The question of the right of defence to property does not arise where it is found that the accused aimed at and fired a shot at the victim when he was running away from the place of incident,[32] as the right of private defence does not extend to chasing and killing a person who is running away from the scene.[33] Where accused persons apprehending that the complainant party had come to take forcible possession of their land and to attack them and chased the complainant party and killed some persons by firing 30-40 rounds of gunshots at the complainant party which was not necessary, the accused were held to have exceeded the right of private defence.[34] Threat to property was over as soon as the intruder started running. There can be no right of private defence where the riot is premeditated on both sides, unless the object of the assembly is shown to have been to repel forcible and criminal aggression.[35]

16. Enforcing a Disputed Right and Maintaining Existing Right, Distinguished

Where the complainant with his men went to plough a field to which he had a good title and the party accused, claiming title to the field, attacked them it was held that since there was no crop on the filed which was in danger of being damaged or removed, and the object with which the accused took the law into their own hands was clearly not to prevent either theft or mischief but to enforce their own supposed right to the land, they had no right of private defence of property.[38]

No Right of Private Defence when no Party is in Possession

The right of private defence of property can only exist in favour of the person who possesses a clear title to that property, and where no such title has been determined no right of private defence of property can exist.[39] But where a person in possession of property sees an actual invasion of his rights which invasion amounts to an offence under the IPC, he is entitled to defend himself and his property by force, if there is no time to get the help of the public authorities.[40] The question of possession is very material in such cases.[41] Where neither party was in peaceful possession of the property and there was a scramble for possession, no right of private defence is available.[42]

Where the accused assaulted/killed the deceased at a distance of 1½-2 kilometers from the field which was the matter of dispute between the parties, the accused was held not entitled to the right of private defence.[43]

Right of Private Defence in Respect of Right to Cut Wood

In a Patna case, there was a dispute regarding a customary right to cut fuel from a jungle. On the day of occurrence the complainant's party came as a body with a number of carts and cut fuel wood, and, while they were carting them, they were opposed by the accused party on the ground that they had no such right and, therefore, their action was an encroachment upon their rights. There was a mutual marpit and a large number of persons belonging to the accused party were injured, as against only three men of the complainant's party. It was found that the complainant's party had no right to cut the fuel while the party of the accused had a subsisting right. It was held that the action of the complainant's party in cutting the fuel wood amounted to direct encroachment on the subsisting rights of the accused persons and, therefore, they were completely protected by the right of private defence of property. The fact that the accused persons had come prepared to fight could not deprive them of their right of private defence of property.[44]

Right of Private Defence in Respect of a Creature Killed in Hunting

If a person kills a wild animal or wild bird on the property of another person, such dead creature does not belong to the killer, but to the proprietor of the property: and616 such proprietor either himself or by his duly authorised agent can lawfully demand and, if refused, seize such dead creature from the possession of the killer; and such persons as help him to exercise his right are doing no wrong. They would be protected by the provisions of this section, provided they do not exercise more force than is necessary.[45]

Right of Easement of Light and Air does not give Rise to a Right of Private Defence

An easement does not come within the purview of 'property'. An obstruction to an easement of light and air cannot give rise to a right of private defence of property.[46]

17. Right is Subjected to the Restriction Imposed by sections 99, 103 and 105

When a conspectus of the facts would lead to the inevitable conclusion that the accused clearly exceeded his right of private defence and caused much more harm than necessary, he cannot claim immunity under the garb of s 97, IPC . The right of private defence under s 97, IPC is expressly subject to the restriction contained in s 99 .[47] This section is itself subject to the restriction contained in s 99 that the right of private defence in no case extends to the inflicting of more harm than it is necessary to inflict for the purpose of defence.[48] This section declares that every person has a right, subject to certain restrictions mentioned in s 99, to defend the property of himself or any other person against any act which is an offence falling within the definition of theft, robbery, etc.

Section 105, IPC declares that the right of private defence of property commences when a reasonable apprehension of a danger to the property commences, and s 103, IPC says that the right of private defence of property extends, under the restrictions mentioned in s 99, IPC to the voluntary causing of death or of any other harm to the wrongdoer, if the offence, the committing of which, or the attempting to commit which, occasions the exercise of the right, be an offence of any of the descriptions therein enumerated.[49]

18. Right to Defend another's Property

Under this section every person has a right to defend the property whether movable or immovable of himself or of any other person against any act which is an attempt to commit theft, robbery or criminal trespass.[50] Further, the right of private defence is not limited only to persons, who are in actual possession of the property, but extends to such other persons who act in helping the former to protect their right in the property.[51] A person employed to guard the property of his employer is, therefore, protected, if he causes death in safeguarding his employer's property, when there is reason to apprehend that the person whose death has been caused was about to commit one of the offences mentioned in s 103, IPC or was about to attempt to617 commit one of those offences. The fact that the property to be guarded is public property does not extend the protection given to a guard.[52]

19. Theft and Robbery

'Theft' and 'robbery' have been defined by ss 378 and 390 of the IPC respectively of the IPC . Movable property or immovable property when severed from earth alone can be the subject of theft or robbery. In Bootka alias Lootka v State of Rajasthan ,[53] the accused committed robbery by taking away the mare of a person by threatening him by stabbing. Some witnesses pursued him to take back the mare from his possession. The accused stabbed one of them and the victim died. In these circumstances, the accused cannot claim the right of private defence, he not being the owner of the mare.

20. Mischief

'Mischief' has been defined by s 425 of the IPC . Every person has a right, subject to the restrictions, contained in s 99, IPC to defend the property, whether movable or immovable, of himself or of any other person, against the offence of mischief or an attempt to commit the offence of mischief.[54] It cannot be said that a person intentionally joins an unlawful assembly, or continues in it, when it appears from the evidence that he went to the place, where the members of the unlawful assembly were gathered, to prevent mischief being done to his own property which he had a right to protect.[55]

Where the complainant damaged the outer door of the house of the accused which amounted to 'mischief' within the meaning of s 425, IPC, the accused was entitled to exercise the right of private defence so long as the complainant continued in commission of mischief and not after commission of mischief.[56]

Where the accused, who were walking in procession carrying a pot, containing consecrated water, were obstructed and their pot was broken by the complainants, caused injuries to them in resisting the obstruction, it was held that the resistance by the complainants amounted to an attempt to commit mischief in respect of the pot of water, and the accused were justified in exercising their right of private defence.[57]

Where the accused drove a loaded bullock cart unlawfully across the deceased's field on which there were standing crops, it was held that the act of the accused amounted to criminal trespass and mischief regardless of the amount of loss thereby caused and that the deceased had a right to defend his property.[58]618

Right of Private Defence against Co-Sharer against Mischief

One of several co-sharers in constructive possession of joint land has no right to dig part of it with a view to appropriating it for his exclusive use. If he does so in opposition by another who is also in constructive possession, the act amounts to criminal trespass. The removal of the earth from part of the land is calculated to diminish its value or utility and at all events, to affect it injuriously, so as to constitute an offence of mischief. Hence, the other co-sharers have a right of private defence of property.[59]

Where a person, over whose land project, some poles inserted for supporting a scaffolding erected by the owner of the adjoining house, honestly believes that the projection is a trespass and removes the projected poles by reasonable means, the person must be deemed to have acted bona fide in the exercise of what he believed to be his rights and cannot therefore be guilty of an offence of mischief.[60]

Where the accused is attempting to assert a bona fide claim of his right, however, ill founded in law that claim may be, he cannot be held guilty of the criminal offence of mischief.[61] Mere causing obstruction in the cutting of crops does not amount to the offence of mischief, or any of the offences, mentioned in s 97, so as to give the right of defence of property.[62]

Right of Private Defence does not Extend to cause Death by Laying a Trap

The accused, in order to prevent the ingress of persons, like the deceased, into his latrine by making such ingress dangerous, fixed up a naked and uninsulated copper wire across the passage, leading up to his latrine, and carried current from the electric wiring of his house to which it was connected. There was no warning that the wire was live. The deceased managed to pass into the latrine without contracting the wire, but when she came out, she happened to touch it and got a shock as a result of which she died soon after. It was held that the type of injury, caused by the trap, laid down by the accused, could neither be brought within the scope of s 97, nor of s 103, IPC, and he had no right of defence of property.[63]

Right of Private Defence against Cattle Trespass

A person cannot intentionally kill or maim an animal trespassing upon his property. But he has a right to use reasonable force to protect his property against trespass so long as the trespass continues.[64] A person seizing cattle trespassing on his land and taking them to the cattle pound is not guilty of mischief [65] or theft.[66] But when it is not proved that cattle trespassed the field of the complainant and caused damage to his crops, evidence on record leads to the inference that the cattle were seized from a619 grazing field, it amounted to a theft of cattle by the complainant, attack by the accused in execution of his right of private defence of property by giving axe-blow to deceased, though without intention of killing is a clear case of exceeding the right of private defence.[67]It has been held that the commission of an offence under s 22, Cattle Trespass Act 1871 would not give rise to the right of private defence of property.[68]

If the owner of cattle offers resistance, it will be an offence and the person, taking the cattle to the cattle-pound, has a right of private defence.[69]

In a Lahore case it has been held that the act of seizure of cattle may be within s 10 of the Cattle Trespass Act 1871, if it is effected at a spot within easy reach of the field damaged, but where the distance is very great, and the cattle have already come not merely constructively but actually within their owner's possession, the act of the pursuers in seizing and attempting to remove the animals, is not only not covered by s 10 Cattle Trespass Act, but it also amounts technically to an offence of theft within the meaning of s 378, IPC and consequently the owners of the cattle are entitled, in the exercise of their right of private defence of property, to use force, under s 104, IPC to any extent short of causing death in order to prevent the pursuers from carrying out their purpose.[70]

The right of private defence does not arise merely because an unlawful or wrongful act has been done. It arises only when that unlawful or wrongful act is an 'offence'.[71] When a person acts in good faith in taking away a property, and does not intend to take it dishonestly, he does not commit the offence of theft[72] though he may be guilty of a civil wrong. He may be sued for damages in a civil court, but he cannot be punished for an offence under the IPC .[73]

There is some conflict on the question as to whether if the seizure of cattle was unlawful, the owner of the cattle would be justified in exercising the right of private defence of property in rescuing them. One view is that the owner is entitled only to compensation in a civil court or to apply to the magistrate concerned under s 20 of the Cattle Trespass Act and that he has no right to rescue the animals by the use of force.[74] But a contrary view was taken in the undermentioned cases,[75] where it was held that illegal seizure of cattle with a view to impound them is theft, because though the person who has seized the animals had no intention to cause wrongful gain to himself, nevertheless, his intention was to cause wrongful loss to the owner of the animals.620

Where the accused, as owners of the cattle, were still in possession of them and the complainants tried to seize the cattle, it has been held that the accused had a right to use reasonable force to defend their possession, and s 97(2) had no application, for the right of private defence exercised by the accused in this case, though exercised with the object of defending property, is in reality a right of private defence of the body.[76]

Right of Private Defence against Criminal Trespass

This section given a right of private defence of property against an act which amounts, inter alia, to an offence of criminal trespass or mischief.[77] It covers attempt to commit criminal trespass.[78] It is not the law that the rightful owner in peaceful possession of property must run away, if there is an actual invasion of his right or an attempt on his person. The person in possession of property is entitled to defend himself and his property by force and to collect such numbers and such arms, as are necessary for that purpose, if he sees an actual invasion of his rights, which invasion amounts to an offence under the IPC, and when there is no time to get police help. It is lawful for a person, who has seen an invasion of his rights, to go to the spot and object. It is also lawful for such person, if the opposite party is armed, to take suitable weapons for his defence.[79] Where an incident arose out of a land dispute, occurrence took place in the land in possession of the accused persons, the deceased and his sons came to the land in the possession of the accused group to irrigate the land which amounted only to criminal trespass under and within the meaning of s 441, IPC, the right of the accused does not extend to causing death but extended only to causing harm other than death.[80] A person in peaceful possession of land cannot be dispossessed by mere use of force and he has a right to maintain his possession by the use of necessary force if anyone attempts to assail it[81] but he has no right to use a gun and inflict injury when the trespasser has only a kassiya.[82] When persons engaged in the exercise of the right of private defence of property are resisted and themselves attacked, the right of private defence of the body at once arises[83] and extends to causing of death.[84] As observed in Mayne's Criminal Law:[85] 'If the trespasser resists, and in so doing assaults the party in possession, that party may repel the assault, and for that purpose may use any force which he would be justified in using in defence of his person'.[86]621

There is considerable distinction between enforcing a right and maintaining a right. People who are maintaining a right, or in other words enjoying a right, of which they had been given possession by a competent court of jurisdiction, are justified in repelling an attack upon them by persons who had no right to obstruct them.[87]

The evidence on the record showed that the victims who had attacked the appellants and the deceased by trespassing into the land in possession of the appellants were the aggressors, and that the deceased was unarmed. Held, the accused appellants faced with criminal trespass by the victim did not exceed the right of private defence of own body, and the body of any other person, such that the role attributed to the appellants by the prosecution is fully covered by their right of private defence. Thus, the accused appellants were acquitted of the offence under s 302, IPC .[88]

A was in possession of certain property as mortgagee from B. In a dispute between A and B as to possession, the mamlatdar held A to be in possession and referred B to civil court. Subsequently, while A was sowing the field, B and his relations entered the field and tried to stop the sowing. It was held that though B and the other members of his party did not use actual force against A, his right to eject them by force was in no way affected.[89] Where the accused is attempting to assert a bona fide claim of his right, however, ill-founded in law that claim may be, he does not commit the offence of criminal trespass.[90] Where A entered into the land of B to carry out repairs of boundary fencing between the land of the two, without, any intention to annoy, intimidate or insult B, and the latter caused injury to A, it was held that the act of A did not amount to criminal trespass and B had no right to cause injury to A in exercise of the light of private defence.[91]

A necessary postulate of the exercise of right of private defence is the commission of an offence of criminal trespass. Mere entry on the property even by a bona fide claimant is not such trespass unless there is the requisite criminal intent.[92]

Possession at the Material Time Determines the Right of Private Defence

In determining whether a party had a right of private defence of property, the question of possession of the disputed property at the time of the occurrence in question is material.[93] A person in actual and peaceful possession of property is entitled to maintain that possession even by use of force, if necessary. The question whether he had or had not the right to possession is immaterial.[94] When once a person has taken possession of, cultivated and sown, the field and remained in possession of it for a couple of months, another person, even though he was the owner, is not entitled to take the law into his own hands and use force in ousting the former person.[95]622

Trespasser's Right of Self-Defence

The right of self-defence under this section is confined to the protection of person and property. By no stretch of legal imagination can the word 'property' by extended to forcible possession usurped by a rank trespasser against a protesting owner. A person who has sown crops without let or hindrance is in cultivatory possession, but one who uproots another's crops and follows this act of goondaism by sowing his own crop cannot claim that he is in such cultivatory possession as will entitle him to the right of self-defence under this section. Self-help is permitted by law as a deterrent against lawless aggression, not in aid of it. It was never intended to be a charter of immunity for any ruffian to acquire possession by a surprise move backed by overwhelming force and then claim the right to defend the fruits of his robbery.[1] Where the accused persons trespassed on the land of the complainant and opened fire and killed the deceased persons, they are not entitled to the right of private defence.[2] Where there was a sudden quarrel over cutting of a tree, the accused gave a blow with a wooden reaper on the head of the deceased causing his death, and the tree in question was standing on the land belonging to the deceased and was in his actual possession, the right of private defence was not available to the accused.[3] A mere trespasser cannot, by the very act of trespass, immediately and without acquiescence, give himself what the law understands by possession against the person whom he ejects, and drive him to produce his title, if he can without delay reinstate himself in his former possession.[4] Where there was a fight between two parties, where the revenue records showed that the complainant party was in possession of land where occurrence took place, the accused party trespassing into the land fully armed with fire arms and lathis for taking possession of land, the complainant party consisted of only two persons. The intention on the part of the complainant party to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy the accused was not proved. It was held that the use of deadly force by the accused merely to expel two persons was not justified and the plea of self-defence of properly was not available to the accused party in such case as offence of criminal trespass was not proved to have been committed by the complainant party.[5]

It has been held that even if a person is a trespasser and has wrongfully cultivated a certain portion of a field of which he was bound in law to deliver possession to another person, the latter person had no right to take law into his own hands and beat the former in order to dispossess him from the field, and that if the latter person is an aggressor, there is no doubt that the former person, though a trespasser, has a right of self-defence.[6] When once a person has taken possession of a field and remained in possession of it for some time, another person even though he is the owner is not entitled to take the law into his own hands and use force in ousting the former person.[7]623

Trespasser can be Dispossessed by Force Till he is in the Process of Trespassing

A true owner has every right to dispossess or throw out a trespasser while the trespasser is in the process of trespassing and has not accomplished his possession; this right is not available to the true owner if the trespasser has been successful in accomplishing his possession to the knowledge of the true owner. In such circumstances, the law requires that the true owner should dispossess the trespasser by taking recourse to the remedies available under the law.[8] Ploughing of land by the trespasser does not impair its value so as to necessitate immediate action on the part of the owner to remove that person from the land by causing injury to him.[9] The law protects even a rank trespasser in the peaceful enjoyment of the land trespassed upon, the only remedy of the rightful owner is to take appropriate proceedings in that regard in a court of law.[10] A trespasser, unless he is evicted in due course of law, is entitled to defend his possession even against the rightful owner.[11]

Nature of Possession which can be Defended by a Trespasser

It may, therefore, be considered settled law that a trespasser acquires the right to defend his possession against physical attack only if he has come to it by the acquiescence, express or implied, of the rightful owner and his possession has become peaceful and settled. The passage of time does not necessarily confer any right on the trespasser. For example, a man may be away when another takes forcible possession of his property behind his back, and on his return he can assert his right of property by throwing out the trespasser. The question of lapse of time becomes relevant only if the rightful owner or occupier sits quiet and does nothing to assert his rights even after knowing that the trespasser is in possession of his property.[12]

It may also be noted that right of self-defence of property under this section is available to a trespasser only against some act of the rightful occupier which amounts to theft, robbery, mischief or criminal trespass or any attempt to commit any of these four crimes. But if the rightful owner somehow resumed possession of his own land in the absence of the trespasser, he commits no crime and the trespasser on his return cannot invoke the right of self-defence to oust the rightful occupier. The property does not belong to him, he is no longer in possession and there is nothing which he can defend. The question of self-defence may arise if a vigilant trespasser keeps ceaseless watch over the property and prevents the rightful occupier from making a re-entry. But if he is not vigilant and permits the owner to regain possession of what still belongs to him, his right to defend his wrongful possession is gone, for the simple reason that there is no possession.[13]

But the possession, which a trespasser is entitled to defend against a rightful owner, must be a settled possession extending over a sufficiently long period624 indicative of acquiescence on the part of the true owner. A casual act of possession or mere entry on a vacant part of the land cannot have the effect of interrupting the possession of the rightful owner.[14] Where the deceased allegedly committed criminal trespass in the land of the accused, and the accused pleaded right of private defence of the property, the sale deed established transfer of possession in favour of the father of the accused, it was held that it was for the prosecution to prove that the possession of the accused had not remained undisturbed.[15] The owner may re-enter and reinstate himself, provided he does not use more force than necessary. Such entry will be viewed only as a resistance to an intrusion upon possession which had never been lost.[16] A rightful owner or his agent has every right to eject a trespasser by all lawful means. That would include prevention of the trespasser from persisting in his trespass.[17]

The mere fact that the trespasser was in possession for a few hours does not amount to an acquiescence on the part of the person in possession.

Where the complainant party began to erect some huts on the land stealthily in the darkness of the night and at day-break, the accused, on coming to know what was happening, came to the place fully armed in order to drive off the trespassers. There was a free fight between the parties in which both sides were wounded. Taking that into consideration, it was held that the accused were in actual physical possession of the property in question, that they took the earliest opportunity to exercise the right of private defence that they had no time to have recourse to the public authorities and that the injuries inflicted by them were within the limits allowed to the right of private defence, they were not guilty of rioting.[18]

21. Principles Governing Private Defence of Property

In Paras Ram v Rex ,[19] Agarwala J, after a very elaborate survey of several decisions of the various High Courts in India, enunciated certain principles governing the question of private defence of property in a case of criminal trespass thus:

(a) There can be no danger to property if the accused is not in possession. If he has merely a bare title to the property, his remedy is to seek possession from a court of law and not to enforce it by force himself.
(b) If the accused was previously in peaceful possession, but the other side has dispossessed him, and the accused has acquiesced in the dispossession for some time, then again he must have recourse to law and not to enforce his right to take back possession by his own force.
(c) The accused may have lost possession but if, immediately on coming to know of the other side having entered on his land or taken possession of his625 property, he rushes to oust the trespasser, he is entitled to oust him by force. He is not bound to have recourse to lengthy process of a trial in a civil court. But this rule cannot be applied to a case in which the trespasser has already peacefully established himself in the enjoyment of the property for sometime.

(d) If, however, there is no question of permanent deprivation of one's possession over property and the question is of infringement of enjoyment of a mere right over property, then in that case, unless the injury to be caused by the obstruction of the enjoyment to one's right is expected to be enhanced if recourse is had to public authorities for protection, one is bound to take such recourse.

(e) In every case, however, if one is already in possession of one's property or in enjoyment of a right, one is entitled to reach the spot earlier than the other party with arms and reinforcements and wait in readiness to defend such property or right from the expected aggression from the other side.

(f) If the information of the expected aggression is of a definite kind it would be proper for the party in possession to inform the public authorities and seek their help, unless an apprehension of danger to such property has actually commenced.

(g) If the apprehension of danger has actually commenced and if one can have recourse to the public authorities before an actual injury is caused to the property or right, he must do so, or else he will lose his right of private defence. This contingency usually arises when one has got definite information about the other side proceeding towards the land in dispute and the public authorities are within such a reach that one could inform them before actual damage to the property is done, e.g., when the police station falls on the way to the land in dispute and the accused can inform them while proceeding towards it for its protection.

(h) When a fight takes place not because property or person has to be protected but because parties want to measure their strength, and protection of property is merely a pretext, no question of self-defence arises, but this finding can be arrived at only when the possibility of either party fighting for the protection of his property has been excluded.

(i) When the determination to fight is bona fide to protect one's property, that would not be a case which it can be said that the right of self-defence is excluded. In this connection, it would be important to note whether one is fighting for maintaining one's possession or maintaining one's enjoyment of a right which has been enjoyed for some time previously, or one tries to obtain possession of a property which he thinks belongs to him, or to enforce a right which may be his but which he had never enjoyed before. In the latter class of cases there is no right of self-defence. In the former class of cases there is.

(j) Again, where a fight takes place in an open field, not on or near the property to be protected but far away from it, this fight cannot be said to be one for the protection of that property and there will be no right of self-defence in such cases.

(k) Again, where one party challenges the other party for a fight, then also the right of private defence is excluded, even though the fight be near or on the property. One is, however, entitled to say to the aggressor, 'if you attack626 you will be met by force, but it would be challenging another to fight if one were to abuse him and say 'come on, try strength if you like.

(l) Where there is a dispute over ownership or possession of property and parties quarrel, and there is an exchange of abuses, but the party out of possession has neither attempted nor threatened to take possession immediately, nor attempted or threatened to cause injury to the party in possession, the party in possession has no right to strike first, and if he does so, he gives the other party the right to strike back in self-defence.[20]

It may be noted that possession is presumed to follow the title. Where a tree standing in land, which is in the possession of a tenant, is blown down in the wind, the malguzar, who is the owner of it, becomes entitled to remove it and for this purpose he has a right of ingress over the tenant's land and a right of private defence of property in the fallen tree.[21]

22. Dispossession and Disturbance of Possession Distinguished

There is a distinction between dispossession and disturbance of possession. A person in possession does not lose his right of private defence because there has been a disturbance of his possession on the previous day.[22] So, there must be clear and positive evidence of continuous possession over a reasonable period.[23]

23. When Trespass cannot Cease without Committing further Trespass

In an Allahabad case the appellants forcibly took two loaded carts through the field of one Harphool (deceased) in which there were standing crops. While the carts were still in the field, the deceased protested, the appellants indicated their intention to cease the criminal trespass and take their carts out of the field, but the deceased prevented them and there was a fight. Their Lordships of the Supreme Court held that the appellants and their carts were still inside the field when the incident took place, that the criminal trespass had not therefore ceased and the deceased had the right to prevent the appellants from continuing to commit criminal trespass for whatever short distance they had still to cover before leaving the field and reaching the public pathway. It is true that the appellant's party had to get out of the field and this they could not have done without committing further criminal trespass. But it does not follow that this difficult position in which the party found itself gave them any right for insisting that they must continue the criminal trespass. They had to abide by the directions of Harphool, whatever be the degree of patience required in case they were not allowed to move in any direction in order to leave the field. They had no right to attack the deceased.[24] But in the exercise of the right of private defence the trespasser cannot be kept in wrongful confinement.[25]

Illustrative Cases--Defence of Property

(1) In a murder case where the right of self-defence of property was taken by the accused persons, the allegations were that the accused persons formed an627 unlawful assembly and armed with lathis assaulted the complainant party thereby causing death of the deceased, both the complainant party and the accused party were inimical on account of right of way on disputed land. Evidence showed that the complainant party had right of way vested in them prior to the incident. The accused party were aggressors and therefore were held not entitled to the right of private defence of property.[26]

(2) There was a dispute over construction of a wall of the house. The deceased was making preparations to construct a wall on his own land and committed no mischief within the meaning of s 425, IPC, the accused did not take recourse to public authorities and opened fire on the deceased, the accused was not entitled to claim any right of private defence of the property.[27]

(3) Where accused were getting demarcation of land done between fields of the accused and the complainant party from the appropriate authority. Prior to the incident, the accused were digging khal in between two fields. At the time of incident, allegations that the accused entered land belonging to the complainant and fired on being objected, were doubtful as the incident occurred in the field of the accused. Witnesses examined by the prosecution were interested witnesses and their evidence was not reliable. Independent witnesses were not examined though available, in these circumstances, the possibility that the complainant party attacked the accused first and the accused fired in the exercise of right of private defence was there and the accused persons were found entitled to acquittal.[28]

(4) Complainant party had been informed that the accused had dismantled the common boundary ridge of their fields and encroached upon their land. However, the complainant party found on reaching their field the place of occurrence that the accused were levelling their own land. Even if it was taken that the accused had earlier demolished the common ridge of their field, it could not be said that the complainant party was entitled to assault the accused in the exercise of the right of protection of their property.[29]

(5) The accused wanted to take water through the field of the informant which was resisted

by the informant. Even in the FIR the informant said that the accused wanted to take water through his field in the northern portion which was objected to by the informant by saying that he would not allow the water to be taken through his own field. So if the accused wanted to make a nali through the field of the informant, they had definitely no right to make nali and take water through the field of the informant without his permission. The informant party was well within jurisdiction to object to that one and in these circumstances, no right of self-defence accrued to the accused-appellants.[30]

(6) Where accused persons claimed to be landlords of the land in dispute, members of the prosecution party claimed to be bataidars over land, accused persons though obliged to approach ex magistrate and police628 posted at the place of occurrence, however, arrived at scene of occurrence and started indiscriminate firing, on these facts, the plea of private defence of property or person of the accused person was held not tenable.[31]

(7) Where quarrel ensued between the accused and the deceased (a younger brother), in regard to position of parental house, the accused was alleged to have inflicted at the spur of the moment, a single blow of the blunt side of an axe on the head of the deceased who died after 48 hours, the defence plea that injury was accidental was found to be a false and concocted one, there was no evidence that accused was subjected to assault by the deceased, on these facts the right of self defence was held not available with the accused but conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to one under s 304, Pt II.[32]

(8) Where the prosecution party went to the house of the accused determined to take back its possession by using force, the accused had to exercise the right of private defence of property and person, only one shot was fired at the deceased that ultimately resulted in his death, there was no previous enmity between accused and deceased, deceased was not the allottee of the house about whose possession the entire dispute was, it was held that the accused did not exceed the right of private defence and was entitled to benefit of doubt.[33]

(9) Where the injured, with his axe, tried to cut the apple trees belonging to the accused, and accused appellant in exercise of his right of defence of property shot from his gun at the victim causing injuries to him, held, the accused appellant did not exceed his right of private defence of property as the shot was not fired at a vital part of the body of the victim. Thus, his conviction under s 307, IPC was set aside.[34]

Right of private defence against the act of a person of unsound mind, etc.--

When an act, which would otherwise be a certain offence, is not that offence, by reason of the youth, the want of maturity of understanding, the unsoundness of mind or the intoxication of the person doing that act, or by reason of any misconception on the part of that person, every person has the same right of private defence against that act which he would have if the act were that offence.

Illustrations

(a) Z, under the influence of madness, attempts to kill A; Z is guilty of no offence. But A has the same right of private defence which he would have if Z were sane.

(b) A enters by night a house which he is legally entitled to enter Z, in good faith, taking A for a house-breaker, attacks A. Here Z, by attacking A, under this misconception, commits no offence. But A has the same right of private defence against Z, which he would have if Z were not acting under that misconception.629

Comments

1. Scope

The right of private defence given by ss 96 and 97 is against offences. This section extends that right to certain acts which are not offences. So, the right of private defence is not affected by the fact that the threatened act cannot constitute an offence technically, because of the agent's youth (refer to s 82), want of maturity of understanding (refer to s 83), unsoundness of mind (refer to s 84 and illust (a) to this section);[35] intoxication (refer to ss 85 and 86), or misconception, i.e., mistake of fact (refer to illust (b) to this section). These circumstances may render the need of self-defence still more urgent than in ordinary cases. Therefore, a person does not lose the right of defence of property because the other party is under some misapprehension.[36] Through a person, entering into a property in the possession of another under a misconception may not be guilty of any offence, that would not deprive the right of private defence of property of the person to actual possession.[37] Likewise, if drunken men break the law and attack either the person or the property of people, any member of the public is entitled to exercise the right of private defence provided he does not do more harm than the necessities of private defence require.[38]

General Exceptions

S. 99.

Acts against which there is no right of private defence.--

There is no right of private defence against an act which does not reasonably cause the apprehension of death or of grievous hurt, if done, or attempted to be done, by a public servant acting in good faith under colour of his office, though that act, may not be strictly justifiable by law.

There is no right of private defence against an act which does not reasonably cause the apprehension of death or of grievous hurt, if done, or attempted to be done, by the direction of a public servant acting in good faith under colour of his office, though that direction may not be strictly justifiable by law.

There is no right of private defence in cases in which there is time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities.

Extent to which the right may be exercised.--The right of private defence in no case extends to the inflicting of more harm than it is necessary to inflict for the purpose of defence.

Explanation 1.--A person is not deprived of the right of private defence against an act done, or attempted to be done, by a public servant, as such, unless he knows or has reason to believe, that the person doing the act is such public servant.

Explanation 2.--A person is not deprived of the right of private defence against an act done, or attempted to be done, by the direction of a public servant, unless he knows, or has reason to believe, that the person doing the act is acting by such direction, or unless such person states the authority under which he acts, or if he has authority in writing, unless he produces such authority, if demanded.630

1. Scope

This section lays down the limits of the right of private defence. Sections 96 - 98, IPC give a right of private defence against certain offences and acts. The right of given under ss 96 - 98 and 100-06, IPC are controlled by this section.[39] The first three clauses of this section define the acts against which there is no right of private defence. The fourth clause of the section lays down the general extent of the right of private defence. The first two clauses lay down that there is no right of private defence against:

(i) By a public servant.	(a) in good faith and	though the act done may not be strictly justifiable by law
(ii) By direction of a public servant.	(b) under colour of his office, ditto	though the direction may not be strictly justifiable by law

These clauses in favour of public servants rest, partly on the probability that their acts will be lawful, in which case resistance must necessarily be unlawful, partly on the theory that resistance is unnecessary since the law will set right what has been wrongly done in its name, and partly on the ground that it is good for society that631 public servants should be protected in the execution of their duty even where they are in error.[40]

2. Object underlying Enactment of Paragraph 1 is to Protect Public Servant

Under this clause, an act: (a) done or attempted to be done; (b) by a public servant; (c) acting in good faith; (d) under colour of his office; (e) though that act may not be strictly justifiable by law, does not give rise to the right of private defence.[41] This para is designed to protect a public servant and to limit the amount of resistance which may be offered to him.[42]It was enacted to meet cases which would not fall within s 332 by reason of the public servant not being, at the time when the assault was committed on him in discharge of a duty imposed on him by law. It applied to those cases in which the public servant was acting in good faith under colour of his office, though the particular act being done by him may not be justifiable by law.[43]

3. Right under Section 97 is Subject to Restrictions Imposed by sections 99, 103, 105

Commentary under same heading in s 97, ante, may be referred to.

4. Act which does not Reasonably Cause Apprehension of Death or Grievous Hurt

The first two paragraphs of the section declare that there is no right of private defence against an act done or attempted to be done by, or by the direction of a public servant, but that is subject to the condition that the act 'does not reasonably cause the apprehension of death or of grievous hurt'. If the act reasonably causes an apprehension of death or of grievous hurt, the right of private defence is not taken out simply because it is an act done by, or by the direction of a public servant. If the danger is continuing, the right is there, but if the danger or the apprehension has ceased to exist, there is no longer the right of private defence.[44]

An excise inspector pursuing the accused, an opium-smuggler, fired his revolver twice to frighten him. When he was about to overtake the accused, the latter drew his sword and cut the inspector on the thigh. It was held that the accused had reasonable ground to apprehended that the inspector intended to cause death or grievous hurt, and, therefore, he had a right of private defence against him.[45]

Nature of Apprehension is a Question of Fact

The right of private defence of the body extends, under the restrictions mentioned in this section, to the voluntary causing of death or any other harm to the assailant if the offence which occasions the exercise of the right be an assault as may reasonably cause the apprehension that death or grievous hurt will otherwise be the consequence632 of such assault. Whether the apprehension was reasonable is always a question of fact to be determined by the surrounding circumstances. The test in such a case is not whether there was any actual danger, but whether there was reasonable apprehension that such danger existed. At the same time, it must be borne in mind that a man acting under apprehension of death or grievous hurt cannot be expected to judge too nicely the situation and modulate his defence step by step. And where the assault has assumed a dangerous form every allowance must be made for one, who, with instincts of self-preservation strong upon him, pursues his defence a little further than to a perfectly cool bystander would seem absolutely necessary.[46] There should not be an actual commission of the offence in order to give rise to the right of private defence. It is enough if the accused apprehends that such an offence is contemplated and that it is likely to be committed if the right of private defence is not exercised. The apprehension may be a mistaken one, but if it is bona fide, it would give rise to the right of private defence. Thus, the march of a police party with lathis in horizontal position and armed with rifles and revolvers is enough to give rise to the right of private defence. Such march under the circumstances of a case may also amount to an assault as may reasonably cause the apprehension that death or grievous hurt would otherwise be the consequence of such assault, and the case is then taken out of this section, and directly covered by cll (1) and (2) of s 100 . Even assuming that the march by the police party was a lawful one and that the police party never intended to cause grievous hurt or death, the accused are justified by law to exercise the right of private defence if they were under a bona fide impression, though mistaken, that the march amounted to an assault causing an apprehension that otherwise death or grievous hurt would be the result.[47] In the case of Reg v Rose ,[48]there were circumstances which might have induced a belief that a man was cutting the throat of his wife. Their son shot and killed his father. It was held by Lopes J, that: 'If the accused had reasonable grounds for believing and honestly believed that his act was necessary for the defence of his mother, the homicide was excusable'. If by the exercise of the right of private defence a person escapes death or grievous hurt, it cannot be said that he had no apprehension of the same.[49]

Where after exchange of hot words, the deceased had hurled stones causing injury to one accused, while the deceased was unarmed, and the injuries of the accused were not proved by the production of medical evidence, held that the accused were not entitled to right of private defence, thus, their conviction on the charge of murder was held proper.[50]

5. Public Servant

A vakil appointed to make an attachment is a public servant within the meaning of this section. Omission to record reasons for his appointment to make the attachment does not render the attachment made by him illegal, and no right of private defence arises against his act of attaching the property.[51]633

6. 'Acting' in 'Good Faith'

'Good faith' in this section has to be read with s 52 of this Code, wherein it is provided that: 'Nothing is said to be done or believed in good faith which is done or believed without due care and attention'.[52]Good faith in criminal law is different from 'good faith' as understood in civil law. If an act is not done with due care and attention, it cannot be said to be done in good faith as far as criminal law is concerned.[53]

Where an act is done by a public servant in contravention of the mandatory provisions of law, it must be held to have been done without due care and attention and cannot be said to have been done in good faith.[54]Section 52 makes no reference to the moral elements of honesty and right motive which are involved in the popular significance of 'good faith' and which are predominant in the positive definition enacted in the other Acts of the legislature.[55] It is obviously the duty of all police officers to acquaint themselves with at least the general scope of their powers. Where the action of a police officer is altogether outside the scope of his powers, he cannot be said to have acted with due care and attention and therefore in 'good faith'.[56] Where a police officer arrests a woman in execution of a bailable warrant, deliberately refusing to give her an opportunity of giving bail he cannot be said to have acted in good faith.[57]The act of executing an illegal warrant lacks due care and attention.[58] Due care and attention implies a genuine effort to reach the truth and not the ready acceptance of an ill-natured belief.

7. Good Faith is a Question of Fact

The question of good faith is a question of fact and must be gathered from the surrounding circumstances.

> Mere actual belief without any reasonable grounds for believing is not simultaneous with good faith; but good faith does not require logical infallibility but due care and caution which must, in each case, be considered with reference to the general circumstances and the capacity and intelligence of the person whose conduct is in question. The law does not expect the same care and attention from all persons regardless of the position they occupy.[59]

Where a magistrate ordered the police 'to see that the status quo is maintained', but a police officer proceeded to demolish a wall, it was held that he could not be said to have acted in good faith, as he did not understand the meaning of the expression 'status quo' in the magistrate's order and did not take proper steps to ascertain what the magistrate intended him to do.[60]

An amin executing a warrant, knowing that the date fixed for execution had already expired, cannot be said to have acted in good faith.[61]634

However, where an amin, through inexperience or negligence failed to notice that the duration of his warrant had expired, but proceeded to arrest, honestly believing that he was entitled to do so under the warrant, it was held that there was no right of private defence against his act.[62]

In Queen-Empress v Dalip ,[63] the warrant was executed by constables different from those who were authorised to execute it as the man who was to be arrested was not in the village where it was supposed to be, and the officer of the police station on discovering this, made a copy of the warrant from the register in the thana and endorsed in it the names of other constables who were directed by him to make the arrest. The warrant was executed by these constables who were held to have acted in good faith under colour of their office, and there was nothing to suggest that with due care and attention these police could have ascertained that they were not legally authorised to make the arrest.[64]

But in Prag v Emperor ,[65] where the warrant authorised a particular amin to make the attachment, and he having failed to do so, a naib-tahsildar authorised another amin to make the attachment, it was held that the *naib-tahsildar*may have acted with the best of intentions and may have believed himself entitled to act the way he did, but if he had examined the warrants he would have at once seen that only the kurk amin named in it was authorised to execute them and if he had considered the matter for a moment, he must have realised that it was not within his power to authorise any other kurk amin to execute them and it could not therefore be said that he acted with due care and attention and therefore in good faith.

Commentary under s 52, ante, may be referred to.

Meaning of 'Under Colour of his Office'

The words 'under colour of his office' should be carefully construed. They refer to irregular, as distinguished from illegal, acts. They show that though the act was within the jurisdiction, the jurisdiction had been exercised irregularly or on insufficient grounds. In short, the act has been done wrongly, though it might have been done rightly. In other words, the clause is not intended to cure the want of jurisdiction; it only cures an erroneous exercise of it,[66] when the error affects the procedure rather than the principle, such an irregularly--e.g., as initialling a warrant instead of signing it, the mode of delivering possession or the like--would be covered by this clause.[67]

Where the bailiff's party broke the lock open and entered the hut of the judgment-debtor, in order to attach his wheat it was held that this was an act done by a public servant acting in good faith under colour of his office though that act might not be635 strictly justifiable by law, and that the judgment-debtor or people on his behalf had no right of private defence against it.[68] Similarly, where the accused resisted, and inflicted injuries on, the sales tax officer, who attempted to seize his account books under s 41(3) of the Madras General Sales Tax Act 1959 it was held that the sales tax officer purported to act under the colour of his office and the plea of self-defence was not available to the accused.[69]

Where the search proceedings started by a sub-inspector of police against an accused, are illegal and without jurisdiction, the accused has a right of private defence of property and has every right to prevent him from entering his house.[70]

Where a search warrant was defective, but a head constable carried it out in good faith under colour of his office, it was held that there was no right of private defence against it.[71]

This section contemplates only such cases in which the public servant concerned had no legal authority to do the act but he proceeded to do it in an irregular manner. It does not protect those acts of public servants for which they have no legal authority.

Where certain tahsil peons forcibly seized for military purposes a bullock-cart not let on hire and a scuffle ensued and one of the peons was hurt by the cartman; it was held that the latter acted in the exercise of his right of private defence, because the peons had no legal authority to take the cart in their charge by criminal force and without his consent, and thus their act being one not done under colour of their office, this section could be of no avail to them.[72]

The words 'public servant acting in good faith under colour of his office though that act may not be strictly justifiable by law' in this section have no application to a case where the initial proceeding and the power under which a public servant purports to act are altogether without jurisdiction and are ultra vires.[73]

Phrases 'Under Colour of his Office' and 'in the Lawful Discharge of his Duty'--Distinction

The words 'under colour of his office' are to be distinguished from the words 'in the lawful discharge of his duty' in s 332 of the IPC .[74]

In Provincial Govt, CP and Berar v Nonelal ,[75]it was held: 'The words 'in the discharge of his duty as such public servant' mean in the discharge of a duty imposed by law on such public servant in the particular case and do not cover an act done by him in good faith under colour of his office'.636

A public servant executing an invalid warrant of arrest cannot be said to be acting in the discharge of his duties but may be acting bona fide under colour of his office.[76]

'Not Strictly Justifiable by Law'

The protection afforded by this section to a public servant refers to a public servant actually doing a specific act and, so long as he is acting in good faith under colour of his office, he is protected from assault though the act may not be strictly justifiable by law.[77] As stated by Mayne:[78]

> The words 'not strictly justifiable by law' seem to point to cases where there is an excess of jurisdiction, as distinct from a complete absence of jurisdiction, to cases where the official has done wrongly what he might have done rightly, and not to cases where the act could not possibly have been done rightly.

Generally speaking, the exception contained in the first paragraph of this section applies where a public servant acts irregularly in the exercise of his powers, and not where he acts outside the scope of his powers.[79]The section does not apply to cases where there is a complete absence of jurisdiction and the act could not possibly have been done rightly.[80] Where two constables arrested a person illegally at night from the village, and on way to the police station, the accused rescued the arrested person after assaulting the constable and another person of the village who died later on; under these circumstances, it was held that the object of the respondents was not to assault or murder and the High Court rightly acquitted them of the offence.[81]

In Gograj Mahto v Emperor ,[82] Meredith J, (with whom Harries CJ, concurred) emphasised the word 'strictly' in the expression 'strictly justifiable by law' and observed that it must have been deliberately inserted by the legislature to show that this section was not intended to apply to cases where the act was wholly unjustified. It does not extend to cases where there is a complete want of jurisdiction. So also in the case of Anand Ballabh Prasad v State of Bihar ,[83] it was held that the words 'strictly justifiable by law' show that the section does not contemplate a case of initial want of jurisdiction. If there was no jurisdiction to issue a warrant of arrest or to make an arrest, this section cannot be of any help to the public servant. In the case of Sukar Sao v Emperor ,[84] Shearer J, held that the words 'not strictly justified by law' in this section apply to cases in which there is an excess of jurisdiction as distinct from a complete absence of jurisdiction. An arrest made by a police officer under s 151, CrPC, where there is no emergency contemplated by that section is illegal and neither cl (1) nor cl (2) can afford protection to him.[85] This part of the section protects the public servant against the right of private defence even if the637 authority be defective in minor particulars or even if the officer exceeds his duty in a minor particular, and it merely leaves the right of private defence open when the alleged authority is no authority at all and is wholly defective in form or the officer goes clearly and widely outside the duties imposed on him.[86] If the authority has no defect, the section has no operation.[87] Where in a proceeding under s 144 of the CrPC, the magistrate makes an order which is illegal and ultra vires, the person against whom the order is directed is not deprived of his right of private defence against the execution of the illegal and unjustifiable order.[88] Similarly, where a public servant attaching property removes it from the custody of the owner contrary to the rules of the court having the force of law, this section is no bar to the exercise of the right of private defence by the owner.[89]

Where a warrant of arrest is good and valid on the face of it, and it is sufficient to inform the person, against whom it is issued, of the reason for its issue, and the magistrate is justified in issuing the warrant on the materials before him, such a warrant would not be invalid merely by reason of the fact that the magistrate did not record in writing on the order-sheet of the case the reason for its issue which might be the same as that which he had stated in the warrant itself. There can be no right of private defence against the execution of such warrant.[90] Where accused attacked and fired at a police constable trying to arrest him, right of private defence was not available to accused.[91]

In Khuda Bux v State ,[92]there was an order of a competent magistrate to arrest a person. A police officer cannot, it was held, be said to have acted without jurisdiction in arresting that person. Assuming that the warrant of arrest was defective or irregular, it would, at the most, be a case of his exceeding jurisdiction and not of acting absolutely without jurisdiction. Hence, in executing such a warrant of arrest if the police officer acts in good faith under colour of his office, there is no right of private defence against his act.

In the case of Kalan Beg v Emperor ,[93] it was held:

> Where constables are acting under colour of their office in executing a search warrant in a village, even if their act is not strictly justifiable by law, the villagers have no right of private defence since the constables were acting in good faith. Any technical flaw in the warrant is immaterial in considering the question whether the villagers have a right of private defence.

This section protects the public servant against the right of private defence even if the authority be defective in minor particulars or if the officer exceeds his duty in a minor particular. It merely leaves the right of private defence open when the alleged authority is no authority at all and is wholly defective in form or the officer goes clearly and widely outside the duties imposed on him. If the authority has no defect,638 the section has no operation.[1] Mere irregularities in the execution of a warrant would not take the case outside the scope of the section and entitle the accused person to have a right of private defence.[2]An act of a public servant may not be strictly within his rights, but if he has acted in good faith under colour of his office, there is no right of private defence against his act.[3]

Where an order which a sub-inspector of police was carrying out was apparently lawful but was found to be unlawful on account of a technical defect, it was held that there was no right of private defence against his act.[4]

But where the order of a police head constable was wholly beyond the scope of his powers it was held that the accused had a right of private defence against force sought to be used against his person in pursuance of that order.[5]

Distinction between Illegal Acts and Acts not Strictly Justifiable by Law

The distinction between acting contrary to law and without jurisdiction and acting in a way not strictly justifiable by law has to be made.[6] There is a marked difference between the acts which are wholly illegal on one hand and the acts which may not be strictly justifiable by law. If the public servant acts without jurisdiction, it cannot be said that he acted in good faith and that this act should be protected even if it is not strictly justifiable by law. The law does not protect the illegal acts and the acts committed by a public servant without jurisdiction. 'Act not strictly justifiable by law' does not cover an act which is wholly illegal and totally without jurisdiction. Section 99 applies to acts where jurisdiction is wrongly exercised but not where there is complete absence of jurisdiction.[7] The words 'though that act may not be strictly justifiable by law' are significant. The inference from these words is that while the protection of the section extends to acts that are not strictly justifiable by law, it does not extend to acts which are ultra vires and have no legal basis. The section applies indeed to a case where an official has done wrongly what he might have done rightly but not to cases where the act could not have been done rightly at all by the official concerned.[8] In other words, the clause is not intended to cure the want of jurisdiction, but only an erroneous exercise of it. When the error affects the procedure rather than the principle, it would be covered by the clause.[9]

8. Explanation 1

Explanation 1 goes with para 1 and it is intended to protect persons who may have acted in ignorance of the fact that the person, they were dealing with, was a public servant.[10]639

In a case, the police entered a house at night to arrest the accused. The latter had no means of knowing who they were and fired at them. It was held that expln 1 to this section gave him a right of private defence.[11]

Where the public servant has a distinctive badge or uniform, his position would be manifest to all who have to deal with him. But if the public servant has no distinctive badge or attire, he has to state, who he is, before he can claim exceptional treatment. If he was, however, attended by peons whose badges proclaim his position, or if he was already known in the locality or to the other party, it would be sufficient.[12] In Emperor v Abdul Hamid ,[13] it was observed:

> We consider it necessary here to point out that it is not only proper and advisable, but really necessary, that when police officers act in the discharge of their official duty, they should be clothed in their uniform so that the public should always know that they are officers of the law acting in the discharge of their duty. That rule undoubtedly applied to ordinary cases and we can easily conceive of emergent cases in which the police officers might act without being clothed in their uniform, but in such cases it is their duty to take some steps to make it clear to the person whom they intend to arrest that they are officers of the law. If they fail to do so as the two constables did in the present case, they cannot validly seek the protection of the court.

Where an excise officer, acting bona fide and without malice, went to search the accused's house and the accused was informed of the fact that the officer was a public servant, it was held that the accused had no right of private defence against the act of the excise officer.[14]

9. Paragraph 2--Acts done by Direction of Public Servant

Under the second paragraph of this section, persons directed to do certain things by a public officer are similarly protected in the performance thereof. It is important to note how far private persons who seek to arrest others will be protected by it. A private person may arrest another under any of the following circumstances, under the provisions of the CrPC :

(i) When reasonably demanded to assist a police officer in either--(a) making an authorised arrest, or (b) in the prevention of injuries to public property, breaches of peace and riots and affrays (see s 37, CrPC).
(ii) When requested by a private person seeking to arrest under a warrant (see s 38, CrPC).
(iii) When acting under a warrant granted to himself (see ss 72 and 73, CrPC).
(iv) When ordered by a magistrate to arrest a person who has committed an offence in his presence (see s 44(1), CrPC).
(v) When he sees another person committing a non-bailable, cognizable offence in his presence (see s 43, CrPC).

Arrests must be effected in the manner laid down in s 46 of the CrPC .640

Cases 3 and 4 are clear cases of 'direction' by a public servant, and, therefore, persons acting under them, are protected by the second paragraph of this section, and there is no right of defence against them in doing what they are ordered to do.

At first sight, it appears questionable whether private persons, acting under the circumstances, given in either cases 1 or 2 can be said to act under the 'direction' of a public officer; but this difficulty is more apparent than real. Under s 37 of the CrPC, a person is bound to obey the reasonable demand of the magistrate or police officer. In the other case (s 38) the private person, called upon, is not bound to render assistance, such a course being optional with him. But, having once consented to aid, he then acts with the original grantee of the warrant, under the protection thereof. A warrant, granted to a private individual under s 72 or 73, is, in fact, a direction given not only to him, but to anyone else who, being called upon, chooses to assist the former in executing the warrant under s 38 . Resistance, then, to persons, acting under either s 37 or 38 of the CrPC, cannot be justified on the ground of 'self-defence'.

As to case 5, viz, persons acting under s 43 of that Code, it seems clear that a person who chooses to act under its provisions, must act at his peril, though practically the risk of acting unlawfully (and thereby giving the supposed guilty persons, the right of self-defence) is very slight, as the act, for which arrests may be made under that section, must be one which has actually been seen by the person making the arrest. If lawful, he is protected by s 352 ; but if unlawful, he is not. Thus, A sees B killing C. If B has murdered C,A may arrest B, his act in so doing being lawful under s 43, CrPC, and a lawful act cannot be resisted by any species of force.[15] If B killed C in self-defence, A's act in attempting to arrest B is unlawful, and B has the right of self-defence against A, for it does not come within the exceptions given by this section.[16]

10. 'Good Faith' in Paragraph 2

'Good faith' in para 2 also has to be read with s 52 of the IPC . Where a police sub-inspector, who is not entitled to give verbal instructions to private individuals to arrest persons whom it is his own duty or the duty of his own subordinates to arrest, gives such directions to private individuals in total disregard to the provisions of the CrPC, which apply to matters of arrest, he cannot be said to act in good faith, and this part of s 99 cannot be applied to deprive an individual of his right to defend himself against an unlawful arrest in such circumstances.[17] In Bhailal v Emperor ,[18] a magistrate issued a proclamation, under s 87 of the CrPC, and an order of attachment, under s 88, of the property of certain absconding accused persons. During the attachment an objection was raised that the property being attached did not belong to the absconders. The police officer, on being informed by the *patwari*that it was their property continued the attachment. A mob, amongst whom were the accused, assembled, and by assuming a threatening attitude prevented the police officer from further attaching the property. It was held that even supposing that the order of attachment might not have been properly made, that would be no sufficient ground to give the rightful owner of the property a right of private defence against the act of the police officer acting in good faith under colour of his office.641

11. Explanation 2

A private person, acting by direction, must state his authority, or produce his written authority (if he had one) if demanded. Section 75 of the CrPC, requires that both police officers and private persons acting under a warrant must notify the substance thereof to the offender, and show it to him, if demanded.[19]

12. Paragraph 3--Time to have Recourse to Public Authorities

The third paragraph of this section must be read with s 102 and the first clause of s 105 .[20] The right of defence commences when a reasonable apprehension of danger arises, and if there is no time to have recourse to the public authorities, the accused would be practically in a trapped position. The right of private defence of property is restricted by this clause. There is no right of private defence where there is time to take recourse to such protection.[21] A large number of cases have clustered round the words 'in which there is time', in s 99 of the IPC as those words have some ambiguity. Unless they are applied in the proper sense, they are liable to be misapplied and an unjust result would follow. In one sense, there is always time to have recourse to the protection of public authorities when immovable property is in danger. But if the restriction contained in s 99 is given such an interpretation, the prized legal right envisaged in the IPC regarding private defence of property would elude from those who deserve it. 'Time' referred to in the section in this context means, there must be a reasonable interval between development of apprehension and commission of the offence so that commission of the offence could be pre-empted by such authorities. Time element in s 99 does not depend on the gravity of the offence threatened. If the accused reasonably fears that the offence threatened would be completed by the time the public authorities act, the accused is not under any legal obligation to proceed to the police or other authorities, instead of exercising his right of private defence at the spot itself. If one is to go to the police station after commencement of apprehension that his property is in danger, he allows the mischief threatened to his property to be completed. He cannot be expected to run the risk of depriving himself of his private defence of property by punctiliously, insisting on his obligation to inform the police. Law is not that he should resort to public authorities by scarifying his interest in the property.[22]

No use of Force when there is Time to have Recourse to Public Authorities

Everyone has a right to protect himself in the actual enjoyment of his property, and in the actual exercise of his rights, unless the case be such that the third clause of this section applies, that is, where there is time to have recourse, instead, to the protection of public authorities in which case there is no right of private defence.[23] Right of private defence is not available where the accused had time to have recourse to the642 public authorities.[24] Referring to Hyde v Graham ,[25] Holloway J,[26] says: 'The natural tendency of the law of all civilized states is to restrict within constantly narrowing limits the right of self-help, and it is certain that no other principle can be safely applied to a country (like this)...'. The right of self-help, when it causes, or is likely to cause, damage to the person or property of another person be restricted, and recourse to public authorities must be insisted on. If a person prefers to use force in order to protect his property, when he could, for the protection of such property, easily have recourse to the public authorities, his use of force is made punishable by the IPC . No matter what the intention of that person may be, the law says that he must not use force in such a case. To hold otherwise would be to encourage and put a premium on offences of rioting which are so frequent in this part of India. The country would, in the language of Holloway J, 'be deluged with blood', if an offender who could get relief by recourse to law were allowed to take the law into his own hands.[27] Once a person has lost possession of his land he should proceed to the police station and obtain the assistance of the police, instead of himself ousting the trespasser. He has no right of self-defence in such a case.[28]

In Narayan Raut v Emperor ,[29] one Narayan was in possession of certain land which was not under crop at the time of occurrence. Bhujawan and his party, claiming the land, began ploughing it. Narayan struck Bhujawan and killed him. It was held:

> The land was not under crop at the time of the occurrence. All that the prosecution party were doing was to plough the land. They were not doing any immediate harm. There was, therefore, ample time for Narayan to have recourse to the public authorities for the protection of his rights. Hence, Narayan was not protected by any right of private defence of property.

No Recourse to Public Authorities when Right of Private Defence has Already Arisen

But property need not be abandoned to marauders in view of applying to the police,[30] nor must a person flee from a violent assault to seek their protection.[31]The law does not intend that when a person is attacked while doing a lawful act, he is not entitled to stand on his ground and defend himself, but must run away.[32] It could not have been the intention of the framers of ss 97 and 99 to compel a person having the rights of private defence of property to acquiesce in criminal trespass or mischief, and not exercise his right of private defence at all. In most cases, if recourse is had to public authorities the mischief complained of will have been committed before the public authorities come to his rescue. It follows that if the act of mischief has already begun, there is more than an apprehension of danger to the property and the right of private defence has come into existence. If the right of private defence has already arisen, it is not expected that a person, entitled to exercise it, should have recourse to the643 permission of the public authorities. He is entitled, in view of the immediate danger of injury, to defend it by exercising his right instead to having recourse to the public authorities.[33]The right of private defence against an act of trespass on one's property is not lost by reason of the omission to send word to a police station which is at some distance from the place of occurrence.[34]

In Jageshwar Rai v Emperor ,[35] one J, lawfully and legally obtained possession of certain land and sowed in it rabi crop. One B in bad faith and dishonestly, with a party of men went upon the land and commenced to cut the crops for the purpose of removing them. When J was informed of this, he in company with a band of men, went to the spot to protect his property. A fight ensued in which, however, very slight damage was done to anybody. The sessions judge suggested that the accused had plenty of time to go to the police station and to make a report of the theft. Justice Tudball held that it was true that they had ample time to do that, but that would have been of very little use so far as the protection of the property was concerned. The damage and loss would have been completed before the police could have arrived. The case of Queen-Empress v Prag Dat ,[36] was distinguished and it was observed that the case before him was not one in which the opposite party were merely ploughing up the land and preparing it for sowing. In the latter case, no significant damage would be done and there was ample time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities for the enforcement of their right. In the case before his Lordship, property was actually being cut and damaged if the applicants had gone to the police station and returned with the police help, the damage would have been completed (for a fuller discussion refer to notes under head 'Trespasser's right of self-defence' under s 97).

Where an application for protection is made it should be made on information of a definite kind as to the time and place of the danger threatened.[37]

13. Burden of Proof

This section, which is the more general section, lays down that there is no right of private defence at all when there is time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities. The burden of proof is on the accused. It would also be for them to prove that there was no time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities.[38]

14. Para 4--Extent to Which the Right may be Exercised

The extent of the harm which it is lawful to inflict in self-defence is limited, first by the rule that it is unlawful to kill an assailant unless the crime he is attempting is one of special gravity (ss 100 and 103), and secondly, by the general principle that the injury inflicted upon the assailant must never be greater than is necessary for the purpose of defence.[39] The English commissioners, in their report of 1879, said:[40]644

> We take one great principle of the common law to be, that though it sanctions the defence of a man's person, liberty, and property against illegal violence, and permits the use of force to prevent crimes, to preserve the public peace, and to bring offenders to justice, yet this is all subject to the restriction that the force used is necessary; that is, that the mischief sought to be prevented could not be prevented by less violent means, and that the mischief done by, or which might reasonably be anticipated from the force used, is not disproportioned to the injury or mischief which it is intended to prevent.

Again, at p 45 they quote a passage from the first report of the commissioners who drafted the IPC,[41] in which, while admitting that it would be illegal for a man to kill another to prevent that other from pulling his nose, they assume that it would be lawful to inflict upon him any harm short of death; 'to give the assailant a cut with a knife across the fingers, which may render his right hand useless to him for life, or to hurl him down stairs with such force as to break his leg,' and speak of a man so threatened as 'merely exercising a right by fracturing the skull and knocking out the eye of an assailant'. Upon this the commissioners say:

> (i) If we thought that the common law was such as is here supposed, we should without hesitation suggest that it should be altered. But we think that such is not, and never was, the law of England. The law discourages people from taking the law into their own hands. Still, the law does permit men to defend themselves. And when violence is used for the purpose of repelling a wrong, the degree of violence must not be disproportionate to the wrong to be prevented, or it is not justified.

This latter limitation is not expressly stated in para 4 of this section, but it is probable that its language would be held to forbid any flagrant excess in resisting minor wrongs.[42] It would be atrocious for anybody to think of using a heavy and mechanically propelled vehicle like a jeep as a means or weapon to exercise the right of private defence, even if any existed, and to uphold the plea would be to set at naught the limitations imposed by this section.[43]

A person is not justified in causing the death of a weak half-starved woman detected stealing his paddy.[44]

But where the accused, whose property had frequently been stolen, went out with a lathi to watch his property, and struck with it a thief, who died from the effects of the blows, it was held that 'the mere fact that the accused carried a heavy stick to defend himself and his property from plunderers by night does not seem to lead fairly to any other inference than that he carried with him, and used, such a weapon as a prudent man might reasonably carry, and use for the purpose of defence in such a case' and that he inflicted no more harm than was necessary for the purpose of his defence.[45]

In Queen v Durwangeer ,[46] the thief was endeavouring to escape, but the accused called for a kudali with the express purpose of killing him, and killed him on the spot accordingly. It was held that the right of self-defence under s 100 is subject to the restriction contained in para 4 of this section and the accused having intended to kill the thief, it was impossible to suppose that the killing was necessary for the purpose of defence.645

In Nakafodi v State ,[47] it was held 'While a case of self-defence may be made out on the evidence, if the blow, which causes death is on a vital part of the body, when the deceased was armed only with a lathi, it would be a case of exceeding the right of private defence'. Whilst on the one hand the infliction of death by way of self-defence can only be justified on the ground that such infliction is strictly necessary in order to prevent the offence in question being committed,[48] a man assailed as above is not bound to resort to less violence than the infliction of death, or to run away.[49]

15. Violence Inflicted in Self-defence must be Proportionate

In Hari Ram v State of Rajasthan ,[50] it has been laid down that the apprehension of danger to life and risk of grievous hurt must be reasonable and the violence inflicted must not be greater than is reasonably necessary for the purpose of self-defence. It must be proportionate and commensurate with the quality and character of the act it is intended to meet and what is done in excess is not protected.

Assault by Unarmed Person not to be Repelled by Causing Fatal Injuries

As to the quantum of force which might be employed, that would depend upon the nature and the fierceness of the assault; and the ordinary rule is that the force used should be proportionate to the force of the attack or the threatened danger. It must be such as the circumstances reasonably indicate to be necessary for self-defence. Differences of age or physical strength apart, an assault by an unarmed person is not permitted to be repelled by causing fatal injuries with a deadly weapon. Of course, the courts do not expect a person assaulted to modulate his defence step by step according to the waxing or the waning tempo of the attack. Once the assault has assumed a dangerous form, courts make all reasonable allowances in favour of a person, who, in fear of his life or limb, gives harder blows than appear necessary to a calm spectator watching from a safe distance. An accused person, when placed in such a predicament, is not expected to maintain sangfroid and remain composed and unperturbed. To use the words of Holmes J, 'detached reflection cannot be demanded in the presence of an uplifted knife'.[51] While the law does not expect from the man whose life is placed in danger to weigh with precision the extent and the degree of the force he employs in his defence, the law does insist that the person claiming such a right does not resort to force which is out of all proportion to the injuries received or threatened and far in excess of the requirements of the case. In certain eventualities, it is the duty of the accused even to retreat in order to avoid danger to himself before inflicting fatal injury. This is a necessary corollary that follows from the right of self-defence being based on necessity.[52]

Prosecution case was that when the deceased with dao rushed towards the father of the accused, the father of the accused retaliated with lathi as a result of which the dao fell down from the hand of the deceased, and thereafter, the accused attacked with lathi causing the death. Held, the right of private defence was lost when the dao fell down from the hand of the deceased. Thus, right of private defence was not available to the accused.[53]646

Shooting from Close Range

Where the accused had committed murders by shooting from a close range, the plea of self defence was held not to be available.[54]

16. Extent of Right of Private Defence Depends on the Circumstances of each Case

It is difficult to judge the extent of the right of private defence by any hard and fast rule. It depends on the circumstances of each case. Once an occasion for the exercise of the right of private defence has arisen, the accused cannot be expected to regulate the extent of force to be used by him by any precise standard.

> Where a man has been attacked by another man and uses a weapon such as a lathi, it is impossible to lay down with any sort of accuracy the extent to which the attacked person rightfully acts in his defence. Where in a marpit brought about by the illegal act of the dead person himself the accused, while resisting the attack of the deceased, happens to hit him on the head, rather harder than perhaps he intended to have done and thus kills him, he cannot be said to be exceeding his right of self-defence and should not be convicted.[55]

17. Force to be used cannot be Weighed in Golden Scales

A person who is apprehending death or bodily injury cannot weigh in golden scales on the spur of the moment and in the heat of circumstances, the number of injuries required to disarm the assailants who were armed with weapons. In moments of excitement and disturbed mental equilibrium, it is often difficult to expect the parties to preserve composure and use exactly only so much force in retaliation which is commensurate with the danger apprehended to him where assault is imminent by use of force. It would be lawful to repel the force in self-defence and the right of private defence commences as soon as the threat becomes imminent. If the fact situation shows that in the guise of self-preservation, what really has been done is to assault the original aggressor, even after the cause of reasonable apprehension has disappeared, the plea of right of private defence can legitimately be negatived. The Court dealing with the plea has to weigh the material to conclude whether the plea is acceptable.[56]

The right of private defence under s 100 of the IPC cannot be weighed in golden scale in the spur of

moment and in the heat of circumstances. What is necessary for the defence to prove under the first explanation to s 100 of the IPC is that there was a reasonable apprehension that if death of the assailant is not caused, death will otherwise be the consequence of such assault.[57]

When firing at a crowd, some of whom were advancing and some were retreating, a shot may very well hit one of the retreating persons. That would not indicate that the person threatened by the crowd was exceeding his right of private defence.[58] Where a person, seeing that his friend is being chased by another person with a da,647 strikes the pursuer, he would certainly have a right of private defence. Whether or not the blow which he struck was in excess of that right would of course depend upon the circumstances, upon the amount of danger which his friend was in, and the measures which the accused took to ensure his friend's safety.[59] If a person has a reasonable apprehension of danger to his life, he is justified in completely disabling his adversary, and if in that attempt he happens to inflict the injury with a little more force than absolutely necessary, he cannot be held liable.[60] It is for such a situation that it is often said that one cannot weigh in golden scales the maximum amount of force necessary to keep within the right of private defence.[61] The law makes every allowance to a person who apprehends a reasonable danger to his life from his adversary, and with intent of self-preservation strong upon him, pursues his defence a little further than what to a bystander may seem absolutely necessary.[62]

When lathis, talbar and other sharp-edged weapons are being used by both the parties in the fight, it is very difficult for any side to weigh the strokes that are inflicted by him and to inflict injuries only up to a certain limit and no more.[63] It is difficult to expect that a blow given would be returned with just the same degree of violence.[64] It would be circumscribing the right of private defence of the body with meticulous and unjustifiable restrictions if it were to be held that, when the person attacked had managed to obtain the weapon from the grasp of the attacker, he was not to be allowed to use that weapon in his defence in order to prevent the attacker from regaining possession of it.[65] It is not correct to say that a person apprehending danger to life or grievous hurt should inflict an injury of the same nature to the assailant as was caused to him. The man placed in a grave and imminent danger to his life, cannot be expected to wield the weapon with the same force or impact which has been wielded against him by the assailant and aggressor. Expecting blow for blow with the same measure from a person placed in the accused's situation, when grave and imminent danger to his life exists, would be a wholly erroneous and injudicious approach.[66] The only restriction imposed is that the person exercising the right should not use more force than is reasonably necessary and should not inflict an injury out of all proportion to the injury which he received or which he was threatened with.[67]

While considering whether the right of private defence is available to an accused, it is not relevant whether he may have a chance to inflict severe and mortal injury on the aggressor. In order to find whether the right of private defence is available to an accused, the entire incident must be examined with care and viewed in its proper setting.[68]648

In a case in Gujarat,[69] the deceased attempted to commit an unnatural offence on the accused and the latter in self-defence shot some arrows at the deceased, as a result of which he died. There were nine arrow injuries on the deceased and each of them was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. It was held that the right of private defence came to an end after the infliction of first injury sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, and the injuries inflicted thereafter could not be saved by any right of private defence.

The plea of the accused was that the complainant attacked him first when he was taking his turn of water and thereafter, he assaulted the complainant. Revenue records showed that the accused did not have turn of water. Held, the accused was not entitled to the right of private defence, thus, the accused appellant was convicted under ss 326 / 323, IPC .[70]

returned to the field of the accused, and the accused beat him even after he fell down, it was held that since the guard could not round up the cattle after he fell down, the beating after he fell down could not be said to be in the exercise of the right of defence of property.[71] Where the seizure of timber by the forest guard was not legal, the accused had the right of private defence of property and were not liable under s 332, IPC .[72]

But the question whether the accused had the right of private defence is in every case essentially a question of fact to be decided according to the circumstances of each case; and decided cases are not of much help except as indicating generally the principles which should be borne in mind in deciding the question. It cannot be said that in every case the accused cannot claim the right of private defence of person the moment the deceased is disarmed.[73]

It is also entirely a question of fact in the circumstances of a particular case as to whether there has been an excess of the right of private defence.[74] The court must take into consideration, all the surrounding circumstances and the matter should not be weighed in golden scales.[75] The court must have regard to comparative physical strength to the accused and the deceased and their conduct at the time of the649 occurrence.[76] So, no hard and fast rule can be laid down to determine the amount of harm which is legally justifiable or permissible in law for the exercise of the right of private defence. Individual cases are to be considered on their own peculiar facts.[77] Mere number of injuries, inflicted upon the complainant, does not show that the accused has exceeded the right of private defence.[78] In Jai Dev v State of Punjab ,[79] their Lordships of the Supreme Court considering the quantum of force to be applied in making private defence observed:

> There can be no doubt that, in judging the conduct of a person, who proves that he has a right of private defence, allowance has necessarily to be made for his feelings at the relevant time. He is faced with an assault, which causes a reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt, and that inevitably creates in his mind, some excitement and confusion. At such a moment, the uppermost feeling in his mind would be to ward off the danger and to save himself and his property, and, so, he would naturally be anxious to strike a decisive blow in exercise of his right. It is no doubt true that, in striking a decisive blow, he must not use more force than it appears to be reasonably necessary. But in dealing with the question, as to whether more force is used than what is necessary or justified by the prevailing circumstances, it would be inappropriate to adopt tests of detached objectivity which would be so natural in a Court room, for instance, long after the incident has taken place. That is why in some judicial decisions it has been observed that the means, which a threatened person adopts, or the force, which he uses, should not be weighed in golden scales.

The deceased was unarmed. The accused persons caused as many as 33 injuries. Held, the accused appellants exceeded their right of private defence.[80]

Exercise of Such Right not to be Vindictive

The violence, which the person, defending himself or his property, is entitled to use, must not be unduly disproportionate to the injury, which is to be averted or which is reasonably apprehended, and should not exceed its legitimate purpose. The exercise of the right of private defence must never be vindictive or malicious.[81] Where, by the first stroke of the accused, who gave it in his legitimate right of private defence, the deceased fell defenceless on the ground, it was held that he exceeded his right of private defence when he gave five further strokes of a serious nature as a result of which the deceased died on the spot.[82] The right of private defence of body is exceeded if the accused caused fatal injuries, after snatching the pistol from the deceased, when there is no cause for apprehension that death or grievous injury would be caused to them.[83] But where, in the exercise of the right of self-defence, the first blow, on the neck of the deceased, was sufficient to cause death, it was held that650 the repetition of similar strokes thereafter did not make the position worse and the right of self-defence cannot be said to have been exceeded for that reason.[84]

18. When Death is Caused in Exceeding the Right of Private Defence

A person may resist the execution of an illegal warrant, but he must not voluntarily inflict grievous hurt in so doing. If he does he is guilty of that offence.[85] Where the head constable entered the house of the accused without warrant or authority in law to search it and tried to molest the womenfolk, it was held that the accused had every right to inflict injuries and apprehend the said constable in exercising their right of private defence.[86]If, in exceeding the right, death is caused, the act may amount to murder or only to culpable homicide. If the person has exercised his right: (a) in good faith; (b) without premeditation of death; and (c) without any intention of doing more harm than it was necessary, his offence will be culpable homicide.[87] But these three conditions must concur[88] otherwise the offence will be murder. Where an accused has exceeded the right of private defence, he can be convicted under s 304, Pt I, and not under s 302 .[89] But if there is no initial right of private defence, the question of exceeding that right does not arise.[90]

> When it is not a case of premeditation and also it appears that the accused has no intention to murder the deceased, but all of a sudden he in exercise of his right of private defence stabbed him, therefore, although the accused was guilty of committing culpable homicide, but his act falls within the Exception 2 as envisaged under651Section 302 of the IPC, therefore, the accused was not guilty for the offence of murder, but was guilty for the offence punishable for culpable homicide not amounting to murder i.e. under Section 304 Part II of the IPC .[91]

The deceased was killed mercilessly by inflicting twenty incised injuries, which were mostly on the vital parts of the body. The injuries alleged to be received by the accused were minor and superficial. Held, even if the accused had the right of private defence, he exceeded the right of private defence.[92]

Evidence on record proved that there were altercations between the accused and the deceased, and there was threat that the informant and others would take over possession of the disputed property. There was a threat to the property of the accused and he made an effort to drive away the informant and others. Though the prosecution did not allege that the accused persons were trying to take over possession, yet on a scrutiny of the evidence it becomes quite vivid that the informant party was in a hurry to raise construction at the site and, accordingly, were taking steps. The accused had fired a gunshot but it was really not with the intention to cause the death of the deceased. The prosecution did not bring any material on record that the said accused was vindictive, or that he had any malicious intention to cause the death of the deceased. Held, the accused exceeded the right of private defence, and the case was covered by Exception 2 to s 300 . The accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II.[93]

The accused from a distance of 5 paces fired a shot causing the death of the deceased and injuries to his brother. Held, it could not be said that the accused exceeded his right of private defence. Conviction under s 302, IPC was proper.[94]

Where the accused had right of private defence of person and property, but he exceeded the right, he was convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[95]

In a sudden quarrel between the deceased and the appellant accused, the deceased took out a bamboo stick and he assaulted the appellant with a bamboo stick. The appellant then snatched the bamboo stick from the hand of the deceased and started assaulting the deceased with it. The deceased fell down and died. Held, the accused appellant had the right of private defence, however he exceeded that right. Thus, accused appellant was convicted under s 304, Pt I.[96]

19. Injuries of accused not explained by the prosecution

In Lakshmi Singh v State of Bihar ,[97] the Supreme Court held--

> It is well settled that fouler the crime, higher the proof, and hence in murder case where one of the accused is proved to have sustained injuries in the course of the same occurrence, the non-explanation of such injuries by the prosecution is a manifest defect in the prosecution case and shows that the origin and genesis of the occurrence had been652 deliberately suppressed which leads to the irresistible conclusion that the prosecution has not come out with a true version of the occurrence.

It is clear that where the prosecution fails to explain the injuries on the accused, two results follow: (1) that the evidence of the prosecution witness is untrue and (2) that the injuries probabilize the plea taken by the appellants. In a murder case, non-explanation of the injuries sustained by the accused at about the time of the occurrence or in the course of altercation is a very important circumstance from which the Court can draw the following inferences:

"(1) that the prosecution has suppressed the genesis and the origin of the occurrence and has thus not presented the true version;
(2) that the witnesses who have denied the presence of the injuries on the person of the accused are lying on a most material point and therefore their evidence is unreliable;
(3) that in case there is a defence version which explains the injuries on the person of the accused it is rendered probable so as to throw doubt on the prosecution case."

The omission on the part of the prosecution to explain the injuries on the person of the accused assumes much greater importance where the evidence consists of interested or inimical witnesses or where the defence gives a version which competes in probability with that of the prosecution one. However, there may be cases where the non-explanation of the injuries by the prosecution may not affect the prosecution case. This principle would apply to cases where the injuries sustained by the accused are minor and superficial, or where the evidence is so clear and cogent that it outweighs the effect of the omission on the part of the prosecution to explain the injuries.[1]

Chapter IV

General Exceptions

S. 100.

When the right of private defence of the body extends to causing death.--

The right of private defence of the body extends, under the restrictions mentioned in the last preceding section, to the voluntary causing of death or of any other harm to the assailant, if the offence which occasions the exercise of the right be of any of the descriptions hereinafter enumerated, namely:--

First.	--	Such an assault as may reasonably cause the apprehension that death will otherwise be the consequence of such assault;
Secondly.	--	Such an assault as may reasonably cause the apprehension that grievous hurt will otherwise be the consequence of such assault;
Thirdly.	--	An assault with the intention of committing rape;
Fourthly.	--	An assault with the intention of gratifying unnatural lust;
Fifthly.	--	An assault with the intention of kidnapping or abducting;653
Sixthly.	--	An assault with the intention of wrongfully confining a person, under circumstances which may reasonably cause him to apprehend that he will be unable to have recourse to the public authorities for his release.
[2][Seventhly.	--	An Act of throwing or administering acid or an attempt to throw or administer acid which may reasonably cause the apprehension that grievous hurt will otherwise be the consequence of such act.]

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

New clause 'Seventhly' has been added by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013 (13 of 2013), s 2 (wef 3-02-2013).

2. Scope

This section provides circumstances when death or other harm can be caused in private defence.

This section and s 101 define the extent of the right of private defence of body.[3] If a person has a right of private defence of body under s 97, that right extends, under this section, to causing death if there is reasonable apprehension that death or654 grievous hurt would be the consequence of the assault.[4] So, this section provides the circumstances when the right of private defence of the body extends to the voluntary causing of the assailant's death or any other harm to him,[5] subject to the restrictions, specified in s 99 .[6] This right arises only if an offence against the human body is committed,[7] attempted or threatened,[8] or in exercise of the right of private defence of property as provided by s 103 of the IPC . Section 100 gives an extended right of private defence of a person in cases where the offence which occasions the exercise of the right is of any of the descriptions enumerated therein. Each of the six clauses of this section talk of an assault, and assault is an offence against the human body (s 352, IPC). So, before the extended right under this section arises, there has to be the offence of assault, and this assault has to be of one of the six types mentioned in the six clauses of the section. What this section lays down is that, if the assault is of an aggravated nature, the right of private defence extends even to the causing of death.[9] Under this section and s 96, a person intentionally killing another in self-defence does not commit any offence, if he keeps within the limits prescribed by s 99, that is to say, if the assault could not be prevented by anything short of killing.[10] It has further to be borne in mind that the assault, referred to, does not mean the assault, if any, already committed, but an assault of which an apprehension can reasonably be caused, and that assault must be one which would amount to an offence. The right is a defensive one. It is granted to a citizen to be exercised for the purpose of preventing an offence affecting his body being committed. It is not, as it is sometimes misconceived, a right of retaliation against the completed offence (of assault).[11] Right of private defence is one of self defence or self protection and not right of reprisal or punishment. It is subject to restrictions indicated in s 88 of the IPC .[12]

In order to find out whether right of private defence is available or not, the injuries received by the accused, the imminence of threat to his safety, the injuries caused by the accused and the circumstances whether the accused had time to have recourse to public authorities, are all relevant factors to be considered.[13]

3. Right Commences from the mere Apprehension

The right of private defence of body commences as soon as reasonable apprehension of danger to the body arises from an attempt, or threat, to commit any of the offences, enumerated in this section; the person need not wait till he is hit by his adversary,[14]655 or he actually receives injuries.[15] It is not the actual injuries, sustained by a person, which gave him the right of private defence. Apprehension of grievous injury is enough for the exercise of the right.[16] If the evidence does not establish that the accused has sustained injuries while exercising right of private defence, the accused cannot claim benefit of right of private defence.[17]

4. Homicide in Self-defence when Justified

The person exercising the right should not use more force than is reasonably necessary and should not inflict an injury out of all proportion to the injury which he received or which he was threatened with.[18] But it must be remembered that it is a little difficult to expect a man, when he is quite alone and is attacked by several persons, to count the number of blows that he is to inflict and weigh the force with which he is to inflict them.[19] Homicide in self-defence maybe justifiable irrespective of the fact that the party killing was guilty of an assault or was engaged in an unlawful contest, provided that:

(i) the party killing did not either commence or provoke the attack with intent to kill or do grievous bodily harm;
(ii) he declined further conflict and quit and retreated from it, so far as was practicable with safety; and
(iii) he killed the assailant because he had reasonable cause for believing it to be > necessary to do so in order to avoid immediate death or the other offences here enumerated.[20]

There was evidence that the deceased in a drunken stage, armed with iron pipe, had come to the hut of the accused at the time of the incident. In such a situation, there was a reasonable cause for the accused to entertain the possibility of sustaining grievous hurt. The accused snatched the iron pipe from the deceased and gave three blows on the head of the deceased, which resulted in his death. The accused was found entitled to exercise the right of private defence, and he did not exceed this right. Thus, the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[21]

The Real Test

To claim a right of private defence extending to voluntary causing of death, the accused must show that there were circumstances giving rise to reasonable grounds for apprehending that either death or grievous hurt would be caused to him. The burden in this behalf is on the accused.[22]656

The real test to determine as to whether the right of private defence of person intended even to cause the death of one of the aggressors would be, as to whether the accused party had reasonable apprehension in its mind that the death or grievous hurt would be the consequence of assault on the accused party by the complainant party.[23]

To plead a right of private defence extending to voluntary causing of death, the accused must show that there were circumstances giving rise to reasonable grounds for apprehending that either death or grievous hurt would be caused to him.[24]

Whether the apprehension was reasonable or not is always a question of fact to be determined by the surrounding circumstances. The test, in such a case, is not whether there was any actual danger, but whether there was reasonable apprehension that such danger existed. At the same time, it must be borne in mind that a man acting under apprehension of death, or grievous hurt cannot be expected to judge the situation too well and modulate his defence step by step or to weigh the force used in golden scales.[25]

The reasonable apprehension of the accused that he may be subjected to death or with grievous injury, cannot be subjected to microscopic scrutiny but has to be looked into from the facts and circumstances of each case emerging from such incriminating evidence, which leads to no other conclusion except to the guilt of the accused.[26] In the present case, when the villagers were not armed with lathis and the accused had not received any such injury which could have been apprehended to be of grievous nature, it cannot be said that the accused acted in the right of private defence of his body. There was not even a scuffle between the villagers and the accused, who brutally killed three persons. The accused were not entitled to the plea of self defence.[27]

Two Cases

The life of an antagonist may not be taken if it can be avoided by retreating, and if retreat is practicable consistently with one's safety. Where there are two courses equally feasible, open to a person, one leading to and the other from the difficulty, he must take the latter in order to rely on the right of self-defence, if he can do so without adding to his peril. But where such a course is not possible because of suddenness or fierceness of the attack, he is not obliged to retire and in such a case he might stand his ground and inflict counter-blows. The strict Common Law doctrine of 'retreat to the wall' or 'retreat to the ditch'[28] has undergone modification. A person attacked in his own premises, or where he has a legal right to be, is not bound to retreat. The exemption from retreating is available to the faultless, but those in fault must if able to do so, there being a safe avenue of escape unless prevented by fierceness of the attack.[29] Where the assault has once assumed a dangerous form, every allowance should be made for one, who, with the instinct of self-preservation strong upon him, pursues his defence a little further than to a perfectly cool bystander657 would seem absolutely necessary. So where the accused are fighting for life like rats in a trap with a murderous mob in front of them and an enemy has made his way to the room where they had taken refuge, they cannot be held guilty if they purposely kill their assailant.[30]

Right of Private Defence can be Claimed Against Unarmed Assailant Also

The law of private defence does not envisage that the right of private defence of body cannot be claimed against an assailant who is not armed with some weapon. The language of this section makes it clear that the question, whether a person has a right of private defence in a given case, depends on the manner in, and the ferocity with which, he is attacked and the apprehension in his mind, resulting from such an attack, and not on the question, whether he was armed or otherwise. If, in view of the manner of attack, he has a genuine apprehension that the person, assaulting him, would either cause his death or grievous hurt to him, he would be justified in causing the death of his assailant in exercising the private defence irrespective of the fact whether the assailant was armed or not.[31] For exercising the right of private defence of body by causing the death of the aggressor, it is not necessary that some injury must always be caused to the person acting in the right of private defence. The right of private defence of body commences as soon as a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body arises from an attempt and lasts so long as the reasonable apprehension of danger to the body continues.[32] The complainant party was unarmed but the accused persons armed with kattas and guns, had gone to the place of occurrence, and the accused persons fired with guns causing the death of the deceased. Held, accused persons had no right of private defence, thus, they were convicted under ss 302 / 149, IPC .[33]

Cardinal Conditions for Taking Life in Self-Defence

Four cardinal conditions must exist before the taking of the life of a person on the plea of self-defence:[34]

(i) the accused must be free from fault in bringing about the encounter;
(ii) there must be present and impending peril to life or of great bodily harm, either real or so apparent as to create honest belief of an existing necessity;
(iii) there must be no safe or reasonable mode of escape by retreat; and
(iv) there must have been a necessity for taking life.

The rule that a felonious attack may be resisted by deadly force does not apply to any crime unaccompanied with force, such as pocket-picking. The intent to murder, ravish, or commit a felony attended with force or surprise should be apparent, and not be left in doubt; so that if A makes an attack on B, it must plainly appear by the manner of the assault, the weapon, etc, that the life of B is in imminent danger; otherwise his killing the assailant will not be justifiable self-defence. There must be an intention on the part of the person killed to rob, or murder, or to cause some658 serious bodily injury to the person killing; or the conduct of the party must be such as to render it necessary on the part of the party killing to do act in self-defence.[35]

Merely because an accused has received injuries during the course of an occurrence, does not ipso facto entitle him to right of private defence.[36]

Ordinarily, no Right of Private Defence against Woman

Woman by her feminine nature and with a feeble body, ordinarily would not pose threat or danger to life of a well-bodied man with a lathi.[37]

5. Homicide when Justifiable

Death, if necessary for the purpose of defence, may be caused in the following cases:

(i) In the case of defence of body (s 100) when:
  (a) Assault causes fear of death.
  (b) Assault causes fear of grievous hurt.
  (c) Assault is with intent to commit rape.
  (d) Assault is with intent to commit unnatural offences.
  (e) Assault is with the intention of kidnapping or abduction.
  (f) Assault is with the intention of wrongfully confining a person and, thus, preventing recourse to the public authorities.

(ii) In the defence of property (s 103) when any of the following acts is committed.
  (a) Robbery.
  (b) House-breaking by night.
  (c) Mischief by fire on any building, tent or vessel, used as a human dwelling or as a place for the custody of property.
  (d) Theft, mischief, or house-trespass, reasonably causing apprehension by death, or grievous hurt.

The right of private defence against affords a complete defence to homicide in the circumstances mentioned in this section and s 103 . Causing of death is not justified where this section or s 103 is not attracted.[38]

6. Burden of Proving Exception is on the Accused

The law in India places the burden of proof upon the prosecution to bring the guilt home to the accused, and does not admit of any exception. The presumption of innocence has to be dislodged by the prosecution by leading evidence pointing to the guilt of the accused. Under s 105 of the Indian Evidence Act, the burden of proving the existence of circumstances bringing the case within any of the general or special exceptions is placed on the accused. To claim a right of private defence extending to voluntary causing of death, the accused must show that there were circumstances giving rise to reasonable grounds for apprehending that either death or grievous hurt659 would be caused to him.[39] The burden is on the accused to show that he had a right of private defence which extended to causing of death. Where the deceased had a number of injuries, the accused must prove that, at the time of causing each injury, he was acting in the exercise of his right of private defence.[40]

It is for the accused claiming the right of private defence to place necessary material on record either by himself adducing positive evidence or by eliciting necessary facts from the witnesses examined for the prosecution, if a plea of private defence is raised.[41]

Accused has to Discharge his Burden when Prosecution Proves its Case

Where a person, accused of committing an offence, set up, at his trial, a plea that he is protected by one of exceptions, general or special, in the IPC or any other law, the burden of proving the exception undoubtedly lies upon him. But this burden is to be discharged by the accused only if the prosecution case establishes that, in the absence of such a plea, he would be guilty of the offence charged.[42] The accused however, need not establish their right beyond all reasonable doubt. It is enough if a reasonable doubt arises on examination of the probabilities of the case.[43] Onus of proof to establish the right of the private defence is not as onerous as that of the prosecution to prove its case. And where the facts and circumstances lead to preponderance of probabilities in favour of the defence case, it would be enough to discharge the burden to prove the case of self-defence.[44] Where the evidence on the record raises some doubt as to whether the accused exceeded their right of private defence, they are entitled to an acquittal.[45] Every case is to be considered on its own facts and, before giving to any accused person the benefit of the right of private defence, a court of law must be satisfied that this case is clearly covered by the general exception.[46] In order to reject the theory that the accused are not entitled to the right of private defence, it is the duty of prosecution to come with a true story. If the true story is presented, the court would be in a position to say that the action of the accused persons was illegal and they had no right of private defence. If, on a thorough scanning of the prosecution case, the court is not in a position to say that the accused were guilty beyond reasonable doubt, they are entitled to an acquittal.[47]

7. Not Necessary to Set up Plea of Self Defence at Investigation Stage

In the absence of evidence in a categorical manner as to how the occurrence started, the benefit of doubt has to be given to the accused and it may be accepted that they were not the aggressors and on being attacked they had a right of private defence.[48] Normally, if there is non-explanation of the injuries of the accused, it may give scope to argue that the accused had the right of private defence or in general that the prosecution evidence should be rejected as they have not come out with the whole660 truth particularly regarding the genesis of the occurrence.[49] But when once it is found that the evidence of the prosecution witnesses is cogent, convincing and trustworthy, failure to explain the trivial injuries found on the accused is of no consequences and on the ground it cannot be stated that the entire prosecution has to be thrown out as false.[50] It is not necessary that the accused should set up the plea of self-defence during the investigation of the case. Without putting forward the plea of right of self-defence even during the trial the accused can rely on the circumstances and admissions made by the witnesses in support of his plea without even setting up a specific plea.[51] Burden to prove self-defence is on accused but where the accused failed to discharge the burden and prosecution also failed to establish story set up by it, incriminating part of the statement of accused cannot be picked out for his conviction.[52]

8. Clauses 1 and 2--Reasonable Apprehension of Death or Grievous Hurt

It is true that no person exercising right of private defence can inflict more harm on the assailants than necessary for the purpose of defence, but if the facts of the case disclose that the accused party was in an eminent and reasonable danger of losing their lives or limbs, therefore, if they in exercise of right of their private defence, inflicted any harm even extending to death, it cannot be said that they exceeded right of defence and inflicted more harm on the complainant party than was necessary for the purpose of private defence. The approach in deciding this question should be from the vision of a common man. The matter should not be judged with a vision of cool by stander but with empathy. The act of the accused person is covered by cl (1) of s 100, IPC . Where the accused persons acted in the right of private defence the violence inflicted by them would not be penal but would be a justifiable violence and hence immune from punishment.[53] If homicide is to be justified under these clauses, the person exercising the right of private defence must have been under a reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt,[54] to himself or to those whom he is protecting, and in the case of property the danger to it must be of the kinds mentioned in the s 103 .[55] These clauses do not lay down that grievous hurt must be actually caused by the assailant before the right of private defence comes into play. No court expects the citizens not to defend themselves particularly when they have already suffered grievous injuries.[56]

All that this section lays down, is that the person claiming the right of private defence must be under a bona fide apprehension or fear that death or grievous hurt would otherwise be the consequence of the assault on him, if he does not defend661 himself.[57] Four persons of complainant party, armed with lathi and balkati had come at the house of the accused appellant well prepared. The appellant was assaulted on the head by a sharp edged weapon 'balkati' causing a bone deep injury. In such a situation, the accused persons could have a reasonable apprehension of death or at least of grievous hurt. One of the accused persons in self-defence fired a shot at the deceased causing death. Held that the accused persons acted in exercise of right of private defence. It was a case of single gun shot which was not repeated. Therefore, it cannot be said that the accused persons had exceeded their right of private defence in any manner. Accused persons were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[58] And where the assault has assumed a dangerous form every allowance must be made for one, who, with instincts of self-preservation pursues his defence a little farther than what to a perfectly calm bystander would seem absolutely necessary.[59] But the mere protest gives no cause for any reasonable apprehension that death or grievous hurt would be caused.[60] In considering whether one is entitled to exercise the right of private defence of his body, he has to place himself in the position of the accused in the midst of the circumstances in which he stood and to form his opinion whether for him, in those circumstances, it was not fairly wise to apprehend such an injury to the body as would entitle him to exercise the right that he claims to have done. Where, an accused charged with murder, asserts that he killed in self-defence, his state of mind at the time of the killing, becomes material and an important element in determining his justification or his belief in an impending attack by the deceased. The previous relationship between the deceased and the accused and the deceased's aggressive temperament and disposition shown in his conduct of trespassing into the accused's house in order to assault her, while she was retracting her steps, must go a great way to cause belief, in the accused, in an impending danger to life accompanied with little chance of escape.[61] There was long standing enmity between the accused respondent and the deceased. The deceased with his armed henchmen had entered the house of the accused to assault, and thereupon the accused gave warning to the deceased, fired on him, and repeated the fire. The accused acted in exercise of right662 of private defence to protect his life, and that of his family members, Clause I of s 100 was attracted in the case, such that he was acquitted of the charge of murder.[62] The mind of the accused, at that particular point of time, cannot be determined with the detached objectivity prevalent in court room.[63]

A partition dispute between the father of the accused and the deceased was pending. The deceased inflicted axe blow, hitting the father of the accused on the head. The accused entertained apprehension of death or grievous injury, therefore, in exercise of right of private defence fired from his 12 bore double barrel gun, causing death of the deceased. Held, the accused acted in exercise of right of private defence. Thus, accused was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[64]

In the instant case, as soon as three victims along with one V had gone to the house of the appellant, all of them were brutally assaulted by him. Held, the act of the appellant did not fall within the purview of right of private defence.[65]

Merely because there was a quarrel and accused persons claimed to have sustained injuries, that does not confer a right of private defence extending to the extent of causing death as in this case. Though such right cannot be weighed in golden scales, it has to be established that the accused persons were under such grave apprehension about the safety of their life and property that retaliation to the extent done was absolutely necessary. No evidence much less cogent and credible was adduced in this regard. The accused had cut both the legs of the deceased and caused injuries in brutal manner. The conviction of the accused appellant on the charge of murder was upheld.[66]

There was evidence that the deceased in a drunken stage armed with iron pipe had come to the hut of the accused at the time of the incident. In such a situation there was reasonable cause for the accused to entertain the possibility of sustaining grievous hurt. The accused snatched the iron pipe from the deceased and gave three blows on the head of the deceased resulting in death. The accused was found entitled to exercise right of private defence, and did not exceed the right of private defence. The accused was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[67]

Merely because there was a quarrel and some of the accused persons sustained injuries, would not confer a right of private defence extending to the extent of causing death. It has to be established that the accused persons were under such grave apprehension about the safety of their life and property that retaliation to the extent done was absolutely necessary. In the instant case, no evidence was adduced in this regard. Thus, the right of private defence, claimed by the appellants accused persons, was discarded.[68]

Where the deceased along with two persons had gone to the house of the deceased in dead of night, and the accused had sustained five injuries, held that the accused was entitled to right of self defence.

Totality of Occurrence has to be taken into Consideration

Section 105 of the Evidence Act provides that the burden of proof, if case of the accused comes within an exception, lies upon him. General exceptions are contained in ch IV of the IPC, comprising the right of private defence too. It is not necessary for the accused to lead evidence to prove that he acted in exercise of right of private defence and it may be inferred on the scrutiny of the prosecution evidence itself together with attending circumstances brought on record. But the entire scenario has to be viewed for coming to the right conclusion.[70] In appreciating the defence version, the totality of the occurrence from the beginning of the dispute to the assault on the accused should be taken into account.[71] Where the party of the deceased appeared in a lane and exits at both the ends of the lane were closed, it was held that the violent and threatening attitude of the party of the deceased was sufficient to give a reasonable apprehension to the accused to believe that he was in danger of receiving grievous hurt at the very least.[72] Where the totality of the circumstances brought on record do not point out to the guilt of the accused persons, they are entitled to be acquitted.[73]

Where the complainant party wanted to settle the issue of turning the flow of water from the canal, came to the field of the accused duly armed with lathis and other weapons, a fight took place and on an attack by the complainant party first, the accused in his right of self-defence caused the death of one of them, it was held that mere apprehension that a person would get grievous hurt extends his right of causing death, so the accused were entitled to be acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[74] But when life of the accused was not endangered from ladies alleged to be armed with broomsticks and chappals and not with any deadly weapon, the accused could not have caused death of one of the ladies in exercise of self-defence.[75]

The accused may have the right of self defence in the beginning, but once the deceased was caught and tied to a tree, the threat to the life and property of the accused terminated, and if the accused inflicted injuries on the deceased thereafter, he exceeded the right of self defence. Thus, he was convicted under ss 302 and 324, IPC .[76] The right of private defence ceased when the deceased retreated to his house.[77]

Where the accused, on hearing his widowed sister-in-law's cry for help, rushed to her house with gandasa and found her house open, and the injured grappling with her and trying to outrage her modesty, the accused saved his sister-in-law and inflicted a blow with the gandasa while the injured was running away, it was held that the accused was entitled to right of private defence under s 100, IPC .[78]664

Where the land where occurrence took place belonged to the accused party and was in their possession, the complainant party went there and tried to assault the accused while the accused were putting up a shed in their land. The deceased sustained fatal injuries in the scuffle, injuries suffered by the accused persons were not explained by the prosecution, the accused were entitled to the benefit of doubt.[79] Where some amount remained unpaid by the deceased to the accused running a betel leaf shop who refused to give betel leaves to the deceased. The deceased returned to the shop of the accused for a second time, abused the accused and tried to cause damage to the shop property. Faced with such danger, the accused reacted and caused injury by stabbing the deceased with a sharp weapon on the apprehension of sustaining grievous injury at the hands of the deceased. The accused could not be said to have exceeded self-defence.[80]

Plea of Right of Private Defence cannot be based on Surmises and Speculations

It is trite that a plea of right of private defence cannot be based on surmises and speculation. Burden to prove the plea is on the accused and it stands discharged by showing preponderance of probabilities in favour of that plea of the basis of material on record. Defence must be reasonable and probate version satisfying the court that the harms caused by the accused was necessary for either warding off the attack or for forestalling any further reasonable apprehension from the attacker. The right of self defence preserved by the law for an individual is a very narrow and circumscribed right and can be taken advantage of only when the circumstances fully justify the exercise of such a right.[81] But the mere fact that the deceased and his companions were armed with weapons, is not sufficient to create apprehension in the mind of the accused that they would kill him. A plea of right of private defence cannot be based on surmises and speculations. There must be some evidence to establish the circumstances which necessitated the exercise of such a right.[82] Where there was no evidence showing that the assault by the deceased by some weapon would have reasonably caused apprehension in the mind of the accused that grievous hurt would otherwise be caused, evidence of the doctor showed that injuries found on the person of the accused would not have been caused with forceful assault with such weapon. The accused himself had chosen to be examined as a witness but did not utter a word about his apprehension, the plea of right of private defence of the accused was found not sustainable.[83] Where there was mere exchange of words between the accused and the deceased and the deceased did not attack the accused and the accused stabbed the deceased resulting in his death; it was held that there was no reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt and the right of private defence was not available.[84] Such apprehension of danger to life or risk of grievous hurt must be reasonable and the violence inflicted must not be greater than is reasonably necessary for the purpose of self-defence. It must be proportionate and665 commensurate with the quality and character of the act it is intended to meet, and what is done in excess is not protected.[85]

Where at the relevant time the deceased and the accused were sitting together and drinking liquor, both started quarrelling and exchanging blows with fists, the accused therefore gave two blows on a vital part of the body of the deceased with a knife, there was no evidence that the deceased had posed danger to accused either by holding out a threat or brandishing a weapon, on these facts the plea self defence was held not tenable.[86]

Where during a communal riot the mob approached and started beating the doors of the accused's shop and the accused fired two shots as a result of which a member of the mob was killed, it was held that the circumstances in which the accused was placed were amply sufficient to give him the right of private defence even to the causing of death.[87]

Where a person sees his enemies following him with dangerous weapons he may reasonably apprehend grievous hurt to himself.[88]

The IPC puts no restriction either upon the weapon, or upon the mode of using it, in those particular cases in which it provides that the voluntary causing of death is justified when acting in exercise of the right of private defence of the body, but, of course, all the circumstances of the case must be considered together.[89]

Where a party marches with lathis in horizontal position and armed with rifles and revolvers, it may amount to an assault as may reasonably cause the apprehension that death or grievous hurt would be the consequence of the assault.[90]

The occurrence had taken place in front of the house of the appellant. He had categorically stated that the two deceased persons, had come alongwith another person and opened fire at him. The doctor had found several gunshot injuries on the person of the appellant. These circumstances probabalise his version. Even if the explanation given by the prosecution has to be accepted, the fact remains that the accused received gunshot injuries at the hands of one of the companions of the two deceased persons. In that event also he could exercise his right of self-defence to the extent of protecting his own person. Held, that in view of the specific plea of right of self-defence and the attendant circumstances, the plea set up by him appears to be probable. Therefore, he is entitled to the benefit of doubt.[91]

An attack with a dang[92] or a scythe may cause a reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt being caused.[93]

Lathis are deadly weapons.[94] If a man is attacked by another armed with such a weapon, he cannot be sure that the intention of the aggressor is not to kill. He666 therefore is entitled in his own defence to take every precaution that he is not killed, even if that entails killing his adversary.[1] In Janabali Sheikh v State of West Bengal ,[2] where the accused was hit by a lathi, it was ruled by the Supreme Court that at best there could be simple injury on the person of the accused and for that purpose he had no right to hit the assailant with such force so as to cause the fracture of the frontal bone of his head. It was held that the accused was not entitled to get the benefit of the right of private defence.

Squeezing of testicles can cause death, and where a person's testicles are squeezed, he may reasonably apprehend death or grievous hurt.[3]

If the assailant is disarmed or otherwise disabled,[4] or runs away from the scene so as to escape therefrom Gopal v State of Rajasthan ,[5] there can be no further apprehension of death or grievous hurt, and killing him by a subsequent blow cannot be justified under this section.

Responsibility of Accused cannot be Judged by Meticulous Standard

However, while it is sure that the exercise of the right of private defence subsists only so long as an apprehension of the aggressive attack continues, it is also well-settled that an accused who has had to face an aggressive murderous attack by the deceased and who had to struggle with him in order to get possession of the weapon which was used against him, cannot be expected to exercise any calm and logical judgment in the situation. His responsibility is not to be judged by any meticulous standard.[6] The Shimla High Court has held that thrust of the assault is not expected to be weighed by the accused in golden scales, since it is really a question of do or die.[7]

When the appellant saw that the aggressors were numerically stronger, they started the assault and his wife was assaulted by one of them by means of a stick or a lathi, it was normally difficult on his part to remain calm. On the other hand, like a normal human being having the instinct to protect himself and his near and dear ones from the approaching danger, it was possible that he was convinced from the surrounding circumstances that unless he could seriously resist the attack and strike, he would be further assaulted and could be killed. At such a critical moment it was neither possible nor likely for the appellant to deliberate in a calm mood about the pros and cons of the situation in a golden scale and then inflict injuries on the right persons so that no harm greater than what was required was caused.

In one case there was a quarrel and an exchange of abuses between the deceased and the accused. While the exchange of abuses was going on, the deceased gave the accused a lathi blow. The accused happened to have a sword with him and struck the deceased with in return. The first blow was stopped by the deceased on his lathi and then the accused gave a second blow on the left leg of the deceased with the result that the deceased fell down injured. Thereafter the accused went away. The deceased died in the hospital the next day. It was held that the apprehension that had arisen in the mind of the accused must still have continued, for the deceased was still in the possession of the lathi, So long, therefore, as the deceased had a lathi in his hand, the accused could repeat the attack. Under the circumstances the second blow given by the accused was justified.[9]

Where the accused having succeeded in appeal, had gone to the field with a view to ask the prosecution party to vacate the premises, that by itself does not render them to be aggressors for the purpose of denying them the benefit of the right of self-defence.[10]

9. Clause 3--Assault with Intent to Commit Rape

Where the accused found his wife being assaulted by the deceased with the intention of committing rape and inflicted certain injuries which resulted in his death, it was held that the case was covered by the third clause of this section, and the homicide was completely justified.[11] In a similar case it has been held that though the right of private defence laid down in this section is a restricted right and has to be read subject to the provisions of s 99, still the action of the accused in the particular case was covered by the third clause of this section and that the accused was entitled to an acquittal.[12]

Where the complainants went to the house of the accused at 9.00 pm and started dragging and beating a 25 year old young lady of the family with an ulterior motive to force her to sexual intercourse, it was held that these circumstances were sufficient for the accused to have taken law in their own hands entitling them to cause harm or even death to the assailants while exercising the right of private defence of body.[13]

Evidence showed that heated arguments took place between the accused and the deceased for more than an hour, the deceased under the influence of liquor, had trespassed into the house of the accused with an intention of molesting accused, who in fact was his real sister-in-law. Accused persons were attacked and had suffered serious injuries and had, therefore, acted in their right of private defence. There was no explanation from the prosecution about the injuries sustained by the accused persons. Accused persons may have retaliated to ward off the blows given by the deceased. Held, the accused persons acted in exercise of their right of private defence. Accused persons were acquitted of the charge under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[14]668

Where in order to save her honour, the accused, a young widow, stabbed the deceased who was attempting to commit rape, it was held that she was entitled to protection in exercise of her right of private defence. No offence was committed by her.[15] Even a woman of immoral character is entitled to protect herself from attack of an intending rapist.[16]

In the instant case, the accused pleaded that the incident occurred as the deceased had attempted to rape his wife. Mere ejaculation of semen on penis was held not sufficient evidence of attempt to commit rape. The plea of the accused was rejected.[17]

Where accused on hearing his widowed sister-in-law's cry for help rushed to her house with gandasa and her house was found open by the accused and the injured was found grappling with her and trying to outrage her modesty and rape her, the accused saved his sister-in-law from the clutches of the injured and inflicted a gandasa blow while the injured was running away, it was held that the accused was entitled to right of private defence under s 100 of the IPC .[18] Where the deceased was alleged to have taken the opportunity of the absence of the mother of the prosecutrix and after alluring the accused to consume liquor made an attempt to rape the daughter of the accused, who was pregnant, and the accused in anger stabbed the deceased with a sword lying in the room, he was found entitled to the benefit of the right of private defence of person of his daughter.[19]

Consent of Minor Girl for Sexual Intercourse

Where the sexual intercourse is committed with a minor girl of 15 years, her consent for the same is immaterial and in such a case, the right of private defence arises and the case is fully covered by ss 96 - 97 read with s 100, IPC, as the sexual indulgence would amount to rape within the meaning of cl 6 of s 375, IPC .[20]

10. Clause 4--Assault with Intent to Commit Unnatural Lust

The deceased attempted to commit an unnatural offence against the accused, the accused attacked him, and even when he fell down, the accused inflicted further injuries. The victim died soon thereafter. It was held that the right of private defence, which the accused had, came to an end with the infliction of the first injury, and he exceeded that right when he inflicted more injuries after the deceased had fallen down.[21] Where the accused was caught by witnesses while trying to run away after opening the door of the house of the deceased and the body of the deceased was found in naked state in his house, the defence of the accused that the deceased stripped and attacked the accused with a view to have unnatural sex with him and hence he assaulted deceased in order to protect himself appearing to be probable, the injuries on the person of the accused supporting his case as the said injuries were possible due to the fall during scuffle, the accused was found entitled to benefit of the right of private defence. However, as he exceeded right of private defence by causing death of the deceased he was held liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt II.[22]669

Section 377 of the IPC deals with the offence of unnatural lust. For the definition and ingredients of this offence see the commentary thereunder.

11. Paragraph 5--Assault with the Intention of Kidnapping or Abduction

Sections 359 - 69 of the IPC deal with the offences of kidnapping and abduction (for the definition and ingredients of these offences see the commentary thereunder). The view taken in Emperor v Ram Saiya ,[23] and followed in State v Badri ,[24] that the word 'abducting' used in the fifth clause of this section, refers to such abducting as is an offence under the IPC and not merely to the act of abduction, as defined in s 362 thereof, and that mere abduction is not an offence and, therefore cannot give rise to any right of private defence, is not correct. It is true that the right of private defence of a person arises only if an offence against the human body is committed. This section gives an extended right of private defence of person in cases where the offence, which occasions the exercise of the right, is of any of the descriptions, enumerated therein. Each of the six clauses of this section talks of an assault, and the assault is an offence against human body (refer to s 352, IPC). So, before the extended right under this section arises, there has to be the offence of assault and this assault has to be of one of the six types mentioned in the six clauses of the section. In each of the six clauses enumerated in the section, there is an offence against the human body, namely, assault. Thus, the right of private defence arises against that offence and what this section lays down is that if the assault is of an aggravated nature, as enumerated in that section, the right of private defence extends even to the causing of death. Where the accused's sister was being abducted from her father's house by her husband, and there was an assault on her and she was being compelled, by force, to go away from her father's place: it was held that the accused had the right of private defence of the body of his sister against an assault with the intention of abducting her by force and that right extended to the causing of death.[25] The same view was taken in the undermentioned cases,[26] though there is no discussion on this point there. In order to attract the fifth clause of this section, there must be an assault, which is an offence against human body, and that assault should be with the intention of abducting.[27]

Seizure of the person and dragging a debtor to his creditor by the peons of the creditor against his will, constitutes an offence of abduction within the meaning of s 362, thereby giving the person so dragged the right of private defence of his body even to the extent of causing of death, subject to restrictions mentioned in s 99 .[28]

Where a girl is being carried away forcibly against her will, those who attempt to rescue her are entitled to use sufficient force to achieve that purpose. If stones are670 hurled for the purpose and accidentally a stone hits someone on the head and he is killed, it cannot be said that the person who threw the stone exceeded the right of private defence.[29]

12. A Woman's Right of Private Defence against Husband

A woman, who is free to refuse to go with a person who claims to be her husband and if such person attempts to take her away by force from her father's house with a view to abduct her, then she is justified in using force in resisting his assault, even if such force were to result in his death.[30]

A woman was being brutally beaten by her husband, a very brutal and dangerous man. She rushed out of her room and asked her brother, who was sleeping nearby, to protect her. She was followed by her husband who said that he was going to continue the beating. The brother thereupon seized a hatchet and killed him. There was evidence that if he had not done so, the deceased might have killed him. It was held that considering the brutal character of the deceased, the brother had reasonable apprehension for his own life, the killing was justified.[31]

13. Clause 6--Assault with the Intention of Wrongfully Confining a Person

'Wrongful confinement' has been defined by s 340 of the IPC . This is a minor offence punishable with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to Rs 1,000, or with both.[32] So, it is not every type of wrongful confinement, which is covered by this section. Under the sixth clause of this section, the right of private defence is available to a person against an assault: (a) when such assault has been made with the intention of wrongfully confining a person; (b) when such assault has been made in circumstances as may reasonably cause him an apprehension that it will not be possible for him to have recourse to the public authorities for his release; and (c) when such assault falls under the restrictions mentioned in s 99 .[33] The causing of injuries in exercise of a right of private defence postulates an intention to cause injury in self-defence. Even if the accused was wrongfully confined at the time when he fired a second shot at the person who was moving towards him probably to release him, he can have no right of private defence under the said clause.[34] In another case, the accused, after causing injuries to a person, was running away when he was caught by the deceased. The accused was followed by persons armed with lathis. The accused gave a stab wound to the deceased resulting in his death. It was held that the case fell under this clause, the act of the deceased in arresting the accused amounted to assault with intention of wrongfully confining him in the circumstances of the case and the accused did not exceed the right of private defence.[35] This clause must be read with s 101, and the effect of reading this section and s 101 together is not to render an individual entirely helpless in the matter of his unlawful arrest, but to limit the force which he may exercise to hurt, which is something less than voluntarily671 causing death. Where the person arrested kills the person arresting by using force against him s 101 does not apply. And if the person arrested knows that he is wanted by the police and that he is being taken to the police station for the purpose of being handed over to the police, he has no right of private defence under s 100, cl 6.[36]

Where the accused had gone to meet a lady with whom his illicit relationship was suspected, his mere presence with the lady at her house could not amount to an offence. Consequently, forcibly preventing the exit of the accused was an offence. It was held that the accused had a right of private defence to make good his escape.[37]

14. Clause 7--Act of throwing or Administering Acid

Under the new clause "Seventhly", added by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013, against the act of throwing or administering acid or an attempt to throw or administer acid which may reasonably cause the apprehension that grievous hurt will otherwise be the consequence of such act, a person has also been given the right to cause the death or any other harm to the assailant.

15. Exceeding Right of Private Defence

Where the accused are not found entitled to any right of private defence the question of exceeding such right does not arise.[38] To determine the question whether the accused exceeded the right of private defence, the court must consider the part played by the accused person, the gravity of the offence committed and the nature of the attack made by the accused.[39] If the right of private defence is exceeded, by the non-observance of any of the foregoing rules, it cannot be availed by the accused as a defence. Where, however, the right is exceeded and the case falls within Exception 2 to s 300 of the IPC, the offender is not completely absolved, but the offence is reduced from murder to culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[40] In case of mischief of property the accused has the first degree of right of private defence which extends to committing murder of the wrongdoers but the right must be held to have exceeded when there was no fear that but for the exercise of the right the death or grievous hurt might ensue.[41]

Prosecution evidence was that there was grave and sudden provocation as stones from the side of the house of the deceased had fallen on the house of the appellant accused. The appellant had every right to protect his properties, but he exceeded672 the right by inflicting repeated blows leading to the death of the deceased. Held, case was covered by Exception 2 to s 300, and appellant was convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[42]

Where accused, in the confessional statement made by him under s 313, CrPC, stated that he inflicted two or more blows after the deceased fell down, the accused was held to have exceeded his right of self-defence and so was liable to be consisted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[43] Where there was nothing to show that the accused side was outnumbered by the complainant's side, there was no evidence adduced by the accused to show that the circumstances necessitated shooting dead three persons and injuring other, the accused persons can be said to have exceeded right of private defence and are liable to be convicted on the basis of their individual acts.[44] Where the complainant party attacked the mother of the accused causing grave injury with a sharp weapon, the accused, in order to rescue the mother inflicted a lathi blow with great force on the head of the deceased, it was held that by inflicting the lathi blow with great force the accused had exceeded the right of private defence and his conviction under s 304, Pt II was proper.[45]

On account of previous enmity, the complainant party first attacked the accused and gave blows, and thereafter the accused gave solitary knife blow to the deceased causing his death. Held, the accused exceeded his right of private defence of property.[46]

Where deceased committed criminal trespass but he was unarmed, and there was no apprehension that death or grievous hurt was likely to be caused to the accused. The accused gave two knife blows on the chest of the deceased in quick succession, it was held that accused exceeded the right of private defence of property and was liable under s 304, Pt I and not under s 302 .[47] However, where there was a dispute regarding the victim's obstructing the watercourse to the accused's field, it let to the victim's assaulting the accused with an agricultural instrument causing injury. The accused grappled with the victim, the victim freed himself and again appeared to assault the accused. The accused in defence inflicted a blow of his instrument on the victim but inflicted no further blows after the victim fell down. The accused did not exceed his right of private defence and was entitled to acquittal.[48]

Right of Private Defence

In the instant case, the accused S and his sons were in established possession of the land in dispute, where the occurrence took place, and had sown the crops therein. The members of the complaining party damaged the crops by ploughing the same with a tractor, with an intention to take forcible possession thereof. The appellants were, therefore, entitled to resist the invasion of the members of the complainant party, as they were armed with guns and sharp edged weapons. S, one of the accuseds, had received as many as seven injuries, at the hands of the members of the complainant party. Out of these injuries, one was declared grievous in nature. In such a situation, in which S and his sons were placed, it was not possible for them to weigh their673 blows in golden scales in order to assault the members of the complainant party. Since S and his sons entertained a real apprehension that the members of the complainant party, with their fire-arms and sharp edged weapons, could cause death or grievous hurt to them, they were fully justified in causing the death of the deceased in exercise of their right of private defence. Thus, all the appellants accused were acquitted of the charge of murder.[49]

But when accused persons dragged the deceased in the middle of the road and one of them gave a blow on the chest of the deceased with a dagger which caused grievous injury that resulted in his death, it was held that right of private defence of person was exceeded as the fact that the deceased was holding a shoe in his hand could not cause reasonable apprehension in the mind of the accused that there would be danger to their lives.[50] Where in a property dispute between brothers, the injuries sustained by the accused were minor in nature and needed no explanation, the dispute was not very serious and injuries caused on the head of the deceased by lathi were not commensurate with the apprehension that could reasonably arise. The injuries were disproportionately severe and could not be justified, the accused was found to have exceeded right of self-defence and his conviction under s 302, IPC, was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[51] Where an accused entertaining apprehension that the complainant party had come to take forcible possession of land and to attack them chased the complainant party and killed some persons by firing 30-40 rounds of gunshots at the complainant party which was not necessary, the accused were held to have exceeded the right of private defence and thereby committed offences under s 304, Pt I read with s 34, IPC .[52] So long as an assembly of persons is acting in exercise of the right of private defence, it cannot be an unlawful assembly as the object of members is not unlawful but once they exceeded the right of private defence, the assembly ceased to be lawful and became an unlawful assembly. Therefore, only such of the members of the assembly who share the object of doing anything in excess of the exercise of right of private defence, alone would be liable to be punished for the acts committed in prosecution of the common object or for their individual unlawful acts.[53] A person may resist the execution of an illegal warrant, but he must not voluntarily inflict grievous hurt in so doing. If he does, he is guilty of that offence.[54] Where the accused assaulted the deceased while being chased by him, the injuries found on the body of the deceased were more grievous than those found on the body of the accused, it was held that accused exceeded their right of private defence and their conviction was altered from s 300 to s 304, Pt I, IPC .[55]

Where the evidence on record did not show that complainant side was armed with weapons other than sticks, neither in cross-examination of witnesses nor in his statement under s 313, CrPC, the accused stated that he had given a knife-blow to the deceased while he feared death or grievous injury from deceased or persons who were with deceased on these facts the Apex Court held that it could be said that the accused exceeded his right of private defence when he gave a chattel knife-blow to the deceased, conviction of accused under s 304, IPC, was held proper.[56]674

PWs deposed that it was the deceased who first pulled the collar of appellant's shirt and tried to press his neck, and in the process, the appellant inflicted knife blow in the abdomen of the deceased with a view to escape from the clutches of the deceased. The appellant accused clearly exceeded the right of private defence. In these circumstances, his case fell under s 304, Pt I, IPC . The conviction of the accused appellant under s 302 was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[57]

When Marginal Excess may be Excused

If the person exercised his right: (a) in good faith; (b) without premeditation of death; (c) without any intention of doing more harm than was necessary, then his offence will be culpable homicide.[58] But these three conditions must concur (refer to s 300, Exception 2, and illustration thereto); otherwise the offence will be murder. In case there is marginal excess of the exercise of the right of self-defence it may be possible to say that the means the accused uses could not be weighed in golden scales in judging whether or not the right of private defence would exceed. However, when the mode of exercise of the right of private defence (stengun in that case) is such for which there cannot be any justification and the injury inflicted is clearly in excess of the right of private defence, then Exception 2 to s 300, IPC, would be applicable and the offence would be culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[59]

16. Right of Private Defence not Available to Aggressors

Commentary under same heading in ss 96, 97 ante, may be referred to.

The law protects the victims of assault or aggression and not the aggressors. Notwithstanding injuries received by the accused on their persons, right of private defence was not available where the accused persons were initial aggressors. The incident had taken place at a place which was in the possession of the deceased. The accused persons had gone to that place and inflicted injuries on the complainant party. The accused persons were, therefore, held to be the aggressors.[60] Besides being an aggressor, if a person uses excess force in self-defence, he cannot claim the right of private defence.[61] When a person, even if he was the aggressor, has retreated and reached the rear of the house where he had gone for aggression, the right of private defence would not continue. This right is always limited to the extent that it can repeal the aggressor, it is not a matter of defence but a matter of retaliation which cannot be permitted for looked upon with an eye of approval.[62]

Right of private defence is not available to an aggressor.[63] Where the accused persons armed with guns and kattas had gone to the place of occurrence, they were675 the aggressors as they opened fire causing the death of the deceased, thus, they were not entitled to the right of private defence.[64]

Where evidence showed that the accused continued to assault the deceased even after he fell on the ground, the possibility of the accused causing injuries in exercise of private defence was ruled out.[65] Where the testimony of the independent witness corroborated by the prosecution version showed that the accused chased and killed one of the deceased who fled away from the scene of the occurrence, accused cannot be said to have the right of self-defence as regards killing of such deceased. Acquittal of the accused was set aside and the accused were convicted under ss 302 / 149, IPC .[66]

The accused, though not entitled, allowed his buffalo to graze in the field of the deceased. On the deceased's driving the buffalo from his field, the accused assaulted the deceased as well as another person who came to rescue the deceased in exercise of the right of private defence of person of the deceased. There was also a reliable natural eyewitnesses who gave evidence that the accused assaulted the deceased and another person, on these facts it was held that no right of private defence arose to the accused.[67] Where the accused persons armed with gandasa, bhala, spade, kudali etc inflicted various cut injuries on the prosecution witnesses who died and the accused persons were aggressors having come to the place of incident armed with deadly weapons, they were found not entitled to the right of private defence or of Exception 2 of s 300, IPC, so as to make the offence of murder culpable homicide.[68]

17. Illustrative Cases

The appellant accused armed with a kulhari in his hand went to the house of the deceased and hacked both deceased to death one after another. The appellant had not received any injury on his person. The very fact that the appellant committed the murder of two persons one after another ruled out the plea of private defence. Woman, by its feminine nature, and having a feeble body, ordinarily would not pose a threat or danger to the life of a well bodied man with a lathi. The plea of private defence was rejected, and accused respondent was convicted under s 302, IPC .[69]

There was no imminent danger to the property or person of the accused from the act of the deceased who had merely gone to the spot and asked the accused party to get the measurement of the land and tried to dislodge one of the poles fixed in the land by the accused party. There was neither any occasion nor any cause to attack the complainant party with weapons like axes and crowbars and to cause injuries on the vital parts of the body including the head. There was no evidence on record to show that any of the accused appellants has sustained injuries to deduce the factum of imminent danger to their person or property. The presence of the witness, as put forth by the defence to substantiate the plea of private defence was doubtful, hence his evidence was rejected. The plea of private defence was not accepted, and appellants accused were convicted under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[70]676

When such right extends to causing any harm other than death.--

If the offence be not of any of the descriptions enumerated in the last preceding section, the right of private defence of the body does not extend to the voluntary causing of death to the assailant, but does extend, under the restrictions mentioned in section 99, to the voluntary causing to the assailant of any harm other than death.

Comments

1. Scope

This section supplements the provisions of s 100 and provides that if the offence be not of any of the descriptions enumerated in the last preceding section, the right of private defence of the body does not extend to voluntary causing of death to the assailant, but it extends, under the restrictions mentioned in s 99, to the voluntary causing to the assailant, of any harm other than death. In other words, where the violation of persons or liberty is not of the aggravated nature of the offences mentioned in s 100, it may still be resisted by any necessary degree of violence short of killing. Under this section, therefore, a person is entitled to exercise his right of private defence of the body, as against any assault other than the first, and second of s 100, to the extent of causing grievous hurt. It will have to be borne in mind, that if, after commission of an assault of a simple or grievous nature, as there is, in any case, no further apprehension of assault, occasion for exercise of the right of private defence of the body should not arise. At the same time, the possibility of infliction of further assault likely to cause grievous bodily injury cannot, as a rule, be ruled out on the mere ground that the injury or the injuries already inflicted are simple. The law, in this respect, honours the human instinct of self-preservation. It is a matter for serious consideration of a judge, that the immunity from punishment for inflicting more grievous injuries in order that he may defend his body against infliction of simpler ones, however slight, is guaranteed by the law of private defence of person, which is codified in the IPC . It would amount to erring to hold, irrespective of any consideration of the surrounding circumstances, amongst which must be included the state of feelings between the assaulted and the assailant, that apprehension of an injury of a graver kind by the injured is unfounded as the assault that preceded produced very simple injuries. In considering whether one is entitled to exercise the right of private defence of his body, one has to place himself in the position of the accused in the midst of the circumstances in which he or she stood and to form his opinion whether for him or her in those circumstances, it was not fairly wise to apprehend such an injury to the body as would entitle him or her to exercise the right that he or she claims to have done.

Where an accused, charged with murder, asserts that he killed in self-defence, his state of mind, at the time of the killing, becomes material and an important element in determining his justification or his belief in an impending attack by the deceased.[71]

Injuries of the accused which appear to be superficial in nature are required to be explained by the prosecution.[72]

Where the accused person saw his son under detention, from whom Rs 4 were extorted, and with a view to rescuing his son from duress, detention and extortion, he inflicted simple injury, it was held that the right of private defence was established.[73]677

Where the injuries sustained by the accused appellant are not serious, the prosecution is not enjoined to explain those injuries. The appellant accused was not entitled to right of private defence.[74]

On a reading of this section and s 104 together, it would appear that any harm other than death can be voluntarily inflicted in defence of the body in any case which does not fall within the offences enumerated in s 100,[75] and any such harm can be voluntarily inflicted in defence of property against theft, mischief, or house trespass which are not of the description specified in cll 3 and 4 of s 103 .

General Exceptions

S. 102.

Commencement and continuance of the right of private defence of the body.--

The right of private defence of the body commences as soon as a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body arises from an attempt or threat to commit the offence though the offence may not have been committed; and it continues as long as such apprehension of danger to the body continues.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with the commencement and continuance of the right of private defence of body, and the corresponding s 105 with the commencement and continuance of the right of private defence of property. The right commences, if it is of the body as soon as a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body arises from an attempt or threat to commit the offence though the offence may not have been committed, and it continues as long as such apprehension of danger to the body continues.[76] If it is of the property, it commences when a reasonable apprehension of danger to the property commences, and its continuance is regulated by the provisions of s 105 .[77] Under s 102 of the IPC, the right of public defence would cease to exist as soon as the apprehension ended and such apprehension must be said to have ended after the first shot was fired through the body of the deceased. Pumping bullets one after another cannot also be said to be acts in excess of the private defence because the right of private defence would cease after the deceased was shot through and through his chest.[78]678

2. Distinction between Sections 102 and 105

With regard to the commencement of the right of private defence, the law draws a distinction between defence of person and defence of property. This section provides that the right of private defence of the body commences as soon as a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body arises from an attempt or threat to commit the offence, though the offence may not have been committed, whereas s 105, which deals with the commencement of the right of defence of property, says that the right of private defence of property commences when a reasonable apprehension of danger to the property commences. So, though, in both cases, the right commences when there is a reasonable apprehension of harm, the circumstances under which there can be said to be a reasonable apprehension differ; a mere threat being sufficient in the case of an attack on the person, whereas, in the case of an attack on property, there must be something more than a mere threat and it must be a threat which is so imminent as to amount to an attempt to commit the offence.[79]

3. Sections 102 and 105 --Commencement, Continuity and Conclusion of Right of Private Defence

Sections 102 and 105, IPC, deal with commencement and continuance of the right of private defence of body and property respectively. The right commences as soon as a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body arises from an attempt, or threat, to commit the offence, although the offence may not have been committed but not until there is that reasonable apprehension. The right lasts so long as the reasonable apprehension of the danger to the body continues.[80] In Jai Dev v State of Punjab ,[81] it was observed that as soon as the cause for reasonable apprehension disappears and the threat has either been destroyed or has been put to rout, there can be no occasion to exercise the right of private defence.

Plea of the accused was that he stabbed the deceased in the exercise of the right of private defence as the deceased had destroyed his properties and was dragging him for throwing him into the fire. The evidence established that the properties of the accused were destroyed after he had stabbed the deceased. As such, there was no imminent threat to the properties of the accused which could entitle the accused to stab the deceased in exercise of right of private defence. Held, the accused was not entitled to exercise the right of private defence.[82]

4. Commencement of Right

The right of private defence commences as soon as a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body arises from an attempt, or threat to commit the offence, although the offence may not have been committed,[83] but not until there is that reasonable679 apprehension.[84] The right of private defence is a defensive right. It is neither a right of aggression nor of reprisal. There is no right of private defence where there is no apprehension of danger. The right of private defence is available only to one who is suddenly confronted with the necessity of averting an impending danger which is not self-created. Necessity must be present, real or apparent. As the accused appellants were aggressors, they were held not entitled to the right of self defence. The accused appellants were convicted under ss 302, 148, 149 and 307, IPC .[85] The fact that the deceased was holding a shoe in his hand could not cause reasonable apprehension in the mind of the accused that there will be danger to their lives. The accused dragged the deceased in middle of the road and one of the accused gave a blow on the chest of the deceased with a dagger which caused grievous injuries that resulted in death, it was held that the right of private defence was exceeded by accused persons.[86]

Where a right of private defence is set up the question to be considered is not whether there was an actually continuing danger, but whether there was a reasonable apprehension of the danger.[87] It is not necessary that the person exercising the right of private defence should wait until he himself is attacked.[88] The law does not require a person labouring under a reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt to his companion to postpone his right of defending the body of his companion till it is seen that the latter, unaided, fails to eradicate the source of danger.[89]

Where a person is about to be hit by another with a weapon just like a lathi or gandasa, he can be said to have a reasonable apprehension of danger to his body and the right of private defence of body commences.[90]

5. Threat to Commit the Offence

The threat referred to in this section must be a real threat which might cause a reasonable apprehension of danger, and not mere idle words used by a drunkard.[91] The threat must reasonably give rise to the present and imminent, and not a remote or distant, danger.[92] If the apprehension is real and reasonable even if a mistaken one, there is right of private defence.[93]680

> The previous relationship between the deceased and the accused, and the deceased's aggressive temperament and disposition, shown in his conduct of trespassing into the accused's house in order to assault her, while she was retracing her steps, must go a great way to cause a belief, in the accused of an impending danger to life accompanied with little chance of escape.[1]

Where, after being threatened by the deceased, the accused left the place quite unmolested, and then returned and struck the deceased on the head with a heavy stick, it was held that the threat could not be said to give rise to an apprehension of danger and a right of private defence.[2]

6. Continuance of the Right

The right of private defence of body lasts so long as the reasonable apprehension of danger to the body continues.[3] As soon as the cause for reasonable apprehension disappears and the threat has either been destroyed or has been put to route, there can be no occasion to exercise the right of private defence. In the instant case, the accused gave a fatal blow after the mob had stopped pelting stones. Held, the accused was not entitled to right of private defence.[4] Where the accused snatched a crowbar from the hands of the aggressor-deceased, and the deceased was accompanied by his wife and daughter who had sticks in their hands, it was held that the right of self-defence did not come to an end on snatching the crowbar and it also extended to causing injuries to two ladies who were part of the aggressor party.[5] The right of private defence of person continues so long as the other party is armed with the same weapon; the right ends immediately after the other party is dispossessed of the weapon.[6] In Jai Dev v State of Punjab ,[7] their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed:

> As soon as the cause for reasonable apprehension disappears and the threat has either been destroyed or has been put to rout, there can be no occasion to exercise the right of private defence. If the danger is continuing, the right is there; if the danger or the apprehension about it has ceased to exist, there is no longer the right of private defence.[8]

The right is co-extensive to the reasonable apprehension of the danger to the body continuing. Therefore, if a claim is being made that the accused acted in exercise of power of right of private defence, he must show that there were prevailing circumstances giving rise to reasonable apprehension that either death or grievous hurt would be caused if the right is not exercised.[9]681

The question is not whether there was an actually continuing danger, but whether there was a reasonable apprehension of the same, and in answering this, allowance must be made for the frame of mind in which a person would be, who had just been in danger of his life or serious injury, and was defending himself against such danger. But to deal blows on the body of an assailant already struck senseless to the ground is not an act of self-defence.[10] The assault referred to does not mean the assault, if any, already committed; but it is the assault of which an apprehension can reasonably be caused, and that assault must be one which would amount to an offence. The right is a defensive one. It is granted to a citizen to be exercised for the purpose of preventing an offence affecting his body being committed. It is not a right of retaliation against a completed offence of assault. If, after commission of an assault, there is no further apprehension of the same occasion, exercise of the right of private defence will not arise. But the possibility of infliction of further assault likely to cause grievous bodily injury cannot, as a rule, be ruled out on the mere ground that the injury or the injuries already inflicted are simple.[11] Where a person charged with murder asserts that she killed in self-defence, her state of mind at the time of the killing becomes material, and an important element in determining her justification for her belief in impending attack by the deceased. The reputation of the deceased for a violent, dangerous or turbulent disposition is thus a circumstance which would cause such a belief. The previous relationship between the deceased and the accused and the deceased's aggressive temperament and disposition shown in his conduct of trespassing into the accused's house in order to assault her while she was retracing her steps must go a great way to cause belief in the accused in an impending danger to life accompanied with little chance of escape.[12]

A right to defend does not include a right to launch an offensive, particularly when the need to defend no longer survived.[13]

7. Defence not to be Modulated Step-by-step

A man who is assaulted is not bound to modulate his defence step-by-step, according to the attack, before there is reason to believe that the attack is over. He is entitled to secure his victory as long as the contest is continued. He is not obliged to retreat but may pursue his adversary till he finds himself out of danger; and if in a conflict between them, he happens to kill, such killing is justifiable and every allowance has to be made for one, who, with the instinct of self-preservation strong upon him, pursues his defence a little farther than to a perfectly calm bystander would seem absolutely necessary.[14]

Where, although the deceased started the attack, he was soon disarmed and he started running away from the place, there could no more be a right of private defence against him.[15]682

8. Test for Determining Continuance of Apprehension

One of the tests for determining, whether reasonable apprehension of danger to the body continued, would be to discover whether the accused was still acting under the instinct of self-preservation or whether other feelings, such as those of anger, malice and reprisal, had intervened.[16] The real point which has to be ascertained, is the state of the knowledge of the accused and what a reasonable man, acting under the circumstances without any malice, would reasonably come to know when he was fighting to save his life. Where the accused fired at the deceased, resulting in his death, when the latter was running away in fear of his life, it was held that there was no justification for killing the deceased. The right of defence ends with the necessity for it.[17] As soon as a person disables his adversary by infliction of a blow or blows on his head, or on any other part of his body, and throws him (the adversary) on the ground and there is nothing to show that he (the fallen adversary) could stand up or make any attempt to do so, the apprehension of danger to body disappears and the right of private defence of body comes to an end.[18] Where the assailant runs from the scene in order to escape, the reasonable apprehension of danger disappears.[19] It is for the accused pleading the right of private defence to prove the continuance of the right till he had given the last blow.[20]

Chapter IV

General Exceptions

S. 103.

When the right of private defence of property extends to causing death.--

The right of private defence of property extends, under the restrictions mentioned in section 99, to the voluntary causing of death or of any other harm to the wrong-doer, if the offence, the committing of which, or the attempting to commit which, occasions the exercise of the right, be an offence of any of the descriptions hereinafter enumerated, namely:--

First.	--	Robbery;
Secondly.	--	House-breaking by night;
Thirdly.	--	Mischief by fire committed on any building, tent or vessel, which building, tent or vessel is used as a human dwelling, or as a place for the custody of property;
Fourthly.	--	Theft, mischief, or house-trespass, under such circumstances as may reasonably cause apprehension that death or grievous hurt will be the consequence, if such right of private defence is not exercised.

STATE AMENDMENTS

Comments

1. Scope

The right of a person to private defence of property would extend to the causing of death only against certain crimes which are enumerated in s 103, IPC .[23] This section684 is analogous to s 100 with the difference that s 100 deals with the defence of body and this section with that of property. Under both these sections, killing of a person in the exercise of the right of private defence is justifiable under certain circumstance. This section has to be read with s 99 . The section does not apply to trespass on land.[24]Section 103 states that the right of private defence may even extend to causing death, but this right of private defence can be exercised only as against certain criminal acts which are enumerated in the section. The right of private defence of property would extend to causing death only in the case of robbery, house-breaking by night; mischief by fire committed on any building, tent or vessel, which building, tent or vessel is used as a human dwelling, or as place for the custody of property. It is further stated that in the case of theft, mischief or house-trespass these offences must have been committed under such circumstances as may reasonably cause apprehension that death or grievous hurt would be a consequence. Though private defence is available in respect of criminal trespass or mischief as against the property owned by a person himself or of any other person, but criminal trespass is not enumerated as one of the offences under s 103, IPC . Therefore, the right of private defence of property will not extend to the causing of death of the person who committed such acts, if the act of trespass is in respect of an open land. Only a house-trespass committed under such circumstances as may reasonably cause apprehension that death or grievous hurt would be the consequence, is enumerated as one of the offences under s 103 .[25]

Section 97, IPC declares that every person has a right to defend the property, whether movable or immovable, of himself or of any other person, against any act which is an offence falling under the definition of theft, robbery, mischief or criminal trespass, or which is an attempt to commit any of these offences. This section justifies homicide in case of: (a) robbery; (b) house-breaking by night; (c) arson; and (d) theft, mischief or house-trespass causing apprehension of death or grievous hurt. This right is, however, subject to the two limitations contained in s 99, namely, that there is no right of private defence in case in which there is time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities, and that the right of private defence, in no case, extends to the inflicting of more harm than is necessary for the purpose of defence.[26]

But a mere act of ploughing the land does not give right to a person in possession of the land to voluntarily cause the death of the former.[27] The right of self-defence is not dependent on the actual criminality of the person resisted; it depends solely on the wrongful or apparently wrongful character of the act attempted.[28]

A person in possession of a particular property is protected by this section, under the restriction, mentioned in s 99,[29] if he causes death in safeguarding his property when there is reason to apprehend that the person, whose death has been caused, was about to commit one of the offences mentioned therein. Persons in possession of land are not guilty for causing injuries or death if they merely try to maintain their685 possession.[30] The appellants accused before the Court below did not take plea that they had been in possession of the land. It was necessary for them to allege and prove that they were in possession of the land and the deceased trespassed thereinto. The plea of right of private defence was not available.[31]

Where the accused party assaulted the complainant with lathi and knife causing the death of the deceased, and the accused persons were in settled possession of the land where the occurrence took place, right of private defence accrued to the accused party as soon as the complainant party trespassed on the land. The injuries sustained by the accused in the same incident were not explained by the prosecution. Held, accused persons acted in exercise of right of private defence of person and property, thus, they were acquitted of the charge of murder under s 302, IPC .[32] Where the accused persons were in settled possession of the land, the deceased and the complainant had no right to enter into the field and prevent the accused from reaping the crops sown by them. The complainant party used force against the labourers employed by the accused. The accused appellants inflicted a single blow on the head of the deceased causing death. Held, the accused persons acted in exercise of right of private defence, and were acquitted of the charge of murder under s 302, IPC .[33]

In the instant case, the accused respondent alleged that deceased came to the place where he was working and she started abusing him. Thereafter, the deceased picked up tangia against him and said that she would kill him. On hearing this, he also picked up a tangia and gave a blow of it, because of which the deceased fell down. The deceased had received 4-5 injuries, while the respondent accused did not receive any injury. Only one tangia was recovered from the spot. Only on making a gesture of picking a tangia by the deceased, who was aged about 50 years, the respondent had no right either to kill the deceased or to cause grievous hurt to her. The plea of right of private defence taken by the accused respondent was not accepted.[34]

2. Right is Subject to Restriction Imposed by Sections 99, 103 and 105

Commentary under same heading in s 97, ante, may be referred to.

