That you, on or about the.....day of....., at....., accepted for yourself, or for....., a gratification, to wit....., as a reward for exercising you (or his) electoral right (or for inducing or attempting to induce.....to exercise his electoral right), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 171E of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

Where the accused is the giver of the bribe, it has to be proved that:

(a) he gave gratification to a particular person; and
(b) he did so with the object of (i) inducing him or any other person to exercise any electoral right, or (ii) rewarding any person for having exercised any such right.

Where the accused is the acceptor of the bribe, it has to be proved that:

(a) he accepted either for himself or for any other person a gratification; and
(b) he did so as a reward (i) for exercising any electoral right, or (ii) for inducing or attempting to induce any other person to exercise any such right.

Chapter IXA

Of Offences Relating to Elections

[29][S. 171F.

Punishment for undue influence or personation at an election.--

Whoever commits the offence of undue influence or personation at an election shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section prescribes the punishment for the offences of undue influence and personation at election defined in ss 171C and 171D, IPC .

In one case, a direction was given by the election commission to the chief minister, who was campaigning for himself on the date before the election, to return to the state headquarters under the threat of facing a drastic action otherwise and the chief minister was thereby prevented from exercising his franchise at a place where he was registered as a voter. No allegation of violence in the election process was reported against him. The directions, further, were passed orally without giving any reasons. It was held that the such direction violates s 171F of the IPC .[30]

2. Procedure

The procedure to be followed is the same as in the case of an offence punishable under s 171E, IPC except that the offence of personation is cognizable. The period prescribed for the prosecution of an offence under this section is one year.

Where the accused had picked up or snatched the ballot papers from the custody and possession of some public servants and they had even torn the same and in the process they used criminal force, charges under ss 171F and 353, IPC framed by a judicial magistrate against them were found in order and the petition, under s 482, CrPC, of the accused persons for quashing the FIR and the charges framed against them were dismissed.[31]

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of..... at.....voluntarily interfered (or attempted to interfere) with the free exercise of and electoral right, to wit.....(or.....threatened) .....a candidate or voter or person in whom a candidate (or voter to wit..... is interested) with injury, (to wit ..... or induced or attempted to induce) ..... a candidate (or voter) at an election, to wit ....., to believe that he or any person in whom he is interested, to wit .....(will become an object of divine displeasure or of spiritual censure) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 171F of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

The charge for the offence of personation at an election may run thus:

> That you, on or about the ..... day of ..... at the election to wit, applied for a voting paper (or voted) in the name of another person, to wit ....., who is living 1231(or dead) (or in a fictitious name, to wit .....) (or in your name after having voted once at the said election) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 171F of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

4. Proof

In the case of undue influence at an election, the prosecution has to prove:

(a) that the accused voluntarily interfered or attempted to interfere with the free exercise of any electoral right; or
(b) that the accused threatened any candidate or voter or any person in whom a candidate or voter is interested, with injury of any kind; or
(c) that the accused induced or attempted to induce a candidate or voter to believe that he or any person in whom he is interested will become or will be rendered an object of divine displeasure or of spiritual censure.

In the case of personation at an election prosecution has to prove:

(a) that at an election the accused applied for a voting paper or voted in the name of any other person, whether living or dead, or in a fictitious name; or
(b) that the accused having voted once at an election applied at the same election for a voting paper in his own name; or
(c) that the accused abetted, procured or attempted to procure, the voting by any person in any one of the above ways.

5. Sentence

The pride of India is that its democratic structure has been maintained without any major dent from the date of its independence in 1947. While democracy has floundered all around in the neighbourhood, the Indian democracy has lived and survived all along though not ideally. Any attempt to undermine the democratic process must be frowned upon in unmistakable terms. There can be no place for misuse or abuse of the right to vote in a democracy. The abhorrence of the enlightened polity to the crime must be expressed by the sentence imposed by the court. The length of the period which the offender spends behind the bars need not be reckoned as vitally relevant. A deterrent sentence of fine can be imposed along with substantive sentence of imprisonment for a reasonable period.[32]

Personation in elections, that is, recording votes in elections under a false name is a serious offence and fine is not an adequate punishment.[33]

Chapter IXA

[34][S. 171G.

False statement in connection with an election.--

Whoever with intent to affect the result of an election makes or publishes any statement purporting to be a statement of fact which is false and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, in relation to the personal character or conduct of any candidate shall be punished with fine.]1232

Comments

1. Scope

The offence defined in this section is the making of a false statement in relation to the personal character or conduct of a candidate at an election. This offence may be committed by any person or association, whether corporate or incorporate. The section does not apply to defamatory statements about persons who are not candidates[35] at an election.

2. Analogous Law

This section, which penalises false statements of fact in relation to the personal character and conduct of a candidate for election, corresponds to s 1 of the (English) Corrupt and Illegal Practices Act 1895.[36] The acknowledgement of this fact has been made in the Statement of Objects and Reasons.[37]

This corrupt practice is defined in s 123(4) of our Representation of the People Act 1951, as follows:

> The publication by a candidate or his agent, or by any other person with the consent of a candidate or his election agent, of any statement of fact which is false, and which he either believes to be false or does not believe to be true, in relation to the personal character or conduct of any candidate, or in relation to the candidature or withdrawal of any candidate, being a statement reasonably calculated to prejudice the prospects of that candidate's election.

3. Section 171G Distinguished from Section 171C

It is the degree of gravity of the allegation which will be the determining factor in deciding whether the offence falls under s 171C, IPC or this section. If the allegation, though false and relating to a candidate's personal character and conduct, made with the intent to affect the result of an election, does not amount to interference or an attempt to interfere, the offence would be the lesser one. If, on the other hand, it amounts to interference, or an attempt to interfere, it would be the graver offence

under s 171F, IPC read with s 171C .[38]

4. Distinction between Defamation (Section 499A) and Offence under Section 171G

This section, leaving aside the clause 'with intent to affect the results of an election', does not follow the language used in s 499, IPC or refer to the offence of defamation, 1233but uses a special language of its own with the result that there may be cases under this section which do not fall under s 499 and vice versa. This section is not a species of the more general offence of defamation or is carved out of s 499 . It cannot, therefore, be said that a complainant should proceed against the offender under s 171G and not under s 500 .[39]

The offence under ss 171G and 500 are separate and distinct, the ingredients of an offence under s 171G being different from those of an offence under s 500 . The main distinction between the two sections is that under s 171G, the allegations must be false whereas under s 499 even if the allegations are true, the complaint for defamation will lie unless the person, who makes such defamation, comes under any one of the exceptions. Section 499 covers a wider field. In a prosecution under s 171G if the accused is able to show that the allegations made by him are true, the matter ends there. However, in a prosecution under s 500, even if the accused contends that his statement is true, it may not be a full defence for him unless he comes under any one of the exceptions.[40]

5. Statement of Fact--Meaning of

It is not apparent why the legislature should have thought fit to use the words 'any statement purporting to be a statement of fact', but what was intended doubtless was 'any statement which is made as a statement of fact' and that comes to much the same thing as is conveyed by the English statute. One thing at any rate is clear, that something must be stated as a fact and not as a general imputation or as a matter of opinion.[41] General charges of misconduct are not statements of fact within the meaning of s 171G, IPC, and though one of the statements may be construed as a statement of fact when the other statement was a general imputation of misconduct unaccompanied by any charge of particular acts, not amounting to a statement of fact, this would not fall under s 171G .[42] This section would not be contravened where the statement was a statement not of a fact, but merely of an opinion unless the expression of the opinion was supported by instances. Such reference must not be merely inferential.[43]

6. Question to be Decided on the Facts of Each Case

The question whether a particular statement with respect to a candidate at an election is a statement of fact or is a mere expression of opinion, would depend on the facts of each case and will have to be judged on the circumstances in which the statement was made and in the context of the writing in which it appears, in case it is part of a writing.[44]1234

7. 'In Relation to the Personal Character or Conduct of any Candidate'--Meaning of

The statement must relate to the personal character or conduct of a candidate. The publication by one of the contestants to an election that the other contestant is a leper, knowing it to be untrue with the mala fide intention of injuring the latter's reputation and humiliating him before the public, does not constitute an offence under this section.[45]

8. Freedom of Speech--Limits of

In the language of Parker's Election Agent and Returning Officer, there is no special privilege attached to speeches made during an election. A speaker has full freedom of speech on matters of public interest and general concern. He may express his honest opinion, however adverse, of the policy or public conduct of any public man, and his comments, if uttered fairly with an honest purpose and not maliciously, are not actionable even though they may affect the reputation of some individuals. The mere fact that his opponent is also a candidate for election to the parliament does not give the speaker a right to discuss all his private life and history.

9. Privileged Comments

Unless a speaker is in a position to show that he had a good reason, such as would convince a man of an ordinary common sense to believe in the truth of the statement he proposes to make, such statement had better be left unsaid. The political address or the public career or speeches of his rival are fair subjects for bona fide discussion and unfavourable comments are privileged. He should not, however, allude to the private life or circumstances of any candidate. He should always bear in mind the distinction between criticism and an allegation of fact.

It is one thing to comment upon or criticise, even with severity, the acknowledged or proven acts of a public man and quite another to assert that he has been guilty of some particular acts of misconduct.46

10. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence punishable under s 171E . See notes thereunder. The limitation prescribed for the prosecution of this offence is six months only.

11. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the .....day of .....at..... with intent to affect the result of the election, to wit.....made (or published) a statement in relation to the personal character (or conduct) of a candidate, to wit ..... which statement is false 1235and which you knew (or believed) to be false (or which you did not believe to be true) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 171G of the Indian Penal Code .
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

12. Proof

For an offence under this section, the points required to be proved are:

(a) that an election was impending;
(b) that the accused made or published a statement;
(c) that it purported to be a statement of fact;
(d) that it is related to the personal conduct or character of a candidate;
(e) that he published it with an intent to prejudice his election; and
(f) that it was false or that the accused had no reasonable grounds for believing it to be true.[47]

Illegal payments in connection with an election.--

Whoever without the general or special authority in writing of a candidate incurs or authorises expenses on account of the holding of any public meeting, or upon any advertisement, circular or publication, or in any other way whatsoever for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of such candidate shall be punished with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees:

Provided that if any person having incurred any such expenses not exceeding the amount of ten rupees without authority obtains within ten days from the date on which such expenses were incurred the approval in writing of the candidate, he shall be deemed to have incurred such expenses with the authority of the candidate.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section makes it an offence to incur unauthorised expenses in connection with an election. Under the proviso, expenses to the extent of Rs 10 may be incurred without previous authority, but subject to subsequent ratification by the candidate within 10 days.

2. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence punishable under s 171E, IPC . The period of limitation prescribed for this offence is six months only.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and the office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you without the general (or special) authority in writing of .....on or about .....incurred (or authorised) expenses on account of the holding of a public meeting at.....or upon an advertisement, circular or publication, exhibit v, (or in any other way whatsoever), for the purpose of promoting (or procuring) the election of.....and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 171H of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

Comments

1. Scope

This section penalises the failure to keep accounts of election expenses as required by law.

With reference to the elections to the house of the people and to the legislative assembly of a state, this section has to be read with s 77 of the Representation of the People Act 1951, which provides that every candidate at an election shall, either by himself or by his election agent, keep a separate and correct account of all expenditure in connection with the election incurred or authorised by him or his election agent from the date of nomination to the date of declaration of the result in the manner prescribed.

2. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence punishable under s 171E . The prescribed period of limitation for prosecution under this offence is six months only.

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 172.

Absconding to avoid service of summons or other proceeding.--

Whoever absconds in order to avoid being served with a summons, notice or order proceeding from any public servant, legally competent, as such public servant, to issue such summons, notice or order, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both;

or, if the summons or notice or order is to attend in person or by agent, or to [4][produce a document or an electronic record in a Court of Justice], with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

The words 'produce a document or an electronic record in a Court of Justice' were substituted by Information Technology Act 2000, s 91 and Sch I, for 'produce a document in a Court of Justice.'

2. Scope

Sections 172, 173 and 174 of this chapter all relate to a summons, notice or order lawfully issued by a public servant. Section 172 punishes absconding to avoid service, s 173 punishes preventing service, and s 174 punishes non-obedience to a summons, notice or order. The object of this section is to punish an offender for the contempt his conduct indicates of the authority whose process he disregards. In order to prove the commission of the offence, it must be shown that a summons, notice, or order has been issued. A person cannot evade a direction which has not been given. There must have been an exercise of the authority of the court or officer competent to issue the mandatory process before there can be a contempt of that authority. It is not, therefore, sufficient to show that a person apprehending that a process will be issued has absconded. He may do so in the hope that his absence will deter the court or officer from issuing the process, and he would not be guilty of the offence contemplated by this section.[5] This section can apply only if a summons, notice or order is to be served on the accused, who absconded with a view to evading its service. It is doubtful, to say the least of it, if an order that information of the date fixed for a case be given to a party is such an order as is contemplated by this section. 1240The section is not applicable, unless summons, notice or order which was to be served on the accused was, in fact, in existence and capable of being served.[6]

There is nothing in s 98, CrPC, which requires service of an order under that section, for restoration of a woman unlawfully detained to her liberty, to be served on any person. The order is one capable of execution, and the section lays down that the magistrate may compel compliance with such order using such force as may be necessary. Once an order under s 98, CrPC, has been passed, it is open to the magistrate to use all lawful means to have the woman restored to her liberty. It is conceivable that, for that end, he may legally issue an appropriate direction to some other person in whose custody the woman may be. When such a direction is not given to an accused, nor was it intended by the district magistrate that any order should be served upon him for compliance with its terms, then the accused, if he absconds, does not commit an offence under s 172, IPC .[7]

3. Analogous Law

This section is analogous to s 4 of Regulation 11 of 1796, which it substantially reproduces.

4. Essentials to Constitute an Offence under this Section

To constitute an offence under this section two things are essential:

(a) A summons, notice or order proceeding from a public servant legally competent to issue it.
(b) Absconding in order to avoid being served with the summons, notice or order.

5. Role of Police for Efficient Criminal Justice Delivery System

Police officers are duty bound and they are expected to be diligent in serving the summons on the witnesses so as to enable the criminal courts to effectively discharge their duties. It is highly essential for the proper and effective functioning of the concerned criminal courts. The important role to be played by the police wing and the investigating agency in the administration of criminal justice delivery system needs no emphasis at the hands of this court. Service of summons on witnesses and prompt attendance thereof is an essential facet of criminal justice delivery system. Criminal justice delivery system to function efficiently needs effective coordinative and cooperative gesture of the investigating agencies inclusive of the police wing. Several of the aspects like service of summons on witnesses, prompt attendance of the ordinary witnesses, official witnesses, police officers, experts, judicial magistrates and the like, the execution of warrants in all promptness are a few which may be mentioned in this context. The said list is only illustrative, but not exhaustive. Giving less priority to these duties by the concerned executive wing is to be deprecated since it will tell upon the functioning of the very system itself. The separation of judiciary from the executive is not to operate as an obstacle for the 1241effective functioning of the system. Better co-ordination is essential for better governance and better judicial administration as well.[8]

6. Second Part

The second part of the section applies only where the summons, notice or order is (a) for attendance in court or (b) for production of a document in a court of justice.

7. Non-appearance and Non-production of Property

This section makes absconding of a person, in order to evade from being served with a summons or notice, an offence and does not make non-appearance of a person served with a summons or notice an offence.[9]

Where, however, certain movable property attached in execution of a decree was placed in charge of the accused, and he evaded service of a notice to produce the property, and the property was not produced for sale, it was held that he was guilty of the offence under this section and not under s 406 .[10]

8. 'Whoever'

The use of the word 'whoever', in this section implies that the operation of the section is not confined to parties but extends also to witnesses.[11]

9. 'Absconds'

To abscond is to retire from pubic view, to take oneself off, to decamp, to go out of the way.[12] According to the Concise Oxford Dictionary, 1985 'abscond' means to depart secretly or flee from the law. However, the term 'abscond' is not to be understood as implying necessarily that a person leaves the place in which he is. Its etymological and its ordinary sense is to hide oneself; and it matters not whether a person departs from a place or remains in it, if he conceals himself; nor does the term apply only to the commencement of the concealment. If a person, having concealed himself before process issues, continues to do so after it has been issued, he absconds.[13]

10. 'In Order to Avoid Being Served'

The section declares a person to be liable to punishment if he has absconded 'in order to avoid' service. The absconding must be with a purpose. This implies that the absconder knows, or at least has reason to believe, that the process has issued. He may abscond to avoid the issue of process, but this would not be an offence punishable under this section. When he knows or has reason to believe that it has issued, he may be unwilling to show contempt of the authority of the court or officer who has issued it, and may comply with it, or so conduct himself that service may be effected; but he can hardly be said to be guilty of contempt of authority if he does not know, and has no reason to believe that the authority has been exercised, nor to be absconding to prevent the service of a process, if he does not know, nor has reason to 1242believe, that it has issued.[14] This implies that a summons, notice or order has been issued, for absconding in order to avoid a summons which has not been issued, is no offence under this section.[15]

The statement of a magistrate that a summons might issue has been held equivalent to its actual issue.[16]

11. 'With a Summons, Notice or Order'

Sections 61 - 68 of the CrPC lay down the rules as to issue and mode of service of summons under that Code. Orders 5 and 16 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908, lay down the rules as to issue and service of summons under that Code.

The provisions of this section do not cover the absconding from a warrant of arrest. A warrant addressed to a police officer to apprehend an offender and to bring him before the magistrate is not a 'summons, notice, or order' within the meaning of this section, and the offence of absconding by an offender against whom a warrant has been so issued is not punishable under it.[17]

12. 'Public Servant'

Section 21,ante, and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

13. 'Legally Competent' to issue such Summons, etc

The liability of the accused under this section and ss 173 - 174, IPC depends upon the legal competence of the public servant to issue the summons, etc.[18] Where a duty is imposed on a public officer to superintend and control other public servants, authority to inquire into misconduct imputed to such servants in the discharge of their official duties is implied. If a public officer has authority to hold an inquiry, he has also authority to summon witnesses.[19]

14. 'Document'

Section 29,ante and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

15. 'Court of Justice'

Section 20,ante and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

The word 'court' used in this section has, however, a wider meaning than a 'Court of Justice' and it includes a tribunal empowered to deal with a particular matter and authorised to receive evidence thereon.[20]1243

16. Procedure

The offence is non-cognizable and summons should ordinarily be issued in the first instance. The offence is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by any magistrate. It may also be tried summarily. An offender committing an offence under this section can be prosecuted within one year of the offence subject to the provisions of Chapter 36 of the Code of Criminal Procedure Code 1973.

17. Complaint of Public Servant Concerned, Necessary

Under s 195(1)(a), CrPC no court shall take cognizance of an offence punishable under ss 172 - 188, IPC, or of any abetment of, or attempt to commit, such offence, or of any criminal conspiracy to commit such offence except on the complaint of the public servant concerned or of some public servant to whom he is administratively subordinate. The provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1973 inter alia, s 190 et seq, including s 195 must be strictly followed in such cases.[21]

A complaint directly made by a public servant mentioned therein is quite as sufficient as his sanction.[22]

18. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you (*) on or about the ..... day of ..... at....., absconded to avoid service of summons (or notice or order) proceeding from..... (name of the public servant and his office or of the court of justice) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 172 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

19. Proof

To establish an offence under this section it has to be proved:

(i) That the process in question was a summons, notice or order.
(ii) That the same was issued by a public servant.
(iii) That such public servant was legally competent as such to issue it.
(iv) That such process was issued in order to be served on the accused.
(v) That the accused absconded in order to avoid being served with such process.

For the second clause of the section, it has to be proved further:

(i) That the process required the attendance of the accused (either personally or by his agent) or required the production of a document by him either personally or by his agent.
(ii) That such attendance or production was to be in a court of justice. 1244

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 173.

Preventing service of summons or other proceeding, or preventing publication thereof.--

Whoever in any manner intentionally prevents the serving on himself, or on any other person, of any summons, notice or order proceeding from any public servant legally competent, as such public servant, to issue such summons, notice or order, or intentionally prevents the lawful affixing to any place of any such summons, notice or order, or intentionally removes any such summons, notice or order from any place to which it is lawfully affixed, or intentionally prevents the lawful making of any proclamation, under the authority of any public servant legally competent, as such public servant, to direct such proclamation to be made,

shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both,

or, if the summons, notice, order or proclamation is to attend in person, or by agent, or [23][to produce a document or an electronic record in a Court of Justice], with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

The words 'to produce a document or an electronic record in a Court of Justice' are substituted by the Information Technology Act 2000, s 91 and Sch I, for 'produce a document in a Court of Justice.'

2. Scope

The first part of this section speaks of four offences thereunder:

(a) the prevention of service of a summons, notice or order;
(b) the prevention of the lawful affixing, to any place, of such summons, etc.;
(c) the removing of such summons etc., after it has been affixed; and

(d) the prevention of the lawful making of any proclamation.

In all of them the intention of the offender and the lawful authority of the public servant to issue the process are essential pre-requisites. The offender is liable for simple imprisonment of one month or fine upto Rs 500 or with both. The gravity of offence as per second part of the section increases if the summons, notice or proclamation order is for attending or producing documents or electronic record in a court of justice. In the latter case, the offender is liable to be punished by simple imprisonment of upto 6 months or with fine of upto as Rs 1000 or with both. 1245

3. Preventing Service

Both under the Code of Civil Procedure[24] and the Code of Criminal Procedure[25] a summons may be served by delivering or tendering a copy of the same to the person concerned.

Section 62, CrPC, provides that the summons shall, if practicable, be served personally on the person summoned, by delivering or tendering to him, one of the duplicates of the summons, and that every person on whom a summons is so served shall, if so required by the serving officer, sign a receipt therefor on the back of the other duplicate.

Considering that tender itself amounts to service and delivery is not necessary, it has been held in several cases that a refusal to accept a summons, when tendered, does not amount to intentionally preventing service of summons. What seems to be required under this section is some act of opposition offered to the officer serving the process.[26] However, in Budha v Emperor ,[27] Walsh J, held that a tender, to be sufficient service must be a real tender of a document which is understood by the person to be served, and he must have voluntarily waived actual delivery and indicated in some way that a tender was sufficient, and that a man, who gets away from the serving officer with the obvious intention of not allowing him to hold any communication with him at all and shuts himself in his house, is intentionally preventing service either by tender or by delivery. The act of throwing down a summons which has actually been served on the accused, does not amount to a prevention of service within the meaning of the section.[28]

4. Refusal to Sign Receipt for Summons

It has been held in a number of cases that a refusal to sign a receipt for a summons, i.e., a refusal to sign and return the duplicate as required by s 62(3) of the Code of Criminal Proceddure 1973 is not an act which prevents the service of the summons within the meaning of this section.[29]

A refusal to serve as a special constable, when ordered to do so, is no offence under this section and proceedings taken under this section for such refusal are bad in law and should be quashed.[30]1246

5. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under s 172, IPC . The limitation prescribed for this offence is also one year.

6. Complaint

Complaint of the public servant concerned necessary. Synopsis notes under s 172 may be referred to.

7. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(i) the process in question was a summons, notice or order or a proclamation;
(ii) it was issued by a public servant;
(iii) he had authority to issue it;
(iv) if a summons, notice or order, it was issued for service on someone;
(v) the accused knew it;
(vi) he either prevented its service or removed it from any place to which it has been lawfully affixed; or that he prevented the making of the proclamation; and
(vii) he did so intentionally.

The following aggravating facts where applicable, may be added:

(i) that the process of proclamation required the attendance of the accused either in person or by an agent, or the production of a document or electronic record; and
(ii) that such process or proclamation was to attend or to produce the document or electronic record in a court of justice.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 174.

Non-attendance in obedience to an order from public servant.--

Whoever, being legally bound to attend in person or by an agent at a certain place and time in obedience to a summons, notice, order or proclamation proceeding from any public servant legally competent, as such public servant, to issue the same, intentionally omits to attend at that place or time, or departs from the place where he is bound to attend before the time at which it is lawful for him to depart, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both,

or, if the summons, notice, order or proclamation is to attend in person or by agent in a Court of Justice, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

By Adaptation of Laws Order 1950, the words in illust (a) 'Supreme Court', and by the same enactment, in illust (b), the words 'District Judge' were substituted for the words 'Zila Judge'.

2. Scope

There are two offences under this section: (i) Non-attendance in obedience to a summons, notice, order or proclamation proceeding from a public servant legally competent to issue the same; and (ii) departure before the time when it is lawful to depart.

In either case, the section requires the following three conditions to be fulfilled:

(i) A summons, notice, order or proclamation for attendance must be issued by a public servant who was legally competent to issue the same.

(ii) The person summoned must be legally bound to attend at a certain place and time in answer to the summons, notice, order or proclamation.

(iii) The person summoned must have in the first case: (a) intentionally omitted to attend at that place and time, or in the second case, (b) departed from the place before the time at which it was lawful for him to depart.[34]

In order to sustain a conviction under s 174, IPC, it must be shown that the summons issued was issued by a public servant legally competent as such public servant to issue the same, and the accused intentionally omitted to attend in pursuance of the summons.[35]1248

The word 'whoever', as used in s 174, IPC, is wide enough to cover any party to a proceeding as well as a witness.[36]

4. 'Summons, Notice, Order or Proclamation'

A citation to appear, issued to a person, who is in arrears of revenue, under s 147, Land Revenue Act (UP Act 3 of 1901) is not a 'summons, notice or order' which the recipient is legally bound to obey, and a person is not guilty of the offence under this section if he fails to comply with it.[37]

Where the citation was issued on 25 February and it was not served till 10 March 1927, at 5:00 pm, and called on the accused to be present at noon on 11 March 'in case the entire arrears... are not paid very soon' no conviction under s 174, IPC could possibly stand.[38] For a proclamation requiring appearance before a court, refer to s 82, Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.

