisonment.[47] In another case, keeping in view the fact that the accused was a young boy, the sentence of imprisonment awarded to him by the sessions court was reduced to the period already undergone by him.[48] Where the case was pending for the last 16 years, the accused was sentenced to undergo RI for two years and a fine of Rs 5000 which was to be paid as compensation to the prosecutrix, in default of payment of fine, the accused was to further undergo imprisonment for 18 months.[49] Where the accused was in his early twenties and was a daily wage earner, the occurrence took place seven years back, the sentence of the accused was reduced from five years RI to custodial sentence of six months.[50] In another case, where the accused was in custody for about four months and seven days during trial and some after conviction on 10 September 1994 till disposal of appeal on 6 May 1996, was behind bars, the sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[51]4227

Sentence-Deterrent

Attempt to commit rape is definitely a serious offence. It touches the dignity and honour of a woman.[52] The fact that the incident took place 11 years back, and the accused has a wife and children and he has already undergone 8/9 months imprisonment, are not adequate and special reasons to reduce the sentence. When the accused, a mature and married person committed rape on the prosecutrix who is below the age of 16 years, the minimum sentence of 3½ years imprisonment should be awarded.[53] Where the evidence on record showed that the accused attempted to commit rape on a girl of tender age of 12 years and he himself had a daughter aged eight years at the time of commission of the offence, it was held that the sentence of five years RI and fine of Rs 40,000 would meet the ends of justice.[54] When delay in disposal of the case is entirely attributable to the accused who had absconded with a view to evade trial and punishment immediately after the commission of the offence and was apprehended after about 7½ years, the delay in disposal of the case cannot be treated as a mitigating circumstance in the case. The sentence of RI for three years and fine of Rs 3000 was held justified.[55] In another case, an accused was sentenced to undergo RI for three years and pay a fine of Rs 5000 and in default, to suffer RI for three months.[56]

Alteration of Conviction from Sections 376 / 511 to one under Section 354

The act of the accused catching hold of the prosecutrix and making her fall down cannot be said to be an attempt to commit rape. Though it amounts to assault or use of force to outrage the modesty of the victim, the conviction of the accused is therefore, liable to be altered from s 376 read with s 511, IPC to one under s 354, IPC .[57] The accused seduced the prosecutrix for forcible intercourse, she resisted and her cries attracted witnesses at which the accused fled away. However, physical and psychological potency of the accused to commit sexual intercourse was not substantiated from the record. The higher degree of determination required to commit rape was found lacking. The conviction of the accused was, therefore, altered from s 376 read with s 511, IPC, to one under s 354, IPC .[58] For further commentary, see under the same heading in s 376, Vol 3.4228

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON AMENDMENTS TO CRIMINAL LAW [Relevant Extracts]

Relevant Extracts from the Report of the Committee on Amendments to Criminal Law[1]

Introduction

"Woman is the companion of man, gifted with equal mental capacities. She has the right to participate in the minutest details in the activities of man, and she has an equal right of freedom and liberty with him. She is entitled to a supreme place in her own sphere of activity as man is in his. This ought to be the natural condition of things and not as a result only of learning to read and write. By sheer force of a vicious custom, even the most ignorant and worthless men have been enjoying a superiority over woman which they do not deserve and ought not to have. Many of our movements stop half way because of the condition of our women."

--Mahatma Gandhi[2]

1. Rape, sexual assault, eve-teasing and stalking are matters of serious concern - not only because of the physical, emotional and psychological trauma which they engender in the victim, but also because these are practices which are being tolerated by a society ostensibly wedded to the rule of law.
2. The fundamental rights to life with human dignity,[3] to equality,[4] and to work in ones chosen profession or trade[5] inherently include protection from sexual harassment. It is indubitably the position that the Constitution guarantees fundamental freedoms to women. In view of Article 15(3), which enables the State to make special provisions for women and children, the equality of women and children is firmly enshrined in Article 14 as well as Article 15(1) of the Constitution . It is also necessary to note that Article 21 applies equally to women. Article 21A, which guarantees the right to education applies to 'all children' irrespective of gender. Article 23 prohibits traffic in human beings and forced labour. Article 24 protects children and enjoins that no child below the age of 14 years will be employed to work in any factory or mine or hazardous employment. It may also be noticed that4231 Article 51A(e) provides that it shall be the duty of every citizen of India to renounce practices derogatory to the dignity of women.
3. In fact, the Preamble to the Constitution guarantees social, economic and political justice which, in the view of the Committee, would include gender justice, liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship; equality of status and opportunity that would again reinforce the theory of equality; while fraternity enjoins citizens to treat each other with respect and dignity, regardless of gender.
4. The right to be protected from sexual harassment and sexual assault is, therefore, guaranteed by the Constitution, and is one of the pillars on which the very construct of gender justice stands.[6]
5. This right is buttressed by the directive principles of State policy contained in Articles 38, 39 and 39A of the Constitution, which are to be construed harmoniously with the fundamental rights in Part III; and these fundamental principles bind the State in performance of its task of governance of the country.
6. Every person invested with public power remains primarily a citizen who is duty bound to perform the fundamental duties of every citizen with the added public duty of implementing the directive principles of securing a social order for the promotion of welfare of the people.
7. A fortiori, the duty of the State, therefore, is to provide a safe environment, at all times, for women, who constitute half the nation's population; and failure in discharging this public duty renders it accountable for the lapse. The State's role is not merely reactive to apprehend and punish the culprits for their crimes; its duty is also to prevent the commission of any crime to the best of its ability. Crimes against women are an egregious violation of several human rights demanding strict punishment with deterrence to prevent similar crimes in future by the likeminded.

8. The National Human Rights Commission has also held the government accountable and responsible for the violation of human rights within its jurisdiction, observing:

> "...it is the primary and inescapable responsibility of the State to protect the right to life, liberty, equality and dignity of all of those who constitute it. It is also the responsibility of the State to ensure that such rights are not violated either through overt acts, or through abetment or negligence. It is a clear and emerging principle of human rights jurisprudence that the State is responsible not only for the acts of its own agents, but also for the acts of non-State players acting within its jurisdiction. The State is, in addition, responsible for any inaction that may cause or facilitate the violation of human rights."[7]

9. This Committee has proceeded to perform its task on the basis of the above constitutional obligation and juristic principles enunciating the State's responsibility for the protection of the right to life with all aspects of human dignity of women. This is also the demand of the fundamental rights in Articles 14, 15 and 19 of our Constitution as indicated above. The substantive laws must meet these standards and the machinery prescribing the procedure for their implementation must be adequately equipped for it.4232

10. The purpose of laws is to prescribe the standard of behaviour of the people and to regulate their conduct in a civilized society. Faithful implementation of the laws is of the essence under the rule of law for good governance. In the absence of faithful implementation of the laws by efficient machinery, the laws remain mere rhetoric and a dead letter.

11. Dr. Rajendra Prasad, while moving the motion for adoption of the Constitution in the Constituent Assembly, had said:

> "...Whatever the Constitution may or may not provide, the welfare of the country will depend upon the way in which the country is administered. That will depend upon the men who administer it. If the people who are elected, are capable and men of character and integrity, they would be able to make the best even of a defective Constitution. If they are lacking in these, the Constitution cannot help the country. After all, a Constitution like a machine is a lifeless thing. It acquires life because of the men who control it and operate it, and India needs today nothing more than a set of honest men who will have the interest of the country before them...
> It requires men of strong character, men of vision, men who will not sacrifice the interests of the country, at large for the sake of smaller groups and areas and who will rise over the prejudices which are born of these differences. We can only hope that the country will throw up such men in abundance..."[8]

Is the fervent hope belied? If so, the faith has to be restored.

12. Amartya Sen in 'The Idea of Justice' echoed the same sentiment, in the following words:

> "...There is no automatic guarantee of success by the mere existence of democratic institutions...The success of democracy is not merely a matter of having the most perfect institutional structure that we can think of. It depends inescapably on our actual behaviour patterns and the working of political and social interactions. There is no chance of resting the matter in the 'safe' hands of purely institutional virtuosity. The working of democratic institutions, like all other institutions, depends on the activities of human agents in utilizing opportunities for reasonable realization..."[9]

13. In short, 'institutional virtuosity' by itself is not enough without 'individual virtuosity'.
14. The most perfect laws also would remain ineffective without the efficiency and 'individual virtuosity' of the human agency for implementing the laws, namely, the law enforcement agencies. The mechanism has to be supported by the complementary role of civil society as envisaged in the fundamental duties of the citizens under Article 51A of the Constitution .
15. The fundamental duties of every citizen specified in Article 51A of the Constitution include the duties 'to renounce practices derogatory to the dignity of women' in clause (e), and the foremost duty 'to abide by the Constitution and respect its ideals' in clause (a). These fundamental duties are merely a reiteration of the values of the Indian ethos, which needed a reminder in the waning moral structure of the society, more prevalent in the institutions of governance. Aristotle, in his ancient and seminal work 'Politics', emphasized the significance of 'education of citizens in the spirit of the Constitution', thus:4233

> "The greatest of all means...for ensuring the stability of Constitutions--but which is nowadays generally neglected--is the education of citizens in the spirit of the Constitution..."[10]

The significance of this observation has to be sustained.

16. Thus, if these are guaranteed freedoms under the Constitution, how do they become real freedoms and how do they enable women to possess requisite capabilities which would lead to the fulfilment of their potential as individual citizens under India's liberal and democratic framework? In this respect, the Committee finds great support in the 'capability approach' postulated by Dr. Amartya Sen, who points out:

> "The idea of 'capability' (i.e. the opportunity to achieve valuable combinations of human functionings -- what a person is able to do or be) can be very helpful in understanding the opportunity aspect of freedom and human rights. Indeed, even though the concept of opportunity is often invoked, it does require considerable elaboration, and capability can help in this elucidation. For example, seeing opportunity in terms of capability allows us to distinguish appropriately between (i) whether a person is actually able to do things she would value doing, and (ii) whether she possesses the means or instruments or permissions to pursue what she would like to do (her actual ability to do that pursuing may depend on many contingent circumstances)."[11] (Emphasis supplied)

17. While the Committee is of the view that there is merit in the capability approach propounded by Prof. Amartya Sen, it must also be borne in mind that the ability to dictate needs and desires (including the capacity and ability for consumption as well as income generation) are not irrelevant factors. The Committee is unable to disregard the subjugation of women, which has been occasioned in India on account of the lack of financial independence and security. Hence, while acknowledging that the capability approach does address a series of other issues in relation to women, it is necessary, as a part of the overall change of consciousness, that women must be made equally capable and productive for the purpose of becoming self-sufficient financially, which would be one of the intrinsic safeguards for 'feeling' and 'perceiving' equality. Naturally, this cannot detract from the reality that political power, domestic violence, education and social status are indeed vital concerns.

18. The Committee is of the view that capabilities are indeed crucial to the people's potential functioning, as observed by Prof. Sen. But how do we arrive at that stage in respect of women, when it is evident that women have been kept away from reaching that stage for no fault of their own? This brings us to the vexed question that unless and until the State pursues a policy of avowed determination to be able to correct a historical imbalance in consciousness against women, it will not be possible for men and indeed women themselves, to view women differently and through the prism of equality. It is not enough that women occupy a few symbolic political positions to evidence true empowerment of women in this country. In the view of this Committee, the ethos of empowerment of women does not limit itself to political equality, but also extends, in equal terms, to social, educational, and economic equality.4234

19. If true empowerment of women were to mean anything, it is necessary that law, as well as public policy, must be capable of engaging substantially with women's rights, opportunities, acquisition of skills, the ability to generate self-confidence and insist on total equality in relationships, both with society and the State. It is the inability of women to claim equality in society which has led to a slant against women as a consequence of which there has been a latent bias against women in the prosecution of crimes including its prevention. One wonders if the following words penned by Mahbub-ul-Haq hold true for Indian women:

> "As we approach the 21st century, we hear the quiet steps of a rising revolution for gender equality. The basic parameters of such a revolution have already changed. Women have greatly expanded their capabilities over the last few decades through a liberal investment in their education. At the same time, women are acquiring much greater control over their lives through dramatic improvements in reproductive health. They stand ready and prepared to assume greater economic and political responsibilities. And technological advances and democratic processes are on their side in this struggle. Progress in technology is already overcoming the handicaps women suffer in holding jobs in the market, since jobs in the future industrial societies will be based not on muscular strength but on skills and discipline. And the democratic transition that is sweeping the globe will make sure that women exercise more political power as they begin to realize the real value of the majority votes that they control. It is quite clear that the 21st century will be a century of much greater gender equality than the world has ever seen before."[12]

20. We also revisit the report submitted by one of us in Sheela Barse (infra), which pithily states:

> "Thus the meaning of law and the empowerment which law gives and the clothing of man with such Constitutional rights is only to make sure that whether it be State or whether it be man, and after all the State contains men, that with Pausanius, King of Sparta, a man feels confidently that "laws should have an authority over men, not men over laws" in order to see that a human right is also accompanied by an enforcement modus effectualis, it is necessary to give it in the first instance the prime importance which it deserves and which is merited to it in law, after all law itself recognises the high dimensions and dyophysite existence of rights, the one absolute impregnable and the other subject to social regulation by valid statute law."

21. It is an admitted fact that women in India have suffered in various aspects of life and physical health, mental well-being, bodily integrity and safety, social relations, political empowerment, education and knowledge, domestic work and non-market care, paid work and other projects, shelter and environment, mobility, leisure activities, time autonomy, respect, religion, and if we may add, self-esteem / self-autonomy. We are of the opinion that Indian women have substantially suffered on most of these counts as a consequence of which the de facto equality guaranteed by the Constitution has not become a reality for them.