3. Homicide in Defence of Property

The right of private defence of property to the extent of causing death arises not only when the house is broken into, but when an attempt is made to break into the house. It is not the intention of the law that the right to defend property is available only when the thief has already effected entry, for property may be protected by attacking the thief inside the house as much, as by preventing his entry into it.686

When a man finds another close to a hole which has been with cut burglarious intent in his house, and further, when that man is attacked by the other party, a reasonable apprehension of danger to the property of the accused so attacked exists, such as to justify that person exercising his right of private defence of his property.[35]

A trespasser is entitled to defend his possession even against a rightful owner if the latter tries to evict him by use of force.[36]

Where A is in actual peaceable possession of land, *B's*attempt to recover possession of it by force is an illegal act, which A has a right to resist. If B uses force in carrying out his attempt, A has a right to oppose force to force, and to inflict upon B such injury as is necessary to compel him to desist.[37]

4. Person Employed to Guard the Property

A person, employed to guard the property of his employer, is protected under this section if he causes death in safeguarding his employer's property when there is reason to apprehend that the person, whose death has been caused, was about to commit one of the offences, mentioned in this section, or to attempt to commit one of those offences.[38]

A person employed to guard the property of his employer, is protected by these provisions of the law, if he causes death in certain circumstances in safeguarding his employer's property as stated above. But the fact that the property to be guarded is public property does not, in any way, extend the protection given to a guard. Therefore, a police constable on guard duty at a magazine or other public building is not entitled to fire at a person who does not answer his challenge, when he has no reason to apprehend that the person was about to commit any offence against the magazine or its contents or against himself.[39] Where the accused constable killed the head constable and the incident took place while the accused was doing patrolling duty on a bridge; the accused claimed to have fired on seeing someone with fire near the valve tower. The valve tower was neither used for human dwelling nor for custody of property, no plea was taken by the accused that he apprehended death or grievous hurt, the plea of private defence of the accused extending to causing of death was not tenable.[40]

5. Robbery--Snatching Seized Cattle Amounts to Robbery

Where A seizes cattle trespassing on his land and B, the owner of the cattle, attempts to forcibly remove them from A's possession, it amounts technically to robbery and A is entitled under this section to prevent this. But he is not entitled to inflict on B more harm than is necessary to prevent the rescue of the cattle. If he could have no reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt, he would not be justified in causing the death of B.[41]687

Where the deceased were cutting the crops under the protection of the police and none of the deceased was in possession of any deadly weapons, it was held that the act of the deceased in cutting the crops did not amount to robbery and as such the right of private defence was not available.[42]

6. Every Robbery does not give Rise to a Right to Cause Death

In the case of robbery, the causing of death may be justified as an act done in reasonable and necessary self-defence under certain circumstances and conditions: but the measure of self-defence must always be relevant and proportionate to the quantum of force used and which it is necessary to repel. But the IPC does not provide that in every case where a robbery is committed, the person attacked is entitled to cause death. It means no more than this, the robbery by violence may be resisted by violence sufficient to overcome the force employed by the attacker, and that if in the exercise of that right death is caused, it may be justified if it is reasonably and properly asserted in defence of property.[43] The extent of the right of private defence depends upon the circumstances of each case. Each case must be decided on its own particular facts.[44] Theft becomes robbery if, in carrying away the property, the thief voluntarily causes hurt, and if grievous hurt is caused to the accused when he tries to recover the property, it cannot be disputed that he apprehended grievous hurt. In such a case, the accused would have the right of private defence extending to the causing of death.[45]

7. House-breaking

As already discussed above, the right of private defence of property to the extent of causing death arises not only when the house is broken into, but also when an attempt is made to break into the house. Where a person, under a mistake of fact, kills a person who attempts to enter the accused's house, thinking him to be a burglar, though he is not, he is not guilty of any offence.[46] Where the intruder committed house-breaking by night for committing the offence of adultery, it was held that the right of self-defence extended to causing of the intruder's death.[47]

8. Theft

When a person sees another trespassing upon his property and committing theft, he has a right of private defence of property under this section or s 104, IPC . The right under this section extends to voluntarily causing death, provided there are circumstances reasonably causing apprehension that death or grievous hurt will be the consequence if such right of private defence is not exercised.[48] If there are not such circumstances, the right of private defence of property, if any, would not come688 under this section,[49] but under s 104 which does not extend to the voluntary causing of death, but subject to the restrictions, mentioned under s 99, IPC to the voluntarily causing to the wrongdoer, of any harm other than death. One of the restrictions contained in s 99 is that the right of private defence should, in no case, extend to the inflicting of more harm than is necessary to inflict for the purpose of defence. If, in such a case, death is caused, the right of private defence is exceeded.[50]

In the instant case, the deceased was committing theft of jack fruits from the tree owned by the accused, and when the accused protested, the deceased started abusing the accused, got down from the tree and assaulted him with an axe. In self-defence, the accused assaulted the deceased causing death. Held, the accused acted in exercise of right of private defence of body as well as of property. He was acquitted of the charge of murder.[51]

Appellant accused seeing the deceased plucking Mahua from his tree, protested against the same. There was exchange of hot words between them, in course of which, the appellant accused by means of an axe assaulted the deceased, who succumbed to the injuries. Held, in the due exercise of private defence of person and property, and as a result of the exchange of hot words, appellant accused got excited and assaulted the deceased. Therefore, the act committed by the accused did not attract the provisions of s 302, IPC, but it fell under the purview of s 304, Pt I, IPC .[52]

9. Mischief

Clause (4) of this section does not justify the causing of death in all cases of theft, mischief or house-trespass. It is only when the act which amounts to theft, mischief or house-trespass is such as per se causes a reasonable apprehension that death or grievous hurt will be the result, that the causing of death in order to prevent the commission of such act, is justified.[53] It does not apply when the apprehension of death arises by reason of the intervention of the persons exercising the right of private defence.[54] A person, in rightful possession of the property, is entitled to defend his possession of the same, under this section, even to the extent of causing death of the member of the aggressive party, subject to the restrictions mentioned in s 99, in order to prevent mischief to his land and the crop thereon within the meaning of s 425 .[55]

In case of mischief to property, the accused has the first degree of right of private defence which extends to committing murder of wrongdoers but this right available to the accused must be held to have exceeded when there was no fear that but for exercise of this right, the death as grievous hurt might ensue.[56]689

In a case, the deceased was wrongfully diverting water. The accused intercepted and there was an exchange of hot words between the two. The accused, who had a spade in his hand, hit the deceased on his head as a result of which the latter died. It was held that the act of the deceased amounted to mischief and the accused, therefore, had the right of private defence, but he exceeded the right.[57]

10. House-trespass

It is not every sort of house-trespass which under cl (4) of this section gives the extended right. The right is conferred in the case of house-trespass only when it is committed under such circumstances as may reasonably cause apprehension that death or grievous hurt will be the consequence if the right of private defence is not exercised.[58]

Where the accused inflicted injuries on A, who committed house-trespass, and shot at B, who came on the spot on hearing alarms, it was held that the act of B did not amount to house-trespass and as such, the accused had no right of private defence against B.[59] Though private defence is available in respect of criminal trespass or mischief as against the property owned by himself or of any other person, but criminal trespass is not enumerated as one of the offences under s 103, IPC . Therefore, the right of private defence of property will not extend to causing of death of the person who committed such acts, if the act of trespass is in respect of an open land. Only a house-trespass committed under such circumstances as may reasonably cause apprehension that death or grievous hurt would be the consequence is enumerated as one of the offences under s 103 .[60]

Where the accused establish or are able to show that there was apprehension in their mind that there was a threat of trespass in their land, they can exercise the right of private defence. If the accused persons are not aggressors, they have the right of private defence.[61]

A plea of self-defence can be taken by introducing such plea in the cross-examination of prosecution witnesses or in the statement of the accused-persons recorded under s 313, CrPC or by adducing defence evidence; and even if the plea is not introduced in any one of these three modes, it can still be raised during the course of submissions by relying on the probabilities and circumstances obtaining in the case.[62]

11. Defence of Land Against Trespasser

Private defence can be used to ward off unlawful force, to prevent unlawful force, to avoid unlawful detention and to escape from such detention. So far as defence of land against trespasser is concerned, a person is entitled to use necessary and moderate force both for preventing the trespass or to eject the trespasser. For the said purposes, the use of force must be the minimum necessary or reasonably believed to be690 necessary. A reasonable defence would mean a proportionate defence. Ordinarily, a trespasser would be first asked to leave and if the trespasser fights back, a reasonable force can be used.[63]

Though private defence is available in respect of criminal trespass or mischief as against the property owned by himself or of any other person, but criminal trespass is not enumerated as one of the offences under s 103, IPC . Therefore, the right of private defence of property will not extend to the causing of death of the person who committed such acts, if the act of trespass is in respect of an open land. Only house-trespass committed under such circumstances as may reasonably cause apprehension that death or grievous hurt would be the consequence is enumerated as one of the offences under s 103 .[64]

It is true that no one, including the true owner, has a right to dispossess the trespasser by force if the trespasser is in settled possession of the land and in such a case unless he is evicted in due course of law he is entitled to defend his possession even against the rightful owner. But stray or even intermittent acts of trespass do not give such a right against the true owner. The possession which a trespasser is entitled to defend against the rightful owner must be a settled possession extending over a sufficiently long period and acquiesced in by the true owner. A casual act of possession would not have the effect of interrupting the possession of the rightful owner. The rightful owner may re-enter and reinstate himself provided he does not use more force than necessary. Such entry will be viewed only as a resistance to an intrusion upon possession which has never been lost. The persons in possession by a stray act of trespass, a possession which has not matured into settled possession, constitute an unlawful assembly, giving right to the true owner, though not in actual possession at the time to remove the obstruction even by using necessary force.[65]

12. Exceeding the Right of Private Defence of Property

Commentary in s 100, ante, may be referred to.

Where death was caused under grave and sudden provocation while exercising the right of private defence of property which had been exceeded, the assailants are guilty under s 304, Pt I of the IPC and not under s 302, IPC .[66]

Where evidence on record leads to an inference that cattle were seized from a grazing field which amounted to theft, the attack by the accused in execution of his right of private defence of property by way of an axe-blow given to the deceased, though without intention of killing, but it was held to be a clear case of exceeding right of private defence and the accused was convicted for culpable homicide not amounting to murder and not for murder.[67] To put it simply, if, in a case of homicide a case for private defence is made, the accused is entitled to be acquitted and if not he691 will be convicted of murder. But in case of use of excessive force, he would be convicted under s 304, IPC .[68]

Where the deceased fell down after receiving injuries from the assault made by the accused appellants, but the accused appellants continued attacking the deceased causing death, held that the accused appellants exceeded the right of private defence of property as well as of person.[69]

Crucial Factor

The law is settled that in spite of the plea of right of private defence of property having not been taken by the accused in their statements under s 313, CrPC the said defence is available if it is borne out and sustainable from the testimony adduced on record. The crucial factor is not what the accused pleaded, but whether the accused could show the existence of right of private defence of person or property from the record itself.[70]

Force used in Defence Cannot be Weighed in Golden Scale

While it is true that in exercise of the right of private defence only such force may be used as may be necessary, but it is equally well settled that at a time when a person is faced with imminent peril of life and limb of himself or other, he is not expected to weigh in golden scales the precise force needed to repeal the danger. Even if he, in the heat of moment, carries his defence a little further than what would be necessary when calculated with precision and exactitude by a clam and unruffled mind, the law makes due allowance for it.[71]

General Exceptions

S. 104.

When such right extends to causing any harm other than death.--

If the offence, the committing of which, or the attempting to commit which, occasions the exercise of the right of private defence, be theft, mischief, or criminal trespass, not of any of the descriptions enumerated in the last preceding section, that right does not extend to the voluntary causing of death, but does extend, subject to the restrictions mentioned in section 99, to the voluntary causing to the wrong-doer of any harm other than death.

Comments

1. Scope

This section supplements the provisions of s 103 and is analogous to s 101, IPC .

If the offence, the commission, or the attempt to commit which occasions the exercise of the right of private defence, be theft, mischief, or criminal trespass, but not of any of the descriptions enumerated in s 103, that right will not extend to the692 voluntary causing of death, but does extend, subject to restrictions mentioned in s 99, IPC to the voluntary causing to the wrongdoer of any harm other than death.[72]Where a person sees another trespassing upon his property and in the act of committing theft, he has a right of private defence under s 103 or 104, IPC . This right, under s 103, extends to voluntarily causing death provided there are such circumstances as may reasonably cause apprehension that death or grievous hurt will be the consequence if such right of private defence is not exercised. But where there is absolutely no indication that the trespasser showed any fight or semblance of a fight, the right, if any, would come under this section, which does not extend to the voluntarily causing of death but extends, subject to the restrictions mentioned under s 99, to the voluntarily causing to the wrong-doer any harm other than death. One of the restrictions contained in s 99 is that the right of private defence should, in no case, extend to the inflicting of more harm than is necessary to inflict for the purpose of defence. But, if death is caused, the right is exceeded and the court will have, in that case, to see whether the case comes under Exception 2 to s 300, IPC . Unless the case can be brought under the provisions of this exception he would be guilty of murder, provided of course, that the usual conditions required by s 300 are complied with.[73]

This section applies in cases where an injury, but not death, is inflicted, on the offender in the course of his committing the offence of theft, mischief or criminal trespass, by the persons exercising the right of private defence.[74] Under this section, a person can, in defending his property, cause any harm short of death. He will not be justified in causing death.[75] But if the right of private defence under this section is exceeded, a light punishment may meet the ends of justice.[76]

The act of cutting another's crop clearly amounts to an offence of theft and the owner thereof has a right to resist and to inflict such injuries on the thieves as are necessary to compel them to desist. The owner has, in such a case, the right of private defence of property, if he has not much time to redress his grievances through the legal process.[77]

When the complainant begs the accused to be excused for having passed through their field and to allow him to go out of it, the criminal trespass, if any, ceases to exist and the accused would not be justified in severely beating him. The accused cannot, therefore, get the benefit of this section.[78]693

Where the accused persons were found to have constituted an unlawful assembly, it was held that the right of self-defence could not be acceded to under this section even though the complainants were doing something in contravention of an order of the court.[79]

In another case, the complainant A employed labourers for the repair of the fence of his orchard. The accused B objected to it and the work was stopped. The complainant came on the spot and asked the labourers to start the work. There was an exchange of words between the complainant and the accused and the accused was hurt in the scuffle. The evidence showed that the complainant was going beyond his line and hence trouble arose. It was held that the accused acted in exercise of his right of private defence under this section.[80]

2. Effect of Concurrent Finding of Trial and Appellate Court as to Title and Provision

Where there were concurrent findings of the trial court and High Court that the deceased were the owners and in possession of the land in question and the accused persons had no right, title, interest or possession therein, the Apex Court observed that it must be held that the accused persons were not entitled to any right of private defence of property.[81]

3. Right Extends to Causing any Harm other than Death

Under the section, a person can, in defending his property, cause any harm short of death. He will not be justified in causing death.[82] But even if the right of private defence under this section is exceeded, a light punishment may meet the ends of justice.[83]

Harm in this section means physical injury.[84] The section justifies any harm short of death, but it does not justify the use of abusive language. The right of private defence of property is no defence to a charge under s 504 of the IPC .[85]

For the meaning of 'harm', s 95 of the IPC may be referred to. Where an incident arose out of a land dispute and its occurrence took place on land in possession of the accused persons, the deceased and his sons came to the land in possession of the accused group to irrigate the land which amounted only to criminal trespass within the meaning of s 441, IPC, right of the accused persons does not extend to causing death but extended only to causing of harm other than death.[86] But where the accused constable while on patrol duty on a bridge killed the head constable, the accused did not disclose to any prosecution witnesses that he was unable to identify his immediate superior and thought him to be a miscreant and fired to protect the valve694 tower. The plea of private defence was taken by the accused only in his statement under s 313, CrPC, it was held that the right of private defence was far from the contemplation of the accused when he opened fire at the deceased and the accused was held not entitled to restricted right of private defence under s 104 .[87] Where the accused inflicted knife-blows leading to instantaneous death of the deceased, in view of the provisions contained in ss 101 and 104 of the IPC and the circumstances of the case, the accused had the right of private defence of property and person to cause to the deceased harm short of death and since he caused his death, he only exceeded the right of private defence of property and person and was liable under s 304(2), IPC .[88] Where A trespassed on the lands of B, whose servants seized and confined A till the following day, when B gave information to the police, it was held that the conduct of B and his servants in confining A could not be supported on the ground that they were exercising the right of private defence of property.[89]

Where a co-sharer entitled to joint possession of land had obtained unlawful possession over it, but remained in such possession for only a couple of hours it was held that his possession was no better than that of a mere trespasser and could not give him a right of private defence, but that the person already in possession had the right of private defence under this section and could eject him, inflicting such harm short of death as might be necessary.[90]

In Ismail v Crown ,[91] the accused found that a burglar was in his house in the middle of the night in a dark room. He had every reason to suppose that the burglar had committed theft or was going to do so and that if he met him, he would presumably strike him. He could not know in the dark whether or not the burglar was armed. He struck him on the head with a stick and the burglar died. It was held that the accused did not exceed the right of private defence.

Where a police constable, at midnight, entered upon the premises of a person who was regarded by the police as a suspicious character, and knocked at his door to ascertain if he was there, whereupon he came out and abused and pushed the constable and lifted a stick as if he were about to hit him with it, it was held that the constable was not engaged in the execution of his duty as a public servant and was technically guilty of house-trespass, that the person on whose premises the constable was, was justified under this section, inflicting on him the slight harm he did.[92]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter IV

General Exceptions

S. 105.

Commencement and continuance of the right of private defence of property.--

The right of private defence of property commences when a reasonable apprehension of danger to the property commences.

The right of private defence of property against theft continues till the offender has effected his retreat with the property or either the assistance of the public authorities is obtained, or the property has been recovered.

The right of private defence of property against robbery continues as long as the offender causes or attempts to cause to any person death or hurt or695 wrongful restraint or as long as the fear of instant death or of instant hurt or of instant personal restraint continues.

The right of private defence of property against criminal trespass or mischief continues as long as the offender continues in the commission of criminal trespass or mischief.

The right of private defence of property against house-breaking by night continues as long as the house-trespass which has been begun by such house-breaking continues.

Comments

1. Scope

This section prescribes when the right of private defence of property commences and how long it would continue against the apprehension of commission of different offences. It is analogous to s 102, in which similar provision is made for the right of private defence of the body. The first clause of this section lays down the rule as to the commencement of the right and the remaining clauses, the duration of the right in respect of the various offences against which it is exercised. The right is co-extensive with the reasonable apprehension of the danger to the body continuing. Therefore, if a claim is being made that the accused acted in exercise of power of right of private defence, he must show that there were prevailing circumstances giving rise to reasonable apprehension that either the death or grievous hurt would be caused if the right is not exercised.[93]

The right of private defence is a defensive right. It is neither a right of aggression nor of reprisal. There is no right of private defence where there is no apprehension of danger. The right of private defence is available only to one who is suddenly confronted with the necessity of averting an impending danger which is not self-created. Necessity must be present, real or apparent. As the accused appellant were aggressors, they were held not entitled to the right of self defence. The accused appellants were convicted under ss 302, 148, 149 and 307, IPC .[94]

2. Right is subject to Restrictions Imposed by Sections 99, 103 and 105

Commentary under the same heading in s 97, ante, may be referred to.696

3. Clause 1--Commencement of the Right--Right arises on Apprehension of Danger

The right of private defence of property arises as soon as there is a reasonable apprehension of danger to the property. The person entitled to exercise the right can act before actual harm is done. It is not a right of retaliation and hence he need not wait until the aggressor has started committing the offence which occasions the exercise of his right of private defence.[1] As to the meaning of the expression 'reasonable apprehension of danger', see notes under s 102 . What is relevant to investigate is whether reasonable apprehension of danger to property had commenced. Once a reasonable apprehension of danger to the property has commenced, the right of private defence of property becomes available and it is not necessary that the offence should actually have been commenced.[2]

The right of private defence of body and property commences as soon as a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body arises from an attempt or threat, to commit offence, although the offence may not have been committed, but not until there is that reasonable apprehension. The right lasts so long as reasonable apprehension of danger to the body continues.[3]

Where the complainant damaged after door of house of the accused which amounted to 'mischief' within the meaning of s 425, IPC, the accused was entitled to exercise the right of private defence so long as the complainant continued in commission of mischief and not after commission of mischief.[4]

A commits no offence, if in exercise of the right of private defence of his property against B, whom he finds near a hole in his house, and on being attacked by B, he strikes a blow at random in the dark with a stick in his hand, whereby he is killed.[5]

If the act of trespass and theft have already begun when the owner finds the trespasser and the thief, there is more than an apprehension of danger to the property and the right of private defence comes into existence.[6] The law does not require that, when a person is being wrongfully deprived of property of which he is in possession he should leave the thief alone and run to the police station at a distance to seek redress from the police.[7]

Duration and Cessation of the Right

Under s 102, IPC the right of private defence of the body continues as long as the apprehension of danger and not the danger itself, to the body continues. The same principle applies in the case of defence of property, though this section enters697 into the question in relation to property more minutely. The right ceases on the cessation of the apprehension of danger to the property.

As soon as the reasonable cause disappears and the threat has either been destroyed or has been put to route, there can be no occasion to exercise the right of private defence.[8]

4. Clause 2--Continuance of the Right Against Theft

As against theft, cl 2 of the section declares that the right of private defence of property continues: (a) till the offender has effected his retreat with the property; or (b) either--(i) the assistance of the public authorities is obtained, or (ii) the property has been recovered. These alternatives have created some difficulty in interpreting the clause. It is not altogether clear what is meant by the expression 'the offender has effected his retreat with the property'. In the first report on the IPC,[9] it was suggested that the offender can probably be said to have effected his retreat when he has once got clear off, having escaped immediate pursuit, or pursuit not having been made.[10] It will be observed that while in all other cases the right only exists for the purpose of prevention of the offences named, in the particular case of theft, the right continues for the recovery of the property even after the theft has been accomplished.[11] If the property is recovered on the spot the right ends with the recovery. But if it is not so recovered and the thief runs away with it, the owner can pursue him to recover the property.[12] The right continues till either the assistance of the public authorities is obtained or the property has been recovered. But in the meanwhile, the thief may effect his retreat with the property. Does the right continue, after the retreat, until the assistance of the public authorities is obtained or the property has been recovered? With reference to cl 2 of this section, Mayne observed:

> The right of defence against injuries to property is governed by the same principle, viz, the continuance of an injury which may be prevented (s 105). Therefore, resistance, within justifiable limits, may be continued as long as the wrongful act is going on. But when the robber, for instance, has made his escape, the principle of self-defence would not extend to killing him if met with on a subsequent day. If, however, the property were found in his possession, the right of defence would revive for the purpose of the recovery.[13]

Following this in Jarha Chamar v Surit Ram ,[14] it was observed:

> If A runs away with B's watch, B may chase him until he effects his escape, but the right of self-defence does not end with the escape as the Sessions Judge seems to have held. If B sees A in the street the next day, the next month, or the next year, wearing the stolen watch, B may forthwith seize A and recover his watch, using for the purpose as much force as the case allows. If a policeman should be at hand, B's proper course would be to hand A over to him and let him recover the watch. But B is not bound to put off the capture of A until he can find assistance from public authority. Again, suppose that on a day after the theft thereof, B sees his watch lying on a table in a house or garden. If he can get the assistance of a policeman without losing sight of it, no doubt698 he would be bound to do so. But he would be under no legal obligation to risk a further loss or removal of the stolen property for the purpose of having recourse to the public authorities. If the circumstances are such that immediate seizure seems to offer the only reasonable prospect of recovery, B is entitled to enter the house or garden and recover his watch. The capture of the thief would not be an assault in the one case, and the entry into the house or garden would not be a criminal trespass in the other.

No Revival of Right

But there is no warrant for the theory of revival of the right either in this Code or at Common Law. The clause must be taken to mean that as soon as the offender has effected his retreat with the property, no right of private defence of that property against theft subsists, but that, until the offender has so completed his retreat, the right of private defence of that property continues until the property has been recovered, i.e., during the retreat of the offender, or until the assistance of the public authorities is obtained.[15] It would be meaningless to say that the right of private defence continues till the offender has effected his retreat with property, if in fact it always continues till the property has been recovered.[16]

The words 'till the offender has effected his retreat with the property', in this section, mean that the right of defending the property would come to an end when the offender has finally succeeded in finding an escape from the chasers. It will depend upon the circumstances of each case as to when the offender can be said to have finally escaped from the chase of the searching party. Where the offender has been chased up to his own house, in that event, the pursuers shall not have a right of forcible entry in the offender's house; the offender shall be taken to have successfully effected his retreat and the right of private defence comes to an end.[17]

Recapture of Property when Permissible

When a person takes away the property of another by trespassing over his land, and such an act amounts to an offence of theft and criminal trespass, the person in whom the right of possession is vested may, while the trespass and the act of theft are in progress, turn the trespasser out of the land by force and may also resist the act of the taking away of his property: and if in so doing he inflicts such injuries on the trespasser or on the thief as are warranted by the situation, he commits no offence, and his action will be covered by the principle of self-defence embodied in ss 95 - 105 of the IPC . If, on the other hand, the trespasser or the thief had already accomplished his act and the person with the right has acquiesced in the accomplishment, it is not open to the latter to avail himself of the doctrine of self-defence by inflicting injuries on the trespasser or the thief to acquire possession of his property. In such a case, if the person with the right be an aggressor, there is no doubt that the other has a right of self-defence. Recapture of the stolen or plundered property, while it is in the course of being carried away, is authorised under this section, for the taking and retaking is one transaction.

But when the offence has been committed and the property removed, a recapture after an interval of time by the owner, or by another person on his behalf, however justifiable, cannot be deemed an exercise of the right of defence of property. The recovery which this section contemplates seems to be a recovery either immediate or699 made before the offender has reached his final retreat, as where stolen cattle are tracked until ultimately overtaken in their retreat and recaptured.[18] There should be no lapse of time between the theft and the accused's effort to recover the property before the offender effects his retreat.[19] If the thief runs away throwing away or leaving the stolen property, the right of private defence ceases and the owner of the property has no right to proceed with violence against the thief.[20] But if the thief has not effected his retreat with the property, the right of private defence continues.[21]

The IPC does not give any right of private defence of property in regard to which an offence under s 403 or s 411, IPC, has been committed.[22]

5. Clause 3--Continuance of the Right Against Robbery

This clause declares the duration of the right of private defence against robbery and states that the right continues as long as the offender causes or attempts to cause to any person death or hurt or wrongful restraint or as long as the fear of instant death or of instant hurt or of instant personal restrain continues. It may be noted that robbery involves theft. The right of private defence against the theft may continue after the cessation of the right of private defence against the robbery.

6. Clause 4--Continuance of the Right Against Criminal Trespass

Against criminal trespass, the person in possession of the property has the right of private defence of property so long as the trespass continues.[23]

Where the deceased committed criminal trespass but he was unarmed so there was no apprehension that death or grievous hurt was likely to be caused to the accused, the accused causing two knife-blows on the chest of the deceased in quick succession was held exceeding the right of private defence of property and was liable under s 304 I and not under s 302, IPC .[24]

Where complainant party committed trespass on the land of the accused armed with a knife, a scuffle between the accused party and the complainant party took place, the accused party caused grievous injuries to the complainant, injuries inflicted by the accused not motivated or out of aggression, it is a clear case of right of private defence of body and property, though the accused persons exceeded right of private defence.[25] But where the accused persons themselves trespassed on the land of the complainant and opened fire killing the deceased persons, they were not entitled to right of self-defence.[26] Similarly, when in a sudden quarrel over the cutting of a tree, the accused gave a blow with a wooden reaper on the head of the deceased and caused his death. The tree in question standing on the land belonging to the deceased700 and was in his actual possession, the right of private defence was not available to the accused.[27] In both these cases accused(s) were themselves trespassers so they did not have any right of self-defence which was available to the complainant party, who were in possession of the land in question.

Where the deceased having entered the house of the accused with the intention of outraging the modesty of his wife, was beaten by the accused with a stick and he fell down, but the accused continued to beat him and he died, it was held that it could not be said that after the deceased fell down he continued the trespass, because whatever intention he entertained at the time of entering the house, it had disappeared and he continued on the premises not because he intended to commit an offence but because he was physically unable to get out.[28]

Appellant accused had taken the deceased to his house. Even if it is assumed that deceased had committed house trespass, the right of private defence exercisable by the appellants did not extend to causing his death as there was no apprehension of death or grievous hurt as contemplated under s 105 of the IPC .[29]

Criminal Trespass when Ceases

But criminal trespass does not cease when the trespasser indicates his intention to cease the trespass. The right of private defence of property continues until the trespass actually ceases. In a case which came up before the Supreme Court a curious situation arose. The accused forcibly took loaded carts through a field of one H on which there were some crops standing. While the carts were still in the field, H protested. The accused asked to be excused and permitted to take the carts out of the field. This was not allowed and there was a fight, and H died as a result of injuries received in the incident. The accused being charged with the murder, pleaded that the criminal trespass which they committed terminated when they indicated their intention to cease the criminal trespass, that it was the deceased who prevented them from leaving the field and attacked them and that they acted in self-defence. It was held that since the accused were still inside the field when the incident took place, criminal trespass had not come to an end and, therefore, H had the right to prevent the accused from continuing to commit criminal trespass for whatever short distance they had still to cover before reaching the public pathway. Their Lordships further observed:

It is true that the appellants' party had to get out of the field and that this they could not have done without committing further criminal trespass. But it does not follow that this difficult position in which the party found itself gave them any right for insisting that they must continue the criminal trespass. They had to abide by the directions of H, whatever be the degree of patience required, in case they were not allowed to move in any direction in order to leave the field. If H had started the attack in the circumstances alleged by the appellants, there may have been some scope for saying that he acted unreasonably in taking recourse to force in preference to taking recourse to public authorities or to such action which a less obstinate person would have taken and had, therefore, lost any right of private defence of property against the offence of criminal trespass.30701

7. Clause 5--Continuance of Right Against House-breaking by Night

The right of private defence of property against house-breaking by night continues only so long as the house-trespass, which has been begun by such house-breaking continues. So a person would be justified in using his spear against the house-breaker so long as he remained on his premises; but he is not justified in running after the house-breaker and killing him in the open after the house-trespass had ceased.[31]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter IV

General Exceptions

S. 106.

Right of private defence against deadly assault when there is risk of harm to innocent person.--

If in the exercise of the right of private defence against an assault which reasonably causes the apprehension of death, the defender be so situated that he cannot effectually exercise that right without risk of harm to an innocent person, his right of private defence extends to the running of that risk.

Illustration

A is attacked by a mob who attempt to murder him. He cannot effectually exercise his right of private defence without firing on the mob, and he cannot fire without risk of harming young children who are mingled with the mob. A commits no offence if by so firing he harms any of the children.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter V

Of Abetment

S. 107.

Abetment of a thing.--

A person abets the doing of a thing, who--

First.-- Instigates any person to do that thing; or

Secondly.--Engages with one or more other person or persons in any conspiracy for the doing of that thing, if an act or illegal704 omission takes place in pursuance of that conspiracy, and in order to the doing of that thing; or Thirdly.-- Intentionally aids, by any act or illegal omission, the doing of that thing.

Explanation 1.--A person who, by wilful misrepresentation, or by wilful concealment of a material fact which he is bound to disclose, voluntarily causes or procures, or attempts to cause or procure, a thing to be done, is said to instigate the doing of that thing.

Illustration

A, a public officer, is authorised by a warrant from a Court of Justice to apprehend Z. B, knowing that fact and also that C is not Z, wilfully represents to A that C is Z, and thereby intentionally causes A to apprehend C. Here B abets by instigation the apprehension of C.

Explanation 2.--Whoever, either prior to or at the time of the commission of an act, does anything in order to facilitate the commission of that act, and thereby facilitates the commission thereof, is said to aid the doing of that act.705

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section defines abetment of a thing in general. It does not define any offence, its purpose being merely to explain the meaning of the word 'abetment'. If 'the thing' in question is an offence, then the abetment of it becomes an offence (s 108) and the 'offence of abetment' is constituted (s 108, expln 2), which is thus a separate and distinct offence.[1]

The definition of 'abetment' given here applies to all Central Acts and Regulations made on or after the 14 January 1887.[2] It was applied to a case under the Legal Practitioners Act 1879, which is a special law within the meaning of s 41 of this Code,[3] and also to a case under the Madras Act 5 of 1920, which is a local law.[4] It may be noted that under cl 2 of s 40, IPC, the word 'offence' in ss 109, 110,

112 and 114 - 17, IPC dealing with abetments, denotes a thing punishable under the IPC or under any special or local law.[5]Sections 107 and 109 are applicable to cases under706 s 182, IPC . Where, therefore, a person instigates another person to make a false report, he can be convicted under s 182 read with s 109 .[6]

Under this section, a person abets the doing of an act in either of the three ways which can be: (a) instigating any person to do an act; or (b) engaging, with one or more persons, in any conspiracy for the doing of that act; or (c) intentionally aiding the doing of that act. If a person instigates another or engages with another, in a conspiracy for the doing of an act, which is an offence, he abets such an offence and would be guilty of abetment, under s 115 or s 116, IPC even if the offence abetted is not committed in consequence of the abetment. The offence of abetment is complete when the alleged abettor has instigated another, or engaged, with another, in a conspiracy to commit the offence. It is not necessary for the offence of abetment that the act abetted must be committed.[7]

2. Essentials of Abetment-- It takes Place in One of Three Ways

Abetment involves a mental process of instigating a person or intentionally aiding that person in doing of a thing.[8]A person, who instigates any person to do a thing or who engages, with one or more other person or persons, in any conspiracy for the doing of that thing, or who intentionally aids, by any act or illegal omission, the doing of that thing, abets that thing.[9] Thus an act of abetment may take place in one of three ways: (a) instigation, (b) conspiracy, or (c) intentional aid.[10] In order, therefore, there may be abetment, there must be either instigation, or intentional aiding or engaging in a conspiracy as laid down in this section.[11] General advice is far too vague an expression to prove abetment.[12]'Abetment' in this section includes not merely instigation, which is the normal form of abetment, but also conspiracy and aiding. The section, therefore, comes to this: Where an act is abetted, and the abetment takes the form of instigation of an act, and a different act is done, that different act must be a probable consequence, and committed under the influence of the instigation; and where the abetment takes the form of aiding or a conspiracy, the different act must be a probable consequence and also with the aid or in pursuance of the conspiracy.[13] The mere fact that certain persons have been named in the suicidal note by the deceased to be responsible for his death is not by itself a ground to fasten one with the charge of abetment.[14]

The act or conduct of the accused, even if there may be any, however insulting and abusive those may be, will not by themselves suffice to constitute abetment of707 commission of suicide, unless those are reasonably capable of suggesting that the accused intended by such acts consequence of suicide.[15]

Where the accused demanded money due to him from the deceased and the deceased committed suicide, the demand so made would not amount to abetment within the meaning of s 107, IPC .[16]

Mere Connivance does not Constitute Abetment

An offence of abetment is committed only when a person abets the doing of a thing either by instigation, or by conspiracy, or by intentionally aiding, by an act or illegal omission, the doing of that thing by the principal offender. What, therefore, constitutes an offence of abetment is actual complicity, which precedes the actual commission of the offence by the principal offender, either through substantial assistance to the principal offender for the commission of the offence or through some word or action which instigates the commission of the offence.[17] An association, between the person accused of abetment, and the principal offender, which does not measure up to an instigation, conspiracy or intentional aid in respect of the commission of an offence, does not constitute abetment. Likewise, a mere connivance does not constitute abetment.[18] Abetment does imply a certain degree of activity in the abettor.[19]

Abetment brings the Abettor and the actual Offender on Equal Footing

A person who abets, incites, instigates, goads, urges or exhorts to do an offence is equally liable for the offence which is done by the person who was incited, instigated, exhorted, goaded or abetted as he must have intended all the results that follow by such exhortation and the like. If the exhorter and the like is a member of the unlawful assembly and has exhorted the killer to kill a man, then the exhorter being the member of the unlawful assembly is equally liable for the offence as he has shared the common intention to cause death. Thus, the offence which is committed as a result of incitement, extortion, abetment, goading or instigation will bring the extorter and the like on the same and equal footing as the person who committed the offence as a result thereof.[20]

Mere Interposition of the Abettor does not Constitute Abetment

In order to constitute 'abetment', the abettor must be shown to have 'intentionally' aided the commission of the crime. Mere proof that the crime charged could not have been committed without the interposition of the alleged abettor is not enough compliance with the requirements of s 107 .[21]708

Mere Assertion of Abetment

Mere assertion that the act committed by one of the accused could not have been committed without the interposition of the alleged abettor is not the enough compliance with the requirements of s 107, IPC . But, in the absence of material to show that A-1 was brought to the scene of occurrence by A-2 for the purpose of attacking the deceased and also in the absence of material that only on the instigation through words or by catching hold of the deceased, A-1 began to attack the deceased, it cannot be held that the concluded act on the part of the alleged abettor in catching hold of the deceased for preventing the deceased from moving further would be to facilitate the commission of the crime.[22]

3. Parameters of Abetment

The parameters of the 'abetment' have been stated in s 107 of the IPC . Section 107 states that a person abets the doing of a thing, who instigates any person to do that thing; or engages with one or more other person or persons in any conspiracy for the doing of that thing, if an act or illegal omission takes place in pursuance of that conspiracy, or the person should have intentionally aided any act or illegal omission. The explanation to s 107 says that any wilful misrepresentation or wilful concealment of a material fact which he is bound to disclose, may also come within the contours of 'abetment'.[23]

4. Sections 107 and 34 Distinguished

Section 34, IPC requires participation in crime, whereas mere instigation is sufficient for abetment under this section. Generally, under s 34, a criminal act must be done in furtherance of a common intention, but to constitute the offence of abetment, it is not necessary that the act abetted should be committed or that the effect required for constituting the offence should be caused. A preconcert and the abettor's presence at the scene of offence are not necessary for abetment, but they are necessary under s 34 .[24]

5. Section 107 , Indian Penal Code 1860 and Section 113A of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 are not Contradictory

The word 'intentionally aids' figuring in clause 3rd of s 107 of the IPC is wide enough to conclude that treating a married woman with cruelty would certainly fall within its ambit. The legislature, in its wisdom, by inserting the provisions of s 113A of the Evidence Act had further clarified the import of the definition of abetment of suicide by a married woman in view of social challenges of the present times. Thus, it cannot be said by any stretch of imagination that the provisions of s 113A, Evidence Act are contradictory to the one contained in s 107 of the IPC . On the other hand, these can be said to be supplementary to it.[25]709

6. Abettor and Punishment for Abetment

A person abets an offence, who abets either the commission of the offence, or the commission of an act, which would be an offence, if committed by a person capable by law of committing an offence with the same intention or knowledge as that of the abettor.[26]To constitute an abetment, it is not necessary that the act abetted should be committed.[27] It is also not material that instead of the act abetted some act different from that act is committed.

Section 109 of the IPC provides the punishment for abetment in case the act abetted is committed and prescribes the same punishment which has been provided for the substantive offence. Sections 115 and 116, IPC deal with punishment for abetment in cases when the act abetted is not committed. Remaining sections of this chapter provide for punishment for abetment in different other situations depending upon the manner of abetment and the nature, etc., of the act committed.

7. Commission of an Offence--Whether Necessary to Constitute an Abetment

'Abetment does not in itself involve the actual commission of the crime abetted. It is a crime apart',[28] the general law as to abetment is laid down in ss 107 - 20, IPC . According to it, 'to constitute the offence of abetment it is not necessary that the act abetted should be committed, or that the effect requisite to constitute the offence should be caused. This applied to the abetment of the waging-of-war against the government as much as to the abetment of any other offence under the IPC .[29]In the case of abetment by instigation or by engaging in a conspiracy, it is immaterial whether or not the person instigated commits the offence, or the persons conspiring together actually carry out the object of conspiracy. But, in the case of abetment by aid a person can be said to abet by aiding only when by the commission of an act he intends to facilitate the commission of the offence and does facilitate the same. Therefore, where a person is charged with abetment by aid, of an offence under s 161, IPC and the person charged with the offence is acquitted on the ground that he had not committed the offence, no question of intentionally aiding, by any act or omission, the commission of that offence arises. Whether, therefore the acquittal is right or wrong, the conviction of the abettor also cannot be allowed to stand in the circumstances.[30] An abetment may be complete though the effect contemplated was not caused.[31] But where a person is incited or exhorted to commit an offence, then that offence must be committed as a result of or in pursuance of exhortation or incitement.[32]

Mens Rea--Knowledge or Intention

There can be no abetment without knowledge or intention. The word 'intentionally' is used only with aiding in the third clause of the section but, as will be seen710 presently, even instigation and conspiracy involve mens rea.[33] In order to secure a conviction for abetment of murder under this section, it is essential for the prosecution to prove that the accused knew that the actual murderer did intend to commit the murder.[34] Mere proof, that the crime charged could not have been committed without the interposition of the alleged abettor, is not enough compliance with the requirements of this section. Intentional aiding and, therefore, active complicity is the gist of the offence of abetment under the third paragraph of the section.[35] In order to constitute the offence of abetment, there must be mens rea, i.e., guilty intention or knowledge. In order to convict a person of abetting the commission of a crime, it is not only necessary to prove that he has taken part in those steps of the transaction which are innocent, but in some way or other it is absolutely necessary to connect him with those steps of the transaction which are criminal.[36]

8. Mere Presence is not Enough

Mere knowledge or standing while an offence is being committed by others is not covered by the definition of abetment. It may well be that there is neither conspiracy nor instigation nor intentional aid by some act or illegal omission.[37] A person who happens to be present and witnesses the commission of a crime without himself either aiding in its commission and without giving the criminal any support or encouragement, does not become a principal in the second degree although he makes no effort to prevent or deter the criminal.[38] A person witnessing a crime and not giving information is not an accomplice.[39]

Mere presence of a person on the occasion of the giving of a bribe, and his omission to promptly inform the authorities, does not make him an accomplice, unless it can be shown that he somehow co-operated in the payment of the bribe, or was instrumental in the negotiation for the payment.[40] The mere omission to intervene or raise an alarm on the part of a person witnessing a murder does not constitute an abetment.[41] The interposition of the accused as a mere spectator to the exhibition of a blue-film without any further complicity cannot be taken to be amounting to abetment of the main offence under ss 292 - 94 of the IPC .[42]

Mere presence at the commission of a crime even with the awareness that a crime was being committed is not in itself an intentional aid.[43] Where the only evidence against the accused was that he was found within a few yards of the scene of the711 murder, but no weapon was found on him and no overt act was alleged tending even remotely to facilitate the commission of the crime, it was held that he could not be convicted of abetting murder.[44] Intentional aiding is the gist of abetment.[45]

9. Presence of Abettor not Required at the Scene

Now the true principle is that so long as the accomplice is participating by rendering aid, assistance or even mere encouragement'[46] to the actual perpetration at the very time when the latter is effecting the criminal purpose, no matter how far away from the spot he may be,[47] he is certainly aiding and abetting it and will be principal in the second degree.[48]Explanation to this section shows that abetment by aiding may be by doing something to facilitate the commission of the act abetted prior to the commission of that act.

Maharashtra Control of Organised Crime Act, 1999

Section 2(1)(a)(iii) of MCOC Act has defined the word 'abate' as, the rendering of any assistance whether financial or otherwise to the organised crime syndicate, would amount to abating the crime. The meaning of the term 'abetment' as mentioned in the IPC under s 107 has been further expanded by the definition of s 2(1)(a) of the MCOC Act and therefore the presence of the accused at the scene of offence and that, they were assisting in the commission of crime, undoubtedly falls, within the purview of the definition of s 2(1)(a)(iii) read with s 3(2) of the MCOC Act.[49]

10. Clause 1--'Instigate' and 'Instigation'

It is clear from the above discussion that to constitute 'instigation', a person who instigates another has to provoke, incite, urge or encourage doing of an act by the other, by goading or urging forward. Going by the dictionary meaning[50] the word 'goad' means, 'keep irritating or annoying somebody until he reacts,' So also, 'urge' means 'to advise or try hard to persuade somebody to do something or to make a person to move more quickly in a particular direction especially by pushing or forcing' such person. 'Urge forward' means in this context, 'urge' a person 'forward'. Thus, a person who instigates another has 'to goad or urge forward' the latter, with intention to provoke, incite, urge or encourage doing of an act by the latter.[51]

A close, combined reading of the meaning of the word 'instigation' with the meaning of the terms 'goad' and 'urge' will reveal that 'instigation' involves two things. One is a physical act or omission, while the other is a mental act. The physical act or omission involved in 'instigation' is, 'goading or urging forward' another. Such physical act of goading can be committed either by words or deed, as the meaning of the word suggests. 'Goading' can be committed also by any other wilful conduct may be, by even an adamant silence. Thus, by words, deeds wilful712 omission or wilful silence also, one can goad a person i.e., keep irritating or annoying a person until he reacts.[52]

So also, the physical act of 'urging forward' or 'instigation' involves doing of an act by strongly advising, persuading to make a person do something or by pushing or forcing a person in order to make him move more quickly in a forward direction. Thus, both the physical acts in 'goading or urging forward' can be committed by doing some act, either verbal or physical or even by a wilful omission or conduct.[53]

But, apart from such physical act or omission, one more factor has to be established to constitute 'instigation'. That is a mental act. While a person instigates another by the act of 'goading or urging forward', such person must also have, the intention to provoke, incite, urge or encourage doing of an act by the other. Such intention to provoke, incite, urge or encourage doing of an act by the other is an essential factor in 'instigation'. A person can be said to have instigated another, if such person, with intention to provoke, incite, urge or encourage the latter to do an act, has goaded or urged forward the other person.[54]

The offence of abetment by instigation depends upon the intention of the person who abets and not upon the act which is done by the person who has abetted. The abetment may be by instigation, conspiracy or intentional aid as provided under s 107, IPC, The words uttered in a fit of anger or omission without any intention cannot be termed as instigation.[55]

This section lays down that a person who instigates another to do a thing abets him to do that thing. In this sense it makes instigation tantamount to abetment. The word 'instigate' literally means 'to goad or urge forward or to provoke, incite, urge or encourage doing an act'.[56] The word 'instigate' in the Concise Oxford Dictionary is defined as 'urge on, incite, bring about by persuasion', and in Webster, as 'urge, forward, provoke', with the synonyms of 'stimulate, urge, spur, provoke, tempt, incite, impel, encourage, animate'. A person is said to instigate another to do an act when he actively suggests or stimulates him to the act by any means or language, direct or indirect, whether it takes the form of express solicitation or of hints, insinuation or encouragement.[57] Instigation consists in actively suggesting and stimulating another to act.[58] A person who by wilful misrepresentation or by wilful concealment of fact which is bound to be disclosed, voluntarily causes or713 procures or attempts to cause or procure a thing to be done, is said to instigate the doing of that thing.[59]

The mere fact that the husband treated the wife with cruelty is not enough. Where no element of investigation to constitute abetment to suicide is found in the evidence led by the prosecution, the accused would not be convicted under ss 107, and 306, IPC .[60]

Instigation need not be in any Particular Form

It is not necessary that express and direct words should be used to indicate what exactly should be done by the persons to whom directions are given.[61] The law does not require that instigation should be in a particular form or that it should be only in words and may not be by conduct; for instance, a mere gesture indicating 'beat' or a mere offering of money by an arrested person to the constable who arrests him, may be regarded as instigation, in the one case to beat, and in the other to take a bribe.[62]

Instigation has wider meaning

The meaning of the word 'instigate' used in s 107, IPC, which defines the meaning of the word 'abets', cannot be restricted to the use of the actual words, 'instigating to commit suicide'. It has to be given wider meaning commensurate with the common experience of life.[63] Therefore, it has been held to be 'instigation' in the context of conduct of husband towards wife where the husband created a situation by conduct whereby the victim (his wife), who was in complete dependence and at the mercy of the accused, saw no other way out, except to end her life.[64]

Instigation must be conveyed

There is no instigation unless it is communicated to the author of the act in some form or the other. The instigation may be personal or through a letter or a third party.[65] If the instigation is by means of a letter sent through post, the offence of 'abetment by instigation' is completed as soon as the contents of such letter become known to the addressee, and the offence is triable at the place where such letter is received.[66] A question may arise as to what will be the consequences, if the letter does not reach the addressee? In England, it has been held that a person may be guilty of an attempt to procure the commission by another person of an act of gross indecency with himself by writing a letter to the other person, which in fact does not reach him, if the letter is in such terms as would convey to an understanding mind, an invitation to commit the act.[67]

Act causing Humiliation is not Instigation

The case of the prosecution was that due to the acts of the accused, the deceased felt humiliated and committed suicide. It was held the act causing humiliation may be the offence, but if there is no material on record to show that there was 'abetment' as714 defined in s 107, IPC for the deceased committing suicide, a charge under s 306, IPC, cannot be framed against the accused.[68]

Instigation may be Direct or Indirect

Instigation may be direct, as by counsel of command, or indirect, as by exercising an express liking or approbation or assent to another's design.[69] But in neither case it is necessary to show that the mind of the person instigated was affected thereby.[70]

'Any person', i.e., a person or persons (s 9) and any company or association or body of persons, whether incorporated or not (s 11) and the person or persons instigated may be known, or unknown, as where the instigation is directed to the public at large, as by a newspaper or book, etc.[71]

Instigation may be Personal or through a Third Party

The instigation may be personal or through a third party.[72]

When Instigation by Letter completes Abetment

If the instigation is by means of a letter sent through post, the offence of abetment by instigation is completed as soon as the contents of such letter become known to the addressee, and the offence is triable at the place where such letter is received.[73]

Advice per se may not be Instigation

Instigation necessarily indicates some active suggestion, or support or stimulation to the commission of the act itself, and advice can become instigation only if it is found that it was an advice which was meant actively to suggest or stimulate the commission of an offence. Advice per se cannot necessarily be instigation.[74]

Instigation must have reference to thing Done

The instigation must have reference to the thing that was done and not to the thing that was likely to have been done by the person who is instigated. It is only if this condition is fulfilled that a person can be guilty of abetment by instigation.[75]

Good Object of Instigator

Even if the object of the person who instigated another to commit a crime is to catch him in the act of committing the crime, instigation by him nevertheless amounts to abetment of the offence, and the abettor must be regarded as an accomplice when the object of the instigation is to make the offender commit the offence, and the person who was instigated actually commits the offence.[76] There is no reason why agents provocateurs are not guilty of abetment on the ground that715 their ultimate motives may be good, provided, however, they are guilty of active suggestions to their victims.[77]

Abetment by Instigation--Instances

When the persons who were members of an unlawful assembly set fire to a hut in consequence of order of the accused, it would be too unreal to hold that the persons who set fire to the hut did so irrespective or independently of the order given by the accused. The conviction of the accused for the offence under s 436 read with s 109, IPC, was therefore not bad in law.[78]

Where the accused gave the call 'assault the rascal' and injuries were caused by spear; it was held that the instigation was to assault with a deadly weapon and the accused was guilty under s 324, read with s 109, IPC .[79] Where accused persons went to the house of the deceased, hurled abuses at her and cast aspersions on her character only to hurt and harm her, the words used by them were highly provocative and stimulating, the deceased as a result committed suicide, the acts of the accused persons amounted to instigation and they were held liable to be convicted under s 306 read with s 107, IPC .[80]

Explanation 1--Instigation by Misrepresentation or Concealment

A wilful misrepresentation of a fact amounts to an abetment of an act within the meaning of s 107, expln I.[81] A passive or negative conduct, such as mere silence, does not constitute 'Instigation'. If there is something more than mere silence, if there is concealment, i.e., if something is done by one to conceal from another a material fact which the former is bound to disclose, then by virtue of expln I, the conduct of the former would constitute 'instigation'. A person can be convicted of abetment of theft under the expln I, only if he either procures or attempts to procure the commission of the theft. Mere subsequent knowledge of the offence is insufficient.[82] When the law places a duty to act on a person, his illegal omission to act is to be judged by the same principles. It may be a form of abetment under this section, while s 116 takes particular notice of the omission of a police officer whose duty it is to prevent a crime. So where a police officer purposely kept out of the way, knowing that some persons were likely to be tortured to get confessions out of them, he was pronounced guilty of abetment.[83] Abetment by omission is punishable only if the omission is an illegal omission. The owner of a motorcar cannot, therefore, be held guilty of abetment in merely omitting to give information to his employees as to the rules framed under the Bombay Motor Vehicles Act 1904.[84]716

Instigation through Innocent Agent--Mens Rea

The offence of abetment depends upon the intention of the person who abets.[85]Under the English law, the person incited to commit a certain act must know that the act is criminal, in order that the person, who incited him thereto may be guilty of instigation; for if the person incited does not know that what he is urged to do is illegal, he is really an innocent agent, and the person who incited him is liable as a principal for what is done, and not merely for incitement.[86] Under the IPC, however, a person acting through an innocent agent is not liable as a principal but only as an abettor (s 108, expln 3) so that the question of the criminality of the mind of the actual perpetrator of the offence makes no difference to the legal responsibility of the person who has incited him. Under this section, it is the instigation to the commission of the act itself which constitutes the offence that is regarded as abetment. To ask a person, as a mere threat to fire a gun, without intending that he should really fire it, is not to instigate him to fire the gun. The threat would become instigation only if it is intended that in the event of the threat having no effect, the gun should in fact be fired.[87] Threatening words used by accused would not be sufficient to be described as instigating in the commission of offence.[88]

Mens rea is an essential ingredient of the offence of abetment. Where the deceased wife on account of stress, depression or family problem commits suicide, the accused cannot be held liable for abetment of suicide. The husband and his brother were habituated to drinking and often demand money and as a result the wife commits suicide, the accused husband cannot be convicted for offence under s 306, IPC .[89]

A person is said to instigate any other person to do an act which makes the other person to do such act by any means possible, either direct or indirect. Mens rea is necessary concomitant for instigation.[90]

Instigation through Newspapers

It cannot be said that by publication of the articles, which are said to be of defamatory character, in a daily newspaper, the editor or the other respondents who are also said to have published those articles meant to instigate or intentionally aid the commission of suicide by the victim. The reaction against an article published can be different from different people who read it. A person may get enraged and retaliate or read it and commit suicide. Therefore, the reaction to a defamatory article which cannot be predicted will not be attributable as an intention to illegally aiding or instigating the suicide by the person concerned. A more active role which can be described as instigating or aiding the doing of a thing, is required before a person can be said to be abetting the commission of offence under s 306 of the IPC .[91]

717For the purpose of preventing incitement to murder, or to commit any offence under the Explosive Substances Act 1908, appearing in newspapers, provision has been made for the forfeiture to the state, under a summary procedure, of the printing press, and copies of any newspaper containing matter constituting incitement of such a nature.[92]

The keeper of any printing press who is required to make a declaration under s 4 of the Press and Registration of Books Act 1867, is bound to deposit with the magistrate (unless he be for special reasons to be recorded exempted from so doing) security which may, by notice, in writing given by the state government, be declared to be forfeited should any newspaper, book or other document printed in such press contain an incitement, direct or indirect, to commit any offence specified in s 4(1) of the Indian Press Act 1910. But nothing contained in this Act shall be deemed to prevent a prosecution under any law for an offence against the Act.[93]

Exact Words of Instigation need not be proved

There has to be a reasonable certainty in regard to the meaning of the words used by the 'inciter' in order to judge whether or not there was an incitement, but it is not necessary, in law, to prove the actual words used for the incitement.[94]

Hawkins[95] states:

> Those who by showing an express liking, approbation, or assent to another's felonious design of committing a felony, abet and encourage him to commit it, but are so far absent when he actually commits it, that he could not be encouraged by the hopes of any immediate help or assistance from them, are all of them accessories before the act, both of the felony intended, and to all other felonies which shall happen and by the execution of it, if they do not expressly retract and countermand their encouragement, before it is actually committed.

Thus it was said by Hale[96] that if A commands B to kill C, but before the execution thereof repents and countermands B yet B proceeds in the execution thereof; A is not an accessory, for his consent does not continue, and he gave a timely countermand to B. But even though A had repented, yet if B had not been actually countermanded before the act committed, A would be an accessory before the act.[97] In the absence of such withdrawal, retraction or countermanding, the person who abets an offence would be liable even if the offence abetted is not committed.[98]

A prisoner, who consented to form one of a party who committed theft, and resiled from his agreement, but was present at the commission of the theft, would not come within cl 2 of this section and will not be convicted of the act, but of abetment thereof under cl 3 of this section and s 109 read together.[99]718

Limits of Liability

Where, of several persons constituting, an unlawful assembly, some only are armed with sticks, and A, one of them, is not so armed, but picks up a stick, and uses it, B (the master of A), who gave a general order to beat, is guilty of abetting the assault made by A.[1] A person taking away a cow from its owner without his consent for the purpose of liquidating that owner's debt, is guilty of theft; and it follows that the person ordering such taking would be guilty of abetment of theft.[2]

11. Clause 2--Conspiracy

Unlawful Combination is Conspiracy

A 'conspiracy' is a species of association or union of two or more persons for some common purpose. When such association is legal, it is termed in law a 'combination', as where persons combine in furtherance of their professional, commercial or industrial interests, and when it is against law and public opinion or by unlawful means, it is styled a 'conspiracy', and is thus always used in English law in mala parte as importing a legal wrong.

Before the insertion of ch VII, comprising ss 120A and 120B in the Code, criminal conspiracy was not a substantive offence and was treated only as a species of abetment.[3] In King-Emperor v Tirumal Reddi ,[4] Bhashyam Ayyangar J, observed:

> Under the Indian Criminal Law conspiracy is a mere species of abetment when an act or an illegal omission takes place in pursuance of that conspiracy and amounts to a distinct offence for each distinct offence abetted by conspiracy. Under the English law the agreement or combination to do an unlawful thing or to do a lawful thing by unlawful means amounts in itself to be a criminal offence. The Indian Penal Code follows the English law of conspiracy only in a few exceptional cases which are made punishable under section 311 (thug), section 400 (belonging to a gang of dacoits), section 401 (belonging to a gang of thieves), section 402 (being a member of an assembly of dacoits), section 121A (conspiring to wage war). In these cases whether any act is done or not or offence committed in furtherance of the conspiracy, the conspirator is punishable and he will also be punishable separately for every offence committed in furtherance of the conspiracy. In all other cases, conspiracy is only one species of 'abetment of an offence' as that expression is defined and explained in s 108 and stands on the same footing as abetment 'by intentional aiding'. In regard to both these species of abetment an act or illegal omission, in pursuance of the conspiracy or for the purpose of intentional aiding, is essential.

Now s 120A, IPC defines a criminal conspiracy and s 120B, IPC provides for its punishment.

Abetment by Conspiracy

In order to constitute abetment by conspiracy, three things are essential: (a) the person abetting must engage, with one or more other person or persons in a conspiracy; (b) the conspiracy must be for doing the thing abetted; and (c) an act or illegal omission must take place in pursuance of the conspiracy and in order to do the719 doing of that thing. Under the second clause of the section it will be observed that, when the abetment is by conspiracy, the elements which constitute the offence are, first, the combining together of two or more persons in the conspiracy, and secondly, an act or illegal omission takes place in pursuance of that conspiracy, and in order to do the doing of that thing.[5] All these elements must combine to constitute abetment by conspiracy.[6]

Abettor or Conspirator cannot be Punished when Principal Offender Acquitted

The petitioner was charged with the offence of abetment by conspiracy of the commission of the offence of theft by one Major Trilok Chand. The High Court of Allahabad had clearly held that there was no evidence that Major Trilok Chand has committed the theft, therefore, unless the substantive offence against the principal offender is established, the question of abettor being held guilty under these circumstances does not arise. The petitioner was alleged to have entered into a conspiracy along with eight others and abetted the commission of the offence. All the other alleged abettors and the principal offender Major Trilok Chand were acquitted. The petitioner alone remained in the picture as one having abetted the offence by entering into conspiracy. It is axiomatic that there cannot be a conspiracy of one. It was held that the charge against the petitioner was not sustainable.[7]

'Abetment by Conspiracy' distinguished from 'Conspiracy'

A conspiracy will not amount to an abetment unless an act or illegal omission takes place in pursuance of the conspiracy. Hence, if the offence, alleged to be the object of the conspiracy, has been committed, the conspiracy amounts to an abetment under s 107 and, in such a case, it is unnecessary to invoke the provisions of s 120A and 120B .[8] There may be an element of abetment in a conspiracy, but conspiracy is something more than an abetment.[9] In order to constitute the offence of abetment by conspiracy, first, there must be a combining of two or more persons in the conspiracy; secondly, an act or illegal omission must take place in pursuance of that conspiracy and in order to do that thing. It is not necessary that the abettor should concert the offence with the person who commits it. It is sufficient if he engages in the conspiracy in pursuance of which the offence is committed. But the gist of the offence of criminal conspiracy is in the agreement to do an illegal act or an act, which is not illegal, by illegal means. When the agreement is to commit an offence, the agreement itself becomes the offence of criminal conspiracy. Where however, the agreement is to do an act which is not illegal, by illegal means, some act besides the agreement is necessary. Therefore the distinction between abetment by conspiracy and criminal conspiracy, so far as the agreement to commit an offence is concerned, lies in this that for abetment by conspiracy, mere agreement is not enough while in the offence of criminal conspiracy, the very agreement or plot is, in itself, is an act720 and is the gist of the offence.[10] It is a substantive offence in itself[11] and has nothing to do with abetment.[12]

Two or More Persons must conspire

To constitute abetment by conspiracy, two or more persons must conspire and one of them must be the person abetting. A person cannot conspire with himself or abet his own act.[13] To constitute conspiracy, there must be at least two persons engaged therein, and evidence must always be given to prove that there was another person or other persons engaged besides the accused, though his or their names may not be known.[14] So, if one of two persons charged is acquitted, the conviction of the other for conspiracy cannot stand.[15]

Person Abetting must Engage in a Conspiracy

Abetment by conspiracy 'consists' in the combination and agreement of persons to do some illegal act or to effect some purpose which is not illegal by illegal means.[16]

Gist of Offence

'A conspiracy', it has been said, 'consists not merely in the intention of two or more, but in the agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. So long as such a design rests in intention only, it is not indictable'.[17] The gist of the offence lies, not in doing the act, or affecting the purpose for which the conspiracy is formed, nor in attempting to do them, nor in inciting others to do them, but in the forming of the scheme or agreement between the parties. The external or overt act of the crime is concert by which mutual consent to a common purpose is exchanged.[18] The agreement or engagement postulates knowledge of the scheme or design. It is not necessary that all the conspirators should be equally informed of all the details of the scheme. But there must be mutual consent to a common purpose.

One D impersonated G and withdrew from a treasury, money payable to G. The commission of the offence of cheating by impersonation by D was facilitated by R, a mukhtar, identifying him as G. It was held that R could not be convicted for abetment of the offence committed by D unless it could be found that R knew that the person whom he identified was not G and the offence of cheating by impersonation was being committed.[19]

Though, to establish the charge of conspiracy there must be agreement, there need not be proof of direct meeting or combination, nor need the parties be brought into721 each other's presence: the agreement may be inferred from circumstances raising a presumption of a common concerted plan to carry out the unlawful design.[20]

So far as proof goes, conspiracy, as Grose J said in R v Brissae ,[21] 'is generally matter of inference deduced from certain criminal acts of the parties accused, done in pursuance of an apparent criminal purpose in common between them.'[22]

Under expln 5 to s 108, IPC, it is not necessary for the commission of the offence of abetment by conspiracy that the abettor should concert the offence with the person who commits it. It is sufficient if he engages in the conspiracy in pursuance of which the offence is committed.[23]

Not necessary that all must Join from First Stage

It is also not necessary that all should have joined in the scheme from the first: those who come in at a later stage are equally guilty, provided the agreement is proved.[24] But if the offence, which is the object of the conspiracy, or one which naturally flows from it, is actually committed, it must have been committed in consequence of the conspiracy,[25] and it must, therefore, be proved that the accused was engaged in the conspiracy down to the time when the offence was committed, or when the act was put in the course of actual execution.[26]

The Conspiracy must be 'For the doing of that thing'

In the case of abetment by conspiracy, obviously a person can be said to abet the doing of a thing only if the conspiracy is for the doing of that particular thing. If A and B conspire to rob C, and B not only robs but even kills C, A cannot be said to abet the killing unless it can be said that A must have foreseen it as a probable consequence of the conspiracy. The test, in such cases, must always be whether, having regard to the immediate object of the instigation or conspiracy, the act done by the principal is one which, according to ordinary experience and common sense, the abettor must have foreseen as probable.[27]

Act or Illegal Omission to be in Pursuance of Conspiracy

For abetment by conspiracy, not only must the person abetting engage in a conspiracy, but there must be an overt act or illegal omission in furtherance of the conspiracy and for the doing of the thing abetted. Mere intention not followed by any act cannot constitute an offence, and an indirect preparation which does not amount to an act commencing the offence, does not constitute either a principal offence, or an attempt or abetment of the same.[28] For the abetment of conspiracy, a mere combination of persons or agreement between them is not enough. An act or illegal722 omission must take place in pursuance of the conspiracy and in order to the doing of the thing conspired for.[29]The conspiracy itself is not 'an act committed' which can be abetted.[30] The act itself may not be the immediate object of the conspiracy, but it must be an act committed in pursuance of the conspiracy and a probable consequence of it.[31]

Where the accused conspired with other persons to prepare a document, purporting to be a valuable security, which he knew would be a false document, and must have known was to be used for purposes of fraud, and to that end he prepared a draft which he was about to copy on a stamp of sufficiently early date procured for the purpose, and asked a witness for information to a fact to be inserted in such false document, it was held that he was guilty of abetment of forgery as he conspired to commit the offence of forgery and did an act which facilitated the commission of the offence and thereby facilitated it.[32]

If a conspirator withdraws from a conspiracy before the offence which is the object thereof is effected by the other parties thereto, he is not liable under ss 100 and 109 or ss 111 - 13 and to the more severe punishment thereunder, but he still remains guilty of abetment by conspiracy under s 115 or 116 .[33]

Joint Liability--Each Conspirator is the Agent of the Other

Where several persons are proved to have combined together for the same illegal purpose, any act done by one of the parties in pursuance of the original concerted plan, and with reference to the common object, is, in the contemplation of the law, the act of all. Each party is an agent of the others in carrying out the objects of the conspiracy, and doing anything in furtherance of the common design.[34]

Where four persons combine to attack with lathis their common enemy, each is abetting the conduct of the other within the meaning of this section.[35]

It is not essential that there should have been an agreement in express terms as to what the principal in the first degree should do; the aider and abettor will be responsible for anything done in the joint enterprise which the evidence shows was within his contemplation. Thus, in cases where several persons have come together for the purpose of committing some breach of the peace, their general resolution must be considered, and if it appears upon evidence either to have been actually and explicitly entered into by the confederates, or may be reasonably collected from their number, equipment or behaviour at or before the scene of action, that some kind of violence shall in certain eventualities be resorted to, then every individual in the723 group will be involved in the guilt of any who do any such act which has thus been established to have been within the contemplation of the group.[36]

12. Clause 3--Abetment by Aiding

The third way of abetting is by intentionally aiding the doing of a thing by an act or illegal omission. In abetment by 'aid', it is not the intention to aid the commission of crime, that is punished, but the fact that something is done or not done, whereby the commission of a crime is rendered easier. In instigation, the criminal intention is punished; in conspiracy, the intention plus some act; in aid, the act itself. Reading cl 3 of the s 107, IPC with expln 2, which goes with it, for abetment by aid, four things must be combined:

(i) aid must be actually afforded by means of an 'act or illegal omission';
(ii) there must be an intention to aid thereby;[37]
(iii) the commission of the offence must be facilitated thereby; and
(iv) the act or omission must take place either prior to, or at the time of, the commission of the act intended to be aided (expln 2).

If one of these elements is wanting, e.g., the offence is not, in fact, facilitated by the conduct in question[38] there can be no abetment.

It is clear that under the third clause, when a person abets by aiding, the act so aided should have been committed in order to make such aiding an offence. In other words, unlike the first two clauses of s 107, IPC, the third clause applies to a case where the offence is committed.[39] When accused charged under s 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947 is acquitted as no prima facie case was made out against him, the charge against co-accused for abetment of said offence is not maintainable.[40] The word 'intentionally aids' figuring in clause third of s 57 of IPC is wide enough to conclude that treating a married woman with cruelty would certainly fall within its ambit.[41]

Where a person sends a girl to her matrimonial house on false pretext where she is raped by her husband accused, the case is covered by clause 3 of s 107, IPC . Conviction under s 109, IPC was held proper.[42]

Aiding to Constitute Abetment must Snowball into Intentional Aiding

An act which merely amounts to aiding the commission of an offence is not an abetment. The aiding must snowball into 'intentionally aiding' the doing of a thing. The commission of the act must be the dominant intention of the person who aids it. If a person only knows or has only reason to believe that his act would facilitate the724 commission of offence, it cannot be said that his dominant intention was that.[43] In the absence of a specific allegation against a counsel as to in what way he abetted or aided the offence, preparation and presentation of affidavit before the assistant commercial taxes officer by the counsel in discharge of his duties cannot be construed as aid or abetment of the offence.[44]

The Aid must be actually afforded by an 'Act or Illegal Omission'

The word 'illegal' means against or not authorised by law and omission is something that has not been done either deliberately or accidently.[45] For the meaning of 'act' and 'illegal omission', refer to synopsis notes under s 33, IPC and s 3(2) of the General Clauses Act 1897.

At times even refraining from action and mere impassivity makes a person liable to penalty. There are two kinds of 'impassivity'. In the one, a person remains passive because although he has formed an intention to accomplish something prohibited, he does nothing and thereby he fails to accomplish it. In these circumstances he commits no offence. In the other, by remaining passive and doing nothing a person accomplishes something prohibited. It is the latter form of 'impassivity' which is punishable as an offence.[46] Where abetment is by an omission, the omission must, of course, be an illegal omission, i.e., a breach of a legal obligation.[47] Where accused persons went to the house of the deceased, hurled abuses at her and cast aspersions on her character only to hurt and harm her, the words used by them were highly provocative and stimulating and led the deceased to commit suicide, accused persons were held to have abetted the commission of suicide by the prosecutrix.[48]

There is no duty cast on the president of a meeting to interrupt songs or to forbid their continuance. Hence no illegal omission is committed by him where revolutionary songs are sung in his presence and he has done nothing.[49]

To prove abetment by 'illegal omission', it would be necessary to show that the accused intentionally aided the commission of the offence by his non-interference.[50] In a case of custodial rape by co-accused, the prosecutrix was forcibly taken to the police station by the accused who kept watch over the husband of the prosecutrix while she was being raped by the co-accused. The accused did not do anything and turned a deaf ear towards the cries of the prosecutrix. The conviction of accused for abetting commission of rape with the aid of s 107, IPC was upheld.[51]

The mere fact that the offence of extortion under s 384 of the IPC is committed in the presence of the village chowkidar, without eliciting any disapproval on his part, will not render him liable as an abettor of the offence. There was no illegal omission on the part of the chowkidar as he was not bound by s 89 [now s 85(3)] or by s 90 (now s 87) of the CrPC to report the offence of extortion; and even if he were so bound, his subsequent omission to report the commission of the offence could not be725 said to be intentionally aiding the doing of the thing itself which must have been done before it could be reported by the chowkidar.[52] But he could have been guilty if it could be shown that his non-interference was intentional, i.e., that he omitted to interfere with the intention or motive of assisting in the extortion.[53]

A, a head constable, knowing that prisoners likely to be tortured, keeps out of the way. A has abetted that torture.[54]

A policeman stands by acquiescing in an assault on a prisoner committed by B, another policeman, for the purpose of extorting a confession. A abets an offence under s 330 .[55]

Where a wife, who was having illegal connection with the accused, knowing that the accused was waiting for an opportunity' to ambush and murder her husband, did not warn the husband against the danger to his life and let him go, and he was murdered by the accused, it was held that, in the circumstances, the conduct of the wife in not warning her husband, though certainly open to censure, did not amount to abetment of the murder committed by the accused.[56]

13. Mere Silence, Doing Nothing and Failure to Prevent Offence, not Abetment

Mere silence is not necessarily an illegal omission.[57]Simply doing nothing is not an act, and unless there is a duty to do something, it cannot be said that it is an illegal omission. Where nothing has been pointed out on behalf of the prosecution to show that accused's act of not making any endeavour to save the life of the deceased is against law or the accused was under an obligation by law to prevent such incident, it may be possible that the accused, seeing the flames, was so shocked that he did not react or he might not have attempted to put off the fire apprehending danger to his life, as individuals act differently in the same situation, the act of the accused was held not falling within the expression 'illegal omission'.[58]

Mere failure to prevent commission of an offence is not, by itself, an abetment in the absence of anything to show that the accused helped in, or instigated, the commission of the offence,[59] nor does the omission by a public servant to bring to the notice of his higher authorities, offences by the fellow-servant amount to abetment of the offence though it may form the foundation for a disciplinary action against him in a departmental manner.[60] A superior officer, like an excise officer, though present on the spot, is not under a legal obligation to prevent his subordinate, a preventive726 officer, from taking a bribe,[61] as being cases in which the accused was legally bound to prevent the commission of offences.

There must be an Intention to Aid

Clause 3 of this section relates only to intentional aiding. Intention to aid the commission of the crime is the gist of the offence of abetment by aiding.[62] In order to constitute abetment, the abettor must be shown to have 'intentionally' aided the commission of the crime. Mere proof that the crime charged could not have been committed without the interposition of the alleged abettor is not enough compliance with the requirements of s 107, IPC .[63]An act which merely amounts to aiding the commission of an offence is not an abetment. The aiding must snowball into 'intentionally aiding' the doing of a thing. The commission of the offence must be the dominant intention of the person who aids it.[64] A mere giving of an aid will not make the act an abetment of an offence, if the person who gave the aid did not know that an offence was being committed or contemplated. The intention should be to aid an offence or to facilitate the commission of an offence. But if the person who lends his support does not know or has no reason to believe that the act which he was aiding or supporting was by itself a criminal act, it cannot be said that he intentionally aids or facilitates the doing of the offence.[65] It must be shown that the commission of the crime was not possible without the specific aid rendered by the abettor.[66]

In Shri Ram v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[67] their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed:

> Thus, in order to constitute abetment, the abettor must be shown to have 'Intentionally' aided the commission of the crime. Mere proof, that the crime charged could not have been committed without the interposition of the alleged abettor, is not enough compliance with the requirements of s 107 . A person may, for example, invite another causally or for a friendly purpose and that may facilitate the murder of the invitee. But, unless the invitation was extended with intent to facilitate the commission of the murder, the person inviting cannot be said to have abetted murder. It is not enough that an act on the part of the alleged abettor, happens to facilitate commission of the crime. Intentional aiding and, therefore, active complicity is the gist of the offence of abetment under the third paragraph of s 107 .

A, the editor of a paper, inserted advertisements not obscene in themselves but relating, as he knew, to the sale of obscene books and photographs. A abetted their sale.[68]727

A printed a letter in his newspaper urging Indian soldiers to give up their allegiance to the British Crown, and also sent copies of the letter for distribution amongst the troops. A was guilty of abetment of an offence under s 124A, by way of aid.[69]

A, a debtor, paid a sum of money, to B, his creditor, and accepted an unstamped receipt from B, promising to affix a stamp himself. A did not thereby abet the offence of giving an unstamped receipt.[70]

A gave a doe to B who had declared his intention of coercing C. B wounds C. A abetted the offence by way of aid.[71]

Assisting a murder by holding the legs of the deceased when he was being murdered would be abetting the murder, if the assistance given was intentional. If it was not intentional but was given only under a threat of being put to death in case of non-compliance, the person assisting would be saved by s 94 .[72]

A priest who knowingly celebrates a bigamous marriage would be guilty of abetting the offence of bigamy.[73]

But mere presence at the commission of a crime even with the awareness that a crime was being committed is not in itself an intentional aid.[74]

Where in a murder case a co-accused stated that she remained an unwilling spectator while the murder was being committed by the other accused, her omission to intervene or raise an alarm did not constitute abetment as her inaction did not constitute criminality.[75]

Where a person who joined a conspiracy to wage war subsequently left it, but he omitted to report the plot under s 39, CrPC, it was held that in the absence of evidence to show that his intention in omitting to report was with a view to aiding the waging of war, his omission to report could not constitute abetment.[76]

The bare fact of an attestation is not sufficient to justify an inference that the attester knew that he was attesting a forged document,[77] but a person who attests a forged document knowing that it is intended to prove the discharge of a debt is guilty of abetment even if the document required no attestation.[78]

Single utterance of words leading towards death or suicide would not constitute abetment under s 107, IPC . Continuous conduct either by words or deeds is required in case those words or deeds do not directly indicate death or suicide to deceased.[79]

Time when the Aid is given

The act or omission must take place either prior to or at the time of, the commission of the offence. There can be no abetment (in the restricted sense in which the word is728 employed in the IPC) of an offence after it has been committed;[80] and it should be remembered that aid given at the time of an offence, renders the aider a principal in the offence under ss 34 - 38 . Mere subsequent knowledge of an offence is no evidence of abetment of that offence.[81]

Aid by Concealment

There is one important species of aid which can be given to the commission of crime, viz, concealment of the design to commit the crime; this kind of aid is dealt with separately under ss 118 - 20, IPC .

Facility by Supplying Food--Whether Amounts to Abetment

Supplying food to a person about to commit a crime is not necessarily an abetment of the crime. The supplying of necessary food to a person known to be engaged in crime is not per se criminal; but if food were supplied in order that the criminal might go on a journey to the intended scene of the crime or conceal himself while waiting for an opportunity to commit the crime, the supplying of food would be in order to aid the commission of the crime and might facilitate it.[82]

14. Abetment of Theft--Accessory before Fact

A and B went to steal horses. A remained half a mile from the place where the horses were. B alone went and brought horses to him, and they both rode away the horses. It was held that A was an accessory before the fact.[83]

A servant let a man into his master's house in order that he might steal the master's money. The servant left the house before the theft was committed by the man. It was held that the servant the fact.[84] A person who knowingly aids in the disposal of stolen property falls under the third definition and is an accomplice, and that whatever may have been the case in India before the Penal Code, he is an accomplice under the Code.[85]A person aiding in the disposal of stolen property is no doubt an accomplice or accessory, but he is an accessory after the fact. Such persons are dealt with in ss 410 - 414 . The chapter on abetment is restricted to accessories before the fact. Explanation 2 in this section itself shows that the thing facilitating the act abetted or aided must be done prior to or at the time of the commission of the act. In Davies v DPP ,[86] the House of Lords has declared that receivers of stolen goods are held to be accomplices of the thieves from whom they receive goods on a trial of the latter for larceny. But the judgment goes on to distinguish a receiver as such from either an aider or an abettor, or an accessory before the fact or an accessory after the fact. On the other hand, the thief himself is treated as the aider and abettor of the receiver of the stolen property.[87]729

15. Abetment of Suicide (Sati or Suttee)

Abetment of Suicide--Essentials

There should be an intention to provoke, incite or encourage the doing of an act by the latter. Each person's suicidability pattern is different from the others. Each person has his own idea of self esteem and self respect. It is not possible to lay down any straitjacket formula in dealing with such cases. Each case has to be decided on the basis of facts and circumstances of the case.[88]

Abetment involves a mental process of instigating a person or intentionally aiding a person in doing of a thing. Without a positive act on the part of the accused to instigate or aid in committing suicide, conviction cannot be sustained.[89]

Where a Hindu having died, his widow prepared to commit sati, in the presence of the accused who at first dissuaded her but finding that she was determined, yielded and gave her ghee which she poured over the pyre prepared for her husband's cremation and over herself sitting on the pyre. The pyre was then burned and consumed her and the corpse of her husband. It was held that the accused were guilty of abetting suicide of the woman.[90] In another case of sati, where the accused were members of the crowd who had joined the funeral procession from the house of the deceased to the cremation ground, while the widow of the deceased was walking in front of the procession with an intention to commit sati and they were shouting 'Sati Mata Ki Jai' and as the procession proceeded, about 100 or 150 of the crowd surrounded the police in order to make it impossible for them to prevent her from becoming sati and ultimately the funeral pyre was set on fire with the widow sitting on it, it was held that the accused who were in that procession including the accused, were throughout intentionally aiding the widow in her decision to commit suicide by taking her with the bier to the cremation ground. They were further aiding her inasmuch as they prevented the police from interfering.[91] If there is no evidence showing that accused had acted at point of time suggested or hinted for commission of suicide. No case for instigation or abetment of suicide made out against accused.[92] The case law on sati has now to be read in the light of the provisions of the enactment the commission of Sati

(Prevention) Act 1987.

Appellant accused, supervisor in a school, had slapped the deceased, a student who was found sitting on his scooter. The student committed suicide. Held, the slapping of the child by the appellant did not constitute abetment to the deceased to commit suicide. If it transpires to the court that a victim committing suicide was hypersensitive to ordinary petulance, discord and differences, which is of common in the society and it could not be said that such petulance, discord and differences to the induced and ordinary person to commit suicide. Even if the accused had beaten the deceased, it could not be said that it is an act of attempt to commit suicide or instigating the commission of suicide by the deceased. It could not also be said that730 no other alternative to the deceased, except, to end his life was open. The appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 306, IPC .[1]

Section 306 penalises abatement of suicide. It is a unique legal phenomenon in the IPC that the only act, the attempt of which alone will become an offence. The person who attempts to commits suicide is guilty of the offence under s 309, IPC, whereas the person who commits suicide cannot be reached at all. Section 306 renders the person who abets the commission of suicide punishable for which the condition precedent is that suicide should necessarily have been committed. It is possible to abet the commission of suicide. But nobody would abet a mere attempt to commit suicide.[2]

Abetment in context of offence under s 306 IPC means inciting, encouraging, provoking or urging forward to commit conspiracy for doing of a thing.[3]

The pronouncement of Appex Court in P Rathinam Nagbhusan Patnaik v Union of India ,[4] that attempt to commit suicide is violative of art 21 of the Constitution, does not make the offence of abetment to commit suicide ultra vires the Constitution because the attempt to commit suicide is volitional and well planned act of the person concerned whereas abetment of the offence of suicide is on different footing as third person is aiding the other person to take his life by committing suicide.[5]

Appellant No 1 had illicit relations with the wife (accused no 2) of the deceased, he had taken the wife of the deceased in the presence of the relatives of the deceased as a result the deceased suffered humiliation and committed suicide. The close relatives of the deceased who were also examined as witnesses had categorically stated in their statements that on coming to know of the fact that Appellant No 1 has taken Accused No 2 from the house of PW5 and left her on 06.01.1996 at her parents' house, the deceased stated before the inmates of his house that because of the said insult and humiliation he does not like to live. It is also established that immediately thereafter in the night between 7th and 8th of January 1996 the deceased committed suicide. Held, the facts lead to only one conclusion that it is on account of humiliation and insult due to the behaviour and conduct of Appellant No. 1 and Accused No. 2 that deceased committed suicide. The conviction of the appellant under ss 107 and 306, IPC was held proper.[6]

Abetment of suicide is a distinct offence punishable under s 306 of the IPC . The provisions of abetment as contained in and explained by s 107 fully apply to an offence under s 306 of the IPC . The person against whom charge of abetment is levelled has to do something purposefully which facilitates the commission of the offence. It cannot be said with any stretch of imagination that a person subjecting a woman to cruelty is guilty of abetment of suicide.[7] Direct evidence of instigation to commit suicide is not necessary. When purposely or knowingly result is caused, and actual result is within the knowledge of the abettor, he can be held liable for abetting731 suicide.[8] Where suicide was committed by the wife within three months of marriage, demand of dowry articles at the time of marriage and thereafter was established, the harassment and cruelty on the past of husband and mother-in-law was proved, no effort was made by them to save her when she was burning and even no doctor was called to give any medical help, the version of defence that wife was mentally ill, was not supported by reliable evidence, conviction of the accused husband and mother-in-law under s 306 read with s 107, IPC, read with s 4, Dowry Prohibition Act 1961 was maintained.[9] Where there was a normal dispute between the deceased and her husband regarding not sending the deceased to her parent's house, it cannot be presumed, that the husband appellant instigated or abetted the deceased wife to commit suicide.[10] It often happens that there are disputes and discords in the matrimonial home and a wife is harassed by the husband or her in-laws. This, however, would not by itself and without something more attract s 306, IPC read with s 107, IPC . Thus mere harassment of wife by husband due to differences per se does not attract s 306 read with s 107, IPC, if the wife commits suicide.[11]But where the wife who committed suicide by pouring kerosene and setting her ablaze stated in her dying declaration that the accused husband used to drink liquor after borrowing money from villagers and beat her after drinking liquor. The accused however had not instigated the deceased to commit suicide at the time of committing suicide by doing any act. The accused was held not guilty of abetting commission of suicide. However, the act of the accused in harassing the deceased, drinking continuously and beating her amounted to cruelty to wife so conviction of accused was altered from s 306 read with s 107 to s 498A, IPC .[12] Where the accused husband after consuming liquor beat his wife, and asked her to go and die so that he may marry another woman, held it did not amount to instigation within the meaning of s 306, IPC . Accused husband was acquitted of the charge under s 306, IPC .[13]Presumption under s 113A of Evidence Act is rebutted by circumstances that deceased was rushed to doctor by husband who promptly informed her brother as also his own brother and made arrangements to take deceased to hospital. So, intention to drive deceased to commit suicide cannot be inferred.[14]Act done to facilitate the commission of suicide should be closely proximate in time to the time of incident. The acts done at a distant time with no close, nearness or proximity to the time of a suicide will obviously have to be ruled out, as acts facilitating and accelerating the commission of suicide. There was a dispute between the family members of the deceased at one side and with the family of the petitioner on the other side. One case was pending in the court also. After consuming the poisonous substance, the deceased informed the present witnesses that being afraid of the petitioners and on account of their terror; he has opted to die by committing suicide. Held, the act of the accused did not amount to abetment, the accused were discharged.[15]

732The wife committed suicide within few days of marriage. Allegation was that wife committed suicide on account of harassment by the husband and the close relatives of the deceased wife. Sweeping allegation would not amount to abetment of offence of commission of suicide and something more is required under s 107 of the IPC which provides that the harassment should be of such a nature which should amount to instigation to any person to commit suicide. On the evidence adduced in the case, the accused were not convicted under ss 107 and 306, IPC .[16]

Special rules of evidence contained in s 113A, Evidence Act 1872 apply to a case of suicide by a married woman within seven years of her marriage.

The deceased employee in a company was not satisfied with the working conditions of his office; he sent his resignation letter which was accepted. He committed suicide, his dead body was found on the railway track. In the suicide note left by him, except referring to the name of the appellant accused at two places, there was no reference of any act or incidence whereby the appellant accused was alleged to have committed any willful act or omission or intentionally aided or instigated the deceased in committing the act of suicide. There was no case that the accused appellant has played any part or any role in any conspiracy, which ultimately instigated or resulted in the commission of suicide by the deceased. No case of abetment of suicide was made out against the appellant accused. Proceedings registered against the accused appellant under ss 107 / 306 IPC were quashed. [17]

Where hypersensitivity of the deceased induced him/her to commit suicide, none else can be convicted on charge under ss 107 / 306 IPC .[18]

16. Sting Operation--Liability of a Private Person

The offence of abetment defined by s 107 of the IPC or the offence of criminal conspiracy under s 120A of IPC would, require criminal intent (mens rea) on the part of the offender like any other offence. Both the offences would require existence of a culpable mental state which is a matter of proof from the surrounding facts established by the materials on record. Therefore, whether the commission of offence under s 12 of the Prevention of Corruption Act read with s 120B, IPC had been occasioned by the acts attributed to the accused (appellants) or not, ideally, is a matter that can be determined only after the evidence in the case is recorded. What the accused appellant asserts is that in view of the fact that the sting operation was a journalistic exercise; no criminal intent can be imputed to the participants therein. Whether the operation was really such an exercise and the giving of bribe to A-1 was a mere sham or pretence or whether the giving of the bribe was with expectation of favours in connection with mining projects, are questions that can only be answered by the evidence of the parties which is yet to come. Such facts cannot be a matter of an assumption. Charge sheet against accused was not quashed.[19]

17. Abetment of Extortion

A purchased a tin of kerosene and was carrying it in a cart. B, a constable who was accompanied by C and D, members of the civil guard, challenged, A and demanded733 the cash memo. A produced the cash memo, B took possession of it and then the party moved on to the Thana. After going some way B demanded five rupees from A saying that he would let A go if the same was paid, C and D themselves did not ask for money but they were pushing A and telling him to go along. When the money was refused, the constable tore up the cash memo without any protest from C and D and the party moved to the thana. It was held that C and D intentionally aided the constable in his demand and were guilty of abetting an attempt by the constable to extort money from A.[20]

18. Abetment by giving Bribe

The authors of the Code said:

> The person who, without any demand, express or implied, on the part of a public servant, volunteers an offer of a bribe, and induces that public servant to accept it, will be punishable under the general rule as an instigator. But a person who complies with a demand, however signified, on the part of a public servant, cannot be considered as guilty of instigating that public servant to receive a bribe.[21]

But the IPC does not give effect to their views.[22] In an Orissa case,[23] after a review of the case-law on the subject, it has been held that the giver of the bribe is, in law an abettor of the offence and therefore, an accomplice, irrespective or whether the giving was voluntary or in response to a demand accompanied by threat or fear. But in the later case, i.e., of bribe-giving under threats, whether the evidence of the accomplice is safe to be acted upon, depends on circumstances.

It has been held by the Allahabad High Court[24] that ss 107 and 109 are applicable to the cases under s 182 . Where, therefore, a person instigates another person to make a false report, he can be convicted under s 182 read with s 109, IPC .

The abetment by aid requires that the act of aid in question must have been done with the intention of aiding the commission of the offence. This principle also applied to cases of acts of aid in taking bribe.[25] When considering whether the bribe-giver is guilty of abetment, the definition of abetment given in the section will have to be construed along with illust (a) to s 109 .[26] The giver of the bribe is, in law, an abettor of the offence and therefore, an accomplice irrespective of whether the giving was voluntary or in response to a demand accompanied by threat or fear.[27] But when no prima facie case is made out against the accused of their having committed the offence under s 7 of Prevention of Corruption Act 1988, the question of the other accused committing an offence under s 12 of the said Act of abetment by aiding, does not arise.[28]

The bribe-givers are not exonerated merely because the public servant takes the money without any guilty intention. If a public servant solicits a bribe and the person734 solicited complies with the demand and hands him the money, he intentionally aids by his act, and therefore, abets the taking of the bribe by the public servant; the fact that the bribe was solicited may at most, render the abetment less culpable than it would otherwise be.[29] The offer of the bribe would amount to an abetment under s 116 and would necessarily constitute an offence under s 165A (now replaced by s 12 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1988). The definition of the word 'instigation' in this section leads to the same result.

Where a constable and others entered a house and apprehended certain persons as gamblers, and afterwards released them on payment of a sum of money by the latter, the offence committed is not house-trespass and extortion, but taking a bribe as regards the constable, and abetment of that offence as regard the other.[30] Where the head constable who took the bribe, gave it to the constable, was caught red-handed, the villagers attacked and assaulted member of raiding party on instigation of the accused constables and the head constable and snatched the personal belongings and currency notes used in the trap and also deterred them from discharging their duties, rescued the accused from the lawful custody of the inspector of the raiding party. The head constable who instigated and abetted other accused persons in snatching currency notes in possession of the inspector of the raiding party was convicted under s 3(a) read with s 109, IPC .[31]

19. Abetment of Attempt to Wage War

If the criminal acts took place pursuant to the conspiracy, the accused, as a party to the conspiracy, shall be deemed to have abetted the offence when he took active part in a series of steps taken to pursue the objective of conspiracy. The offence of abetting the waging of war, having regard to the extraordinary facts and circumstances of this case, justifies the imposition of capital punishment.[32]

20. Abetment of Personation--When it Amounts to an Offence

Commentary under the same heading in s 171D, vol 2, may be referred to.

21. Explanation 2--Act or Illegal Omission must Facilitate Commission of the Act Abetted

A person abets by aiding when by the commission of an act or illegal omission he intends to facilitate, and does facilitate, the commission of the crime abetted.[33] In order that expln 2 to this section may apply, it is necessary to determine whether an aid was given and whether with that aid the act or the offence was committed.[34] In abetment by aid, it is not the intention to aid the commission of crime, that is punished, but the fact that something is done or not done, whereby the commission of the crime is rendered easier. In instigation the criminal intention is punished; in conspiracy the intention plus some act; in aid, the act itself.

735Abetment as given in s 107, IPC not only includes instigation but also intentional aiding by an illegal omission. The appellant husband being the person responsible for creating circumstances provoking or forcing his deceased wife to take the extreme step to avoid a more miserable life and not making any attempt to save her life, was liable to be convicted for the offence of abetment of suicide.[35]

For establishing abetment covered by cl 3 read with expln 2, of s 107, IPC it has to be established that there was intentional aiding. Mere aiding may not amount to abetment unless it is intentional. Mere act or omission on the part of a person which in fact, results in facilitating the commission of the offence will not satisfy the requirements of expln 2 of cl 3. What is, therefore, required is that the person against whom charge of abetment is levelled has to do something purposefully which facilitates the commission of the offence. It cannot be said with any stretch of imagination that a person subjecting a woman to cruelty is guilty of abetment.[36]

In the case of a bigamous marriage, the act of throwing holy rice on the couple does not facilitate the commission of the offence and does not, therefore, amount to abetment, but the holding of the antarpat with the full knowledge that the marriage is a void marriage would fall under the purview of the explanation and amount to abetment.[37] A priest, who knowingly celebrates a bigamous marriage, abets the offence of bigamy.[38]

Mere consent of persons to be present at the illegal marriage, or their presence in pursuance of such consent, or the grant of an accommodation in a house for the marriage, does not necessarily constitute abetment of such marriage.[39]

A, with the consent of B, a pregnant woman, pledges B's jewels in order to buy drugs for the purpose of causing B to miscarry. A is guilty of abetting an offence under s 312 .[40]

Where A facilitates the stabbing of C by B by holding C's hands while B stabbed C, A must be deemed to have aided the commission of the offence within the meaning of the explanation.[41]

Where A gave a dao to B, who had given out his intention to coerce the party against whom he was acting and who inflicted grievous hurt on such party with it, A was guilty of abetment within the meaning of second head of the third clause of this section.[42]

Where A ordered B and C to seize and forcibly take D in the contemplation of an assault upon him, and D was so beaten and tortured as to have died in consequence, A was guilty at least of abetting the commission of voluntarily causing grievous hurt.[43]

736But where a head constable deputed two chowkidars to take an arrested person to his house to fetch a bribe and the chowkidars confined him at various places and maltreated him, it was held that the head constable could not be held guilty of abetting the offence under s 347 in the absence of proof that he gave definite orders to that end.[44]

The fact that a motorcar of a person was used for the purpose of abduction does not make him an abettor of the abduction in the absence of evidence that the motor car was so used with his knowledge or under his orders.[45]

The fact that a person is the part-owner of a house, in which a woman is leading the life of a prostitute, is not sufficient to establish that the person abets prostitution.[46]

To prepare in conjunction with others a copy of an intended false document, and to buy a stamped paper for the purpose of writing such false document, and to ask for information as to a fact to be inserted in such false document does not constitute forgery nor an attempt to commit forgery, but are facts which would support a conviction for abetment, as being acts done to facilitate the commission of the offence.[47]

Illustrations

A wrote and took an active part in the preparation of a document but it was not he who signed the name of the alleged executant thereto. It was held that A abetted the forgery.[48]

A makes a false charge against B, C gives evidence in support of the charge. This is no evidence to hold that C abetted the institution of the charge.[49]

Mere subsequent knowledge of an offence is also no evidence of abetment of the offence.[50]

22. Charge of Abetment

There has been some difference of opinion in the High Courts on whether a person can be convicted of abetment on a charge of a substantive offence. The majority opinion is that where the case is covered by ss 236 - 37 of the CrPC 1898 [ss 236 and 237 of the CrPC 1898 (ss 221(1) and 221 (2) of the CrPC 1973)] and the accused has notice of all the facts which go to make up the charge of abetment, he can be convicted of it, even though the charge framed against him was only of the substantive offence.[51] In some cases it has been held that it is not permissible for a737 court to find an accused person guilty of abetment of an offence, when he is charged only with the substantive offence.[52]

Conviction for Abetment may be made without Charge in Certain Cases

Their Lordships of the Privy Council had taken the view that a man may be convicted of an offence, although there has been no charge in respect of it, if the evidence is such as to establish a charge that might have been made.[53] A review of the authorities on the point shows that it cannot be laid down as an inflexible rule that an accused cannot be convicted for abetment if he was charged with the main offence only, and no separate charge was framed for abetment. If the accused had notice of the facts, which constituted abetment, although the charge was one for the main offence, and if there has been no prejudice to the accused by the omission to frame a separate charge for abetment, he can be convicted for abetment even though the charge for the main offence fails.[54] But in the absence of facts stated in the charge which constitute the offence of abetment, a conviction for abetment could not be substituted by an appellate court if it finds that the conviction for the substantive offence itself is unsustainable. But if the facts charged are sufficient to frame a charge for the abetment, it is then open to an appellate court to alter the conviction for the offence into one of abetment.[55]

Accused Charged with Abetment can be Convicted of Substantial Offence

It is now settled law that an accused may be convicted of a substantive offence even if he is charged only with its abetment. It will not be correct to put forward as a proposition of law that on a charge of abetment of a particular offence, an accused cannot be convicted of that substantive offence. In each case what has to be shown is whether there had been any prejudice caused to the accused. Certainly, on a charge of abetment the accused cannot be convicted of a substantive offence if he has been prejudiced in his defence of a case based on a substantive charge.[56]

Accused Charged with one Form of Abetment can be Convicted of other Form of Abetment

It is open to the prosecution to charge abetment generally, and then if the evidence does not establish abetment except in one particular form, to rely on that particular form for the conviction of the accused. The charge will amount to notice to him that he has to meet a case of abetment in one or more of the different ways indicated in this section.[57]738

On a Charge under Sections 304, 149, Conviction under Sections 304, 107 cannot be made

In order to attract Section 221(2) , CrPC offence must be a cognate offence and not a distinct offence. The offence of rioting and the offence of constructive liability as members of an unlawful assembly for the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder are distinct offences from the main offence of s 304, IPC, under s 221(2) of the CrPC an accused charged under s 304, IPC could have been convicted under s 304 read with s 107, IPC, but an accused charged under s 304 / 149, IPC, cannot be convicted under s 304 / 107, IPC, without framing a proper charge.[58]

Charge in Conspiracy Cases

Where a criminal conspiracy amounts to an abetment under this section, it is unnecessary to invoke the provisions of ss 120A and 120B, as the IPC has made specific provision for the punishment of such a conspiracy.[59] When the matter has gone beyond the stage of mere conspiracy and offences are alleged to have been actually committed in pursuance thereof these two sections are wholly irrelevant. Conspiracy, it should be borne in mind, is one form of abetment, and where an offence is alleged to have been committed by more than two persons, such of them as actually took part in the commission should be charged with the substantive offence, while those who are alleged to have abetted it by conspiracy with the offence of abetment under s 109 . The explanation to s 109 makes this quite clear. An offence is said to be committed in consequence of abetment, when it is committed in pursuance of the conspiracy, and the abettor by conspiracy is made punishable (under s 109) with the punishment provided for the actual offence.[60] But in Emperor v Karamalli Gulamalli ,[61] it has been held:

> The punishment for the offence of conspiracy under section 120B depends upon whether the illegal act has or has not been carried out. In the former case the punishment will be in accordance with section 109, ie, it will be the same as for the offence itself. In the latter case it will be in accordance with section 116 . When conspiracy is charged, therefore, it is always open to the prosecution to charge further that the illegal acts which were the object of the conspiracy have been carried out. In the present case proof having been given that the illegal acts were done in furtherance of the conspiracy, the offence under section 120B is punishable under section 109 and not under section 116 . But acts done in pursuance of the conspiracy cannot be separately punished unless these acts are separately charged and particularised as required by the Code.[62]

23. Proof--Specific Allegations be made and Proved

In case of an allegation that a person is liable to be punished because of his having abetted the commission of the crime, specific allegations ought to be made against him and proved in the course of the trial to bring home the guilt to the accused regarding the manner in which he might have abetted the commission of the crime. It must be shown that the commission of the crime was not possible without the739 specific aid rendered by the abettor.[63] Specific allegations must be made in order to attract the application of this section.[64]

24. Mere Association not Sufficient to Prove Conspiracy

Abetment by conspiracy, as set forth in cl (2), s 107, is not established merely by proof of association together, nor by mere suspicion of guilt.[65]

Abettor--Whether can be Convicted if Principal Offender is Acquitted

It cannot be laid down as a rule of law that a person cannot, at all, be convicted of abetting a certain offence when the person, alleged to have committed that offence in consequence of the abetment, has been acquitted. The question of the abettor's guilt depends on the nature of the act abetted and the manner, in which the abetment was made.[66]

Abetment by itself being a substantive offence, an abettor can be convicted before the principal is apprehended and put on trial.[67] It is only in a case, where a person has abetted an offence by intentionally aiding another to commit that offence, which the charge of abetment against him would fail when the person, alleged to have committed the offence is acquitted of the offence.[68]

Where the accused was charged with the offence of abetment of conspiracy of commission of offence of theft by his officer, substantive offence against principal offender was not established and the principal offender was acquitted of the charges, it was held that the alleged abettor cannot be convicted and he also has to be acquitted.[69]

When no prima facie case is made out against the accused of their having committed the offence under s 7 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1948, the question of other accused committing an offence under s 12 of the said Act, of abetment by aiding, does not arise.[70] When the accused charged under s 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947 is acquitted as no prima facie case was made out against him, the charge against co-accused for abetment of the said offence is not maintainable.[71]740

Chapter V

Of Abetment

S. 108.

Abettor.--

A person abets an offence, who abets either the commission of an offence, or the commission of an act which would be an offence, if committed by a person capable by law of committing an offence with the same intention or knowledge as that of the abettor.

Explanation 1.--The abetment of the illegal omission of an act may amount to an offence although the abettor may not himself be bound to do that act.

Explanation 2.--To constitute the offence of abetment it is not necessary that the act abetted should be committed, or that the effect requisite to constitute the offence should be caused.

Illustrations

(a) A instigates B to murder C. B refuses to do so. A is guilty of abetting B to commit murder.
(b) A instigates B to murder D. B in pursuance of the instigation stabs D. D recovers from the wound. A is guilty of instigating B to commit murder.

Explanation 3.--It is not necessary that the person abetted should be capable by law of committing an offence, or that he should have the same guilty intention or knowledge as that of the abettor, or any guilty intention or knowledge.

Illustrations

(a) A, with a guilty intention, abets a child or a lunatic to commit an act which would be an offence, if committed by a person capable by law of committing an offence, and having the same intention as A. Here A, whether the act be committed or not, is guilty of abetting an offence.
(b) A, with the intention of murdering Z, instigates B, a child under seven years of age, to do an act which causes Z's death. B, in consequence of the abetment, does the act in the absence of A and thereby causes Z's death. Here, though B was not capable by law of committing an offence, A is liable to be punished in the same manner as if B had been capable by law of committing an offence, and had committed murder, and he is therefore subject to the punishment of death.
(c) A instigates B to set fire to a dwelling-house. B, in consequence of the unsoundness of his mind, being incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is wrong or contrary to law, sets fire to the house in consequence of A's instigation. B has committed no offence, but A is guilty of abetting the offence of setting fire to a dwelling-house, and is liable to the punishment, provided for that offence.

(d) A, intending to cause a theft to be committed, instigates B to take property belonging to Z out of Z's possession. A induces B to believe that the property belongs to A. B takes the property out of Z's possession, in good faith, believing it to be A's property. B, acting under this misconception, does not take dishonestly, and therefore does not commit theft. But A is guilty of abetting theft, and is liable to the same punishment as if B had committed theft.

Explanation 4.--The abetment of an offence being an offence, the abetment of such an abetment is also an offence.

Illustration

A instigates B to instigate C to murder Z. B accordingly instigates C to murder Z, and C commits that offence in consequence of B's instigation. B is liable to be punished for his offence with the punishment for murder; and, as A instigated B to commit the offence; A is also liable to the same punishment.741 Explanation 5.--It is not necessary to the commission of the offence of abetment by conspiracy that the abettor should concert the offence with the person who commits it. It is sufficient if he engages in the conspiracy in pursuance of which the offence is committed.

Illustration

A concerts with B a plan for poisoning Z. It is agreed that A shall administer the poison. B then explains the plan to C mentioning that a third person is to administer the poison, but without mentioning A's name. C agrees to procure the poison, and procures and delivers it to B for the purpose of its being used in the manner explained. A administers the poison; Z dies in consequence. Here, though A and C have not conspired together, yet C has been engaged in the conspiracy in pursuance of which Z has been murdered. C has therefore committed the offence defined in this section and is liable to the punishment for murder.

Comments

1. Scope

Abetment of a thing, as defined in s 107, becomes an offence in itself, if the thing which is abetted, comes with in the terms of the first paragraph of this section, i.e., if it is an offence, etc.[72] Thus, conspiracy per se is no wrong, and is not illegal, e.g., a combination of person in, pursuit of a legitimate trade object,[73] but it becomes unlawful when the thing which is the subject of the conspiracy involves a civil injury to another,[74] thereby giving him a right of action, and it becomes a crime when its subject is a crime. Given therefore an instigation, conspiracy or aid in reference to an offence, the instigation, etc., becomes the offence of abetment directly after it has taken place, and it is a substantive offence quite irrespective of the other offence which forms its subject-matter, and which perhaps will never take place at all.[75] Persons, punished as principals, cannot also be punished for abetment of the same offence.[76] The abettors of crime are accomplices in the eye of law.[77]742

2. Three Essentials to Constitute an Offence under this Section

Three things are essential to complete abetment as a crime. There must be an abettor; he must abet; and the abetment must be of an offence,[78]an act which would be an offence if committed by a person capable by law of committing the offence with the same intention or knowledge as that of the abettor.

If the thing abetted is not an offence at all, the person abetting it is not an abettor.[79] Where a counsel is liable for defamation, he is the principal accused, and not an abettor.[80] In the absence of material showing the accused's complicity, connivance or abetment, mere circumstance of carrying on criminal activity by the accused's brother in the accused's house is not sufficient to hold the accused guilty of an offence under ss 108 and 34, IPC .[81]

Persons, who are forced to pay illegal gratification, are constrained to heed to the demand for illegal gratification on apprehension that unless they pay, they would lose business, cannot be styled as abettors.[82]

3. Abetment, a Distinct Offence

If 'the thing' in question is an offence, its abetment becomes an offence (s 108) and the 'offence of abetment' is constituted (s 108, expln 2), which is thus a separate and distinct offence.[83] The offence of abetment is complete notwithstanding that the person abetted involuntarily fails in doing the abetted, or is interrupted before the act is complete. The offence of abetment by instigation depends upon the intention of the person who abets and not upon the act which is actually done by the persons abetted.[84] As a general rule, an offence of abetment falls through if the principal offence is not sustained.[85] But there might be an exception to this general rule, as abetment of an offence is a distinct offence.[86]

4. Accessories after the Fact

Abetment by aiding or instigating necessarily means some active suggestion or support or stimulation to the commission of the offence itself. If the offence had already been complete before anything was done by the alleged abettor, any subsequent action of his which might, in any way, help the main offender, will not be abetment within meaning of s 107, being an accessory after the fact which is no offence under the Indian law.[87] This section does not contemplate any acts of subsequent abetment, and the IPC does not provide for the punishment of such offences, except when they are such as are defined in ss 212 - 18 of ch XI of the743IPC .[88] Persons punished as principals cannot also be punished for abetment of the same offence.[89]

5. Explanation 1--Abetment by Illegal Omission

For an omission to be criminal, the act which is omitted must be one which the person who omits was legally bound to do,[90]but it matters not, under expln 1, whether or not the abettor was legally bound to do the act, the omission of which he abets.[91] Thus A, a private person, instigates B, a police officer, to leave the scene of a cognizable offence which it is his duty to prevent. If, in consequence, B illegally omits to prevent the commission of the cognizable offence, he would be guilty of abetting the offence but A would not guilty of abetting the abetment committed by B by his illegal omission, which is also an offence under expln 4 to this section.

In a charge for outraging the modesty of the woman, accused persons denuded the victim lady in the presence of the co-accused woman, but co-accused lady did not make any effort to save the modesty of the victim lady, she was convicted under s 109, IPC .[92]

6. Explanation 2--Effect Immaterial--Abetment is Complete without the Commission of the Act Abetted

Explanation 2 makes it clear that to constitute the offence of abetment, it is not necessary that the act abetted should be committed.[93] The offence of abetment is complete notwithstanding that the person abetted involuntarily fails in doing the act abetted, or is interrupted before the act is complete. The offence of abetment by instigation depends upon the intention of the person who abets and not upon the act which is actually done by the person abetted.[94] It has been held that an offence can be abetted even though the means intended to be employed are such that it is physically impossible to produce the effect by them.[95]

Justice Darling's view and its Criticism by Russell

In R v Brown [96] where the defendant induced a woman to take a concoction in order to procure an abortion, Darling J, in the course of his summing up to the jury, said: 'But if the thing supplied is to his knowledge not capable of procuring abortion, such person is not guilty of inciting her to commit an offence under the statute, although he knows that she will take it in the belief that it is a noxious thing in order to procure abortion'. Criticising this, Russell says:

> At all events the dictum should be confined to the facts of the particular case and the statutory provision, by emphasising the words 'under the statute'. Otherwise the744 untenable conclusion would follow that if A, for his own purposes, incites B to attempt to steal money from the pocket or safe of X, knowing fully well that the pocket or safe is empty so that it is impossible for B to steal anything from it, then A is not guilty of the crime of incitement. This could surely not be so: for it is irrelevant whether A knows or does not know the law applicable to the facts, ie, that what he is procuring B to do will be a criminal offence, if B does exactly what A has told him to do. This is different, of course, from a mistake of fact: for example, if A, thinking a colourless liquid to be water, tells B (who knows the liquid to be poison) to give some to C, then A, if charged with criminal incitement, can set up the defence of reasonable mistake of fact, namely, that what he honestly thought he was recommending was a drink of water for C. To take another possibility: if A, knowing that B desires to poison C, persuades B to use for the purpose a certain liquid which A knows to be harmless, then B will be guilty of the criminal attempt but A will have the defence of justification, namely, that what he had done was a reasonable method of preventing B from achieving a serious offence.[97]

Criticism of Justice Darling's view appears to be Fallacious

But the criticism levelled against the view taken by Darling J in R v Brown ,[98] appears to be fallacious. The offence of abetment by instigation will always depend upon the intention of the alleged abettor. If in the earlier instance given by Russell, A knows that there is no money in the pocket or safe of B, and yet, if he incites C to pick his pocket or steal money from his safe, he could not possibly be guilty of abetment of the offence of theft, for no theft could possibly be committed, though so far as C is concerned, he could be guilty of the offence of attempt to commit theft. A could be convicted of the offence of inciting C to pick B's pocket or cut or break open his safe, but not of inciting him to steal for to his own knowledge no theft could be committed. In the other instance cited by Russell, if A incites C to offer a harmless coloured liquid to B so as to poison him, knowing fully well the liquid is absolutely harmless, C may be guilty of attempt to commit B's murder, but how can A be held guilty of the offence of abetment of murder, when B's murder by administering the coloured liquid to him was neither intended by A nor was it by any chance possible. It is, of course, quite a different thing if A believed the liquid to be poison and believing it to be so, incited C to administer it to B.

In the case before Darling J, C was induced by A to take a concoction in order to procure abortion. The concoction was to his knowledge not capable of that effect. There could, not therefore, be abetment of the offence of causing abortion, as, by what A did, an abortion could never have been caused, though C might be guilty of attempt to commit that offence if she took that concoction with the intention of causing abortion and believing the concoction to have that effect. A may be guilty of cheating or playing false with C or subjecting her to a hoax, his action may or may not be punishable under the Code, but he certainly cannot be guilty of the offence of abetment.

7. Explanation 2 to be read with Sections 115 and 116

Explanation 2 should be read together with ss 115 - 16, IPC, under which simple abetment, i.e., abetment not followed by the commission of the offence abetted, is745 punishable.[1] The offence of abetment is complete when the alleged abettor has instigated another, or engaged with another, in a conspiracy to commit the offence.[2]

8. Offence of Abetment

Abetment is thus a separate and distinct offence, quite independent of its consequences, and to be an offence, it must take place within India, though the offence abetted may take place beyond India.[3] Abetment is a substantive offence quite irrespective of the other offence which forms its subject matter, and which may perhaps never take place at all.[4]

9. Explanation 3--Two Fold Effect

Section 108 and expln 3, IPC should be read together. The effect is two-fold. Abetment to be criminal must be the abetment of either: (a) that which is an offence; or (b) that which would be an offence, but that the person abetted is incapable by law (refer to ch IV) of committing an offence, or has no guilty knowledge or intention.[5]

10. 'Offence'

The word 'offence' in this section must be interpreted by ss 40 and 108A of the IPC . By virtue of the former it means 'a thing made punishable by this Code', i.e., an act or omission contrary to the provisions thereof and committed within India.[6] But by s 108A 'offence' denotes a thing made punishable by the Code, although it is committed without and beyond India. Consequently, the abetment of an offence means the abetment in India of a thing made punishable by the Code,[7] whether such thing is committed within or without and beyond India.

Illustrations

(i) A instigates B help him steal from C, B's master. B does so, with the consent of C, whom he had informed of A's instigation. A instigated an act contrary to the provision of s 378 of the Code, and is, therefore guilty of abetment of theft.[8]

(ii) A offers a bribe to B, a servant of C, to induce him to sell certain goods of C at less than their value. A abets an offence under s 408 of the Code.[9]

(iii) A, a Mahommedan guardian of a young married girl, caused her marriage ceremony to be performed, whilst her husband was living, but in her absence and without her knowledge. Under these circumstances the girl could not be guilty of an offence under s 494, and A, therefore, did not abet an offence.[10]

(iv) 746*A*, in India, instigates B to commit an offence under the Penal Code on a ship on the high seas. A instigates an 'offence' and his abetment is now punishable.[11]A's abetment was held not to be punishable, because the decision was under the old law existing prior to the enactment of s 108A .

(v) A, in India, incites B and C, Portuguese subjects, to murder D in Portuguese territory. A abets an 'offence', and his abetment is punishable.[12]

11. Abetment of Act Done by Innocent Agent

Explanation 3 to this section makes it clear that the person abetted need not have any guilty intention in committing the act[13]

Illustrations

(i) A tells a child under seven to bring him money belonging to B.[14] A has abetted theft, although the child is incapable in law of committing an offence. (s 82 .)

(ii) A, knowing a note to be forged, asks B, who does not know it to be forged, to get it changed for him. B does so and gives A the money.[15]A has abetted cheating (s 415), although B had no guilty intention or knowledge.

Conviction of Abettor not Dependent on the Conviction of Principal

Under English law, A would in such cases be principal in the first degree, but under the IPC he is an abettor only. But abetment is a substantive offence, and the conviction of an abettor is in no way dependent on the conviction of a principal at all. Refer to expln 2.[16] According to expln 3, it is not necessary that the person abetted should have committed the offence and be punished.[17]

12. Explanation 4--Abetment of Abetment

In view of expln 4 appended under s 108 of the IPC, it cannot be said that there cannot be any abetment of an abetment and it is unknown to criminal jurisprudence.[18] Under expln 4, when the abetment is an offence, the abetment of such abetment is also an offence. The words 'when the abetment of an offence is an offence' do not mean when an abetment of an offence is actually committed. What is meant is when the abetment of an offence is by definition or description an offence under the IPC, which is when the abetment of an offence is punishable under s 109 or 116 or some other provision of the IPC, then the abetment of such abetment is also an offence.[19] Explanations 2 and 4 lead to the conclusion that the abetment of an abetment is an offence though the second abetment is ineffective.[20] It is not necessary to prove that the principal offence abetted was actually committed.[21] The offence of abetment747 being a substantive offence, the conviction of the abettor is in no way dependent on the conviction of the principal.[22]

It is possible to abet the commission of suicide. But nobody would abet a mere attempt to commit suicide. It would be preposterous if law could afford to penalise an abetment to the offence of a mere attempt to commit suicide. It is wrong to convict the accused under s 116 linked with s 306, IPC but the crux of the offence under s 306 itself is abetment. In other words, if there is no abetment, there is no question of offence under s 306 coming into play. It is inconceivable to have abetment of an abetment. Hence there cannot be an offence under s 116 read with s 306, IPC and conviction of accused was altered by substituting s 306 with s 304B, IPC, read with s 116 .[23]

13. Explanation 5--Abetment Relates to an Offence and not the Offender

This explanation applies only to abetment by conspiracy.[24] A conspiracy to publish an article in a newspaper may be inferred if the article could not have appeared therein without the concurrence of the persons charged with conspiracy.[25] 'Abetment', as defined in the IPC, relates not to an offender but to an offence. A person may constitute himself an abettor by the intervention of a third person without any direct communication between himself and the person employed to do the thing, and under expln 5 in the case of abetment by conspiracy, it is not necessary that the abettor should concert the offence with the person who commits it. It is sufficient if he engages in the conspiracy in pursuance of which the offence is committed.[26]

14. Provisions of Section 10, Indian Evidence Act 1872, Apply

The provisions of s 10 of the Evidence Act may be usefully quoted here. Where there is reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons have conspired together to commit an offence, anything said, done, or written by anyone of such persons in reference to their common intention after the time when such intention was first entertained by any one of them may be proved, both for the purpose of proving the existence of the conspiracy as also for showing that any such person was a party to it.[27]

15. Evidence of Abettor

In the absence of material showing accused's complicity, connivance or abetment, the mere circumstance of carrying on criminal activity by the accused's brother in the accused's house is not sufficient to hold the accused guilty of offence under ss 108 and 34, IPC .[28]

748Where the only evidence against the accused was that he exhorted the main accused to fire at the victim from the top of the roof and the evidence as regards exhortation was not satisfactory, the benefit of doubt should go to the accused.[29]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter V

Of Abetment

[30][S. 108A.

Abetment in India of offences outside India.--

A person abets an offence within the meaning of this Code who, in [31][India], abets the commission of any act without and beyond [32][India] which would constitute an offence if committed in [33][India].

Illustration

A, in [34][India], instigates B, a foreigner in Goa, to commit a murder in Goa. A is guilty of abetting murder.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section puts the abetment of offences to be committed outside India on the same footing as abetment of offences to be committed in India. As regards the necessity for such a rule, see Stephen's History of Criminal Law of England.[35] Under this section, although the offence abetted may be committed outside India, the abetment itself must be committed in India.

Mere intention not followed by any act cannot constitute any offence, and an indirect preparation which does not amount to an act which amounts to a commencement of the offence, does not constitute either a principal offence or an attempt or abetment of the same.[36]

The illustration in the case of R v Ganpatrao Ramchandra ,[37] in which it was held that such abetment was not punishable, a decision which no doubt suggested the amendment of the law.[38]

2. Legislative Changes

This section was added by s 3 of the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act 1898.

749Formerly the abetment in India of an act or omission without and beyond India was not punishable, since it was not the abetment of an offence under the IPC .[39]But exceptions to this rule were gradually established. The abetment in India of counterfeiting coin outside India was made punishable by s 236, and so was abetment in India of waging war against the queen (now the Government of India) by s 121 (refer to s 125). By s 4 of Act 9 of 1891, it was provided that the abetment in British India of an act outside thereof, which if committed within British India would be an offence under Merchandise Marks Act, or under any section of ch XVIII of the IPC which relates to trade, property, or other marks, may be tried and punished as if the abettor had committed in British India the act which he abetted. The principle involved in these enactments is now, after the insertion of this section in the IPC, applied to the abetment of all offences.

With regard to this section the Select Committee observed:

> We have made it an offence for a person in British India to abet any act which would be an offence if committed in British India, but, as a fact, is committed outside. In short, to put it in popular language, we have extended the law of abetment of offences committed outside British India. It has been held by the Bombay High Court that if a person in British India abetted or incited a murder in Goa, he would not be guilty of any offence. We have come to the conclusion that he ought to be deemed guilty of an offence and that India is not to be made an Alsatia for instigator of crime.[40]

The other changes are noted in the footnotes to the section.

3. 'Offence'

The word 'offence' in s 108A denotes an act or acts made punishable under the IPC, and not under any special Act. A child marriage celebrated outside India is not an act, punishable under the IPC, and hence its abetment is not punishable as an abetment within the meaning of this section.[41]

4. Abetment in Foreign Territory

Where a subject of an Indian state was charged with abetting an offence committed in India and the alleged abetment consisted entirely of what the accused did or said at a place within the foreign territory, it was held he could not be tried in a court in India for such abetment.[42] Courts in India have no jurisdiction to try a person who is not a citizen of India for abetting out of India an offence committed by another in India.[43]

5. Procedure

No court shall take cognizance of any offence punishable under this section except with the previous sanction of the Central Government or of the state government. The Central Government or the state government may, before according sanction,750 order a preliminary investigation by a police officer not below the rank of inspector.[44]

Of Abetment

S. 109.

Punishment of abetment if the act abetted is committed in consequence and where no express provision is made for its punishment.--

Whoever abets any offence shall, if the act abetted is committed in consequence of the abetment, and no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment, be punished with the punishment provided for the offence

Explanation.--An act or offence is said to be committed in consequence of abetment, when it is committed in consequence of the instigation, or in pursuance of the conspiracy, or with the aid which constitutes the abetment.

(a) A offers a bribe to B, a public servant, as a reward for showing A some favour in the exercise of B's official functions. B accepts the bribe. A has abetted the offence defined in section 161 .

(b) A instigates B to give false evidence. B, in consequence of the instigation, commits that offence. A is guilty of abetting that offence, and is liable to the same punishment as B.

(c) A and B conspire to poison Z. A in pursuance of the conspiracy, procures the poison and delivers it to B in order that he may administer it to Z. B, in pursuance of the conspiracy, administers the poison to Z in A's absence and thereby causes Z's death. Here B is guilty of murder. A is guilty of abetting that offence by conspiracy, and is liable to the punishment for murder.751

1. Scope

Sections 109 - 10 of IPC deal with the state of things that may arise after an abetment has been committed,[45]viz, where the very act abetted happens in consequence thereof. This section is concerned only with the punishment of abetments and lays down nothing more than that if the IPC has not separately provided for the punishment of an abetment as such, then it is punishable with the punishment provided for the original offence.[46] Active abetment, at the time of committing the offence is covered by this section.[47] s 109, IPC, is by itself an offence though punishable in the context of other offences.[48] A person, who aids and abets the perpetration of a crime at the very time the crime is committed, is a principal of a second degree and this section applies to him.[49] Mere failure to prevent the commission of an offence is not by itself an abetment, in the absence of anything to show that the accused helped in or instigated the commission of the offence.[50] Likewise, the mere omission to bring certain facts, within the knowledge of the accused, to the notice of the higher authorities does not itself constitute abetment as defined in the IPC, unless the omission is one which can be said to be an illegal omission, i.e., involves a breach of a duty imposed by law, and not merely a breach of a departmental rule of conduct or discipline. Thus, if a clerk does not report to the superior authorities what is known to him about his fellow clerks' taking bribes, such omission does not amount to abetment of bribery though it may form the foundation for disciplinary action against him in a departmental way.[51]

"Abetted" in s 109 means the specific offence abetted. Therefore, the offence for the abetment of which a person is charged with the abetment is normally linked with the proved offence.[52]

This section is attracted even if the abettor is not present, where the offence abetted is committed, provided that he has instigated the commission of the offence or has engaged, with one or more other persons, in a conspiracy to commit the offence, and in pursuance of that conspiracy some act or illegal omission takes place, or has intentionally aided the commission of an offence by an act of illegal omission.[53]

2. Section is Attracted even when Abettor is not Present

Servants and partisans, not unoften, on their own responsibility, do things which they consider to be in the interest of their master or principal, without the latter's knowledge or consent. Hence, where the master was nowhere near the scene of occurrence, the mere fact, that the unlawful assembly consisted mostly of his servants and tenants and that its common object was to do something which was in the interests of their master, cannot lead to the conclusion that the master must752 necessarily have ordered or instigated the formation of the unlawful assembly or the commission of the crime, so as to make the master liable as an abettor.[54]

3. Essentials to Constitute an Offence under this Section

For the application of the section three things are essential: (a) there must be abetment of an offence, (b) the act abetted must have been committed in consequence of the abetment,[55] and (c) there must be no express provision in the IPC, for the punishment of such abetment. Such express provision made in ss 110 - 23, 130, 132, 133, 134, 136 and 138 of the IPC, s 182 not being such section, there is no reason why this section should not be applicable to cases under s 182 of the IPC .[56]

4. Distinction between Sections 109 and 114

This section is punitive and provides for punishment of abetment of an offence. Section 114, on the other hand, is not punitive, but only raises a presumption. The presumption raised by that section brings the case within s 34 .[57] The effect of this section and s 114 is to supersede the English law relating to principals of the first and second degrees and accessories before the act.[58]

Section 114 of the IPC is only brought into operation when circumstances amounting to abetment of a particular crime have first been proved, and then the presence of the accused, at the commission of that crime, is proved in addition. The real test, to see whether or not the section is applicable, lies in its words; 'who if absent would be liable to be punished as an abettor'. Abetment, to come under this section, must be one which is prior to the commission of the offence and complete by itself, and not an abetment which is done immediately before or at the time of the commission of the offence, for in the latter case, the abettor would not have committed the abetment if he had not been present and would not, therefore, have been liable to punishment as an abettor. When a person is present and abets another to commit an offence, then s 114 will not be applicable to the case. Active abetment at the time of the committing of the offence is covered by this section and s 114 is clearly intended for an abetment previous to the actual commission of the crime at any time, that is, before the first steps have been taken to commit it.[59]

It may be noted that while abetment by instigation and abetment by intentionally aiding the offence can both be done either immediately before the omission of the753 offence or prior to it, abetment by conspiracy can hardly be committed at the time of the commission of the offence.[60]

The distinction between the two sections has, however, no practical effect, for whichever of the two is applicable; the accused is liable to exactly the same punishment.[61]

5. Sections 34 , 109 and 120B, Indian Penal Code 1860--Distinction

Synopsis of s 34 may be referred to.

6. Abetment of an Offence

For a conviction under this section, it must be established that the accused abetted the commission of an offence. There must be some legal basis for the conclusion that the accused abetted the commission of an offence. To constitute abetment of an offence intentional and active participation of abettor must be established. The accused, the owner of the lorry, was not held guilty for the negligence of person, who actually drove the lorry negligently.[62] The instigation or intentional aiding is necessary to bring the charge under this section.[63] In order to convict a person of abetting the commission of a crime, it is not only necessary to prove that he has taken part in those steps of the transaction which are innocent, but, in some way or other, it is absolutely necessary to connect him with those steps of the transaction which are criminal. Thus what the law punishes is only the abetment of an offence, and not the abetment of mere acts which are not offence.[64]

Where the complainant-wife alleged that her in-laws incited her husband to marry for a second time, there was no averment in the complaint or in the summoning order that the in-laws ever negotiated or arranged the so-called marriage nor was there any allegation of their presence at the time of performance of the second marriage, no case of abetment under s 109 against the in-laws was made out.[65]Where in a case of death by strangulation, there was nothing on record to show any conspiracy between co-accused and the main accused for committing murder, no overt act was alleged against co-accused, alleged exhortation by co-accused also not appearing to be cause of murder, the co-accused was held entitled to the benefit of doubt and was acquitted of charge of offences under s 109 read with s 300, IPC .[66] Where there was no material showing the role played by the accused persons in performance of a second marriage, mere blessings alone would not amount to abetment of offence of bigamy.[67] In cases of alleged abetment of suicide there must be proof of direct or indirect acts of incitement to the commission of suicide. The mere fact that the husband treated the deceased wife with cruelty is not enough.[68]

754Majority of the fourteen prosecution witnesses, both civilian and police personnel accompanying the procession did not support the prosecution version that A2, A3 and A4 also exhorted accused B to shoot at the deceased, it was not found safe to convict A2, A3 and A4 for the offence of abetment of the murder of the deceased. Accused A2, A3 and A4 were acquitted of the offence under ss 302 / 109, IPC .[69]

Where the alleged offence of offering a bribe was committed in the year 1948, the accused could not be convicted for its abetment under s 165A, (since repealed) since that section was introduced for the first time in the IPC by s 3 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act (46 of 1952), which came into force on 28 July 1952, but it was held that the accused could still be convicted on the same facts under s 161 read with this section.[70]

Where a head constable who took a bribe gave it to a constable and he was caught red-handed, the villagers attacked and assaulted members of the raiding party on instigation of the accused constable and head constable and snatched the personal belongings and currency notes used in the trap and also deterred them from discharging their duties and rescuing accused from lawful custody of the inspector of the raiding party. The head constable who instigated and abetted other accused persons in snatching currency notes in possession of the inspector of the raiding party was convicted under s 395 read with s 109, IPC .[71]

Where it was alleged that the accused, by mixing methyl alcohol and ethyl alcohol caused hurt to the persons consuming the poisonous adulterated arrack, the accused suffered trial for substantive offences under the IPC and the Kerala Abkari Act, his direct involvement therein could not be established. It was held that accused cannot be convicted for abetment of the said offences by employing s 109 .[72]

Where in a case of illegal cutting of excess trees on government land by allottee and the assistant gram sewak (one of the accused) proved privy to the illegal cutting of excess trees, the accused was held guilty under s 167, IPC, and also under s 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, considering all the circumstances, he was also held guilty under ss 427 / 109, IPC, as he did aid and abet in committing the mischief which caused loss to the government.[73]

The appellant was charged under s 109 IPC for abetting the offences committed under ss 326, 327 and 328, IPC but the appellant was convicted under s 109, IPC for making abetment in consequence of which offences under ss 18, 19 and 20 of the Transplantation of the Human Organs Act has been committed, whereas no charge was framed under ss 18, 19 and 20 of the Transplantation of the Human Organs Act either against this appellant or the other accused. Therefore, the order of conviction and sentence passed under s 109, IPC was quite illegal.[74]

Where the accused took a room on rent in his own name and facilitated the main accused in committing rape on the prosecutrix, he was convicted under s 376 read with s 109, IPC .[75]755

7. 'Any Offence'

'Any offence' in this section means anything punishable under this Code or any special or local law,[76] and committed within or outside India (refer to synopsis notes under s 108).

8. Act Abetted must have been Committed

The 'act abetted' here obviously means the specific offence abetted. If the act committed is different from the act abetted, the case would fall under s 111, IPC . A person cannot be convicted for abetment under this section unless the offence alleged to have been abetted has been committed.

Where A was charged with offences under ss 280 (rash and negligent navigation) and 304A (causing death by a rash and negligent act) of the IPC and B with abetment of those offences and A was acquitted on the ground that there was no negligence on his part and the occurrence was a pure accident, it was held that B could not be convicted of abetment as the principal offences were not substantiated.[77]

Assistance in the preparation of an offence which ultimately was not committed cannot amount to an abetment under this section.[78] Offering gratification as a reward or motive to withdraw a case against the accused, which had already been dismissed, was held not to amount to an abetment of an offence under s 161 (since repealed) of the IPC .[79]

9. Conviction of Principal Not Always Necessary--Exceptions to the General Rule

This section requires only that the act abetted should have been committed, and not that the principal should have been convicted. An offence of abetment falls through if the principal offence is not substantiated.[80] But it cannot be laid down as a general proposition that in every case where an abettor and principal are tried together, the abettor, if charged with having abetted the principal in the commission of an offence, must be acquitted if the principal is acquitted. Such a general statement might hold good in the majority of cases, but there may be exceptions to the general rule. Thus A and B were tried together, A for committing a murder and B for abetting the offence. The jury found A not guilty and he was accordingly acquitted. There was, however, no doubt that the offence of murder was committed. There was the retracted confession of B on the basis of which the jury could have formed as against her that the murder was committed by A. It was held that B could be convicted of abetting murder although A was acquitted.[81]B was, however, acquitted as she was protected by s 94 . So, the conviction of the abettor is not dependent upon the conviction of the principal offender. The abetment by itself being a substantive offence, an abettor can be convicted before the principal is apprehended and put on trial.[82] Where the principal accused was756 acquitted merely on benefit of doubt for lack of his identity, by said acquittal, the prosecution case that the deceased was abducted for being compelled to marry another person or forced to have illicit intercourse with him with the complicity of appellant was not rendered false. Prosecution case was found true by the High Court. Hence the appellant could not be absolved of the charge as abettor.[83]

The Punjab and Haryana High Court has however, held that where there was no evidence to show as to who, when, where and how killed the deceased there was also no evidence of abetment. Unless the principal accused responsible for killing the deceased was found and named, charge under s 302 read with s 109, IPC was rendered nugatory.[84]

The accused was a member of an unlawful assembly, the common object of which was to attack a certain hut and commit assault on remonstrance.

The accused was found to have given orders to one B, a member of the unlawful assembly to set fire to the hut. The hut was set fire to and burnt. The accused was charged, among other counts, under s 436 read with this section. B was charged under s 436, but was acquitted as the evidence of the witnesses that B had set fire to the hut was not believed. But their evidence that the accused had ordered to set fire to the hut and the hut was actually burnt by one of the members of the unlawful assembly was believed. It was held that the hut was set on fire by one of the members of the unlawful assembly and it was in consequence of the orders given by the accused and, therefore, the conviction of the accused under s 436 read with s 109 was not illegal.[85]

10. Act must be Committed in Consequence of the Abetment--Explanation

For the application of this section it must be found that the act abetted was committed in consequence of the abetment.[86] According to the explanation, an act or offence is said to be committed in consequence of the abetment if it is committed in consequence: (a) of the instigation; or (b) in pursuance of the conspiracy; or (c) with the aid which constitutes the abetment. These three clauses clearly follow the three corresponding clauses of s 107, IPC .

The law does not require that instigation should be in a particular form or that it should be only in words and may not be by conduct: for instance, a mere gesture indicating 'beat' or a mere offering of money by an arrested person to the constable who arrests him may be regarded as instigation, in the one case to beat and, in the other to take a bribe.

Whether there was instigation or not is a question to be decided on the facts of each case. It is, however, not necessary, in law, for the prosecution to prove that the actual operative cause in the mind of the person abetted was the instigation, and nothing else, so long as there was instigating and the offence has been committed, or the offence would have been committed, if the person committing the act had the same757 knowledge and intention as the abettor. It is impossible for any human tribunal to decide exactly how much the instigation actually weighed in the mind of the person abetted when he committed the act or offence.[87]

Accused Charged under Section 300 , read with Section 149,Indian Penal Code 1860 cannot be convicted under Section 300 read with Section 109, Indian Penal 1860

Where the accused along with other accused persons was charged with an offence under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, no charge undisputedly was framed against the accused with the aid of s 109, IPC, the offence under s 109, IPC, is a distinct offence, the accused having faced trial for being a member of an unlawful assembly with achieved the common object of killing the deceased, could in no event be substitutedly be convicted for an offence under s 302, IPC, with the aid of s 109, IPC . Such a conviction of the accused would not only be a legal flaw but also a great prejudice to the accused in projecting his defence.[88]

11. Procedure

The general procedure in respect of an offence under this section is the same as that for the principal offence.

The offence is bailable or non-bailable and cognizable or non-cognizable according to the procedure for the offence abetted and is triable by the court by which the offence abetted is triable (refer to CrPC, Sch I).

12. Arrest

Police may arrest without warrant, if arrest for the offence abetted may be made without warrant, but not otherwise.

13. Warrant or Summons

A warrant or summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance, according as a warrant or summons may issue for the offence abetted. An offence under s 117 of this Code and s 17(1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1908, can be tried as a summons-case.[89]

14. Joint trial

Under s 223, CrPC, judicial discretion has been given to the court to try the principal offender and the abettor either jointly or separately; and the manner, in which this discretion should be exercised, must depend on the facts of each case.[90]Section 3(1) (b) encompasses the offences committed in conspiracy with others or by abetment of 'any of the offences' punishable under the Prevention of Corruption Act 1988 (PC Act). If such conspiracy or abetment of 'any of the offences' punishable under the PC Act can be tried 'only' by the Special Judge, it is inconceivable that the abettor or the conspirator can be delinked from the delinquent public servant for the purpose of trial758 of the offence. If a non-public servant is also a member of the criminal conspiracy for a public servant to commit any offence under the PC Act, or if such non-public servant has abetted any of the offences which the public servant commits, such non-public servant is also liable to be tried along with the public servant before the court of a Special Judge having jurisdiction in the matter.[91] Where accused a public servant is tried under s 13(2) of the Prevention of Corruption Act for being found in possession of assets disproportionate to his known source of income, his wife who is not a public servant where evidence prima facie shows his involvement can be prosecuted with the aid of s 109,

15. Jurisdiction

Every offence shall ordinarily be inquired into and tried by a court within whose local jurisdiction it was committed (refer to s 177 CrPC 1973). A charge of abetment may be inquired into or tried either by the court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the abetment was committed, or by the court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the offence abetted was committed (refer to s 180, CrPC). The principal offender and the abettor can be tried together not only at the place where the abetment takes place, but also at the place where the offence abetted is committed.[93]

Jurisdiction in Case of Abetment by Conspiracy

It cannot be said that s 180, CrPC, has no longer any application to cases of abetment by conspiracy as the conspiracy itself has been made an offence under s 120B . The offence of abetment by conspiracy as defined in s 107 was not repealed when s 120B, was enacted.[94] Conspiracy is one form of abetment (s 107, IPC) and where an offence is alleged to have been committed by more than two persons, such of them as actually took part in the commission should be charged with the substantive offence, while those who are alleged to have abetted it by conspiracy should be charged with the offence of abetment under s 109, IPC .[95]

It is not the act done in pursuance of the conspiracy but the place where the conspiracy was formed or made which determines the jurisdiction of the Court and it has been consistently held that in an indictment for conspiracy the venue should be laid where the conspiracy was, and not when the result of such conspiracy was put in execution.[96]

Conspiracy is a substantive offence in itself. It is not one of the offences named in s 181 .[97]

It has accordingly been held in some cases that where a conspiracy is entered in district A and offences in pursuance of the conspiracy are committed in district B, the offence of conspiracy itself can be tried only at A and not at B.[98] In some other cases it has been held that where the conspiracy was an offence by reason of its relation to759 the other acts committed by the conspirators which are offences by themselves, then by reason of s 180, the offence of criminal conspiracy could be tried at the places where the other offences with which it is related, can be tried. Thus, it was held that where a conspiracy was hatched at Howrah but the offence of kidnapping in pursuance thereof was committing at Balia, the court at Balia had jurisdiction to try the offence of conspiracy.[1]

Apart from the question of law, it will be more convenient if the offence of conspiracy and the various other offences committed in pursuance of it are tried together at one place because it will be more convenient and also less expensive to both the parties. It has been held by the Privy Council in Babulal Chawkhani v Emperor ,[2] that if several persons conspire to commit offences and commit overt acts in pursuance of the conspiracy, these acts are committed in the course of the same transaction, which embrace the conspiracy and the acts under it, and the conspiracy and the various other offences committed in pursuance of the conspiracy can be tried together.

16. Place of Trial for Abetment by Letter sent through Post

Where one person instigates another to the commission of an offence by means of a letter sent through post, the offence of abetment by instigation is completed so soon as the contents of such letter become known to the addressee, and such offence is triable at the place where such letter is received.[3] For the purpose of giving jurisdiction, a letter speaks continuously from the moment of its being posted until its receipt by the addressee.[4]

17. Abetment in India of an Offence Committed in Foreign Territory

The accused, an Indian subject of Her Majesty, abetted the commission of murder, or of rioting under ss 302 and 147, by words spoken in British territory, inciting certain Portuguese subjects to kill one Bhama, if he attempted to remove the produce of certain lands situated in the Portuguese territory of Daman. A disturbance afterwards occurred at Daman in connection with this matter, in which one man was killed and another wounded. It was held that s 188, CrPC, had no application to the case, the alleged offence of abetment not having been committed outside British India.[5]

This difficulty is now removed by the addition of s 108A in the IPC under which a person abets an offence within the meaning of this Code, who in India abets the commission of any act without and beyond India, which would constitute an offence if committed in India.

Illustration

A in India instigates B, a foreigner in Goa, to commit a murder in Goa. A is guilty of abetting murder.760

18. Abetment of Foreign Territory of Offence Committed in India

A subject of an Indian state, who by acts done in that state, and not in British territory, abetted the commission of an offence in British territory, was not liable to be tried in British India,[6] but if he were an Indian subject, he could be tried in British India if a certificate was obtained.[7]

Where a foreign subject, resident in a foreign territory, instigated the commission of an offence which in consequence was committed in British territory, it was held that the instigation not having taken place in any district created by this Code, the instigator was not amenable to the jurisdiction of a British court established under the Code.[8]

19. Complaint Necessary in the case of Abetment of Certain Offences

Sub-clause (i) of cl (a) of s 195(1) of the CrPC provides that no court shall take cognizance of any offence punishable under ss 172 - 88 (both inclusive) of the IPC except on the complaint in writing of the public servant concerned or some other public servant to whom he is administratively subordinate. Similarly for the offences punishable under ss 193 - 96 (both inclusive), 199, 200, 205-11 (both inclusive) and 228, when such offence is alleged to have been committed in, or in relation to, any proceeding in any court or of any offence described in s 463, or punishable under ss 471, 475 or 476 of the IPC, when such offence is alleged to have been committed in respect of a document produced or given in evidence in a proceeding in any court cognizance can be taken only on the complaint in writing of that court by such officer of the court as that court may authorise in writing in this behalf, or some other court to which that court is subordinate. The same procedure has to be followed for the prosecution of the abettors of the aforementioned offences in view of the provisions of sub-cl (ii) of cl (a) and sub-cl (iii) of cl (b) of s 195(1) of the said Code. The cognizance is, therefore, barred without the written complaint of the public servant or the court concerned as the case may be.[9]

20. Sanction

Under the provisions of the present CrPC, previous sanction of the Central Government or of the state government is required for taking cognizance of abetment described in s 108A of the IPC and not in respect of any abetment described in s 109, where A submitted false claims to the government of Burma and obtained payment of money in respect of works not carried out by him for the government, A was tried for cheating along with the trial of a public servant for abetment of the offence of cheating, by falsely certifying correctness of the claims. It was contended that trial of A was vitiated for want of sanction under s 197, CrPC, for the prosecution of the public servant. It was held that the trial was not vitiated for want of sanction as neither A was a public servant nor the act of abetting the principal offenders could possibly be held to have been done. The conviction of the accused persons under s 420 read with s 109, IPC was maintained[10] (s 196, CrPC).[11]761

Commentary under s 107, infra, may be referred to.