The summons, etc., contemplated by the section are those which have been issued according to law. Failure to comply with summons, issued in proceedings, which are themselves illegal is not an offence under this section.[39]

A warrant is not a 'summons, notice or order' and this section does not apply to an escape from custody under a warrant in execution of the decree of a civil court.[40]

A person disobeying a coroner's summons under s 17 of the Coroners Act 1871 (Act 4 of 1871), is guilty of an offence under ss 174 or 175, IPC, as the case may be.

5. Summons, etc, must be Mandatory and not Optional

Summons may be issued to a party or to a witness or to a party who is sought to be examined in the case as a witness. The object may be to give notice to a party of some suit, application or other proceeding. In such a case, the party is not bound to appear in court although his non-appearance may entail the consequence of an ex parte order against him.[41] Again, the object may be to compel his appearance in court to give evidence. In such a case, he is legally bound to appear in court and he cannot be allowed to contumaciously withhold his appearance. A summons to a witness is a process of mandatory character. In a civil suit, the court has summary powers to proceed against him and pass orders under O 16, r 12, CPC. Such summary powers have now been conferred on criminal courts as well under s 350 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973. The cases of deliberate disobedience of summons are rare. Whether a party or a witness was bound to appear in a proceeding has to be determined by a reference to the nature of the proceeding and the provision of the particular statute under which he is served with the notice. 1249

6. Section not Applicable when Appearance is Optional

Section 201, UP Land Revenue Act 1901, provides that no ex parte order or order by default shall be set aside without a notice of the application to the opposite party. This section is analogous to O 9, r 14, CPC. Here the notice served to a party is not for personal appearance. It is a matter of his option to appear or not to appear, but non-appearance exposes him to certain legal consequences. It may be conceded that the party served with notice in these cases is not legally bound to appear.[42]

7. Form and Contents of Summons--Time and Place

Summons should be clear and specific in their terms as to the title of the court, the place at which the day, and the time of the day when the attendance of the party summoned is required, and they should further go on to say, that such party is not to leave the court without leave, and if the case, in which he has been summoned, is adjourned without ascertaining the date of adjournment. Where a summons did not mention the place at which, or the time of the day when, the attendance of the person summoned was required, it was held that such person could not lawfully be punished under s 174,

IPC for non-attendance in obedience to such summons.[43] Before convicting a person under this section, it is necessary to prove that he had notice to appear at a certain time and place, and that he did not do so.[44] But it would be most unreasonable to serve a notice on a person at 5:00 pm one day that he was to be present with the money on the next day by noon at a distant place.[45]

A subpoena issued to a person, which did not require him to attend at a certain place, but called on him to attend wherever the officer concerned might happen to be, is not a legal subpoena, failure to comply with which one cannot be punished under this section.[46]

A summons which, although specifies the place and the day, but omits to mention the time, is a summons which is not sufficiently specific to justify a prosecution if it be not complied with. It is not necessary that in every case the exact hour at which the attendance of the person upon whom the summons is served is required should be mentioned. A summons which required a person to attend at a particular police station on a particular date between the hours of three and five in the afternoon, or 'at such time as may be convenient between the hours of 8 and 12 in the morning' would be such a summons as would render the person to whom it is addressed liable to prosecution if he failed to obey it, but the position is different when the summons omits any reference whatever to the hour of the day at which the attendance of the person on whom that summons is served is required.[47] A case cannot be adjourned by a proclamation merely,[48] but a definite verbal order is enough.[49] A summons returnable on a sundry is legal.[50] A mere verbal direction to appear before a police officer as a witness, having regard to s 160, CrPC is not sufficient.[51] The place fixed 1250for appearance must be within India. It is no offence to disobey a summons directing a person to appear at a place outside India.[52]

8. Fact Requisite for Conviction

For a conviction under this section it must be proved that the officer in question was present[53] at the place on the date, both of which must be fixed in the summons[54] and in the case of proceedings in a court, that as a fact he took up the case in question.[55]

9. Summons or Order must be Addressed to the Person Whose Presence is Required

The order in writing contemplated by the provisions of s 160, CrPC, is an order addressed to a person whose presence is required. An order given to a subordinate police officer to produce a person before the sub-inspector is not an order contemplated by the provisions of s 160, CrPC, disobedience of which could be made punishable under this section, even though the order might be brought to the notice of the person concerned. The words 'summons, notice, order or proclamation', used in this section are different forms of directions for compliance and they would not partake of the character of directions as such if they are not addressed to the persons whose attendance is required.[56]

10. Summons or Order, must have been Properly Served

In order to sustain a charge under s 174, CrPC for disobedience to a summons issued by a court, it is necessary to prove personal service of the summons in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908.[57] And, therefore, where a summons was not served personally on the defendant, but affixed to the door of his house and he failed to attend, it was held that he had committed no offence.[58] For service of summons, refer to Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, ss 62 - 69 . The mere production of a summons with an endorsement of service is not sufficient proof of service. The evidence of the serving officer is necessary.[59] A tender and refusal to accept a summons is a personal service.[60] The summons should be left with the person summoned.[61] If a case is postponed, fresh summons or notification of postponement must be served.[62] If a witness does not receive or hear of the summons till after the day named therein, he cannot be fined for non-attendance.[63] There must be evidence to show that the summons was brought to the knowledge of the accused.[64]1251

Section 66, CrPC, which prescribes a special mode of service on a government servant applies only to summons issued by a court of justice and not an order under s 160, CrPC, issued by a police officer. If such an order is personally served on an amin of the court and is disobeyed, he would be liable under this section.[65]

11. Party should be Legally Bound to Obey Summons, etc

Under this section it is necessary that the party should be legally bound to obey the summons. This obligation would, in general, follow as a necessary consequence from the competence of the officer to issue the order. But cases might arise in which there would be no such obligation. For instance, a witness, already in attendance at one court, would be under no obligation to go to a court at a distance, until he had given his evidence in the case for which he has been first cited.[66] Where the presence of the accused required before an authority issuing the summons, is optional, and not compulsory, it cannot be said that the accused is legally bound to appear.[67]

The police have not been given powers to summon witnesses during investigation in respect of proceedings under any of the chapter of Pt IV, CrPC, dealing with prevention of offences, unlike in the case of investigation of offences under ch 14, CrPC . In the absence of such powers, the petitioners can ignore the summons and the prosecution of the petitioners for the offence under s 174, IPC, cannot be sustained.[68]

12. Public Servant must be 'Legally Competent' to Issue Process

The liability of the accused under this section and ss 172 and 173, IPC depends upon the legal competence of the officer to issue the summons, etc. or to make the proclamation.[69] In order to sustain a conviction under this section it must be shown that the summons issued was issued by a public servant legally competent to issue the same, and the accused intentionally omitted to attend in pursuance of the summons.[70]

13. Public Servants not held Competent

A receiver appointed under s 56 of the Bengal Land Registration Act, 8 of 1876 is not a public servant legally competent to issue and pass order directing persons to attend before the collector with their collection papers and rent receipts, and 1252disobedience to such an order does not constitute an offence under this section or s 175 .[71] There is no law which makes non-attendance when called upon to serve as coolies, an offence, and a tahsildar acting as a magistrate is not legally competent to summon persons to appear before him and show cause why they refused to appear as coolies. They are not legally bound to obey his summons, and cannot be convicted under this section for non-attendance in obedience to the summons.[72]

A cantonment magistrate is not legally competent to require the attendance of agents of bungalows in connection with the acquisition of bungalows for military purposes, as it is not a matter connected with him as a magistrate, and disobedience of such a requisition by him is no offence under this section.[73] A tahsildar is not legally competent to issue summons for the attendance in court of persons who prepare and attest a list of cattle in the Mianwali district in order to make the revenue authorities able to distribute the revenue over wastelands, and the persons called munsifs cannot be convicted for their non-attendance under this section.[74]

Under r 44 of the rules issued by the local government in regard to the sale of ancestral land, a collector is empowered to delegate his powers only to an assistant collector of the first class. He cannot delegate his authority to an assistant collector of the second class and therefore, the latter is not legally competent to issue summons, the disobedience of which would be an offence under this section.[75]

Section 82 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 prescribes the mode of giving notice by means of a proclamation to an accused person, alleged to be absconding, to appear in court on a particular date, and the section makes it mandatory that the accused person shall be given notice of not less than thirty days' period to present himself in court, and if no such notice is given the proclamation is not a valid proclamation, and failure to appear in obedience to it is not an offence under this section.[76]

Section 160, CrPC does not provide for an order by an investigating officer to a subordinate police officer to produce a person before him. Any such order not amounting to an order of arrest under s 41, CrPC has no sanction of law behind it, and its disobedience by the person concerned to whose notice the order is brought does not become a penal offence provided under this section.[77]

Where a tahsildar is authorised to hold an inquiry and has discretion to depute a revenue inspector to conduct the inquiry, non-attendance in obedience to an order issued by the latter would be an offence under this section.[78]

14. Non-attendance must be Intentional

A conviction for non-attendance in obedience to an order from a public servant, under this section cannot be had unless the person summoned was legally bound to 1253attend, and refused or intentionally omitted to do so.[79] The word 'intentional' has not been defined in the IPC, but it means non-attendance which amounts to wilful disobedience.[80] The use of the word 'intentionally' limits the application of the section to cases where the omission is clearly wilful. It does not apply to a case where the omission arose from some circumstances which rendered it impracticable for the person to attend.[81]

15. Non-appearance when not Intentional

Where a person employed in an office was summoned to give evidence in a court and he failed to obey the summons as his superior officer did not let him go, it was held that there was no intentional omission on his part to attend the court in obedience to the summons, and he could not be held liable under this section.[82]

Non-appearance due to illness is not intentional. If a person is sufficiently incapacitated by illness as to have given up his ordinary vocations, there would be sufficient excuse for him not to attend a court in obedience to a summons.

The fact that he did not inform the court of his illness would not render him liable to punishment under this section.[83]

Where an advocate summoned to appear before a magistrate on a charge under the Motor Vehicles Act was unable to obey the summons as he was engaged in arguing a case in the High Court and sent another advocate to ask for an adjournment, it was held that he did not intend to disobey the summons and, therefore, committed no offence under this section.[84]

Where the accused summoned to appear before a settlement officer explained to the process-server his inability to be present, but the latter omitted to mention it to the officer issuing the summons, it was held that he could not be said to have intentionally disobeyed the summons within the meaning of this section.[85] Whether or not omission to appear was intentional is a question of fact to be decided by the trial court,[86] after giving an opportunity of hearing to explain the absence.[87]

16. Appearance by Agent

An offence is not committed by an accused person in a summons case, who on the day fixed for the trial, makes an appearance by his pleader to ask for an order dispensing with his personal attendance under s 205 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 if his conduct is in other respects lawful.[88]1254

However, the accused specifically directed to appear in person had no authority to send his representative and if the accused is found to have wilfully avoided to attend in spite of sufficient notice, he is guilty of offence under s 174 .[1]

17. Intentional Departure before Time

In order to make a person, summoned as a witness, liable to punishment under this section, he must have intentionally omitted to attend at the place or time mentioned in the summons, or wilfully departed from the place where he had attended before the time at which it was lawful for him to depart.[2] In Queen v Sutherland ,[3] it was held that a witness who attends in obedience to a summons at a certain hour is not bound to wait all day long and if he goes away after a reasonable time, he cannot be convicted under this section. It may be doubted, however, if a witness is not bound to wait so long as there is reason to believe that the case in which he is summoned would come on, and his evidence taken.

In a Bombay case, a magistrate summoned the defendant to appear before him at 10 am. He attended punctually, but the magistrate was detained by public business. After waiting for a few minutes, the defendant went away. It was held that he was properly convicted under this section.[4]

Where the accused did not attend on the day fixed, but the magistrate was absent from the station the whole day, it was held that, as the object of the summons was a meeting on a particular day between the person summoned and a specified public functionary, the non-attendance at a time when no such meeting could have taken place was not an offence.[5]

A person who duly appears in obedience to a summons but departs without permission is not guilty under s 174, in the absence of a direction that he should not leave without permission.[6]

18. Effect of Absence of Summoning Authority

For a conviction under this section for non-attendance in obedience to a summons issued by an officer, it must be shown that the officer in question was present[7] at the place and on the date, both of which must be fixed in the summons,[8] and in the case of proceedings in a court, that as a fact he took up the case in question,[9] failing which the accused cannot be convicted.

19. Opportunity to Explain Absence must be Given to Accused

Before considering the question whether or not disobedience to a summons was intentional, the accused should be given an opportunity of explaining his absence.[10]1255

20. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable and a summons should ordinarily be issued in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by any magistrate. The period prescribed for prosecution under his section is one year.

For the offender to be prosecuted for the said offence of disobeying the summons of the court, a charge has got to be framed, he has to be tried and the procedure as is envisaged by the relevant provisions of CrPC, has to be followed.[11]

Non-attendance in obedience to a summons of a court is an offence under this section. If the magistrate thinks that such an offence had been committed by the person in question, he ought to follow the procedure prescribed in the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 in trying him therefor. When this is not done, but a simple notice is sent to the person and he comes forward and asks to be excused, and the magistrate 'sentences' him to pay a fine of Rs 5, this procedure is not what is contemplated by the Code.[12]

21. Complaint of Public Servant or Court Necessary

A competent court who can try the accused for the said infraction should try the case on a complaint filed by the court. But there is a limitation for that competent court to take cognizance of the offence and in the absence of the necessary complaint in writing filed by the public servant where orders have been flouted, the competent court is precluded from taking cognizance under s 195, CrPC, which engrafts a bar for the court to take cognizance of the offence alleged against the person who has violated the orders of the court in having failed to appear before that court pursuant to the summons issued which is an offence punishable under s 174, IPC . In the absence of any such written complaint filed by the public servant whose order has been infracted, no court can take cognizance of the offence and there can be no punishment.[13] In view of the provisions of s 195(1)(a), CrPC an offence punishable under this section can be taken cognizance of by a court only on the complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate.[14] An offence under this section is against the public servant before whom the accused fails to appear. Where, therefore, a witness fails to appear before the court, which summoned him, a complaint must be made by the court. If there is no such complaint, the accused cannot be convicted on a complaint by a sub-inspector of police.[15]

Therefore, if the court is of the opinion that there has been infraction of the order of the court by committing default in making appearance before that court pursuant to the summons issued by it, such violation on the part of the person responsible can be effectively dealt with only by ordering prosecution by filing a complaint in writing before a competent court of magistrate empowered to take cognizance.[16]1256

22. Whether Judge, Magistrate or Officer whose Order is Disobeyed, can Try such Offender

This section is one of the sections referred to in s 195, CrPC, and having regard to the provision of s 352 of that Code, therefore, an offence under this section cannot be tried by the officer whose order is disobeyed.[17]Section 352 is a prohibitory section and it excludes the jurisdiction of a court in cases in which the offence is committed before itself or in contempt of its authority.[18] The prohibition is absolute and consent or otherwise of the accused is immaterial.[19]

Section 345, CrPC, envisages a procedure, where a court can invoke its summary powers and punish the contempnor who has violated the orders of the courts by taking cognizance of the offence and by calling for the explanation from him and for that purpose by ordering detention of that person till the end of the summary trial and at the end the court is empowered to inflict the sentence of fine not exceeding Rs 200 but the summary power of the court can be exercised in respect of an offence enumerated under ss 175, 178, 179, 180 or 228, IPC . The offence enumerated under s 174, IPC, is not the offence that can be tried summarily under s 345, CrPC .[20]

Section 350 of the CrPC, however, provides a summary procedure for punishment for non-attendance by a witness in obedience to a summons. Under that section, if the court before which the witness is to appear is satisfied that it is expedient in the interest of justice that such witness should be tried summarily, the court may take cognizance of the offence and after giving the offender an opportunity of showing cause why he should not be punished under this section, sentence him to fine not exceeding Rs 100. In such cases, the procedure prescribed for summary trial has to be followed as nearly as may be practicable.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

[21][S. 174A.

Non-appearance in response to a proclamation under section 82 of Act 2 of 1974.--

Whoever fails to appear at the specified place and the specified time as required by a proclamation published under sub-section (1) of section 82 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1973 (2 of 1974) shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years or with fine or with both, and where a declaration has been made under sub-section (4) of that section pronouncing him as a proclaimed offender, he shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years and shall also be liable to fine.]

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

This section is newly inserted by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act 2005 (25 of 2005), s 44(b) (wef 23-06-2006). 1257

Notes on Clauses

CrPC (Amendment) Act, 2005--Clause 44.--This clause amends the Indian Penal Code as follows, namely:--

'Clause 12 seeks to insert new sub-sections (4) and (5) in Section 82 of the Code to provide for the declaration of a person as proclaimed offender, if he fails to appear inspite of the proclamation published under sub-section (1) of that section. In order to curb the tendency on the part of criminals not to attend the Court in response to proclamation published under sub-section (1) or further proclamation issued under sub-section (4) declaring the accused as "Proclaimed Offender a new Section 174 -A is being added to the Indian Penal Code to prescribe punishment for such offender'.

2. Scope and Application

Persons against whom proclamation is issued under s 82(1), CrPC would be divided into two categories. The first category would be of the persons who are accused of an offence other than the one mentioned in s 82(4), CrPC and the second category of the persons accused of an offence mentioned in s 82(4), CrPC . For these two categories of persons, punishment is differently provided by s 174A, IPC . Where the accused is a person against whom proclamation stands published, he is liable to be proceeded against under s 83, CrPC by way of attachment of his property as also under s 174A, IPC .[22]

If the IO submits charge-sheet without arresting the accused persons (unless he is on bail), it can be submitted only if he has been declared absconder and the case under s 174A, IPC has also been registered as a result of this proclamation.[23]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 175.

Omission to produce [24][document or electronic record] to public servant by person legally bound to produce it.--

Whoever, being legally bound to produce or deliver up any [25][document or electronic record] to any public servant, as such, intentionally omits so to produce or deliver up the same, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both;

or, if the [26][document or electronic record] is to be produced or delivered up to a Court of Justice, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Illustrations

A, being legally bound to produce a document before a [27][District Court], intentionally omits to produce the same. A has committed the offence defined in this section. 1258

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

In the illustration, the words 'district court' were substituted for the words 'zila court' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950.

The words 'document or electronic record' were substituted by the Information Technology Act 2000, s 91 and Sch I for 'document' wef 17-10-2003.

2. Scope

Section 174, IPC deals with disobedience of summons, etc., to attend and this section deals with disobedience of a summons, etc., to produce a document. This section applies to a witness who, having a document, does not produce it in obedience of a summons to produce it.[28] In order to convict a person under this section for non-production of a document, it must be shown that the production of the document was necessary or desirable for the decision of the case in which it was summoned,[29] and that it was in the possession or control of the accused.[30] The summons or order must specify the particular documents or books required.

Where a junior member of Hindu family attended court in obedience to a summons which directed him to produce his account books in respect of a family business in which he was a partner with his father, but he did not produce the same, it was held that he could not be proceeded against under this section or s 345 of the CrPC since the summons was too vague in not directing any particular book to be produced and since he, as junior member, could not be expected to have control of the books.[31]

A party to a suit, failing to comply with an order for production or inspection of documents, does not commit an offence under this section, but is liable to be dealt with only in the manner prescribed by O 11, r 22, CPC.[32] The omission to produce the document must be intentional.

Where the omission on the part of the accused to produce and deliver up the document to the court constitutes the real gravamen of the offence of contempt of court, this section would hardly be relevant.[33] This section and other sections of this chapter relate to particular rules of contempts of lawful authority of public servants. Where the facts of a case disclose no offence under ss 172 - 90, the case, if the facts so permit may be tried as a contempt case under s 10 of the Contempt of Courts Act 1971.[34]1259

3. Analogous Law

Under s 30(b), CPC, a court may issue a summons to any person whose attendance is required either to give evidence or to produce documents and under s 32 it can compel the attendance of such person.

Order 11, r 14, CPC empowers the court during the pendency of a suit to order the production by any party thereto of such of the documents in his possession or power relating to any matter in question in such a suit.

Under s 162 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, a witness summoned to produce a document shall, if it is in his possession or power, bring it to court, notwithstanding any objection which there may be to its production or to its admissibility, and the validity of such objection shall be decided by the court.

Under s 130 of the 1872 Act, no witness shall be compelled to produce his title deeds and under s 131 of 1872 Act, no one shall be compelled to produce documents in his possession, which any other person would be entitled to refuse to produce if they were in his possession, unless such last mentioned person consents to their production.

There are also provisions in some special or local Acts under which persons are legally bound to produce documents. Thus, under s 39 of the UP Consolidation of Holdings Act 1953 (V of 1954), a consolidation officer may require any person to produce such documents as he may deem necessary for the proper exercise of his powers or discharge of his duties, and the person required to produce the document is 'legally bound' to do so within the meaning of this section.

4. Document

Section 29 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

5. Privileged Documents

Although a witness may refuse to deliver up a document on the ground that it is privileged, he is not excused thereby, from bringing it to court for the court's inspection and decision thereon, unless the document constitutes state proceedings, in which case the word of the public officer having their custody, must be taken.[35]

6. 'Legally Bound to Produce'

A person is not legally bound to produce a deed for the purpose of verifying a copy thereof in a registration office.[36] In Ishwar Chandra Ghoshal v Emperor ,[37] it was held that the provisions of s 91, CrPC, cannot be taken to apply to the case of an accused person on his trial to whom a notice had been issued to produce an incriminating document. However, it has also been held in several other cases that it is competent to a magistrate under s 91, CrPC, to issue a summons to an accused 1260person to produce a document or other thing, even if the production of it might tend to incriminate him.[38]

Income-tax officers are not bound, by their oath of secrecy, when summoned, to give evidence in a court of justice.[39]

When a karnam is in possession of government records, he was ex necessitae to hand over the records to another karnam who is duly appointed by the collector. His action would certainly fall within the definition of 'legally bound to do' under s 43, IPC . If he is legally bound to do an act and if he fails to do so, then this section will apply.[40]

An offence under this section is committed when there is a legal obligation, on an accused, to produce or deliver the document or other thing to a public servant.[41]

7. Procedure

An offence under this section is non-cognizable and bailable but not compoundable. This is triable by the court, in which the offence is committed in a court by any magistrate.[42] The period prescribed for prosecution for this offence is one year.

8. Complaint

Under s 195(1)(a) of the CrPC, no court shall take cognizance of any offence punishable under ss 172 - 188 of the IPC, except on the complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is administratively subordinate. Subject to the provisions of s 352 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, no judge of a criminal court or a magistrate can try any person for any offence committed before him. Section 352 runs as follows:

> S. 352 . Certain Judges and Magistrates not to try certain offences when committed before themselves.--Except as provided in sections 344, 345, 349 and 350, no judge of a Criminal Court (other than a judge of a High Court) or magistrate shall try any person for any offence referred to in section 195, when such offence is committed before himself or in contempt of his authority, or is brought under his notice as such judge or magistrate in the course of a judicial proceeding.

9. Special Procedure in Certain Cases of Contempt

Commentary on s 345(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973[43] may be referred to.

10. When Jurisdiction of High Court not Excluded

If the acts alleged are offences under ss 175, 178, 179, 180 or s 228, IPC, they constitute contempt and can be taken cognizance of by the court, in whose view or 1261presence they are committed, and, in respect of only such contempt, the High Court would not take cognizance because s 3(2) of the Contempt of Courts Act 1971 bars its jurisdiction. On the other hand, if the act, complained of, which is alleged to constitute contempt, is an offence under the Indian Penal Code, but other than an offence under ss 175, 178, 179, 180 or s 228 of the Code, then the jurisdiction of the High Court is not excluded.[44]

11. Proof

To establish an offence under this section it must be proved that:

(i) the accused was legally bound to produce or deliver up any document or electronic record to any public servant or to a court of justice;
(ii) he omitted to produce or deliver it up; and
(iii) he did so intentionally.

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 176.

Omission to give notice or information to public servant by person legally bound to give it.--

Whoever, being legally bound to give any notice or to furnish information on any subject to any public servant, as such, intentionally omits to give such notice or to furnish such information in the manner and at the time required by law, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both, or, if the notice or information required to be given respects the commission of an offence, or is required for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence, or in order to the apprehension of an offender, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both,

[45][or, if the notice or information required to be given is required by an order passed under sub-section (1) of section 565 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 (5 of 1898)[46] with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.] 1262

Comments

1. Scope

This section applies to persons upon whom an obligation is imposed by law to furnish certain information to public servants, and the penalty, which the law provides is intended to apply to parties who commit an intentional breach of such obligation. No offence is committed if there is no such legal obligation.[47] The gist of the offence is that there should be an intentional omission to give the information.[48] The section refers to information to be given in statements required to be furnished under some provision of law.[49]

The section is in three parts. All the three parts deal with an omission to give notice or information to a public servant. The omission to give information to a public servant 'or any subject' by a person legally bound to give such information is punishable under the first part of the section; and if the 'subject' in question is an 'offence', the omission is more severely punishable under the second part. The third part deals with an omission to give notice or information required under s 565(1) (now s 356) of the CrPC .

It is a well established principle that s 176, IPC is intended to apply to parties who commit an intentional breach of obligation to report, and not where the public servant had already obtained the information from other sources.[50] The provisions of this section should be used not for the purpose of vexation, but for ensuring that information be not intentionally withheld by those whose position renders them liable to give it.[51] When several parties are bound to give information and one of them furnishes it, it is not reasonable to prosecute the other or others for not giving the same.[52]

2. Legislative Changes

The third clause to the section was inserted by s 2 of the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1939. This clause requires amendment to substitute s 356 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 for the existing words of s 565 of the same Code. 1263

3. Ingredients of Offence

The two ingredients of the offence are:

(i) intentional omission to give information to a public servant; and
(ii) that the accused was legally bound to give such information to a public servant.[53]

4. Legally Bound

A person is said to be 'legally bound to do' whatever it is illegal for him to omit.[54] And it is only illegal for him to omit what is an offence or prohibited by law or is ground for a civil action.[55] To render a person liable under this section it must be shown: (a) that there was an obligation imposed on him by law to give the notice or information, and (b) that he 'intentionally' omitted to give the same.[56] If there is no such legal obligation, there can be no offence in withholding the information in question.[57] This section refers to information to be given in statements required to be furnished under some provision of law.[58]

5. Sections 40, 43 and 176 Read Together

If ss 40, 43 and 176, IPC be read together, the result follows that one who fails to furnish information which he is legally bound to furnish is punishable under s 176, that he is legally bound to furnish what it is illegal for him to omit, that it is illegal for him to omit what is an offence and that an offence is what is punishable under the Penal Code.[59]

6. Statutory Obligation

Such legal obligations are imposed by various Acts, both Central and local.