22. The achievement of empowerment and equality of women has to be necessarily a conjoint effort of the individual and the State. Cases of individual women performing well are not indicative of the empowerment of women as a collective responsibility under the Constitution. The nation also suffers from, on the other hand, dismal sex ratios in several states such as Punjab and Haryana. The nation suffers from the existence of chauvinistic institutions like khap panchayats, which, unfortunately, are politically so powerful that they overrule, with impunity, the4235 constitutionally mandated administration of equality in favour of women, by using extra constitutional, oppressive methods of punishment.

23. It is shocking to note that even after the recent horrific incident of gang rape, many political leaders, including members of Parliament/State legislatures, spiritual gurus with large followings and other eminent persons have been making statements reinforcing the gender bias. Some have even blamed the victim for having facilitated the rape by her own behaviour. Some of the worst examples are:

    (i) Shri Anisur Rahman (Communist Party of India (Marxist) - West Bengal): "We have told the chief minister in the assembly that the government will pay money to compensate rape victims. What is your fee? If you are raped, what will be your fee?"

    (ii) Shri Asaram Bapu: "Only 5-6 people are not the culprits. The victim is as guilty as her rapists... She should have called the culprits brothers and begged before them to stop... This could have saved her dignity and life. Can one hand clap? I don't think so,"

    (iii) Shri Om Prakash Chautala (INLD - Haryana): "We should learn from the past... specially in Mughal era, people used to marry their girls to save them from Mughal atrocities and currently a similar situation is arising in the state. I think that's the reason khap has taken such a decision and I support it."

    (iv) Shri Sri Prakash Jaiswal (Congress): "New victory and a new marriage have their own significance. The memory of your victory fades with time, the same way one's wife becomes old and loses her charm"

    Many of them have reflected this gender bias contrary to the constitutional mandate after swearing 'to bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution of India', in addition to their fundamental duty 'to abide by the Constitution and respect its ideals'. These deep rooted prejudices have to be eliminated for the efficacy of any laws on the subject. The time has come to enact laws providing for the subsequent disqualification of elected representatives on this ground alone.

24. This begs the question - does the Indian State live at two levels? One which comprises those who are affluent and who have access to the Constitution and its machinery, and the other comprising those who live in the silent domination of the superior will of tradition, customs and practices which are derogatory to women?

25. In our view, unless and until each one of these pernicious models is deconstructed by the collective will of not only Parliament, but also of the people of India, gory incidents, such as those which have been reported in recent times (and which continue to be reported) from across the country, will continue to shake the faith of the people. Each violent incident against an Indian woman is causing greater provocation. It is causing greater provocation not simply because it is a shameful incident, but also because it appears that there is a vast disconnect between equality and respect and the obligations of those who administer the law.

26. These indeed compel us to admit to only one answer that whatever be the political orientation, the Indian State has failed to look at this issue in a substantive manner. While we acknowledge and greatly applaud the concerns of feminists and various persons who have spoken in support of women, we still feel distressed to say that all organs of the State have, in varying degrees, failed to fulfil the promise of equality in favour of women. We also notice that the high instances of female4236 foeticide and infanticide, poor maternity and child care, women's diseases turning chronic, women being subjected to malnutrition, are outrageous stains on a free India. They disclose the inbuilt subconscious bias of those who rule against women. The Committee would like to remind the State that gender equality and safeguarding of human rights is a Millennium Development Goal (to be achieved by the year 2015) under the United Nations Millennium Declaration.

27. If these problems exist - and there have been consistent studies by sociologists which establish this fact - the mere setting up of Ministries for the social empowerment of women is highly inadequate. The immediate requirement is, therefore, that there should be minimal guaranteed rations in respect of women, compulsory access to education for women, free education in respect of women up to the undergraduate level, preferential opportunities to single women, rehabilitation of destitute women, prevention of trafficking in women and a host of measures which would show that the Indian society is serious in reinforcing gender equality.

28. A fortiori the need for good governance is of a credible and efficient mechanism for law enforcement and justice delivery coupled with performance of the fundamental duties by every citizen.

29. Implicit in the terms of reference, this forms an integral part of the Report.

30. In our tradition bound society, structured on the basis of conservative values, when a woman is subjected to sexual assault in any form, it translates into a multiple crime. She is raped at home (literally and figuratively) and in public, followed by demeaning medical examination, examination and cross-examination by the police and in court, in salacious media reports, and in the insensitive response of society, including family and acquaintances. In sum, the victim suffers intermittent rape in full public glare.

31. Another humiliating aspect of the crime against women is that her status in the patriarchal structure of society also impedes her access to justice. The inequities of social status, caste prejudices, and economic deprivation further compound the gender injustice.

32. Despite the well-known Bhanwari Devi case, which led to the Vishakha judgment, full justice continues to elude the victim of sexual harassment and sexual assault even after two decades. The most appalling feature of the case is that the trial court acquitted the accused observing that the rapists were middle-aged and respectable persons of a higher caste who could not have raped a lower caste woman. The mindset of the judiciary also needs to be improved by their education in gender sensitivity. The women's tragedy is to face the compounding of gender and social injustice contrary to the constitutional promise to 'secure a social order in which justice, social, economic and political, shall inform all the institutions of national life', and the State's obligation 'to eliminate inequalities in status, facilities and opportunities, not only amongst individuals but also amongst groups of people'.[13]

33. Education to correct gender bias and to cure the mindset of the prejudices influencing the law enforcement agencies has also to be a part of this exercise. A holistic view of the entire issue has to be taken by addressing the root causes and not merely the symptoms of the malady. Education has to begin at birth in the home, in formal education, personal behaviour, social interaction, and it has to continue4237 life-long. The process may take time for its completion, but it must commence forthwith. The Report has, therefore, to deal with this aspect as well.

34. Women must enjoy freedom and should not be intended to act as carriers of 'perceived honour' any differently from male children. Thus, the excessive control over women, which has been exercised over the last few decades and its acceptance in India in recent years, is simply outrageous. We are also of the opinion that the rape of Nirbhaya and the sacrifice of her life only reinforces that India requires de facto equality, freedom from superstition, renunciation of arcane, misogynist traditions and practices which are at variance with the Constitution, which seek to debilitate and handicap women.

35. On the contrary, it is necessary that the State must practice equality in matters of all such opportunities which it affords in public employment, the employment of women which would include even employment in other positions where women could completely show their ability to perform.

36. It is indeed tragic that the brutal gang rape of a young, defenseless woman on December 16, 2012 by a group of perverted men in the heart of the nation's capital was needed to bestir the government into action realizing the gravity of the situation, which could no longer countenance delay in taking necessary steps to provide adequate measures for the safety and protection of the womenfolk in the country. The setting up of this Committee is a step in that direction, and we hope, at the very outset, that the three arms of governance, viz, the executive, the judiciary and the legislature, will take the recommendations made herein to their logical conclusion.

37. We must note, with some satisfaction, that during the formulation of this Report, the Executive has taken steps to implement measures to ensure the safety of women in public transport.[14] The judiciary has also come down heavily in several instances, and, as reported in the media, the Supreme Court has, on January 11, 2013, taken cognizance of a PIL filed seeking directions in respect of women's safety in Delhi.[15] We hope that the impetus generated by the December 16 incident and the ensuing protests will continue in the future.

38. The involvement of civil society led by the youth in the spontaneous country-wide peaceful protest, demanding prompt measures by the government to protect the dignity of women has lent greater urgency to the long felt need. To quote Pratap Bhanu Mehta:

> "The disenchantment with the state often expresses itself in the thought that those who wield state power are not accountable."[16]

39. To achieve this reality, stages of change do not have to be, in the Darwinian sense, mere steps in evolution but can be fast forwarded by fundamental changes of attitude. We are glad to note that the voices of protest raised post the December 16, 2012 incident have symbolised the potential of the youth of the nation, and, perhaps, their need to disregard past perceptions in relation to women. In the view of the Committee, the protests are clearly a call to modern India to renounce old ways of looking, thinking and acting towards women and are a strong, positive move towards true empowerment.4238

40. Demand of accountability by the civil society of those responsible to provide good governance to curb the menace of sexual harassment escalating to assault on women in any form is the discharge of people's participatory role in republican governance. This is a positive fallout of the unfortunate incident. Sexual assault degenerates to its gravest form of rape beginning with uncontrolled sexual harassment in milder forms, which remain uncontrolled. It has, therefore, to be curbed at the initial stage.

41. The Report, therefore, deals with sexual crimes at all levels; and with the measures needed for prevention as well as punishment of all acts with sexual overtone that are an affront to human dignity. To go a step further, this Report also deals with the construct of gender justice in India and the various obstructions thereto, which prevent this nation of more than a billion persons from achieving the objectives stated in the Preamble to the Constitution.

42. The expressions 'aggravated sexual assault', 'Criminal Law', and 'speedier justice' used in the terms of reference contained in the Notification dated December 23, 2012 constituting the Committee, have to be interpreted expansively to serve the object of this exercise.

43. The expression 'aggravated sexual assault' must include all stages of affront to human dignity which is the quintessence of human rights, beginning with any act with a sexual overtone. The expression 'Criminal Law' must include all gender related laws: criminal, civil or electoral. The expression 'speedier justice' must include all institutions of the justice delivery system, which are meant to provide speedy justice to enforce the right to life with dignity guaranteed in Article 21 of the Constitution of India .

44. In short, a holistic view is to be taken of the unrealized and seriously threatened constitutional promise of the universally recognized human right of gender justice.

45. This is the scope of the Committee's Report.

Chapter Three

Rape and Sexual Assault

1. The statutory definition of the offence of "rape" is found under section 375 . It reads thus:

> "375. Rape.-- A man is said to commit "rape" who, except in the case hereinafter excepted, has sexual intercourse with a woman under circumstances falling under any of the six following descriptions:--
> First.--Against her will.
> Secondly.--Without her consent.
> Thirdly.--With her consent, when her consent has been obtained by putting her or any person in whom she is interested in fear of death or of hurt.
> Fourthly.--With her consent, when the man knows that he is not her husband, and that her consent is given because she believes that he is another man to whom she is or believes herself to be lawfully married.4239
> Fifthly.--With her consent, when, at the time of giving such consent, by reason of unsoundness of mind or intoxication or the administration by him personally or through another of any stupefying or unwholesome substance, she is unable to understand the nature and consequences of that to which she gives consent.
> Sixthly.--With or without her consent, when she is under sixteen years of age.

> Explanation.--Penetration is sufficient to constitute the sexual intercourse necessary to the offence of rape.
> Exception.--Sexual intercourse by a man with his own wife, the wife not being under fifteen years of age, is not rape."

2. Simply put, the offence of rape is "ravishment of a woman" without her consent or against her will by force, fear or fraud and also includes the "carnal knowledge" of a woman.[17]
3. "Carnal Knowledge" means penetration to any slightest degree. This ingredient of rape has been statutory incorporated under the Explanation to Section 375 .

Ingredients of the offence

Consent

4. In order to bring home the charge of rape against a man, it is necessary to establish that the "sexual intercourse" complained of was either against the will or without her consent. Where the consent is obtained under the circumstances enumerated under clauses firstly to sixthly, the same would also amount to rape.
5. In Dileep Singh v State of Bihar [18] the Supreme Court observed that "though will and consent often interlace and an act done against the will of the person can be said to be an act done without consent, the Indian Penal Code categorizes these two expressions under separate heads in order to as comprehensive as possible."
6. The difference between the two expressions was brought out by the Supreme Court in State of UP v Chottey Lal [19] in the following words:

> "15. Be that as it may, in our view, clause Sixthly of Section 375IPC is not attracted since the prosecutrix has been found to be above 16 years (although below 18 years). In the facts of the case what is crucial to be considered is whether clause Firstly or clause Secondly of Section 375IPC is attracted. The expressions "against her will" and "without her consent" may overlap sometimes but surely the two expressions in clause Firstly and clause Secondly have different connotation and dimension. The expression "against her will" would ordinarily mean that the intercourse was done by a man with a woman despite her resistance and opposition. On the other hand, the expression "without her consent" would comprehend an act of reason accompanied by deliberation. (Emphasis supplied)"

7. It must be noted that the Courts have followed the tests laid down under Section 90 of the IPC for establishing "consent". Section 90 reads thus:

> "90. Consent known to be given under fear or misconception.-- A consent is not such a consent as is intended by any section of this Code, if the consent is given by a person under fear of injury, or under a misconception of fact, and if the person doing the4240 act knows, or has reason to believe, that the consent was given in consequence of such fear or misconception; or > [Consent of insane person] if the consent is given by a person who, from unsoundness of mind, or intoxication, is unable to understand the nature and consequence of that to which he gives his consent; or

> [Consent of child] unless the contrary appears from the context, if the consent is given by a person who is under twelve years of age."

8. In this context the decision of Supreme Court in State of H.P. v Mango Ram [20] is noteworthy. The Court observed as follows:

> "13.....The evidence as a whole indicates that there was resistance by the prosecutrix and there was no voluntary participation by her for the sexual act. Submission of the body under the fear of terror cannot be construed as a consented sexual act. Consent for the purpose of Section 375 requires voluntary participation not only after the exercise of intelligence based on the knowledge of the significance and moral quality of the act but after having fully exercised the choice between resistance and assent. Whether there was consent or not, is to be ascertained only on a careful study of all relevant circumstances. From the evidence on record, it cannot be said that the prosecutrix had given consent and thereafter she turned round and acted against the interest of the accused. There is clear credible evidence that she resisted the onslaught and made all possible efforts to prevent the accused from committing rape on her. Therefore, the finding entered by the learned Sessions Judge that there was consent on the part of the prosecutrix is without any basis."