Where the accused merely introduced the co-accused to a bank for opening an account and the co-accused after six months, presented bogus drafts and withdrew the amount, there was no evidence showing involvement of accused in fraud committed by the co-accused nor did he instigate the co-accused to present bogus drafts. The bank passed self cheque of the co-accused when there was not sufficient money in his credit by acting on bogus drafts. It was held that the accused was not responsible for loss sustained by the bank and conviction of the accused for abetment of cheating under ss 420 / 109, IPC, was not proper.[12]

Evidence of PW3 showed that the Accused A1 re-married with Accused A5 in the presence of the other co-accused, after his marriage with the complainant was dissolved, but the other co-accused (A3 and A4) had no knowledge that the decree of divorce had already been set aside by the court. The other co-accused (A3 and A) could not be held guilty of abetment of bigamy. They were held entitled to benefit of doubt. Their conviction under s 494 read with s 109, IPC was set aside.[13]

22. Sentence

Courts do not have to make any distinction in the quantum of sentence to be awarded to the principal offender and that awarded to the offender who abetted the commission of offence.[14] It is irregular to convict and punish a person for abetment of theft, and at the same time to convict and punish him for receiving the stolen property.[15] Persons, charged as principals, cannot be punished for the abetment of the same offence without a charge.[16] The rules of the perpetrator and abettor of the crimes are distinct. In the absence of definite information about the actual words used by an accused in abetting an offence, other circumstances, relied by the prosecution against the accused, lose much of their force, and it is unsafe to convict an accused person of the offence of abetment.[17] Where an accused has been found guilty under s 302 read with ss 109 and 120B, IPC, no conviction or sentence under the charge for the offence under s 120B, IPC, need be recorded.[18]

Where two persons A and B have been charged for abetment and the case against the two is inextricably mixed-up and cannot be severed, B, on the acquittal of A, should be given the benefit of doubt and should also be acquitted.[19]762

23. Charge

In a charge of abetment, the section of the principal offence, and the particular section of this chapter, under which the case falls should be mentioned with the circumstances which bring it under the said section.[20] It is not possible to frame a charge under this section alone because that section has, for its application, to be read with some other section defining the offence, say, s 420 read with s 109, or s 467 read with s 109 and so on. A charge under s 109, when framed, is along with the charge of some substantive offence.[21] Where the charge against the accused is for an offence under s 304, Pt I, read with s 34 IPC, the accused cannot be convicted under s 304, Pt I, read with s 109, IPC, in the absence of charge under s 109, IPC .[22] However, it cannot be laid down as an inflexible rule that a conviction for abetment cannot be made in a case where the accused is charged with the main offence only, and no separate change has been frame under this section. If the accused had notice of the facts which constituted abetment, although the charge was one for the main offence, and if there has been no prejudice to him by the omission to frame a separate charge for abetment, he can be convicted for abetment even though the charge for the main offence fails.[23] Where a charge is framed under ss 467 and 120B of IPC for the offence of conspiracy to forge a valuable security and also an additional charge of abetment under ss 467 and 109 and the former charge is subsequently, after evidence on aforesaid charge has been led by prosecution, cancelled for want of sanction under s 196, CrPC, the court would be justified in convicting the accused under ss 467 and 109 .[24]

Where the offence charged is only a conspiracy to commit a single act, the persons concerned can be charged with the actual commission of the offence or with abetment of the offence as abetment includes abetment by conspiracy. In such circumstances, as the entire case would be covered by framing a charge of the offence or its abetment, a charge under this section read with the section creating the substantive offence, would be sufficient and proper and it would be improper and certainly unnecessary to frame a charge of conspiracy separately under s 120B . But where the specific charges are only but two acts and the charge of conspiracy is not with respect to these two only but with respect to several others also, the entire case cannot be covered by a mere charge of abetment under s 109 read with sections defining the substantive offence, and a charge under s 120B, of conspiracy separately would be necessary.[25] Conspiracy, is one form of abetment (see s 107, IPC), and where an offence is alleged to have been committed by more than two persons, such of them as actually took part in the commission of the offence, should be charged with the substantive offence, while those who are alleged to have abetted it by conspiracy, with the offence of abetment under this section.[26] Where a person has been convicted under s 379, IPC, of theft, it is not competent for the appellate court,763 while finding him not guilty of theft, to modify the conviction into one of abetment of theft.[27]

Accused Convicted without framing Charge

Section 211 of the CrPC requires that the charge against the accused be precisely stated. Sub-section (4) of s 211 of the CrPC specifically requires that the law and section of the law against which the offence is said to have been committed shall be mentioned in the charge.[28] In the absence of a charge being framed against the accused under s 302 or 109, IPC, it would certainly cause prejudice to him, if he is convicted under either of these offences at the end of the trial. It is not permissible for the trial court to convict the first for the offence under s 302 read with s 109, IPC, without framing charge. His conviction under s 302 read with s 109, IPC is, therefore, illegal and is liable to be set aside.[29] Where the accused was not notified at any stage that he would be tried for the offence of having abetted the deceased to cause miscarriage, it was held that the conviction of the accused for having abetted the deceased to cause miscarriage was not proper.[30]

Form of Charge

The charge has to be framed in the following form:

'I (name and office of Magistrate, Sessions Judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That A B (name the principal: if the person is unknown, say that an unknown person) on the.....day of..... at..... committed the offence of.....and that you at ..... abetted the said AB (or person unknown) in the commission of the said offence of ..... which was committed in consequence of your abetment and you have thereby committed an offence punishable under s 109 read with section ..... of the Indian Penal Code, and within my congnisance (or within the cognizance of the Court of .....)

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court (or the said court) on the said charge.

When the abettor is charged with the principal offender, the charge should run thus:

That you ..... on or about the ..... day of ..... at .....abetted the commission of the offence of ..... by ..... which was committed in consequence of your abetment, and that you have thereby committed an offence punishable under s 109 and ..... of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of my Court (or the Court of .....).'

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter V

Of Abetment

S. 110.

Punishment of abetment if person abetted does act with different intention from that of abettor.--

Whoever abets the commission of an offence shall, if the person abetted does the act with a different intention or knowledge from that of the abettor, be punished with the punishment provided for the offence which would have been committed if the act had been done with the intention or knowledge of the abettor and with no other.764

Comments

1. Scope

Under expln 3 to s 108, it is not necessary that the person abetted should be capable by law of committing an offence, or that he should have the same intention or knowledge as that of the abettor, or any guilty intention or knowledge. This section provides for cases in which the intention or knowledge of the person abetted is different from that of the abettor. Even in such a case, the abettor is liable for the offence which would have been committed if the act abetted had been done with the intention or knowledge of the abettor. In other words, the variation in the intention or knowledge of the person abetted does not affect the liability of the abettor. For a concrete example of this section see illust (d) to expln (3) of s 108 . In the case illustrated, the abettor is guilty of abetting theft although the act committed by the person abetted is not theft.[31]

Where allegations were that the co-accused by using an abusive term exhorted the main accused who thereby killed the deceased. Conviction of the main accused for the offence of murder was found proper, however, the co-accused was held not sharing common intention with the main accused to cause death of the deceased, though words were used by the co-accused in an abusive way but from that it could not be said that he exhorted main accused to kill the deceased. The co-accused was held guilty for abetment of offence of hurt and his conviction under s 302 read with s 34, IPC was altered to one under ss 324 / 110 IPC .[32]

Where the abettor's intention was only to cause simple hurt to a woman, but the person abetted hit her with the intention of causing grievous hurt, it was held that the abettor was liable only for what he intended so that he could be convicted only for an offence under s 323 read with s 110 .[33]

It has been held that the principle of ss 38 and 110 applies to offences under s 149 and the liability of individual members of an unlawful assembly under the latter section depends on the intention or knowledge of the members.[34]

2. Procedure

The procedure is the same as that for the offence abetted (refer to the CrPC, Sch I).

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter V

Of Abetment

S. 111.

Liability of abettor when one act abetted and different act done.--

When an act is abetted and a different act is done, the abettor is liable for the act done, in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had directly abetted it:

Proviso.--Provided the act done was a probable consequence of the abetment, and was committed under the influence of the instigation, or with the aid or in pursuance of the conspiracy which constituted the abetment.765

Illustrations

(a) A instigates a child to put poison into the food of Z, and gives him poison for that purpose. The child, in consequence of the instigation, by mistake puts the poison into the food of Y, which is by the side of that of Z. Here, if the child was acting under the influence of *A'*sinstigation, and the act done was under the circumstances a probable consequence of the abetment, A is liable in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had instigated the child to put the poison into the food of Y.

(b) A instigates B to burn Z's house. B sets fire to the house and at the same time commits theft of property there. A, though guilty of abetting the burning of the house, is not guilty of abetting the theft; for the theft was a distinct act, and not a probable consequence of the burning.

(c) A instigates B and C to break into an inhabited house at midnight for the purpose of robbery, and provides them with arms for that purpose. B and C break into the house, and being resisted by Z, one of the inmates, murder Z. Here, if that murder was the probable consequence of the abetment, A is liable to the punishment provided for murder.

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

Sections 109 - 110 provide for cases in which the act done is the act abetted. This section provides for the liability of the abettor when the act done is different from the act abetted. It lays down that in such a case the abettor is liable for the act committed. Reading with s 107, this section comes to this. Where an act is abetted and the abetment takes form of instigation of an act, and a different act is done, that different act must be probable consequence, and committed under the influence of the instigation; and where the abetment takes the form of aiding or a conspiracy, the different act must be a probable consequence and also with the aid or in pursuance of the conspiracy. In the latter case, for conviction under this section, the prosecution must show, not only that assault on the complainant was a probable consequence of the conspiracy to assault the complainant but also that it has been done in pursuance of that conspiracy.[35]

It is clear law that if one man instigates another to perpetrate a particular crime, and that other, in pursuance of such instigation, not only perpetrates that crime, but, in the course of doing so, commits another crime in furtherance of it, the former is criminally responsible as an abettor in respect of such last mentioned crime, if it is one which as a reasonable man, he must, at the time of the instigation, have known would, in the ordinary course of things probably have to be committed in order to carry out the original crime. For example, if A says to B: 'You waylay C on such and such a road and rob him, and if he resists, use this sword but not more than is absolutely necessary'; and B kills C, A is responsible as an abettor of the killing, for it was a probable consequence of the instigation. To put it in plain terms, the law virtually says to a man: 'If you choose to run the risk of putting another in motion to766 do an unlawful act, he, for the time being, represents you as much as he does himself; and if, in order to effect the accomplishment of that act, he does another which, you may fairly, from the circumstances, be presumed to have foreseen, would be a probable consequence of your instigation, you are as much responsible for abetting the latter act as the former'.[36]

A person is guilty of abetment provided only that the act which he does is a probable consequence of the abetment and is committed under the influence of the instigation.[37]

The illustrations to this section, show that it contemplates cases not only where a different act is done but also where a different person is attacked in pursuance of the conspiracy.[38] But where the offence is totally different from the one instigated, the liability of the abettor does not accrue.[39]

2. English Law

As to the liability of the accessory when the crime committed is other than that commanded, is dealt with in this section, Russell says:[40]

> If the principal totally or substantially varies from the terms of the instigation, if being solicited to commit a felony of one kind, he wilfully and knowingly commits a felony of another, he will stand single in that offence, and the person soliciting will not be involved in his guilt (Fost 369: 1 Hale 436).

Thus if A commands B to burn C's house, and he in so doing commits a robbery now A, though accessory to the burning, is not accessory to the robbery: for that is a thing of a distinct and inconsequential nature.[41] And if A counsels B to steal goods of C on the road, and B breaks into C's house and steals them there, A is not accessory to the breaking the house, because that is a felony of another kind. He is, however, accessory to the stealing.[42]

But if the principal complies in substance with the instigation of the accessory, varying only in circumstances or time or place, or in the manner of execution, the accessory will be involved in his guilt: as, if A commands B to murder C by poison, and B does it by a sword or other weapon or by any other means, A is an accessory to this murder; for the murder of C was the object principally in contemplation, and that is effected.[43]

And where the principal goes beyond the terms of the solicitation, yet if, in the event, the felony committed was a probable consequence of what was ordered or advised, the person giving such order or advice will be an accessory to that felony. Thus if A advises B to rob C, and in robbing him B kills him, either upon resistance made, or to conceal the fact, or upon any other motive operating at the time of the robbery, in such a case A is an accessory to the murder as well as to the robbery.[44]767 And if A solicits B to burn the house of C, and B does it accordingly; and the flames taking hold of the house of D, that likewise is burnt: A is accessory to B in the burning of the houses both of C and of D. The advice, solicitation, or orders of A were pursued in substance; and the events, though possibly falling out beyond his original intention, were, in the ordinary course of things, the probable consequences of what B did under the influence and at the instigation of A.[45]

3. Liability of Abettor for Act Committed

The abettor is liable for the act committed, if:

(a) it was a probable consequence of the abetment; and
(b) it was committed:

(i) under the influence of the abetment, or
(ii) in pursuance of the conspiracy which constituted abetment.[46]

4. Principle

The principle involved is that an abettor is liable for the probable consequences of his abetment. The test in these cases must always be whether, having regard to the immediate object of the instigation or conspiracy, the act done by the principal is one, which according to ordinary experience and common sense, the abettor must have foreseen as probable. The determination of this question as to the state of a man's mind at a particular moment must necessarily always be a matter of serious difficulty, and conclusions should not be formed without the most anxious and careful scrutiny of all the facts.[47] Russell says in this connection:[48]

> Nowadays, it is submitted, the test should be subjective, and the person, charged as accessory, should not be held liable for anything but what he either expressly commanded or realised might be involved in the performance of the project agreed upon. It would, on this principle, therefore, be a question of evidence to satisfy the jury that the accused did contemplate the prospect of what the principal has in fact done. Of course, in considering the evidence, the jury will naturally bear in mind the probability that what the ordinary average man would have foreseen was also foreseen by the accused, and that his present denial, now that he is charged, may be false.

5. 'When an Act is Abetted'

When this section speaks of an act, which is abetted, it means instigation of a criminal act. It does not follow as a natural and probable consequence of the instigation of a lawful action that an offence will be committed. Peaceful picketing is not an unlawful act and a person instigating another to picket a liquor shop peacefully cannot be said to abet a criminal act. But where the accused instigates some volunteers to stop the sale of liquor by use of criminal force, he, in other words,768 instigates them to commit an offence under s 143, IPC . He will, then, be guilty of abetting the offence under that section.[49]

6. Probable Consequence

A probable consequence of an act is one which is likely, or which can reasonably be expected, to follow from such an act. An unusual or unexpected consequence cannot be described as a probable one. When the consequence of an act is such that a reasonable man could not be expected to foresee that it would follow from such an act, such a consequence cannot be described as a probable one. On the contrary, it can only properly be described as an unexpected, unlikely or improbable consequence. It is a well-established rule of construction that words in a statute creating a criminal offence must be construed strictly. A wider meaning to the phrase 'probable consequences' in this section should not and cannot be given; otherwise it would be impossible to fix any limits to a abettor's liability. When the act done is different from the act instigated, an abettor is only liable for such a different act if it was a likely consequence of the instigation or if it was an act which the instigator could reasonably have been expected to foresee might be committed as a result of his instigation.[50]Sections 111 - 13 make it abundantly clear that if a person abets another in the commission of an offence and the principal goes further thereafter and does something more which has a different result from that intended by the abettor and makes the offence an aggravated one, the abettor is liable for the consequences of the acts of his principal. If the offence committed is totally different from that which had been instigated, the abettor is not liable for the same even though his liability remains for the probable consequences of his abetment.[51] The crux of the problem, in an enquiry of this sort, is whether the abettor, as a reasonable man at the time of his instigation or intentionally aiding the principal, would have foreseen the probable consequences of his abetment.[52] When the chances are in favour of a certain event happening, that event is probable; when the chances are against its happening, it is improbable. When the chances are even, we get the middle line between probability and improbability. Improbability if increased to the extreme limit, becomes impossibility, probability if increased to the limit becomes certainty. The halfway line is neither probability nor improbability.

In a robbery, if there is no previous enmity of any sort, firearms are taken, it has been held, with the main object of frightening the villagers, and it is not the intention of the robbers to use the firearms with deadly effect, unless it should be necessary to do so in order to effect their escape. Where four persons set out to commit a robbery and one of them commits a murder in the course of robbery, it cannot in all cases be said that murder is a probable consequence of robbery so that the other three persons may be held guilty of the murder by abetment.[53]

Where a person orders his men to beat the other party and in consequence of that order, the people of that party are beaten and as a result, some men are killed, that769 person is guilty of abetment of murder.[54] Where the prisoner abetted an assault, and a murder was committed, it was held, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, that they were guilty of abetment of grievous hurt, and not of abetment of murder.[55]

7. Procedure

The procedure, in the case of an offence under this section, is the same as in the case of the offence abetted. Punishment is the same as that for the offence intended to be abetted.

For arrest, warrant or summons, bail, compounding, and court, refer to commentary under s 109 ante.

8. Proof

The facts, necessary to establish an offence under this section, are:

(i) that the accused abetted the commission of a particular act;
(ii) that the act, actually committed, was done under the influence of such abetment; and
(iii) that the act done was a probable consequence of the abetment.[56]

Chapter V

Of Abetment

S. 112.

Abettor when liable to cumulative punishment for act abetted and for act done.--

If the act for which the abettor is liable under the last preceding section is committed in addition to the act abetted, and constitutes a distinct offence, the abettor is liable to punishment for each of the offences.

Illustration

A instigates B to resist by force a distress made by a public servant. B, in consequence, resists that distress. In offering the resistance, B voluntarily causes grievous hurt to the officer executing the distress. As B has committed both the offence of resisting the distress, and the offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt, B is liable to punishment for both these offences; and, if A knew that B was likely voluntarily to cause grievous hurt in resisting the distress A will also be liable to punishment for each of the offences.

Comments

1. Scope

Under this section an abettor may render himself liable for two offences, when he only intended to bring about one, if the one which he intended caused another which he ought to have anticipated, and if the two are distinct offences so as to be subject to distinct punishments.

Supposing an act, as is contemplated under s 111, is committed in addition to the act abetted, the abettor is liable for both. In the illust, A abets resistance of the officer by force. If B was armed for the purpose then the grievous hurt inflicted was clearly a probable consequence of the abetment, and was inflicted under the influence of the770 abetment, and, therefore, would be punishable under s 111, IPC . But having been inflicted in addition to the act abetted, A is liable for both the offences.

For the principle underlying the section, refer to commentary under s 111 .

As to 'distinct offences', refer to synopsis notes to s 71 .

Chapter V

Of Abetment

S. 113.

Liability of abettor for an effect caused by the act abetted different from that intended by the abettor.--

When an act is abetted with the intention on the part of the abettor of causing a particular effect, and an act for which the abettor is liable in consequence of the abetment, caused a different effect from that intended by the abettor, the abettor is liable for the effect caused, in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had abetted the act with the intention of causing that effect, provided he knew that the act abetted was likely to cause that effect.

Illustration

A instigates B to cause grievous hurt to Z. B, in consequence of the instigation, causes grievous hurt to Z. Z dies in consequence. Here, if A knew that the grievous hurt abetted was likely to cause death; A is liable to be punished with the punishment provided for murder.

Comments

1. Scope

Where a certain act is abetted with the object of producing a certain effect but it causes a different one, the abettor is liable for it, if he knew that the act which he abetted was likely to cause that effect.[57] Under the terms of this section the liability depends on the question of the abettor's knowledge.[58] Under the English law the question seems to be one of fact, i.e., whether or not the effect which happened was likely.[59] Thus, A describes B to C, and instigates C to murder B. C murders D, who corresponds to A's description of B. Under the English law, A is accessory before the fact to the murder of D.[60] Under s 113, A is an abettor of the murder of D, only if he knew that the killing of D was likely. But he is guilty of the abetment of murder of B under s 115, A advises B to murder C (B's wife) by poison. B gives C a poisoned apple, which C gives to D (B's child). D dies, A is guilty of abetment of murder of C, but not of the murder of D,[61] but B is guilty of murder.

B and C instigated A to rob X. A in so doing killed X. B and C did not abet the murder of X by A. It would be otherwise if they knew that A was armed with a deadly weapon.[62]771

2. Difference of Means--Effect of Supposing the act abetted is committed in a manner different from the one suggested, it would make no difference to the abettor's liability for the effect abetted.[63] Thus if A advises B to murder C by shooting, and B stabs C who dies, A abets the murder of C. Similarly it would seem where A instigates B to kill C by sorcery or other impossible means, and B kills C otherwise.[64]

Chapter V

Of Abetment

S. 114.

Abettor present when offence is committed.--

Whenever any person who, if absent, would be liable to be punished as an abettor, is present when the act or offence for which he would be punishable in consequence of the abetment is committed, he shall be deemed to have committed such act or offence.

Comments

1. Scope

The person, who has abetted an offence, whether by instigation, conspiracy, or aid, may be present when the offence abetted is committed. He is, under this section, treated as a principal, i.e., he is deemed to have committed the offence, though in fact, it was committed by another.[65] This section is a provision which is only brought into operation when the circumstances amounting to abetment of a particular crime has first been proved, and then the presence of the accused at the commission of that crime is proved in addition.[66] Abetment does not in itself involve the actual commission of the crime abetted. It is a crime apart. Section 114 of IPC deals with the case where there has been not only the abetment of a crime, but also actual commission of the crime abetted and the abettor is present at the time of such commission. The way in which it deals with such a case is as follows.

772Instead of the crime being still abetment with circumstances of aggravation, abetment becomes the very crime abetted. The section is evidentiary not punitory. Because participation de facto may sometimes be obscure in detail, it is established by the presumption juris et de jure that actual presence plus prior abetment means nothing else but participation. The presumption raised by this section brings the case within the ambit of s 34 .[67] The presumption is irrebuttable.[68]

The quarrel/incident between the deceased and the appellant A1 ensued over the issue of dashing the victim with a bicycle. The victim was chased by A1 and was over powered in front of his house. The victim was assaulted on his head with an axe provided by A2, the mother of the assailant. The victim sustained head injuries and collapsed on the ground. Only one incised wound over the scalp of the deceased was caused. Accused A2 was convicted under Section 304 , Part II IPC . It was not a pre-meditated action on the part of A1 and A2 who supplied the incriminating axe as per asking of his son instantaneously without considering its pros and cons. The accused A2 was convicted under ss 326 / 34, IPC instead of ss 326 / 114, IPC .[69]

2. Object

The whole object of ss 34 and 114 of the IPC is to provide for cases in which the exact share of one of several criminals cannot be ascertained, though the moral culpability of each is clear and identical. Neither of these two sections should be so interpreted as to defeat the very object which underlies them.[70] This section introduces a statutory legal fiction whereby an abettor is treated as if he himself committed the offence by reason of his presence at the time and place of the offence. It does not apply to the case of an abettor whose abetment consists in something done or omitted when the offence was committed in his presence.[71] To bring a person within this section, the abetment must be complete apart from the presence of the abettor.[72]

3. Applicability

It is necessary first to make out the circumstances which constitute abetment, so that, if absent, he would have been 'liable to be punished as an abettor', and then to show that he was also present when the offence was committed.[73] This section would apply to a case where a person abets the commission of an offence, sometime before it takes place and happens to be present at the time when the offence is committed. It is not applicable to a case where the abetment is at the time when the offence takes place, and the abettor helps in the commission. When a person, who abets the773 commission of an offence, is present and helps in the commission of the offence, he is guilty of the offence itself and not merely of abetment except in a few cases like rape or bigamy.[74] Where neither any community of intention, nor any abetment prior to their presence at the spot, is established against the accused, the accused cannot be convicted with the aid of this section.[75] Where the accused is present on the spot and on his instigation, made on the spot, an offence is committed; the case falls under s 109, and not under this section.[76]

The section would be applicable only where the act at the time of doing of which the abettor is present, would itself amount to an offence and not otherwise.[77]

4. When Individual Acts become Relevant

Courts have stood as one holding that a person, who participates in a crime with the mens rea of that crime, alone is responsible and not one who is neither perpetrator nor a person acting with necessary actus reus. A person cannot be convicted if he is not a perpetrator as a secondary party, unless he was aware of all the essential matters which made the act done a crime. He may not have noted that his act amounted to crime in law, but he must be aware of all the essential matters of the act done, which essential matters together make the act done a crime. It thus follows that if several persons bear a common purpose, all are responsible for that act whether it was originally contemplated or not, where, however, one of them does an act which was not contemplated by the others and it is outside the common purpose, the others are not criminally liable in respect of that act, even though they may all have been engaged in an unlawful enterprise. In such circumstances, those who claim a secondary role may be liable for any other crimes and their individual acts may become relevant.[78]

5. The Real Test

The real test to see whether or not this section is applicable, lies in the words of the section. 'Who if absent would be liable to be punished as an abettor'. Abetment to come under this section must be one which is prior to the commission of the offence and complete by itself and not an abetment which is done immediately before or at the time of the commission of the offence, for in the latter case the abettor would not have committed the abetment if he had not been present and would not therefore, have been liable to punishment as an abettor.[79]774

Distinguishing Features of Sections 114 and 34

Commentary under s 34, may be referred to.

Distinguishing Features of Sections 114 and 109

Commentary under s 109, ante, may be referred to.

Distinguishing Features of Sections 114, 111 and 149

Where a number of persons are engaged in the commission of something criminal, all acting in furtherance of a common intention, each is of course punishable for what he has done. But his liability does not end there, for he is liable not only for the act he himself does, but also for those, which he thereby facilitates, provided of course, they are done in pursuance of the common intention. There may be cases where, the common intention is to do one act but a different act is done. When this is so, and there has been prior abetment, each abettor is liable as an abettor for the crime actually committed, provided the conditions specified in s 111, IPC have been fulfilled. That of course applies when the abettor is not actually present at the crime. But when he is there, this section comes into operation and makes him liable for the crime for which he would have been punishable 'as an abettor' if he had not been there. A parallel is to be found, in s 149, IPC, in cases of riot of an unlawful assembly. Each member of the assembly is liable not only for the acts done in furtherance of the common object, but also for acts which he knows were likely to be committed in the prosecution of that object. The law, then, reduces itself to this. In offences of this nature each person is liable for all crimes committed in furtherance of the common intention. What that intention was and whether each accused shared it are questions of fact which must be determined afresh, in each case with reference to the circumstances, which exist there, and not with reference to what other judges have decided in other cases on other facts. When, however, offences are committed, which travel beyond the common intention, each is still liable for these other offences provided there has been prior abetment and provided he would have been liable as an abettor under s 111, if he had not been present.[80]

Sections 114 and 149, IPC, both deal with constructive liability. Section 149 applies only when the person, composing the assembly of rioters, are at least five in number. There is no such limitation under this section. Again a person liable under s 149 need not be 'present' when the offence is committed as under this section.

Section 114 and not s 149, was held to apply to a case where, upon a charge of mischief by fire, the prisoner admitted that he was an abettor, and that he was present at the time when the offence was committed.[81]

'Who, if Absent, would be liable to be Punished as an Abettor'

In order to bring a person within the ambit of this section, it is necessary first to make out the circumstances which constitute abetment, so that, 'if absent', he would have been 'liable to be punished as an abettor', and then to show that he was also present when the offence was committed.[82] The real test lies in the words 'who, if absent,775 would be liable to be punished as an abettor'. They clearly show that abetment, to come under this section, must be one which is prior to the commission of the offence and complete by itself and not an abetment which is done immediately before or at the time of the commission of the offence, for, in the latter case the abettor would not have committed the abetment if he had not been present and would not, therefore, have been liable to punishment as an abettor.[83] Some persons commit grievous hurt, whilst A and B merely stand by. The attack is not pre-meditated. A and B cannot be punished as principals under s 114 because if they had been absent they would not be punished at all.[84] But where one of the accused was standing with an open knife, while the offence of rape was being committed by the other accused, the former was held guilty under ss 376 / 114, IPC .[85] Where the co-accused facilitated the main accused in committing rape on the prosecutrix, his conviction under s 376 / 114, IPC and of main accused under s 376, IPC was found proper.[86] This section applies to a case where a person abets the commission of an offence sometime before it takes place and happens to be present at the time when the offence is committed, and is not applicable to a case where the abetment is at the time when the offence takes place and the abettor helps in the commission.[87] In order to bring a case within s 114, the abetment must be complete, apart from the presence of the abettor.[88]

The incident had not occurred all of a sudden. There was no evidence to show that accused no. 2, 3 or 4 aided accused No. 1 in assaulting the deceased. Held, the accused No. 2 could not be held guilty for causing the death of the deceased by employing s 114 for aiding or abetting accused No. 1.[89]

6. 'Is Present when the Act or Offence is Committed'

For the application of this section, there must be not only prior abetment, but also the presence of the abettor when the act or offence is committed.[90] For abetment under s 107, presence of the abettor at the time of the commission of the act abetted is not necessary. Explanation 2 to that section shows that abetment by aiding may be by776 doing something to facilitate the commission of the act abetted prior to the commission of that act. To constitute the offence of abetment it is not even necessary that the act abetted should be committed, or that the effect requisite to constitute the offence should be caused.[91]There can, therefore, be no question of the presence of the abettor when the act or offence is committed. But for an abettor to be liable under this section, he must be present when the act or offence abetted is committed. The ground of liability is participation in the crime, and that is established by the presumption juris et de jure that actual presence plus prior abetment can mean nothing but participation.[92]

In a case of cheating, a person is guilty of abetment under ss 109 and 114 of the IPC, who introduces the complainant to the cheater, knowing full well that the offence is going to be committed, is present at the time when the agreement and the payment are made but remains silent and, while taking no share of the money takes no steps to inform the complainant of what is going to happen with him.[93]

Where four persons tacitly agree to beat their common enemy with *lathi*s, each is abetting the conduct of the other within the meaning of s 107 . If they actually beat their enemy and cause grievous hurt to him, each one of them can be convicted under s 325, IPC ; even if it cannot be ascertained which one of them caused the grievous hurt. As the agreement to beat constituted abetment and as each one of them is present at the beating this section fully applies.[94]

Where the accused persons were convicted for abetting rape committed on the prosecutrix. The evidence did not show that the accused persons had any conspiracy or desire to abet commission of rape on the prosecutrix, and even evidence in regard to their presence at the time of commission of rape was not very clear and the prosecutrix was not examined in this regard, conviction of the accused persons for abetting commission of rape was held not proper.[95]

Entrustment to the accused is a necessary element of the offence of criminal breach of trust under s 406 of the IPC . A jewel was entrusted to A who gave it to B, for being pledged to some person. C, who was aware that the jewel did not belong to B, took B to a money-lender and induced him to give a loan to B, on the pledge of the jewel. Both B and C acted at the instance of A. Here C was no doubt present at the pledging but pledging by itself would not constitute the offence under s 406 . C was not present at the time of the entrustment, the other element necessary to constitute the offence. So C cannot be convicted under s 406 read with this section.[96]

A mere direction from one person to another and the carrying out of that direction by the other may be only instigation of the latter's act and may not be a case of a joint act falling under s 34 . But where two persons with their followers, all of them armed, move about together for a set purpose and one gives instructions to the other and keeps himself on the spot in readiness to see it carried out and the other carries it out, it is hardly possible to say that the act is not one which was done in the777 furtherance of the common intention of both. The accused's saying 'people are collecting, let us fire' brings out the common intention clearly. But if the evidence makes out no more than mere instigation, it is even so, instigation by a person who is present at the scene of offence when the act is committed. In such a case the instigator is deemed to commit the murder by virtue of this section. Actual presence plus prior abetment can mean nothing else but participation. That is the irrebuttable presumption raised by this section and brings the case under s 34 .[1]

The appellant R was present when appellant K inflicted the fatal lathi blow. It was he who had abetted and at his command K had acted. It was held that he cannot escape from offence of murder under s 302, IPC, on account of act of 'K' in terms of s 114, IPC .[2]

There was evidence that the appellant accused S actually participated in the conspiracy. There was also an independent evidence to prove that he made all the arrangements pursuant to the criminal conspiracy and induced appellant to commit the murder of the deceased. S was present at the scene of the occurrence and that fact was proved by the evidence of PWS. It was proved that S abetted the commission of the murder and as he was present at the scene of occurrence at the time of commission of the crime, s 114 IPC also would apply. Appellant S was convicted under s 302 read with ss 120B and 34, IPC .[3]

7. 'He shall be deemed to have Committed such Act or Offence'

This is a statutory fiction whereby an abettor, who is present at the commission of the offence abetted, is treated as if he had actually committed the offence himself.[4] In a case reported[5] in the Madras High Court Reports the said court stated that the section simply provides for the punishment of what the English law calls principals in the second degree, that is, persons who abet a crime and countenance it by their presence at it, but who do not actually engage in it. In Emperor v Atmaram Govind ,[6] Chandavarkar J, observed:

> When one thing is not the same as another thing, but the Legislature says that it 'shall be deemed to be' the same thing, it creates a legal fiction, and in that case 'the Court is entitled and bound to ascertain for what purposes and between what persons the statutory fiction is to be resorted to'.[7] And fictions created by law shall never be contradicted so as to defeat the ends for which they are invented, though for every other purpose they may be contradicted.[8]

In the case of Emperor v Kashia Antoo ,[9] which was decided by a single judge of the High Court of Bombay, an offender was convicted of theft under s 379 read with this section, and the question raised was whether or not the provisions of s 75 of the IPC could be applied to the case, that is to say, whether or not he was guilty of the offence of theft. Relying on the above observations of Chandravarkar J, it was held778 that the effect of s 114, therefore, is that if a man is present at the commission of an offence he is to be deemed to have committed it, not that he has committed it, and that a previous conviction of an accused for an offence, cannot be taken into consideration at a subsequent conviction for abetment, for the purpose of enhancing punishment under s 75 of the IPC . But this has been dissented from by a Full Bench of the Rangoon High Court in Emperor v Maung Pu Kai ,[10] in which Heald J, (with whom Maung Ba J, and Ratledge J concurred) observed:

> With all respect for the opinion of the learned Judge, I suggest that the legal fiction in this case was created by the Legislature between the Court and the offender for the purpose of enabling the court to punish the offender for the substantive offence, and that as the learned Judge says 'for that purpose he is to be treated in the same way as if he had committed the offence, that is to say, he must be regarded by the Court as having committed the offence'. In my opinion a person who is convicted of an offence under a particular section of the Indian Penal Code read with s 114 of that Code is not convicted of abetment but is convicted of the substantive offence. Section 114 deals expressly with a person who if absent would be liable to punishment as an 'abettor', and provides that such person if present when the offence for which he would be punishable 'in consequence of the abetment' is committed, he shall be deemed to have committed the offence. I cannot read that section otherwise than as meaning that such a person is more than an abettor, and that he is in fact what is called in English law a principal in the second degree.

The presumption, raised by the section, brings the case within the ambit of s 34 and is an irrebuttable presumption.[11]

Where a person, inciting others to commit an offence under s 447, is himself present when the offence is committed, he is guilty under s 447 .[12]

Illustrative Cases

Where one of the accused standing with an open knife while the offence of rape was being committed by the other accused, the former was held guilty under ss 376 / 114 .[13]

If the dispute in question is nothing but a dispute regarding non-payment of dues of the complainant, which can be said to be the dues of an unpaid seller, the complainant, therefore, after affixing appropriate court fee stamp, as required by law, should have filed money suit for obtaining money decree instead of that the complainant has rushed to the criminal court. In a given case, both civil and criminal proceedings may arise from a particular transaction but in the instant case, there is no scope for both the proceedings. This is not a case where any post-dated cheques are given by the accused which have bounced back nor any security is given by the accused. It is purely a simple money transaction between a seller and purchaser and no provision of IPC can be said to have been attracted in the present case. The complaints were quashed by High Court.[14] The accused was alleged to have fired a shot at the deceased from close range; the co-accused was proved to have actually779 participated in the conspiracy. Independent evidence was produced by the prosecution to prove that the co-accused made all arrangements pursuant to criminal conspiracy and induced the main accused to commit murder of the deceased. The co-accused was present at the scene of occurrence at the time of commission of crime, and s 114 of IPC would be attracted, further independent evidence adduced against the co-accused was corroborated by confession made by the main accused, the conviction of the co-accused under s 302 read with ss 120-B and 34, IPC was found proper.[15]

Where a court finds that parties came with a number of armed men and carried off a crop, the finding amounts to that of a forcible carrying off without the consent of the owner. Even if they took no part in the actual taking, they must, with reference to s 114 of the IPC, be considered guilty of the substantive offence under s 378 .[16]

R, who was the proper driver and in control of a lorry carrying passengers allowed H, a minor, with full knowledge that H did not know driving well, to drive the lorry so rashly and negligently as to endanger the lives and personal safety of the passengers in spite of the protests of the passengers. R was sitting by the side of H when an accident took place. The accident resulted in causing grievous hurt to some passengers. It was held that R was liable as a principal offender under the provisions of this section. In fact he was the person driving, through the hand and instrumentality of the boy H, to whom he had consciously and knowingly given the steering wheel. Therefore, R was himself liable to be punished for offences under ss 338 and 279 .[17]

The appellant K had been convicted under s 302, IPC, along with other appellants, namely R, Kr, D and C the latter under ss 302 / 149 . Appellants Kr, D and C were further convicted s 201, IPC . It was alleged that the deceased had protested against the grazing in the field by the buffalos of the appellants, which led to an exchange of hot words. Appellant R then ordered to kill the deceased and throw him in the water. Following his command, appellant K gave a fatal blow on head of the deceased with a lathi and appellants Kr, D and C lifted the deceased bodily and threw him in the river and pressed his body under the water and then pushed it into the deep running water. In an appeal before the Patna High Court, the question arising in appeal was whether appellant K alone was responsible for murder and other appellants R, Kr, D and C did not share in the common object and/or common intention to kill or not.

Except the evidence that appellants Kr, D and C who were members of the assembly also responded to the command of appellant R, one of members of assembly, there was nothing done by them prior to appellant K one of members of assembly inflicting lathi injury on the head of the deceased. Their participation in the occurrence, therefore, came at a point when the fatal blow had already been inflicted to the head of the deceased. Although very narrowly, yet appellants Kr, D and C, for their role in the occurrence, escape liability under ss 34 and 149, IPC . The case of appellant K satisfied all tests of culpable homicide committed with the intention of causing bodily injury with the knowledge that the same would cause the victim's death. His act is one punishable under s 302, IPC . Appellant R was present when appellant K inflicted the lathi blow. It was he who had abetted and at his command K had acted. He cannot escape from offence of murder under s 302, IPC on account of780 act of K in terms of s 114, IPC . Others pushed the deceased's body in the river with the intention of causing the evidence of the commission of the offence to disappear, and thus they participated in the occurrence at that stage and by their act, an offence punishable under s 201, IPC instead of s 302, IPC was made out.[18]

Where the accused armed with lathis trespassed into the house of the deceased and voluntarily caused hurt to the victims, and the witnesses gave evidence that the accused instigated others to beat up the victims who received lathi injuries, the accused were found liable to be convicted under s 324 read with s 114 .[19]

Accused abettor snatched spade, did not cause any injury to the deceased nor passed on the spade to the accused for causing injuries to the deceased. The accused was not held abettor, his conviction under s 114, IPC was not sustained.[20]

In one case the father exhorted his sons to beat the deceased on latter's asking them why he indulged in abusing his children, whereupon one son T, inflicted a lathi injury on his head and exhorted his brother G to fire. The deceased sustained head injury and firearm injuries in his stomach and died. According to the medical evidence the cause of death was fire arm injuries. The Allahabad High Court found the father guilty of an offence under s 323 read with s 114, IPC, and not of an offence under s 302 read with s 114, IPC .[21]

8. Procedure

Same as that for the offence abetted. For arrest, warrant or summons, bail, compounding and court, see commentary under s 109 .

9. Conditions Requisite for Initiation of Proceedings

Though there is no express provision in the IPC for the punishment of abetment of an offence punishable under s 494, IPC, such abetment is punishable with the punishment provided for the offence falling under s 494, IPC by reason of ss 109 and 114, IPC . Abetment of an offence punishable under s 494 is thus also an offence which falls under s 494, within the meaning of s 198, CrPC . The fact, that there is no specific provision like s 195(1), CrPC in s 198 of that Code, does not make that section (i.e. s 198, CrPC) any less applicable where the charge is abetment of an offence punishable under s 494, IPC . The intention of the legislature plainly is that in the case of bigamy, the aggrieved person must take the initial steps by means of a complaint made to a magistrate before the latter can take cognizance of the offence.[22]

The contrary opinion expressed in Bhawani Dutt v Emperor ,[23] and Jatra Shekh v Reazat Shekh ,[24] is no longer good law.781

10. Charge

Sections 34, 114 and 149 of the IPC provide for criminal liability viewed from different angles as regards actual participants, accessories and men, actuated by a common object or a common intention; and the charge is a rolled up one involving the direct liability and the constructive liability, without specifying who are directly liable and who are sought to be made constructively liable. In such a situation, the absence of a charge under one or other of the various heads of criminal liability for the offence cannot be said to be fatal by itself, and before a conviction for the substantive offence, without a charge, can be set aside, prejudice will have to be made out. In most of the cases of this kind, evidence is normally given from the outset as to who was primarily responsible for the act which brought about the offence and such evidence is, of course, relevant.[25]

11. This Section and Section 138 of Negotiable Instrument Act

As the ingredients of the offence under s 138 of Negotiable Instrument Act, and of offences under ss 114, 407 and 420, IPC are distinct, a person once tried for dishonour of cheque under s 138, NI Act, can be tried again for offence of criminal breach of trust, cheating and abatement, the bar contained in the doctrine of double jeopardy would not operate.[26]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter V

Of Abetment

S. 115.

Abetment of offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life--If offence not committed.--

Whoever abets the commission of an offence punishable with death or [27][imprisonment for life] shall, if that offence be not committed in consequence of the abetment, and no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

If act causing harm be done in consequence.--and if any act for which the abettor is liable in consequence of the abetment, and which causes hurt to any person, is done, the abettor shall be liable to imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to fourteen years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Illustration

A instigates B to murder Z. The offence is not committed. If B had murdered Z, he would have been subject to the punishment of death or [28][imprisonment for life]. Therefore A is liable to imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years and also to a fine; and if any hurt be done to Z in consequence of the abetment, he will be liable to imprisonment for a term which may extend to fourteen years, and to fine.782

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

Section 109 of the IPC provides for punishment of abetment of an offence if the act abetted is committed in consequence of the abetment. Sections 115 - 16 provide for punishment of abetment pure and simple, i.e., abetment of an offence, when the offence is not committed in consequence of the abetment.

Where an act is abetted and it is not committed but a different act is committed in consequence of the abetment s 111 applies. But if the commission of the different acts is not in consequence of the abetment, s 115 or 116, as the case may be, may be applicable.[29]

This section deals with the abetment of an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life, whereas s 116 deals with the abetment of an offence punishable only with imprisonment.

Under s 115, abetment of an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life is punishable with imprisonment up to seven years and fine. If any act is done in consequence of such abetment, the term of imprisonment may be extended to 14 years.

Offences, punishable with death or imprisonment for life, are those under ss 121, 132, 194, 302, 305, 307 (second para), and 396; with death only, s 303 ; with imprisonment for life, ss 121A, 122, 124A, 125, 128, 130, 131, 194, 222, 225, 232, 238, 255, 226, 304, 304B, 307, 311, 313, 314, 326, 329, 364, 371, 376, 377, 388, 389, 394, 395, 400, 409, 412, 413, 436, 438, 449, 459, 460, 467, 472, 474, 475, 477, 489A, 489B and 489D of the IPC .

This section would apply if there is no express provision made by this Code for the punishment of 'such abetment', i.e., abetment of the offences specified in this section. If s 117, IPC applies, the offence would not fall under this section.

Where a person instigated another to commit an offence under s 436, IPC, and the offence committed was not by the person instigated but by someone else, it was held that the person instigating was guilty of the offence of abetment not under s 436 read with s 109 but under s 436 read with s 115 since commission of offence was not in consequence of his abetment.[30]

Where a person was charged with the offence of abetment of conspiracy for commission of an offence of theft, by his officer, a substantive offence against the principal offender was not established and the principal offender was acquitted, the alleged abettor could not be convicted and he had also to be acquitted.[31]

2. 'Whoever Abets the Commission of an Offence'

'Offence', in this section means a thing punishable under any special or local law (see s 40 of IPC). Abetment under this section need not be abetment of the commission of an offence by any particular person against any particular persons. It may include abetment of the commission of an offence by unspecified persons against a class or number of other persons described generally and not particularly783 specified.[32] Abetment has a reference both to the person or persons abetted, and to the offence or offences the commission of which is abetted. Section 117 , IPC deals with the former whatever be the nature of the offence abetted, while s 115, IPC deals with the latter, without having regard to the person or persons abetted. Section 115 is not confined to the abetment of a single person or specified individual or individuals, and covers the case of the abetment of a class of persons also. It does not apply only if an express provision is made by the IPC for the punishment of such abetment. The words 'such abetment' evidently refers to the abetment of the offence specified in the section itself, an offence punishable with death or transportation for life.

3. 'Express Provision' for Punishment of such Abetment

This section applies only if there is no express provision, made by this IPC, for the punishment of 'such' abetment, i.e., abetment of the offence, specified in this section, namely, an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life. Sections 121 and 131, IPC provide for the punishment of the abetment of some such offences. Therefore, the words 'no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment', in this section, refer to ss 121 and 131, whereunder punishment is provided for the specific cases of abetment and not to section like s 117, which provides for punishment for a mere abetment.

4. Distinguishing Features of Sections 115 And 117

In a Lahore case it was held that s 115 applies only when the abetment is not punishable under another provision of the IPC . So if s 117 applies the offence would not fall under s 115, IPC . Where in a speech addressed to a number of persons exceeding ten the speaker incited the audience to commit an offence, s 117 was the more appropriate section to apply. But as has been pointed out by Lokur J, in Emperor v Lavji Mandan ,[33] abetment has a reference both to the person or persons abetted, and to the offence or offences the commission of which is abetted. Section 117 deals with the former whatever be the nature of the offence abetted, while s 115 deals with the latter, without having regard to the person or persons abetted. It is not disputed that s 115 is not confined to the abetment of a single person or a special individual or individuals, and covers the case of the abetment of a class of persons also. It does not apply only where 'an express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment'. The words 'such abetment' evidently refer to the abetment of the offence specified in the section itself, namely, an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life, and only ss 121 and 131, IPC, provide for the punishment of the abetment of such offences. There is no express provision in the Code for the punishment of the abetment of murder. Hence, the abetment of the commission of murder, whether by a single individual or by a class of persons exceeding ten, falls under s 115 . In the latter case, it may fall under s 117 also, but as s 117 prescribes a lesser punishment, s 115 is the more appropriate provision for such an offence. Although both the sections may apply, there cannot be separate sentences under the two sections for the same criminal act, and the conviction should properly be under that section which inflicts the higher punishment.784

5. Procedure

For arrest, warrant or summons, compounding and court, see commentary under s 109 . The offence is not bailable. The accused is not entitled to bail as of right.[34]

6. Charge

An offence under this section may be charged thus:

> 'I (name and office of Magistrate or Judge) hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of..... at ..... abetted the commission by one A B, of an offence of.....punishable with death (or imprisonment for life) which said offence was not committed in consequence of the abetment, (or and in consequence of the said abetment hurt was caused to....) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 115 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of....) by this Court (or by the said Court).
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.'

7. Punishment

For a case, falling under the first paragraph of this section, imprisonment upto seven years can be awarded. Infliction of 10 years sentence in such a case is illegal.[35] In case hurt is caused to any person in consequence of the abetment, imprisonment upto 14 years can be awarded under the second paragraph.

Chapter V

Of Abetment

S. 116.

Abetment of offence punishable with imprisonment--if offence be not committed.--

Whoever abets an offence punishable with imprisonment shall, if that offence be not committed in consequence of the abetment, and no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment, be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for that offence, for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term provided for that offence, or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both;

If abettor or person abetted be a public servant whose duty it is to prevent offence.--and if the abettor or the person abetted is a public servant, whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence, the abettor shall be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for that offence, for a term which may extend to one-half of the longest term provided for that offence, or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both.

(a) A offers a bribe to B, a public servant, as a reward for showing A some favour in the exercise of B's official functions. B refuses to accept the bribe. A is punishable under this section.
(b) A instigates B to give false evidence. Here, if B does not give false evidence, A has nevertheless committed the offence defined in this section, and is punishable accordingly.785
(c) A, a police-officer, whose duty it is to prevent robbery, abets the commission of robbery. Here, though the robbery be not committed, A is liable to one-half of the longest term of imprisonment provided for that offence, and also to fine.
(d) B abets the commission of a robbery by A, a police-officer, whose duty it is to prevent that offence. Here, though the robbery be not committed, B is liable to one-half of the longest term of imprisonment provided for the offence of robbery, and also to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section supplements s 115, IPC which is similarly worded and deals with the abetment of an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life in like circumstances. This section deals with the abetment of an offence punishable with imprisonment if the offence be not committed in consequence of the abetment. Like s 115, this section applies only if the offence abetted is not committed and no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such offence.[36]

This section discriminates between public servant, whose duty it is to prevent the commission of the offence abetted, and the public by prescribing an enhanced penalty on the former. The section is in two parts; under the first part, which deals with the public in general, abetment of an offence punishable with imprisonment may be punished by the infliction of one-fourth of the longest term of imprisonment provided for that offence. Under the second part, if the abettor or the person abetted is a public servant whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence, the term of imprisonment may be double.[37]

It will be observed that no punishment under this section is provided for the abetment of offences which are punishable with fine only, and which are not committed in consequence of such abetment. Offences under the following sections are punishable with fine only. Sections 137, 154 - 56, 278, 283, 290 and 294A (second para) of the IPC .

For the definition of public servant, see s 21 and the commentary thereunder.

2. Relative Scope of Sections 116 and 117 of the Indian Penal Code 1860

This section applies where the offence abetted is punishable with imprisonment. If a class of persons, exceeding ten, be abetted to commit such an offence, s 117 also would be applicable. If the offence abetted is theft, and the offence is not committed in consequence of the abetment, the punishment under s 116 would be only a quarter of three years, that is to say, nine months, but under s 117, it would be three years. Hence one, who abets the public or a class of persons exceeding ten to commit theft,786 should be charged under s 117 rather than this section. In other words, where a person is found guilty of a criminal act which is punishable under two different sections of the IPC, he may be convicted under both the sections, but should be punished only under that section which imposes the higher penalty.[38]

3. Offence

'Offence', in this section, means a thing punishable under this Code or under any special or local law (see s 40). Thus, where A, a vakil of a High Court, offered to give B, a vakil practising in a court subordinate thereto, a gratification contrary to s 36 of the Act, 18 of 1879, it was held that he was guilty of abetment of an offence by way of incitement under this section.[39]

Where the accused were charged with abetting a bigamous marriage, it was held that if the second celebration would have resulted in a valid marriage, then the offence of bigamy which they were charged with having abetted, would have been fully committed; but if the celebration of the second marriage would not have resulted in a valid marriage, the offence of bigamy, which they were charged with having abetted, would not have been fully committed. In the former case, they would be liable to the punishment prescribed by s 114 and in the latter only to the punishment prescribed by this section.[40]

It is possible to abet commission of suicide but nobody would abet a mere attempt to commit suicide. It is wrong to convict the accused under s 116 linked with s 306, IPC, in case of an attempt to commit suicide. The crux of the offence under s 306, IPC, itself is abetment. In other words, if there is no abetment, there is no question of the offence under s 306, IPC, coming into play. It is inconceivable to have abetment of an abetment. Hence, there cannot be an offence under s 116 read with s 306, IPC, and the conviction of the accused was liable to be altered by substituting s 306 with s 304B, IPC, read with s 116, IPC .[41]

Meaning of Offence Punishable with Imprisonment

The sentence or punishment of imprisonment used in this section neither includes neither imprisonment for life nor imprisonment in default of payment of fine. Imprisonment for life is an offence distinct from imprisonment as is clear from the provisions of s 53 of this IPC . Section 115 deals with the abetment of offences punishable with death or imprisonment for life. The abetment of offences punishable with imprisonment (other than imprisonment for life), which is of two descriptions, namely: (a) rigorous and (b) simple, is governed by the provisions of this section. Imprisonment awarded by a court for an offence punishable with fine only, in default of payment of fine, does not make that offence punishable with imprisonment and is not covered by this section.

'Public Servant whose Duty it is to Prevent the Commission of such Offence'

The enhanced punishment provided in the second clause of this section applies only to the abettors, where the abettor or the person abetted is a public servant whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence. The words 'such offence' occurring787 in the second clause of this section are of significance to suggest that abetment of all categories of offences involving public servants are not covered by this clause. But this clause embraces within its ambit only those offences, which are either abetted by or the person abetted are such public servants, who were duty bound to prevent their commission. A railway booking clerk, travelling ticket examiner or any other railway servant, whose duty includes the prevention of sale and use of forged railway tickets if abets the sale or use of such tickets will fall in the category of such public servants. The abettor or the person abetted both need not be public servants.

For the application of the provisions of enhanced punishment contained in cl 2 it is sufficient if one of them only is a public servant. If the person abetted is a public servant, the abettor will be liable to enhanced punishment under this clause, though he is not a public servant. Abettors, not falling in this category, will be dealt with under the first clause.

A civil surgeon is a public servant. His duty as a public servant is to act in the way of his profession, i.e., the profession of a medical man. It is not his duty to prevent the commission of the particular offence of bribing any further than it is the duty of every good citizen to do what he can to keep people about him honest, and to prevent the commission of any offence whatever. Cases might be readily supposed to which this latter half of the section would directly apply; for instance, it is the duty of a custom-house officer to prevent fraud upon the revenue in the way of smuggling; and, consequently, abetting him in the commission of such a fraud would be abetting the commission of an offence by a public servant whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence. It is not, however, the special duty of the civil surgeon as a public servant to prevent the commission of the offence of bribing. Therefore, the latter portion of the section does not apply to him and the punishment which is to be inflicted on him must be measured according to the provisions of the first part.[42]

A head constable of police is a public servant, but it is not his duty to prevent the commission of an offence under s 161 . Where, therefore, a person was accused of abetment of bribing a head constable; it is the first part of this section that applied and not the second.[43]

4. Abortive Attempt to give Bribe

Section 116, IPC makes an abortive attempt at giving a bribe, an offence, from the point of view of the person who offers it.[44] But as already pointed out, this section applies only if no express provision is made by the Code for the punishment of such abetment. Section 165A (since repealed) which was inserted in the Code by s 3 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1952 provided for the punishment for abetment of offences under ss 161 and 165 of the Code. So it was s 165A and not this section which applied[45] after the enactment of s 165A . Section 165A is now no more on the statute book and has been replaced by s 12 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1988.

788Where petitioners entered into a conspiracy with the co-accused and tried to bribe the deputy commissioner for availing of NOC. The deputy commissioner was newly posted and had no reason to falsely implicate them; it was held that abetment for commission of bribery is punishable under s 12 of Prevention of Corruption Act 1988 even if bribery is not completed. So, prima facie case against the petitioner was made out for taking cognizance against the petitioner and proceedings pending before the chief metropolitan magistrate were not quashed and writ petitions were dismissed.[46]

5. Procedure

Same as that for the offence abetted.

6. Charge

The following form may be adopted in framing the charge:

I (name and office of Magistrate, Session Judge etc,).....hereby charge you (name of accused).....as follows:

That you (if a public servant) being a public servant.....whose duty it was to prevent the commission of such offence, on or about the....day of....at.....abetted the commission by one X of an offence of.... Punishable with imprisonment, though the said offence was ultimately not committed in consequence of the abetment, and thereby committing an offence punishable under the second part of s 116 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the said Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court (or by the said Court) on the said charge.

Or

'I (name and office of Magistrate or Session Judge, etc).....hereby charge you (name of accused)....as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of.....at...abetted the commission by one X (name the person abetted), whose duty it was to prevent the commission of such offence, of an offence of....punishable with imprisonment, though the said offence was ultimately not committed as a consequence of the abetment, and thereby committed an offence punishable under the second part of s 116 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the said Court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court (or by the said Court) on the said charge.

For offences punishable under the first part of this section a charge may be similarly worded omitting the fact that the abettor or the person abetted is a public servant, whose duty it was to prevent the commission of such offence.

Chapter V

Of Abetment

S. 117.

Abetting commission of offence by the public or by more than ten persons.--

Whoever abets the commission of an offence by the public generally or by any number or class of persons exceeding ten, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.789

Illustration

A affixes in a public place a placard instigating a sect consisting of more than ten members to meet at a certain time and place, for the purpose of attacking the members of an adverse sect, while engaged in a procession. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides punishment for abetment of an offence by the public generally or by any number or class of persons exceeding ten.[47] The offence, under the section, is an aggravated form of abetment,[48] and has reference both to the person or persons abetted, and to the offence or offences the commission of which is abetted. This section deals with the former whatever be the nature of the offence abetted, and s 115 with the latter without having regard to the person or persons abetted.[49] Though this section contemplates the abetments of the commission of an offence by the public generally, or by any number or class of persons exceeding 10, it does not necessarily follow that the offence is to be committed by all the ten or more persons at one and at the same time or that there should be an unlawful assembly. The offence of abetment, under this section does not; therefore necessarily involve an offence under s 143 of this Code.[50]

The first thing to be proved under this section is the abetment of an offence, i.e., a thing punishable by the Code, or under any special or local law (see s 40 of IPC) and secondly, that the intention of the abettor was that the offence should be committed by more than ten persons, or by the public generally.

2. Relative Scope of Sections 115 and 117

Synopsis notes under s 115, may be referred to.

3. Applicability of Section to Offences under the Salt Act

The effect of s 40 of the IPC is that all acts or omissions in contravention of special or local Acts which are punishable under the Acts, fall under the definition of 'offences' in the IPC, and all abetments of offences which are offences under the special or local Acts and are punishable under the said Acts also fall under the definition of 'offences' in the IPC .

Section 40 enlarges the ambit of this section so as to include within its scope the offence under s 9 of the Salt Act. The result is that where an offence under s 9(a) of the Salt Act by the public generally or by a number of persons exceeding790 ten is abetted, it satisfies all the conditions of the offence under s 117 and this section applies.[51]

The offence under this section is not the offence of abetment simply, but abetment by the public generally or by any number or class of persons exceeding ten and the abetment referred to in s 9 of the Salt Act of 1882, is simply abetment within the meaning of the IPC, which may be abetment by a single person. The offence under this section is different from the offence under s 9 of the Salt Act and therefore this section is applicable to an abetment of an offence punishable even under Salt Act provided the abetment is by public generally or by any number or class of persons exceeding ten.[52]

The gravamen of a charge under this section is the abetment itself, i.e., the instigation to general lawlessness, and not the particular offence of which the commission is instigated. Section 74 of the Madras Salt Act 1899 obviously refers to the direct abetment of particular acts and to try to make it embrace the offence under this section is merely a legal quibble. Section 74 of the Madras Salt Act does not supercede the provision of this section.[53]

4. Abetment must be of an Offence

The first thing that has to be proved for the application of this section is the abetment of an offence. A person is said to abet the doing of a thing who intentionally aids it by an act or illegal omission. The omission must be illegal, and before there can be an illegal omission, there must be a duty cast by the law upon the person said to be guilty of the omission to do something or the other.

There is no duty cast on the president of a meeting to interrupt songs or to forbid their continuance. Hence, no illegal omission is committed by the president where such songs are sung in his presence and he has done nothing. Simply doing nothing is not an act unless there is duty to do something, it cannot be said that it is an illegal omission. Where, therefore, in a meeting of more than ten persons some revolutionary songs were sung, the mere fact that the president omitted to interrupt the songs and forbid the singing of them, could not render him liable under this section.[54]

Instigating railway workers to lie on the line in the event of a strike is an offence even though the strike is only a contingent matter. The illustration to this section shows that an instigation to attack a procession which is going to be taken is an offence under the section. It is immaterial, therefore, whether the accused was urging an immediate strike and instigating the workers to lie across the line or was merely instigating their doing so in case of a strike, which he advised if some retrenchment proposals, which were temporarily held up, were carried out.[55]

The abetment must be of an offence. Where an alleged abetment was by way of instigation by means of isolated passages contained in a literary work, published in791 the ordinary way towards the close of serious religious riots, but not distributed among the rioters, and the general spirit of the work was in favour of peace and reconciliation, it was held that it would not be a proper construction of the words, though objectionable in themselves, to allow them to override the whole context of the work.[56]

A person, who instigates the formation of an association, the objects and purpose of which are such as to constitute it an unlawful one, brings himself within the ambit of this section, as any one becoming a member of it, or contributing funds to it, would be guilty of an offence under s 17(1) of the Criminal Amendment Act 14 of 1908.[57]

5. 'By the Public Generally...or Persons Exceeding Ten'

To convict a person under this section, there must be an abetment of the commission of an offence by the public generally or by any number or class of persons exceeding 10. If, however, there is no abetment within the meaning of this section, there is no offence; in other words, if the public have not been instigated or incited, etc., there is no offence. A mere intention or preparation to instigate is neither instigation nor abetment. Where the allegation is that the accused posed seditious leaflets on the gate of a public library, to bring the accused within this section, it must be shown that either the public read the leaflets in question or that the leaflets were exposed to the public gaze. If the leaflets were posted in the dead of night and were removed by the police shortly afterwards, before the public could either see or read them, the case does not come within the purview of this section. Even if the police constables read the leaflets, they cannot be classed as 'public'.[58]

6. Procedure

The procedure applicable to an offence under this section is the same as in the case of the offence abetted.

7. Charge

The following form may be adopted in framing the charge:

> 'I (name and office of Magistrate or Sessions Judge etc...) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day....at.....abetted the commission of the offence of.....by.....numbering more than ten persons (or the public generally) by (state the act done by accused in instigation), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 117 of the Indian Penal Code, and within any cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of.....)

792

It may, or it may not, be a duplication to have s 117 as well as s 120B, but there can be no objection to charge under both ss 117 and 120B .[59]

1. Legislative Changes

In second paragraph of the section, the words "voluntarily conceals by any act or omission or by the use of encryption or any other information hiding tool, the existence of a design" have been *substituted*for words "voluntarily conceals, by any act or illegal commission, the existence of a design," by the Information Technology (Amendment) Act 2008, (10 of 2009), s 51(c) .

2. Scope

This and the next two sections refer to a special form of abetment by way of aid, viz, concealment of a design to commit a crime. It follows from the nature of abetment, which involves participation of two or more persons, that the concealment, contemplated by these sections, is the concealment by one person of the existence of a criminal design on the part of another.[62] All the three sections deal with concealment prior to the commission of an offence. Subsequent concealment is dealt793 with in ss 202 - 03 . These sections apply to the concealment of all offences except those punishable with fine only.

The following points should be proved in order to secure a conviction under these sections:

(i) that there was a designed offence, i.e., a thing made punishable by the IPC (see s 40) with imprisonment;
(ii) that the design was known to, and not merely suspected by the accused;
(iii) that the accused voluntarily (see s 39) concealed the existence of the intention, whether by an act on his part or by an illegal omission; or that he knowingly made a false representation respecting such design; and
(iv) that the accused intended, or knew, that he was likely thereby to facilitate the commission of the offence. It is not necessary, however, to prove that the offence was actually facilitated thereby.

3. 'Offence'

Section 40,ante and commentary thereunder, may be referred to.

4. 'Voluntarily'

Commentary under s 39, ante, may be referred to.

5. 'Conceals'

The concealment must be the result of some conduct, positive or negative, directed to that end. It must be active, as distinguished from passive non-disclosure. Thus, mere denial of the existence of a design to commit an offence does not constitute concealment.[63]

There must be an obligation on the person concealing the offence to disclose it. The concealment to be criminal must be intentional or, at least, with knowledge that it will facilitate the commission of an offence.

Knowing of a design to commit a dacoity, and voluntarily concealing the existence of that design with the knowledge that such concealment would facilitate the commission of dacoity, does amount to an abetment of the dacoity.[64]

6. 'By an Act or Illegal Omission'

Where the conduct consists of an omission, the omission must be 'illegal'; it must be in itself either an offence, i.e., a thing punishable under the IPC (s 40), or prohibited by law, or furnishing ground for a civil action (s 43). In the case of public servants, under s 119, every omission to disclose a design to commit any offence which would affect the particular state department, to which he belongs, must be illegal.[65]794

7. Duty to give Information

As to the duty of the public to give information to the police, or to the magistrate, in the case of the commission or intended commission, of certain crimes, 'in the absence of a reasonable excuse', a person, who is aware of the intention of the commission of a serious offence like murder and does not lay information before the nearest magistrate or the police officer, is guilty of an offence. He is practically a consenting party to the crime and is an accomplice.[66]

As to the duty of village officials, persons living in the villages and others, to report certain matters, refer to s 40, CrPC . When there are several lambardars and one of them to the knowledge of others directs the village chowkidar to make a report of burglary at the thana, it cannot be said that any of them had intentionally failed to give the information, prescribed by law, or that there was no reasonable excuse for not giving it, if the chowkidar had disobeyed the order.[67]

The fact that the omission was likely to facilitate the commission of the offence is material and must be clearly established.[68]

8. Procedure

For arrest, warrant or summons, compounding and court, in regard to offences under this section and s 119, refer to commentary under s 109 .

Bail

An offence under this section is not bailable; nor is one under s 119 when the principal offence is committed and is punishable with death or imprisonment for life. It is bailable if the offence is not committed (CrPC, Sch I).

9. Charge

The following form may be adopted in framing the charge:

> 'I (name and office of Magistrate, Sessions Judge etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the .....day of ....., at ....., with the intention of facilitating, or with the knowledge that you will thereby facilitate the commission of the offence of ..... (specify the act) omitted to do ..... (specify the omission) to conceal the existence of the design to commit the said offence, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 118 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of .....)
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court (or the said court) on the said charge'.

61 Substituted by the Information Technology (Amendment) Act, 2008 (10 of 2009), s. 51(c), for "voluntarily conceals, by any act or illegal omission, the existence of a design" (wef 27-10-2009).

Public servant concealing design to commit offence which it is his duty to prevent.--

Whoever, being a public servant, intending to facilitate or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby facilitate the commission of an offence which it is his duty as such public servant to prevent;

795[69][voluntarily conceals by any act or omission or by the use of encryption or any other information hiding tool, the existence of a design] to commit such offence, or makes any representation which he knows to be false respecting such design;

if offence be committed.--shall, if the offence be committed, be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-half of the longest term of such imprisonment, or with such fine as is provided for that offence, or with both;

if offence be punishable with death,etc.--or, if the offence be punishable with death or [70][imprisonment for life], with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years;

if offence be not committed.--or, if the offence be not committed, shall be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of such imprisonment or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both.

Illustration

A, an officer of police, being legally bound to give information of all designs to commit robbery which may come to his knowledge, and knowing that B designs to commit robbery, omits to give such information, with intent to facilitate the commission of that offence. Here A has by an illegal omission concealed the existence of B's design, and is liable to punishment according to the provision of this section.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is an adaptation of s 118, IPC to public servants, whose duty, as such public servants, is to prevent the commission of offences, and prescribes an enhanced punishment in their case. Refer to commentary under the preceding s 118 .

2. Public Servant

Section 21 and commentary thereunder, may be referred to.

3. Procedure

An offence, under this section, is non-bailable if the offence concealed is committed, or if it is punishable with death or imprisonment for life; otherwise it is bailable (refer to s 159, Act 18 of 1923). It is cognizable and compoundable if the offence abetted is so, and it is triable by the court by which the offence abetted is triable.796

4. Charge

The following form may be adopted in framing the charge:

> 'I (name and office of Magistrate, Sessions Judge etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, ...on or about the .....day of .....at..... being a public servant, ..., whose duty it was to prevent the commission of the offence of ....., with the intention of facilitating, or with the knowledge that you will thereby facilitate, the commission of the offence of ..... did (specify the act) or omitted to do ..... (specify the omission), to conceal the existence of the design to commit the said offence, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 119 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of.....)
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court (or the said Court) on the said charge.'

Legality of Charge under Section 409 , Indian Penal Code 1860 and Conviction under Section 119 , Indian Penal Code 1860

No person can be convicted of less an offence without a charge, unless it is a case falling under ss 221(2) or 222, CrPC . Even in cases, where a conviction without charge is permissible, it is necessary to guard against the question of prejudice, because the accused is entitled to know with certainty and accuracy, the exact nature of the charge of which he is going to be convicted. If the facts are such as to give the accused notice of the offence for which he is going to be convicted, though not charged with it, the question of prejudice may not arise; but the court should, in any event, satisfy itself that the accused was not misled in his defence. Sections 119 and 409, IPC are in different chapters of the Code. The ingredients of both the offences are not the same. A charge under Section 409, obviously, therefore, cannot cover any of the ingredients excepting the ingredient of being a public servant which by itself is not an offence. Such a case is not one contemplated by either Section 221(2) (s 237 old) or s 222 (s 238 old), CrPC . When the fact constituting an offence under s 119, IPC, were neither stated in the charge sheet nor was the accused, at any time, put on notice of the same. The charge under s 409 being disproved, the accused cannot be taken by surprise for an offence under this section, such a conviction without a charge is against the law.[71]

Concealing design to commit offence punishable with imprisonment.--

Whoever, intending to facilitate or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby facilitate the commission of an offence punishable with imprisonment, voluntarily conceals, by any act or illegal omission, the existence of a design to commit such offence, or makes any representation which he knows to be false respecting such design, if offence be commited--if offence be not committed.--shall, if the offence be committed, be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-fourth, and, if the offence be not committed, to one-eighth, of the longest term of such imprisonment, or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both.797

Comments

1. Scope

This section supplements the provisions of s 118 . That section applies to abetment by concealment of offences punishable with death or imprisonment for life, and this section applies the same rule to abetment by concealment of offences punishable with imprisonment. No such provision is made for offences punishable with fine only. Refer to commentary under s 118 .

Where specimen writings and specimen signatures of the accused charged under ss 120, 420, 468 of the IPC and s 5(1)(d) of Prevention of Corruption Act 1947 were taken by a magistrate who neither knew the accused personally nor got the accused person's identified before taking the specimen writings, the specimen writings and signatures so taken could not be said to be of the accused persons and their comparison with the disputed writings done by the expert would not connect the accused persons with the crime.[72]

2. Procedure

For arrest, warrant or summon, compounding and court in regard to offences under this section. (Refer to commentary under s 109, ante).

Where enquiry under ch 18 of the old CrPC was pending when new Code came into force, procedure is governed by the new Code and not by old Code, complaint under s 466 / 469 and s 120 IPC pending on the date of new Code must be proceeded with as a warrant case and not as a sessions inquiry.[73]

Bail

An offence under this section is bailable or non-bailable according as the offence abetted is bailable or non-bailable, if the offence be committed. It is bailable if the offence be not committed (refer to CrPC, Sch I).

3. Charge

The following form may be adopted in framing the charge.

Criminal Conspiracy

[22][S. 120A.

--Definition of criminal conspiracy.--

When two or more persons agree to do, or cause to be done,--

(1) an illegal act, or
(2) an act which is not illegal by illegal means, such an agreement is designated a criminal conspiracy:

*Provided*that no agreement except an agreement to commit an offence shall amount to a criminal conspiracy unless some act besides the agreement is done by one or more parties to such agreement in pursuance thereof.

Explanation.--It is immaterial whether the illegal act is the ultimate object of such agreement, or is merely incidental to that object.]805

Comments

1. Scope

The offence of criminal conspiracy under s 120A, IPC is a distinct offence introduced for the first time in 1913 in ch V-A of the IPC . The very agreement, concert or league is the ingredient of the offence.[23] It is not necessary that all the conspirators must know each and every detail of the conspiracy as long as they are co-participators in the main object of the conspiracy. There may be so many devices and techniques adopted to achieve the common goal of the conspiracy and there may be division of performance in the chain of actions with one object to achieve the real end of which every collaborator must be aware and in which each one of them must be interested. There must be unity of object or purpose but there may be plurality of means sometimes even unknown to one another, amongst the conspirators. In achieving the goal, several offences may be committed by some of the conspirators even unknown to the others. The only relevant factor is that all means adopted and illegal acts done must be and purported to be in furtherance of the object of the conspiracy even though there may be sometimes misfire or over-shooting by some of the conspirators. Even if some steps are resorted to by one or two of the conspirators without the knowledge of the others it will not affect the culpability of those others when they are associated with the object of the conspiracy.[24]

This section defines 'criminal conspiracy' and the next section prescribes the punishment for that offence. This section contemplates two classes of conspiracy. It defines criminal conspiracy as an agreement between two or more persons to do, or cause to be done: (a) an illegal act, or (b) an act which is not illegal by illegal means. Under s 43 of the IPC an act would be illegal, if it is an offence, or if it is prohibited by law or if it furnishes the ground for a civil action. One class of conspiracy, contemplated by this section, is that in which the agreement is to do, or cause to be done, an illegal act which is an offence. Such an agreement amounts to a criminal806 conspiracy even if there is no other act besides the agreement in pursuance thereof. The second class of conspiracy is that in which the act agreed to be done does not amount to an offence. In such a case the agreement to do the act does not amount to a criminal conspiracy unless some act besides the agreement is done by one or more of the parties to the agreement in pursuance thereof. The proviso to this section excludes the agreement to commit an offence from the category of such conspiracies in which it is necessary that the agreement should be followed by some act.[25]

It has been held that ss 120A and 120B appear to have been introduced to fill a gap in s 107, IPC, defining abetment. Under cl 'secondly' of s 107 a person abets the doing of a thing who engages with others in a conspiracy for the doing of that thing, if an act or illegal omission takes place in pursuance of that conspiracy. Abetment of an offence is punishable under s 109 or 114 as the case may be, if the offence is committed, or under ss 115 or 116, as the case may be, if the offence be not committed; but it is clear that a conspiracy will not amount to an abetment unless an act or illegal omission takes place in pursuance of the conspiracy. Thus, whereas s 120A provides an extended definition of criminal conspiracy covering acts which do not amount to abetment by conspiracy within the meaning of s 107, s 120B provides a punishment for 'criminal conspiracy' where no express provision is made in this Code for the punishment of such a conspiracy. Therefore, if the offence alleged to be the object of the conspiracy has been committed, the conspiracy amounts to an abetment under s 107 and it has been held that it is unnecessary to invoke the provisions of ss 120A and 120B because the Code has, in ss 109 and 114, made specific provision for the punishment of such conspiracy.[26] But there is no analogy between ss 120B and 109 . There may be an element of abetment in a conspiracy; but conspiracy is something more than an abetment. Offences created by ss 109 and 120B, IPC, are quite distinct and there is no warrant for limiting the prosecution to only one element of conspiracy, i.e., abetment, when the allegation is that what a person did was something over and above that. Where a number of offences are committed by several persons in pursuance of a conspiracy it is usual to charge them with those offence as well as with the offence of conspiracy to commit those offences.[27] One who commits an overt act with the knowledge of conspiracy is guilty. And one who tacitly consents to the object of a conspiracy and goes along with other conspirators, actually standing by while the others put the conspiracy into effect, is guilty though he intends to take no active part in the crime.[28]

The elements of a criminal conspiracy have been stated to be (a) an object to be accomplished, (b) a plan or scheme embodying means to accomplish the objects, (c) an agreement or understanding between two or more of the accused persons whereby, they become definitely committed to co-operate for the accomplishment of the object by the means embodied in the agreement, or by any effectual means, and (d) in the jurisdiction where the statute required an overt act.[29]807

2. It is a Substantive Offence

Criminal conspiracy is a substantive offence and has nothing to do with abetment.[30] It is a substantive offences in itself. It is not one of the offences which is an offence because of its relation to another offence, such as abetment, which would give the court jurisdiction either where the principal offence or the connected offence was committed, nor can it be brought within the meaning of s 180, CrPC .[31]

3. Constructive Liability

Commentary under same heading in s 34, ante, may be referred to.

4. Conspiracy and Offences Pursuant to it--Distinction to be made

In Ajay Aggarwal v Union of India ,[32] while discussing the question whether the conspiracy is a continuing offence, the following pertinent observations were made by K Ramaswamy, J speaking for the Bench at para 11:

> Conspiracy to commit a crime itself is punishable as a substantive offence and every individual offence committed pursuant to the conspiracy is separate and distinct offence to which individual offenders are liable to punishment, independent of the conspiracy. Thus, a distinction was maintained between the conspiracy and the offences committed pursuant to the conspiracy.[33]

5. Gist of the Offence

The gist of the offence of conspiracy lies not in doing that act or effecting the purpose for which the conspiracy is formed nor in attempting to do any of the acts, nor in inducing others to do them, but in the forming of the scheme of agreement between the parties.[34] The offence of a conspiracy to commit a crime is an offence different from the crime which is the object of the conspiracy, because the conspiracy precedes the commission of the crime and is complete before the crime is attempted or completed; equally the crime attempted or completed does not require the element of conspiracy as one of its ingredients. They are therefore, quite separate offences.[35] The gist of the offence is a bare agreement and association to break the law.[36] The offence of criminal conspiracy consists in the conspiracy without any reference to the subject-matter of the conspiracy.[37] It is correct to say that the gist of an offence of conspiracy, or more accurately, the gist of an offence under s 120A is the conspiracy808 or agreement between the accused persons. In other words, a mere agreement between two or more persons to do an illegal act, or an act which is not illegal by illegal means is itself a criminal conspiracy. But criminal conspiracy may come into existence, and may persist and will persist so long as the persons constituting the conspiracy remain in agreement and so long as they are acting in accord, in furtherance of the objects for which they entered into the agreement.[38] A conspiracy is not 'an act committed' which can be abetted.[39]

The essential ingredient of the offence of 'criminal conspiracy', defined in s 120A, IPC, is the agreement to commit an offence. In a case where the agreement is for accomplishment of an act which by itself constitutes an offence, then in that event, unless the statute so requires, no overt act is necessary to be proved by the prosecution because in such a fact-situation criminal conspiracy is established by proving such an agreement.[40]

The gist of the offence is an agreement to break the law. The parties to such an agreement will be guilty of criminal conspiracy, though the illegal act agreed to be done has not been done. So too, it is not an ingredient of the offence that all the parties should agree to do a single illegal act. It may comprise the commission of a number of acts.[41] The gist of the offence of conspiracy then lies, not in doing the act, or effecting the purpose for which the conspiracy is formed, nor in attempting to do them, nor in inciting others to do them, but in the forming of the scheme or agreement between the parties. Agreement is essential. Mere knowledge, or even discussion, of the plan is not, per se enough.[42]

The essence of criminal conspiracy is an agreement to do an illegal act and such an agreement can be proved either by direct evidence or by circumstantial evidence or by both, and it is a matter of common experience that direct evidence to prove conspiracy is rarely available. The circumstances proved before and after the occurrence have to be considered to decide about the complicity of the accused.[43]

6. Essence of Criminal Conspiracy

The essence of a criminal conspiracy is the unlawful combination and ordinarily the offence is complete when the combination is framed. From this, it necessarily follows that unless the statute so requires, no overt act need be done in furtherance of the conspiracy, and that the object of the combination need not be accomplished, in order to constitute an indictable offence. Encouragement and support which co-conspirators give to one another, rendering enterprise possible, which, if left to individual effort, would have been impossible; furnish the ground for visiting conspirators and abettors with condign punishment. The conspiracy is held to be809 continued and renewed as to all its members wherever and whenever any member of the conspiracy acts in furtherance of the common design.[44]

The offence of conspiracy created under s 120A is bare agreement to commit an offence. It has been made punishable under s 120B . The offence of abetment created under the second clause of s 107 requires that there must be something more than mere conspiracy. There must be some act or illegal omission in pursuance of that conspiracy; that would be evident by s 107 (secondly), 'engages in any conspiracy for the doing of that thing, if an act or omission took place in pursuance of that conspiracy'.[45]

7. Section Not Retrospective in Operation

Sections 120A and 120B did not find a place in the IPC before the 27 March 1913, when the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1913, which inserted them in the IPC, became law. The sections have no retrospective effect and a conviction under s 120B cannot stand if the offence was committed before that section came into force, though the accused may be convicted of abetment under s 109 .[46]

Conspiracy Distinguished from Other Offences

Conspiracy differs from other charges in this respect that in other charges, the intention to do a criminal act is not by itself a crime until something is done amounting to the doing or attempting to do some act, to carry out that intention; conspiracy, on the other hand, consists simply in the agreement or confederacy to do some act, no matter whether or not it is done.[47] It is true that the law does not take notice of the intention or the state of mind of the offender and there must be some overt act too under s 120B, consisting the agreement of the parties. The definition of criminal conspiracy in this section excludes the agreement to commit an offence from the category of such conspiracies in which it is necessary that the agreement should be followed by some act.[48]

8. Theory of Agency

The offence cannot be spelt out by applying the principle of agency if the statute does not say so.[49] The theory of agency cannot be extended thus far, that is to say, to find all the conspirators guilty of the actual offences committed in execution of the common design even if such offences were ultimately committed by some of them, without the participation of others. Those who committed the offences pursuant to the conspiracy by indulging in various overt acts will be individually liable for those offences in addition to being liable for criminal conspiracy; but, the non-participant conspirators cannot be found guilty of the offence or offences committed by the other810 conspirators. There is hardly any scope for the application of the principle of agency in order to find the conspirators guilty of a substantive offence not committed by them. Criminal offences and punishments therefor are governed by statute. The offender will be liable only if he comes within the plain terms of the penal statute. Criminal liability for an offence cannot be fastened by way of analogy or by extension of a common law principle.[50]

9. Sections 120A and 34 Distinguished

In the case of s 34, IPC, the constructive liability for the crime is specifically fastened on each of those who participate in the crime in furtherance of the common intention. But s 120B does not convey that idea.[51]

There is not much substantial difference between conspiracy as defined in this section, and acting on a common intention as contemplated in s 34 . In the former case, the gist of the offence is the bare engagement and association to break the law even though the illegal act does not follow; the gist of the offence under s 34, IPC, is the commission of a criminal act in furtherance of a common intention of all the offenders which means that there should be a unity of criminal behaviour resulting in something for which an individual would be punishable as if it were all done by himself alone.[52]Section 34 only enunciates a principle of liability. It is not an offence in itself; on the other hand, criminal conspiracy is, by itself, a substantive offence.[53]Section 34 requires not only common intention, but also participation in the crime; when a specific offence is committed by some of the conspirators in pursuance of the conspiracy, the common intention of all would not be enough to fasten the guilt on all of them. It is only those who had actually participated in the crime that would be held responsible for its commission.[54]

Distinction Between Sections 34, 120A and 120B

Commentary under same heading in s 34, ante, may be referred to.

10. Sections 34, 120A and 149 Read Together

Commentary under s 34, ante, may be referred to.

11. Section 120A of the IPC and Section 10 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872

The essence of conspiring is that there should be an agreement between persons to do one or the other of the acts described in s 120A . It can be established by direct evidence or by circumstantial evidence. But, s 10 of the Evidence Act introduces the doctrine of agency and if the conditions laid down therein are satisfied, the act done by one is admissible against the co-conspirators. Section 10 of the Evidence Act, as the opening words show, will come into play only when the court is satisfied that811 there is reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons have conspired together to commit an offence or an actionable wrong, that is to say, there should be primafacie evidence that a person was a party to the conspiracy before his acts can be used against the co-conspirators.[55]

12. Effect of Termination of Conspiracy--Joinder and Splitting of a Conspiracy

It has been said that a criminal conspiracy is a partnership in crime and that there is in each conspiracy a joint or mutual agency for the prosecution of a common plan. Thus, if two a more persons enter into a conspiracy, any act done by any of them pursuant to the agreement is, in contemplation of law, the act of each of them and they are jointly responsible therefor. This means that everything said, written or done by any of the conspirators in execution or furtherance of the common purpose is deemed to have been said, done or written by each of them. And this joint responsibility extends not only to what is done by any of the conspirators pursuant to the original agreement but also to collateral acts incidental to and growing out of the original purpose. A conspirator is not responsible, however, for acts done by co-conspirators after termination of the conspiracy. The joinder of a conspiracy by a new member does not create a new conspiracy nor does it change the status of the other conspirators, and the mere fact that conspirators individually or in groups perform different tasks to a common end does not split up a conspiracy into several different conspiracies.[56]

13. Distinction between Criminal Conspiracy and Abetment by Conspiracy

In order to constitute the offence of abetment by conspiracy, first, there must be a combining of two or more persons in the conspiracy; secondly, an act or illegal omission must take place in pursuance of that conspiracy and in order to do the doing of that thing. It is not necessary that the abettor should concert the offence with the person who commits it. It is sufficient if he engages in the conspiracy in pursuance of which the offence is committed. It is worthy of note that a mere conspiracy or a combination of persons for the doing of a thing does not amount to an abetment. Something more is necessary, namely, an act or illegal omission must take place in pursuance of the conspiracy and in order to do the doing of the thing for which the conspiracy was made. The gist of the offence of criminal conspiracy is in the agreement to do an illegal act or an act, which is not illegal, by illegal means. When the agreement is to commit an offence, the agreement itself becomes the offence of criminal conspiracy. Where, however, the agreement is to do an illegal act which is not an offence or an act which is not illegal, by illegal means, some act, besides the agreement, is necessary. Therefore, the distinction between abetment by conspiracy and criminal conspiracy, so far as the agreement to commit an offence is concerned, lies in this, that, for abetment by conspiracy, mere agreement is not enough. An act or illegal omission must take place in pursuance of the conspiracy and in order to the812 doing of the thing conspired for. But in the offence of criminal conspiracy, the very agreement or plot is an act in itself and is the gist of the offence.[57]

The gist of the offence of criminal conspiracy created under s 120A, IPC is a bare agreement to commit an offence. It has been made punishable under s 120B, IPC . The offence of abetment created under the second clause of s 107 requires that there must be something more than a mere conspiracy. There must be some act or illegal omission in pursuance of that conspiracy. That would be evident by the wordings of s 107, 'Secondly', 'engages in any conspiracy...for the doing of that thing, if an act or illegal omission takes place in pursuance of that conspiracy...'. The punishments for these two categories of crimes are also quite different. Section 109 , IPC, is concerned only with the punishment of abetments for which no express provision is made under the IPC . A charge under s

109 should, therefore, be along with some other substantive offence committed in consequence of abetment. The offence of criminal conspiracy is, on the other hand, an independent offence. It is made punishable under s 120B for which a charge under s 109, IPC is unnecessary and indeed inappropriate.[58] A conspiracy is not 'an act committed' which can be abetted.[59]

So far as abetment by conspiracy is concerned, the abettor will be liable to punishment under varying circumstances detailed in ss 106-17 . It is unnecessary to detail those circumstances for the present case. For the offence of criminal conspiracy it is punishable under s 120B .[60] There is no analogy between ss 120B and 109, IPC . There may be an element of abetment in a conspiracy; but conspiracy is something more than an abetment. Offences created by ss 109 and 120B, IPC, are quite distinct and there is no warrant for limiting the prosecution to only one element of conspiracy, i.e., abetment when the allegation is that what a person did was something over and above that. Where a number of offences are committed by several persons in pursuance of a conspiracy, it is usual to charge them with those offences as well as with the offence of conspiracy to commit those offences.[61]

14. Summoning Additional Accused\Conspirators During Trial

Where the charges against existing accused persons were that they entered into criminal conspiracy and created a forged and fabricated document, on the basis of examination of witnesses, the additional accused persons were summoned by taking recourse to s 319, CrPC, on these facts it was held that the order cannot be set aside in appeal on the ground that the witnesses had not made it clear as to what role those additional accused persons had played in creating forged documents; at that stage only a *prima fa*cie case has to be formed and detailed examination of allegations was not called for.[62]813

15. Ingredients of Criminal Conspiracy

The ingredients of the offence of conspiracy are:

(i) there should be an agreement between the persons who are alleged to conspire;
(ii) the agreement should be--(a) for doing an illegal act, or (b) for doing by illegal means, an act, which may not itself be illegal;
(iii) in cases, other than an agreement to commit an offence, the agreement must be followed by an overt act.[63]

The ingredients of the offence of criminal conspiracy are that there should be an agreement between the persons who are alleged to conspire and the said agreement should be for doing an illegal act or for doing by illegal means an act which by itself may not be illegal.[64]

So long as such a decision rests in intention only, it is not indictable.[65]

Criminal conspiracy would not be inferred from the mere fact that there were official discussions between officers of the Government, Chief Minister, Minister and Representatives of Management which were unheard. A wrong or incorrect decision or poor management by iteslf would not be said to be the product of criminal conspiracy [66]

Single Conspiracy Distinguished from a Number of Unrelated Conspiracies

A general conspiracy is to be distinguished from a number of separate conspiracies having a similar general purpose. In order to constitute a single general conspiracy, there must be a common design and common intention of all to work in furtherance of the common design. Each conspirator plays his separate part in one integrated and united effort to achieve the common purpose. Each one is aware that he has a part to play in the general conspiracy though he may not know all its secrets or the means by which the common purpose is to be accomplished. The evil scheme may be promoted by a few; some may drop out and some may join at a later stage, but the conspiracy continues until it is broken up. The conspiracy may develop in successive stages. There may be a general plan to accomplish the common design by such means as may, from time to time, be found to be expedient. New techniques may be invented and new means may be devised for advancement of the common plan.[67] But where different groups of persons co-operate towards their separate ends without any unity with each other, each combination constitutes a separate conspiracy. The common intention of the conspirators, then, is to work for the furtherance of the common design of his group only.[68] Where the charge, as framed, discloses one single conspiracy, although spread over several years, there is only one object of the conspiracy, i.e., to cheat members of the public, and the fact, that, in the course of years others joined the conspiracy or that several incidents of cheating took place in814 pursuance of the conspiracy, does not change the conspiracy and does not split up a single conspiracy into several conspiracies.[69]

The definition of criminal conspiracy under this section postulates an agreement to do an illegal act, or a legal act by illegal means. The essence of the offence of conspiracy is the bare agreement and association to break the law,[70] or to do an illegal act.[71] The generally accepted definition of the offence is that as given in Mulcahy v R ,[72] and accepted by the House of Lords in that[73] and subsequent cases:[74]

> A conspiracy consists not merely in the intention of two or more but in the agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act, or to do a lawful act by unlawful means. So long as such a design rests in intention only it is not indictable. When two agree to carry it into effect, the very plot is an act in itself, and the act of each of the parties, promise against promise, actus contra actum, capable of being enforced if lawful, punishable if for a criminal object or for the use of criminal means.

The meeting of minds of two or more persons for doing an illegal act or an act by illegal means is sine qua non of the criminal conspiracy but it may not be possible to prove the agreement between them by direct proof. Nevertheless, existence of the conspiracy and its objective can be inferred from the surrounding circumstances and the conduct of the accused. But the incriminating circumstances must form a chain of events from which a conclusion about the guilt of the accused could be drawn. An offence of conspiracy is a substantive offence and renders the mere agreement to commit an offence punishable even if an offence does not take place pursuant to the illegal agreement.[75]

For the charge under s 120B to be proved, an agreement between two or more persons to do or cause to do an illegal act which is not illegal by illegal means, must be established. From the mere fact that the deceased was seen at the police station it cannot be held that he was brought at the police station in pursuance of some criminal conspiracy entered into between the accused No. 1 and accused No. 2 Police officers.[76]

Physical Manifestation of Agreement is Essential

It is essential that the offence of conspiracy requires some kind of physical manifestation of agreement. The express agreement, however, need not be proved815 nor is it necessary to prove the actual words of communication. The evidence as to transmission of thoughts sharing the unlawful design may be sufficient.[77]

17. Conspiracy Comes into being the Moment the Agreement is Reached

To make out an offence of criminal conspiracy, it is not sufficient to establish that a number of persons had a common intention to commit an act opposed to, or forbidden by the law; it has further to be proved that they 'agreed' to commit the relevant act. The agreement is the gist of the offence. Conspiracy comes into being just the moment the agreement to commit the crucial act is reached and it continues to exist so long as the object, for which the association was formed, continues in the process of fulfillment as per the agreement.[78]

Agreement is the Base of the Offence of Conspiracy

The offence of criminal conspiracy consists in the 'combining'. So long as such a design rests in intention, it is not indictable. When two or more persons agree to carry it into effect, the very plot is an act in itself. The offence is, therefore, complete though no further act is done in pursuance of the agreement or even where the parties do not settle the means to be employed.[79] The 'agreement' is the rock-bottom of the offence of criminal conspiracy under this section and unless it is shown that the several accused persons had agreed either to do an illegal act or an act, which is not illegal, by illegal means, no charge of criminal conspiracy can succeed.[80]

Legality of Means--Agreement may Comprise a Number of Illegal Acts

The same is the law in India.[81] The offence of criminal conspiracy is a highly technical one and the essential ingredient is the agreement to commit an offence, irrespective of the means decided upon to carry out the object of the conspiracy. Whether those means are legal or innocuous would not affect the question of criminality.[82] As pointed out in Barindra Kumar Ghose v Emperor ,[83] although there must be agreement there need not be proof of direct meeting or combination; the agreement may be inferred from circumstances raising a presumption of a concerted plan to carry out the unlawful design;[84] it may also be inferred from acts and conduct of parties.[85] There must be unity of will and purpose amongst all the conspirators. It is necessary that there should be one conspiracy and not a series of conspiracies and816 criminal acts unconnected by unity of intention.[86] Persons must know what the conspiracy is about, otherwise they cannot be said to have conspired.[87] Where the object of the agreement is to do an unlawful act, and not to do a lawful act, by an unlawful means, it is sufficient to specify the unlawful object without specifying the means adopted by all or any of the conspirators to gain that object.[88] Privacy and secrecy are more characteristics of a conspiracy than a loud discussion in an elevated place open to public view, in the garden of a stranger.[89] It is not necessary that the agreement of conspiracy should be confined to the commission of only a single act; it may comprise the commission of a number of illegal acts.[90]

Agreement need not be Formal or Express but may be Inherent in and Inferred from the Circumstances

It is the unlawful agreement and not its accomplishment, which is the gist or essence of the crime of conspiracy. Offence of criminal conspiracy is complete even though there is no agreement as to the means by which the purpose is to be accomplished. It is the unlawful agreement which is the gravamen of the crime of conspiracy. The unlawful agreement which amounts to a conspiracy need not be formal or express, but may be inherent in and inferred from the circumstances, especially declarations, acts and conduct of the conspirators. The agreement need not be entered into by all the parties to it at the same time, but may be reached by successive actions evidencing their joining of the conspiracy.[91]

All Conspirators need not Know Every Detail--There must be Unity of Object or Purpose

In Yashpal v State of Punjab ,[92] their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed:

> The very agreement, concert of league is the ingredient of the offence. It is not necessary that all the conspirators must know each and every detail of the conspiracy as long as they are co-participators in the main object of the conspiracy. There may be so many devices and techniques adopted to achieve the common goal of the conspiracy and there may be division of performances in the chain of actions with one object to > achieve the real end of which every collaborator must be aware and in which each one of them must be interested. There must be unity of object or purpose but there may be plurality of means sometimes even unknown to one another, amongst the conspirators. In achieving the goal, several offences may be committed by some of the conspirators even unknown to the other. The only relevant factor is that all means adopted and illegal acts done must be and purported to be in furtherance of the object of conspiracy; even though there may be sometimes misfire or overshooting by some of the conspirators without the knowledge of the others, it will not affect the culpability of those others when they are associated with the object of the conspiracy.[93]817

The essence of conspiracy is, that there should be an agreement between persons to do one or the other of the acts described in the section.[94]

18. Two or More Persons

When two or more person agree to commit a crime of conspiracy, then regardless of making or considering any plans for its commission, and despite the fact that no step is taken by any such person to carry out their common purpose, a crime is committed by each and everyone who joins in the agreement. There has thus to be two conspirators and there may be more than that.[95] By the terms of the definition itself, there ought to be two or more persons who must be parties to such an agreement and it is trite to say that one person alone can never be held guilty of criminal conspiracy for the simple reason that one cannot conspire with oneself. It has, therefore, been held that if four named individuals are charged with having committed the offence of criminal conspiracy and three of them are acquitted, the fourth one alone cannot be held guilty of the offence of criminal conspiracy.[96] This holds good in a case where the only persons, alleged to have been guilty of the offence of conspiracy, were the persons placed on trial and there was no allegation, nor any evidence forthcoming, that any other persons were, though not placed on trial, concerned with the crime. But where the charge alleges, or there is evidence forthcoming, that other persons, though not named in the charge and placed on trial were concerned with the conspiracy, there can be no objection to one accused only being convicted. It is not essential that more than one person should be convicted of the offence of criminal conspiracy. It is enough if the court is in a position to find that two or more persons were actually concerned in the criminal conspiracy.[97]Section 212, CrPC, which requires the particulars of the offence to be stated, does not in terms further require that in an offence like conspiracy the names of the co-conspirators should also be mentioned. Any defect in not mentioning the names of the conspirators not placed on trial can be cured under ss 215, 464 and 465, CrPC .[98] Where, therefore, on the findings of the courts below, apart from the persons placed on trial, there was the approver also who implicated himself equally with the other accused persons and a number of other prosecution witnesses as having been privy to the conspiracy, it was held that the conviction of one of the accused only was not illegal.[99]818

19. Every Conspirator need not be Capable

It is not necessary that everyone of the persons, agreeing to do the illegal act or acts, should be capable, in law, of committing an offence in respect of that act.[1]It may be specified in a charge that a certain act has been committed which could not possibly be committed by one of the alleged conspirators; nevertheless such conspirator may be guilty of that conspiracy in the course of which such act was committed.[2]It is not an ingredient of the offence of criminal conspiracy that all the parties should agree to do a single illegal act. It may comprise the commission of a number of acts.[3] Where, however, several persons are charged with the same conspiracy, the prosecution must prove that there is one large conspiracy involving all the persons charged and not a number of unrelated conspiracies entered into by different groups of the accused. Unity of will and purpose amongst all the accused must be proved; and an accused not shown to be a member of a large conspiracy is entitled to acquittal, however bad his record may be and, however, much he may be suspected of this or that offence.[4]

In order to constitute the offence of conspiracy as defined in this section it is only necessary for the prosecution to show that the persons concerned had agreed to do or cause to be done an illegal act or an act which is not illegal, by illegal means, and it is immaterial whether the illegal act is the ultimate object of such agreement or is merely incidental to the object.

Where it cannot be said, except by straining the language, that everyone of the accuseds was in agreement to do the same illegal act or cause the same illegal act to be done, they cannot be held to have been parties to one and the same conspiracy within the meaning of this section.[5]

A Conspiracy may be Spread Over Several Years

Where the charge, as framed, discloses one single conspiracy, although spread over several years, there is only one object of the conspiracy, and that is to cheat members of the public, the fact that in the course of years others joined the conspiracy or that several incidents of cheating took place in pursuance of the conspiracy, does not change the conspiracy and does not split up a single conspiracy into several conspiracies.[6]

20. Different Persons may enter the Conspiracy at Different Stages

It is true that a mere agreement may bring the conspiracy into existence but the IPC does not say that thereafter the offence no longer exists. Criminal conspiracy may come into existence, and may and will persist so long as the persons constituting the same remain in agreement, and so long as they are acting in accord, in furtherance of the objects for which they entered into the agreement.[7] It is not by any means819 necessary that each conspirator should be aware of all the acts done by each of the conspirators in the course of the conspiracy. His offence is the conspiracy. The acts done by any of the conspirators in furtherance of the purpose of the conspiracy are merely indication of what the object of the conspiracy was. What is necessary, however, is that there should be one conspiracy and not a series of conspiracies and criminal acts unconnected by unity of intention. It is quite possible that there may be a band of conspirators working for a common criminal end, and for the purpose of that conspiracy, they may find it necessary to procure the doing of unlawful acts by persons, who are not members of the conspiracy. In that case, if the persons so seduced into unlawful acts are not aware of the conspiracy, the fact that they do unlawful acts, does not make them members.[8] It is the object which the court has to consider when deciding the question of conspiracy and its members. Different persons may enter a conspiracy at different stages and persons joining the conspiracy can properly be convicted of that conspiracy so long as the object of the conspiracy exists.[9] Each conspirator must be aware of the object of the conspiracy,[10] but it is not the law that every conspirator must be present at every stage of the conspiracy. If the conspirator concerned had agreed to the common design and had not resiled from that agreement, it can be presumed that he continued to be a party to the conspiracy.[11]

A Conspirator can Join and Leave the Conspiracy at any Stage but Still Would be Liable

A conspirator can join the conspiracy at any stage and similarly leave it at any stage and will still be liable for the acts of the other conspirators. Where it was not in dispute that when the contract was awarded, the accused was one of the parties to the decision taken by the conspirators, the plea of the accused that he retired from services and cannot be made liable for the subsequent acts of the other conspirators would not be tenable.[12]

Conspirators may be Enrolled in Chain

Conspirators may, eg, be enrolled in chain, A enrolling B, B enrolling C and so on and all will be members of a single conspiracy if they so intend and agree, even though each member knows only the person who enrolled him and the person whom he enrolls. There may be a kind of umbrella-spoke enrolment, where a single person at the centre doing the enrolling and all the other members being unknown to each other though they know that there are to be other members.[13]

The Conspirators may not know each other

Persons may be members of a single conspiracy even though each is ignorant of the identity of many others who may have diverse roles to play. It is not a part of the crime of conspiracy that all the conspirators need to agree to play the same or an active role.[14]820

Conspirators Not Liable for Acts after Termination of Conspiracy

Once the object of conspiracy has been achieved, any subsequent act which may be unlawful, would not make the accused a part of the conspiracy, like giving shelter to an absconder.[15] A conspirator is not responsible, however, for acts done by a co-conspirator after termination of the conspiracy.[16]

21. Illegal Act--There can be no Conspiracy if the Act is not Illegal

Under s 43 of the IPC an act would be illegal, among other things, if it is an offence or if it is prohibited by law.[17]So to sustain a charge of conspiracy to do an illegal act, the prosecution must allege and prove the committing of an illegal act by the conspirators. If the act alleged is not illegal, the question of conspiracy becomes irrelevant.[18] Conspiracy differs from other charges in this respect. In other charges, the intention to do a criminal act is not a crime itself, until something is done amounting to the doing or attempting to do some act, to carry out that intention; conspiracy, on the other hand, consists simply in the agreement or confederacy to do some act, no matter whether or not it is done.[19]

Where an accused was aware of the fact that a large amount of jewellery had been handed over to another accused in order that he might deposit it for safe custody in a bank and also of the fact that the latter had pawned the jewellery and kept the proceeds, but he did not inform the person, whose property had been misappropriated, of the fact, but told her deliberate untruths upon the subject, it was held that both the accused were engaged in a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence under s 409 .[20]

If the conspiracy is merely to do an act which is not illegal, though in the hope and belief that that act may result in the death of, or injury to, some persons, that does not amount to a conspiracy to do an illegal act, e.g., if A and B agree that they will induce 'Y' to point his finger at X, believing that 'Y' is endowed with some special power which will enable him to kill by so doing, there is no agreement to do an illegal act and no conspiracy to commit an offence.[21]

22. 'Explanation'

The definition of conspiracy as given in this section makes it amply clear thateither the very act agreed to be done by the conspirators be illegal or if it is not illegal, it should be agreed to be done by illegal means. Therefore every conspiracy involves an element of illegality or illegal act. Under the Explanation to this section, it is immaterial whether the illegal act is the ultimate object of the agreement or is merely incidental to it.821

23. 'By Illegal Means'

Obtaining credit without means to pay, though not criminal, is unlawful. It has been held that it is criminal to conspire to enable a person to get goods on credit by means of a false certificate, knowing that he did not intend to pay for them.[22]

24. Mere Suspicion of Motive is not Sufficient to Frame Charges

Mere suspicion of motive is not sufficient to frame charges against the accused. There should be some reasonable ground to believe that the person has taken part in the conspiracy or in other words reasonable likelihood of participation. There should be something to connect the accused with the crime.[23] Where there was no prima facie evidence that the signature was made by the accused in reference to the common design of the conspirator and also no knowledge of the conspiracy was attributed to the accused, order framing charge of conspiracy against the accused was not proper.[24]

25. Proof

There is no difference between the mode of proof of the offence of conspiracy and that of any other offence. It can be established by direct evidence or by circumstantial evidence.[25] The essence of criminal conspiracy is an agreement to do an illegal act and such an agreement can be proved either by direct evidence or by circumstantial evidence or by both and it is a matter of common experience that direct evidence to prove conspiracy is rarely available.[26]To establish a charge of criminal conspiracy, the prosecution must prove an agreement between two or more persons to do or cause to be done some illegal act or some act, which is not illegal, by illegal means provided that where the agreement is other than one to commit an offence the prosecution must go further and prove that some act, besides the agreement, was done, by one or more of the parties, in pursuance of it. Where the agreement, therefore, is one to do or cause to be done an act which is itself an offence, no overt act, i.e., any act done, by one of the parties to the agreement, in pursuance of it, need be proved; the crime of criminal conspiracy is established once such an agreement is proved.[27]Agreement between two or more persons for committing an illegal act is sufficient and thereafter, it becomes immaterial as to whether the offence has been committed or not. The agreement arrived at for violating the law is an essential ingredient to hatch the criminal conspiracy.[28]

822The gist of the offence is an agreement to break the law. The parties to such an agreement will be guilty of criminal conspiracy, though the illegal act agreed to be done has not been done.[29]

A person may be guilty of criminal conspiracy even though the illegal act which he has agreed to do or caused to be done, has not been done.[30] But the mere exhortation to take to the Naxalite method, without anything more, would not satisfy the requirements of this section.[31] If no common interest between the two accused is found to exist, it cannot be concluded that they were deriving profits out of the criminal conspiracy.[32] Where the agreement is to commit an offence, the offence of criminal conspiracy consists in the very agreement between two or more persons to commit a criminal offence irrespective of the further consideration whether or not those offences have actually been committed. The very fact of the conspiracy constitutes the offence and it is immaterial whether anything has been done in pursuance of the unlawful agreement,[33] as pointed in Mulcahy v R [34] :'When two persons agree to carry it into effect, the very plot is an act in itself, and the act of each of the parties, promise against promise, actus contra actum, capable of being enforced, if lawful, punishable, if for a criminal object of for the use of criminal means.'[35] Where the conspiracy alleged is one to commit a series of crimes, mere proof of such an agreement between the accused is sufficient to sustain a conviction and no overt act need be proved. Proof of overt acts is not necessary, but if some of them were concerned in the overt acts that would go a long way to establish that the agreement was in fact made by them.

Prosecution case was that the deceased had a love affair with the sister of the appellant. The appellant and his family members hatched a conspiracy to murder the deceased when they came to know about the marriage of the deceased with some other girl. There was no direct evidence, thus, the mother, sister, father and other co-accused were discharged. Held, the appellant was also entitled to be discharged and was discharged.[36]

Where the prosecutrix did not name the co-accused persons, in the absence of any other evidence of criminal conspiracy, the co-accused were acquitted of the charge under ss 376 / 120B .[37]

26. Where some overt Act is Necessary

Where, however, the agreement is not to commit an offence but to commit an illegal act, or an act, which is not illegal, by illegal means, it does not amount to criminal823 conspiracy unless some act besides the agreement, is done by one or more parties to the agreement in pursuance thereof.[38]

Once a conspiracy to commit an illegal act is proved, act of one conspirator becomes the act of another.[39] There must be meeting of minds conspirators to commit the offence. The conspiracy can be inferred even from circumstances giving rise to exclusive or irresistible inference of an agreement between two or more persons to commit an offence.[40]

27. Inference from Circumstantial Evidence

Mostly, conspiracies are proved by circumstantial evidence, as a conspiracy is seldom an open affair. Usually both the existence of the conspiracy and its objects have to be inferred from the circumstances and the conduct of the accused.[41] The well-known rule governing circumstantial evidence is that each and every incriminating circumstance must be clearly established by reliable evidence and 'the circumstances proved must form a chain of events from which the only irresistible conclusion about the guilt of the accused can be safely drawn and no other hypothesis against the guilt is possible'. Justice GN Ray J, in Tanviben Pankajkumar Divetia v State of Gujarat ,[42] observed that this court should not allow the suspicion to take the place of legal proof.

As pointed out by Fazal Ali J, in VC Shukla v State ,[43] 'in most cases it will be difficult to get direct evidence of the agreement, but a conspiracy can be inferred even from circumstances giving rise to a conclusive or irresistible inference of an agreement between two or more persons to commit an offence'. In this context, the observations in the case Noor Mohammad Yusuf Momin v State of Maharashtra [44] are worth noting: '...in most cases proof of conspiracy is largely inferential though the inference must be founded on solid facts. Surrounding circumstances and antecedent and subsequent conduct, among other factors, constitute relevant material'.

Conspiracy is a matter of inference deducted from certain criminal acts of the accused done in pursuance of the apparent criminal purpose in common between them. The fact that some members of conspiracy are not members from the start but joined the conspiracy only later does not make them any less liable to conviction. In a conspiracy persons are often required to do various acts at various stages, and if some of the accused come in only at a later stage, it cannot be said that they are not members of conspiracy. They are members thereof, provided their act is calculated to promote the object of the conspiracy. It can be inferred from the circumstances proved.[45]

824A few bits here and a few bits there on which the prosecution relies cannot be held to be adequate for connecting the accused in the offence of criminal conspiracy. The circumstances before, during and after the occurrence can be proved to decide about the complicity of the accused.[46]

Lord Bridge, in R v Anderson ,[47] aptly stated that the evidence from which a jury may infer a criminal conspiracy is almost invariably to be found in the conduct of the parties. In Daniel Youth v King ,[48] the Privy Council warned that in a joint trial care must be taken to separate the admissible evidence against each accused and the judicial mind should not be allowed to be influenced by evidence admissible only against others. 'A co-defendant in a conspiracy trial', observed Jackson, J, 'occupies an uneasy seat' and 'it is difficult for the individual to make his own case stand on its own merits in the minds of jurors who are ready to believe that birds of a feather are flocked together'.[49]

Cumulative Effect of Proved Circumstances

One more principle which deserves notice is that cumulative effect of the proved circumstances should be taken into account in determining the guilt of the accused rather than adopting an isolated approach to each of the circumstances.[50] The circumstances proved before, during and after the occurrence have to be considered to decide the complicity of the accused. But if those circumstances are compatible also with the innocence of the accused person, then it cannot be held that the prosecution had successfully established its case. Even if, some acts are proved to have been committed it must be clear that they were so committed in pursuance of an agreement made between the accused who were parties to the alleged conspiracy. Inference from such proved circumstances regarding the guilt may be drawn only when such circumstances are incapable of any other reasonable explanation.[51]

28. Advocate on Bank Panel--Submitted False Legal Opinion on House Loans

An advocate on panel of bank giving legal opinion in loan cases cannot be mulcted with criminal prosecution unless evidence shows conspiracy between him and the conspirators accused. The liability against an opining advocate arises only when the lawyer was an active participant in a plan to defraud the Bank. In the present case, there was no such evidence. Charges framed against the accused advocate under ss 120B, 420, 467 etc. of the IPC were quashed.[52]825

29. Concurrent Findings by Courts below--No Interference by Supreme Court

Where the entire gist in a case of conspiracy is the agreement to commit the offence, all the three courts below have examined the material on record and, particularly, taking into consideration that sixteen applicants did not receive the loans in the manner alleged by the accused, took the view that the offence of conspiracy is made out, the Apex Court declined to interfere with the concurrent findings arrived at by the courts below.[53]

Chapter VA

Criminal Conspiracy

[54][S. 120B.

Punishment of criminal conspiracy.--

(1) Whoever is a party to a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence punishable with death, [55][imprisonment for life] or rigorous imprisonment for a term of two years or upwards, shall, where no express provision is made in this Code for the punishment of such a conspiracy, be punished in the same manner as if he had abetted such offence.

(2) Whoever is a party to a criminal conspiracy other than a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence punishable as aforesaid shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding six months, or with fine or with both.]826

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

Sections 120A and 120B of the IPC have brought the law of conspiracy in India in line with the English law by making the overt act unessential when the conspiracy is to commit any punishable offence. The most important ingredient of the offence of conspiracy is the agreement between two or more persons to do an illegal act. The illegal act may or may not be done in pursuance of the agreement, but the very agreement is an offence and is punishable.[56]Resorting to s 120B of the Penal Code is permissible only when there is a conspiracy to commit an offence, but the offence is not actually committed, or, when there is conspiracy to do an illegal act, which itself827 is not an offence.[57] It is not illegal to try accused persons on a charge of conspiracy to commit an offence even if the substantive offence has been committed.[58]

Conspiracy is the substance of offence.[59] This section provides for the punishment of 'criminal conspiracy' as defined in the previous section.[60] Sub-section (1) imposes a penalty equal to the punishment for abetment, on participation in a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence punishable with death, imprisonment for life, or rigorous imprisonment for a term of two years or upwards, in case no express provision is made in the IPC for the punishment of such a conspiracy. Sub-section (2) imposes a lighter penalty in the case of a criminal conspiracy not covered by sub-s (1). Thus, for the purposes of punishment the section contemplates two classes of criminal conspiracies, viz, the first, in which the conspiracy is formed for the commission of a serious offence but no act or illegal omission has taken place in pursuance of it; and the second in which the conspiracy is formed in order to do an illegal act or an act which is not illegal, by illegal means; this sort of conspiracy, in no case amounts to abetment and does not amount to a criminal conspiracy unless some act besides the agreement is done in pursuance thereof.[61]

If a matter has gone beyond the stage of mere conspiracy and offences have actually been committed in pursuance thereof, a conviction, also under this section, for conspiracy simpliciter is unnecessary.[62] When an accused is convicted and sentenced for composite charge under s 120B read with some other offences no separate sentence is called for those offences.[63] The section will have no application even when there is no offence which is punishable under the various sections of this IPC .[64] The section would apply to those who are members of the conspiracy during its continuance. The emphasis is on the words 'is party'. It is not that the agreement as such that is punishable. Conspiracy is intended to be tried as continuing offence and whoever is a party to conspiracy during the period for which he is charged, is liable under this section.[65] So long as its performance continues, it is a continuing offence till it is executed or rescinded or frustrated by choice as necessity.[66] The section will have no application even when there is no offence which is punishable under the various sections of this Code.[67]

Offence created by ss 109 and 120B are distinct offences. Where a number of offences are committed by several persons in pursuance of a conspiracy, it is not illegal to charge them with those offences as well as with the offence of conspiracy to commit those offences. Cases in which a different view was taken, will, in view of828 the Supreme Court decision in State of Andhra Pradesh v Kandimalla Subbaiah ,[68] no longer be good law.[69] Referring to the observations of Finnemore J, in R v Dawson ,[70] their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed in State of Andhra Pradesh v Kandimalla Subbaiah :[71]

> We agree that it is not desirable to charge the accused persons with conspiracy with the ulterior object of letting in evidence which would otherwise be inadmissible, and that it is undesirable to complicate a trial by introducing a large number of charges spread over a long period. But then this is only a question of propriety and it should be left to the Judge or the magistrate trying the case to adopt the course which he thinks to be appropriate in the facts and circumstances of the case. It cannot be said as a matter of law that such a trial is prohibited by the CrPC .

This decision has been cited with approval in Pramatha Nath Talukdar v Saroj Ranjan Sarkar .[72] Where the offence has been actually committed, it would be more appropriate to proceed for the trial of the principal offence and abetment thereof rather than with the offence of criminal conspiracy. In such a case, even if the charge of criminal conspiracy does not become irrelevant, at least it cannot be regarded as the primary charge where offence in pursuance of the conspiracy has been committed.[73]

The petitioner Chartered Accountant had issued a certificate to the company which was submitted by the company to the excise official while seeking renewal of the licence for the ensuing year. Allegation against him was of conspiring with the officers in charge of the affairs of the company to prepare false documents and based thereon seek a benefit from the excise authorities at Delhi, benefit being of renewal of the L-1 licence. Where the chartered accountant merely certifies a statement of fact based on the records produced by a company on the allegation that the record is fabricated, charge of a conspiracy cannot be framed against the Chartered Accountant unless there is some more material against the Chartered Accountant. The petitioner had not applied for extension of licence. Charge under s 120B, IPC could not be framed against the accused appellant.[74]

To attract the applicability of s 120B it has to be proved that all the accused had the intention and they had agreed to commit the crime. There is no doubt that conspiracy is hatched in private and in secrecy for which direct evidence would rarely be available. It is also not necessary that each member to a conspiracy must know all the details of the conspiracy.[75]

Once a conspiracy is given effect to, the individual acts of the conspirators thereafter do not brush the others with the same taint for the reason that once a829 common intention is given effect to, the theory of constructiveness no longer remains in operation.[76]

2. Section is not Retrospective in Operation

Commentary under s 120A may be referred to.

3. The Word "Whoever" in Sections 415 and 120B does not include Company

The IPC does not contain any provision similar to that in the Income-tax Act 1961, which specifically states that a company, being a person within the meaning of the word as defined in s 11, IPC can be punished even for offences involving mens rea as an essential ingredient. The Income-tax Act, the Essential Commodities Act, the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, etc., do contain specific provisions to deal with offences by companies.[77]

Prosecution against the company which being a juridical person is, in a sense, doliincapax and it cannot commit an offence of cheating within the meaning of s 415, which positively involves criminal intention to deceive others. The same is also true in respect of the offence of conspiracy which involves a guilty mind to do an illegal thing. Therefore, although a person who is victim of deception can be a company, the perpetrator of deception cannot be a corporate body like a company or association. It can only be a natural person who is capable of having mens rea to commit the offence. Consequently, the words 'whoever' occurring at the beginning of ss 415 and 120B cannot include in its sweep, a juridical person like a company. In view of this position the objection raised on behalf of the petitioner to the maintainability of the complaint will have to be upheld.[78]

4. Where No Express Provision is made in the Code for the Punishment of such Conspiracy

Whereas s 120A, IPC provides an extended definition of criminal conspiracy covering acts which do not amount to abetment by conspiracy within the meaning of s 107 ; s 120B provides a punishment for criminal conspiracy 'where no express provision is made in this Code for the punishment of such a conspiracy'. These words do not mean that when there is proof of an abetment of an offence, the charge should be for such abetment. It only includes cases where there is an express provision for the punishment of the particular conspiracy alleged and the only such case in the IPC is that under s 121A, IPC . It is optional for the prosecution to proceed for the abetment of the offence by conspiracy under s 107 or for the conspiracy as a substantive offence under s 120B . This is in accord with the law in England.[79] Where a criminal conspiracy amounts to an abetment under s 107, it is unnecessary to invoke the provision of ss 120A and 120B, as the IPC has made specific provision for the punishment of such a conspiracy.[80] There is no express provision made in the830IPC for the punishment of conspiracy to fabricate false evidence. Hence the section applies to a conspiracy to fabricate false evidence.[81]

5. Subsistence of Conspiracy

The evidence as to the transmission of thoughts sharing the unlawful act is not sufficient. A conspiracy is a continuing offence which continues to subsist till it is executed or rescinded or frustrated by choice of necessity. During its subsistence, whenever any one of the conspirators does an act or series of acts, he would be held guilty under s 120B of the IPC .[82]

Most Important Ingredient--Duty of Court

The most important ingredient of the offence is the agreement between two or more persons to do an illegal act. In a case where criminal conspiracy is alleged, the court must inquire whether the two persons are independently pursuing the same end or they have come together to pursue the unlawful object. The former does not render them conspirators, but the latter does. For the offence of conspiracy some kind of physical manifestation of agreement is required to be established. The express agreement need not be proved.[83]

To make out an offence under s 120B, IPC, the prosecution must adduce evidence to show the existence of some agreement between the accused persons. In the instant case, the allegation was that the accused appellants informed the accused that the victim was carrying money which could be looted. But there was absence of specific evidence as to where and when the conspiracy was hatched and what was the purpose of the conspiracy. Appellants were acquitted of the charge under s 120B, IPC .[84]

Sections 71 and 120B Considered Together

Section 71, IPC, limiting punishment of offences in certain cases does not apply to conspiracy as defined in this section, i.e., in connection with an offence committed in consequence of a conspiracy; in other words, the conspiracy to commit an offence and the actual commission of the offence are two separate and distinct transactions. This section provides punishment for conspiracy; it is ideal to say that persons can be punished under this section if they only conspire and do not commit an offence, but cannot be punished under it if, besides conspiring, they actually proceed to commit the offence.[85]

6. Cognizance

It is well settled that at the stage of cognizance and issuance of process, the magistrate has only to see whether the FIR discloses an offence and whether there is sufficient ground for proceeding against the accused. The magistrate at this stage is not to appreciate the evidence meticulously. When the FIR of the instant case shows that the allegations made therein disclosed criminal offence and the order shows that the learned CJM, after perusing the case diary has found a prima facie case under ss 420, 467, 468, 471, 120B, IPC, the order of taking cognizance is proper.[86]

If Allegations, FIR/Complaint Prima Facie do not Constitute the Offence of Conspiracy and other Offences, FIR/Complaint can be Quashed under Section 482 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

The complainant firm, a manufacturer of bidis, lodged an FIR against the accused for the offence of cheating, conspiracy and infringement of trademark or copyright. There was a dispute between the complainant and its partners regarding sale of bidis within specified areas as per an agreement and the accused were bona fide purchasers of goods and were neither manufacturers nor partners of complainant firm. The allegations made in the FIR against the accused, even if taken at face value and accepted in their entirety, prima facie were held not to constitute any offence within the provisions of ss 78 - 79, Trade and Merchandise Marks Act 1958, ss 63 - 64 of the Copyright Act 1957 and ss 420, 120B, IPC, the FIR against the accused was quashed by the High Court on petition filed by the accused persons under s 482, CrPC .[87]

Where the accused was summoned under ss 420 and 120B, IPC, on a criminal complaint, the accused allegedly floated a company for a fraudulent purpose. The complainant had given large amounts to the accused to purchase its units, the company owned 250-300 acres of land in which over one lakh eucalyptus trees were planted, thus the company had substantial assets and this was not so only on paper. The accused had executed a sale deed of 6 acres of land in favour of the petitioner, merely because the accused retained the sale proceeds of the trees, it cannot be inferred that he had fraudulent intentions from the beginning. On these facts it was held that no criminal offence is made out and it was a case of breach of contract as liability of the accused was of a civil nature. The complaint was quashed.[88]

But where the cognizance of offence was taken under ss 120B and 116, IPC and ss 5 and 12 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1988, the accused entered into conspiracy with the co-accused and tried to bribe the Deputy Commissioner for availing an NOC. The Deputy Commissioner was newly posted and had no reasons to falsely implicate them. The co-accused was an employee of the department and was suspended and facing a departmental enquiry, from the facts of the case and as revealed in the FIR, it was clear that a prima facie case could be made out, not only for conspiracy between accused and the co-accused but for direct abetment for the purpose of bribing the Deputy Commissioner, so cognizance taken against the accused persons regarding offences was found proper and the proceedings arising out of the FIR lodged in the police station were not quashed.[89]

832Where the complainant and the accused persons were contesting the election of the Board of Directors of the bank, an agreement was reached between the complainant and the accused person for withdrawal of candidature on deposit of some money by the accused persons, the complainant filed a complaint alleging that he withdrew his candidature but the agreed amount was not deposited, the order of magistrate taking cognizance of offences and issuing process under ss 417 and 120B was held illegal as such contract is against law and not enforceable by virtue of s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, as a result the order of the judicial magistrate first class was set aside and criminal proceedings initiated were quashed by the Karnataka High Court by exercising inherent powers under s 482, CrPC .[90] But where the charges were under ss 120B, 409, 420, 468, 471, 477A of the IPC, the appellant/accused obtained overdraft facilities from the bank which was much beyond financial power of branch manager of the bank. The branch manager was alleged to be in the habit of receiving illegal gratification from the customers. The Apex Court observed that there may not be any direct evidence against the appellant/accused as regards payment of illegal gratification by him to the branch manager or accountant but a natural inference may be drawn that he did take advantage of said overdraft facility upon some other consideration. Continuation of prosecution against appellant/accused in the circumstances it was held, would not be travesty to justice or prejudicial. The order of the High Court refusing to quash proceeding under s 482, CrPC, against appellant/accused was upheld.[91]

Where the complaint was filed against the accused persons alleging commission of offences under ss 406, 420, 120B, 409, IPC, allegations made by the complainant were that he was duped by accused company. The complainant supplied consignment to accused, no dispute regarding payment of price was alleged, dispute related only to non-conveyance of form 'H', intention to deceive the complainant was not evident on the part of the accused. The dispute being of a civil nature, on these facts it was held that continuance of proceedings against the accused person was an abuse of the process of court so the proceedings pending before the judicial magistrate were quashed.[92] Where defamatory matter was published in a newspaper, allegations of criminal conspiracy between the editor, executive editor, managing editor and resident editor with clear intention of defamation of the complainant were made, all of them were held liable to be prosecuted and application for quashing proceedings on the ground that only the editor was responsible for the said publication was not allowed.[93]

A complaint against bank manager was that cheque was issued by accused A in favour of complainant. Accuseds B and C encashed cheque on behalf of the complainant as he was not holding account in bank. They, however, did not send the amount to complainant as assured by them, and the signature on reverse of cheque was admittedly that of the payee. The bank manager (accused) cannot be held responsible for passing cheque without verifying signature of payee on reverse of cheque and crediting it to account of accused B and accused C whose names were mentioned above signature of payee, no offence is made out against him and complaint against accused bank manager is liable to be quashed.[94]833

7. Conditions Requisite for Initiation of Proceedings

Chapter V-A, comprising ss 120A and 120B, was inserted by the Indian Criminal (Amendment) Act 1913, making criminal conspiracy itself an independent and substantive offence for the first time in India.[1] The word 'illegal' used in the definition of the offence in s 120A has been defined by s 43 as applicable to everything which is an offence, which is prohibited by law or which furnishes ground for a civil action. The very wide scope of the definition would make even a civil trespass indictable as a criminal conspiracy. Under English law to which the Indian law has been assimilated, indictments for conspiracy extend to almost every possible sort of case.[2]

Sections 195 and 196A of the CrPC 1898 have been repealed and replaced by ss 195 and 196 of the CrPC .[3]

8. Prosecution of Certain Classes of Criminal Conspiracy

It is apparent from these sections that there is no condition precedent to a court taking cognizance of a criminal conspiracy the object of which is to commit an offence punishable with death, imprisonment for life or rigorous imprisonment for two years or upwards and not specified in ss 195 and 196 .[4] No consent was necessary to a prosecution for criminal conspiracy to commit a non-cognizable offence when s 195(4) of the old CrPC was applicable.[5] Under the proviso to sub-s (2) of s 196 where the criminal conspiracy is one to which the provisions of s 195, CrPC apply, no consent for prosecution is necessary.

Where in a case tried under the old CrPC, a charge under s 467 read with s 120B, IPC was framed, but there was no sanction obtained before the complaint was entertained, it was held that conviction under s 467 read with s 109 would be quite proper, although the charge under ss 467 / 120B could fail for want of sanction.[6] But where the accused persons were charged with the substantive offence of forgery under s 467, IPC, and abetment of that offence under s 467 read with s 114, IPC, it was held unnecessary to charge the accused also for conspiracy to commit forgery under s 120B, so as to attract the provisions of s 196A,[7] of the old CrPC .

Accused appellant had aided and abetted the co-accused Army Havaldar, a public servant, in obtaining a sum of Rs. 25000/- as illegal gratification for securing appointment of the son of the prosecution witness. He was convicted under s 120B, IPC and ss 7, 13(2) of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1988.[8]

834Where the accused was charged under ss 120B and 409, IPC, and no sanction for prosecution was obtained, it was held that the absence of sanction for charge under s 120B, IPC, did not vitiate the trial on the substantive charge under s 409, IPC .[9]

Where the object of criminal conspiracy is cheating by impersonation under s 419, IPC, sanction for prosecution under s 196, CrPC, is not necessary.[10]

There is no bar to prosecuting an offender for abetting, under s 109, IPC . An offence, which has, in fact, been committed in pursuance of a conspiracy, notwithstanding the fact that a prosecution under s 120B, cannot be launched without previous consent. When the second clause of s 107 is read with the definition of conspiracy in s 120A, it is clear, apart form any decision on the subject, that the State has a right to file a prosecution under s 120B, whether or not in pursuance of the conspiracy to commit an offence, the offence takes place. If it does take place, the prosecution has the option to treat the person, who has conspired with another, as an abettor within the meaning of s 107, IPC .[11]

Where Object of Conspiracy and means Adopted are Separable, Sanction is not Necessary

There is a recognizable difference between the object of a conspiracy and the means adopted to realise the object. If they are separable, then sanction is not necessary. It does not matter if the object is erroneously mixed up with the statement of the method of attaining it in the body of the complaint. It is perfectly open to the magistrate, upon the evidence to dissect the facts in order to decide the question of sanction.[12]

Where the offence is a cognizable one punishable with rigorous imprisonment for two years or more, s 196, CrPC, does not necessitate a previous sanction.[13]

Where the conspiracy is to obtain money (property) by cheating, an offence punishable under s 420, IPC, no consent under s 196, CrPC, is necessary as the punishment may extend to more than two years, imprisonment.[14]

If the object of the conspiracy was not to commit an offence under s 471, IPC, but to make a false claim in a court of justice and to obtain a decree on it, s 196, CrPC, has no application whatever. It is s 195, CrPC, which would apply.[15]

The words 'not punishable with death, imprisonment for life or rigorous imprisonment for a term of two years or upwards' in s 196, CrPC, now govern both a cognizable as well as a non-cognizable offence. Whether a sanction has been granted835 under s 196 is a question of fact which ought to be urged at the trial, and not before the High Court.[16]

Sanction under s 197, CrPC, is not necessary for instituting proceedings against a public servant on charges of conspiracy and of bribery.[17]

The fact that s 196A had been inserted in the CrPC 1898 and almost the same provision has been introduced in s 196 of the new CrPC shows that the Legislature is anxious that prosecutions under s 120B should not be started indiscriminately. No person should be allowed to be convicted of an offence under s 120B punishable with imprisonment for less than two years if his prosecution under that section is neither sanctioned by the State Government or the district magistrate, nor was within the contemplation of the officer making complaint under s 340 (s 476 old), CrPC .[18]

9. Conspiracy -- Kidnapping for Ransom

The prosecution witness identified by voice, the person who on telephone had demanded ransom for releasing the victim. Scientific officer of the CBI who examined the Voice Spectrography of the caller deposed that the tape recorded voice was that of the accused. On the information given by the accused, remaining accused were arrested and victim was rescued. Accused was convicted under s 120B and s 364 IPC .[19]

Accused persons had kidnapped the son of the complainant, and demanded rupees five lacs as ransom threatening the safety of the kidnapped boy on telephone. Trap was laid, accused were arrested and on the disclosure statement made by them, the kidnapped boy was recovered. The testimony of the father of the boy was believed. Non-examination of the independent witnesses was held immaterial. Accused persons were convicted under ss 120B and 364A, IPC .[20]

10. Procedure

In the case of conspiracies falling under sub-s (1) of this section, the procedure is the same as in the case of the offence which is the object of the conspiracy. The offence under sub-s (1) of this section is cognizable or non-cognizable, bailable or non-bailable, according as the offence, which is the object of conspiracy, is cognizable or non-cognizable, or bailable or non-bailable. It is triable by the court by which abetment of the offence, which is the object of conspiracy, is triable. The offence under sub-s (2) is non-cognizable and bailable and triable by a magistrate of the first class. In view of the specific provisions of s 320(9) of the CrPC no offence under this section is compoundable. This question is, however, debatable as in the matter of sentence, the conspiracy has been equated with abetment, and this section provides that whoever is a party to criminal conspiracy to commit an offence, shall be punished in the same manner as if he had abetted such offence. According to s 320(3), CrPC, when any offence is compoundable under that section, the abetment of such offence may be compounded in like manner. The same provisions should,836 therefore, apply to an offence under this section in the matter of the composition of the offence.

If there is specific allegation by the prosecution that the accused in question was a party to the criminal conspiracy, neither the Special Court nor the High Court is justified in granting bail to the said person.[21]

Economic offences constitute a class apart and need to be visited with a different approach in the matter of bail. The economic offence having deep rooted conspiracies and involving huge loss of public funds needs to be viewed seriously and considered as grave offences affecting the economy of the country as a whole and thereby posing a serious threat to the financial health of the country. While granting bail, the Court has to keep in mind the nature of accusations, the nature of evidence in support thereof, the severity of the punishment which conviction will entail, the character of the accused, circumstances which are peculiar to the accused, reasonable possibility of securing the presence of the accused at the trial, reasonable apprehension of the witnesses being tampered with, the larger interests of the public/State and other similar considerations. In case registered under s 120B read with s 420, 409 and 477A, IPC, and s 13(2) read with s 13(1)(c) and (d) of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1988, the allegations against the accused appellant sitting MP and son of Chief Minister were of amassing huge illegal wealth. Pending CBI investigation, bail was refused.[22]

11. Place of Trial

Sections 177, 180, 181 and ch 13 of Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, may be referred to.[23]

12. Joint Trial

Sections 218, 220, 223 Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, may be referred to.[24]

Facts of Some Accused not being Common in all Cases does not affect their Joint Trial

If the alleged offences of conspiracy, in a number of given cases, relate to one and the same transaction, they may be tried together in order to avoid multiplicity of proceedings and conflict of decisions. In Dhuruvasalu Naidu v State ,[25]where a common FIR was filed and a reading of it and other records showed that there was only one criminal conspiracy, the object of which was to commit theft of valuable timber from a reserve forest and to transport it by dishonestly using the permits, obtained for purposes other than cutting and removing trees, and to share the profits, arising out of that act, it was held that the joint trial of the accused was not illegal. It was further observed that the mere fact, that some of the accused, in the alleged cases, would be different, would not change the nature and character of the conspiracy.837

Validity of Joint Trial Depends on Initial Accusations and not on Facts Ultimately Proved--Effect of the Validity of Joint Trial when Offences Not Committed in same Transaction Pursuant to Conspiracy

In a case of conspiracy, it is not necessary for the validity of a trial to ultimately prove that the conspiracy alleged actually existed. The validity of a joint trial upon charges for offences, alleged to be parts of the conspiracy, is determined by the initial accusations levelled by the prosecution against the whole body of accused persons.[26] Even if the charge of a conspiracy under s 120B, IPC, is not established, it is open to the prosecution to prove the offence of unlawful assembly.[27] However, in KTMS Mohd v Union of India ,[28] where three persons were prosecuted on the complaint of the Income-tax Officer Madras under s 120B, IPC, read with s 193 IPC, read with s 277 of the Income Tax Act and under s 193 *(simpliciter)*IPC and two of them were also indicted under s 277 (simpliciter) of the Income Tax Act 1961, the charge under s 120B, IPC, could not be established but the accused were convicted and sentenced under s 193, IPC, under s 277 of the Income Tax Act 1961 by the trial court. The conviction was confirmed in appeal and also in revision by the Madras High Court. On appeal by the accused before the Supreme Court, the Apex Court observed that the complaint was ill-drafted and the necessary ingredients to make out a case for conspiracy were not brought out therein and with the further observation that in the facts and circumstances of the case, the misjoinder of charges cannot be said to be a mere irregularity, it was held that by the joint trial with misjoinder of charges, a failure of justice has, in fact, been occasioned, since all the courts below have clubbed all the allegations levelled against all the three appellants and two other accused together and considered the same as if all the offences were committed in the same transaction pursuant to a conspiracy, which is neither supported by the allegations in the complaint nor by the evidence as required under the law and the conviction of the appellants under s 193, IPC and s 277, Income Tax Act 1961 was accordingly set aside.

13. Charge

It is well settled that if a charge is framed for a substantive offence, a person may, without any additional charge being framed, be convicted of an attempt to commit that offence. He may similarly be convicted of abetment to commit that offence, though on this point conflicting views have been expressed in cases decided under the old Code. But no person can be convicted of the offence of criminal conspiracy without there being a charge under s 120B, IPC .[29] The conspiracy to commit an offence is, by itself, distinct from the offence for which the conspiracy is entered into. Such an offence, if actually committed, would be the subject-matter of a separate charge.[30]

838Where a number of offences are committed by several persons in pursuance of a conspiracy, it is not illegal to charge them with those offences, as well as with the offence of conspiracy to commit those offences.[31]

A charge of conspiracy may prejudice the accused because it has forced them into joint trial and the court may consider the entire mass of evidence against every accused. In the charge of conspiracy, the court has to guard itself against the danger of unfairness to the accused.[32]

It is also well-settled that the indictment in all cases of conspiracy must, in the first place, charge the conspiracy, but that in stating the object of the conspiracy the same degree of certainty is not required as in an indictment for the offence conspired to be committed.[33]Where the object of the agreement is to do an unlawful act, and not to do a lawful act by unlawful means, it is sufficient to specify the unlawful object without specifying the means adopted by all or any of the conspirators to gain that object.[34] The mere fact that the charge is vague because it does not disclose the mode in which the offence was committed, would not make the trial illegal especially if no prejudice is thereby caused to the accused.[35] It is convenient in a charge of conspiracy to draw attention to the existence of facts which form a connecting link between what might otherwise have appeared to be a series of different individual offences.[36]

Even at the stage of framing charge, it is the duty of the court to see whether there is sufficient material to go into trial.[37] A presumption against an accused to be drawn at the stage of framing charge would be a logical and sensible presumption, but certainly not a leap in the dark or stretch in imagination.[38]

For framing a charge for offence under s 120B of the IPC, the Court has to prima facie take into account the material placed on record by the prosecution. The accused, a Registering and Licensing Authority, without complying with the Rules, signed the endorsement and issued licence, thus, the framing of charge under s 120B, IPC against the petitioner was held proper.[39]

Where the accused persons were charged for offences under ss 120B, 409 and 420, IPC, materials collected were sufficient for raising a strong suspicion to form a presumptive opinion as to the existence of the factual ingredients constituting alleged offences, circumstantial evidence *prima facie s*howing alleged criminal conspiracy was executed with ingenuity, dexterity and adroitness, the order framing charge against the accused persons was found proper.[40]

Once the Court finds an accused guilty of s 120B, where the accused had conspired to commit an offence and actually committed the offence with other accused with839 whom he conspired, they all shall individually be punishable for the offence viz. s 300 read with s 120B, IPC for which such conspiracy was hatched. On facts, conviction of the accused for offence under s 120B read with s 302, IPC was held proper.[41]

No Charge of Conspiracy Without Charge of Primary Offence

Under the scheme of the IPC the charge is to be framed on the basis of the evidence contained in the case diary. Section 120-B is an offence of conspiracy. The said section cannot be applied simpliciter unless and until some offence is disclosed. There cannot be any conspiracy without any offence. Section 120B has to be appended with a primary offence.[42] Charge framed against the accused under s 120B, IPC*simpliciter* was quashed.[43]

Agreement Necessary for Charge of Conspiracy

To constitute the offence under s 120B IPC, first, there must be an agreement between the persons who are alleged to conspire.

The agreement should be;

(i) for doing of an illegal act or;
(ii) for doing by illegal means an act which may not itself be illegal.

Thus it is clear that for a charge of conspiracy, only an agreement itself is sufficient.[44]

The essential ingredients of criminal conspiracy are (i) there has to be an agreement between two or more persons; (ii) the agreement must relate to the doing or causing to be done either of (a) an illegal act or (b) an act which is not illegal in itself but is done by illegal means. What is, therefore, necessary, is to show the meeting of minds of two or more persons for doing or causing to be done an illegal act or an act by illegal means. Mere knowledge or discussion or generation of a crime in the mind of the accused, is not sufficient to constitute an offence.[45]

The offence can be proved by adducing circumstantial evidence or by necessary implication. Meeting of minds to form a criminal conspiracy has to be proved by adducing substantive evidence in cases where circumstantial evidence is incomplete or vague. The gist of the offence of conspiracy lies in the forming of the scheme or agreement between the parties, thus, agreement is essential.[46]840

Charge when not to be Framed on Insufficient Material or Inference or Mere Suspicion

Conspiracy cannot be proved merely on the basis of inferences. The inferences have to be backed by evidence. If the material put forward by the prosecution is insufficient to bring home the guilt of the accused then he is entitled to be discharged.[47] Some general evidence pertaining to the conspiracy would be sufficient to form part of the charge of conspiracy in the charge sheet. As a matter of fact some connecting link or connecting factors somewhere would be enough for framing charge since framing of charge and to establish the charge of conspiracy cannot possibly be placed at par: To establish the charge of conspiracy, cogent evidence of meeting of two minds in the matter of commission of an offence is required, in the absence of which the charge cannot be sustained, this is, however not so, in the matter of the framing of a charge since the incidence of the offence shall have to be investigated.[48]

A conspirator need not be present during the entire period of the conspiracy, if it is shown that he contributed his part for the furtherance of the conspiracy, it is sufficient to hold, that charges have to be framed against him.[49]

Test for Sending a Person to Trial

The test to send a person for trial is whether there is a strong suspicion against him. The suspicion must be aroused in a judicial mind. It is not every suspicion that justifies the trial of an accused. The suspicion must be strong enough to justify the trial.[50] Where in the facts and circumstances of the case at least a strong suspicion arises that there was a conspiracy between the accused persons with the object of deceiving the department, on basis of a certificate, the charge under s 120B, IPC, cannot be quashed.[51] Where the co-accused was alleged to have helped the accused to retrieve his vehicle from a spot and the former had witnessed the shooting of the deceased by the latter, and thereafter he met other co-accused and gave them his vehicle to retrieve the vehicle of the accused from the spot, it was held that these facts raised a strong suspicion of his being party to the conspiracy and so he was liable to be charged under s 201 read with s 120B, IPC .[52] Where the guilt of criminal conspiracy or cheating against a bank official could not be proved for want of evidence, the summoning order was quashed.[53]

Charge when some Conspirators are Unknown

In a conspiracy case, the accused can be charged with conspiring with persons unknown, but if they are charged with conspiring with persons known, then such persons must be named in the charge.[54]Section 212, CrPC, which requires the particulars of the offence to be stated does not in terms further require that in an841 offence like conspiracy the names of the co-conspirators should also be mentioned, but it is always advisable to give those particulars also in order to give a reasonable notice to the accused that he has been charged with having conspired with so and so (persons named) as also persons unnamed to commit a certain offence.[55]

Charge When Conspiracy is Spread Over Several Years

Where a charge, as framed, discloses one single conspiracy, although spread over several years, there is only one object of the conspiracy (to cheat members of the public). The fact that in the course of years others joined the conspiracy or that several incidents of cheating took place in pursuance of the conspiracy does not change the conspiracy and does not split up a single conspiracy into several conspiracies.[56]

Charge in Case of Conspiracy of Acts Committed in Pursuance Thereof

Conspiracy to commit an offence is itself an offence and a person can be separately charged with respect to such a conspiracy.[57] There is no analogy between ss 120B and 109, IPC . Where a number of offences are committed by several persons in pursuance of a conspiracy, it is usual to charge them with those offences as well as with the offence of conspiracy to commit those offences. Though it is not desirable to charge the accused persons with conspiracy with the ulterior object of letting in evidence which would otherwise be inadmissible and though it is undesirable to complicate a trial by introducing a large number of charges spread over a long period, this is only a question of property. It should be left to the judge or the magistrate trying the case to adopt the course which he considers appropriate in the facts and circumstances of the case. Such a trial is not prohibited by the CrPC .