(a) Information in Regard to Matters other than Offence

For duty of officer employed in connection with the affairs of a village to make certain report, see commentary to s 40, Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[60]

A village headman, patwari and chowkidar are legally bound under s 40(1)(b) of the CrPC to give the police information, which they possess respecting the resort to any place within their village of a proclaimed offender to the village, and if being aware of such a visit, they intentionally omit to do so, they are liable under this section whether the proclamation under s 87 of the CrPC was or was not made 1264strictly in accordance with the terms of that section.[61] Under certain circumstances covered by s 45(d) of the CrPC 1898 (now s 40(d) of the CrPC 1973), the concealment of suspicious death is punishable under this section, but mere servants, who are entirely dependent on their master in whose house the death takes place, do not come within the category of persons who are bound to communicate an occurrence of this sort.[62]

The bringing of a suspected robber under arrest to the village of the accused and releasing him there does not amount to the resorting to any place within, or the passage through the village of a suspected robber within the meaning of cl (b) of sub-s (1) of s 40, Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[63]

In a case,[64] the Madras High Court held that the owner of land on which a corpse is seen, need not be the owner or occupier of land on which the occurrence took place. The finding of a dead body on any land would ordinarily raise the presumption that death had taken place on that spot, so as to impose an obligation on a person occupying one of the positions in relation to the land described in this section to communicate information regarding the matter. He must justify the omission to give information. Per Prinsep and Machperson JJ, (Mitter J, dissenting), held that the (dead) body standing by itself does not necessarily lead to the inference that death took place in the village. It is equally consistent with death having taken place in another village and the dead body having been subsequently removed to the village where it is at last found.[65]

A Karnam in Madras Presidency is bound to furnish true information regarding cultivation in his village.[66] But he is not liable under s 176, IPC, if he omits to submit the information in obedience to an order of a Revenue Inspector.[67]

The allegation against the wife was that she was in possession of unauthorized liquor. The husband cannot be compelled to give information to the police about the unauthorized possession of liquor by the wife. The wife and the husband cannot be prosecuted for offences under ss 176 and 420, IPC .[68]

Foreigners Act[69]

Under this provision masters of foreign vessels are liable to furnish information.

Coroners Act[70]

A person appearing on a summons before a coroner but who refuses to give the required information commits an offence under this section.1265

Dramatic Performance Act[71]

Failure to give information as to a proposed dramatic performance, when called upon to do so by the local government, or its officer, is punishable under this section.

Indian Income Tax Act (43 of 1961)

Sections 94(6) and 133 empower Income-Tax Officers to require certain information and s 271 provide penalties for failure to furnish the information.

Land Acquisition Act (1 of 1894) [72]

Section 10(2) provides that everyone required to make or deliver a statement under s 9 or s 10 of the Act is legally bound to do so within the meaning of ss 175 and 176, IPC .

Indian Succession Act 1925

If an executor or administrator, on being required by the court to exhibit an inventory or account under s 317 of the 1925 Act, intentionally omits to comply with the requisition, he shall be deemed to have committed an offence under s 176, IPC .[73]

City of Bombay Municipality Act (3 of 1888)

Section 473 provides that whoever contravenes the provisions of s 155(1) and (2), or s 187 commits an offence under s 176 or s 177, as the case may be.

Registration Act (16 of 1908), Section 84(2)

Under sub-s (1) of the Act, every registering officer appointed under this Act shall be deemed to be a public servant within the meaning of the Indian Penal Code, and every person under sub-s (2) of the Act, shall be legally bound to furnish information to such registering officer when required by him to do so.

UP Land Revenue Act (3 of 1901)

Under s 46, a zamindar is bound to furnish information required by a patwari to prepare his jamabandi, and failure to do so is punishable under s 176, IPC .[74] However, the zamindar is not bound to give the information unless he is asked to give it by the qanungo or patwari.[75]

UP Consolidation of Holdings Act (5 of 1954), Section 39

Under s 39, a person required by a Consolidation Officer to furnish certain information is bound to furnish it.

It has been held that a person who refuses to answer when examined under s 161, CrPC cannot be said to commit an offence under s 176 or s 179 or s 187, IPC .[76]1266

(b) Information in regard to Offences

Under s 39 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 every person is bound to give information to the nearest magistrate or police officer of the commission of, or intention to commit, any offences specified under the Indian Penal Code .[77] Again, under s 40(1)(c) and (e), CrPC the persons mentioned in the section are bound to give information to the nearest magistrate or police officer respecting the commission or intention to commit the offences specified therein.

(c) Information required to be given under Section 356(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

Before the insertion of the third part in this section by s 2 of the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 22 of 1939, and the amendment of s 567 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898 by Act 7 of 1924 and Act 22 of 1939, it was held that notice of residence required to be given under s 565, CrPC was not required for preventing the commission of any particular offence and that failure to give such notice fell under the first part and not under the second part of s 176 of the Penal Code.[78] The offence under the first part of this section is punishable only with simple imprisonment or with fine extending up to five hundred rupees or both. But now the third part of this section specifically provides for a breach of the order under s 565(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898 and the punishment for failure to give the notice required by that section has been altered to imprisonment of either description up to six months or fine up to Rs 1000 or both.

7. 'Offence'

By virtue of s 40, and the explanation to s 177, IPC 'offence' means a thing made punishable by the Code, or under any special or local law whether committed within or without India in the case of the offences specified in the said explanation: or under any special or local law, if punishable thereunder by imprisonment for a term of six months or upwards, whether with or without fine. The offences referred to in the explanation to s 177 are murder, culpable homicide not amounting to murder, theft after preparation made for causing death or hurt, in order to the committing of the theft, robbery, attempt to commit robbery, voluntarily causing hurt in committing robbery, dacoity, dacoity with murder, robbery or dacoity with attempt to cause death or grievous hurt, attempt to commit dacoity when armed with a deadly weapon, making preparation to commit dacoity, assembling for the purpose of committing dacoity, mischief by fire or explosive substance with intent to cause damage to the amount of Rs 100, the same with intent to destroy a house, etc., house-trespass in order to the commission of an offence punishable with death, the same in order to commit an offence punishable with transportation for life, lurking house-trespass or house-breaking by night, in order to the commission of an offence punishable with imprisonment, the same after preparation made for causing hurt to any person, grievous hurt caused whilst committing lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, death or grievous hurt caused by one of several persons jointly concerned in house-breaking, *etc.*1267

8. Doctor(s) Working in Hospital

Where a patient is brought to a doctor in a hospital for treatment of poisoning, duty lies on the doctor to inform the police about the death of such patient who dies. Where the accused doctor did not do so, charges for offences under ss 176 and 201, IPC were framed against him.[79]

9. 'Commission of an Offence'

The aggravated penalty imposed by the second part of the section can be inflicted only when the information required to be given relates to the commission of some particular offence, and not of offences generally.[80]

10. 'Public Servant'

Public servant has been defined by s 21, IPC . For the application of this section it is necessary that the accused was legally bound to give notice or furnish information on any subject to any public servant. A person who is directed to investigate into the affairs of an insurance company under s 33(1) of the Insurance Act, does not ipso facto become an officer or there is no office which he holds. The making of a statement to the investigators under s 33(3) of the Insurance Act does not amount to furnishing information on any subject to any public servant as contemplated by this section, an omission to furnish which would be an offence under that section.[81]

11. 'Intentionally Omits'

The omission must be intentional.[82] Thus, the refusal of a person to join in a dacoity, but of which he says nothing, does not necessarily render him liable to punishment under this section.[83] Intention, which is the gist of the offence[84] is to be presumed from the circumstances of the case.

12. Nature of Omission

Section 176, IPC, deals with omission to give notice or information to the public servant, by a person who is legally bound to do it. An omission postulates legal obligation and knowledge, for there can be no omission when there is no obligation and knowledge. The notice or information contemplated in s 176 is naturally notice or information of a definite character, having a credible origin and such as may probably be a definite character, having a credible origin and such as may probably be conductive to the apprehension of the crime or prevention of crime. The action does not refer to vague floating gossips in which every market abounds.[85]

Where the accused who as a licensee was bound under the conditions of his licence to disclose the places where he had stocked cloth meant for sale, was asked to submit a list of the mill-made cloth with him and he omitted to mention in the list submitted by him the cloth he had stocked in a place other than his shop, it was held that he 1268intentionally omitted to furnish legal information which he was legally bound to furnish and committed an offence under this section.[86]

It is not necessary in order to support a conviction under this section against a person falling within the provisions of s 40 of the Criminal Procedure Code 1973, for not giving information of an occurrence falling under cl (d) of that section, to show that the death actually occurred on his land, when the circumstances disclosed, show that a body has been found under circumstances denoting that the death was sudden, unnatural or suspicious; the finding of the body being a fact from which a court might reasonably infer, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the death took place there.[87]

13. Omission of Investigating Officer to Complete Investigation within the Statutory Period

Omission on the part of the Investigating Officer to complete the investigation within 60 days from the date of the arrest of the accused, is not covered under the s 176, IPC . The Investigating Officer, therefore, cannot be said to be guilty under s 176 of the IPC .[88]

14. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable and summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable and not compoundable. It is triable by any magistrate, and may be tried summarily.

No court can take cognizance of an offence under this section except on a complaint in writing of the public servant concerned or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate.[89] The prescribed period of limitation for prosecution under this section is one year.

15. Complaint of the Public Servant Concerned Necessary

The commentary under s 172 may be referred to.

16. Particulars of Charge

The charge, under this section should distinctly set forth the particular offence in respect of which the accused either omitted to give information, or gave information which he knew to be false; and it should appear precisely what his duty was in the matter.[90]

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at....., being legally bound to give any notice (or to furnish information) on any subject, to wit, to..... a public servant intentionally omitted to give such notice (or to furnish such information), which you were legally bound to give as to in respect of commission (or prevention) of an 1269offence (or apprehension of an offender) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 176 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

17. Proof

Before a person may be convicted under this section the prosecution is bound to prove that:[1]

(i) the accused person was legally bound to furnish a certain information to a public servant; and
(ii) he intentionally omitted to give such information.

In the case of an offence under the second or third part of the section, the aggravating circumstances have to be proved in addition.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 177.

Furnishing false information.--

Whoever, being legally bound to furnish information on any subject to any public servant, as such, furnishes, as true, information on the subject which he knows or has reason to believe to be false, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both;

or, if the information which he is legally bound to give respects the commission of an offence, or is required for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence, or in order to the apprehension of an offender, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Illustrations

(a) A, a landholder, knowing of the commission of a murder within the limits of his estate, wilfully misinforms the magistrate of the district that the death has occurred by accident in consequence of the bite of a snake. A is guilty of the offence defined in this section.

(b) A, a village watchman, knowing that considerable body of strangers has passed through his village in order to commit a dacoity in the house of Z, a wealthy merchant residing in a neighbouring place, and being bound under clause 5, section VII, [2][Regulation III, 1821], of the Bengal Code, to give early and punctual information of the above fact to the officer of the nearest police station, willfully misinforms the police officer that a body of suspicious characters passed through the village with a view to commit dacoity in a certain distant place in a different direction. Here A is guilty of the offence defined in the latter part of this section.

[3][Explanation.--In section 176 and in this section the word "offence" includes any act committed at any place out of [4][India], which, if committed in [5][India], would be punishable under any of the following sections, namely, 302, 304, 382, 1270392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 457, 458, 459 and 460; and the word "offender" includes any person who is alleged to have been guilty of any such act.]

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

The explanation to this section was inserted by s 5 of the Indian Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 3 of 1894.

The words 'British India' were successively substituted by the AO 1948, AO 1950 and the Part B States (Laws) Act 1951 to read as above.

2. Scope

This section is in two parts. The first part deals with the simple case of a person who, being bound to furnish true information to a public servant, furnishes false information to him and under this part of the section, the maximum punishment is six month's simple imprisonment with or without fine. The second part deals with a case when the information is required for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence or in order to the apprehension of an offender, and under this part the maximum punishment is two years' imprisonment of either description with or without fine.[6]

A, a police officer, whose duty it was to enter all reports, brought to him, of offences in the station diary, refused to enter a report, brought to him, of a certain offence, but entered, instead, a false report. A was held to have committed an offence under this section.[7] But A, who seeks to be enlisted in the police, falsely says that he is not a resident of the district, commits no offence.[8]

A plain reading of s 26 of the General Clauses Act 1897, shows that there is no bar to the trial of conviction of an offender under two enactments but there is only a bar to the punishment of the offender twice for the same offence. In other words, the section provides that where an act or omission constitutes an offence under two enactments, the offender may be prosecuted and punished under either or both the enactments but shall not be liable to be punished twice for the same offence.[9] The accused belonging to 'Havyak Brahmin' furnishing false information and obtaining 1271admission by producing false Scheduled Tribe Certificate can be convicted for offence under ss 120-B, 177 and 471 of the Indian Penal Code 1860.[10]

Giving false information is distinct from omission to give information. Omission to give information is not an offence under s 177, IPC, unless the same is intentional.[11]

3. Analogous Law

Regulation 3 of 1821 of the Bengal Code, referred to in illust (b) has been repealed by Act 17 of 1862. The corresponding liability is now imposed by s 40(1)(e) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.

Section 52 of the Income-Tax Act 1922[12] stated as follows:

> If a person makes a statement in a verification mentioned in s 19(A) or s 22, or sub-s (2) of s 26(A), or sub-s (2) of s 33(A), which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false, or does not believe to be true, he shall be deemed to have committed the offence described in s 177, IPC .

Sections 277 and 278 of the Income Tax Act 1961 may be referred to.

4. Ingredients

The section lays down two ingredients: (a) that a person must be legally bound to furnish information on the particular subject to the public servant, and (b) that he must furnish, as true, information on that subject which he knows or has reason to believe to be false.[13]

5. Relative Scope of Sections 177, 182, 201 and 203

Commentary under same heading in s 182, post may be referred to.

6. 'Being Legally Bound'

Section 43 and commentary under ss 43 and 176 may be referred to.

The section has no application to a case in which a false statement has been made to the police by a person who was under no legal obligation or who was not legally bound to give that information. Such a person may be liable for prosecution under s 182, IPC, which, however, is a different matter. To bring a case under s 177, IPC, it is absolutely necessary to prove that the informant was 'legally bound' to give the information, which is proved to be false, to the public servant.[14] A person may be guilty of a breach of departmental orders such as sending in a false 'nil' return, but he cannot be held liable under this section unless he was legally bound to furnish the information required.[15] The illustrations to this section show that it does not apply to the case of any person, who is examined by a police officer, making a false statement, but it evidently alludes to cases, when, by law, landholders or watchmen 1272are bound to give information, and to other analogous cases of the same description.[16]

Section 43, IPC, covers a breach of contract, and not merely a tort. The breach of contract, however, must be one which furnishes ground for a civil action, that is to say, in respect of which damages could be obtained under s 73, Contract Act, or which could be enforced specifically. Where there is a contract between the government and the municipality, under which a doctor of municipality was to furnish certain information (i.e. to carry out post-mortem examination of bodies sent and to report result) to the government, there is no contract between the doctor and the government and as such the doctor is not legally bound to furnish information within the meaning of this section and the doctor cannot be prosecuted under it for giving a false report without opening the bodies sent to him.[17]

Under s 40(1)(d) of the Code of Criminal Code 1973, a mukhia of a village is legally bound to give information to the police which he may possess respecting:

(i) the occurrence in or near such village of any sudden or unnatural death;
(ii) any death under suspicious circumstances;
(iii) the discovery in or near such village or any corpse or part of a corpse, in circumstances which lead to a reasonable suspicion that such a death has occurred;
(iv) the disappearance from such village of any person in circumstances which lead to a reasonable suspicion that a non-bailable offence has been committed in respect of such person.

If no death has taken place and there is no evidence that any non-bailable offence has been committed about which the Mukhia had any information, which it was his duty to report to the police, he cannot be held liable under this section.[18]

Under ss 139 and 140 of the Indian Income Tax Act 1961,[19] persons are legally bound to submit returns of their income and to sign and verify them. If a person makes a false return on a false declaration in the verification, he would be liable under this section.[20] However, he is under no such obligation if no notice has been given to him under s 139(2),[21] and he cannot be held liable under this section.[22] With reference to the corresponding ss 22 and 52 of the Income Tax Act 1922, it has been held that the essence of an offence under those sections lies in the verification of an untrue statement, and provided the statement was deliberately false or not believed to be true, subsequent rectification cannot make it any less an offence, though it may be considered as an extenuating circumstance in awarding sentence.[23]Now s 277 of the Income Tax Act 1961, itself makes a false statement in declaring an offence punishable with simple imprisonment which may extend to six months or with fine which may extend to Rs 1000, or both.1273 sale-deed to correctly describe the property sold. The section only requires that the property should be described in sufficient detail so as to make the identity thereof easier. If the description given by him is sufficient to identify it, the mere fact that it was not described as laid down within the meaning of s 2 of reg 3 of 1914, will not render him liable under this section.[24]

By s 44 of the Police Act 1861, every officer in charge of a police station is bound to keep a general diary in which he is to record 'all complaints and charges preferred, the names of all persons arrested, the offences charged against them', and by s 23, he is bound to communicate intelligence respecting the public peace. One object of that diary is to inform the magistrate of the district and the district superintendent of police of the offences which have been reported at the thana. In that sense, the diary furnishes them with 'information'. If, therefore, a police officer in charge of a police station refuses to enter a report made to him concerning the commission of an offence, and enters instead in the diary a totally different and false report as that which was made to him, he commits an offence under this section.[25] In the same case it was observed: 'If he was legally bound to give information, he would be legally bound not to omit to give such information, and such omission would make him punishable under this section.' The ground of liability under this section is not the suppression or omission of the true information but the furnishing of false information.

7. Foreigners Act 1946 (31 of 1946)

A master of any vessel, who, being required to give information under s 6 of the Act, gives false information, commits an offence under this section.

8. Bombay Municipal Corporation Act (3 of 1888) (Section 473)

A person who contravenes the provisions of ss 28(j) or 155(1) and (2) or s 187, commits an offence under this section.

9. Illustrative Cases

The following are some illustrative cases under this section:

A, not being bound to furnish information of an offence, falsely informs the police that an offence has been committed. A has committed no offence under this section.[26]

A makes an entry in his official diary to the effect that he was on duty in a particular place on a particular day, which is untrue. A has committed an offence under this section.[27]

A, a police officer, whose duty was to enter all reports brought to him of offences in the station diary, refused to enter a report brought to him of a certain offence, but 1274entered instead a different and false report. A committed an offence under this section.[28]

Appellant Sarpanch of Gram Panchayat knowingly issued a false certificate in favour of one L that he did not own any property except the land which he made fit for cultivation though L had owned 13 Kanals and 13 marlas of land and his wife owned 70 kanals of land in the village. On the basis of that certificate L contended to be landless and sought allotment of land and land was allolled to L. Conviction of the appellant under ss 177 and 420, IPC was held proper.[29]

Respondent filed nomination for election and made wrong declaration before the Election authorities. Prima facie respondent committed offence under s 177 . High Court directed the authorities to initiate proceedings against the respondent for making false declaration.[30]

A purchases a stamped paper and gives the vendor thereof a false name. He is not bound by law to furnish information to the vendor, and is, therefore, not punishable under this section.[31]

A, seeking to be enlisted in the police, falsely said that he was not a resident of the district. A has committed no offence.[32]

10. 'Which he Knows, or has Reason to Believe, to be False'

Even if a person is legally bound to furnish information to a public servant, before he can be convicted under this section, it has to be seen whether he knew or has reason to believe the information furnished to be false.[33] It is not necessary to prove an intention to defraud in order to justify a conviction under this section. It is enough to show that the information furnished as true was either known to be false or not believed to be true.[34]

The fact that a person, whose petition is alleged to contain false information, in bringing a suit on the basis of the allegation that the information is true does not support the view that he knew or had reason to believe it to be false, even though a magistrate on reviewing the evidence may have come to the conclusion that the information was not true.[35]

11. Information for the Purpose of Preventing the Commission of an Offence

The information which, under the second branch of this section, a person is legally bound to give 'for the purpose of preventing the commission of the offence' relates not to the commission of offences generally but to the commission of some particular offence.[36] Notes under s 176, ante may be referred to. 1275

12. Procedure

The procedure is the same as for an offence under s 176, IPC . The prescribed period of limitation for prosecution for this offence is one year.

Where the complaint was filed against the accused for furnishing false information to the society regarding their owning another house and having membership in other societies and getting plots allotted in their names, the chargesheet was filed against the accused persons for offences under ss 420, 471, 120(B), 177 and 182, IPC, nearly eight years after. Offences under ss 177 and 182, IPC, were held barred by limitation under s 468, CrPC and other offences were not made out; so a Division Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court quashed the criminal proceedings under s 482, CrPC pending against accused persons before the metropolitan magistrate, Hyderabad.[37]

13. Who can Order Withdrawal of Complaint

When a complaint of an offence under this section has been made under s 195(1)(a), CrPC by a public servant, the authority to whom such public servant is subordinate may order the withdrawal of the complaint. Interpreting the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898, the Madras[38] and the Nagpur[39] High Courts have held that a First Class Magistrate is subordinate to the District Magistrate and not to an Additional District Magistrate. The Allahabad High Court has, however, held that since the Additional District Magistrate has got the powers of the District Magistrate, a Sub-Divisional Magistrate is subordinate to him.[40]

An Additional Deputy Commissioner exercising power under the CP and Berar Municipalities Act 1922, is not subordinate to the Board of Revenue.[41]

14. Charge

The first part of the section deals with a summons case which needs no charge. In the case of an offence under the second part, the charge should distinctly set forth the particular offence in respect of which the accused either omitted to give information, or gave information which he knew to be false; and it should appear precisely what his duty was in the matter.[42]

15. Form of Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and officer of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you (*) on or about the..... day of..... at....., being legally bound furnish information on the subject, to wit..... to ....., a public servant as such, furnished as true the information, to wit..... on the subject which you knew (or had reason to believe) to be false (add if necessary) and the information which you were legally bound to give in respect of commission of an offence, (or in order to the apprehension of an offender) and 1276thereby committed an offence punishable under s 177 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

16. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the following facts must be proved that:

(i) the accused was legally bound to furnish certain information to a public servant;
(ii) he furnished information on the subject which he knew or had reason to believe, to be false; and
(iii) (in a case under the second part of the section) the information was with respect to the commission of an offence.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 178.

Refusing oath or affirmation when duly required by public servant to make it.--

Whoever refuses to bind himself by an oath [43][or affirmation] to state the truth, when required so to bind himself by a public servant legally competent to require that he shall so bind himself, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section makes refusal to take an oath or make an affirmation an offence. The liability of a person to take the oath or affirmation depends upon the competency of the public servant to administer it. Refusal to take an oath when required by a court amounts to contempt of court for which the Code of Criminal Procedure provides a summary remedy of punishing the offender on the spot.[44]

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'or affirmation' were added by s 15 of the Indian Oaths Act 1873.

3. 'Refuses to Bind Himself by an Oath, or Affirmation'

'Refusal' signifies a positive non-compliance with the demand made. Mere omission does not amount to a refusal. If a person has opted to depose as a witness and his examination-in-chief has taken place, his refusal to take oath and come to the witness box for his cross-examination amounts to an offence under s 178, IPC .[45] The ground upon which the refusal is based is immaterial, e.g., that the person refusing is the 1277father or son of the one against whom he is required to testify,[46] or the husband or wife of the same.[47] Such refusal on the ground of non-payment of expenses may, however, not amount to an offence in a civil case.[48]

4. Refusal by Police Officials before Inquiry Committee

In a case, the police officials whose actions were sought to be inquired, were covered under s 8B of the Commissions of Inquiry Act 1952. They were sought to be cross-examined at the inception of the inquiry though notices were not issued to them. On their refusal to appear and testify before the committee, the committee directed for filing of a complaint against them under s 178, IPC .

On these facts, it was held that the orders of the inquiry committee directing complaints to be filed against the police officials for an offence punishable under s 178, IPC, were the consequences of the misapprehension that they were not covered by s 8(B), because no notices under that section had been issued to them. The action of the committee in compelling them to enter the witness box on the dates in question for being cross-examined, when even according to it and it was apparent from its order that persons similarly situated were to do so at the end of the inquiry, was in itself discriminatory. There was, therefore, valid justification for the refusal by the police official to take oath for cross-examination at the stage when they were required to do so. Therefore, the inquiry committee should not have in the instant case directed the filing of a complaint against police officials for an offence punishable under s 178, IPC .[49]

5. 'Oath'

Oath includes solemn affirmation. Section 51 , IPC, may be referred to.

6. 'When Required so to Bind Himself'

Section 4 of the Oaths Act 1969, makes it obligatory to make oaths and affirmations by all witnesses, interpreters and jurors. This section provides punishment for refusing to bind oneself by oath or affirmation or state the truth when required. Sections 9 - 12 of the Indian Oaths Act 1873, since repealed, contain provisions for special oaths. These provisions do not find a place in the Act of 1969. It is, therefore, not binding on any person even under the present law to make a statement on special oath. Even under the repealed Act a refusal to make the special oath was not binding under s 12 of the said Act.