9. The United Nations Handbook points out that the definitions of rape and sexual assault have evolved over time, from requiring use of force or violence, to requiring a lack of positive consent.
10. The United Nations recommends that the definition of rape should require the existence of 'unequivocal and voluntary agreement' as well as proof by the accused of steps taken to ascertain whether the complainant was consenting.[21] This has the advantage of shifting the burden to the defence to prove that such steps were taken. This approach was endorsed by the CEDAW committee in its views in Vertido v The Philippines,[22] which made it clear that such a definition would assist in minimizing secondary victimization of the complainant/survivor in proceedings.
11. Similarly, under Canadian law, the accused cannot argue that there was belief in consent if the accused did not take reasonable steps to ascertain that there was consent to the specific sexual activity. It is not enough that the accused subjectively believed there was consent. He must also demonstrate that he took reasonable steps to ascertain it.[23]
12. Under the law of England and Wales, a person consents if he or she 'agrees by choice and has the freedom and capacity to make that choice.'[24] There are certain statutory presumptions regarding consent. For example, lack of consent is assumed if violence was used or threatened or the accused had induced a fear of violence; the complainant was unlawfully detained, asleep or unconscious; or the accused had administered a substance capable of causing the complainant to be stupefied or overpowered. Lack of consent is conclusively proved if the defendant intentionally4241 deceived the complainant as to the nature or purpose of the relevant act, or induced consent by impersonating a person known to the complainant.[25]The underlying principle is that consent to sexual activity 'requires a conscious, operating mind, capable of granting, revoking or withholding consent to each and every sexual act.'[26] There are some similar presumptions in the Indian statute. We have defined consent keeping the above in mind.

Penetration

13. The section further clarifies that mere penetration is sufficient to constitute the offence of rape.

14. In Koppula Venkatrao v. State of AP [27] the Supreme Court held as follows:

> "12. The sine qua non of the offence of rape is penetration, and not ejaculation. Ejaculation without penetration constitutes an attempt to commit rape and not actual rape. Definition of "rape" as contained in Section 375IPC refers to "sexual intercourse" and the Explanation appended to the section provides that penetration is sufficient to constitute the sexual intercourse necessary to the offence of rape. Intercourse means sexual connection."

15. Pursuant to the aforesaid observation the offence of 'attempt to commit rape' also need elaboration. Section 376 read with Section 511 of IPC penalizes the offence of 'attempt to rape'.

Attempt to commit rape

16. In Koppula Venkatrao (supra) the Supreme Court, with respect to the applicability of section 511 to the offence of rape, held the following:

> "8. The plea relating to applicability of Section 376 read with Section 511IPC needs careful consideration. In every crime, there is first, intention to commit, secondly, preparation to commit it, and thirdly, attempt to commit it. If the third stage, that is, attempt is successful, then the crime is complete. If the attempt fails, the crime is not complete, but law punishes the person attempting the act. Section 511 is a general provision dealing with attempts to commit offences not made punishable by other specific sections. It makes punishable all attempts to commit offences punishable with imprisonment and not only those punishable with death. An attempt is made punishable, because every attempt, although it falls short of success, must create alarm, which by itself is an injury, and the moral guilt of the offender is the same as if he had succeeded. Moral guilt must be united to injury in order to justify punishment. As the injury is not as great as if the act had been committed, only half the punishment is awarded.
> 9. A culprit first intends to commit the offence, then makes preparation for committing it and thereafter attempts to commit the offence. If the attempt succeeds, he has committed the offence; if it fails due to reasons beyond his control, he is said to have attempted to commit the offence. Attempt to commit an offence can be said to begin when the preparations are complete and the culprit commences to do something with the intention of committing the offence and which is a step towards the commission of the offence. The moment he commences to do an act with the necessary intention, he commences his attempt to commit the offence. The word "attempt" is not itself defined, and must, therefore, be taken in its ordinary meaning. This is exactly what the provisions of Section 511 require. An attempt to commit a crime is to be distinguished from an intention to commit it; and from preparation made for its commission. Mere4242 intention to commit an offence, not followed by any act, cannot constitute an offence. The will is not to be taken for the deed unless there be some external act which shows that progress has been made in the direction of it, or towards maturing and effecting it. Intention is the direction of conduct towards the object chosen upon considering the motives which suggest the choice. Preparation consists in devising or arranging the means or measures necessary for the commission of the offence. It differs widely from attempt which is the direct movement towards the commission after preparations are made. Preparation to commit an offence is punishable only when the preparation is to commit offences under Section 122 (waging war against the Government of India) and Section 399 (preparation to commit dacoity). The dividing line between a mere preparation and an attempt is sometimes thin and has to be decided on the facts of each case. There is a greater degree of determination in attempt as compared with preparation.

10. An attempt to commit an offence is an act, or a series of acts, which leads inevitably to the commission of the offence, unless something, which the doer of the act neither foresaw nor intended, happens to prevent this. An attempt may be described to be an act done in part-execution of a criminal design, amounting to more than mere preparation, but falling short of actual consummation, and, possessing, except for failure to consummate, all the elements of the substantive crime. In other words, an attempt consists in it the intent to commit a crime, falling short of, its actual commission or consummation/completion. It may consequently be defined as that which if not prevented would have resulted in the full consummation of the act attempted. The illustrations given in Section 511 clearly show the legislative intention to make a difference between the cases of a mere preparation and an attempt.

11. In order to find an accused guilty of an attempt with intent to commit a rape, court has to be satisfied that the accused, when he laid hold of the prosecutrix, not only desired to gratify his passions upon her person, but that he intended to do so at all events, and notwithstanding any resistance on her part. Indecent assaults are often magnified into attempts at rape. In order to come to a conclusion that the conduct of the accused was indicative of a determination to gratify his passion at all events, and in spite of all resistance, materials must exist. Surrounding circumstances many times throw beacon light on that aspect."

Evidence and proof

17. It is well settled that the evidence of the victim of rape is on the same footing as the evidence of an injured complainant or witness. Her testimony alone is sufficient for conviction. In prosecutions of rape, the law does not require corroboration. It is only by way of abundant caution that the court may look for some corroboration so as to satisfy its conscience and rule out any false accusation.
18. However, the above principle of presumption while prosecuting rape cases emerged in the aforesaid background.
19. In Tukaram v State of Maharashtra [28] the Supreme Court had disbelieved the statement of the victim of rape, on the ground that the circumstantial evidence did not lead to the inference of guilt and "in fact derogates in no uncertain measure from the inference drawn by it."[29]
20. The facts were these - Mathura was a young girl labourer of 14-16. Her bother and she were brought to their local police station to record their statements in respect4243 of a complaint lodged by her brother. While at the police station, Mathura was raped by Head Constable Tukaram and Constable Ganpat, a fact which she reported to a crowd that had gathered outside the police station. Mathura was then examined by a doctor, who advised her to file a police complaint, which complaint was registered by the police after some hesitation and protests from the crowd.
21. Mathura's medical examination revealed no injuries and evidence of prior intercourse. Presence of semen was detected on her clothes and the pyjama of Ganpat. The Trial Court, however, refused to convict the accused. The High Court reversed the finding and sentenced Tukaram to rigorous imprisonment for one year and Ganpat for five years. The High Court held that both these 'gentlemen' were perfect strangers to Mathura and that it was unlikely that 'she would make any overtures and invite the accused to satisfy her sexual desires' The High Court came to the conclusion that Mathura did not consent to intercourse. The Supreme Court reversed the High Court verdict and held that as there were no injuries shown by the medical report, the story of 'stiff resistance having been put up by the girl is all false' and the alleged intercourse was a peaceful affair. The Court further held that crimes and alarms were a concoction on her part. The Court further held that under Section 375 only the "fear of death or hurt" could vitiate consent for sexual intercourse.

22. Following this verdict a nation-wide protest was launched for inclusion of custodial rape within the legislative provision. The Supreme Court's judgment was criticised by four eminent law teachers - Upendra Baxi, Vasudha Dhagamdar, Raghunath Kelkar, and Lotika Sarkar - who posed the following questions in an open letter to the Supreme Court--

(a) Was this not a decision which violated human rights of women under the law and the Constitution?
(b) The judgment provided no cogent analysis as to why the factors which weighed with the High Court were insufficient to justify conviction for rape?
(c) The fact remains that Mathura was asked to remain in the police station even after her statement was recorded and her friends and relations were asked to leave. Why?
(d) Why were the lights put off and the doors shut?

23. The decision of Tukaram v State of Maharashtra ,[30] is a relevant case to show how public opinion and various organisations have espoused the rights of women.

24. Accordingly the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1983 was passed which included situation of "aggravated rape" under section 376A to E. Further, the India Evidence Act, 1872 was also amended by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1983 and section 114A was incorporated which imposed the burden of proving "consent" upon the accused in the aforesaid cases of aggravated rape. This was an exception of the general rule of presumption of innocence of the accused.

25. However, even before the above amendments came in to force in the case of Bharvada Gohinbhai Hirjibhai v State of Gujarat ,[31] the Supreme Court reversed the trend and came to a conclusion that it was open to the Court to rely upon the evidence of a complainant even without seeking corroboration if corroboration by4244 medical evidence is available. We also notice that the said judgment seems to have stereotyped Indian and Western women in a somewhat unorthodox way:

> "9. In the Indian setting, refusal to act on the testimony of a victim of sexual assault in the absence of corroboration as a rule, is adding insult to injury. Why should the evidence of the girl or the woman who complains of rape or sexual molestation be viewed with the aid of spectacles fitted with lenses tinged with doubt, disbelief or suspicion? To do so is to justify the charge of male chauvinism in a male dominated society. We must analyze the argument in support of the need for corroboration and subject it to relentless and remorseless cross-examination. And we must do so with a logical, and not an opiniated, eye in the light of probabilities with our feet firmly planted on the soil of India and with our eyes focussed on the Indian horizon. We must not be swept off the feet by the approach made in the Western World which has its own social milieu, its own social mores, its own permissive values, and its own code of life. Corroboration may be considered essential to establish a sexual offence in the backdrop of the social ecology of the Western World. It is wholly unnecessary to import the said concept on a turn-key basis and to transplate it on the Indian soil regardless of the altogether different atmosphere, attitudes, mores, responses of the Indian Society, and its profile. The identities of the two worlds are different. The solution of problems cannot therefore be identical. It is conceivable in the Western Society that a female may level false accusation as regards sexual molestation against a male for several reasons such as:
> (1) The female may be a 'gold digger' and may well have an economic motive to extract money by holding out the gun of prosecution or public exposure.

(2) She may be suffering from psychological neurosis and may seek an escape from the neurotic prison by phantasizing or imagining a situation where she is desired, wanted, and chased by males.

(3) She may want to wreak vengeance on the male for real or imaginary wrongs. She may have a grudge against a particular male, or males in general, and may have the design to square the account.

(4) She may have been induced to do so in consideration of economic rewards, by a person interested in placing the accused in a compromising or embarrassing position, on account of personal or political vendetta.

(5) She may do so to gain notoriety or publicity or to appease her own ego or to satisfy her feeling of self-importance in the context of her inferiority complex.

(6) She may do so on account of jealousy.

(7) She may do so to win sympathy of others.

(8) She may do so upon being repulsed.

10. By and large these factors are not relevant to India, and the Indian conditions. Without the fear of making too wide a statement, or of overstating the case, it can be said that rarely will a girl or a woman in India make false allegations of sexual assualt on account of any such factor as has been just enlisted. The statement is generally true in the context of the urban as also rural Society. It is also by and large true in the context of the sophisticated, not so sophisticated, and unsophisticated society. Only very rarely can one conceivably come across an exception or two and that too possibly from amongst the urban elites. Because :(1) A girl or a woman in the tradition bound non-permissive Society of India would be extremely reluctant even to admit that any incident which is likely to reflect on her chastity had ever occurred. (2) She would be conscious of the danger of being ostracised by the Society or being looked down by the Society including by her own family members, relatives, friends and neighbours. (3) She would have to brave the whole world. (4) She would face the risk of losing the love and respect of her own husband and near relatives, and of her matrimonial home and happiness being shattered. (5) If she is unmarried, she would apprehend that it would be4245 difficult to secure an alliance. With a suitable match from a respectable or an acceptable family. (6) It would almost inevitably and almost invariably result in mental torture and suffering to herself. (7) The fear of being taunted by others will always haunt her. (8) She would feel extremely embarrassed in relating the incident to others being over powered by a feeling of shame on account of the upbringing in a tradition bound society where by and large sex is taboo. (9) The natural inclination would be to avoid giving publicity to the incident lest the family name and family honour is brought into controversy. (10) The parents of an unmarried girl as also the husband and members of the husband's family of a married woman would also more often than not, want to avoid publicity on account of the fear of social stigma on the family name and family honour. (11) The fear of the victim herself being considered to be promiscuous or in some way responsible for the incident regardless of her innocence. (12 The reluctance to face interrogation by the investigating agency, to face the court, to face the cross examination by Counsel for the culprit, and the risk of being disbelieved, acts as a deterrent".

26. As a listing of these characteristics, we regret that there is a profiling of an Indian girl which has taken place which is an overgeneralisation and it would neither be accurate nor scientific to test the testimony of an Indian women with reference to the criteria which are mentioned in paragraph 10 above. But what is important is that the judgment, in a certain sense, discloses how a woman is viewed in India.