When Sanction is Required But Not Obtained--Effect on Charge

If the substantive offence does not require sanction, though the offence of conspiracy does and the sanction is not obtained, the court can proceed with the trial as to the substantive offence as if there were no charge of conspiracy.[58]

Where the accused involved in conspiracy was charged for offences under s 161, IPC and s 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947, the sanction for their prosecution was obtained under s 197, CrPC but not under s 6 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, charges were held liable to be quashed.[59] But when sanction for offences including criminal conspiracy against a public servant is not necessary since such offences cannot be said to have been committed in discharge of official duties, proceedings cannot be quashed for want of sanction.[60]

Prima Facie*Evidence for Charge--Charge when not Substantial

It is convenient, in a charge of conspiracy, to draw attention to the existence of facts which form a connecting link between what otherwise would have appeared to be a842 series of different individual offences.[61] Where no negligence or rashness in performing an operation endangering the life of the patient was averred or proved, surgical injury for curing diseases cannot be said to be injury caused voluntarily punishable under s 326 . By performing an operation no wrongful gain is made to doctors or to a hospital, it was held that no criminal offence under ss 326, 338, 420 read with s 120B was made out and an order for framing of charges against the accused was quashed.[62] Where the charge against the accused, the erstwhile finance minister, was of conspiring to approve for purchase of TV set at a hiked price, the evidence showed that the accused only put a signature on the file under the direction of the then chief minister, there was no prima facie evidence that said signature was done by the accused, in reference to common design of conspirator, also, no knowledge of conspiracy was attributed to the accused, it was held that the order framing the charge of conspiracy against the accused was not proper.[63] But where circumstantial evidence prima facie showing alleged criminal conspiracy was executed with ingenuity, dexterity and adroitness, the order framing charge against accused persons was held proper.[64]

Where the co-accused alleged to have helped the accused to retrieve his vehicle from the spot and the former had witnessed the shooting of the deceased by the accused, thereafter he met other co-accused and gave them his vehicle to retrieve the vehicle of the accused from spot, it was held that the facts raised a strong suspicion of his being party to the conspiracy and so he was liable to be charged under s 201 read with s 120B, IPC .[65]

Where statement of complainant's son indicated threat of putting complainant in fear, framing of charge under s 120B read with s 387, IPC was held not illegal.[66] Mere suspicion of motive is not sufficient to frame charges against accused. There should be some reasonable ground to believe that the person has taken part in the conspiracy or in other words, reasonable likelihood of participation. There should be something to connect him with the crime.[67] The evidence of prosecution witnesses, that the person, against whom the evidence was offered, was a person so conspiring, by itself, and without more, is sufficient to pass the prima facie standard to enable the judge to frame the charge of conspiracy.[68]But the mere presence in the meeting is not sufficient to frame a charge, against any person, under s 120B, unless it is shown that he was guilty of some overt act.[69] Where the accused is neither a party to the conspiracy, nor is there material on the record to prove mens rea on his part, charge for criminal conspiracy against him is not sustainable.[70] Persons once charged under s 120B could not be charged again with abetment under s 114 of the IPC .[71]

843Where the charge against the accused is that they had committed the offence under s 120B read with s 420, IPC, they cannot be convicted separately under ss 120B and 420, IPC .[72]

Framing of charge of conspiracy is generally based on circumstantial evidence as direct evidence of conspiracy is rarely available.[73]

Conviction on Substantive Charge can be made even if Conspiracy not Established

It may or it may not be a duplication to have s 117 as well as s 120B, but there can be no objection to charge under both ss 117 and 120B .[74] A charge under s 120B, read with s 395 of the IPC is not, therefore, artificial.[75] If the charge of conspiracy to commit breach of trust is followed by a substantive charge of criminal breach of trust in pursuance of such conspiracy, there is nothing to prevent the court from convicting an accused under the second charge even if the prosecution fails to establish conspiracy.[76] 'The offence of conspiracy is an entirely independent offence and though other offences are committed in pursuance of the conspiracy, the liability of the conspirators for the conspiracy itself cannot disappear.'[77]

Conviction of One Conspirator Alone--Whether Possible

Where the only persons alleged to have been guilty of the offence of conspiracy are the persons placed on trial and there is no allegation nor any evidence forthcoming that any other persons were, though not placed on trial, concerned with the crime, if all the accused persons except one are acquitted for a charge of conspiracy, the conviction of one only on that charge cannot be sustained.[78] The conspiracy by just one person is unheard of.[79] Where the prosecution was not able to prove that one of the two accused was a party to a conspiracy, charge of conspiracy under s 120B cannot stand against other accused as in a conspiracy there must be two parties.[80]

The conviction under s 120B cannot be sustained when the other accused persons have been acquitted, for an offence of conspiracy cannot survive if there is acquittal of the other alleged co-conspirators. Where other co-accused conspirators had been acquitted, the conviction of the accused appellant under s 120B, IPC was set aside.[81]

But where, on the findings of the courts below, apart from the persons placed on trial, there was the approver who implicated himself equally with the other accused persons and a number of other prosecution witnesses as having been privy to the conspiracy, the conviction of one only is not illegal. Even if the charge does not844 specifically mention the name of the approver as having been one of the conspirators, s 215, CrPC, will cure the defect if the accused is not misled or the charge has not occasioned a failure of justice. Further, s 464, CrPC will apply.[82] But, where it is not clear as to with whom the accused conspired and to do what, the charge under s 120B, IPC, against him, is groundless.[83]

14. Form of Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of the Magistrate, Sessions Judge etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at..... agreed with (name of the co-conspirator), to do (or cause to be done) an illegal act, to wit ..... (or an act, which is not illegal, by illegal means to wit.....) and that you did some acts, to wit ..... besides the agreement, in pursuance of the said agreement, to commit the offence of ..... punishable with death (or imprisonment for life, etc) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 120B of the Indian Penal Code ; and within my cognizance (or the cognizance of the Court of.....)
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court (or by the said Court) on the said charge.

15. Proof of Conspiracy

To substantiate a charge of conspiracy the prosecution must prove:

(i) that the accused conspired with another or others;
(ii) that he did so to do, or cause to be done, an illegal act or an act which is not illegal, by illegal means; and
(iii) that an overt act was done by one or more of the conspirators in pursuance of the conspiracy, but this is not necessary if the agreement was to commit an offence.

The aforesaid can be established by either direct evidence or circumstantial evidence,[84] or by necessary implications.[85] Meeting of minds between the conspirators has to be proved by adducing substantive evidence in cases where circumstantial evidence is vague or incomplete.[86] Confession of accused can be used against co-accused to establish the charge of criminal conspiracy.[87] To establish the charge of conspiracy, there is required cogent evidence of meeting of two minds in the matter of commission of offence--in the absence of which the charge cannot be845 sustained.[88] The law is well settled that for establishing a criminal conspiracy, the prosecution must place on record some connecting link or connecting evidence of the meeting of minds of the conspirators for achieving a particular object.[89]

Direct evidence, being extremely rare, criminal conspiracy can be proved by the circumstantial evidence.[90]

The appellants accused who were driving a car, intercepted the truck, assaulted the driver and cleaner of the truck, snatched bags which contained cash and silver coins. The appellant no. 3 was the only person who had information about the cash and ornaments in the two bags kept in the cabin of the truck. His involvement in conspiracy was proved. He was convicted under s 120B, IPC, while the appellant nos. 2 and 3 were given benefit of doubt and were acquitted.[91]

The conspiracy cannot be proved merely on the basis of inferences. The inferences have to be backed by evidence.[92] In a charge of conspiracy the court has to guard itself against the danger of unfairness to the accused. Introduction of evidence against some may result in the conviction of all, which is to be avoided.[93]

There must be evidence of meeting of minds between the conspirators resulting in an ultimate decision taken by the conspirators regarding commission of the crime. In the instant case, the only witness examined by the prosecution to prove the alleged meeting between the appellant and the other accused turned hostile. In the absence of the evidence about the meeting of minds between the conspirators, conviction of the accused appellant under s 324 read with the aid of s 120B, IPC recorded by courts below was not sustained, hence was set aside.[94]

Unless there is evidence of criminal conspiracy, merely because deceased N died on account of injury on his abdomen, it cannot be presumed that he died on account of injury inflicted by accused K at the instigation of accused H in conspiracy with other accused persons.[95]

A conspiracy within the meaning of s 120B, IPC, presupposes an agreement by the accused proposed to be charged thereunder to do an illegal act or an act by illegal means.[96]

Where the accused persons lay in wait for deceased, and after the commission of the offence, flee away together, it showed the existence of conspiracy between the accused perosns.[97]

No Conspiracy without an Agreement--Mere Proof of Agreement Sufficient for Conviction under Section 120B

The essential ingredient of the offence of criminal conspiracy is the agreement to commit an offence.[98] The illegal act may or may not be done in pursuance of an846 agreement, but the very agreement is an offence and is punishable.[1] In the case of a criminal conspiracy what is to be proved is an agreement and common design.[2]One of the essential ingredients that the prosecution should establish is that there was an agreement between two or more persons to do an illegal act or a legal act by illegal means, there can be no conspiracy without such an agreement.[3] Where conspiracy alleged is with regard to commission of a serious crime of the nature as contemplated in s 120B read with the proviso to sub-s (2) of s 120A of the IPC, then, in that event mere proof of an agreement between the accused for commission of such a crime alone is enough to bring about a conviction under s 120B and the proof of any overt act by accused or by any one of them would not be necessary.[4]The illegal act may or may not be done in pursuance of an agreement, but the very agreement is an offence and is punishable. Reference to ss 120A and 120B, IPC, would make these aspects clear beyond doubt.[5] Where there was no material showing that there was an agreement between both accused to commit murder of deceased, the mere fact that accused was nephew of the co-accused is not sufficient to lead to an inference of conspiracy.[6] Where there was no specific evidence as to where and when the conspiracy was hatched, and what was the specific purpose of such conspiracy, the conviction and sentence under s 120B, IPC awarded to the accused were set aside.[7]

To constitute a conspiracy, agreement between two or more persons for doing an illegal act, or an act by illegal means, is a sine qua non. As there was no link to show that the conspirators agreed to misappropriate the gold while the gold ornament was being prepared, accused was held not guilty of offence under ss 120B and 149, IPC .[8]

Direct Evidence Seldom Available--Inference from Circumstantial Evidence

Direct evidence in proof of conspiracy which is generally treated in the stealth of darkness is seldom available, and even when available it is tainted, being that of an accomplice, and requires corroboration.[9] Conspiracy is difficult to establish by direct847 evidence. However, there should be material showing a connection between the alleged conspiracy and act done pursuant to that conspiracy.[10] Conspiracy is hatched in secrecy and for proving the said offence, substantial direct evidence may not be possible to be obtained. An offence of criminal conspiracy can also be proved by circumstantial evidence.[11]

As criminal conspiracy is hatched in secrecy; offence of conspiracy can be established on basis of legitimate inference to be drawn from facts on record.[12]

The conspiracy need not necessarily be proved by direct evidence. It is also capable of being proved by circumstances pointing out the existence of a conspiracy to commit an unlawful act. It is also to be taken into account that there is seldom direct evidence for proof of the conspiracy in the very nature of things. In almost all cases, it is to be inferred from the presence of proved circumstances pointing out the one and only hypothesis of the existence of a conspiracy to commit any unlawful or illegal act.[13] The circumstances proved before, during and after the occurrence have to be considered to decide about the complicity of the accused. But if these circumstances are compatible also with the innocence of the accused persons, then it cannot be held that the prosecution had successfully established its case. Even if, some acts are proved to have been committed it must be clear that they were so committed in pursuance of an agreement made between the accused who were parties to the alleged conspiracy. Inference from such proved circumstances regarding the guilt may be drawn only when such circumstances are incapable of any other reasonable explanation.[14]

Direct evidence being extremely rare, criminal conspiracy can be proved by circumstantial evidence. When there were serious infirmities in the evidence relating to conspiracy, accused A3 was given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge of criminal conspiracy.[15]

When deciding the question of sufficiency of circumstantial evidence for the purpose of conviction, what the court has to consider is the total cumulative effect of all the proved facts, each one of which reinforces the conclusion of guilt, and if the combined effect of all those facts, taken together, is conclusive in establishing the guilt of the accused, the conviction would be justified even though it may be that any one or more of those facts, by itself, is not decisive.[16] Where the accused administered poison and caused the death of a woman and her two children, there was sufficient evidence to show that the four accused persons entered into a criminal conspiracy to murder the deceased persons, evidence regarding the movements of accused persons at relevant time near the house of the deceased and the fingerprints of one of the accused on one of the glasses seized from the house of the deceased were present, one of the accused made a confession. On these facts, the Apex Court848 held that the prosecution proved the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt.[17] It is not always possible to give affirmative evidence about the date of the formation of the criminal conspiracy, about the persons who took part in the formation of the conspiracy, about the object which the conspirators set before themselves as the object of the conspiracy, and about the manner in which the object of the conspiracy is to be carried out--all this is necessarily a matter of inference.[18] Privacy and secrecy are more characteristic of a conspiracy, than a loud discussion in an elevated place open to public view.[19]In cases, where persons act in concert by virtue of a common intention and of a criminal conspiracy their activities cannot normally, in the very nature of things, be brought out in evidence by direct evidence because they are done in privacy.[20]

Generally, a conspiracy is hatched in secrecy and it may be difficult to adduce direct evidence of the same. The prosecution will often rely on evidence of acts of various parties to infer that they were done in reference to their common intention. The prosecution will more often rely upon circumstantial evidence.[21] To prove conspiracy, there need not be evidence of direct concert, nor even of any meeting together of the conspirators. The agreement can be inferred from collateral acts, but these acts must show a common plan so as to exclude a reasonable possibility of the acts of the conspirators having been done separately and connected only by coincidence.[22] A reasonable inference of conspiracy is not permissible unless, in addition to the proof of association, there is also evidence of something suspicious in the association.[23] See commentary under heading 'Inference from Circumstantial Evidence' in s 120A, ante.

The prosecution case was that the appellant and the co-accused D (deceased) conspired with each other to commit the murder of the boy and the trial court convicted the appellant/accused for the said offence. But there was absolutely no evidence with regard to the conspiracy hatched between the two accused. The motive was only against the appellant accused and not against the co-accused D. Appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 120B, IPC .[24]

Cumulative Effect of Proved Circumstances

Commentary under same heading in s 120A, ante, may be referred to.849

16. Proof of Criminal Conspiracy -- Confession of Accused

Where there is overwhelming evidence independent of confession of accused, which shows involvement of co-accused in the criminal conspiracy, the confession of the accused can be used for recording the conviction of the co-accused on the charge of murder.[25]

Extra Judicial Confession of Co-accused

In the absence of other corroborative evidence, accused cannot be convicted on the basis of extra judicial confession made by a co-accused.[26]

17. Agreement to Cheat--How Proved

To substantiate a charge of conspiracy the prosecution must prove the agreement between two or more persons to do an unlawful act or a lawful act by unlawful means.[27] Where there was no direct or circumstantial evidence to hold that the accused had prior meeting of minds and an agreement to commit the alleged crime, the mere suspicion of the informant about the conspiracy of the accused cannot be a ground to convict them under s 120B, IPC .[28] There can be no conspiracy without such an agreement.[29] The agreement may be proved by direct evidence or inferred from other proved facts. But the inference of fact may be drawn only when the circumstances are such as to be incapable of any other reasonable interpretation. The law requires specific proof against each of the conspirators participating in a particular design to do a particular criminal thing. The object of the conspiracy must be proved.[30] The circumstances to lead an inference of conspiracy must be of such a nature so as to be incompatible with the innocence of the accused.[31] The essence of criminal conspiracy is an agreement to do an illegal act, for instance, to commit cheating. Such an agreement can be proved either by direct evidence or by circumstantial evidence or by both. It is not necessary that there should be express proof of the agreement, as it can be inferred even from the acts and conduct of the parties to the agreement.[32] For instance, if it can be proved that the accused pursued,850 by similar acts, the same object, often by the same means, one performing one part of the act and the other another, so as to complete it with a view to the attainment of the object which they were pursuing, the court will be at perfect liberty to conclude that they had conspired together to effect that object. Proved acts of cheating by various persons belonging to one group, at various times at various places, by the same devices would furnish strong evidence of the existence of a conspiracy to cheat, as also of the membership of those persons of the conspiracy.[33]In several cases, it has been laid down that there may be an agreement without each conspirator being aware of each and every act of the others and also that the conspiracy may be proved by other than oral evidence, by evidence of surrounding circumstances and the conduct of the accused.[34] In Barindra Kumar Ghosh v Emperor ,[35] Jenkins CJ said:

> Though to establish a charge of conspiracy there must be agreement, there need not be proof of direct meeting or combination nor need the parties be brought into each others' presence; the agreement may be inferred from circumstances raising a presumption of a common concerted plan to carry out the unlawful design.

From the mere fact that the deceased was seen at the police station, it cannot be held that he was brought at the police station in pursuance of some criminal conspiracy entered into between the accused no. 1 and accused no. 2 Police officers.[36]

Marriage between the appellant accused and the deceased wife took place about 9 years prior to the date of occurrence. No cogent evidence was led by the prosecution to show that there was conspiracy amongst the accused over such a long period of time to force the deceased to commit suicide. Held, the case under s 120B, IPC was not made out against the accused.[37]

18. Burden of Proof

The burden is upon the prosecution to prove a case of conspiracy. Nevertheless, where groups of persons are found in constant communication and each group appears to have a single form of activity which is characteristic of the group, communications between the two must receive the interpretation that the common objective of the two groups is the subject thereof unless a satisfactory explanation is offered.[38] Where several persons are charged with the same conspiracy, the prosecution must prove that there is one large conspiracy involving all the persons charged and not a number of unrelated conspiracies entered into by different groups of the accused. Unity of will and purpose amongst all the accused must be proved; and any accused not shown to be a member of that large conspiracy is entitled to acquittal, however bad his record may be and however much he may be suspected of this or that offence.[39]851

Two Conspiracies

When two conspiracies are alleged, and one is larger than the other, there may be some common factors, but the nature of offence would differ. An offence committed would not be judged by mere mentioning of the sections but the mode and manner in which the same was committed and also the nature thereof.[40]

19. Criminal Conspiracy--Explosion case--Proof

In case of a conspiracy, there cannot be any direct evidence. Express agreement between the parties cannot be proved. Circumstances proved before, during and after the occurrence have to be considered to decide about the complicity of the accused. Such a conspiracy is never hatched in open and, therefore, evaluation of proved circumstances play a vital role in establishing the criminal conspiracy.[41] In the instant case, there was evidence that the accused persons were meeting frequently at a Madrasa in the village where they used to have discussion about the place suitable for planting the bomb. The evidence about the purchase of ammonia nitrate and other relevant items, and carrying of boxes to the Madrasa cumulatively established that the accused appellants hatched conspiracy to commit the blast on Republic Day. Accused were convicted.[42]

20. 2G Spectrum Scam--Criminal Conspiracy--Prosecution of Finance Minister

Criminal conspiracy cannot be inferred from the mere fact that there were official discussions between the officers of the Ministry of Finance and that of Department of Telecommunications and between two Ministers, which were all recorded. Suspicion, however strong, cannot take the place of legal proof and the meeting between two Ministers would not, by itself, be sufficient to infer the existence of a criminal conspiracy so as to indict one of them.[43]

21. Conviction of more than one not Essential

In a prosecution for conspiracy, it is necessary to prove that there were two or more persons agreeing for purposes of the conspiracy.[44] But it is not essential that more than one person should be convicted of the offence of criminal conspiracy. It is enough if the court is in a position to find that two or more persons were actually concerned in the criminal conspiracy.[45]

Charge to be Established Against each Individual

The offence of conspiracy under s 120B, IPC is one which requires detailed and specific proof against each of the accused that he individually participated in a852 particular design to do a particular criminal thing,[46] and unless a detailed and specific proof against each of the accused has been established, there can be no conviction under this section.[47]The prosecution has to produce evidence not only to show that each of the accused has knowledge of the object of the conspiracy but also of the agreement.[48] Flimsy and unreasonable evidence does not firmly establish the guilt of the accused.[49] The fact that the appeal against the conviction of the main accused was dismissed is not sufficient to say that the charge of conspiracy against the other accused would be deemed to be proved.[50] Similarly, when the charge of conspiracy fails against one accused, the prosecution case so far as the actual assault being given by appellant/co-accused cannot be ipso facto thrown away.[51]

What the prosecution has to establish is an agreement between two or more persons to do an illegal act or a legal act by illegal means. There can be no conspiracy without an agreement in this behalf.[52] A charge of conspiracy can only be sustained if the prosecution alleges and proves an agreement to commit an illegal act or a legal act by illegal means.[53]

Where it is manifest from the evidence that the accused has not been a party either for any conspiracy or for forging the documents and making use of the same and there is no acceptable evidence that the co-accused did all this with the knowledge and consent of the appellant, his conviction under s 120B, IPC cannot be sustained.[54] Similarly, mere lack of supervision or even negligence on the part of the accused is not sufficient to draw an inference of criminal conspiracy against him.[55]

22. Whether Proof of Overt Act Necessary

In the case of a conspiracy other than a conspiracy to commit a crime, it must be proved that some act, besides the agreement to do an illegal act, has been done by one or more of the conspirators. Where the conspiracy alleged is one to commit a series of crimes, mere proof of such an agreement between the accused is sufficient to sustain a conviction and no overt act need be proved.[56] In a case where the agreement is for accomplishment of an act which by itself constitutes an offence, then in that event, no overt act is necessary to be proved by the prosecution because in such a fact situation, criminal conspiracy is established by proving such an agreement. In other words, where the conspiracy alleged is with regard to commission of a serious crime of the nature as contemplated in s 120B read with the proviso to sub-s (2) of s 120A, IPC, then in that event, mere proof of an agreement between the accused for commission of such a crime alone is enough to bring about a conviction under s 120B and the proof of any overt act by the accused or by anyone of them would not be necessary.[57] Proof of overt acts is not necessary, but if some of them were concerned in the overt acts, that would go a long way to establish that the853 agreement was in fact made by them.[58] But, as has already been stated above, it is not always possible to give direct evidence of the conspiracy, and it can only be inferred from the acts of the conspirators. In the case of a conspiracy to cheat if a specific instance of cheating is proved beyond doubt against any of the accused that would furnish the best corroboration of the offence of conspiracy because conspiracy was the root and the specific instances were the fruit.[59] The fact that several conspirators played different roles is wholly irrelevant in considering that charge. Each one is responsible for the acts of the other conspirators as well. It is not the law that every conspirator must be present at every stage of the conspiracy. If the conspirator concerned had agreed to the common design and had not resiled from that agreement, it can be presumed that he continued to be a party to the conspiracy.[60] A conspirator need not be present during the entire period of the conspiracy.[61] But where the accused kept himself away from the scene of occurrence and did not actively participate, this excludes his possibility of hatching a criminal conspiracy.[62] The conspirators must have unity of object through plurality of acts.[63]

Every Conspirator need not know Every Step of the Transaction

In a conspiracy, it is not necessary that every person knows each and every step of the transaction, which is known to the principal conspirators; simply because some one knows only a small part of the transaction, it cannot be held that he did not participate in the conspiracy.[64] In pursuance of the criminal conspiracy, when the conspirators commit several offences, then all of them will be liable for the offences even if some of them had not actively participated in the commission of the offence.[65]

The principle in such cases is that once an agreement among the conspirators is proved, it is not necessary that the participants in these offences should take, or intend to take, some part in the course of conduct that amounts to, or involves the commission of offence for establishing their guilt.[66] The proof of conspiracy in law is very largely inferential, but the inferences which are to be drawn must be, even if they are mere inferences, supported by solid evidence.[67] The mere fact, that a person had, at one time, been involved in a rebellion, would not necessarily warrant the inference that he had organized a conspiracy to shield another from legal punishment.[68]Where no actual act was attributed to the accused, there was no proof of planning or conspiracy or execution thereof, the ingredients necessary to attract s 120B, IPC, are not made out.[69]

Appellant accused wife of the main accused was keeping a watch on the victim. But there was no evidence that she was part of 'pressurize tactics' or had terrorized854 the victim or the members of his family. She was entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 364A read with s 120B .[70]

Where some persons committed murder and the accused persons were proved to be assisting them in causing the dead body to disappear clandestinely, in furtherance of the conspiracy between them, conviction of the accused persons under s 201 read with s 120B was held proper.[71] Where the charge against the accused was under ss 300 and 120B, IPC, for murder and conspiracy to kill the former Prime Minister of India, Rajiv Gandhi, one of the main accused (Nalini) made a voluntary confession assigning her pivotal role in the conspiracy, and the confession was corroborated by witnesses and material documents, conviction of the accused persons under ss 300 and 120B was maintained.[72]

A bomb blast occurred at the State Stadium where the Republic Day function was to be celebrated. The approver examined in the case proved the involvement of all the accused appellants in the case. Explosive articles in huge quality used in preparation of the bombs were recovered from the possession of the accused. Documentary evidence filed in the case also proved offence of conspiracy in the case. The appellants were convicted under the Explosive Substances Act (6 of 1908), ss 3, 4, 5 of the Explosive Act (4 of 1884) and ss 9B and 120B of the IPC .[73]

Where the concerted conduct of the accused showed that they had agreed to prepare forged railway passes, with the intention of causing wrongful loss to the railway, and in pursuance of the conspiracy they prepared forged passes, the conviction of the accused for offences under ss 120B, and 465, IPC, and 5(2) of the Prevention of Corruption Act was held proper.[74]

Prosecution case being that the appellant accused hatched conspiracy with co-accused to provide liquor mixed with 'Nitrazepam' to security guards so that the security guards would facilitate them in the commission of dacoity as after taking liquor the security guards would become unconscious, was falsified. Prosecution did not adduce evidence to show that the liquor taken by the appellant and the security guards was having Nitrazepam. The appellant had also become unconscious. Appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 120B, IPC .[75]

Where the only evidence of conspiracy, adduced by the prosecution, is the solitary and uncorroborated testimony of an interested witness, conviction of the accused for offence under s 120B, IPC cannot be recorded.[76] Where the charge against the accused was of printing counterfeit currency notes, but the evidence did not show that the machinery brought and transported was used for printing counterfeit currency notes, it was held that the accused could not be convicted of conspiracy under s 120B, IPC .[77]

In pursuance of the criminal conspiracy hatched out by accused R and U, the victim girl was kidnapped from the lawful guardianship and she was concealed and wrongfully confined at several places from 1 January 1996 to 26 February 1996, and855 she was subjected to illicit sexual intercourse by several persons. The appellant was convicted for the offences under ss 120B, 363, 365, 366A and 368 of the IPC .[78]

Where there is no evidence of any meeting of the minds of the accused and the actual assailants, the suspicion cannot be allowed to eclipse the requirement of the objective facts.[79] In the absence of any agreement link, nexus of conspiracy, the mischief of s 120B is not attracted.[80]Where the accused persons alleged to have conspired with the main accused in murdering the deceased, there was an omission of the fact of their complicity in statement before the investigating agency, besides there was previous enmity between the complainant and the accused and so there was possibility that the accused persons were falsely implicated, the act of criminal conspiracy and abetment against the accused was held not proved.[81] PW9 deposed before the Court that in his presence the accused persons had discussed their plan to kill the deceased. PW9 knew the deceased for the last 15 years, but he did alert the deceased or his family members or his relatives beforehand about the diabolical plan of the accused to kill him. The Investigating Officer (IO) recorded the statement of PW9 on 17 August 2004 under s 161, Cr PC, but he sent it to the Court only on 14 May 2005 along with the final report. The unreasonable delay on the part of the IO in sending the statement to the Court was not explained. Held, the criminal conspiracy propounded by the prosecution was not established. Appellants accused were acquitted of all the charges.[82]

The accused Chairman and member of a Subordinate Staff Selection Board in conspiracy with the accused candidate increased the marks awarded in viva voce test and included him in the list of selected candidates for pecuniary benefits. The act of the three accused persons did not amount to offence of forgery, and the accused persons prepared false record of the final result and also committed cheating. They were held guilty of offence under s 218, s 420, s 477A and s 120B, IPC .[83]

In criminal conspiracy hatched to eliminate the deceased, the co-accused, an RMP Doctor was assigned the role of administering injection containing poison to the deceased. The doctor who conducted post-mortem examination did not find any poisonous substance in the stomach of the deceased. Accused persons were acquitted of the charge under s 120B read with s 34, IPC .[84]

Where an old intimacy and love affair between a concubine (accused no 2) and the deceased paramour was broken for sometime but revived subsequently, there was no evidence to prove that accused no 1 with whom accused no 2 was living happily as his concubine, was aware of such revival, and there was also no evidence to show that accused no 2 was averse to revival of intimacy with deceased. There was no occasion for accused no 2 to agree with accused no 1 to commit murder of her previous paramour, circumstances that the deceased was last seen in the company of the accused nos 1 and 2 was found not sufficient to hold that both accused agreed to kill him, screaming of woman heard by witnesses from the house of the accused no 1 would suggest the reluctance of accused no 1 to share common intention to kill the856 deceased, on those facts the Apex Court held that the High Court was justified in holding that charge of conspiracy against accused no 2 was not proved.[85]

Appellant accused Bank Manager was alleged to have sanctioned loan for obtaining pecuniary advantage. Evidence showed that the loan sanctioned was secured by collateral security, and the senior officer of the bank after conducting pre-sanction inspection had recommended the sanction of loan. Held, the appellant had not sanctioned loan dishonestly for obtaining pecuniary advantage. Appellant was acquitted of charges under ss 120B, 420 and 468 of the IPC .[86]

Where the co-accused BDO on the loan applications verified by the accused Gram Sewak sanctioned loan and the co-accused Branch Manager of the Bank disbursed the loan, there was no evidence of any conspiracy between the three accused, the two co-accused BDO and the Branch Manager were acquitted of the charge under s 120B, IPC .[87]

Where the accused were charged for criminal conspiracy and forgery under ss 120B, 477A, IPC, the allegations were forgery of Rs 52,000 belonging to High Court, there was no proof to show that appellant/accused was entrusted with receipt of stamps by the Registrar, no evidence was produced before the trial court to show that the accused/appellant had in any manner conspired with other accused and had made false entries in the register. The Registrar of the High Court was not examined as a witness. The appellant/accused suffered trial and the appeal was fought for 10 years, on these facts conviction and sentence passed against accused was set aside.[88] There was evidence that the appellant Junior Engineer entered into criminal conspiracy with the co-accused Assistant Engineer for preparation of false muster roll, and as such false muster rolls were prepared showing names of casual labourers who had not even worked. Accused appellant verified, co-signed muster-rolls, gave false certificates. His conviction under ss 120B, 467, 468, 471 and 420, IPC was held proper.[89]

The prosecution did not lead any evidence to show any animosity or that the appellant had a strong motive to commit the murder of the deceased. To establish an offence under s 364, IPC, it must be proved that the person charged with the offence had the intention at the time of kidnapping or abduction that the person kidnapped or abducted was in danger of being murdered. The appellant was not convicted under s 364, IPC read with s 120B, IPC .[90]

Death by Poison--Not Proved

Appellants were prosecuted for offences under ss 302, 120B and 201 of the IPC on allegations that the accused persons made the deceased and his wife drink coffee in which they had mixed sleeping pills, and also administered five injections of poison. The doctor in post mortem report had opined that the cause of death could not be ascertained as the body was decomposed. According to FSL report, medicine called Diazepam 'Tranquilizer' was found in the stomach, intestine, liver, heart, kidney and lungs etc. The mere recovery of injections from a lane near the house of the accused857 was held not sufficient to record the conviction of the accused appellants. Conviction of the accused appellants for offences under ss 302, 120B and 201, IPC was held not proper and was set aside.[91]

23. Special Rules of Evidence in Section 10, Indian Evidence Act 1872

Section 10 of the Evidence Act prescribes a special rule of evidence and renders admissible, in cases of conspiracy, such evidence which is not ordinarily admissible under the English or the Indian law.[92] Section 10 of the Evidence Act, as the opening words show, will come into play only when the court is satisfied that there is reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons have conspired together to commit an offence or an actionable wrong, that is to say, there should be prima facie evidence that a person was a party to the conspiracy before his acts can be used against the co-conspirators.[93] Before the provisions of that section can be invoked it has to be established from independent evidence that there is reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons conspired together to commit an offence or an actionable wrong. When this is shown, anything said, anything done or anything written by any one of such persons would be a relevant fact as against each of the other conspirators, provided that it is in reference to their common intention. Such things said, done or written would be relevant: (a) for the purpose of proving the existence of the conspiracy and also; (b) of showing that any such person was a party to it.[94] The existence or fact of conspiracy must be proved before evidence can be given of the acts of any person not done in the presence of the accused. This must, generally speaking, be done by evidence of the party's own acts.[95] But, owing to the difficulties in the way of such proof, a deviation has, in many cases, been made from the general rule, and evidence of the acts and conduct of others have been admitted to prove the existence of a conspiracy previous to the proof of the accused's privity.[96] But in respect of such conduct a distinction has been made between declarations and confessions of persons not being mere 'hearsay' are not evidence even to prove the existence of a conspiracy. There cannot be, strictly speaking, direct evidence of the inception of a conspiracy, if any of the conspirators themselves do not choose to speak of the same.[97] The agreement to conspire may be inferred from circumstances which raise a presumption of a concerned plan to carry out an unlawful design.[98]858 After the existence of a conspiracy has been established, the particular accused must be proved to have been parties to it.[1]

24. Conviction--Essentiality

Before a person can be convicted constructively with the addition of s 120B of the IPC, the requirement of s 120A of IPC, defining criminal conspiracy would have to be met.[2]

25. Two Objections to the Applicability of Evidence under Section 10

It is true that the provision as contained in s 10 is a departure from the rule of hearsay evidence. There can be two objections to the admissibility of evidence under s 10 and they are: (a) the conspirator whose evidence is sought to be admitted against the co-conspirator is not confronted or cross-examined in court by the co-conspirator and; (b) prosecution merely proves the existence of reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons have conspired to commit an offence and that brings into operation the existence of agency relationship to implicate the co-conspirator. But then precisely under s 10, Evidence Act, the statement of a conspirator is admissible against co-conspirator on the premise that this relationship exists. Prosecution, no doubt, has to produce independent evidence as to the existence of the conspiracy for s 10 to operate but it need not prove the same beyond a reasonable doubt. Criminal conspiracy is a partnership in agreement and there is in each conspiracy a joint or mutual agency for the execution of a common object which is an offence or an actionable wrong. When two or more persons enter into a conspiracy any act done by any one of them pursuant to the agreement is, in contemplation of law, the act of each of them and they are jointly responsible therefor. This means that everything said, written or done by any of the conspirators in execution of or in reference to the common intention is deemed to have been said, done or written by each of them. A conspirator is not, however, responsible for acts done by a conspirator after the termination of the conspiracy as aforesaid. The court is, however to guard itself against readily accepting the statement of a conspirator against the co-conspirator. Section 10 is a special provision to deal with dangerous criminal combinations. The normal rule of evidence that prevents the statement of one co-accused being used against another under s 30 of the Evidence Act does not apply in the trial of conspiracy in view of s 10 of that Act. When it is said that the court has to guard itself against readily accepting the statement of the conspirator against the co-conspirator what is meant is that court looks for some corroboration to be on the safe side. It is not a rule of law but a rule of prudence bordering on law. All said and done ultimately it is the appreciation of evidence on which the court has to embark.[3]

Effect of the Two Parts of Section 10 of the Evidence Act

Section 10 of the Evidence Act mainly could be divided into two: the first part talks of where there is a reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons have859 conspired to commit an offence or an actionable wrong, and it is only when this condition precedent is satisfied that the subsequent part of the section comes into operation. The second part of s 10 permits the use of evidence which otherwise could not be used against the accused person. It is well settled that act or action of one of the accused could not be used as evidence against the other. But an exception has been carved out in s 10 in cases of conspiracy. The second part operates only when the first part of the section is clearly established, i.e., there must be reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons have conspired together in the light of the language of s 120A, IPC . It is only then the evidence of action or statements made by one of the accused could be used as evidence against the other.[4]

26. Inference in Case of Possession of a Document

When it is shown that there is reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons have conspired to commit an offence or an actionable wrong, anything said, done or written by any one of such persons in reference to their common intention becomes a relevant fact. 'Anything said' would include the statements made, speeches delivered, or knowledge of the person. Anything 'written' would include: (a) a manuscript, whether signed or unsigned, written by the person; and (b) matter transcribed by him on a typewriter. But an unknown document found in the possession of a conspirator, would not by itself be admissible for the purpose of proving the truth of its contents as against the other accused. The fact of possession would be evidence to show that the conspirator in whose possession it is found, had received and preserved it.[5] The possession of a document creates an inference that the possessor was aware of its contents.[6]

Any statement made by one conspirator to another indicating in any way the complicity of a third conspirator is a relevant fact and as such may be admitted. Whether it should be believed or not is another question.[7]Section 10 of the Evidence Act introduces the doctrine of agency and if the conditions laid down therein are satisfied, the act done by one is admissible against the co-conspirators.[8]

27. Principle of Agency--Duration of its Operation

The principle of agency imported by s 10, Evidence Act, operates from the point of time when the common intention or purpose was first entertained by any one of the conspirators till the point of time when the object of the conspiracy is achieved. This is clear also from the illustration to that section. It is thus not necessary either that every one of the conspirators should be associated with the conspiracy right from the beginning or that each should be associated with it till the common purpose is accomplished.[9] Commentary under Heading 'Theory of agency' in s 120A, ante, may be referred to.860

28. Evidentiary Value of Cipher Code

A cipher code cannot be treated as 'the act, words, or deed' of a particular person. But the fact that it exists and that the name and addresses of a number of persons, who are alleged to be parties to a conspiracy as charged are mentioned in it, the fact that it is in a peculiar form such as is not likely to be found in any code intended to be used for lawful purposes, taken along with other matters brought out in evidence may give rise to a legitimate inference that the ciphers were prepared in connection with some unlawful purpose requiring secrecy; and in the absence of evidence that the matters appearing form the secret document were associated with some legitimate or lawful purpose, the cipher code is in itself a good ground for supposing that the persons named in it had conspired to commit an offence and any other acts or writings of individual conspirator in furtherance of the common design become admissible under this section.[10]

29. Applicability of Section 10 of the evidence act not affected by any Conspirator Turning an Approver

The said section does not cease to apply to 'anything said, done, or written' by a conspirator simply because that conspirator gives evidence as an approver. The evidence of a conspirator becoming approver must be read subject to the rules of prudence and corroboration which apply to the evidence of approvers generally, but once the court is satisfied that the approver is speaking the truth, his evidence can be accepted as to anything he has 'said, done or written,' as in the case of any other conspirator.[11]

Where in order to prove a conspiracy the prosecution produced the statement of an approver before the trying magistrate, as to the existence of a conspiracy, and a number of letters written by the conspirators to each other using code words, it was held that the statements and the letters were admissible under this section.[12]

In this connection the decisions of the Supreme Court in Sardual Singh Caveeshar v State of Bombay ,[13] and Badri Rai v State of Bihar ,[14] may be referred to.

Relevancy of the Confession of a Conspirator

A confession by a conspirator made to a magistrate after arrest disclosing the existence of a conspiracy, its object and the names of its members, is not admissible under this section against the co-conspirators jointly tried with him, except under s 30, Evidence Act.[15]Section 10 is intended to make as evidence communications between different conspirators while the conspiracy is going on with reference to the carrying out of the conspiracy. The confession of a co-accused is not intended to be861 put on the same footing as a communication passing between conspirators or between conspirators and other persons with reference to the conspiracy.[16]

30. Intercepted Correspondence and the Statements of the Accused

Any intercepted correspondence between the respondents in divorce cases cannot be considered as evidence against the person to whom it is addressed for any purpose whatever.[17] But a letter written by a respondent to a co-respondent is evidence against the former.[18] In other cases copies of letters from the accused to his co-conspirators which were intercepted and reported are admissible in evidence.[19]

31. Extent of Admissibility

If prima facie evidence of the existence of a conspiracy has been led, and reasonable ground shown to believe in its existence, things said, done or written while the conspiracy was on foot are relevant as evidence of the common intention.[20] But it would be very different matter to hold that any narrative or statement or confession, made to a third party, after the common intention or conspiracy was no longer operating and had ceased to exist, is admissible against the other party. There is then no common intention of the conspirators to which the statement can have reference.[21]

Where the object of the conspiracy had been carried out and the conspiracy had come to an end, a subsequent statement cannot be said to have reference to the common intention of the conspirators.[22] Any statement made by an accused person during the trial is also not a statement made by a conspirator in reference to the common intention of the members of the conspiracy, and the statements made under s 342 (now s 313), CrPC, in the course of the trial are not, therefore, admissible in evidence against the other accused.[23]

32. Motive

In the absence of any other evidence of conspiracy, mere evidence of motive is not sufficient to connect a man with the conspiracy.[24] What may be a sufficient motive for an individual or a group of individuals may or may not be sufficient motive for others, and it is, therefore, necessary to give importance to the occurrence itself, to the participation of the accused persons in the same, and see if they were responsible862 for the crime, although it may not be possible definitely to hold that the motive ascribed was not sufficient or commensurate with the nature of the crime.[25]

33. Punishment--Offence of Conspiracy is Separately Punishable

The punishment for the offence of conspiracy under s 120B, IPC depends upon whether the illegal act has or has not been carried out. In the former case, the punishment will be in accordance with s 109, IPC, i.e., it will be the same as for the offence itself. In the latter case it will be in accordance with s 116, IPC . When, therefore, conspiracy is charged, it is always open to the prosecution to charge further that the illegal acts which were the object of the conspiracy have been carried out. Acts done in pursuance of the conspiracy cannot be separately punished unless these acts are separately charged and particularised as required by the IPC .[26] The offence of criminal conspiracy is a separate offence punishable separately from the main offence. There is no illegality in recording separate convictions and awarding separate sentences for the offence of criminal conspiracy and the offence committed in pursuance thereof.[27] However, in CR Mehta v State of Maharashtra ,[28] where the accused were convicted and sentenced for the composite ss 161 and 165A, IPC, by the trial court, the Bombay High Court had held that no separate sentence was called for under s 165A read with s 161, IPC . Conspiracy is intended to be treated as a continuing offence and whoever is a party to conspiracy during the period, for which he is charged, is liable under s 120B, IPC .[29]

Where the accused is charged for conspiracy under s 120B and also for the offence committed in furtherance of the conspiracy and is convicted on both the counts, it is not necessary to award a separate sentence under s 120B, especially if the offence was committed within a short time of the hatching of the conspiracy.[30]

Where the accused appellants were convicted for the offences of criminal conspiracy, cheating and forgery, and the occurrence took place 15 years, and before the conviction, the appellants had remained in custody for about one month, sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[31]

So, where the accused has been found guilty and convicted of an offence under s 302, read with s 34, IPC, and sentenced to imprisonment for life and no separate sentence has been awarded to him for conviction under s 302, read with s 109, IPC, no conviction or sentence under the charge for the offence under s 120B, IPC, need be recorded, and, if recorded, it is illegal.[32]

863Where a person is charged with an offence under s 302, IPC, read with s 120B, he can be convicted either under s 302 read with s 109 if the conspiracy to murder is proved or under s 302 read with s 115, if conspiracy is not proved. In either case he cannot be sentenced to 10 years' rigorous imprisonment and such punishment, if passed, is illegal.[33]

34. Stage at Which a Conspirator Joins is Material for Sentence

So far as punishment is concerned, a distinction must be drawn between the case of a person who joins a conspiracy before the actual crime which is the object of the conspiracy is committed, and the case of a person who joins it subsequent to a commission of such a crime. If, therefore, A and B conspire to commit murder and B subsequently does commit murder, A is punishable as if he had abetted that murder (s 109, IPC). But if B has already committed a murder before A conspires with him to commit it, A would be liable to be punished (if in point of fact no other murder is committed) only to the extent provided in s 115, IPC .[34]

Where the accused was the chief person to carry out the main work of the conspiracy, the fact that he made no profit for himself out of the impugned transactions, that he was old and had already been in jail for 10 days were held to be not sufficient for reducing the sentence to the period already undergone.[35] In such cases, the other accused should be treated on par in the matter of sentence and they cannot be awarded a different or more severe punishment.[36]

To say that as an accused was not admitted to the full dignity of membership of the conspiracy and was not treated as a member and he deserves leniency is a very dangerous doctrine, and would, if accepted, palliate the offence of every hired assassin. If the accused knew perfectly well what he was doing, there is no justification for awarding a lenient punishment to him.[37]

35. Acquittal on Charge of Conspiracy has no effect on other Offences

Acquittal of some of the co-accused from the charge of conspiracy cannot really affect the accusations under s 471, IPC .[38] In Madan Lal v State of Punjab ,[39] two persons were tried for alleged commission of offences punishable under ss 409, 465, 477A and 120-B, IPC . Though the accusations under s 120B were set aside, the High Court confirmed the conviction under s 409 simpliciter. A contention was raised before the Supreme Court that if the charge relating to criminal breach of trust was along with the charge of conspiracy, conviction simpliciter for criminal breach of trust would not be valid. The Supreme Court held that if the charge of conspiracy is followed by substantive charge of another offence there is nothing to prevent the court convicting an accused for the substantive charge even if the prosecution had failed to establish conspiracy.[40] Where the occurrence took place 26 years ago, and864 accused persons remained in custody for about 15 days and one month respectively, considering the circumstances, sentence reduced to period already undergone.[41]

Illustrative Cases

Where the accused were charged with offences of kidnapping, murder and conspiracy under ss 300, 364 and 120B, of the IPC, the case was based on circumstantial evidence with missing links. The conspiracy of sacrificing the life of a virgin girl for begetting a child was alleged. The chain of circumstances did not unerringly point towards guilt of the accused. The accused was held entitled to the benefit of doubt.[42]

The accused had developed intimacy with the wife of the deceased. The accused caused multiple injuries to the husband (deceased) of the wife, resulting in death. It could be true that the relations between the deceased and the wife were strained, but from this circumstance alone it could not be inferred that the wife entered into criminal conspiracy to cause the death of the husband. The conviction of the wife under s 300 read with s 120B, IPC was found not sustainable, and was set aside.[43]

In one case, about 25-30 Muslim boys, formed an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of beating and killing Hindus and assaulted bus passengers. The accused no 1, the bus driver was proved to have stopped the bus at the place of occurrence, a Muslim locality, went to the mob and induced them to attack the passengers, thereafter the mob attacked the bus, and accused driver was held to have an agreement between him and the said unlawful assembly, therefore, his conviction under s 120B, IPC was upheld.[44]

Where the accused persons were convicted by the session court under ss 120B / 302 and 302 / 34, IPC, evidence of the approver was found trustworthy and corroborated on material particulars by other witnesses, the conviction of accused persons was held justified.[45]

Where one accused sprinkled petrol on a bus and another accused lit the matchstick thereafter, the accused persons had knowledge that their acts were imminently dangerous and would cause the death of passengers or bodily injuries likely to cause death, their conviction under s 302 read with s 120B was held proper.[46]

Where the charge against the accused was under s 120 read with s 201, IPC, of criminal conspiracy and causing disappearance of evidence, the evidence on record corroborated with the evidence of approver, the conviction of the accused was maintained by the Apex Court.[47]

Where there was not an iota of evidence to prove the charge of conspiracy by the prosecution under s 120B, IPC, and even the circumstances did not prove it, the other offence for which the accused were charged were also not proved, the accused persons were held entitled to be acquitted of the charges under ss 419, 420, 120B IPC .[48]

the murder of the Head priest of the temple and his disciple. The names of the alleged assailants surfaced three days after the incident when the statement of PWS were recorded. No acceptable explanation was given for delay in recording the statements. The reluctance of the prosecution witnesses to come out with the truth and name the assailants, the delay in recording the statements of eye-witnesses and statement of PW3, the unnatural dying declaration giving minute diverse particulars about the assailants reflected on the credibility of the prosecution case. Thus, the accused were acquitted of the charges under ss 302 and 120B, IPC .[49]

Where in a case of death by poisoning the accused was charged with criminal conspiracy and murder, there was no evidence that the accused persons had pre-planned or conspired to poison the deceased, the deceased was not invited to the puja but was offered prasad when he incidentally passed by, the prior meeting of mind or conspiracy to poison deceased was thus not proved and the accused were held entitled to acquittal.[50]

The accused husband was already married, still, he got married to the prosecutrix, and had sexual intercourse with her, without disclosing his earlier marriage to the prosecutrix. Prima facie a case under s 376, IPC was made out against the accused. The parents of the accused husband residing with him did not disclose the fact of earlier marriage to the complainant, and were part of the conspiracy; thus, they can be prosecuted under s 376, IPC, read with ss 120B and 34, IPC .[51]

Where allegations were that the accused in pursuance of conspiracy with the co-accused persons passed bills and made a payment of the entire amount to the firm without receipt of the material subject of the bills, evidence showing that bills for payment were routed though various official channels including the accountant with the certificate of the incharge of schemes, there was no other evidence to link the accused with the commission of alleged offences, it was held that the action of the accused in passing payment of bills cannot be faulted with and acquittal of accused persons of offences under ss 409, 420, 120B, IPC, was found proper.[52]

Where the accused withdrew a non-refundable amount from the PF account standing in the credit of his colleague, the accused forged the signature of his colleague in the advance application form and in the account opening form in the bank and the amount deposited in the bank was also withdrawn in a fictitious name. When the crime was detected, the accused requested his colleague not to resort to criminal proceedings and he would refund the amount to him. The prosecution case against the accused was proved beyond reasonable doubt and the conviction of the866 accused under ss 120B, 419, 420, 468, 471 of the IPC read with s 13(1)(d) read with s 13(2) of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1988 was found proper.[53]

Where in case of criminal conspiracy of robbery and murder there was a confessional statement of the accused that he participated in the looting of the bank and while escaping his companion killed the deceased outside the bank, charge under s 120B was held fully established against the accused.[54]

Where the co-accused, a foreign national was found staying in the country without a valid passport and visa, his movements from one place to another with the main accused were established, large quantities of arms and ammunitions were recovered from the premises occupied by the main accused, on these facts the Apex Court held that the inference of criminal conspiracy can be drawn.[55]

Conspiracy was entered into to obtain fake passport. Accused filed application for passport, but bogus particulars were filled up in the application form. Conviction under s 120B was held proper.[56]

Where the appellant/accused and the main accused allegedly hired a killer working together in a plantation and were seen together before and after the incident, near the place of incident, these facts were held not sufficient to prove that they met each other in furtherance of conspiracy to murder the deceased, so prosecution failed to prove the charge of conspiracy against the appellant/accused who was held entitled to the benefit of doubt.[57]

The accused Bank Manager had sanctioned loan to Government employees, without making any inquiry, without inspecting the site; the accounts of the Government employees were not opened and the loan amount sanctioned was credited to the accounts of the co-accused. Held, the accused Bank Manager and co-accused entered into conspiracy and defrauded the Bank; thus, their conviction under ss 420 / 120B, IPC was upheld.[58]

Mere recoveries of a 9mm pistol and the rounds from the bungalow of the accused would not be sufficient to connect him with the said articles. The recoveries made must be found to have been made as a consequence of the statement made by the accused in custody. If the nexus between the two is not established, the said statement made would be inadmissible in evidence. Acquittal of the accused for offence under s 6 of TADA Act and s 120B, IPC was held proper.[59]

There was evidence of rivalry and strained relations between the accused persons and the deceased as the deceased was creating hurdle in the business,running of educational institution, and the family life of the accused. The evidence of the eye-witnesses proved the assault and firing indulged in by the accused persons. The manner in which the accused fled after the commission of the crime clearly indicated867 their involvement in the offence to conduct a conspiracy. The ocular evidence adduced in the case was in accordance with medical evidence. The conviction of the accused appellants under s 302, IPC read with s 120B, IPC was held proper.[60]

Appellant accused, wife of the main accused kept the kidnapped person inside her house, supplied him food knowing fully that her husband and his companions had kidnapped the victim. Her conviction under ss 364A, 365, 346, 343 read with 120B of the IPC was held proper.[61]868

1. Scope

Sections 121, 121A and 122, IPC specifically relate to offences against the state. While s 121 provides punishment for those engaged in waging of war against the Government of India, the other two sections relate to conspiracy and preparation to commit such offence by collecting arms, etc., respectively.[13] Sections 121 - 124A deal with offences against the security of the state. Of these, s 121 deals with the highest form of treason, which is punishable with death or imprisonment for life and also fine. What is punishable under this section is not only the actual waging of war against the Government of India, but also attempting or abetting such war.

The Statute of Treason 1351,[14] which superseded the rules of Common Law in England restricted high treason to seven classes only. These seven classes as set out by Hale[15] are as follows:

(i) When a man doth compass of imagine the death of our Lord the King, or our lady his Queen, or of their eldest son and heir; or
(ii) If a man do violate the King's companion (i.e., consort) or the King's eldest daughter unmarried, or the wife of the King's son and heir;[16] or

(iii) If a man do levy war against our Lord the King in his realm; or

(iv) Be adherent to the King's enemies in his realm, giving them aid and comfort in the realm or elsewhere, and thereof be provably attained of open deed by the people of their condition; and

(v) If a man counterfeits the King's great or privy seal, or his money; and

(vi) If a man brings false money into this realm counterfeit to the money of England...knowing the money to be false, to merchandise or make payment in deceit of our Lord the King and of his people; and

(vii) If a man slays the Chancellor, Treasurer, or the King's Justices of the one Bench or the other, Justice in Eire, or Justices of Assise, and all other Justices assigned to hear and determine, being in their places doing their offices.

Of these the first two were omitted in India as it was considered unlikely for the king to visit India.[17] Offences (v) and (vi) above cannot be said to be treason in the proper sense and have been relegated to Chapter XII of the IPC . The seventh is only applicable to the Chancellor, Treasurers and the king's judges in England. The remaining two are the only high treasons which have been incorporated and enacted in India but in a modified form.

The fundamental characteristics of high treason was the betrayal of the faith and allegiance which were due from a subject to his sovereign as the supreme head of the state.[18] Every citizen is entitled to claim the protection of the state and for that reason, has the corresponding duty of allegiance to the state. Allegiance follows protection as a matter of course.

873This section is remarkable for the fact that it specifically provides for the offence of abetment of waging war. Under expln 2 of s 108, the offence of abetment is constituted even when the act abetted is not committed and, as was pointed out in Emperor v Ganesh Damodar Savarkar ,[19] while under the general law as to abetment a distinction is made for the purposes of punishment between abetment which has succeeded and abetment which has failed, s 121 does away with that distinction and deals equally with an abettor whose instigation has led to a war and one whose instigation had no effect whatsoever. Another unusual feature is that by virtue of the provisions of s 94 of the IPC, compulsion is not a defence to a charge under s 121, although it might well, according to the circumstances, operate in mitigation of punishment.[20]

2. 'Whoever'

This word is a substitute for the words 'if a man' in the Statute of Treason. It includes all persons, whether Indian citizens, who owe allegiance by birth or naturalisation, or foreigners who owe allegiance by virtue of their residence.[21]

Articles 5 - 10 of the Articles 10- 10 of the Constitution of India and the Indian Citizenship Act 1955 deal with the subject of 'acquisition and termination of Indian citizenship'.

The word 'whoever' is a word of broad import. Advisedly such language was employed departing from the observations made in the context of Treason statute. There is no good reason why the foreign nationals stealthily entering into the Indian territory with a view to subverting the functioning of the Government and destabilizing the society should not be held guilty of waging war within the meaning of section 121 . The section on its plain terms, need not be confined only to those who owe allegiance to the established Government.[22]

3. Insurrection

Organizing or joining an insurrection against the Government of India is also a form of war. 'Insurrection' as defined in dictionaries and as commonly understood connotes a violent uprising by a group directed against the Government in power or the civil authorities.

Rebellion, revolution and civil war are progressive stages in the development of civil unrest, the most rudimentary form of which is 'insurrection'--videPan American World Air Inc v Actna Cas and Sur Co .[23]An act of insurgency is different from belligerency. It needs to be clarified that insurrection is only illustrative of the expression 'war' and it is seen from the old English authorities that it would cover situations analogous to insurrection if they tend to undermine the authority of the Ruler or Government.[24]

874The following statement of law by Sir Michael Foster is instructive :

> There is a difference between those insurrections which have carried the appearance of an army formed under leaders, and provided with military weapons, and with drums, colours etc., and those other disorderly tumultuous assemblies which have been drawn together and conducted to purposes manifestly unlawful, but without any of the ordinary shew and apparatus of war before mentioned. I do not think any great stress can be laid on that distinction. It is true, that in case of levying war the indictments generally charge, that the defendants were armed and arrayed in a warlike manner; and, where the case would admit of it, the other circumstances of swords, guns, drums, colours, etc., have been added. But I think the merits of the case have never turned singly on any of these circumstances.[25]

4. Concept of War in the Section

War, terrorism and violent acts to overawe the established Government have many things in common. It is not too easy to distinguish them, but one thing is certain, the concept of war imbedded in s 121 is not to be understood in international law sense of inter-country war involving military operations by and between two or more hostile countries. Section 121 is not meant to punish prisoners of war of a belligerent nation. Apart from the legislative history of the provision and the understanding of the expression by various High Courts during the pre-independence days, the illustration to s 121 itself makes it clear that 'war' contemplated by s 121 is not conventional warfare between two nations.[26]

The concept of war in s 121 which includes insurrection or a civilian uprising should not be understood in the sense of conventional war between two nations or sovereign entities. The normative phenomenon of war as understood in international sense does not fit into the ambit and reach of s 121 .[27]

5. 'Wages War'--Old Law

The provision as originally framed (s 109, the first section of Chapter Five, 'Of offences against the State') was confined to the waging of war, or the attempt to wage war, or the abetment thereof 'against the Government of any part of the territories of the East India Company', and three illustrations to the section were given by way of example, namely:

(i) the joining 'an army of a Foreign Power' invading the said territories;
(ii) conspiring 'to cause an insurrection against the East Indian Company's Government in one of the Presidencies;
(iii) instigating a native power to make war on the Government of India.

6. Views of the Law Commission

In their Second Report on the draft Code (under date 24 June 1847), the Indian law commissioners quoted with approval the opinion of the English Criminal Law Commission that the crime specified in the Statute of Treasons 'is in plain and unambiguous terms declared by the Statute to consist in a levying of war', and that 'there is nothing in the Statute to indicate that these terms were intended to be used875 otherwise than according to their literal sense', and they consequently deprecated the latitude of construction (of the Statute) beyond what, in their opinion, the Statute of Treasons contemplated, but which had been sanctioned by high Judicial authority'.

The commissioners on the Indian Penal Code continued:

> So also we conceive the terms 'waging war against the Government' naturally to import a person arraying himself in defiance of the Government in like manner and by like means as a foreign enemy would do; and it seems to us, as we presume it did to the authors of the Code, that any definition of terms so unambiguous, would be superfluous.[28]

7. Meaning of the Term 'Waging War'

The expression 'waging war' means and can only mean waging war in the manner usual in war.[29] The draft of the IPC as prepared in 1837 received careful and elaborate revision at the hands of the first Legislative Council of the Governor-General which was established by the East India Company Act 1853, and in 1860, after the passing of the Government of India Act 1858, (which transferred the Government of East India Company's territories to the Crown) the Code as revised became law, the words 'the Queen' (or 'the Sovereign for the time being of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland', s 13) being substituted in s 121 for the words 'the Government of any part of the territories of the East India Company' which appeared in the corresponding s 109 of the draft IPC . It will be observed that like the latter section, s 121 is confined to waging war, in the sense above explained, and the Code nowhere expressly provides for acts of violence directed against the person of the sovereign. Both the framers of the IPC[30] and the Indian Law Commissioners[31] were of the opinion that the imperial legislature should do what cannot be done by the local legislature, and should pass a law of high treason for the territories of the East India Company:

> 'as far, indeed, as respects the Royal person, the present state of the law, though in theory unseemly, is not likely to cause any practical evil. It is highly improbable that any English King will visit his Indian dominions,[32] (tempora mutantur) or that any plot, having for its object the death of an English King, will ever extend its ramifications to India'.

No such statute has, however, been passed. The term 'wages war' must therefore be taken to mean the taking part in the open and avowed hostilities of an invading army or guerrilla warfare or in an armed insurrection, revolution, or mutiny.[33]

Where foreign national(s) enter the territory of India with the object of destabilizing society and subvert the society, they are guilty of the offence of waging war against the Government of India falling under Section 121IPC .[34]

In "waging war", the intent of the foreign enemy is not only to disturb public peace or law and order or to kill many people. A foreign enemy strikes at the sovereignty of the State, and his conspiracy and actions are motivated by that animus.[35]

876The words 'wages war' in s 121 are synonymous with 'levying war' in the Statute, 25 Edward, 3 c 2, which offence is declared to be treason; and the meaning of these words has long been settled, although their full significance is seldom understood.[36] In Barindra Kumar Ghosh v Emperor ,[37]

Jenkins CJ, observed:

> It is argued on behalf of the Crown that it was intended by the framers of the Indian Penal Code to reproduce the English Law of Treason in its entirety, that is to say, not only the Statute Law, but also the interpretation placed on it by the cases. But anyone who has studied the history of section 121, which was a part of the law of the land before its incorporation in the Indian Penal Code, and the literature on the subject, must know that this was not the intention of those who framed the provisions.

Relying on these observations, it was contended in a Nagpur case, that the interpretation placed by the English Judges upon the English law of treason should not be followed in India. But this contention overlooks the fact that the learned chief justice's observations referred to the argument advanced in that case that 'it was intended by the framers of the IPC to reproduce the English Law of Treason in its entirety, that is to say, not only the Statute Law but also the interpretation placed upon it by the cases'. The meaning of the observations becomes clear in Barindra Kumar Ghosh v Emperor ,[38] where the learned chief justice observed that collection of weapons for a far-off revolution amounts, though not to waging war, to a conspiracy to wage war. What he really laid down was that the words 'wages war' must be understood in their ordinary sense and that overt acts such as the collection of arms and ammunition for that purpose do not amount to waging war.[39]

8. What Constitutes a Levying of War in England

In order to constitute a levying of war against the King, in England it is neither the number of people who got engaged, nor the force they employed, nor the species of weapons with which they may be armed, that will constitute the overt act of treason. It is the purpose and intention, the object which they have in view, which congregates and assembles them together, which gives them the impulse in their arming and in their rising, which constitutes treason, and distinguishes the crime from that of riot, or any other rising. If a rising and insurrection be for a public purpose, to resist the King's authority, to compel him to do or to refrain from doing what it is part of his prerogative to do or not to do as he thinks proper, if it be to compel him to change his measures and councils, it amounts to treason.[40] In R v Forst ,[41] Tindall CJ, in his charge to the jury, expressed himself thus:

> An assembly of men, armed and arrayed in a warlike manner with any treasonable purpose, is a levying of war, although no blow be struck; and the enlisting and drilling and marching bodies of men are sufficient overt acts of that treason, without coming to a battle or action. And, if this be the case, the actual conflict between such a body and the Queen's forces must, beyond all doubt, amount to a levying of war against the Queen...and, as has already been adverted to, it is quite unnecessary to constitute the guilt of treason that the tumultuous multitude should appear to be accompanied with the pomp and pageantry of war, or with military array. Insurrection and rebellion are more877 humble in their first infancy, but all such external marks of pomp will not fail to be added with the first gleam of success...It may be proper to inform you, that in the case of treason the law knows no distinction between principal accessory; all who partake in the treason incur the same guilt, and are liable to the same punishment; the treasonable design once evidenced, the man who instigated, incited, procured, or persuaded others to commit the act, though not present in person at the commission of it, is equally a traitor, to all intents and purposes, as the man by whose hand the act of treason is committed. He who leads the armed multitude towards point of attack, and then retires before the blow is struck; he who remains at home, planning and directing the proceedings but leaving the actual execution of such plans to more daring hands; all these are equally guilty in the eye of law of the crime of high treason.

9. English View Followed in India

The English view has been followed by the courts in India.[42] A person taking part in an organised armed attack on the constituted authorities, that attack having for its object the subversion of the government and the establishment of another in its place, would be guilty of the offence of waging war.[43]

But it is the fundamental right of every citizen to have his own political theories and ideas and to propagate them and work for their establishment so long as he does not seek to do so by force and violence or contravene any provision of law. To work by peaceful means to bring about the end of capitalism and private ownership and the establishment of a socialist state does not amount to waging war.[44] The expression 'waging war' means, and can only mean, 'waging war in the manner usual in war'. In other words, in order to support a conviction on such a charge, it is not enough to show that the persons charged have contrived to obtain possession of an armoury and have, when called upon to surrender it, used the rifles and ammunition so obtained against the government's troops. It must also be shown that the seizure of the armoury was part and parcel of a planned operation and that their intention in resisting the government's troops was to overwhelm and defeat the same and then go on and crush any further opposition with which they might meet until either the leaders of the movement succeeded in obtaining possession of the machinery of government or until those in possession of it yielded to the demands of their leaders.[45]

Where the object of the accused was to overthrow the established government, and with this object in view they raided villages recruiting people to their gang punishing those who refused to do so, it was held that they were guilty of waging war.[46]

A deliberate and organised attack upon the government forces amounts to 'waging war' if the object of the insurgents be to overcome the servants of the government by armed force and violence and thereby prevent the general collection of taxes.[47]878

10. Principles on Waging War

Reviewing the earlier authorities a Division Bench of the Nagpur High Court observed:[48]

From these authorities the following principles emerge:

(i) No specific number of persons is necessary to constitute an offence under s 121, Penal Code.
(ii) The number concerned and the manner in which they are equipped or armed are not material.
(iii) The true criterion is quo animo,i.e., did the gathering assemble?
(iv) The object of the gathering must be to attain by force and violence an object of a general public nature, thereby striking directly against the government's authority.
(v) There is no distinction between principal and accessory and all who take part in the unlawful act incur the same guilt.

11. Terrorist Act

It has been aptly said by Sir J F Stephen:

> Unlawful assemblies, riots, insurrections, rebellions, levying of war are offences which run into each other and not capable of being marked off by perfectly definite boundaries. All of them have in common one feature, namely, that the normal tranquility of a civilised society is, in each of the cases mentioned, disturbed either by actual force or at least by the show and threat of it.[49]

To this list has to be added 'terrorist acts' which are so conspicuous now-a-days. Though every terrorist act does not amount to waging war, certain terrorist acts can also constitute the offence of waging war and there is no dichotomy between the two. Terrorist acts can manifest themselves into acts of war. Terrorist acts prompted by an intention to strike at the sovereign authority of the State/Government, tantamount to waging war irrespective of the number involved or the force employed.[50]

12. Concept of War in International Law Sphere

It needs to be noticed that even in international law sphere there is no standard definition of war. Prof L Oppenheim in his well-known treatise on International Law has given a definition marked by brevity and choice of words. The learned author said: 'war is a contention between two or more States through their armed forces, for the purpose of overpowering each other and imposing such conditions of peace as the victor pleases.' Yoram Dinstein, an expert in international law field analysed the said definition in the following words:

> There are four major constituent elements in Oppenheim's view of War: (i) there has to be a contention between at least two States (ii) the use of the armed forces of those States is required, (iii) the purpose must be overpowering the enemy (as well as the imposition of peace on the victor's terms); and it may be implied, particularly from the words 'each other' and (iv) both parties are expected to have symmetrical, although diametrically opposed, goals.

The learned author commented that Oppenheim was entirely right in excluding civil wars from his definition. Dinstein attempted the definition of 'war' in the following terms:

> War is a hostile interaction between two or more States, either in a technical or in a material sense. War in the technical sense is a formal status produced by a declaration of war. War in the material sense is generated by actual use of armed force, which must be comprehensive on the part of at least one party to the conflict.

In international law, we have the allied concepts of undeclared war, limited war, war-like situation, the nuances of which it is not necessary to unravel.[51]

13. Terrorist's Attack on Parliament is Waging War against the Government

In State (NCT of Delhi) v Navjot Sandhu ,[52] the Apex Court held:

> The single most important factor which impels us to think that this is a case of waging or attempting to wage war against the Government of India is the target of attack chosen by the slain terrorists and conspirators and the immediate objective sought to be achieved thereby. The battle-front selected was the Parliament House Complex. The target chosen was the Parliament - a symbol of sovereignty of the Indian republic. Comprised of peoples' representatives, this supreme law-making body steers the destinies of vast multitude of Indian people. It is a constitutional repository of sovereign power that collectively belongs to the people of India. The executive Government through the Council of Ministers is accountable to Parliament. Parliamentary democracy is a basic and inalienable feature of the Constitution. Entering the Parliament House with sophisticated arms and powerful explosives with a view to lay a siege of that building at a time when members of Parliament, members of Council of Ministers, high officials and dignitaries of the Government of India gathered to transact Parliamentary business, with the obvious idea of imperiling their safety and destabilising the functioning of Government and in that process, venturing to engage the security forces guarding the Parliament in armed combat, amounts by all reasonable perceptions of law and common sense, to waging war > against the Government. The whole of this well planned operation is to strike directly at the sovereign authority and integrity of our Republic of which the Government of India is an integral component. The attempted attack on the Parliament is an undoubted invasion of the sovereign attribute of the State including the Government of India which is its alter ego. The attack of this nature cannot be viewed on the same footing as a terrorist attack on some public office building or an incident resulting in the breach of public tranquility. The deceased terrorists were roused and impelled to action by a strong anti-Indian feeling as the writings on the fake Home Ministry sticker found on the car (Ext. PW 1/8) reveals. The huge and powerful explosives, sophisticated arms and ammunition carried by the slain terrorists who were to indulge in 'Fidayeen' operations with a definite purpose in view, is a clear indicator of the grave danger in store for the inmates of the House. The planned operations if executed, would have spelt disaster to the whole nation. A war-like situation lingering for days or weeks would have prevailed. Such offensive acts of unimaginable description and devastation would have posed a challenge to the Government and the democratic institutions for the protection of which the Government of the day stands. To underestimate it as a mere desperate act of a small group of persons who were sure to meet death, is to ignore the obvious realities and to stultify the wider connotation of the expression of 'war' chosen by the drafters of IPC . The target, the obvious objective which has political and public dimensions and the modus880 operandi adopted by the hard-core 'Fidayeens' are all demonstrative of the intention of launching a war against the Government of India.[53]

When an attack on the Parliament was planned, the executors of the plan should have envisaged that they will encounter resistance from the police and other armed security personnel deployed on duty, fairly in large numbers, at the Parliament complex. The slain terrorists and other conspirators should have necessarily aimed at overpowering or killing the armed personnel who would naturally come in their way. Inflicting casualties on the police and security personnel on duty as well as civilians, if necessary, would have been part of the design and planning of these hard-core terrorists and the criminal conspirators. It is not necessary that in order to constitute the offence of waging war, military or other forces should have been the direct target of attack. There is no such hard and fast rule and nothing was said to that effect in the long line of cases referred to supra. The act laying siege of Parliament House or such other act of grave consequences to the Government and the people is much more reflective of the intention to wage war rather than an attack launched against a battalion of armed men guarding the border or vital installations.[54] Thus, the criminal acts done by the deceased terrorists in order to capture the Parliament House is an act that amounts to waging or attempting to wage war.[55]

14. Question of Declaration of War by Government

The question of formal declaration of war by the Government would only arise in a case of outbreak of armed conflict with another country or a political group having the support of another nation. It may be, in a case of civil war and a rebellion spreading through the length and breadth of the country, the Government will have to control it on war footing and it might even consider it expedient to declare that a state of war exists, but this theoretical possibility cannot be a guiding factor in construing the expression 'waging war' in s 121 especially when there is no legal provision mandating the Government to make such declaration.[56]

15. Distinction between Riot and Waging War

It is sometimes a matter of difficulty to say whether there has been a levying or waging of war or merely a riot of a serious kind. 'Rioting' is defined in s 146, IPC, and the test to determine 'whether a body of persons are rioters or rebels is quo animo,i.e., did the parties assemble?'[57]

Although the offence of waging war against the government and committing a riot may often run into each other, the distinction between them is clear. Where the rioting or tumult is merely to accomplish some private purpose interesting only to those engaged in it, not resisting or calling in question the state's authority or prerogative, then the tumult, however, numerous or outrageous the mob may be, is only a riot. But wherever the rising or insurrection has for its object a general purpose, not confined to the peculiar interests of the persons concerned in it, but common to the whole community, and striking directly against the state's authority,881 then it assumes the character of treason. The numbers concerned and the manner in which they were equipped or armed, are not material.

Prima facie, persons who attack a police station are guilty of rioting, and if the state charges them instead with waging war against the government, it is incumbent upon it to show that there is an insurrection and not a riot, and that insurrection is for the accomplishment of an object of a general nature.[58] In 1820, Lord President Hope in his summing up speech to the jury in Rex v Andrew Hardie ,[59] explained the distinction between levying a war and committing a riot in the following words :

> Gentlemen, it may be useful to say a few words on the distinction between levying war against the King and committing a riot. The distinction seems to consist in this, although they may often run very nearly into each other. Where the rising or tumult is merely to accomplish some private purpose, interesting only to those engaged in it, and not resisting or calling in question the King's authority or prerogative then the tumult, however numerous or outrageous the mob may be, is held only to be a riot. For example, suppose a mob to rise, and even by force of arms to break into a particular prison and rescue certain persons therein confined, or to oblige the Magistrates to set them at liberty or to lower the price of provisions in a certain market, or to tear down certain enclosures, which they conceive to encroach on the town's commons. All such acts, though severely punishable, and though they may be resisted by force, do not amount to treason. Nothing is pointed against either the person or authority of the King.[60]

> But, gentlemen, wherever the rising or insurrection has for its object a general purpose, not confined to the peculiar views and interests of the persons concerned in it, but common to the whole community, and striking directly the King's authority or that of Parliament, then it assumes the character of treason. For example, if mobs were to rise in different parts of the country to throw open all enclosures and to resist the execution of the law regarding enclosures wheresoever attempted, to pull down all prisons or Courts of justice, to resist all revenue officers in the collecting of all or any of the taxes; in short, all risings to accomplish a general purpose, or to hinder a general measure, which by law can only be authorised or prohibited by authority of the King or Parliament, amount to levying of war against the King and have always been tried and punished as treason. It is, therefore, not the numbers concerned, nor the force employed by the people rising in arms, but the object which they have in view that determines the character of the crime, and will make it either riot or treason, according as that object is of a public and general, or private and local nature.[61]

16. 'Against the Government of India'

The expression 'Government of India' was substituted for the expression 'Queen' by the Adaptation of Laws Order of 1950.[62] This section uses the expression 'against the Government of India' and not 'government or any state government' as used in s 121A . When a man is attacked by his opponent and receives some injury in any part of his882 body, we do not say that any part or that injured part of the man has been attacked for the simple reason that the various individual parts of the body have no separate existence of their own and all such parts constituent one inseparable body. Similarly, 29 states and 7 union territories constitute one integrated country, i.e., India or Bharat (art 1 and Sch I to the Constitution of India). Every state or union territory forming part of India is an integral part of this country. Under arts 256 - 257 of the Constitution, the Union Government or the Government of India has power to issue necessary directions to the states in certain matters. Under art 260 only the Government of India can enter into agreement with the government of any territory outside India in respect of certain matters and similar power has not been given to any state. Under art 355 it is the duty of the Union to protect every state not only against external aggression but also against internal disturbance and to ensure that the government of every state is carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. Under art 53(2) the supreme command of the defence forces of the Union vests in the Union and no state is competent to raise its own defence forces. In view of this frame work of our Constitution if anybody wages war against any part of India, it will be deemed that the war has been waged against the Government of India. It is because of these considerations that the terms 'against the state government' has not been used along with the term 'against the Government of India' in this section.

The war contemplated by this section must be waged against the government. Mere violence, however great it may be, cannot amount to waging war against the Government of India.

The expression 'Government of India' is used in s 121 to imply the Indian State, the juristic embodiment of the sovereignty of the country that derives its legitimacy from the collective will and consent of its people.[63]

17. Abets the Waging of such War

Under the English law mere words spoken, however wicked and abominable, if they do not relate to any act or design then actually on foot against the life of the King, or the levying of a war against him, and in the contemplation of the speaker, do not amount to treason. And the same has been held to apply to writings.[64] But under IPC, the waging or levying of war and the abetting of it are put upon the same footing by this section. That is, the abetting of waging war is, under the IPC as much an offence of treason as the waging of war itself. This word 'abetment' is defined in s 107 and one of the ways in which an offence can be abetted is by 'instigating any person to do anything'. The meaning of abetment is not excluded by anything that occurs in s 121, IPC . The general law as to abetment is laid down in ss 107 - 120, IPC . To constitute 'abetment', it is not necessary that the act abetted should be committed or that the effect requisite to constitute the offence should be caused. This applies to the abetment of waging of war against the state as much as to the abetment of any other offence under the IPC . The only difference created between the former offence and other offences is that, while under the general law as to abetment a distinction is made for the purposes of punishment between abetment which has succeeded, and abetment which has failed, s 121 does away with the distinction so far as the offence883 of waging war is concerned and deals equally with an abettor whose instigation has led to a war and one whose instigation has taken no effect whatsoever.[65]

So long as a man only tries to inflame feeling, to excite a state of mind he is not guilty of anything more than sedition. It is only when he definitely and clearly incites to action that he is guilty of instigating and therefore abetting the waging of war.[66] This is the distinction between the offence of waging war and that of sedition under s 124A, IPC .

Under s 39 of the CrPC, every person aware of the commission of, or of the intention of any other person to commit, an offence punishable under ss 121 - 126, or 130, IPC must, in the absence of a reasonable excuse, give information thereof to the nearest magistrate or police officer. 'Offence' in s 39 includes any act committed at any place out of India which would constitute an offence if committed in India. Omitting to so report may amount to abetment by aiding under cl 3 of s 107 . But that clause relates only to intentional aiding. Where it is not proved that the accused's intention in omitting to report a plot, under s 39 of the CrPC, was with a view to aiding the waging war, the accused cannot be convicted of the offence of abetment of waging war. If a conspirator has formed the intention to leave a conspiracy and ceases to be a conspirator by his own act and intention when the other conspirators wage war, he cannot be held guilty under s 121 of the IPC .[67]

The accused was an influential man in a village which was the hotbed of a rebellion. He was the president of an association whose activities in regard to capitation tax were the preliminaries to the rebellion. Then, when the rebellion broke out, he assisted the rebels by feeding them after a battle and he helped in getting persons tattooed, i.e., enrolled as participants, or sympathizers of the rebellion. It was held that the accused abetted the waging of war and was guilty of the offence under s 121 .[68]

Conspiracy to wage war is punishable by s 121A, IPC . Refer to notes under that section.

Accused Pakistani nationals who had intruded into Indian territory, were arrested by the members of the Boarder Security Forces. Arms and ammunitions were recovered from their possession. Plea of the accused that they were fishermen was found false. Their conviction under ss 121, 121A, 122 and 123, IPC was held proper.[69]

18. No Distinction between Principal and Accessory

There is no distinction between the principal and accessory in an offence under this section.[70]Where parties concert together and have a common object, the act of one of the parties, done in furtherance of the common object and in pursuance of the concerted plan, is the act of all of them. Each party is an agent of the others in884 carrying out the objects of the conspiracy, and doing anything in furtherance of the common design.[71] But a distinction though fine, must be made between men who plan and execute a raid and those who, swept along in the maelstrom of events and sudden frenzy, participate in an offence of that kind. The latter cannot be held liable under this section.[72]

19. Previous Sanction of Government Necessary

Commentary for s 196, CrPC 1973[73] may be referred to.

20. Joinder of Charges

Where charges under ss 121, 121A and 122, IPC purport to place before the court different aspects of the same transaction, their joinder is not illegal.[74] The offence under this section is a continuing offence, and a charge is not illegal by reason of contravening s 219, CrPC, by mentioning more than three offences spread over a period longer than a year.[75]

21. Limitation

The special limitation of the period of prosecution in cases of treason and misprision of treason under state 7 Wm III C 3, s 5 in England, is an exception to the general rule in criminal cases. In enacting this section in IPC, the legislature has not thought it fit to limit in any way the period within which a prosecution for an offence under the enactment may be commenced, and consequently such limitation does not form part of the IPC .[76] The period of limitation prescribed by s 468, CrPC 1973 also does not apply to offences under this section.

Where an accused was summarily convicted by a magistrate having no jurisdiction on 06 September 1921, under s 149, IPC, and the conviction was subsequently set aside by the High Court on habeas corpus proceedings on 30 August 1922, and the government decided on 08 December 1922, to prosecute the same accused under s 121, IPC, it was held that in view of the unexplained delay and the fact that the accused had succeeded before the High Court, he should not be further prosecuted.[77]

22. Arrest, Bail and Court of Trial

An offence punishable under this section is cognizable, non-bailable and triable by a court of session. (Refer to the First Sch to the CrPC 1973). Refer to s 196, CrPC 1973.[78] An accused involved in a case under this section can, therefore, be arrested without a warrant.885

23. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I, (name and office of the Sessions Judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the day of...at...waged war against the Government of India...(mention the details, if necessary) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 121 of the Indian Penal code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

(Signature and seal of the Magistrate)

24. Proof

The treason alleged must be proved by overt acts. The acts, upon which it is intended to rely, must be expressly alleged in the indictment and no evidence is admissible of any overt act that is not so alleged unless it affords direct proof of the overt acts that are laid. Where the overt acts, alleged in the indictment, includes acts of conspiracy, evidence may be given of acts committed by co-conspirators in execution of the common design even if committed after the date of the overt acts alleged and after accused's arrest.[79]

25. Death Sentence

In case of terrorist attack on Parliament, where a conspiracy had been entered into to wage war against the Government of India, there were heavy casualties, The incident shocked the entire nation, and so death sentence awarded was held proper.[80]

Accused appellant Kasab was found guilty of waging war against the Government of India and causing death of several persons. Attack had shocked the conscience of the nation. Death sentence was held justified.[81]

26. Life Imprisonment

In an earlier incident, one person of the 'Jehadi' group was killed. The accused persons in order to take revenge attacked the American Centre causing the death of five police personnel and injuries to others. As many as seventeen persons including the two accused appellants participated in the attack. The accused were found guilty for waging war/attempting to wage war against the Government of India. The attack was supported by foreign nationals. On the facts and circumstances of the case, the imposition of death sentence on the appellants AF and N was held not warranted, the accused appellant N was sentenced to imprisonment for minimum thirty years without remission and accused AF was sentenced to imprisonment for entire life.[82]886

Chapter VI

Of Offences Against the State

[83][S. 121A.

Conspiracy to commit offences punishable by Section 121 .--

Whoever within or without [84][India] conspires to commit any of the offences punishable by section 121,[85][* * ] or conspires to overawe, by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force, [86][the Central Government or any [87][State] Government [88][ * *], shall be punished with [89][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description which may extend to ten years, [90][and shall also be liable to fine].

Explanation.--To constitute a conspiracy under this section, it is not necessary that any act or illegal omission shall take place in pursuance thereof.]

Comments

1. Scope

The relevant portion of the section, as it appeared in the Bill which led to its insertion, was:

> Wherever ...conspires to wage or abet civil war shall be punished with transportation for life, or any shorter term, or with imprisonment of either description which may extend to ten years.

Explanation 2 ran thus:

> Civil war means permanent and organised hostile operations carried on by any one section of the community against any other section of it.

Appended to this were two illustrations, one of which was:

An attack upon an arsenal might be civil war if it was intended as the first step towards permanent hostilities.[91]

2. Legislative Changes

This section was added by s 4 of the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act 1870 and since then has undergone a number of amendments. The words 'and shall also be887 liable to fine' at the end were inserted by s 3 of the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act 1921. The words 'British India' after the words 'within or without' were successively substituted by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1948 and 1950 and the Pt B states (Laws) Act 1951, to read as 'India'. The words 'or to deprive the Queen of the sovereignty of the Provinces or of any part thereof' after the figure '121' as amended by AO 1937 and AO 1948 for the original words were repealed by AO of 1950. The words 'the Central Government or any Provincial Government' after the words 'Criminal force' were substituted for the words 'Government of India or any Local Government' by AO of 1950. The words 'or the Government of Burma' before the words 'shall be punished' were repealed by AO 1948.

3. Marginal Note to the Section

The marginal note to this section is 'conspiracy to commit offences punishable by s 121, IPC . This was a strictly accurate description of the section proposed to be enacted by the bill originally introduced in the legislative council, as the conspiracies aimed at were conspiracies either to wage war against the King in the manner in which it was usual to wage war or conspiracies to raise an insurrection with the object of subverting the constitution. The section, however, as it was finally enacted, brought within its scope other conspiracies also, and the marginal note is, therefore, not a strictly accurate description of what is contained in it. The words 'conspires to overawe by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force the Central Government or any state government' clearly embrace not merely a conspiracy to raise a general insurrection, but also a conspiracy to overawe the Central or a state government, by the organisation of a serious riot or a large and tumultuous unlawful assembly.[92]

4. "Whoever"

Commentary under same heading in s 121 may be referred to.

5. Two Kinds of Conspiracies Embraced

The section, as it now stands, embraces two kinds of conspiracies: (a) conspiracies to commit any of the offences punishable by s 121, and (b) conspiracies to overawe, by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force, the Central or any State Government.

The conspiracies dealt with in this section may be distinguished from criminal conspiracies dealt with in ss 120A and 120B . In Mir Hasan Khan v State ,[93] Shearer J, (for self and Jamuar J) observed:

> Section 121A occurs in a chapter of the Penal Code which is headed 'Offences against the State', whereas the offence of conspiracy is contained in the preceding chapter, Chapter VA which is headed 'Criminal Conspiracy'. The Legislature in enacting section 121A clearly had in mind the English Treason Felony Act of 1948 and I am very much inclined to think that, in enacting it, it did not aim at conspiracies other than conspiracies which had a political object, that is, conspiracies to overthrow the existing constitution or conspiracies to prevent the enactment of legislation which was888 considered to be obnoxious or to compel the resignation of a member or members of the Government who had become unpopular. As the Section > stands, however, I am not prepared to say that in certain circumstances persons who organise a strike among policemen or certain other public or municipal employees might not render themselves liable to prosecution under it. Clearly, however, persons do not commit this crime unless it was part and parcel of their plans to overawe the Central or the Provincial Government by criminal force or show of criminal force.

6. Mere Holding of Certain Views not Punishable

The mere holding of communist belief or doctrines is not punishable per se. A theoretical communist or a student of communism cannot be said to be guilty of an offence. And if a communist were to work individually, in furtherance of his belief, he would not be guilty of conspiracy. In the case of SH Jhabwala v Emperor ,[94] the court observed:

> The question before the Court is whether these non-member communists also conspired with the member communists to deprive His Majesty the King-Emperor of his sovereignty. It may be conceded that 'any conspiracy to change the form of the Government of India or of any Local Government', even though it may amount to an offence under another section of the Code, would not be an offence under s 121A, unless it is a conspiracy to overawe such Government by means of criminal force, or show of criminal force...Depriving His Majesty of the sovereignty of British India would obviously include the severance of the connection of India with the Imperial Government of England. It cannot therefore be questioned that any conspiracy to establish the complete Independence of India, as distinct from obtaining for it the status of a self-governing dominion within the British Empire, would be tantamount to conspiring to deprive His Majesty of the sovereignty of British India. The same result would follow if there was a conspiracy to establish a perfectly democratic or republican form of Government of India outside the British Empire.

The law does not prohibit a person from forming any views, however extreme they may be, and if a person confines himself to an academic discussion as to the soundness of his views, he would not be guilty of any crime. But if he decides to go beyond the stage of academic discussion, he should have regard not merely to the attractive doctrines of political philosophers but to the mundane matter of fact provisions of the IPC . As with the doctrines of political philosophers, so with the theories sound or unsound of constitutional law; they avail nothing against the plain provisions of the IPC . A court has no concern with the justification or otherwise of the claims of the accused or with the rectitude of his political views, but the court may take cognizance of the fact that he does hold certain views, for as a guide to his conduct and intentions these views are most relevant considerations. A person has no justification to attempt violently to overthrow by force the Constitution as by law established.[95]

7. Conspiracy itself is a Crime

It is elementary but it is usual to state that under the law as contained in this section conspiracy in itself is a crime and it is not necessary to establish any illegal act or illegal omission as overt acts of the conspiracy, the existence of which has to be889 established. The illegal act or omission, if established, supports the case of the existence of the conspiracy; the offence being complete even though two persons conspiring together go no further than the original agreement.[1]The offence of criminal conspiracy is complete as soon as two or more persons agree to do or cause to be done an illegal act, or an act which is not illegal, by illegal means. It is immaterial whether the illegal act is the ultimate object of such an agreement or is merely incidental to that object. For the purpose of s 121A, IPC, it is not necessary that any act or illegal omission shall take place in pursuance of the conspiracy. The agreement in itself is enough to constitute the offence. The provisions of law are very comprehensive and do not require any formidable elements either in men or means to satisfy its definition of a conspiracy to wage war. For the conspiracy no act or illegal omission is necessary, the agreement of two or more will suffice, so that the determination of the court that a conspiracy to wage war has been established does not imply as its terms might suggest, the existence of a serious menace to the Constitution or the stability of the constituted authority in India.[2]

The same person may be guilty under s 121A as well as s 123, IPC ; for instance, a person may bring himself within the latter section by concealment of the existence of a design to wage war against the government, and may immediately afterwards join in the conspiracy to wage the war and thereby bring himself within the scope of s 121A .[3] To act as carrier is sometimes enough in a case of conspiracy.[4]

Even when the facts alleged and proved can be brought within the ambit of this section, it is not incumbent on the government to prosecute under that section. The government may consider that it would be impossible to prove facts which would bring the offence under it and may be content to advance evidence of a criminal conspiracy under s 120B .[5]

Where several persons are charged with the same conspiracy, it is a legal impossibility that some should be found guilty of one conspiracy and some of another, and any accused not shown to be a member of that conspiracy is entitled to demand an acquittal.[6] Where charges of conspiracy and sedition were framed on the basis of letters recovered in the search of accused, it could not be said that the charges were not justified as the accused were not the authors of the letters.[7]

Accused Pakistani nationals who had intruded into the Indian territory, were arrested by the members of the Boarder Security Forces, and arms and ammunitions were recovered from their possession. Plea of the accused that they were fishermen was found false. Their conviction under ss 121, 121A, 122 and 123, IPC was held proper.[8]

Conspirators may Appear and Disappear in the Course of Conspiracy

It is also not necessary that a person should be participant in a conspiracy from start to finish. Conspirators may appear and disappear from stage to stage in the course of890 a conspiracy.[9] A conspirator would be guilty under this section even if he subsequently left it and did not take part in the fight that took place in pursuance of the conspiracy.[10]

8. 'To Overawe by Means of Criminal Force'

This section applies not only to a conspiracy to wage war against the Government of India, but also to overawe, by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force, the Central Government or any state government.[11] The word 'overawe' clearly imports more than the creation of apprehension or alarm or fear. It connotes the creation of a situation in which the government is compelled to choose between yielding to force or exposing the government or the members of the public to a very serious danger. Therefore a procession by a few youngsters shouting slogans to the effect that only by an armed revolution, the government of the people can be established would not, by itself, create any public disturbance.[12]

It is not necessary that the danger should be a danger of assassination or of a bodily injury to themselves. The danger might well be a danger to public property or to the safety of members of the general public. Persons who organise a strike among policemen and other public or municipal employees might render themselves liable to prosecution under this section, if it is a part and parcel of their plan to overawe the government by criminal force or show of criminal force.

9. Criminal Force Considered

Where a large number of police havaldars and constables conspired to withhold their services with the object of compelling the State Government to yield to their demands and the conspirators seized the armouries and took possession of the arms and ammunition, (though they remained peacefully in the police lines and did nothing to intimidate the general body of citizens) but took steps to ensure that the working of the treasury should not be interrupted, it was held that it could not fairly be said that there was any such show of criminal force as is contemplated by this section.[13]

10. Condition for Initiation of Proceedings

Under s 196, CrPC, no court can take cognizance of an offence punishable under this section, except with the previous sanction of the Central Government or the State Government.[14]

11. Procedure

An offence punishable under this section is cognizable and non-bailable and is triable by a court of session.[15]

891An offence punishable under this section, if committed in the same transaction with any offence punishable under the Prevention of Corruption Act 1988 may also be tried by a special judge appointed under that Act in his deemed capacity as a session judge, without any order of commitment.[16]

12. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and office of the Session Judge etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused), as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....conspired to wage war (or to attempt or abet the waging of war) against the Government of India, (or conspired to overawe) by means of criminal force or show of criminal force, the Central Government (or any state government) (specify the act) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 121A of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

In a conspiracy case the accused can be charged with conspiracy with persons unknown, but if they are charged with conspiracy with persons known, such persons must be named in the charge.[17] Omission of the prosecution to proceed against all the conspirators does not always vitiate the trial.[18] It may be noted that mention of the names of persons as co-conspirators indiscriminately gives greater facility in the matter of leading evidence under s 10 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872.[19]

Even when the facts alleged and proved can be brought within the ambit of this section, it is not incumbent on the government to prosecute under it, government may consider that it would be impossible to prove facts which would bring the offence under this section.[20]

13. Proof

The offence of criminal conspiracy is complete as soon as two or more persons agree to do or cause to be done an illegal act, or an act which is not illegal, by illegal means. The agreement itself is enough to constitute the offence as contemplated by this section, and it is not necessary that any act or illegal omission shall take place in pursuance of the conspiracy. The rule of evidence forming part of the substantive law is the one formulated in s 10, Indian Evidence Act 1872, the operation of which is strictly conditional upon there being reasonable ground to believe that two or more persons have conspired together to commit an offence.[21] The question whether the evidence is sufficient to establish a charge of conspiracy under s 121A, IPC is a question which depends upon the view which the trial court892 takes of the evidence adduced before it and of the inferences reasonably to be drawn from that evidence.[22]

In order to support a conviction on such a charge it is not enough to show that the persons charged have contrived to obtain possession of an armoury and have, when called upon to surrender it, used the rifles and ammunition so obtained against the Government troops. It must also be shown that the seizure of the armoury was part and parcel of a planned operation and that their intention in resisting the troops of the Government was to overwhelm and defeat these troops and then to go on and crush any further opposition with which they might meet until either the leaders of the movement succeeded in obtaining the possession of the machinery of Government or until those in possession of it yielded to the demands of their leaders.[23]

14. Punishment

Sections 121, 121A and 122, IPC specifically relate to offences against the state. While s 121 provides for punishment for those engaged in waging war against the Government of India, the other two sections relate to conspiracy and preparation to commit such offence by collecting arms etc., respectively.[24] In awarding sentence, the prevention of crime, the protection of the state, the society and the public, as also the reformation of the offender, have to be kept in view. It has been felt that in the case of political offences, arising out of beliefs of the accused, severe sentences defeat their object,[25] but a distinction must be drawn between political offences of the nature of sedition or spread of ideas of communism and socialism charged under s 121A, IPC, and offences against the state and society involving treason, armed rebellion and murder, in connection with which the name of politics is used. The sentence passed in a case which is required to be a deterrent must be in proportion to the gravity of the offence committed, and if the offence committed was one of the most serious against the state, the court has to keep in view the ends of justice as provided by law, in the matter of conviction of the accused placed on trial, as also in the matter of sentence passed on him commensurate with the nature of the offence committed. Where many of the accused are misdirected persons in the prime of their youth and their guilt as members of the conspiracy has not been of the same description, regard being had to the part actually played by them, different sentences are called for in the case of each so far as the nature of his guilt is concerned.[26] The theory of punishment is based upon (a) the protection of the public, (b) the prevention of crime, and (c) the reformation of the offender. In the case of political offences, arising out of the beliefs of the accused, severe sentences in practice confirm the offenders in their beliefs and create other offenders, thus increasing the evil and the danger to the public.[27] The maximum punishment that can be imposed under this section, when the offence as well as its gravity is established, is imprisonment for life.

893In Nazir Khan v State of Delhi [28] the Supreme Court observed:

> However, considering the gravity of the offence and the dastardly nature of the acts and consequences which have flown out and would have flown in respect of the life sentence, incarceration for the period of 20 years would be appropriate. It was also held that the accused-appellants would not be entitled to any remission from the aforesaid period of 20 years. As observed by this Court in Ashok Kumar v Union of India [29] and Satpal v State of Haryana and another [30] 'imprisonment for life' means imprisonment for the full span of life.[31]

Chapter VI

Of Offences Against the State

S. 122.

Collecting arms, etc., with intention of waging war against the Government of India.--

Whoever collects men, arms or ammunition or otherwise prepares to wage war with the intention of either waging or being prepared to wage war against the [32][Government of India], shall be punished with [33][imprisonment for life] or imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding ten years, [34][and shall also be liable to fine].

Comments

1. Scope

Sections 121, 121A and 122, IPC specifically relate to offences against the state. While s 121 provides for punishment to those engaged in waging war against Government of India, ss 121A and 122 relate to conspiracy and preparation to commit such offence by collecting arms, etc., respectively.[35] The acts, made punishable by s 122, are those which amount to preparation to wage war. Preparation is a stage prior to attempt. This section and ss 126 and 399 make preparation to commit an offence punishable. In other cases mere preparation to commit an offence is not punishable.

Accused Pakistani nationals who had intruded into the Indian territory, were arrested by the members of the Boarder Security Forces, and arms and ammunitions were recovered from their possession. Plea of the accused that they were fishermen was found false. Their conviction under ss 121, 121A, 122 and 123, IPC was held proper.[36]894

2. Ingredients

The ingredients required to be proved for an act to constitute an offence under s 122 are: (i) there must be a collection of men, arms or ammunition; (ii) such a collection should be with the intention of either waging war or being prepared to wage a war; (iii) the participation of the accused in such a collection; and (iv) the war is to be waged against the Government of India.[37]

In the instant case the accused appellants had collected themselves in a room and from that room arms, ammunitions and print publication was seized. There was no evidence at all that these four appellants had organized a movement or were part of a movement, attended with violence or attacks against public officials. Nor was there any proof that they had collected the arms with a view to destruct public property, etc. Therefore charge under s 122, IPC was held not proved in the case.[38]

3. 'Otherwise Prepares'

This phrase is comprehensive enough to make any kind of preparation to wage war punishable. It would embrace even aiding the ways of preparation.

4. 'Preparation' Distinguished from 'Attempt'

Preparation consists in devising or arranging the means or measures necessary for the commission of the offence; the attempt is the direct movement towards commission after the preparation has been made.[39] There is a greater degree of determination in an 'attempt' as compared with a 'preparation'.[40] Mere intention, not followed by any act, cannot constitute an offence, and an indirect preparation, which does not amount to an act which amounts to a commencement of the offence, does not constitute either a principal offence, or an attempt or abetment of the same.[41]

There is no sharp clear-cut distinction between the two. One fades into the other and the dividing line can only be decided with reference to the facts of each particular case.[42] In Re R Mac Crea,[43] it was observed that it is very difficult to frame a satisfactory and exhaustive definition which may lay down for all cases where preparation to commit an offence ends and where attempt to commit that offence begins. The test for determining whether an act constitutes an attempt or preparation895 is whether the overt acts already done are such that if the offender changes his mind and does not proceed further in its progress, the acts already done would be completely harmless.[44] The Supreme Court, in an earlier case, held that there is a thin line between the preparation for and an attempt to commit, an offence. Undoubtedly, a culprit first intends to commit the offence, then makes preparation for committing it and thereafter attempts to commit the offence. If the attempt succeeds, he has committed the offence; if it fails due to reasons beyond his control he is said to have attempted to commit the offence.[45]It was further pointed out in the last cited case that the question whether a certain act amounts to an attempt to commit a particular offence is a question of fact dependant on the nature of the offence and the step necessary to take in order to commit it.[46]

5. Presumption under Section 111A of Indian Evidence Act

Under s 111A of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, a presumption can be drawn against a person who is accused of having committed an offence punishable under s 122 of the IPC . It can be presumed that a person charged under s 122 of the IPC, is guilty if it is shown that he had been in an area declared to be a disturbed area and where firearms or explosives were used or found to attack or resist the numbers of any armed forces or forces charged with the maintenance of public order, while discharging of their duties.[47]

6. Procedure

Same as in the case of an offence under s 121 .

7. Information to Police or Magistrate

Section 39 of the CrPC, provides that every person, aware of the commission of, or of the intention of any other person, to commit, any offence punishable under ss 121 - 126 and 130 of the IPC shall, in the absence of any reasonable excuse, forthwith give information to the nearest magistrate or police officer of such commission or intention.

For the purpose of s 39, CrPC, the term 'offence' includes any act committed at any place out of India which would constitute an offence if committed in India.

Omission to give information must be intentional. Failure to give information is punishable under ss 118, 176 or 202 of the IPC .

8. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and office of Session Judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused), as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....collected men (or arms or ammunition) (if any other means were adopted, mention them) with the896 intention of waging war (or being prepared to wage war) against the Government of India, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 122 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this Court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

9. Proof

To establish that an offence under s 122 has been committed, it is incumbent on the prosecution to prove that the collection of men, arms and ammunition is for no other purpose but to prepare to wage a war against the Government of India.[48]

32 Substituted by the AO 1950, for 'Queen'.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VI

Of Offences Against the State

S. 123.

Concealing with intent to facilitate design to wage war.--

Whoever, by any act, or by any illegal omission, conceals the existence of a design to wage war against the [49][Government of India], intending by such concealment to facilitate, or knowing it to be likely that such concealment will facilitate, the waging of such war, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is an adaptation of the principles of ss 118, 119 and 120, IPC with a view to facilitate the waging of war. Commentary under those sections may be referred to.

Offence under s 123, IPC in relation to a charge under s 121, IPC is a minor offence, and the accused can be convicted under s 123, IPC even in the absence of a charge.[50]

Accused Pakistani nationals had intruded into the Indian territory, and were arrested by the members of the Boarder Security Forces, and arms and ammunitions were recovered from their possession. Plea of the accused that they were fishermen was found false. Their conviction under ss 121, 121A, 122 and 123, IPC was held proper.[51]

2. Procedure

Same as in the case of an offence under s 121, IPC .

3. Information to Police or Magistrate

Synopsis notes under s 122 may be referred to.

897When the accused had knowledge of a conspiracy and plans of terrorists to attack the Parliament House, his illegal omission to apprise police or magistrate of the design of conspirators, which is act of waging war, would make him liable for the offence under s 123 of the IPC . The fact that no charge under s 123 was framed against him, would not prejudice him if charge of waging war and other allied offences are subject matter of charges.[52]

4. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and office of Sessions Judge etc.) charge you (name of the accused), as follows:
> That you, knowing that on or about the.....day of.....at.....certain persons had designed to wage war against the Government of India, concealed the existence of the design by (specify the act or omission) intending by such concealment to facilitate (or knowing it to be likely that such concealment would facilitate) the waging of such war, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 123 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby, direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

5. Proof

To establish the charge under this section the following points should be proved in evidence:

(i) The existence of a design to wage war.
(ii) The accused's knowledge of such design.
(iii) The fact of its concealment by means of an act or illegal omission.
(iv) The intent with which the design was concealed.

Of Offences Against the State

S. 124.

Assaulting President, Governor, etc., with intent to compel or restrain the exercise of any lawful power.--

Whoever, with the intention of inducing or compelling the [53][President] of India, or the [54][Governor [55][* * ]] of any [56][State], [57][ * ] [58][ * ] [59][ * ] to exercise or refrain from exercising in any manner any of the lawful powers of such [60][President] or [61][Governor [62][ * ]], 898assault or wrongfully restrains, or attempts wrongfully to restrain, or overawes, by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force, or attempt so to overawe, such [63][President or [64][Governor, [65][ * *]], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is an enlargement of the latter portion of s 121A, IPC and imposes a deterrent punishment for assaults, wrongful restraints etc., to overawe the President or the Governor of any state to exercise or restrain from exercising their lawful, official and constitutional powers.

2. Procedure

Same as in the case of an offence under s 121, IPC .

3. Information to Police or Magistrate

Synopsis notes under s 122 may be referred to.

4. Charge

The following model form of charge under s 124 has been given at serial no. 2 of form no. 32 in the Sch II to CrPC, and may be used with necessary modifications according as to the facts and circumstances of the individual case:

I, (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of the accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of....., at....., with the intention of inducing the President of India [or, as the case may be, the Governor of (name of state)] to refrain from exercising a lawful power as such President (or as the case may be, the Governor), assaulted President (or as the case may be, the Governor), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 124 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this Court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

(Signature and seal of the Session Judge)

5. Proof

To prove a charge under this section the following points have to be proved:

(i) the accused committed one or other of the acts specified;899
(ii) the person against whom the offence was committed was the person known under the name or title by which he is described in the section;
(iii) the object with which the act in question was committed.

Chapter VI

Of Offences Against the State

[66][S. 124A.

Sedition.--

Whoever, by words, either spoken or written, or by signs, or by visible representation, or otherwise, brings or attempts to bring into hatred or contempt, or excites or attempts to excite disaffection towards, [67][* * ] the Government established by law in [68][India], [69][ * *] shall be punished with [70][imprisonment for life], to which fine may be added, or with imprisonment which may extend to three years, to which fine may be added, or with fine.

Explanation 1.--The expression "disaffection" includes disloyalty and all feelings of enmity.

Explanation 2.--Comments expressing disapprobation of the measures of the Government with a view to obtain their alteration by lawful means, without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection, do not constitute an offence under this section.

Explanation 3.--Comments expressing disapprobation of the administrative or other action of the government without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection, do not constitute an offence under this section.]900

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines, and prescribes punishment for the offence called 'sedition'. The word 'sedition' did not occur anywhere in the old section enacted in 1870. Even in the present section, the word is found only in the marginal note, which is not an operative part of the section, but merely provides the name by which the crime defined in the section will be known.[71]

To understand correctly the precise scope of s 124A, IPC, it is necessary to bear in mind that this section, together with s 121A, IPC, was avowedly inserted in Chapter VI of the IPC, relating to offences against the state, with a view to fill up an inadvertent omission of a special provision for the punishment of the offence of abetment of rebellion. In the words of Sir Fitz James Stephen, it was felt that as the causes which produce rebellion are wide, and spread over a longer period, a wider definition of abetment in the case of rebellion was necessary than sufficed in the case of theft or murder. In giving effect to this view, the principles of the English statute and common law were followed, and the section, as originally drafted by the Indian Law Commissioners in 1837, was finally incorporated in the Code in 1870, as substantially representing the law of England of the present day 'though much more compressed and more distinctly expressed'.[72]

So construed, the scope of the section has been stated by their Lordships of the Supreme Court:[73]

> The section, it must be noted, penalises any spoken or written words or signs or visible representations, etc., which have the effect of bringing or which attempt to bring into hatred or contempt or excites or attempts to excite disaffection towards the Government established by law. Now, the expression 'the Government established by law' has to be901 distinguished from the persons for the time being engaged in carrying on the administration. 'Government established by law' is the visible symbol of the state. The very existence of the state will be in jeopardy if the Government established by law is subverted. Hence, the continued existence of the Government established by law is an essential condition of the stability of the state. That is why 'sedition', as the offence in s 124A has been characterised, comes under Chapter 6 relating to offences against the state. Hence, any acts within the meaning of s 124A which have the effect of subverting the Government by bringing that Government into contempt or hatred, or creating disaffection against it, would be within the penal statute because the feeling of disloyalty to the Government established by law or enmity to it imports the idea of tendency to public disorder by the use of actual violence or incitement to violence. In other words, any written or spoken words, etc., which have implicit in them the idea of subverting Government by violent means, which are compendiously included in the term 'revolution', have been made penal by the section in question. But the section has taken care to indicate clearly that strong words used to express disapprobation of the measures of Government with a view to their improvement or alteration by lawful means would not come within the section. Similarly, comments, however strongly worded, expressing disapprobation of actions of the Government, without exciting those feelings which generate the inclination to cause public disorder by acts of violence, would not be penal. In other words, disloyalty to Government established by law is not the same thing as commenting in strong terms upon the measures or acts of Government, or its agencies, so as to ameliorate the condition of the people or to secure the cancellation or alteration of those acts or measures by lawful means, that is to say, without exciting those feelings of enmity and disloyalty which imply excitement to public disorder or the use of violence...A citizen has a right to say or write whatever he likes about the Government, or its measures, by way of criticism or comment, so long as he does not incite people to violence against the Government established by law or with the intention of creating public disorder. The provisions of the sections read as a whole, along with the explanations, make it reasonably clear that the sections aim at rendering penal only such activities as would be intended, or have a tendency, to create disorder or disturbance of public peace by resort to violence. As already pointed out the explanations appended to the main body of the section make it clear that criticism of public measures or comment on Government action, however strongly worded, would be within reasonable limits and would be consistent with the fundamental right of freedom of speech and expression. It is only when the words written or spoken, etc., which have the pernicious tendency or intention of creating public disorder or disturbance of law and order that the law steps in to prevent such activities in the interest of public order. So construed, the section, strikes the correct balance between individual fundamental rights and the interest of public order.

Scope of the Section is Restricted

Criticising the present judicial set up or functioning of the Parliament or legislative assemblies cannot be considered as bringing into hatred or contempt or exciting or attempting to excite disaffection towards the government established by law. Nor are the slogans alleged to have been shouted by the petitioners capable of inciting any class or community of persons to commit any offence. Seldom a day has passed in the state in the last three decades when such or similar slogans have not been shouted in one or other part of the state. The scope of s 124A of the IPC is restricted to cases in which the search, writing or other activity of the accused is prejudicial to public order or public security as it is only in such cases that it can be said that the attack is directed against the government established by law. The approach to the question whether any action brings into hatred or contempt or excites disaffection towards the government should be in the following way. First, the true meaning of the words, the innuendo they convey and the convert meaning, if any, they have, to be gathered.902 Secondly, their probable or natural effect has to be seen. In other words, whether they are calculated to produce the result, i.e., hatred, contempt or disaffection towards the government. Thirdly, if they do, the intention of the author of the words to produce that result has to be ascertained. The provisions of s 124A, IPC should be limited, in its application, to acts involving an intention or tendency to create disorder or disturbance of law and order or incitement to violence. The ventilation of grievances against officers by means of articles, pamphlets or by demonstrations would not fall within the mischief of s 505(1)(c), IPC . Shouting slogans for a classless society or against the privilege or for establishment of socialism will not come within the mischief of the provisions.[74]

2. Analogous Law

Apart from English law, we have in Indian law itself, several provisions which are analogous to this section. Thus, s 4(1)(c) of the Indian Press Act 1910, has its analogy in ss 124A and 153A of IPC, although the language is not precisely the same.[75]

Section 4(1)(d) of Press (Emergency Powers) Act 1931, cl 6(e) of r 34 of the Defence of India Rules 1939,[76] and r 35(6)(e) of the Defence of India Rules 1962,[77] may be quoted as other similar provisions with not much material distinction.[78]

3. History of the Section and its Amendments

Section 113 originally drafted in Macaulay's Draft Penal Code of 1837-39 was the section corresponding to this section. By some curious omission it seems to have dropped out of the Code as finally passed in 1860.[79]It was adopted with some verbal alteration by Sir James Stephen, and added to the Code by s 5 of the Act 27 of 1870, 'as substantial representation the law of England of the present day, though much more compressed and more distinctly expressed'.[80] The section as then enacted ran thus:

> 124A. Exciting Disaffection.--Whoever by words, either spoken or intended to be read, or by signs, or by visible representation, or otherwise, excites, or attempts to excite, feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India, shall be punished with transportation for life or for any term, to which fine may be added, or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, to which fine may be added, or with fine.
> Explanation.--Such a disapprobation of the measures of the Government as is compatible with a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government, and to support the lawful authority of the Government, against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist the authority, is not disaffection. Therefore, the making of comments on the methods of the Government, with the intention of exciting only this species of disapprobation, is not an offence within this clause.

903

The said section was replaced by a new section in 1898 which was also subsequently amended from time to time as indicated in the footnotes.

Notable Cases of Revolutionaries and Nationalist Leaders

This section as enacted in 1870 remained in force till the 18 February 1898. During this period there were several notable cases under it[81] in which the meaning of the word 'disaffection' in the section was much discussed.

(a) Jogendra Chander Bose's Case

In what is known as the Bangobasi case,[82] while charging the jury, Sir Comer Petheram CJ, explained the law to the jury in these terms:

> Disaffection means a feeling contrary to affection, in other words, dislike or hatred. Disapprobation means simply disapproval. It is quite possible to disapprove of a man's sentiments or action and yet to like him. The meaning of the two words is so distinct that I felt it hardly necessary to tell you that the contention of Mr Jackson cannot be sustained. If a person uses either spoken or written words calculated to create in the minds of the persons to whom they are addressed a disposition not to obey the lawful authority of the Government, or to subvert or resist that authority, if and when occasion should arise, and if he does so with the intention of creating such a disposition in his hearers or readers, he will be guilty of the offence of attempting to excite disaffection within the meaning of the section, though no disturbance is brought about by his words or any feeling of disaffection, in fact, produced by them. It is sufficient for the purposes of the section that the words used are calculated to excite feelings of ill-will against the Government and to hold it up to the hatred and contempt of the people, and that they were used with the intention to create such feelings.

(b) Bal Gangadhar Tilak's Case

In Queen-Empress v Bal Gangadhar Tilak ,[83] Strachey J, in the course of his charge to the jury, explained the law thus:

> The offence as defined by the first clause is exciting or attempting to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government. What are feelings of disaffection? I agree with Sir Comer Petheram in Bangobasi case that disaffection means simply the absence of affection. It means hatred, enmity, dislike, hostility, contempt and every form of ill-will to the Government. 'Disloyalty' is perhaps the best general term, comprehending every possible form of bad feeling to the Government. That is what the law means by the disaffection which a man must not excite or attempt to excite; he must not make or try to make others feel enmity of any kind towards the Government. You will observe that the amount or intensity of the disaffection is absolutely immaterial except perhaps in dealing with the question of punishment. If a man excites or attempts to excite feeling of disaffection, great or small, he is guilty under the section. In the next place, it is absolutely immaterial whether any feelings of disaffection have been excited or not by the publication in question...You will observe that the section places on absolutely the same footing, the successful exciting of feelings of disaffection and the unsuccessful attempt to excite them, so that, if you find either of the prisoners has tried to excite such feelings in others, you must convict him even if there is nothing to show that he succeeded. Again, it is important that you should fully realise another point. The904 offence consists in exciting or attempting to excite in others certain bad feelings towards the Government. It is not the exciting or attempting to excite mutiny or rebellion, or any sort of actual disturbance, great or small. Whether any disturbance or outbreak was caused by these articles, is absolutely immaterial. If the accused intended by the articles to excite rebellion or disturbance, his act would doubtless fall within s 124A, and would probably fall within other sections of the Penal Code. But even if he neither excited nor intended to excite any rebellion or outbreak or forcible resistance to the authority of the Government, still if he tried to excite feelings of enmity to the Government, that is sufficient to make him guilty under the section. I am aware that some distinguished persons have thought that there can be no offence against the section unless the accused either counsels or suggests rebellion or forcible resistance to the Government. In my opinion, that view is absolutely opposed to the express words of the section itself, which as plainly as possible makes the exciting or attempting to excite certain feelings, and not the inducing or attempting to induce to any course of action such as rebellion or forcible resistance, the test of guilt. I can only account for such a view by attributing it to a complete misreading of the explanation attached to the section, and to a misapplication of the explanation beyond its true scope.

On an application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council, a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court refusing leave, observed:

> The major ground [on which a certificate of fitness for appeal was asked] was that the section cannot be said to have been contravened unless there is a direct incitement to stir up disorder or rebellion. That appears to us to be going much beyond the words of the section, and we need not say more upon that ground. The first of the minor points is that Mr Justice Starchey in summing up the case to the jury stated that disaffection meant the absence of > affection. But although if that phrase had stood alone it might have misled the jury, yet taken in connection with the context we think it is impossible that the jury could have been misled by it. That expression was used in connection with the law as laid down by the Sir Comer Petheram in Calcutta in the Bangabasi case. There the Chief Justice instead of using the words 'absence of affection' used the words 'contrary to affection'. If the words contrary to affection had been used instead of absence of affection in this case there can be no doubt that the summing up would have been absolutely correct in this particular case. But taken in connection with the context it is clear that by the words 'absence of affection' the learned Judge did not mean the negation of affection, but some active sentiment on the other side. Therefore, on that point we consider that we cannot certify that this is a fit case for appeal.

On a further application for special leave to appeal to the Judicial Committee, the Lord Chancellor, delivering the opinion of the Judicial Committee, while dismissing the application, observed that taking a view of the whole of the summing up they did not see any reason to dissent from it.

(c) Ramchandra Narayan's Case

Again in Queen-Empress v Ramchandra Narayan ,[84] a Full Bench of the Bombay High Court consisting of Farran CJ, and Parsons and Ranade JJ, had laid it down that the word 'disaffection' in the section is used in a special sense as meaning political alienation or discontent or disloyalty to the government or existing authority. They also held that the meaning of the word 'disaffection' in the main portion of the section was not varied by the explanation. Parsons J, held that the word 'disaffection' could not be construed as meaning absence of or contrary to affection or love. Ranade J, interpreted the word 'disaffection' not as meaning mere absence or negation of love or goodwill but a positive feeling of aversion, which is akin to ill-905will, a definite insubordination of authority or seeking to alienate the people and weaken the bond of allegiance, a feeling which tends to bring the government into hatred and discontent, by imputing base and corrupt motives to it.

(d) Amba Prasad's Full Bench Case

These decisions were reviewed by a Full Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Queen-Empress v Amba Prasad ,[85] in which Edge CJ, who delivered the judgment of the court, while generally adopting the reasons for the decisions in the Bangobasi case and the case of Bal Gangadhar Tilak, observed that a man may be guilty of the offence defined in s 124A of attempting to excite feelings of disaffection against the government established by law, although in a particular article or speech he may insist upon the desirability or expediency of obeying and supporting the government. Referring to the remarks made by the judges in Queen-Empress v Ramchandra Narayan ,[86] it was pointed out that if these remarks were meant to be in any sense different from the construction placed upon the section by Starchey J, which was approved, as aforesaid, by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, they could not be treated as authoritative.

Keeping these interpretations in view, the section was amended by the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act 1898. The single explanation to the section was replaced by three separate explanations as they now stand. The section, in its present form, is the result of further amendments under several Adaptation Orders of 1937, 1948, 1950, 1951 and Act 26 of 1955.

The section inserted in 1898 differed from the old one as: (a) the 'feeling' in the former was limited to one of 'disaffection', whilst under the new section it may be one of 'hatred', 'contempt', or 'disaffection', (b) the object of the 'feeling' under the former section was 'the government established by law in British India' to which under the new section had been added 'Her Majesty', and (c) the offence was termed 'sedition' instead of 'exciting disaffection'. It was however, held by the Privy Council in Emperor v Sadashiv Narayan Bhalerao ,[87] that the amendments in 1898 by the inclusion of 'hatred or contempt' and the addition of explns 2 and 3 did not affect or alter the construction of the section laid down in Tilak's case.[88]

4. English Law

In England, the crime has been described by Stephen in his Commentaries on the Laws of England,[89] based on the address to the jury by Fitzgerald J, in the case of R v Alexander Martin Sullivan ,[90] in these words:

> Section IX--Sedition and Inciting to Disaffection--We are now concerned with conduct which, on the one hand, falls short of treason, and, on the other, does not involve the use of force or violence. The law has here to reconcile the right of private criticism with necessity of securing the safety and stability of the state. Sedition may be defined as conduct which has, either as its object or as its natural consequence, the unlawful display of dissatisfaction with the Government or with the existing order of society.

The seditious conduct may be by words, by deed, or by writing. Five specific heads of sedition may be enumerated according to the object of the accused. This may be either:

(1) to excite disaffection against the King, Government or Constitution, or against Parliament or the administration of justice;
(2) to promote, by unlawful means, any alteration in Church or state;
(3) to incite a disturbance of the peace;
(4) to raise discontent among the King's subjects;
(5) to excite class hatred.

It must be observed that criticism on political matters is not of itself seditious. The test is the manner in which it is made. Candid and honest discussion is permitted. The law only interferes when the discussion passes the bounds of fair criticism. More especially this will be the case when the natural consequence of the prisoner's conduct is to promote public disorder'.

In Halsbury's Laws of England,[91] 'sedition' has been defined as follows:

> Sedition is a misdemeanour at common law consisting of acts done, words spoken and published, or writings capable of being a libel published, in each case with an intention (1) to bring into hatred or contempt, or to excite disaffection against, the Queen or the Government and Constitution of the United Kingdom, or either House of Parliament, or the administration of justice; or (2) to excite the Queen's subjects to attempt, otherwise than by lawful means, the alteration of any matter in church or State by law established; or (3) to incite persons to commit any crime in general disturbance of the peace; or (4) to raise discontent or disaffection amongst Her Majesty's subjects; or (5) to promote feelings of ill-will and hostility between different classes of those subjects. Where the words are oral the offence is called the speaking of seditious words; where the words are written, the offence is called the publication of seditious libel; where two or more combine for the furtherance of seditious intention the offence is called seditious conspiracy.

In England there is no statutory definition of sedition, and its meaning and content have been laid down in many decisions, but these decisions are not relevant when we have a statutory definition of that which is termed sedition.[92]

5. Language of Section is Borrowed from English Law

The language of the section itself has been adopted from English law and in a well-known English case, a learned Judge observed:

> Sedition is a crime against society, merely allied to that of treason, and it frequently precedes treason by a short interval. Sedition in itself is a comprehensive term, and embraces all those practices, whether by word, > deed or writing, which are calculated to disturb the tranquility of the State and lead ignorant persons to subvert the Government. Sedition has been described as disloyalty in action, and the law considers as sedition all those practices which have for their object to excite discontent or disaffection, to create public disturbance, or to lead to civil war, to bring into hatred or contempt the sovereign or Government, the laws or the constitution of the realm and generally all endeavours to promote public disorder.[93]

907 Referring to this view Gwyer CJ, speaking for the Federal Court of India, observed in Niharendu Dutt Mazumdar v Emperor :[1]

> Generally speaking, we think that the passage accurately states the law as it is to be gathered from an examination of a great number of judicial pronouncements. The first and most fundamental duty of every Government is the preservation of order, since order is the condition precedent to all civilization and the advance of human happiness. This duty has, no doubt, been sometimes performed in such a way as to make the remedy worse than the disease; but it does not cease to be a matter of obligation because some on whom the duty rests have performed it ill. It is to this aspect of the functions of Government that, in our opinion, the offence of sedition stands related. It is the answer of the state to those who, for the purpose of attacking or subverting it, seek (to borrow from the passage cited above) to disturb its tranquility, to create public disturbance and to promote disorder, or who incite others to do so. Words, deeds or writings constitutes sedition, if they have this intention or this tendency; and it is easy to see why they may also constitute sedition, if they seek, as the phrase is, to bring Government into contempt. This is not made an offence in order to minister to the wounded vanity of Governments, but because where Government and the law ceased to be obeyed because no respect is felt any longer for them only anarchy can follow. Public disorder, or the reasonable anticipation, or likelihood of public disorder, is thus the gist of the offence. The acts or words complained of must either incite to disorder, or must be such as to satisfy reasonable men that, that is their intention or tendency.

This statement of the law was followed in the under mentioned cases.[2]

But in Emperor v Sadashiv Narayan Bhalerao ,[3] their Lordships of the Privy Council did not approve of this statement of the law and observed that they were unable to find anything in the language of the section to suggest that 'the acts or words complained of must either incite to disorder or must be such as to satisfy reasonable men that that is their intention or tendency'. The Privy Council also referred to their precious decision in Wallace Johnson v King ,[4] which was a case under sub-s (8) of s 326 of the Criminal Code of the Gold Coast, which defined 'seditious intention' in terms similar to the words used in his section. In that case, their Lordships had laid down that incitement to violence was not a necessary ingredient of the crime of sedition as defined in the law. This case was followed in a number of subsequent decisions.[5]

There is thus a direct conflict between the decision of the Federal Court in Niharendu's case,[6] and of the Privy Council in a number of cases from India and the Gold Coast, referred to above. Both the views can be supported on good reasons.

6. Supplementary Provisions

Section 108 of the CrPC, provides for demanding security for good behaviour from persons disseminating or attempting to disseminate or abetting dissemination of any908 seditious matter, that is to say, any matter the publication of which is punishable under this section.

7. Security

An executive magistrate, on receiving information that a person disseminates or attempts to disseminate or abets the dissemination of any matter, the publication of which is punishable under this section may order such person to furnish security for good behaviour.[7]

8. Principle Underlying the Section--Balance Between Fundamental Rights and

Interest of Public Order

This section, which occurs in Chapter VI 'Offences against the state', is based upon the principle that every state, whatever its form of government, has to be armed with the power to punish those who, by their conduct, jeopardize the safety and stability of the state, or disseminate such feelings of disloyalty as have the tendency to lead to disruption of the state or to public disorder. The security of the state, which depends upon the maintenance of law and order, is the very basic consideration upon which legislation, with a view to punishing offences against the state, is undertaken. At the same time, such a legislation has to protect and guarantee the freedom of speech and expression which is the sine qua non of every democratic form of government such as we have in India.[8] Explanations 2 and 3 appended to the section are based upon this principle. Properly construed, this section strikes the correct balance between individual fundamental rights and the interest of public order.[9]

With reference to s 4(1) of the Indian Press Act 1910, which is analogous to ss 124A and 153A of IPC, in Annie Besant v Advocate-General of Madras ,[10] their Lordships of the Privy Council observed:

> The balancing of important political considerations which is effected by adding Explanation 2 to the enacting words, which are found in the earlier part of the section has its analogy in sections 124A and 153A of the Indian Penal Code . The language is not precisely the same, but there is the same delicate balancing of two important public consideration, the undesirability of anything tending to excite sedition or to excite strife between classes and the undesirability of preventing any bonafide argument for reform.

9. Fundamental Right of Citizens

> 'It is the fundamental right of every citizen to have his own political theories and ideas and to propagate them and work for their establishment so long as he does not seek to do so by force and violence or contravene any provision of law. Thus, where the pledge of a Society and the establishment of a socialist State for which others are already working under the lead of the working classes, it was held that it was open to the members of the Society to achieve these objects by all peaceful means, ceaselessly fighting public opinion that might be against them and opposing those who desired the continuance of the existing order of society and the present Government; that it would also be legitimate to presume that they desired a change in the existing Government so909 that they could carry out their programme and policy; that the mere use of the words 'fight' and 'war' in their pledge did not necessarily mean that the Society planned to achieve its object by force and violence'.[11]

10. Broad View of the Matter Required from Court

The provisions of this section are very wide and strictly speaking they would cover everything amounting to defamation of the government if one excludes from the meaning of that term any criticism in good faith of any particular measures or acts of administration.[12] The language of s 124A, if read literally, even with the explanations attached to it, would suffice to make a surprising number of persons in the country guilty of sedition. But no one would suppose that it is to be read in this literal sense. The language itself has been adopted from English law, but it is to be remembered that in England the good sense of jurymen can always correct extravagant interpretations sought to be given by the executive government or even by the judges themselves; and if in this country that check is absent, or practically absent, it becomes all the more necessary for the courts, when a case of this kind comes before them, to put themselves so far as possible in the place of a jury, and to take a broad view, without refining over much in applying the general principles which underlie the law of sedition to the particular facts and circumstances brought to their notice.[13] The words, as well as the acts, which tend to endanger society, differ from time to time in proportion as society is stable or insecure in fact, or is believed by its reasonable members to be open to assault. Meetings and processions are now held lawful, though 150 years back they would have been held to be seditious, and this is not because the law is weaker now or has changed, but because, the times having changed, society is stronger than before.[14]

Since the decision of their Lordships of Privy Council in Emperor v Sadashiv Narayan Bhalerao ,[15] India has attained Independence, and art 19 (1) (a) of the Constitution of India guarantees to all citizens the right to freedom of speech and expression, subject only to reasonable restrictions as laid down in cl (2) of that article. If a literal meaning is given to the words of the section divorced from all the antecedent background in which the law of sedition has grown, it will be true to say that the section is not only within but also very much beyond the limits laid down in cl (2) aforesaid. It is well settled that in interpreting an enactment, the court should have regard not merely to the literal meaning of the words used, but also take into consideration the antecedent history of the legislation, its purpose and the mischief it seeks to suppress.[16] It is also well settled that if a provision of law comes within the constitutional powers of the legislature by adopting one view of the matter and limit its application accordingly, in preference to the view, would make it unconstitutional.[17] In construing the provisions of ss 124A and 153A, IPC, therefore, the court should give these sections that interpretation which would make them consistent with the Constitution, unless the language of the provisions precludes such910 an interpretation.[18] Taking these principles into consideration the Supreme Court[19] has construed this section so as to limit its application to acts involving all intention or tendency to create disorder, or disturbance of law and order or incitement to violence. This construction is also in consonance with the English law on the subject expounded in Rex v Aldred ,[20] where Coleridge J, in the course of his summing up to the jury said:

> Nothing is clearer than the law on this head, namely, that whoever by language, either written or spoken, incites or encourages others to use physical force or violence in some public matter connected with the state, is guilty of publishing a seditious libel. The word 'sedition' in its ordinary, natural signification denotes a tumult, an insurrection, a popular commotion, or an uproar; it implies violence or lawlessness in some form.

11. Acts Constitute Sedition only if they Incite Violence or Disturb Law and Order or Create Public Disorder, etc.

The security of the state and organised government are the very foundations of freedom of speech and expression which maintains the opportunity for free political discussion to the end that government may be responsive to the will of the people and it is, therefore, essential that the end should not be lost sight of in an over-emphasis of the means. The protection of freedom of speech and expression should not be carried to an extent where it may be permitted to disturb law and order or create public disorder with a view to subverting government established by law. It is, therefore, necessary to strike a proper balance between the competing claims of freedom of speech and security of the state. This balance has been found by the legislature in the enactment of s 124A, IPC which defines the offence of sedition for our country. The interpretation of s 124A has over the years gone through various vicissitudes and changes. It must, however, be now taken as well settled that words, deeds or writings constitute sedition punishable under s 124A only if they incite violence or disturb law and order or create public disorder or have the intention or tendency to do so. It is in the light of this interpretation of s 124A that the court has to determine whether objected passages constitute seditious matter punishable under s 124A .[21]

Demand for a separate State e.g. Khalistan without breach of violence is not punishable. FIR was quashed.[22]

Section 124A is not ancillary to s 124 .[23] The offences under ss 124A and 153A are distinct offences.

12. Allegation of Sedition on the basis of articles, Pamphlets and Letters

A mere criticism or denunciation of the government established by law is not objectionable. Citizens are certainly entitled to express their grievances and to endeavour to get them redressed through lawful means. However, if these attempts or exhortations bring the established government or tend to bring it into hatred and911 contempt, they certainly come within the ambit of sedition as stated in s 124A, IPC . The test that should be applied is to find out whether any article or articles intend or have the effect of creating feeling of hostility towards the government and to excite disaffection.[25]

Where an FIR was lodged under s 124A, IPC on the basis of a hindi pamphlet published under the caption 'Atrocities of Army on students', it was held that the pamphlet did not incite people to violence against Government and there was no intention of creating public disorder. Whatever was said in the pamphlet amounted to nothing more than an exercise of right guaranteed in sub-cl (a) of cl (1) of art 19 of the Constitution . Proceedings before the trial court were accordingly quashed.[26]

Where charges of conspiracy and sedition were framed on the basis of a letter recovered during a search conducted on the person of the accused, it could not be said that the charges were not justified as the accused were not the authors of the letters. Authorship of seditious material alone is not the gist of any of the offences. Distribution and circulation of seditious material may also be sufficient on the facts and the circumstances of a case.[27]

It is not necessary for the charge to specify the distinct passages in the pamphlets which are alleged to constitute the offence of attempting to promote feelings of hatred and the distinct passages which are alleged to constitute the offence of attempting to excite disaffection. It is sufficient for the charges to allege generally that the pamphlet constitutes an attempt to promote feelings of hatred and also excite disaffection.[28] The two offences, though committed by means of the same pamphlet, are as distinct as two libels on two different persons contained in one book. They do not come within the provisions of s 71, IPC .[29]

The requirement of passing an order of forfeiture of a book, presupposes that the book contains any matter the publication of which is punishable under ss 124A or 153A or 153B or 292 or 293 or 295A of the IPC, for the State Government to declare that every copy of such book be forfeited to the Government. The power can only be exercised and notification can only be issued if the Government forms an opinion that the publication contains a matter which is in an offence under any of the sections of the IPC as aforestated.[30]

13. Sections 124A and 153A

A plain reading of s 124A, IPC, would show that its application would be attracted only when the accused brings or attempts to bring into hatred or contempt or excites or attempts to excite disaffection towards the Government established by law in India, by words either written or spoken or visible signs or representation, etc.[31]

Section 153A, IPC provides for punishment for promoting enmity between groups on grounds of religion, race, place of birth, residence, language, caste or community or any other ground whatsoever or brings about dishonesty or feeling of hatred or ill-912will between different religions, races, language or regional groups or castes or communities. It is only where the written or spoken words have the tendency or intention of creating public disorder or disturbance of law and order or affect public tranquillity that the law needs to step in to prevent such an activity. The intention to cause disorder or incite people to violence is the sine qua non of the offence under s 153A, IPC and the prosecution has to prove the existence of mens rea in order to succeed.[32]

14. Validity of the Section

Clause (1) of art 13 of the Constitution provides that all laws in force in the territory of India immediately before the commencement of this Constitution, in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of Part III shall, to the extent of such inconsistency, be void.

Article 19(1), which is in Pt III of the Constitution provides that all citizens shall have the right, inter alia, (a) to freedom of speech and expression. Section 124A of the IPC, undoubtedly places restrictions on the right to freedom of speech and expression, and would, therefore, be void under art 13(1) unless saved by some other provision of the Constitution. The only provision that could so save it is cl (2) of art 19 of the Constitution which runs as follows:

> Nothing in sub-clause (a) of Clause (1) shall affect the operation of any existing law, or prevent the state from making any law relating to libel, slander, defamation, contempt of court or any matter which offends against decency or morality or which undermines the security of, or tends to overthrow the State.

The scope of this clause came to be considered by the Supreme Court in two cases: (a) Romesh Thapper v State of Madras ,[33] and (b) Brij Bhushan v State of Delhi .[34] Delivering the majority judgment in the former case, Patanjalli Sastri J, (as he then was) observed:

> Deletion of the word 'Sedition' from the draft article 13(2) [corresponding to article 19(2) in the Constitution as finally framed], therefore, shows that criticism of Government exciting disaffection or bad feelings towards it is not to be regarded as justifying ground for restricting the freedom of expression and of the press, unless it is such as to undermine the security, or tend to overthrow the state. It is also significant that the corresponding Irish formula of 'undermining the public order or the authority of the state',[35] did not apparently find favour with the framers of the Indian Constitution. Thus, very narrow and stringent limits have been set to permissible legislative abridgement of the right of free speech and expression and this was doubtless due to the realisation that freedom of speech and of the press lay at the foundation of all democratic organisations, for without free political discussion no public education, so essential for the proper functioning of the process of popular Government is possible. We are, therefore, of opinion that unless a law restricting freedom of speech and expression is directed solely against the undermining of the security of the state or the overthrow of it, such law cannot fall within the reservation under clause (2) of article 19, although the restrictions which it seeks to impose may have been conceived generally in the interests of public order.

In view of these observations, the Parliament by the Constitution (First Amendment) Act 1951, substituted the original cl (2) of art 19 of the Constitution by a new cl (2) which reads as follows:

> Nothing in sub-clause (a) of clause (1) shall affect the operation of any existing law, or prevent the State from making any law, in so far as such law imposes reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right conferred by the said sub-clause in the interests of the sovereignty and integrity of India, the security of the State, friendly relations with Foreign States, public order, decency or morality, or in relation to contempt of court, defamation or incitement to an offence.

The changes effected by this amendment, which have been given retrospective effect are:

(i) Several new grounds of restriction upon the freedom of speech have been introduced: (a) friendly relations with foreign states; (b) public order; (c) incitement to an offence.
(ii) Deletion of the ground 'tends to overthrow the state'.
(iii) Widening the scope of the expression relating to 'security of the state', by substituting the words 'any matter which offends against or undermines the security of the state' by the words 'in the interests of the security of the state'.

(iv) Substitution of the words 'libel, slander' by the word 'defamation', and

(v) Insertion of the expression 'reasonable restrictions', to govern all the above grounds.

In view of these amendments the Supreme Court has now held that the provisions of ss 124A and 505, IPC, impose restrictions on the fundamental freedom of speech and expression, but those restrictions cannot but be said to be in the interest of public order and within the ambit of permissible legislative interference with that fundamental right, and that they are not therefore void. This section strikes the correct balance between individual rights and the interest of the public order.[36]

15. Essential Ingredients

'Whoever'

About the expression 'Whoever' the law Commissioners says: (2nd Report: Section 13)

> 'The laws of a particular nation or country cannot be applied to any persons but such as owe allegiance to the Government of the country, which allegiance is either perpetual, as in the case of a subject by birth or naturalisation, and c., or temporary, as in the case of a foreigner residing in the country. They are applicable of course to all such as thus owe allegiance to the Government, whether as subjects or foreigners, excepting as excepted by reservations or limitations which are parts of the laws in question.'[37]

It is not only the writer of the alleged seditious article, but whoever uses, in any way, words or printed matter, for the purpose of exciting feelings of disaffection to the government, is liable under this section whether or not he is the actual writer.[38]914

'By Words...Or Otherwise'

Seditious libel may be in writing or print, or may be contained in a drawing or engraving, or a painted picture, or a sculpture or any permanent representation.[39] In the word 'written', print is included by the General Clauses Act 1896, and therefore 'by words written' means amongst other things 'by words that are printed'.[40] The exhibition of flags is also a mode of using 'signs or visible representation'.[41] Shouting slogans, such as 'Destroy the dishonest Government' and 'long live the bloody revolution' or reciting poems which incite police to revolt against the government administration,[42] would amount to sedition within the meaning of this section.[43] The words 'or otherwise' cover all possible means of publishing sedition. The concluding words 'or otherwise' indicate the universality of the means by which the offence may be committed. The whole sentence might have been shortly expressed by saying 'whoever by any means' brings, etc. The offence may be committed by means of words spoken or written, or by visible representations such as pictures, or by dramatic performances, even in a dumb show, where no words are spoken, but where the feelings of the audience are excited, by the gestures, motions and dramatic actions of the performers. Thus, words of any kind are by no means a necessary element of the offence. It may be committed without any words being spoken or uttered.[44] Even a historical book may be seditious if the author makes no endeavour to be impartial, but presents only the evil deeds of the Government.[45]

'Brings or Attempts to Bring Into Hatred or Contempt'

These words were not used in the original section introduced in 1870. They were first used in India by Sir Comer Petheram CJ, in his charge to the jury in Queen-Empress v Jogendra Chandra Bose .[46] There too they were used only to explain the meaning of 'disaffection'. In explaining the law to the jury, the Chief Justice observed:

> Disaffection means a feeling contrary to affection, in other words dislike or hatred...It is sufficient for the purpose of the section that the words used are calculated to excite feeling of ill-will against the Government and to hold it up to the hatred and contempt of people, and that they were used with the intention to create such feeling.

Strachey J, in his charge to the jury in Queen-Empress v Bal Gangadhar Tilak ,[47] said:

> The offence as defined by the first cl is exciting or attempting to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government. What are feelings of disaffection? I agree with Sir Comer Petheram in the Bangobasi case that disaffection means simply the absence of affection. It means hatred, enmity, dislike, hostility, contempt and every form of ill-will to the Government.

So also in Queen-Empress v Ram Chandra Narayan ,[48] Sir C Farran CJ, said:

> An attempt to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government is thus equivalent to an attempt to produce hatred of Government as established by law, to excite political discontent and alienate the people from their allegiance.