A witness in a civil suit is entitled to be paid his expenses before giving evidence and a refusal to give evidence on the ground of non-payment is no offence.[50] As to expenses of a witness summoned by a criminal court, refer to s 312 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.

7. Legally Competent

Notes under s 174 may be referred to.1278

By s 10 of the Public Gambling Act 1867 [which extends to Punjab, United Provinces (now Uttar Pradesh) and Central Provinces (now Madhya Pradesh)], a refusal to make oath or affirmation constitutes an offence under this section.

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable and a summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the court in which the offence is committed, subject to the provisions of ch 26, CrPC ; or, if not committed in a court, by any magistrate.

Where the offence is committed in the view or presence of any civil, criminal or revenue court, the procedure prescribed by ss 345 - 46, CrPC, has to be followed.

For 'complaint' 'jurisdiction' and 'special procedure', notes under s 175 may be referred to. Prosecution for an offence under this section can be made within a period of one year only.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 179.

Refusing to answer public servant authorised to question.--

Whoever, being legally bound to state the truth on any subject to any public servant, refuses to answer any question demanded of him touching that subject by such public servant, in the exercise of the legal powers of such public servant, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

While the preceding section deals with refusal to take oath or make affirmation, this section deals with refusal to answer a question put by a public servant. Before a person can be convicted under this section it must be shown that he was legally bound to state the truth and that he refused to do so. This is one of the provisions to enforce compliance when a public servant legally demands a truthful answer but is met with a blank refusal or plain mendacity.[51] A breakdown of this section would yield the following results that:

(a) the demanding authority must be a public servant; and
(b) the demand must be to state the truth on a subject in the exercise of legal powers.[52]

Section 179 has a component of mens rea. Where there is no wilful refusal, but only unwitting omission or innocent warding off, the offence under this section is not made out.[53]1279

This section has nothing whatever to do with the conduct of accused persons in court.[54]

2. 'Legally Bound'

Section 43 and notes thereunder and synopsis note under s 176 may be referred to.

3. 'To State the Truth'

Every person giving evidence on any subject before any court or person authorised to administer oaths and affirmation is bound to state the truth on such subject.[55] But to this section there are certain exceptions in the form of privileges in the Indian Evidence Act 1872, and the witnesses cannot be compelled by law to answer questions on some subjects. Thus, a witness is privileged or protected from answering any questions on the following subjects:

(i) his own conduct in court as a judge or magistrate or as to anything which came to his knowledge in court as a judge or magistrate;[56]
(ii) communication made to him during marriage;[57]
(iii) evidence as to affairs of state;[58]
(iv) official communications;[59]
(v) information as to the commission of any offence;[60]
(vi) professional communications;[61]
(vii) confidential communications with legal advisers.[62]

Under s 132 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872:

A witness shall not be excused from answering any question as to any matter relevant to the matter in issue in any suit or in any civil or criminal proceeding, upon the ground that the answer to such question will criminate, or may tend directly or indirectly to criminate such witness or that it will expose, or tend directly or indirectly to expose, such witness to a penalty or forfeiture of any kind: Provided that no such answer, which a witness shall be compelled to give, shall subject him to any arrest or prosecution, or be proved against him in any criminal proceeding, except a prosecution for giving false evidence by such answer.

Under s 165 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, a judge may, in order to discover or to obtain proof of relevant facts, ask any question he pleases of any witness or of the parties about any fact relevant or irrelevant, but this section does not authorise him to compel any witness to answer any question, which such witness is entitled to refuse to answer under ss 121 - 131 of that Act. Although a judge has power under s 165 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, to ask a witness questions about any irrelevant fact, in order to obtain proof of relevant facts, the witness is not bound to answer such a 1280question if it is put, not for that purpose, but with a view to criminal proceedings being taken against him.[63]

A complainant voluntarily preferring a complaint under the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, cannot be compelled to answer questions put by the magistrate, and therefore, his refusal to answer is not an offence under this section, or s 349 of the Code Criminal Procedure 1973.[64]

Under s 161 of the CrPC 1973, a police officer making an investigation, under ch 12 of the Code may examine orally any person supposed to be acquainted with the facts and circumstances of the case, and such person is bound to answer all questions relating to the case put by such officer. But a refusal to answer questions asked by a police officer under this section is not punishable under s 176 or s 187, IPC, as under the present Code there is no obligation to speak the truth as there was under the 1882 Code.[65]

4. Mens Rea

Section 179, IPC has a component of mens rea and where there is no wilful refusal but only unwitting omission or innocent warding off, the offence is not made out. When there is reasonable doubt indicated by the accused's explanation he is entitled to its benefit and cannot be forced to substantiate his ground lest, by this process, he is constrained to surrender the very privilege for which he is fighting. What may apparently be innocent information may really be innocent or not, when viewed in the wider setting.[66]

5. Accused as Witness

Section 342A, CrPC, which has been newly inserted in the Code by s 61 of the Amendment Act, (26 of 1955), enables an accused person to be a competent witness for the defence.[67]Before this amendment, he could not do so, although for the purpose of enabling him to explain the circumstances appearing in the evidence against him, the court could put such questions to him as were considered necessary. Section 118 of the Evidence Act deals with persons who are competent to testify as witnesses, but in view of s 342, CrPC, before this amendment, no accused person could appear as a witness and therefore, s 118 aforesaid was inapplicable to him. Article 20(3) of the Constitution provides that no person accused of an offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself. Now under this section the accused person has become a competent witness for the defence, but he cannot be compelled to be a witness and cannot be called as a witness except at his own request in writing, and his failure to give evidence cannot be made the subject-matter of comment by the parties or the court.[68]1281

Under s 342 the accused cannot be called as a witness except on his own request, but once he offers himself as a witness and is put on oath, his position could not be either better or worse than that of any other witness, and s 132 of the Evidence Act would apply to him. That section itself makes a distinction between those cases in which a witness voluntarily answers a question and those in which he is compelled to answer; and gives him a protection in the latter of these cases only. 'Protection is afforded only to answers which a witness has objected to give, or which he has asked to be excused from giving, and which then he has been compelled to give, and not to answers given voluntarily.'[69]

Apart from this, s 342, CrPC empowers the court to examine the accused for the purpose of enabling him to explain any circumstances appearing in the evidence against him. However, no oath shall be administered to him and he shall not render himself liable to punishment by refusing to answer the questions put to him in his examination, or by giving false answers to such questions.[70]Section 179, IPC, has nothing whatever to do with the conduct of accused persons in court.[71]

6. Refusal to Answer

The following are cases in which the answer given by the witness was held to amount to or not to amount to refusal to answer.

A witness was asked the name of his grandfather and he replied that he did not remember it. It is not a refusal to answer within the meaning of this section.[72]

A witness was asked as to what was the result of a case in which he was a witness, and he said he did not know. He could not be considered to have refused to answer the question put to him.[73]

Where, however, a witness, though persistently asked by the court to give certain information, persisted in giving only a prevaricating and irrelevant reply, it was held that it amounted to a refusal to answer within the meaning of this section.[74]

7. Procedure

It is the same as in the case of an offence under the preceding s 178, IPC . The prescribed period of limitation for this offence is one year.

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 180.

Refusing to sign statement.--

Whoever refuses to sign any statement made by him, when required to sign that statement by a public servant legally competent to require that he shall sign that statement, shall be punished with 1282simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section makes it an offence to refuse to sign a statement when required to do so by a public servant. But the public servant must be legally competent to require the statement to be signed and the person required to sign must be bound to do so.

A person commits an offence under this section if he refuses to sign a statement, which he has himself made and which he is required to sign by a public servant, legally competent to require him to sign the same.[75] A mere refusal to sign a receipt for a summons, as required by s 62(3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, is not an offence under s 173 or under this section.[76] It is only when a person refuses to sign a statement, which a public servant is legally empowered to require him to sign, he renders himself liable to punishment.[77]

The essential ingredients to constitute the offence under this section are:

(i) The accused made a statement before a public servant;
(ii) The accused was required by public servant to sign such statement;
(iii) Public servant was legally empowered or competent to require the accused to sign that statement, and
(iv) That the accused refused to sign statement.

In certain pension matter proceedings before the Deputy Secretary to the Government of Karnataka, the counsel for the petitioner had made certain submissions, and when the counsel was required to sign the proceedings, he was said to have refused to sign those proceedings. Held, no offence under s 180 or s 353, IPC was made out, proceedings were quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[78]

The section was enacted at a time when the Acts and Regulations, then in force, required witnesses and accused persons to sign the statements made by them. Now the law has changed considerably in this respect, and care has to be taken, in applying the section, to see whether the accused was legally bound to sign his statement.

Every refusal on the part of a counsel appearing for a party, to subscribe his signature to the proceeding sheet in which the public servant has recorded the submissions of such counsel, is not an offence under s 180 of the IPC . To attract the offence under s 180, IPC, the person accused of such offence should be under a legal 1283obligation or compulsion to sign the statement or submission, and refusal on his part to sign such statement or submission cannot be brought under s 180, IPC .[79]

2. Civil Cases

The method of recording the evidence of witnesses in civil cases is laid down in O 18, r 5 of the Code of Civil Procedure and is stated below:

In cases in which an appeal is allowed, the evidence of each witness shall be taken down in writing and when completed, shall be read over in the presence of the Judge and of the witness, and the Judge shall, if necessary, correct the same, and shall sign it.

In this regard, there is a distinct provision that the judge shall sign the deposition, but there is nothing about the witness signing it also. There is no legal obligation upon witnesses in civil cases to sign or thumb-mark their depositions. Courts cannot order, but can doubtlessly ask them to do so, and if they refuse, they cannot be compelled and are not liable to prosecution for an offence under this section. Section 151 , CPC, does not authorise a judge to force a witness to sign his deposition.[80]

Even assuming that, under the CPC, a judge is legally competent to require that a witness shall sign his evidence, it will only be when the evidence has been read over to the witness, and he has admitted it to be correct, and has refused to sign it, that he will be guilty of an offence under this section.[81]

3. Criminal Cases

Under five sections of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, it is enacted that a person who has made a statement thereunder shall sign it, when it is made in writing, or when reduced to writing. Under s 62(3) of the CrPC 1973, every person on whom a summons is so served shall, if so required by the serving officer, sign a receipt therefor on the back of the other duplicate. By s 154, CrPC, information in cognizable cases 'shall be signed by the person giving it'. Statements and confessions made to a magistrate in the course of an investigation under ch 12 must be signed by the person making them in the same manner that the record of the examination of an accused person by a magistrate is required to be signed by the accused (ss 164 and 281). So too a complaint is required to sign the substance of his complaint, when reduced to writing, made before the magistrate (s 200). No statement made to a police officer in the course of an investigation, if reduced to writing, is to be signed by the person making it, nor can such writing be used as evidence under the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 (s 162).

It has been held in some cases that the provision in ss 122 and 346 of Act 10 of 1872 and the corresponding ss 164 and 364(2) of the Code of 1898 that the accused should sign the record of his statement, is only directory, and that an accused person who refuses to sign a statement made by him in answer to questions put to him by a magistrate (in the case of a confession recorded under s 164 of the CrPC) or by a court in the case of a statement recorded under s 364, in answer to questions put to 1284him does not commit an offence under this section.[82] The reasons for this view are said to be: (a) that since the essence of such confessions and statements is that they should be voluntarily made, and they cannot be considered complete until signed by the accused person and that this object is wholly inconsistent with the use of any compulsion, by fine or otherwise, for the purpose of obtaining such signature;[83] and (b) that the procedure indicated involves the magistrate offering the record for the accused's signature, but it does not empower the magistrate to require his signature. It is only when a person refuses to sign a statement which a public servant is legally empowered to require him to sign that he renders himself liable to punishment.[84] It may, however be pointed out that under ss 164 and 364 (now s 281) ample security is given to ensure the statement being voluntarily made, and that the accused can explain or add to his answers before he can be called upon to sign that which he has voluntarily declared to be the truth. To employ compulsion at this stage cannot deprive the statement of its voluntary character. Even if the words 'the record shall be signed by the accused' in s 364(2) (now s 281(5) can be construed only as a mere direction to the magistrate or court to take the signature of the accused, yet it is difficult to hold that in requiring the signature, the magistrate or judge is not 'legally competent' to so require it.[85] The magistrate is a public servant legally competent to require the accused to sign the statement, and if he refuses to do so, he will have committed an offence under this section. It will be noted that an accused person is not bound to make any statement whatsoever, but if he does, and if he is examined by the magistrate and replies to the magistrate's questions, the court is bound to reduce the statement to writing in the form of questions and answers and the magistrate is bound to sign it, as also the accused.[86] It has, however, been held in an old case that the signature of the accused seems to be required more for his protection than to impose on him an obligation which is to be enforced under s 180, IPC .[87]

Mere refusal to sign a receipt for a summons as required by s 62(2), CrPC is not an offence under s 173 or this section.[88]

4. Revenue Cases

A deponent in a revenue inquiry is not bound to sign his deposition.[89]

5. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under s 178 . The limitation prescribed for this offence is one year. A Court wherein offence is alleged to have been committed can suo motu register a case and punish the offender provided the procedure laid down by s 340, CrPC has been followed.[90]1285

6. Appeal & Revision

Appeal, and not revision, lies against the order of conviction recorded under s 180, IPC .[91]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 181.

False statement on oath or affirmation to public servant or person authorised to administer an oath or affirmation.--

Whoever, being legally bound by an oath [92][or affirmation] to state the truth on any subject to any public servant or other person authorised by law to administer such oath [93][an affirmation], makes, to such public servant or other person as aforesaid, touching the subject, any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

Furnishing false information to a public servant is punishable under s 177, IPC . Making a false statement on oath or affirmation to a public servant is an offence under this section. Giving false evidence is an offence under s 191 punishable under s 193, IPC . To constitute an offence under this section--

(i) the accused took the oath or made the affirmation;
(ii) the accused must be legally bound by oath or affirmation to state the truth to a public servant or any other person;
(iii) the public servant or other person must be authorised by law to administer the oath or affirmation;
(iv) the statement made by the accused touching the subject must be false; and
(v) one which he either knew or believed to be false, or did not believe to be true.

A falsehood made in good faith that it is true will not expose him to penalty.[94]

2. Relative Scope of Sections 181 and 193

The wording of this section is apparently large enough to admit of false statements of every description, i.e., whether made in the course of judicial proceeding or not. However, the subject-matter of this chapter is 'contempt of the lawful authority of public servants', and provision is made in the following chapter,[95] for the offence of 1286giving false evidence and offences against public justice. This section is, therefore, properly confined to non-judicial proceedings.[1] This was perhaps clearer under the old law, for by the Schedule to the Code of Criminal Procedure 1861, an offence under s 193 was triable only by a court of session; whilst an offence under s 181 was triable by that court or by a district magistrate.[2] Under the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898, however, (as under the Codes of 1872 and 1882) offences under either section are triable by the same courts. But, as the Law Commissioners explained it, 'when false information is given upon oath, the offender is punishable under this clause, with imprisonment not exceeding three years. When the false statement amounts to false evidence as defined in s 191, the offender is punishable more severely under s 193 of the Code'.[3] Seeing that special provision is made by s 193 for false statements made in a judicial proceeding such a charge should be made under that section,[4] though a conviction under s 181 for an offence which falls under s 193 is, apparently, good.[5]

A false return on oath of the service of a summons,[6] and a false statement made on solemn affirmation before an income tax commissioner,[7] falls under s 193 .

3. Legally Bound

Section 43 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

4. Oath or Affirmation

Section 51 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

5. 'Person Authorised by Law'

The officer administering the oath or affirmation must be one who is authorised by law to administer it in the circumstances in question.[8] A criminal appeal is a continuation of the criminal case, and an appellant in an appeal against conviction has the privilege of an accused. He cannot be examined as a witness, and therefore, cannot be punished for making a false statement, being protected expressly by s 313 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[9]

Section 181 of IPC provides that a person who is legally bound by oath or affirmation to state the truth on any subject to any public servant or other person authorised by law to administer such oath or affirmation, makes to such public servant or other person any statement which is false, is liable for punishment as prescribed in the said section. Complaint was filed on allegation that the accused persons made a false declaration before the Notary Ex-Officio Sub-Registrar 1287omitting to show that the applicant is one of the heirs of S. This declaration was sought to be used by the accused for applying for getting their names mutated in the properties. There was nothing to show that the Notary Ex-officio Sub-Registrar was required to administer any oath or affirmation to the persons who made the declaration excluding the applicant from the heirs of one S. The accused persons had not committed offence under s 181, IPC .[10]

However, if an accused person when not being examined under that section for the purpose of enabling him to explain any facts apparently unfavourable to him, voluntarily gives false information to the court with the view of obtaining a transfer of the case, he commits an offence under s 182, IPC .[11]

6. Making False Statement in Affidavit

The mere swearing of an affidavit does not make the statement contained therein a piece of evidence which a court would be bound to admit in a judicial proceeding. In receiving the statement, the officer before whom the affidavit is sworn is not receiving something which is intrinsically evidence and is, therefore, not acting in the exercise of any authority to receive evidence. Such an officer does not satisfy the definition in s 3, Oaths Act 1988 of a court or person authorised to administer oaths and affirmations, and the false statement is not caught up under this section.[12] For further discussion on the topic, notes under ss 191 - 193 may be referred to.

7. 'Or Does not Believe to be True'

Making a statement with no knowledge one way or other as to its truth constitutes a false statement, since the person making it does not believe it to be true.[13]

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable and summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. The limitation prescribed for this offence is three years.

Where the accused was facing a charge before the trial court under s 181, IPC, he moved the High Court by a petition filed under s 482, CrPC, which was allowed and criminal proceedings were quashed. The appeal was filed before the Supreme Court where the accused appellant agreed to withdraw the petition from the High Court under s 482, CrPC, which was ordered to be dismissed as withdrawn by the Apex Court without prejudice to the right of the accused appellant and prosecution to raise whatever contentions they propose to raise in the case which shall be decided by the trial court untrammelled by any observation made by the earlier order of the trial court or the order of the High Court.[14]

9. Complaint

No court shall take cognizance of an offence under this section except on a complaint of the public servant concerned or of some other public servant to whom he is subordinate.[15] The complaint for the offence under s 181, IPC, is not covered by the provisions in cl (b) of sub-s (1) of s 195, CrPC ; on the other hand, it is covered by the provision in cl (a) of sub-s (1) of s 195, CrPC . Therefore, not serving a show cause notice and not venturing into an inquiry under s 340, CrPC, for the offence under s 181, IPC, is not violative of the procedural law.[16] Even if the complaint is false but an offence as alleged is made out, the officer competent to file the complaint is only the magistrate or his official supervisor which anyhow the sub-inspector is not. He had no business to usurp the powers.[17] Commentary under s 172, ante may be referred to.

10. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you(*) on or about the..... day of..... at ..... being legally bound by an oath (or affirmation) to state the truth, on a certain subject, to wit,..... to a public servant (or person) authorised by law to administer such oath (or affirmation), did make to such public servant (or person) as aforesaid, touching that subject, a statement which was false, and which you knew (or believed to be) false, to wit..... and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 181 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

11. Joinder of charges

The case of each person accused must be inquired into separately and if committed for trial, each accused must be separately tried.[18]

(a) to do or omit anything which such public servant ought not to do or omit if the true state of facts respecting which such information is given were known by him; or
(b) to use the lawful power of such public servant to the injury or annoyance of any person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

(a) A informs a Magistrate that Z, a police-officer, subordinate to such Magistrate, has been guilty of neglect of duty or misconduct, knowing such information to be false, and knowing it to be likely that the information will cause the Magistrate to dismiss Z. A has committed the offence defined in this section.
(b) A falsely informs a public servant that Z has contraband salt in a secret place, knowing such information to be false, and knowing that it is likely that the consequence of the information will be a search of Z's premises, attended with annoyance to Z. A has committed the offence defined in this section.
(c) A falsely informs a policeman that he has been assaulted and robbed in the neighbourhood of a particular village. He does not mention the name of any person as one of his assailants, but knows it to be likely that in consequence of this information the police will make enquiries and institute searches in the village to the annoyance of the villagers or some of them. A has committed an offence under this section.] 1290

1. Scope and Applicability

This section relates only to cases of information given to an official with the intention of causing, or with knowledge that it is likely to cause, that official to do or omit to do something, which he ought not to do or omit to do, or to use his lawful power to the injury or annoyance of any person. This is a distinct offence from the one described in s 211, which relates to an attempt to put the criminal courts in motion against another person.[20]

To make out a case under s 182, IPC the following ingredients are to be proved:

(i) An information was given by a person to a public servant.
(ii) The information was given by a person who knows or believes such statement to be false.
(iii) Such information was given with an intention to cause or knowing it to be likely to cause (a) such public servant to do, or not to do anything if the true state of facts respecting which such information is given were known by him, or (b) to use the lawful power of such public servant to the injury or annoyance of any person.[21]

The fact that the public servant did not, in fact, do or omit to do anything, or did not use his lawful power in consequence is not a deciding factor. The guilt of the accused lies in his intention or knowledge, and a man's intention or knowledge must be judged from his acts and the surrounding circumstances.[22] The criminality, contemplated by the section, does not depend upon which is done by the public servant on such false information.[23]

The offence is, therefore, complete when the false information has been knowingly given, with one or other of the intentions specified in cll (a) and (b), and, being complete, then the offender may be prosecuted at once under the section.[24]

The section penalises only the giving of false information to a public servant and not withholding information.[25] The information need not necessarily be of the 1291commission of a cognizable offence. When a false report is made to the police, the question in deciding as to whether it amounts to an offence under this section is not whether the report is one of a cognizable crime but whether it is of such a nature as might be supposed to lead the police to make use of their lawful powers to the injury or annoyance of any person.[26]

The information given must be false to the knowledge or belief of the informant. The section does not necessarily impose upon the person giving information to the officer, criminal liability for mere want of caution before giving that information. There must be positive and conscious falsehood established.[27]

As has been mentioned earlier, the section contemplates two intentions on the part of the person giving the false information, the intention to cause or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause such public servant to do or omit to do some act, the intention to cause or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause a public servant to use his lawful power to the injury or annoyance of any person or persons. In the first case, the offence falls under cl (a) in which case the intention may not be that the public servant should act on the false information to the injury or annoyance of any person. The intention may be that the public servant should omit to do something which he ought not to omit. In the second case falling under cl (b) the intention is that the public servant should act on the false information and exercise his lawful power to the injury or annoyance of any person.[28]

2. Legislative Changes

This section was substituted for the original by s 1 of the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 3 of 1895. Prior to the amendment, cl (b) came first as cl (a), and cl (a) came second as cl (b). In the new section, illust (c) is newly added. Before this amendment, the Calcutta[29] and Madras[30]High Courts held that for the application of the section there must be some particular person against whom the information is levelled and that the act done must tend to do some direct and immediate prejudice of that person. These views were dissented from by the Bombay High Court in Queen-Empress v Ganesh Khanderao .[31] By adding illust (c), the legislature makes it clear that they did not express the intention to the legislature, and that the information need not be levelled against any particular person or persons and the informant would be liable under this section, if he knew it to be likely that in consequence of the information, the public servant would use his lawful power to the injury or annoyance of some person or persons.

3. Ingredients

The ingredients of the offence under this section are:[32]

(i) the giving of false information;
(ii) to a public servant;
(iii) which the informant knew or believed to be false; and
(iv) which he gave to influence the public servant (a) to act otherwise than he would have acted, or (b) to use his lawful power to the injury or annoyance of any person.[33]

4. Hoaxes

There may be many cases which in truth may be cases of hoaxes, which would still come within this section. For example, suppose a man, knowing the statement to be untrue, but intending the magistrate to act upon it, informed the magistrate of the district that a violent fire was raging in a city in the district of which he had charge. Now, if the magistrate believed that statement, he would naturally send as many police as he could spare to assist in quelling the fire and keeping order. He might possibly also ask for the assistance of the military if there were any in the neighbourhood. That would be a perfect example of a hoax, and it would come within the section whether or not the magistrate acts upon the information.[34]

5. Moral Turpitude

An offence under s 182, IPC, whether falling under cll (a) or (b), is an offence involving moral turpitude.[35]

6. Imputability and Deception

The offence consists in the giving of false information with intent to mislead a public servant, and is complete whether the public servant was or was not misled. The imputability consists in the consciousness that the deception is practised upon a public servant in contempt of his authority as such and that he might thereby be induced to do what he ought not to do in the discharge of his duty as a public servant so as to prejudice the public interest.[36]

7. Relative Scope of Sections 177, 182, 201 And 203

Section 177 renders punishable the furnishing of false information to a public servant by a person 'legally bound' to furnish information. Sections 182 and 203 refer to the giving of information, which has been held to mean the volunteering of information, to a public servant.[37]Section 182 refers to the giving of any false information with 1293the particular intent specified in the section, while s 203 refers to the giving of false information respecting the commission of an offence committed. Sections 201 and 203, IPC, contemplate giving information respecting an offence which the accused person knows or believes to be false. For the offence under s 201, the false information should also be furnished with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment. Unlike this section which deals with giving false information to any public servant, ss 201 and 203 do not refer as to whom false information should be given; it would take in private persons as well as public servants including the police.[38]

8. Distinction between Sections 182, 499 and 500

The ingredients of the offence under s 182 cannot be said to be the ingredients for the offence under s 500 . Nor can it be said that the offence relating to giving false information relates to the same group of offences as that of defamation. Offences under s 500 can be tried without sanction under s 195, CrPC .[39]Section 499 deals with defamation per se, and says nothing about where, why, or when the imputation is made so the law would appear to apply in exactly the same way whether the imputation is made in a court of justice or before some other public servant or anywhere else. Section 195 , CrPC, lay down that a court shall not take cognizance of certain offences under certain sections except on the complaint in writing of the public servant concerned to that court or some other court to which the first court is subordinate and so on, but s 500 is not mentioned in s 195, CrPC . To s 499 there are 10 exceptions; it would have been quite easy for the legislature to have inserted an 11th exception saying that when the defamation is made in a statement to a public servant or in court proceedings by virtue of which the offence was punishable under ss 182 or 211, IPC or some other section, then no prosecution under s 500 would lie. But there is no such extra exception.[40] Thus bar of s 195, CrPC is attracted to ss 182, 211, IPC but not to s 500, IPC .