27. We feel that it is the duty of the State as well as civil society to deconstruct the paradigm of shame-honour in connection with a rape victim. Rape is a form of sexual assault just like any other crime against the human body under the IPC . While we agree that it has its distinguishing characteristics, we do not think that there is any basis for society or the State and much less the police/doctors to treat a rape victim as a victim of any other crime. In other words, we are of the opinion that while the said paragraph quoted illustrates the misplaced juxtaposition of shame and honour with the crime of rape, the juxtaposition is clearly a matter of reality and at the same time we think that it is necessary for this to be deconstructed. It also shows that women have been looped into a vicious cycle of shame and honour as a consequence of which they have been attended with an inherent disability to report crimes of sexual offences against them.

28. In other words, a woman seems to be risking her reputation and honour by reporting a crime of sexual assault against herself. This view must change and while the above passage shows the fundamental misconceptions which are inbuilt in society dealing with women, we are more concerned with the observations in so far as they describe the position of women in Indian society, not in as much as women in the context of rape. In fact, we believe that equality before law, which is guaranteed under the Constitution, invariably means the eschewing of irrelevant considerations and we do believe that many of these considerations must be viewed as irrelevant in a changing society. However, we do notice that the above characteristics are completely inconsistent with fundamental rights which are guaranteed to a woman under the Constitution. We further believe that these cannot be the basis for the purpose of defining the rights of women under the law.

29. At this stage, we notice in Rafique v State of UP ,[32] where Krishna Iyer, J. made the following observations:--

> "There are several "sacred cows" of the criminal law in Indo-Anglian jurisprudence which are superstitious survivals and need to be re-examined. When rapists are4246 revelling in their promiscuous pursuits and half of humankind-womankind-is protesting against its hapless lot, when no woman of honour will accuse another of rape since she sacrifices thereby what is dearest to her, we cannot cling to a fossil formula and insist on corroborative testimony, even if taken as a whole, the case spoken to by the victim strikes a judicial mind as probable. In this case, the testimony has commanded acceptance from two courts. When a woman is ravished what is inflicted is not merely physical injury, but "the deep sense of some deathless shame".
> A rape! a rape!...
> Yes, you have ravish'd justice;
> Forced her to do your pleasure."
> "Hardly a sensitized judge who sees the conspectus of circumstances in its totality and rejects the testimony of a rape victim unless there are very strong circumstances militating against is veracity. None we see in his case, and confirmation of the conviction by the courts below must, therefore, be a matter of course. Judicial response to human rights cannot be blunted by legal bigotry."

30. The effect of the Criminal Law Amendment of 1983 was examined by the Supreme Court[33] and it was observed as follows:

> "15. In spite of the decision of this Court that (depending upon the circumstances of the case) corroboration of the prosecutrix was not necessary, the cases continued to end in acquittal on account of mishandling of the crime by the police and the invocation of the theory of 'consent' by the courts who tried the offence. To overcome this difficulty, the legislature intervened and introduced Section 114-A in the Evidence Act by Act No. 43 of 1983 reading as under:

"114-A. Presumption as to absence of consent in certain prosecutions for rape.-- In a prosecution for rape under clause (a) or clause (b) or clause (c) or clause (d) or clause (e) or clause (g) of sub-section (2) of Section 376 of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860), where sexual intercourse by the accused is proved and the question is whether it was without the consent of the woman alleged to have been raped and she states in her evidence before the Court that she did not consent, the Court shall presume that she did not consent."

16. This section enables a court to raise a presumption that the woman who was the victim of rape had not consented and that the offence was committed against her will. The situation, however, has hardly improved. Conviction rates for rape are still lower than any other major crime and the women continue to argue even today that in rape cases the victimised women, rather than the rapists, were put on trial. A large number of women still fail to report rapes to the police because they fear embarrassing and insensitive treatment by the doctors, the law enforcement personnel and/or the cross-examining defence attorneys. The fear has to be allayed from the minds of women so that if and when this crime is committed, the victim may promptly report the matter to the police and on a charge-sheet being submitted, the trial may proceed speedily without causing any embarrassment to the prosecutrix who may come in the witness-box without fear psychosis."

31. Further in State of Maharashtra v Chandraprakash Kewalchand Jain , the Court observed:[34]

"15. It is necessary at the outset to state what the approach of the court should be while evaluating the prosecution evidence, particularly the evidence of the prosecutrix, in sex offences. Is it essential that the evidence of the prosecutrix should be corroborated in material particulars before the court bases a conviction on her testimony? Does the rule4247 of prudence demand that in all cases save the rarest of rare the court should look for corroboration before acting on the evidence of the prosecutrix? Let us see if the Evidence Act provides the clue. Under the said statute 'Evidence' means and includes all statements which the court permits or requires to be made before it by witnesses, in relation to the matters of fact under inquiry. Under Section 59 all facts, except the contents of documents, may be proved by oral evidence. Section 118 then tells us who may give oral evidence. According to that section all persons are competent to testify unless the court considers that they are prevented from understanding the questions put to them, or from giving rational answers to those questions, by tender years, extreme old age, disease, whether of body or mind, or any other cause of the same kind. Even in the case of an accomplice Section 133 provides that he shall be a competent witness against an accused person; and a conviction is not illegal merely because it proceeds upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. However, illustration (b) to Section 114, which lays down a rule of practice, says that the court 'may' presume that an accomplice is unworthy of credit, unless he is corroborated in material particulars. Thus under Section 133, which lays down a rule of law, an accomplice is a competent witness and a conviction based solely on his uncorroborated evidence is not illegal although in view of Section 114, illustration (b), courts do not as a matter of practice do so and look for corroboration in material particulars. This is the conjoint effect of Sections 133 and 114, illustration (b).

16. A prosecutrix of a sex offence cannot be put on par with an accomplice. She is in fact a victim of the crime. The Evidence Act nowhere says that her evidence cannot be accepted unless it is corroborated in material particulars. She is undoubtedly a competent witness under Section 118 and her evidence must receive the same weight as is attached to an injured in cases of physical violence. The same degree of care and caution must attach in the evaluation of her evidence as in the case of an injured complainant or witness and no more. What is necessary is that the court must be alive to and conscious of the fact that it is dealing with the evidence of a person who is interested in the outcome of the charge levelled by her. If the court keeps this in mind and feels satisfied that it can act on the evidence of the prosecutrix, there is no rule of law or practice incorporated in the Evidence Act similar to illustration (b) to Section 114 which requires it to look for corroboration. If for some reason the court is hesitant to place implicit reliance on the testimony of the prosecutrix it may look for evidence which may lend assurance to her testimony short of corroboration required in the case of an accomplice. The nature of evidence required to lend assurance to the testimony of the prosecutrix must necessarily depend on the facts and circumstances of each case. But if a prosecutrix is an adult and of full understanding the court is entitled to base a conviction on her evidence unless the same is shown to be infirm and not trustworthy. If the totality of the circumstances appearing on the record of the case disclose that the prosecutrix does not have a strong motive to falsely involve the person charged, the court should ordinarily have no hesitation in accepting her evidence. We have, therefore, no doubt in our minds that ordinarily the evidence of a prosecutrix who does not lack understanding must be accepted. The degree of proof required must not be higher than is expected of an injured witness. For the above reasons we think that exception has rightly been taken to the approach of the High Court as is reflected in the following passage:

"It is only in the rarest of rare cases if the court finds that the testimony of the prosecutrix is so trustworthy, truthful and reliable that other corroboration may not be necessary."

With respect, the law is not correctly stated. If we may say so, it is just the reverse. Ordinarily the evidence of a prosecutrix must carry the same weight as is attached to an injured person who is a victim of violence, unless there are special circumstances which call for greater caution, in which case it would be safe to act on her testimony if there is independent evidence lending assurance to her accusation.4248

17. We think it proper, having regard to the increase in the number of sex violation cases in the recent past, particularly cases of molestation and rape in custody, to remove the notion, if it persists, that the testimony of a woman who is a victim of sexual violence must ordinarily be corroborated in material particulars except in the rarest of rare cases. To insist on corroboration except in the rarest of rare cases is to equate a woman who is a victim of the lust of another with an accomplice to a crime and thereby insult womanhood. It would be adding insult to injury to tell a woman that her story of woe will not be believed unless it is corroborated in material particulars as in the case of an accomplice to a crime. Ours is a conservative society where it concerns sexual behaviour. Ours is not a permissive society as in some of the western and European countries. Our standard of decency and morality in public life is not the same as in those countries. It is, however, unfortunate that respect for womanhood in our country is on the decline and cases of molestation and rape are steadily growing. An Indian woman is now required to suffer indignities in different forms, from lewd remarks to eve-teasing, from molestation to rape. Decency and morality in public life can be promoted and protected only if we deal strictly with those who violate the societal norms. The standard of proof to be expected by the court in such cases must take into account the fact that such crimes are generally committed on the sly and very rarely direct evidence of a person other than the prosecutrix is available. Courts must also realise that ordinarily a woman, more so a young girl, will not stake her reputation by levelling a false charge concerning her chastity.

18. But when such a crime is committed by a person in authority, e.g. a police officer, should the court's approach be the same as in any other case involving a private citizen? By our criminal laws wide powers are conferred on police officers investigating cognizable offences. The infrastructure of our criminal investigation system recognises and indeed protects the right of a woman to decent and dignified treatment at the hands of the investigating agency. This is evident from the proviso to sub-section (2) of Section 47 of the Code which obliges the police officer desiring to effect entry to give an opportunity to the woman in occupation to withdraw from the building. So also sub-section (2) of Section 53 requires that whenever a female accused is to be medically examined such examination must be under the supervision of a female medical practitioner. The proviso to Section 160 stipulates that whenever the presence of a woman is required as a witness the investigating officer will record her statement at her own residence. These are just a few provisions which reflect the concern of the legislature to prevent harassment and exploitation of women and preserve their dignity. Notwithstanding this concern, if a police officer misuses his authority and power while dealing with a young helpless girl aged about 19 or 20 years, her conduct and behaviour must be judged in the backdrop of the situation in which she was placed. The purpose and setting, the person and his position, the misuse or abuse of office and the despair of the victim which led to her surrender are all relevant factors which must be present in the mind of the court while evaluating the conduct evidence of the prosecutrix. A person in authority, such as a police officer, carries with him the awe of office which is bound to condition the behaviour of his victim. The court must not be oblivious of the emotional turmoil and the psychological injury that a prosecutrix suffers on being molested or raped. She suffers a tremendous sense of shame and the fear of being shunned by society and her near relatives, including her husband. Instead of treating her with compassion and understanding as one who is an injured victim of a crime, she is, more often then not, treated as a sinner and shunned. It must, therefore, be realised that a woman who is subjected to sex violence would always be slow and hesitant about disclosing her plight. The court must, therefore, evaluate her evidence in the above background.

32. We are of the opinion that these factors are to be kept in mind as we go forward. We do think that the criterion that 'a stigma attaches to the rape victim in Indian society.' is a counter-productive basis of appraisal. We do not think the victim4249 suffers a stigma. It is a stigma against society. The rights of women in the context of the Constitution are clearly intended to overcome all negative perceptions generated against them. We do think that the reiteration of the theory of stigma and shame has itself led to an 'unintended' diminution of the status of the victim. In other words, the victims can and ought to recover like any other victims from an accident, but that is possible only when there is a due discharge of the functions by the State. Except for this caveat, we think that the formulation by Lodha, J. has substantially aligned itself with modern psychological and scientific understanding of psychosocial trauma.

33. There is some degree of substance in the criticism which we have heard from women's organisations that women do not need sympathy, empathy or charity. They are equal per se. In other words, they claim what general human rights and the Constitution guarantees as their natural space to live freely and effect decisions based on individual judgment. We are unable to discountenance this argument. On the contrary this is entirely correct. The fundamental attitude, based on paternalism, must be discarded. We also think that the judgments of courts can sometimes be misconstrued as suggestive of sympathetic consideration in a criminal trial. We also think that the right to justice is a fundamental right under the Constitution and must not be earned out of a sympathy having regard to the social malaise which exists in society. In other words, we advocate an approach that if the juxtaposition between honour and shame on the one hand and the crime of rape is deconstructed, people would be able to step forward and be heard. Such crimes should be registered immediately and investigated impartially and in respect of which we propose to make recommendations in the succeeding paragraphs. If an impartial investigation brings offenders to book, it is going to add to the confidence of not only the individual victim but also to women in society that such crimes can be brought to book. No woman in India must feel a sense of shame or stigma in the event of sexual assault. She is entitled to the redressal of that injury and that offence and she is therefore statutorily and constitutionally capable of access to the rule of law.

34. We believe that there is no danger and no shame or loss of honour in a victim seeking redressal by filing complaints and must in fact exercise, consistent with fundamental rights of women, the right to file complaints and bring offenders to book. We also think that it is the duty of the State to encourage such a climate and also to make available such resources that enable them to file such complaints.

35. If the depiction of the Indian society is what is depicted by Thakkar, J. in 1983, we must change the situation. We are indeed impressed by the reasoning of Lodha, J. who, although relying upon the decision of Thakkar, J. in Bharwada Bhoginbai Hirjibai, has correctly elucidated the psychological factors. We think that the scientific alignment adopted by Lodha, J. is the correct way to fashion the attitude of society towards a rape victim, which is to administer to her not only justice, but also such psychological therapeutic intervention as is necessary for rediscovery of the self and increased self-affirmation.