In the same case, Ranade J, also, defining 'disaffection' spoke of:

> A feeling which tends to bring the Government into hatred or contempt by imputing base or corrupt motives to it, makes men indisposed to obey or support the laws of the realm, and promotes discontent and public disorder.[49]

The expression 'to bring into hatred or contempt the sovereign or the government' was used by Fitzgerald J, in his charge to the jury in the case of R v Alexander Martin Sullivan ,[50] as an endeavour to promote public disorder. In an old English case, R v Cobbett ,[51] Lord Ellenborough told the jury that if a publication is calculated to 'alienate the affections to the people' by bringing the government into disesteem, whether the expedient employed is ridicule or obloquy, the publication is seditious.

It would thus appear from these authorities that bringing the government into hatred or contempt was considered to be a means to 'excite disaffection' and was not an independent head of sedition. The case of bringing into hatred or contempt and that of exciting or attempting to excite disaffection have, in view of the scheme of this section to be considered together, the one resulting from the other.[52]

A plain reading of s 124A, IPC would show that its application would be attracted only when the accused brings or attempts to bring into hatred or contempt or excites or attempts to excite disaffection towards the government established by law in India, by words either written or spoken or visible signs of representations, etc. Thus where some slogans were raised a couple of times by two accused persons and there was no evidence showing that the accused persons were either leading a procession or were otherwise raising the slogans with the intention to incite people to create disorder and no disturbance, whatsoever, was caused by the raising of slogans and the people, in general, were unaffected and carried on with their normal activities, it cannot be said to be aimed at exciting or attempt to excite hatred or disaffection towards the government as established by law in India. Hence s 124A, IPC, would not be attracted to the facts and circumstances of the case.[53]

The accused appellant was found exciting the people to wage war by armed rebellion against the Government, and naxalite literature which contained exciting speeches was recovered from his possession, hence, he was convicted under s 124A, IPC .[54]

Hatred and Contempt Explained

The words 'hatred' and 'contempt' need no explanation. Hatred is a passion which every wise and good man endeavours to check himself. With the feeling of hatred, the law can do nothing because it cannot see into the heart and cannot reform it, but law does step in when any attempt is made to excite that feeling in others. And it does so as much for the protection of the individual as for the protection of the state. If it is the individual against whom hatred is excited, the offence is described as defamation, and the law extends similar protection to the collective body which is called the government, and which represents the community as a whole, and whose916 duty it is to perform the functions of preserving order and peace, which are essential to the beneficial co-operation of human beings and to the enjoyment and safety of life and property.[55] Hatred and contempt mean something more than mere disapproval or dislike. Between dissatisfaction on the one hand and hatred, contempt and disaffection on the other, there is a vast gulf.[56] The government may be brought into hatred and contempt by imputing base and corrupt motives to it.[57] It is quite possible, by the abuse of government officials as officials, to make an endeavour to bring into hatred or contempt the government established by law in the country.[58] Where every calamity or evil or misfortune that falls on the country and sufferings by people was imputed to the zamindars, talukdars and the government which was also accused of hostility and indifference to the welfare of the people and the people were asked to follow the example of Ireland and Russia, it was held that the accused who delivered the speech was guilty under ss 124A and 153A .[59]

Where the predominating idea in the speech delivered by the accused is not only to support the idea of communism and to suggest some other form of government, but to bring the present government and the supporters of the same into hatred and contempt, it attracts the provisions of this section.[60]

But an attack on imperialism as a system or a school of opinion without reference to persons does not involve any incitement to hatred or contempt of those who are in the system or hold the opinion.[61]

It cannot however, be said that a speech, even if it brings the government into hatred and contempt can be considered to be innocuous because such hatred and contempt cannot be increased from the standard that already exists in the minds of the people. To intend a thing is to act in such a way as to expect that certain consequences would follow. Intention, therefore, is correlated with the natural consequences which must follow from a particular act.[62]

'Disaffection'

The sense in which the word 'disaffection' is used in this section has received a considerable amount of judicial consideration. The term is not defined in the IPC, but while on the one hand it 'includes disloyalty and all feelings of enmity' (explanation 1), it does not, on the other hand, mean mere disapprobation of the legislative or executive conduct of the government (explanations 2 & 3). Disapprobation means disapproval which may consist of severe condemnation, even though unreasonably, perversely, or unfairly expressed,[63] and the distinction between this and disaffection is the essence of the section, the object of the second and third explanations being to protect honest journalism and bona fide criticism of public measures and institutions917 with a view to their improvement, and to the remedying of grievances and abuses, and to distinguish this from attempts, whether open or disguised, to make the people hate their rulers,[64] and to impair the confidence imposed by the public in the government.[65]

Disapprobation and reasonable criticism are quite compatible with loyalty. Whilst it is open to everyone to express with moderation any disapprobation, he may feel regarding the acts and measures of the government, it is at the same time the duty of every citizen to support the government established by law.[66]

Disaffection is Synonymous with Disloyalty

Although the primary meaning of the word 'disaffection' is the alienation of attachment, affection or goodwill, and the consequent substitution of a contrary feeling of dislike or hatred,[67] yet when used in connection with a people and its government all standard authorities use the term as synonymous with disloyalty[68] and this interpretation of the word 'disaffection' has now been adopted judicially.[69] 'Disaffection' thus means 'political alienation or discontent, a spirit of disloyalty to the government or existing authority'.[70] In the words of Ranade J:[71]

> 'Disaffection', as thus judicially paraphrased, is a positive political distemper, and not a mere absence or negation of love and goodwill. It is a positive feeling of aversion which is akin to disloyalty, a defiant insubordination of authority, or when it is not defiant, it secretly seeks to alienate the people, and weaken the bond of allegiance, and prepossesses the minds of the people with avowed or secret animosity to Government, a feeling which tends to bring the Government into hatred or contempt by imputing base or corrupt motives to it, makes men indisposed to obey or support the laws of the realm, and promotes discontent and public disorder.

Where the effect of the speech delivered by the accused was to suggest to the persons to whom it was addressed that the government was taking sides against them, and was taking the part of their opponents, it was held, 'To make charge of gross partiality of that sort against government is calculated, to inspire feelings of enmity and disaffection towards Government'.[72]

Explanation 1 to the section itself makes it clear that the expression 'disaffection' includes disloyalty and all feelings of enmity. As pointed out by Strachey J, in Queen-Empress v Bal Gangadhar Tilak ,[73]

> The offence consists in exciting or attempting to excite in others certain bad feelings towards the Government. It is not the exciting or attempting to excite mutiny or rebellion, or any sort of actual disturbance, great or small. Whether any disturbance or outbreak was caused by these articles, is absolutely immaterial. If the accused intended918 by the articles to excite rebellion or disturbance, his act would doubtless fall within section 124A, and would probably fall within other sections of the Penal Code. But even if he neither excited not intended to excite any rebellion or outbreak or forcible resistance to the authority of the Government, still if he tried to excite feelings of enmity to the Government, that is sufficient to make him guilty under the section.[74]

16. Question of Fact

Whether the words or representations are seditious or merely express disapprobation is a question of fact to be determined on the true construction of the document (if any) and in the light of the surrounding circumstances, and a magistrate's finding thereon is conclusive so far as the revisional jurisdiction of the High Court is concerned, unless some error of law vitiates that finding.[75]

A writer may be guilty of exciting or attempting to excite disaffection no matter how guardedly he may attempt to conceal his real object.[76]

It has been held that to urge an audience to secure Swaraj, which literally means self-government, and in its ordinary acceptance 'home-rule' under the government, is not an offence under this section.[77] Nor does one single expression that the people of Bengal are trodden under the feet of strangers, used in a newspaper article, which is innocent in other respects, make the whole article seditious.[78]

17. 'Attempts'

What is made punishable by the section is the bringing or attempting to bring into hatred or contempt, or exciting or attempting to excite feelings of disaffection towards the government established by law in India. The attempt is made punishable as well as the effect of the attempt. It is immaterial under the section whether the attempt has effected its purpose or not, because it is the attempt that is made punishable. It is no defence, therefore, to say that, granted there is an attempt, still it is an attempt to which the public were too wise to pay any attention. The question then is as to whether the attempt has been made. It is not necessary in order to bring the case within this section that it should be shown that the attempt was successful. Attempt does not imply success. It is merely trying. Whoever tries to excite, attempts to excite, etc., is held to come within the section. Whether the intention has achieved the result, is immaterial.[79] In the case of Queen-Empress v Bal Gangadhar Tilak , it was observed:

> The section places on absolutely the same footing the successful exciting of feeling of disaffection and the unsuccessful attempts to excite them, so that, if you find that either of the prisoners has tried to excite such feelings in others, you must convict him even if there is nothing to show that he succeeded.[80]

An attempt is an intentional, premeditated action, which if it fails in its object, fails through circumstances independent of the person who seeks its accomplishment. If919 its failure is to be attributed to something which he cannot control, its failure is no excuse.[81]

All that is necessary to constitute such an attempt is some external act, something tangible and ostensible, of which the law can take hold as an act showing progress towards the actual commission of the offence. It does not matter that the progress was interrupted.[82] As stated by Cave J, in R v Burns & Ors :[83]

> A man cannot escape from the uttering of words with intent to excite people to violence solely because the persons whom he addressed may be too wise or temperate to be induced to act with violence.

If the accused tried to excite hatred and contempt, the fact that he failed to do so will be no justification for him, though no doubt that will be a matter to be decided in determining any sentence which may have to follow upon a verdict of guilty.[84]

18. Speech as a whole has to be Considered

In order to decide whether or not a speech constitutes an attempt to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection, it should be viewed from the standpoint of the type of persons to whom it was primarily addressed. On the one hand, their limitations, if any, have to be taken into account; on the other, the fact that the words may convey to them a literal meaning must not be lost sight of. The time and the place are also factors which would be considered. The court must not look to a single sentence or an isolated expression, but take the speech as a whole and give it a full, free and generous consideration.[85]

To distribute amongst Indian troops copies of a letter published in a newspaper urging Indian soldiers to give up their allegiance to the Government of India is such an attempt as is contemplated by this section.[86]

19. 'Attempts to Publish' when Complete

An attempt to publish seditious matter is complete as soon as the accused knowingly sells or distributes the paper containing the seditious matter; and it is nonetheless an attempt because something external to himself happens, which prevents a perusal of the paper by the buyer or recipient or other member of the public.[87]

20. Intention--Mens rea

The language of the section might perhaps be deemed to give rise to some doubt whether, as it stands, the offence is independent of any intention, and that was the view formerly taken by the chief court of Punjab in Re Ram Nath,[88] but it is now well settled that intention is essential and that in fact the essence of the crime of sedition920 consists in the intention with which the language is used.[89] Even an attempt to excite hatred or contempt or disaffection implies intention.[90] The question of intention is a question of fact,[91] which must be judged primarily by the language itself used by the accused.[92] Intention for this purpose is really no more than meaning:

> When a man is charged in respect of anything he has written or said, the meaning of what he said or wrote must be taken to be his meaning, and that meaning is what his language would be understood to mean by the people to whom it is addressed.[93]

If a particular article is charged as being seditious, on the ground that it says more than what appears on the face of it, it is the duty of the prosecution to show that it has, in fact, the guilty meaning or intention attributed to it.[94]

The ultimate object of the writer of an article may be one thing, but if, in attaining that object he uses as the means the exciting of disaffection against the government, then he would be guilty under this section.[95]

With reference to intention, in the leading case of Queen-Empress v Bal Gangadhar Tilak ,[96] Strachey J, in his charge to the jury said:

> There are various ways in which you must approach the question of intention. You must gather the intention as best you can from the language of the articles; and you may also take into consideration, under certain conditions, the other articles that have been put in evidence. But the first and most important index of the intention of the writer or publisher of a newspaper article is the language of the article itself. What is the intention which the articles themselves convey to your minds? In considering this, you must first ask yourselves what would be the natural and probable effect of reading such articles in the minds of the readers of the Kesari, to whom they were addressed? Read these articles, and ask yourselves how the ordinary readers of the Kesari would probably feel when reading them. Would the feeling produced be one of hatred to the Government, or would it be simply one of interest in a poem and a historical discussion about Shivaji and Afzul Khan and so forth? If you think that the only feelings which such readers would be excited to are feelings of interest in a poem or a historical or ethical discussion, then you may presume that that is all the accused intended to excite. If you think that such readers would naturally and probably be excited to entertain feelings of enmity to the Government, then you will be justified in presuming that the accused intended to excite feelings of enmity or disaffection. As a matter of commonsense a man is presumed to intend the natural and ordinary consequences of his acts: he cannot, speaking generally, say: 'Although this language would have the natural and ordinary effect of exciting feelings of disaffection, I did not, when publishing it, intend that it should do so. But in considering what sort of effect these articles would be likely to produce, you must have regard to the particular class of921 persons among whom they were circulated, and to the time and other circumstances in which they were circulated. In judging what would be the natural and ordinary consequences of a publication like this, and what, therefore, was the probable intention of the writer or publisher, I must impress on you, as perhaps the most important point in my summing up, that you must bear in mind the time, the place, the circumstances, and the occasion of the publication. When you are considering the probable effect of a publication upon people's minds, it is essential to consider who the people are. Then you have to look at the standing and the position of the prisoner Tilak. But in the next place, in judging the intention of the accused, you must be guided not only by your estimate of the effect of the articles upon the minds of their readers, but also by your commonsense, your knowledge of the words, your understanding of the meaning of words, and your experience of the way in which a man writes when he is animated by a particular feeling. Again, in judging of the intention of the writer or publisher, you must look at the articles as a whole, giving due weight to every part. It would not be fair to judge of the intention by isolated passages or casual expressions without reference > to the context. You must consider each passage in connection with the others and with the general drift of the whole.

Another learned judge, Jenkins CJ, observed in Queen-Empress v Luxman Narayan Joshi :[1]

> To determine whether the intention of the accused was to call into being hostile feelings, the rule that a man must be taken to intend the natural and reasonable consequences of his act must be applied; so that if on reading through the articles the reasonable and natural and probable effect on the minds of those to whom they are addressed appears to be that feelings of hatred, contempt, or disaffection would be excited towards the Government, then it is justifiable to say that the articles are written with that intent, and that they are an attempt to create the feelings against which the law seeks to provide.

Intention is Co-Related with the Natural Consequences

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council also laid down that in judging the question of intent, the publisher must be deemed to intend that which is the natural result of the words having regard, among other things, to the character and description of that part of the public who are expected to read the words.[2]To intend a thing is to act in such a way as to expect that certain consequences would follow. Intention therefore is correlated with the natural consequences which must follow from a particular act.[3] In order to decide whether or not a speech constitutes an attempt to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection, it should be viewed from the standpoint of the type of persons to whom it was primarily addressed. On the one hand, their limitations, if any, have to be taken into account and on the other, the fact that the words may convey to them a literal meaning must not be lost sight of. The time and the place are also factors which should be considered. The court must not look to a single sentence or an isolated expression, but take the speech as a whole and give it a full, free and generous consideration.[4]

A person accused under this section cannot be attributed the requisite 'intention' if he was not even aware of the contents of the seditious publication.[5]

922While however, these decisions furnish the principle or test to be applied in order to ascertain intention, it is only right to bear in mind that the articles would be read not in any spirit of narrow criticism, but in a fair, free and liberal spirit, and, if any doubt should arise in regard to the intention, the benefit of that doubt should be given to the accused.[6]

21. 'Government Established by Law in India'

Section 17 of the IPC, as it originally stood, defined 'Government' as denoting 'the person or persons authorised by law to administer the executive Government'. But this has been altered by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950 and Act 3 of 1951. Under the present s 17, the word 'Government' denotes the Central Government or the government of a State. The expression 'the government established by law' has to be distinguished from the persons for the time being engaged in carrying on the administration. 'Government established by law' is the visible symbol of the state. The very existence of the state will be in jeopardy if the government established by law is subverted. Hence, the continued existence of the government established by law is an essential condition of the stability of the state. That is why 'sedition', as the offence in this section has been characterised, comes under Chapter 6 relating to offences against the state.[7] The phrase 'Government established by law in India' means the established authority which governs the country and administers its public affairs and includes the representatives to whom the task of Government is entrusted.[8]

Government and Form of Government not the Same Thing

There is a sharp distinction between the government and the form of the government. To fight against a principle or doctrine is not the same thing as to fight against a government established by law. To suggest a change in the form of government is not tantamount to causing disaffection towards the government established by law. To suggest some other form of government is not necessarily to bring the present government into hatred or contempt.[9]

An attack on imperialism as a system or a school of opinion without reference to persons does not involve any incitement to hatred or contempt of those who are in the system or hold the opinion.[10]

A general criticism of certain officer or officers cannot be deemed to be a criticism of government established by law.[11]

Calling bureaucrats, thugs and profiteers is not sedition. Criticism of the subordinate officials of the government and not of the government itself is not sedition.[12]

An attack upon certain police officers at a particular place does not convey any reflection upon the governing authority.[13]

923To say that an officer of high rank 'played holi with the blood of Indians' does bring government into hatred and contempt.[14]

Ministers are not Government

The feelings, which are the object of this section to prohibit, may be excited towards the government in a variety of ways; and it is possible to excite such feelings towards the government by an unfair condemnation of any of its services. Whether in a particular case the condemnation of any service is sufficient to excite any feeling of hatred or contempt or disaffection towards government by law established, must depend upon the nature of the criticism, the position of the service in the administration and all the other circumstances of that case. It would be a question of fact to be determined in each case with reference to its circumstances. But as a matter of law it cannot be said that the condemnation of a particular service under the government by law established can never be sufficient to excite any of the feelings prohibited by this section towards such government.[15] It is quite possible, by the abuse of government officials as officials, to make an endeavour to bring into hatred or contempt the government established by law.[16] Although in popular language, the ministers may be referred to as 'the Government', they are not 'the Government', within the meaning of ss 7 and 124A, IPC .[17]

Where the article, for publishing which the accused are tried and convicted of an offence under this section amounts in essence to nothing more than a censure expressed in exaggerated, inflated and intemperate language, on a draft bill sponsored by a ministry and is thus an attack not on the ministry but against the policy of the ministry as revealed through the proposed legislation, it is not seditious in the sense that it brings or attempts to bring the ministry into hatred or contempt, or that it excites disaffection in any greater measure than the measure implicit in the working of a democratic constitution, apart altogether from the question whether it is seditious within the narrower limits imposed by the IPC .[18]

22. Explanations 2 and 3

Right of Criticism

In the original section inserted in 1870 there was only one explanation. With regard to this, Strachey J, in his charge to the jury in Queen-Empress v Bal Gangadhar Tilak ,[19] said:

> While the first cl shows affirmatively what the offence made punishable by the section is, the explanation states negatively what it is not; it says that something 'is not disaffection', and 'is not an offence within this clause'. Therefore, its object is to protect from the condemnation pronounced by the first clause certain acts which it distinguishes from the disloyal attempts which the first clause deals with. The next and most important point for you to bear in mind is that the thing protected by the explanation is 'the making of comments on the measures of the Government' with a certain intention. This shows that the explanation has a strictly defined and limited924 scope. Observe that it has no application whatever unless you come to the conclusion that the writings in question can fairly and reasonably be construed as 'the making of comments on the measures of the Government'. It does not apply to any sort of writing except that. It does not apply to any writing which consists not merely of comments upon Government measures, but of attacks upon the Government itself...In the next place supposing that you are satisfied that these writings can fairly and reasonably be construed as 'comments on the measures of the Government' and not as attacks upon the Government itself, still you cannot apply the explanation unless you believe that such comments were made with the intention of exciting only such a disapprobation of the measures of the Government, as is compatible with a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government and to support the lawful authority of the Government, against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist that authority...It shows clearly what a public speaker or writer may do, and what he may not do. A man may criticize or comment upon any measure or act of the Government, whether legislative or executive, and freely express his opinion upon it. He may discuss the Income Tax Act, the Epidemic Disease Act, or any military expedition, or the suppression of plague or famine, or the administration of justice. He may express the strongest condemnation of such measures, and he may do so severely, and even unreasonably, perversely and unfairly. So long as he confines himself to that, he will be protected by the explanation. But if he goes beyond that, and, whether in the course of comments upon measures or not, holds up the Government itself to the hatred or contempt of his readers, as for instances, by attributing to it every sort of evil and misfortune suffered by the people, or dwelling adversely on its foreign origin and character, or imputing to it base motives, or accusing it of hostility or indifference to the welfare of the people, then he is guilty under the section, and the explanation will not save him. The object of the explanation is to protect honest journalism and bona fide criticism of public measures and institutions with a view to their improvement, and to the remedying of grievances and abuses, and to distinguish this from attempts, whether open or disguised, to make the people hate their rulers. So long as a journalist observes this distinction, he has nothing to fear.

The single explanation in the original section has been replaced by the present Explanations 2 and 3. With regard to them the select committee in their report said:

> We have added Explanation 3 to make it clear that criticism on the action of Government is not confined to cases in which it is sought to bring about an alteration of what has been done. For example, suppose the Government makes an appointment which is considered objectionable. That appointment may be criticised, although the criticism may not have in view that cancellation of the appointment. We have made consequential amendments in Explanation 2 to make the language of the two explanations uniform.

These explanations were added to remove any doubt as to the meaning of the legislature; they do not add to or subtract from the section itself.[20]

In Emperor v Sadashiv Narayan Bhalerao ,[21] their Lordships of the Privy Council observed that the amendment of this section in 1898 by the inclusion of hatred or contempt and the addition of explns 2 and 3 did not affect or alter the construction of the section laid down in Tilak's case; and the principles laid down by Strachey J, in Tilak's case[22] have been generally followed by the courts in India.925

Meticulous Care to Balance Two Political Considerations by Explanation

Explanation 2 provides for comments expressing disapprobation of the measure of the government with a view to obtain their alteration by lawful means, and explanation 3 provides for comments expressing disapprobation of the administrative or other action of the government. Both the explanations are in a negative form and in both there is an apparent repetition of the positive enactment in the guise of a qualification. Meticulous care has been taken by the legislature to balance two important political considerations namely, (a) the undesirability of anything tending to excite sedition, and (b) the undesirability of preventing any bona fide argument for reform. Prominence is given to the first consideration in the main part of the section and to the second in the two explanations. In applying these balancing principles it is inevitable that different minds may come to different results, one attaching more weight to the consideration of freedom of argument, and the other to the preservation of law and order or of harmony.[23] As pointed out by their Lordships of the Supreme Court, the explanations appended to the main body of the section make it clear that criticism of public measures or comment on government action, however strongly worded, would be within reasonable limits and consistent with the fundamental right of freedom of speech and expression. It is only when the words, written or spoken, etc., which have the pernicious tendency or intention of creating public disorder or disturbance of law and order that the law steps in to prevent such activities in the interest of public order. So construed, the section strikes the correct balance between individual fundamental rights and the interest of public order.[24]

Sedition's Character Changes With Time

In Bowman v Secular Society Ltd , Lord Sumner observed:

> The words, as well as the acts, which tend to endanger society, differ from time to time in proportion as society is stable or insecure in fact, or is believed by its reasonable members to be open to assault. In the present day meetings and processions are held lawful, which 150 years ago would have been deemed seditious, and this is not because the law is weaker or has changed, but because, the times having changed, society is stronger than before.[25]

Many judicial decisions in particular cases, therefore, which were no doubt correct at the time when they were given, may well be inapplicable to the circumstances of today. The time is long past when the mere criticism of government was sufficient to constitute sedition, for it is recognised that the right to utter honest and reasonable criticism is a source of strength to a community rather than a weakness. Criticism of an existing system of government is not excluded, nor even the expression of a desire for a different system altogether. The language of this section if read literally, even with the explanations attached to it, would suffice to make a surprising number of persons in this country guilty of sedition; no one however, supposes that it is to be read in that sense. The language itself has been adopted from English law, but it is to be remembered that in England the good sense of jurymen can always correct extravagant interpretations sought to be given by the executive government or even by the judges themselves; and if in this country that check is absent, or practically absent, it becomes all the more necessary for the courts, when a case of this kind comes before them, to put themselves so far as possible in the place of a jury, and to926 take a broad view, without much refining in applying the general principles which underlie the law of sedition to the particular facts and circumstances brought to their notice.[26] In a democratic country such criticisms are to some extent unavoidable, they are made for the purpose of enlisting popular support, and in considering the effect of such criticism no serious notice ought to be taken of crude, blundering attempts or of rhetorical exaggeration by which nobody is likely to be impressed. As Lord Sumner pointed out, with the change of times, the effect of criticism also changes; what was damaging contempt or hatred of a bureaucratic government is not so of a popular government--a government which can neither afford to be hypersensitive, nor impervious, to criticism.[27] In England the law on the subject is thus summarised in Halsbury's Laws of England:[28]

> The freest public discussion, comment, criticism, and censure, either at meetings or in the press in relation to all political or party questions, all public acts of the servants of the Crown, all acts of the Government, and all proceedings of Courts of Justice are permissible, and no narrow construction is to be put upon the expressions used in such a discussion, etc., but the criticism and censure must be without malignity, and must not impute corrupt or malicious motives.[29] Every man has a right to give every public matter a candid, full and free discussion; something must be allowed for feeling in men's minds and for some warmth of expression, but intention to incite the people to take the power into their own hands and to provoke them to tumult and disorder is a seditious intention.[30]

Object of Explanations

Explanations 2 and 3 are intended to protect criticism of government measures, and of administrative and executive action of government, and they give perfect freedom to journalists, to publicists, to orators and public speakers, to discuss the measures and administrative acts of the government, to disapprove of them, to attack them, and to use forcible and strong language if necessary, and to do everything legitimate and honest in bringing before the public or the government the fact that their measures or their actions are disapproved by a section of the public or by that particular speaker or journalist. But no publicist, no journalist, no speaker has any right to attribute dishonest or immoral motives to government. Criticism, though harsh and uncompromising, must be free from the taint of language which is likely to arouse or calculated to encourage feelings of enmity, hatred, or disloyalty against the government.[31] These explanations have no application whatever unless the criticisms are concerning the measures of government or the administrative or other action of government and that too, without exciting or attempting to excite hatred, contempt or disaffection. The object of the explanations is to protect bona fide criticism of public measures and institutions with a view to their improvement, and to the remedying of grievances and abuses, and to distinguish this from attempts, whether open or disguised, to make the people hate their rulers.[32]

927A reasonable criticism of the action of government in a particular matter without any attempt to create hatred or contempt against it is not sedition, but an incitement to insurrection which falls within the scope of s 124A .[33]

It is not sedition to criticise or comment upon administrative machinery or the officers of government or an act or measure of the government and freely express one's opinion thereon. One may express condemnation and so long as he confines himself to that he will be protected; but if he exceeds the limits of fair criticism and attacks the government with the object of creating disaffection, he must pay the penalty for it.[34]

A journalist may comment expressing disapprobation of the measures of the government with a view to obtain their alteration by lawful means, but he must do so without attempting to excite hatred and disaffection.[35]

Fair Criticism of Government not an Offence

Fair criticism of the government is no offence, and it is quite possible to express dissatisfaction without exciting disaffection.[36] It has been said that in the present day an attempt to remove from power the ministers in office, or any agitation for the repeal of an Act of Parliament cannot be seditious if no unlawful means are employed.[37]

It has been laid down in R v Sullivan ,[38] that a journalist may canvass and censure the acts of the government and their policy and indeed it is his duty. He is free to discuss their acts and their public policy and he may, if he thinks proper, censure the acts of the government and ministers. While a very large amount of latitude is and must be allowed to writers in the public press, the interests of the state must at the same time be not lost sight of and writers cannot under the guise of criticism of public affairs be allowed to indulge in attributing base, improper or dishonest motives to those who carry on the work of the government of the country.[39] Conditions at present in India are quite different from those which existed in 1897 and far greater freedom is given to the press now than was given in those days, and things which may now be said and written with impunity would have been treated as seditious at the end of the last century. The state of the minds of the people at present and the present conditions have to be considered to decide whether an article is now likely to engender feelings of hatred, enmity or disloyalty in the minds of the readers.[40] Although it cannot be said that language current in the political controversy of a country can never be made the subject of a charge of sedition for something may turn upon the occasion on which it is used, the context in which it occurs and on the surrounding circumstances of the case, but ordinarily it should be difficult to found a charge of sedition upon ideas, sentiments and expressions which have become a part and parcel of the normal political life of the country, and which do not excite people to disorder.[41]928

23. Truth does not Excuse Seditious Commentary

The truth or otherwise of the aspersions cast upon the government is immaterial and it has no justification for seditious utterances.[42] If certain alleged facts are used as a peg on which to hang seditious comments, the truth of the facts does not excuse the seditious commentary.[43]

24. Liability of Editor, Printer and Publisher

The liability under the section arises from certain action, viz., the bringing or attempting to bring into hatred or contempt the government of the country. This is a result which may be effected in various ways, i.e., either by speech, writing, by signs or by visible representations. The offence consists of making use of any means for the purpose. It is quite immaterial whether such means had been previously prepared for the purpose by the person who uses them--or by some other person--if those means are used for the purpose of bringing the government into hatred or contempt. It is, therefore, not sufficient for a person who has published matter calculated to excite hatred, contempt, or disaffection, to say: 'This is not my own work', because the adoption of the means, the publishing thereof, is in itself his work, and therefore it is, that the printer or publisher of an article, which is open to these objections is always to be held liable. Whoever the composer might be, whosoever may have written or caused it to be written, the person who uses it for exciting disaffection, will be guilty of an offence under this section.[44]

The publisher is prima facie liable for whatever appears in his paper, and if he seeks to get rid of that liability the onus lies on him. It is for him to prove circumstances which may justify responsibility not being fastened on him. What is necessary for him to establish is that the article was published without his knowledge or authority or consent, or without any acquiescence or intention on his part. It is not sufficient for him to say that what was put into his paper of a seditious character was put in during his absence and without his authority. If he did not authorize it, it is for him to prove that as a fact, because it must be within his knowledge whether any such authority was given. It is not enough for him to say: 'I never authorized publication of this particular article'.[45] Intention is an essential ingredient under this section and a person accused under it cannot be attributed the requisite 'intention' if he was not even aware of the contents of the seditious publication.[46] But the man who is the proprietor and owner of the press and the publishing house connected with it cannot be allowed to contend that he can shut his eyes to everything going on under the premises and then pretend that he has no knowledge of the contents of the publications printed and issued by him.[47] A registered printer and publisher of a newspaper cannot escape liability even if he proves temporary absence and want of knowledge of the seditious matter,[48] though he is not liable, of course, if a concealed seditious object is not proved.[49]929

Editor's Liability for Seditious Matter

Where it is satisfactorily established that the editor was on leave and had entrusted his duties to a responsible person who will have accepted the full responsibility for the publication of the libel, the editor cannot be held to be criminally liable. In such a case there is no necessity for the editor to adduce positive proof to show that he was on leave when the libel was published.[50]

25. Joint Trial of Printer and Publisher

In cases of sedition, the printer and publisher, being concerned in the same transaction, in regard to the publication of the seditious matter, they may be tried jointly in proper cases.[51] Where the charge framed against the accused did not contain any averment that he did anything as against the government, offence under s 124A is not made out.[52]

26. Seditious Pamphlet

The sending of a seditious pamphlet by post, addressed to a private individual not by name, but by designation as the representative of a large body of students, amounts to publication.[53]

27. Punishment

The punishment for sedition may, under this section, be anything from a mere fine to imprisonment for life. The sentence to be actually imposed will depend upon the circumstances of each case, and the position and age of the accused.[54] In the case of political offences arising out of the beliefs of the accused, severe sentences defeat their object. In practice such sentences confirm the offenders in their beliefs and create other offenders thus increasing the evil and the danger to the public.[55] The test should be whether the speech was a violent one and whether the intention of the accused was to excite people to commit violence.[56] 'Where the speaker in his speech does not in terms advocate violence in any shape and there is nothing in the speech which might by implication or innuendo suggest its use, a heavy sentence is not called for'.[57] Where the speech is mild and the offence a technical one, a light sentence would be enough.[58]930

28. 'Forfeiture'

There is nothing in this section which authorizes a magistrate to confiscate the property of an accused.[59] But under s 95 of the CrPC, any newspaper, book or document containing seditious matter may be forfeited to Government.

A Book Containing Objectionable Matter may be Forfeited

If the book does contain such objectionable matter publication of which would be punishable under s 124A, IPC, the Government has the right to declare the publication forfeited. The mere fact that in the order it is also mentioned that the subject-matter is prejudicial to maintenance of harmony would not make the matter any the less objectionable if it is in fact objectionable under any of the sections. It is not possible to accept that merely because it is also stated in the order that the subject-matter is prejudicial to the maintenance of harmony it would vitiate the order if it is otherwise found that the matter is of such a nature that its publication is punishable under s 124A, IPC .[60]

29. Freedom of Thought and Remedy Available to the Government

There can indeed be no real freedom unless thought is free and unchecked, not free thought for those who agree with us but freedom for the thought that we hate. It is only from a clash of ideas that the truth can emerge, for the best test of truth is the power of thought to get itself accepted in the market. This is not to suggest, that if any words or writings incite violence or disturb law and order or create public disorder with a view to overthrow government established by law, the state would have no power to forfeit a book containing such words or writings in order to prevent disturbance of public tranquility or public order.[61]

30. Conditions for Initiation of Proceedings

This is one of those offences of which no court shall take cognizance except with the previous sanction of the Central Government or of the State Government.[62] Sanction to prosecute constitutes a condition precedent to the institution of the prosecution; the giving of the sanction confers jurisdiction on the court to try the case; and where there is no valid sanction there is a defect in the jurisdiction of the court which can never be cured under s 465, CrPC .[63] The absence of sanction is a defect which vitiates the proceedings abinitio and is not a mere irregularity curable under s 465 .[64] It is not necessary for the sanction under this section to be in any particular form or in writing, or for it to set out the facts in respect of which it is given, though it is desirable to do so.[65]931

31. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by the court of session.[66]

As under the CrPC 1973 an offence under this section cannot be tried by a magistrate and it is punishable with imprisonment for life. Section 260 of the CrPC is not applicable to it and it cannot be tried summarily.

32. Charge

Particulars of Charge

In an indictment for seditious words, the words alleged to be seditious must be specified.[67] Where an offence under this section is committed by means of a series of pictures, the requirements of the Code are satisfied if the charge gives such a description of the pictures as is reasonably sufficient to enable the accused to know the matter with which he is charged; and so, if an offence under the section is committed by words spoken, the requirements of the law are satisfied if the charge gives such a description of the words used as is reasonably sufficient to enable the accused to know the matter with which he is charged, that is, if the charge states the words used with substantial, though not absolute, accuracy. Even if the words or the substance of the words used, are not entered at all in the charge, this will amount only to an irregularity and will not afford ground for reversing a conviction, unless the accused has, in fact, been misled by the omission, and it has occasioned a failure of justice.[68] In a trial under this section the substance of the speeches alleged to have been made by the accused was not mentioned in the charge, and all that was stated there was that on certain dates the accused delivered seditious speeches and brought or attempted to bring into hatred or contempt, or excite or attempted to excite, disaffection towards the government established by law in British India. It was held that the charge was defective; but having regard to the simple nature of allegations made by the prosecution as to the substance of the speeches, the accused was not under any misapprehension as to the nature of the charge, and was not prejudiced by the defect in the charge.[69] It is not necessary for the charge to specify the distinct passages in the pamphlet which are alleged to constitute the offence of attempting to promote feelings of hatred and the distinct passages which are alleged to constitute the offence of attempting to excite disaffection. It is sufficient for the charges to allege generally that the pamphlet constitutes an attempt to promote feelings of hatred and also excite disaffection.[70] The two offences, though committed by means of the same pamphlet, are as distinct as two libels on two different persons contained in one book. They do not come within the provisions of s 71, IPC .[71]

Where charges of conspiracy and sedition were framed on the basis of letters, recovered in a search on the person of the accused, it could not be said that the932 charges were not justified as the accused were not the authors of the letters. Authorship of seditious material alone is not the gist of any of the offences. Distribution, circulation of seditious material may also be sufficient on the facts and the circumstances of the case.[72] Where the charge framed against the accused contained no averment that he did anything as against the government, the offence under s 124A, IPC, is not made out.[73]

Form of Charge

The charge under this section may be framed as follows:

I, (name and office of Sessions Judge, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....by writing or speaking the words (mention them) (or by signs or by visible representation or otherwise) brought, (or attempted to bring) into hatred or contempt (or excited) (or attempted to excite disaffection towards) the Government established by law in India and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 124A of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

33. Proof

When an information is lodged at the police station and an offence is registered, then the mala fides of the informant would be of secondary importance. It is the material collected during investigation and the evidence led in the trial Court which decides the fate of the accused person.[74]

It is not necessary, in order to establish the fact of publication of seditious matter transmitted through the post office, on a charge under this section to prove the actual posting, nor that it was printed and published under the directions of the accused. If the seditious writing is shown to be in the handwriting of the accused, and it is further proved that the contents were in fact printed and published, there is sufficient evidence of publication by him.[75]

On a charge under this section, the sending of a pamphlet by post, addressed to a private individual not by name, but by designation as the representative of a large body of students, amounts to publication.[76]

Where the charge framed against the accused is totally bereft of the crucial allegation that accused did anything with reference to the government, it is not possible to sustain the conviction of the accused under s 124A, IPC .[77]

34. Evidence--Notes of Speech are Admissible

Even though the speech taken down by the reporter may not be verbatim, provided there is nothing to show that such portions as were taken down, were incorrectly taken down or that excerpts of the speech are not a fair representation of the general933 drift of the speeches, and also provided the entire subject-matter of the speech was such as to bring it within the purview of s 124A, the conviction can be justified.[78] Notes of speech are admissible in evidence and a person can be convicted on those notes.[79]

66 Substituted by Act 4 of 1898, s 4, for the original s 124A which had been inserted by Act 27 of 1870, s 5 .

67 The words 'Her Majesty or' omitted by the AO 1950. The words 'or the Crown Representative' inserted after the word 'Majesty' by the AO 1937 were omitted by the AO 1948.

68 The words 'British India' have successively been substituted by the AO 1948, the AO 1950 and Act 3 of 1951, s 3 and Schedule to read as above.

69 The words 'or British India' inserted by the AO 1937 omitted by the AO 1948.

Chapter VI

Of Offences Against the State

S. 125.

Waging war against any Asiatic Power in alliance with the Government of India.--

Whoever wages war against the Government of any Asiatic Power in alliance or at peace with the [80][Government of India] or attempts to wage such war, or abets the waging of such war, shall be punished with [81][imprisonment for life], to which fine may be added, or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, to which fine may be added, or with fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The offences, forbidden by this section, are the same as those under s 121, IPC ; the persons protected hereby being the government of an asiatic power in alliance or at peace with the Government of India. The offences defined in this section were also punishable under the Foreign Enlistment Act 1870,[82] which applied to India, and the preamble of which recited: 'It is expedient to make provision for the regulation of the conduct of Her Majesty's subjects during the existence of hostilities between foreign states with which Her Majesty is at peace'. The section is based upon the principle of international amity and the desire of the state to remain in friendly relations with its neighbours.[83]

An Indian waging war against the Rajah of Manipore who was then an Asiatic sovereign in alliance with the Queen of England and Empress of India, was held guilty of the offence punishable under this section.[84]

2. Whoever

Commentary under same heading in ss 121 and 124A may be referred to.

3. 'Abets'

Commentary under s 121 may be referred to. Section 121A , IPC does not apply to this section, and hence a conspiracy to wage war would have to be followed by an overt act, in order to render it punishable as abetment under this section.934

4. Procedure

It is the same as in the case of an offence under s 121, IPC .

80 Substituted by the AO 1950, for 'Queen'.

81 Substituted by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Schedule, 'for transportation for life' (wef 1-1-1956).

Chapter VI

Of Offences Against the State

S. 126.

Committing depredation on territories of Power at peace with the Government of India.--

Whoever commits depredation, or makes preparations to commit depredation, on the territories of any Power in alliance or at peace with the [85][Government of India], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine and to forfeiture of any property used or intended to be used in committing such depredation, or acquired by such depredation.

Comments

1. Scope

The provisions of this section differ from those of s 125 in the following particulars:

(i) The power in question need not be an Asiatic one.
(ii) The object of the expedition is plunder, not to wage war.
(iii) The depredation must be actually carried out, or preparations made to carry it out.

An attempt to carry out depredation would not perse be punishable under this section, but under s 511, and it would of course be evidence of preparation, whilst abetment would be punishable under the provisions of ch V.

2. Whoever

Commentary under same heading in ss 121 and 124A may be referred to.

3. Depredation

Depredate means subject to plunder and pillage. [86]Therefore, in this section depredation means plunder on territories of a state in alliance or at peace with the Government of India.

4. Procedure

It is the same as in the case of an offence under s 121, IPC .

5. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and office of Sessions Judge etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of....., at....., committed (or made preparations to commit) depredation on the territories of....., a Power in alliance (or at935 peace) with the Government of India, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 126 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VI

Of Offences Against the State

S. 127.

Receiving property taken by war or depredation mentioned in sections 125 and 126 .--

Whoever receives any property knowing the same to have been taken in the commission of any of the offences mentioned in sections 125 and 126, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine and to forfeiture of the property so received.

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides for punishment of persons who knowingly receive property obtained by waging war against any Asiatic power in alliance with the Government of India or by depredation on its territories. The receivers of such property also are liable as they are accessories after the fact.

2. Whoever

Commentary under same heading in ss 121 and 124A may be referred to.

3. 'Knowing'

Synopsis notes under s 26 may be referred to.

4. Proof

To prove a charge under this section the prosecution has to prove the waging of war against the government of an Asiatic power in alliance or at peace with the Government of India, or the committing of depredation, on the territories of any power in alliance or at peace with the Government of India and the receipt of the property taken therein, and the knowledge of the accused that the property received by him is the property taken in the managing of such war or by such plunder.

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable and triable by the court of session. Prior sanction of the Central Government is necessary for taking cognizance of this offence by the court.

6. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and office of the Sessions Judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of....., at.....received (specify the property) knowing the same to have been taken in waging war against.....an Asiatic936 power in alliance (or at peace) with the Government of India (of knowing the same to have been taken in the commission of depredation on the territories of.....) a power in alliance (or at peace) with the Government of India, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 127, of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this Court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Chapter VI

Of Offences Against the State

S. 128.

Public servant voluntarily allowing prisoner of State or war to escape.--

Whoever, being a public servant and having the custody of any State prisoner or prisoner of war, voluntarily allows such prisoner to escape from any place in which such prisoner is confined, shall be punished with [87][imprisonment for life], or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This and the next two sections deal with escape and rescue of state prisoners. The offence under this section is an aggravated form of the offence under s 225A, IPC . It provides for the punishment of a public servant who voluntarily allows a state prisoner to escape, while the next section provides for the punishment of a public servant who negligently suffers escape of such a prisoner from confinement. Section 130 , IPC provides for the punishment of any person, other than a public servant, who aids in the escape of a state prisoner or rescues him or harbours him after his escape.

2. Whoever

Commentary under same heading in ss 121 and 124A may be referred to.

3. 'State Prisoner'

A state prisoner is a prisoner arrested and confined for 'reasons of state embracing the due maintenance of the alliance formed by the Indian government with foreign powers, the preservation of tranquility and the security of India from foreign hostility and from internal commotion'.[88] The regulations providing for confinement of state prisoners are specified in the footnote.[89]

4. Procedure

It is the same as in the case of an offence under s 121, IPC .937

5. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I, (name and office of Session Judge, etc.,) hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:

That you, being a public servant (mention the office), and as such having the custody of.....a state prisoner (or a prisoner of war), on or about the.....day of.....at..... voluntarily allowed such prisoner to escape from....., the place in which such prisoner was confined, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 128 of Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

Chapter VI

Of Offences Against the State

S. 129.

Public servant negligently suffering such prisoner to escape.--

Whoever, being a public servant and having the custody of any State prisoner or prisoner of war, negligently suffers such prisoner to escape from any place of confinement in which such prisoner is confined, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The previous section deals with voluntarily allowing a state prisoner or prisoner of war to escape from custody by a public servant, while this section deals with an offence of suffering such escape by negligence. The punishment provided under this section is simple imprisonment extending upto three years and fine while the offence under s 128, IPC is punishable with life imprisonment or imprisonment of either description extending upto ten years and fine. The remaining provisions of both the sections are the same.

2. Whoever

Commentary under same heading in ss 121 and 124A may be referred to.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. Prior sanction of the Central Government or state government is necessary for taking cognizance of even this offence.

4. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I,..... (the name and office of the Magistrate) hereby charge you..... (name of accused) as follows:

That you, being a public servant (mention office) and as such having the custody of.....a state prisoner (or a prisoner of war), on or about the.....day of.....at.....938 negligently suffered his escape from.....where he was confined and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 129 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VI

Of Offences Against the State

S. 130.

Aiding escape of, rescuing or harbouring such prisoner.--

Whoever knowingly aids or assists any State prisoner or prisoner of war in escaping from lawful custody, or rescues or attempts to rescue any such prisoner, or harbours or conceals any such prisoner who has escaped from lawful custody, or offers or attempts to offer any resistance to the recapture of such prisoner, shall be punished with [90][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.--A state prisoner or prisoner of war, who is permitted to be at large on his parole within certain limits in [91][India], is said to escape from lawful custody if he goes beyond the limits within which he is allowed to be at large.

Comments

1. Scope

The scope of this section is much wider than the scope of ss 128 - 129, IPC . The said sections deal with only escape of state prisoners or the prisoners of war, while this section also embraces within its ambit rescuing or attempting to rescue, harbouring or concealing, such prisoners, who have escaped from lawful custody, or offering or attempting to offer resistance to the recapture of such prisoners and makes these acts punishable. Its application is not confined to public servants only and it applies to all alike. In doing any of the acts specified in this section the accused must know that the person concerned is a state prisoner or a prisoner of war. In the absence of such knowledge, the offence may fall under s 225 or s 225B, IPC but not under this section.

2. Whoever

Commentary under s 225 may be referred to.

3. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, not compoundable and triable by a court of session. Prior sanction of the Central Government or state government is necessary for taking cognizance of an offence under this section by the court.939

4. Charge

One of the following forms of charge may be adopted:

I,.....(name and office of the Sessions Judge etc.) hereby charge you..... (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of..... at.....knowingly aided (or assisted or rescued or attempted to rescue).....a state prisoner (or prisoner of war) in escaping form lawful custody and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 130 of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of this court.

Or

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....knowingly harboured..... (or concealed), a state prisoner or prisoner of war, who had escaped from lawful custody (or offered or attempted to offer resistance to the recapture of...., a state Prisoner) (or prisoner of war after he had escaped form lawful custody) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 130 of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of this Court.

> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.940

90 Substituted by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Schedule for 'transportation for life' (wef 1-1-1956).

91 The words 'British India' have successively been substituted by the AO 1948, the AO 1950 and Act 3 of 1951, s 3 and Schedule to read as above.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VII

Of Offences Relating to the Army, [1][Navy and Air Force]

General Notes

The offences dealt with in this chapter (ss 131 - 140) consist of the abetment of breaches of military law, and the harbouring of offenders against that law. Now, breaches of such law are not likewise breaches of the Code, nor are they breaches of a special or local law, for special and local laws apply to all persons with reference to a particular subject, or in a particular area, whilst military law applies only to a special class of people. Consequently, the abetment of such offences would not, in the absence of the special legislation in this chapter, have been punishable. Hence, arose the necessity for the chapter.[2] The authors of the Code themselves explained the necessity of the provisions of this chapter as follows:

> It is obvious that a person who, not being himself subject to military law, exhorts or assists those who are subject to military law to commit gross breaches of discipline, is a proper subject of punishment. But the general law respecting the abetting of offences will not reach such a person; nor, framed as it is, would it be desirable that it should reach him. It would not reach him, because the military delinquency which he has abetted is not punishable by this Code, and therefore is not, in our legal nomenclature, an offence. Nor is it desirable that the punishment of a person, not military, who has abetted a breach of military discipline, should be fixed according to the principles on which we have proceeded in framing the law of abetment. We have provided that the punishment of the abettor of an offence shall be equal or proportional to the punishment of the person who commits that offence; and this seems to us a sound principle when applied only to the punishments provided by this Code. But the military penal law is, and must necessarily be, far more severe than that under which the body of the people lives. The severity of the military penal law can be justified only by the reason drawn from the peculiar habits and duties of a soldier and from the peculiar relation in which they stand to the Government. The extension of such severity to persons not members of the military profession appears to us altogether unwarrantable. If a person, not military, who abets a breach of military discipline, should be made liable to a punishment regulated according to our general rules, by the punishment to which such a breach of discipline renders a soldier liable, the whole symmetry of the penal law would be destroyed. He who should induce a solider to disobey an order of a Commanding Officer would be liable to be punished more severely than a dacoit, a professional thug, an incendiary, a ravisher, or a kidnapper. We have attempted in this chapter to provide, in a manner more consistent with the general character of the Code, for the punishment of persons who, not being military, abet military crimes.[3]941

Chapter VII

Of Offences Relating to the Army, [Navy and Air Force]

S. 131.

Abetting mutiny, or attempting to seduce a soldier, sailor or airman from his duty.--

Whoever abets the committing of mutiny by an officer, soldier, [4][sailor or airman], in the Army, [5][Navy or Air Force] of the [6][Government of India] or attempts to seduce any such officer, soldier, [7][sailor or airman] from his allegiance or his duty, shall be punished with [8][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[9][Explanation.--In this section the words "officer", [10]["soldier", [11]["sailor"] and "airman"] include any person subject to the [12][Army Act, [13][the Army Act, 1950 (46 of 1950), [14][the Naval Discipline Act, [15][* * *] the [16][Indian Navy (Discipline) Act, 1934 (34 of 1934)], [17][the Air Force Act, or [18][the Air Force Act, 1950 (45 of 1950)], as the case may be]].

Comments

1. Scope

This section supplements, and extends to civilians, the penal provisions of the Army Act 1950, the Air Force Act 1950, and Indian Navy (Discipline) Act 1934, etc, relating to mutiny and desertion.

2. Analogous Law

The provisions of this section are similar to those of the English Incitement to Mutiny Act 1797,[19] the Incitement to Disaffection Act 1934[20] and the Naval Discipline Act 1866.[21]942

The Incitement of Mutiny Act 1797,[22] enacted:

> Any person who shall maliciously[23] and advisedly endeavour to seduce any person or persons serving in His Majesty's forces by sea or land, form his or their duty and allegiance to His Majesty, or to incite or stir up any > such person or persons to commit any act of mutiny, or to make or endeavour to make any mutinous assembly, or to commit any traitorous or mutinous practice whatsoever, shall, on being legally convicted of such offence, be adjudged guilty of felony.

Under s 1 of the Punishment of Offences Act 1837,[24] such a person, on conviction 'shall be liable...to be transported beyond the seas for the term of the natural life of such person'.

The Incitement to Disaffection Act 1934[25] provides:

(i) If any person maliciously and advisedly endeavours to seduce any member of His Majesty's forces from his duty or allegiance to His Majesty, he shall be guilty of an offence under this Act.

(ii) If any person, with intent to commit or to aid, abet, counsel or procure the commission of an offence under Section 1 of this Act, has in his possession or under his control any document of such a nature that the dissemination of copies thereof among members of His Majesty's forces would constitute such an offence, he shall be guilty of an offence under this Act.

(iii) A person guilty of an offence under this Act shall be liable, on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or to a fine not exceeding two hundred pounds, or on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding four months or to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds, or (whether on conviction on indictment or on summary conviction) to both such imprisonment and fine.

3. 'Whoever'

In this and the following sections, the word 'whoever' signifies anyone other than a person subject to the Indian Army Act, the Army Act 1950, the Naval Discipline Act, the Indian Naval Discipline Act 1934, or the Air Force Act 1950.[26]

4. 'Abets'

Refer to s 107 of this Code.

5. 'Mutiny'

The term 'mutiny' has not been defined anywhere in this Code. Mutiny appears to mean 'collective insubordination';[27] or a combination of two or more persons to resist, or to induce others to resist, lawful, military authority.[28]

6. 'Soldier'

Under the explanations to this section the word 'soldier' means any person subject to the Naval Discipline Act or the Indian Army Act or the Army Act 1950.943

7. 'Sailor'

'Sailor' means a person subject to the Navy (Discipline) Act 1934.

8. 'Airman'

'Airman' means a person subject to the Air Force Act, or the Air Force Act 1950.[29]

9. 'Attempts to seduce'

To distribute amongst Indian troops copies of a letter published in a newspaper urging Indian soldiers to give up their allegiance to the Indian Government is such an attempt.[30]An indictment upon this statute need not set out the means used for seducing the soldier from his duty and allegiance; and it need not aver that the prisoner knew the person endeavoured to be seduced to be a soldier. Nor, in an indictment for endeavouring to seduce soldiers by means of printed publications addressed to soldiers, is it necessary to specify any particular person or persons serving in Indian forces by sea or land who have been approached by the accused in contravention of the Act. It is sufficient to allege the endeavour to be to seduce persons serving in Indian forces.[31]

10. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognisable and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and is triable by the Court of Session.

11. Charge

The form of charge under this section may be:

> I (Name and office of the Sessions Judge etc), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you on or about the.....day of.....at.....abetted the commission of mutiny by....., an officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Government of India (or attempted to seduce an officer) (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Government of India from his allegiance (or his duty) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 131 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VII

Of Offences Relating to the Army, [Navy and Air Force]

S. 132.

Abetment of mutiny if mutiny is committed in consequence thereof.--

Whoever abets the committing of mutiny by an officer, soldier, [32][sailor or airman] in the Army, [33][Navy or Air Force] of the [34][Government of India], shall, if mutiny be committed in consequence of that abetment, be punished with944 death or with [35][imprisonment for life], or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This is an aggravated form of the offence, dealt within the last section and prescribes the extreme penalty of death where the mutiny abetted is committed in consequence of the abetment.

2. 'In Consequences Thereof'

Refer to explanation to s 109 of this Code.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable and a warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is neither bailable nor compoundable and is triable by the Court of Session.

4. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I..... (name and office of the Sessions Judge, etc), hereby charge you..... (name of accused) as follows:
> That you on or about the.....day of.....at.....abetted the commission of mutiny by....., an officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Government of India, which offence was committed in consequence of your abetment and that you have thereby committed an offence punishable under Section 132 of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of this court.

35 Substituted by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Sch, for 'transportation for life' (wef 1-1-1956).

Chapter VII

Of Offences Relating to the Army, [Navy and Air Force]

S. 133.

Abetment of assault by soldier, sailor or airman on his superior officer, when in execution of his office.--

Whoever abets an assault by an officer, soldier, [36][sailor or airman], in the Army, [37][Navy or Air Force] of the [38][Government of India], on any superior officer being in the execution of his office, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.945

Comments

1. Scope

The substantive offence, the abetment of which is made punishable under this section is the offence defined in s 40 of the Army and Air Force Acts of 1950. The section applies only if the officer assaulted was at the time of assault in execution of his office. Abetment punishable under s 133, IPC can be committed by any person but the assault has to be made by an officer, soldier, sailor or airman in the Army, Navy or Air Force of the Government of India on a superior officer and not an assault on any other person.

2. 'Assault'

Whoever makes any gesture, or any preparation intending or knowing it to be likely that such gesture or preparation will cause any person present to apprehend that he who makes that gesture or preparation is about to use criminal force to that person, is said to commit an assault.

Explanation

Mere words do not amount to an assault. But the words which a person uses may give to his gestures or preparation such a meaning as may make those gestures or preparations amount to an assault.[39]

3. 'Officer'

The expression 'officer' means a person commissioned, gazetted or in pay as an officer in the regular Army, Navy or Air Force.[40]

4. 'Soldier'

Refer to synopsis notes under s 131 .

5. 'Superior Officer'

Section 3(xxiii) of the Army Act 1950, lays down that 'Superior Officer', when used in relation to a person subject to this Act, includes a junior commissioned officer, warrant officer and a non-commissioned officer, and, as regards persons placed under his orders, an officer, warrant officer, petty officer and non-commissioned officer of the Navy or Air Force.

6. 'In the Execution of his Office'

The question whether the superior officer was, at the relevant time, in the execution of his office would depend upon the nature of his duties and the orders of his superior officers. The burden is on the prosecutor to show that the officer was, at the time, in the execution of his duty.

7. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognisable and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is both non-bailable and non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.946

8. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you on or about the.....day of.....at.....abetted an assault by.....an officer..... (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Government of India on.....a superior officer being in the execution of his office, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under Section 133 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognisance.

S. 134.

Abetment of such assault, if the assault is committed.--

Whoever abets an assault by an officer, soldier, [41][sailor or airman], in the Army, [42][Navy or Air Force] of the [43][Government of India], on any superior officer being in the execution of his office, shall, if such assault be committed in consequence of that abetment be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This is an aggravated form of the offence punishable under the previous section. The last section prescribes punishment for abetment of an assault not committed, and this section prescribes punishment for an assault committed in consequence of the abetment.

2. Procedure

The offence is cognisable and a warrant may be issued in the first instance. It is neither bailable nor compoundable, and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

3. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

Chapter VII

Of Offences Relating to the Army, [Navy and Air Force]

S. 135.

Abetment of desertion of soldier, sailor or airman.--

Whoever abets the desertion of any officer, soldier, [44][sailor or airman], in the Army, [45][Navy or Air Force] of the [46][Government of India], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This and the next section refer to offences which are also offences under s 38 of the Army Act 1950, the Air Force Act 1950, and s 49 of the Navy Act 1957. What is made punishable under this section is the abetment of desertion and not desertion itself. It is not necessary that desertion should have taken place. It is enough if desertion is abetted.[47]

2. Desertion

In ordinary language, to desert is to part from, end connection with. In military law it means, to leave without permission, forsake in violation of duty, i.e., to quit service without permission, run away.[48] Desertion must be distinguished from mere absence without leave, which is separately dealt with in s 39 of the Army and Air Force Acts 1950. Desertion implies quitting the service for good, without leave or permission. To establish desertion it would be necessary to prove circumstances justifying an inference that the person deserting has no intention to return to duty.

3. Intention

Under s 108 of this Code a person is said to abet an offence even when he does no more than abet an act which would be an offence, if committed by a person capable by law of committing an offence with the same intention or knowledge as that of the abettor. It is not necessary that the act abetted should be committed, nor is it necessary that the person abetted should have any guilty intention or knowledge.[49]

Where the accused helped a regimental sepoy to desert his regiment, it was held that the accused was guilty of attempting and abetting the desertion of the sepoy under s 135 read with ss 108 and 511 of this Code, even though the regimental sepoy never intended to desert and had offered to do so only to entrap the accused.[50]

4. 'Soldier'

The word 'soldier' in this section must be interpreted as in the explanation to s 131, IPC . The definition given in the Indian Articles of War is expressly confined to those articles and is a very limited one.[51]948

5. Procedure

The offence is cognisable and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by any magistrate.

6. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of the magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you on or about the.....day.....at.....abetted the desertion of....., an officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Government of India, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 135 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

Harbouring deserter.--

Whoever, except as hereinafter excepted, knowing or having reason to believe that an officer, soldier, [52][sailor or airman], in the Army, [53][Navy or Air Force] of the [54][Government of India], has deserted, harbours such officer, soldier, [55][sailor or airman], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Exception.--This provision does not extend to the case in which the harbour is given by a wife to her husband.

Comments

1. Scope

This section refers to an offence which is also an offence under s 38(2) of the Army and Air Force Acts 1950, s 76 of the Navy Act 1957 and s 153(3) of the English Army Act 1881.

2. 'Harbouring Deserter'

The gist of the offence under this section is the harbouring of a deserter knowing or having reason to believe that he has deserted, The Indian Army, Navy or Air Force. As to the meaning of the word 'harbour', refer to s 52A, IPC and notes thereunder.

3. Procedure

Same as in the case of an offence under s 135 .949

4. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of.....at.....knowing or having reason to believe that.....an officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Government of India had deserted, harboured such officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 136 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

Deserter concealed on board merchant vessel through negligence of master.--

The master or person in charge of a merchant vessel, on board of which any deserter from the Army,[56][Navy or Air Force] of the [57][Government of India] is concealed, shall, though ignorant of such concealment, be liable to a penalty not exceeding five hundred rupees, if he might have known of such concealment but for some neglect of his duty as such master or person in charge, or but for some want of discipline on board of the vessel.

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes the person in charge of a merchant vessel on board which a deserter is concealed. The person is liable, even though he is ignorant of the concealment, if he might have known of such concealment but for his negligence or want of discipline on board the vessel. The section applies only to the person in charge of a merchant vessel and not a man-of-war.

2. Procedure

The offence is non-cognisable and summons may be issued in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by any magistrate.

3. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of the Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That....., a deserter from the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Government of India, had concealed himself on or about the.....day of.....at.....on board.....a merchant vessel of which you were the master (or person in charge) through your neglect of duty as such master (or person in charge) (or through want of discipline on board the said vessel) and that you have thereby committed an offence punishable under s 137 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognisance.

Abetment of act of insubordination by soldier, sailor or airman.--

Whoever abets what he knows to be an act of insubordination by an officer, soldier, [58][sailor or airman], in the Army, [59][Navy or Air Force] of the [60][Government of India], shall, if such act of insubordination be committed in consequence of that abetment, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides punishment for abetment of insubordination, an offence described in s 42 of the Army and Air Force Acts 1950. For a conviction under this section it must be shown that the accused abetted an act knowing it to be an act of insubordination. It is also necessary that the act of insubordination should have been committed in consequence of the abetment.

2. Procedure

The offence is cognisable and a warrant may be issued in the first instance. It is bailable, not compoundable and triable by any magistrate.

3. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day of.....at.....abetted what you knew to be an act of insubordination by.....an officer (or soldier or sailor or airman) in the Army (or Navy or Air Force) of the Government of India, and such act of insubordination was committed in consequence of the said abetment, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 138 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

Wearing garb or carrying token used by soldier, sailor or airman.--

Whoever, not being a soldier, [69][sailor or airman], in the Military, [70][Naval or Air] service of the [71][Government of India], wears any garb or carries any token resembling any garb or token used by such a soldier, [72][sailor or airman] with the intention that it may be believed that he is such a soldier, [73][sailor or airman], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Dummy

1. Scope

The object of this section is to discourage the use of garb (dress or costume) or token of military, navy or air service of the Government of India by any person, who is not a soldier, sailor or airman. The use of such garb or token, which are though not of military, navy or air service but resemble with the garb or token used by a soldier, sailor or airman with the intention that it may be believed that the person wearing the same is a soldier, sailor or airman in the military, navy or air service of the Government of India is an offence punishable under this section. To bring a case under this section it is essential that: (a) the garb or token must resemble such the garb or token used by a soldier, sailor or airman; and (b) the use of such garb or token must be with the intention of impersonation.

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable but summons may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by any magistrate.952

3. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you not being a soldier (or sailor or airman) in the Military (or Navy or Air) service of the Government of India, on or about the.....day of.....at..... wore..... (specify the garb) (or carried.....a token) resembling (specify it) or used by such soldier (or sailor or airman) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 140 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognisance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

4. Proof

To establish an offence under this section the following points must be proved:

(i) The wearing of some garb or token used by a soldier, sailor or airman.
(ii) That the wearer was not entitled to wear it.
(iii) That the purpose in so wearing it was to induce people to believe that the wearer was actually at the time in the service indicated by the garb or token in question.

The wearing of cast-off uniforms for the purpose of clothing, or dressing in naval or military uniform for the purpose of dramatic representation is, of course, no offence.953954

First.-- To overawe by criminal force, or show of criminal force, [5][the Central or any State Government or Parliament or the Legislature of any State], or any public servant in the exercise of the lawful power of such public servant; or

Second.-- To resist the execution of any law, or of any legal process; or

Third.-- To commit any mischief or criminal trespass, or other offence; or956

Fourth.-- By means of criminal force, or show of criminal force, to any person, to take or obtain possession of any property, or to deprive any person of the enjoyment of a right of way, or of the use of water or other incorporeal right of which he is in possession or enjoyment, or to enforce any right or supposed right; or

Fifth.-- By means of criminal force, or show of criminal force, to compel any person to do what he is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do what he is legally entitled to do.

Explanation.--An assembly which was not unlawful when it assembled, may subsequently become an unlawful assembly.957

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

The words 'Central or any Provincial Government or legislature' were substituted in this section for the words 'Legislative or Executive Government of India, or the Government of any Presidency, or any Lieutenant-Governor' by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order 1937. Subsequently the words 'Central or any Provincial Government or legislature' in their turn were replaced by the words 'the Central or any State Government or Parliament or the legislature of any State' by the (Adaptation of Laws) Order 1950.

2. Scope

This section appears to have been founded on the general principles of the English Common Law to protect public peace from dangers to it caused by the combination of forces of a number of persons.[6] The law suppresses unlawful assemblies because, if not suppressed, they may lead to more serious crimes like rioting and murder. This is done by punishing persons for being members thereof (s 143, IPC). This section defines 'unlawful assembly' and s 142 defines the expression 'being member of an unlawful assembly'. an unlawful assembly is an assembly of five or more persons, if the common object of the persons, composing it, is of the nature specified in items first to fifth of the section.[7] The intention indicated by the heading of the chapter was to constitute certain acts, which endangered the public peace, into offences against public tranquillity. In construing the section regard must be had not only to the general intention deducible from the heading of the chapter, but also to the specific mode in which the legislature intended to carry out that intention.[8] Where fodder belonging to an informant was set on fire, the informant suspected the accused and called the accused by name. The accused got infuriated and called out to the other accused to assault the informant, whereupon all accused persons came there and started assaulting the informant and caused injuries on his person. It cannot, therefore, be disputed that all the accused persons formed an unlawful assembly within the meaning of s 141, IPC .[9]

Where all the accused except one formed an unlawful assembly with the object to commit mischief or to take or obtain possession of the property of the old school and to deprive the brother of the injured, their conduct in facts and circumstances of the case lead to the inference that they were members of an unlawful assembly in pursuance of the common object, as specified in clauses third and fourth of s 141, IPC .[10]

958Mere presence of a person at the place where members of an unlawful assembly have gathered for carrying out their illegal common object does not incriminate him. But the question is one of fact in each case as to whether a person happens to be innocently present at the place of occurrence or was actually a member of the unlawful assembly.[11]

3. Canadian Law

An unlawful assembly is an assembly of three or more persons who, with intent to carry out any common purpose, cause others nearby reasonably to fear that they will disturb the peace tumultuously, or will needlessly and without reasonable cause provoke other persons to disturb the peace tumultuously. Persons who are lawfully assembled may become an unlawful assembly if they conduct themselves with a common purpose in a manner that would have made the assembly unlawful if they had assembled in that manner for that purpose. Persons are not unlawfully assembled by reason only that they are assembled to protect the dwelling house of any one of them against persons who are threatening to break and enter it for the purpose of committing an indictable offence therein.[12] This is not unconstitutional or contrary to the Charter. To "disturb the peace tumultuously" requires an atmosphere of actual or constructive force or violence. A tumult is a commotion or disturbance caused by a multitude, so that what distinguishes a disturbance of the peace per se from a tumultuous one is that in the latter case it is being caused by a "multitude".

A member of an assembly is not culpable where he did not have knowledge of a fact that gave rise to the fear that the peace would be disturbed tumultuously.[13]

4. Object

The object of this section is to prevent resort to criminal force by five or more persons to do any of the five acts set out in the section.[14]

5. Essentials of 'Unlawful Assembly'

The essentials of an unlawful assembly are:

(i) There must be an assembly of not less than five persons.[15]
(ii) They must have a common object.[16]
(iii) The common object must be of the nature of one of the five objects specified in the section.[17]
(iv) The common object must be unlawful.[18]959

To establish that an assembly is unlawful, it is not necessary that it assembled in a public place.[19] The essential requirement is the presence, or likely presence, of innocent third parties, not participating in the illegal activities in question.

Test of Unlawfulness of Assembly

The test of the unlawfulness of an assembly is the means it intends to employ, and it does not lie in the numbers who take part in a meeting, nor in the place of meeting, e.g., a highway,[20] nor in the legality (real or supposed) or illegality of the purpose in view, e.g., an assembly for the purpose of gambling is not an unlawful assembly.[21]

6. Assembly of Five or more Persons

Under the English law, the minimum number of persons required to constitute an unlawful assembly is three. But under this section the number is five.[22] There may be more, but not less. A conviction for being a member of an unlawful assembly or for rioting as a member of an unlawful assembly requires the proof that there was an unlawful assembly consisting of at least five persons. If this ingredient is proved, it is not necessary to prove the identity of five or more persons constituting the unlawful assembly. If the prosecution establishes satisfactorily the presence of at least five members in an unlawful assembly with the requisite common object, one of them may be convicted, even though the remaining four are acquitted on the ground of their identity not being satisfactorily established. It is essential that the prosecution must satisfactorily prove the existence of an unlawful assembly of five or more persons.[23] The identity of the persons comprising the assembly is a matter relating to the determination of the guilt of the individual accused, and, even when it is possible to convict less than five persons only, s 147 would still apply if upon the evidence in the case the court is able to hold that the person or persons who have been found guilty were members of an assembly of five or more persons, known or unknown, identified or unidentified.[24] When the court can legally find that the actual number of members in the assailants' party was more than five, the said party will constitute an unlawful assembly even when only three persons have been convicted. It is only when the number of the alleged assailants is definite and all of them are named, and the number of persons found to be proved to have taken part in the incident is less960 than five, then it cannot be held that the assailant's party must have consisted of five or more persons. The acquittal of the remaining named persons must mean that they were not in the incident. The fact that they were named excludes the possibility of other persons to be in the assailants' party and especially when there is no occasion to think that the witnesses naming all the accused could have committed mistakes in recognising them.[25]

There cannot be straight-jacket formula for arriving at a finding as to who was the member of unlawful assembly and for what object the unlawful assembly was formed. an unlawful assembly may initially be formed for achieving any object described in s 141 of the IPC and at subsequent stage, the object of certain members of unlawful assembly may change, in that circumstances, the unlawful assembly may be of more than one part especially in the light of its common object as it is a matter of common knowledge that normally, the prosecution would not be in a position to lead evidence to show that firstly the assembly was gathered, they discussed the matter and decided their object, and thereafter, proceeded for achieving that object. It can be inferred and proved by cogent evidence.[26]

To call an assembly as "an unlawful assembly", it should comprise not less than five persons and all of them should share a common object. Where the Court records finding that the prosecution has failed to prove the guilt for the charge leveled against accused 5 to 8which means accused 5 to 8 were not the members of the alleged assembly. There were only four persons left in the assembly namely A-1 to A-4. The remaining four accused persons cannot be convicted under s 149, IPC .[27]

Where out of seven persons charged under ss 302 / 149, IPC, five were given the benefit of doubt and acquitted by the High Court and the Supreme Court found that there was no scope for introducing the theory of benefit of doubt and that the acquittal of the five persons was wrong, it was held that the acquittal could not affect the conviction of the remaining two under s 302 read with s 149 .[28]

7. Effect of Acquittal of Some of the Members of Unlawful Assembly

Commentary under same heading in s 147, post, may be referred to.

When five named persons are charged with a substantive offence read with s 149, IPC, and some of them are acquitted, conviction of the rest is not possible unless the evidence shows that they formed an unlawful assembly with unidentified and unnamed assailants.[29] In view of the acquittal of two persons by the court without the961 finding that some other known or unknown persons were also involved in the assault, it could be said that for all intents and purposes the two acquitted accused persons were not members of the unlawful assembly. Thus, when only four accused could be said to have been the members of the assembly, such an assembly which comprises of less than five members is not an unlawful assembly within the meaning of s 141, IPC .[30]

Where seven accused persons were hired and five were acquitted, the remaining two accused persons were not convicted with the aid of s 149, IPC .[31]

Where out of total nine accused persons, six accused persons have already been acquitted in two appeals arising out of the same occurrence, no question of formation of unlawful assembly by remaining three accused persons would arise.[32]

Where initially seven accused were charged for offences under ss 148, 149 two of them were acquitted by the trial court and one by the High Court, and no other persons apart from the seven accused were involved in crime. The conviction of the remaining four accused under ss 148, 149 cannot be sustained.[33]

Where the three accused persons were convicted under s 302, IPC and the rest were acquitted, there was no common object of an unlawful assembly constituted of all the accused and to the exclusion of three accused held liable for commission of murder, all the rest had been acquitted, the involvement of only three persons is contrary to the legal provisions of s 141, IPC, as they could not have formed an unlawful assembly and accordingly, any question of the existence and formation of a common object by any unlawful assembly did not arise in terms of s 149, IPC to make three accused vicariously liable for the commission of murder.[34]Where four of the eight accused persons were women and the only act attributed to them was of throwing chili powder, the charge of unlawful assembly and rioting against them failed in the absence of proof of their participation. The charge of unlawful assembly, rioting, etc., would automatically fail against the other accused because elimination of the four women accused would bring the number of participants to less than five.[35]

8. Finding with Certainty

The court must find with 'certainty' that there were at least five persons sharing the common object. A finding that three of them 'may or may not have been there' betrays uncertainty on this vital point and it consequently becomes impossible to allow the conviction to rest on this uncertain foundation.[36]

Where there is a clear finding that there were more than five persons in the band of attackers, the mere fact that only two of them were satisfactorily identified does not weaken the force of the finding that more than five persons were involved.[37]962

9. When Less than Five Persons can be Convicted being Member of Unlawful Assembly

In Ram Bilas Singh v State of Bihar ,[38] the Supreme Court reviewed the case-law on the subject and held that it is competent for a court to come to the conclusion that there was an unlawful assembly of five or more persons, even if less than that number have been convicted by it, if: (a) the charge states that apart from the person named, several other unidentified persons were also members of the unlawful assembly whose common object was to commit an unlawful act and evidence led to prove this is accepted by the court; (b) or the FIR and the evidence show such to be the case even though the charge does not state so; or, (c) though the charge and the prosecution witnesses named only the acquitted and the convicted accused persons, there is other evidence which discloses the existence of named or other persons, provided, in cases (b) and (c), no prejudice has resulted to the convicted persons by reason of the omission to mention in the charge, that the other unnamed persons had also participated in the offence.

10. Persons Forming Unlawful Assembly--How Ascertained

The crucial question to determine is whether the assembly consisted of five or more persons and whether the said persons entertained one or more of the common objects, as specified in the section.[39] While determining this question, it becomes relevant to consider whether the assembly consisted of some persons who were merely passive witnesses and had joined the assembly as a matter of idle curiosity without intending to entertain the common object of the assembly.[40] In ascertaining the number of persons, constituting an unlawful assembly, the acquitted persons must be excluded. Whether the number still remains, at five or more, must depend upon whether the charge and the evidence confine the membership to a certain number of named and enumerated persons, or either the charge, or at any rate, the evidence, indicates that there might possibly be persons, other than those named and enumerated in the charge, who can rightly be described as having been the members of the unlawful assembly, referred to in the charge.[41]

An assembly of five or more persons having a common object does not cease to be an unlawful assembly simply because it splits itself into two parties for the purpose of carrying out their object.[42]

Mere Presence in an Unlawful Assembly not Sufficient

Mere presence does not make a person a member of unlawful assembly and hence vicariously liable for all the acts committed by members of the unlawful assembly either in the prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly or for such acts which the members of unlawful assembly knew were likely to be committed.[43] Mere presence in a crowd or along with members of an unlawful assembly cannot963 render a person liable,[44] unless there was a common object and he was actuated by the common object and that object is one of those set out in this section,[45] or it is shown that he had done something, or omitted to do something which would make him a member of the unlawful assembly, or unless the case falls under s 142 .[46] Mere presence of a person at the time of the commission of rioting is not sufficient to show that he was a member of the unlawful assembly which committed the offence. The primary question for consideration is as to whether the object of the assembly of the accused persons was unlawful.[47] In Baladin's case,[48] their Lordships of the Supreme Court remarked:

> If members of the family of the appellants and other residents of the village assembled, all such persons could not be condemned *ipso facto*as being members of that unlawful assembly. It is necessary, therefore, for the prosecution to lead evidence pointing to the conclusion that all the appellants had done or been committing some overt act in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly.

But these observations must be read in the context of the special facts of that case. It would not be correct, in law, to say that before a person is held to be a member of an unlawful assembly, it must be shown that he had committed some illegal overt act or had been guilty of some illegal omission in pursuance of the common object of the assembly. Section 149 makes it clear that in certain circumstances one member of an unlawful assembly may be vicariously liable for an offence committed by another member of that assembly although he had no intention of committing that offence and had done no overt act except his presence in the assembly and sharing the common object of that assembly.[49]

Some unmistakable overt act contributing to the prosecution of the common object should always be proved before a person is convicted for membership of an unlawful assembly or for rioting. Mere presence will not usually be that unmistakable act; but presence plus the carrying of weapons will bring him nearer to the common object, unless he explains why he carried the same. If, in addition to his presence and the weapon, there are cries clearly indicating a determination to attack members of another group, the position is stronger still against him. Finally, while going in the crowd with the war cries, if he marches along with the others into the opposing group and uses his weapon, it is complete evidence of membership of the assembly.[50] Mere presence of a person along with members of an unlawful assembly is not sufficient to964 support a finding that he had the common object of the unlawful assembly. There must be other evidence direct or circumstantial to justify that finding.[51]

The mere fact that a person resides in the same street or his mere presence at the time when the offence of rioting is committed, is not sufficient to show that he was a member of the unlawful assembly, which committed the offence.[52] Where the accused, a counsel, came to the spot, in a car, along with his client and was sitting in it at some distance from the place of occurrence and there was no allegation, against him, that he played any direct or indirect role in the commission of the offences, it was held that his mere presence, in a car near about the place of occurrence did not lead to an inference that he shared the common object of those who resorted to acts of violence.[53]

Mere Innocent Presence not Sufficient to make a Member

In Musa Khan v State of Maharashtra ,[54] their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed:

> It is well settled that a mere innocent presence, in an assembly, of persons as, for example, a bystander, does not make the accused a member of an unlawful assembly unless it is shown, by circumstantial evidence, that the accused shared the common object of the assembly. Thus, a Court is not entitle to presume that any and every person, who is proved to have been present near a riotous mob, at any time or to have joined or left it, at any stage during its activities, is, in law guilty of every act, committed by it from the beginning to the end, or > that each member of such a crowd must, from the beginning, have anticipated and contemplated the nature of the illegal activities in which the assembly would subsequently indulge. In other words, it must be proved, in each case, that the person concerned was not only a member of unlawful assembly at some stage, but, at all the crucial stages, he shared the common object of the assembly. Where the evidence merely shows that some of the accused were members of the unlawful assembly at one particular stage but not at another, the accused, who were not present or who did not share the common object of the unlawful assembly at other stages, cannot be convicted for the activities of the assembly at those stages.

The question, whether a person happens to be innocently present at the place where the members of an unlawful assembly have gathered together to prosecute their common object or is a member sharing their common object, is normally one of fact.[55]

Caution to be Exercised

Where a large number of persons have assembled and some of them resorted to violence or otherwise misbehaved, it need not necessarily mean that every one of the persons present actually shared the opinions, intentions or objects of those who misbehaved or restored to violence. In fact, the possibility of some of the persons965 actually resenting or condemning the activities of the misguided persons cannot be ruled out. Caution should, therefore, be exercised while deciding which of the persons present can be safely described as members of an unlawful assembly. Although, as a matter of law, an overt act on the part of a person is not a necessary factor bearing upon his membership of an unlawful assembly, in a case of this nature it will be safer to look for some evidence of participation by him before holding that he is a member of the unlawful assembly. Otherwise, there is a serious danger of innocent bystanders being punished for no fault of theirs.[56] A person who encourages, or promotes, or takes part in rioting whether by word, signs or gestures, or even by wearing the badge or ensign of the rioters, becomes a rioter, for in this case, all are deemed principals. On the other hand, a mere presence without encouragement is not enough to establish criminality.[57] But active participation in actual violence is not necessary. Persons who by words or by signs or otherwise encourage violence are equally members of the unlawful assembly.[58]

Where there is credible evidence to show that the accused marched in procession with the rioters when they were shouting slogans and pelting stones, it is up to them (the accused) to prove their innocence. It will be very unsafe, in the case of a large mob of rioters to rely on the evidence of 'a single witness' speaking to the presence of an accused in the mob for convicting him, especially, when no overt act of violence, or shouting of slogans, or organising the mob, or giving orders to it, or marching in procession with it, or other similar things are proved against him.[59]

But where the accused took only a passive attitude, it has been held that they were entitled to the benefit of doubt on the question of their being animated by a common illegal object.[60]

Overt Act by a Member of an Unlawful Assembly, whether Necessary

It cannot be laid down as a general proposition of law that unless an overt act is proved against a person, who is alleged to be a member of unlawful assembly, it cannot be said that he is a member of an assembly. The only thing required is that he should have understood that the assembly was unlawful and was likely to commit any of the acts which fall within the purview of s 141 .[61] The specific and active participation or overt act of the accused forming unlawful assembly is not required to be proved by the prosecution.[62] Mere presence in the crowd is not sufficient to make any person a member of an unlawful assembly, but, at the same time, to make one a966 member of an unlawful assembly, it is not necessary that he should have done any overt act in pursuance of the common object. The only thing, that is necessary, is to find out whether the facts and circumstances warrant the conclusion that the person concerned shares the common object of the unlawful assembly.[63] In Jagnaya v State of Rajasthan ,[64] it was observed that what is required of the prosecution to prove against a person, who is alleged to be a member of the unlawful assembly, is that he was one of the persons, constituting the assembly, and he entertained, along with the other members of the assembly, the common object, as defined by s 141, IPC . Once this is proved it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove the overt act of each and every member of the unlawful assembly.[65]

11. Common Object

The essence of the object of an unlawful assembly is common object of the accused persons forming it. It is necessary that the object should be common to the persons and they should all be aware of it and concur in it.[66]In fastening constructive liability, the importance of the common object is very great and it is on this basis alone that an accused is punished for the act of his associates. To establish that the accused was a member of an unlawful assembly; it must be shown, either from his active participation or otherwise, that he shared the common object of the assembly.[67] The word 'object' means the purpose or design, and in order to make it 'common' it must be shared by all. There must be community of object and the object may exist only up to a particular stage and not thereafter.[68] The purpose for which the members of the assembly set out or which was desired to achieve is the object. Each member may have an object in view and may also have his own idea of the means with which that object is to be attained and the extent to which he is prepared to go for attaining it. If the object desired by all the members is the same, the knowledge that that is the object which is being pursued is shared by all the members and they are in general agreement as to how it is to be achieved, the object becomes the common object of the assembly. Normally a determination to achieve an object includes a resolve to meet with force any resistance that may be offered and to remove any obstruction that may be found to exist in the path leading to the attainment of the object.

An object is entertained in the human mind and it being merely a mental attitude; no direct evidence can be available and, like intention, has generally to be gathered from the acts which the person commits and the result therefrom. Mere words or utterances in excitement are not enough to indicate the real mental attitude. It is the acts, committed and the result therefrom, that are the main features, though in every967 case the result alone does not necessarily indicate the attitude of the mind of the doer of the act.[69]

12. The Assembly must have a Common Object

Under the explanation to s 141, IPC, an assembly which was not unlawful when it assembled may, subsequently become an unlawful assembly and an offence will fall within the purview of s 149 even if members of the assembly view that it was 'likely to be committed' in prosecution of their common object or if the offence was such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object.[70] Under the Explanation to s 141, an assembly which was not unlawful when it was assembled, may subsequently become unlawful. It is not necessary that the intention or the purpose, which is necessary to render an assembly an unlawful one, comes into existence at the outset. The time of forming an unlawful intent is not material.[71] To constitute an unlawful assembly there must not only be an assembly of five or more persons, they must all have a common object which they are going to carry out by unlawful means.[72] Existence of a common unlawful object is a requisite for an unlawful assembly, and unless there is proof of an agreement amongst persons to do anything or a plan to carry out a design--and if this is not possible, unless it is shown that an inference in support of it can reasonably be drawn from the relations, acts and conduct of the parties, persons cannot be constructively made liable for the acts of others.[73]

Common Object--How Found

A common object may be formed by express agreement after mutual consultation, but that is by no means necessary. It may be formed at any stage by all or a few members of the assembly and the other members may just join and adopt it. Once formed, it need not continue to be the same.

It may be modified or altered or abandoned at any stage.[74] What the common object of the unlawful assembly is at a particular stage of the incident is essentially a question of fact to be determined, keeping in view the nature of the assembly, the arms it carries and the behaviours of its members at or near the scene of the incident.[75] The common object must be common to at least five persons. If out of five persons assembled even one is found not to have shared their common object,968 the assembly cannot constitute an unlawful assembly.[76] A person cannot be said to be a member of an unlawful assembly when his presence in the assembly was due to duress and he had no common object with the other members of the assembly.[77] Merely coming to the spot even with a lathi or other weapon in response to a cry by a person that he was being killed can hardly be considered sufficient to make those who came guilty of rioting.[78] The object should be common to the persons who compose the assembly, that is to say, they should all be aware of it and concur in it.[79]

Same Object and Common Object

There may not be much difference between common object and common intention, but there is distinction between common object and same or similar object.[80] The same object is not necessarily a common object, but it becomes so only when it is known to and shared by all.[81] All the members of the assembly must have a common object. It is not enough if they have a similar object. A common object must be distinguished from a similar object.[82]

13. Opposite Factions Cannot Constitute One Unlawful Assembly

Where two opposite factions commit a riot, it is irregular to treat both parties as constituting one unlawful assembly, and to try them together, inasmuch as they do not have 'one common object' within the meaning of this section.[83]

14. Prior Concert not Necessary

In order to constitute an unlawful assembly, it is not necessary that there should be a preconcert in the sense of a meeting of the members of the unlawful assembly as to the common object; it is enough if it is adopted by all the members and is shared by all of them.[84]

15. Common Object must be an Immediate One

'Common object' refers to the means whereby the purpose of the assembly is to be effected;[85] the common object of the assembly must be an immediate one to be carried in effect forthwith. If a certain number of people meet merely to arrange a plan for some future action, on an uncertain event taking place, it cannot be said that969 they had assembled to carry out some plan forthwith. There should be some present and immediate purpose of carrying into effect the common object. If five or more persons meet for deliberations only to arrange some plans for future action which may be brought into effect individually and not necessarily jointly, that would not constitute an unlawful assembly.[86]

The Madras High Court has also taken a similar view and it has been held that the mere fact, that an assembly consists of five or more persons or is likely to disturb the public peace, does not prove that the common object of the assembly is one of those enumerated in the said section. Further, the common object must be an immediate one, and not to be carried out at some future time.[87]

Common Object must be One of the Five Specified in the Section

An assembly would become unlawful only if it has one or the other of the different objects mentioned in this section.[88] The section requires that there should be a common object which can be brought within the purview of one or the other heads mentioned therein.[89]

Common Object and Common Intention--Distinguished

Common intention required by s 34 and the common object required by s 149 are far from being the same thing.[90] There is a difference between object and intention, for, though the object of the assembly is common, the intentions of the several members may differ and indeed may be similar only in respect that they are all unlawful.[91]The object of an assembly as a whole may not be the same as the intention which several persons may have when in pursuance of that intention they perform a criminal act and it may well be that the object of the assembly is lawful, whereas the intention common to those of the assembly who jointly commit a criminal act is in itself criminal and the joint criminal act is equally imputed to all of them.[92] It is true that 'common object' and 'common intention' sometimes overlap, but they are used in different senses in law and should be kept distinct. In a case of unlawful assembly or riot we are concerned with a common object. A common object is different from a common intention in that it does not require prior concert and a common meeting of minds before the attack, and an unlawful object can develop after the people get there. Under s 141, IPC, it is enough that each has the same object in view, that their number is five or more and that they act as an assembly to achieve that object.[93]

970It may be noted that for the application of s 34, IPC, which deals with common intention that intention must be to do a criminal act, whereas the common object which falls under this section need not necessarily be to do a criminal act. For instance, the common object may be to recover possession of property from a trespasser. That by itself is not unlawful. It becomes unlawful only if the object is to obtain possession 'by means of criminal force or show of criminal force'. Where, however, the common object of an assembly is 'to commit any mischief or criminal trespass or any other offence' (s 141, third of the IPC) there may not be much distinction between common object' and 'common intention'.[94]

Substitution of Section 34 for Section 149 in the Charge, when Permissible

Common object and common intention as stated above also to some extent overlap and it is a question to be determined on the facts of each case whether the charge under s 149, IPC overlaps the ground covered by s 34, IPC . If the common object which is the subject-matter of the charge under s 149 does not necessarily involve a common intention, then the substitution of s 34 for s 149 might result in prejudice to the accused and ought not, therefore, to be permitted. But if the facts to be proved and the evidence to be adduced with reference to the charge under s 149 would be the same if the charge were under s 34, then the failure to charge the accused under that section cannot result in any prejudice and in such cases substitution of s 34 for s 149 will be a formal matter.[95]

Common Object must be Unlawful

In order to constitute an 'unlawful assembly', there must be an assembly of five or more persons, the assembly must have a common object and the object must be 'unlawful'.[96] Where the object of an assembly is to do an act which is not an offence, the assembly is not unlawful.[97]

Where a group of accused persons having firearms took position on the terrace of the first floor and fired at the unarmed complainant party standing on road. One person only however, was fatally injured, though it was easy for the accused persons to have murdered many in view of their position. No unlawful object to murder could be attributed to the accused and s 149 is not available to the prosecution.[98]

Where the only facts proved were that a number of persons assembled together armed with bill-hooks and sticks, and they ran away when the police appeared, it was held that those facts alone were insufficient as legal proof of the unlawful character of the assembly, as the persons might have come for a lawful purpose and armed themselves for protection against anticipated violence from others.[99]971

The assertion of right of private defence within the limits prescribed by law cannot fall within the expression to enforce any right or supposed right in the fourth clause of s 141, IPC . The assembly cannot be designated as an unlawful assembly if its object is to defend person or property by the use of force within the limits prescribed by law. The words 'within the limits prescribed by law' clearly indicate that so long the force used is 'within the limits prescribed by law' no offence is committed, and the provisions of s 141 and consequently that of s 149, IPC would not apply to such a case.[1]

If an assembly of five or more persons resists an attack upon them, the action of such members of the assembly in defending their persons and properties would not take its character as an unlawful assembly.[2] An assembly, lawful in itself, does not become unlawful merely by reason of its lawful acts exciting others to do unlawful acts;[3] an assembly of persons, gathered for election purpose, does not become an unlawful assembly merely because some persons of the assembly carried with them weapons, including firearms.[4] Similarly, the actions of a few members of an assembly, which gathers together for a perfectly lawful purpose, cannot, by themselves, make the whole assembly an unlawful assembly. The mere fact, that they are with the offending members at the time, would not make them members of the unlawful assembly.[5]

17. Initially Lawful Assembly May Turn Unlawful

An assembly, which was initially a lawful assembly, might subsequently be converted into an unlawful assembly. This is a matter of inference deducible from the conduct of persons composing the assembly. The conduct, which may lead to the inference, must, however, be of a clear and unequivocal nature and the inference must be irresistible. If the conduct of the assembly is consistent with its having remained a lawful assembly and a reasonable possibility of its having retained its original lawful character is not excluded, it is not possible to say that the assembly changed into an unlawful assembly.[6] In order that a person may be held to be a member of an unlawful assembly, it is necessary to find out whether that person, being aware of the facts which render the assembly unlawful, intentionally joins that assembly or continues in it obviously with that intention.[7] Where the common object of an unlawful assembly was to abduct a woman and to put her in wrongful confinement during abduction, it was held that the assembly was unlawful and every member of the assembly was guilty under s 147 .[8]

972It is no offence for a person who is acting within his rights to make preparations for resisting an invasion of those rights.[9] Where five persons assembled at a water-head to take water by force and armed themselves with deadly weapons to strike and vanquish anybody who should stand in their way and prevent them from accomplishing their purpose, it was held that they constituted an unlawful assembly and became guilty of rioting when they used their deadly weapons in pursuance of their common object, and further that as every one of them knew that these weapons were likely to be used with deadly effect, they were all responsible if any one of them inflicted a fatal injury.[10] The second clause of this section has not the effect of making an assemblage of persons an unlawful assembly if the object with which they assemble is a perfectly legal one.[11]

Where the accused numbering more than five were exercising their right of speech and assemblage, without arms in a peaceful manner in order to vindicate their right for enforcement of public rights adumbrated in the Manipur State Constitution Act 1947, it was held that the assembly could not deemed to be an unlawful assembly within the meaning of this section.[12]

But where, there being a long-standing dispute as to the possession of certain land, which was not in the undisturbed possession of either party to the dispute, one party goes armed with lathis to sow the land, and keep their opponents at a distance by flourishing the lathis, whilst the sowing is going on, the aggressive party constitutes an unlawful assembly.[13]

Where the purpose of a crowd is merely to demonstrate with black flags, it cannot be said to be an unlawful purpose, and the crowd does not constitute an unlawful assembly.[14]

People going in the company of a court's officer to take delivery of possession under an order of the court cannot be said to form an unlawful assembly, as the purpose of their going is a lawful purpose.[15]

18. Determination of Common Object--Factors to be Considered

The 'common object' of an assembly is to be ascertained from the acts and language of the members composing it and from a consideration of all the surrounding circumstances.[16]

The circumstances of the case, the attitude and the deportment of the persons assembled very often furnish a key to their mental bend.[17] In the words of the commissioner's second report: 'The common purpose is a matter of inference from973 the overt acts of the members of the assembly, their language and gestures as proved in evidence'.[18] The phrase 'common object' is the central fact on which the liability of persons other than the actual doer of the act depends. The word 'object' means the purpose, intention, or design and, in order to make it 'common', it must be possessed by all. There must be a community of an object which may, however, exist up to a certain point only, beyond which they may differ in their objects and the knowledge possessed by each member of what is likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object will vary not only according to the information at his command but also according to the extent to which he shares the community of object. As a consequence of this, the effect of s 149 may be different on different members of the very same unlawful assembly.[19]

The common object may be gathered from the course of conduct adopted by the members of the assembly.[20] In order to prove common object, it is necessary to establish a connection between those who take active part in a riot and those who merely utter some words intended to provide encouragement,[21] and in order to find what was the common object of the crowd at the beginning, it is not a legitimate method merely to take all the actual offences, committed by it in the course of the riot, and to infer that all these were originally part of its common object. Such common object must be determined as a point of fact, and must normally be based on more evidence than the mere acts themselves.[22]The motive for the crime, the weapons used in the attack and the conduct of assailants, before and at time of attack are relevant considerations. Whether an unlawful assembly was formed and what exactly the common object thereof was, are matters of inference from circumstances, it is not necessary that all persons forming an unlawful assembly must do some overt act.[23]

Other Relevant Considerations for Determination of Common Object

What the common object of the unlawful assembly is at a particular stage of the incident is essentially a question of fact to be determined, keeping in view the nature of the assembly, the arms it carries, and the behaviour of its members at or near the scene of the incident.[24] The use of the lethal weapons is, no doubt, a circumstance which weighs against them, but that circumstance alone cannot determine what the common object of the unlawful assembly was. Much depends upon other circumstances of the case.[25] The mere fact, that one of the members of the unlawful974 assembly was carrying a gun and that he used that gun to kill a person, will not make other persons, who are members of that unlawful assembly, liable for the offence of murder under ss 302 / 149, IPC . Everything will depend upon the common object of the unlawful assembly.[26] From the mere fact of instigation by others, it cannot be concluded that all persons present had the same common object to assault.[27] But where the accused were armed with spears with the object to cause grievous hurt, endangering life, can be inferred.[28] In the absence of direct, or res gestae, evidence, it has to be inferred from the circumstances, such as the weapons with which the members were armed, or their conduct during the riot.[29]

Conclusion of Common Object to be Drawn when Irresistible

For the determination of common object of an unlawful assembly, the conduct of each of the members of the unlawful assembly is also material. However, non-participation in the assault does not necessarily mean non-sharing of the common object if the common object is otherwise clear and avowed. It is the background, in which the occurrence takes place, which is material and which gives an idea as to what could be the common object of the assembly. Inference or conclusion of sharing a particular object should only be drawn when such a conclusion is irresistible because it involves an incalculable danger as the innocents can be punished for the state of mind which they never had.[30]

Where the accused were found in a temple in the middle of night with house-breaking implements, aruvals and guns in their possession, it was held that they were guilty of an offence under s 143 as they must have been there with a common object of an unlawful kind.[31]

19. First Clause--To Overawe by Criminal Force or Show of Criminal Force

The words 'overawe by means of criminal force or the show of criminal force' also occur in s 121A, IPC . In a case under that section,[32] Shearer J, of the Patna High Court, explained the meaning of the word 'overawe' in the following words:

> The word 'overawe' clearly imports more than the creation of apprehension or alarm or even perhaps fears. It appears to me to connote the creation of a situation in which the members of the Central or the Provincial Government feel themselves compelled to choose between yielding to force or exposing themselves or members of the public to a very serious danger. It is not necessary that the danger should be a danger of assassination or of bodily injury to themselves. The danger might well be a danger to public property or the safety of members of the general public.

The overawing must be attended by criminal force or show of criminal force. What the section requires is that the assembly should have the common object to overawe975 and not that it should have the effect of overawing. Thus in an Allahabad case,[33] when a sub-inspector of police was thinking of rearresting a person who had escaped from his custody a crowd of 50 or 60 villagers carrying lathis assembled. The sub-inspector considered their appearance so formidable that he desisted from his intention to rearrest the man. It was held that if the intention of the villagers in assembling was to prevent the re-arrest of the person wanted, they would no doubt constitute an unlawful assembly, but if they merely assembled to see what was happening on and without any intention of preventing the police officer from doing his duty, they could not constitute an unlawful assembly. A police party cannot be said to have been overawed by the mere shouting of even dangerous slogans.[34]

This clause contemplates the overawing of: (a) the legislative or executive wings of the Central or State Government, or (b) any public servant. In the case of the latter the common object must be to overawe a public servant in the exercise of his lawful power. That is, the public servant must be 'acting in good faith under colour of his office'. In such a case there is no right of private defence against his acts. Commentary under s 99 may be referred to.

Criminal Force

A person is said to use force on another if he causes motion, change of motion, or cessation of motion to that other in a certain specified manner (refer to s 349, IPC). Section 350 of the IPC defines 'criminal force' as follows:

> Whoever intentionally uses force to any person, without that person's consent, in order to the committing of any offence, or intending by the use of such force to cause, or knowing it to be likely that by the use of such force he will cause injury, fear or annoyance to the person to whom the force is used, is said to use criminal force to that other.

20. Second Clause--Resistance

'Resistance' means something more than defiance of disobedience or non-submission. It consists of an overt act showing an intention to make opposition to the execution of the law. Mere words, when there is no intention of carrying them into effect, will not be sufficient to prove an intention to resist.[35] Resistance to execution of the law is one thing and refusal to disperse is another thing.[36] A mere refusal to obey the order of dispersal given by the police does not amount to resistance to the execution of law.[37] An assembly does not become unlawful merely because it continues without dispersing in defiance of the lawful order to disperse, for there is no clause under this section to say that an assembly refusing to disperse in obedience976 to a lawful command becomes an unlawful assembly.[38] But where the police order was not to direct a procession without a licence and the accused, in defiance of the order, put themselves at the head of the procession and began to direct it, it was held that there was resistance to the execution of law.[39]So also where the organisers of a procession violated the conditions of the licence to take out the procession, and on being ordered by the police and the magistrate, not only resolved to disobey the orders, but, in defiance of the orders, they actually made a determined effort to break through the police cordon, it was held that their action was clearly an overt act amounting to resistance to the execution of the law.[40]

21. Second Clause--Execution of Law

Blackstone defined 'law' as: 'A rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in a State, commanding what is right, prohibiting what is wrong, and regulating matters in themselves indifferent'.[41]

The essence of the law is that it is enforceable as law, and that, though the courts may construe the law, they cannot reject it, nor quash it. A distinction has to be made between an enactment and a rule made under it. There is a clear authority for the view that, though there is no difference between a rule and enactment where there is a provision in the enactment that the rules shall be of the same effect as if they were contained in the Act, there is a wide difference between the two when there is no such provision; and the difference is this, that though you may not canvass an Act of Parliament, you may canvass a rule.[42]

It has been held that when a notification is issued by an executive authority in exercise of a power conferred by statute, that notification is as much a part of the law as if it had been incorporated within the body of the statute at the time of its enactment. Such a command is in every respect a command by the proper legislative authority, and, therefore, disobedience of a notification under the Police Act is resistance to the execution of a legal process.[43] To the same effect is the decision of the Madras High Court in Public Prosecutor v Vadlamudi Satyanarayana ,[44] but it has been held that the police order in such a case is an execution of the law and not of a legal process. When an order is lawfully made under the provisions of a statute, that order is law, and when the police tries to execute that law by preventing a procession from proceeding, any resistance against it would bring the offender within the provisions of this part of the section also.[45]

It is, however, pointed out that the entire case-law discussed above is of a pre-Constitution era. The position has considerably changed after the enactment of the Constitution of India. The Supreme Court of India and the High Courts of the states977 now enjoy full powers under the Constitution to quash any law, if it infringes any fundamental right of the citizens guaranteed by the Constitution or contravenes any other provision of the Constitution. Rules framed or notifications issued under any law or act can also be struck down, if they are beyond the scope of that law or fall outside the authority making the rules or issuing the notification. The said case-law has, therefore, to be read subject to these constitutional changes.

22. Second Clause--Execution of Legal Process

The process, such as a warrant of arrest or a search warrant contemplated under this clause must be 'legal'. Where the object of the assembly was to resist attachment by the court, it was held that the assembly was unlawful.[46] If there is an assemblage of five or more men with the common object of resisting by force or show of force, by the execution of processes of law every one of them is guilty of being a member of an unlawful assembly, whether or not resistance is offered. If force is used by any member of the assembly, each one of them becomes liable for rioting under s 147, IPC . But if actual resistance is offered, a separate offence of resistance of the process of law punishable under s 186, IPC, is committed.[47] This is so only when the process is legal that the persons, resisting its execution, are deprived of the right of private defence under s 99, IPC . If it is illegal, they have a right of private defence under s 97, IPC .[48]

This provision cannot have the effect of making an assemblage unlawful, if the object thereof is a legal one, e.g., resistance to an order made without authority by an agent of the court of wards[49] or to the execution of a warrant which does not specify the name of the person against whose goods it is to be executed,[50] or resistance to the execution of a time-barred warrant.[51] Where the police attempt to arrest persons without any justification and the persons resist the arrest, they cannot be held guilty of rioting.[52]

Where in execution of a decree, buffaloes not belonging to the judgment-debtor, but to other persons, were attached, it was held that their buffaloes could certainly not be attached, but once they were attached they could not form an assembly of more than four persons with the object of enforcing their right of releasing them from the attachment without committing an offence under s 143, IPC .[53]

Resistance to the execution of law or legal process may amount to an offence. If so, the case would fall under cl (3) of s 141 . Refer to synopsis notes under the next clause.978

23. Third Clause--To Commit Mischief, Criminal Trespass or other Offence

The object under this clause must be to commit mischief, criminal trespass, or some other offence. Where criminal intention is a necessary ingredient in the offence, as it is in those specifically mentioned in this clause the requirement will not be satisfied, if it can be shown that the accused had a right, or honestly believed that he had a right, to do the act complained of, and in this respect this clause differs from cl (4).

This clause is ambiguous to some extent. It specifies two offences, namely, mischief and criminal trespass, and then says 'or other offence'. Now, the phrase 'other offence' would cover every other offence made punishable by the IPC . If all the other offences made punishable by the IPC are meant to be included in the phrase, there can be no meaning in specifically mentioning two offences. It would therefore appear that the legislature intended to include in this clause only mischief, criminal trespass and other offences ejusdem generis. But, as will be seen presently, the decided cases indicate that the courts have interpreted the phrase 'other offence' as including any other offence. Illegal seizure of cattle to take them to the cattle pound does not constitute mischief, criminal trespass or theft, and an assembly of five or more persons seizing the cattle does not become an unlawful assembly.[54]

Certain persons entered a vacant manai (building site) for the purpose of rebuilding their wall which adjoined the vacant land. It was held that since they did not assemble there for the purpose of committing mischief, criminal trespass, or any other offence, they did not constitute an unlawful assembly.[55]

Causing of annoyance to policemen is not an offence known to the law though disobedience to an order lawfully promulgated under s 144 of the CrPC is a known form of criminal behaviour which the law punishes. Where, therefore, the common object is only to cause annoyance to police officers, the assembly cannot be said to be an unlawful assembly.[56]

Mischief

For definition of mischief refer to s 425, IPC . In a case, the accused finding their fields flooded, cut a channel through a railway to let the water run off their fields. It was held that, though the motive of the accused was to free their fields from water, their intention was to make a ditch through the railway and so they were guilty of mischief and constituted an unlawful assembly with the common object of damaging the railway.[57]

Where, at a partition, a house in possession of the complainant was allotted to the accused but actual possession of the house was not given to him, and while litigation was still going on between the two, the accused's party dismantled the house, it was979 held that the dismantling of the house amounted to mischief and that the party of the accused were guilty of the offence under s 147, IPC .[58]

Where the intention of the accused was not to commit mischief by causing wrongful loss or damage but to exercise a right which they bona fide claimed, it was held that they could not be held to form an unlawful assembly under s 141, cl (3).[59]

Criminal Trespass

For definition of criminal trespass refer to s 441, IPC . Criminal trespass need not have been committed actually, to constitute an offence under s 143, even though the common object of the assembly may have been to commit criminal trespass. The trespass, if committed, cannot be said to be a part of the offence of being a member of an unlawful assembly.[60] Where there is no allegation that the accused intended to commit any offence other than that of criminal trespass, the evidence must establish that the assembly held that particular object.[61] The intention to intimidate, insult or annoy, or to commit an offence must be distinctly found.[62]

Where a person asserts a grazing right which has never been declared against him and which he bona fide believes he has, and, in consequence of that belief, he goes, with his party to protest against the land being ploughed up, he cannot be convicted of criminal trespass or of being a member of an unlawful assembly.[63]

Any other Offence

For the purposes of this section the word 'offence' denotes a thing punishable under this code or under any special or local law, if punishable under such law with imprisonment for a term of six months or upwards, whether with or without fine.[64] Therefore, an offence punishable under a special or local law for less than six months cannot be taken into consideration as an offence under this clause.

The legislature intended to include, in the third clause of this section, only mischief, criminal trespass and other offences ejusdem generis. The courts have interpreted the phrase 'other offence'.[65]

Disobedience of a lawful order passed by a police commissioner under s 62A(4) of the Calcutta Police Act, is an offence under s 62A(6)(ii) of that Act. But that Act being a local law within the meaning of s 42, IPC and the offence under that Act not being punishable with imprisonment for six months and upwards, it is not an offence within the meaning of s 40 or s 141 of this IPC . But as it is also an offence under s 188 of the IPC, it is, therefore, an offence within the meaning of this section.[66]

980Similarly, disobedience of an order under s 23(3) of the Bombay City Police Act,[67] or s 42 of the Bombay District Police Act,[68] is an offence under s 188 of the IPC and falls under the third clause of this section.

Defying the conditions laid down in an order passed under s 30 of the Bihar Police Act amounts to an offence under s 188 of the IPC and falls under the third clause.[69]

The offence of wrongful restraint punishable with simple imprisonment for not more than one month under s 341 of this Code is also an offence within the meaning of the third clause.[70]

Where the common object was to commit the offence of theft and assault and the specific finding was that the paddy was cut and removed, it was not possible to particularise the accused persons connected with the theft. All the petitioners assembled were armed with different weapons with a view to remove the paddy and cause assault. It was held that on such a finding, a conviction under s 143, IPC must follow.[71]

Where the common object of the unlawful assembly is alleged to be looting of crops, the fact that the title to the land is uncertain and that a bona fide dispute exists about it negatives the offence of looting the crops, and the common object cannot be said to be to commit an offence.[72] Where the common object of an assembly of five or more persons is to commit an offence under the latter part of s 188 of this Code, the assembly became unlawful.[73]

24. Fourth Clause--Scope and Object

The Fourth clause mentions 'to take or obtain possession of any property', and, therefore, it does not make any mention of 'maintaining possession or resisting an attempt to take possession'. It will, therefore, not apply to an accused who is defending his possession in any property and the right of private defence as contemplated by the Code is not taken away, if there is any action on the part of the accused persons in maintaining their possession and defending their property.[74]The provision in the Fourth clause is one of those rare instances in which an act, in the view of the criminal law, is legal and gives no right of action to the person affected by it, but is punishable criminally on account of the injurious consequences to the public peace,[75] resulting from the use or show of criminal force. The object of the clause is to prevent breaches of the peace, by compelling everyone, who desires to enforce a disputed right to do so under the authority of the law.[76] There is not even the right of private defence in cases where there is time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities (s 99, IPC). The principle is the same as that under which the magistrate is authorised, in cases in which a breach of the peace is981 apprehended, to maintain the party in possession, or attach property pending the decision of a competent civil court.[77]

25. 'By Means of Criminal Force or Show of Criminal Force'

As to the meaning of 'criminal force' refer to s 350 of the IPC . The essence of this clause is the use or show of criminal force.[78] People merely shouting slogans or delivering a speech cannot be said to use or show criminal force and cannot be convicted under s 143 of the IPC .[79] The plain object of this clause is to prevent the resort to force in vindication of supposed rights.[80] 'It is perfectly immaterial whether the act which one seeks to prevent by the use of criminal force or show of criminal force is legal or illegal, the test of criminality being the determination to use criminal force and act otherwise than in due course of law, so as to threaten the public peace,[81] unless, of course, the circumstances are such that a right of private defence arises.[82] It must, however, be remembered that the right of private defence of property is a restricted right. Section 99 of the IPC expressly lays down that there is no right of private defence in cases in which there is time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities and it also lays down that the right of private defence, in no case, extends to doing more harm than is necessary for the purpose of defence. Sections 100 to 105 of the IPC make the right depend on the circumstances of each case. The right of self-help, when it causes, or is likely to cause, damage to the person or property of another person must be restricted, and recourse to public authorities insisted on. If a person prefers to use force in order to protect his property, when he may easily have recourse to the public authorities, his use of force is made punishable by the Code. No matter what his intention may be, the law says that he must not use force in such case. To take any other view would be to encourage and put a premium on offence of rioting. The country would, in the words of Holloway J, be deluged with blood, if an offender who could get relief by recourse to law were allowed to take the law into his own hands.[83] The phrase 'by means of criminal force or show of criminal force to any person' governs all the three sub-clauses of this clause. Thus, if any one is in wrongful possession of his property, the landlord in taking or obtaining possession must not do so by means of criminal force or show of criminal force. But if he can obtain it in a peaceable and easy manner, he has every right to do so, even though this may involve the 'peaceable and easy' enactment of anyone found on the premises.[84] Again, the use or show of criminal force must be before and for the purpose of taking or obtaining possession and not after taking or obtaining possession.[85]

Where the accused, in order to enforce his right of way, took a funeral procession through a particular road, and in answer to protest said that he would go on his way by force, if necessary, and the processionists used threats and abusive language, it982 was held that this made them an unlawful assembly whether the end and object they proposed were a just and legitimate one or not.[86]

Where both parties are entitled to joint possession neither of them have the right, under the law, to attempt to take forcible possession or take forcible possession after assembling a number of armed men and going to the place and thereby intimidating the people in possession.[87]

26. 'To Any Person'

The words 'to any person' mean to any private individual and not necessarily a public servant as in the first clause. In the case of taking or obtaining possession, the show of criminal force maybe to the owner, or his servant or agent, or to any person in whose charge or custody the property is.

27. 'Possession'

In a case coming under this chapter dealing with the question as to who was in actual occupation just before the occurrence took place, is of paramount importance, and a right to possession, or constructive possession, is not generally of much importance. If a person has the right to possession, and was in law constructively in possession, but was not in actual occupation just before the occurrence, he may ordinarily have recourse to the proper authorities for the prevention of any wrong to him and he should not be allowed to plead the right of private defence of property.[88] In all these cases it should be clear from the evidence that the party exercising the right he claims is in possession of that right and that he is entitled to resist or repel aggression in order to maintain his right.[89]

Where one party alleges that it has been dispossessed by the use or show of criminal force and the other party pleads that it was forced to maintain or defend its possession, the question of possession is of vital importance and it is incumbent on the court to record a clear finding as to possession, as without such a finding it cannot be decided as to who was the aggressor.[90] A single or casual act of possession by the complainant of which the evidence speaks, cannot possibly, in cases of this kind, be safely relied upon as furnishing a firm foundation for a finding of possession, and unless actual possession has been clearly established, it is impossible to hold that the charges of rioting or of mischief could be brought home to the accused.[91]

Formal or symbolical possession delivered by a court must be deemed equivalent to actual possession as against parties to the proceeding, though not as against third parties.[92]

983Where, however, it was only proved that an auction-purchaser was given only symbolical possession of a field formally transferring the ownership to him and not the actual possession thereof with the standing crops, and when the auction-purchaser and his men tried to take actual possession, the lessee of the former owner, whose crop was standing in the field, and his men resisted, it was held that the lessee and his men could not be held guilty of rioting.[1]

An order under s 144 of the CrPC cannot be treated as substantive evidence of possession.[2] Possession given to a party in proceedings under s 145, CrPC, may be maintained.[3] Where both parties are entitled to joint possession, neither of them have the right under the law to attempt to take forcible possession or take forcible possession after assembling a number of armed men and going to the place and thereby intimidating the people in possession.[4] A plea of a right to possession is no answer to a charge of rioting by making a forcible entry on land cultivated even by a trespasser who is in possession and opposes the entry.[5] Even if persons have a right to possession, they would be guilty of the offence under s 143 of the IPC, if they enforce that right by means of criminal force.[6]

Where a person has been in possession of land under water, the fact that on one occasion another person succeeded in fishing without molestation would amount only to a disturbance of the former's possession and not to his dispossession, and the former is not deprived of his right of private defence.[7]

28. 'To Take or Obtain Possession'

No person is entitled to vindicate his right to possession of any property by resorting to criminal force. That right is subject to the limitations in ss 96 - 106 of the IPC . Where there is an actual invasion of one's property or person and there is no time to seek the aid of public authorities, the right of private defence is available, and that right extends also to this section.[8] This clause speaks of 'to take or obtain possession of any property'. It does not speak of maintaining possession or resisting an attempt by another to take possession. It is therefore, plain, that it can have no application to a case where a person, in lawful possession of any property, proposes to use force in order to maintain his possession.[9] Persons, merely acting in maintenance of an existing peaceful possession, no matter whether possession was with or without title, cannot be said to enforce any right or supposed right and, therefore, cannot be held to form an unlawful assembly within the meaning of the fourth clause of this section. A984 person who is out of possession must enforce his right, if any, in the way prescribed by law and he cannot be permitted to vindicate it by the use of criminal force.[10] However, where possession is already complete before the date of occurrence, the fourth clause of this section is not applicable.[11]

Where the common object is not to use criminal force to get possession but to prevent aggression by others, it cannot be said to be unlawful.[12] Even force can be used to resist trespassers if necessary, and no question of private defence on the part of the trespassers arises.[13] The right of private defence extends to this and subsequent sections, just as much as it extends to any other offence punishable under the Code. Where a person in possession of his property resists an invasion against it, in exercise of his right to that property, and if that invasion amounts to an offence under the Code, he is entitled to resist it by force and to collect for that purpose such number and such arms as may be absolutely necessary for this purpose, provided only that there is no time to have recourse to the protection of the police authorities.[14]

Where the accused numbers 2 and 7 were in possession and the other accused joined them in maintaining that possession, it was held:

> The accused's party sought only to maintain possession and an assembly of more than five persons with this common object would not come within the definition of 'unlawful assembly' given in section 141 , Indian Penal Code 1860. The accused, therefore, cannot be convicted of any offence by virtue of s 149, Indian Penal Code 1860. If they had no right of private defence of the property in the possession of accused 2 and 7, the accused would be responsible for the various acts done by them individually. If they had a right of private defence but some exceeded it, that right not only entitled accused 2 and 7 to defend the land, but also such other persons, as they might have gathered there to help them to protect their rights.[15]

To Enforce a Right to Possession and to Maintain Possession to be Distinguished

Under the fourth clause of the section, an assembly of five or more persons is an unlawful assembly if the common object of its members is to enforce any right or supposed right by means of criminal force or show of criminal force. Section 141 of the IPC must be read with ss 96 and 106 of the IPC dealing with the right of private defence. Under s 96 of the IPC nothing is an offence which is done in the exercise of right of private defence. The assertion of a right of private defence, within the limits prescribed by law, cannot fall within the expression 'to enforce any right or supposed right in the fourth clause of this section'.[16]The true import of the expression 'to enforce any right' relates to an initial act when it is done in furtherance of any right, and not to an act when it is done to maintain a position already achieved in the lawful exercise of that right.[17] If a person is already in possession of property and he gathers985 five or more persons to defend such possession, he would be doing so to maintain his possession and such action would not be illegal and the assembly would not be unlawful. However if he is not in possession of property, but has got only right to acquire possession, and if he, with five or more persons, goes to the property to acquire it by force, that would be unlawful because that would be a case of enforcing a right. What this sub-clause prohibits is to enforce a right or a supposed right, and not maintaining or defending such right or a supposed right.[18]The fact of exceeding the right of private defence, which a person has, cannot make him a member of an unlawful assembly. He can only be convicted and punished for the individual act which he himself has done in excess of the right of private defence.[19] Where the accused forcibly took away the crops under a bona fide belief that they were entitled to the possession, the Supreme Court held that the accused could not be held guilty of having trespassed into the said land or formed an unlawful assembly for committing theft of the crops and that conviction of the accused under ss 143 and 379 of the IPC was bad.[20]

Possession of Trespasser

When two persons are on a field, each claiming it, he who has the title, is in law deemed to be in possession. If the true owner acquiesces or acts otherwise, so that legal possession vests in the trespasser, then he must resort to a civil court and bring a suit either under s 6 of the Specific Relief Act, or for ejectment or damages.[21] If somebody enters on his land during his absence and he does not acquiesce in the trespass, he would still retain possession of the land; and as the possessor of the land, he is entitled to defend that possession. If he brings friends with him and with force of arms resists those who are trespassing on the land, who are also armed, he and his friends would not be guilty of forming themselves into an unlawful assembly; for those who defend their possession are not members of an unlawful assembly. But if a person acquiesces in his dispossession and subsequently, under claim of title, comes again to dispossess his opponents then he and his friends would be members of an unlawful assembly and guilty of rioting.[22]It is true that the courts in India have taken the view that a trespasser who is in peaceful and settled possession of the property in dispute is entitled to defend his right of possession against physical attack. However a trespasser does not acquire this right from his own act of trespass or taking forcible possession. No person can derive any benefit from his own act of the trespass or taking forcible possession. No person can derive any benefit from his own wrongful986 or criminal act. His rights, if any, flow from the conduct of the rightful owner or occupier who may acquiesce in the trespasser's possession. A mere trespasser cannot, by the very act of trespass, immediately and without acquiescence, give himself what the law understands by possession against the person whom he ejects, and drive him to produce his title, if he can, without delay, or reinstate himself in his former possession.

It may, therefore, be considered settled law that a trespasser acquires the right to defend his possession against physical attack only if he has come to it by acquiescence, express or implied, of the rightful owner and his possession has become peaceful and settled. The passage of time does not necessarily confer any right on the trespasser. For example, a man may be away when another takes forcible possession of his property behind his back, and on his return, he can assert his right of property by throwing out the trespasser. The question of lapse of time becomes relevant only if the rightful owner or occupier sits quiet and does nothing to assert his rights even after knowing that the trespasser is in possession of his property.[23]

29. 'Property'

Property in this clause includes movable property.[24]

30. 'To Deprive any Person of the Enjoyment of Right of Way'

The use of the words 'or other incorporeal rights' in this sub-clause shows that it applies to all incorporeal rights and is not confined to a right of way or a right to the use of water. In the case of incorporeal rights, such as for instance, a right of way or a right to use water, no one is in possession of it except during the actual moment when he is peacefully exercising it.[25] No person can prevent by force another person dealing with his own land, merely because he may have some right of easement over that land of which right he was not, at the time, in actual enjoyment.[26] A person who interferes with such a right does not 'take or obtain possession of any property' but only deprives the other of the enjoyment of it. This sub-clause applies only when some person is in possession or enjoyment of an incorporeal right and is deprived of the enjoyment of it.

Right of Way--Processions

A person may acquire a right of way over the land of another by way of an easement. Continued use by the public of a way raises a presumption that the way belongs to the public.[27]

Where, at the time of the occurrence, there was a decree of a competent civil court against the complainant having a right of way, it was held that the accused could not be said to have a common object to deprive the complainant of the enjoyment of his987 right of way, even if they debarred the complainants access to the disputed pathway.[28]

All members of the public have a right to carry religious processions through a public way in a lawful manner irrespective of the religions to which they belong.[29] The right to use a public highway is not a right which originates either in an agreement or in custom. The very fact that a particular path or a road is a public highway means that every member of the public has a right to use it. That right is subject only to similar rights of other members of the public to use the public highway and to the power of the state to regulate traffic and to prevent disturbance or breach of public peace. Although the right to use public highways in this manner is not expressly described as a fundamental right in the Constitution of India, it can reasonably be stated to partake of the fundamental right, to assemble peaceably and without arms and to move freely throughout the territory of India, guaranteed under art 19 of the Constitution of India .[30] Where, therefore, the accused who were 'Muslims', prevented certain processionists from proceeding along a mosque on a public highway with music, it was held that the processionists had the right to come in procession along the public highway, whether with or without music, so long as they did so peacefully without being armed and subjected themselves to control by the state in the interest of regulation of traffic or use of the public ways by others and in the interest of the public peace. No person has any right to prevent them from proceeding along the public highway in a procession in that manner. The common object, therefore, of the above assembly of 'Muslims' was clearly to restrain the processionists from proceeding in the way they have a right to, and to compel the processionists to omit to do what they were legally entitled to do, by means of criminal force, or show of criminal force and so the accused formed an unlawful assembly and were liable to punishment under s 143 of the IPC .[31]

Where the petitioners formed part of a Moharram procession and while going on a highway placed the tabuts (Tazias) in a line across the road, thereby preventing the mail tonga from passing along, it was held that the placing of the tabuts on the road, was obstructing the highway, and that though they were entitled to the use of the road, they could not so occupy it to the exclusion of others equally entitled to the use of it.[32]

Right of Way--Speech and Dharna

It is true that art 19(1)(b) of the Constitution of India guarantees to every citizen the right to assemble peacefully and without arms and art 19(1)(d) guarantees the right to move freely throughout the territory of India. It is from these rights that the right to take out a procession flows. If the procession carries placards or shouts slogans or halts from time to time and speeches are made, right of speech and expression as988 guaranteed by art 19(1)(a) is also exercised. However, these rights are subject to constitutional and statutory restrictions and can be exercised subject to such restrictions only.

When such rights are exercised on a public high-way, it has to be ensured that it is done peacefully and in an orderly manner without infringement of the rights of others. Every member of the public has a right to use a high-way and such right is subject to similar rights of other members of the public. The acts of sitting in dharna and stopping other persons and vehicles from passing through the high-way will not be a lawful exercise of the rights of the processionists and will be violative of the rights of others and will amount to public nuisance, rioting and causing of illegal restraint to others who are stopped from passing/re-passing through the public highway.[33]

31. 'Enjoyment of the Use of Water'

What this sub-clause aims at is a common object to deprive a person of the enjoyment of the use of water and not merely a supposed right to its use. No person can have a right to prevent by force another person dealing with his own land merely because he may have some right of easement or customary right over a portion of that land of which right he was not at the time in actual enjoyment.[34]

Where a party stationed higher up a stream obstructs the flow of water, the people down below may be deprived of the use of the water of the stream. However, they cannot take the law into their own hands and commit a riot to remove the obstructions.[35]

Where the common object of the assembly was by means of criminal force or show of criminal force to deprive the cultivators of a certain village of the use of water or a pyne of which they were in enjoyment, or thereby to enforce their right or supposed right to the said water, it was held that they formed an unlawful assembly.[36]

Where people are in possession of water and their intention is to maintain that possession and not to enforce any right or supposed right, their common object is not unlawful. A party in possession is entitled to resist and repel an aggression and his action in so doing would be in the maintenance of his right.[37] In defending what they are possessed of and bona fide believe they have a right to, whether it be tangible property or such a right as supply of water, persons who form an assembly for that purpose do not render themselves criminally punishable.[38]

In Ramnandan Prasad Singh v Emperor ,[39] across a waterway exclusively belonging to the accused, the complainant's party constructed, without the permission of the accused, a bund or dam for their own purpose. The complainant's party had been restrained by an injunction from interfering with the accused in their use and occupation of the pyne in question. The accused in attempting to cut the bund989 were opposed by the complainant's party, two of whom were struck by the accused. It was held that by attempting to cut the bund, the accused were not enforcing a right, but only maintaining it and could not be held guilty. However where five persons assembled at a water head to take water by force and armed themselves with deadly weapons to strike and vanquish anybody who should stand in their way and prevent them from accomplishing their purpose, it was held that their common object was not to maintain a right but to enforce a supposed right, and they formed an unlawful assembly.[40]

32. Right to Fish

If persons have a right to fish in a reservoir of water, they have every right to defend or maintain that right, and their common object to assault in defending or maintaining their right will not be unlawful.[41]

33. 'To Enforce Any Right or Supposed Right'

The plain object of the Fourth clause of this section is to prevent resort to force in vindication of one's supposed rights.[42] The words 'by means of criminal force or show of criminal force' in the beginning of this clause govern the sub-clause 'to enforce any right or supposed right'. The test of criminality is the determination to use criminal force and act otherwise than in due course of law, so as to threaten the public peace.[43]

The most important words in this clause are 'to enforce any right or supposed right'. The phrase 'to enforce a right' can apply only when the party claiming the right has not possession over the subject of the right and therein lies the distinction between 'enforcing a right' and 'maintaining a right'. A party in possession is entitled to resist and repel an aggression and his action in so doing would be in the maintenance of his right.[44]

Whether Right of Private Defence Extends to this Section Also

At first sight there may appear to be some confusion between the right of private defence of property as set out in ss 96 and 105 of the IPC, and the provisions of s 141 (fourth clause) of the same Code which make it an offence to 'enforce any right'. A party cannot be said 'to enforce any right' where he is in undoubted possession of the land upon which an attack has been made and he defends that possession. In that case it is only the right of private defence of property which would arise. If, on the other hand, there is real doubt whether the land belonged to one party or the other, then, if either party uses force, that would amount to enforcing a right and there would be no right of private defence of property.[45]The true import of the expression 'to enforce any right' relates to an initial act when it is done in furtherance of any right and not990 to an act when it is done to maintain a position already achieved in the lawful exercise of that right. The distinction may be fine, but it is substantial.[46]Whether a right exists, or is merely supposed to exist, the essence of the fourth clause of this section is the use or show of criminal force to enforce that right. The expression 'enforce a right' implies the existence of two persons--the person who enforces it and the person against whom it is enforced. Such a situation can arise when the property over which, or the subject in respect of which, the right is sought to be enforced is not in the possession of the person trying to enforce that right, but is in the possession of the person against whom that right is sought to be enforced. If that property or subject is in the actual possession of the person to whom the right also belongs, his act in respect of the right cannot be rightly described as enforcing that right. In such a situation he is said to enjoy the right and not enforce it. The import of the phrase used in the section, therefore, relates to an act done in furtherance of any right or claim of right and not to an act done in defending or maintaining the right already in the enjoyment of the person.[47] There is a difference between 'forced to maintain or defend any right' and 'to enforce any right or supposed right'. What this section prohibits is enforcing any right or supposed right, and not maintaining or defending one's right.[48] Where the intention is not to enforce a right, but to maintain undisturbed actual enjoyment of a right, no question of an unlawful assembly arises. It is a question of private defence of property.[49] This section must be read with s 96 of the IPC and the following sections of the Code. The persons in a party are protected by both the clauses of s 97 of the IPC that is to say: (a) they have a right to defend their own person and the person of others against an offence affecting the human body, and (b) they have the right to defend the property against the opposite party who are committing, or attempting to commit at least, the offence of criminal trespass.[50] No person is entitled to vindicate his right to possession of any property by resort to criminal force. That right is subject to the limitations laid down in ss 96 - 106 of the IPC . When there is an actual invasion of one's property or person and there is no time to seek the aid of public authorities, the right of private defence is available and that right extends also to this section. It would depend on the circumstances of each case in order to determine the question as to whether five or more persons having a common object joined together and committed a particular crime. In all these cases, it should be clear from the evidence that the party exercising the right he claims, is in possession of that right and that he is entitled to resist or repel aggression in order to maintain that right.[51]

Under the fourth clause of s 141 of the IPC, an assembly of five or more persons is an unlawful assembly if the common object of its members is to enforce any right or supposed right by means of criminal force or show of criminal force to any person. Section 141 of the IPC must be read with ss 96 - 106 of that Code dealing with the right of private defence. Under s 96 of the IPC nothing is an offence which is done in991 the exercise of the right of private defence. The assertion of a right of private defence within the limits prescribed by law cannot fall within the expression 'to enforce any right or supposed right' in the fourth clause of s 141 of the IPC .[52]

The fact of exceeding the right of private defence, which a person has, cannot make him a member of an unlawful assembly. He can only be convicted and punished for the individual act which he himself has done in excess of the right of private defence.[53] Persons, merely acting in maintenance of an existing peaceful possession, no matter whether the possession was with or without title, cannot be said to enforce any right or supposed right and therefore cannot be held to form an unlawful assembly within the meaning of the fourth clause of this section. A person who is out of possession must enforce his right, if any, in the way prescribed by law and he cannot be permitted to vindicate it by the use of criminal force.[54]

It has been held in a Madras case that it is little short of self-evident that in defending what they are possessed of and have bona fide belief that they have a right to, whether it be tangible property or such a right as that to a water supply, persons who have formed an assembly for that purpose do not render themselves criminally punishable.[55]It has, however, been held that in the case of an incorporeal right no one can be said to be in possession of it except during the actual moment when he is peacefully exercising it, and any attempt to vindicate such a right at any other time by the use of force must necessarily be an attempt to 'enforce a right or supposed right' within the meaning of this clause, and not an act to maintain an existing right of peaceful possession.[56]

When a party is in possession for four or five days, though it may be in wrongful possession, another party, although claiming to be the rightful owner, is not entitled to go in and use force to turn him out, much less is he entitled to take armed men with him for that purpose.[57]

Where an assembly of more than five persons conducted a funeral procession along a public road with the object of vindicating their right of way and intending to resist if obstructed, and, though not armed, they were using threatening language, it was held that they formed an unlawful assembly though they had a right of way.[58]

Peacefully abating private nuisance cannot be said to be an unlawful object. Where a co-owner illegally erected a platform on joint land and the other co-owners came in and without violent or unnecessary force and with no breach of the peace, abated the nuisance by putting down the platform, it was held that they could not be held to form an unlawful assembly.[59]

However where the accused were playing music while celebrating a recognised festival and a neighbour annoyed by the noise came and took away one of their992 drums on which they assaulted him, it was held that they could not be said to have formed an unlawful assembly.[60]

Unless a right of private defence is established, a claim (even if bona fide) of title or a claim (even if bona fide) of possession will avail nothing.[61] A distinction must be made between a disputed claim and an admitted claim or ascertained right. The distinction has some importance with reference to the fourth clause, the plain object of which is to prevent the resort to force in vindication of supposed rights.[62] Even the assertion of a supposed right, if the right is to be asserted by a show of force, is sufficient in itself for constituting an unlawful assembly.[63] Cultivators cannot be convicted of criminal trespass when they asserted grazing rights which had never been declared against them and which they bona fide believed they had, and for the same reason they cannot be said to have formed an unlawful assembly because they went and protested against the land being ploughed up.[64]

34. Fifth Clause--Illegal Compulsion by use or show of Criminal Force

This clause makes it unlawful for any person to compel another person, by means of criminal force, or show of criminal force, to do what he is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do what he is legally entitled to do. A person cannot be said to be acting in any illegal or unlawful manner if he seeks the assistance of a magistrate and the police, and any force used or show of force made by the magistrate cannot be deemed to be force used or show of force made by those persons. Hence they cannot be said to form an unlawful assembly within the meaning of this clause.[65] People simply asserting their bona fide right and preventing an unlawful interference with their property cannot be regarded as members of an unlawful assembly. The mere use of criminal force or show of criminal force by any person to take possession of any property is not sufficient to bring the case within this clause unless some criminal intent is proved against the person so using force or show of force.[66]

'Legally Entitled to Do'

For the application of this clause it is not sufficient to prove that the common object of the accused's party was to compel the complainant by means of force to omit, for the time being, to do a certain act. The act omitted must be one which the complainant was legally entitled to do, and if it was not such an act, cl 5 cannot apply.[67] If the person in question was not legally entitled to do the thing objected to, obstructing him in so doing is no offence, as where the police searched the house of an alleged offender, without having a search warrant, and the search was resisted by force,[68] or where an illegal arrest is resisted by force.[69]993

35. Explanation

Under the explanation to the section an assembly which was not unlawful when it assembled may subsequently become unlawful.[70] Although individuals may, in the first instance, have associated themselves with a mob from motives perfectly innocent, nevertheless, if the mob is or becomes an unlawful assembly and the individuals in question take part in its proceedings, they will be liable as members of an unlawful assembly.[71] Where certain Mohammadans being apprehensive of the breach of the peace being committed by Hindu processionists, assembled either to protect themselves or to protest against the action of the processionists in taking an unlicensed route, it cannot be said that they become members of an unlawful assembly at that stage. But when the Hindus were receding, the Mohammadans chased them; they became members of an unlawful assembly.[72]

Where three out of five persons did not take part in the seizure of the cattle, but when subsequently they were joined by another group of nine persons armed with lathis and all of them participated in the subsequent attack on the owners of the cattle, it was held that though the first group was not an unlawful assembly in the beginning, it became so subsequently.[73]

But when a body of men are determined to vindicate their rights, or supposed rights by unlawful force, and when they engage in a fight with men, who on the other hand, are equally determined to vindicate by unlawful force their rights or supposed rights, no question of self-defence arises. Neither side is trying to protect itself but each side is trying to get the better of the other.[74] In such a case the claim of right becomes reduced to a mere pretext for fighting. The assembly is unlawful not because the claim of right is immaterial, but because it was not the real object of the fight.[75] An assembly lawful in itself does not become unlawful merely by reason of its lawful acts exciting others to do unlawful acts.[76]

It was held in Kunja Bhuniya v Emperor [77] that an assembly of persons lawfully exercising their lawful rights would not become an unlawful assembly by repelling an attack made on them by persons who had no right to obstruct them, nor by exceeding the lawful use of their right of private defence.

An assembly of persons lawfully exercising their lawful rights would not become an unlawful assembly merely by repelling an attack made on them by persons who had first acquiesced in handing over possession to them.[78]

The test of the unlawfulness of an assembly of five or more persons as laid down by English law is, whether it is the intention of the assembly to carry out its common994 purpose, whether lawful or unlawful, in such a manner as to give firm and courageous persons in the neighbourhood of such assembly, ground to apprehend a breach of the peace in consequence of it.[79] Thus, although the conduct of an assembly of more than five persons excites others to a breach of the peace, yet, unless it is the object of the assembly to do so, it is not an unlawful assembly on that account.[80] An assembly which is not unlawful in its inception does not become unlawful merely because it continues without dispersing in defiance of a lawful order to disperse, for there is no provision in this section to say that an assembly refusing to disperse in obedience to a lawful command becomes an unlawful assembly.

An assembly which was lawful in its inception may subsequently turn unlawful all of a sudden without previous concert among its members. Previous concert is not necessary. The common object required under this section differs from the common intention required by s 34 in this respect.[82]

It is not necessary that the intention or the purpose which is necessary to render an assembly an unlawful one, need not come into existence at the outset. The time of forming an unlawful intent is not material. an assembly which at its commencement or even for sometime thereafter is lawful, may subsequently become unlawful, or even riotous.[83]

Applicability in a Case of Sudden Fight

Where no party attacked the members of the opposite party at the commencement of the occurrence and at the stage of remonstrance and counter-remonstrance someone started the fight but it could not definitely be determined as to which of the two parties struck the first blow. It was held by the Supreme Court that as there was no premeditation and the occurrence was a sudden affair hence each assailant should be liable for his individual act and not vicariously liable for the acts of others.[84]

36. Group Clashes/Arson--Evidence

When an unlawful assembly or a large number of persons take part in arson or in a clash between two groups, in order to convict a person, at least two prosecution witnesses have to support and identify the role and involvement of the persons concerned. The normal test is that the conviction could be sustained only if it is supported by two or more witnesses who give a consistent account of the incident in question.[85]995

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 142.

being member of unlawful assembly.--

Whoever, being aware of facts which render any assembly an unlawful assembly, intentionally joins that assembly, or continues in it, is said to be a member of an unlawful assembly.

Comments

1. Scope

The last section defined an 'unlawful assembly', and this section declares who may be said to be a member of an unlawful assembly, for it is only such a person who can be punished under s 143, IPC . For a person to be a member of an unlawful assembly, he must have been aware of the facts which rendered the assembly an unlawful one; and being so aware, he must have either intentionally joined that assembly or, if he joined it before being so aware, he must have continued in it after being so aware.[86] In the words of the commissioner's second report:

> A person is not a member of an unlawful assembly, unless he is aware of the facts making the assembly unlawful, and the intention of the party joining the assembly is to be inferred from his cognisance of the facts characterising the assembly as unlawful, and the common purpose is a matter of inference from the overt acts of the members of the assembly, their language and gestures as proved in evidence.[87]

2. Whether Mere Presence Sufficient

Mere presence of a person in an assembly does not make him a member of an unlawful assembly, unless it is shown that he had done or omitted to do something which would make him a member of such an assembly, or unless the case falls under this section.[88] If there are two explanations for the presence of a particular person on a particular occasion, one of which is lawful and the other unlawful, it will not be possible to assume an unlawful intention against him.