9. Relative Scope of Sections 182 and 191

Unlike s 191, the scope of this section is restricted. Whereas s 191 also makes it an offence on the part of the accused to make a statement which he does not believe to be true, this section does not make it so.[41] To constitute an offence punishable under this section it is necessary that the information given should be information which the accused person knows or believes to be false. It is not sufficient that he had reason to believe it to be false, or that he did not believe it to be true, there must have been positive knowledge or belief that it is false.[42]

11. Distinction between Sections 182 and 211

Commentary under the same heading in s 211, post may be referred to.

Section 211 and this section have many elements in common and the question, whether an information of this nature falls under s 211 or this section, has been the subject of debate in various High Courts and their view is not unanimous. The Bombay High Court in Apaya Tatoba v Emperor ,[43] held that criminal law makes a clear distinction between a false charge which comes under s 211 and false information given to the police, which comes under this section. The distinction has been drawn thus:

> If the information conveyed to the police amounts to the false institution of criminal proceedings against a defined person, or amount to the falsely charging of a defined person with an offence, then the person giving such information is guilty of an offence under s 211 . In such a case this is not the appropriate section under which to frame a charge. Section 182, when read with s 211, must be understood as referring to cases where the information given to the public servant falls short of amounting to an institution of criminal proceedings against a defined person and falls short of amounting to the falsely charging of defined person with an offence.

The Allahabad, Calcutta and Madras High Courts have taken a different view. The Calcutta High Court has held that a prosecution for a false charge may lie under ss 182 or 211, but if the false charge is a serious one, the graver s 211 should be applied.[44] The Madras High Court has also held that there is no error in a conviction under s 182, when the false charge made before the police is punishable under s 211 .[45] Many of the High Courts have taken the view that an offence may fall under both sections. It is said that an offence under s 211 includes an offence under s 182, and that therefore, it is open to a magistrate to proceed under either section, although in cases of a more serious nature, it may be that the proper course is to proceed under s 211 .[46]

The view of the Allahabad High Court was expressed by Edge CJ, in Queen-Empress v Raghu Tiwari ,[47] in the following words:

> Although it is difficult to see what case could arise under section 211 to which section 182 could not be applied yet section 182 would apply to a case which might not fall under section 211 . The offence under section 182 is complete when false information is given to a public servant by a person who believes it to be false, but who intends thereby to cause such public servant to institute criminal proceedings against a third person. The offence is complete although the public servant takes no step towards the institution of such criminal proceedings. In our opinion it is in such a case, not at all necessary that the public servant should take any step whatever on the false information 1295before instituting and prosecuting to a conclusion a charge under section 182 against the person who had given such false information...In cases to which section 211 especially applies and in which a criminal proceeding has been instituted a court should in our opinion, as a rule proceed to determine such criminal proceeding instituted it and should give the person instituting such proceeding a reasonable opportunity of supporting his case before proceeding against him for an offence under section 211 ...It appears to us that it has been left to the discretion of the court to determine when and under what circumstances prosecutions should be proceeded with under sections 182 and 211 .

It has been held that an offence falling under this section is included in the more serious offences falling under s 211 ; and a prosecution for a false charge may be either under this section or s 211, though clearly if s 211 does apply and the false charge is serious, prosecution should be under the more serious s 211 . However, this does not mean that where an offence under s 182 is complete and the prosecution is lodged, the proceeding must subsequently be quashed because the accused; not content with the false report to the police, subsequently makes a false complaint to a magistrate in addition and thereby exposes himself to a prosecution under s 211, IPC .[48]

Where a false report has been made to the police, and a similar complaint subsequently to the magistrate, a proceeding under s 182 can be instituted by the police in reference to the false report made to them.[49] The petitioner filed a complaint against the opposite party alleging that his son was kidnapped by the opposite party. The kidnapped boy appeared before the Court and stated that he was not kidnapped by the opposite party but that he himself had gone voluntarily to marry a girl. The girl in statement under s 164, CrPC also stated that she had married the petitioner's son. The petitioner had filed a false case of kidnapping. Cognizance of the offences under ss 182 and 211, CrPC taken by the Magistrate was held proper.[50]

However, as already pointed out, the Bombay High Court has taken a different view and held that the offence under s 182 is a distinct offence from that under s 211 .

In Raghavendra v Kashinath Bhat ,[51] Ranade J, observed:

> The criminal law makes a clear distinction between a false charge which falls under section 211 of the Penal Code, and false information given to the police, in which latter case the offence falls under section 182 of the same Code. If plaintiff in the present case had chosen to prosecute the offender under section 182, it would not have been necessary for him to prove malice and want of probable or reasonable cause, except so far as they were implied in the act of giving information known to be false, with the knowledge or likelihood that such information would lead a public servant to use his power to the injury or annoyance of the complainant. In an inquiry under section 211, on the other hand, proof of the absence of just and lawful ground for making the charge is an important element.

In Emperor v Ram Krishna Yeshwant Adarkar ,[52] Batty J, delivering the judgement of the court, observed:

> Section 182 relates only to cases of information given to officials with the intention of causing or with knowledge that it is likely to cause, that official to do or omit to do something which he ought not to do or omit to do, or to use his lawful power to the 1296injury or annoyance of any person. This is a distinct offence from that described in section 211 , Indian Penal Code, which relates to an attempt to put the criminal courts in motion against another person. The action which section 211 , Indian Penal Code, renders penal is action entailing very serious consequences, and therefore the more serious consideration is required of the individual who takes it. It is sufficient, therefore, in such cases for the prosecution to prove, not merely absence of reasonable or probable cause for giving the information, but a positive knowledge or belief of the falsity of the information given.

Again in Apaya Totoba Mande v Emperor ,[53] Batchelor J, of the Bombay High Court observed:

> The mere words of section 182, if they stood alone, are wide enough to cover the case where the information conveyed to a Police Officer amounts to a direct charge of an offence as 'offence' is defined in the Penal Code; but section 182 is to be interpreted not in isolation but in association with section 211, and, if the wording of the two sections is contrasted, the different circumstances provided for by both seem to me to be fairly easy of ascertainment. It appears to me that where the information conveyed to the police amounts to the institution of > criminal proceedings against a defined person, with an offence as 'offence' is defined in the Penal Code, then the person giving such information has committed an offence punishable under section 211 . In such case section 211 is, and section 182 is not, the appropriate section under which to frame the charge... section 182, when read with section 211, must be understood as referring to cases where the information given to the public servant falls short of amounting to the institution of criminal proceedings against a defined person and falls short of amounting to the false charging of a defined person with an offence as defined in the Penal Code. The distinction is substantial.

In one case,[54] Mulla J, of the Allahabad High Court held that an accused can commit both offences under ss 182 and 211 in the pursuit of the same purpose one after the other but their circles are clearly separated and they do not overlap each other.

The Punjab Chief Court also followed the Bombay High Court and held that the two offences are essentially distinct.[55]

For an offence under s 182, IPC, it is only necessary that the information given by the accused to a public servant should be false to his knowledge, whereas to constitute an offence under s 211, IPC, it is necessary that the accused should institute or cause to be instituted some criminal proceedings against another person or should falsely charge him with having committed an offence.[56] The essence of an offence under s 182 is not the falseness of the information, as it is the essence of an offence under s 211, but the contempt of the lawful authority of the public servant.[57]

It may also be noted that the offence, if any, constituted by a false complaint against unknown persons is not one under s 211, but under this section.[58]

A person who falsely informs the police that he has been robbed by a particular person is guilty of an offence under s 211 and not under s 182 .[59]1297

Section 211 applies only when a person institutes or causes to be instituted, criminal proceedings against any person, or falsely charges any person with having committed an offence. A person actually institutes criminal proceedings within the meaning of s 211 upon making a complaint as defined in s 2(d), CrPC . In order to render an allegation a complaint, it must be made with a view to a magistrate taking action under the CrPC . In the absence of a definite prayer asking the court to take such action, there must be clear proof that that was the intention of the complainant. The words 'falsely charged' in s 211 must be read with the preceding words of that section and imply a false charge to a person in authority made with a view to setting the law in motion. The question here again is one of intention. In the absence of proof that the intention of the person giving the information was to set the criminal law in motion against the person charged, the case would fall under s 182 and not s 211 .[60]

However, if the motive was to induce the public servant not merely to do what he would not otherwise have done but to take specific action of investigating the offence and prosecuting the person complained against, the only section which is appropriate and which must be applied is s 211 ; and it would be obviously anomalous and in every respect undesirable if the law were that simply because an offence under s 182 is also disclosed and because for the trial of such an offence a written complaint from a public servant is necessary, the court should be debarred from inquiring into the real nature of the offence which comes within s 211 .[61] But where a person gives false information to the police and subsequently files a complaint to a magistrate to the same effect and allows the proceedings thereon to be dropped, the mere fact that a complaint has been made does not bar the police officer to whom the false information was given from making a complaint of an offence under s 182 .[62]

It is true that the offence under s 182 is distinct from the one under s 211 though the latter is more serious and may include the offence under the former section. The magistrate can take cognizance of an offence under s 182 on a complaint in writing of the police officer by virtue of the provisions contained in s 195(1)(a), CrPC . However, it would virtually lead to the circumvention of the provisions of s 195(1)(b) if the proceedings under s 182 can continue, where the offence disclosed is covered by s 211, IPC, and a complaint is pending which has been filed by the informant on the same facts and allegations as were contained in his first information report. On a parity of reasoning with regard to an offence under s 211, IPC, no cognizance can be taken by the magistrate for the alleged offence under s 193 of the Penal Code which is one of the sections mentioned in s 195(1)(b) .[63] Once a complaint, filed by an informant, is being proceeded with which is based on the same facts and allegations on which the first information report was registered, it is not open to a magistrate to take cognizance of any offence alleged to have been committed under s 211, IPC, unless there has been a proper complaint with the provisions of s 195(1)(b), CrPC .[64]1298

12. Distinction between Sections 211 and 182 Summarised

In a comparatively recent case the Madras High Court has held that s 182, IPC, deals with the offence of giving false information to a public servant, thereby intending such public servant to use his lawful power to the injury, or annoyance, of any person. Section 211 of the IPC deals with the offence of instituting, or causing to be instituted, any criminal proceeding against any person, or falsely charging any person for having committed an offence with intent to cause injury to any person knowing that there was no just or lawful ground for such proceeding or charge against that person. Section 182 of the IPC deals with a lesser offence while s 211 of the IPC refers to a graver offence. If the information conveyed to the police amounts to the institution of criminal proceeding against a defined person or amounts to falsely charging of a defined person with an offence, then the person giving such information is guilty of an offence under s 211 of the IPC . In such a case, s 211 is, and s 182 is not, the proper section under which a charge has to be framed. Section 182 read with s 211 of the IPC must be understood as referring to cases where the information, given to the public servant, falls short of amounting to an institution of criminal proceeding against a defined person with an offence as defined in the Penal Code. When a person specifically complains that another man committed an offence and does so falsely with the object of causing injury to that person, he is guilty of making a false charge of an offence under s 211, and not under s 182 of the IPC . Where the complainant has given a complaint of theft of cash and other articles from his house against a defined person, who was formerly employed under him, and the complaint has turned out to be false, the case falls under s 211, IPC, and not under s 182, IPC . Further, when a complaint sets forth certain facts disclosing minor offence as also a graver offence, the prosecution should ordinarily be for the graver offence.[65]

13. When Offence is Covered under Section 211, Proceedings under Section 182 cannot Continue

Commentary under same heading in s 211, post may be referred to.

14. 'Whoever Gives'

It is only the person who gives the false information to a public servant that can be held liable under this section.

Where a false report of a theft was made at the police station by one S and U was with him when the report was made, U cannot be held to have committed the offence, as he himself did not make the report.[66]

In a similar case, however, Stuart CJ, observed:

> This report was made, as is clear from the proceedings, by Ram Jiawan and Ram Naresh jointly. Ram Jiawan first stated the story and Ram Naresh corroborated him. But even if Ram Jiawan alone had told the story and Ram Naresh had said nothing, both the men were clearly guilty on the facts: Ram Jiawan under the provisions of section 182 and Ram Naresh for abetment, having engaged with Ram Jiawan in a conspiracy to make a false 1299report and the false report having been made in pursuance of the conspiracy. In respect of the > decision of the late Mr Justice Karamat Hussain which is reported in Umrao Singh v King-Emperor ,[67] it is sufficient to say that I do not agree with the view which he took. He laid down that it was impossible for any person to be convicted in respect of a false report unless false report had been taken down from his dictation.68

Mere Spectator

It is difficult to understand how the other man can be made liable if he was only a spectator and there is nothing to indicate that he associated with the person who actually made the false report or investigated or conspired with or aided him.

Where an application containing false allegations is made by a person purporting to act on behalf of his father, but there is nothing to show that the father instructed the son to make the application, the father cannot be prosecuted for an offence under this section.[69]

Scribe of the Report

Where the false information is contained in an application said to have been made by the accused, it must be proved that he made the application, otherwise he cannot be convicted of the offence under this section. The mere writer of the application who had no reason to suppose that the allegations in it were false, cannot be held guilty under this section.[70]

15. Meaning of 'Information'

The word 'information' is not defined either in the IPC or the CrPC . It simply means the communication of any intelligence or knowledge of facts. A mere expression of a private person's belief or opinion[71] or suspicion,[72] is not information within the meaning of this section.

Information as contemplated by s 182 need not be in writing or be reduced to writing, it may be oral.[73]

16. 'Gives any Information'--Signature on Information not Necessary

The expression 'gives any information' occurs also in s 203, and has been interpreted to mean 'volunteers information'.[74]Section 177 uses the word 'furnishes' instead of 'gives' when the informant is bound to furnish the information. There seems to be no authority for asserting that a person cannot be said to give information under s 182 unless he actually signs the document giving the information.[75]1300

The section penalises only the giving of false information to a public servant and not the withholding of information.[76]

17. Information Given in Answer to Question

It has been held in some cases that the plain ordinary meaning of the expression 'gives information' is to volunteer information and not to make statements in answer to questions put by the public servant.[77] But in these cases, except in the Rangoon case, the statements were made in answer to questions put by the police during investigation under s 161, CrPC, and the questions whether or not they amount to information under this section will be presently considered in the following note. In the Rangoon case,[78] it was held that a statement of a witness called for the defence of a departmental inquiry cannot, in general, form the basis of a conviction under this section. Distinguishing these rulings, it has been held in a number of cases that there is nothing to justify the reading in of the word 'voluntarily' before the word 'gives' in this section,[79] that there is no reason to insert in the statutory provisions of this section words that are not there, and thus to restrict unduly the meaning of the words and to reduce the efficacy of the section in dealing with the mischief it was designed to deal with[80] and that any false information given to a public servant with the intention mentioned in this section is punishable under that section whether the information is volunteered by the informant or given in answer to questions put to him.[81] There is no reason why the word 'information' in this section be understood to refer only to a first information recorded under s 154, CrPC . It is used in the section with reference not to a police officer in particular but to any public servant.[82] In Queen-Empress v Ramji Sajabarao ,[83] it was held that false information given to a forest officer, a public servant, in answers given to questions put by him in the course of an inquiry was punishable under this section.[84] When questions are put to a person, he is bound, if at all, to answer them truthfully and correctly; otherwise it is open to him not to answer the questions if he so liked. But if he gives a false reply, he gives false information and is liable under this section, whether the statement is made voluntarily or in answer to questions put to him.[85]

18. Volunteer Information

Whether answers given to questions put by a police officer in the course of an investigation are punishable under this section or not, the words 'gives information' should not be interpreted as necessarily meaning 'volunteer information' i.e., that it 1301must be information on some matter which is not already under inquiry by the public servant.[86]

Reviewing the entire case-law on the subject, a division bench of the Kerala High Court has observed:

> We are not inclined to give that restricted meaning of 'volunteer' to the word 'give'. For instance, if a police officer has reason to suspect the commission of a cognizable offence, he can investigate the case under section 157 for the discovery and arrest of the offender. During such investigation he may find a person who gives him the required information in answer to questions put him. There is nothing to prevent that officer from recording that information under the provisions of section 154 and proceeding with the investigation of the case and if that information is proved to be false the person can be prosecuted. That was what happened in Kalawati's case[87] and their Lordships of the Supreme Court found her guilty of the offence under section 201 , IPC .[88]

19. Statements Under Section 161 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

It is not disputed that if any person gives the first information statement to the police which is recorded under s 154, CrPC, and if it ultimately turns out to be false, it would amount to giving false information and the offender would be punishable under s 182, 201 or 203, IPC provided the requisite intention is proved.[89]

There is conflict of judicial opinion whether information referred to in these sections if given to the police would refer only to information under s 154, CrPC, or whether they would refer to statements recorded by the police during the course of investigation also. In some cases, it has been held that the words 'public servant' in this section sufficiently cover a police officer and that a reasonable interpretation of the words of this section is to include information even if it is given to a police officer in the course of an investigation under s 161, CrPC, in reply to questions put by him.[90] These cases may be distinguished on the ground that they do not relate to statements under s 161, CrPC . On the other hand, it has been held in a number of cases that a statement made by a witness to the police under the provisions of s 161, CrPC, is not 'information given to a public servant' within the meaning of s 182, IPC .[91] Reviewing the entire case-law on the subject, a division bench of the Kerala High Court in State of Kerala v Markose ,[92] observed:1302

> Section 161 CrPC provides for the recording of statements of person acquainted with the facts and > circumstances of the case by the police officer making the investigation. A statement so recorded must be distinguished from one constituting the information which starts the investigation, and it has been distinguished in section 162 by being described as a statement made by any person to a police officer in the course of an 1303investigation. Under the Criminal Procedure Code of 1882, the public were no doubt bound to answer 'truly' all questions put to them by the police while investigating a cognizable case. If, therefore, they answered falsely, they could have been then prosecuted under section 193 of the Code. But this obligation of answering 'truly' no longer exists, and if they could be punished under sections 182 , 201 or 203, IPC, it would render nugatory the policy which dictated the amendment of the Criminal Procedure Code by the removal of the word 'truly' from section 162 of the Criminal Procedure Code .

That is why Irwin CJ, in King-Emperor v Nga Aung Po ,[1] observed that as persons examined by the police can no longer be punished for giving false evidence, it would be mere evasion of law to hold them liable under s 182, IPC . It also seems to us unfair that a man should be liable to be convicted of giving false information on the strength of a statement given to a police officer which is not given on oath, which he has not signed, and which he has had no opportunity of verifying. As is well known, such statements are hurriedly taken down as rough notes and the police officer is not trained in taking evidence. We are aware of the force of the argument of the learned public prosecutor of not imposing a liability on persons who give false information to the police with the object of laying false trails or causing the inquiry to be burked or weaken the prosecution and thereby injuriously interfere with public justice but justice as well as expediency demand that a ban be placed on prosecutions based on statements made to the police during investigation.

20. Statements made by Accused--Such Statement is not Information

Neither can statement made by an accused person for purposes of his defence be held to be information given to a public servant within the meaning of this section,[2] nor can a false statement made by him in a petition of appeal.[3] A criminal appeal is a continuance of the criminal case, and, except so far as there is a provision to the contrary, the appellant has the privilege of the accused and cannot be punished for making a false statement under s 313, CrPC .[4]

A false statement made by an accused person when being examined under s 313, CrPC is not information given to a public servant within the meaning of this section. However, if a person is not examined in his capacity as an accused, a false statement made by him would render him liable under it.[5]

21. Statements of Accused on Oath in Support of an Application for Transfer

It has been held in some cases that no one can be prosecuted in respect of false statements made by him in an affidavit for the purpose of a revision,[6] or transfer of a case in which he was an accused person.[7] But, dissenting from this view, it has been held that an application for transfer is not a part of the defence of an accused person 1304and statements made by an accused person in an affidavit in support of such an application do not enjoy the immunity conferred by s 342, (now s 313) CrPC, upon answers to questions put to the accused by the court trying the case.[8]

22. 'To any Public Servant'

For the meaning of 'public servant' refer to s 21 and the commentary thereunder. A head constable is a public servant within the meaning of this section.[9] By the Railways Act 1989, a railway servant, i.e., any person employed by a railway administration in connection with the service of a railway (s 2(34) is deemed a public servant for the purposes of ch 9 of this Code.[10]

There is no provision in the Code which constitutes it an offence to lodge a false complaint in a foreign court or to give false evidence before such court where the oath is not administered under the provisions of law in force in India, but under the law of that state in relation to proceedings before that court. No offence under this section, can be made out where it is not suggested that the false information was given to a public servant as defined by this Code, quite apart from the consideration that it was given without and beyond India.[11]

23. Indirect Communication of Information to Public Servant--When an Offence

It constitutes an offence under this section if a false complaint with evil intention is made to a village magistrate for the purpose of being passed on to a station house officer, and which it is his bounden duty so to pass on. Information given to A for the purpose of being passed on to B (a public servant), and which it was his bounden duty so to pass on, must be considered as having been given, and intended to be given, to B.[12] It would, of course, be different if the false information was given to someone who was under no legal obligation to take any action upon it.[13]

24. Indirect Communication of Information to Public Servant--When Not an Offence

The accused, a liquor shop man in India, reported to his master that the excise inspector had asked him for money and had watered some liquor in the shop with a view to getting him into trouble. The master as intended by the shop man reported the matter to the collector, who after causing an inquiry to be made gave the excise inspector permission under s 195(a), CrPC, to prosecute the shopman under this section, in order to clear his own character. It was held that the accused was not 1305guilty of the offence as the false information was not given by him to a public servant, but to his own master.[14]

Where the accused swore an affidavit containing false statements in support of an application by a complainant for transfer of her case and handed it over to the complainant's pleader for filing it in court, it was held that even if the accused was the son of the complainant and made the statements to her pleader on her behalf, he could not be held to have himself made the statements in court when the affidavit was filed, inasmuch as the pleader was not his agent but represented his mother and she could have asked the pleader not to file the affidavit in court.[15]

25. 'Information which he Knows or Believes to be False'

To establish an offence under this section there must, in the first instance, be legal proof that the information given to the public servant was false. The mere opinion of the investigating officer on the point cannot be treated as legal evidence and cannot be made the basis of a finding.[16] It must further be proved that the accused knew or believed it to be false and he gave it with such knowledge or belief.[17] To establish the offence, the prosecution must show, not merely that the accused gave the information, but that it was false and that the accused knew or believed it to be false. A mere denial on oath by the person against whom the alleged false information was given is not sufficient to prove the offence.[18]

The appellant had filed a complaint against her in-laws for dowry demand and harassment under s 498A, IPC, and her brother-in-law was the Senior Superintendent of Police (respondent no. 3). No case was registered but complaint was filed against the appellant under s 182, IPC for filing false report. Held, the investigating officer failed to show that the appellant had given information which she was knowing and believing to be false. In the investigation report it was not reported that the appellant was knowing that the information given was false but still gave the information to harass the respondent. Thus, the proceedings under s 182 were quashed.[19]

26. Difficult to Prove Knowledge--Reasonable Inference--Burden not to be Laid on Accused

To constitute the offence, it is also necessary that the information given is information which the accused person knew or believed to be false. It is not sufficient that he had reason to believe it to be false, or that he did not believe it to be true; there must have been positive knowledge or belief that it was false.[20] To bring the case within this section, it is necessary for the prosecution to prove, not merely an absence of a reasonable or probable cause for giving the information but a positive 1306knowledge or belief of the falsity of the information given.[21] In Murad v Empress [22] it has been held that:

> It is not enough to find that he has acted in bad faith, that is, without due care or inquiry, or that he has acted maliciously, or that he had no sufficient reason to believe or did not believe the charge to be true. The actual falsity of the charge, recklessness in acting upon information without testing it, or scrutinising its source; actual malice towards the persons charged, they are relevant evidence more or less cogent; but the ultimate conclusion must be, in order to satisfy the definition of the offence, that the accused knew that there was no just or lawful grounds for proceeding. It may be difficult to prove this knowledge, but, however difficult it may be, it must be proved and unless it is proved, the informer must be acquitted.

To constitute the offence, it must be shown that the person giving the information knew or believed it to be false or that the circumstances in which the information was given were such that the only reasonable inference is that the person giving the information knew or believed it to be false. The fact that the information is shown to be false does not cast upon the party who is charged with an offence under this section, the burden of showing that when he made it, he believed it to be true. The prosecution must make out that the circumstances were such that the only reasonable inference was that he must have known or believed it to be false.[23] The burden of proof cannot be laid upon the accused. It is for the prosecution to show that the information given was false, and not for the accused to show that it was true.[24] The accused cannot be convicted if he fails to establish that the reported information was true. An allegation which is found not proved, is not necessarily false and false to the knowledge of the maker.[25]

27. Particular Intention or Knowledge, Essential--Act or Mission of Public Servant not Material

This section requires that information which is false or which is believed to be false is given to a public servant with a particular intention or knowledge, and if the information is known to be false and is given with the intention mentioned in the section, the offence is committed. The fact that the public servant did not, in fact, do or omit to do anything or did not use his lawful power in consequence, is not a deciding factor. The guilt of the accused lies in his intention or knowledge, and a man's intention or knowledge must be judged from his acts and the surrounding circumstances.[26] A man is presumed in law, to intend the ordinary and natural consequences of his acts, and when he falsely charges another before the police with the commission of an offence, knowing the charge to be false, there can be no doubt that he is guilty of an offence punishable under both s 182 and s 211, even though his primary object may have been to protect himself rather than to injure the person falsely charged.[27] Without the requisite intent or knowledge, there can be no offence 1307under this section.[28] The intention must be to cause the conduct specified in cl (a) or cl (b) of the section.