36. Many people who have faced accidents have overcome the disability caused by those accidents and have proceeded with life in a positive way. We must be able to teach the same rehabilitative methodology to rape victims. But in order to do that, it is necessary that they must be encouraged to report such crimes of sexual violence. In fact, it is the process of reporting such crimes which will be a forward looking step in being able to assert and demand justice. The demand of justice is not a personal aspiration. The demand of justice is a fundamental charter of freedom which is guaranteed under the Constitution to every individual. In the context of a woman, it4250 is all the more necessary that we snap the link between shame and honour, on the one hand, and the crime itself. We urge every victim to have the requisite courage to go forward and we exhort civil society to support all such cases where people who are filing complaints genuinely are given massive support to bring perpetrators to book.

37. We do notice that this concept of shame has somehow led the police to have an upper hand. The police have become arbiters of honour. The police, without registering even a FIR, assume that they have the moral capacity to pronounce upon the rights and wrongs of the rapist as well as the rape victim. This is simply deplorable and it is inconceivable in a modern society, which is governed by republican values. We think that it is necessary for the police officers to be completely sensitised against the honour-shame theory, and to treat every woman complainant as an individual in her own right capable of asserting her grievance. In other words, we feel that an indirect validation of police inaction in rape crimes has taken place as a result of - a) amorphous attribution of women's position in Indian society; b) the theory of shame-honour; and c) the policeman, 'being the male' in a 'patriarchal society, ought to be 'the moral judge'. It not only skews the justice delivery system at the stage of lodging the complaint, but it has a strongly debilitating effect resulting in direct violation of fundamental human freedoms and rights under the Constitution and the various international instruments.

38. We wish to take this point further. When a woman complains of rape, it is not the physical part of the woman which is directly the focus of attention. It is the offence and the offence against the bodily integrity of the woman as a person which is the offence in question. We therefore think that we need a woman to be viewed as a whole and not as a physical centre of sexual congress. At the same time it must not be viewed that a woman, while making a complaint, is in any way acting less honourably or in any way disturbing what is considered as the repository of honour of the family, community and others.

39. An offence against a person is very different from offence against a community. We think that there has been a completely erroneous connection which is being made between a woman and a community. In other words, we feel very strongly that an assault on a woman is an assault on the person of the woman. In this regard, we would like to quote Sohaila Abdulali, a rape victim, who recounts her experience which took place 32 years ago in Mumbai:

> "Rape is horrible. But it is not horrible for all the reasons that have been drilled into the heads of Indian women. It is horrible because you are violated, you are scared, someone else takes control of your body and hurts you in the most intimate way. It is not horrible because you lose your "virtue." It is not horrible because your father and your brother are dishonored. I reject the notion that my virtue is located in my vagina, just as I reject the notion that men's brains are in their genitals.
> If we take honor out of the equation, rape will still be horrible, but it will be a personal, and not a societal, horror. We will be able to give women who have been assaulted what they truly need: not a load of rubbish about how they should feel guilty or ashamed, but empathy for going through a terrible trauma."[35]

40. We are given to understand that the Government of India had brought out a Criminal Law Amendment Bill, 2012. We notice that a detailed critique of the said4251 Bill was submitted on behalf of women's groups and other stakeholders. We, too, have had the opportunity of examining the said Bill, which is presently pending before Parliament.
41. While we feel that the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, 2012 has provisions that are somewhat protective of the right of safety of women, we feel that the said Bill is far from complete. It needs a series of revisions, many of which we propose to recommend at a later stage in this Report.
42. At this juncture, we would like to revisit the recommendations made by previous Law Commissions on various issues pertaining to crimes against women.
43. We begin with the 84th Law Commission Report.[36] The said report was submitted on 25th April 1980 by the 42nd Law Commission presided over by Mr. Justice P.V. Dixit, former Chief Justice of the Madhya Pradesh High Court. It was pointed out in the said report that:

> "1.1 During recent years, the impact on the criminal justice system on victims of rape and other sexual offences has received considerable attention both in legal circles and amongst organizations and individuals connected with the welfare of women. In the field of criminology, an increasing interest has been shown in the victim and his or her position with the criminal justice system. In consequence, greater attention has now been paid to female victims of the sexual offence. Psychologists have, for some times past, been studying the effects of rape and other sexual offences upon women or girls and their personality."

44. We agree with the following observations of the 84th Report of the Law Commission:--

> "1.2 It is often stated that a woman who is raped undergoes two crisis, the rape and the subsequent trial. While the first seriously moves her dignity, curbs her individual, disturbs her sense of security and may often run her physically, the second is no less potent of mixture, in > as much as it not only forces her to relive through the traumatic experience, but also does so in the grudge of publicity in a totally alien atmosphere, with the whole apparatus and paraphernalia of the criminal justice system focused upon her."

45. We also agree with the following observation of the 42nd Law Commission regarding the purpose of criminal law:

> "Thus, we acknowledge that criminal law is the chief legal instrument to prevent anti-social acts of a serious character. The object is sought to be achieved, in the first instance, by the legislative command embodying that aspect of punishment which is called "general deterrence". Once a crime - whether sexual or any other crime - has been committed, this aspect is, at least for the time being, exhausted in regard to that particular criminal act. The fact that the particular crime has been committed shows that the object of deterrence has failed to prevent the particular criminal act."

46. We must point out that the Law Commission of India in its 42nd Report[37] as well as the 69th Report[38] has also made certain suggestions to the IPC and the Evidence Act. With reference to the IPC, it was suggested that where the4252 circumstances are such that a male may be able to take undue advantage of the situation and seduce the woman to illicit intercourse, the Commission recommended the insertion in the Code of three specific sections, intended respectively to deal with illicit intercourse - a) by a person having custody of a woman, with that woman; b) by superintendent of an institution with an inmate of an institution; and c) by a person in-charge of a hospital, with a mentally disordered patient.

47. We are indeed shocked to note that notwithstanding the fact that these Law Commission Reports were made decades ago, very little attention has been paid to the implementation of these recommendations. We also note that the National Legal Vision Document (drafted by one of us) in fact wanted a separate office of the Attorney General and Solicitor General to be established which would study the implementation of recommendations of the Law Commission. This, unfortunately, has also not been carried out.

48. The 42nd Law Commission (in the 84th Report) recommended that Sections 375 to 376E be redrafted.

49. While the Law Commission in its 84th Report made recommendations in the context of forcible and fraudulent sexual intercourse as well as illicit sexual intercourse by way of seduction, the 84th Report proceeded further. It examined the issue of 'consent'. According to the Law Commission, the statutory definition of rape in India emphasized the element of absence of consent. In fact, absence of consent is an important aspect. Barring cases where consent is irrelevant and the age of the girl is the only crucial factor (because of the statutory requirement of minimum age), want of consent becomes infructuous as a determining factor in most prosecutions for rape. It is also the factor to which the law has devoted its most detailed attention.

50. We agree with the 84th Report that:--

> "2.6 Consent is the anti-thesis of rape. Even if some may find any discussion on consent, it is too complicated. The matter cannot consistently with the needs of the subject be put in simple one phrase formulation. When circumstances in life present an infinite variety, the law must be well equipped to deal with them, nuances of consent are therefore unavoidable."

51. It may also be noted that the 84th Report of the Law Commission therefore dealt with the substantial law relating to the law of consent in the context of rape. Consent must be real. Often, it is vitiated by circumstances which take away the freedom of choice. Section 90 of the IPC runs thus:--

> "A consent is not such a consent as is intended by any section of this Code, if the consent is given by a person under fear of injury, or under a misconception of fact, and if the person doing the act knows or has reason to believe, that the consent was given in consequence of such fear or conception; or if the consent is given by a person who, from unsoundness of mind, or intoxication, is unable to understand the nature and consequence of that to which he gave his consent; or unless the contrary appears from the context if consent is given by a person who is under 12 years of age."

52. Thus the 84th Law Commission Report observed as follows:

> "2.9 The modifications recommended by us in the third clause vitiate consent not only when a woman is put in fear of death or hurt, but also when she is put in fear of any injury being caused to any person (including herself) in body mind, reputation or property and also when her consent is obtained by criminal intimidation, that is to say, by any words or acts intended or calculated to put her in fear of any injury or danger to herself or to any person in whom she is interested or when she is threatened with any4253 injury to her reputation or property or to the reputation of any one in whom she is interested. Thus, if the consent is obtained after giving the woman a threat of spreading false and scandalous rumours about her character or destruction of her property or injury to her children or parents or by holding out other threats of injury to her person, reputation or property, that consent will also not be consent under the third clause as recommended to be amended."

53. The 84th Law Commission Report correctly said that violence was not mandatory.

> "2.11. Overt violence, if necessary.-- While these are the main amendments on the point of consent, we may also mention a few points that have been raised during the suggestions made to us, concerning the concept of consent. There is a suggestion that the definition of "rape" should make it clear that the crime can take place without overt violence. We have given careful thought to this aspect, but we do not think that the law needs any clarification in this regard. Overt violence, or, for that matter, violence of any particular category, is not a necessary element of rape as defined in S. 375 . The cardinal fact is absence of consent on the part of the woman."

54. There can be cases of consent even when there is no violence. Violence--or, for that matter, marks of resistance--are not conclusive of consent. In any case, after a clarification is made in S. 375 on the lines recommended by us, this point would lose much of its practical importance.

55. The 84th Report further recommended that the minimum age should be increased to 18 years and observed as follows:

> "2.20. Increase in minimum age.-- The question to be considered is whether the age should > be increased to 18 years. The minimum age of marriage now laid down by law (after 1978) is 18 years in the case of females and the relevant clause of S. 375 should reflect this changed attitude. Since marriage with a girl below 18 years is prohibited (though it is not void as a matter of personal law), sexual intercourse with a girl below 18 years should also be prohibited.

56. On the question of Section 354 relating to outraging modesty of women and indecent assaults, the 84th Report suggested that Section 354A must be inserted regarding indecent assault on a minor. The 84th Report also opined that eve teasing was amply covered under Section 509 of the IPC, and observed as follows:

> "2.31. Recommendation as to Section 354 -A, Indian Penal Code .-- Accordingly, we would recommend that, while incorporating S. 354 -A in the Indian Penal Code, after the words "obscene manner", the words "with or without the consent of the minor" should also be added.
> XVI. Indecent gestures
> 2.32. Section 509IPC -- We may mention here that acts which do not amount to an "assault"--acts such as indecent gestures and acts that have come to be known as "eve teasing"--are amply covered by S. 509 of the Indian Penal Code . The matter strictly does not fall within the purview of rape or assault, but we refer to it because one of the women's organisations with whom we held discussions was anxious that the law should penalise such behaviour in public places or on public transport vehicles particularly."

57. Where there is physical contact or threat of physical contact, the offender can be charged under S. 354 of the same Code, punishing a person who "assaults or uses criminal force to any woman, intending to outrage or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby outrage her modesty". The punishment is imprisonment of either description up to two years or fine or both. Both the offences are, as the law now stands, cognizable4254
58. We notice that many other recommendations have been made in respect of female victims of sexual offences. In particular, we have also noticed the suggestion contained in paragraph 3.15 of the 84th Report that a new sub-section be added in Section 160 of the CrPC to require the statement of female victims of sexual assault under the age of 12 to be recorded by a woman police officer. It is unfortunate that it is only in 2012, in the Protection of Children from Sexual Offences Act, 2012, that an attempt has been made by Parliament to provide special measures for the recording of statements of children who are victims of sexual offences.
59. We also notice in the 84th Report that the medical report is a document of vital importance and deserves attention.
60. We notice that the medical examination report of the accused in a case of rape or attempt to commit rape is an important document, and we have dealt with this aspect at some length later in this Report. We also think that any delay in reporting rape will result delay in the commencement of the investigation. But at the same time, the police are duty bound to register such cases and must not insult or harass or refuse to hear the victim or the complainant.
61. We notice that the following recommendations were made for the purpose of recording of reasons by inserting Sections 53(1A) , (1B), (1C) and (1D) in the CrPC :--

> "4.7. Recommendation as to Section 53CrPC .--It is very important that reasons should be given for the opinion expressed in the report. Accordingly, we recommend the insertion in S. 53 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, of the following sub-sections:
> Ss. 53(1-A), (1-B), (1-C) and (1-D) Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 to be inserted.
> (1-A) When a person accused of rape or an attempt to commit rape is arrested and an examination of his person is to be made under this section, he shall be forwarded without delay to the registered medical practitioner by whom he is to be examined.
> (1-B) The registered medical practitioner conducting such examination shall without delay examine such person and prepare a report specifically recording the result of his examination and giving the following particulars:
> (i) the name and address of the accused and of the person by whom he was brought,
> (ii) the age of the accused,
> (iii) marks of injury, if any, on the person of the accused, and
> (iv) other material particulars in reasonable detail.
> (1-C) The report shall state precisely the reasons for each conclusion arrived at.
> (1-D) The exact time of commencement and completion of the examination shall also be noted in the report, and the registered medical practitioner shall, without delay, forward the report to the investigating officer, who shall forward it to the Magistrate referred to in S. 1973 as part of the documents referred to in cl. (a) of sub-s. (5) of that section."

62. We are of the view that Section 417A suggested by the 84th Report requires to be enacted, as suggested below:

> "When a woman is arrested and there are no suitable arrangements in the locality for keeping her in custody in a place of detention exclusively meant for women she shall be sent to an institution established and maintained for the reception, care, protection and welfare of women or children licensed under the Women's and Children's Institutions (Licensing) Act, 1956 or an institution recognized by the State Government except in4255 cases where any special law requires that she should be sent to a protective home or other place of detention authorized for the purposes of such special law."