Where passengers driving in a motor bus decided to engage in some such unlawful activity as would constitute them to be an unlawful assembly there is no reason why the paid driver should be presumed to be a member of the unlawful assembly; his presence there is perfectly well explained by his capacity as the driver. If it is desired to clothe him with further responsibility, the prosecution must prove not merely that he was present there, but that he was present there with a positive intention and object which went beyond his intention to perform his duty in driving the motor bus.[89]

996In a riot case all the ingredients required for an unlawful assembly and rioting are to be strictly proved. The fact that there were a thousand rioters, and only 122 accused before the sessions judge, it will not take away from the prosecution even an iota of the responsibility of proving them guilty. It may be the misfortune of the prosecution. But the misfortune of the prosecution should never be allowed to become the misfortune of the accused.[90]

3. 'Being Aware of Facts which Render any Assembly into Unlawful Assembly'

As is evident from s 141, IPC, the facts which render an assembly unlawful are that the assembly consists of five or more persons and that their common object is to do any one of the acts specified in the five clauses of that section. A person cannot be said to be a member of an unlawful assembly unless he is aware of these facts. Whether he is so aware or not is a question of fact, a matter of inference from proved facts.[91] Spectators, wayfarers, etc., attracted to the scene of rioting by curiosity, as generally happens in the country side when a riot or affray is going on, should not, by reason of their mere presence at the scene of rioting and with the rioters, be held to be members of the unlawful assembly of rioters. But, if they are proved to have marched with the rioters for a long distance, when the rioters were shouting tell-tale slogans and pelting stones, it will be for them to prove their innocence under s 106 of the Evidence Act .[92] No one who intentionally joins or continues in an unlawful assembly can be allowed to say that he was merely a harmless spectator. He must prove that he was there owing to no fault of his own and he could not get out of the crowd.[93]

4. Presumption in a Case of Riot

When a person is found to be amongst a mob of rioters, the law presumes that he shared their common intention and object. If he does not share their common intention and object, the onus is upon him to prove his innocence.[94] The proof of awareness of facts, which render an assembly an unlawful assembly, must normally relate to circumstances or acts, giving rise to such inference, existing or done prior to the execution of such common object.[95]

5. 'Intentionally Joins'

Any person who intentionally joins or continues in an unlawful assembly doing an unlawful act is a member of that unlawful assembly. He cannot help being aware that the action of those men was unlawful. A person, who has innocently got into a crowd and is unable, owing to pressure of numbers to escape from it, is not a member of the997 unlawful assembly; but he would have to make out his case on that point.[1] Although individuals may, in the first instance, have associated themselves with a mob from motives perfectly innocent, nevertheless, if the mob is or becomes an unlawful assembly and the individuals in question take part in its proceedings, they will be liable as members of an unlawful assembly.[2] But where persons, hearing a cry for help, run to rescue a person, they cannot be said to be members of an unlawful assembly.[3] What the section requires is that a person should intentionally join, or continue in, an unlawful assembly.[4]

Where the common object of an unlawful assembly was to seize and carry away a woman, and the accused was the driver of the carriage in which she was carried away, it was held that he was a member of the unlawful assembly as he was present and must have seen that the object of the assembly was to carry off the woman, and when he drove her off against her wish, he joined the unlawful assembly and assisted in carrying the unlawful object for which it was assembled.[5]

Where in a trial of 34 persons under ss 143 and 379, IPC on allegations that they formed an unlawful assembly with a common object of committing theft and committed theft by cutting and removing paddy crops from the lands, it was found that the possession of land was in dispute and that some of the accused, being only labourers, merely obeyed the orders of their employer and there was no evidence to show that they were aware of any previous quarrel and of the person who grew the crops, nor was there evidence to show that they had gone to the fields with dishonest intention, it was held that they were entitled to the benefit of doubt.[6]

A person cannot be said to be a member of an unlawful assembly when he had no common object with the members of the assembly and his presence in the assembly was due to duress.[7] When two or more mobs start from different localities, operate independently and never mingle together at any time or place, the mere fact that they have a common intention will not make them one assembly. The question whether two groups of men do or do not form one 'assembly' is a question of fact in each case.[8]

6. 'Continues in it'

It is sufficient for the offence of riot to be proved against an individual that he should remain in an unlawful assembly even when he is aware that the assembly is unlawful. The word 'continues' merely means physical presence as a member of the unlawful assembly, that is, to be physically present in the crowd.[9] The mere fact that a person applied to be made a member of a committee nine months before it was declared unlawful cannot, be said to be proof of his membership after the association had been998 declared unlawful. Some overt act as a member subsequent to such declaration must be proved.[10]

Continued whether to be Equated with Physical Presence

But the word 'continued' is not, in all circumstances, to be equated with the physical presence although, unless the contrary is shown either by evidence or by circumstances, physical presence would lead to the inference that it was accompanied by the mental element necessary for the continuance.[11] The word 'continued' in this section, carries the implication that the person concerned remained a part of the assembly, physical presence near about the place, where an unlawful assembly has been formed, cannot, by itself and in all situations, prove remaining a part of the assembly or, to use the words of the section continuing in the assembly.[12]

Where, on the arrival of the procession, people from inside houses started throwing stones and soda water bottles, etc., and the innocent people, from the said houses, could not go because of the apprehension of the police (which immediately cordoned off the locality) and of miscreants, it was held that there was no intention on the part of the innocent persons, when the stones, bricks, etc., were thrown on the procession, to continue in the houses, and they could not be convicted under s 142 .[13]

Withdrawal from Unlawful Assembly

A member of an unlawful assembly may withdraw from it. Such withdrawal can be either actual and voluntary or involuntary. It would be voluntary if he removes himself from the assembly and goes away; clearly indicating that he is averse to taking any further part in the incident. If a member of an unlawful assembly is not able to walk away like this and has perforce to remain on the spot either because he is so injured that he cannot remove himself or because he is held up by others, he may still continue to be a member of the unlawful assembly if he shares the common object of the assembly subsequent to his being made helpless. He can, however, in such a position, disavow his share in the common object by expressions, bearing no doubt that he did not share the object any more. If he is also unable to express himself in this respect, it would be fair to presume that he was incapable of both taking part and of sharing the objects of the unlawful assembly, and that he had withdrawn from the unlawful assembly.[14]

Presumption of Continuance as Members--Burden of Proof of Innocence

It is not right to presume, from the fact that the man is a member of an association when it is lawful, that he continues to be a member after it is declared unlawful. This is not a matter of presumption; there must be evidence of continuing membership.[15] It may well be that a perfectly lawful assembly of citizens may become later a riotous mob, and it may be that in the mob there will be a number of innocent people who do999 not share the common objects of rioters. When a person, is, however, found to be amongst a mob of rioters, the law presumes that he shares their common object and intention. If he does not share that common object and intention, the onus is upon him to prove his innocence. What the common object and intention of a mob is, can only be inferred from its actions. Where a mob murdered certain men, the only inference which can be drawn is that the common object of the mob was murder. If any of the accused did not share that common object, it is for them to prove that fact.[16]

The point was further considered in Bindeshwari Singh v State .[17] In that case Sinha J, referring to the observations made in Ramhit's case cited above, observed:

> In my opinion, the proposition is very widely stated. As section 149 stands and this was a case under sections 302 / 149, Indian Penal Code, the ingredients of the offence have to be made out by the prosecution and not by the accused. It has to be proved by the prosecution that at the time of the committing of the offence the accused was a member of the assembly. If it appears that the important expression occurring in section 149 'at the time of the committing of that offence' was missed by their Lordships, and no effect, therefore, was given to that expression in the observations just quoted. It is true that if once the prosecution had led evidence that the accused was present at the time of the commission of the offence as a member of the mob, it would be for the accused, if he so wishes, to give evidence to rebut the prosecution case. But unless there is some evidence to show that the accused was a member of the unlawful assembly at the time of the commission of the offence no burden lies upon the defence to prove his innocence.

But Ahmed J, dissented from this view and relying on the two Allahabad decisions cited above, observed:

> It is true that a man may retire from an unlawful assembly in the course of its transaction before a particular offence is committed, but once it is found that he was a member of the unlawful assembly at the time when the transaction began, the reasonable inference should be that he continued to be there as such till the transaction was completed, unless there is some evidence or circumstances present on the record to show otherwise.
> This rule, however, is not without exception because there may be cases where difference in time and space between the presence of a member and the commission of a crime is so that that factors considered in the light of other circumstances may throw doubt as to his continuing to be the member till the time when the offence alleged was committed. In those cases no doubt, as also in a case where an accused specifically pleads that he retired from the assembly after a point of time in the midst of the transaction, the question of his guilt no doubt will have to be weighed on a different footing.
> But normally, as stated above, and more particularly when in the course of a single transaction many acts are committed by different members of the unlawful assembly in quick succession within a short time, the rule of inference should be in favour of his continuing to be the member of that assembly till the close of that transaction. For, if the interval between the different acts is short, the probabilities are more against the inference that any of these members retired in the midst of the transaction and did not continue to be present till the time the transaction lasted. Otherwise, I think the very application of constructive liability, as contemplated by section 149 , IPC, will fail.1000

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 143.

Punishment.--

Whoever is a member of an unlawful assembly, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The mere fact of being a member of an unlawful assembly, as defined in ss 141 and 142, IPC, is punishable under this section. If there is an assemblage of five or more men with the common object of resisting by force or show of force, the execution of processes of law, every one of them is guilty of being a member of an unlawful assembly, whether or not resistance is offered. If force is used by any member of the assembly each one of them becomes liable for rioting under s 147, IPC . But if actual resistance is offered, a separate offence of resistance of the process of law punishable under s 186, IPC is committed.[18] Where the common object of an assembly of five or more persons is to commit an offence, the purpose for which they are united constitutes in itself an offence distinct from the criminal offence which the persons assembled agree and intend to commit.[19]

In a Calcutta case it has been held:

> If the evidence is insufficient to prove the substantive charge of criminal trespass, it will be extremely difficult to hold that the petitioners were members of an unlawful assembly, the only common object of which was to commit the offence of criminal trespass. As an abstract proposition of law it might not be inconceivable that some persons might form themselves into an unlawful assembly for the purpose of committing an offence of criminal trespass although no actual offence of trespass was committed by them that would be a position very much divorced from the realities of the situation.[20]

The Madras High Court has, however taken a different view and it has been held that it is difficult to understand how the position can be said to be 'very much divorced from the realities of the situation'. It is a matter of common experience that unlawful assemblies often fail to achieve their common object. The law does not require that for a person to be a member of an unlawful assembly, the common object of the assembly should have been achieved. If the common object of an unlawful assembly is to commit an offence, but the offence has not been committed, the difficulty may be in finding evidence of the common object. But there have been cases where the common object was proved by circumstantial evidence, and people were convicted under this section. Thus, where the accused were found in a temple at midnight with house-breaking implements, aruvals and guns in their possession, it was held that1001 they were guilty of an offence under this section as they must have been there with a common object of an unlawful kind.[21]

Spectators cannot be Convicted under this Section

A distinction has, however, to be made between 'being a member of an unlawful assembly' and 'being present at the place where members of an unlawful assembly have gathered, as mere spectators cannot be convicted for offences under s 143, IPC .[22] The Supreme Court has also held that mere presence of a person at the place where members of an unlawful assembly have gathered for carrying out their illegal common object, does not incriminate him.[23]

2. Sections 143, 147 and 148 Considered Together

Section 143 of the IPC*simpliciter* refers to punishing a person who is a member of an unlawful assembly. Section 147 , IPC refers to punishment for rioting when force or violence is used by an unlawful assembly or by any member of it. Section 148 refers to rioting armed with deadly weapons. Consequently for punishment under any or all these sections an unlawful assembly is sine qua non. If there is only one transaction, regarding which the punishment is meted out and if that punishment is under s 147 or to a particular accused under s 148, IPC, it is implicit in the finding that there was an unlawful assembly. If the offender is found guilty of the offence under s 147 or under s 148 the offence under s 143, IPC is automatically proved.[24]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, but not compoundable and is triable by any magistrate.[25] It is a curious anomaly that where the common object of an unlawful assembly is to commit the offence of criminal trespass, that offence itself is compoundable, but an offence under this section is not. This is presumably because offences under this section are regarded by the legislature as concerning persons other than those immediately involved; these offences are offences which directly affect the public peace and the conclusion of criminal cases relating to them is, therefore, something more than a matter for agreement between individuals.[26]

4. Complaint of Public Servant, if Necessary

Section 195(1)(a) of the CrPC[27] prevents a court from taking cognisance of an offence punishable under ss 172 - 188 of the IPC, except on the complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or some other public servant to whom he is administratively subordinate. In some cases it has been held that where the real offence alleged to have been committed is one under s 186, IPC, the accused could1002 not be tried for a minor general offence like the one under s 143, IPC, without a proper complaint under s 195, CrPC .[28]

5. Requirement of Charge

It is not obligatory to charge a person under s 143 or s 144, IPC when charging him with s 147 or s 148, IPC . Similarly, it is not obligatory to charge a person under s 145 or s 147, IPC when charging him for an offence with the aid of s 149, IPC . These sections are implied. The ingredients of s 143 are implied in s 147 and the ingredients of s 147 are implied when a charge under s 149 is included. Offences under ss 143 and 147, IPC are always present. When a charge is laid for an offence with the aid of s 149, but the other two charges need not be framed separately unless it is sought to secure a conviction under them. Section 143 is not used when the charge is under s 147 or s 148 and s 147 is not used when the charge is under s 149 . Section 147 may be dispensed with when the charge is under s 149 read with an offence under the IPC .[29] In every charge of rioting and unlawful assembly, the common object of the assembly must be stated.[30] The magistrate should mention one of the objects enumerated in s 141 as the common object.[31] But where there is evidence on record to show what the common object was and the accused have not been prejudiced, the conviction will not be bad for failure to state the common object.[32] Failure to define expressly and accurately the common object is an error which may be cured by ss 215 and 464 of the CrPC .[33] The Punjab Chief Court in Dhian Singh v Emperor ,[34] dissented from Kuduratullah v Emperor ,[35] and declined to hold that the specific common object of a riot must be set out in a charge under s 149, IPC, and declined to interfere as the omission in the charge had not in fact occasioned a failure of justice, and s 537 of the CrPC 1898 (now s 464 of the CrPC 1973) covered the omission.[36]

But a different view has been taken by the Orissa High Court in Markanda Panda v Ronkonidhi Panigrahi ,[37] and it was held that if the common object is not mentioned, conviction under this section will not be sustained.

Where the common object, alleged in the charge, was 'ousting the petitioner from a certain plot of land' and the charge did not recite 'by means of criminal force or show of criminal force', it was held that no such common object, as alleged in the charge was found to be included in any of the clauses, contained in s 141, IPC . It was not a case of defective charge, but of no charge, as the essential ingredient of the common object, as contained in s 141 of the IPC, was absent and there could be no1003 conviction on such a charge.[38] Where, however, the common object was stated to be 'harassing Hindus', it was held that the phrase used was sufficient to satisfy the requirements of law and to give the accused a sufficiently clear idea of the charge against them.[39]

6. Form of Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:
> That you on or about the....day of.....at.....were a member of an unlawful assembly, the common object of which was (here specify the object) there committed an offence punishable under s 143 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

7. Proof

For a conviction under this section, it must be proved that:

(i) there was an assembly of five or more persons;
(ii) they had a common object to do one of the acts specified in the five clauses of s 141, IPC ;
(iii) the accused was aware of the facts which constituted the assembly an unlawful assembly; and
(iv) being so aware, he intentionally joined or continued in the unlawful assembly.

In a prosecution under ss 143 and 379, IPC for removing paddy crops from the lands, possession of which was in dispute, the main question for consideration by a criminal court is whether the prosecution has established beyond reasonable doubt that the complainant had raised the crops on the disputed land.[40]

It is for the prosecution to show that the common object of a crowd was such as would constitute it an unlawful assembly as defined by s 141, IPC .[41]

Direct Evidence of Common Object not Possible

In order to establish the common intention of an unlawful assembly, it is, however, not necessary to prove that its members actually met and conspired to commit an offence. Such intention can be inferred from the circumstances of the case. In the case of a concerted attack by five or more persons, it is a perfectly valid and reasonable inference that they all had a common intention and were therefore, members of an unlawful assembly.[42] It is not possible for the prosecution to prove what was in the minds of the persons assembled. That can only be inferred by the subsequent conduct of the assembly.[43] To establish common object there cannot be1004 direct evidence. From the established facts, the court will have to come to the conclusion whether the accused were members of an unlawful assembly or whether they were present at the scene of offence as mere spectators. Spectators cannot be convicted for offences under s 143, IPC .[44] It is also not necessary to prove that a particular member of the unlawful assembly committed a particular offence to convict the other members of the unlawful assembly for the said offence.[45]

Only what the witnesses actually saw and heard as to what a mob was doing and saying is admissible to prove the nature of the assembly; their opinion and impressions that the assembly appeared to be unlawful are not admissible.[46] Notes under s 141 ante, may be referred to.

8. Conviction when Object of the Unlawful Assembly Fails--Conflicting Views

For punishment under s 143, IPC, an unlawful assembly is sine qua non.[47] The various High Courts have, however, expressed conflicting views on the maintainability of a conviction under s 143 when the object of the unlawful assembly has failed. The Patna High Court has held that where accused have been charged under s 379 and 143, IPC and the charge under s 379, IPC fails, the accused cannot be convicted under s 143 .[48] The Cuttack High Court has held that the conviction of the accused persons under s 143, IPC cannot be maintained as the commission of the offence under s 27 of the Act is alleged to be the common object of the assembly and on their acquittal of the said offence the essential element of common object for an offence under s 143, is found lacking.[49]

A contrary view has been taken by the Calcutta High Court and it has been held that it is not necessary under law that in all cases of unlawful assembly with an unlawful common object, the said common object must be translated into action or be successful. In many cases although the requisite number of persons had the unlawful common object and with that common object formed an unlawful assembly yet that common object might have been foiled or unsuccessful due to some reason or other. But that failure cannot be the reason to hold that there was no unlawful assembly as defined under the IPC if the essential ingredients of the offence under s 143, IPC, are proved. Simply because the Sessions Judge gave benefit of doubt to the accused in respect of the charge under s 379 of the IPC it cannot be argued that there could not have been any unlawful assembly having common object to reap the paddy. Persons may be guilty under s 143, IPC, even though the common object is unfulfilled.[50]

In a case before the Supreme Court where the question of cultivating the land and ownership of the crop was a matter of considerable doubt, it has been held that the1005 conviction under ss 143 and 379, IPC, cannot be upheld.[51] The finding arrived at in this case by the Apex Court is based on a question of fact this decision is, therefore, not of any help in resolving the controversy, the Calcutta view appears to be sound.

9. Sentence

Where in the case of an unlawful assembly the common object was to take forcible possession of property, the accused were only servants and acted on behalf of their masters who had a right to possession, and what they did, did not actually cause a breach of the peace, it was held that the sentence should not be too severe.[52] Any calculated interference with the judicial work by a noisy and tumultuous demonstration or by resorting to any other means forbidden by law, cannot be allowed to go unpunished. When the attitude of the accused was that of truculence at the time of the commission of the offence and of recalcitrance during the trial, it was held that a sentence of two months, imprisonment and a fine of Rs 50 on each accused could not be deemed to be excessive.[53]

Where, however, the accused has been acquitted for charges under the substantive offence, a lenient view can be taken for offence under s 143 .[54] Similarly as an offence under s 148, IPC is an aggravated form of offence under s 143 and s 147, separate conviction under these sections is not necessary.[55] It is also to be kept in view that as a riot is more or less a technical offence, harsh sentence has been held to be uncalled for.[56]

10. Security for Keeping the Peace

Under s 106 of the CrPC 1973, power is given to the court convicting an accused of 'any offence involving a breach of the peace' or of any other offence specified in sub-s (2) of s 106 to order the accused to execute a bond for keeping the peace during such period, not exceeding three years, as it may think fit to fix. But, since being a member of an unlawful assembly does not necessarily involve an actual breach of the peace, because the members may abstain from proceeding to such lengths, the magistrate should expressly find that the acts of the person convicted amounted to or involved a breach of the peace before making the summary order requiring security to keep the peace.[57] Otherwise no order under s 106, CrPC, can be passed under this section.[58]

11. Information by Public

Every person aware of the commission of or of the intention of any other person to commit, an offence under s 143, or other specified offences shall, in the absence of1006 reasonable excuse, forthwith give information to the nearest magistrate or police officer of such commission or intention.[59]

12. Information by Village Officers, Etc.

Every officer employed in connection with the affairs of a village and every person residing in a village is similarly required to communicate forthwith to the nearest magistrate or to the officer in charge of the nearest police station, whichever is nearer, any information which he may possess respecting the commission of, or intention to commit, in or near such village an offence punishable under s 143, IPC or other offences and matters concerning law and order as specified in s 40 of the CrPC 1973.

Intentionally omission to give notice or information to a public servant under s 40 or s 39, IPC is an offence punishable under ss 176, 118 or 202, IPC and furnishing false information is punishable under s 177 of the IPC .

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 144.

Joining unlawful assembly armed with deadly weapon.--

Whoever, being armed with any deadly weapon, or with anything which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, is a member of an unlawful assembly, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The offence under s 144, IPC is an aggravated form of the offence under s 143, IPC which makes culpable a membership of an unlawful assembly, and an assembly is unlawful only when the object of the assembly is one of the five things mentioned in s 141, IPC .[60] The aggravation consists in the offender being armed with a deadly weapon.

For a conviction under this section, it is necessary to establish:

(i) that there was an unlawful assembly as defined in s 141, IPC ;
(ii) that the accused was a member of that assembly as defined in s 142, IPC ; and
(iii) that he was armed with a deadly weapon.

2. 'Whoever'

The use of the word 'whoever' in this section suggests that only those persons who are actually armed with deadly weapons in an unlawful assembly, can be held liable under this section. The only way in which one member of an unlawful assembly can1007 be made liable for the act of another is under s 149, IPC .[61] So, where the accused, though not armed in the mob, shared the common object of the other members of the unlawful assembly, who carried deadly weapons like garasa, bhalaetc., it was held that they were liable for offence under s 149 and the fact, that they were not armed with deadly weapons, could not lessen the guilt.[62] But where a person instigates another to join an unlawful assembly armed with deadly weapons and then himself joins the assembly, he is liable under this section read with s 114, IPC although he himself is not armed with a deadly weapon.[63]

3. 'Deadly Weapon'

The expression 'deadly weapon' is not defined in the IPC . The marginal note to the section uses the expression 'deadly weapon' only. The section itself may appear to make a distinction between a 'deadly weapon' and 'anything which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death'. But there seems to be no difference between the two expressions and the latter expression may be taken to explain the former. No weapon can be deadly unless it is used. A weapon which when used for its designed purpose is likely to cause death, is a deadly weapon. Deadly weapons are lethal weapons, such as swords, daggers, pistols, guns, spears, hammers etc.;[64] it has been held that a spear and a kanta (Hindi word for a glove with sharp steel claws) are deadly weapons.[65] Sharp-edged weapons like kirpans,[66]dharia,[67]gupti[68] and knife[69] are also deadly weapons. The test of a 'deadly weapon' is not the purpose for which it is carried; it should be of such a nature that, if used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death.[70]

4. 'Or with anything which, used as a Weapon of Offence, is Likely to Cause Death'

A crowbar or spade may well be a deadly weapon if used as a weapon for offence, but if it is merely used to destroy a bridge, it certainly cannot be described as a weapon of any sort.[71] not only heavy sticks, but also a pen knife, a chopper, a dagger, a sling and even stones, when used as weapons of offence, may cause death.[72] Whether or not a stick is a deadly weapon would depend upon its size and weight. 'Stout male bamboos' when used as weapons of offence are likely to cause death, but not hollow ones.[73] In Queen-Empress v Nath ,[74] it has been held that it is a question of fact to be decided in each case whether the lathi used or the lathi with which the1008 injury is caused, was or was not in itself a deadly weapon. One lathi may by reason of its weight, length, or other peculiarities, be a deadly weapon; another may not. In that case the lathi used was held to be a deadly weapon. A lathi is not in itself, a deadly weapon. It performs precisely the same function in ordinary life in this country as a walking stick does in others, it is universally used by everybody in the moffussil; and it certainly cannot be regarded as, in any way, a deadly weapon unless and until it is used on the head or on some vital part of a person.[75] A lathi may be a lethal weapon and anyone who uses it on the head of another with such force as to fracture the skull must know that he was doing an act which in all probabilities must cause death.[76]

5. 'Is Member of an Unlawful Assembly'

This section contemplates the accused being a member of an unlawful assembly as defined in s 141, IPC, in the first instance. The mere fact that he was armed and was one of a crowd, though strongly suggesting that the object of the assembly was unlawful, is no proof thereof.[77]

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable and warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by any magistrate.[78]

7. Requirements of Charge

A charge under this section must specify the common object of the assembly, as well as the fact that the accused was a member of the unlawful assembly and armed with a deadly weapon. Therefore to sustain a charge under s 144 of the IPC, the prosecution must prove the common object of the unlawful assembly of which the accused is alleged to be a member.[79] If the common object is not mentioned, conviction under this section will not be sustained.[80] The accused should have reasonably distinct notice of the common object imputed to them and of the manner in which that common object was to be brought within the language of s 141, IPC .

Where the common object was stated to be 'harassing Hindus', it was held that the phrase used was sufficient to satisfy the requirements of law and to give the accused a sufficiently clear idea of the charge against them.[81]

8. Form of Charge

Notes under the previous section may be referred to. The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> 1009That you on or about the.....day of .....at..... being armed with a deadly weapon, to wit.....(or armed with.....which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death) were a member of an unlawful assembly, the common object of which was to (describe the common object) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 144 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 145.

Joining or continuing in unlawful assembly, knowing it has been commanded to disperse.--

Whoever joins or continues in an unlawful assembly, knowing that such unlawful assembly has been commanded in the manner prescribed by law to disperse, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The offence punishable under s 143, IPC is being a member of an unlawful assembly; that under s 144 being such member armed with something which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death; and the one under this section is the continuance in an unlawful assembly 'knowing that such unlawful assembly has been commanded in the manner prescribed by law to disperse'.[82] The offence is thus an aggravated offence.[83] Where the assembly is not unlawful, the provisions of this section are not attracted.[84] This and the analogous s 151, IPC have to be read with s 129 of the CrPC, sub-s (1) of which runs thus:...

> (1) Any Executive Magistrate or officer in-charge of a police station or, in the absence of such officer in-charge, any police officer, not below the rank of a sub-inspector may command any unlawful assembly, or any assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, to disperse; and it shall thereupon be the duty of the members of such assembly to disperse accordingly.

The first part of this sub-section empowers a magistrate or a police officer to command any unlawful assembly to disperse, and s 145, IPC provides the penalty for joining or continuing in the unlawful assembly knowing that it has been commanded to disperse. The second part of sub-s (1) of s 129, CrPC, empowers a magistrate or competent police officer to command any assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, and s 151 of this Code provides the penalty for knowingly joining or continuing in such an assembly after it has been commanded to disperse. This section contemplates only an unlawful assembly, but the assembly contemplated by s 151 of the Code may be a lawful or an unlawful1010 assembly. If the assembly likely to cause disturbance of the peace is an unlawful assembly within the meaning of s 141, the offender will be punishable under this section (refer to explanation to s 151 of this Code post).

Disobedience to a command to disperse may also be an offence, punishable under s 188 .[85]

2. Essentials of the Offence

In order to constitute an offence under this section, it is necessary for the prosecution to establish:

(i) there was an assemblage of at least five persons;
(ii) the object of the assembly must be any of the five objects mentioned in s 141, IPC ;
(iii) the accused shared that object with at least four others of the meeting or assembly;
(iv) the accused intentionally joined the assembly:
  (a) having knowledge of the assembly, or
  (b) continued therein after having had that knowledge;

(v) such unlawful assembly had been commanded to disperse;
(vi) such command to disperse was in the manner prescribed by law;
(vii) the accused joined or continued in such unlawful assembly after it had been commanded to disperse; and (viii) he did so knowing that it had been commanded to disperse.[86]

3. 'Joins or Continues in an Unlawful Assembly'

For definition of 'unlawful assembly' refer to s 141, IPC . Before conviction under this section may be recorded, it must be shown that there was an unlawful assembly and that the accused joined or continued in it after the legal command to disperse had been given. If it is not established that at the time when the order to disperse was given, it was addressed to an unlawful assembly, a conviction under this section will not stand. an assembly which is not unlawful at its inception, does not become unlawful merely because it continues without dispersing in defiance of the lawful order to disperse. There is no clause under s 141 to say that an assembly refusing to disperse in obedience to a lawful command becomes an unlawful assembly.[87] It is a question of fact to be dealt with and decided by the court whether the assembly of which the accused persons were members, had an unlawful common object.[88]

People in a procession held by the Congress party were ordered to take a different route, but they refused to do so, and sat on the ground. On being asked to disperse they refused to do that also. It was held that the conduct of the accused, coupled with1011 the fact that the procession was animated by hostility to the established government, showed that they were determined to disregard and disobey any lawful order, and that the conviction under s 145, IPC, was proper.[89]

Where the common object of an assembly was to commit an offence under the latter part of s 188, it was held that the assembly became unlawful, and remaining in it when it was ordered to disperse, constituted an offence under s 145 .[90]

4. 'Knowing that Assembly has been Commanded to Disperse'

If there was no order to disperse or the accused had no knowledge of it, they cannot be convicted under this section.[91]

5. 'Commanded in the Manner Prescribed by Law'

Section 151 uses the word 'lawfully' instead of 'in the manner prescribed by law', but that makes no difference.

Section 129 of the CrPC prescribes the procedure and authorises an executive magistrate or officer-in-charge, of a police station or, in the absence of such officer-in-charge, any police officer, not below the rank of a sub-inspector, to command an unlawful assembly to disperse. The executive magistrate or the police officer exercising powers under the said section must have jurisdiction in that area. Under the old CrPC of 1898, a police officer, who was not in charge of a police station, did not possess such powers.[92] Under the present Code, a sub-inspector of police can command an unlawful assembly to disperse in the absence of the office-in-charge of a police station. Police officers superior in rank to an officer-in-charge of a police station can also command an unlawful assembly to disperse throughout their local area.[93]

6. Procedure

Same as in the case of an offence under s 144, ante.

7. Form of Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....(day of.....at....., joined or continued in) an unlawful assembly, the common object of which was, to wit.....knowing that such assembly had been commanded in the manner prescribed by law to disperse, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 145 of the Indian Penal Code, within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried, by this Court on the said charge.1012

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 146.

Rioting.--

Whenever force or violence is used by an unlawful assembly, or by any member thereof, in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, every member of such assembly is guilty of the offence of rioting.

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines rioting and makes it an offence and the next section prescribes the punishment for simple rioting. The remaining sections of this chapter deal with the aggravated forms of rioting and offences relating to rioting.

To constitute a riot, the members of an unlawful assembly must have a common unlawful object, which means that such persons must have previously intended and arranged a certain procedure stated in one or the other of the five clauses of the s 141, IPC . If a number of persons assembled for any lawful purpose, suddenly quarrel with an intruder without any previous intention or design, they do not commit 'riot' in the legal sense of the word.[94] It is the use of force or violence that distinguishes a riot from an unlawful assembly.[95] Offence of rioting is not made out if evidence of victim is that some other persons came there and attacked and said persons have not been arrayed as accused.[96]

2. Rioting

The offence of rioting consists in the use of force or violence by an unlawful assembly or by any member thereof in prosecution of the common object of such assembly. A mere assembly or gathering of persons is not unlawful, though some of its members may employ force to commit an offence, as it may well be that the presence of some at the time was accidental or may be due to curiosity as mere spectators. Some may have been there as passersby or passive bystanders. Section 141 , IPC requires that there should be a common object which can be brought within the purview of one or the other heads mentioned therein and s 142, IPC expressly states that a person to be a member of an unlawful assembly should be aware of facts which rendered the assembly unlawful and that he should intentionally join the assembly or continue in it. From the mere fact that all or some of the accused being found at the scene of the occurrence at the time when a person was injured it cannot be inferred that they were all members of an unlawful assembly.[97]

1013 If no particular act of violence is established, merely coming to the spot even with a lathi or other weapon in response to a cry by a person, that he was being killed, will not make those, who came, guilty of rioting.[1]

Ingredients

To sustain a charge of rioting, the prosecution has to establish: (a) that there was an unlawful assembly as defined in s 141 ; (b) that the accused was member of that assembly as defined in s 142, (c) that force or violence was used by the unlawful assembly or by a member thereof, and (d) that the force or violence was used in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly.[2]

3. Injury or Damage not Necessary

Although the use of force or violence is an essential ingredient of the offence of rioting, the offence has no reference to the injury or damage caused by the same. The offence of rioting is an offence against public tranquillity; it is not an offence affecting the human body or an offence against property.

The section makes every member of the unlawful assembly guilty of rioting, even if the force or violence is used only by one member of the assembly; because it is used in prosecution of the common object of the whole assembly. This liability should not be confused with the constructive liability under s 149 or s 34 .

The requirements of the law under ss 141, 146 and 147 or 148, IPC, must be strictly proved before an accused may be convicted for rioting or any other offence covered by these sections.[3]

4. English Law as to Rioting

Hawkins has defined a riot as 'a tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three persons or more who assembled together of their own authority, with an intent mutually to assist one another against any who shall oppose them in the execution of some enterprise of a private nature, and afterwards actually execute the enterprise, in a violent and turbulent manner to the terror of the people, whether the act intended was, in itself, lawful or unlawful'.[4]

According to the judicial definition in Field v Receiver of Metropolitan Police :[5]

> There are five necessary elements of a riot: (1) a number of persons,[6] three at least (2) common purpose; (3) execution or inception of the common purpose; (4) an intent to help one another by force if necessary against any person who may oppose them in the execution of the common purposes; (5) 'force or violence' used in the execution of the1014 common purpose 'not merely used in demolishing, but displayed in such a manner as to alarm at least one person of reasonable firmness and courage.

This definition was applied in Ford v Receiver for the Metropolitan Police District ,[7] and again in Munday v Metropolitan Police District Receivers .[8] It has, however, been stated in a later case,[9] that a riot may involve no noise or disturbance of the neighbours, though there must be some force or violence, and that the fifth element of riot as laid down in Field's case 'may require reconsideration at some future time' since it would be enough that a witness could say that persons appeared to be alarmed, and not necessary to produce a witness who could say 'I was terrified'.[10]

Where 12 or more persons who are present together, use or threaten unlawful violence for a common purpose and the conduct of them, taken together, is such as would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to fear for his personal safety, each of the persons using unlawful violence for the common purpose is guilty of riot. A person is, however, guilty of riot only if he intends to use violence or is aware that his conduct may be violent. Riot may be committed in private as well as in public places.

Overt possession of weapons can amount to a threat of violence, even though they are not waved or brandished. It is immaterial whether or not the 12 or more persons use or threaten unlawful violence simultaneously.[11]

5. Duty of Court/Magistrate

When the offence has been alleged in the complaint in respect of unlawful assembly, the Court is bound to make scrutiny for the purpose of ascertaining whether allegations are making out a case of unlawful assembly. The magistrate has to consider whether the allegations made in the complaint indicate that the unlawful assembly was formed immediately before commission of the alleged offence. The magistrate has to further see whether the members of unlawful assembly were present in the said unlawful assembly with intention of committing the offence or for the purpose of executing object of unlawful assembly or knew that some acts would be committed in prosecution of that object for which the said unlawful assembly was formed and very importantly, whether the said assembly was formed for the purpose of committing the offence of rioting as indicated by the provisions of s 146, of IPC .[12]

6. 'Unlawful Assembly'

Unless there is an unlawful assembly (s 141, ante) in the first instance there can be no riot, though there may be an affray (s 159, post).[13] Where the common intention of an assembly of more than five persons was to resist by force an unlawful1015 trespass on land, the individuals of the assembly cannot be convicted of rioting in so doing.[14]

Where one party attempts to turn another party away from the land of which it is actually in possession and both parties are accused of rioting, the latter party is not an unlawful assembly (as its object is to maintain undisturbed the actual enjoyment of a right) and hence cannot be convicted of rioting.[15]

Where a trespasser actually in possession of land is attacked by a number of persons who make a forcible entry on the land, a plea of their right to possession is no answer to a charge of rioting.[16]

Commentary under s 97 may be referred to.

7. 'Use of Force or Violence'

To constitute rioting there should be use of either 'force' or 'violence'. Where 'force' or 'violence' has been used, conviction under this section cannot be recorded.[17] As use of force or violence is essential to rioting, an unlawful assembly, which runs away on approach of other people, does not constitute a riot.[18] So also where the use of force is prevented from being carried out because, before the assailants assemble, the persons who were to be attacked, run away, no offence of rioting is established.[19]

Definition of 'Force' in Section 349 not Applicable

Force, which is defined in s 349, IPC, must necessarily be used against a human being and not against an inanimate object.[20] If any motion, change of motion, or cessation of motion is caused to any property without affecting a human being, there is no 'force' within the meaning of the term as used in s 349 . It has been observed by the Kerala High Court that s 349 of the IPC does not purport to be a statutory dictionary for the meaning of 'force' wherever it occurs in the IPC . 'Force' in s 349 applies only when there is 'force to another'. Force as an ingredient of the offence of criminal force or assault required a statutory explanation and coverage and that is provided in s 349 . Section 349 and the group of sections following it are included in ch 16 relating to offences affecting the human body and under the sub-heading 'Criminal Force and Assault'. Force against an inanimate object is thus outside s 349 and force as an ingredient of the offence of rioting cannot naturally have any restricted relevance or logic or application. Force, as understood in common parlance, as defined in the Oxford Dictionary, reads: 'Strength exerted on an object,1016 power, impetus'. The word 'force' in s 146 of the IPC, has to be understood in this sense.[21]

Pulling down a man's house,[22] a toddy shop,[23] or a chappar,[24] without causing any injury to a human being, amounts to the use of violence within the meaning of this section.

It is not necessary, for the purpose of this section, that force or violence be directed against any particular person or object. Brandishing of bamboos and cutting down the branches of a pipal tree were held to amount to the use of force or violence by the members of an unlawful assembly.[25] It is not necessary for an offence under s 147, IPC that force or violence be used to an extent that death or grievous injury or even simple hurt,[26] might be caused. Force or violence, to whatever extent used, would be sufficient if it is used by all or some of the members of an unlawful assembly.[27]

Where, in breaking into a temple and removing the idols for celebrating a festival, the common object of the accused was to enforce a right, and violence was used in prosecution of the common object, it was held that they were guilty of rioting under s 147, IPC .[28]

Violence

The word 'violence' is not necessarily confined to violence used against a human being. The term 'violence' has not been defined in the IPC and must, therefore, be given its ordinary dictionary meaning. If damage is caused by an unlawful assembly to any property without any harm being caused to any person, violence will have been used. 'Violence' is a word of wider import than 'force' and includes force used against inanimate objects also.[29]

8. 'By an Unlawful Assembly, or any Member Thereof'

For the offence of rioting, it is not necessary that force or violence should be used by all the members of the unlawful assembly. It is enough if force or violence is used 'by any member thereof' in prosecution of the common object of such assembly. Actual participation in violence is not necessary to convict a person of rioting. Those who encourage, by signs, symbols or shouts, the unlawful object of the assembly, are also rioters.[30]

Where the common object of an unlawful assembly was simply to march in a procession from a certain place to another, breaking the condition of a proclamation issued by the district magistrate, and the accused instigated the members of the1017 unlawful assembly to use force or violence for overcoming any resistance offered by the army or the police. The force was in fact used by the unlawful assembly, but there was no evidence to show that the actual acts of violence committed by the assembly were instigated by him, it was, therefore, held that the accused was guilty of abetment of rioting only and was not liable for the acts of violence committed by the assembly.[31] The question whether the accused was a member of the unlawful assembly and liable under this section or s 149 was not considered in the case. The reason appears to be that this case was tried under the Travancore Penal Code and not under this Code.

9. 'In Prosecution of the Common object of such Assembly'

One of the essential ingredients of the offence of rioting consists in the members of the assembly having a common object to do or to commit one of the acts mentioned in s 141 .[32] The common object of the unlawful assembly must be definitely found and not left for conjecture or inference from other facts found.[33] The five or more persons must share in a common object as specified. If, for e.g., two persons out of five have no common object with the others, none of them can be held guilty of rioting.[34] As to the meaning of 'common object', refer to comments under s 141 .

Send from Here

The common object of a riotous mob may be presumed to be that which is indicated by their conduct throughout their proceedings, in the absence of evidence or reasons to the contrary.[35]

This section requires that force or violence should be used 'in prosecution of the common object' of the unlawful assembly, i.e., in the execution of the common object of the unlawful assembly.[36] Use of criminal force is a necessary ingredient in the offence, but any particular kind of voluntary use of such criminal force should be separately stated in the charge.[37] The expression 'in prosecution of the common object' is not defined in the IPC . 'Prosecution', however, means following up or pursuit and, generally speaking, everything that is done for the purpose of achieving the desired object, can be taken to have been done in prosecution of it.[38] The plain literal meaning of the words 'in prosecution of' would seem to be 'in order to achieve or attain'. 'Prosecution' is derived from Latin, and the root meaning of the word is 'to follow'. The words 'in prosecution of the common object' must be strictly construed as equivalent to 'in order to attain the common object'. When a person has already attained or caught up with his object and passed beyond it, it can no longer be said to be pursuing or prosecuting it.[39]1018

Illustrative Cases as to Prosecution of Common object of Assembly

The words 'in prosecution of the common object' do not mean during the prosecution of the common object of the assembly'. It means that the offence committed was immediately connected with the common object of the assembly or the act is one which upon the evidence appears to have been done with a view to accomplish the common object attributed to the members of the assembly.[40] The words 'in prosecution of the common object' have to be strictly construed as equivalent to 'in order to attain the common object'.[41] The common object may exist up to a particular stage and not thereafter.[42] Force or violence used after the common object ceases to exist cannot be said to be 'in prosecution of the common object'.

Where the common object of the unlawful assembly was to cause hurt to A, hurt caused to B cannot be said to be in prosecution of the common object,[43] but where the common object of the assembly was to take away a buffalo from the house of a third person, and while the buffalo was being taken away, that person came to rescue the animal and was attacked and beaten by some members of the assembly, it was held that force or violence was used 'in prosecution of the common object of the assembly.[44]

A number of ryots gathered together in order to prevent a revenue officer from distraint. This formed an unlawful assembly within the meaning of s 141, cl 5. It was held that if one of them beat the officer or rescued the goods seized, they are guilty of rioting.[45]

After the assembly in the above illustration had dispersed, two of the ryots commence to fight. The others are not guilty of rioting.[46]

A, B and Co (Hindus) forcibly removed an ox and two cows from the possession of X (a Mahommadan) for the purpose of preventing the slaughter of the animals. They were guilty of rioting.[47]

Where altercation took place between two parties and one person was murdered, four of the eight accused persons were women and the only act attributed to them was of throwing chili powder, it could be said that they were falsely implicated and charge of unlawful assembly and rioting against them would fail in the absence of proof of their participation.[48]

On A, B and C being appointed special constables, the police proceeded to their village informing them of the appointment, and directed them to proceed to the police station. On their refusing to do so, the police attempted to arrest A, but he and1019 the others resisted, and compelled the police to withdraw from the village. A, B and C were guilty of rioting, their common object being to assault the police.[49]

In execution of a decree, property (cattle) not belonging to the judgement-debtor was illegally attached and kept in the custody of a sapurdar. The owner and his men numbering more than four went out with the common object of taking away the property by use of force and they did use force in prosecution of the common object. Although the attachment was illegal, that illegality did not entitle the owner and his men to take away cattle from the custody of the sapurdar and since they used force in prosecution of the common object, they were guilty of rioting.[50]

10. 'Every Member of such Assembly is Guilty of the Offence of Rioting'

Under this section every member of the unlawful assembly is guilty of rioting even if force or violence is used by only one member of the assembly.

The liability of the members who have not used force or violence is not a constructive liability for the use of force or violence, but a direct liability for being a member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of which, force or violence has been used by one or more of its members. There is no such thing as 'constructive liability' for the offence of being a member of an unlawful assembly, or liability for conviction under s 147, IPC by being merely proved to have been found with known or proved rioters.[51]

11. Overt Act not Necessary for Conviction

Before the appellants could be convicted of sharing the common object of the assembly or of being members of the same, it had to be proved by the prosecution that the appellants were members of the unlawful assembly at the time when the assembly became unlawful. The fact that an accused is a member of an unlawful assembly must be shown either from his active participation or otherwise that he shared the common object of the unlawful assembly. It is not necessary that the accused should be guilty of any overt act. It is sufficient if it is shown that as a participant of the unlawful assembly he was sharing the common object of the same.[52]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 147.

Punishment for rioting.--

Whoever is guilty of rioting, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.1020

Comments

1. Scope

This section prescribes the punishment for the offence of rioting defined in the previous section.[53] The two sections must, therefore, be read together. Where the averment of what happened in a case was that there was a fight in the course of which injury was inflicted, and it is not really a riot in any but the most technical sense, a commonsense view should be taken and the accused should really be punished for fighting with their neighbours and inflicting simple hurt. The section is not to be used for the purpose of enabling a sentence to be given, which is greater than the one prescribed for the offence, of which the accused has really been guilty.[54]

2. Acquittal of Substantial Offence Rules out Rioting

The presence of the accused at the place of the incident does not mean that he formed an unlawful assembly.[55] If force or violence was applied, then only s 147 would come into play. On the acquittal of the accused persons under s 323, IPC, the accused persons cannot be convicted under s 147 in the case because they did not apply force or violence.[56]

A person would be guilty of rioting only when he is a member of an unlawful assembly, the common object of which is to commit some offence. In the given case, the applicants were said to be members of an unlawful assembly the common object1021 of which was to beat the complainant and to frustrate his attempt in taking their cattle from his field to the cattle pound. The trial court acquitted the applicants of the aforesaid two offences, i.e., of beating the complainant and of their having rescued their cattle from being impounded by the complainant. After the applicants had been acquitted of the substantive offences there was no question of their having formed an unlawful assembly for committing an offence. Their conviction under s 147, IPC, was therefore, wholly misconceived.[57]

3. Lawful object of Assembly--Consequences of Unlawful Acts-- Section 147 has no Application to such Cases

The cases are not uncommon where a number of persons (exceeding four) initially assemble to do some lawful act and in order to achieve their lawful object some or one of them may commit an unlawful act. It is also seen that an assembly, which was not unlawful when it assembled, subsequently becomes an unlawful assembly. Sometimes, the right of private defence is exceeded by a member or two of an assembly while exercising the right of private defence of person or property. The question to be seen is whether s 147, IPC applies to such cases. Such a question arose for determination before the Supreme Court in Maiku v State of Uttar Pradesh :[58]

> The object was either to recover the dead body of S or to recover the stolen property of P. This object apparently could not be said to be an unlawful object and therefore these appellants could not be convicted under section 147 . The High Court appears to have ignored this aspect of the matter. It is also clear that if these appellants could not be convicted for an offence under section 147, they also could not be convicted under any section of the Penal Code with the aid of section 149 . The conviction of these appellants under section 147 and with the aid of section 149 could not therefore, be sustained.

Where the main object of the appellants was to demolish the obstruction caused by the complainant on the pathway leading to the well, they could not be said to be inspired by any unlawful object. If, however, in achieving this object some of the accused assaulted the members of the prosecution party, they would be guilty of the individual overt acts committed by them.[59]

Where the accused were ploughing land on adhir terms and had taken some labourers with them to plough, there was no unlawful assembly of accused persons as it cannot be said that they had assembled for illegal purposes.[60]

Where at the inception the assembly of the petitioners along with others at the place of occurrence was not an unlawful one as they were there in the exercise of their right of private defence of property and in exercising their said lawful right some of them exceeded the lawful use of that right, and for that the assembly of these persons did not become an unlawful assembly as merely on such facts, it cannot be said that those persons had the common object of acting in excess of their lawful right which is an important requisite for an unlawful assembly. So each one of those1022 persons, who acted in excess of their right, can be held separately liable only for his own individual acts done in excess of such right.[61]

4. Principle of Vicarious Criminal Liability

Section 149, IPC, lays down the principle of constructive or joint criminal responsibility making every member of the unlawful assembly responsible for the act of the other if the act is achieved in the prosecution of the common object of that assembly or as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed. In other words, it will depend upon the circumstances of each case to make one criminally responsible for the act of the other and it would not matter whether the offence is committed by any one of them, or some of them, or all of them, it is very rare, though by no means impossible, to prove by direct evidence, the prior agreement by an assembly or persons more than five in number regarding their achieving one of the unlawful objects specified under s 141, IPC and setting out to achieve it. In most cases, there is no such evidence and hence, the formation of the unlawful assembly with the common unlawful object and the setting out of the members of that assembly to achieve that object (or objects) has to be inferred from the other evidence adduced. A person is not guilty merely because he is present at the scene of crime and does nothing to prevent it. Complicity in a crime may be inferred by exhortation from another to commit a particular crime or his helping him or encouraging him. The concept of help includes co-operation and help may be given even if the member, to whom the help is being given be unaware of it, provided his conduct is such which leads that member to believe, when committing the offence, which he is being helped or will be helped, if necessary, by him. Mere presence may, in certain circumstances, constitute encouragement thereby emboldening the main perpetrator to commit the crime. But there must be a purpose to encourage; accidental presence will not do. Even purposeful presence is not conclusive of co-participation where it does not indicate encouragement to the actual perpetrator. Then the principle of constructive (fictitious or non-actual) or joint responsibility has not to be unduly extended. It has to be strictly construed. A charge for the commissioning of an offence with the help of s 149, IPC (among other sections like ss 34, 109 and 120B), can be embarrassing to the accused because of its vagueness and hence, there is necessity of the proof of overt acts on the part of the constituent member of the unlawful assembly having a common object.[62]

Injured witness had deposed that four accused persons assaulted him and three persons were standing outside the house while the assault was made. There was no allegation or evidence that the three persons standing outside instigated or abetted the assault committed by the four persons. Held, the three persons standing outside did not form unlawful assembly within the meaning of s 147, IPC .[63]

Mere presence would not make a person the member of an unlawful assembly. An act or omission would make a person a member of an unlawful assembly. Existence of common object is the basic thread and such type of evidence is required to be led1023 by the prosecution to link the appellants with the charge of offences punishable under ss 147, 148 or 149 of the IPC .[64]

5. Sections 147 and 149 --Considered Together

The offences of rioting made punishable under ss 147 and 149, IPC laying down the principle of constructive or joint responsibility have four elements in common. Both of them require:

(i) an assembly of five or more persons;
(ii) all of them having a common object;
(iii) their object being one of those laid down in s 141, IPC, or generally speaking to commit any offence; and
(iv) the assembly using force or violence in the prosecution of the common object of the assembly.

When the trial court found the accused persons guilty under s 304 pt II read with s 149 of the IPC the elements of s 147 of the IPC merged with the elements of s 149 of the IPC . When the main charge was under s 304 read with s 149 of the Indian Penal Code 1860 then the said charge automatically covers elements of s 147 of the Indian Penal Code 1860.[65]

6. Sections 147 and 148 --Considered Together

It is pertinent to note that the offence punishable under s 148, IPC, is a graver offence than the offence punishable under s 147, IPC . When it is fully proven on record that all the accused were armed with deadly weapons, and when the court convicted and sentenced them under s 148, IPC, the conviction and sentence of the accused under s 147, IPC was redundant and was uncalled for.[66]

Where the accused persons having lathis in their hands inflicted blows on the deceased, lathis are not deadly weapons so accused persons cannot be convicted under s 148, IPC, and their conviction was altered from s 148 to s 147, IPC .[67]

Where all the accused members of an unlawful assembly were having weapons which could be used from the iron blade side for causing fatal injuries but the accused persons preferred not to use the same from that side, instead they assaulted the deceased and his mother only from the blunt side, their conviction under s 148, IPC, cannot be sustained but that under s 147, IPC, was however, maintained.[68]

7. Procedure

It is the same as in the case of an offence under s 144 .

The offence of rioting under this section being an offence against public tranquillity, primarily concerns the state more than an individual, and that is probably one reason why it is not included in the category of the offences which can be1024 compounded by the person immediately affected even with the permission of the court by which the trial is held.[69]

8. Effect of Compromise in Respect of Compoundable Offences Charged with this Section

Where an accused is charged for an offence, which is compoundable along with an offence under ss 143, 147 or 148, IPC, and the charge under the former offence is compounded or allowed to be compounded, it will not result in acquittal for the offence punishable under ss 143, 147 or 148, IPC . Offences under ss 143, 147 or 148, IPC being offences against public tranquillity, have to be tried in spite of the compromise in respect of the former offence.[70] The Bombay High Court in State v Berulal

,[71] has expressed the view that where other offences have been compounded, the court must discharge the accused for offences under ss 147, 148 or 149, IPC, also. But the Supreme Court in Ram Pujan v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[72] has held that the court should take into account the fact of compromise in determining the sentence even if the offence is non-compoundable. In Tetan Mandal v State of Bihar ,[73] the petitioners were convicted under ss 452 and 147, IPC and each of them was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months under each section in respect of which imprisonment was ordered to run concurrently. They were also sentenced to pay a fine of Rs 250 each under s 452, IPC, and in default, to undergo a further rigorous imprisonment for one month each. The High Court, in view of the compromise petition, filed before it by the parties, and the nature of the occurrence, reduced the sentence to the period already undergone which was about seven days in each case. The sentence of fine was also reduced to Rs 20 each, and, in default, to suffer one week's rigorous imprisonment each.[74]

9. Necessity and Particulars of Charge

An accused is entitled to know, with certainty and accuracy, the exact value of the charge brought against him, and unless he has this knowledge he is likely to be seriously prejudiced in his defence, specially when it is sought to implicate him for acts not committed by him but by others with whom he was in company.[75] Where the charge fulfills the requirements of this section, any error or omission in it will not be1025 regarded as material unless in terms of s 215 of the CrPC, 1973 the accused has in fact been misled by such omission or there has been a failure of justice as a result of such error or omission.[76] Where the accused did not complain, in the lower courts, of the defect in the charge, it was held that the omission to mention the object in the charge caused no prejudice to the accused so as to vitiate the trial.[77]

10. Charge under Section 149 Includes Charge under Section 147

When there is charge of s 149, IPC there is no need of framing separate charge under s 147 of the IPC as elements of s 149 of the IPC covers the elements of s 147 .[78]

11. Common object to be set out in Charge

As rioting is an offence with a specific name, it is sufficient to describe the offence by that name and that name only. Section 211(2) , CrPC clearly contemplates a case of this description and was enacted to meet a case of this kind. Where a person is charged with rioting, it means that the prosecution alleges that all the necessary ingredients constituting the offence of rioting are present. It is not necessary to set out what these ingredients are.[79] But, in every charge of rioting and unlawful assembly, the common object must be set out in the charge,[80] though its omission will not necessarily make the conviction bad, except when the accused has been misled thereby and prejudiced in his defence.[81] In some cases, it is said that when there is a dispute and uncertainty as to possession of the parties, it is better to frame a charge of rioting with the common object of assault, but in all cases the principal and the prominent common object should form the subject of the charge and not the incidental happenings.[82] If no charge was framed under this section defining the common object of the assembly, nor was any charge framed under s 149 as to what part of that section applied, it cannot be said that they were not prejudiced at all.[83]

Consequences of Omission to Mention Common Object in Charge

It is incumbent upon the trial court to specify the common object of the unlawful assembly in the charge itself under s 147, IPC . Mere statement of the common object to commit rioting would not be sufficient in law to indicate as to what really their common object was. The court should mention one of the objects enumerated in s 141 as the common object.[84] A conviction of rioting on a charge which does not1026 state the common object is liable to be set aside,[85] but as the offence of rioting can be legally described by its specific name,[86] the question whether any further particulars are necessary under s 213, CrPC must be a question of direction in each case.[87] But where there is evidence on the record to show what the common object was and the accused have not been prejudiced, the conviction will not be bad.[88] If the variance between the common object charged and the common object found is material, the conviction will be set aside,[89] but if not material, the conviction will not be set aside.[90]

Where the only common object alleged in the charge under s 147, IPC, was to assault the members of the opposite party and to enforce the supposed right and claim over the produce of the disputed fields, whereas in the judgment of the Additional Sessions Judge, it was found that the common object of the assembly was to commit the offence of criminal trespass and theft of the paddy of the opposite party and also for assaulting them if they offered resistance, it was held that the finding was not vitiated on the ground that in the charge, the common object was not stated to be to commit theft and criminal trespass.[91]

Sessions Trial need not be Cumbered with a Medley of Minor Charges

There is no necessity for a sessions trial to be cumbered by a medley of minor charges, particularly in a rioting case in which the overt acts constitute evidence of participation in the riot. This section is quite sufficient in its punitive scope to adequately punish these minor overt acts committed.[92]Section 402, IPC (assembling for the purpose of committing dacoity) fully covers the ingredients of ss 147 and 148 and the accused cannot be said to be prejudiced if the charge mentioned only s 402 and not ss 147 and 148 .[93]

Property when to be Specified

Where the common object is alleged to be to take possession of property, the property must be specified.[94]

Alteration or Variation in the Common Object Alleged and Proved

If a rioter is armed with a deadly weapon he is punishable under s 148, IPC . It is not possible to find him guilty both under s 147 and 148, because, however many weapons he may be armed with, he commits only one offence of rioting in the course of the same riot.[95] A conviction or acquittal on a charge under s 148 cannot on appeal1027 be altered to one under s 147 .[1] Where at the trial the common object charged has been clearly found, and the accused convicted, on appeal the court cannot reject that finding, and on the evidence find another common object, sustaining the conviction thereon. To do so is to convict the accused for an offence for which they have never been tried.[2] It is, however, not a general proposition of law that a conviction under s 147, IPC, cannot be supported, when the common object as stated in the charge is not precisely made out. Where the question in a case was whether the common object as established agrees in essential part with that laid in the charge, the variance between the common object alleged and that found in the case was not such as to invalidate the conviction. Accused persons did not appear to have been prejudiced by such variance between the common object as laid in the charge and that found. Their conviction under s 147, IPC, was, therefore, upheld.[3] Where a charge drawn up by a magistrate alleges several alternate common objects, it is incumbent, on the appellate court to determine whether it is sustainable, and if so, which of the common objects stated has been made out.[4] Notes under s 143, ante may be referred to.

12. Form of Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:

That you along with (name the other persons of the assembly or mention their number with a few names if known) on or about the .....day of at.....were members of an unlawful assembly, and in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, namely.....(specify the object) committed the offence of rioting, punishable under s 147 of the IPC, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

13. Proof

To sustain a charge of rioting the prosecution has to establish that there was an unlawful assembly as defined in s 141, IPC, that the accused was a member of that assembly as defined in s 142, IPC, that force or violence was used by such assembly or by any member thereof, and that it was used in prosecution of the common object of the assembly.[5] Where five accused went to the field of the deceased and assaulted him, they could be said to be members of an unlawful assembly so their conviction under s 147, IPC was held proper.[6]

Seven accused persons were alleged to have committed the murder of one KR. The appellants (Accused nos. 6 and 7) were not named in FIR. The eye-witnesses also did not mention the names of the two appellants present on the spot at the time of the occurrence and did not attribute any role to them in the occurrence. It is a settled law that mere presence or association with other members is not per se sufficient to hold every one of them criminally liable for the offences committed by the others unless there is sufficient evidence on record to show that one also intended to or knew the1028 likelihood of commission of such an offending act. In this case, there was no legally acceptable material to prove that the appellants acted as members of unlawful assembly to connect them with the murder of the deceased KR. In the absence of reliable evidence to prove that the appellants were either present on the spot or that they had committed any overt act that could show that they shared the common object of the unlawful assembly, the benefit of doubt has to be given to them. The conviction of the two accused appellants under ss 304, Pt II, and ss 147 and 148, IPC as recorded by the High Court was set aside.[7]

Difficulty of the Prosecution Due to the Large Number of Rioters does not Change the Burden of Proof

As in all criminal cases, the burden of proving the charge, substantially as drawn, lies on the prosecution.[8] Notwithstanding the large number of the rioters or of the persons put up in court for rioting, and the consequent difficulty for the prosecution to name the specific acts attributed to a particular accused, the court must see to it that all the ingredients required for unlawful assembly and rioting are strictly proved by the prosecution before convicting that particular accused.

But if some of the accused are proved to have marched with the rioters for a long distance, when the rioters were shouting tell-tale slogans and pelting stones, it will be for them to prove their innocence under s 106 of the Indian Evidence Act .[9]

There must be Nexus between the Common Object and Offence Committed

One of the essential ingredients of the offence of rioting consists in the members of the assembly having a common object to do or commit one of the acts mentioned in s 141 .[10] There must be a nexus between the common object and offence committed.[11] Where the common object of all the accused persons appears to be to assault the deceased and not to cause his death, but they were members of an unlawful assembly which had a common object and force or violence was used in pursuance of such common object, all the accused persons are guilty of offence of rioting under s 147, IPC .[12]

If more than five people come with lathis in a body and some of them beat a person and the others stand-by there is undoubtedly a common object. When lathis are carried one can be certain that the common object is at least to cause hurt. It was in evidence that the said petitioners caused hurt to the women who came to the rescue of their husbands. There is, therefore, no escape from the conclusion that these petitioners participated in the common object of the unlawful assembly.[13]

Where there was a clear evidence on record to the effect that a group of nine persons, having enmity with the deceased, and armed with lathis, attacked and caused fatal injuries to the deceased and simple injuries to his two rescuers. Such an1029 incident cannot be said to be a free-fight so as to hold individual persons liable for their individual acts only. The accused can validly be convicted under s 147, IPC .[14]

Assailants to be Liable for Individual Acts in the Absence of Common Object

Where the appellants were not present in a group at the scene of occurrence at the initial stage but came one by one to the scene of occurrence on noticing the incident, the appellants could not, be said to be members of an unlawful assembly with the common object of attacking either the deceased or prosecution witnesses nor was there any evidence to infer forming of a common object on the spot. The appellants were therefore, not held liable for offence under ss 147 and 148, IPC . Each of the appellants would be liable only for his individual overt act.[15]

Where accused persons were alleged to have committed murder by forming unlawful assembly, prosecution failed to establish charges against them beyond reasonable doubt, injury caused by one of accused persons was his individual act, possibility of over implication of accused persons could not be ruled out since prosecution witnesses deposing against accused persons were thickly related to deceased, conviction of accused persons was set aside, except one accused who gave a single blow injury and was convicted under s 304 Pt II of the Indian Penal Code 1860.[16]

Where the common object of an assembly, consisting of five or more persons, is to beat the police officers, who are discharging their duties, and some of them are hurt, the assembly is clearly an unlawful assembly, committing rioting, and each of them can be held liable under s 147, IPC .[17] There can be no conviction under this section unless there is a finding that there was an unlawful assembly of five or more persons having a common object as defined in s 141 .[18]

14. Section not Applicable to a case of Sudden Fight

Where there is no satisfactory evidence to prove the formation of any unlawful assembly with the common object of committing a crime and the whole fight starts suddenly on the spur of the moment and in the heat of passion, the accused, though more than five in number can only be liable for the individual acts, committed by them, and they cannot be convicted under ss 147, 148 or 149, IPC .[19]

Where neither party, was the aggressor and after altercation between them, taking place with regard to irrigating the fields, injuries were caused on both sides. There was no common intention or common object on either party to assault or injure the other group. In such a situation, the appellants cannot be held to be the members of an unlawful assembly nor a case of rioting is made out against them and all that can be said is that the occurrence took place suddenly at the spur of the moment, and1030 therefore, they cannot be convicted of offences under ss 323 and 324, read with s 149, IPC .[20]

15. When Lawful Assembly Suddenly Turns Unlawful

No doubt an assembly which was not unlawful when it assembled may subsequently become an unlawful assembly. It was only at the stage of remonstration that one of them started inflicting blows and others followed him. Firstly, as there was a sudden affair, none of the accused can be held guilty for offence punishable under s 147, IPC and secondly the aid of s 149, IPC, cannot be invoked to convict the accused-appellants. Each of the appellants shall be held liable for his individual act and not vicariously liable for the acts of others.[21]

Where no party attacked the members of the opposite party at the commencement of the occurrence and it was only at that stage of remonstration and counter-remonstration that someone started the fight and, according to the trial court, it could not definitely be determined as to which of the two parties struck the first blow. As there was no premeditation and the occurrence was a sudden affair, each of the appellants should be liable for his individual act and not vicariously liable for the acts of others.[22]

Where a sudden fight developed from an altercation at the spur of the moment and the FIR and evidence did not disclose the formation of an unlawful assembly with common object to assault and kill, the offence was held to be committed on individual liability and conviction under ss 147 - 149 was not sustainable.[23]

In the absence of a common object, any act, even if committed by one of the crowd would not make the others liable.[24]

Identity of Participants in a Case of Unlawful Assembly

There can be no conviction under s 147, IPC, unless the prosecution establishes, beyond reasonable doubt, the identity of persons, who were the members of the unlawful assembly, and the part attributed to any of the accused persons. The case of the prosecution must fail if it is difficult to understand as to who the members of the unlawful assembly were and who were the persons who assaulted or attempted to assault, the complainant, and who were mere spectators.[25]

Where out of the mob of 500-600 persons, 50-60 persons allegedly took active part in an assault on the police party and it is difficult to single out an accused who actually inflicted injuries, the appellants are entitled to be acquitted.[26]

Where a number of accused persons were involved in a case of murder and rioting and the evidence disclosed that a few of the accused were falsely implicated due to1031 enmity and it was not possible to single out the accused falsely implicated. It was held that all the accused are to be given the benefit of doubt.[27]

Evidence on record established beyond doubt: (a) that it was accused no 1 who was armed with a spear, and (b) that accused nos 1, 6, 7, 10, 13, 17 and 20 were the members of the unlawful assembly, some of whom were armed with weapons such as spears, sticks and stones. In the said circumstances, accused no 1 can be convicted under s 148, IPC, and the remaining accused persons can be convicted under s 147, IPC .[28] For a conviction under this section it must be remembered that mere presence of a person along with members of an unlawful assembly is not sufficient to support a finding that he had the common object of the unlawful assembly. There must be other evidence, direct or circumstantial; to justify a finding that he had the common object.[29] The finding as to the common object must be supported by evidence.[30]

Mere Presence at the Place of Occurrence not Sufficient to become Member of Unlawful Assembly

Mere presence at the time and place of occurrence without anything more is insufficient to hold them as members of unlawful assembly which was the foundation of their conviction.[31] Where a lady victim was kicked in the abdomen by accused lady resulting in an abortion, other accused though present did not participate in an assault or abuse, evidence of the victim was reliable and truthful, evidence of other witnesses was found relevant and corroborated with the evidence of victim, guilt of the lady accused was held established and her conviction under ss 313, 147, IPC was maintained but non-participating accused were given benefit of doubt and their conviction for the said offences was set aside.[32]Where there was a mob of about 100 persons, it will be unsafe to infer from the mere presence of these persons, in absence of any overt act on their part or any other evidence on record that they along with the appellant 'J' and others who might be present there, formed an unlawful assembly with the alleged common object. Hence, they are required to be acquitted.[33] It must be shown that the common object was shared by at least five persons including the accused.[34] Mere presence of the accused at the scene of occurrence is not enough; it must be shown that they shared the common object of the unlawful assembly. When people go to defend their rights that cannot be described as enforcing any right or supposed right.[35] If there are two explanations of the presence of a particular person on a particular occasion, one of which is lawful and the other of which is unlawful, the court cannot, as against an accused person, assume the unlawful intention.[36]1032

16. Certain Presumptions in a Case of Rioting

When it is found that the accused came to the place and some of them assaulted the complainant, the presumption is that the assault took place in prosecution of the common object of assaulting the complainant. Assuming that assault was not the original common object with which the accused came to the place, it must be presumed in the circumstances that it was formed at the time the assault took place. Prima facie, therefore, the accused formed an unlawful assembly.[37] When the common object of the accused as alleged by the prosecution, is found to be not proved, the charge of rioting under this section cannot be legally sustained.[38] If the common object assigned in the charge is not sustained, the appellate court cannot invent a common object to sustain the conviction under this section.[39] Evidence of injuries on the body of persons is a sure guide that they took part in the riot.[40]

Where the accused persons formed an unlawful assembly and armed with weapons alleged to have trespassed into the house of the victim and assaulted her family members, evidence of eyewitnesses as regards trespass and assault was proved beyond doubt, the conviction of accused persons under ss 147, 451, 323, IPC, was held proper.[41]

Where the trial court examined three injured witnesses but did not record reasons for discarding their testimony, acquittal of the accused under ss 323, 325, 147, IPC, by the trial court for want of availability of independent eyewitness was found not proper and order of acquittal of trial court was set aside.[42]

Where a number of people are jointly tried for an offence under this section along with an offence resulting from specific acts, the court should consider the evidence against each of the accused separately and give definite findings as regards the presence and part taken by each of the accused.[43]

Where the evidence is interested and a considerable amount of enmity exists between the factions who are concerned in the affair, it is necessary to scrutinise the evidence very carefully.[44] The adequacy of evidence to prove the case against any one has to be determined on the peculiar circumstances of the situation in which the crime was committed, and, in the absence of any rule requiring a particular number of witnesses to testify the acts imputed to the accused, the conviction cannot be assailed only because it is based on the evidence of a single witness. What is necessary in such a case is that the evidence should be subject to strict scrutiny.[45]

17. Testimony of Eyewitnesses not to be Rejected because of some Inconsequential Contradiction or Exaggeration

When people are killed during a riot, there may be a possibility of the incident being exaggerated or some innocent persons being named as being part of the assailant's1033 party. But just because there may be some inconsequential contradictions or exaggeration in the testimony of the eyewitnesses, that should not be a ground to reject their evidence in its entirety. In cases of rioting, where there are a large number of assailants and a number of witnesses, it is but natural that the testimony of the witnesses may not be identical. What has to be seen is whether the basic features of the occurrence have been similarly viewed and/or described by the witnesses in a manner which tallies with the outcome of the riot, viz the injuries sustained by the victims and the number of people who are attacked and killed.[46]

18. Certain Guidelines for cases of Mammoth Rioting

Sometimes there are cases of mammoth rioting in which a very large number of people are tried for rioting. Panchapakesa Ayyar J, of the Madras High Court has laid down the following five principles to be observed by the court in such cases:

> The first is that notwithstanding the large number of the rioters or of the persons put up in court for rioting, and the consequent difficulty for the prosecution to name the specific acts attributed to each of the accused, the court must see it that all the ingredients required for unlawful assembly and rioting are strictly proved.

> Secondly, spectators, wayfarers etc. are often attracted to the scene of the rioting by curiosity. They should not be, by reason of their mere presence at the scene of rioting and with the rioters, held to be members of the unlawful assembly or rioters. But if they are proved to have marched with the rioters for a long distance, when the rioters were shouting tell-tale slogans and pelting stones, it will be for them to prove their innocence under section 106 of the Indian Evidence Act .

> The third is that it will be very unsafe, in the case of such large mobs of rioters to rely on the evidence of 'a single witness' speaking to the presence of an accused in that mob for convicting him, especially, when no overt act of violence, or shouting of slogans, or organising the mob, or giving orders to it, or marching in procession with it, or other similar thing is proved against him.

> An ordinary rule of caution and prudence will require that an accused identified only by one witness, and not proved to have done any overt act, etc. should be given the benefit of doubt.

> The fourth principle to be observed in such cases is that where there are such acute factions, one based on agrarian dispute and troubles, another on political wrangling and rivalry, and a third on caste division, or the division of the haves and the have-nots, greatest care must be exercised before believing the evidence of a particular witness belonging to one of these factions against an accused of the opposite view. This principle assumes special importance when there are no overt acts, etc., proved and there are only one or two witnesses speaking to the presence of the accused among the rioters, and they belong to the class or factions opposed to the accused.

> The fifth principle to be observed is that mere 'followers' in rioting deserve a much more lenient sentence than leaders, who mislead them into such violent acts, by emotional appeals, slogans and crimes.[47]

19. Joinder of Charges--Trial of Cross-cases

Where two opposing factions commit a riot, each faction should be committed for trial and tried separately. They should not be treated as constituting one unlawful1034 assembly, not having one 'common object' under s 141, IPC .[48] The desirable procedure in such cases would be that both the cases be tried by the same judge. The first case should be tried to a conclusion. But the judge should postpone judgment in that case till he has heard the second case to a conclusion and he should then pronounce judgments separately in each case. He would of course be bound to confine his judgment in each case to the evidence led in that particular case and would not be at liberty to use the evidence in one case for the purpose of the judgment in the other case and to allow his findings in one case to be influenced in any manner to the prejudice of the accused by the views which he may have formed in the other case. It would be obviously necessary that he should try the two cases in quick succession one after the other. It may be that in some particular cases he might feel some difficulty about trying both cases and in such a case it would always be open to him to get the second case transferred.[49]

In a case of this kind it is rather difficult to keep the two cases wholly separate, but every effort has to be made to do so. In a case, two parties were charged for their attacks on each other in the same occurrence, and the charges were tried separately at two distinct trials. The evidence given for the prosecution was similar to a substantial extent in each case. Each party was a witness against the other, but there was also independent evidence. Although they were tried separately, the High Court gave one judgment, but treated the cases as two cases which had been separately tried. Before their Lordships of the Privy Council it was contended that they imported considerations from one case into the other. Their Lordships held:

> When one looks at it, to some extent that was inevitable, and to some extent it did so happen. There was, however, a body of separate evidence which was applicable to each case and that in itself was enough for the conviction, so that, although technically it might have been better to keep the evidence entirely distinct, and to have delivered two separate judgments, no injustice has followed from what was done.[50]

Evidence of one Cross-Case cannot be used in Another

In the Mithu Lal v State of Uttar Pradesh [51] the Allahabad High Court based its conclusions not only on the evidence, recorded in the case against the appellants but also took, into account, the evidence, recorded in the cross-case. In appeal, their Lordships of the Supreme Court strongly deprecated the procedure, adopted by the High Court, and observed:

> It is difficult to comprehend as to how the High Court could decide the appeal, before it, by taking, into account, evidence recorded in another case, even though it might be, what is loosely called, a cross-case. It is elementary that each case must be decided on the evidence, recorded in it, and evidence, recorded in another case, cannot be taken into account in arriving at the decision.1035

20. Effect of Acquittal of Some Members of the Unlawful Assembly--Some

Illustrative Cases

Commentary under s 141, ante may be referred to.

Where out of eight accused, three were acquitted by the trial court and the fourth one is being given benefit of doubt by the High Court, it reduces the number of assailants to be four out of whom three have already died, the result would be that remaining one accused cannot be convicted under s 147 of the Indian Penal Code 1860.[52]

There was a charge against six accused, including the two appellants, that they formed an unlawful assembly. Presence of four accused was not proved, and, therefore, the trial court acquitted them. No appeal was filed by the state against the acquittal of the four accused. There was no charge against the appellants that there were some unidentified persons along with them. In such a case, in the absence of any charge to this effect, even if the appellant court comes to the conclusion that there were 3 or 4 persons along with the two appellants, they cannot be convicted for offences under ss 147 and 148, IPC and, therefore, the order of conviction under ss 147 and 148, IPC, passed by the trial court against them, was set aside.[53]

Where there was a charge against six persons under s 302 read with ss 147 and 148, IPC, and four of them were acquitted. One was convicted under s 302 read with s 148 and another under s 147 alone. It was held that conviction of one under s 148 and of another under s 147 was illegal as acquittal of four meant no unlawful assembly. Conviction of one under s 302 alone was justified.[54]

Where there was no finding that after acquittal of five accused what remained was an unlawful assembly of five or more known or unknown persons, the charge under ss 147 and 149, IPC even against two remaining accused would not stand.[55]

The petitioner was convicted under s 147, IPC on account of plea of guilt by him but four other co-accused were let off as according to the trial court the presence of five or more persons was not proved. The court of revision held that in view of the finding of the trial court in regard to other accused, conviction under s 147, IPC could not be sustained.[56]

Complainant alleged that he had been in possession of the disputed land and that he had been living in a mud house made by him in the disputed land. The accused persons on the date of occurrence formed unlawful assembly, entered the disputed land, demolished the mud house and also removed the belongings of the complainant. A civil suit in respect of the disputed land between the parties was pending. The accused were given benefit of doubt and their conviction under s 147, IPC and s 3(x) of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act 1989, recorded by the Court below, was set aside.[57]1036

21. Sentence

Where the offence is more or less technical, harsh sentence is uncalled for.[58] Where the criminal proceedings had been pending for a period of more than seven years and the accused had been in jail for a considerable period, the High Court, in appeal, held that the sentence already undergone by the accused, would subserve the ends of justice.[59] Where litigation had been pending between the parties from before the day of occurrence, sentence of fine, instead of imprisonment, could serve the ends of justice.[60]Rioters, who carried no weapons and committed no overt act of violence, and only marched in procession with other rioters for some distance, deserve only a light sentence. Merely because some rioters have received gunshot wounds on police firing, they cannot be presumed to have been more aggressive than other rioters, and they cannot be treated more severely than others.[61] Accused appellants were convicted for offences under ss 147, 149, 323 and 325 of the IPC . Since the occurrence had taken place 25 years ago, and the appellants had remained in custody from 23 to 109 days during trial of the case, sentence imposed on them was reduced to the period already undergone.[62]

The incident was thirty years old and some of the accused appellants had become old. The accused were released on probation of one year.[63]

The occurrence had taken place three decades before. The Court did not think it proper to send the accused appellants to jail to serve the imprisonment awarded to them. The Court upheld the conviction but substituted the substantive imprisonment by a fine of Rs 300/- to be payable in cash by the accused appellants.[64]

Where a case presents a picture of extreme brutality and lawlessness the accused are not entitled to receive any mercy and are liable to maximum penalty.[65]

22. Whether an Offence under this Section Involves Moral Turpitude

The Calcutta High Court has held in a case of a police constable that an offence under ss 147 and 323 / 149, IPC committed by a constable involves moral turpitude and he cannot be allowed to act as a member of such disciplined force.[66]1037

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 148.

Rioting, armed with deadly weapon.--

Whoever is guilty of rioting, being armed with a deadly weapon or with anything which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The offence punishable under this section is only an aggravated form of the offence of rioting punishable under s 147, IPC . It is a distinct offence.[67]

A rioter armed with a deadly weapon, is punishable under s 148, IPC . So the accused who are armed with deadly weapons, are punishable under this section while those, who carry only lathis, are punishable under s 147 .[68] Conviction can be under either but cannot be under both, ss 147 and 148, because however many weapons he may be armed with, he commits only one offence of rioting in the course of the same riot.[69]

Where the accused, numbering more than five, had the common object of belabouring a person, used violence in prosecution of their common object, and they were all armed with deadly weapons, it was held that their offence fell under this section.[70]

2. Sections 147 and 148 --Distinguishing Features

This section appears to differ from s 147 precisely in the same way that s 144 differs from s 143, IPC . Under s 143 any member of an unlawful assembly is liable to punishment for upto six months. Under s 144, whoever being armed with a deadly weapon is a member of an unlawful assembly is liable to imprisonment for two years. In exactly the same way, under s 147, whoever is guilty of rioting is liable to imprisonment upto two years; and under s 148 whoever being armed with deadly weapon is guilty of rioting and is liable to imprisonment for three years.[71]1038

Sections 147 and 148 --Considered Together

Commentary under same heading in s 147, ante may be referred to.

3. Unlawful Assembly and Common Object--Some Illustrative Cases

In order to constitute an 'unlawful assembly', the assembly, composed of five or more persons, should not only have a 'common object' but the object must also be 'unlawful'.[72] This section will not apply if the number of members of the assembly is less than five or the common object is not unlawful or the offence committed was not in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly.

Where only two accused persons had participated in the occurrence, conviction for forming unlawful assembly under s 148, IPC was set aside.[73]

Where seven accused were tried together in the case but the case against three of the assailants was not found free from doubt, and they were acquitted thereby reducing the maximum number of the assailants, to only four, in such a case, the conviction of the appellants under s 148, IPC cannot be sustained.[74] Where out of total nine accused persons, six accused persons have already been acquitted in two appeals arising out of the same occurrence, no question of formation of unlawful assembly by remaining three accused persons would arise; the remaining three accused persons cannot be convicted for offences under ss 148 and 149, IPC .[75]

Where only the two appellants were present at the time of the incident and no other persons in their company have been proved to have been seen at the place of incident, the conviction under ss 324 and 325 with the aid of ss 148 and 149, IPC is not tenable.[76]

Where the challan was filed against five persons but four persons were acquitted by the trial court, it was held that a single person cannot form unlawful assembly. No case of unlawful assembly was made out and it was wrong to convict a single person for forming unlawful assembly with the aid of s 149 .[77]

Since the object of the appellants' assembly was to exercise the right to self-defence, it could not be held to be unlawful. Therefore, the appellants could not be held to be the members of an unlawful assembly and as such could not be convicted with the aid of s 149 of the IPC . They would individually be liable for their respective acts.[78]

Where an unlawful assembly was formed on the spot itself at the spur of the moment and no deadly weapon was used by any member of the unlawful assembly in the whole occurrence under consideration, in such a case, no conviction can be passed under s 148, IPC .[79]

1039Where the accused were present at the spot to defend their possession over the land but when the complainant party left the scene, some of the accused chased and assaulted them and in a melee, some of the accused and some of the prosecution party resorted to a free fight, in the course of which injuries were caused to some persons of either party. In such a case, charges under ss 148 and 302 read with s 149, IPC, and the charge in respect of offence of causing grievous or simple hurt by the application of s 149, IPC must fail.[80]

Where the common object of the unlawful assembly was not to kill the deceased or A and further that the common object was to teach A a lesson as PW 3 says and it was with that object in their mind that the appellants were rushing towards the place of occurrence when deceased N came in their way. Three of the appellants went to deal with him as he was a brother of A and pushed him to the ground as a result of which he was injured. The other four witnesses, all relations of A were also injured as they rushed to the aid of N. The fact that the appellants other than the three did not take any part in causing the death of deceased shows clearly that killing anybody was not part of that common object. In the circumstances, the charge under s 148, IPC alone may be said to have been fully established against all the appellants, their common object being to assault A and his relations with lathi, axes etc, an unlawful object altogether.[81]

Where the charge was under s 367 read with s 148 and the State Counsel conceded that charge under s 148, IPC related to murder of the deceased at a place other than the place of his abduction, and was not connected with the accusation of abduction. In such a case, the common object, as stated by the prosecution cannot be available for sustaining the conviction under s 148, IPC in the said background.[82]

Where the appellants formed an unlawful assembly with the object of abducting a woman, their intention being to have her murdered, and each one of the appellants was armed with fire guns and used the said fire guns while abducting the lady; conviction of the appellants under s 148, IPC was upheld.[83]

4. Large Scale Rioting

In a large scale rioting it is generally difficult for the witnesses to observe the details of the attack. However, in the case of injured witnesses their presence cannot be doubted and there is no reason as to why their evidence cannot be accepted in respect of the participation of their own assailants. In a case of this nature, the court generally, to fix the presence of unlawful assembly, would first scrutinise the evidence of the injured witnesses and if the same is corroborated by the medical evidence, that can be accepted as against those accused who caused injuries and they can be held to be members of the unlawful assembly. This is on the ground that the witnesses at least would be in a position to identify their own assailants. Applying this principle out of 43 persons challanned by the police only four persons were convicted for rioting.[84]1040

5. Act of Member of Unlawful Assembly may not Bind All

It is not a necessary corollary that whenever there is an unlawful assembly being governed by any particular common object, whatever offence is committed by any particular member or a group of members of that assembly will have to be taken as having been committed by all the members as in pursuance of such a common object it is not unlikely or unusual that one or some members of that assembly may indulge in commission of any act, which may not be prompted by an object common to all.[85]

6. 'Whoever'

It is only the person, or persons, armed with a deadly weapon who can be charged under this section. The only way in which one person can be made liable for the acts of another, is under s 149, IPC .[86] In Re Muduru Payalagadu,[87] a view was taken that:

> If some members of an unlawful assembly are armed with deadly weapons in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly, and if rioting is committed, the other members of the unlawful assembly who are not armed with deadly weapons may be convicted under section 148 read with section 149 .

But this view has been dissented in Muddamsetti Subba Rao's case.[88]Section 148 deals with direct responsibility and a rioter who does not carry a deadly weapon himself cannot be made liable under that section by virtue of s 149 . The appropriate section to apply to a rioter who is not armed with a deadly weapon is s 147 .[89]

7. 'Being Armed'--Use of Weapon not Necessary

The mere fact of being armed with a deadly weapon is sufficient to convert ordinary rioting into an aggravated rioting under this section. The actual use of the weapon constitutes a different offence, e.g., one under s 324, IPC .[90] For the application of this section, it is, therefore, not necessary that any such weapon or anything which, used as a weapon of offence likely to cause death, is actually used in the rioting. It would suffice if it were merely displayed.[91]

8. 'Deadly Weapon'

The expression 'deadly weapon' is not defined in the Indian Penal Code . However, a weapon, which, when used for its designed purpose, is likely to cause death, is a deadly weapon. A lethal weapon, such as a sword, a dagger, pistol, a gun, a spear, a kanta (glove with steel claws) or a hammer,[92] is a deadly weapon.[93] A sharp-edged1041 weapon, like a kripan,[1]dharia,[2]gupti[3] or knife,[4] is a deadly weapon. The test of a 'deadly weapon' is not the purpose for which it is carried; it should be of such a nature that, if used as a weapon of offence, it is likely to cause death.[5]

Lathi whether Deadly Weapon

Lathis are not deadly weapons.[6] Ordinary lathis cannot be described as deadly weapons.[7] It depends on the size and weight of a lathi to determine whether it is a deadly weapon. Stout, solid and thick bamboos have been generally held to be deadly weapons while hollow bamboos have been held to be not so.[8]

Or with anything, which when used as a Weapon of Offence is likely to Cause Death

A crowbar or spade may well be a deadly weapon if used as weapon of offence; but if it is merely used to destroy a bridge, it certainly cannot be described as a weapon of any sort.[9] not only heavy sticks, but also a pen-knife, a chopper, a dagger, a sling and even stones, when used as weapons of offence may cause death.[10] Whether or not a stick is a deadly weapon would depend upon its size and weight. 'Stout male bamboos, when used as weapons of offence, are likely to cause death but not hollow ones'.[11]

Question of Facts

In Queen Empress v Nathu ,[12] it was held that it is a question of fact to be decided, in each case, whether the lathi used or the lathi, with which the injury is caused, was or was not, in itself, a deadly weapon. One lathi may, by reason of its weight, length or other peculiarities, be a deadly weapon, another may not.[13]

9. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable and warrant may be issued in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.[14]1042

10. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you ..... along with (name the other persons or some of them, if known, or mention their number) on or about the.....day of.....at...were a member of an unlawful assembly and were, at the time armed with a deadly weapon (or with a thing which used as a weapon of offence, was likely to cause death) to wit, and did, in prosecution of the common object of that assembly, namely, ...commit the offence of rioting and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 148 of the IPC, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

11. Proof

In a trial for an offence under this section all the elements of rioting have to be proved in addition to the fact that the accused was armed with a deadly weapon or with something, which, used as a weapon of offence is likely to cause death. The common object of an unlawful assembly must be definitely found and not merely left for conjecture or inference from other facts found in the judgment.[15]

Where the common object of all accused persons was proved only to the extent of beating the deceased and not to committing murder, conviction of the accused persons under s 300 was set aside but all accused were held liable to be convicted under ss 324 / 149, IPC as one of the accused was carrying a deadly weapon with the knowledge of the other accused persons, the said accused holding the sharp edged weapon which is a deadly weapon was also liable to be convicted under s 148, IPC .[16]

There was no reliable evidence to prove that the accused persons were present on the spot and no overt act was attributed to them to show that they shared common object of unlawful assembly. They were acquitted of the charge under s 148, IPC .[17]

Force or Violence must be Proved

All the essential ingredients of an unlawful assembly must be proved.[18] For holding a person guilty under this section, a definite finding as to weapon is not necessary. It is sufficient if the court arrives at a finding that the weapon was dangerous or at least a weapon which, if used as a weapon of offence, was likely to cause death.[19] It is also not necessary to prove as to which specific weapon was held by which particular accused.[20] Where the accused persons having lathis in their hands inflicted blows on the deceased, lathis are deadly weapons, so the accused persons cannot be convicted under s 148 and their conviction was altered to one under s 147, IPC .[21]

None of the prosecution witnesses deposed that the accused formed an unlawful assembly of five or more persons and in prosecution of the common object of the1043 assembly the injured was assaulted. In the absence of proof of these ingredients by prosecution, the accused persons were acquitted of the charge under s 148, IPC .[22]

Where the manner in which occurrence took place proved that the accused were members of an unlawful assembly there was no requirement to go into the question as to which of the accused persons inflicted what particular injury.[23] Where the prosecution has not been able to show how any 'force' (as defined by s 349, Penal Code) or violence is proved to have been used by the appellants in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly of which they were members, and with the exception of the firing of shots in a direction, which cannot be determined and no attempt was made by any of the appellants to use any force or violence on any member of the other (police) party, it was held that the conviction of the appellants under s 148 could not be made.[24] Where the accused persons formed an unlawful assembly and armed with weapons allegedly entered the house of the complainant and assaulted inmates, thereby causing the death of the complainant's mother. The medical evidence regarding injuries corroborated with the testimony of the eyewitness. FIR was promptly lodged and also corroborated with the version of the eyewitnesses, accused persons were identified and evidence showed that they actively took part in the commission of the offence, the accused were held guilty of offence under s 148, IPC .[25]

12. Conviction

Where the allegations were that all the accused persons armed with deadly weapons attacked deceased and the main accused hurled a bomb on the deceased while the other co-accused persons joined the accused in chasing the deceased and beating him indiscriminately with hunting sickles. The presence of eyewitnesses at the time and place of occurrence was not doubtful, the medical evidence showed that injuries found on the person of the deceased were sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature, the conviction of the main accused for offences under ss 148 and 302, IPC and ss 3 and 5 of the Explosive Substances Act was held proper, however, the co-accused persons who could not be said to have caused death of the deceased as vital injuries were not caused from their acts were held liable to be convicted for offences under ss 324 and 148, IPC .[26]

Accused A1 along with some others, armed with weapons, entered the house of the complainant PW1, inflicted knife injuries and looted articles. The prosecution evidence established that the gathering of mob outside the house of PW1 was an unlawful assembly, which was armed with deadly weapons. The same would clearly fall within the ambit of ss 141 and 148 of the IPC . Accused A1 was convicted for offences under ss 148, 392 and 452 of the IPC .[27]

1044Where an accused is charged under s 148, IPC and acquitted, conviction of such accused under s 302 read with s 149, IPC cannot be legally recorded.[28]

Accused armed with lethal weapons gave blows on the head of the deceased causing death. However, there was no evidence to show that the occurrence was a pre-arranged plan. Accused persons were not convicted for offences under ss 148 and 149 of the IPC .[29]

Where the prosecution has established that the common object of the unlawful assembly was to commit the offence of rioting armed with deadly weapons, conviction of the accused persons under s 148, IPC, was found proper.[30]

Where evidence of eyewitnesses was that the accused directed other accused persons to punish the deceased and sever his head and the other accused persons made a murderous assault on the deceased in compliance of such direction and caused as many as 14 incised injuries on his person, the accused persons then chased the deceased to a field nearby and then again assaulted him with deadly weapons, it was held that the accused persons formed an unlawful assembly and the object of the said assembly was to commit murder of the deceased and hence, conviction of the accused under s 300 read with s 148, IPC, was confirmed.[31]

Where the accused persons were armed with deadly weapons and were convicted under s 148, IPC, it is not necessary to record their conviction separately for offence under s 147, IPC .[32]

13. Acquittal

Where the accused persons have a right of private defence of person or property, they cannot be convicted under ss 147, 148 or 149, IPC .[33]

Where earlier the investigating agency, after investigation, had submitted the 'Final Report', and the learned Magistrate, however, on the basis of material available before it took cognisance of the offence under s 307 / 34 IPC and that too, against 3 accused persons only, they could not have been convicted either under s 148 IPC or with the aid of s 149 IPC .[34] The conviction and sentence of the accused persons under s 148 IPC, is liable to be set aside if it is found that the occurrence had taken place in a quarrel.[35]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 149.

Every member of unlawful assembly guilty of offence committed in prosecution of common object.--

If an offence is committed by any member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of that assembly, or such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in1045 prosecution of that object, every person who, at the time of the committing of that offence, is a member of the same assembly, is guilty of that offence.1046

Comments

1. Scope

Section 149 of the Indian Penal Code postulates an assembly of 5 or more persons having a common object i.e. one of those named in s 141 of Indian Penal Code 1860 and then doing of the act as the members of it in prosecution of that object. The basis of constructive guilt under s 149 is mere membership of an unlawful assembly. Under s 149, if the accused is a member of an unlawful assembly, the common object of which is to commit a certain crime, and such a crime is committed by one or more of the members of that assembly, every person who happens to be a member of that assembly would be liable for the commission of the crime being a member of it irrespective of the fact whether he has actually committed the criminal act or not. There is a distinction between the common object and common intention. The common object need not require prior concert and a common meeting of minds before the attack, and an unlawful object can develop after the assembly gathered before the commission of the crime at the spot itself. There need not be prior meeting of the mind. It would be enough that the members of the assembly which constitutes five or more persons have common object and that they acted as an assembly to achieve that object. In substance, s 149 makes every member of the common unlawful assembly responsible as a member for the act of each and all merely because he is a member of the unlawful assembly with common object to be achieved by such an unlawful assembly. At the same time, one has to keep in mind that mere presence in the unlawful assembly cannot render a person liable unless there was a common object and that is shared by that person. The common object has to be found and can be gathered from the facts and circumstances of each case.[36]

1047The scope of this section is very wide.[37] For attracting the provisions of s 149, IPC what is required to be established is that the common object of the unlawful assembly was to commit a particular offence or that the accused who were the members of unlawful assembly, must have known that a particular offence was likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly even if the common object may be different.[38] The Apex Court has held that for applying s 149, IPC, what the court has to see is whether the assailants formed an unlawful assembly and shared the common object either by participation or by being present as members of the unlawful assembly knowing its common object.[39]

To ascertain whether a particular person shared common object of unlawful assembly, it is not essential to prove that he committed some illegal overt act or had been guilty of some illegal omission in pursuance of the common object.[40] Undoubtedly, commission of an overt act by such a person would be one of the tests to prove that he shared the common object, but it is not the sole test.[41]While overt act and active participation may indicate common intention of the person perpetrating the crime, the mere presence in unlawful assembly may fasten vicariously criminal liability under s 149, IPC .[42]

When charge under s 149, IPC is made, it is not necessary that each accused should be assigned independent part played in the beating. If it is found that one of them was a member of the unlawful assembly and that unlawful assembly assaulted the deceased, which ultimately caused the death of the deceased, then all who were members of the unlawful assembly can be held liable and convicted.[43]

Mere knowledge of likely commission of an act or the commission of the offence by any member of unlawful assembly also attracts the provison of s 149, IPC .[44]

In other words, this provision, so to speak, takes him out of the region of abetment, and makes him responsible, as a principal for the acts of each and all, merely because he is a member of an unlawful assembly,[45]although he may have no intention to commit that offence and did no overt act, except his presence in the assembly and sharing the common object of that assembly. Without the provisions of this section he could not have been made liable for the offence committed, not by himself, but by another member of that assembly.[46]

In the Full Bench case, Re Theetumalai Gounder,[47] it was held that s 40 of the IPC, defines 'offence' as a thing made punishable under the Code or under any special or1048 local law as defined in the Code. A person could not be tried and sentenced under s 149, IPC alone, as no punishment is provided by the section. But by virtue of this section he is guilty of the substantive offence committed and is liable for the punishment provided for that offence.

A group of fifty persons armed with weapons, accused appellants indulged in indiscriminate firing causing the death of a woman and her two children. Post mortem report stated that the death was the result of firearm injuries. Accused persons were convicted under ss 302 read with s149 of the IPC .[48]

Section is Declaratory of Vicarious Liability

This section is declaratory of the vicarious liability of the members of an unlawful assembly for acts done in prosecution of its common object or for such offences as its members knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object.[49] The section declares, in substance, that every member of an unlawful assembly is responsible for an offence committed by another member, or the other members, in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, or one which he must have known was reasonably likely to be committed in the prosecution of such common object.[50]Section 149 creates no substantive offence.[51]

2. Principles of Vicarious Liability

Commentary under s 147, ante may be referred to.

In fact, s 149 makes it clear that if an offence is committed by any member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of that assembly, or such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object, every person who, at the time of the committing of that offence, is a member of the same assembly, is guilty of that offence; and that emphatically brings out the principle that the punishment prescribed by s 149 is in a sense vicarious and does not always proceed on the basis that the offence has been actually committed by every member of the unlawful assembly.[52]

3. Essential Ingredients

Section 149, IPC creates a specific and distinct offence. There are two essential ingredients thereof:

(i) Commission of an offence by any member of an unlawful assembly, and
(ii) Such offence must have been committed in prosecution of the common object of that assembly or must be such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed.[53]1049

It is essential to prove that the person sought to be charged with an offence with the aid of s 149 was a member of the unlawful assembly at the time the offence was committed.[54]

Essentials of the Section

For the application of this section, the following elements are necessary:

(i) there must have been an unlawful assembly;
(ii) an offence is committed by a member of that assembly;
(iii)
  (a) the offence is committed in prosecution of the common object of the assembly; or
  (b) the person sought to be made liable knew that the offence was likely to be committed in prosecution of that common object; and

(iv) such person was a member of the same unlawful assembly at the time of the commission of the offence.[55]

Mere Presence not Sufficient

The mere presence at the scene of occurrence as onlooker is not sufficient.[56]

Mere presence in the unlawful assembly cannot render a person liable unless there was a common object and that is shared by that person.[57]

If a person is only a silent spectator, he would not be a member of an unlawful assembly or when a person ceases to be a member of unlawful assembly before the actual commission of the offence, he would not be liable vicariously with the aid of s 149, IPC .[58]

Mere presence of a person on the scene of occurrence is however, not sufficient to make him guilty under this section unless there was a common object.[59]

Sudden or Unexpected Act of a Member

It needs to be emphasised that the basis of liability under s 149, IPC is constructive and not individual. Once the membership of an unlawful assembly is proved and it is established that the act was committed in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly or was such which the members knew was likely to be committed, all the members would be equally liable for it, irrespective of the gravity of their individual roles even though those who do not take part in the actual assault on the victim would be equally liable.[60]

1050Where a member of an unlawful assembly suddenly got enraged at the behaviour of an opponent and hit him with a spear and killed him, it was held that the other members could not be held liable for the murder.[61]

The members of an unlawful assembly are liable for an offence committed by any particular member, only if such offence was contemplated by the members, or was one which they knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of the common intention[62] and not for a sudden or unexpected act of any member.[63]

This Section must be Construed Strictly

Since the section deals with constructive liability, it must be construed very strictly.[64] The stringency of the section is, therefore, not to be strained so as to make every member of an unlawful assembly liable even for acts which are not committed necessarily in prosecution of the common object of the rioters or which are not immediately connected with the common object of the unlawful assembly, of which the accused were members, nor must a guilty knowledge of the likelihood of the commission of such an offence, in prosecution of the common object, be imputed to all the members of the unlawful assembly in the absence of any clear evidence, direct or circumstantial, adduced on behalf of the prosecution to show that such knowledge could be so legitimately imputed to the members of the unlawful assembly before they moved to action.[65] The expression 'in prosecution of common object' as appearing in s 149 have to be strictly construed as equivalent to 'in order to attain the common object'. It must be immediately connected with the common object by virtue of the nature of the object.[66]

4. Common object upto a Certain Point--Effect

There must be community of object and the object may exist only up to a particular stage, and not thereafter. Members of an unlawful assembly may have community of object up to certain point beyond which they may differ in their objects and the knowledge, possessed by each member of what is likely to be committed in prosecution of their common object may vary not only according to the information at his command, but also according to the extent to which he shares the community of object, and as a consequence of this effect of s 149, IPC may be different on different members of the same assembly.[67]

As pointed out in Emperor v Bhola Singh :[68]

> A person may join an unlawful assembly with an unlawful object, but it does not necessarily follow that he endorses all that the other members say or do. Nor is he, therefore, responsible for their acts of which he was not clearly cognizant. For example, two persons may be induced by another to assist him in thrashing his enemy with whom he had had a quarrel. They may consent to lend him their assistance so far, but if he had secretly planned to kill him and does so, they cannot be held responsible for his act.

1051In a Calcutta case it was stated:

> Members of an unlawful assembly may have a community of object up to a certain point, beyond which they may differ in their objects, and the knowledge possessed by each member of what is likely to be committed in prosecution of their common object may vary not only according to the information at his command, but also according to the extent to which he shares the community of object; and, as a consequence of this, the effect of s 149 of IPC may be different on different members of the same unlawful assembly.[69]

In dealing with such cases, while, on the one hand, it is necessary for the protection of accused persons that they should not, merely by reason of their association with others as members of an unlawful assembly, be held criminally liable for offences committed by their associates, which they themselves neither intended nor knew to be likely to be committed; on the other hand, it is equally necessary for the protection of peace that members of an unlawful assembly should not lightly be let off from suffering the penalties for offences for which, though committed by others, the law has made them liable for punishment by reason of their association with the actual offenders with one common object. The cases of Sabed Ali[70] and Hari Singh,[71] cited above, emphasise the necessity of keeping in view these two conflicting, but equally necessary, considerations.[72]

Where an accused is charged under s 148, IPC and acquitted, conviction of such accused under s 302 read with s 149, IPC cannot be legally recorded.[73]

Where original common object of the accused persons was to assault the victim, some of the accused however, after entering the house of the victim developing different common object and causing grievous injuries to the victim, the accused standing outside the house of the victim could not be knowing what transpired inside the house, act of those members of original unlawful assembly who entered the house, cannot be attributed to member who stood outside; members who did not share common object and stood outside were liable to be convicted under s 352 read with s 149 of the IPC and not under s 326 read with s 149 .[74]

All the members reaching to the spot together armed with weapons and immediately attacking the persons present there clearly exhibits the intention of the unlawful assembly. Common object of unlawful assembly to kill the deceased persons was inferred. Appellants accused were convicted under s 302, IPC with aid of s 149, IPC .[75]

Where the common object of the assembly was to cause grievous hurt and death was caused by only one of the members of the assembly for which the other members were not responsible, the conviction of the other members under s 326 read with s 149, IPC cannot be held illegal, merely because no member of the assembly1052 was proved to have caused grievous hurt to the victims.[76] Where on account of assault by several accused the complainant's son died, there was no evidence to show that the co-accused persons came to the scene of the incident with the object of trespass and assault on the complainant and his son, the co-accused cannot be made vicariously liable for the overt acts of other accused and so their conviction under s 304, Pt II and s 149, IPC was set aside.[77]

In a Calcutta case, it was held that by appending s 149 to a charge under s 326, the court intimates to the accused persons that some person other than they themselves had committed the substantive offence, with the result that the accused could not be convicted of the substantive offence under s 326 as they had not been charged under it.[78] But dissenting from this a single Judge of the Oudh Chief Court observed:

> I do not see how the conclusion at which they arrived follows from s 149, Penal Code. That section contemplates the commission of an offence by any member of the unlawful assembly. Thus, the addition of s 149, Penal Code, merely indicates that the offence was not necessarily committed by any of the accused persons and might have been committed by some person other than the accused. It does not, however, exclude the possibility of the accused themselves having committed the offence, since the very nature of the charge indicates that they were also members of the same unlawful assembly.[79]

5. Distinction between Section 34 and Section 149

Commentary under same heading s 34, ante may be referred to.

Common intention is different from common object.[80] There is a clear distinction between the provisions of ss 34 and 149, IPC, and the two provisions are not to be confused. The principal element in s 34 is the common intention to commit a crime. In furtherance of the common intention several acts may be done by several persons resulting in the commission of that crime. In such a situation, s 34 provides that each one of them would be liable for that crime in the same manner as if all the acts resulting in that crime had been done by him alone. There is no question of common intention in s 149 . an offence may be committed by a member of an unlawful assembly and the other members will be liable for that offence although there was no common intention between that person and other members of the unlawful assembly to commit that offence provided the conditions laid down in the section are fulfilled. Thus, if the offence committed by that person is in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly or such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object, every member of the unlawful assembly would be guilty of that offence, although there may have been no common intention and no participation by the other members in the actual commission of that offence.[81] But in the total absence of evidence both in respect of offence under s 34 as well as s 149, the conviction of accused persons with the aid of s 149 or s 34 is not proper.[82]1053

Distinguishing Features of Vicarious Liability under the Two Sections

Under s 149, IPC the liability of the other members of the unlawful assembly for the offence committed during the continuance of the occurrence, rests upon the fact whether the other members know beforehand that the offence actually committed was likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object. Common object has to be distinguished from common intention. There is no question of common intention in s 149 of the Indian Penal Code .[83]

Common object, as contemplated by s 149, IPC does not require prior concert or meeting of minds before the attack.[84]Section 149, IPC no doubt provides for creating vicarious liability. However, the main ingredient of the charge under s 149, IPC against the accused person is that he was a member of an unlawful assembly, one or more members of which committed some offence. Section 34 , IPC also provides for vicarious liability, but that is in a case where some act is done in furtherance of the common intention of all. Although the criminal act is done by all the persons, intention of each such person is liable for that act in the same manner as if the whole of it had been done by him alone. There is, therefore, a good deal of difference between the nature of vicarious liability created under s 34, IPC and that created under s 149, IPC although to a certain extent these two sections overlap.[85]

Unlike s 34, this section creates a specific offence and deals with the punishment for that offence alone.[86] This section constitutes a substantive offence and is not merely an enabling one for imposition of vicarious liability,[87] although the punishment for the offence is under the section, to which it is tagged, being committed by the principal offender, in the unlawful assembly, known or unknown.[88] But if one reads s 149 and s 34, IPC, they will go to show that these two sections are related and overlap each other. When an offence is committed with a common object by more than five persons, it will amount to an offence under s 149, whereas if an offence is committed with a common object by persons less than five, the offence will come under s 34 .[89]Even if the offence under s 148 was not proved, the persons actually assaulting together would be liable for each other's act by the operation of s 34, IPC, i.e., acting in furtherance of common intention.[90]

When a charge is for commission of certain offences by an unlawful assembly and vicarious liability is sought to be fixed on a person by operation of s 149, IPC even if1054 unlawful assembly is not established and more than one person is proved to have participated in the violence in furtherance of their common intention, the court shall take resort to s 34, IPC for fastening vicarious liability for each other's act.[91] The accused charged under ss 302 / 149, IPC can be convicted under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[92] Similarly, the accused charged under ss 452 / 149, IPC can be convicted under s 452 with the aid of s 34, IPC when charge under s 149, IPC is not proved.[93]

But where the complicity of the accused in view of the provisions of s 149 has been proved, the court need not advert its attention towards the provisions of s 34, IPC .[94] Where the finding of the High Court was that ingredients of both s 34 and of s 149 were proved as far as all the accused were concerned but the High Court acquitted two of the accused persons as their participation in the crime was not free from doubt, the order of the High Court was not only contradictory to its own finding but was also based on an erroneous interpretation of provisions of both ss 34 and 149, IPC as authoritatively laid down, therefore, the order of the High Court acquitting the two accused cannot stand.[95]

Both Sections 34 and 149 may or may not Apply/Overlap

Commentary under same heading in s 34, ante may be referred to.

6. Sections 34, 114 and 149

Sections 34, 114 and 149 of the Indian Penal Code provide for criminal liability viewed from different angles as regards actual participants, accessories and men actuated by a common object or a common intention; and the charge is a rolled up one involving the direct liability and the constructive liability without specifying who are directly liable and who are sought to be made constructively liable.[96]

In such a situation, the absence of a charge under one or other of the various heads of criminal liability for the offence cannot be said to be fatal by itself, and before a conviction for the substantive offence, without a charge, can be set aside, prejudice will have to be made out. In most of the cases of this kind, evidence is normally given from the outset as to who was primarily responsible for the act which brought about the offence and such evidence is of course relevant.[97]

7. Applicability of Section 149 to Part I of Section 304

Commentary under the same heading in s 304, post may be referred to.

8. Applicability of Section 149 to Part II of Section 304

Commentary under the same heading in s 304, post may be referred to.1055

9. Trite Law

It is trite law that when there are more than one accused, and any of the accused is exceeding right of private defence, he alone would be guilty of commission of culpable homicide not amounting to murder by exceeding right of private defence of person or property falling under exception (2) of s 300 IPC . The other accused persons cannot be held responsible vicariously with the aid of s 34 or s 149 of the Indian Penal Code 1860.[1]

It is now well settled legal position that when the act falls within any of the exceptions of s 300 Indian Penal Code 1860, the accused cannot be convicted with the help of s 34 or s 149 Indian Penal Code 1860. They should be convicted for their individual act.[2]

10. Two Parts of the Section

The section describes the offence which is to be so attributed under two alternative forms or parts: (a) it must be either an offence committed by a member of the unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of that assembly; or (b) an offence such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object.

In the Full Bench case Queen v Sabid Ali ,[3] Couch CJ, pointed out the distinction between the two parts as follows:

> At first, there does not seem to be much distinction between the two parts of the section, and I think the cases which would be within the first offences committed in prosecution of the common object, would be, generally, if not always, within the second, namely offences which the parties knew to be likely to be committed in the prosecution of the common object. But I think there may be cases which would come within the second part, and not within the first.

In a case[4] their Lordships of the Supreme Court have held that the distinction between the two parts of the section cannot be ignored or obliterated and that in every case it would be an issue to be determined whether the offence committed falls within the first part of s 149, IPC or it is an offence such as the members of the assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object and falls within the second part. As regards the distinction itself their Lordships further held:

> The first part of the section means that the offence committed in prosecution of the common object must be one which is committed with a view to accomplish the common object. It is not necessary that there should be > a preconcert in the sense of a meeting of the members of the unlawful assembly as to the common object; it is enough if it is adopted by all the members and is shared by all of them. In order that the case may fall under the first part, the offence committed must be connected immediately within the common object of the unlawful assembly of which the accused were members.[5]

The two parts of the section are quite distinct though the same act may, and frequently does, fall under both. The first classes of acts are those committed in prosecution of the common object of the assembly. The act may be that of one individual accused, but if it is committed in furtherance of the end which they all have in view, all the accused are liable for it. The second classes of acts are those which the accused knew to be likely to be committed in connection with the carrying out of their common purpose.[6] 'In the first alternative the offence had to be committed before the common object could be achieved and in the second it was not necessary that it should be committed but in all probability it would be'.[7] The first part deals with an offence committed which is in the scheme of the assembly, but the second part embraces such offences which were not in the original scheme, and yet they are committed by some of the members of the assembly for which the others are liable.[8]

These explanations of the two parts were further elaborated by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Shambhu Nath Singh v State of Bihar ,[9] where the two parts were paraphrased as follows:

> If an unlawful assembly is formed with the common object of committing an offence and if that offence is committed in prosecution of the object by any member of the unlawful assembly, all the members of the assembly will be vicariously liable for that offence even if one or more, but not all committed the offence. Again, if an offence is committed by a member of an unlawful assembly and that offence is one which the members of the unlawful assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object, every member who had that knowledge will be guilty of the offence so committed.

11. Relevant Factors

Section 149 of the Indian Penal Code 1860 provides for vicarious liability. If an offence is committed by any member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of a common object thereof or such as the members of that assembly knew that the offence was likely to be committed in prosecution of that object, every person who at the time of committing that offence was member, would be guilty of the offence committed. The common object may be commission of one offence while there may be likelihood of commission of yet another offence, the knowledge whereof is capable of being safely attributable to the members of the unlawful assembly. Whether a member of such unlawful assembly was aware as regard likelihood of commission of another offence or not would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case. Background of the incident, the motive, the nature of the assembly, the nature of the arms carried by the members of the assembly, their common object and the behaviour of the members soon before, at or after the actual commission of the crime would be relevant factors for drawing an inference in that behalf.[10]

1057There was overwhelming evidence that all the accused persons variously armed, including with firearms, came together on the spot and started the assault together; one of them shot the deceased and others caused injuries. After that, all of them left the place of occurrence together. All of them were convicted with the aid of s 149, IPC .[11]

Accused persons armed with weapons went to the cattle shed of the husband of the deceased and carried with them kerosene as well. The common object of the unlawful assembly as revealed by the evidence was to have the cattle shed vacated. Accused persons attacked and the members of the unlawful assembly also set fire to the wife of the owner of the cattle causing her death. All the members of the unlawful assembly were convicted under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[12]

Eye-witnesses deposed that the attacks on the head of the deceased by the two convicted accused were in quick succession. From the manner in which the injuries were inflicted, inference could be drawn that both the accused R and P shared common intention to cause the death of the deceased. Both were convicted under s 302, IPC read with s 34, IPC .[13]

Accused A1, A5, A16 and A21 were members of the unlawful assembly which had caused the murder of the deceased in terms of s 149, IPC, as they had dragged the deceased after first assault and contributed in preventing the deceased from escaping the assault of A13 and A14. Accused A1, A15, A16, A21 were held guilty of murder along with A13 and A14 under s 302 read with s 149 of the IPC .[14]

12. Pivotal and Crucial Question

The pivotal question is applicability of s 149, IPC . The said provision has its foundation on constructive liability which is the sine qua non for its operation. The emphasis is on the common object and not on common intention. Mere presence in an unlawful assembly cannot render a person liable unless there was a common object and he was actuated by that common object and that object is one of those set out in s 141, IPC . Where common object of an unlawful assembly is not proved, the accused persons cannot be convicted with the help of s 149, IPC . The crucial question to determine is whether the assembly consisted of five or more persons and whether the said persons entertained one or more of the common objects, as specified in s 141 . It cannot be laid down as a general proposition of law that unless an overt act is proved against a person, who is alleged to be a member of unlawful assembly, it cannot be said that he is a member of an assembly. The only thing required is that he should have understood that the assembly was unlawful and was likely to commit any of the acts which fall within the purview of s 141 . The word 'object' means the purpose or design and, in order to make it 'common', it must be shared by all. In other words, the object should be common to the persons, who compose the assembly, that is to say, they should all be aware of it and concur in it. A common object may be formed by express agreement after mutual consultation, but that is by no means necessary. It may be formed at any stage by all or a few members of the assembly and the other members may just join and adopt it. Once formed, it need not1058 continue to be the same. It may be modified or altered or abandoned at any stage. The expression 'in prosecution of common object' as appearing in s 149 has to be strictly construed as equivalent to 'in order to attain the common object'. It must be immediately connected with the common object by virtue of the nature of the object. There must be community of object and the object may exist only up to a particular stage, and not thereafter. Members of an unlawful assembly may have community of object up to certain point beyond which they may differ in their objects and the knowledge, possessed by each member of what is likely to be committed in prosecution of their common object, may vary not only according to the information at his command, but also according to the extent to which he shares the community of object, and as a consequence of this the effect of s 149, IPC may be different on different members of the same assembly.[15]

Accused appellant was found guilty and convicted for offences under ss 148, 307, 302 / 149, IPC . Merely because the other co-accused died a natural death was no reason to exonerate the present sole appellant-accused.[16]

13. Act Committed by One Member of Unlawful Assembly may not Bind All

This section does not apply to a member of an unlawful assembly who has committed an offence and is directly responsible for it. If a man does commit an offence directly, there is no question of his committing it constructively.[17] The vicarious liability of the members of an unlawful assembly under s 149, IPC extends for acts done in prosecution of the common object of that assembly or for such offences as members of the unlawful assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object. The mere fact, that one of the members of the unlawful assembly was carrying a gun and that he used that gun to kill a person, will not make other accused persons who were members of that unlawful assembly, liable for the offence of murder punishable under ss 302 / 149, IPC . Everything will depend on the common object of the unlawful assembly.[18] The vicarious liability under s 149, IPC does not always proceed on the basis that the offence has been actually committed by other member of the unlawful assembly. Section 149 makes it clear that if an offence is committed by any member of the unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object or such as the members of the unlawful assembly knew it likely to be committed in prosecution of that object, every person, who, at the time of the commission of the offence, is a member of that assembly, is guilty of that offence.[19]

14. Overt Act if Necessary

For the purpose of attracting s 149 and/or s 34, IPC, a specific overt act on the part of the accused is not necessary. He may wait and watch and inaction itself on the part of an accused may sometime go a long way to hold that he shared a common object1059 with others.[20]Once it is proved that the unlawful assembly had a common object, it is not necessary that all persons forming the unlawful assembly must be shown to have committed some overt act, they can be convicted under s 149, IPC .[21] Where the appellant accused persons armed with deadly weapons entered into the house of the deceased, assaulted the deceased, his wife and mother, inference could be drawn that the accused had formed unlawful assembly, the common object was to commit the murder of the deceased. It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove specific role/overt act of each accused appellant when the offence was committed.[22]Even if no overt act is imputed to a particular person when the charge is punishable under s 149 of the IPC and even the presence of the accused as part of unlawful assembly is established, it is sufficient for conviction.[23] For the purpose of application of s 149, IPC the prosecution has to prove the presence and participation in an unlawful assembly.[24] It is true that the commission of an overt act may not always be necessary to prove that a member of an unlawful assembly shared the common object of the assembly, but then, the minimum that the prosecution must prove is that the persons concerned were members of the unlawful assembly.[25]Where the co-accused persons who were 3-4 in number were unarmed, did not commit any overt act towards the commission of the offence, they had only accompanied the main accused to the spot and were seen running by the PWS, co-accused persons were acquitted of the charges under ss 147, 148 and 149 of the IPC .[26] However, the mere fact that no overt act has been attributed to the members of the unlawful assembly, is not sufficient to disprove the charge under s 149, IPC .[27] To attract the mischief of s 149 of the IPC, it is not necessary that each of the accused must commit some illegal overt act. an assembly which is not unlawful when assembled may subsequently become an unlawful assembly.[28]Once an assembly is found to be unlawful, where all the accused armed had come to the spot and attacked the deceased, it is not necessary to assign overt act to each member of the unlawful assembly.[29]

Once it is established that the unlawful assembly had common object, it is not necessary that all persons forming the unlawful assembly must be shown to have committed some overt act. For the purpose of incurring the vicarious liability for the offence committed by a member of such unlawful assembly under the provision, the1060 liability of other members of the unlawful assembly for the offence committed during the continuance of the occurrence rests upon the fact whether the other members knew beforehand that the offence actually committed was likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object.[30]

There was no enmity between the deceased and the accused appellant; he had not caused any injury to the deceased and no overt act was attributed to the appellant so far as the deceased was concerned. Mere fact that the appellant was armed with a lathi by itself would not prove that he shared common object with which the main accused was inspired. The prosecution had not adduced evidence to establish the nexus between the common object and the offence committed. Held, the accused appellant could not be convicted with the help of s 149, IPC .[31]

It cannot be stated as a general proposition of law that unless an overt act is proven against the person who is alleged to be a member of the unlawful assembly, it cannot be held that he is a member of the assembly. What is really required to be seen is that the member of the unlawful assembly should have understood that the assembly was unlawful and was likely to commit any of the acts which fall within the purview of s 141, IPC . The core of the offence is the word 'object' which means the purpose or design and in order to make it common, it should be shared by all. All the accused persons who had come together were armed with lathis. Accused H was armed with a gun. The eye-witnesses deposed in an unequivocal manner about the assault by all the accused persons. The common object was clearly evident. In such a situation, attribution of specific individual overt act has no role to play. All the requisite tests to attract s 149, IPC were established by the prosecution.[32]

The punishment prescribed by s 149 is in a sense vicarious, and does not always proceed on the basis that the offence has been actually committed by every member of the unlawful assembly.[33]

If an offence is committed by a member of the unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object, any member of the unlawful assembly who was present at the time of commission of offence and who shared the common object of that assembly would be liable for the commission of that offence even if no overt act was committed by him. If a large crowd of persons armed with weapons assaults intended victims, all may not take part in the actual assault. If weapons carried by some members were not used, that would not absolve them of liability for the offence with the aid of s 149 of the IPC if they shared common object of the unlawful assembly.[34] When the evidence on record establishes the fact that large number of persons were present, it may be safe to convict only those persons against whom overt act is1061 alleged with the aid of s 149 IPC, lest some innocent spectators may get involved. This is only a rule of caution and not a rule of law.[35]

Where in a case of mass killing by an unlawful assembly the accused were charged with murder etc. with the aid of s 149, and the prosecution proved that the accused was a member of an unlawful assembly which shared the common object of murder, loot and burning of the properties, proof of specific overt act in such a situation is not necessary.[36]Where prosecution evidence showed that out of eight accused persons, four accused were not present on the spot, and no overt act attributed to them, they were acquitted of the charge under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[37] Where witness has not given any definite overt acts regarding the role ascribed to two of the accused persons and has made the general version that all accused surrounded and assaulted, the guilt of these two accused is not established beyond reasonable doubt so their conviction was set aside.[38] The other accused persons had they intended or shared the common object to kill S, they must have used the weapons allegedly carried by them to facilitate the alleged common object of committing murder. Held, it was not safe to convict other accused appellants under s 149, IPC .[39] Where there was no specific allegation against the accused persons for committing an overt act on the injured, the mere fact that at the relevant time they were holding lathis would not by itself prove that they shared the common object with which the main accused was inspired, the occurrence took place at the spur of the moment, the accused persons cannot be said to be members of unlawful assembly so their conviction under s 307 read with s 149, IPC, was set aside.[40]An assembly constituted lawfully may be converted into an unlawful assembly at any moment. Normally the evidence relating to common object of unlawful assembly is not possible. It may be inferred from the act committed by the unlawful assembly and the result of such act; once it is proved that unlawful assembly has been constituted, any overt act or active participation of any member of unlawful assembly is not necessary.[41] The assembly had an unlawful object. Therefore, the acquittal of the accused persons on account that specific role was not attributed to them cannot be said to be justified.[42]

Eye-witness in his statement mentioned the name of one accused, and did not attribute overt act to other accused persons. Held, other accused did not share common object with the named accused, thus, the conviction of the co-accused under ss 302 / 149, IPC was set aside.[43]

There was evidence that the appellant accused assaulted the deceased with gupti, while the co-accused who had also come armed caught hold of the deceased. It created suspicion about the prosecution case that the co-accused shared the common1062 object of the unlawful assembly. The co-accused though were armed, did not use the weapons which they had clutched in their hands. The co-accused were held entitled to benefit of doubt and were acquitted of the charge under ss 302 / 149, IPC .[44]

15. Only Role of Exhortation

The three accused appellants were armed with which had not been used by them in any manner and the only allegation against them was that they had exhorted their co-accused to fire at the opposite party. Held, the possibility that the three accused persons were roped in on account of animosity could not be ruled out. The three accused appellants were given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under ss 149, 302 and 307, IPC .[45]

16. Unlawful Assembly - Factum of Causing Injury Irrelevant

The factum of causing injury or not causing injury would not be relevant where accused is sought to be roped in with the aid of s 149, IPC .[46]

17. No Trial for this Section Alone

While this section creates an offence a person cannot be tried and sentenced under s 149, IPC alone because no punishment is provided by the section, but, by virtue of this section, he is guilty of the substantive offence committed and is liable for punishment provided for that offence.[47] There is, therefore, no meaning in charging a person merely with s 149 .[48]

Section 149 creates no substantive offence and separate punishment under this section cannot be awarded. Separate sentence awarded by the Sessions Judge under s 149, IPC was set aside.[49]

18. Sections 149 and 150 Distinguished

Under this section, both the persons, who committed the offence and the persons sought to be held liable for it, must be members of an unlawful assembly. But under s 150, IPC, a person need not be a member of an unlawful assembly yet he would be guilty of being a member of such assembly and of the offence which may be committed by a member of it in the circumstances mentioned in the section.[50]

19. Sections 149 and 301 Considered Together

The two sections apply to two different situations having no similarity. Section 301 applies to a situation where a person causes the death of another, whose death that person neither intends nor knows himself likely to cause. That being so, it is rather1063 difficult, as a process of logical reasoning, to apply s 149, IPC to a situation like that. Section 149 contemplates inter alia the commission of an offence which the members of the assembly knew likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly. If, by the terms of s 301, the offender could not have known it likely that he would cause the death of the person whom he has actually killed, equally, by the terms of s 149, the other members of the unlawful assembly, that is to say, the members other than the member who has actually caused the death of the person, could not have known it to be likely that the death of that particular person would be caused.[51]

20. Sections 34, 120A and 149 Considered Together

Commentary under same heading in s 34, ante may be referred to.

Where the court finds that the strength of the assembly was insufficient to constitute it into 'unlawful assembly', but the remaining persons who participated in the crime had shared common intention with the main perpetrators of the crime, the court can take the aid of s 34 of the IPC even if the said section was not specifically mentioned in the charge.[52]

Out of seven accused persons put on trial five accused persons were acquitted by the trial court. Two accused H and M, armed with lathi and sharp edged weapon, had come together on the spot, gave abuses, had inflicted injuries with sharp edged weapon and lathi and had left together from the spot. Held, common intention was proved; hence, the Supreme Court upheld the conviction of the two accused appellants.[53]

23. Unlawful Assembly--Requirement of Section 149, IPC applies only where there is an unlawful assembly.[54] Where the persons forming the assembly are shown to be having identical interests in pursuance of which some of them come armed, others though not armed would, under the circumstances, be deemed to be the members of the unlawful assembly.[55] If it is not found that five or more persons took part in the assault, there could be no unlawful1064 assembly within the meaning of s 141 and this section will not apply.[56] Presence of four accused persons does not constitute unlawful assembly. The conviction of the four accused appellants under s 302 read with ss 148 and 149 of the IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II read with s 34, IPC .[57] Where a number of persons were alleged to have violently attacked and caused death of five persons, there was no specific evidence as to when the assembly became unlawful, some of the persons retaliated due to assault and counteraction of the police, the conviction for unlawful assembly was held not proper.[58] However, the view that only persons doing overt acts could be members of an unlawful assembly was held to be unreasonable and wrong.[59] The section presupposes a finding that there was an unlawful assembly with a common intention to commit an offence.[60] The court must find with certainty that there were at least five persons sharing the common object. A finding that three of them may or may not have been there betrays uncertainty on this vital point, and it consequently becomes impossible to allow the conviction to rest on this uncertain foundation. But this is not to say that five persons must always be convicted before s 149 can be applied.[61]

Various Categories of Cases

In dealing with the question as to the applicability of this section in such cases, it is necessary to bear in mind the several categories of cases which come before the courts for decision. If five or more persons are named in the charge as composing an unlawful assembly and evidence adduced by the prosecution proves that charge against all of them, then it is a clear case where s 149 can be successfully brought home to any member of the unlawful assembly. It may be that less than five persons may be charged and convicted under s 302 read with s149 of the IPC . If the charge is that the person before the court along with others named constituted an unlawful assembly, the other persons so named may not be available for trial along with their companions for the reason, for instance, that they have absconded. In such a case, the fact that less than five persons are before the court does not make this section inapplicable, as both the charge and the evidence seek to prove that the persons before the court and others number more than five. Similarly, less than five persons may be charged under s 149 if the prosecution case is that the persons before the court and others, numbering in all more than five, composed an unlawful assembly, these others being persons not identified and so not named. In such a case, if evidence shows that the persons before the court along with unidentified and1065 unnamed assailants or members composed an unlawful assembly, those before the court can be convicted under s 149, though the unnamed and unidentified persons are not traced and charged.

Cases may also arise where in the charge; the prosecution names five or more persons and alleges that they constituted an unlawful assembly. In such cases, if both the charge and the evidence are confined to the persons named in the charge and out of the persons so named two or more are acquitted, leaving before the court less than five persons to be tried then in such a case, s 149 cannot be invoked.[62] Even in such cases, it is possible that though the charge names five or more persons as composing an unlawful assembly, evidence may nevertheless show that the unlawful assembly consisted of some other persons as well who were not identified and so not named. In such cases, the court may come to the conclusion that the acquittal of some of the persons named in the charge and tried will not necessarily displace the charge under s 149, because along with the two or three persons convicted were others who composed the unlawful assembly, but who have not been identified and so have not been named.

In such cases, the acquittal of one or more persons named in the charge does not affect the validity of the charge under s 149, because on the evidence, the court is able to reach the conclusion that the persons composing the unlawful assembly nevertheless were five or more than five.[63] It is true that in such cases, the court will have to be very careful in reaching the said conclusion. But there is no legal bar which may come in the way of the court doing so. The failure to refer in the charge to other members of the unlawful assembly unnamed and unidentified may conceivably raise the point as to whether prejudice would be caused to the accused by reason of the fact that the charge did not indicate that unnamed persons also were members of the unlawful assembly. But apart from the question of such prejudice, which may have to be carefully considered, there is no legal bar preventing the court from holding that though the charge specified only five or more persons, the unlawful assembly in fact consisted of other persons who were not named and identified.[64] Synopsis notes of s 151 under the heading 'Assembly of five or more persons' may be referred to.

Proximity of Time and Place and Sameness of Stages

Section 149, IPC cannot apply unless there is proximity of time and place both between members of an unlawful assembly and the criminal acts of individual members of that assembly, for there obviously cannot be an assembly unless the five or more persons constituting it are at the same place. Section 149 itself speaks distinctly of 'at the time of the committing of the offence'.[65] It has also to be proved that common object was shared at all the stages.[66] But it is not correct to say, while dealing with an offence under this section, that all the persons must combine together1066 or help one another at the time of the assault.[67] In a case, their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed that in the case of a free fight:

> When it is held that the appellant's party was prepared for a fight and to have had no right of private defence, it must follow that their intention to fight and cause injuries to the other party amounted to their having a common object to commit an offence and, therefore, constituted them into an unlawful assembly. The injuries they caused to the other party are caused in furtherance of their common object. There is then no good reason why they be not held liable, constructively, for the acts of the other persons of the unlawful assembly, in circumstances which makes section 149 , IPC, applicable to them.[68]

Where an accused person is acquitted of rioting (s 146, IPC), he cannot be properly convicted of grievous hurt under s 325 by the application of this section, when it has not been found that he was a member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of which grievous hurt was caused by any other member of the same assembly, or that the offence was such as each other member of the same assembly, or that the offence was such as each member of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object.[69]

Where on account of assault by several accused the complainant's son died, there was no evidence to show that the co-accused persons came to the scene of the incident with the object of trespass and assault the complainant and his son, the co-accused cannot be made vicariously liable for the overt acts of the other accused and so their conviction under s 304, Pt II and s 149, IPC was set aside.[70]

24. Mob--Members of

Accused A1 to A7, members of the mob were not members of the unlawful assembly; thus, they could not be said to have common intention to commit the murder of the deceased. The acquittal of the accused A1 to A7 under s 302 read with s149, IPC was held proper.[71]

A mob consisting of 400-500 persons had assaulted the deceased. Eye-witness in the court gave out the names of 157 persons. His evidence could not be discarded on the mere ground that it was not possible for a person to remember the name of so many persons on the spot. Accused were convicted under s 302 read with s 149 of the IPC .[72]

25. 'An Offence is Committed'

The first essential element of this section is the commission of an offence by any member of an unlawful assembly.[73] The word 'offence' means only an offence under the Indian Penal Code and does not include an offence under a special or local law. The section has, therefore, no application to offences under a special or local law like1067 the Railways Act and the Defence of India Rules.[74] This section cannot be made use of for the purpose of establishing the guilt of the accused constructively except in cases falling under the Indian Penal Code .[75]

In Empress v Jhabboo Mahton ,[76] Field J, observed that where a prisoner is constructively guilty of murder under s 34, it is doubtful if he can be said to have committed the offence of murder within the meaning of s 149, so as to make other prisoners, by a double construction, guilty of murder.

26. 'By any Member of an Unlawful Assembly'

For the application of this section it is necessary that an offence should have been committed by any member of an unlawful assembly. not only an offence should have been committed, but the person who committed it must at the time of committing it, have been a member of the unlawful assembly. Where the prosecution version was to the effect that the whole group consisting of women, children and men came to the spot to raise the dispute regarding the cleaning of the well by the prosecution party, it cannot be said that all of them were members of the unlawful assembly with the common object of attacking the deceased. It is during the quarrel that took place that some of the accused particularly A4 and A9 committed certain acts of violence on the deceased and PW 1. Therefore, the High Court rightly held them guilty for their individual acts. In a situation like this the court has always to keep in mind that bystanders or others coming from the village cannot be said to be members of the unlawful assembly with the common object of attacking the deceased as well as PW 1. The individual acts have to be taken into consideration to avoid large scale convictions of the persons by virtue of the application of s 149, IPC .[77] As to who can be said to be a member of an unlawful assembly, s 142 and notes thereunder may be referred to. If an assembly was not unlawful, and one member of it having a right of private defence exceeds the right and commits an offence he alone would be guilty of the offence and the other members of the assembly will not be liable under this section.[78] This section does not require that there must be conviction of the principal before other members of the unlawful assembly may be constructively held guilty. It merely lays down that the offence for which they are convicted must have been committed. Once the court finds that an offence has been committed by some member or members of the unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object, then whether the principal offender has or has not been convicted, the other members may be constructively convicted of that offence, provided they are found to have had the necessary intention or knowledge.[79]

Where the two appellants accused were not named in the FIR, they were not identified in the document, none of the PWS had taken their names as the persons who committed any overt act, or the persons who chased the deceased; it was not established that they were members of unlawful assembly. Held, they could not be1068 convicted under s 302 read with s 149 of the IPC, and they were given the benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under ss 302 read with s 149 of the IPC .

There was no evidence to prove the formation of unlawful assembly and therefore the conviction of accused under ss 302, 323, IPC with the aid of s 149, IPC was not sustained and was set aside.[81]

All the appellants accused armed with deadly weapons like lathi, tangi and tabbal participated in the assault and committed the murder of two persons. Their conduct at the time of incident would show that they were members of the unlawful assembly and the conviction of the appellants with the aid of s 149, IPC was not illegal.[82]

Every member of unlawful assembly who participated in the act of hunting is liable to be prosecuted for offence under s 51 of the Wild Life (Protection) Act, with the aid of s 149, IPC .[83]

Mere forming of two groups on petty quarrel would not amount to formation of unlawful assembly.[84]

27. Mere Bystander

If a person is a mere bystander, and no specific role is attributed to him, he may not come under the wide sweep of s 149 .[85]

28. Offence Committed by one or more Persons in Concert

A Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court has held that this section applies in terms not only to cases where the offence in question is committed by a single individual but also where it is committed by several individuals acting in concert, and that according to the definition of 'offence' in s 40 of the Code, the word 'offence' as used in s 149, IPC, denotes anything made punishable by the Code. Where a person becomes liable in respect of a criminal act done by him in furtherance of the common intention of himself and others and is punishable in respect of his part in the act, he is himself guilty of an offence. The offence of which he may be guilty may be different from that of the others engaged along with him in the commission of the criminal act (s 38, IPC) but it will nevertheless clearly be an offence within the meaning of the word as used in the section.[86]

All that the section requires is that an offence should have been committed by a member of an unlawful assembly. It is not necessary that the member or members who committed the offence should be known, identified or convicted. The identity of the persons comprising the assembly is a matter relating to the determination of the guilt of the individual accused, and even when it is possible to convict less than five persons only, s 147, IPC still applies if upon the evidence in the case the court is able1069 to hold that the person or persons who have been found guilty were members of an assembly of five or more persons, known or unknown, identified or unidentified.[87]

If the case of the prosecution and the evidence adduced indicates that a number in excess of five persons participated in the incident and some of them could not be identified, it would be open to the court to convict less than five of the offence of being members of the unlawful assembly or convict them of the offence committed by the unlawful assembly with the aid of s 149, IPC provided it comes to the conclusion that five or more persons participated in the incident.[88]

Where more persons participated in the incident, the accused who participated in the occurrence can be convicted with the aid of s 149, IPC . The mere fact that several accused were acquitted and only four are convicted, does not rule out the application of s 149, IPC . Only four accused were convicted under ss 326 read with 149 and ss 323 read with 149, IPC .[89]

29. Common Object

A common object is essential for an offence under s 149, IPC .[90] Common object as contemplated by s 149, IPC does not require prior concert or meeting of minds before the attack.[91] Even where the common object is not developed at the initial stage, it may develop at the spot instantly.[92]In fastening constructive liability, the importance of the common object is very great and it is on this basis alone that an accused is punished for the act of his associates.[93] The emphasis in the section is on common object, and not on common intention.[94] If the accused are acquitted on the charge of rioting, there is no unlawful assembly and no common intention on their part to commit an offence. This section cannot, therefore, be applied to them.[95] Mere presence in a crowd or unlawful assembly cannot render a person liable, unless there was a common object; he was actuated by the common object, and that object is one of those set out in s 141 .[96] Where there was a fight between the main accused and1070 deceased over possession of land, the other accused were merely present on the spot, no specific part was assigned to men in causing death of accused, no particular injury was attributed to them, on these facts they cannot be convicted under s 302 with the aid of s 149, IPC on the basis of mere presence on the spot.[1] Where initially only 20-25 accused persons appeared at the place of occurrence and the entire body of 100-125 persons had not come together armed with weapons, the evidence showed that some of the accused persons though named in the FIR were standing at a distance, mixed with other accused persons without carrying any weapons or committing any overt act, they cannot be termed to be members of unlawful assembly.[2] Where there was no evidence regarding the incitement of the accused for the purpose of the alleged killing, accused's alleged shouts (words) were not stated in the FIR, and there was also no use of the accused's weapons in the alleged killing, it was held that the accused's mere standing near the place of occurrence does not bring him within the ambit of s 149 .[3] Therefore, if there is no common object there can be no unlawful assembly.[4] The court found that out of eight accused persons nos. 1 to 8, accused nos. 5 to 8 did not commit any offence, those accused were not members of unlawful assembly, only accused nos. 1 to 4 were left and they could not constitute unlawful assembly; thus, they could not be convicted for offences under ss 143, 144, 147, 323, 324 and 326, IPC read with s 149, IPC .[5] Persons who are members of an unlawful assembly and are guilty of rioting under s 148 would not all be necessarily guilty of the offence of dacoity. That would be so only if robbery and dacoity are also the common object of the unlawful assembly and the offence of dacoity was committed in prosecution of the said common object.[6] Where evidence showed that the accused persons had formed an unlawful assembly with the common object of rioting with deadly weapons the accused only was caught hold of by member of the assembly, he was shot at by one of the accused only when he escaped, another victim was killed by an accused who was not member of the assembly, on these facts it was held that the causing of death of deceased persons were individual ones of two accused and conviction of other accused persons under s 300 with the aid of s 149, IPC was not proper, the conviction of all the accused persons under s 148, IPC was however maintained.[7]

(a) Common Object--Prior Concert not Necessary

A 'common object' does not require a prior concert and a common meeting of minds before the attack. It is enough if each member of the unlawful assembly has the same object in view and their number is five or more and that they act as an assembly to achieve that object.[8]

Where A1, A2 and A3 had knives, and other accused persons had sticks in their hands and all the accused came together, assaulted the deceased with knives and sticks causing death, held all the accused had common object to cause the death1071 of the deceased; thus, they were convicted under s 302, IPC read with s 149, IPC .[9]

(b) Point of Time of Common Object

Common object would mean the purpose or design shared by all the members of unlawful assembly. It may be formed at any stage.[10] The concept of common object, it is well known, is different from common intention. It is true that so far as common object is concerned no prior concert is required. Common object can be formed at the spur of the moment. Course of conduct adopted by the members of the assembly, however, is a relevant factor. At what point of time the common object of the unlawful assembly was formed would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[11] The phrase 'common object' is the central fact on which the liability of persons other than the actual doer of the act depends. The word 'object' means the purpose, intention, or design and, in order to make it 'common' it must be possessed by all. There must be community of an object which may, however, exist upto a certain point only, beyond which, they may differ in their objects, and the knowledge possessed by each member of what is likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object will vary not only according to the information at their command but also according to the extent to which he shares the community of objects, and as a consequence of this, the effect of this section may be different as different members of the same unlawful assembly.[12] Common object could develop eoinstanti and being a question of fact it can always be inferred and deduced from the facts and circumstances of a case projected and proved in a given case.[13]

Common Object can be Formed at the Spur of Moment

Common object is different from common intention. It is true that so far as common object is concerned no prior concert is required. Common object can be formed at the spur of the moment. Course of conduct adopted by the members of the assembly, however, is a relevant factor. At what point of time the common object of the unlawful assembly was formed would depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[14]

(c) Common Object at all Stages

It must further be proved in each case that the person concerned was not only a member of the unlawful assembly at some stage, but at all the crucial stages he shared the common object of the assembly at all these stages. Where the evidence merely shows that some of the accused were members of the unlawful assembly at one particular stage but not at another, the accused who were not present or who did not share the common object of the unlawful assembly at other stages cannot be convicted for the activities of the assembly at those stages.[15]1072

(d) Definite Finding Required

The common object of the unlawful assembly must be definitely found and not merely left for conjecture or inference from other facts found in the judgment.[16] Before convicting accused with the aid of s 149, IPC the court must give clear finding regarding nature of common object and that the object was unlawful. In the absence of such finding as also any overt act on the part of the accused persons, mere fact that they were armed would not be sufficient to prove common object.[17] Ordinarily it is not possible to adduce oral evidence about the object of the accused persons.[18] Generally, no direct evidence is available regarding the existence of common object which, in each case, has to be ascertained from the attending facts and circumstances. When a concerted attack is made on the victim by a large number of persons armed with deadly weapons, it is often difficult to determine the actual part played by each offender and easy to hold that such persons attacked the victim and had the common object for an offence which was known to be likely to be committed in prosecution of such an object. Where the persons forming the assembly are shown to be having identical interest in pursuance of which some of them come armed, others though not armed would, under normal circumstances, be armed to be the members of the unlawful assembly. The facts and circumstances of the case would unequivocally prove the existence of the common object of such persons forming the unlawful assembly who had come to the spot and attacked the complainant party.[19]

(e) Determination of Common Object

The question, as to whether in a given case common object has been made out or not, will depend upon the facts and circumstances thereof; conduct of the parties and the manner in which the occurrence has taken place, will have some bearing on the question.[20] Common object of an unlawful assembly can also be gathered from the nature of the assembly, the weapons used by its members and the behavior of the assembly at or before the scene of occurrence.[21] Whether in a given case the accused persons shared common object or not, must be ascertained from the acts and conduct of the accused persons. The surrounding circumstances are also relevant and may be taken into consideration in arriving at a conclusion in this behalf.[22] Gathering of more than five persons armed with firearm, betel axe and sticks itself is sufficient to infer that the persons have gathered with definite object and their object was to kill the person by use of firearm and other dangerous weapons. In case of assault by firearm, dangerous weapons, betel axe and sticks, it would not be possible for the person who had also received injury or whose husband/relatives had received injury1073 and ultimately died to describe the details of injury, details of weapons used and part of the body effected.[23]

In the instant case there was evidence that appellants, 24 persons armed with lethal weapons, surrounded the complainant party, killed three persons and caused severe injuries to two persons. Held, the accused appellants had formed unlawful assembly, the common object of which was to commit the murder of the deceased. All were convicted under s 302 read with s 149 of the IPC .[24]

Determination of the common object of an unlawful assembly or the determination of the question whether a member of the unlawful assembly knew that the offence that was committed was likely to be committed is essentially a question of fact that has to be made keeping in view the nature of the assembly, the arms carried by the members and the behavior of the members at or near the scene.[25]

The common object has to be determined with reference to the facts and circumstances of each case. Anything that may be said by a rioter as well as the surrounding circumstances would be relevant.[26] Nature of the injuries as caused by the accused is an index of their object in attacking the deceased.[27] Inference of common object has to be drawn from various factors such as the weapons with which the members were armed, their movements, the acts of violence committed by them and the result.[28]

Enmity between the deceased and the accused party was proved. All the five accused were armed with deadly weapons. Accused S, at the time of incident, exhorted the other accused, 'Kill him. He is the bone of contention'. The attack by the accused party on the victim was pre-planned and premeditated. Held, all the accused persons acted in furtherance of the common object to cause the death of the deceased. Accused appellants were convicted under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[29] The common object, as pointed out in Madat Khan v Empress ,[30] refers to anyone or more of the objects mentioned in s 141 . Such purposes as 'overpowering all resistance', 'resisting to utmost', 'using force if necessary', however convenient the phrases may be, are not recognised by the legislature either as ends or means to an end. Every common object involves the commission of an offence either as the common end or as a means to the common end. It necessarily contemplates an attempt to commit that offence and the commission of every minor offence is involved in the greater offence1074 and any attempt to commit any such minor offence.[31] Where evidence showed that all the accused had gone to the place of occurrence armed with weapons and assaulted the victims, inference can be drawn that they had formed an unlawful assembly before going to the place of occurrence and that they had assaulted the victim in furtherance of their common object, the finding of roles played by each accused individually is not necessary, the conviction of all the accused with the help of s 149 is sustainable.[32] Where several accused persons armed with deadly weapons assemble together at one place at 10 PM without any reason, it conclusively proves that the object of the assembly was unlawful and also common so as to take the life of the deceased.[33]

Where the five accused persons came in jeep, beat the complainant, they had acted in concert with common object, thus, they were convicted under s 149, IPC .[34]

The co-accused was alleged to have assaulted/caused injuries to the deceased by pharsa on the head and ear of the deceased. In post mortem examination no pharsa injury was found on the person of the deceased. In the absence of injury, it could not be said that the co-accused shared common object. The co-accused was not convicted under s 302 read with s 149 of the IPC .[35]

Where a riotous mob chased members of a rival community upto their locality and members of the riotous mob on reaching the locality of the rival community got busy in setting a house on fire while other members of the riotous mob continued to chase members of the rival community and caused the death of four persons, the members who were engaged in burning the house could not be said to have shared common object of causing murder, and hence, they could not be convicted for murder with the aid of s 34 or s 149, IPC .[36] Actually, in every case under this section, it is not necessary that the common object should directly be to commit a particular offence. It is sufficient that the particular result was such that the member of the assembly knew to be likely to be committed in the prosecution of that common object.[37] Synopsis notes under s 141 may be referred to.