To put it in other words, s 182 of the IPC requires as an essential ingredient thereof, that the allegedly false information must have been given with the intention to cause, or knowing it to be likely that it will cause, a public servant in the exercise of his duties as such (a) to do or to omit anything which he ought not to do or omit, on the basis of the true facts or (b) to use his lawful power to the injury or annoyance of any person.[29]

28. Intention must not be Confused with Motive

Where the accused made a false report to the police that a burglary was committed in his house, not with the intention or knowledge specified in the section, but with the ulterior motive of suppressing certain documents by pleading that they were stolen in the burglary, it was held that he could not be held guilty of the offence under this section.[30]

29. Consequential Action not Necessary

The offence does not depend upon what is done or omitted to be done by the public servant, on such false information, the question whether the public servant was induced to do or not to do anything thereby, being absolutely immaterial so far as this section is concerned.[31] The offence is, therefore, complete when the false information has been knowingly given, with one or other of the intentions specified in cll (a) and (b), and being complete then, the offender may be prosecuted at once under this section.[32] It is thus immaterial whether or not the public servant is misled.[33] It is not necessary that action should be taken by the police on the information given. What is essential is the intention that an action be taken or the knowledge that it is likely to be taken.[34]

30. Clause (A)--Statutory Amendments

It may be noted that the marginal note to the section speaks only of 'false information with intent to cause public servant to use his lawful power to the injury of another person' which is covered by cl (b). The reason is that cl (a) did not appear in the draft of the Indian Penal Code prepared by Lord Macaulay's Commission.[35] It was subsequently added. The original clause was marked as (a) and the newly added clause as (b). But the position of the two clauses was altered when the section was amended in 1895, and what was cl (a) became cl (b), and cl (b) became cl (a).[36]1308

Under this section, the giving of false information to a public servant is made penal when either of two consequences is intended to be caused, or known to be likely to be caused, by the false information. The first is that which is described in cl (a) and the second is described in cl (b). The two consequences are quite distinct from each other. To constitute an offence under the first part, covered by cl (a), it is not necessary that the act intended, or known to be likely to be done, be to the injury or annoyance of any third person.[37] But in either case the false information must call for some action or omission on the part of the public servant to whom it is given. Thus, the making of a false report to the police alleging the disappearance of a bullock or a buffalo does not call for any action on the part of the police, as the report does not disclose any cognizable offence in which case only the police can take action. The making of such a report does not justify a conviction under this section.[38] But this does not mean that in order to constitute the offence under this section, the information should be given to a police officer and that it must relate to a cognizable offence. Illustrations (a) and (b) show that the information need not relate to an offence, cognizable or non-cognizable, punishable under the Code and that it may be given to a public servant who is not a police officer.[39]

Where the accused sold his horse but falsely reported to the police that it was stolen, it was held that in making this report, he clearly gave false information to the police which he knew to be false and he must have known that it was likely that he would thereby cause the police authorities, if they found a horse answering to his description, to take it from the possession of its rightful owner.[40]

It must be remembered that in a case under this part of the section, it is immaterial to consider the nature of the action of the public servant; the question is what action the person, who gave the false information, contemplated that the public servant would take. If the person intended and contemplated that the public servant would do some act which, had he known the true facts, he would not have done, he (the person who gave the false information) has committed an offence under this section.[41]

31. 'To do or Omit Anything'--Meaning of

The words 'to do or omit anything which such public servant ought not to do or omit' must mean, to do something which the public servant was enjoined to do in his official capacity as a public servant. If a person gives false information to a public servant, knowing it to be likely or intending that he would do something which had no connection with his office as a public servant, then the conduct of the person giving such information would not come within the purview of this section. For instance, if a person gave information to a public servant knowing it to be likely or intending that such public servant would go and beat up somebody, then it cannot be said that this offence has been committed, because it is no part of the duty of a public 1309servant to beat up people.[42] However, it cannot be said that this section applies only to a complaint to a public servant when it is made with the intention of inducing such public servant to take action of a sort which only a public servant of the description in question could take, and which would not be open to a private individual. In illust (a), the action expected to be taken by the public servant was simply the dismissal of a subordinate and any master could do the same.

Where a postman reported to the postmaster that he was beaten and robbed of his postbag by a person, and the postmaster immediately gave information to the police who inquired into the matter and reported that the complaint was false, it was held that his conviction under this section was justified, because the accused gave to a public servant (the sub-postmaster) information which the accused knew to be false intending thereby to cause the sub-postmaster to do something (viz, sending information to the police) which he ought not to have done if the true state of facts were known by him.[43]

32. 'Which such Public Servant Ought not to do or Omit', etc--Use of 'Ought' Explained

The words 'such public servant ought not to do or omit' in the section appear to resemble the words 'to use the lawful power of such public servant to the injury or annoyance of any person' only insofar as both sets of words refer to an official conduct. But the latter phrase using the word 'ought', which implies duty and excludes personal choice, covers duties imposed by more particular statutes, as well as duties arising otherwise from the status or office of the public servant. The police, for example, are bound by an express statute, to vigilance, in the prevention and detection of crime and the apprehension of offenders; the customs and excise officers are in much the same position. But other public servants, in the absence of statutes, are required by the unwritten law to exercise vigilance and care, like the ministers of the government, to give good advice, or, like judges, to hearken in their courts to the suitors and their counsel, or, like the magistrate, to suppress riots, or to comment on the misconduct of the police in cases before them.[44]The office, the honour, and the duty go together and all relate to the public welfare. Now, as the officer is bound to act in the discharge of his office in the proper circumstances, it may often be an interference with his duty, and thus dangerous to the public welfare, if through false information he is prevented from acting, or induced to act wrongly.[45]

A personating B at an examination, passes it and obtains a certificate in B's name. B files the certificate along with an application to the assistant collector to have his name entered in a list of candidates for service in the revenue department, and on the strength of the certificate, B's name is registered. B is guilty of an offence under cl (a) of this section.[46]

A makes a false charge of theft to a village magistrate. This is an offence under cl (a) read with s 45(c) (now s 40(1)(c) of the Code of Criminal Procedure .[47]1310

Request to do an Illegal Act not within the Purview of this Section

It has been held that cl (a) of this section applies to a case in which it is intended that a public servant should do or omit to do something which he ought to do or omit to do if the facts were true, that is, which he would be legally justified in doing or omitting to do if the facts before him were true. Asking a magistrate to do an act which would be an illegal act even if true facts were stated to him, would not come within the purview of the section. The information must be information regarding a fact which would induce the magistrate to do something which he would be legally competent to do if he had been cognizant of the true facts. Where, therefore, the accused petitioned the district magistrate praying that as certain tenants occupying his houses had absconded, leaving the houses locked up, the houses might be unlocked to enable him to execute the necessary repairs, and the application was sent for compliance and report to the police, who reported that the allegations contained in the petition were untrue, it was held that this section was inapplicable to the circumstances of the case.[48] But dissenting from this, in a parallel case the Peshawar judicial commissioner's court had observed:

> It appears to me to be a reductio ad obsurdum of section 182 , Indian Penal Code, to hold that when a person gives false information to a public servant deliberately asking that public servant to take certain action, he is not punishable under this section because the public servant was not legally entitled to take the action requested. It would be more than ever reductio ad obsurdum in a case like the present one where the application was nothing unusual, but was one of a kind constantly made to magistrates on which magistrates were in the habit of taking the action requested. The applicant believed that the magistrate had power to take the action requested and the magistrate himself believed it. So far as the point goes, therefore, I cannot but hold that the persons making an application of this nature based upon deliberately false information are certainly liable to prosecution under section 182 , Indian Penal Code .[49]

Making Investigation does not Affect the Falsity of Report

In a later case, where a report of a burglary was made to the police and on investigation the report was found to be false, it was held that it cannot be said that making the investigation is an act which ought not to have been done if the true facts were known. There is no law or rule requiring a public servant not to make an investigation in certain circumstances. In the absence of a positive law or rule requiring him not to make an investigation if he knew that a certain report was false, lodging a false report intending to cause, or knowing it likely to cause, him to make an investigation would not constitute an offence.[50] An accused who makes a false statement in his petition of appeal, cannot be held to have committed an offence under this section, even assuming that the false statement was made with the object of inducing and that it did induce, the appellate court to send for the record of the case, as it cannot be said that the court was thereby induced to do what it ought not to have done.[51] Similarly, a person who makes a false statement in his petition cannot be held to have committed the offence simply because his claim is not substantiated, even assuming that some false statement, which was not directly the subject of complaint, was made with the object of inducing and that it did induce the court to 1311take some action, as it cannot be said that the court was thereby induced to do what it ought not to have done.[52]

Action Contemplated and not Taken is Material

It must be remembered that in a case under this part of the section, it is immaterial to consider the nature of the action of the public servant; the question is what action the person who gave the false information contemplated that the public servant would take. If the person intended and contemplated that the public servant would do some act which, had he known the true facts, he would not have done, he (the person who gave the false information) has committed an offence under this section.[53]

Giving Wrong Identity Falls within the Mischief

Where on being questioned by a superintendent of police, the accused, driving a motor car without licence, gave him a fictitious name as that of himself, it was held that the accused, by giving a false name must have intended to cause, or have known that he would be likely to cause, the superintendent of police to prosecute a fictitious person or to omit prosecuting the real offender, and even if the intention of the accused was to put obstruction or difficulty in the way of the police officer taking action against himself, the false information given by him came within the mischief of s 182(a), and that what the superintendent of police actually did was immaterial.[54]

33. Clause (B)--Test to be Applied

To bring a case within this clause, the intention or knowledge of the informant must be to procure the exercise of the lawful power of the public servant to the injury or annoyance of any person. Whether a case falls under this clause or not depends upon the answer to the question as to whether the information given to the public servant was of such a nature as might be supposed to lead the public servant to make use of his lawful powers to the injury or annoyance of any person.[55] Where the accused in a petition of resignation made to the collector, made certain false allegations against another person in order to forestall any proceeding which that other person might take against him, but he never intended the collector to use his powers to the injury or annoyance of that person, it was held that the accused was not guilty of the offence under this section.[56]

The accused appeared before the district magistrate and made certain allegation against a police officer, but added that he did not wish to make an inquiry so as to prevent the police officer from behaving tyrannically towards him. It was held that the accused was guilty, not under s 193, but under this section.[57]

So also where the accused said to an officer 'I find there has been a theft, I suspect the persons named and I want an inquiry to be made', it was held that it was not a false charge within the meaning of s 211, but if it was false, it was a false report made to the officer under s 182 .[58]1312

In these two cases, the question as to whether the accused intended the public servant to use his lawful powers to the injury or annoyance of the third person was not considered.

34. 'To use the Lawful Power of Such Public Servant'

The expression 'such public servant' in the two clauses of the section refers to the public servant to whom the false information is given with the intention specified in the two clauses.[59] Information given to A (a village magistrate or headman) for the purpose of being passed on to B (the police station-house officer), which it was his duty so to pass on, must be considered as having been given to B.[60] In the case last cited, the case of Queen v Periannan [61] was distinguished and dissented from. In that case also information of an offence was given to a village magistrate who reported the matter at the police station, and the station house officer after an inquiry, referred the case as false to the sub-magistrate and also asked for a sanction to prosecute the informant under this section. The sub-magistrate ordered the sanction and subsequently, himself tried and convicted the accused (informant) under this section. The district magistrate, however, took the view that the proceedings were illegal on two grounds: (a) that the village magistrate to whom the information was given had no powers in the case, (b) that the sub-magistrate had no power to give sanction as he was not the public servant to whom the information was given. The High Court did not concur in the opinion of the district magistrate and refused to interfere with the conviction. With regard to the second ground on which the district magistrate considered the proceedings to be illegal, the High Court observed: 'As to the other question, we think all was done that was necessary. The public servant himself complained, which is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the section (old s 467, now s 195, Criminal Procedure Code).' This can only mean that it is not the village magistrate to whom the false information was given but the station-house officer to whom the information was passed on and thus he was the 'public servant concerned' within the meaning of s 195, CrPC and 'such public servant' within the meaning of s 182 . And this is in accord with the decision in Emperor v Jonnalagadda Venkatarayadu .[62] With regard to 'the use of his lawful power' in Periannan's case,[63] it was remarked:

> We think the words 'to use his lawful power' in s 182 refer to some power to be exercised by the officer misinformed, which shall tend to some direct and immediate prejudice of the person against whom the information is levelled. They do not (we think) apply to such prejudice as might eventually arise in consequence of certain harmless intermediate steps to be taken by the misinformed officer such as were taken in the present case, where all that the misinformed officer did or could do was to pass on the information.

Considered along with the final decision in the case these remarks can only mean that the village magistrate (the magistrate within whose jurisdiction the concerned village lay) had no power except to pass on the information to the station-house officer, and the station-house officer being the public servant to whom the information must be considered to have been given, it is the use of his lawful power that has to be 1313considered in applying this section. It is unfortunate that the language of the judgment is misleading, but taken with the actual decision in the case, it is submitted that there can be no doubt that the High Court meant to lay down nothing contrary to what was clearly laid down in the case of Emperor v Jonnalagadda Venkatarayadu .[64] In Public Prosecutor v Thavasiandi Thevan ,[65] it was remarked: 'The case of The Queen v Periannan reported in ILR 4 Mad 241 is not an authority against his view, since in that case the learned judge only held that no offence punishable under s 182(b) was committed.' It is submitted that this remark is due to a misunderstanding of the actual decision in Periannan's case.

35. 'To the Injury or Annoyance of any Person'

As to the meaning of 'injury', see s 44 and the commentary thereunder.

A tells B, a collector, that certain zamindars have usurped the possession of government land. Supposing B believes A and takes action thereon, he can only bring a civil suit against the zamindars, and would not thereby be acting as collector or magistrate, and hence A has not committed any offence.[66]

'Any person' must mean some third person. A public servant cannot use his lawful power to the annoyance of himself.[67]

The other person may or may not be definitely ascertained. See illust (c). Thus, whether the 'person' in question be one, more, or many, only one offence is committed.[68]

36. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable and a summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by any magistrate. In a case, registered on the report of a police officer for an offence under s 182, IPC, the provisions of s 256(1), CrPC, 1973 did not apply and the accused could not be acquitted on the complainant's failure to appear before the magistrate on the date fixed for the hearing.[69] No application can lie under s 476(1) (now under s 340), CrPC, for taking any action in regard to an offence under s 182, IPC .[70]

37. Limitation

The limitation prescribed for prosecution under this section is one year. The order taking cognizance thereafter is bad in law and cannot be sustained.[71] The offence under s 182, IPC is complete when the complaint is found to be false. Therefore, it is the date for starting limitation when the investigating agency concludes the investigation and finds the averments in the complaint are false. The acceptance of a cancellation report will not extend the time, under s 469 of CrPC, where the commission of the offence is not known to the person aggrieved by the offence or to 1314any police officer, the first day on which such offence comes to the knowledge of such person or any police officer, whichever is earlier. Therefore, when the police officer finds that the complaint was false, it is that date when the limitation starts.[72] Where the complaint was filed against the accused for furnishing false information to the society regarding their owning another house and having membership in other societies and getting plots allotted in their names, the chargesheet was filed against the accused persons for offences under ss 420, 471, 120(B), 177 and 182 of the Penal Code nearly after 8 years. Offences under ss 177 and 182, IPC were held barred by limitation under s 468, CrPC and other offences were not made out, so a Division Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court quashed under s 482, CrPC, the criminal proceedings pending against the accused persons before a metropolitan magistrate, Hyderabad.[73]

38. Complaint of Pubic Servant Concerned Necessary

Under s 195(1)(a) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, no court shall take cognizance of an offence punishable under this section except on a complaint in writing by the public servant concerned, or some other public servant to whom he is subordinate. Compliance with the provisions of this section is a condition precedent to the court assuming jurisdiction, and a failure to comply with those provisions would vitiate the entire trial as without jurisdiction,[74] and it is doubtful whether s 465, CrPC can be pressed into service to cure a defect of jurisdiction.[75] In view of s 195(1)(a)(iii), CrPC, in order to maintain the complaint for the offence under s 182, IPC, the complaint must be filed either by the person before whom such information was given or the superior officer of that public servant.[76] The legislature has provided a condition precedent to the exercise of jurisdiction by a court and the condition precedent must be strictly complied with.[77] The provisions of this section are mandatory, so that it has been held that no court has jurisdiction to take cognizance of any of the offences mentioned therein without the prescribed complaint,[78] non-compliance with the section being fatal to the prosecution.[79] No prosecution can be entertained without the prescribed complaint in the case of offences specified in the section.[80] In the absence of a complaint as required by s 195, the magistrate will be 1315acting without jurisdiction in summoning the accused, and any subsequent proceedings would be void,[81] and the trial without the complaint, nugatory.[82]

The Supreme Court has also held that the trial of an accused under s 182 of the Indian Penal Code, without the complaint of the public servant concerned, is without jurisdiction ab initio and the conviction cannot be maintained.[83] Where the complaint for giving false information was not filed by the authority to whom false information was given but by a person not competent to do, accused was acquitted of the charge under s 182, IPC .[84] Where, however, a complaint for an offence under s 182 of the Indian Penal Code has been dismissed on the ground that it has not been presented by the public servant concerned, subsequent prosecution of the accused on a valid complaint is not barred by s 300, CrPC 1973.[85]

The allegations were that the petitioner committed fraud by getting sale deed of 324 square yards registered whereas the actual ownership of the vendor was merely of 194 square yards. The complaint was filed before the Magistrate under the signatures of the SHO. As the complaint was filed by an incompetent person, order summoning the petitioner as accused under s 182, IPC was quashed[86]

39. When False Information is Given to Superintendent of Police, Complaint Cannot be Filed by SHO or Other Subordinate Police Officers

The question whether the superintendent of police is competent to file complaint or it could be filed even by a person subordinate to him has been the subject-matter of consideration in the cases of Harbans Singh v State of Punjab ,[87]Davinder Singh Kapoor v State of Punjab [88] and Malkiat Singh v State of Haryana. [89] It has been held in all the aforementioned judgments that the complaint is required to be filed by the public servant concerned i.e. by the superintendent of police to whom false grievance is alleged to have been made by the accused and not by the Station House Officer.[90]

40. Facts Disclosing Two or More Offences One of which only Requires Complaint, Trial of Others Without Complaint--Validity of

Section 195 provides inter alia that no court shall take cognizance of any offence punishable under ss 172 to 188, IPC, except on a complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or some other public servant to whom he is subordinate. The statute thus requires that without a complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, no prosecution for an offence under s 182 can be taken cognizance of. It does not further provide that if in the course of the commission of that offence other distinct offences are committed, the magistrate is debarred from taking cognizance in 1316respect of those offences as well.[1] Where, in the course of the same transaction, distinct offences are committed, and only some of them require a complaint by the public servant or the court concerned, cognizance of the other offences constituted by a different set of acts is not barred.[2]

If the offence disclosed can be laid under different sections of the Indian Penal Code, some requiring sanction and others not, it is quite competent for the prosecution to bring the offence under a section which does not require a sanction.[3]

The allegations made in a complaint may have a double aspect, that is; on the one hand they may constitute an offence against the authority of the public servant or public justice, and on the other hand, constitute the offence of defamation or some other distinct offence. Section 195 , CrPC does not per se bar the cognizance by the magistrate of that offence, even if no action is taken by the public servant to whom the false report has been made. The ingredients of the offence under s 182 cannot be said to be the ingredients for the offence under s 500 . Nor can it be said that the offence relating to giving false information relates to the same group of offences as that of defamation.[4] Where, upon the facts, the commission of several offences is disclosed, some of which require sanction and others do not, it is open to the complainant to proceed in respect of those only which do not require sanction; because to hold otherwise would amount to legislating and adding very materially to the provisions of ss 195 to 199, CrPC .[5]Hence, a prosecution for defamation, based on a false information given to a public officer with an intent that the latter should act on it, is not barred for a want of complaint by the public officer under s 195(1)(a), CrPC on the ground that a prosecution under s 182 and s 500, IPC, should be said to arise out of the same facts.[6] Even when an alleged defamatory statement is made before a court and that court finds that the deposition is false, it is open to the person defamed to institute proceedings under s 499, IPC, without the court filling a complaint in accordance with the provisions laid down in s 195, CrPC . All the more so is such a complaint unnecessary where a defamatory statement is made by a witness in the course of a judicial proceeding and the court was deprived of an opportunity of so adjudicating; in all such cases it is open to the party defamed to take proceedings under s 499, IPC .[7]

Though s 195 does not bar the trial of an accused person for a distinct offence disclosed by the same facts and which is not included within the ambit of that section, it has also to be borne in mind that the provisions of that section cannot be evaded by resorting to devices or camouflages. The test as to whether there has been an evasion of the section or not, is whether the facts disclose primarily and 1317essentially an offence for which a complaint of the court or of the public servant is required. In other words, the provisions of the section cannot be evaded by the device of charging a person with an offence to which that section does not apply and then convicting him of an offence to which it does, upon the ground that such latter offence is a minor offence of the same character, or by describing the offence as being one punishable under some other section of the Indian Penal Code, though in truth and substance, the offence falls in the category of sections mentioned in s 195 of the CrPC . Merely by changing the garb or label of an offence, which is essentially an offence covered by the provisions of s 195, prosecution for such an offence cannot be taken cognizance of by misdescribing it or by putting a wrong label on it.[8]

Where the real offence committed is one under s 182, the accused cannot be tried for a minor offence without a proper complaint.[9]

41. When Complaint should be for an Offence Under Section 182 , IPC and when for Offence Under Section 211,IPC --Divergent Views--Test Suggested

On this question there is a difference of opinion between the various High Courts. The Bombay High Court holds the view that false information to the police comes under s 182, IPC, and a false charge in a court comes under s 211 .[10] The Calcutta High Court has held that prosecution for a false charge may be under s 182 or s 211, but if the charge is serious, s 211 should be applied,[11] and a false charge made to the police of a cognizable offence falls under s 211 and not under s 182 .[12] But this does not mean that where an offence under s 182 is complete, and the prosecution is lodged under s 182, the proceeding under that section must subsequently be quashed because the accused, not content with the false report to the police, subsequently makes a false complaint to a magistrate in addition and thereby exposes himself to a prosecution under s 211 .[13]

It is for the court to determine under what section the prosecution should be held.[14] When the false charge amounts to an offence under s 211 also, proceedings should be taken with respect to the more serious offence, i.e., s 211 .[15] The main test as to whether a person makes 'a charge' within the meaning of s 211 is, 'Does the person who makes the statement which is alleged to constitute the 'charge' does so with the intention and object of setting the criminal law in motion against the person against whom the statement is directed.'[16] If a case comes under both s 211 and 182, it is open to the authority concerned to proceed under one section or the other. But if in such a case that authority has thought fit to file a complaint under s 182, the magistrate is not justified in acquitting the accused on the sole ground that he should have been 1318prosecuted under s 211 .[17] It has been held that even if the offence falls under both the sections, a conviction under s 182 will not be regarded as illegal.[18]

If the complaint sets out all the facts which constitute the offence, it does not matter whether the complainant thinks that the offence committed is punishable under s 211 or under s 182, IPC .[19]

42. Complaint by Whom to be Made

The complaint under s 195(1)(a) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 must be a complaint filed by the public servant concerned or by another public servant to whom he is subordinate, but not by a public servant who is himself subordinate to the public servant concerned.[20] The public servant concerned is the public servant to whom the false information was given with the intention or knowledge that such public servant will do something which he ought not to do.[21] If a false report was made to a police officer, the complaint must be by that police officer and not the magistrate who directed the police to complain.[22] However, if the false information given to a public servant is repeated before a magistrate, that magistrate may complain, whether the false statement was made to him voluntarily or upon questions put to the accused.[23] If the information was given to a sub-inspector of railway police or to the inspector general of police, it is that officer who can complain and not a sub-inspector of police who subsequently investigated the case.[24] In the case of an offence under this section, in connection with a complaint preferred to a magistrate, the proper authority to file the complaint is the magistrate himself. A complaint filed by the sub-inspector of police under the direction of the magistrate is not a proper complaint under s 195(1)(a) .[25]

Where the accused persons were prosecuted for having committed serious offences under ss 363(A), 366 & 376, IPC, after the insuance of a suo motu notice for the cancellation of bail, the prosecutrix and the witnesses completely reversed the stand taken earlier and no proceeding had been initiated against the prosecutrix and her parents, the Punjab and Haryana High Court directed the concerned police station to initiate the necessary proceedings against the prosecutrix and her parents for having committed the offence under s 182, IPC, together with any other offence that may be made out.[26]

Magistrate has no Locus Standi to Direct Filing of Complaint under Section 182

Reading s 182, IPC with s 195(1)(a), CrPC, it is clear that no court can take cognizance of any offence punishable under s 182, IPC (giving false information to a 1319public servant in order to cause him to use his lawful power) except on a written complaint of the concerned public servant or his higher authority.[27] cognizance by a magistrate could only be taken in the given case, on a written complaint of the concerned police officer. A magistrate has no locus standi to order the filing of a complaint in respect of an offence under s 182, IPC .[28]

43. Inquiry before Complaint--Whether Necessary

One of the ingredients of the offence under this section is that the accused should know or believe that the information given by him was false.