63. What is most surprising is that Parliament has ignored the recommendation of the 84th Report, which calls for the punishment of a station-in-charge who fails to register information of a cognisable offence given to him. In this respect the 84th Report recommended as follows:

> "X. Non-recording of information relating to cognizable offences

3.29. Section 167 -A IPC --Refusal to register case of rape.-- We now come to another matter concerning the stage of investigation. During our oral discussions with the representatives of women's organisations, it was stated that in some cases the police fail to register a case of rape reported to them even when the full facts are communicated to them. We have not been able to gather statistics of the number of such cases, as the collection of the relevant figures would take considerable time and the present Report deals with a matter of urgency. We hope that the percentage of such cases would not be high. Nevertheless, we do take the view that in principle, the law should contain a specific provision dealing with refusal (or failure without sufficient cause) to register such cases. The offence of rape is a cognizable offence and if the police fail to register it, it is a clear violation of the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 in this regard. Cognizable offences reported to the police are "registered"--as the popular usage goes--under S. 154(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure . If the officer in charge of a police station refuses to record the information reported relating to a cognizable offence, there is a remedy already provided in the Code of Criminal Procedure, the relevant provision being in the following terms:

"(3) Any person aggrieved by a refusal on the part of an officer in charge of a police station to record the information referred to in sub-s. (1) [of S. 154] may send the substance of such information, in writing and by post, to the Superintendent of Police concerned who, if satisfied that such information discloses the commission of a cognizable offence, shall either investigate the case himself or direct an investigation to be made by any police officer subordinate to him, in the manner provided by this Code and such officer shall have all the powers of an officer in charge of the police station in relation to that offence."

3.32. Insertion of Section 167 -A, Indian Penal Code recommended.--Having regard to what we have stated above, we would recommend the insertion of a specific penal provision, say, as S. 167 -A, in the Indian Penal Code on the subject. In view of the general scheme adopted in that Code, the proposed provision would not be confined to refusal to register the offence of rape and would cover other cognizable offences as well. The following is a rough draft of the provision that we recommend:

"167-A.-- Whoever, being an officer-in-charge of a police station and required by law to record any information relating to the commission of a cognisable offence reported to him, refuses or without reasonable cause fails to record such information shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both."

64. Section 375 of the Indian Penal Code has raditionally defined rape in narrow terms as 'sexual intercourse' or 'penetration' in the circumstances defined in the statute. The Indian Criminal Law Amendment Bill 2012 proposes replacing the offence of 'rape' with that of 'sexual assault'. However, while the new provisions widen the definition of 'penetration' beyond vaginal penetration, the new offence remains limited to that of 'penetration'. Other types of sexual assault are not subject to appropriate legal sanction.

65. Two contrasting positions on this issue have been taken in other jurisdictions examined here.4256

(a) A wide definition of sexual assault to replace the offence of rape and indecent assault:

(i) The UN Handbook recommends that existing offences of 'rape' and 'indecent assault' be replaced with a broad offence of 'sexual assault' graded according to harm.[39] However, its definition of 'sexual assault' is significantly wider than that of the proposed Indian approach. The Handbook recommends that 'sexual assault' be defined as a violation of bodily integrity and sexual autonomy. Moreover, it recommends the removal of any requirement of proof of penetration.

(ii) This follows the approach in Canada, which does not have a separate definition of rape. Instead, s. 271 of the Criminal Code in Canada prohibits 'sexual assault'. Section 265 defines 'sexual assault' as non-consensual touching in circumstances of a 'sexual nature'.[40] The law does not distinguish between different types of touching from groping to penetration. All are sexual assaults and criminal offences.

(iii) The advantage of this approach is that it does not require complex definitions of 'penetration', which are inevitably unable to capture the full range of violations to which a woman could be subject. Such definitions also considerably increase the evidential burden of the prosecution to prove penetration.

(iv) The disadvantage of this approach is that the epithet 'rape' continues to bring with it a high degree of moral and social opprobrium, which is not conveyed by the words 'sexual assault.' By removing the epithet 'rape', there is a risk of diluting the extent of moral condemnation.

(b) Retaining an offence of 'rape' within a wider offence of sexual assault.

(i) This approach retains the specific offence of rape but includes it in a cluster of offences under the category of sexual assault. This is the approach of the legislation in England and Wales, which specifies offences of 'rape', 'assault by penetration', 'sexual assault' and 'causing a person to engage in sexual activity without consent'.

1. 'Rape' occurs when a person (A) 'intentionally penetrates the vagina, anus or mouth of another person (B) with his penis' without consent. This carries a maximum sentence of life imprisonment.[41]
2. 'Assault by penetration' occurs when (A), without consent, 'intentionally penetrates the vagina or anus of another person (B) with a part of his body or anything else,' and the penetration is sexual. This carries a maximum sentence of life imprisonment.[42]4257
3. 'Sexual assault' occurs when (A) 'intentionally touches another person (B),' and the touching is sexual. This carries a maximum sentence of 10 years' imprisonment.[43]
4. 'Causing a person to engage in sexual activity without consent' occurs when (A) intentionally causes another person (B) to engage in a sexual activity without consent.[44] Where the activity is equivalent to rape or assault by penetration, the maximum sentence is life imprisonment. In other cases, the maximum sentence is 10 years.

(ii) A similar approach is taken by the South African legislation, which distinguishes between rape and other forms of sexual assault. Under South African law,[45]

1. 'Rape' is defined as all penetrative offences. 'Sexual penetration' is defined in broad and gender-neutral terms which go well beyond the prior common law restriction to penile-vaginal penetration.[46]
2. 'Sexual assault' replaces the common law offence of 'indecent assault'. Section 5 of the Act provides that sexual assault is committed where a person ('A') unlawfully and intentionally sexually violates a complainant ('B'). 'Sexual violation' has a wide definition.
3. The advantage of this approach is that it retains the moral opprobrium attached to the common understanding of rape. Notably the separation of rape from other forms of sexual assault was supported by the South African Law Reform Commission in its 1999 Discussion Paper on the reform of South African sexual violence laws.[47] The Commission argued that sexual violence involving the penetration of the body using sexual organs is qualitatively different from non-penetrative forms of sexual assault and therefore should be treated as a more severe offence.[48] To combine penetrative acts with non-penetrative acts in a single offence, it argued, would reduce the gravity of the offence. Furthermore, it argued that the division between penetrative and non-penetrative sexual offences would provide a better guide to judicial officers in sentencing.[49]

(iii) The disadvantage of this approach is that there will still be disputes as to when an act is penetrative and when it is not, potentially making it more difficult to prove a rape case.

66. The meaning of 'sexual': In both cases it is necessary to give some guidance as to when an assault is a sexual as against any ordinary assault.4258

(a) The Canadian Criminal Code is silent as to the definition of 'sexual'. The Supreme Court of Canada in R v Chase gave a broad definition: 'viewed in the light of all the circumstances, is the sexual or carnal context of the assault visible to a reasonable observer.'[50] Courts will examine the part of the body touched, the nature of the contact, the situation in which it occurred, the words and gestures accompanying the act, threats, intent of the accused and any other relevant circumstances.[51] However, it is not a pre-requisite that the assault be for sexual gratification. The motive of the accused is just 'simply one of many factors to be considered.'[52]

(b) The UK legislation has a statutory definition, which like the Canadian, relies on the way in which a 'reasonable observer' might view the activity. Under s. 78, an activity is sexual if a reasonable person would consider that it is 'because of its nature sexual' or that 'because of its nature it may be sexual and because of its circumstances or the purpose of any person in relation to it (or both) it is sexual.'

67. We are of the considered opinion that in the Indian context it is important to keep a separate offence of 'rape'. This is a widely understood term which also expresses society's strong moral condemnation. In the current context, there is a risk that a move to a generic crime of 'sexual assault' might signal a dilution of the political and social commitment to respecting, protecting and promoting women's right to integrity, agency and autonomy. However, there should also be a criminal prohibition of other, non-penetrative forms of sexual assault, which currently is not found in the IPC, aside from the inappropriate references to 'outraging the modesty' of women in Sections 354 and 509 . We recommended the enactment of Section 354 in another form while we have recommended the repeal of Section 509 .

68. We have kept in mind that the offence of rape be retained but redefined to include all forms of non-consensual penetration of a sexual nature. Penetration should itself be widely defined as in the South African legislation to go beyond the vagina, mouth or anus.

69. An offence of sexual assault should be introduced to include all forms of non-consensual non-penetrative touching of a sexual nature. It is recommended here that the Canadian approach be followed, according to which the 'sexual nature' of an act is established if: 'viewed in the light of all the circumstances... the sexual or carnal context of the assault [is] visible to a reasonable observer.'[53] Courts will examine the part of the body touched, the nature of the contact, the situation in which it occurred, the words and gestures accompanying the act, threats, intent of the accused and any other relevant circumstances. It should not be a pre-requisite that the assault be for sexual gratification. The motive of the accused is 'simply one of many factors to be considered.'[54]

70. In this background it is necessary to examine the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, 2012. The offence of rape falls under Chapter XVI dealing with "offences affecting human body". Sections 375 to 376D are put under the category of "sexual offences". While Courts have often used the expression "sexual assault" in dealing4259 with not only rape cases but also cases of sexual abuse, the IPC did not define the said expression. The definition of "assault" is found under section 351 .

71. By virtue of the Amendment, the legislature has sought to widen the scope of the offence under section 375 to 376D by substituting the expression rape with "sexual assault". While we feel that the proposed Bill (as placed before Parliament) proposes some welcome changes to the law, there is still much ground that needs to be covered. Accordingly, this Committee has recommended amendments (appended to this Report) to the Criminal Law Amendment Bill 2012, which should be considered and enacted by Parliament at the earliest possible, if not immediately. In any event, we feel that the same ought to be promulgated by the Government as an ordinance.

Marital Rape

72. The exemption for marital rape stems from a long out-dated notion of marriage which regarded wives as no more than the property of their husbands. According to the common law of coverture, a wife was deemed to have consented at the time of the marriage to have intercourse with her husband at his whim. Moreover, this consent could not be revoked. As far back as 1736, Sir Matthew Hale declared: 'The husband cannot be guilty of rape committed by himself upon his lawful wife, for by their mutual matrimonial consent and contract the wife hath given herself up in this kind unto her husband which she cannot retract'.[55]

73. This immunity has now been withdrawn in most major jurisdictions. In England and Wales, the House of Lords held in 1991 that the status of married women had changed beyond all recognition since Hale set out his proposition. Most importantly, Lord Keith, speaking for the Court, declared, 'marriage is in modern times regarded as a partnership of equals, and no longer one in which the wife must be the subservient chattel of the husband.'[56]

74. Our view is supported by the judgment of the European Commission of Human Rights in C.R. v UK , which endorsed the conclusion that a rapist remains a rapist regardless of his relationship with the victim. Importantly, it acknowledged that this change in the common law was in accordance with the fundamental objectives of the Convention on Human Rights, the very essence of which is respect for human rights, dignity and freedom.[57]This was given statutory recognition in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994.[58]

75. We find that the same is true in Canada, South Africa and Australia. In Canada, the provisions in the Criminal Code, which denied criminal liability for marital rape, were repealed in 1983.[59] It is now a crime in Canada for a husband to rape his wife. South Africa criminalised marital rape in 1993, reversing the common law principle that a husband could not be found guilty of raping his wife. Section 5 of the Prevention of Family Violence Act 1993 provides: 'Notwithstanding anything to the4260 contrary contained in any law or in the common law, a husband may be convicted of the rape of his wife.' In Australia, the common law 'marital rape immunity' was legislatively abolished in all jurisdictions from 1976.[60] In 1991, the Australian High Court had no doubt that: 'if it was ever the common law that by marriage a wife gave irrevocable consent to sexual intercourse by her husband, it is no longer the common law.'[61] According to Justice Brennan (as he then was): 'The common law fiction has always been offensive to human dignity and incompatible with the legal status of a spouse.'[62]

76. These jurisdictions have also gone further and recognised that consent should not be implied by the relationship between the accused and the complainant in any event. In the Canadian 2011 Supreme Court decision in R v. J.A. , Chief Justice Mclachlin emphasised that the relationship between the accused and the complainant 'does not change the nature of the inquiry into whether the complaint consented' to the sexual activity.[63] The defendant cannot argue that the complainant's consent was implied by the relationship between the accused and the complainant.[64]In South Africa, the 2007 Criminal Law (Sexual Offences and Related Matters) Amendment Act ('Sexual Offences Act') provides, at s. 56 (1), that a marital or other relationship between the perpetrator or victim is not a valid defence against the crimes of rape or sexual violation.

77. Even when marital rape is recognised as a crime, there is a risk that judges might regard marital rape as less serious than other forms of rape, requiring more lenient sentences, as happened in South Africa.[65]In response, the South African Criminal Law (Sentencing) Act of 2007 now provides that the relationship between the victim and the accused may not be regarded as a 'substantial and compelling circumstance' justifying a deviation from legislatively required minimum sentences for rape.

78. It is also important that the legal prohibition on marital rape is accompanied by changes in the attitudes of prosecutors, police officers and those in society more generally. For example, in South Africa, despite these legal developments, rates of marital rape remain shockingly high. A 2010 study suggests that 18.8% of women are raped by their partners on one or more occasion.[66] Rates of reporting and4261 conviction also remain low, aggravated by the prevalent beliefs that marital rape is acceptable or is less serious than other types of rape.[67] Changes in the law therefore need to be accompanied by widespread measures raising awareness of women's rights to autonomy and physical integrity, regardless of marriage or other intimate relationship. This was underlined in Vertido v The Philippines, a recent Communication under the Optional Protocol of the Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW), where the CEDAW Committee emphasised the importance of appropriate training for judges, lawyers, law enforcement officers and medical personnel in understanding crimes of rape and other sexual offences in a gender-sensitive manner.[68]

79. We, therefore, recommend that:

(i) The exception for marital rape be removed,
(ii) The law ought to specify that:

(a) A marital or other relationship between the perpetrator or victim is not a valid defence against the crimes of rape or sexual violation;
(b) The relationship between the accused and the complainant is not relevant to the inquiry into whether the complainant consented to the sexual activity;
(c) The fact that the accused and victim are married or in another intimate relationship may not be regarded as a mitigating factor justifying lower sentences for rape.