30. 'In Prosecution of the Common Object of that Assembly'

No doubt, the philosophy behind s 149 of the IPC is to fasten a person with vicarious liability for the offence committed by another person. Even then it is essential that the offence should have been committed in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly. One can be convicted with the help of s 149 only if he was a member of the unlawful assembly. He could be tagged with membership of the assembly when the common object of the assembly was to commit the offence which any one among them has committed. Unless the offence was committed prosecution of the common object of that assembly (or such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object), even membership of the assembly is insufficient to drag him to the net. The word prosecution in s 149 1075 means to follow up or pursue. There must be some proximate connection between the offence perpetrated and the common object perceived.

The expression 'in prosecution of common object' as appearing in s 149, IPC have to be strictly construed as equivalent to 'in order to attain the common object'. It must be immediately connected with the common object by virtue of the nature of the object.[38] The expression 'in prosecution of the common object', therefore means that the offence committed must have had a perceptible nexus with the common object. For fastening a person with vicarious liability under s 149, it is not enough to show that the particular member of the unlawful assembly intended to commit a particular offence. Unless the court can with reasonable certainty hold that persons assembled together were huddled by a common object, no person can be convicted for what another has done even though the presence of the former at or near the place of occurrence stood established [39]

The phrase 'in prosecution of the common object' is not defined in the Code. It occurs in s 146 also and the notes under that section may also be referred to. 'Prosecution', however, means 'following up or pursuit', and, generally speaking; everything done for the purpose of achieving the desired object can be taken to have been done in prosecution of that object. There must be some connection between the offence and the common object. The connection must be proximate and not too remote. The act must help the attainment of the object or at least smoothen the path towards the goal.[40] The expression 'in prosecution of the common object', therefore, means that the offence committed must have a nexus with the common object and by committing the offence and various other illegal acts, the common object of the unlawful assembly is accomplished or attained.[41] The words 'in prosecution of the common object' have to be strictly construed as equivalent to 'in order to attain the common object'.[42] Under the first part of this section it is essential that the offence must have been committed by a member of the unlawful assembly 'in prosecution of the common object of that assembly'.[43] But the phrase occurs in both parts of the section and the mere fact that the legislature thought fit to express the second alternative appears to show very distinctly that it did not intend the words 'in prosecution' which are found in the first to be equivalent to 'during the prosecution', for if they were, then the second alternative would have clearly been unnecessary.[44] It has been held that in order to fall within the first part of the section, i.e., in order to be committed in prosecution of the common object, the offence committed must be immediately connected with that common object by virtue of the nature of the1076 object.[45] In a case, their Lordships of the Supreme Court held that the first part of the section means that the offence committed in prosecution of the common object must be one which is committed with a view to accomplish the common object, and that in order that the case may fall under the first part, the offence committed must be connected immediately with the common object of the unlawful assembly of which the accused were members.[46]

Where only accused A2 gave fatal blow, and other accused A2, A3 and A5 had not caused any injury but had carried deadly weapons; the knowledge that grievous injury may be caused can be attributed to them. Accused A2, A3 and A5 could not be convicted under s 302 read with s 149, IPC ; thus, they were convicted under s 326 read with s 149 of the IPC .[47]

When the seven accused persons of the procession consisting of more than five thousand persons carrying the dead body of the deceased (killed in another incident on road) turned violent and committed the murder of the deceased, District Magistrate (subject matter of the present trial), the members of the procession did not know that the deceased was coming from that direction, the members of the procession were held not members of the unlawful assembly, and could not be said to have common object to commit the murder of the deceased. The conviction of the seven accused persons for offence under s 302 read with s 149, IPC was held not proper.[48]

The accused appellants in furtherance of their common object assaulted the deceased with dharia, axe and sword; inflicting multiple injuries causing death. The conviction of the accused appellants under s 302 read with s 149 of the IPC was held proper.[49]

Three out of six accused persons were armed with fire-arms, but no fire arm was used and as such no fire arm injury was caused to the deceased. Held, the common object of the unlawfully assembly was not to cause the death of the deceased. Accused who were armed with axe and sword had assaulted the witnesses; they were convicted under s 324 read with s 149 of the IPC .[50]

The incident of the accused fleeing away from the place of occurrence together will not be conclusive and determinative of the liability of the accused for the substantive offence under s 302 with the aid of s 149, IPC . In the present case there was no convincing and consistent evidence of any individual overt act on the part of any of the accused appellants to implicate any or all of them for causing the fatal injuries on the body of the deceased. Therefore, it could not be reasonably inferred that the accused appellants, as members of an unlawful assembly, had any common1077 object to commit the offence of murder of the deceased. Accused appellants were acquitted of the offences under s 302, IPC read with s 149 of the IPC .[51]

Where the evidence showing the two accused who were members of unlawful assembly and armed with deadly weapons came along with other accused and participated in murderous assault on both the victims, the finding that he had not caused any serious injuries to the two victims and no specific role was attributed to these two accused and acquitting these accused is illegal as the scope of s 149, IPC, is wide enough to hold these two accused guilty with the aid of s 149, IPC for substantive offences punishable under s 302, IPC .[52]

There was evidence mob of 18-20 persons after coming to the dalan of the deceased forced them to handover their gun by show of force. an offence under s 384 was, therefore, clearly made out and with the aid of s 149, IPC all the appellants were held guilty of that offence.[53]

Where accused persons formed an unlawful assembly and equipped with weapons came to the place of incident, they all have actively participated in the incident which has resulted in death of the accused; this clearly indicates the state of mind of the accused persons, which reflects forming of an unlawful assembly and acting in furtherance of a common object. It would, therefore, not be necessary for the prosecution to establish as to who caused the fatal injury to the accused. It stands, therefore, established that they had approached the place of incident in furtherance of their common object and to fulfil that common object, they unitedly assaulted the deceased and caused injuries to them, which ultimately resulted in his death.[54] Accused appellants had formed unlawful assembly, had committed the murder of two persons and caused injuries to the prosecution witnesses. When the police had called the accused appellants to the police station, they were carrying swords with them which demonstrated that they had prior intention in their mind to commit the murder of the two deceased. They were convicted under ss 302 and 324 read with s 149 of the IPC .[55]

All the accused persons came after the conch-shell was blown. They gave clarion calls. They exhorted others to kill the Dharas. They burnt the houses of Dharas. They killed the Dharas even though the witnesses came and requested not to attack them. Two of the accused attacked two ladies with katari. After the murders were committed, they picked up the dead bodies and threw them on the land near the bund and then they fled away. Their conduct before the attack, at the time of the attack, after the attack and near the scene of offence clearly indicated that they were members of the unlawful assembly, the common object of which was to murder the Dharas and set fire to their houses. The conviction of the accused appellants with the aid of s 149, IPC was sustained.[56]

Accused armed with lethal weapons gave blows on the head of the deceased causing death. However, there was no evidence to show that the occurrence was a1078 pre-arranged plan. Accused persons were not convicted for offences under ss 148 and 149, IPC .[57]

Test Laid Down

In Madat Khan v Empress ,[58] Plowden J, held:

> The test whether an offence is committed in prosecution of common object is, whether the common object is prosecuted in fact as well as in the intention of the doer. When that is the case, every person who is engaged in prosecuting the same object may well be held guilty of an offence which fulfils or tends to fulfil the object which he is himself engaged in prosecuting. It must, however, be clearly understood that offence executes or tends to execute the common object, unless the commission of that offence is involved in the common object.

But it has been held that in a case under s 149, IPC, it is immaterial whether any member of the unlawful assembly intended to commit that offence or not. 'Intention' can be considered only in a case governed by s 34 .[59] All that can be said is that the commission of the offence must be necessarily involved in the execution of the common object. Where the common object was only to abduct a woman and murder was committed in the course of the abduction, it cannot be said that the murder was committed in prosecution of the common object as murder is not essential in order to achieve that common object.[60] But if the members of the unlawful assembly intended and made preparations to go to any length, even to the extent of causing death, in order to attain their common object, murder may be said to have been committed in prosecution of the common object within the meaning of the first part of s 149 .[61] In a case, it has been held that the commission of the offence must have been in the contemplation of the unlawful assembly directly or impliedly.[62] An extreme view is that the first part of section should be confined to cases where the common object of the assembly is to commit an offence and that offence is committed by a member of the assembly in prosecution, or execution of the common object. This is how the Supreme Court has explained this part of the section in Shambhu Nath v State of Bihar :[63]

> If the common object of the assembly was only to chastise a person, from the mere fact that some members of the assembly were armed with deadly weapons like spears, it cannot necessarily be inferred that their common object was to kill that person or anyone who offered resistance. If the common object was to chastise A, and B is killed, it cannot be said that B's death was caused in prosecution of the common object of the assembly.[64]1079

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 149.

Every member of unlawful assembly guilty of offence committed in prosecution of common object.--

31. 'Or Such as the Members of that Assembly Knew to be Likely to be Committed in Prosecution of that Object'

Actually, in every case under this section it is not necessary that the common object should directly be to commit a particular offence. It is sufficient that the particular result was such that the members of the assembly knew to be likely to be committed in the prosecution of that common object.[65] It has been held that the section fixes liability on a member of an unlawful assembly for an offence which he himself did not commit in either of the two cases mentioned in the two parts of the section, namely: (a) where it was committed in prosecution of the common object, i.e., in order to achieve or accomplish the common object of the unlawful assembly of which he was a member; and (b) where the members of the assembly knew it to be likely to be committed. If a case does not fall under the first alternative it may yet fall under the second.[66] The section thus applies not only to offences actually committed in pursuance of the common object, but even to offences which members of the assembly knew were likely to be committed.[67] And if there be such offence as the members of the assembly knew to be likely to be committed by a person engaged in prosecuting the common object, and acting with the purpose of executing it, it may fairly be imputed to the other members of the assembly.

32. Meaning of 'Knew' and 'Likely'

The second clause of the section indicates clearly that offences not likely to be committed in prosecuting the common object, and even, offences likely to be committed but not known to be likely, are to be excluded from imputable offences.[68] The Allahabad High Court has, however, held that the use of the word 'likely' in the second part of the section means some clear evidence that the unlawful assembly had such knowledge.[69]

The word 'knew' has been advisedly used in the section and cannot be made to bear the sense of 'might have known'.[70] It does not mean a mere possibility such as might or might not happen.[71] The use of the word 'likely' in the second part of the section implies something more than a possibility. A thing is likely to happen only when it will probably happen or may very well happen.[72] For the second part of the section to apply there must be an expectation founded upon facts known to all the members, amounting to something more than a mere speculation.[73] The word 'knew' in s 149, IPC, implies the existence of facts from which a certain inference is so irresistible as to amount to a certainty. This knowledge or state of mind must be1080 shown to exist at the time of the offence, and not the knowledge acquired in the light of subsequent events.[74] Such knowledge may be collected from the nature of the assembly, its common object, the kind of arms which its members bear, and their behaviour at or before the actual conflict.[75] It is highly significant that the legislature refrained from including in the section some such expression as 'or had reason to believe'; further the likelihood of the result must be 'in the prosecution of the common object' and not through some other reason.[76] Knowledge must be proved.[77] It is necessary for the prosecution to show that the members of the assembly did not merely know that the offence was likely to be committed but further that it was likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object of the assembly.[78] Unless such knowledge is proved, the members who did not actually take part in the commission of the offence cannot be held constructively liable for same under this section.[79] Where the accused person armed with an axe and the rest armed with sticks assaulted the deceased resulting in death of five persons and injury to others, all accused persons knowing that the main accused was armed with an axe but still continued in the said assembly and killed three other deceased by chasing them, the accused persons were guilty of sharing a common object of unlawful assembly because the facts of the case squarely fell within the purview of second part of s 149, IPC .[80] The appellant and his four companions arrived on the spot, one of them gave knife blow to the deceased on his thigh which cut his femoral artery and caused death. The appellant did not know that the assailant had knife with him; he was acquitted of the charge under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[81]

The complainant himself stated that when PW6 intervened and tried to save him, suddenly accused B took out a knife (Churi) and assaulted him. This showed that other appellants/co-accused had no knowledge of the fact that B was having a knife in his possession. Held, the other co-accused could not be held guilty for the act of accused B, therefore, prosecution failed to prove that appellants/accused persons had made unlawful assembly and caused incised wound to the complainant in furtherance of common object of the same.[82]

The Question is One of Fact

No hard and fast rule can be laid down as to the circumstances under which one member can be deemed guilty of an offence committed by another. Every case must1081 be decided on its own merits,[83] the question, in each case, being one of fact, as to whether the offence was contemplated or was known to be likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object by members of the party other than the principal offender.[84] Where five accused persons, armed with deadly weapons, intercepted the deceased, accosted him and, after causing fatal injuries, ran away together, it was held that there was no escape from the conclusion that all the five accused came and worked with one design and object and they definitely knew of the fatal consequences that actually ensued as a result of the conjoint attack to make them all vicariously responsible under s 149, IPC .[85]

The medical evidence was that individually the injury on the right partial region was sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature and cumulatively all the injuries were sufficient to cause death, in such a situation it can safely be inferred that the murder of the deceased was committed in furtherance of the common object of the five accused who had formed an unlawful assembly for that express object, at any rate they knew that the same could be committed, as contemplated by the second part of s 149, IPC .[86]

Where, out of six assailants, four carried one farsa and one spear, visible to all, and all assailants came together, it was held that each of the assailants had the opportunity of seeing the spear and farsa; the use of those weapons was a possibility within the knowledge of every one of the members and as such each of them was responsible not merely for what he might have thought was the original common object but also for everything they had reason to know was likely to be done in prosecution of that common object.[87] If the accused, with common object to dispossess the deceased and his sons from the land and to assault them, if resistance was offered in the achievement of that object, go to the place of the occurrence armed with lathis, bhalas and tangi, they must know that grievous injury with deadly weapons was likely to be caused to the victim in the occurrence. Therefore, they cannot escape punishment for the offence under s 326, read with s 149, IPC .[88]

33. Cases of Free Fight

In a case of free fight, s 149 cannot be applied.[89] In a sudden and mutual fight between two groups s 149, IPC cannot be involved for imposing constructive criminal liability; each accused will have to be held liable for individual injury caused by him.[90]

1082In case of free-fight between the parties, the principle of unlawful assembly is not attracted and both sides can be convicted for their individual acts. Each accused should be fastened with the individual liability in relation to the specific role attributable to each of such individuals and since in a free fight it becomes difficult for the Court to ascertain as to who was the aggressor, the safer course of action is to pick up individual acts for punishing individual accused persons.[91]

In Puran v State of Rajasthan ,[92] the Supreme Court had held that in case of sudden fight the question of invoking s 149, IPC does not arise. In a recent case, applying s 149 to a case of free fight it has, however, held that the question of one party being aggressor may not arise. However, the members of each party would be members of the unlawful assembly with the common object to fight. But the nature of the participation, the weapons used and the injuries caused would also be relevant to infer the nature of the common object.[93] In another case before the Supreme Court though it was not found safe to hold that the common object of the unlawful assembly was to commit murder and that everyone knew that and that same would attract s 302, IPC, but under the circumstances, the accused armed with deadly weapons formed into an unlawful assembly with a view to fight with the other side and attacked them. One of the deceased received two fatal injuries and the other deceased received only one fatal injury. In such circumstances, the members of the unlawful assembly must be held to have knowledge that some of them are likely to cause injuries and thereby likely to cause death. In other words, they had the knowledge that at least an offence of culpable homicide was likely to be committed. It was held that under these circumstances they can safely be convicted under s 304, Pt II read with s 149, IPC .[94] Where it is apparent that none of the appellants had any intention to kill any particular person on the side of the prosecution party and both the parties were itching for a confrontation and a clash. In a sense, prosecution party and appellants came to a clash and had a free fight. In this background, it will not be safe to record a finding that the appellants had any common object to commit the murder of B they had only common object to cause grievous hurt to the members of the prosecution party. This is apparent from the fact that only P gave gandasi blow on the head of B, none of the remaining five appellants are alleged to have given any blows to him from the weapons held by them. If they had also shared common object to cause the murder of B, then in normal course, it was expected that they would have also attacked B, instead of causing incised injuries and abrasions on the other members of the prosecution party. Appellants were accordingly held guilty under s 326 read with s 149 and not under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[95]

Where there was a free fight between two parties resulting in death of the deceased but there was no conclusive evidence to show that the accused started the fight, injuries on accused were not satisfactorily explained by the prosecution but injuries on the side of the prosecution were more in number which was no ground to conclude that accused were aggressors, the accused were held entitled to the benefit1083 of doubt and were acquitted of the changes under ss 147, 123, 325 / 149 and 304 / 149, IPC .[1]

In a case of free fight between two parties, the question of formation of unlawful assembly and common intention does not arise. Each accused is therefore, responsible for individual acts committed by him.[2]

Where there was a free fight between two parties, both the parties were armed with deadly weapons, the prosecution suppressed injuries suffered by the accused persons in the FIR and later on failed to explain them. It also omitted to mention in the FIR that the informant side had used weapons in self-defense. Accused persons were held entitled to be acquitted for the offences under ss 149, 302 and 323, IPC .[3]

34. Proof of the Requisite Knowledge

Under the second part of this section the liability of the other members of the offence committed during the continuance of the occurrence rests upon the knowledge of the other members beforehand that the offence, actually committed, was likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object. If such knowledge may not reasonably be attributed to them, their liabilities for the offence will not arise.[4] Where no injury was inflicted pursuant to the common object to kill the deceased and injury was caused by one member only when provoked by one of the other members, all the members of unlawful assembly cannot be presumed to be aware of offence of murder and hence, not guilty under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[5] In every case, it would be an issue to be determined whether the offence committed falls within the first part of the section or it was an offence such as the members of the assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object and falls within the second part.[6]

35. Inference of Knowledge of Common Object from Relevant Facts

Common object, as contemplated by s 149 of the IPC, does not require prior concert or meeting of minds before the attack. Generally, no direct evidence is available regarding the existence of common object which, in each case, has to be ascertained from the attending facts and circumstances. When a concerted attack is made on the victim by a large number of persons armed with deadly weapons, it is often difficult to determine the actual part played by each offender and easy to hold that such persons who attacked the victim, had the common object for an offence which was known to be likely to be committed in prosecution of such an object. Where the persons forming the assembly are shown to be having identical interest in pursuance of which some of them come armed, others though not armed would, under the normal circumstances, be deemed to be the members of the unlawful assembly. The facts and circumstances of the case unequivocally prove the existence of the common object of such persons forming the unlawful assembly who had come on the spot and1084 attacked the complainant party.[7] Whether or not the other members of the assembly had the requisite knowledge may reasonably be collected from the nature of the assembly, arms, or behaviour at or before the occurrence.[8] The Kerala High Court has held that the manner in which the five or more accused persons came in concert and the blows, which they gave to the deceased with dangerous weapons, and then escaped from the scene with the weapons, constitute them members of an unlawful assembly and demonstrate what their common object was. In determining what offences the accused are guilty of, it is necessary to find what the common object of the assembly would have been considering all the circumstances and nature of injuries that were inflicted upon the deceased. Where a concerted attack is made on the victim by a large number of persons, it is often difficult to determine the actual part played by each of them. If the injuries, that are sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, are traced to a particular accused, he will be guilty of an offence under s 302 without the aid of s 149, IPC . When the injuries caused are cumulatively sufficient to cause death, it is necessary, before holding each of the accused guilty under s 302 read with s 149, to find that the common object of the unlawful assembly was to cause death or that the members of the unlawful assembly knew it to be likely that an offence under s 302, IPC, would be committed in prosecution of the common object. The common object of an assembly is to be ascertained from the acts and language of the members, composing it, and from a consideration of all the surrounding circumstances. On an analysis of the injuries in a given case, and taking into account all the circumstances, if the court is not satisfied that the common object of the assembly was to cause death, it cannot be said that any of the persons, who inflicted the injuries, intended to cause death or such injury as is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. Where the injuries are incised wounds, not individually sufficient to cause death, and the only words by way of exhortation uttered by the first accused was to state the object of the unlawful assembly could have been only to cause grievous injury, the accused can, in such a case, be found guilty of the offence punishable under s 326 read with s 149, IPC .[9] In the opinion of the Madhya Pradesh High Court when lathis are carried, one can be certain that the common object is at least to cause hurt, and in addition that the members are aware of the possibility at least of grievous hurt. Whether they would be aware also of the possibility of killing in the prosecution of the common object would depend upon various circumstances, in particular, the number in the assembly, the nature of the weapons, and the number of injuries caused to the persons who are actually killed.[10]

Evidence of the eye-witnesses established that all the eight appellants accused persons were armed with weapons; they surrounded the deceased and prevented others from going near the deceased to rescue him. They had arrived together in the same jeep and left by jeep after the incident. Jeep was kept in starting position. Appellant accused were convicted under s 302, IPC read with s 149, IPC .[11]

1085The prosecution evidence did not show that the accused persons came to the spot together, or that after the commission of crime all of them left together, they did not carry any arm, no overt act was attributed to them; they were given benefit of doubt and acquitted of charge under s 149, IPC .[12]

Where accused (alleged to be dacoits) formed an unlawful assembly with the common object of committing murder of the police force, they allegedly fired at the police party in prosecution of the common object and had an encounter with the police party, one of the accused died on the spot and others got injured, the Allahabad High Court held that it was astonishing that there was an allegation of firing shots by the accused in the prosecution of the aforesaid common object, but the prosecution side (police and public witnesses) did not receive even a scratch on their bodies by the alleged firing in the prosecution of the common object and the accused received firearm injuries by the firing from the side of the police, the conviction of the accused by Sessions Court for offences under ss 147 and 307 / 149, IPC was, therefore, set aside.[13]

Common Object how Inferred

The Supreme Court has expressed the view that the common object has to be gathered or inferred from the various circumstances like membership, nature of the weapons, the force used and the injuries that are caused as well as other surrounding circumstances. After carefully going through the medical evidence, the Supreme Court found in a case that it is difficult to conclude that the common object was to cause the death. If their intention was to cause death, they would have used the lethal weapons in a different way and would not have merely inflicted simple injuries on the non-vital parts like legs and hands.[14] Going as a body alone cannot be a decisive factor in inferring the common object.[15] In a case of frequent movement of rival groups at the time of election the Supreme Court held that in applying s 149, IPC the court has to be satisfied about the common object and fix the membership of the accused in the alleged unlawful assembly. As on the day of occurrence an election had taken place and one can see as to how the atmosphere could have been prevailing in view of the long standing enmity between the two rival groups. Admittedly the factions of the two rival groups were moving out briskly in the village, it was, therefore, difficult to say that even if four or five members were moving that all of them could have been members of an unlawful assembly with a particular

object.[16]

36. Mere Knowledge of Likely Commission of Act

Apart from any act of commission of offence by any member of unlawful assembly, mere knowledge of likely commission of such an act also comes within purview of s 149 .[17]No overt act by each member of the assembly is necessary to attract s 149, IPC . Where a concerted attack is made on the victims by a large number of persons it is often difficult to determine the actual part played by each offender. But on that account for an offence committed by a member of the unlawful assembly in the prosecution of the common object or for an offence which was known to be likely to1086 be committed in prosecution of the common object, persons proved to be members cannot escape the consequences arising from the doing of that act which amounts to an offence.[18]

37. Inference Regarding Knowledge to Cause Death

In Mizaji v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[19] it was observed:

> For instance it is a matter of common knowledge that when in a village a body of heavily armed men set out to take a woman by force, someone is likely to be killed and all the members of the unlawful assembly must be aware of that likelihood and would be guilty under the second part of section 149 .

If a body of persons go armed to take forcible possession of the land, they will have the knowledge that murder is likely to be committed if the circumstances as to the weapons carried and other conduct of the members of the unlawful assembly clearly point to such knowledge on the part of them all.

In Hukam Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[20] the Supreme Court held that when several persons armed with lathis, and one of them armed with a hatchet agreed to use these weapons in case they were thwarted in the achievement of their object, they will be believed to be prepared to use violence in prosecution of their common object and to know that in the prosecution of such common object it was likely that someone may be so injured as to die as a result of those injuries.

Where some members of the assembly accompanied the others seeing that they were armed with swords, and, so far from attempting to prevent the use of those weapons, encouraged it by shouting 'maro', it was held that they were in the same position as those members who struck the actual blows.[21]

Where a person carries a firearm in the dead of night and uses it and then continues a fight after an excited crowd has assembled and some nine persons rush in to join in the beating after the first shot, they must know either that somebody is likely to deal a fatal blow or at least that the cumulative effect of the blows inflicted by a number of persons armed with lathis is likely to cause death from shock.[22]

Where a number of persons indulge in beating a man with sharp-edged weapons like kirpans they must know that death is likely to be caused. Where, therefore, numerous injuries were caused to a person by four members of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of their common object, and one of the injuries proved fatal, but it could not be found which of the assailants caused that particular injury, it was held that all four assailants must have known that murder was likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object and were, therefore, liable for the offence under s 302 read with s 149 .[23]

Where two members of an unlawful assembly used spears and deliberately pierced another person through the chest and abdomen, with the knowledge that death was likely to ensue, all the members of the unlawful assembly were held guilty of1087 murder.[24] Members of a party setting out heavily armed for the purpose of committing dacoity must know that there is every likelihood of something occurring to interfere with their criminal plans and that the deliberate intention of the party is to use their arms, wherever necessary, so that if arms are used on the way, all the members of the party are collectively responsible.[25]

Where a number of persons, two of whom were armed with pistols, set out to abduct a woman and a person was shot in prosecution of the common object, the obvious inference was that the pistols were intended to be used, if necessary, to overcome any resistance, and that the members of the gang knew that murder was very likely to be committed.[26]

But where after the object of an unlawful assembly is accomplished, and the opposite party is driven away, one of the members enters into an altercation with another and wounds him with a fish-spear, the act will not be one done with a view to accomplish the common object of the assembly, or one which the rest knew would be likely to be committed in the prosecution of that object.[27]

38. Liability Attaches only to Members of an Assembly 'At the Time of Committing that Offence'

It is not all the members of an unlawful assembly but only those who are members thereof 'at the time of the commission of the offence' who are made constructively liable under this section. Under s 143, IPC, a person is punishable only for being a member of an unlawful assembly. No question of the commission of any offence arises there. Under s 144, IPC, it is only a member of the unlawful assembly who is armed with a deadly weapon that is made liable. If force or violence is used by any member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of the assembly, every member of the assembly is liable for rioting under s 147, IPC . There is no qualification in that section, that the person should be a member of the assembly at the time when the force or violence was used. But under this section one member of an unlawful assembly is made liable for an offence committed by another, only if he and the person committing the offence are both members of the assembly 'at the time of the committing of that offence'. being a member at the time of the commission of the offence thus becomes an essential condition of liability under the section, and has to be proved by the prosecution.[28] Generally, however, it is, as pointed out by Ahmed J in the case last cited, a matter of inference from the facts and circumstances of each case. Where, in the course of a single transaction, many acts are committed by different members of the unlawful assembly in quick succession within a short time, the inference may be in favour of a person continuing to be a member of that assembly till the close of the transaction, for in such a case the probabilities are against an inference of any member of the assembly retiring in the midst of the transaction.[29]

1088If a person arraigned ceases to be a member of the unlawful assembly before commission of the offence, he cannot be held liable for the offence with the aid of s 149, IPC .[30] If a person is only a silent spectator, he would not be a member of the unlawful assembly or he ceases to be a member of the unlawful assembly before the actual commission of the offence, he would not be vicariously liable with the aid of s 149, IPC .[31]

This section cannot apply unless there is proximity of time and place both between members of an unlawful assembly and the criminal acts of individual members of that assembly, for there obviously cannot be an assembly unless five or more persons constituting it are at the same place, while the section itself speaks distinctly of 'at the time' of the committing of the offence.[32] Members of an unlawful assembly present at the time of the commission of the offence taking part in the fight are liable under this section.[33]

The prosecution must prove in each case that the person concerned was not only a member of the unlawful assembly at the some stage, but at all the crucial stages he shared the common object of the assembly at all these stages.[34] But where the persons participating in an assault upon the deceased are members of one unlawful assembly, the mere fact that some of the members of that assembly run away after inflicting one or two injuries each upon the deceased cannot absolve them of the responsibility for the death, even though it was not the direct result of the injuries inflicted by anyone of them but was the cumulative result of the injuries inflicted by them and other members of the same unlawful assembly. It is impossible to dissociate the act done by one member of an unlawful assembly from the acts of other members of the same assembly if all those acts form part of the same transaction.[35]

39. Physical Participation if Necessary

It is well settled that if an offence is committed by some members of an unlawful assembly then the other members of the assembly are also liable for the offence under s 149, IPC .[36] Every accused is responsible vicariously for causing death. Even if any of the accused might not have caused a single injury to the deceased, because he was a member of the assembly and in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly he knew that the greater probability was that death would be caused.[37] The circumstance that the other accused remained outside the house of the complainant to provide cover to the assailants/accused shows that all accused persons formed an unlawful assembly with common intention to kill deceased persons.[38]

1089Persons present at the place of occurrence may be liable even if they did not take any part in the beating which was their common object.[39] It is not correct to say when dealing with an offence under this section that all the persons must combine together or help one another at the time of the assault.[40] Where persons join an unlawful assembly for the purpose of committing an assault, and, instead of preventing those armed from using their weapons, encourage them to do so they are in the same position as those members of the unlawful assembly who struck the blows.[41]But where four out of eight accused persons were women, the only act attributed to them was that of throwing chili powder, it could be said that they were falsely implicated, and charge of unlawful assembly and rioting against them would fail in the absence of proof of their participation.[42] Where only two accused persons had participated in the occurrence, conviction for forming unlawful assembly under s 148, IPC, was set aside.[43] Non-mentioning of names of some accused, who were attributed very important role in the incident, in the FIR lodged by the eyewitnesses of the occurrence throws doubt on the participation in the crime by the said accused persons who therefore are entitled to the benefit of doubt.[44] Where the physical presence on the spot and involvement of the accused is found doubtful, he would not be convicted with the aid of s 149 .[45]

Where the testimony of the prosecution witnesses about the role played by the two appellants accused was inconsistent and doubtful, both were acquitted of the charge under s 149, IPC .[46]

The prosecution in case under s 302 read with s 149, IPC did not assign any overt act to the appellant accused N, son of the accused L, alleged to be present on the spot. Even if N was present when the occurrence took place, there was nothing to suggest that he shared the common object of the unlawful assembly, and he did not take any part in the assault. Admittedly, large number of persons had come to the ghat that day for taking a bath in river Ganges. It was considered not safe to convict appellant accused N merely on the ground that he was present. He was given benefit of doubt and was acquitted of all the charges under s 302 read with s 149 IPC .[47]

40. Mere Spectator not Liable

Where a member of the assembly is present when murder is being committed by other members, in prosecution of their common object and there is nothing to show or suggest of that assembly, he would be liable under this section.[48]

A mere spectator taking no part in the affairs is not liable.[49]1090

41. No Liability of Person Separated from Unlawful Assembly

Where a gang of persons making preparations to commit dacoity was discovered and pursued by a body of villagers who succeeded in arresting two of the members and, at or about this critical moment, one of the dacoits at large fired his gun and killed a villager, it was held that the two members arrested, having been, by force of circumstances separated from the gang before the unseized dacoit shot at and killed the villager, could not be visited with liability for the murder committed by a member of the gang to which they no longer belonged.[50]

Where a member of an unlawful assembly was, at the outset of the rioting, fell down and while he was lying unconscious, the other members of the assembly pursued the opponents and committed murder, it was held that he was not a member of the unlawful assembly at the time of the committing of the murder, and could not be held liable for it under this section.[51]

Two opposing factions meet and fight. A is wounded and retires. Afterwards B is killed. A, having ceased to be a member of an unlawful assembly, is not guilty of the murder.[52]

Where a group of persons took away cattle forcibly and raised shouts to assault the complainant party, however, only one accused caused death of the deceased by a single blow, there was no evidence that the other co-accused were members of an unlawful assembly or were armed with deadly weapons, the co-accused also did not make any overt act of causing hurt, the co-accused were held not liable to be convicted for offences under ss 323 and 149, IPC .[53]

42. Extent of Liability of Members--Liability under First Part--Limited Liability Under Second Part

This section is declaratory of the vicarious liability of the members of an unlawful assembly for acts done in prosecution of its common object or for such offences as the members thereof knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object. As regards the extent of the vicarious or constructive liability, the section begins with the words: 'If an offence is committed by any member of an unlawful assembly' and, at the end declares that every member of the assembly 'is guilty of that offence'. Reading these two portions of the section alone, it might appear and it was so held in Ram Prasad Singh v King-Emperor ,[54] that if a member of an unlawful assembly is to be found constructively guilty of an offence, it must be the same offence of which the principal is guilty and not some other offence. That is so if the case falls under the first part of the section.[55] If an unlawful assembly is formed with the common object of committing an offence and if that offence is committed in prosecution of the object by any member of the unlawful assembly, all the members of the assembly will be vicariously liable for that offence even if one or more, but not all, committed the offence. But if the case falls under the second part of the section, the words1091 'guilty of that offence' at the end, must be taken to refer to 'the offence' such as the members of that assembly 'knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object'. In a case falling under the second part of the section, therefore, the vicarious liability will be limited to the offence which the members knew to be likely to be committed. Once an assembly becomes unlawful, all things done in the prosecution of the common unlawful object of that assembly are chargeable against every member thereof. The liability of every member extends not only to the acts intended by all to be done, but also to those offences which were likely to be committed in achieving the common object.[56] Where some of the accused went near the place of occurrence and joined an unlawful assembly and took part in beating those who came there, from the evidence on record it cannot be said that they knew that death was likely to be caused in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly of which they became a part later on, these accused persons were held liable to be convicted under s 323 read with s 149 while the accused persons who formed the unlawful assembly and assaulted the deceased and continued to beat others who came to rescue them were held liable to be convicted under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[57]

It has to be determined, with reference to the facts of the case, what offence the members must have known to be likely to be committed. If such offence is a minor offence, then they should be convicted accordingly.[58] As long ago as 1894 it was pointed out in Jamiruddin v Queen-Empress :[59]

> Members of an unlawful assembly may have a community of object only up to a certain points beyond which they may differ in their objects, and that the knowledge possessed by each member of what is likely to be committed in prosecution of their common object, will vary, not only according to the information at his command, but also according to the extent to which he shares the community of object; and, as a consequence of this, the effect of s 149 of the IPC, may be different on different members of the same unlawful assembly.

The same view still holds good. Therefore, a conviction for an offence under s 326 read with s 149, IPC may be recorded against the members of an unlawful assembly, even if it be established that an offence of murder was committed by a member of that assembly. The offence under s 326 of the Indian Penal Code is in relation to the offence of murder a minor offence and the language used in s 149 of the IPC does not prevent the court from convicting for that minor offence merely because an aggravated offence is committed.[60]

43. When Common Object of Unlawful Assembly not Murder but Murder is Committed

Each case must necessarily be decided on the facts that can be found on the evidence led in the case. If the facts established show that the common object was to commit murder, it would be a simple matter and, every member of the assembly would be1092 liable for the killing. The difficulty, however, arises when the common object of the assembly is not murder but some other unlawful object, and death is caused in the course of the achievement of that object. The question that arises, in such a case, is whether the evidence discloses that in achieving the common object, which was not the commission of murder, the members of the assembly were determined to go to any length, even to the length of committing murder. If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, the commission of murder will be deemed to have been included within the common object of the assembly. On the other hand, if the answer to the question is in the negative, and yet, on the sudden coming into existence of an unexpected situation, death is caused by the isolated act of one of the members of the assembly, that member alone will be liable for the killing, and the aid of this section cannot, in such a case, be invoked to fasten liability for the murder on the other members of the assembly.[61]

Where the members of an unlawful assembly animated with the common intention of causing grievous hurt, cause death, and it is found that one of them was immediately responsible for one of the deaths caused, that member is guilty of the offences of rioting under s 147, IPC, and of culpable homicide under s 304, and the rest are guilty of rioting and causing grievous hurt under s 325, read with s 149 of IPC .[62] Where the common object of all accused persons was proved only to the extent of giving beating to the deceased and not to commit murder, conviction of accused persons under s 300, IPC, was set aside and all accused were held liable to be convicted under s 324 read with s 149, IPC, as one of the accused was carrying a deadly weapon with the knowledge of other accused persons.[63]

Where the accused persons were alleged to have caused firearm injuries on the deceased, however, except one incised injury on the skull of the deceased all other injuries were found to be lacerated injuries on legs, no injuries were found on vital parts of the body, it was held that the common object of the unlawful assembly was to cause grievous hurt and not murder. The conviction of accused persons was altered from s 302 read with s 149 and s 326 read with s 149, IPC .[64] Where the evidence proved that motive of the accused party was to remove babul trees from the field at any cost and cause such injury as may be necessary for that purpose, some of the accused, however, started assaulting immediately after reaching the spot, the other accused persons cannot be conclusively said to have known that murders were likely to be committed in prosecution of their common object so as to attract the second part of s 149 and so were held liable to be convicted under s 326 read with s 149 and not s 300 read with s 149, the accused who acted beyond the common object of the unlawful assembly, however, were liable to be convicted under s 300 read with s 34 IPC .[65] Most of the injuries were deep incised wounds of varying sizes. Additionally, multiple fractures on the base of the occipital bone were noticed. The intention of the assailants as established by the evidence of the witnesses was to cause death of the deceased and not to cause grievous injury. The accused were convicted under s 302 1093 read with s 149 of the IPC, and the conviction recorded by the trial court was restored.[66]

Where accused persons went to the house of the complainant armed with lathis to belabour them, the main accused was not a member of the assembly and picked a heavy stone and dropped it from the roof of his house on the head of the deceased who had arrived there. The act of the main accused was an isolated act unconnected with purpose or object of the unlawful assembly formed by the accused persons, the accused persons were held not guilty of offence under s 304, Pt II read with s 149, however, there was sufficient evidence with regard to formation of unlawful assembly and causing injury to the complainant and others, so, their conviction under s 323 read with ss 149 and 148, IPC, was found proper, the main accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[67]

Where in a case of political rivalry the group of opposite party workers including the appellants/accused alleged to be armed with deadly weapons attacked the deceased and his co-workers, they also chased them from one house to another and ultimately hacked the deceased to death, eyewitness evidence was that all the appellants/accused were members of the unlawful assembly but one of the eyewitnesses stated that appellants/accused did not continue to be members of the unlawful assembly at the time the deceased met with his death, on these facts it was held that appellants/accused cannot be convicted under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, but are liable only under s 307 read with s 149, IPC, for attempting to commit murder of the deceased.[68]

Where prior to occurrence there was no cause of friction between two parties, accused persons came to the spot duly armed not with the purpose of causing injury but to enjoy the sport of fishing, the unlawful assembly formed spontaneously and did not have the sole object of causing murder, but only to cause assault, the degree and gravity of the assault has to be considered, the death of the deceased persons was caused by the sole fatal injury inflicted by means of an arrow, the accused causing the said injuries individually were held guilty under s 302, IPC, remaining accused who did not touch the deceased at all were acquitted of the charge under s 300 read with s 149 but their conviction under s 307 read with s 149, IPC, was upheld.[69]

Where the common object of an unlawful assembly was criminal trespass and no injury was inflicted pursuant to the common object to kill the deceased, the injury was caused by one member only when provoked by one of the other members, it was held that all the members of unlawful assembly were not guilty of the offence under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, as they cannot be presumed to be aware of the offence of murder. Only the accused who caused the injury and the one who instigated him to inflict injury were held guilty under s 302 read with s 34, IPC, and all other accused were held guilty of offences punishable under ss 147, 148 and 323 read with s 149, IPC .[70]1094

44. Omission to Ask Question under Section 313,Crpc Regarding Forming of an Unlawful Assembly

Where the accused were charged with forming an unlawful assembly and attacking victims and causing death of one and inflicting grievous hurt upon another, while examining accused persons under s 313, CrPC, detailed questions were put to them and in these questions full opportunity had been accorded to accused persons to explain the circumstances appearing against them, there is no modality in s 313, CrPC that it should also be written as to what offence had been committed by the accused persons and under what sections those offences were punishable. So, there is no infraction of s 313, CrPC, on account of not being mentioned in a question put to accused as to whether they had formed an unlawful assembly and murdered the deceased and caused grievous injuries to the witness nor can it be held that the accused persons in any manner had been prejudiced on account of omission to put the above question.[71]

45. Procedure

The procedure is the same as for the substantive offence committed. But the offence under s 149 is non-compoundable.

46. Contents of Charge--Foundation for Conviction

This section creates a specific offence[72] or at least a distinct head of criminal liability and the framing of a specific and distinct charge in respect of every distinct head of criminal liability constituting an offence is the foundation for a conviction and sentence thereunder.[73] An accused person is entitled to know with certainty and accuracy the exact nature of the charge brought against him. Unless he has this knowledge he must be seriously prejudiced in his defense. This is true in all cases, but it is more especially true in cases where it is sought to implicate an accused person for acts not committed by himself, but by others with whom he was in company.[74] In Musakhan v State of Maharashtra ,[75] the Supreme Court held that as an offence under s 395, IPC, comes into existence only when the dacoity is committed by five or more persons jointly. The question of applying s 149 is a mere surplusage. Therefore, it is not necessary to frame a charge under s 149 read with s 395, IPC .

Charge under Section 149 Includes Charge under Section 147

Commentary under same heading in s 147 may be referred to.

Mere Mention of Section in the Charge not Sufficient

A mere mention of the relevant sections in the charges to which the accused persons are called upon to plead, or when entering convictions against them, will not satisfy the conscience of an appellate court that the lower court has applied its mind to the1095 question whether the elements attracting the application of the rules relating to constructive liability for crimes are present in the case nor would such mere mention of the sections clothe the accused persons with proper notice of the crimes for which they are sought to be made constructively liable.[76] In a charge under s 149, IPC, the common object should be mentioned so as to give the accused clear notice of the charge against them, but the omission to do so is nothing more than a mere irregularity.[77]

Common Object to be Mentioned in Charge

Where the common object of the rioters was clearly to obtain possession of immovable property, but during the riot, members of the opposite party were injured, it was wrong to include 'and assaulting them' as one of the common objects, in the same trial, even more so in one charge.[78]

The fact that an offence is committed 'in prosecution of the common object', is of the essence of the case and there could be no conviction for any offence committed with a different common object. It is, therefore, obligatory to set out the common object in a charge unless it has been already specified in the main charge under s 147 .[79]

There is clear distinction between intention and common object. If some of appellants were not sharing the common object with the remaining appellants on both counts, it cannot be said that the common object of the unlawful assembly of the appellants was the same.[80]

In Chikkarange Gowda v State of Mysore ,[81] the common object of an unlawful assembly, as mentioned in the charge and as found by the court, was merely to administer a chastisement to the deceased. The charge did not mention that the members of the unlawful assembly knew that the deceased was likely to be killed in prosecution of that common object. The deceased was killed by the fatal injury caused by a certain member of the unlawful assembly. The court convicted the other members, who had not caused the fatal injury, under s 302 read with ss 149 and 34 . The Supreme Court held that as the finding of the court was that none of the members of the unlawful assembly had the intention to kill the deceased nor did any of them know that the deceased was likely to be killed in prosecution of the common object of chastisement, and as the charge gave no notice to the accused that they had a separate common intention of killing the deceased different from that of the other members of the unlawful assembly, the conviction of the accused who had not caused any fatal injury, of an offence under s 302 read with ss 149 or 34, IPC could not be sustained.

Where the common object specified in the charges is 'assaulting the pariwars' the words cannot be understood as denoting murder, though assault may sometimes prove fatal, and if the latter part of s 149 imputing knowledge of the offence likely to1096 be committed is not referred to in the charge, there is no jurisdiction for the conviction of all the members of the unlawful assembly for murder, when it is not alleged in the charge that murder was the common object and the evidence did not establish it.[82]

Omissions in the Charge--Effect Thereof

But a mere omission to mention in the charge that the accused had the knowledge of the likelihood of the offence being committed as required by the second part of the section is a mere irregularity and not illegality if the accused is not prejudiced thereby.[83] It is not a general proposition of law that a conviction under ss 147 of the IPC cannot be supported whenever the common object as stated in the charge, is not precisely made out. The question in each case is whether the common object established agrees in essential particulars with that laid in the charge. Where the common object set out in the charge was to assault the complainant and his party, who were cutting the paddy of their land, and, thereby to forcibly oust them, but the common object established by the facts found by the sessions judge was to maintain possession of the land by the accused, it was held that the common object in the charge had not been substantially made out, and that the conviction under s 147, IPC was, therefore, bad.[84] But in a Bombay case it was held that the omission in a charge to state the common object of an unlawful assembly is not fatal to the trial, where it is specified in the complaint and found by the court.[85]

47. Form of Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I, (name of office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That on or about the.....day of.....at.....you were a member of an unlawful assembly, one of the members of which committed the offence of (specify the offence) in prosecution of the common object (merely specify the common object) of that assembly (or the offence of.....which the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object) and you, being a member of such assembly, at the time of the committing of that offence, are, therefore, guilty of that offence punishable under.....(specify the section) read with s 149 of the IPC, and within my cognisance (or within the cognisance of the Court of Session).

> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this (or by the said) Court on the said charge.

Framing of Additional Charge under Section 149 --Effect

Where an additional charge has been framed under s 149, IPC, and the accused sought an opportunity to recall the witness for cross-examination, on this score, s 149, IPC, is specific and the offence constitutes a substantive one, therefore, the accused persons are to be given the fullest opportunity to defend themselves. If the prosecution witnesses who have been examined are cross-examined in view of the altered charge, it would be a denial of opportunity to the accused persons to defend1097 themselves, therefore, the order of the trial judge declining such opportunity to the accused was set aside being unsustainable.[86]

Effect of Omission to Frame Charge--Effect

Sections 34, 114 and 149 of the Code, provide for criminal liability viewed from different angles as regards actual participants, accessories and men actuated by a common object or a common intention; and the charge is a rolled up one involving the direct and the constructive liability without specifying who are directly liable and who are sought to be made liable constructively. In such a situation, the absence of a charge under one or other of the various heads of criminal liability for the offence cannot be said to be fatal by itself, and before a conviction for the substantive offence, without a charge, can be set aside, prejudice will have to be made out. In most of the cases of this kind, evidence is normally given from the outset as to who was primarily responsible for the act which brought about the offence and such evidence is of course relevant. In considering whether the omission to frame a charge under ss 34 or 149, IPC is a defect which is illegal or a mere irregularity, the court has to take into account several factors, such as the form and the language of the mandatory provisions, the scheme and the object to be achieved, the nature of the violation, etc.

The omission to frame a charge is a grave defect and should be vigilantly guarded against. In some cases, it may be so serious that by itself it would vitiate a trial and render it illegal, prejudice to the accused being taken for granted. In the main, the provisions of s 535 of CrPC 1898 (now s 464 of CrPC 1973) would apply to cases of inadvertence to frame a charge induced by the belief that the matter on record is sufficient to warrant the conviction for a particular offence without express specification, and where the facts proved by the prosecution constitute a separate and distinct offence but closely relevant to and springing out of the same set of facts connected with the one charged.[87]

In another case, their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed:

> Section 149, unlike section 34, creates a specific offence and deals with the punishment of that offence alone. We would accordingly require strong reasons for using section 149 when it is not charged, even if it be possible to convict under that section in the absence of a specific charge, a point we do not decide here.[88]

Subsequently in a case where a charge under s 149, IPC, was not framed but all the ingredients of s 149 were clearly indicated in the charge framed against the accused, relying upon the Constitutional Bench decision in Willie (William) Slaney v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[89] wherein it was held that omission to mention s 149, IPC, specifically in the charge is only an irregularity and since no prejudice is shown to have been caused to appellants/accused by that omission it cannot affect their conviction, accordingly conviction of the accused under s 304, Part II read with s 149 was held to be proper.[90] If the ingredients of s 149, IPC are mentioned in the charge1098 under s 302, IPC, mere omission of s 149, IPC would not preclude the court from convicting the accused under the provisions of s 149, IPC where no prejudice to the accused is shown or caused.[91] In framing charge under s 326, IPC, it was mentioned that the accused persons were members of unlawful assembly and had acted in pursuance of the common object of such assembly, i.e., in order to commit murder of the deceased, they committed the offence and at that time, they were armed with daggers etc. to bring in the application of s 148, IPC . The absence of specific charge under s 149 did not vitiate the conviction under s 302, IPC, as the charge was not only implicit, but also patent in the charges.[92] Conviction under s 149, IPC, is otherwise not sustainable when no charge under the same section was framed against the accused.[93]

Where the agitators, including the appellant, were alleged to have committed mischief by setting fire to the residential house of the District Judge during agitation of Uttrakhand Sangharsh Samiti, the evidence of the eye-witness was found not reliable, thus, the appellant could not be convicted under s 436, IPC (s*impliciter*) in the absence of charge under s 436 read with s 149, IPC against the accused appellant.[94]

Conviction without a Formal Charge in Appeal

The Goa High Court has held that where there was reliable evidence to prove that the accused formed an unlawful assembly with the common object to demolish the house of the complainant it was held that the Appellate Court can convict the accused under s 149 though no charge for that offence was framed by the trial court.[95]

Substitution of Charge under Section 34 for Charge under Section 149 of the Penal Code

It has been held that the 'common object' under s 149, IPC, being different from the 'common intention' required by s 34, in the absence of an alternative charge under s 34, it is not possible to convict the accused charged under s 149 for any supposed common intention.[96] But though there is a substantial difference between the two sections, they also to some extent overlap and it is a question to be determined on the facts of each case whether the charge under s 149, IPC overlaps the ground covered by s 34 . If the common object which is the subject-matter of the charge under s 149 might result in prejudice to the accused, substitution of s 34 for s 149, IPC ought not to be permitted. But if the facts to be proved and the evidence to be adduced with reference to the charge under s 149 would be the same if the charge were under s 34, it cannot result in any prejudice, and in such cases the substitution of s 34 for s 149 must be held to be a formal matter.[97]

1099 If one reads s 149 and s 34, they will go to show that these two sections are related and overlap each other. When an offence is committed with a common object by more than five persons, it will amount to an offence under s 149, whereas if an offence is committed with a common object by persons less than five, the offence will come under s 34 . Hence an accused charged with an offence under s 448 read with s 149 can be convicted under s 447 read with s 34 .[1]

Where 29 accused persons faced trial for rioting, two murders and other related offences, the Sessions Court convicted 19 of them under ss 148, 302 read with s 149, s 307 read with s 149, and s 324 read with s 149, IPC, and acquitted the rest, the High Court dismissed the appeal of the convicts and upheld the conviction. The evidence proved that motive of the accused party was to remove babul trees from the field at any cost and cause such injury as may be necessary for that purpose. Some of the accused, however, started assaulting immediately after reaching the spot. Other accused persons cannot be conclusively said to have known that the murders were likely to be committed in prosecution of their common object so as to attract the second part of s 149 and so were held liable to be convicted under s 326 read with s 149 and not under s 300 read with s 149, the accused who acted beyond the common object of the unlawful assembly, however, were held liable to be convicted under s 300 read with s 341, IPC .[2] The accused charged under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, can be convicted under s 302 read with s 34, IPC .[3]

The accused charged under s 452 read with s 149, IPC, can be convicted under s 452 with the aid of

s 34, IPC, when charge under s 149, IPC, is not proved.[4]

The accused charged with s 302 read with s 149, IPC, can be convicted under s 326 read with s 34, IPC .[5] The accused charged under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, can be convicted under s 304, Pt I, read with s 34, IPC .[6]

In a case, the Kerala High Court has however, held that though in certain circumstances a conviction for liability under s 34, IPC, can be entered even though the charge mentions only s 149, IPC, the procedure is to put the accused person in notice of the precise ground on which liability is cast upon him.[7] It was held in Re Thirugnanam,[8] that failure to frame charge under s 302 read with s 34, as an alternative to that under s 302 read with s 149, because of carelessness and indifference of the trial judge will make the accused entitled to acquittal.

Substitution of Charge under Section 149 for Charge under Section 34

Commentary under same heading in s 34 may be referred to.

In the absence of prejudice, there is no legal bar to the recording of conviction under s 302, read with s 149, when the accused were charged under s 302, read with1100 s 34 . Where the charge for rioting, with deadly weapons, resulting in brutal murders, against the several accused clearly stated that the common object of the unlawful assembly was to commit murder and all the accused were also charged under s 302 read with s 34, in respect of the murders, on the footing that they were committed in furtherance of the common intention of all the accused and the evidence did not establish which of the accused had actually participated in the attack on the deceased persons, it was held that the accused, whose participation in the rioting had been proved beyond doubt, should be convicted under s 302, read with s 149, for the murders.[9] A person can be convicted of an offence read with s 34, or s 149, if the facts of the case justify it and if the accused has not been misled in his defence and if there has been no failure of justice irrespective of the fact that in the charge framed against him, s 34 or s 149 is not specifically mentioned.[10]

Charge Under Section 34 or Section 149 --Conviction for Substantive Offence, not Charged

Commentary under same heading in s 34 may be referred to.

It is settled that the offence under s 149, IPC constitutes a substantive offence and creates vicarious liability upon all the five or more, if the act has been done by any one of them. There is a legal distinction between a charge under s 302 and a charge of constructive liability under s 302 read with s 149, i.e. being a member of an unlawful assembly the common object of which was to kill the deceased. Section 149 creates a specific and distinct offence and it postulates an assembly of five or more persons having a common object as named in s 141, IPC . Therefore conviction of the accused under s 302 simpliciter without a specific charge, while acquitting the rest of the four accused persons from charges under ss 149 and 302, IPC, was liable to be quashed.[11] Where the accused are charged for rioting and murder by virtue of ss 149 and 34, IPC, it is usual to charge the accused individually also for the acts that they are said to have committed. This draws the attention of the accused in particular to the acts which they are said to have committed. If that is not done, the accused may have cause for argument that when the main charge of rioting and acting in concert in pursuance of a common intention has failed; he ought not to be convicted for the particular acts committed by him. But omission to charge an accused individually for the acts specifically done by him does not render the conviction invalid if he knew exactly what acts he was said to have done, and there has been no miscarriage of justice on account of the omission in the charge.[12] There is nothing in s 149, IPC, to indicate that unless one member of an unlawful assembly is charged with the substantive offence, the conviction with the aid of s 149, IPC, cannot be possible.[13] Where the accused were charged for offences under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, and accused persons were found guilty of offence under s 149, IPC, no prejudice is1101 caused to accused persons for not framing an independent charge under s 302 IPC, and the irregularity is curable and trial is not vitiated.[14]

48. Legal Position Explained

When a person is charged with an offence read with s 149, IPC, he is only put on notice of two facts, that he was a member of unlawful assembly, and that an offence was committed in prosecution of the common object or he knew that an offence was likely to be committed. He is therefore called upon to meet only the points mentioned above, and is not called upon to show that he has not committed any individual act. Section 149 creates a distinct offence, at any rate, a distinct head of liability.[15] Where the accused persons were charged for offence under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, but the common object for committing murder was not established, the accused persons cannot be convicted for the substantive offence of murder under s 302 IPC, in the absence of a specific charge.[16] So a person charged with constructive liability cannot be convicted for a substantive offence.[17]The reason of the rule is that the accused is very much prejudiced when he is convicted for a substantive offence without a specific charge because his attention is not focused on any individual act. But the position is different when a person is charged with an offence under the IPC . Overt acts are attributed to the accused and they have opportunities of meeting that case. Consequently, the conviction for the substantive offence does not occasion any prejudice to the accused.[18]

Where the main accused along with other accused persons was charged with offences under ss 147, 149, 300, IPC, but the charge of unlawful assembly was not proved, the main accused can be convicted of a substantive offence under s 302, IPC, though the charge against him was framed under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, provided no prejudice is caused to the accused and accused knew from the very beginning of the trial the charge against him was one under s 302 IPC, and the evidence of the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt is established.[19]

49. Joinder of Charges and Separate Trials

All the accused, charged under s 149 of the IPC, have to be tried jointly.[20] Synopsis notes under s 147, ante may be referred to. But where one of the members of a unlawful assembly was 13 years of age at the time of the incident, conducting of his trial along with the other accused who were not children was illegal, however, since this plea was not raised by the accused before trial court or High Court so conviction of the child accused was confirmed by the Apex Court but the sentence imposed on him was set aside.[21] When the argument that the accused was a juvenile was not1102 taken before the trial court and High Court and even in the SLP, it being a mixed question of law and fact and not a pure question of law cannot be raised for the first time in the criminal appeal before the Supreme Court.[22]

50. Proof

Prosecution should prove not only physical presence of the accused persons, but should also satisfy the court about sharing of common object notwithstanding actual participation in commission of the offence.[23]

The ingredients of the offence under s 149, IPC, have to be made out by the prosecution,[24] but it is not necessary, for it, to prove that a particular named member of the unlawful assembly committed the offence,[25] or what particular injury was caused by which one of the accused.[26] Where unlawful assembly otherwise is proved by evidence on the record, omission of the prosecution witnesses to depose exact role played by each accused would not be fatal.[27] It would be difficult for any witness to state exactly which accused inflicted how many blows on the deceased.[28] For sustaining conviction

under s 149, IPC, the prosecution need not prove as to which of the accused was responsible for the fatal blow.[29] Where the injuries were caused to the deceased in prosecution of the common object of all the accused to cause the death of the deceased, the accused cannot derive any benefit from the inability of the prosecution witnesses to state as to which particular injury was caused by which of the accused.[30] So, it is immaterial that one of the accused did not cause injuries to the deceased or the injured.[31] Whether all the accused had beaten the deceased or not, was really not of any consequence and all should be held guilty for causing death of the deceased.[32] The author of injury would not be absolved from criminal liability under ss 302 and 149, IPC, when he was member of the unlawful assembly which caused death of two persons.[33] Where the name of one accused was not mentioned in FIR, but figured in the statement under s 161, CrPC recorded on the next day of recording of FIR, four persons including the son of the informant were seriously injured, the informant may be under severe psychic trauma, the omission of the name of one accused in FIR was held of no importance.[34] Where there was no reliable evidence to show that at least five persons set on fire the hut of the complainant, the1103 PWS had not seen the three appellants on the spot at the time of the incident, held the three appellants were not members of the unlawful assembly, and were acquitted of the charge under s 436 read with s 149 IPC .[35]

51. Appreciation of Evidence

Where shots are fired in rioting, it is very difficult for the witnesses to tell the exact distance from which the shots were fired.[36]

The prosecution witnesses did not describe the appellant accused either in their statement recorded under s 161, CrPC or prior to holding of Trial Identification Parade (TIP) before the magistrate. Although, they claimed in their testimonies, that they had seen the appellant in the full moon light, but this fact was not mentioned by them in their statements recorded under s 161, CrPC . The identification of appellant accused in TIP was highly doubtful. He was acquitted of the charges under ss 399, 392 and 307 read with s 149, IPC .[37]

Once a membership of an unlawful assembly is established, it is not incumbent on the prosecution to establish any specific overt act to any of the accused for fastening of liability with the aid of s 149 of the IPC . Commission of overt act by each member of the unlawful assembly is not necessary. The common object of the unlawful assembly of the accused in the present case was evident from the fact that some of them were armed with deadly weapons. None of them were curious onlookers or spectators to the macabre drama.[38]

52. Identification by Two Witnesses Desirable when Unlawful Assembly is Large

There is no rule of evidence that no conviction can be leased unless a certain minimum number of witnesses have identified a particular accused as member of an unlawful assembly. It is axiomatic that evidence is not to be counted but only weighed and it is not the quantity of evidence but the quality that matters. Even the testimony of one single witness, if wholly reliable, is sufficient to establish the identification of an accused as a member of an unlawful assembly. All the same, when the size of the unlawful assembly is quite large and many persons would have witnessed the incident, it would be a prudent exercise to insist on at least two reliable witnesses to vouchsafe the identification of an accused as participant in the rioting.[39] Where a large number of people are involved, it would be prudent to adopt a two witness theory.[40]

The case of each individual accused has to be examined to satisfy that mere spectators, who had not joined the assembly and who were not aware of its common object, have not been treated as members of the unlawful assembly which committed1104 the crime.[41] But failure of the prosecution to establish, which of the particular persons formed an unlawful assembly, does not affect the liability of the persons proved to be the members of the unlawful assembly for the acts done in prosecution of the common object or which they knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of the common object thereof.[42] Doubts may arise about the veracity of the whole prosecution version and doubts about the participation of individual accused persons may contribute to the emergence of such doubts which may cover and engulf the whole case. Nevertheless, if the court, whose duty it is to separate the chaff from the grain, does hold that the convicted persons were certainly members of an unlawful assembly which must have consisted of more than five persons, one does not see any principle of law or justice which could stand in the way of the application of s 149, IPC, for convicting those undoubtedly guilty of participation in carrying out the common object of an unlawful assembly.

Where the allegations were that accused persons having formed an unlawful assembly assaulted the deceased with a sword and thereafter threw his dead body in a hut and set it on fire. Evidence of eyewitnesses was corroborated by the objective findings of investigating officer and medical evidence. The participation of the accused persons and their active roles in the incident was established by two or more eyewitnesses so conviction of participating accused was held proper. However, the conviction of other two accused persons solely on the identification by one witness only was not proper, further there was no evidence to establish that the remaining accused persons were members of an unlawful assembly and their presence at the scene of occurrence as onlookers cannot be ruled out, hence they were entitled to the benefit of doubt.[43]The statement of the informant under s 161 giving details of the incident with the specific overt acts of each accused cannot be admitted in evidence in view of s 145, Evidence Act 1872.[44]

53. Testimony of Single Witness

Where an unlawful assembly involves a very large number of persons, there is no rule of law that states that there cannot be any conviction on the testimony of a sole eye-witness, unless the court is of the view that the testimony of such sole eye-witness is not reliable. Though, generally it is a rule of prudence followed by the courts that a conviction may not be sustained if it is not supported by two or more witnesses who give a consistent account of the incident, in a fit case, the court may believe a reliable sole eye-witness if in his testimony he makes specific reference to the identity of the individual and his specific overt acts in the incident. The rule of requirement of more than one witness applies only in a case where a witness deposes in a general and vague manner, or in the case of a riot.[45]

54. Conviction

Omission to record a finding of acquittal or conviction on a charge under s 148 would not necessarily affect the conviction for another offence, read with s 149,1105IPC .[46] But where the accused are charged for different offences including offences under ss 148, 149, IPC, the acquittal of the accused persons under s 148 would make their conviction under s 149 illegal, as once there was acquittal under s 148, invoking of s 149 was not warranted.[47] Even where the charge of conspiracy is not proved, the offence of unlawful assembly can be proved and conviction can be recorded for the offence of unlawful assembly.[48]

A person cannot be convicted under s 302, IPC, for committing the offence directly and under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, at the same time, for committing the offence constructively. If a man does commit an offence directly, there is no question of his committing it constructively, and vice versa.[49] Therefore, a person charged for an offence under s 302, IPC, read with s 149 cannot be convicted of the substantive offence under s 302, IPC, without a specific charge having been framed against him as envisaged by law.[50]

When the main five accused are acquitted of the charge for the offence under s 302, IPC, simpliciter, the conviction of the other accused on the basis of the same prosecution evidence with the help of provision of s 149, IPC, is not proper.[51] In the total absence of evidence both in respect of offences under s 34 as well as s 149, IPC, the conviction of the accused persons with the aid of s 149 or s 34,

IPC, is not proper.[52]

Where the accused, preventing a procession from proceeding on a highway with music, were convicted under s 341, read with s 149, it was held that it would be more proper and logical not to record a separate conviction in respect of their individual acts under s 341 .[53]

Despite the possession of a pistol with two accused persons, the non-use of the pistol on the two victims proves the fact that the accused persons had not formed the unlawful assembly at the spot with the object of causing death of a victim. Thus all accused persons were held liable to be punished under s 304, Pt I read with s 149 and not under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[54]

Deceased appellants had formed unlawful assembly, and they were armed with deadly weapons, their common object being to kill and commit murder of their rival group and inflict injuries to others; their conviction under ss 147, 148 read with ss 302 and 307, IPC read with s 149, IPC was held proper.[55]

Conviction of Less than Five Persons--When Justified

It is competent for a court to come to the conclusion that there was an unlawful assembly of five or more persons, even if less than that number are convicted by it if:1106

(i) the charge states that apart from the persons named, several other unidentified persons were also members of the unlawful assembly whose common object was to commit an unlawful act and evidence led to prove this is accepted by the court;
(ii) the first information report and the evidence show such to be the case even though the charge does not say so; or
(iii) though the charge and the prosecution witnesses name only the acquitted and the convicted accused persons, there is other evidence which discloses the existence of named or other, persons, provided, in cases (b) and (c), no prejudice has resulted to the convicted person by reason of the omission to mention in the charge that the other unnamed persons had also participated in the offence.[56]

In charge for unlawful assembly, even if some of the accused are acquitted and the number of remaining accused falls short of five, that does not always mean that remaining two accused should be acquitted.[57]

> It is true that the acquittal of an accused person does raise, in the eye of law, a presumption that he is innocent even if he was actually guilty. But, it is only the acquitted accused person and not the convicted accused persons, who can, as a rule, get the benefit of such a presumption. The effect of findings on questions of fact depends upon the nature of those findings. If, for example, only five known persons are alleged to have participated in an attack but the courts find that two of them were falsely implicated, it would be quite natural and logical to infer or presume that the participants were less than five in number. On the other hand, if the court holds that the assailants were actually five in number, but there could be a doubt as to the identity of two of the alleged assailants, and, therefore, acquits two of them, the others will not get the benefit of doubt about the identity of the two accused so long as there is a firm finding, based on good evidence and sound reasoning, that the participants were five or more in number. Such a case is one of doubt only as to identity of some participants and not as to the total number of participants. It may be that a definite conclusion that the number of participants was at least five may be very difficult to reach where the allegation of participation is confined to five known persons and there is doubt about the identity of even one. But, where a large number of known persons (such as eighteen, as is the case before us), are alleged to have participated and the court acts on the principle that it is better to err on the side of safety, so that no injustice is done to a possibly wrongly implicated accused, and benefit of doubt is reaped by a large number, with the result that their acquittal, out of abundant caution, reduces the number of those about whose participation there can be no doubt to less than five, it may not be really difficult at all, as it is not in the case before us, to reach the conclusion that, having regard to undeniable facts, the number of participants could not possibly be less than five.[58]1107

Conviction under Section 302 Read with Section 34 can be altered to one under Section 326 Read with Section 149

Commentary under the same heading in s 34, ante may be referred to.

Conviction under Section 326 cannot be altered to one under Sections 302 / 149 in the Absence of Relevant Facts

Where the Sessions Judge did not frame charge against the accused persons for offence punishable under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, the relevant prosecution allegations so as to bring in the ingredients of the offence punishable under s 302 read with s 149, IPC also were not incorporated in the charge framed by the Sessions Judge, the accused were not told that they had to face charge of being member of the unlawful assembly and the common object of such assembly was to commit murder of the deceased and in furtherance of that common object murder was committed and thereby they had the constructive liability and thus they committed the offence punishable under s 302, IPC read with s 149, IPC on these facts it was held that mere omission to mention s 149 may be considered as an irregularity, but failure to mention the nature of the offence committed by them cannot be said to be a mere irregularity, the accused were told to face a charge punishable under s 302 simpliciter and there was no charge under s 302, IPC read with s 149, IPC, therefore, it was not possible to reverse the conviction of the accused under s 326, IPC and substitute the conviction for the offence punishable under s 302 read with 149, IPC as there was no charge framed against them for such offence.[59]

Basis of Conviction under the Section

Though sad, yet it is a fact that people do not hesitate in resorting to vengeance even on the unfortunate deaths of their near and dear ones. There is a tendency to rope in as many people as possible for facing the trial relating to the death or injuries to the unfortunate victims. Sometimes it is over-enthusiasm and many a times designed effort to harass the relations and friends of the real culprits. It has been found that on occasions, innocent persons including the aged and infirm, ladies and children are booked for standing at the dock and remain confined in jails till the pendency of the cases. Some are acquitted by the trial court and many by the appellate courts but only after their languishing in confinements for years. Such efforts of unscrupulous survivors of the crime or the relations of the victims invariably but unfortunately helps the real culprits as it becomes difficult for the court to sift the grain out of the chaff.

Under such circumstances and in view of the prevalent criminal jurisprudential system in the country, the doctrine of presumption of innocence in favour of the accused makes justice itself a victim which ultimately weakens the criminal justice dispensation system. Be that as it may, an onerous duty is cast upon the criminal courts in the country to ensure that no innocent is convicted and deprived of his fundamental liberties. However, in cases of group clashes and organised crimes, persons beyond the screen, executing the crime should not be allowed to get away scot free. In cases involving a number of accused persons, a balanced approach by the courts is required to be insisted upon. Neither any innocent person should be convicted nor should a guilty be acquitted under the cloak and cover of the loose and liberal interpretations of the statutory provisions and the technicalities of procedural wrangles. In cases of arson and murder where a large number of people are accused of committing the crime, the courts should be cautious to rely upon the testimony of1108 witnesses speaking generally and in an omnibus way without specific reference to the accused or the role played by them.[60]

In view of s 149, if an offence is committed by any member of that unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of that assembly, or such as the members of the assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object, every person who at the time of committing of that offence was a member of that assembly is guilty of that offence. That emphatically brings about the principle that the punishment prescribed under s 149 is in a sense vicarious, and does not always proceed on the basis that the offence has been actually committed by every member of the unlawful assembly.[61] It is well settled that if an offence is committed by some members of an unlawful assembly then the other members of the assembly are also liable for the offence under s 149, IPC .[62]Section 149 creates a constructive or vicarious liability on the members of an unlawful assembly for unlawful acts committed pursuant to the common object by any other member of that assembly. The basis of constructive liability under s 149 is mere membership of an unlawful assembly with the requisite common object or knowledge. This section makes a member of unlawful assembly responsible as a principal offender for the acts of each and all.[63] The Allahabad High Court has held that the vicarious liability under s 149, IPC does not always proceed on the basis that the offence has been actually committed by other members of the unlawful assembly. Section 149 makes it clear that if an offence is committed by any member of the unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object or such as the members of the unlawful assembly in prosecution knew it likely to be committed in prosecution of that object every person, who, at the time of the commission of the offence, is a member of the same assembly is guilty of that offence.[64]

55. Acquittal of three Accused Members of Unlawful Assembly by giving them Benefit Doubt

The legal position is fairly well settled by the decision of the Supreme Court in Khem Karan v State of UP [65] where the Supreme Court observed:

> .....the fact that a large number of accused have been acquitted and the remaining who have been convicted are less than five cannot vitiate the conviction under Section 149 read with the substantive offence if - as in this case the Court has taken care to find - there are other persons who might not have been identified or convicted but were party to the crime and together constituted the statutory number.

To the same effect is the decision of the Supreme Court in Dharam Pal v State of UP [66] where the court observed:

> .....If, for example, only five known persons are alleged to have participated in an attack but the Courts find that two of them were falsely implicated, it would be quite natural and logical to infer or presume that the participations were less than five in1109 number. On the other hand, if the Court holds that the assailants were actually five in number, but there could be a doubt as to the identity of two of the alleged assailants, and, therefore, acquits two of them, the others will not get the benefit of doubt about the identity of the two accused so long as there is a firm finding based on good evidence and sound reasoning that the participants were five or more in number.

Acquittal of three out of the five accused persons comprising the unlawful assembly does not make any material difference and it would not negate the theory of there being an unlawful assembly. So long as there were four other persons with the appellant who had the common object of committing an offence, the assembly would be unlawful in nature, notwithstanding the acquittal of some of those who were members of the unlawful assembly by reason of the benefit of doubt given to them.[67]

Unlawful Assembly--Membership below Five

The membership of A2 to A5 of the unlawful assembly was not proved beyond doubt, and no overt act was attributed to them, thus, their conviction under s 302 read with s 149, IPC was set aside.[68]

56. Mere Membership of Unlawful Assembly is Sufficient

The Rajasthan High Court has opined that the basis of constructive guilt under s 149 is mere membership of the unlawful assembly with the requisite common object or knowledge. If the court on the basis of the material on record is convinced that certain persons formed an unlawful assembly and the offence was committed by any member of that assembly in prosecution of the common object of that assembly, which the member of the unlawful assembly knew to be likely to be committed, that person would be constructively liable for the acts of others whether he himself actively participated in the commission of the crime or not.[69]

57. Independent part in Crime by Members of Unlawful Assembly not Necessary

When charge under s 149, IPC is there, it is not necessary that each one should be assigned independent part played in the beating. If it is found that one of them was a member of the unlawful assembly and that unlawful assembly assaulted the deceased which ultimately caused the death of the deceased, then all who were members of the unlawful assembly can be held liable.[70]

It is also well settled that if death had been caused in prosecution of the common object of an unlawful assembly, it would not be necessary to record a definite or specific finding as to which particular accused out of the members of the unlawful assembly caused the fatal injury.[71]1110

58. Other Factors

For arriving at a conclusion of constructive liability what the courts have to see is whether they had common intention or common object and the ingredients are to be considered for a conviction under s 149 or s 34, IPC . The court has to look into the proved circumstances like the formation of the unlawful assembly, the weapons with which they were armed and the active role played by them.[72]

59. No Conviction with the Aid of Section 147 or Sections 148 - 149 if the Right of Private Defence is Available or has been Exceeded

Where the right of private defence of person or property is available, the accused cannot be convicted with the aid of s 147 or s 148 of the IPC .[73] If, however, the right of private defence is exceeded, the accused can be convicted for the particular offence which he commits.[74] A group of five or more persons using criminal force in defence of their person and property is not an unlawful assembly unless they continue it after the right ceases. When a group of persons numbering five or more, at a time in exercise of their private defence of property and person, use criminal force, application of law relating to unlawful assembly on the members of the group will be improper. But as soon as the right ceases and the group continues with the criminal force with common object, they become members of an unlawful assembly.[75] Where after the deceased had fallen to earth and was assaulted indiscriminately on his back, the assembly of accused persons which was initially lawful got converted into an unlawful assembly. Their conviction for rioting was held sustainable.[76] Unless an accused is convicted of the offence of rioting under s 148, or under s 147, IPC, he cannot be convicted under s 324 read with s 149, IPC .[77]

The appellant accused fired in the air from his licensed gun only with an idea to scare away the aggressor and in pursuance of right of private defence of his property and life. Accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under s 307 read with s 149, IPC .[78]

Where the plea of private defence of accused was found to be false and concocted, the accused persons after forming an unlawful assembly and knowing the consequences of the firing had obstructed construction by pointing firearms and1111 firing in quick succession thereby causing death of the deceased and injuries to others. In view of evidence of eyewitness which was truthful and reliable and corroborated by medical evidence, conviction of the accused persons under s 300 read with s 149, IPC, was held proper.[79]

The ripe paddy crop in the disputed land was cut and removed in the occurrence. According to prosecution it was cut and removed by the accused-appellant party while the defence version was that it was done by the prosecution side. It was held that where the possession of accused persons over disputed land was established, the right of private defence would accrue to the accused party if the prosecution party cut and removed the standing crop. It would then have been a case of theft. If however the prosecution party tried to prevent the accused party from cutting and removing the ripe paddy crop, so, even if five or more accused-appellant persons were present at the spot, it could not be said that they formed an unlawful assembly.[80] Where the allegations were that the accused party, armed with barchas, axes and lathis attacked and assaulted the complainant party and the medical evidence showed that both the accused and the complainant sustained injuries in the same incident which took place in the field of the complainant, the fact that the accused persons were aggressors and the presence of injuries on the accused would not by itself establish a plea of self-defence, also non-explanation of injuries of two accused on facts and circumstances was not fatal. However, injuries found on the complainant were simple in nature so, no intention to cause the death of the complainant can be gathered and so, the conviction of the accused under s 307 read with s 149 was altered to one under s 324 read with s 149, IPC, and their conviction under s 148, IPC, was maintained.[81]

Where the accused persons claimed to be the landlord of the land in dispute, members of the prosecution party claimed to be bataidars over land, executive magistrate was posted at the place of occurrence with the police force so the accused were obliged to approach magistrate and police force. The accused however arrived at the scene of occurrence and started indiscriminate firing. The plea of private defence of property or person of the accused was held not tenable and failure of the prosecution to explain some minor injuries on the person of the accused was held not fatal, in the face of cogent and positive prosecution evidence, the appeal of the accused persons against conviction under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, was dismissed.[82]

The accused were in possession of land where the incident took place, while their possession was disputed by the prosecution side. Altercation took place over embedding of hand-pump on that land by the accused. The accused were entitled to the right of private defence of self and property and where injuries inflicted by the accused caused the death of one person and severe injuries to other, the accused could not be said to have exceeded the right of private defence. However, there was no evidence to fix the identity of the individual accused who caused the fatal incised wound on the forehead of deceased. Hence, the accused could not be held liable under s 149 and their conviction under ss 147 - 149, 302, 307 IPC, was set aside.[83] Where the prosecution party appeared to be aggressors and injuries were caused to1112 the deceased in self-defence by the accused party and the prosecution had concealed the origin of the incident, the accused were held entitled to be acquitted for offence under ss 147, 148, 300 IPC .[84]

Where admittedly the complainant party had come to the disputed land for the first time on the date of occurrence, after they allegedly purchased it from the tenure holder and the documentary evidence proved beyond doubt that the accused were in peaceful possession of the land in dispute, the right of private defence of the property accrued to the accused when the complainant tried to dispossess them. The accused persons cannot be held guilty of forming an unlawful assembly and causing blunt injuries and were held entitled to be acquitted.[85]

Where the assembly of accused persons acted in exercise of the right of private defence, it cannot be termed as an unlawful assembly when there was no evidence to show that all the accused persons except one had caused any injury to anyone after the right of private defence had ceased to be available to them, the said accused persons cannot be convicted either s 148 IPC, or with the aid of s

Where the place where the incident took place was disputed, the occurrence as per prosecution version was doubtful. The possibility that the accused persons would have inflicted injuries on the members of complainant party in exercise of the right of private defence could not be ruled out; the acquittal of the accused persons for offences under ss 323, 148 was found proper.[87]

60. Effect of Conviction of Less than Five Persons

A combined reading of ss 141 and 149, IPC, shows that an assembly of less than five members is not an unlawful assembly within the meaning of s 141 and cannot therefore, form the basis for conviction for an offence with the aid of s 149, IPC . The effect of the acquittal of the two accused persons by the High Court and without the High Court finding that some other known or unknown persons were also invoked in the assault, would be that for all intent and purposes the two acquitted accused persons were not members of the unlawful assembly. Thus only four accused could be said to have been the members of the assembly but such an assembly which comprises of less than five members is not an unlawful assembly within the meaning of s 141, IPC . The existence of an unlawful assembly is a necessary postulate for invoking s 149, IPC . Where the existence of such an unlawful assembly is not proved, the conviction with the aid of s 149, IPC, cannot be recorded or sustained.[88] Where eight out of the accused were acquitted on concurrent finding of the Sessions Court and High Court that they were not involved in the offence and only one accused was convicted, as per evidence on record, none other than the accused persons charged formed an unlawful assembly, and death was not caused by injuries inflicted by the accused alone, on these facts the conviction of the accused under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, was set aside and the accused was convicted under s 326 1113 for causing grievous injuries.[89] Where out of 16 accused, 14 were acquitted, conviction of remaining two accused under s 147 or ss 149 and 302 IPC, would be improper since two persons cannot form an unlawful assembly with any common object, however, the two accused would be responsible for offence committed by them in their individual capacity.[90] Similarly, where the prosecution case, as set out in the charge and as supported by the evidence, is to the effect that the alleged unlawful assembly consists of five or more named persons and no others, and there is no question of any participation by other persons not identified or identifiable, it is not open to the court to hold that there was an unlawful assembly unless it comes to the definite conclusion that five or more of the named persons were members thereof.

Where a murder was committed by members of an unlawful assembly and more than five persons participated in the assault, seven persons were convicted by the trial court. The High Court acquitted four of them and one of the remaining three convicted persons died during the pendency of appeal, the High Court despite absence of appeal against acquitted accused found that acquittal of two of the accused by the trial court was wrong. On these facts the Apex Court held that the High Court can convict the remaining two accused under s 300 read with s 149 since there were more than five persons out of the named accused who had participated in the assault on the deceased.[91] Where seven accused persons were hired and five were acquitted, the remaining two accused persons were not convicted with the aid of s 149 of the IPC .[92]

It is not necessary that in every case, five persons must always be convicted before s 149, IPC can be applied because it is possible in some cases for judges to conclude that though five persons were unquestionably there, the identity of one or more is in doubt, in which case a conviction of the rest with the aid of s 149 would be good. In such a case, the court must say so with unerring certainty.[93] Where the case of the prosecution and the evidence adduced indicates that a number in excess of five persons participated in the incident and some of them could not be identified, it would be open to the court to convict less than five of the offence of being members of the unlawful assembly or convict them of the offence committed by the unlawful assembly with the aid of s 149, IPC, provided it comes to the conclusion that five or more persons participated in the incident.[94] It is competent to a court to come to the conclusion that there was an unlawful assembly of five or more persons, even if less than that number have been convicted by it, if: (a) the charge states that apart from the persons named, several other unidentified persons were also members of the unlawful assembly whose common object was to commit an unlawful act and evidence led to prove this is accepted by the court; or (b) that the first information report and the evidence show such to be the case even though the charge does not state so; or (c) that though the charge and the prosecution witnesses named only the acquitted and the convicted accused persons there is other evidence which discloses the existence of named or other persons provided, in cases (b) and (c), no prejudice1114 has resulted to the convicted person by reason of the omission to mention in the charge that the other unnamed persons had also participated in the offence.[95] Where the accused were large in number, some accused were acquitted. Some of the acquitted accused were given the benefit of doubt and the prosecution case was strongly supported by independent witnesses. It was held that acquittal of other accused was not justified on the ground of acquittal of some.[96]

61. Omission to Record a Finding not Material

The essence of the offence of rioting is use of force and violence by an unlawful assembly in prosecution of its common object. If it can be found on the materials on record that there was use of force and violence by the accused as members of an unlawful assembly the omission to record a formal conviction under s 148, IPC, would not affect the conviction for other offences by the application of s 149, IPC .[97]

62. Sentence

The question of sentence must in each case depend upon the facts of the case. It cannot be said that in case of a conviction under s 302 read with s 149, the appropriate sentence in all cases must be imprisonment for life. But where it is found that the accused, though they were among the rioters some of whom in pursuance of the common object of the unlawful assembly, caused the death of the deceased, had themselves taken no part in the assault, the lesser sentence of imprisonment for life may be appropriate.[98] In cases where the facts are fully known and it is possible to determine who inflicted the blows which were fatal and who took a lesser part, it is a sound exercise of judicial discretion to discriminate in the matter of punishment. It is an equally sound exercise of judicial discretion to refrain from sentencing all to death when it is evident that some would not have been if the facts had been fully known and it had been possible to determine, e.g. who hit on the head or who only on a thumb or an ankle; and when there are no means of determining who dealt the fatal blow, a judicial mind can legitimately decide to award the lesser penalty in all the cases.[99] It cannot be laid down as a rule of law that in every case where it is not possible to allocate the wounds inflicted to a particular accused, a lesser penalty should be given. Where a group of persons brutally murdered the deceased, they all deserve the same punishment. But there may be cases where the part taken by each of the accused may vary, one of the accused taking a main part and another taking a subsidiary part, though their common object is to commit murder. In such a case, perhaps, there may be a good ground for differentiating the accused for inflicting punishment.[99a] The Karnataka High Court has, however, held that it is not the law that when s 149 of the IPC, comes into play, the sentence passed on a member of an1115 unlawful assembly against whom an overt act is proved, should be more severe than the one passed on the other members of the unlawful assembly.[1] Where there are no reasons for distinguishing some accused from the others in the matter of sentence, all must be given the same sentence.[2] But where an accused is held to be only constructively liable for murder, he may be given the lesser punishment of imprisonment for life.[3] Once it is established that the intention of a number of persons is to make a joint assault, the culpability of those who deliver the assault and those who make the assault possible by beating off a rescue, is the same. In a case of extended liability under s 149, and in a case where it is doubtful whether death was intended it is not inappropriate to treat all alike and sentence each of the appellants, to imprisonment for life. If the evidence is such that it can be reasonably found that all who joined an attack, knew that death would be an almost certain result of the attack for instance, when guns were openly carried, perhaps death, in the case of all [subject of the provisions of s 354(3) of the CrPC 1973] would be the appropriate penalty. But where accused persons are saddled with vicarious liability, and in addition, intention to cause the actual result achieved cannot be clearly established, the convicts should be given the benefit of the lower penalty.[4] Leniency in the matter of sentence shown to some accused is no ground for reducing the sentence of the accused who are shown to be responsible for the killing.[5]

Where it was not specified by eyewitnesses as to which of the seven accused caused grievous injury, 16 years have passed since the incident took place, there was no criminal antecedents or adverse criminal history of the accused persons, the sentences for one year rigorous imprisonment under s 148, IPC, and two years rigorous imprisonment under s 325 read with s 149, IPC, was not manifestly inadequate so enhancement of sentence was not warranted. In the facts of the case, sentences of imprisonment awarded to the accused persons were reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone by the accused persons and the sentence of fine of Rs 10,000 each, was also imposed which was directed to be paid to the widow of the accused/victim.[6] Accused appellants were convicted for offences under ss 147, 149, 323 and 325 of the IPC . Since the occurrence had taken place 25 years ago, and the appellants had remained in custody for 23 to 109 days during trial of the case, sentence imposed on them was reduced to the period already undergone.[7]

Where the assault was made by accused persons with lathi and tangi (agricultural tools), the accused were old men with no criminal antecedent against them and the case was lying pending against them since 1984, it was observed that the accused persons had suffered much, and in view of the same the sentence of accused persons was reduced to payment of fine.[8]

But where the members of the Lodhi and Thakur community committed offences under ss 149, 300, 325, 452 and 436, IPC, against members of the scheduled caste1116 community, and such tendency of abusing members of scheduled caste community should be curbed, so the accused persons did not deserve any leniency in sentence.[9] Where the age of two of the eight accused, convicted under ss 300 and 149, IPC, at the time of recording of statement was assessed to be 22 years, however, occurrence took place some six years ago, so on calculation the said two accused were found to have been below 16 years on the date of occurrence, the order to serve remaining period of sentence by them was held liable to be set aside.[10]

Where the offences under ss 147, 149, 323, 325, and 452, IPC were committed by the accused persons 20 years back, all the accused persons were more than 60-65 years, and there was no previous conviction against them on record, their sentences were reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone and to fine which was increased so that the victims could be properly compensated.[11]

Where accused persons were acquitted of offences under s 323 read with s 149, IPC, in view of the said offence lawfully compounded by the parties, the offences under ss 147 and 452, IPC, being non-compoundable, the conviction of the accused persons for these offences was proper, however, on facts and circumstances that incident took place 20 years ago and accused persons were in custody as convicts for at least six days, their sentence was reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone as the amount of fine had already been deposited by them.[12]

Where the incident took place 21 years ago, the accused were now aged 55-60 years and with the passage of time their socio-economic conditions had undergone radical changes. The fact that only lathis were used by the accused during the crime, do not warrant imposition of severe punishment, so sentence of the accused persons for offences under s 304, Pt II read with s 149, IPC, was reduced to three years rigorous imprisonment with Rs 5,000 as fine.[13]

63. Separate Convictions and Sentences for Substantive Offences

It has been held in many cases that where a prisoner is convicted of rioting and of causing hurt, and the conviction for hurt depends upon the application of this section, two sentences, one for rioting, and one for hurt, may be passed, provided that the total punishment does not exceed the maximum which the court might pass for any one of these offences,[14] and that the sentences should be made to run concurrently.[15] In the Full Bench case of Sunder Singh v State ,[16] the majority of the judges held that an offence under s 147 need have no ingredient which is common to s 323, nor for an offence under s 323 there need be any ingredient which constitutes an offence under s 147 . There can therefore be no doubt that both are separate offences for which separate convictions and separate sentences can be awarded. On the other hand, it has been held in other cases that separate sentences passed for rioting and grievous hurt1117 are not legal when the person so sentenced did not individually cause hurt, but is liable therefore under s 149 .[17]

Where the accused preventing a procession from proceeding on a highway with music were convicted under s 341 read with s 149, IPC, it was held that it would be more proper and logical not to record a separate conviction in respect of their individual acts under s 341 .[18] If the accused himself inflicted the hurt, he may be punished both for rioting and hurt, and the total punishment may legally exceed the maximum which the court might pass for any one of these offences.[19] A person cannot be convicted under s 302, IPC, for committing the offence directly, and under s 302 read with s 149, IPC, at the same time, for committing the offence constructively. If a man does commit an offence directly, there is no question of his committing it constructively, and vice versa.[20]

64. Illustrative Cases

The accused appellants committed the murder of the deceased, packed the dead body of the deceased into a gunny bag and threw it in the river. There was evidence that some accused persons actively participated in the assault, while others helped them. Conviction under s 304, Pt II, read with s 149 of the IPC was held proper.[21]

The prosecution case was that accused with armed naxallites opened fire on the police party, and the fire continued for two hours. None of the police party was hurt. No empty cartridges were recovered from the spot. The accused were arrested from the place near the incident. The prosecution witnesses gave divergent versions about the incident. Accused were entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charges under s 307 read with s 149, IPC .[22]

The prosecution case was that the accused S, driver of the car along with the occupants of the car (other accused) committed the murder of the deceased. Name of accused, S, was mentioned neither in the FIR nor in the statement under s 161, CrPC . No test identification parade was held, though the witnesses did not know him from before. The High Court had drawn an inference that because he was a driver in pre-planned manner, the role of such driver is crucial. Such an inferential conclusion was without any evidence to show participation of accused S. The conviction of the accused S under s 302, IPC read with s 149, IPC was found not sustainable, thus, it was was set aside.[23]

Five accused persons not named in FIR were given benefit of doubt and were acquitted of charge under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[24]

1118One accused appellant was not named in the FIR; however he admitted his presence in his statement under s 313, CrPC . Injured witness also deposed about his participation in the incident. The accused appellant was convicted under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[25]

The unlawful assembly consisted of twenty four persons. The five appellants were named in the FIR; four PWS (some of them injured) also disclosed their name at trial. The participation of the five accused appellants in the incident was proved beyond doubt. They were convicted under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[26]

All the seven accused assailants armed with lethal weapons viz. country made pistols, lathi, bhala came together to the house of the complainant, participated in the assault in which one person was killed and one injured and all ran away together. Charges against the appellants that they in concert with other accused to achieve a common object entered the house of the complainant stood proved. Accused appellant were convicted under ss 149 and 302, IPC .[27]

The unlawful assembly consisted of twenty four persons. Out of them, the eight appellants though named in the FIR, the prosecution evidence did not establish that they were either present on the spot or participated in the occurrence. No overt act was attributed to them. As such these appellants were given benefit of doubt by the Supreme Court and acquitted of the charge under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[28]

Only accused A1 was convicted. Eye-witnesses attributed overt act to accused A1 only. The injury caused by accused A1 proved fatal. Only conviction of accused A1 under s 302 read with s 149, IPC was affirmed. Other four accused A2 to A5 were acquitted.[29]

Appellant accused armed with fire arms weapons indulged in firing from close range, and caused death of the deceased. Large number of cartridges was recovered from the place of occurrence. Conviction of the accused appellants under s 302 read with s 149, IPC was held proper.[30]

Where several accused persons armed with various weapons attacked the deceased and the members of his family but only one appellant accused had inflicted the fatal injury, accused appellants were convicted under s 304, Pt II read with s 149, IPC .[31]

Since the medical report in the case did not support the allegations against the appellant Nos. 2 and 4, they were given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under ss 307 and 149, IPC .[32]

Six appellants accused persons were convicted on the charge of committing culpable homicide not amounting to murder under s 304, Pt I, IPC . The remaining1119 appellants were all along present at the time of the occurrence along with the six appellants; they were convicted under s 148 IPC, and were acquitted of the charges under ss 147 and 302 read with s 149 of the IPC .[33]

Where the evidence of PWS relating to the overt acts was in conflict with medical evidence, which also rendered presence of the accused persons at the scene of offence at the relevant point of time very much doubtful, the accused persons were acquitted of the charge under s 149, IPC .[34]

Where only two accused persons armed with gun had gone to the house of the deceased, other accused persons though armed with deadly weapons had not used those weapons, did not cause injury to the deceased or his people, they were acquitted of the charges under ss 302 and 307 read with s 149, IPC .[35]

Where role of two accused A5 and A6 was not clear, the number of members of unlawful assembly came to four, thus, s 149, IPC was held not attracted in the case.[36]

Where only two accused persons had caused injuries to the deceased, all other accused persons were held entitled to benefit of doubt and were acquitted.[37]

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 150.

Hiring, or conniving at hiring, of persons to join unlawful assembly.--

Whoever hires or engages or employs, or promotes, or connives at the hiring, engagement or employment of any person to join or become a member of any unlawful assembly, shall be punishable as a member of such unlawful assembly, and for any offence which may be committed by any such person as a member of such unlawful assembly in pursuance of such hiring, engagement or employment, in the same manner as if he had been a member of such unlawful assembly, or himself had committed such offence.

Comments

1. Scope

Like s 149, IPC, this section also creates a specific offence. For a person to be liable under s 149, he must be a member of an unlawful assembly at the time of the commission of an offence by a member of that assembly. But under this section a person need not be a member of an unlawful assembly, and yet he would be guilty of being a member of an unlawful assembly and guilty of an offence which may be committed by a member of it in the circumstances mentioned in the section.[38]

Notes under s 149, ante may be referred to.1120

2. Liability of the Hirer, Etc.

As already stated, this section creates a specific offence. The section intends to embrace all those who hire, promote or connive at the employment of persons and render them punishable as principal participants. It is clear from the language of this section which refers to a particular unlawful assembly. Under the section, a person though not actually a member of that unlawful assembly himself may be held guilty of being a member of unlawful assembly and may also be held liable for the offence which may be committed by any such member of the unlawful assembly.[39] If a person hires or engages another person to join or become a member of a particular unlawful assembly, he is liable for any offence committed by a member of that unlawful assembly as if he is himself a member of such unlawful assembly or himself commits the offence. The section will not apply unless there is an unlawful assembly composed of persons hired or engaged or employed, etc., by the accused, and some offence is committed by a member of such unlawful assembly in pursuance of the hiring, engagement or employment.[40]

3. Section 157 Distinguished

An offence contemplated by s 157, IPC may take place before an offence under this section is committed as well as after it. In this respect s 157 is of wider application. Section 150 , IPC makes the hiring or employing, etc. of persons to join an unlawful assembly an offence while harbouring persons so hired or employed or the persons about to be so hired or employed has been made punishable under s 157 . That latter section prescribes a specific sentence of imprisonment for a term of six months or fine or both but an accused under s 150 is liable to punishment in the same manner as if he had been a member of such unlawful assembly or himself had committed the offence, which may be committed by any hired or employed person as a member of such unlawful assembly. Under s 157, the law contemplates the imminence of an unlawful assembly and the proof of facts which in law would go to constitute an unlawful assembly.[41]

4. Meaning of 'Hires', 'Engages' or 'Employs'

To attract the provisions of s 150, IPC there must be the hiring, engagement or employment of a person to become a member of any unlawful assembly. The hiring, etc. must be complete, i.e. an agreement come to, and not merely an offer on the part of the accused. an attempt to hire, however, though not punishable under this section, would be so under s 511, IPC . The word 'employ' means 'to keep in service or to use'. The word is of very wide import and may include hiring and engagement. Though the word 'employ' or 'employment' is used, it does not mean recruitment. It means without any recruitment as a servant or agent to commit the offence. It would be calling of the service.[42] The word 'engage' here imports the idea of winning over as adherence or to set a person into service on a contract. It has also no reference to any compensation for the service taken from the person engaged. The word 'hire' means 'to procure for use or service for a compensation for the service to be1121 rendered'. The word 'employ' is comprehensive enough to convey any sense for which the three different words have been used in this section.

5. 'Promotes' or 'Connives'--Explained

The word 'promotes' denotes acceleration or inducement.[43] If the accused did not himself hire, engage or employ another, it should be shown that he either promoted, i.e. actively assisted, or connived at, i.e. passively allowed the hiring. In the case of connivance, three things should be proved:

(i) that the accused was legally bound to prevent the hiring;
(ii) that he was physically able to prevent it; and
(iii) that he did not do all that lay in his power to prevent it.

It is not necessary to prove that the person hired took any part in the unlawful assembly, unless it is desired to prove that he committed some offence in pursuance of such hiring, in which case, the hirer is punishable, under the latter clause of the section, as if he had himself been a member of the assembly, or had himself committed the offence.[44]

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable and non-compoundable. In other respects, the procedure is the same as for the offence committed by the person hired, engaged or employed.

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I, (nameand office of Magistrate, Session Judge etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you.....on or about the.....day.....of.....at..... hired (or engaged, or employed) (or promoted or connived at the hiring or engagement, or employment of) one AB to join as (or become) a member of an unlawful assembly, and that the said AB as a member of such unlawful assembly in pursuance of such hiring (or engagement or employment) committed (specify the offence and the person), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under.....read with s 150 of the IPC, and within my cognisance,
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 151.

Knowingly joining or continuing in assembly of five or more persons after it has been commanded to disperse.--

Whoever knowingly joins or continues in any assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, after such assembly has been lawfully commanded to disperse, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.--If the assembly is an unlawful assembly within the meaning of section 141, the offender will be punishable under section 145 .1122

Comments

1. Scope

This section penalises knowingly joining, or continuing in, an assembly of five or more persons, which is likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, after it is lawfully commanded to disperse. It does not apply to cases in which the assembly was unlawful from its inception or had become unlawful before the command for dispersal was given.[45] The explanation to the section amply makes it clear that a person who is a member of an unlawful assembly will be punishable under s 145, IPC and not under this section. Section 151 , IPC, will be attracted only if there was evidence to show that the assembly had been lawfully commanded to disperse. Where the command of dispersal was not given and the policeman only warned the two factions who were pelting stones this section cannot be invoked.[46] It is very doubtful if an assembly which is not unlawful in its inception does not become unlawful merely because it continues without dispersing in defiance of the lawful order to disperse, for there is no clause under s 141, IPC to say that an assembly refusing to disperse in obedience to a lawful command becomes an unlawful assembly.[47] The section is not applicable in the absence of the likelihood of causing public disturbance.[48]

2. Analogous Law

This section is analogous to s 145 of IPC 1860 and has to be read with that section and s 129 of the CrPC . The scope of these three sections and the distinction between them has been discussed in the commentary under s 145, IPC .

3. 'Knowingly Joins or Continues'

The section applies to a person who 'knowingly' joins or continues in an assembly. The word 'knowingly' means willfully, after being aware, of the fact that the assembly has been lawfully commanded to disperse.1123

4. 'Assembly of Five or More Persons'

Where the object of only three persons was to draw a crowd and their action was such as was calculated to, and did, draw a crowd of 50-60 persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, it was held that the gathering constituted an assembly of five or more persons within the meaning of this section and that a refusal to disperse after being lawfully commanded to disperse rendered every member of the gathering liable to conviction under it.[49]

5. 'Likely to Cause a Disturbance of the Public Peace'

This section finds its place in the chapter relating to 'Offences against the public tranquillity', and the very object of the section is to prevent a disturbance of the public peace. The likelihood of the assembly to cause disturbance to the public peace is, therefore, an essential element of the offence. In Empress v Tuker ,[50]it was held that whether disturbance to the peace is likely to be caused, must of necessity be very much a matter of opinion, and the police officer, in whose discretion the law leaves the duty of dispersing assemblies, must of course act upon his own opinion, one way or the other; and if his opinion is relevant, the grounds on which it is based, are also relevant. But their Lordships added that, although in cases of this kind the opinions of the police who know the people of the locality, may be relevant, the magistrate himself must look to the surrounding circumstances and form his own conclusions, whether the acts committed were reasonably likely to lead to a breach of the peace.

Meaning of the Expression, 'Likely to Cause a Disturbance of the Public Peace' in Section 129Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

The expression 'likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace' appears also in s 127, CrPC 1898 (now s 129, CrPC 1973), which is the section which empowers a magistrate or police officer to command an assembly to disperse. Interpreting the section Niyogi, AJC of the Nagpur Judicial Commissioner's Court observed:

> The reasonable, and what appears to me to be a plain meaning, is that when it appears that the behaviour of an assembly of five or more persons is such as to indicate that it would be an active party to the disturbance of public peace, or that it is reasonably calculated to provoke others to a breach of the peace, such an assembly may be ordered to disperse under section 127 , CrPC 1898 (now section 129,CrPC 1973). That section speaks of an actual unlawful assembly and a potential unlawful assembly. In the case of the latter, there must be evidence to establish that in the immediate future it would develop into an unlawful assembly animated by the common object of disturbance of the peace, or that the natural consequence of the assembly itself is to provoke a disturbance. In every case it is a question of fact to be determined on the evidence relating to the conduct of the assembly.[51]

6. Satisfaction of the Court Necessary

In a case under this section it is not sufficient to establish merely that in the opinion of the magistrate, who ordered the particular assembly to disperse, such assembly1124 was likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace; it is necessary to establish by evidence to the satisfaction of the court that the assembly was in fact likely to cause such disturbance.[52]

7. 'Lawfully Commanded to Disperse'

Section 151, IPC is attracted only if there is evidence to show that the assembly was lawfully commanded to disperse.[53] In the analogous s 145, IPC, the words used are 'commanded in the manner prescribed by law'. But that makes no difference.[54] In either case, for an order of dispersal to be lawful, it must fulfil the conditions of s 129 of the CrPC, the condition for making the command is that there should be an assembly of five or more persons and a likelihood of a disturbance of public peace. The word 'lawfully' in this section cannot be construed as having reference only to the authority or competency of the person issuing the command, but as signifying authority as well as likelihood of disturbance of public peace, and if either of these is found lacking the command will not be lawful.[55]

A command, disobedience to which is made penal under this section, is only a command to disperse.

an order to an assembly proceeding in a procession to go back and not to proceed further along the route it is going, has been held to be not a 'command to disperse' within the meaning of this section.[56]

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable, bailable but non-compoundable, and is triable by any magistrate.

Since the punishment provided for an offence under this section is imprisonment not exceeding six months, it can, under s 260, CrPC 1973 be tried summarily.

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name of office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of the accused), as follows:
> That you.....on or about the.....day of.....at..... joined (or continued in) an assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, after knowing that such assembly had been lawfully commanded to disperse, thereby committed an offence punishable under s 151 of the IPC, and within my cognisance.

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 152.

Assaulting or obstructing public servant when suppressing riot, etc.--

Whoever assaults or threatens to assault, or obstructs or attempts to obstruct, any public servant in the discharge of his duty as such public servant, in1125 endeavouring to disperse an unlawful assembly, or to suppress a riot or affray, or uses, or threatens, or attempts to use criminal force to such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The last section dealt with passive resistance of a person to the lawful command of a public servant and this section deals with active opposition to a public servant endeavouring to disperse an unlawful assembly.

The section contemplates resistance to some particular public servant, and therefore general resistance to the police force does not fall under it.[57]

2. 'Assault'

Section 351,post, and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

3. 'Public Servant'

Section 21,ante, and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

4. 'Unlawful Assembly'

Section 141,ante, and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

5. Riot

Section 146,ante, and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

6. Affray

Section 159,post, and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

7. Criminal Force

Section 350,post, and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable and a warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable, non-compoundable, and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.1126

9. Charge

The charge, under this section must specify the particular public servant assaulted or obstructed. It is not sufficient to say that the accused 'obstructed members of the police force'.[58] Where a person with six others, commits the offences of rioting, grievous hurt and assaulting a public servant endeavouring in the discharge of his duty as such to suppress the riot, he may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under ss 147, 325 and 152 of the IPC .[59] This section has reference to the offence of affray and to an assault committed on public servants in endeavouring to disperse an unlawful assembly or to suppress an affray. Under s 254 of CrPC 1898 [now s 246 (1), CrPC 1973], therefore, a magistrate has jurisdiction when discharging the accused of an offence under s 152 to frame a charge under s 160, IPC, since the offence of an affray is not an offence triable under chapter 21,[60] which dealt with warrant cases under the old CrPC .

10. Form of Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and office of Magistrate, etc.), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
>
> That you.....on or about the.....day of.....at.....assaulted (or threatened to assault) or obstructed (or attempted to obstruct) (or used or threatened to use criminal force to).....a public servant, in the discharge of his duty as such public servant in endeavouring to disperse an unlawful assembly (or to suppress a riot or affray), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 152 of the IPC, and within my cognisance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

11. Sentence

When a prisoner is convicted of rioting and for causing hurt and the conviction for hurt depends upon the application of s 149, it is not illegal to pass two sentences, one for riot, and one for hurt, provided the total punishment does not exceed the maximum which the court might pass for any one of the offences.

When, however, the accused is guilty of rioting, and is also found to have himself caused the hurt, he may be punished both for rioting and for hurt. In such a case the total punishment can legally exceed the maximum which the court might pass for any one of the offences.[61]

Separate sentences under ss 152, 332 and 333, IPC have however, been held to be illegal as the hurt inflicted on the police officers is the violence used towards them and is the essence of the offence under s 152 .[62]

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 153.

Wantonly giving provocation with intent to cause riot--if rioting be committed--if not committed.--

Whoever malignantly, or wantonly, by doing anything which is illegal, gives provocation to any person, intending or knowing1127 it to be likely that such provocation will cause the offence of rioting to be committed, shall, if the offence of rioting be committed in consequence of such provocation, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both; and if the offence of rioting be not committed, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section penalises the doing of an illegal act with the intention of provoking a riot.[63] The object is to avoid all possibilities of disturbance of the public peace. The section is based on the maxim 'prevention is better than cure'.[64] It provides for a heavier punishment if a riot is caused in consequence of the provocation. A conviction under this section does not warrant the taking of action under s 106 of the CrPC .[65] The presiding over of a debate on a subject of 'secularism', participated by eminent journalists and other personalities and true publication of these debates, however, will not amount to an offence under s 153, IPC . In order to come within the ambit of s 153, IPC, apart from the malignant or derogatory remarks published, that act must be an illegal act. The presiding over of a debate and publication of the speeches cannot be considered to be illegal acts.[66]

2. Validity of the section

The validity of this section was challenged before the Bombay High Court in GV Godse v Union of India ,[67] and it was held that the section is not ultra vires of the Constitution.

3. Gist of the Offence

The gist of the offence, under this section, is giving provocation wantonly to cause riot. The fact, that the offence under this section is punishable with a maximum of six months' imprisonment indicates that it was intended to apply to such provocative words, or acts, as do not directly amount to instigation or abetment.[68] A mere chance of provocation is however, not sufficient to justify a conviction under this section.[69]1128

4. Provocation to Cause Riot

The gist of the offence under this section is giving provocation wantonly to cause riot. In Queen-Empress v Kahanji ,[70] the language used both by Jardine and Ranade JJ, seems to show that these learned judges regarded instigation as equivalent to provocation, as the latter word is used in this section. But the point does not seem to have been argued in that case. Provocation which results in rioting may or may not amount to instigation or abetment of that offence. If it does, it is obviously more appropriate to charge abetment, which is the more serious offence. The fact that the offence under this section is punishable with a maximum of six months' imprisonment indicates that it was intended to apply to such provocative words, or acts, as do not amount directly to instigation or abetment.[71]Section 153, IPC implies instigation only in the sense of causing a riot by an illegal act which originates the feelings of anger of a so far peaceful assembly. Though the distinction may sometimes be hard to draw, the offence under this section involves some act of origination of a riot, by doing an illegal act infuriating to the feelings of those who ultimately come to riot; at least some such idea is connoted by the expression 'gives provocation' rather than the converse one of abetment.[72]

The notice board put up at a public place contained defamatory matter qua the accused. The accused tore out the same. Held, the act of the accused of tearing the notice would not be considered as an act done to commit disruption of public peace. Continuance of the proceedings against the accused would be abuse of the process of the court; thus, proceedings were quashed on petition under s 482, CrPC .[73]

5. Meaning of Words 'Wantonly' and 'Malignantly'

The word 'wantonly' merely means 'recklessly',[74] or 'thoughtlessly' without regard for right or consequence.[75] The word 'wantonly' occurs only in this section of the IPC, while the word 'malignantly' occurs once again in s 270, IPC, which refers to the wicked spread of infectious poison. 'Malignancy' implies a sort of general malice, and very strong evidence must be given to prove this malignancy or wantonness.[76] Good faith in the formation or expression of an opinion, can afford no protection to an imputation which does not purport to be based on that which is the legitimate subject of public comment.[77]

Where certain persons taking part in a religious procession gratuitously disobeyed the orders of the police concerning the manner in which such procession was to be conducted, with the result that a riot was only averted by bringing armed police upon the scene, it was held that the persons concerned acted, though not 'malignantly', yet 'wantonly' within the meaning of this section.[78]1129

The Provocation must be given 'Malignantly' or 'Wantonly'

The section requires that the provocation must be given malignantly or wantonly. No conviction under this section can be had unless it is proved inter alia that the act of the accused was done either malignantly or wantonly.[79] It is not necessary that the provocation should be given both malignantly and wantonly. It is enough if it is given only malignantly or wantonly.

Where it was found that the accused, a Mohammaden, killed a cow, not in the presence of any Hindu whose religious feeling might be wounded, but somewhere in a village sometime before sunrise, it was held that in the absence of evidence of malice or wantonness on the part of the accused, he could not be convicted under this section.[80] But to kill or to sacrifice a cow in the open, exposed to the view of the public, would cause needless offence to a very large body or persons who inhabit this land. A person who so kills or sacrifices a cow obviously does so recklessly, thoughtlessly and without regard for the sentiment of those who do not approve of such an act. Such conduct therefore amounts to a wanton act.[81]

Where an alleged abetment was by way of instigation by means of isolated passages contained in literary work published in the ordinary way towards the close of serious religious riots, but not distributed among the rioters, the general spirit of the work being in favour of peace and reconciliation, it was held that it would not be a proper construction of the words, though objectionable in themselves, to allow them to override the whole context of the work, and that the composition was not 'illegal', nor was its publication 'malignant' or 'wanton'.[82]

Where the accused were exercising their ordinary rights without interfering with the rights of the complainants, it cannot be said that they were provoking a riot, 'malignantly and wantonly by doing anything which is illegal' with the meaning of this section.[83]

6. 'By Doing anything which is Illegal'

The provocation must be given by doing an illegal act. If the act is not illegal, however wanton, undesirable and deplorable it may be, there can be no offence under this section.[84] Under s 43 the word 'illegal' has been defined as:

> The word "illegal" is applicable to everything which is an offence or which is prohibited by law, or which furnishes ground for a civil action; and a person is said to be "legally bound to do" whatever it is illegal in him to omit.

The killing of one's own cow does not furnish a ground for a civil action, and, in the absence of any law prohibiting cow slaughter, it cannot be said to be an illegal act.[85] The section does not apply unless there has been 'doing anything which is illegal'.

1130The act of taking out a bride and bridegroom in palanquins, in a marriage procession through a village does not amount to an illegal act in the absence of a custom having the force of law preventing people from going through the village in palanquins. The act which is in itself perfectly legal does not become illegal merely because it is done in defiance of an order of a police officer directing the bride and bridegroom to dismount when the police officer is not empowered under the laws, to issue such an order.[86]

The throwing of a brick at a temple is so far not declared to be an offence, nor is it prohibited by law. It may furnish a ground for a civil action if anybody was hit, but if nobody is hit, it is not an illegal act. So, even if a person deliberately threw bricks at the temple hoping that the Hindus would believe that the bricks came from the Mohammaden quarter and that thereby the Hindus would be enraged against the Mohammadens and there would be a riot between the Hindus and Mohamadens; he cannot be held guilty under this section if nobody was hurt by the brick.[87] Such cases may fall within the ambit of s 153A, IPC .

Where the accused Mohammadens formed themselves into a procession, and proceeded along a certain route at the time when another procession of Hindus was passing in the opposite direction along the same route as settled by the authorities, ignoring the orders of policemen stationed there to control traffic that they should go by another route, and a riot with injury to many persons was the result, it was held that the act of the accused in refusing to comply with the lawful orders of the police rendered them liable under this section.[88]

7. Provocation by Publication

Presiding over a debate on a subject of 'secularism', participated by eminent journalists, and other personalities and true publication of those debates, however, will not amount to an offence under s 153, IPC . In order to come within the ambit of s 153, IPC, apart from malignant or derogatory remarks published, that act must be an illegal act. The presiding over of a debate and publication of the speeches cannot be considered to be an illegal act.[89]

The publication of a pamphlet (the subject-matter of which leaves no doubt as to the identity of the persons against whom the writing is directed) written in a very provocative style, defamatory of certain persons, furnishing to them grounds for a civil action, would be illegal according to s 43 of the IPC, and as the natural and probable result of reading such a pamphlet would be to give provocation to the readers, the person connected with the pamphlet may properly be said to have intended that such provocation would cause the offence of rioting to be committed, and the distribution of the pamphlet would render the person concerned liable to punishment under s 153 of the IPC .[90]

When mention of a sentence in a book relating to Indian History that "Oriya is a younger sister of Bengali", cannot be said to be in a derogatory or defamatory sense in the context of the entire chapter, more particularly in view of fact that said1131 sentence was promptly deleted with apology, continuance of proceedings for defamation against eminent writer who was above 75 years of age, would amount to abuse of process of the court, hence, liable to be quashed.[91]

8. 'Intending or Knowing that it was Likely to Cause Rioting'

To constitute an offence under this section the accused must have been acting illegally and also with the intention to, or knowledge that it was likely to cause the offence of rioting to be committed.[92] There is nothing 'illegal' in India in a religious procession on a highway,[93] and the procession of one sect contemporaneous with the procession of another does not necessarily involve an intention to provoke a riot.[94]

Where the general spirit of a poem, published after a riot between the Hindus and Muslims and before the excitement caused by the riot had not entirely subsided, was in favour of peace and reconciliation, and there was nothing to indicate that the author's intention was to instigate the Hindus or provoke the Mohammedans to renew the disturbance, it was held that the composition of the poem could not be regarded as an illegal act and its publication was not malignant or wanton within the meaning of this section.[95]

Motive is not to be confused with intention. If a man knows that a certain consequence will follow from his act, it must be presumed in law that he intended that consequence to take place, although he may have had some quite different ulterior motive for performing the act.[96]

There was a flag hoisting ceremony witnessed by a gathering of about 250-300 persons. After the ceremony was over and the gathering was about to disperse, the accused came, unfastened the string of the National Flag and after the flag came down, trampled over it. The court held that the accused did an act, which was illegal, to wound the feelings of the persons present on the spot, gave provocation to them by his illegal act and was guilty under this section.[97]

9. Procedure

The procedure for an offence under this section is the same as in the case of an offence under s 152, IPC, but it is triable by any magistrate.

10. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and officer of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at..... malignantly, (or wantonly), by doing.....which was illegal, gave provocation to.....intending (or knowing it to be likely) that such provocation would cause the offence of rioting to1132 be committed, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 153 of the IPC, and within my cognisance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

11. Proof

To make out a case under this section, it is necessary to establish that:

(i) the accused did an act which was illegal;
(ii) he thereby gave provocation to any person; and
(iii) he did this (a) intending that the provocation will cause the offence of rioting to be committed or (b) knowing it to be likely that such provocation will cause the offence of rioting to be committed.[1]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

[2][S. 153A.

Promoting enmity between different groups on grounds of religion, race, place of birth, residence, language, etc., and doing acts prejudicial to maintenance of harmony.--

(1) Whoever--

(a) by words, either spoken or written, or by signs or by visible representations or otherwise, promotes or attempts to promote, on grounds of religion, race, place of birth, residence, language, caste or community or any other ground whatsoever, disharmony or feelings of enmity, hatred or ill-will between different religious, racial, language or regional groups or castes or communities, or

(b) commits any act which is prejudicial to the maintenance of harmony between different religious, racial, language or regional groups or castes or communities, and which disturbs or is likely to disturb the public tranquillity, [3][or]

[4][(c) organises any exercise, movement, drill or other similar activity intending that the participants in such activity shall use or be trained to use criminal force or violence or knowing it to be likely that the participants in such activity will use or be trained to use criminal force or violence, or participates in such activity intending to use or be trained to use criminal force or violence or knowing it to be likely that the participants in such activity will use or be trained to use criminal force or violence, against any religious, racial, language or regional group or caste or community and such activity for any reason whatsoever causes, or is likely to cause fear or alarm or a feeling of insecurity amongst members of such religious, racial, language or regional group or caste or community,] shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.1133

Offence committed in place of worship, etc.--(2) Whoever commits, an offence specified in sub-section (1) in any place of worship or in any assembly engaged in the performance of religious worship or religious ceremonies, shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to five years and shall also be liable to fine.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section was enacted to supplement the law of sedition, but the offence under it is quite different from sedition. The offence under this section may be concisely described as stirring-up of class hatred. In England it is punishable as seditious libel, but in India it is inserted in chapter 8 of the IPC relating to offences against public tranquillity, because, the essence of the offence is that it predisposes people to actions which disturb the public tranquillity. It affects the state only indirectly through disturbance of the public peace.[5]

Section 153A of IPC covers a case where a person by words, either spoken or written, or by signs or by visible representations or otherwise, promotes or attempts to promote, disharmony or feelings of enmity, hatred or ill-will between different religious, racial, language or regional groups or castes or communities or acts1134 prejudicial to the maintenance of harmony or is likely to disturb the public tranquillity.[6]

2. Amendments

This section is new and with the exception of cl(c) of sub-s(1) which was substituted by s 2 of the IPC, (Amendment) Act 1961 for the old s 153A, which itself was added by s 5 of the IPC, (Amendment) Act 1898.

The old section ran as follows:

> 153A. Promoting enmity between classes.--Whoever by words, either spoken or written, or by signs, or by visible representations, or otherwise, promotes or attempts to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of the citizens of India, shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.
> Explanation.--It does not amount to an offence within the meaning of this section to point out without malicious intention and with an honest view to their removal, matters which are producing, or have a tendency to produce, feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of the citizens of India.

3. Objects and Reasons

In order to effectively check fissiparous communal and separatist tendencies, whether based on grounds of religion, caste, language or community or any other ground, it is proposed to amend s 153A of the IPC, so as to make it a specific offence for anyone to promote or attempt to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different religious, racial or language groups or castes or communities. The Bill also seeks to make it an offence for anyone to do any act which is prejudicial to the maintenance of harmony between different religious, racial or language groups or castes or communities and which is likely to disturb public tranquillity.[7] The object of s 153A is to prevent breaches of public tranquillity which might result from excited feelings of enmity between classes of people.[8]

4. Changes Introduced by the New Section

The new section is divided into two parts marked separately as sub-ss (1) and (2). Sub-section (1) has been further sub-divided into three parts or clauses.

Clause (a) of sub-s (1) roughly corresponds to the old section and amplifies it by specifying some grounds of promoting feelings of enmity or hatred, and illustrating the different classes of citizens contemplated by the section.

Clause (b) is new and makes any act prejudical to the maintenance of harmony between the various communities an offence.

Clause (c) of sub-s (1) was inserted in 1972 to enlarge the scope of this section to bring within its ambit certain activities intended to use criminal force or violence against any religion, race, language or regional group or caste or community, which1135 may cause fear or alarm or a feeling of insecurity amongst members of the said classes or category.

Sub-section (2) provides an enhanced punishment of imprisonment extending to five years, as against three years provided by sub-s (1), for the same offence if they are committed in any place of worship or in any assembly engaged in the performance of religious worship or ceremonies.

The explanation appended to the old section has been dropped as, perhaps, being redundant.

5. Purpose

It is sometimes said that the section deals with defamation of a class as distinguished from defamation of the state (s 124A, IPC), defamation of religion (s 295A, IPC), or defamation of a person (s 499, IPC). This is probably because, according to the theory of the criminal law of England, the essence of the crime of libel lies in its tendency to provoke breaches of public peace. But, under the IPC, defamation has been made an offence without any reference to its tendency to provoke a breach of peace.[9] The section has been enacted for the purpose of preserving order and amity between various classes of citizens. It only means that no person is entitled to write or say or do anything whereby the feelings of one class of citizens should be inflamed against another.[10] That is why this section is placed in Chapter Eight and not in Chapter 21 relating to defamation.

6. Analogous Law

This section is analogous to ss 124A, 295A and 505 of IPC .

Section 95(1), CrPC 1973 provides for forfeiture of any newspaper, book or document, the publication of which is punishable under this section or s 124A, or s 153B or s 292 or s 293 or s 295A of IPC . Sub-section (2) of s 95, CrPC, provides that the 'newspaper' and 'book' for the purposes of ss 95 and 96 have the same meaning as in the Press and Registration of Books Act 1867 and the word 'document' includes any painting drawing or photograph, or other visible representation.

7. Healthy and Rational Criticism of Religion not an Offence

Rational criticism of religious tenets, couched in restrained language, however does not amount to an offence under s 153A .[11] Where the article read as a whole does not in any way tend or has the tendency to promote ill feeling or hatred against the Muslim community it cannot be said that the writer has deliberately and maliciously outraged the religious feelings of the Muslims. On the other hand, the article contains healthy and legitimate criticism of the Islamic religion and it is intended to bring about reformation in that religion in keeping with the modern world. It was held that the writing in question is not at all offensive and does not amount to an offence under1136 s 153A or s 295A of the IPC .[12] Criminality, under s 153A, does not attach to the thing said or done, but to the manner in which it is said or done. If the words, spoken or written, are couched in temperate, dignified and mild language and do not have the tendency to insult the feelings, or the deepest religious convictions, of any section of the people, penal consequences do not follow.[13] But where the articles do promote feelings of enmity, hatred and ill-will between the Hindu and Muslim communities on grounds of community, this cannot be done in the guise of a political thesis or historical truth.[14]Section 153A(1)(a), IPC is not confined to the promotion of feelings on enmity, etc. on grounds of religion only, but it takes in promotion of such feelings on other grounds as well such as race, place of birth, residence, language, caste or community.[15] Where the views expressed in an article, are purely political in nature, this section would not be attracted even though they give a call to the poor masses to rebel against the capitalist class.[16] But if the writing is calculated to promote the feelings of enmity or hatred, it is no defence, to a charge under s 153A, that the writing contained a truthful account of past events or is otherwise supported by good authority.[17]

The requirement of passing an order of forfeiture of a book, presupposes that the book contains any matter the publication of which is punishable under ss 124A or 153A or 153B or 292 or 293 or 295A of the IPC, for the State Government to declare that every copy of such book be forfeited to the Government. The power can only be exercised and notification can only be issued if the Government forms an opinion that the publication contains matter which is in an offence under any of the sections of the IPC as aforestated.[18]

8. No Applicability to Historical Works

This reasoning or principle will, however, not apply to historical works. Sometimes even a truthful account may come within the mischief of s 153A, IPC . But this will be too broad a proposition. Different considerations prevail when the courts are to consider a scholarly article on history and religion based upon research with the help of a number of reference books. It is very difficult for the state to contend that a narration of history would promote violence, enmity or hatred. If such a contention is accepted, a day will come when that part of the history, which is unpalatable to a particular religion, will have to be kept in cold storage on the pretext that the publication of such history would constitute an offence punishable under s 153A, IPC . The scope of s 153A cannot be enlarged to such an extent with a view to thwart history. For obvious reasons, history, and historical events cannot be allowed to be looked as a secret on a specious plea that if the history is made known to a person who is interested to know the history, there is likelihood of someone else being hurt.1137 Similarly, an article containing a historical research, cannot be allowed to be thwarted on such a plea that the publication of such a material would be hit by s 153A .[19]

9. Moral Turpitude

An offence under this section involves moral turpitude.[20]

10. Relative Scope of Sections 124A, 153 and 153A

The offence of sedition under s 124A, IPC, is essentially an offence against the Government or the State, while, the offence of stirring up of class-hatred under this section is an offence against public tranquillity. It affects the State only indirectly by disturbing the public peace. When amending s 124A, by Act 4 of 1898, the legislature thought of putting the words 'promotes or attempts to promote feelings of enmity or ill-will between different classes of His Majesty's subjects' in the proposed s 124A . But the Select Committee omitted the clause and enacted the same as an independent section in the form of this section on the following grounds:

> It appears to us that the offence of stirring up class-hatred differs in many important respects from the offence of sedition against the State. It comes more appropriately in the chapter relating to offences against the public tranquillity. The offence only affects the Government or the State indirectly, and the essence of the offence is that it predisposes classes of the people to action which may disturb the public tranquillity. The fact that this offence is punishable in England as seditious libel is probably due to historical causes, and has nothing to do with logical arrangement.[21]

The offence under this section is distinct from, and is not a necessary ingredient of the offence defined in s 124A . These two offences, even though committed by means of the same pamphlet, are as distinct as two libels on different persons contained in one book.[22]

It has been held that this section is no more ancillary to s 153 than s 124A to s 124 .[23]Section 153A may not be 'ancillary', that is subservient or subordinate, to s 153, but certainly the two sections are analogous, both being offences against public tranquillity. The difference between the two lies in this, that s 153 is directed against provoking a riot, whereas this section is directed against the disturbance of the public tranquillity generally.

11. Validity of Notification under Section 95Code of Criminal Procedure, Regarding Objectionable Matters Pertaining to Sections 124A , 153A, 153B,

292, 293, 295A, Indian Penal Code

It is evident that for exercising power under s 95 of the CrPC, it must appear to the government that the material published contains any objectionable matter and such matter promotes or is intended to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of the citizens of India, punishable under s 124A or s 153A or s 153B or s 292 or s 293 or s 295A of the IPC and thereupon, the state government1138 may by notification, stating the grounds of its opinion, declare every copy of the book containing such matter to be forfeited.

When the person affected, challenges the notification by filing a petition under s 96 of the CrPC, he has to establish that the publication or the book complained of, does not contain any material, which will offend or outrage the religious feelings of any section of the society. Thus the burden is on the person or persons who challenge the notification.

Where the Government is satisfied after considering the material on record that, where, any newspaper, or book or any document wherever printed, appears to the State Government to contain any matter, the publication of which is punishable under s 124A or s 153A or s 153B or s 292 or s 293 or s 295A of the IPC, the State Government may issue a notification stating the grounds of its opinion, by passing an order under s 95 of CrPC and the said order cannot be said to be violative of art 19(1)(a) of the Constitution of India offending the freedom of speech. On the other hand, the order is in pursuance of the reasonable restriction imposed by the Parliament. Therefore, the same is not violative of either art 19(1)(a) or art 19(1)(g) of the Constitution of India .[24]

Mere mention of an article or a part thereof in the notification would not constitute grounds contemplated by s 95, CrPC .[25]

Where notification issued under s 95, CrPC directed forfeiture of posters displayed with deliberate and malicious intention to insult religious belief of a particular community, there was no material showing that the act was done with malicious intention and deliberateness, there was no indication regarding existence of the requisite ingredients of ss 153A and 295A of the IPC, there was also no description of any particular religion or community in the notification which was likely to be incensed, the notice was indefensible so order of forfeiture was set aside.[26]

Pre-decisional hearing is not envisaged by s 95, CrPC .[27]

12. Relative Scope of Sections 153A and 295A

The provisions of this section may overlap those of s 295A, which was inserted in the Code by the Criminal Law (Amendment) 1927. In the 'Statement of Objects and Reasons' for that Act it was stated:

> The prevalence of malicious writings intended to insult the religion or outrage the religious feelings of various classes of His Majesty's subjects has made it necessary to examine the existing provisions of the law with a view to seeing whether they require to be strengthened. Chapter 15 of the IPC, which deals with offences relating to religion, provides no penalty in respect of writings of the kind described above. Such writings can usually be dealt with under section 153A of the IPC, as it is seldom that they do not represent an attempt to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes. It must be recognised, however, that this is only an indirect way of dealing with acts which may properly be made punishable themselves, apart from the question whether they have the further effect of promoting feelings of enmity or hatred between classes.1139 Accordingly, it is proposed to insert a new section in Chapter 15 of the IPC, with the object of making it a specific offence intentionally to insult or attempt to insult the religion or outrage or attempt to outrage the religious feelings of any class of His Majesty's subjects.[28]

It may be noted that s 295A, IPC is confined to outraging the religious feelings of a class of citizens by insulting their religion or religious beliefs, but s 153A, IPC is not so restricted, but extends to promoting enmity or hatred between different racial or language groups, or castes and communities not only on grounds of religion, but also on grounds of race, language, caste, community, or any other ground.

13. Sections 153A and 505 Considered Together

Section 153A, IPC covers a case where a person 'by words, either spoken or written, or by signs or any visible representations' promotes or tends to promote such feeling. Under s 505, IPC, promotion of such feelings should have been done by making and publishing or making any statement or report containing dire or alarming news. The main distinction between the two offences is that while publication of the words or representation is not necessary under the former, such publication is sine qua non under s 505 . The words 'whoever makes, publishes or circulates' used in the setting of s 505(2), IPC cannot be interpreted disjunctively but only as supplementary to each other. If it is construed disjunctively, anyone who makes a statement falling within the meaning of s 505 would, without publication or circulation, be liable to conviction. But the same is the effect with s 153A, IPC also and then that section would have been bad for redundancy. The common feature in both sections being promotion of feeling of enmity, hatred or ill-will 'between different' religious or racial or language or regional groups or castes or communities it is necessary that at least two such groups or communities should be involved. Merely inciting the feeling of one community or group without any reference to any other community or group cannot attract either of the two sections.[29]

14. Validity of Section 153A

A view was taken in some cases that, after the coming into force of the Constitution of India, this section, as it was, as well as s 124A become void under art 13 of the Constitution as contravening the right of freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by art 19(1) of the Constitution . But art 19(2) after its amendment by the Constitution (First Amendment) Act 1951, which was made on 18 June 1951, with retrospective effect saved the sections from unconstitutionality.[30] The concluding words of cl (b) of the present section make it further clear that the section has been enacted in the interest of public order within the meaning of art 19(2) . The amended cl (2) of art 19 of the Constitution protects a law imposing reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right to freedom of speech and expression 'in the interest of public1140 order', which is much wider than 'for maintenance of' public order. If, therefore, certain activities have a tendency to cause public disorder, a law penalising such activities as an offence cannot but be held to be a law imposing reasonable restriction 'in the interest of public order' although in some cases those activities may not actually lead to a breach of public order.[31] There can, therefore, be no question that the section is saved by art 19(2) and is perfectly valid.

15. 'By Words, Spoken or Written...or Otherwise'

These words are also found in s 124A, IPC, and for comments thereon, notes under that section may be referred to.

It is thus firmly established both in India and in England, that criminality for the offence of blasphemous libel, or criminality under s 153A of the IPC, does not attach to the things said or done but to the manner in which it is said or done. If the words spoken or written are couched in temperate, dignified, and mild language, and do not have the tendency to insult the feelings or the deepest religious convictions of any section of the people, penal consequences do not follow.[32]

16. 'Promote'

The word 'promote' according to Webster's Dictionary means 'to contribute to the growth, enlargement or prosperity of (any process or thing that is in course); to forward; to further; to encourage; to advance; to excite; and also to urge on or incite another as to strife'. In the context in which the word is used in this section, it may be taken to mean 'to excite' and that is the word used in some of the analogous provisions of law. It has been held that it is not essential to the meaning of 'promotion' that the object aimed at should be achieved. That is one of the differences between 'promoting' and 'causing'. Cause implies effect. Promotion does not. The promotion may fail in its object. In this respect it may be a synonym for 'foment'. It is also not essential that promotion should be with reference to something already in existence. It would be possible to promote hatred where enmity had previously existed.[33]

17. 'Promotes or Attempts to Promote Disharmony or Feeling of Enmity, Hatred or Ill-will'

The gist of the offence under cl(a) of sub-s(1) of this section is the promotion of, or attempt to promote disharmony, feelings of enmity or hatred or ill-will between the different religious, racial, language or regional groups or castes or communities.[34] Prompting disharmony or feeling of enmity, hatred or ill-will between different communities which is likely to cause fear or alarm or induce any person to commit any offence against public tranquillity are sought to be covered by the provisions of ss 153A and 505(1)(b) and (c) of IPC . This being the common feature of both the provisions it is necessary that at least two groups or communities should be involved.1141 Merely inciting the feeling of one community or group without any reference to any other community or group cannot attract the provision of s 153A or s 505 .[35]

The intention to cause disorder or incite the people to violence is the sine qua non of the offence under s 153A of IPC and the prosecution has to prove prima facie the existence of mens rea on the part of the accused. The intention has to be judged primarily by the language of the book and the circumstances in which the book was written and published. The matter complained of within the ambit of s 153A must be read as a whole. One cannot rely on strongly worded and isolated passages for proving the charge, nor indeed can one take a sentence here and a sentence there and connect them by a meticulous process of inferential reasoning.[36]

It has, however, been held that the words 'promotes or attempts to promote feelings of enmity' are to be read as connoting a successful or unsuccessful attempt to promote feelings of enmity. It must be the purpose, or part of the purpose, the mere circumstances that there may be a tendency is not sufficient.[37] Following this view, it has been held that everything done which may have a remote bearing on promoting feelings of hatred or enmity would not be an offence. There should either be the intention to promote such feelings or such feelings should be promoted as a result of such publications.[38]

Criticism of the Hindu religion for its inculcation of the doctrine of untouchability and for the sanction which it has given to reprehensible treatment meted out to the low castes has in recent years been considered perfectly legitimate.[39] Thus in such cases it cannot be said that there was any attempt to promote disharmony or feeling of enmity, hatred or ill-will.

Where there were criticisms in an article of British imperialism and the Rulers of India, accusing them of exploiting and crushing the 'workers' and the proletariat, the article could not be said to be calculated to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between the Europeans as Europeans and the Indians as Indians.[40]

But where in a speech made by the accused every calamity or evil or misfortune that fell to the country and suffering by the people was imputed to the Government, zamindars and talukdars, it was held that the intention of the accused was to promote, or attempt to promote, feelings of enmity and hatred between the kisans and the zamindars and talukdars of Oudh, and he was guilty of the offences under this section.[41]

If the writing is calculated to promote feelings of enmity or hatred, it is no defence to a charge under s 153A of the IPC that the writing contains a truthful account of past events or is otherwise supported by good authority. Adherence to strict path of history is not by itself a complete defence to a charge under s 153A of the IPC .[42]

A, a Hindu, ridiculed the Mohammedan Prophet in a book, not out of any eccentricity but in the prosecution of a propaganda started by a class of persons. It1142 was held that he was punishable under this section as the book promoted feelings of enmity and hatred between Hindus and Mohammedans.[43]

The applicant wrote a book Islam - A concept of Political World Invasion by Muslims. The book contained an attack on the personal life of Mohammad Pigambar, which would hurt Muslim sentiments. The ban on the circulation of the book imposed by the Maharashtra Government under s 95, CrPC was held proper.[44]

Where in a newspaper article, both Babas and Meahs, are inveighed against, as robbing the poor Mohammedan raiyats, and Christian missionaries are referred to as illustrating their treatment of converts, it could not be said that there was an intention to create enmity between them and any other citizens, nor was it a deliberate attempt to incite one class against another, and consequently, a conviction in respect of such article under this section was held to be bad.[45]

Where in the book in question there was nothing objectionable that might be said to insult Hinduism or to promote disharmony and hatred between different castes so as to be punishable either under s 153A or s 295A, IPC and the impugned order of its forfeiture was wholly unjustified and unsustainable.[46] The author of the book Shivaji Hindu Kling in Islamic India, a serious and intense scholar, did not intend to hurt the sentiments of the people of India. Held, the author and the printer of the book could not be prosecuted under ss 153 and 153A .[47]

Prosecution case was that the accused petitioner published a news item in the newspaper that some explosives were received from the house of the relative of the then Chief Minister of the State to malign the Chief Minister, to create communal disharmony in the State. Merely inciting the feeling of one community or group without any reference to any other community or group cannot attract the provisions of s 153A or s 505 . In the entire news item there was no reference to two communities for the purpose of inciting the feeling of one community against the other. It only narrated about para-military forces operating in that area and recovering certain arms from the possession of persons including Ganga Charan Debbarma. Except the activity of the para military force and the role of certain persons including Ganga Charan Debbarma, there was nothing to incite any community against the other. Ingredients of offence under ss 153A and 505, IPC were not made out.[48]

In Bilal Ahmaed Kaloo v State of AP ,[49] it is held that the common feature in both the sections, viz., ss 153A and 505(2) of the IPC, being promotion of feeling of enmity, hatred or ill-will between different religious or racial or linguistic or regional groups or castes and communities, it is necessary that at least two such groups or communities should be involved. Further, it was observed that merely inciting the1143 feeling of one community or group without any reference to any other community or group cannot attract either of the two sections.[50]

18. Attempt Implies Intention

The word 'attempt' implies intention,[51] but 'intention' falls short of 'attempt'[52]which implies, besides the mental act of intention, some direct effort towards the achievement of the desired object.

19. Gist of the Offence

The gist of the offence is the intention to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes or people.[53]

20. Intention

The intention to cause disorder or incite people to violence is the sine qua non of the offence under s 153A, IPC, and the prosecution has to prove the existence of mens rea in order to succeed. Where, the prosecution has not been able to establish any mens rea on the part of accused persons, as envisaged by the provisions of s 153A, IPC, by their raising the three slogans casually a couple of times, the offence under s 153A, IPC, is not made out against them.[54] Absence of malicious intention is a relevant factor to judge whether the offence is committed. It can be said to be promoting enmity only where the written or spoken words have the tendency or intention of creating public disorders or disturbances of law and order or affect public tranquillity. Mens rea has to be proved for proving commission of the offence.[55] It has been held in a number of cases that it was intended by the framers of the Code that intention should be an element in the offence under this section.[56] In State (Delhi Admn) v Shri Kanth Shastri ,[57] the Delhi High Court has taken the view that the essence of this offence is malicious intention.

21. Intention can be Judged from Words Published or other Material

The intention to cause disorder or incite the people to violence is the sine qua non of the offence under s 153A of the IPC and the prosecution has to prove prima facie the existence of mens rea on the part of the accused. The intention has to be judged primarily by the language of the book and the circumstances in which the book was written and published. The matter complained of within the ambit of s 153A must be1144 read as a whole. One cannot rely on strongly worded and isolated passages for proving the charge nor indeed can one take a sentence here and a sentence there and connect them by a meticulous process of inferential reasoning.[58]

In PK Chakravarty v King-Emperor ,[59] Rankin J, (with whom Mukerji J, agreed) observed:

> It is settled law that section 153A , IPC, does not mean that any person who > publishes words that have a tendency to promote class hatred can be convicted under that section. The words 'promotes or attempts to promote feelings of enmity' are to be read as connoting a successful or unsuccessful attempt to promote feelings of enmity. It must be the purpose or part of the purpose of the accused to promote such feelings and, if it is no part of his purpose, the mere circumstance that there may be a tendency is not sufficient. It is quite true that whether or not the promoting of enmity is the intention, is to be collected in most cases from the internal evidence of the words themselves, but I know of no authority for saying that other evidence cannot be looked at; and it appears to me that the explanation shows quite conclusively that, in any matter on which other evidence could assist, it may be taken.

Again in Satya Ranjan Bakshi v Emperor ,[60] his Lordship as CJ (Ghose J, agreeing with him) elaborated the same view in the following words:

> In PK Chakravarthy v Emperor ,[61] I had occasion to point out that although the internal evidence of the words published will generally be decisive on the question of intention, they are never more than evidence of intention and it is the real intention of the accused that is the test. I pointed out also that the mere fact that ill-feeling may result or may be likely to result from the publication is not in itself sufficient and that there may be circumstances in any such case which would rightly prevent a Judge of fact from holding that the publication was an attempt to promote ill-feeling.

Further, referring to the important principle laid down by Woodroffe J, in Re Amrita Bazar Patrika Press:[62]

> If on the other hand, the words used naturally, clearly and indubitably have such tendency, then it must be presumed that the publisher intended that which is the natural result of the words used, and no other evidence is (to say the least) likely to rebut the existence of such intention, it was observed that each case must be presumed that the publisher intended that which is the natural result of the words used, and no other evidence is (to say the least) likely to rebut the existence of such intention.