The offence is one in which mens rea must be established by direct evidence or by circumstances of the case and the conduct of the informant. Before a public servant may make a complaint of an offence under this section, he must have before him some evidence, either direct or inferential, to establish the fact that the information given to him was false to the knowledge or belief of the informant.[29] But as pointed out by Cuming J, in the case of Emperor v Baharali Biswas ,[30] there is no provision in the law that, before a magistrate can inquire into a case under s 182, on the complaint of a police officer, he must give the accused party an opportunity of proving the truth of his case, and therefore if the accused person is convicted without any preliminary opportunity being given to prove the truth of his case, the conviction is not illegal on that account.[31] The terms of s 340, CrPC do not make it obligatory in any case to direct a preliminary inquiry before the making of the complaint; such preliminary inquiry may be held only when the offence is one of those referred to in cl (b) of s 195(1), Crpc . Section 182 , IPC, is not one of the offences mentioned in the aforesaid clause, and therefore, there is no reason why there should be a preliminary inquiry before a complaint is actually made by the public servant. Section 340 , CrPC, speaks of holding a preliminary inquiry, if at all, by the court, when it is making a complaint and not where it is the public servant who is making the complaint.[32] When, as the result of a police investigation, it appears that a complaint made to the police of the commission of an offence punishable under the Indian Penal Code is false, it is not necessary that the complainant should be given any further opportunity of establishing the truth of his allegations, before his prosecution under s 182 is proceeded with.[33]

When a complaint of an offence under this section or s 211 (duly sanctioned or not requiring sanction) is presented to a magistrate, it should be disposed of according to law, and there is no provision requiring him to first give the accused person an opportunity of proving the truth of the charge he has made.[34] But where a person challenges the police report and reiterates the charges made before the police, it is 1320clearly a complaint, and the magistrate should deal with it under the provisions of s 203, CrPC . The case under this section cannot be proceeded with until that person's complaint has been dealt with in accordance with law.[35]

Where a narazi petition against the report of police has been actually dismissed by the magistrate under s 203, CrPC, there is nothing to prevent a trial under s 182 from proceeding.[36]

44. Quashing of Complaint by High Court Allowing Petition Under Section 482 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

Where the complaint was lodged by the petitioner against the accused for the house trespass and theft of his properties, after investigation, the Investigating Officer submitted final form with the report of false accusations, no notice was sent to the petitioner informing him about the submission of the final report, subsequent protest petition filed by him was not registered, instead the petitioner complainant himself was prosecuted under ss 182 and 211, IPC for setting the law in motion falsely, order taking cognizance was found not sustainable in law and was quashed.[37]

45. Jurisdiction where Information Sent by Post

Where the information given to a public servant is contained in a letter posted at one place and delivered at another, the offence is committed partly in one local area and partly in another, the court, therefore, within whose jurisdiction the letter was posted is also competent to try the offence.[38]

46. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you on or about the ..... day of ..... at ..... gave to ....., (name of official designation of public servant), a public servant, the following information, namely ..... which you knew or believed to be false, intending thereby to cause (or knowing it to be likely that you would thereby cause) such public servant to do (or omit) something to omit..., which such public servant ought not to do (or omit) if the true state of facts were known by him (or to use the lawful power of such public servant, to the injury) (or annoyance) of ..... and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 182 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I thereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

47. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it must be proved that the accused gave certain information to a public servant,[39] knowing or believing it to be false and with 1321the intention, or knowledge, mentioned in either of the two clauses [(a) or (b)] of the section.[40] The prosecution has further to show that the accused intended thereby to cause or knew that it was likely that he would thereby cause such public servant to do or omit anything which such public servant ought not to do or omit, if the true state of facts were known to him or that he intended thereby to cause or knew that it was likely that he would thereby cause such public servant to use his lawful powers to the injury or annoyance of any person.[41]

To constitute an offence under this section, it must be shown that the person giving the information, knew or believed it to be false, or that the circumstances in which the information was given were such that the only reasonable inference is that the person giving the information knew or believed it to be false. The fact that an information is shown to be false does not cast upon the party who is charged with an offence under the section, the burden of showing that, when he made it, he believed it to be true. The prosecution must make out that the only reasonable inference was that he must have known or believed it to be false.[42] It is not enough to find that he had acted in bad faith, that is, without due care or inquiry, or that he had acted maliciously, or that he had no sufficient reason to believe or did not believe the charge to be true. The actual falsity of the charge, a recklessness in acting upon the information without testing it, or scrutinising its sources; or an actual malice towards the person charged--they are relevant evidence more or less cogent, but the ultimate conclusion must be, in order to satisfy the offence, that the accused knew that there was no just or lawful ground for proceeding. It may be difficult to prove this knowledge, but however difficult it may be, it must be proved, and unless it is proved, the informer must be acquitted.[43]

Where the oral and documentary evidence on record adduced by the complainant before the trial Court did not prove beyond reasonable doubt that accused had committed the offences punishable under ss 182 and 209, IPC, the appellant accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 182 and 209, IPC .[44]

48. Sentence

Where an accused was convicted under this section and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs 200 or, in default, to undergo a rigorous imprisonment for six months, and it was found that he was a mere servant and presently out of employment, his fine was reduced to Rs 100.[45]

49. Effect of Acquittal

An acquittal on a charge under this section is no bar to a subsequent trial for an offence under s 211 .[46] But an acquittal under s 211 may be a bar to a trial under s 1322182.[47] An acquittal on the ground that the person to whom the information was given was not a public servant, is no bar to a trial for defamation under s 500 .[48]

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 183.

Resistance to the taking of property by the lawful authority of a public servant.--

Whoever offers any resistance to the taking of any property by the lawful authority of any public servant, knowing or having reason to believe that he is such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section makes it an offence to offer resistance to the taking of property by the lawful authority of a public servant. Under this and the following sections up to s 187, IPC, two things must concur:

(i) there must be the lawful authority of a public servant,[49] i.e., the authority under which he acts must have been bestowed upon him in accordance with law;[50] and
(ii) the accused must know or have 'reason to believe' (see s 26, IPC) that the public servant in question is a public servant.

The application of this section is not limited to the parties to the donee under execution. Whoever offers resistance, whether a party to a decree or not, is liable under this section if such offers resistance, knowing, or having reason to believe, that the person, to whom resistance is offered, is a public servant.[51]

2. 'Offers any Resistance'

'Resistance' involves an active physical obstruction. Thus, a mere passive refusal, or even a threat of physical obstruction, is not resistance.1323

Where certain property is entrusted to a firm for sale and subsequently, the management of the owner's estate is handed over to the court of wards, any refusal by the firm to deliver the property entrusted to them until their general account is settled, does not amount to any resistance to the taking of any property by the lawful authority of any public servant.[52]

Where the accused refused to hand over to a bailiff, money alleged to be in his pocket, it was held that there was no 'resistance' within the meaning of this section.[53]

But where the accused not only refused to give up the property, but threatened to do harm to the constable if he should venture to carry out the warrant, it was held that the threat constituted an overt act sufficient to constitute a 'voluntary obstruction' within the meaning of s 186 .[54]

3. Oral Statement or Objection--Whether Amounts to Resistance

A mere oral statement by a person, claiming to be the owner of certain articles attached by a bailiff in the execution of a decree, to the effect that he would not allow the bailiff to take away the articles unless he entered them as his property, does not amount to an offence under this section. Where, therefore, when a bailiff proceeded to attach certain articles as the property of a judgement-debtor, the accused, a third person, said that the articles were his property and that he would not allow the bailiff to take them away, it was held that the mere statement of the accused does not amount to 'resistance' and that the accused was not guilty of an offence under this section.[55]

Where a property in possession of the accused was, in their absence, seized by a head constable investigating a case of theft and kept loaded in a cart for the purpose of being taken away, and the accused on hearing about it, came and stood before the cart and raising their hands said that the cart should not be driven and they objected to the property being taken away, it was held:

> A mere objection to the head constable's seizing the article cannot be said to amount to 'resistance'. All that was done in this case was a statement by the accused objecting to the constable taking the article accompanied by a pantomime indicating that they were so objecting. This could not be taken to amount to offering any 'resistance'.[56]

4. Lawful Authority--Meaning of

To constitute an offence under this section, the resistance must be to the taking of any property by the lawful authority of any public servant.[57]

Unless it is clearly established that the person seizing the property had lawful authority to do so, there can be no conviction under this section.[58] 'Lawful authority', means an authority given to a public servant by law, which thereby invests him with 1324legal powers. An authority, therefore, which is not authorised by law, though it may be given by a court, is not a 'lawful authority'.[59]

5. Extent of Authority Explained

Under the rules of the Calcutta High Court, where movable property is attached in execution of a warrant of attachment, the attaching officer shall give the debtor or, in his absence, any present adult member of his family, the option of having the attached property kept on his premises or in some other place in the village, on condition that a suitable place for its safe custody be provided by him. Removal of the property by the civil court peon, without leaving any option to the judgement-debtor to provide safe custody for the property, must be considered as illegal, and consequently, the subsequent taking back of the property by the accused cannot be held to constitute any offence under this section.[60]

A civil court's bailiff, in executing a process against the movable property of a judgement-debtor, has no authority to use force, and break open a door or gate,[61] unless specifically authorised.

A bailiff who, in order to execute a civil court decree against A, breaks open the door of B's house when neither A nor his goods are in the house, is a trespasser and resistance by B is not punishable under this section or under s 186 .[62]

6. When Resistance is not an Offence

In order to prove that an attachment made in pursuance of s 109 of the Tripura Municipal Act was effected by lawful authority, the prosecution has to prove that on the date the attachment was effected, the necessary 15 days had elapsed after the service of the notice and the bill. If the prosecution fails to prove this, the taking of the property is not by lawful authority. If the prosecution fails to prove that the taking of the property was by lawful authority, then the offence under this section has to be treated as not having been proved.[63]

Where the attaching officer had no list of the property to be attached,[64] the warrant was not signed by the court, and part of the form relating to security was left blank, and the accused, who was not the judgement-debtor, resisted the attachment, it was held that he committed no offence.[65]

A offers resistance to the execution of an order of a public servant. The order, as a matter of fact, had ceased to be in force. *A'*s resistance is not punishable.[66]

An amin attempts to attach property under a warrant, which however he has not got with him. B resists the attachment. This is no offence.[67]1325

7. Seizure of Property under Illegal Warrant

In order to support a conviction for resisting the execution of a warrant by a public servant, the warrant must be a lawful one and the person who executes the warrant must be clothed with lawful authority under the warrant of execution, which does not bear a date on or before which it should be executed and after which it is not a good warrant.

The nazir of a court has no lawful authority to execute a warrant directed to the bailiff of the court.[68]

A warrant for the attachment of property which is not signed by the judge or such officer as the court may appoint in this behalf, is not a legal warrant and the removal of property directed by such warrant for the attachment of crops for arrears of revenue, the warrant being time-expired, A does not commit an offence and the person resisting is guilty under this section.[69] So the execution of a writ of attachment, after the expiry of the date fixed for its return, is illegal and resistance to such execution is not an offence under s 186 .[70] The person who executes a warrant derives his authority from the court which issued it and not from the nazir who endorsed it in his name. If the warrant is executed within the date fixed by the court, the execution of the warrant is not illegal because the nazir fixed a date earlier than that in which it is executed.[71]

8. Resistance to Seizure of Property when not Strictly Justifiable

(a) When There is no Right of Private Defence

There can be no doubt that in construing this section, the language of s 99 as well as that of other sections concerning resistance to the acts of public servants, must be borne in mind. Section 99 , IPC declares that the protection afforded by the Penal Code to public servants acting in good faith, under colour of their office is not lost to them, by reason of any mistake on their part in the exercise of their proper functions. The effect of s 99, cl (1) is that although a public servant, lawfully authorised and acting under colour of his office, in good faith, does something not 'strictly justifiable', still there is no right of private defence against such acts, unless they cause an apprehension of death or grievous hurt.[72]

A public servant may do an act of a kind which he has no authority to do. In such a case, he could not be acting in discharge of his public functions[73] and the lawful authority required by this section will be clearly wanting.[74] On the other hand, the public servant may do an act, acting in good faith under colour of his office, but the act is not strictly justifiable by law. Thus, a public servant, authorised to attach the property of the judgement-debtor, may attach the property of a third person under the bona fide belief that the property really belonged to the judgement-debtor. If, in such a case, the owner of the property offers resistance to the taking of the property 1326so attached, is he liable to be punished under this section? The Madras High Court has held that he is so liable.[75]

(b) Whether the Authority and its Execution both be Strictly Lawful--Madras View

In Queen-Empress v Tiruchittambala Pathan ,[76] a decree having been passed against the assets of a deceased debtor, execution was taken out, and the amin of the court attempted to attach and seize a brass plate in the possession of the accused as forming part of the assets of the deceased. The accused wrested it from the hands of the attaching officer stating that it belonged to him and not to the deceased. Setting aside his acquittal, the Madras High Court again observed:

> The object of the legislature as shown in the Code was to facilitate the transaction of public business by affording protection in two ways to public servants acting in the exercise of their duty. They are protected from criminal proceedings by sections 78 and 79 . They are insured against resistance by section 99 and other sections of the Code. The intention was to give protection of this latter kind in all the cases in which, but for the immunity specially provided, the act of the public servant would amount to an offence. The phrase 'lawful authority' used in section 183 does not oblige us to hold that the cases in which the person charged may have a civil action against the public officer must be excluded from the operation of the section. In the present case the amin had lawful authority to take in execution the goods of the deceased. There was no mistake about his authority, but the mistake was in the mode in which he executed his duty and the section does not require that the execution of the authority, as well as the granting of it, must be strictly lawful. To hold that a judgment-debtor might, with impunity, resist the seizure of goods found in his house, on the mere plea that they belonged to somebody else, honesty and good faith on the part of the attaching officer being presumed, would reduce section 183 to a dead letter.

(c) Bombay View

The Bombay High Court has dissented from this view and has held that resistance to the act of a public officer acting bona fide, though in excess of his authority, may well give rise to some charge in the nature of assault, but it cannot afford any foundation for a prosecution under s 183, IPC . According to it, s 99, IPC is designed to protect a public servant, and to limit the amount of resistance which may be offered to him.

9. Provision not for the Protection of Public Servant

Section 183, IPC is, however, not a section meant for the protection of the public servant, but enables him to take the offensive and prosecute anybody who resists the taking of property by lawful authority. It is one thing to provide that a public servant who is acting bona fide in the exercise of his office, though in excess of his authority in fact, is to be protected from acts of violence. It is quite another thing to say that such a public servant, being in fact in the wrong, may prosecute anybody for resisting peaceably his wrongful act. Resistance to an act of a public officer acting bona fide, though in excess of his authority, may well give rise to some charge in the nature of assault, but it cannot afford any foundation for a prosecution under s 183 . The language of s 183 is perfectly plain. It applies to resistance to the taking of property 1327by lawful authority of a public servant and there are no words in that section, as there are in s 99, extending the operation of the section to acts which are not strictly justifiable by law.[77]

10. 'Knowing or Having Reason to Believe that he is Such Public Servant'

There can be no offence under this section unless it is shown that the accused knew or had reason to believe[78] that the person by whose authority the property was being taken was a public servant. Where it did not prima facie appear from the record that the mamlatdar was an officer to whom, under the provisions of s 12 of the Land Revenue Code, the powers of the collector constituted by s 87 of the Code, had been delegated under any general or special order of the government, nor that the karkoon employed to distrain was an officer directed to perform that duty by the commissioner, under the orders of government, a person resisting such a karkoon by force, when the latter came to distrain some goods at his house, is not guilty of an offence under s 183 .[79] It has been held that it is the intention of the law that, when a public servant attaches property under a warrant in execution of a decree, he must have the warrant with him, otherwise the taking of the property is not lawful.[80] However, the written order need not be shown to the accused.[81]

11. Property

Property in this section includes immovable property.[82]

12. Procedure

The procedure to be followed is the same as in the case of an offence under s 182 . The limitation prescribed for prosecution for an offence under this section is one year.

13. Complaint

No court can take cognizance of an offence under this section, except on a complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is administratively subordinate.[83] Taking cognizance of offences under ss 182, 183, IPC, by the magistrate, on a complaint not filed by the concerned public servant is bad in law on account of the bar of s 195, CrPC .[84]

No complaint for an offence under this section can be filed by a court, as s 340, CrPC, applies only to cases falling under s 195(1), cl (b) of the Criminal Procedure Code . This excludes cases falling under s 195(1), cl (a). This section falls under s 195(1)(a) .[85]1328

14. Complaint of Court when Necessary

Where a complaint is filed by a private person under any section of the Indian Penal Code which does not require a complaint of the court under s 195, CrPC, but the complaint is such that it discloses other facts which constitute an offence for which a complaint of the court is necessary, the principle to be followed in cases of this kind is not whether the complaint discloses other facts which constitutes offences for which no complaint of the court is necessary, but whether there is not an evasion of the provision of s 195, and the test whether there is an evasion or not is whether the facts disclose primarily and essentially an offence for which the complaint of the court is required.[86]

15. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of....., at....., offered resistance to the taking of the property by the lawful authority of public servant.....(name or official designation of the public servant), knowing, or having reason to believe that he was such public servant, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 183 , IPC, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the court on the said charge.

16. Punishment

Where the resistance by the accused has been unaccompanied by violence and has been exaggerated by the prosecution, the case calls for no more than a nominal punishment.[87]

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 184.

Obstructing sale of property offered for sale by authority of public servant.--

Whoever intentionally obstructs any sale of property offered for sale by the lawful authority of any public servant, as such, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with the offence of an intentional obstruction of a sale of property held by the lawful authority of a public servant. To constitute an offence under this section, the sale must be by the lawful authority of a public servant, and the obstruction to the sale must be intentional. The obstruction dealt with here is 1329not obstruction of a public servant as under s 186 or of any person as under s 225B, IPC, but of a proceeding being conducted by the lawful authority of a public servant.

2. 'Obstructs'

The word 'obstructs' occurs in ss 186 and 225B, IPC also, and, in some cases, dealing with offences under those sections, it has been held that the obstructions must be physical.[88] But elsewhere it has been held that even under s 186, actual physical obstruction is not necessary to complete the offence if threats are accompanied either by overt acts or by a menacing attitude or show of physical force or assault, as contemplated in s 352, IPC .[89]

Commentary under same heading in s 186, post may be referred to.

3. 'Intentionally Obstructs'

There is an essential difference in the obstructions contemplated in ss 184 and 186, IPC . Section 186 postulates some show of physical force, whereas s 184 does not. Now, this section does not deal with the obstruction of any public servant or of any person but with the obstruction of a proceeding which is being conducted by a lawful authority, and a proceeding can be obstructed by measures other than physical measures taken against the person who is conducting the proceeding.

At a public auction, a concerted plan to prevent the auction being carried out by raising shouts or disturbance which would prevent bids from being heard and necessitating the closing of the auction would certainly amount to obstructing that auction,[90] within the meaning of this section.

4. Mere Threats do not Amount to Obstruction

In King-Emperor v Gopal Rai ,[91] Rennie J observed that a mere posting up of placards asserting a title to the land claimed, cannot be regarded as obstruction under s 184, IPC, and that on the contrary, a claimant is well advised in doing so as otherwise he might be told that he stood by and made no protest. Mere threats by themselves would not, in all cases, amount to an obstruction, unless they are accompanied either by an overt act or by a show of physical force.[92] Where threats uttered to the actual bidder and to the audience of potential bidders discloses an intent to prevent the sale from being held and that intention has been successfully carried out, it amounts to an offence under this section.[93]

Where two persons were charged under this section, one of them for executing and the other for accepting a deed of sale of some property which was ordered to be sold in execution of a decree of a revenue court, it was held that the execution of the sale- 1330deed would not amount to an obstruction of the sale, and was, therefore, not punishable under this section.[1]

5. 'Lawful Authority'

The commentary under s 183 may be referred to. The lawful authority of the public servant offering the property for sale must be proved by the prosecution; a conviction cannot be justified in the absence of such proof.[2]

6. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under s 182 . The limitation prescribed for an offence under this section is one year.

7. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of the magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of ....., at....., intentionally obstructed the sale of property, offered for sale by the lawful authority of the public servant.....(name or official designation of public servant) as such, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 184 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 185.

Illegal purchase or bid for property offered for sale by authority of public servant.--

Whoever, at any sale of property held by the lawful authority of a public servant, as such, purchases or bids for any property on account of any person, whether himself or any other, whom he knows to be under a legal incapacity to purchase that property at that sale, or bids for such property not intending to perform the obligations under which he lays himself by such bidding, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The last section dealt with obstructing a sale of property offered for sale by authority of a public servant. This section deals with the illegal purchases or bids at such a sale. It makes it penal to bid at a public sale for a property on account of a party who is under a legal incapacity to purchase it, or bid for it not intending to complete the 1331purchase, or as it is expressed, to perform the obligations under which the bidder lays himself by such bidding.

2. 'At any Sale of Property'

This section is not restricted to a sale of corporeal property.[3] The object of this chapter, as its heading shows, is to punish 'contempts of the lawful authority of public servants'. A party can equally show a contempt by bidding for the lease of a ferry put up to a public auction by a magistrate, as he can, by bidding for any corporeal property, not intending to perform the obligations under which he lays himself by such bidding. It is his intention at the time of bidding, and not the nature of the thing to be sold, which constitutes the offence. So a mock bidding at the sale of the lease of a ferry is an offence under this section.[4]

The right to sell drugs, i.e., the monopoly granted for a certain area, comes within the definition of property.[5]

3. Purchase or Bid on Account of Person Under Legal Incapacity to Purchase

Under s 19 of the Cattle Trespass Act 1871, no officer of police shall directly or indirectly purchase any cattle for sale under that Act. A sub-inspector of police is under such legal incapacity. If he purchases a pony at a sale under that Act, he would be guilty of the offence under s 169 of this Code.[6] If, instead of himself purchasing the pony, the sub-inspector asks his friend B to make the purchase benami for himself and B purchases the pony at the sale under the Act, knowing of the incapacity of the sub-inspector himself to make the purchase, B would be guilty of the offence under this section.

4. Bidding for Property 'Not Intending to Perform the Obligations'

As observed earlier, it is the intention of the accused at the time of the bidding which constitutes the offence under this section. Where an accused made bids at a sale held by the collector and gave a false name as that of the bidder, it was held that the intention of the accused was not to perform the obligation under which he was laying himself at the time of bidding and that he was guilty of the offence under this section.[7] But where the accused made a bona fide bid at the time of an auction sale and had no intention of shirking his obligations, it was held that his subsequent failure, due to circumstances over which he had no control, to deposit the earnest money which he was legally bound to do on the acceptance of his bid, could not be made a penal offence under this section.[8]

5. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under s 182 . The prescribed period of limitation of an offence under this section is one year. 1332

6. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the..... day of ....., at a sale of property, held by the authority of a public servant....(name or official designation of public servant) as such, purchased (or bade for) the property for yourself (or any other person, namely, ... (give the name of that person), knowing that you (or such other person) were under a legal incapacity to purchase the property at sale (or bade for such property not intending to perform the obligations under which you laid yourself by such bidding), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 185 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 186.

Obstructing public servant in discharge of public functions.--

Whoever voluntarily obstructs any public servant in the discharge of his public functions, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

STATE AMENDMENT

Andhra Pradesh.--In Andhra Pradesh offence under section 186 is cognizable.--A.P.G.O. Ms. No. 732, dated 5-12-1991.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with the general offence of obstructing a public servant in the discharge of his public functions. It has to be distinguished from s 184, which deals with the obstruction of a proceeding conducted by the lawful authority of a public servant.[9]1333

A person, obstructing a public servant in the discharge of his public functions, executing a warrant of possession issued by a court, commits two offences. One offence committed is the obstruction of the public servant punishable under this section, and the other is the offence of contempt of court by undermining its authority.[10]

2. Section 186 Distinguished from Sections 332 and 353

Sections 186 and 332, IPC relate to two separate and distinct offences. Section 186 , IPC relates to a case where the accused voluntarily obstructs a public servant in the discharge of his public functions, but under s 332, IPC, the ingredient of voluntarily causing hurt as a consequence of an assault or a use of criminal force while the public servant is discharging his duty, with the intent to prevent or deter such public servant from discharging his duty as such public servant, is necessary. The gravity of the two offences is, therefore, different. It is further significant to note that while s 186 occurs in ch 10 of the IPC dealing with contempt of the lawful authority of public servants, s 332 falls in ch 16 of IPC dealing with offences affecting human body and life. The legislature in its wisdom has made the offences under s 186 IPC as 'non-cognizable' while making the offence under s 332 IPC as a 'cognizable' one.[11]

Though the offences, under ss 186 and 332, have some common elements, they are quite distinct in their nature and application.[12]

Similarly, the allegations upon which a charge under s 353, IPC, is based, may be the same as those constituting the charge under s 186, IPC, but both sections relate to two distinct offences; while the offence, under the latter section, is a cognizable offence, the one under the former section, is not so. The ingredients of the two offences are also distinct. This section is applicable to a case where the accused voluntarily obstructs a public servant in the discharge of his functions but under s 353, IPC, the ingredient of assault or use of criminal force, while the public servant is doing his duty as such, is necessary. The quality of the two offences is also different. This section occurs in ch 10, dealing with contempt of the lawful authority of public servants, while s 353 occurs in ch 16, relating to offences affecting human body.[13]

3. Ingredients of an Offence under this Section

The ingredients, which constitute an offence under this section, are as follows:

(i) there must be an obstruction;
(ii) the obstruction must be by the accused;

(iii) the obstruction must be voluntary;
(iv) the obstruction must be of a public servant; and
(v) the obstruction must be in the discharge of his (i.e., the public servant's) public functions.

4. 'Obstructs'

Commentary under same heading in s 184, ante may be referred to.

The word 'obstructs' is not defined anywhere and baffles definition. Its derivation from the Latin 'to build against, or, to block up' shows that it has a certain passive connotation.[14] But the section does not appear to contemplate constructive obstruction to a judicial officer in the discharge of his judicial functions, even when they are of a quasi-executive character or when the proceedings before him are in execution.[15]

In a Patna case, it has been held that a sufficient indication that any attempt to effect attachment by a peon having a warrant of attachment, would be resisted by force is quite enough to constitute obstruction.[16] The Allahabad High Court has observed in a case[17]that the word 'obstruction' connotes some overt act in the nature of violence or a show of violence; it connotes some positive act, which would deter the man obstructed from carrying out his intentions. It cannot be said that a man obstructed another if that man runs away from the other. The act of running away does not do any such thing. It may, however, have the effect of baulking a man or cheating him of his intentions, but that would not amount to obstruction. Some courts have held that the word 'obstruction', as used in s 186, means 'physical obstruction', i.e., actual resistance or obstacle put in the way of a public servant. The word implies the use of criminal force.[18] In Kisan Krishanji Tikle v Nagpur Conference of Society of St Vincent De Paul case,[19] the physical obstruction required by the section was explained as follows:

> An illustration will bring out the point of this finding. If A endeavors to drive his motor-car down a road and B tears up the road and places a barricade across it so that no car can proceed until the obstruction is removed, that is a physical obstruction. It is not necessary that the car should actually crush into the barricade and attempt to break through it for the physical element to come into being. So also here, the judgement-debtor and his men were drawn up and showed every intention of resisting by force. That, in my opinion, constituted the physical obstruction required by s 186 .