80. We must, at this stage, rely upon Prof. Sandra Fredman of the University of Oxford, who has submitted to the Committee that that "training and awareness programmes should be provided to ensure that all levels of the criminal justice system and ordinary people are aware that marriage should not be regarded as extinguishing the legal or sexual autonomy of the wife".

Chapter Five

Other offences Against Women

EveTeasing

1. Another important aspect of sexual harassment is the horrendous practice of eve-teasing. In a recent judgment in DIG v S. Samudiram ,[69] the Supreme Court has referred to eve-teasing as a euphemism, which attracts penal action. In this case, a policeman was caught eve teasing a married woman. It led to his dismissal from service and the initiation of criminal proceedings. The aggrieved employee challenged the dismissal order before the Tamil Nadu Administrative Tribunal, Chennai. While the said application was pending before the Tribunal, the Judicial Magistrate, Tenkasi rendered a judgment acquitting the respondent of all charges.4262 The Tribunal noticed that no reliance could be placed on the judgment of the Criminal Court and upheld the order of dismissal from service, which was eventually upheld by the Supreme Court.
2. Since the case was in the context of eve teasing, the following observations of Radhakrishnan, J. are very important. In our view, the learned Judge perceptively has looked at not only sexual harassment at workplaces but the safety of women in all places. We are of the opinion that the safety of women in all places is again a fundamental guarantee which is enforceable against the State. We note the Supreme Court's observations which are as follows:--

> "26. We may, in the facts and circumstances of this case, wish to add some aspects which are also of considerable public importance. We notice that there is no uniform law in this country to curb eve-teasing effectively in or within the precinct of educational institutions, places of worship, bus stands, metro-stations, railway stations, cinema theatres, parks, beaches, places of festival, public service vehicles or any other similar place. Eve-teasing generally occurs in public places which, with a little effort, can be effectively curbed. Consequences of not curbing such a menace, needless to say, at times disastrous. There are many instances where girls of young age are being harassed, which sometimes may lead to serious psychological problems and even committing suicide. Every citizen in this country has right to live with dignity and honour which is a fundamental right guaranteed under Article 21 of the Constitution of India . Sexual harassment like eve-teasing of women amounts to violation of rights guaranteed under Articles 14, 15 as well. We notice in the absence of effective legislation to contain eve-teasing, normally, complaints are registered under Section 294 or Section 509 IPC .

28. It is for the prosecution to prove that the accused committed any obscene act or the accused sang, recited or uttered any obscene song; ballad or words and this was done in or near a public place, it was of obscene nature and that it had caused annoyance to others. Normally, it is very difficult to establish those facts and, seldom, complaints are being filed and criminal cases will take years and years and often people get away with no punishment and filing complaint and to undergo a criminal trial itself is an agony for the complainant, over and above, the extreme physical or mental agony already suffered.

30. The burden is on the prosecution to prove that the accused had uttered the words or made the sound or gesture and that such word, sound or gesture was intended by the accused to be heard or seen by some woman. Normally, it is difficult to establish this and, seldom, woman files complaints and often the wrong doers are left unpunished even if complaint is filed since there is no effective mechanism to monitor and follow up such acts. The necessity of a proper legislation to curb eve-teasing is of extreme importance, even the Tamil Nadu Legislation has no teeth.

31. Eve teasing today has become pernicious, horrid and disgusting practice. The Indian Journal of Criminology and Criminalistics (January-June 1995 Edn.) has categorized eve teasing into five heads viz. (1) verbal eve teasing; (2) physical eve teasing; (3) psychological harassment; (4) sexual harassment; and (5) harassment through some objects. In Vishaka and Others v. State of Rajasthan (1977) 6 SCC 241, this Court has laid down certain guidelines on sexual harassments. In Rupan Deol Bajaj and Another v K.P.S. Gill (1995) 6 SCC 194, this Court has explained the meaning of 'modesty' in relation to women. More and more girl students, women etc. go to educational institutions, work places etc. and their protection is of extreme importance to a civilized4263 and cultured society. The experiences of women and girl children in over-crowded buses, metros, trains etc. are horrendous and a painful ordeal.

32. The Parliament is currently considering the Protection of Woman against Sexual Harassment at Workplace Bill, 2010, which is intended to protect female workers in most workplaces. Provisions of that Bill are not sufficient to curb eve-teasing. Before undertaking suitable legislation to curb eve-teasing, it is necessary to take at least some urgent measures so that it can be curtailed to some extent. In public interest, we are therefore inclined to give the following directions:

(1) All the State Governments and Union Territories are directed to depute plain clothed female police officers in the precincts of bus-stands and stops, railway stations, metro stations, cinema theatres, shopping malls, parks, beaches, public service vehicles, places of worship etc. so as to monitor and supervise incidents of eve-teasing.

(2) There will be a further direction to the State Government and Union Territories to install CCTV in strategic positions which itself would be a deterrent and if detected, the offender could be caught.

(3) Persons in-charge of the educational institutions, places of worship, cinema theatres, railway stations, bus-stands have to take steps as they deem fit to prevent eve-teasing, within their precincts and, on a complaint being made, they must pass on the information to the nearest police station or the Women's Help Centre.

(4) Where any incident of eve-teasing is committed in a public service vehicle either by the passengers or the persons in charge of the vehicle, the crew of such vehicle shall, on a complaint made by the aggrieved person, take such vehicle to the nearest police station and give information to the police. Failure to do so should lead to cancellation of the permit to ply.

(5) State Governments and Union Territories are directed to establish Women' Helpline in various cities and towns, so as to curb eve-teasing within three months.

(6) Suitable boards cautioning such act of eve-teasing be exhibited in all public places including precincts of educational institutions, bus stands, railway stations, cinema theatres, parties, beaches, public service vehicles, places of worship etc.

(7) Responsibility is also on the passers-by and on noticing such incident, they should also report the same to the nearest police station or to Women Helpline to save the victims from such crimes.

(8) The State Governments and Union Territories of India would take adequate and effective measures by issuing suitable instructions to the concerned authorities including the District Collectors and the District Superintendent of Police so as to take effective and proper measures to curb such incidents of eve-teasing."

3. We have recommended insertion of provisions in the IPC to criminalise the act of eve-teasing.

AcidAttacks

4. We understand that a most heinous form of attack on women, which is commonplace in several Asian and African countries, is the throwing of acid on women for a multitude of reasons, including alleged adultery, turning down advances from men, and also as a form of domestic violence. Acids and other corrosive substances are thrown on women or administered to them, thereby causing death or physical and psychological damage with unfathomable consequences. The 226th4264 Report of the Law Commission of India, which dealt particularly with this offence stated:

> "Though acid attack is a crime which can be committed against any man or woman, it has a specific gender dimension in India. Most of the reported acid attacks have been committed on women, particularly young women for spurning suitors, for rejecting proposals of marriage, for denying dowry etc. The attacker cannot bear the fact that he has been rejected and seeks to destroy the body of the woman who has dared to stand up to him".[70]

5. In a certain sense, the aggressor is conscious that self-worth and self-esteem of a woman often lies in her face, which is a part of her personality. The dismemberment of the face or the body is not merely an offence against the human body but will cause permanent psychological damage to the victim. What happens when there is permanent physical and psychological damage to a victim, is a critical question and law makers have to be aware that offences are not simply based on the principle of what might be called offence against the body, i.e., damage of the body, but they must take into account the consequences on the right to live with dignity which survives the crime. This is an important consideration both in the fields of criminology and also in the field of sociology.

6. The Law Commission studied instances of acid attacks and also laws to deal with the offence in various countries including Australia, Bangladesh, Cambodia, China, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Italy, Laos, Malaysia, Nepal, Pakistan, Thailand, Sri Lanka, Uganda, UK, USA and Vietnam. However, the incidence in Bangladesh, India, Pakistan, Cambodia and Uganda are much higher and are on the rise. The Bangladesh Government therefore enacted a law called the Acid Offences Prevention Act, 2002. The Law Commission after examining the law in various jurisdictions, came to the conclusion that a separate Act should be proposed for dealing with compensation to victims of acid attacks, rape, sexual assault, kidnapping.

7. Traditionally, the offence is dealt with under Section 326 of the IPC which deals with 'Voluntarily causing grievous hurt by dangerous weapons or means'. This provision also deals with causing grievous hurt using 'corrosive substances' which include acids.

8. In fact in Sachin Jana v State of West Bengal ,[71] a case involving acid attack which had caused disfigurement of the victim, the Supreme Court applied Section 307IPC (Attempt to murder) read with Section 34 on the basis that to justify a conviction under Section 307 it was not essential that 'bodily injury capable of causing death was inflicted'. The Section made a distinction between the act of the accused and its result. Therefore it was not necessary that the injury actually caused to the victim should be sufficient under ordinary circumstances to result in death. The court is only required to see whether the act, irrespective of its result, was done with the intention or knowledge mentioned in Section 307 . It was sufficient if there was intent coupled with an overt act in execution thereof. The Supreme Court in this case, also relied upon the decision in State of Maharashtra v Balram .[72]
9. The gender specificity and discriminatory nature of this offence does not allow us to ignore this offence as yet another crime against women. We recommend that4265 acid attacks be specifically defined as an offence in the IPC, and that the victim be compensated by the accused. However in relation to crimes against women, the Central and State governments must contribute substantial corpus to frame a compensation fund. We note that the existing Criminal Law (Amendment) Bill, 2012, does include a definition of acid attack.

Offences against women in border areas / conflict zones

10. We now address a very important, yet often neglected area concerning sexual violence against women - that of legal protections for women in conflict areas. Our views on this subject are informed by the plight of a large number of women from areas in Kashmir, the North-East, Chhattisgarh, Odisha and Andhra Pradesh who were heard at length in the course of preparing our report. We are indeed deeply concerned at the growing distrust of the State and its efforts to designate these regions as 'areas of conflict' even when civil society is available to engage and inform the lot of the poor. We are convinced that such an attitude on the part of the State only encourages the alienation of our fellow citizens.
11. At the outset, we notice that impunity for systematic or isolated sexual violence in the process of Internal Security duties is being legitimized by the Armed Forces Special Powers Act, which is in force in large parts of our country. It must be recognized that women in conflict areas are entitled to all the security and dignity that is afforded to citizens in any other part of our country. India has signed the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance,[73] which has to be honoured. We therefore believe that strong measures to ensure such security and dignity will go a long way not only to provide women in conflict areas their rightful entitlements, but also to restore confidence in the administration in such areas leading to mainstreaming.
12. To this end, we make the following recommendations for immediate implementation:

    (a) Sexual violence against women by members of the armed forces or uniformed personnel must be brought under the purview of ordinary criminal law;
    (b) Special care must also be taken to ensure the safety of women who are complainants and witnesses in cases of sexual assault by armed personnel;
    (c) There should be special commissioners - who are either judicially or legislatively appointed - for women's safety and security in all areas of conflict in the country. These commissioners must be chosen from those who have experience with women's issues, preferably in conflict areas. In addition, such commissioners must be vested with adequate powers to monitor and initiate action for redress and criminal prosecution in all cases of sexual violence against women by armed personnel;
    (d) Care must be taken to ensure the safety and security of women detainees in police stations, and women at army or paramilitary check points, and this should be a subject under the regular monitoring of the special commissioners mentioned earlier;

(e) The general law relating to detention of women during specified hours of the day must be strictly followed;4266

(f) Training and monitoring of armed personnel must be reoriented to include and emphasize strict observance by the armed personnel of all orders issued in this behalf;

(g) There is an imminent need to review the continuance of AFSPA and AFSPA-like legal protocols in internal conflict areas as soon as possible. This is necessary for determining the propriety of resorting to this legislation in the area(s) concerned; and

(h) Jurisdictional issues must be resolved immediately and simple procedural protocols put in place to avoid situations where police refuse or refrain from registering cases against paramilitary personnel.

Conclusions and Recommendations

In view of the above, we come to the following conclusions and make the following recommendations:

Part I--Conclusions

1. The existing laws, if faithfully and efficiently implemented by credible law enforcement agencies, are sufficient to maintain law and order and to protect the safety and dignity of the people, particularly women, and to punish any offenders who commit any crime. This is not to say that the necessary improvements in the law, keeping in mind modern times, should not be enacted at the earliest.
2. Speedy justice is not merely an aspect of the right to life with dignity, but is essential for efficacy of the law and its desired impact, as well as for prevention of its violation.
3. Available personnel of the judiciary and the infrastructure, with a few systemic changes can, at least, reduce half the burden of arrears in courts contributing to delays in enforcing the law of the land. Judge strength can be increased in phases without diluting their quality. Our suggestion of eminent retired judges being appointed as ad hoc judges will solve this problem.
4. More effective control of the subordinate judiciary by the responsibility vested in the High Courts would ensure improved performance of the subordinate judiciary, which is the cutting edge of the justice delivery system. The High Courts have the pivotal role in the administration of justice by virtue of Article 235 of the Constitution . They have to lead by practice in addition to precept. The restatement of values of judicial life is a charter of faith for every judicial functionary at all levels.
5. Police reforms that are recommended and directed for the autonomy and better quality of the police force must be urgently implemented for the preservation of the rule of law, which is a basic feature of our Constitution.[74]
6. Law enforcement agencies must be insulated from any political or other extraneous influence, which impedes their performance. Law enforcement agencies must not become tools at the hands of political masters.4267
7. Transparency in the performance by all institutions of governance is necessary to enable the 'people' to discharge their participatory role in governance of the republic, and to enforce accountability of the public functionary when needed.
8. Performance appraisal for career progression must be objective, i.e. based on commitment to the constitutional values and to prevent the upward mobility of the undeserving.
9. Practically every serious breach of the rule of law can be traced to the failure of performance by the persons responsible for its implementation. The undisputed facts in public knowledge relating to the Delhi gang rape of December 16, 2012 unmistakably disclose the failure of many public functionaries responsible for traffic regulation, maintenance of law and order and, more importantly, their low and skewed priority of dealing with complaints of sexual assault.