It was observed that each case must be dealt with on its own facts. This view has been followed in the undermentioned cases.[63] In Lajpat Rai v Emperor ,[64] following the Calcutta cases cited above, it was distinctly held that the Crown has to establish that the writer of the work was actuated by the malicious intent which it is necessary to prove by extrinsic evidence, or to infer from the nature of the work itself.1145

22. Rule of Mens Rea Expressly Displaced by Statute

But, as pointed by Sulaiman CJ, in MLC Gupta v Emperor ,[65] it would be interpolating the words 'with intent to' in this section if one were to hold, that the intention of the writer to promote hatred, etc, must be established. The section merely says: 'Whoever by words, either spoken or written, or by signs, or by visible representations, or otherwise, promotes, or attempts to promote feelings of enmity or hatred, etc. It does not say 'intentionally promotes feelings of enmity, etc.'. There can be no justification for introducing the words 'with intent to' in the section. There are a number of offences under the IPC for which an express intention on the part of the accused is not at all necessary. Indeed, wherever it is necessary that intention should form a necessary part of the offence, the Code expressly states so. It should, therefore, follow that the legislature contemplates that the words spoken or written, which do promote hatred, etc.c., would create sufficient mischief so as to fall within the scope of the section, and that it is not necessary for the prosecution to further establish that the writer had the intention to promote such hatred. Even if a question of intention were to arise, such intention must be gathered from the words spoken or written, and they themselves would be conclusive, and it would not be necessary for the prosecution further to prove that such an intention was behind the use of such words. It may also be noted that even in the present section inserted by the amending Act, the legislature has not thought it fit to insert the word 'intention' or 'intentionally'. The offence is one of those in which the general rule of mens rea is expressly displaced by the statute creating it, which creates an absolute prohibition.[66]

The matter may also be looked at from another point of view. Even cl (a) of the present sub-section, like the old section, bases the liability under it on two alternative grounds: (a) promoting feeling of enmity or hatred; or (b) attempting to promote such feelings. Taking the first ground first, it is clear that it applies to a case where feelings of enmity or hatred have actually been promoted, or excited or aroused by the words spoken or written by the accused. If the feelings have not actually been excited or aroused, it cannot, without violence to the language, be said that the accused promoted such feelings. If the feelings of enmity or hatred have been promoted by the accused, he is guilty under the section and no question of intention arises; for the simple reason that promotion implies intention and the accused is presumed to have intended the natural consequences that resulted from his act of promoting.[67] That is why the section does not use the word 'intentionally' before the word 'promotes'.

As regards the second ground of liability, that is, 'attempts to promote feelings of enmity', the very word 'attempt' implies intention.[68] But intention falls short of 'attempt'[69] which implies, besides intention, some effort, through some overt act, to achieve the desired object.

This ground of liability applies only to a case where the feelings of enmity or hatred have not yet been actually promoted. All the decisions in which the question1146 of intention was considered were cases of this class. Where the attempt of the accused not having succeeded, the object of the attempt is not known and has still to be ascertained, and until it is ascertained to be to promote feelings of enmity, the accused cannot be held guilty. It is in ascertaining the effect of the attempt that the question of intention arises. Whether or not the promoting of enmity is the intention, is to be collected in most cases from the internal evidence of the words themselves spoken or written by the accused.[70]

23. Intention--How Determined

Where the words written or spoken do attempt to promote feelings of enmity, hatred, etc., and therefore fall under s 153A, action can be taken by the state where, although there has yet been no occasion for the promotion of any feelings of enmity and hatred and there may have been no attempt yet made to promote such feelings, but the words are intended to promote such feelings.[71] It has been repeatedly held that in judging the question of intent, the accused must be deemed to intend that which is the natural result of the words used, having regard, among other things to the character and description of that part of the public who are to be expected to hear or read the words used.[72] In a Bombay case, it was held that where an article can bear a meaning that it is calculated to produce hatred and enmity between two classes, the natural inference, from its publication is that the person, who published it, had the malicious intention, that it would produce such hatred and enmity. The burden of proof shifts to the accused when he asserts that the natural inference to be drawn from the publication of the article does not hold good in his case.[73] The Allahabad High Court has held that the legislature contemplates that the words spoken or written which do promote hatred, etc., would create sufficient mischief so as to fall within the scope of s 153A, IPC and that it is not necessary for the state further to establish that the writer had the intention to promote such hatred. Even if a question of intention were to arise such intention must be gathered from the written words used in the case, and they themselves would be conclusive, and it would not be necessary for the state further to prove that such an intention was obtained by the use of such words.[74]

24. Determination of Guilt--Objectionable Matter

In an Oudh case, it has been held that it is not open to the speaker to say that he did not intend his language to bear the meaning which it naturally does bear.[75] But in another Allahabad case it has been held that this matter must be judged primarily by the language of the book itself though it is permissible to receive and consider1147 external evidence either to prove or to rebut the meaning ascribed to it in the charge.[76] The Calcutta High Court explained the position thus:

> It is true that from the nature of the case, the internal evidence of the words used and the meaning of the words used will very generally be decisive of the question, whether or not the court is confronted with a successful or unsuccessful attempt to promote feelings of enmity. They will be decisive in all cases where the intention is expressly declared; also if the words used naturally, clearly and indubitably have such a tendency, then it must be presumed that the publisher intended that which is the natural result of the words used.[77] But the words used and their true meaning is never more than evidence of intention and it is the real intention of the accused that is the test.[78]

It has, however, to be remembered that cl (b) of the section makes it an offence to commit an act which is even likely to disturb the public tranquillity. It does not make it necessary that the accused should know that it is likely to disturb the public tranquillity. In other words it does away with mens rea altogether. There is no reason why mens rea should be made an essential element for an offence under cl (a).[79]

When mention of a sentence in a book relating to Indian history that 'Oriya is a younger sister of Bengali', cannot be said to be in a derogatory or defamatory sense in the context of the entire chapter, more particularly in view of fact that said sentence was promptly deleted with apology, continuance of proceedings for defamation against eminent writer who was above 75 years of age, would amount to abuse of process of the court, hence, liable to be quashed.[80]

In determining the effect of a speech or writing the court has to look at the speech or writing as a whole and not pay undue regard to any particular sentence or phrase.[81] The Supreme Court has directed that an objectionable matter must be viewed from an average, healthy and commonsense point of view and judged by the standard of an ordinary reasonable prudent man.[82]

25. 'On Grounds of Religion...or any other Ground Whatsoever'

This is a new clause in sub-s (i) of this section. It sets out the grounds of promoting feelings of enmity and hatred. The grounds so specified are only illustrative, and are not exhaustive. The words 'or any other ground whatsoever' would cover every possible ground which may or may not be similar to the grounds specified. The reference to religion, race and caste in this section echoes art 15 of the Indian Constitution which prohibits discrimination against any citizen 'on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them'.

'Religion' refers to the prevalent system of faith and worship, such as the Hindu, Mohammedan and Christian religions.

1148'Race' refers to different ethical stocks like the Caucasian, Mongolian, etc. Europeans and Indians were considered to belong to different races and a step towards abolition of racial discrimination was taken on the eve of the commencement of the Constitution by the passing of the Criminal Law (Removal of Racial Discriminations) Act 1949 by which the privileges enjoyed by the Europeans and Americans under the British regime, in matters of criminal law and procedure, were taken away. In Narayan Vasudev Phadke v Emperor ,[83] Wassoodew J, referred to racial grouping of Indians themselves at Mahan, Chambhan and Chandals in Western India.

'Language' refers to the different languages like Hindi, Tamil, Telugu, etc.

'Caste' refers to hereditary classes like Brahamans, Kshatriyas, Vaishyas and Sudras.

'Community' is a body of persons having something like religion or profession in common. The word roughly corresponds to the word 'classes' in the old section.

Each of the categories specified is only a different basis of classification of the citizens. These categories are not mutually exclusive and may cut across or overlap each other. Thus, different sections of the same religious group may fall under different racial or language groups. So also different sections of the same language group may fall under different religious groups. Different members of the same caste may come under different language groups.

26. 'Between Different Religious, Racial, Language or Regional Groups or Castes or Communities'

The phrase is new and corresponds to the phrase 'between different classes of the citizens of India' in the old section. This new phrase practically means the same thing as the old one, though it gives some definiteness and content to that phrase. It has been held that the word 'class' in the old section has not been defined anywhere and that the 'classes' may not be divided on racial or religious grounds only.[84] The phrase in the present section specifically refers to religious or racial groups, but it is not restricted to them. It specifically mentions other groups like language groups and castes and finally uses the general word 'communities' which practically means the same thing as 'classes'. The word 'classes' is opposed to the word 'masses' and simply means a division of the mass of citizens. The leading sense in which 'class' is used in given in the New Oxford Dictionary as a number of individuals (persons or things) possessing common attributes, and grouped together under a general or 'class' name; a kind, sort, division.

The Koran is a sacred book. This book is not prejudicial to the maintenance of harmony between different religions because of the Koran no public tranquillity has been disturbed up to now and there is no reason to apprehend any likelihood of such disturbance in future. Apart from anything else, there is no question for forfeiture or banning of the said book on the ground of disharmony or feelings of enmity or hatred or ill-will between different religions or communities. Section 153A of the IPC has no application on these facts of the case.[85]

1149In State of Andhra Pradesh v P Sugar ,[86] their Lordships of the Supreme Court, dilating upon the expression 'class', observed thus:

> The expression 'class' means a homogenous section of the people grouped together because of certain likeness or common traits, and who are identifiable by some common tributes such a status, rank, occupation, residence in a locality, race, religion and the like. In determining whether a particular section forms a class, caste cannot be excluded altogether, but in the determination of the class, a test, solely based upon the caste or community, cannot also be accepted.

27. Clause (b)--Prejudicial Act

This clause is entirely new and is added to 'effectively check fissiparous and separatist tendencies'. The old section was confined to promoting, or attempting to promote, feelings of enmity or hatred between different communities in India. By this clause the present section creates a new offence, which is the doing of any act which is prejudicial to the maintenance of communal harmony and which disturbs, or is likely to disturb public tranquillity, whether or not it can be said to promote or attempt to promote feelings of enmity or hatred between the various communities.

28. Clause (c)

Prior to the insertion of this clause, though action could be taken under the existing law against individuals for activities promoting enmity or prejudicial to the maintenance of harmony between different groups on grounds of religion, race, place of birth, residence, language, etc., there was no provision for dealing effectively with an association which had, for its object, such objectionable activities. In order to curb the objectionable activities of such associations more particularly the militant organisations, engaged in certain activities intending to use criminal force or violence against, or to cause, or likely to cause, fear or alarm or a feeling of insecurity amongst member of any religious, racial, language or regional group or caste or community; which pose a serious challenge to the integrity of the nation and maintenance of harmony between different communities, the present cl (c) has been added in this section.

29. Sub-section (2)--Offences Committed in Place of Worship, Etc

This sub-section does not lay down any new provision and simply provides somewhat more stringent punishment for the offences specified in sub-s (1); if they are committed in any place of worship or in any assembly, engaged in the performance of religious worship or religious ceremonies. The temples, mosques, churches, gurdwaras or any platform or other place, where prayers, offerings or any other religious ceremonies made will come within the expression 'place of worship'. A marriage or adoption strictly speaking is neither a religious worship nor a religious ceremony but a hawan or recitation of 'sloks' or prayers made to invoke Gods on such occasions among Hindus, may fall under the expression 'religious' ceremonies. Therefore, such part of a marriage ceremony, which has the sanction of the religion of any particular community, without which the marriage is nullity, will be a religious ceremony according to this sub-section. If it is intended that an accused should get an enhanced punishment provided by this sub-section, the formal charge framed by the magistrate should contain the particulars required thereunder.1150

30. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable and a warrant may be issued in the first instance. It is neither bailable nor compoundable; and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

31. Conditions Requisite for Initiation of Proceedings

Commentary under the same heading in s 196, CrPC, may be referred to.[87]

As restriction is placed by s 196(1)(a), CrPC in relation to an offence under s 153A, IPC on cognizance of the offence by the court without prior sanctioning of the Central/State Government, as such FIR can be registered and investigation can be carried out without prior sanction.[88]

Prior sanction either of the State Government or of the Central Government is necessary before taking cognizance of the offence under ss 153A and 153B of the IPC . Where no sanction as envisaged under s 196(1)(a) and s 196(1A)(a), CrPC for prosecution of the Central or State Government was obtained, order of taking cognizance of the two offences i.e. under ss 153A, 153B, IPC, was quashed.[89]

32. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of....., at....., by speaking (or writing) the words (or by signs, or visible representations), viz, ... promoted (or attempted to promote) feelings of enmity (or hatred) between.....(specify the groups, castes or communities) or committed an act, which is prejudicial to the maintenance of harmony between different groups, castes or communities and which disturbs, or is likely to disturb, public tranquillity, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 153A of the IPC, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

In case the offence committed by an accused falls under cl (c) of sub-s (1) or under sub-s (2) the particulars or ingredients of the same are to be mentioned in the charge.

33. Joinder of Charges

A person can be charged at one trial with having committed offences under s 124A, and s 153A, IPC by means of two articles of different dates appearing in his newspaper of those dates.[90] It is not necessary for the charges to specify the distinct passages in a pamphlet which are alleged to constitute offences under ss 124A and 153A respectively. It is sufficient for the charges to allege generally that the pamphlet constitutes an attempt to excite disaffection, and also to promote feelings of hatred between different classes.[91]1151

34. Joint Trial

Charges under ss 124A and 153A, IPC, may be tried together. But even separate trials for each are not illegal.[92]

35. Proof

For charge, under s 153A, it is not necessary to prove that, as a result of the objectionable matter, enmity or hatred was, in fact, caused between the different classes.[93]Intention to promote enmity or hatred, apart from what appears from the writing itself, is not a necessary ingredient of the offence. It is enough to show, at the trial, that the language of the writing is of such a nature as to promote the feelings of enmity or hatred because a person must be presumed to intend the natural consequences of his act.[94] The matter charged, as being within the mischief of s 153A, must be read as a whole. One cannot rely on stray and isolated passages for proving the charge nor, indeed one can take a sentence here and a sentence there and connect them by a meticulous process of inferential reasoning.[95] For judging, what are the natural or probable consequences of the writing it is permissible to take, into consideration, the class of readers, for whom the writing is primarily meant, as also the state of feelings between the different classes or communities at the relevant time.[96]

Omission of Penal Provision in Notification Banning a Book--Effect of

Where the ingredients of the penal provision(s) are stated in the notification, the absence of a clear statement of the penal provisions in the notification is not fatal to the notification.[97]

36. Yardsticks for Judging an Offensive Matter

Where the question before the Supreme Court was whether the TV serial titled 'Tamas' depicted communal tensions and violence that occurred during the partition period in India and was likely to disturb public order and incite people to indulge in commission of criminal offences, the humble judges constituting the Bench viewed it from an average, healthy and commonsense point of view and observed that that is the yardstick. There cannot be any apprehension that it is likely to affect public order or it is likely to incite into the commission of any offence. It was held that the standards must be so framed that people are not reduced to a level where the protection of the least capable and the most deprived amongst us determines what the morally healthy cannot view or read. The censors must make a substantial allowance in favour of freedom thus leaving a vast area for creative art to interpret life and1152 society with some of its foibles along with what is good. One must not look upon such human relationship as banned in toto forever from human thought must give scope for talent to put them before society. Ideas having redeeming social or artistic value must also have importance and protection for their growth. Thus there is no violation of s 153A, IPC, or infringement of arts 21 and 25 of the Constitution when judged by the standard of an ordinary reasonable prudent man.[98]

Where there was no iota of evidence to indicate that the accused persons either committed or conspired or attempted to commit or abetted or advocated or advised or knowingly facilitated the commission of any disruptive activity, the offence under s 4(1) of TADA cannot be said to have been established beyond reasonable doubt to convict them. Similarly, no offence can be said to have been committed by them either under s 124A or s 153A, IPC, so, conviction of the accused persons was set aside.[99]

To ascertain whether an offence as defined under s 153A of IPC, has been committed or not, it is for the court to examine the words either spoken or written or by signs or by visible representations and come to a conclusion whether they have a tendency to promote or attempt to promote on grounds of religion, race, place of birth, residence, language, caste or community or any other group etc., disharmony or feeling of enmity, hatred or ill-will between different religious, racial, language or regional groups or castes or communities. In the absence of any material as to the actual words uttered by the accused or the acts committed by the accused, the allegations must be held to be extremely vague.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

[1][S. 153B.

Imputations, assertions prejudicial to national integration.--

(1) Whoever, by words either spoken or written or by signs or by visible representations or otherwise,--

(a) makes or publishes any imputation that any class of persons cannot, by reason of their being members of any religious, racial, language or regional group or caste or community, bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution of India as by law established or uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India, or

(b) asserts, counsels, advises, propagates or publishes that any class of persons shall, by reason of their being members of any religious, racial, language or regional group or caste or community, be denied or deprived of their rights as citizens of India, or

(c) makes or publishes any assertion, counsel, plea or appeal concerning the obligation of any class of persons, by reason of their being members of any religious, racial, language or regional group or caste or community, and such assertion, counsel, plea or appeal causes, or is likely to cause disharmony or feelings of enmity or hatred or ill-will between such members and other persons, shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

(2) Whoever commits an offence specified in sub-section (1), in any place of worship or in any assembly engaged in the performance of religious worship or religious ceremonies, shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to five years and shall also be liable to fine.]1154

Comments

1. Scope

Propaganda, that members of any particular community should be deprived of their rights as citizens of India, and propaganda, regarding the obligations of any class of persons by reason of their being the members of any religion, race, language or regional group or caste or community, is prejudicial to the maintenance of communal harmony and to the integrity of the nation. This section makes special provisions, in this Code, to deal effectively with persons engaged in such activities. Thus the section which is couched in the very wide language, supplements the provisions of ss 153A and 295A of this Code.

When the mention of a sentence in a book relating to Indian history that 'Oriya is a younger sister of Bengali', cannot be said to be in a derogatory or defamatory sense in the context of the entire chapter, more particularly in view of fact that said sentence was promptly deleted with apology, continuance of proceedings for defamation against eminent writer who was above 75 years of age, would amount to abuse of process of the court, hence, liable to be quashed.[2]

The intention of the impugned publication in the newspaper was to incite hatred between the Sikkimese and non-Sikkimese people, thus, both the editors and the publishers were liable under s 153B, IPC . Conviction of the accused persons under s 153B, IPC was held proper. A sum of Rs. 3000/- was imposed as fine.[3]

The offence under s 153B(1)(c), IPC also brings within its ambit the publisher of an offending article.[4]

The requirement of passing an order of forfeiture of a book, presupposes that the book contains any matter the publication of which is punishable under ss 124A or 153A or 153B or 292 or 293 or 295A of the IPC, for the State Government to declare that every copy of such book be forfeited to the Government. The power can only be exercised and notification can only be issued if the Government forms an opinion that the publication contains matter which is in an offence under any of the sections of the IPC as aforestated.[5]

2. Procedure

Section 196, CrPC may be referred to.[6] Prior sanction, either of the State Government or of the Central Government, is necessary before taking cognizance of the offence under ss 153A and 153B of the IPC . Where no sanction as envisaged under s 196(1)(a) and s 196(1A)(a), CrPC for prosecution of the Central or State Government was obtained, order of taking cognizance of the two offences i.e. under ss 153A and 153B, IPC was quashed.[7]1155

3. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I..... (name and designation of the Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you.....(name of the accused) as follows:

That you on or about.....(date) at.....(Time or time in an assembly engaged in the performance of religious worship or ceremony specify as the case may be) at.....(name or place of worship) by words (spoken or written or by signs or by visible representations or otherwise) made (or published) an imputation that.....(specify the class of persons) cannot by reason of their being members of religious (or racial, language or regional) group or caste or community bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution of India (or upheld the sovereignty of India) or asserted (counseled, advised, propagated or published) that.....(the particular class of persons) shall by reason of their being members of any religious (racial, language or regional) group or caste or community be denied or deprived of their rights as citizens of India or made (or published) an assertion (counsel, plea or appeal) concerning the obligation of .....(class of persons) by reason of their being members of any religious (racial, language or regional) group or caste or community and such assertion (counsel, plea or appeal) caused (or was likely to cause) disharmony (or feelings of enmity or hatred or ill-will) between such members and other persons and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 153B (or s153B (2), IPC, as the case may be), and within my cognisance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 154.

Owner or occupier of land on which an unlawful assembly is held.--

Whenever any unlawful assembly or riot takes place, the owner or occupier of the land upon which such unlawful assembly is held, or such riot is committed, and any person having or claiming an interest in such land, shall be punishable with fine not exceeding one thousand rupees, if he or his agent or manager, knowing that such offence is being or has been committed, or having reason to believe it is likely to be committed, do not give the earliest notice thereof in his or their power to the principal officer at the nearest police-station, and do not, in the case of his or their having reason to believe that it was about to be committed, use all lawful means in his or their power to prevent it, and, in the event of its taking place, do not use all lawful means in his or their power to disperse or suppress the riot or unlawful assembly.

Comments

1. Scope

This section, which is of an exceptional nature, is intended to impose on all owners or occupiers of land, the duty of maintaining the public peace and preventing unlawful assemblies and riots on their estates, and to render the former liable for any1156 dereliction in the discharge of this duty.[8] The section declares, in the first place, that the owner of that land, on which a riot or unlawful assembly is committed or held, becomes punishable, if he or his agent or manager, knowing that such offence is being committed or has been committed or having reason to believe that it is likely to be committed, does not give the earliest notice thereof in his or their power at the nearest police station. This part of the section is extremely comprehensive in character, and embraces not only the past and present, but also the future. Secondly, it makes it punishable on the part of the owner or his agent or manager, if he or they, 'having reason to believe that a riot was about to be committed', do not use all lawful means in his or their power to prevent it. Thirdly, it imposes the same penalty, if in the event of a riot taking place he or they do not use all lawful means in his or their power to disperse or suppress the riot or unlawful assembly.

2. Analogous Provision

The section does not authorise police officers to issue a notice in the nature of temporary injunction restraining the owners or persons who are in possession of any (agricultural) land.[9] A somewhat similar provision in part but otherwise more comprehensive has been made in s 40 of the CrPC, which requires every person residing in a village to communicate forthwith to the nearest magistrate or to the officer in charge of the nearest police station, whichever is nearer any information which he may possess respecting the commission of, or intention to commit in or near such village any non-bailable offence or any offence punishable under ss 143, 144, 145, 147 and 148 of the IPC .[10] Village in that section includes village lands. Omission to give notice or, furnish information required by s 40, CrPC, is an offence punishable under s 176, IPC .

Three Breaches of Duty

The section, therefore, contemplates three different breaches of duty:

(i) Omission to give notice;
(ii) Abstention from prevention the offence;
(iii) Negligence to suppress it.

The provisions of the section are of an exceptional nature in the sense that they cast a vicarious liability on an absentee landlord for the acts or omissions of his agents or servants.[11] Great caution is, therefore, required before proceedings are started against any person under this section.[12]

3. Ingredients of the Offence

The ingredients of an offence under this section are as under

(i) Holding of unlawful assembly or commission of a riot.1157
(ii) Accused is the owner or occupier of the land, or has, or claims to have an interest in the land, upon which the unlawful assembly is held or the riot is committed.
(iii) Either the accused or his agent or manager knew that the offence was being or had been committed, or had reason to believe that it was likely to be committed.
(iv) On having knowledge that the offence was being or had been committed, or having reason to believe that it was likely to be committed, the accused does not give earliest information to the principal officer of the nearest police station.
(v) The accused having reason to believe that the offence is about to be committed, does not use all lawful means in his power to prevent the offence, or in the event of its taking place does not use all lawful means in his power to disperse the unlawful assembly or suppress the riot.[13]

4. 'Whenever'

The holding of each unlawful assembly or riot constitutes a separate offence, for e.g., the use of premises on six different days for unlawful assemblies is not a continuous offence, but six offences.[14]

5. Persons Responsible under the Section

The persons made responsible under this section are the: (a) owner; (b) occupier; or (c) any person having or claiming interest in land upon which an unlawful assembly has been held or a riot committed.

The section is of exceptional nature, and is intended to impose on all landowners or occupiers, resident or non-resident, and their agents, the duty of maintaining the public peace and preventing unlawful assemblies and riots on their estates, and to render the former liable for any dereliction in the discharge of this duty.[15] It is impossible to punish in every case every person who has any interest in the land. The responsibility must depend upon the fact of the person, who caused the riot being himself the person, who has an interest in the land, or an agent or manager of such person; and one of the facts to be proved, is whose agent or manager the person who fomented the riot is. It is not everyone having an interest in land, who falls within the purview of the section, but only such persons as have control over the management of the property.[16] An absent co-sharer in land who takes no active part in its management, ought not to be convicted of an offence under this section (or s 155, IPC), where a resident co-sharer has been punished for the offence.[17]

6. Adopted Sons when not Liable

Where three Hindu women had the management of an estate and were responsible for the appointment of the manager, who had fomented a riot, and their adopted sons had1158 nothing to do with such appointment, though they took some share in the management, it was held that the ladies were alone liable under this section.[18]

7. Relevancy of Mens Rea or Knowledge

Knowledge of the landholder or of his agent is the first essential element of an offence under this section.[19] But knowledge on the part of the owner or occupier of the land, of the acts or intentions of the agent, is not an essential element of an offence, under this section and he may be convicted under it, though he may be in entire ignorance of the acts of his agent or manager.[20]

Seton Karr J, has observed in Queen v Hurnath Roy :[21]

> A Zamindar by leaving his estate and residing at the Presidency cannot avoid his duties and liabilities, and it is his business to appoint fit and proper persons to manage his local affairs, and to enable him to perform the duties imposed on him by the legislature. Moreover, it is the Zamindar's duty to be regularly acquainted with all that goes on in his zamindari.

Where, however, the agent or manager himself had no knowledge or no reason to believe that an unlawful assembly or riot would be held or committed; it has been held that the absentee-owner cannot be held liable.[22]

To Prevent the Offence or Disperse Unlawful Assembly or Suppress Riot

By the mere fact that the landholder did not reside on his estate, cannot aid him in avoiding the liability which the law imposes upon him.[23] But where the charge is of failure to prevent or suppress a riot, there must be evidence to show that the landholder or his agent had 'lawful means in his or their power' to prevent or suppress it and had neglected to use them. It cannot be expected that a person should personally attempt to suppress a riot between two parties, who suddenly and in great numbers, and armed with deadly weapons, choose to have a stand-up fight. The only means, in his power, is to invoke the aid of the police and if he does so, he cannot be convicted under this section.[24]

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable and summons may be issued in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by any magistrate.1159

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That on or about the.....day of.....an unlawful assembly was held or a riot was committed upon land in village (name of village) of which you are the owner (or occupier, or in which you claim an interest) and you (or your agent or manager) knowing that such offence was being committed (or had been committed, or having reason to believe that it was likely to be committed) did not give the earliest notice thereof, in your power, to the principal officer at the nearest police station, and did not use all lawful means in your power to prevent it or to disperse or suppress the riot or unlawful assembly, and thereby committed the offence punishable under s 154 of the IPC, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

The charge under this section ought to be clear and distinct.[25]

10. Proof

To prove an offence under this section, the following facts must be established:

(i) That an unlawful assembly or riot took place on the land which is owned or occupied by the accused or in which he claims an interest;
(ii) That he, knowing that such offence is being, or has been, committed, or having reason to believe that it is likely to be committed, did not give the earliest notice thereof in his power to the principal officer at the nearest police station;
(iii) In the case of his having reason to believe that it was about to be committed, he did not use all lawful means in his power to prevent it; and
(iv) In the event of its taking place, he did not use all lawful means in his power to disperse or suppress the riot or unlawful assembly.

Direct Evidence Rarely Available

Direct evidence on these points would be very difficult to obtain, but it is not even necessary. If from the surrounding circumstances of the case, the only reasonable inference that can be drawn is that the accused had the necessary information and failed to act, as directed under the section, conviction would be legal.[26]

In Brae v Queen-Empress ,[27] Mitter J, said:

> No doubt this fact (i.e. The accused had reason to believe that a riot was likely to be committed) can very seldom be established by direct evidence, but there must be circumstances from which it may be reasonably inferred.

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 155.

Liability of person for whose benefit riot is committed.--

Whenever a riot is committed for the benefit or on behalf of any person who is the owner or occupier of any land, respecting which such riot takes place or who claims any interest in such land, or in the subject of any dispute which gave rise to the riot,1160 or who has accepted or derived any benefit therefrom, such person shall be punishable with fine, if he or his agent or manager, having reason to believe that such riot was likely to be committed or that the unlawful assembly by which such riot was committed was likely to be held, shall not respectively use all lawful means in his or their power to prevent such assembly or riot from taking place, and for suppressing and dispersing the same.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is more or less an aggravated form of the offence under the previous section, and deals with the liability of a person for whose benefit a riot is committed. Facts, similar to those mentioned under s 154, IPC, must be proved in support of a charge under these sections, but the riot must be committed with reference to certain land, and for the benefit of the owner of such land. The interest in the land need not be as large as in cases under s 154 ; any interest will do.[28]

2. Liability in a Case of Sudden Riot

But a landholder ought not to be made liable under this section of a sudden and unpremeditated riot, which, there was no reason to infer, he could have anticipated that it was likely to happen.[29]

A person not claiming any interest in the land for himself cannot be convicted under this section.[30]

When there is no evidence to show that an absentee co-sharer in a zamindari takes an active part in the management, and a resident co-sharer has been sentenced to pay a fine under s 155, IPC, the non-resident zamindar ought not to be convicted under this section.[31]

3. Procedure

It is the same as in the case of an offence under s 154, IPC .

S. 156.

Liability of agent of owner or occupier for whose benefit riot is committed.--

Whenever a riot is committed for the benefit or on behalf of any person who is the owner or occupier of any land respecting which such riot takes place, or who claims any interest in such land, or in the subject of any dispute which gave rise to the riot, or who has accepted or derived any benefit therefrom, the agent or manager of such person shall be punishable with fine, if such agent or manager, having reason to believe that such riot was likely to be committed, or that the unlawful assembly by which such riot was committed1161 was likely to be held, shall not use all lawful means in his power to prevent such riot or assembly from taking place and for suppressing and dispersing the same.

Comments

1. Scope

This section extends the provisions of the previous section to the agent or manager, who is made liable along with the owner or occupier. In order to constitute an offence under this section, it must be established: (a) that a riot was committed; (b) that it was committed for the benefit, or on behalf, of the person who was the owner or occupier of the land respecting which such riot took place; (c) that the accused had reason to believe that a riot was likely to be committed or the unlawful assembly which committed the riot was likely to be held; and (d) that he had not used all lawful means to prevent it. The third fact can very seldom be established by direct evidence, but there must be circumstances from which it may be reasonably inferred. As Pigot J pointed out, applying the sections which give the magistracy powers of such startling magnitude, it is incumbent upon those entrusted with the exercise of such powers to act not upon inferences or suspicions but upon evidence.[32]

2. Procedure

It is the same as in the case of an offence under s 154, IPC .

Harbouring persons hired for an unlawful assembly.--

Whoever harbours, receives or assembles, in any house or premises in his occupation or charge, or under his control any persons, knowing that such persons have been hired, engaged or employed, or are about to be hired, engaged or employed, to join or become members of an unlawful assembly, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with harbouring, receiving or assembling persons hired, engaged or employed to join as or become, members of an unlawful assembly. It is of wider application than s 150 which refers to a particular unlawful assembly; in other words, when it is found that any person has, hired or engaged another to join as or become, a member of a particular unlawful assembly, he is liable for any offence committed by any member of that unlawful assembly in the same way as if he had been a member of such unlawful assembly or had himself committed such offence. On the other hand, this section provides for an occurrence, that may happen and makes the harbouring, receiving or assembling of persons, who are likely to be engaged in any unlawful assembly, an offence. There again, the law contemplates the imminence of an unlawful assembly and the proof of facts which in law would go to constitute an1162 unlawful assembly.[33] The section clearly refers to some unlawful assembly in the future. It provides for an occurrence which may happen and not one which has happened.[34]

2. 'Hired, Engaged or Employed'

To support a conviction under this section it must be shown that, for the purpose of an unlawful assembly, the accused had hired or engaged or employed other persons. The mere fact that the accused's servants come from a district, where men having a well-known character as lathials (people who used to carry and use lathis or strong, stout bamboo sticks) reside, and that they had been in his service for some time before a riot took place, is not sufficient to support a conviction under this section.[35] Volunteers engaged in preparing salt from seawater cannot be said to have been hired, engaged or employed within the meaning of this section.[36]

3. 'Harbours'

For definition of the word 'harbour', refer to s 52A, IPC . This section is exempted from that definition, so that even the wife or husband of the person harboured may be liable under this section.

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable. In other respects, the procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under s 154, IPC .

5. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I..... (name and designation of the Magistrate etc), hereby charge you, (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you on or about.....the day of.....harboured (or received or assembled) in the house (or premises).....(give details) in your occupation (or charge or under your control).....(name) knowing that he has been hired (or engaged or employed or was about to be hired, engaged or employed) to join (or become) a members of an unlawful assembly and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 157, IPC, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

being hired to take part in an unlawful assembly or riot.--

Whoever is engaged, or hired, or offers or attempts to be hired or engaged, to do or assist in doing any of the acts specified in Section 141, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both,1163 or to go armed.--and whoever, being so engaged or hired as aforesaid, goes armed, or engages or offers to go armed, with any deadly weapon or with anything which used as a weapon of offence is likely to cause death, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The offence under this section differs from that under s 150, IPC, in the sense that an attempt to get hired is equally punishable with the offence of actually being hired. an offer to go armed, being hired, or going armed, renders the offence an aggravated one, more severely punishable in consequence.

2. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under the previous section.

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 159.

Affray.--

When two or more persons, by fighting in a public place, disturb the public peace, they are said to "commit an affray".

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines the offence of affray, which is the last of the six species punishable under this chapter, i.e., ch 8, and the next section lays down the penalty therefor. When two or more persons (including the accused) fight in a public place, causing disturbance of the public peace, they can be said to commit an affray. The essence of the offence lies in the terror (i.e., disturbance) which it causes to the public.[37] 'Affray' as defined in this section, postulates the commission of a definite assault and a breach of the public peace.[38] But when two persons fight in the public place and cause hurt to each other, they ought to be tried for causing hurt, and not for the minor offence of affray.[39] Where a person is charged with causing grievous hurt under s 325 and is acquitted of that offence, he cannot be convicted of the offence of affray in the absence of a finding as to how the public peace was disturbed.[40]1164

2. English Law

If a person uses or threatens unlawful violence towards another and his conduct is such as would cause a person of reasonable firmness present at the scene to fear for his personal safety, he is guilty of affray. A person is, however, guilty of affray only if he intends to use or threaten violence or is aware that his conduct may be violent or threaten violence. Affray may be committed in private as well as in public places.

A person guilty of affray is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years or to a fine or to both, or on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to both.

A person should not be charged with the offence unless he uses or threatens unlawful violence towards another person actually present at the scene and his conduct is such as would cause fear to a notional bystander of reasonable firmness.[41]

3. Singapore Law

A fight requires that there be an exchange of blows between the persons involved and a mere quarrel is not enough.[42]

4. Ingredients

To constitute an affray: (a) there must be fighting between two or more persons (including the accused);[43] (b) such fighting must be in a public place;[44] and (c) the fighting must disturb the public peace.[45]

An offence of affray in essence consists of three ingredients, the first being fighting by two or more persons, secondly, the fighting must take place in a public place and thirdly, such fighting must also result in disturbance of the public peace. Only if such ingredients are satisfied an offence of affray can be said to have occasioned for which the persons causing the same would be responsible.[46]

One does not expect, in an affray, to find specific evidence as to the acts of each fighter. Only general evidence can be given as to the accused taking part in it.[47] It is not necessary to prove that a particular individual beat a particular individual. It is1165 enough to prove that two or more persons fought together in a public place and thereby disturbed public peace.[48]

In the instant case, PW1 and PW2 categorically stated that there was a free fight between 'A' group and 'B' group, and both the groups resorted to catch hold of each other. PW1 further stated that the act of 'A' group and 'B' group resulted in disturbance to the public peace. There was no reason to disbelieve PW1 who was an independent and disinterested witness. The conviction of the accused petitioner under s 159, IPC was held proper.[49]

5. 'Affray' Distinguished from a 'Riot'

Affray differs from a riot in the sense that an 'affray' may be committed by two persons whereas a riot requires at least five persons. Secondly, an 'affray' cannot be committed in a private place while a riot may take place anywhere. Where a quarrel arose between four persons stationed, at the entrance of a temple for the purpose of collecting fees, and three others, who wished to enter the temple without previous payment of the fee demanded, it was held that the offence committed was an affray, and not a riot.[50]

6. 'Affray' Distinguished from an 'Assault'

An affray is committed by fighting in a public place while an assault may be committed anywhere. What would be an assault in a private place may become an affray in a public place. Affray is an offence against public tranquillity while an assault is an offence affecting the human body. an affray is a bilateral affair in which both parties should participate. If one side is aggressive and the other passive, there may be an assault, but not an affray.[51] The offence of affray postulates the commission of definite assault and breach of peace.[52]

7. 'Affray' Distinguished from 'Public Nuisance'

The ingredients of an offence under s 290, IPC (public nuisance) are totally different from those of the offence of an affray. It is doubtful whether a person, who is charged under s 160, IPC, can ever be convicted under s 290, IPC .[53]

8. 'Two or more Persons'

An 'affray', being a 'little war', requires two sides to fight.[54] So, for a charge under s 159, IPC, there must be two or more previous concerned, in the absence of a finding as to who the second person was, the charge cannot be sustained.[55]1166

9. 'By Fighting'

The term 'fight' is not defined in the IPC, but everyone knows what a fight is and that it takes two to make a fight.[56] The expression 'fighting', in s 159, IPC, is used in its ordinary sense and it means a combat or quarrel involving exchange of some force or violence, if not blows. Mere verbal quarrel or vulgar abuse sans violence cannot be construed as fighting which contemplated bilateral use of violence by two competing parties. Even if there is no exchange of blows, there should be exchange of some violence between the two contending parties before it can be said that the parties are fighting. If one person uses violence against another and the other person merely remains passive, it cannot be said that there is a fighting between the two persons. So also if neither person uses violence against the other but both the persons merely indulge in verbal abuses, it does not amount to fighting.[57]

10. Use of Weapons not Necessary

Where one person attacks and the other defends, they can legally be said to be fighting within the meaning of this section.[58] But it will not amount to an affray when the party, who is assaulted, submits to the assault without resistance,[59] or tries to escape, and, thus, there is no fight between the two.[60] There can be a quarrel without fighting. Mere quarreling or abusing, in a public place, without exchange of blows, is not sufficient to attract the application of s 160 .[61] It is not necessary that weapons should be used in a fight; an affray can be a fight even if only one party, in the fight, is successful in landing a blow on his opponent.[62] But it must be established that each one of the accused took an active physical part in the process of fighting.[63]

11. 'In a Public Place'

To constitute an affray, the fighting must be in a public place.[64] Whether a place is public or not, does not necessarily depend on the right of the public, as such, to get to the place, though, of course, a place, to which the public can go as of right, must be a public place. The place, where the public are actually in the habit of going, must be deemed to be public place for the purpose of the offence of affray, for instance,1167 places, like railway platforms, theatre halls and open spaces, resorted to by the public, for purposes of recreation, amusement, etc.[65] The entrance to a place of worship was held to be a public place,[66] but not a chabutara (platform), to which public had no access, either by right or by permission or by usage or otherwise.[67] The criminal court is not charged with the task of evaluating the comparative claims of the parties as to the public user of the site in question. Its finding must be distinct and clear that the scene of occurrence is a public place.[68]

12. 'Disturb the Public Peace'

In order to constitute the offence of an affray, there must be disturbance of the public peace due to the fighting in a public place.[69] The gist of the offence is the terror which it causes to the public.[70] In a prosecution under s 159 there must be positive evidence of public peace having been disturbed which would mean that by the action of the accused the even tempo of life of the public was disturbed resulting in affecting the peace and tranquillity of the locality.[71] There must be a definite disturbance of the public peace due to the fight in the public place to make the offence affray. Merely causing inconvenience to the public is not sufficient.[72]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter VIII

Of Offences Against the Public Tranquillity

S. 160.

Punishment for committing affray.--

Whoever commits an affray, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to one hundred rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The fifth and the last species of offence punishable under this chapter is affray. Section 159 , IPC defines the offence and this section lays down the penalty for it.1168

2. Meaning of Affray

'Affray' has been defined in s 159 of the IPC . The various elements are that there must be fighting by two or more persons, the fighting must be a public place and that fighting must disturb the public peace.[73]

Under the English Common Law an affray is the fighting of two or more persons in a public place, to the terror of Her Majesty's subjects, and is a misdemeanor at Common Law.[74] The word 'affray' is derived from the French word effroi (terror). In 3 Co Instt 158, it is said that 'an affray is a public offence to the terror of the King's subjects; and is an English word, and so called because it affrighteth and maketh men afraid; and that it is inquirable in a lett as a common nuisance'.[75] Under s 159 of this Code when two or more persons, by fighting in a public place, disturb the public peace, they are said to 'commit an affray'. The essence of an affray lies on as to now public a place is, and the disturbance of the public place.[76]

'Where one person attacks and the other defends, it is legally correct to say that the two persons are fighting and the case comes under the definition of affray. The gist of the offence consists in the terror it causes to the public'.[77] In a recent case, in England, it has been held that on a charge of making an affray, it is sufficient, in the absence of direct evidence that any subject of the Queen is put in fear or terror, to show that the circumstances were such that reasonable persons might be frightened or intimidated.[78]

3. Ingredients of the Offence

To constitute an affray:

(i) there must be fighting between two or more persons;
(ii) such fighting must be in a public place; and
(iii) the fighting must disturb the public peace.[79]

Only if such ingredients are satisfied, an offence of affray can be said to have been occasioned for which the person causing the same would be responsible.[80]

Thus, to constitute an offence under s 160 of the IPC, three ingredients must be satisfied; firstly, fighting must be between two or more persons, secondly, fighting must take place in a public place, and thirdly, such fighting must also result in disturbance of public peace. In the absence of even one of these ingredients, it cannot be stated that there was either an affray or the accused facing the trial should be held responsible for the same.[81]

1169In the instant case, B along with his party men had gone to the house of A and had assaulted A and his partymen. The occurrence took place outside the house of A, which was not a public place. It was only a private fight. It had not resulted in disturbance of public peace. No offence under s 160,

IPC was committed.[82]

Affray and Riot, Distinction

Affray differs from riot in that it may be committed by two persons whereas riot requires five or more. an affray cannot be committed in a private place, while a riot may take place anywhere.

Where a quarrel arose between four persons stationed at the entrance of a temple for the purpose of collecting fees, and three others who wished to enter the temple without previous payment of the fee demanded, it was held that the offence committed was affray and not riot.[83]

An affray may fall short of a riot, though many persons are engaged in it. Thus, if a number of persons meet at a fair or market or on any other lawful or innocent occasion, and happen, on a sudden quarrel, to begin fighting, they will not be guilty of riot, but only of a sudden affray of which none are guilty but those who actually engage in it; because the design of their meeting was innocent and lawful, and the subsequent breach of the peace happened unexpectedly without any previous intention.[84] But as the explanation to s 141, IPC shows, an assembly which was not unlawful when it assembled, may subsequently become unlawful. So it is not always possible to draw a distinction between an unlawful assembly as a premeditated, and an affray as a sudden one.[85]

Affray and Assault, Distinction

An affray is committed by fighting in a public place, while an assault may be committed anywhere. What would be an assault in a private place may become an affray in a public place. Affray is an offence against public tranquillity; an assault is an offence affecting the human body. an affray is a bilateral affair in which both parties should participate. If one side is aggressive and the other passive, there may be an assault and not an affray.[86]

If the fighting results in the infliction of hurt (s 324, IPC) the person causing it should be tried for that offence, and not for the minor one under this section.[87]

Where a person is charged with causing grievous hurt under s 325, IPC and is acquitted of that offence, he cannot be convicted of the offence of affray in the absence of a finding as to how the public peace was disturbed.[88]

Affray and Public Nuisance

The ingredients of an offence under s 290, IPC (public nuisance) are totally different from those of the offence of affray. It is doubtful whether a person who is charged under s 160, IPC, can ever be convicted under s 290, IPC .[89]1170

'Two or More Persons'

For a charge under s 159, IPC, there must be two or more persons concerned. In the absence of a finding as to who the second person was, the charge cannot be sustained.[1] An affray is only a 'little war', and a war and an affray both require two sides to fight.[2]

'By Fighting'

The term 'fight' is not defined in the IPC, but everyone knows what a fight is and that it takes two to make a fight.[3] Where one person attacks and the other defends, it is legally correct to say that the two persons are fighting and the case comes under the definition of affray.[4]But it is only 'when two or more persons by fighting in a public place disturb the public peace' that they are said to commit an affray. The word 'fight' connotes a bilateral act in which two parties participate. It will not amount to an affray when the party who is assaulted submits to the assault without resistance,[5] or tries to escape to avoid a fight.[6] As pointed out by Pandurang Row J, in Rami Reddy v Chinta Chinna Narasi Reddy :[7]

> Fighting connotes necessarily a contest or struggle for mastery between two or more persons against one another. A struggle or a contest necessarily implies that there are two sides each of which is trying to obtain the mastery, so that unless there is some violence offered or threatened against one another, there could be no fight but only a mere assault or beating.

It must be established that each one of the accused took an active physical part in the process of fighting.[8]

'Passive submission to beating by the other side will not result in affray nor will mere howling in pain do. an answering challenge or war cry or even an active non-violent resistance might have done'.[9] Mere quarrelling or exchange of abuse in a public place would not amount to an affray. Something more than a mere wordy quarrel is needed before a person can be convicted under this section. It would be enough if blows are aimed, whether or not they prove to be successful.[10]

It is not necessary that weapons should be used in a fight, and an affray can be a fight even if only party in the fight is successful in landing a blow on his opponent.[11]

'In a Public Place'

To constitute an affray, the fighting must be in a public place. The expression 'public place' or a cognate expression is used in many Acts of the legislature, but there is no1171 statutory definition of it. The word 'public' is defined in Webster's Dictionary as meaning the general body of mankind or of a nation, state or community. It also means people indefinitely, also a particular body or aggregation of people. This means that the public must be an unlimited or a fluctuating body of persons and not individuals merely.[12]

It will be observed that the section does not make fighting 'in public', which is not likely to disturb the public peace, an affray. The fighting disturbing the public peace, which is an affray, is fighting which takes place in a 'public place'. Some of the statues in England make acts penal which are done in public, others make acts penal which are done in a public place, so that in the criminal statute law in England, the distinction is, it will be observed, between doing an act in public and doing an act in a public place. Keeping this distinction in view, it was held that a chabutra (platform), to which the public had no access, either by right or by permission or by usage or otherwise, was not a public place within the meaning of s 159, IPC, although any member of the public walking along the street could walk on to it, but in doing so he would be committing trespass.[13] In Re Muthuswami Iyer,[14] the magistrate who tried the case having said that 'the scene of offence is an open field with no compound walls. It is a place where the public go no matter whether they have a right to go or not'. Justice Pandurang Rao, held that the magistrate's view was substantially correct, and further observed:

> Whether a place is public or not does not necessarily depend on the right of the public as such to go to the place, though of course a place to which the public can go as of right must be a public place. The place where the public are actually in the habit of going must be deemed to be public for the purpose of the offence of affray, for instance, a place like railway platforms, theatre halls, and open spaces resorted to by the public for purposes of recreation, amusement, etc. Reference was made to, among other rulings, the decision in the Allahabad case cited above.[15] It is submitted that the real point decided in that case was that a place is not a public place if the public has no access to it by right or by permission or by usage or otherwise. That means that for a place to be considered a public place, the public must not only have access to it but the access should be lawful and not by trespass. The proposition that 'the place where the public are actually in the habit of going must be deemed to be public for the purposes of the offence of affray may, however, be justified on the ground that the fact of the public being in the habit of going to the place indicates that the public has access to the place by 'permission', or by usage or otherwise.

The expression 'public place' may well have different meanings for the purpose of different Acts.

Where it is not specifically defined, its meaning must be reasonably determined by the context and the circumstances in which it has been used.[16] So the interpretations placed on the expression in cases under the various Gambling Acts cannot be relevant here. In several such cases the English decision in Reg v Wellard ,[17] has been relied on. But that was a case of an unlawful indecent exposure of the human body and not a case of affray. In that case, where the place in question was out of sight of the public footpath but was a place to which persons were in the habit of going without any strict legal right to do so and without being in any way1172 hindered, but the prisoner exposed his person to several little girls, it was held that he was rightly convicted, and a suggestion was thrown out that the offence might be indictable if committed before diverse subjects of the realm even if the place be not public.[18] The cases of R v Holmes ,[19] and R v Harris ,[20] are also cases of indecent exposure. These cases cannot be relevant in a case of affray. On the other hand, where two of the prisoners fought together amidst a great crowd of persons, and the others were present aiding and assisting, at a place far from any highway, and where the fight ceased on the appearance of some peace officers, it was held that this was not an affray, because the scene of action was to all intents and purposes a private place.[21]

The entrance to a place of worship was held to be a public place.[22]

'Disturb the Public Peace'

Again, in order to make the offence an affray, there must be disturbance of the public peace due to the fighting in a public place.[23] The gist of the offence consists in the terror it causes to the public.[24] The presence of large numbers of the public at the time of the disturbance which took at least a quarter of an hour, shows that the members of the public must have been alarmed by reason of the disturbance and that there was sufficient breaking of the public peace within the meaning of s 159, IPC . It is not necessary that any particular member of the public must have evidence to the effect that he was alarmed or frightened, before a conviction can be had for an offence punishable under s 160 . If it is likely that such alarm would have been caused to the public or members of the public, the necessary ingredient is established.[25] On a charge of making affray it is sufficient, in the absence of direct evidence that any member of the public was put in fear or terror, to show that the circumstances were such that reasonable persons might be frightened or intimidated.[26]

In a prosecution under s 159, IPC, there must be positive evidence of public peace having been disturbed which would mean that by the action of the accused the even tempo of life of the public was disturbed resulting in the peace and tranquillity of the locality being affected.[27]

Where admittedly no such evidence of public peace having been disturbed has been led and there is also no conclusive evidence that because of the fight any annoyance has resulted to the public, the conviction of the accused person under s 160, IPC, would not be sustainable.[28]

4. Procedure

The offence punishable under s 160 is cognizable. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by any magistrate. The offence not being punishable1173 with imprisonment exceeding two years, it can be tried summarily.[29] Like other cognizable cases, an investigation is a must into an offence under this section, though both the parties are arraigned as accused.[30]

5. Charge

The charge may run as follows:

I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you .... on or about the.....day of....at....committed an offence of affray, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 160 of the IPC, and within my cognisance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on that charge.

A charge under s 160, IPC, is not maintainable when there is a charge for assault under s 323, IPC, the reason being that a charge under s 323, IPC, has a prosecutor on one side while in a charge under s 160, IPC, both sides are accused. A charge of affray brings in both the sides as accused persons since both the fighting groups have committed the offence. A charge of assault punishable under s 323, IPC, has a prosecutor on one side and the accused persons on the other.[31]

In a case of affray, merely because both the parties are accused, it is not permissible to the prosecution to submit a charge sheet against them without making an investigation. A chargesheet filed without following the procedure laid down in s 157, CrPC, is liable to be quashed.[32]

6. Proof

On a charge under this section, it has to be proved:

(i) that two or more persons including the accused were fighting;
(ii) that such fight was in a public place; and
(iii) that it disturbed the public peace.

One does not expect in an affray, to find specific evidence as to the acts of each fighter. Only general evidence can be given as to the accused taking part in it.[33] It is not necessary to prove that a particular individual beat a particular individual. It is enough to prove that two or more persons fought together in a public place and thereby disturbed public peace.[34]

7. Separate Trials

Committing the offence of affray and causing hurt are two distinct offences for which there may be separate charges and separate trials, though it is convenient, under the circumstances, to have a joint trial. A conviction of the accused under s 160, IPC, is no bar to their trial and conviction again under s 323, IPC .[35]1174

Public servant disobeying law, with intent to cause injury to any person.--

Whoever, being a public servant, knowingly disobeys any direction of the law as to the way in which he is to conduct himself as such public servant, intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will, by such disobedience, cause injury to any person, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Illustration

A, being an officer directed by law to take property in execution, in order to satisfy a decree pronounced in Z's favour by a Court of Justice, knowingly disobeys that direction of law, with the knowledge that he is likely thereby to cause injury to Z.A has committed the offence defined in this section.

Comments

1. Scope

Section 166 of the Code is very comprehensive and includes several offences in respect of the abuse of official authority, regarding officers omitting to arrest offenders and suffering prisoners to escape, so far as the offence is voluntary, and in general, any breach of official duty, by which it is intended, or which is known to be likely, to injure any party or to save any person from legal punishments.[3]

The ingredients of s 166 are:

(a) The accused was a public servant at the relevant time;
(b) There was a direction of law as to how such public servant should conduct himself;
(c) The accused had disobeyed such direction;
(d) By such disobedience he had intended to cause or knew it to be likely to cause injury to any person.[4]1177

To make out an offence under this provision, it has to be stated that the public servant knowingly disobeyed any particular direction of the law which he was bound to obey and further that it was to the knowledge of the public servant that such disobedience would cause injury to a person.[5] Thus, the provisions of the section are attracted only if the alleged offender disobeys a direction of the law knowingly and with the intention to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will, by such disobedience, cause injury to the complainant.[6]

2. Analogous Law

This and the next section, deals with misconduct by a public servant in office. Under the English law, neglect of official duty is a misdemeanour. Where a public officer is guilty of misbehaviour in office, by way of neglecting a duty imposed upon him either by common law or by a statute, he commits a misdemeanour and is liable to indictment, unless, it is substituted by another remedy in a statute.[7] The liability exists whether he is a common law or a statutory officer,[8] and a person holding an office of important trust and of consequence to the public under Letters Patent, or derivatively from such authority, is liable to indictment for not faithfully discharging the office.[9]

3. Ingredients of the Section

The ingredients of the offence under s 166, IPC are: (a) that the accused should be a public servant; (b) that he should conduct himself in disobedience of a direction of law; (c) that he should disobey the direction of law knowingly; and (d) that in such deliberate disobedience, his intention or knowledge should be that he was likely thereby to cause an injury to the person complaining. Disobedience of the direction of law is not by itself punishable, unless the injury is intended to someone, or unless the injury is likely and the public servant has the intention or knowledge of it.[10]

The indispensable ingredient of the offence under this section is that the offender should have committed the act 'being a public servant'. The next ingredient close to its heels, is that such a public servant should have acted in disobedience of any legal direction concerning the way in which he should have acted as such a public servant.[11]

The prosecution case was that the replies given by the accused to the applications filed by the complainant under s 7 of the Right to Information Act 2005, were incorrect, hence the accused committed offence under ss 166 and 167, IPC . Except stating that the replies given were incorrect no attempt whatsoever was made in the complaint to show as to how or in what respect the replies given were incorrect. There was no case that the accused had disobeyed the direction of law regarding their duties by refusing to furnish the information asked for. If in carrying out the direction of law the accused gave information which according to the complainant was untrue, 1178that by itself cannot attract the offence punishable under s 166, IPC unless it is shown that the replies given by the accused were untrue.[12]

While failure to give the information applied for or giving demonstrably false replies may amount to disobedience within the meaning of s 166 but furnishing information which is not shown to be incorrect cannot be termed as disobedience of any direction of law.[13]

4. 'Direction of the Law'--Section not Concerned with Disciplinary Rules

To make out an offence under s 166, IPC it has to be stated that the public servant knowingly disobeyed any particular direction of the law which he was bound to obey and further that such disobedience would cause injury to any person, was to the knowledge of the public servant.[14] The section has nothing to do with the disciplinary rules of a department, the violation of which may call for departmental punishment. It is only concerned with the violation of an express direction of law, which alone is punishable, if it has resulted in injury to any person. The mere breach of departmental rules and regulations, not having the force of law, cannot be visited with punishment under this section. However, it may be a direction given by a written law or a mandate proceeding from a competent authority, which the public servant is bound by law to obey--like a writ or order for the liberation of a person from prison.[15]

5. Some Illustrative Cases

An interpreter or a translator of a document, who, having been directed by the court to keep its contents secret, disobeys the direction,[16] commits an offence under this section.

A Registrar issuing a marriage certificate within the times specified in s 72, Christian Marriage Act 1872 (15 of 1872), commits an offence under this section.

Where a peon in a subordinate court, who was directed to serve a notice on a person and to obtain his signature acknowledging such service, represented the notice to be a warrant and arrested the person, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under this section.[17]

The attachment and seizure of a cart for want of a licence, while the cart is being used for the conveyance of goods or passengers, is an offence under this section.[18]

Where a person had encroached upon the municipal land adjoining the land belonging to the complainant, and started construction in a manner so as to cause danger and the municipal authorities did not take any steps is a case under s 166 IPC .

On account of non-appearance of the applicant due to shradda, the complaint was dismissed and the accused was acquitted, despite the fact that the matter was eight 1179years old. The apex court restored the complaint and directed the magistrate concerned to dispose off the complaint case at an early date.[19]

However, where a circle inspector, merely asked the under-trial prisoners detained in police lock-up to not touch any food until the officer-in-charge, directly responsible for the feeding of the under-trial prisoners arrived there, it was held not to be within the mischief of the section.[20]

Where a perusal of the complaint against officers of the Bihar State Electricity Board did not disclose any particular act or omission thereof by any of the officers of the Board, that they knowingly disobeyed any particular directions of the law which they were bound to obey, and such disobedience could cause injury to any person to their knowledge, these officers of the Board were held not liable under this section, despite the fact that they were undisputedly public servants within the meaning of the definition of the term in the Indian Penal Code .[21]

Further where the CrPC gives a magistrate, authority to order a release on bail, it is certainly not for a sub-inspector to refuse to carry out such an order on the mere technical quibble that he thought that such an order should be communicated to him through the superintendent of police. If he thereby refuses to carry out the order, he renders himself liable under this section.[22]

Period of limitation within which the cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken by the court is one year.[23]

6. To Cause 'Injury'--Injury is a Comprehensive Term

To make out an offence under s 166, IPC it has to be stated that the public servant knowingly disobeyed any particular direction of the law which he was bound to obey and further that such disobedience would cause injury to any person, was to the knowledge of the public servant.[24] The term 'injury' is comprehensive enough to include any harm illegally caused to any person in body, mind, reputation or property (see s 44, IPC). This section contemplates only the breach of some statutory duty with a view to cause injury to any person and not merely through inadvertence or negligence. Where, in the order of punishment, the punishing authority omitted to mention as to where and within what time an appeal could lie, it was held that it was a mere act of inadvertence for which he could not be convicted under this section.[25]It is an abuse of office, in which the law presumes that the injury was caused from some ulterior corrupt motive, which is punishable under this section. A mere dereliction of duty, unconnected with any intention to cause injury to anyone is not an offence under this section, though it may be under some other Act.

Where a postmaster, employed to expedite the conveyance and delivery of post letters and to take part in their delivery, absents himself from the station and thereby 1180causes delay in the dispatch of the mail, he is guilty of an offence under s 47 of the Post Office Act 1866, and not under this section.[26]

7. Procedure

An offence under this section is non-cognizable, and summons may be issued in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and it is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

8. Limitation for Prosecution

Refer to the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, ss 468 - 473 .[27]

9. Sanction

Refer to the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, s 197 .[28]

Use of filthy language by a public servant cannot be said to be an act done by him in the discharge of official duty. In such cases, protection of s 197, CrPC is not available to the accused.[29]

10. Effect of Delay in Filing Complaint

In cases such as those under ss 166 and 342, IPC, the most important, though by no means the only test is whether the allegations against the police officer or any other public servant concerned were placed before the proper authority at the very earliest opportunity. A delay in making the complaint before the magistrate or any other competent authority is almost fatal to a prosecution of this nature.[30]

11. Similarity between Section 166, and Sections 167 and 219

The indispensable ingredient of the offence under s 166, IPC is that the offender should have done the act 'being a public servant.' The next ingredient close to its heels is that such a public servant has acted in disobedience of any legal direction concerning the way in which he should have conducted as such a public servant. In the offences under ss 167 and 219 of IPC, the pivotal ingredient is the same as for the offences under s 166, IPC .[31]

12. Charge--Contents of

The charge should be stated as nearly as possible in the language of the section of the Act which is disobeyed. The particular direction of the law disobeyed should be specified.[32]

13. Form of Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:[33]

> I (name and office of the magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of..... at..... did (or omitted to do, as the case may be) ....., such conduct being contrary to the provisions of ..... Act ....., section....., and known by you to be prejudicial to....., and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 166 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said court on the said charge.

14. Proof

To establish an offence under this section the prosecution must prove that:

(a) on the date of the offence the accused was a public servant;
(b) he conducted himself in the particular manner charged;
(c) such conduct was in the exercise of his public duties as such public servant;
(d) such conduct was in disobedience of a direction of the law;
(e) when the accused disobeyed such direction of law, he did so knowingly; and
(f) when the accused committed such disobedience, he thereby intended, or knew that he was likely to cause an injury to some person.[34]

Of Offences by or Relating to Public Servants

[35][S. 166A.

Public servant disobeying direction under law.--

Whoever, being a public servant,--

(a) knowingly disobeys any direction of the law which prohibits him from requiring the attendance at any place of any person for the purpose of investigation into an offence or any other matter, or
(b) knowingly disobeys, to the prejudice of any person, any other direction of the law regulating the manner in which he shall conduct such investigation, or
(c) fails to record any information given to him under sub-section (1) of section 154 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973, (2 of 1974) in relation to cognizable offence punishable under section 326A, section 326B, section 354, section 354B, section 370, section 370A, section 376, section 376A, section 376B, section 376C, section 376D, section 376E or section 509, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than six months but which may extend to two years, and shall also be liable to fine.]1182

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

Section 166A of the Code is new and is inserted by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013 (13 of 2013) (wef 3-02-2013).

2. Scope and Application

Insertion of s 166A vide Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013, must be read in consonance with the provision and not contrary to it. The insertion of s 166A was in the light of recent unfortunate occurrence of offences against women. The intention of the legislature in putting forth this amendment was to tighten the already existing provisions to provide enhanced safeguards to women. The legislature, after noticing the increasing crimes against women in the country, thought it appropriate to expressly punish the police officers for their failure to register FIRS in these cases.[36]

By s 166A(c), registration of FIR is not compulsory for all offences other than those specified in the section. A lapse on the part of the public servant to register FIR is punishable with sentence of rigorous imprisonment which may extend to two years and also fine.[37]

It cannot be urged that registration of FIR is not compulsory for all offences other than what is specified in s 166A(c), IPC .[38]

3. Charge

I,.....(name and office of Session Judge etc.) hereby charge you..... (name etc. of the accused) as follows:

That you on or about the day of .....at.....Distt..... while working as Station Officer X (Name of the Police Station) did not record FIR lodged by one P (name of the informant) for offence under Section 376A of the Indian Penal Code and thereby committed an offence punishable under Section 166-A and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct you to be tied by this Court on the said charge.

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

Section 166B of the Code is new and is inserted by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013 (13 of 2013) (wef 3.2.2013).

2. Scope and Application

Section 357C, CrPC makes provision for treatment of victim of rape. Section 357C provides that all hospitals, public or private, whether run by the Central Government, the State Government, local bodies or any other person, shall immediately, provide the first aid or medical treatment, free of cost, to the victims of any offence covered under s 326A, 376, 376A, 376B, 376C, 376D or s 376E of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860), and shall immediately inform the police of such incident. New s 166B IPC provides for punishment on contravention of s 357, CrPC, as punishable with imprisonment which may extend to one year or with fine or with both.

3. Charge

I,.....(name and office of the Judicial Magistrate 1st Class etc.) charge you.....(name etc. of the accused) as under -

That you on or about the day of .....at.....Distt..... while posted as Medical Officer in Civil Hospital, Hazratganj, Lucknow (give the details of the hospital) did not provide (first aid or medical aid) to one A, victim of rape and did not inform the police of the incident and thereby committed offence punishable under Section 166 -B of the IPC and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct you to be tried by the Court for the said charge.

Chapter IX

Of Offences by or Relating to Public Servants

S. 167.

Public servant framing an incorrect document with intent to cause injury.--

Whoever, being a public servant, and being, as [40][such public servant, charged with the preparation or translation of any document or electronic record, frames, prepares or translates that document or electronic record] in a manner which he knows or believes to be incorrect, intending thereby to cause or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause injury to any person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.1184

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

By the Amending Act 21 of 2000 vide s 91 and Sch. I, w.e.f 17-10-2000 the words 'such public servant, charged with the preparation or translation of any document or electronic record, frames, prepares or translates that document or electronic record" were substituted for the words "such public servant, charged with the preparation or translation of any document, frames or translates that document.'

2. Scope

This section, like the preceding s 166, IPC, is intended to punish acts of official perversity, and not those of mere incompetence. The public servants, who, from bias or corrupt motives, misuse their office by preparing an incorrect document, are punished under this section, while those who do a wrongful act are punished under s 166, IPC . Where a document is incorrectly framed wantonly or deliberately, the law would presume that the person who framed it must have known that it was likely to cause injury to the person affected thereby. The language of this section is vaguely general and comprehensive, but not indefinite.[41] Public records are expected to represent the proceedings of the court or the public servant concerned, correctly and accurately. There is a presumption in law as to their correctness, and hence sanctity is attached to their entries. The tampering of such records by the very persons who are charged with the duty of preparing them correctly is thus a serious offence indeed, and if the record was prepared to cause injury to any person, the offence is punishable under this section.

If there was no motive for framing the record incorrectly, even in such a case of misconduct, the matter is left for departmental action.

Prosecution under s 167, IPC cannot be launched against a private individual.[42]

The ingredients of s 167 are :--

(i) The accused at the relevant time was a public servant;
(ii) The accused was entrusted with the duty of preparation of a document;
(iii) The accused had framed, prepared or translated the document incorrectly; and
(iv) The accused did so with the intent or knowledge that it would cause or was likely to cause injury to any person.

3. Persons not Entrusted with such Work are not Liable

This section punishes a public servant for incorrectly framing or translating a document, the preparation or translation of which is within the scope of his official duty. He must have, however, done it with the intention or knowledge that it was likely to cause injury to any person. The section further requires that the public servant must be charged with the preparation or translation of the document. It would include not only those who are ordinarily employed to prepare or translate documents but also those who may have been ordered to prepare or to translate them, though such work was not within the ordinary sphere of their official duty. However, if the public servant was not entrusted with such work; he would not be penally liable.

4. Distinction between Sections 167 and 218

This section is analogous to s 218, IPC, and both are in fact indistinguishable, except that the present section specifically penalises the framer as well as the translator of a document. Under both the sections, the public servant disobeys the direction of law, knowing it to be likely to cause an injury to any person. Section 218 is, however, more comprehensive as it would apply even when the document so incorrectly framed, instead of causing injury to any person, saves him from legal punishment or saves his property from forfeiture or other charge to which it is liable by law.

5. Distinction Between Sections 167 and 193

The distinction between s 167 and s 193, IPC, is that whereas this section relates to the incorrect preparation of a public record as such, the latter section applies when the record forms a part of the record of a judicial proceeding,[43] or when false evidence is given or fabricated in any stage of a judicial proceeding, or in any other case.

Section 167 is attracted only when a public servant prepares a document in a manner which he thinks or believes to be incorrect. In the present case, the petitioner's allegation was that the accused suppressed the real statement prepared under s 161 of the CrPC and produced along with the charge-sheet a fabricated statement, that comes only within the purview of s 193, CrPC . Section 167 was not attracted in the case.[44]

6. Distinction between Sections 167 and 466

Section 466, IPC also deals with the forgery of public records but offences under s 167 and s 466, IPC, are not of the same kind. Section 167 requires that the accused should be a public servant, but not that he should be actuated by any dishonest or fraudulent intention. While s 466 requires the latter, it does not require the former. It is however possible that the same individual may commit both the offences in the same transaction.[45]

7. Public Servant

For the definition of a 'public servant', see s 21, IPC and notes thereunder.

An amin, who is directed to attach the movable property in the judgment-debtor's possession by a warrant of attachment, is bound to return the warrant within a certain date, with an endorsement certifying the date and the manner in which it is executed or as to why it was not executed. He is, therefore, a public servant charged with the preparation of a document within the meaning of s 167 .[46]

Explanation 2 to s 21, IPC, provides that wherever the words 'public servant' occur, they shall be understood to include every person who is in actual possession of the situation of a public servant, whatever legal defect there may be in his right to hold that situation. If, therefore, the public servant acted as if he had been formally 1186appointed to do the work concerned, the absence of a formal appointment is immaterial.[47]

8. 'Charged With'--The Word not to be Narrowly Construed

Section 167, IPC is attracted when a public servant is charged with the duty of the preparation of a document, and he frames an incorrect document.[48] The word 'charged' in this section is not to be narrowly construed.[49] The words 'charged with the preparation' are not restricted to the narrow meaning of 'enjoined by a special provision of law'. It is sufficient to show that the document was prepared in accordance with a practice, to which it was the duty of the accused to conform. A sub-inspector of police was held to have been charged with the preparation of a report when it appeared that he submitted such a report in pursuance only of a practice requiring such a report.[50]

Where a public servant is appointed to prepare a document, he must be taken to have been charged with the preparation of the document, even if there is any legal defect in his appointment.[51]

There must be a statutory duty on a public servant to prepare or translate the document, which he knows or believes to be incorrect, and, further, he must, in fact, have prepared it.[52]

9. Preparation, Translation and Framing

There is hardly any sensible difference between the preparation and the framing of an electoral roll. According to the dictionaries 'to prepare' is to make ready or make by a regular process, and 'to frame', is to construct by a combination of parts or an adaptation to design.[53] But both the words suggest the making of something original and not a mere copy or translation.

In Hira Singh v Crown ,[54] it was held that a patwari framing an incorrect copy of an entry in his roznamcha was liable to be convicted under this section.

But in Crown v Dewa Singh ,[55] Berkley J held that making a copy of a document is not included in the words 'preparation or translation of any document' or in the words 'frames or translates that document'.

In People Patriotic Front v KK Birla ,[56] it was held that the reasons recorded by the minister for giving the directions to Indian Oil Corporation can be classified as a preparation of an incorrect document. He was not even bound to record any reasons.

The preparation of a document is distinct from signing and delivering it. The signature and the delivery are operations subsequent to the preparation. They would 1187serve to indicate that the preparation was complete, but cannot be said to be essential to the framing required by this section, for it is not always impossible to show that the process of preparing was complete.

Where a clerk charged with the preparation of electoral rolls, prepared it incorrectly, but it was signed and submitted by his locum tenens while he was on leave, it was held that as there was a possibility that if the clerk had remained on duty he might have corrected the incorrect entries before signing and submitting the electoral rolls, therefore, he could not be convicted under this section.[57]

An amin who, being charged with the preparation of a report of attachment of some movable property, attached thereto a certificate containing falsehoods, was held liable under this section.[58] Similarly, a process-server directed to sell attached property and who made a false report of the sale, was held liable.[59]

A station house officer, in order to support an inspector, made a false entry in his diary that four cartmen stated to him, 'as they had said before the Inspector, that there was no dacoity'. He was guilty of intentionally framing an incorrect public record.[60]

10. Knowledge or Intention to Cause Injury

The words 'intending thereby to cause or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause injury to any person' used in the section, make it clear that before an accused can be convicted under this section, it must be shown that the accused had a clear intention to cause injury to some person by making a wrong entry. A mere wrong entry, by itself, is not sufficient to bring home the charge to the accused under this section.[61] It is for the prosecution to prove that the accused had a clear intention to harm the complainant in making the false entry.[62] Subsequent conduct of the accused may, however, be taken into consideration.[63]

11. Injury

For the definition of an 'injury', see s 44, IPC and the commentary thereunder.

12. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. The period of limitation prescribed for the prosecution of this offence is three years.

13. Sanction

Refer to s 195, Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[64]1188

The Supreme Court has specifically held that s 195(1)(b)(i), CrPC does not bar the jurisdiction of a magistrate to take cognizance of an offence under s 167, IPC .[65]

14. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....being a public servant in the Department,.....and being, as such public servant, charged with the preparation (or translation) of the document relating to.....framed (or translated) that document in a manner which you knew (or believed) to be incorrect, intending thereby to cause (or knowing it to be likely that you might thereby cause) injury to....., and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 167 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said court on the said charge.

15. Proof

To prove an offence under this section the prosecution must prove that:

(a) on the date of the offence the accused was a public servant;
(b) the accused was charged with the preparation (or translation) of the document;
(c) the accused in fact prepared (or translated) the said document in his capacity as such public servant; and
(d) either the accused intended to cause injury, or knew that the injury was likely to be caused by this act, to any person.[66]

16. Sentence

An official who deliberately tampers with official records and issues false copies, whatever his motives, deserves severe punishment, not merely for his own conduct, but as a deterrent to others who may be tempted to follow his example.[67]

17. Separate Convictions

The offence under this section is included in the offence under ss 467 and 471, and therefore, conviction, both under this section and ss 467 and 471, is not maintainable.[68]

40 Substituted by the Information Technology Act, 2000 (21 of 2000), s 91 and Sch 1, for 'such public servant, charged with the preparation or translaton of any document, frames or translates that document' (wef 17-10-2000).

Chapter IX

Of Offences by or Relating to Public Servants

S. 168.

Public servant unlawfully engaging in trade.--

Whoever, being a public servant, and being legally bound as such public servant not to engage in trade, engages in trade, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.1189

Comments

1. Scope

This section is directed against public servants engaging in trade. All public servants are not debarred from engaging in trade. This section, therefore, seeks to punish only those of them, who are legally bound as such public servants, to not to engage in trade. The section requires only three elements to constitute the offence, namely:[69]

(a) that the offender is a public servant;
(b) that, as such, he is legally bound not to engage in trade; and
(c) that he has engaged in trade so forbidden.

2. Public Servant

For the definition of a 'public servant' see commentary under s 21, ante.

The employees of the LIC are public servants and FIR lodged by the CBI is within their competence.[70]

3. Principle

Public servants are debarred from engaging in trade so that they may not neglect their duties. They can easily obtain an unfair advantage over other traders, as they have access to official information in other respects. The courts are jealous and stringent in imposing restrictions upon the carrying on of trade by public servants, and they will go as far as possible in constructing the words 'directly or indirectly interested' to protect, in the remotest degree, the common public interest, against the fraudulent use of advantages created by the official position of a public servant.[71]

4. Section is Incomplete

The section is, in a way, incomplete without the assistance of some other enactment, or rule of law, which imposes the legal prohibition required, as the second of the above elements requires; and the enactment containing the prohibition naturally and necessarily, should define the area which is covered by it, both as to the class of public servants to whom it applies, and the nature of the dealings in which those servants are prevented from engaging.[72]

5. 'Legally Bound as such Public Servant not to Engage in Trade'--Meaning of

As to the meaning of the expression 'legally bound', see s 43, IPC and the commentary thereunder.1190

Members, officers and servants of a municipality, who are directly or indirectly interested in any contract made with such municipality, are, under some acts, guilty of an offence under this section. This rule applies in the case of members, etc of district municipalities, local boards, committees, etc, as well.[73]

Sometimes, however, the penalty for such an offence is prescribed by the act itself.[74] Further, sometimes though no penalty attaches, but the offending official is debarred from holding the office.[75] The conduct of a police servant carrying on a shop comes within the prohibition contained in s 10 of the Police Act, and he is therefore liable to be convicted under this section.[76] Similarly, a public servant who engaged himself in trade, though prohibited from doing so by r 21, Bombay Civil Services Conduct, Discipline and Appeal Rules, framed by the government of Bombay and cl (2) of rr 48 and 54, Civil Services (Classification, Control and Appeal) Rules, was held to be liable under this section only.[77]

Also, there are departmental rules prohibiting public servants from trading, but it would appear that on their basis, such public servants are liable to departmental action only.

A public servant can be charged/convicted for offence under s 168, IPC when he is found engaged in a trade. In the instant case, the petitioner was working as a Divisional Manager of the LIC. He owned certain properties, partitioned the same amongst his two sons for the purpose of obtaining loan required by his two sons for carrying on business as builders and promoters. He had sought permission of the department also. Held, no offence under s 168, IPC was made out against him, order framing charge under s 168, IPC was set aside.[78]

6. 'Trade'--What is?

The meaning of the word 'trade' should not be narrowed down, so as to include only an extremely limited class of public servants in the operation of s 168, Indian Penal Code . In Halsbury's Laws of England,[79] it is said that the secondary meaning of the term 'trade' is 'any business carried on with a view to profit'. It is also pointed out that 'the word is one of a very general application, and must always be considered with the context with which it is used'. In its wider sense, the word is used 'to cover every kind of trade, business, profession or occupation'. Although 'in a great many contexts the word 'trade' indicates a process of buying and selling, that is by no means an exhaustive definition of its meaning. It may also mean a calling or industry or class of skilled labour'. In this regard, the work of preparing plans and estimates, requires a certain amount of skill, and, looking at it from that point of view, there is no reason why we should not construe it as a 'trade'.[80]

7. Isolated Transaction is not Trade

The word 'trade' in its narrow popular sense means an 'exchange of goods for goods or for money with the object of making profits'. In its widest sense, it includes any business carried on with a view to earn profit.[81] Further, the word 'trade' implies that the trade or business must be habitually, or systematically, exercised. It does not apply to an isolated transaction.

8. Carrying Trade ' Benami'

If a public servant carries on trade benami in the name of another person, he must be regarded as carrying on the trade himself.[82](Refer to Benami Transactions (Prohibition) Act, 1988.)

9. Doctor doing Private Practice Despite Ban on Private Practice

Where a doctor in Government service practices despite the ban on private practice, it may be violation of Service Rules, but he cannot be said to unlawfully engaged in trade, commits offence punishable under s 168, IPC . The said act clearly would fall within the ambit of misconduct to be dealt with under the Service Rules but would not constitute criminal offence under the Prevention of Corruption Act.[83]

10. Procedure

An offence under this section is non-cognizable, and summons should ordinarily issue in the first class. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. The period of limitation for prosecuting an offender under this section is one year.

The question whether a previous sanction of the state government, as provided by s 197 of the CrPC, is necessary, depends upon whether the offence was committed by the public servant while discharging his official duty.[84]

11. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....being a public servant, to wit....., and being, as such public servant, legally bound not to engage in trade, did engage in trade, namely.....and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 168 .
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

1192

The property purchased by the petitioner, working as a Divisional Manager, LIC, was partitioned by him in share of his two sons and wife, and the said fact was duly declared by him to the Income Tax Department. Further in his letter he informed LIC that his sons are carrying on business as builders and promoters, and are developing the property in question; since the original title was in his name his signatures were required on loan documents. To establish the guilt of the petitioner under s 168, Indian Penal Code 1860 and under s 13(2) r/w s 13(1)(d) of the P C Act 1988 it was required to be enquired in the matter, whether after seeking permission, permission was accorded by the LIC or not? The letter which was written by the accused was on the record, but the CBI had not enquired into this aspect; the CBI was not able to establish the offence against the accused-petitioner as to how the offence was made out under s 168, Indian Penal Code 1860. No prima facie case for framing charge against the petitioner was made out.[85]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter IX

Of Offences by or Relating to Public Servants

S. 169.

Public servant unlawfully buying or bidding for property.--

Whoever, being a public servant, and being legally bound as such public servant, not to purchase or bid for certain property, purchases or bids for that property, either in his own name or in the name of another, or jointly, or in shares with others, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both; and the property, if purchased, shall be confiscated.

Comments

1. Scope

The prohibition, contained in this section, is merely the extension of the principle enunciated in s 168 . Under this section a public servant is prohibited from purchasing or bidding for property which he is legally bound not to purchase. Various laws prohibit officers from holding sales of property, and persons employed by and subordinate to them, from purchasing directly or indirectly any property at such sales. The precise terms of the law which create the obligation not to bid or purchase should be referred to, as the prohibition may not be absolute, but only against purchasing at some certain sales. The prohibition, contemplated by the section, is in respect of property with which a public servant is connected in his official capacity, and he is, thus, placed in a position of advantage. The offence of purchasing an impounded pony by a police officer falls within this section, and s 19 of the Cattle Trespass Act 1871.[86]

2. Essential Ingredients

Section 169, IPC sets out that (1) the person should be a public servant, (2) in such capacity as public servant, he is legally bound not to purchase or bid 'certain 1193property', and (3) either in his name or in the name of another or jointly, or in shares with others.[87]

3. Section Incomplete without Assistance of some other Enactment

The offence under Section 169 , IPC is incomplete without the assistance of some other enactment which imposes the legal prohibition required. 'The enactment containing the prohibition naturally and necessarily defines the area which is covered by it, both as to the class of public servants to whom it applies and the nature of the dealings in which those servants are prevented from engaging.'[88] Therefore, in order to come within the clutches of s 169, IPC, there should be a law which prohibits a public servant from purchasing certain property and if he does it, it becomes an offence under s 169, IPC . Section 481 , Criminal Procedure Code, s 189 of the Railway Act, 1989 and s 19 of the Cattle Trespass Act, 1871 and instances of that nature in several enactments are available in which persons mentioned therein shall not directly or indirectly purchase any property at a sale under those Acts. Similarly s 136 of the Transfer of Property Act provides that no Judge, legal practitioner, or officer concerned with any Court of Justice shall buy or traffic in, or stipulate for, or agree to receive any share of, or interest in, any actionable claim and no Court of Justice shall enforce, at his instance, or at the instance of any person claiming by or through him, any actionable claims which so deals with by him as stated above. Thus, in these circumstances where a law has prohibited purchase of property or to bid at an auction, the prohibition contained therein will be attracted and will become an offence under s 169, IPC .[89]

4. Prohibition should Flow from a Law

Section 168, IPC bears the marginal heading "Public Servant unlawfully buying or bidding for property".[90] On a plain reading of the section and seeking the assurance from the marginal heading as well, it is fairly clear that prohibition should flow from a law. Such law in the context of s 169, IPC should mean that the law as ordinarily understood, that is to say, an enacted law or a rule or regulation framed under such law but not an executive order which confers no rights on anybody nor sets down legally enforceable obligations.[91]

5. Procedure

An offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable and non-compoundable, and it is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

Section 468, CrPC is confined only to those categories of offences which are punishable with fine or with imprisonment for not exceeding three years. Obviously, the provisions of that section will not be attracted to that category of offences which are punishable with forfeiture or confiscation of property.[92]1194

6. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I.... (name and office of the magistrate, etc) hereby charge you.....(name of the accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....being a public servant, namely....., in the.....department and being legally bound as servant, not to purchase or bid.....property did so purchase that property in your own name (or in the name of.....) (or jointly or in share) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 169 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

In a case, the petitioner-accused, the Chief Minister of Tamil Nadu, can be a partner in a firm and the same cannot be questioned. The only question raised in the case was that the alleged offences were committed by her in the purchase of the property belonging to TANSI by the said firms. It was held that to answer the said charge under s 169, IPC, there must be a prima facie case against the petitioner-accused.[93]

It is clear that any breach in following a government order cannot be an offence punishable under IPC . This is one of the reasons which would stand against the respondent to frame charge against the petitioner for an offence under s 169, IPC . When there is no material regarding the substantial ingredients to make out the said offence, it cannot be said that there is a prima facie case against her or that the materials available on record are sufficient enough to convert into evidence at the time of trial to make out an offence under s 169, IPC .[94]

7. Proof

The prosecution, in order to secure conviction under this section, must prove that:

(a) the accused was a public servant;
(b) as such, he was legally bound not to purchase or bid for the property in question; and
(c) he had purchased or bid for that property either in his own name, or in the name of another, or jointly, or in partnership with others.

8. Confiscation

In addition to any sentence which may be imposed under this section, the court has to pass an order for the confiscation of the property so purchased by the public servant. The court has no choice in the matter and in a case of conviction an order of confiscation in mandatory.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter IX

Of Offences by or Relating to Public Servants

S. 170.

Personating a public servant.--

Whoever pretends to hold any particular office as a public servant, knowing that he does not hold such office or falsely personates any other person holding such office, and in such assumed character does or attempts to do any act under colour of such office, shall be punished 1195with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes a person who pretends to hold a public office as a public servant and does any act in the assumed character of a public servant. The act of pretending to hold a particular office as a public servant alone does not make a person punishable, unless that person, in such an assumed character, does or attempts to do some act under colour of such office. The act or acts done by the person who personates a public servant gives a clear indication that he misused his position, ie, he did some overt act in the exercise of the authority of the assumed public servant. It is wholly immaterial whether such a person indulges in one act only or in a series of acts. The gist of the offence consists in the false assumption of the role of a public servant.[95]

2. Ingredients of Offence

To attract s 170, IPC two ingredients are required that such a person who pretends to hold any office as a public servant falsely impersonates any other person holding such office, and any person in such an assumed character does or attempts to do any act under the colour of such office.[96] The prosecution, therefore, needs to prove the following points:

(a) that the accused falsely pretended to be or personated to be a public servant,
(b) that he did so knowingly, and
(c) that while assuming such a character he did, or attempted to do, something under the colour of such an office.[97]

3. Distinction between Sections 170 and 419

See commentary under s 419, post.

The offences of cheating and personation overlap each other. Cheating by personation (s 419, IPC) is an offence of a general character under which a person 1196may pretend to be one other than what he really is. But cheating by pretending to be a public servant (s 170, IPC) is a specific offence where one pretends to be a public servant. It has all the ingredients of cheating by personation under s 419 of the IPC . When the personation is that of a public servant and the pretender does some act as such public servant, then the offence would fall under s 170 .[1]

4. 'Any Particular Office'--Meaning of

What is meant by 'any particular office' is 'any specified office' regardless of whether or not such an office exists? If a person makes a claim in some such words 'I hold an office as a public servant', it will not do to charge him under this section; he must specify the office which he claims to hold before he can be found guilty under the section. All that the law requires is that he must specify the office; it does not go further and require that the office must exist. If a person is to be convicted for making a false pretence, the false pretence must be of some existing fact in distinction from a mere promise and a mere opinion, but that does not mean that for an offence under this section the office must be existing.[2]

5. 'As a Public Servant'--Meaning of

A petition-writer is not a public servant as defined in s 21, IPC . Consequently, a person cannot be convicted under this section of personating him.[3]

See also s 21 and the commentary thereunder.

6. 'Knowing that he does not Hold such Office'--Meaning of

To sustain a conviction under this section it would be necessary to make out that the accused knew that he did not hold the office which he pretended to hold. A bona fide belief that he does hold such office (for example, by one officer in the absence of another) precludes such knowledge. Although an ignorance of law does not excuse a person who does an action which is an offence (without any knowledge on the part of the alleged offender), yet, to constitute the offence, it needs to be shown that there was a certain knowledge. Further, the offence was not committed by one who acts without that knowledge, and it is immaterial whether the absence of the knowledge required to constitute the offence proceeded from ignorance of law or ignorance of fact. For, though ignorance of law is no ground of defence, it is evidence of a mental condition.[4]

7. 'Falsely Personates'--Meaning of

'Falsely' does not mean 'fraudulently'. When a person 'falsely personates' any other person he does not necessarily act fraudulently or with any dishonest intention. Whether or not he makes any gain out of his activities while he poses as a public servant is wholly immaterial.[5] This is one of the few offences in this code, in which a dishonest intention is not expressly made an essential ingredient.[6]1197

In an old case, a prisoner who, having passed himself off as a police officer, cheated several villagers out of their money, was held guilty of cheating, and falsely personating as a public servant.[7]

Where the accused, who was a lower division clerk, pretended to hold the post of a secret ASI No 775 in the education department, while knowing very well that he did not hold such office as there was no such office in the department, he was convicted under s 170, IPC .[8]

Where the accused persons posed as officers attached to the detective department on the strength of a police belt and a police monogram and robbed certain articles from the complainant, which were recovered along with one police belt and monogram from the accused, the evidence of the complainant was found to be clear and cogent. The evidence of witnesses were corroborated, the delay in the FIR was held to be of no consequence as the same had to be sent from one police station to another on the point of jurisdiction, and the conviction of the accused persons under ss 170 / 411 / 392 / 34, IPC was upheld.[9]

8. 'Does or Attempts to do any Act'--Meaning of

The fact of personation alone would not be sufficient to justify a conviction under this section. The section further requires that the offender should be shown to have attempted to do or to have done in such assumed character some act under colour of such office.[10] But it is necessary that the act done or attempted to be done should be such an act as might legally be done by the public servant personated.[11]

Where the accused, falsely representing himself to be a constable in the CID demanded people having cattle with them to produce rahadari papers, it was held that, even assuming that it was not the duty of a CID constable to order the production of rahadari papers, the accused having pretended to be a public servant and as such demanded the production of the rahadari papers, he was guilty of the offence under this section.[12]

To constitute offence under s 170, IPC, a person must either pretend to hold a particular office as a public servant knowing that he does not hold such office or falsely personate any other person holding such office. Over and above that, that person in such assumed character must do or attempt to do an act under the colour of such office. The only imputation against the accused was that after retirement from IAS he had used IAS with his name in his letterhead and made some correspondence. True, IAS being a service under the Central Government so long as a member thereof is in service then alone he can use with his name as a member/cadre of that service. By use of IAS with his name in the letterhead and correspondence made stating so the accused could not be imputed of having pretended of holding a particular office as a public servant, which he was not, or of doing or attempting to do any act under 1198the assumed. Petitioner who was a member of IAS had used IAS in his letterhead when he continued as Director of CAPE and also corresponded in that manner, was no ground to impute that he has committed an offence under s 170 of the IPC . The proceedings against the accused petitioner were quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[13]

9. 'Under Colour of such Office'--Significance of

The phrase 'an act under colour of such office', points to acts which could not have been done without assuming official authority or responsibility, and would not connote acts of a ministerial or mechanical character, which might be done without requiring the justification of an office in the person doing them.[14]But the act in question need not be such an act as might legally be done by the public servant personally. Thus, A pretending to be a head constable, demands one anna worth of fruit from a fruit-seller for one pice. He is guilty of the offence under this section.[15]The act done 'under colour' of an office is an act having some relation to the office which the accused pretends to hold.[16]The act done must be one which assumes an official authority.

The Kerala High Court has held that it is not possible to subscribe to the view that to constitute the offence provided for by s 170 of the Indian Penal Code, it is not necessary that the act done or attempted to be done should be such an act as might legally be done by the public servant personated. Such a view, if accepted would virtually make the clause 'under colour of such office' redundant, but the section not only provides that the act shall be done in such assumed character, but also under colour of such office.[17]

The view of the Calcutta High Court was the same. It observed that the clause 'under colour of such office' apparently means making use of such office and an act done or attempted to be done 'under colour' must be an act having some relation to the office which the accused pretends to hold. In the case before the division bench of the Calcutta High Court, where the accused personated as a customs officer and extracted presents, it was held that s 170, IPC was not attracted.[18]

The Punjab and Haryana High Court had the occasion to examine the above views of the Kerala and Calcutta High Courts and took a different meaning of the expression 'under colour of such office'. According to it one finds it difficult to subscribe to the view of the Kerala and Calcutta High Courts. This is for the reason that it is not necessary that the act done should be such as might legally be done by the public servant personated. The expression 'under colour of such office' need not have a direct proximity with the duties of the office of the person impersonated. It is enough that a person pretends to be someone else in front of others who infact he is not. Therefore, the accused, who identified persons in different sale-deeds as a 1199*lambardar* and attested certain sureties while he infact was not a lambardar, was held to be acting under the colour of the office of a lambardar.[19]

Where the accused avoided paying a one anna platform charge by pretending, upon entering the station platform, that he was a CID officer, it being a custom of the railway not to require from CID officers a platform ticket, it was held that the act of the accused did not constitute an offence as it was not a power peculiar to a CID officer to go to a platform without a ticket and the act of the accused was not therefore an official act.[20]

Where the accused falsely representing himself as a CID officer promised to appoint the complainant as a constable, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section as a mere promise could not be regarded as an act within the meaning of this section, and as the promise implied nothing more than that the accused would recommend the complainant for appointment as a constable, and such a recommendation might be made by one not necessarily a CID officer.[21]

Where the accused, a retired assistant civil surgeon, issued a certificate on which he made a rubber stamp which purported to show him as a civil surgeon, it was held that he was not guilty under this section as even in his capacity as a retired assistant civil surgeon, he could issue the certificate and so could not be said to have done an act under the colour of the office of a civil surgeon.[22]

Where the accused posed as a government servant and by so doing, obtained the services of the kamdar mahar, services which he would not otherwise have obtained and which the *Kamdar mahar*was bound to give on demand by a government officer, it was held that the accused did an act under the colour of the office which he assumed and was therefore guilty under this section.[23]

10. Mere Attending or Addressing Public Meetings without Attempts to Commit any Official Act

A mere attending of some meetings and addressing the general public does not amount to an act under the colour of the office. If a person, who has been designated as a chairman, discusses with somebody like the sub-divisional magistrate or deputy commissioner and other people, it does not amount to dealing with the activity of the marketing board. It does not amount to acting under the colour of the office. It is possible that having been appointed as the chairman of the Punjab State Agricultural Marketing Board, the accused wanted to acquaint himself with its functioning. But it does not amount to an offence as envisaged under s 170, IPC . A mere assumption of a character without any attempt to commit any official act is not sufficient to attract s 170, IPC .[24]

11. Mens Rea

This is one of the offences in the code in which a dishonest intention is not expressly made an essential ingredient.[25] Acting as a public servant in good faith under the 1200*bona fide* belief that he holds such an office may be covered by the general exception under s 79 and is not an offence.[26]

12. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable and a warrant must ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is non-bailable and non-compoundable, and is triable by any magistrate. The period of limitation prescribed for this offence is three years.

13. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I.....(name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you.....(name of accused), as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....pretended to hold the office of....., as a public servant (or falsely personated.....holding such office), and in such assumed character did (or attempted to do) under colour of such office,.....(specify the act done) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 170 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

14. Proof

To secure conviction under this section the prosecution is to prove the following points:

(a) that the accused falsely pretended to be or personated to be a public servant;
(b) that he did so knowingly; and

(c) that assuming such character he did or attempted to do something under colour of such office.[27]

In other words, for proving an offence under s 170, IPC against an accused, it is necessary for the prosecution to establish that the accused personated himself as a public servant or that he pretended to hold the office of a public servant, that he was not a public servant or that he did not hold such office, that he acted falsely in such personation and that he knew that he did not hold such office, and that he, when assuming such character, did or attempted to do something under colour of such office.[28]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter IX

Of Offences by or Relating to Public Servants

S. 171.

Wearing garb or carrying token used by public servant with fraudulent intent.--

Whoever, not belonging to a certain class of public servants, wears any garb or carries any token resembling any garb or token used by that class of public servants, with the intention that it may be believed, or with the knowledge that it is likely to be believed, that he belongs to that class of public servants, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.1201

Comments

1. Scope

This section is analogous to s 140, IPC under which the wearing of the garb or carrying of the token of a soldier, sailor or airman is punishable. Under the present section the wearing of the garb or carrying of a token resembling any garb or token used by a public servant with the intention to pass off as such public servant is punishable. The offence is complete, although no act is either done or attempted to be done in the assumed official character. The mere circumstances of wearing the garb, or using the token, with the necessary intention or knowledge is sufficient. If any act is done, then the preceding section will apply. The English law is also to the same effect.

See also s 140, IPC and commentary thereunder.

2. 'Wears any Garb'--Meaning of

To carry a police jacket under the arm is not to 'wear' it.[29] If the person so deceived thereby acts to his own detriment, the offence will be one of cheating.[30]

Where there is no averment in the petition that the accused had worn any garb or carried any token used by the public servant, s 171, IPC is not attracted.[31]

3. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable but summons may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by any magistrate and may also be tried summarily. The period of limitation for the prosecution of this offence is one year.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I..... (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you.....(name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at .....not belonging to.....class of public servant wore garb of such a class of public servant, to wit.....(or carried token, to wit.....which is used by.....class of public servant) with the intention that it may be believed (or with the knowledge that it is likely to be believed) that you belong to that class of public servants and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 171 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

The points for proving an offence under this section are:

(1) that the accused wore the garb or carried a token of a public servant;
(2) that it either was the garb or token of a public servant or resembled it;
(3) that the accused was not a public servant entitled to use such garb or token; and
(4) that he wore the garb or carried the token with the intention or knowledge that it was likely to be believed that he was such a public servant.12031204

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter IXA

Of Offences Relating to Elections

[13][S. 171A.

"Candidate", "Electoral right" defined.--

For the purposes of this chapter--

[14][(a) "candidate" means a person who has been nominated as a candidate at any election;]

(b) "electoral right" means the right of a person to stand, or not to stand as, or to withdraw from being, a candidate or to vote or refrain from voting at any election.]1207

Comments

1. Scope

This section only defines the expressions, 'candidate' and 'electoral right'.

2. Legislative Changes

Clause (a) of s 171A was substituted by Act 40 of 1975, s 9, wef 6 August 1975.

3. Election

The term 'election' is defined in expln 3 of s 21 of this Code as denoting 'an election for the purpose of selecting members of any legislative, municipal or other public authority, of whatever character, the method of selection to which is by, or under, any law prescribed as by election'. In its ordinary or etymological meaning it implies some act of choosing on the part of the electorate, though indeed we are accustomed to speak of an 'uncontested election', where the single candidate is unopposed. The word 'election' has by long usage, in connection with the process of selection of proper representatives in democratic institutions, acquired both a wide and a narrow meaning. In the narrower sense, it is used to mean the final selection of a candidate which may embrace the result of the poll when there is polling, or a particular candidate being returned unopposed, when there is no poll. In the wider sense, the word is used to connote the entire process culminating in a candidate being declared elected. It bears, thus, a wide meaning whenever we talk of elections in a democratic country. Hence, the term election may be taken to embrace the whole procedure whereby an elected member is returned, whether or not it was found necessary to take a poll.[15] Election has the same meaning as the expression used in arts 327 and 328, of the Indian Constitution, viz., matters relating to or in connection with election.

Election Embraces Whole Procedure

Election is not merely the ultimate decision or the ultimate result. Election is every stage from the time the notification is issued till the result is declared, and even perhaps if there is an election petition, till the decision of the Election Tribunal. It is a whole continuous integrated proceeding and every aspect of it and every stage of it and every step taken in it is a part of the election.[16]

4. Definition of Candidate

The definition of candidate in this section has been adopted from the English Municipal Corporations Act 1882, s 77 and Municipal Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act 1884.[17]

In s 79(b) of the Representation of the People Act 1951, the term 'candidate' is defined as:

> Candidate means a person who has been or claims to have been duly nominated as a candidate at any election.

Unless, therefore a case falls within the latter half of the definition a person becomes a candidate under the first part of the definition only when he has been duly nominated as a candidate and the furtherance of the prospects of a candidate's election must, therefore, in such a case, commence from after that stage.[18] Before the 1975 amendment, the word candidate included a person who, when an election was in contemplation, held himself out as a prospective candidate thereat; provided that he was subsequently nominated as a candidate at such election. The natural effect of this definition is that a person, who holds himself out as a prospective candidate cannot be treated as a candidate in the eyes of law unless he is actually nominated as such. The expression 'holding out as a prospective candidate' has now lost its significance.

5. Candidate--Determining Factor

The question as to when a person becomes a candidate must be decided on the language of s 79(b) of the Representation of the People Act 1951. Under that section, the candidature commences when the person begins to hold himself out as a prospective candidate. The determining factor, therefore, is the decision of the candidate himself, and not the act of other persons or bodies adopting him as their candidate.[19] When, therefore, a question arises under s 79(b) of the Representation of the People Act 1951 as to whether a person had become a candidate at a given point of time, what has to be seen is whether at that time he had clearly and unambiguously declared his intention to stand as a candidate, so that it could be said of him that he had held himself out as a prospective candidate. That he has merely formed an intention to stand for election is not sufficient to make him a prospective candidate, because the essence of the matter is that he should hold himself out as a prospective candidate. That can only be possible if he communicates such intention to the outside world by a declaration or conduct from which it could be inferred that he intends to stand as a candidate.[20]

6. Withdrawal after Nomination--Effect

It is obvious that a person who has been duly nominated as a candidate is a candidate within the definition of this word in this section. He remains a candidate even though, after having been duly nominated, he withdraws. The words of the definition itself are clear and there is no manner of ambiguity in this respect.[21]

7. 'Electoral Right'--Definition of

The term 'electoral right', defined under cl (b) of s 171A, IPC clearly indicates that an electoral right is of a definite nature and it is to be exercised by an individual.[22] Electoral right has been defined in s 171A, IPC, inter alia as either to vote or refrain from voting at an election.[23] Under the definition given here, the expression electoral right embraces not only the right of a person to stand or not to stand as a candidate or to withdraw from being a candidate at an election,[24] but also his right to vote or refrain from voting at an election.[25] The right to nominate a candidate does not, however, constitute an electoral right.[26]

13 Inserted by the Act 39 of 1920, s 2 .

Chapter IXA

Of Offences Relating to Elections

[27][S. 171B.

Bribery.--

(1) Whoever--

(i) gives a gratification to any person with the object of inducing him or any other person to exercise any electoral right or of rewarding any person for having exercised any such right; or

(ii) accepts either for himself or for any other person any gratification as a reward for exercising any such right or for inducing or attempting to induce any other person to exercise any such right, commits the offence of bribery:

Provided that a declaration of public policy or a promise of public action shall not be an offence under this section.

(2) A person who offers, or agrees to give, or offers or attempts to procure, a gratification shall be deemed to give a gratification.

(3) A person who obtains or agrees to accept or attempts to obtain a gratification shall be deemed to accept a gratification, and a person who accepts a gratification as a motive for doing what he does not intend to do, or as a reward for doing what he has not done, shall be deemed to have accepted the gratification as a reward.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines bribery at an election.

Bribery in Election

'Bribery' is defined primarily as the giving or acceptance of a gratification, either as a motive or as a reward to any person, either to induce him to stand as, or not to stand as, or to withdraw from being a candidate, or to vote or refrain from voting at an election. It also includes offer, or agreements to give or offer, and attempts to procure, a gratification for any person. Gratification was formerly explained in s 161 of this Code, now replaced by s 7 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 49 of 1988, and it states that the word gratification is not restricted to pecuniary gratifications or to gratifications estimable in money.[28]

Bribery as Corrupt Practice

The definition of bribery given here differs materially from the definition of bribery as a corrupt practice given in s 123(1) of the Representation of the People Act 1951, which runs:

(1) "Bribery" that is to say,--

(A) any gift, offer or promise by a candidate or his agent or by any other person with the consent of a candidate or his election agent of any gratification, to any person whomsoever, with the object, directly or indirectly of inducing--

(a) a person to stand or not to stand as, or to withdraw or not to withdraw from being a candidate at an election, or

(b) an elector to vote or refrain from voting at an election, or as a reward to--

(i) a person for having so stood or not stood, or for having withdrawn or not having withdrawn his candidature; or

(ii) an elector for having voted or refrained from voting;

(B) the receipt of, or agreement to receive, any gratification, whether as a motive or a reward:

(a) by a person for standing or not standing as, or for withdrawing or not withdrawing from being, a candidate; or

(b) by any person whomsoever for himself or any other person for voting or refraining from voting, or inducing or attempting to induce any elector to vote or refrain from voting, or any candidate to withdraw or not to withdraw his candidature.

Explanation.--For the purposes of this clause the term "gratification" is not restricted to pecuniary gratifications or gratifications estimable in money and it includes all forms of entertainment and all forms of employment for reward but it does not include the payment of any expenses bona fide incurred at, or for the purpose of, any election and duly entered in the account of election expenses referred to in section 78 .

That section contemplates only the making of a gift by a candidate, whereas bribery in this section embraces not only the making of a gift but also the acceptance of it.[29]

Laws of England

Bribery at a parliamentary or local election was an indictable offence at common law punishable by fine and imprisonment. The common law offence has, however, been superseded by express statutory provisions.1211

A person is guilty of a corrupt practice if he is guilty of bribery. A person is guilty of bribery:

(1) if he, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf:
  (a) gives any money or procures any office to or for any voter or to or for any other person on behalf of any voter or to or for any other person in order to induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting; or
  (b) corruptly does any such act as mentioned in head (a) above on account of any voter having voted or refrained from voting; or
  (c) makes any such gift or procurement to or for any person in order to induce that person to procure, or endeavour to procure, the return of any person at an election or the vote of any voter; or if upon or in consequence of any such gift or procurement he procures or engages, promises or endeavours to procure, the return of any person at an election or the vote of any voter;

(2) if he advances or pays or causes to be paid any money to or for the use of any other person with the intent that that money or any part of it is to be expended in bribery at an election or knowingly pays or causes to be paid any money to any person in discharge or repayment of any money wholly or in part expended in bribery at any election;
(3) if, before or during an election, he directly or indirectly by himself or by any other person on his behalf receives, agrees, or contracts for any money, gift, loan or valuable consideration, office, place or employment for himself or for any other person for voting or agreeing to vote or for refraining or agreeing to refrain from voting;
(4) if, after an election, he directly or indirectly by himself or by any other person on his behalf receives any money or valuable consideration on account of any person having voted or refrained from voting or having induced any other person to vote or refrain from voting.

Where in an election petition it is shown that corrupt practices committed in reference to the election for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of any person at that election have so extensively prevailed that they may reasonably be supposed to have affected the result, his election, if he is elected, is void and he is incapable of being elected to fill the vacancy or any of the vacancies for which the election was held.[30]

2. Gratification

The term 'gratification' has been explained above.

3. Gratification to Individual and not to the Party

The term 'electoral right' as defined under cl (b) of s 171A of the IPC clearly indicates that the electoral right is of a definite nature and it is to be exercised by an individual. So, the gratification has to be given to an individual. When the offer is made to the Republican Party of India and not to an individual and there is nothing in the offer which indicates that any influence is being brought on any individual with respect to exercising his electoral right, that means, to stand, or not to stand as, or to withdraw from being a candidate or to vote or to refrain from voting at the election, seeking support of a political party, during the cause of election and making an offer to a political party of some share in political power for giving such support cannot be called as giving gratification as contemplated under s 171B of IPC .[31]

4. Gratification not Limited to Money

Gratification is not necessarily limited to money or money's worth, since anything done or omitted to be done may amount to a gratification and consequently a bribe. For example, the promise of a situation or employment[32] or the offer to vacate an office in favour of the briber[33] are within its mischief. Payment to the voter for loss of time is equally so.

Where a candidate for an election writes a letter to his agent asking him to dissuade a rival candidate from standing for the election by offering him money and the agent accordingly offers a big sum of money to the rival candidate for withdrawing his candidature, the conduct of the accused candidate is within the mischief of this section.[34]

5. Gratification--Tests to be Applied

For finding out whether a particular promise or act amounts to gratification, two tests have to be satisfied. First, that the gratification must be something which is calculated to satisfy a person's aim, object or desire, and secondly, such a gratification must be of some value though it need not be something estimable in terms of money.[35] The word 'gratification' should be deemed to refer only to cases where a gift is made of something which gives a material advantage to the recipient.[36] It is not, however, necessary that the gratification offered should be of value only to the person to whom it is offered, and not to anybody else.[37]

Whether the object, for which gratification has been paid, has been achieved or not is immaterial.[38]

6. Making of Gift is Corrupt Practice

An acceptance of bribe or gift made to a candidate with the intention of inducing him to drop out of the election contest is not a corrupt practice within the meaning of s 123(1)(A) of the Representation of the People Act 1951. The words 'gift, offer or promise by a candidate or his agent or by any other person' clearly show that what is contemplated is the making of the gift and these words are wholly inappropriate to describe the acceptance of the gifts. The words 'with the object, directly or indirectly of inducing' also indicate that only the making of the gift is contemplated, for the object is to punish the person making the gift, and clearly not of the person accepting it.[39]

7. Contribution to Charity

Charitable gifts, at the time of an election, may, in conceivable cases, amount to the corrupt practice of bribery, provided the motive behind the charity was corrupt.[40]1213*Bona fide* charity has always been allowed. On the other hand, what are called charitable gifts may be merely a specious and subtle form of bribery. If a gift is charitable, it will not become bribery because of the use made of it, even if political capital is made out of it; it is not possible by any ex post facto act to make that which was legal at the time, illegal and criminal.[41]It is the object of the act to determine whether or not it amounts to bribery. It is, therefore, the motive which is behind the charity that should be taken into consideration in finding whether or not it is a subtle form of bribery. If the motive is corrupt and the object is to induce the voters to vote in a particular way, it is bribery.[42]

8. What is Treating?

'Treating' is a form of bribery. The explanation to s 171E says that 'treating' means that form of bribery where the gratification consists of food, drink, entertainment or provision.

Under s 100 of the (English) Representation of the People Act 1949:[43]

> A person shall be guilty to treating if he corruptly, by himself or by any other person, either before, during or after an election, directly or indirectly, gives, or provides or pays, wholly or in part, the expense of giving or providing any meal, drink, entertainment or provision to or for any person--
> (a) for the purpose of corruptly influencing that person or any other person to vote or refrain from voting; or
> (b) on account of that person or any other person having voted or refrained from voting, or being about to vote to refrain from voting.
> Every elector, or proxy of an elector who corruptly accepts or takes any such meal, drink, entertainment or provision shall also be guilty of treating.

A corrupt promise of refreshment to voters to induce them to vote has been held to be bribery. Where, however, the object of a candidate in distributing sweets to school children was not to secure votes, it could not be held to be a case of bribery, even if the idea, that the donation would increase his popularity and might result in some indirect propaganda for him, might have been at the back of the candidate's mind.[44]

9. Proof--To be Proved as any other Offence

Due proof of a simple act of bribery by or with the knowledge and consent of the candidate or by his agents, however insignificant that act may be, is sufficient to invalidate the election.[45] The charge of bribery is indeed a serious criminal charge. It falls within the ambit of s 171B of the Indian Penal Code, and is a criminal offence. If that be so, it must follow that clear and unequivocal proof is required before a case of bribery is held to be established. It should satisfy the test applied to the proof of offences in criminal cases. The court must be satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt 1214that the said bribery has been proved.[46] Suspicion is not sufficient,[47] and the confession of the person, alleged to have been bribed, is not conclusive.[48] It is not safe to base a finding of bribery on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice except possibly, in very exceptional circumstances.[49]

10. Illustrative Cases

Most of the decisions relating to bribery are on election petitions under the Representation of the People Act.

Paying a voter's debts,[50] permitting a voter to shoot rabbits on the estate of the candidate,[51] paying the travelling expenses of a voter on condition that he must vote for the payer,[52] paying the rates and taxes of a voter,[53] payment made to keep away voters from voting,[54] payment to a voter for loss of time[55] offering money to a rival candidate for withdrawing his candidature,[56] are all instances of bribery, but it is not bribery to make payment to election agents,[57] or payment of election expenses to a candidate.[58]

Money paid to a club to pay off its debts and to repair its premises, with the object of inducing those of its members who are voters to record their votes in favour of the candidate is a bribe.[59]

Where the motive is corrupt and the object of giving the gratification is to induce the voters to vote in a particular way, it is bribery.[60]

A person, who gives some land to a voter for refraining from voting at an election, is guilty of an offence under this section.[61]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter IXA

Of Offences Relating to Elections

[62][S. 171C.

Undue influence at elections.--

(1) Whoever voluntarily interferes or attempts to interfere with the free exercise of any electoral right commits the offence of undue influence at an election.1215

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of sub-section (1), whoever--

(a) threatens any candidate or voter, or any person in whom a candidate or voter is interested, with injury of any kind, or

(b) induces or attempts to induce a candidate or voter to believe that he or any person in whom he is interested will become or will be rendered an object of Divine displeasure or of spiritual censure, shall be deemed to interfere with the free exercise of the electoral right of such candidate or voter, within the meaning of sub-section (1)

(3) A declaration of public policy or a promise of public action, or the mere exercise of a legal right without intent to interfere with an electoral right, shall not be deemed to be interference within the meaning of this section.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines the offence of 'undue influence' and s 171F provides the punishment for it.

2. Analogous Law

'Undue influence' as a corrupt practice is defined in sub-s (2) of s 123 of the Representation of the People Act 1951 as:

> (2) Undue influence, that is to say, any direct or indirect interference or attempt to interfere on the part of the candidate or his agent, or of any other person with the consent of the candidate or his election agent, with the free exercise of any electoral right:
> Provided that--
> (a) without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of this clause, any such person as is referred to therein who--
> (i) threatens any candidate or any elector, or any person in whom a candidate or an elector interested, with injury of any kind including social ostracism and ex-communication or expulsion from any caste or community; or
> (ii) induces or attempts to induce a candidate or an elector to believe that he, or any person in whom he is interested, will become or will be rendered an object of divine displeasure or spiritual censure,1216 > shall be deemed to interfere with the free exercise of the electoral right of such candidate or elector within the meaning of this clause;
> (b) a declaration of public policy, or a promise of public action, or the mere exercise of a legal right without intent to interfere with an electoral right, shall not be deemed to be interference within the meaning of this clause.

...

The law in England relating to undue influence at elections, is not the same as in India, as will appear from the following definition of 'undue influence' contained in s 2 of 46 and 47 Vic, c 51, which substantially re-enacted the former s 5 of 17 and 18 Vic, c 102:[63]

> Every person who shall directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf made use of or threaten to make use of any force, violence, or restrain, or inflict or threaten to inflict, by himself or by any other person, any temporal or spiritual injury, damage, harm, or loss upon or against any person in order to induce or > compel such person to vote or refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting at any election, or who shall by abduction, duress, or any fraudulent device or contrivance, impede or prevent the free exercise of the franchise of any elector, or shall thereby compel, induce, or prevail upon any elector either to give or to refrain from giving his vote at any election, shall be guilty of undue influence.

3. Difference between English and Indian Law

The law relating to undue influence at elections in England is not the same as in India. The words of the English Statute quoted in note no 1 above, lay emphasis upon the individual aspect of the exercise of undue influence. It is with reference to the words of that statute that Brumwell, B made the following observation in the North Durham case:[64]

> When the language of the act is examined it will be found that intimidation to be within the statute must be intimidation practised upon an individual.

The Indian law, on the other hand, does not emphasise the individual aspect of the exercise of such influence, but pays regard to the use of such influence as has the tendency to bring about the result contemplated in the clause. What is material under the Indian law is not the actual effect produced, but the doing of such acts as are calculated to interfere with the free exercise of any electoral right. Decisions of the English courts based on the words of the English statute, which are not strictly in parimateria with the words of the Indian statute, cannot, therefore, be used as precedents in this country.[65]

4. Undue Influence--Meaning of

The Statement of Objects and Reasons appended to the bill states:

> Undue influence at an election is defined as the voluntary interference or attempted interference with the right of any person to stand, or not to stand as, or withdraw from being, a candidate, or to vote or refrain from voting. This covers all threats of injury to person or property and all illegal methods of persuasion and any interference with the liberty of the candidates or the electors. A sub-section is added to explain that the 1217inducing or attempting to induce a person to believe that he will become the object of divine displeasure is also interference. It is not, however, interference within the meaning of the clause to make a declaration of public policy or a promise of public action.[66] The second sub-clause is merely explanatory of the general definition in the first sub-clause and does not restrict the generality of the words used there. We have considered the criticisms of this clause based on the generality of the words employed, but we are satisfied that any attempt at specific enumeration would be open to a serious danger of loopholes in what we regard as a most salutary provision.[67]

The definition of undue influence given in s 123(2) of the Representation of the People Act 1951, is more or less in the same language as in s 171C of the IPC, except that the words 'directly or indirectly' have been added to indicate the nature of interference. It will be seen that the definition of undue influence in the Representation of the People Act may be wider.[68]

5. The term 'Under Influence' is not Susceptible to Precise Definition

The term 'undue influence' is not susceptible of any precise definition, but it suggests the overcoming of the will of one by the other who superimposes his will on the weaker party despite the latter's disinclination or effective resistance. 'Undue influence' is a species of constructive flow. Undue influence is used in contradistinction to proper influence which may be secured through affection bestowed or from kindness indulged.

In order to establish undue influence it must be proved that the influence was such as to deprive the person affected of the free exercise of his will. It must amount to imposing a restraint on the will of another whereby he is prevented from doing what he wishes to do or is forced to do what he does not wish to do.

6. Acts which do not Amount to Undue Influence

A friendly advice or an influence arising from gratitude or esteem is not undue influence, unless thereby the functioning of a free mind is destroyed. Mere suggestions or appeals cannot have such an effect. An influence which exists from attachment or respect or which results from arguments or appeals to reason and judgment is not undue influence.[69] A threat to a member of the legislative assembly of Bengal that if a certain candidate was elected as the President of India, he would enforce President's rule in Bengal, doesn't amount to undue influence.[70]

An advice, argument, persuasion or solicitation cannot constitute undue influence. Honest intercession, even importunity, falls short of controlling a persons' free exercise of his will. A persuasion, which leaves a person free to adopt his own course, is not undue influence. On the other hand, a suggestion or an entreaty from somebody, held in esteem, could be treated as undue influence. In the absence of proof, that a person has been, in consequence of the alleged influence, deprived of free agency, the question of there being an undue influence does not arise.

7. Essence of Undue Influence

It is not objectionable to exercise an influence by acts of kindness or appeals to the free reason and understanding of a person. So long as the free agency of the other person is not prevented or impaired by obtaining a domination over his mind, it is not an exercise of undue influence. The essence of undue influence is that a person is constrained to do against his will, but for the influence he would have refused to do it, if left to exercise his own judgment. It has to be shown that a person's volition had thus been controlled by another, whereby he could not pursue his own inclination, being too weak to resist the importunity and in view of the pressure exercised on his mind he could not act intelligently and voluntarily and had become subject to the will of the other who had thus obtained dominion over his mind.

In a Madras case[71] Odgers J, doubted if merely telling people not to vote would constitute an offence under this section.

Gist of Undue Influence

The gist of undue influence at an election consists in a voluntary interference or an attempt at interference with the free exercise of any electoral right. Any voluntary action which interferes with or attempts to interfere with such free exercise of electoral right would amount to undue influence. However, even though the definition in sub-s (1) of s 171C, IPC is wide in terms it cannot take in a mere canvassing in favour of a candidate at an election. If that were so, it would be impossible to run democratic elections.[72] If the intended phonogram is not with reference to the right of a person to stand or not to stand as a candidate or to withdraw from being a candidate, it cannot be said that canvassing in favour of a candidate is to exercise undue influence and no offence under s 171C, read with s 171F, IPC can be said to have been committed.[73]

When the elector goes through the mental process of weighing the merits and demerits of candidates and makes his choice, even at that stage, undue influence may come in. The distribution of a pamphlet imputing vices and immorality to a candidate would amount to an attempt to interfere with the free exercise of the right to vote and undue influence under this section.[74]

Recitation in a public meeting of a poem containing false statements or facts, with the consent and knowledge and in the presence of a candidate, about another candidate, and its publication would make the candidate responsible under s 123(4), Representation of the People Act 1951.[75]

It is the degree of the gravity of the allegation which will be the determining factor in deciding whether the offence falls under s 171C of this Code. If the allegation, though false and relating to the candidate's personal character and conduct, made with the intent to affect the result of an election, does not amount to interference, or an attempt to interfere, the offence would be a lesser one. If, on the other hand, it 1219amounts to interference, or an attempt to interfere, it would be a graver offence under s 171F read with s 171C, IPC .[76]

8. Editorial to Vote Freely--Whether Attracts this Section

To attract s 171C of the IPC, it has to be established that the petitioners voluntarily interfered or attempted to interfere with the free exercise of any electoral right. In one case, what has been published in the editorial was only a general statement highlighting the difficulties encountered on account of a large number of candidates contesting the elections. The opinion of a newspaper or friendly advice made by it to the voters will not constitute an offence under s 171C of the IPC . As a matter of fact, the request made to the voters through the editorial, was only to exercise their votes freely and not to be influenced by the gimmicks shown by the rebel candidates and those candidates who do not put forward any definite programmes or who do not have any clear manifesto to offer to the people. In order to establish undue influence, the complainant has necessarily to prove that the influence was such as to deprive the voter of the free exercise of his will.[77]

The message by a person to a particular political party to boycott the election does not amount to interference with the free exercise of the electoral rights of the voters of that party, within the meaning of s 171C of the IPC, for the simple reason that the voters of that party would still be free to vote for the candidate, whom they desire, in spite of the message.[78]

9. Meaning of 'Without Prejudice to the Generality of the Provisions of Sub-section (1)'

Section 171C is enacted in 3 parts. The first sub-section contains the definition of undue inference, which is in wide terms and renders a person voluntarily interfering or attempting to interfere with the free exercise of any electoral right guilty of committing undue influence. That this is very wide is indicated by the opening sentence of sub-s (2), i.e., 'without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of sub-s (1)'. It is well settled that, when this expression is used, anything contained in the provisions following this expression, is not intended to cut down the generality of the meaning of the preceding provision.[79]

It follows from this that we have to look at sub-s (1) as it is, without restricting its provisions by what is contained in sub-s (2). Sub-section (3) throws a great deal of light on this question.[80] In the above case, the judge observed:

> At what stage would a declaration of public policy or a promise of public action act tend to interfere? Surely only at the stage when a voter is trying to make up his mind as to which candidate he would support. If a declaration of public policy or a promise of public action appeals to him, his mind would decide in favour of the candidate who is propounding the public policy or promising a public action. Having made up his mind he would then go and vote and the declaration of public policy having had its effect it would no longer have any effect on the physical final act of casting his vote.[81]

10. Sub-section (2)--Mere Canvassing does not Amount to Undue Influence

Sub-section (2) of this section shows what the nature of undue influence is; it does not cut down the generality of the provisions contained in sub-s (1). What is contained in sub-s (2) of s 171C is merely illustrative. It is difficult to lay down in general terms where mere canvassing ends and interference or attempt at interference with the free exercise of any electoral right begins. That is a matter to be determined in each case; but there can be no doubt that if what is done is merely canvassing, it would not be undue influence. As sub-s (3) of s 171C shows, the mere exercise of a legal right without intent to interfere with an electoral right would not be undue influence.[82]

11. Sub-section (3)

Sub-section (3) proceeds on the assumption that a declaration of public policy or a promise of public action or the mere exercise of a legal right can interfere with an electoral right, and therefore, it provides that if there is no intention to interfere with the electoral right, it shall not be deemed to be interference within the meaning of this section.[83] The expression 'free exercise of any electoral right' is to be kept in mind while interpreting sub-s (3).

Sub-section (3) further proceeds on the basis that the expression 'free exercise of his electoral right' does not mean that a voter is not to be influenced. This expression has to be read in the context of an election in democratic means. Candidates may propound their programmes, policies and views on various questions which are exercising the minds of the electors. This exercise of the right by a candidate or his supporters to canvass support does not interfere or attempt to interfere with the free exercise of the electoral right. What does, however, attempt to interfere with the free exercise of an electoral right is, if we may use the expression, 'tyranny over the mind'.[84] As sub-s (3) of s 171C shows, the mere exercise of a legal right, without intent to interfere with an electoral right, would not be undue influence.[85]

It is open to ministers to canvass for the candidates to their party standing for election. Such canvassing does not amount to undue influence. It is only where a minister abuses his position as such and goes beyond merely asking for support for the candidates belonging to his party, then a question of undue influence may arise.[86]

The statements that M made promises to the voters about non-recovery of bank dues, removal of taxes and the repealing of some laws in no sense embody any allegation of undue influence. They are only statements which are generally made at election time by candidates boosting up their programme and achievements and running down the policies and failures of the opponents. Such declarations do not amount to exercise of undue influence on the part of the declarant.[87]1221

The Himachal Pradesh High Court, in Dr YS Parmar v Hira Singh Pal & Anor ,[88] approved the following observations made by the Election Tribunal Bangalore in Linga Gounda v Shivananjappa: [89]

> A leader of a political party is entitled to declare to the public the policy of the party, and ask the electorate to vote for his party without interfering with any electoral right and such declarations on his part would not amount to undue influence under s 123(2) . The fact that he happens to be a Minister or Chief Minister of the state would not deprive him of this right.

12. Threat of Injury

Where a day before the election, the complainant, a candidate for election, was prevented from coming out of his house and going to the voters by his rival candidate and the latter's supporters who were picketing the former's house, it was held that the accused, the rival candidate, was not guilty of the offence under this section as he could not be said to have interfered or attempted to interfere with the free exercise of an electoral right or threatened any candidate or voter with injury of any kind.[90] Where it was averred that one of the candidates seated in an easy chair was remarking, as the voters were proceeding, that gosha women need not vote and that the better thing for them would be to remain at home and that his own wife remained at home, it was held that there was neither a threat to any candidate or any voter with an injury of any kind nor an attempt to induce a belief in the voter that he would be rendered the object of divine displeasure.[91]

13. Appeal to Religion and Community

If a political party is criticised on the ground that it has a communal outlook and that its policy is to suppress the members of another community, for example, the Jan Sangha or the Muslim League, and if it is stated that people should not vote for any of these communal organisations because the essential policy of these organisations is to further the ends of the Hindus or the Muslims at the cost of the members of the other community, the appeal in such cases would be to the members of the Hindu or the Muslim community, but it would not be on the ground of religion or community, but on the ground of the wrong policy of the particular organisation. This would be a criticism, of a policy of the organisation and not an appeal to vote or to refrain from voting on the ground of religion or community. If the legislature really meant to prohibit an appeal to a community, it could easily have said so, instead of saying 'on the ground of religion'.[92] A religious leader has the right to freely express his opinion on the comparative merits of the contesting candidates and to canvass for such of them as he considers worthy of the confidence of the electors. In other words, the religious leader has a right to exercise his influence in favour of any particular candidate by voting for him and by canvassing votes of others for him. Such a course of conduct on his part will only be a use of his great influence amongst a particular section of the voters in the constituency; but it will amount to an abuse of his great influence if the words he uses in a document, or utters in his speeches, leave no choice to the persons addressed by him in the exercise of their electoral rights. If the 1222religious head had said that he preferred the appellant to the other candidate because, in his opinion, he was more worthy of the confidence of the electors for certain reasons, good, bad or indifferent, and addressed words to that effect to persons who were amenable to his influence, he would be within his rights and his influence, however great, could not be said to have been misused. However, if the religious leader practically leaves no free choice to the electors, not only by issuing in writing the hukam or farman, but also by his speeches, to the effect that they must vote for the candidate, implying that disobedience of his mandate would carry divine displeasure or spiritual censure, the case is clearly brought within the purview of the second paragraph of the proviso to s 123(2) of the Representation of the People Act, and within the mischief of this section.[93]

14. Corrupt Practice under Section 123, Representation of the People Act 1951 may not be Offence Under this Section

A corrupt practice under s 123 of the Representation of the People Act 1951, may or may not be an offence under this chapter. The Rajas of Puri have been associated with the management of the Temple of Lord Jagannath and the Raja of Puri is venerated as Chalantika Bishnu (movable Bishnu as distinct from the immovable deity inside the shrine) by a large majority of Oriyas. Lord Jagannath is not only the national deity of Orissa but he also occupies a unique position throughout India. Hence as the Adya Sevak of the Lord, as his moving representative, the Raja of Puri is undoubtedly held in great veneration. In a case, a brother of the Raja being a candidate for election to the Orissa Legislative Assembly, it was alleged that he and his agents informed the voters that as he was Chalanti Vishnu and as such a representative of Lord Jagannath himself, any person who did not vote for him would be a sinner against the Lord and the Hindu religion and that he would be committing sacrilege to the deity. It was held that such a propaganda would come within the scope of the second proviso to sub-s (2) of s 123 of the Representation of the People Act 1951 and that it would also amount to an election offence under s 171F read with s 171C of the Code. It was further held that appealing to the voters to vote for him saying that he was the crown jewel amongst them, and using a religious symbol, namely Nila Chakra of Lord Jagannath and asking them to vote for him as he was the moving representative of Lord Jagannath would come within the scope of s 123(3) of the Representation of the People Act 1951, but would not amount to an offence under this section.[94]

Chapter IXA

Of Offences Relating to Elections

[95][S. 171D.

Personation at elections.--

Whoever at an election applies for a voting paper or votes in the name of any other person, whether living or dead, or in a fictitious name, or who having voted once at such election applies at the same election for a voting paper in his own name, and whoever abets, procures or attempts to procure the voting by any person in any such way, commits the offence of personation at an election]:

[96][Provided that nothing in this section shall apply to a person who has been authorised to vote as proxy for an elector under any law for the time being in force in so far as he votes as a proxy for such elector.]1223

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

The proviso to the section was inserted by Act 24 of 2003, vide its s 5 and became effective from 22 September 2003.

2. Scope

This section defines the offence of personation at election and s 171F, prescribes the punishment for the offence. The definition of 'personation' closely follows the definition in s 24 of the Ballot Act 1872 of England and covers both a person who attempts to vote in another person's name or in a fictitious name, a voter who attempts to vote twice, and any person who abets, procures or attempts to procure such voting.[1]

3. Analogous Law

'Personation' at election is defined in s 24 of the (English) Ballot Act 1872,[2] as follows:

> A person shall, for all purposes of the laws relating to parliamentary and municipal elections, be deemed to be guilty of the offence of personation who, at an election for a country or borough, or at municipal election, applies for a ballot paper in the name of some other person, whether that name be that of a person living or dead, or of a fictitious person, or who having voted once at any such election, applies at the same election for a ballot paper in his own name.

By the (English) Representation of the People Act 1949 (12, 13 & 14 Geo 6, c 68), s 47 :

A person shall be deemed to be guilty of personation at a parliament or local government election if he:

(a) votes in person or by post as some other persons, whether as an elector or as proxy, and whether that other person is living or dead or is a fictitious person; or
(b) votes in person or by post as proxy:
  (i) for a person whom he knows or has reasonable grounds for supposing to be dead or to be a fictitious person; or
  (ii) when he knows or has reasonable grounds for supposing that his appointment as proxy is no longer in force.1224

For the purposes of this section, a person who has applied for a ballot paper for the purpose of voting in person or who has marked, whether validly or not, and returned a ballot paper issued for the purpose of voting by post, shall be deemed to have voted.

4. Essence of the Offence

The essence of the offence of false personation is that the offender pretends to be other than what he really is. The gist of the offence being false personation, the section does not come into play when the voter himself does not put the cross-mark against the name of any of the candidates, but permits the candidates or their agents to do so, and the candidate or his agent does not claim to be the voter himself when he makes a cross-mark against any name.[3]

5. 'Applies for' Interpretation--Presumption Under Section 114 Evidence Act

The indictee must have applied for a ballot paper. Only voting takes place inside the booth and a person who enters the booth against whom an allegation is raised that he had applied for the voting paper, must certainly be saddled with the responsibility at least under s 114 of the Evidence Act to explain why he entered the polling booth and for what purpose. If he hands over a slip showing the name of a voter other than himself the irresistible inference to a prudent mind can only be that he was applying for voting paper in the name of such person. Courts cannot be oblivious to life and real life situations while appreciating oral evidence. Section 114 of the Evidence Act permits and mandates courts to draw reasonable inferences based on their experience of men and matters in life.[4]

6. 'Applies for a Voting Paper'--Meaning of

The procedure for voting is as follows: the voter goes to an officer who issues what are known as 'signature slips'. He has to state, or in some other way indicate to that officer, who he is. On ascertaining that the applicant is a real voter, the officer, in whose charge the signature slips are, issues one to the applicant. The applicant then signs the signature slip, and on the strength of that signature slip, obtains a voting paper. It is the application for a voting paper by a wrong person that has been made punishable under s 171F of the Code.[5] Where the accused is charged of personation at an election, the first element to be proved by the prosecution is that he had applied for a voting paper at the election in question. So long as the voter does not approach the polling officer for the purpose of getting the ballot paper, it cannot be said that he applied for a voting paper. The mere obtaining of an identity slip, or an attempt to obtain it, is not enough.[6]

In Reg v Parrick Fox ,[7] a person applied for a ballot paper in a name which appeared on the register of voters' list and which was inserted therein by the overseers in the belief that it was the name of the applicant; was consequently held as not guilty of the offence of personation.1225

Where in a municipal electoral roll the name of Mahommad Din, son of Faqir Mohammad, was recorded as a person entitled to vote, and the accused, whose name also was Mahommad Din but whose father's name was Abdulla, asked for a ballot paper saying the he was Mohammad Din, son of Faqir Mahommad, it was held that he was guilty of the offence of personation under this section.[8]

The indictee had applied for a ballot paper. Only voting takes place inside the booth and a person who enters the booth against whom an allegation is raised that he had applied for the voting paper, must certainly be saddled with the responsibility at least under s 114 of the Evidence Act to explain why he entered the polling booth and fo what purpose. If he hands over a slip showing the name of a voter other than himself the irresistible inference to a prudent mind can only be that he was applying for voting paper in the name of such person. Courts cannot be oblivious to life and real life situations while appreciating oral evidence. Section 114 of the Evidence Act permits and mandates courts to draw reasonable inferences based on their experience of men and matters in life. It would be puerile for a court to look for specific evidence of the indictee entering the polling booth and making a ceremonial declaration in writing or in words that he is applying for a voting paper. That would be an unreasonable and perverse approach to the evidence tendered. Appellant accused was convicted for offence under s 171D, IPC .[9]

Dissenting from the view taken by the Orissa High Court in State of Orissa v Gokul Barik ,[10] the Gujarat High Court in State of Gujarat v Chandulal Bhikalal [11] has held that everyone who goes to the first polling officer for checking of his name and he has not already voted, does so because he applied for a ballot paper, although the ballot paper is actually issued by the third polling officer. If he has applied for a ballot paper under a false name, he comes within the mischief of the section. This view appears to be correct.

7. When Corrupt Motive is Implied

No intention or no corrupt motive is necessary to be proved when a person goes to the polling station and applies for a ballot paper under a false name. Corrupt motive is implied by the very fact that he applies for a ballot paper under a false name.[12]

8. Double Voting

An application for a second voting paper by a person who has already voted once at the same election is an offence under this section.[13]

9. Mens Rea or Corrupt Motive, Necessity of

It is not stated in this section, or in s 24 of the (English) Ballot Act (35 & 36 Vic Ch 33) which it closely follows, that personation must be with a corrupt or any other intention. However, in the Stepney case[14] a man's name had been wrongly included 1226in the register of two divisions. He voted twice and it was admitted that he was ignorant of the law and had acted conscientiously by mistake, that he had no corrupt intention and that he had not been corruptly influenced. Denman J held:

> It is thoroughly understood in election law that, unless there be corruption, and a bad mind and intention in personating, it is not an offence. If it is done under an honest belief that the man is properly there for the purpose of voting, it is held in these cases and in other cases analogous that no offence has been committed... They are enactments which can be really only applicable to an intentionally bad act, because if a man is guilty at all he is guilty of felony, and may be imprisoned as a felon for a considerable time. To suppose that the legislature even intended to enact that man, who with perfect honesty but from a mere blunder as to his rights, gives a vote, and then (believing that he has right to do so), gives a second vote, he being on the register, on the same day, is to be deemed guilty of felony, is to impute an intention to the legislature which is absurd, though if it had said so in absolutely plain words, we must have carried it out. I do not think that that is the intention of the act; I think there is still to be added to the offence of personation a corrupt intention, and where the corrupt intention is absent, the offence of personation cannot have been committed.

The same has also been followed in Pantan Venkayya v Emperor ,[15] in which the facts were very similar.

10. Intention--Relevancy of Chapter IXA of the IPC provides for the punishment of malpractices in connection with elections and attempts to safeguard the purity of the franchise. The very idea of personation connotes knowledge of or advertence to the act of pretending to be some other person. In fact, it implies false pretence. The only intention which is to be found in the section and which is the central element requisite to a conviction is the intention to personate the election for one who is a voter.

It will thus be seen that the statute does not rule out mens rea as a constituent part of the crime and the accused cannot be found guilty of an offence under s 171D, IPC unless he is proved to have a guilty mind.[16] The word personation itself implies corruption or fraud,[17] and a person cannot be convicted under this section unless it is proved that in doing what he did he was actuated by a corrupt motive.[18]

Holding claim of a right, honestly and bona fide, is a question of fact.

11. Mistake of Law and Good Faith--Effect of

It is well settled that ignorance of law will not excuse a person from the consequence of guilt if he has the capacity to understand the law. A mistake of law, however, normally relates to a mistake as to the accused's rights under the law to do a particular act or pursue a particular course of conduct. The courts are not at all concerned with the legality or otherwise of the rights under which the accused purported to act. The only question that the courts have to decide in such cases is, whether the claim of right was honestly and bona fide held by the accused. This question will essentially be one of fact. In such cases, it is the good faith of the accused and not the right itself which requires adjudication. In this sense, a mistake 1227of law can, to a certain extent, be a defence to a criminal charge.[19] It was observed in Tolson's case,[20]that 'an honest and reasonable mistake stands in fact on the same footing as absence of the reasoning faculty, as in infancy or the perversion of that faculty as in lunacy'. It was also added that this exception of common law equally applies in the case of statutory offences unless it is excluded expressly or by necessary implication. It is now well-settled as a principle of English criminal law that as a general rule, an honest and reasonable belief in a state of facts, which, if they existed, would make the accused's act innocent, affords an excuse for doing an act which would otherwise be an offence. And in this connection, the difference between a mistake of fact and a mistake of law would not be material.[21]

12. Abetment of Personation--When it Amounts to an Offence

Under s 107, IPC 'A person abets the doing of a thing who intentionally aids by any act or illegal omission the doing of that thing'. The intention should be to aid the commission of a crime. A mere giving of an aid will not make the act an abetment of an offence if the person who gave the aid did not know that an offence was being committed or contemplated. The intention should be to aid an offence or to facilitate the commission of an offence. However, if the person who lends his support does not know, or has no reason to believe, that the act which he was aiding or supporting was by itself a criminal act, it cannot be said that he intentionally aids or facilitates the doing of the offence. In one case, the accused was a candidate at a municipal election. A person named H was a voter on the electoral roll. He was absent but in his stead some person came forward at the time of the election and professed to be H and put his thumb mark on the voting slip. The voting slip was attested by the accused, after ascertaining from the voter and his men as to who the man was. This was done to the knowledge of the polling officer. It was held that the candidate did not abet, by intentionally aiding, the commission of the offence under this section. There is an essential difference between a reckless act, for which a man may be held civilly liable, and a criminal act for which he may be punished by imprisonment or fine.[22] But in the subsequent case of Emperor v Badan Singh ,[23] where a candidate at an election, who was, according to the procedure to be followed, to identify the voters, recklessly attested the signature slip without taking care to ascertain whether the thumb-impression was that of the voter, Iqbal Ahmad J held that the candidate was only technically guilty of the offence under this section and deserved a lenient punishment, but Walsh J disagreed with him. The case being referred to a third judge, Mears CJ held that, it being found that the real voter, whether dead or alive, was not present at the polling station and that the accused candidate was not the victim of a plot, the inevitable inference was that he corruptly, wrongfully and intentionally abetted personation within the meaning of this section and deserved severe punishment.

13. 'Attempt to Obtain Voting Paper'--Meaning of

An act, to amount to an attempt, must be such that, if not prevented, it would complete the offence. The mere obtaining of a signature slip would not amount to an 1228application for a voting paper. If, therefore, a person is frustrated in getting the signature-slip, his attempt to obtain the signature would not amount to an attempt to commit the offence of fraudulently applying for a voting paper.[24] Mere approach to a polling officer for an identity slip or signature-slip may amount to some preparations for the commission of the offence, but preparation is not an attempt within the meaning of s 511, IPC .[25]

14. Courts Approach to Evidence

It would be puerile for a court to look for specific evidence of the indictee entering the polling booth and making a ceremonial declaration in writing or in words that he is applying for a voting paper. That would be an unreasonable and perverse approach to the evidence tendered and would not be the standards of an ordinarily prudent person which, law in s 3 of the Evidence Act mandates the courts to follow.[26]

15. Sentence

Where a person is found guilty for offence under s 171D, a deterrent sentence of fine can be imposed along with substantive sentence of imprisonment for a reasonable period. The accused petitioner was sentenced to undergo simple imprisonment for a period of 3 months and to pay an amount of Rs. 10,000/- as fine and in default to undergo simple imprisonment for a further period of 2 months.[27]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter IXA

Of Offences Relating to Elections

[28][S. 171E.

Punishment for bribery.--

Whoever commits the offence of bribery shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both:1230

Provided that bribery by treating shall be punished with fine only.

Explanation.--'Treating' means that form of bribery where the gratification consists in food, drink, entertainment, or provision.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section merely prescribes the punishment for the offence of bribery under s 171(B) . The punishment for bribery by 'treating' is fine only, but the punishment for other forms of bribery is imprisonment of either description for one year, or fine, or both.

2. 'Treating'--Meaning of

See notes under s 171B .

3. Procedure

The offence punishable under this section is non-cognizable and summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The offence is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by a first class magistrate. The period prescribed for the prosecution of this offence is one year.

4. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

(where the accused is the giver of the bribe)

That you, on or about the ..... day of ..... at ....., gave a gratification, to wit ..... to ....., with the object of inducing him or ..... (name the other person, if any) to exercise his electoral right (or rewarding him for having exercised his electoral right), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 171E of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

(where the accused is the acceptor of the bribe)