10. Disputes relating to the jurisdiction of the police over the area of the crime are often a cause of delay in initiating the process of taking cognizance of the crime and providing medical aid to the victim.
11. Delay in giving the necessary medical aid to the victim/injured person in a medico-legal case is also because of the practice of approaching only a government hospital and not the nearest available hospital. This continues in spite of the clear duty of every medical doctor (even a private practitioner) to attend to an injured person and to save such person's life.
12. The peculiarity of the Government of NCT of Delhi not having any control over the police force, which control vests only in the Ministry of Home Affairs of the Government of India (through the Lieutenant Governor) is the reason given publicly by the Chief Minister of Delhi for the absence of responsibility of her government. This ambiguity must be removed forthwith so that there is no divided responsibility in Delhi in respect of maintenance of law and order. Such a step is also essential to maintain accountability.
13. The apathy of civil society is evident from the inaction of passers-by and bystanders, who failed in their citizenship duty of rendering help to the victim of the December 16 gang-rape and her companion, who were both lying badly injured and disrobed on the roadside for a considerable amount of time. The misbehaviour of the police towards any samaritan is often the cause for such apathy. But this must not deter citizens from doing their duty. A change in the behaviour of the citizenry will also improve the conduct of the police. This effort must be promoted.
14. It is clear that denial of political rights to women will cast a shadow on democratic right to a free and fair election.
15. The nation has to account for all its missing children.
16. The lathi charge on peaceful demonstrators after the December 16 gang rape has scarred the Indian democracy.
17. The brutalities of the armed forces faced by residents in the border areas have led to a deep disenchantment, and the lack of mainstreaming of such persons into civil society. Serious allegations of persistent sexual assault on the women in such areas and conflict areas are causing more alienation.
18. The nation has to account for the tears of millions of women and other marginalized sections of the society which has been ignored owing to institutional4268 apathy. At this closing juncture we wish to reiterate the promise of a 'tryst with destiny' that Pandit Nehru made to the nation on the eve of independence:

> "Freedom and power bring responsibility. The responsibility rests upon this Assembly, a sovereign body representing the sovereign people of India. Before the birth of freedom, we have endured all the pains of labour and our hearts are heavy with the memory of this sorrow. Some of those pains continue even now. Nevertheless, the past is over and it is the future that beckons to us now. That future is not one of ease or resting but of incessant striving so that we might fulfil the pledges we have so often taken and the One we shall take today. The service of India means the service of the millions who suffer. It means the ending of poverty and ignorance and disease and inequality of opportunity. The ambition of the greatest man of our generation has been to wipe every tear from every eye. That may be beyond us but as long as there are tears and suffering, so long our work will not be over."

19. Unless the promises made at the birth of the nation are fulfilled, the India that our founding fathers dreamt of will never become a reality. Recent events indicate that the patience of the disillusioned youth is running out.

Part II--Recommendations

1. The equality of women, being integral to the Constitution, its denial is a sacrilege and a constitutional violation. Sustained constitutional violations mean that governance is not in accordance with the Constitution. A fortiori, all limbs of the State - the executive, the legislature as well as the judiciary - must respect women's rights and must treat them in a non-discriminatory manner.
2. As a primary recommendation, all marriages in India (irrespective of the personal laws under which such marriages are solemnised) should mandatorily be registered in the presence of a magistrate, which magistrate will ensure that the marriage has been solemnised without any demand for dowry having been made and that the marriage has taken place with the full and free consent of both partners.
3. The manner in which the rights of women can be recognised can only be manifested when they have full access to justice and when the rule of law can be upheld in their favour. The proposed Criminal Law Amendment Act, 2012, should be modified as suggested, and to secure public confidence, be promulgated forthwith. Since the possibility of sexual assault on men, as well as homosexual, transgender and transsexual rape, is a realitythe provisions have to be cognizant of the same.
4. In respect of certain categories of cases, such as those where the victim is in custody of persons in authority including police and armed personnel, certain statutory presumptions must apply under Section 114A of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872. Every complaint of rape must be registered by the police and civil society should perform its duty to report any case of rape coming to its knowledge.
5. Any officer, who fails to register a case of rape reported to him, or attempts to abort its investigation, commits an offence which shall be punishable as prescribed. We have also taken into account offences of eve teasing, voyeurism, stalking as well as sexual assault and unsolicited sexual contact.
6. A special procedure for protecting persons with disabilities from rape, and requisite procedures for access to justice for such persons is also an urgent need. Amendments to the Code of Criminal Procedure, which are necessary, have been suggested.4269
7. The protocols for medical examination of victims of sexual assault have also been suggested, which we have prepared on the basis of the best practices as advised by global experts in the fields of gynaecology and psychology. Such protocol-based, professional medical examination is imperative for uniform practice and implementation.
8. The insensitivity of the police to deal with rape victims is well known. The police respect a patriarchal form of society, and have been unable to deal with extraordinary cases of humiliation and hardship caused by the khap panchayats, as is evident from various judgments of the Supreme Court. The police are involved in trafficking of children (including female children) and in drug trade. To inspire public confidence, it is necessary that there must not only be prompt implementation of the judgment of the Supreme Court in Prakash Singh, but also police officers with reputations of outstanding ability and character must be placed at the higher levels of the police force. In the present context, and in view of the facts revealed to us, it is necessary that every police commissioner and director general of police of this country must be selected in accordance with the directions of the Supreme Court in Prakash Singh's case, who can lead by example. The leader makes all the difference. As such, all existing appointments need to be reviewed to ensure that the police force has the requisite moral vision.
9. It is settled law that every policeman is bound to obey the law and any order of a superior officer, which is contrary to law, is no defence for his illegal action, which may be a punishable offence. Accordingly, any political interference or extraneous influence in the performance of the statutory duty by a policeman cannot be condoned. This principle has to be clearly understood by every member of the police force - their accountability is only to the law and to none else in the discharge of their duty. Dereliction of this duty has to be punished according to the service rules and applicable law.

10. Authentic figures of missing children in India are not available for obvious reasons of the complicity of law enforcement agencies. Children have been driven into forced labour, sex abuse, sexual exploitation as well as made victims of illegal organ trade. Our report includes the testimonies of children (whose identities have been concealed for their safety) to verify facts from their personal experience. As a small gesture, this Committee has (at its own cost) taken necessary steps for proper rehabilitation and education of one of these children, payment of the minimum wages due to the said child, her safe passage and reintegration with her family, psychotherapeutic intervention, and to fulfil her educational aspirations. The Committee expects similar treatment by the State of all such deprived children.
11. Every District Magistrate is responsible for carrying out a census of missing children within his district. Having regard to the apathy shown by the district magistrates and the police in the matter of missing children, evident from advisories issued by the Ministry of Home Affairs as late as on 30th January 2012, this issue needs immediate attention. This is necessary also for the credibility of the political establishment.
12. The judiciary has the primary responsibility of enforcing fundamental rights, through constitutional remedies. The judiciary can take suo motu cognizance of such issues being deeply concerned with them both in the Supreme Court and the High Court. An all India strategy to deal with this issue would be advisable. The Chief Justice of India could be approached to commence appropriate proceedings on the4270 judicial side. The Hon'ble Chief Justice may consider making appropriate orders relating to the issue of missing children to curb the illegal trade of their trafficking etc. Social activists involved in curbing this menace could assist the court in the performance of this task. The question of award of compensation and rehabilitation could also be considered in such cases by the court.
13. Juvenile homes in the country, i.e. child homes, and observation homes, are not being run in a manner consistent with the spirit of the Juvenile Justice Act. To ensure that the constitution of the Child Welfare Committee, Juvenile Justice Board, the infrastructural facilities in a home, the quality of food, the quality of counselling and psychotherapy required for a child to wipe out the scars of abuse and deprivation in early childhood and to mainstream him/her in society and to educate him/her fully requires a deeper and profound engagement of the State and civil society. This is the primary duty of the State, which is found wanting. We are shocked to note that so many of these children have been forced into bonded labour and beggary, which is in violation of Article 23 of the Constitution . India should not permit cheap child labour to be an incentive for foreign investment to boost our economy.
14. It is time for the judiciary to step in to discharge the constitutional mandate of enforcing fundamental rights and implementation of the rule of law. In performance of this obligation, the Chief Justice of the High Court in every State could devise the appropriate machinery for administration and supervision of these homes in consultation with experts in the field. For the safety and physical security of children, women, persons with disabilities, inmates of mental homes and widows, monitoring by the judiciary is necessary. The immediate and ultimate guardianship of such persons has to be with the court, founded on the principle of parens patriae.
15. To augment the police force, there is a need to develop community policing by involving the local gentry, which would also motivate them to perform their duty as citizens. Respectable persons in each locality could also be appointed Special Executive Magistrates under Section 21,Cr.P.C . and invested with powers to deal with the traffic offences and other minor offences. In addition, to assisting the maintenance of law and order in the locality, their presence would inspire greater confidence of safety in the locality.
16. Street lighting everywhere would provide more safety since dark areas are more prone to facilitate crimes. There is great wisdom in the words of the American Judge Louis Brandeis, that "Sunlight is said to be the best of disinfectant; electric light the most efficient policeman".

17. Street vending should be encouraged to make the bus stops and footpaths safe for communities and pedestrians, in addition to providing street food for the common man.

18. We recommend the creation of a new constitutional authority akin to the Comptroller and Auditor General for education, non-discrimination, in respect of women and children.

19. Reforms in respect of the political establishment:

(a) Reforms are needed in the Representation of People Act, 1951 to deal with criminalisation of politics and to ensure true representation of people by elimination of those with criminal antecedents. This is also essential to avoid any conflict in the discharge of their legislative functions.4271

(b) Having regard to the fact that there is no verification of the affidavits which are filed by candidates under Section 33A of the Representation of People Act, 1951, we have suggested amendments to the said Section 33A requiring the making of a declaration about the pendency of any criminal case, whether cognizance has been taken of it. A certificate from the Registrar of the High Court should be necessary for the validity of the nomination.

(c) We also suggest that, in the event cognizance has been taken by a magistrate of an offence mentioned in Section 8(1) of the Representation of People Act, 1951, the candidate ought to be disqualified from participating in the electoral process.

(d) We further suggest that Section 8(1) of the Representation of People Act, 1951 be amended and should include all heinous offences as suggested.

(e) A candidate who fails to disclose a charge or the commission of an offence should be disqualified subsequently. It is alleged that a minister of the Andhra Pradesh Cabinet had failed to disclose an offence and there is presently a complaint pending against such minister under Section 125A of the Representation of People Act, 1951. We request the Chief Minister of Andhra Pradesh to dismiss the minister immediately from the Cabinet if it is correct that he did not disclose the offence for which he was charged.

(f) Scrutiny and verification of the disclosures made by candidates in respect of their assets may be made by the CAG with necessary follow up action in the case of such disclosures being found to be incorrect or false. Such discrepancies should be a ground for subsequent disqualification under the Representation of People Act, 1951.

(g) If all those in Parliament and State Legislatures, who have any criminal case pending against them in respect of heinous offences, vacate their seats as a mark of respect to Parliament and to the Constitution (which they have sworn to uphold), it would be a healthy precedent and would raise them in public esteem. This would be consistent with the principle of institutional integrity emphasised by the Supreme Court in the P.J. Thomas case judgment.[75]

(h) It is the least to expect that political parties do not nominate any candidates for election who have any criminal antecedents. Failure to do so is likely to set in motion social urges of inestimable dimensions. It has been established in the oral interactions of the Committee with the stakeholders that the fielding of such candidates leads to women being deterred from exercising their right to vote.

(i) Legislation be enacted for compulsory registration of all political parties as indicated earlier.

20. Even though the scope of the terms of reference of this Committee was to look at all criminal laws including laws relating to aggravated sexual assault, we have also studied the related laws which have a bearing upon the administration of criminal justice, including the exercise of enacting legislation.4272

21. These recommendations are to be read along with the various other recommendations contained in the body of the report relating to specific matters.

22. The recommendations made in this report, unless urgently implemented, will end the exercise conducted by this Committee in futility.

We pay our tribute to the departed soul of Nirbhaya which has occasioned this exercise.42734274

The Crimes (Amendment) Ordinance (No 5) 1985 (ACT) inserted s 92R into the Crimes Act1900 (NSW), as it applied to the ACT, which provided that the fact that a person is married to a person upon whom an offence of sexual intercourse without consent contrary to s. 92D is alleged to have been committed shall be no bar to the conviction of the first-mentioned person for the offence. In Victoria, the Crimes (Amendment) Act 1985 (Vic) substituted for s 62(2) of the Crimes Act 1958 (Vic) a new sub-section providing that the existence of a marriage does not constitute, or raise any presumption of, consent by a person to a sexual penetration or indecent assault by another person.