On the other hand, in some cases it has been held that the word 'obstruction' in this section does not mean 'physical obstruction' and it is not necessary that there should be physical or criminal force, and that it is sufficient if there is either a show of force or a threat or any act preventing the discharge of his public function by a public servant.[20] An obstruction to a public servant can be caused even by words of mouth.[21]1335

5. 'Voluntarily Obstructs'

In this section the word 'obstructs' is used along with the word 'voluntarily', and under s 39 of the Code, a person is said to cause an effect 'voluntarily' when he causes it by mean whereby he intended to cause it, or by mean of which, at the time of employing those means, he knew or had reason to believe that he was likely to cause it. This implies the employment of certain means to cause a certain effect. It has accordingly been held that the use of the word 'voluntarily' seems to indicate that the legislature contemplated the commission of some overt act of obstruction, and did not intend to render penal a mere passive conduct.[22]

To constitute the offence under this section, the obstruction must be intentional and it must be direct.

[23] If in causing the obstruction the accused acts intentionally, the means employed by him to cause the effect intended, do not matter.[24]

Where the accused, in the honest belief that the men doing some work on a private land, under the orders of a magistrate, had committed trespass, prevented them from doing the work, it was held that he could not be said to have voluntarily obstructed the public servant and could not, therefore, be convicted under this section.[25]

Proof of bad faith on the part of a person obstructing is not necessary to a conviction under the section.[26] Refer also the commentary under the heading 'Obstructs'.

6. Gist of the Offence

The gist of the offence, thus lies in the intention of the accused to interfere with or prevent the public servant's discharge of his official function.[27] The obstruction may be in various ways.[28] The question whether an offence under this section has, or has not been, committed must depend upon the peculiar facts and circumstances of each case. The real question is whether the action or attitude of the persons alleged to have obstructed a public servant in the performance of his public functions was of such a nature so as to obstruct, that is to say, prevent him from carrying out the duties which he had to discharge.[29] To prevent, by physical means, persons willing to be vaccinated from being vaccinated, might be obstruction of the vaccinator within the meaning of the section.[30]

7. Physical Obstruction not Necessary

The expression 'obstruction' used in s 186, IPC is not consigned to physical obstruction. It need not be an act or use of criminal force. The act complained of results in preventing a public servant in the discharge of his lawful duties. Any act of causing an impediment, by unlawfully preventing a public servant from the discharge 1336of his functions, would be enough to attract s 186 of IPC . Any other interpretation would be to encourage people to take the law into their hands, frustrate the investigation of crimes and thwart public justice. Such an interpretation cannot be commended by the courts.[31] But a shutting of the door in the face of a public servant entering a house, to attach some property in the performance of his duty, is obstructing him.[32]

8. Threats and Abuses, if Constitute Obstruction--Protest when Amounts to Obstruction

In some cases it has been held that to constitute 'obstruction' within the meaning of this section there must be a use of criminal force, and a mere threat or threatening language is insufficient.[33]A different view has, however, been taken in some other cases and it has been held that mere threats by themselves would not in all cases amount to obstruction unless they were accompanied either by an overt act or by a show of physical force. If it is solely a matter of threats, they must be of such a nature as to so affect the public servant concerned as to cause him to abstain from proceeding with the execution of his duties. It seems obvious that threats of violence made in such a way as to prevent a public servant from carrying out his duty might easily amount to an obstruction of the public servant, particularly if such threats are coupled with an aggressive or menacing attitude on the part of the persons uttering the threats, and still more so if they are accompanied by the flourishing or even the exhibition of some kind of weapon capable of inflicting physical injury. Threats made by a person holding an offensive weapon in his hands must be taken to be just as much an obstruction as that caused by a person actually blocking a gateway or handling a public servant in a manner calculated to prevent him from executing his duty.[34] Threats of violence made in such a way as to prevent the public servant from carrying out his duty, might easily amount to an obstruction of the public servant.[35] A protest is not an obstruction, but a strongly worded protest, verging on a threat would be an obstruction within the meaning of this section, if there appears to be at least a likelihood of the threat being immediately carried out.[36]

Where a person not only refuses to give up the property but threatens to do harm to the police constable if he should venture to carry out the warrant, the threat is an overt act sufficient in law to constitute a 'voluntary obstruction' within the meaning of this section.[37]1337

9. Evasion of Arrest

Evasion of arrest or a mere assertion by the person sought to be arrested that he would not live to be arrested or that a fight would be the result of such arrest, does not constitute a voluntary obstruction.[38]

10. Refusal to Obey

A mere refusal to comply with the request of a public servant discharging his functions, does not amount to a voluntary obstruction within the meaning of this section.[39] But a refusal to show goods on demand to an octroi official discharging his official function has been held to be an obstruction within the meaning of this section.[40]

11. Persuasion and Dissuasion

Persuading tenants not to pay rents to a receiver does not constitute obstruction to the receiver, when such persuasion was addressed to the tenants in the absence of the receiver.[41]

Where as a protest against a member of the depressed classes being appointed a panch, the accused, who was a member of the panchayat, refused to work as a Panch and instigated others also to do the same, it was held that the accused was at perfect liberty to resign, and there was nothing in law to prevent his advising others not to serve in the panchayat, and he could not be held guilty under this section.[42]

To prevent, by physical means, persons willing to be vaccinated from being vaccinated, might be an obstruction to the vaccinator within the meaning of the section. But merely to dissuade people from submitting to a vaccination is not obstruction, for it is only with regard to willing patients that the vaccinator has any duty.[43]

So also spreading a false report and thereby preventing people from bringing their children for vaccination does not amount to a voluntary obstruction to the vaccinator in the performance of his duties.[44]

The lawful guardian not having consented to the vaccination of his child, has a perfect right to take the child away from the vaccinator.[45]

12. Running Away to Avoid Arrest

The act of mere running away to escape arrest may have the effect of baulking a public servant or cheating him of his intentions, but that would not amount to obstruction within the meaning of this section.[46]1338

13. Escape From Lawful Custody

Escaping from lawful custody is not obstructing a public servant in the discharge of his public functions within the meaning of this section.[47] But where C who was arrested, whilst being conveyed to the court, called for help and four persons rescued C in consequence, it was held that they were guilty under this section and C of abetment.[48]

14. Putting up Fence or Shutting Door to Prevent Entry

A, a district judge, sends B, a commissioner, to search and bring away certain property from the house of C, a defendant in a suit pending before him. C shuts the doors and did not admit B. A crowd collected and B went away. It was held that no offence under this section was committed as the object of C was not to obstruct, but to gain time for the compromise, which later on, in the day, was effected; and further C did not voluntarily obstruct, since 'voluntarily' indicates the 'commission' of some overt act of obstruction'.[49] From the definition of 'voluntarily'[50] it will be seen that the meaning of the word is not a question of doing or not doing something, but of the mental attitude of the agent. If C knew that by shutting his doors or by omitting to open them he was causing obstruction to B, by force of s 39, IPC he voluntarily obstructed B, and his motive in so doing (to gain time) seems to be immaterial under s 186, IPC . This case has been distinguished in the following two cases.

Shutting of the door in the face of a public servant entering a house to attach some property in the performance of his duty, is obstructing him.[51]

Where a constable entered a house and found in a room three articles alleged to have been stolen, but before the constable could remove them the accused caused the door of the room to be shut and also threatened to kill the constable if he removed the articles, it was held that the acts of the accused constituted obstruction of the public servant in the discharge of his public functions.[52]

Where the accused put up a fence across his private property to prevent a public servant from passing through it, for inspection in a suit to which the accused was not a party, it was held that the accused did not commit the offence under this section.[53]

15. Some Illustrative Cases

The following are some of the cases relating to obstruction of a public servant:

A traffic constable was trying to clear the congestion from a road. The accused became angry, showed him red eyes and asked him to give him his number. The accused persisted in asking for the number of the police constable even when the constable was engaged in clearing the congestion on the road. He placed his hand on the uniform of the police constable and pushed him, thus obstructing him in the 1339discharge of his public functions. The accused was guilty of the offence under this section.[54]

A traffic constable is prevented by the accused from regulating the traffic. He is guilty of the offence under this section whatever be the exact means employed by him.[55]

On a certain occasion, certain police constables were on duty observing and timing the speed of motor cars driving along a certain road with a view to the prosecution of the drivers of such cars as should be travelling at an illegal speed. The accused warned the drivers of cars, which were approaching the measured distance in the presence of the constables and disclosed the purpose for which they were here. As a result, the drivers slackened their speed and proceeded over the measured distance at a lawful speed. It was held that the accused had willfully obstructed the constables in the execution of the duty.[56]

The pointing of the mauser gun by the accused towards the police officers prima facie suggests the commission of an offence under ss 186 and 353, IPC, inasmuch as on seeing the mauser gun being aimed at him, the police officer must have got terribly shaken, thus being obstructed in the discharge of his official duties. The impugned FIR, therefore, cannot be quashed by invoking s 482, CrPC .[57] Where acts complained of prima facie amount to obstructing the public servant in the discharge of their public functions and offence under s 186, IPC is attracted, the proceedings before the trial court cannot be quashed by taking recourse to s 482, CrPC .[58]

The accused, in order to evade payment of toll, drove a motor bus by a sidetrack and did not stop the bus when signalled to do so. The accused prevented the toll contractor, who was a public servant, from collecting the toll and thus obstructed him in the discharge of his duty.[59]

A public servant had to search the stock of sugar in a sugar factory, and the accused, who was the general manager of the factory, placed obstacles on the road leading to the sugar godown making any vehicular traffic towards it impossible. It amounted to 'obstruction' within the meaning of this section.[60]

A search party wanted to search the upstairs of the accused's house, but he went and stood on the stairs and blocked the way and objected to the party going up; Bagaley J of the Rangoon High Court observed:

> In view of the fact that the constable says that he merely sat on a chair by the side of the stairway and the bazaar-gang definitely says that the accused did not actually obstruct with his hand and block the way but stood by the staircase, I must hold that he did no physical act which could be regarded as obstruction while his verbal protest, not containing anything that could be interpreted as a threat which was likely to be immediately put into force, could not amount to obstruction either.[61]

Where on account of electrocution of the daughter of a tenant of the accused, police officials visited to check the fresh electric wiring and leakage of current with permission, the search was undertaken in exigent circumstances. The investigating team was obstructed while taking photographs and was confined wrongfully in the house, which amounted to obstructing them in the discharge of their public duties, thus the framing of charges under ss 186 and 342, IPC against the accused persons was found proper.[62]

16. 'Public Servant'

Commentary under s 21, ante may be referred to.

A vaccinator is a public servant within the meaning of this section and s 21 (8),[63] so also is a Union Karnam possessing a general authority in writing,[64] and a clerk in the cess-collection department of a district municipality.[65] Under s 21(10) of this Code read with s 11 of the Tolls on Roads and Bridges Act,[66] a toll contractor as well as his servants are public servants.[67] A local board road sircar, who merely supervises roadwork or the construction of a culvert, is not a public servant[68]

By s 21, IPC, every officer of a court of justice whose duty it is to execute any judicial process, is a public officer. The resistance of a process of a civil court is punishable under this Code.[69] A commissioner appointed by a civil court to divide the properties by metes and bounds as a result of a preliminary decree for partition, is a public servant within the meaning of s 21 of this Code. Any obstruction to the work done by him is an offence under this section.[70] Obstructing an officer of a co-operative society from removing attached property is not an offence under this section, as he is not a public servant.[71]

An officer authorised by a court to arrest a person whose evidence is deemed necessary under the Bengal Pilots Act 1859, s 15, and the Indian Merchant Shipping Act 1883, s 14, is a public servant within the meaning of this section.

The section applies only to obstructing a public servant in the discharge of his public functions. Obstruction to persons called to help a public servant, is not obstruction to the public servant.[72]

17. 'In the Discharge of his Public Functions'

The public functions contemplated by this section mean legal or legitimately authorised public functions, and are not intended to cover any act that a public functionary may choose to take upon himself to perform, and the mere fact of a 1341public servant believing that he was acting in the discharge of his duties will not be sufficient to make resistance or obstruction to him amount to an offence within the meaning of this section.[73] If a levy is legal,[74] the public servant would be performing a legal duty when attaching property, and resistance or obstruction to him would be an offence under this section.[75] But resistance to the execution of a warrant which is illegal and without any legal force does not attract the operations of this section.[76]

Where the police party forcibly took the petitioner to the government dispensary, against his will, the petitioner has a right to resist it. If in that incident any police personnel were given some beating, they invited it. No offence is, therefore, committed and the conviction has to be set aside.[77]

A warrant of attachment, which does not bear the signature[78] or the seal of the court issuing it,[79] is illegal and resistance to the execution of it is no offence. A public servant who seeks to execute a warrant of arrest which is not signed by a magistrate as required by s 70 of the CrPC, but which only bears his initials, and the substance of which is not notified to the person to be arrested, as required by s 75 of that Code, does not act in the discharge of his public functions in a manner authorised by law.[80] So also in the case of a warrant of attachment which has expired.[81]But the authorisation of a public servant to act as such in a given case need not necessarily be of a formal nature.[82] The functions, discharged by a public servant would not, however, be public-functions if they fall wholly outside the jurisdiction or authority which he, as a public officer, possesses.[83]

Where the complainant police officer entered the house of the accused in connection with the investigation of a case, without obtaining any warrant or written permission, and the accused had not used any criminal force or assaulted the 1342complainant to deter her from discharging her duty, held no offence under s 186 or s 353, IPC was committed. FIR was quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[84]

18. Some Illustrative Cases

A district magistrate has no authority to issue a warrant for the production of a witness at an investigation by a police officer, but only before his own court.[85] The warrant issued by him for the production of a witness for production before a police officer is, therefore, not lawful.

The accused, who were not parties to a suit in which a public right of way was claimed, did not allow a munsif, in whose court the suit was pending, to pass in a boat through a ditch, which was their private property, when the munsif wanted to pass through it for the purpose of making a local inspection in connection with the suit. It was held that the accused could not be held guilty of the offence under this section.[86]

An obstruction to the delivery of possession in execution of a decree by the petitioner, who was in possession of the property and not bound by the decree, cannot be treated as an unlawful obstruction to the exercise of a lawful authority by a public servant.[87]

Prosecution evidence established that train was stopped by the accused appellant who cut the hotch pipe and on being restrained from doing so, assaulted the complainant police constable. When the accused appellant and other persons were taken to the guard room, they were shouting at him and threatening to throw him on the railway track. The accused was duly identified. He had obstructed a public servant and voluntarily caused hurt to him in order deter him from discharging his duty. He was convicted under s 186, IPC .[88]

Generally, an obstruction to the execution of illegal and ultra vires warrants is no offence.[89]

On the other hand, the authorisation of a public servant to act as such in a given case need not necessarily be of a formal nature.[90] But the functions discharged by a public servant would not be public functions if they fall wholly outside the jurisdiction or authority, which he as a public officer possesses.[91] This section does not apply to an officer who is acting wholly outside his jurisdiction or authority.[92]

A warrant for the realisation of a sum, which includes an installment, which is not due, is altogether without jurisdiction. When a distress warrant is issued without jurisdiction, no offence is committed under this section if the execution of the warrant is resisted.[93]1343

A person resisting a warrant is not guilty of an offence under this section, where the warrant was directed by a munsif to a place beyond his jurisdiction.[1]

If a public officer does no more than act upon the official instructions he has received, and if those official instructions are not of such a kind as to be obviously and patently illegal, then he acts properly in carrying out such orders and, resistance to a public officer carrying out orders which upon the face of them are not open to objection and are in proper form, is an offence against the statute.[2] There is no duty laid upon a bill collector and other persons executing warrants, to make independent inquiries regarding the validity of the warrant; nor would it be possible for him to do so.[3]

Where an officer had been entrusted with the execution of a search warrant, directing him to search in a particular place, and the officer, in fact, searched in other places, it was held that resistance to him and escape from his custody was not an offence.[4]

The prosecution case was that the accused persons forcibly entered the office of the DCP Traffic, gheraoed and manhandled DCP. However, the prosecution case of causing hurt, assault or use of criminal force to deter a public servant from discharging his duty was not proved, thus, the accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 186, 353 and 332, IPC .[5]

Where a peon was apparently carrying out official instructions to sell the attached bullocks, but the instructions were obviously and patently illegal because the certificate officer had no power to authorise the peon to sell them, it was held that the peon was not discharging his public functions and an obstruction to him was no offence.[6]

A receiver, taking possession of property in possession of a third party, in contravention of the provisions of O 40, r 1(2) of the Code of Civil Procedure, cannot be said to be discharging his public functions and resistance to him is no offence.[7]

19. Obstructing Public Servant Acting in Good Faith--Conflicting Views

There is a conflict of judicial opinion on the question whether a person who obstructs a public servant, acting in good faith though his act is not strictly justifiable in law, commits an offence under this section. In Queen-Empress v Tulsiram ,[8]a collector, having no legal authority to do so, ordered a surveyor to execute a decree for possession. The surveyor, in attempting to execute the decree, was obstructed by the accused. It was held by the Bombay High Court that the collector having no authority to issue the order to the surveyor, the surveyor acting under the collector's orders was not discharging a public function and that the act of the accused in obstructing him could not be an offence under this section. Repelling an argument that the surveyor 1344was protected by s 99 of the Code and that the accused had no right of private defence, it was held that was not so; for the protection given by that section to a public officer who, acting in good faith under colour of his office, does an act not causing the apprehension of death or grievous hurt which may not be strictly justifiable in law, does not extend to an officer whose act is altogether illegal. Nor was the surveyor protected by the second paragraph of s 99 ; for though he was acting by the direction of the collector, still the collector's order was so entirely ultra vires as to leave no room for the operation of the section. In Emperor v Shivdas Omkar Marwadi ,[9] the same court observed:

> Before an offence under s 186 of the Penal Code can be said to be established against any person, it is requisite, as the section itself expressly recites, to prove that the public servant concerned, was obstructed in the discharge of his public functions, and that we take it as a matter of fact and not a matter of the public servant's intentions. His intentions may have been perfectly honest, but if in fact and in law the discharge of which he was obstructed were not public functions, then no offence can be committed under this section. It is plain that the functions would not be public functions if they fell wholly outside the jurisdiction or authority which he as a public officer possessed.

Following these two rulings it has been held in another Bombay case that an obstruction offered to a range forest officer, who was acting in perfect good faith but having no jurisdiction, was not punishable under this section.[10] The Calcutta,[11] Lahore[12] and Patna[13] High Courts, took the same view.

A contrary view has been taken by the Madras High Court in a number of cases.[14] In the leading case of Queen-Empress v Poomalai Udayan ,[15] it is said that if the act of the public servant, however, irregular and illegal it may have been, was done in good faith under the colour of his office, an offence under this section would be committed if he was obstructed. The case of Queen-Empress v Tulsiram ,[16] was distinguished on the ground that the public servant was in effect not a public servant. This was followed in Public Prosecutor v Madhava Bhonjo Santo ,[17] where it was observed that s 99, cl 2, IPC, no doubt, in terms, applies only to the right of private defence against the act of a public servant acting in good faith under the colour of his office, but that section has been held by this court to throw light on and govern the interpretation of the expression 'lawful authority' and 'discharge of public functions' 1345found in ss 183 and 186, IPC . This case was, in its turn, followed in Re Peer Masthan Rowther[18] and Simhadri Naidu v Emperor. [19]

In Queen-Empress v Janki Prasad ,[20] the Allahabad High Court held that obstruction to the execution of a warrant which was sealed but which was only initiated by the officer issuing the warrant (instead of being signed), did render the obstructer punishable under this section, if the officer executing the warrant acted in good faith.

The Bombay High Court in Reg v Vyankatrav Shrinivas ,[21] held that if a public servant bona fide believed that he was discharging his public functions within the scope of his authority, even though he was mistaken as to the extent of his powers, an obstruction caused to him would be punishable under s 1876, IPC . This decision was approved of in Bhawoo Jivaji v Mulji Dayal. [22]

In Dukhan Sahu v Emperor ,[23] a peon having a proper warrant of attachment against J for attaching the goods from his shop, went to the shop with two men of the decree-holder, who stated that the shop belonged to J, and seeing J in the shop regarded in good faith, that the property belonged to J and attempted to affect attachment, but was obstructed and threatened by J's son who claimed that the shop belonged to him. It was held by the Patna High Court that J's son committed an offence under s 186, IPC, by obstructing the peon whose duty it was to attach the property. A similar view was taken in Doman Mahto v Emperor [24] and Puna Mahto v Emperor .[25]

The question as to the correctness of either of the above views was raised in Santosh Kumar Jain v State ,[26] but was left undecided. In favour of the latter view, it must be conceded that this section speaks of a public servant in the discharge of his 'public functions' and not 'lawful functions', and a public servant acting in good faith under colour of his office cannot be said to be acting in his private capacity and must be said to be discharging his public functions. But, at the same time, a public servant doing something absolutely illegal cannot be said to be discharging any of his public functions. There can be no public function to do something illegal.

20. Delegated Functions

Public functions may consist of delegated authority. Where a warrant of attachment was addressed to the nazir of the court, who delegated its execution to a court peon, by an endorsement of the peon's name on the warrant, an obstruction of the peon in executing the warrant was held to be an offence under this section.[27] So also a nazir of a court may delegate the execution of a warrant of arrest.[28]

But the name of the delegate must appear on the warrant, otherwise resistance to its execution is no offence.[29]1346

21. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under s 182 . The limitation for the prosecution of an offence under this section is one year.

However, it is a well accepted proposition of law that where an accused commits some offences which are separate and distinct from those contained in s 195 ; s 195 will affect only the offences mentioned therein unless such other offences form an integral part of the same so as to amount to offences committed as a part of the same transaction. In such a case, the other offences would also fall within the ambit of s 195, CrPC .[30]

22. Complaint

Under s 195(1)(a) no court shall take cognizance of an offence under this section except on the complaint by the public servant concerned or by some other public servant to whom he is subordinate. The prerequisites for taking cognizance are: (a) that there should be a complaint; (b) that the complaint should be in writing; and (c) that it should be by the public servant concerned, or by some other public servant to whom he is subordinate. Want of such a complaint is fatal to a prosecution under this section.[31] A statement under ss 161 or 164, CrPC, would not constitute a written complaint and cannot be equated as a special complaint in writing stipulated under s 195, CrPC .[32] cognizance taken by the magistrate on a police-challan is illegal and is liable to be quashed.[33]

23. Section 195 , CrPC Does not Bar Trial of Other Distinct Offences

The allegations upon which a charge under s 353, IPC is based may be the same as those constituting the charge under s 186, IPC, but it cannot be ignored that ss 186 and 353, IPC, relate to two distinct offences and while the offence under the latter section is a cognizable offence, the one under the former section is not so. The ingredients of the two offences are also distinct. Section 186 , IPC, is applicable to a case where the accused voluntarily obstructs a public servant in the discharge of his public functions, but under s 353, IPC, the ingredients of assault or use of criminal force while the public servant is doing his duty as such, is necessary. Where, upon the facts, the commission of offences disclosed is such that they can come under either s 353 or s 186, it is open to the complainant to proceed only under s 353 which does not require a complaint from the concerned public servant or his superior authority.[34]

But the order taking cognizance of an offence under s 186, IPC would be bad in law as it would attract the mischief of s 195, CrPC .[35]1347

24. Split up not Permissible

The prosecution is, however, not entitled to split the facts of the case for the purpose of circumventing the provisions of the said s 195 of the Criminal Procedure Code .[36] Where, however, a person who has been charged under ss 186 and 504, prosecution under s 504 is not bad because no complaint has been filed under the said s 195(1)(a) .[37]

25. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at....., voluntarily obstructed a public servant.....(name or official designation of public servant) in the discharge of his public functions.....(give the details), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 186 , Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

26. Proof

The burden is on the prosecution to show that the court or officer who issued the warrant in the execution of which the public servant was obstructed, had jurisdiction to do so,[38] and that the public servant was discharging public duties imposed on him by law.[39]

27. Punishment

Defiance of the processes of law is a serious offence as it hampers the administration of justice. If allowed to be committed with impunity, the prestige of the court is lost. The sentence should, therefore, not be lenient.[40]

The incident had taken place in the year 1992, and the time of sentencing the accused had attained the age of 50 years, thus, the sentence of two years imposed was reduced to a period of three months, and a fine of Rs. 5000/- was imposed.[41]

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 187.

Omission to assist public servant when bound by law to give assistance.--

Whoever, being bound by law to render or furnish assistance to any public servant in the execution of his public duty, intentionally omits to give such assistance, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both,1348 and if such assistance be demanded of him by a public servant legally competent to make such demand for the purposes of executing any process lawfully issued by a court of justice, or of preventing the commission of an offence, or of suppressing a riot or affray, or of apprehending a person charged with or guilty of an offence, or of having escaped from lawful custody, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

Section 176, IPC dealt with an intentional omission to furnish information. This section deals with an intentional omission to render or furnish assistance to a public servant. It provides, first, in general terms, for the punishment when a person being bound by law to render assistance to a public servant in the execution of his public duty intentionally omits to assist; and secondly, it provides for the punishment when the assistance is demanded for certain specified purposes and is refused.[42]

This section and s 188, IPC apply to a direct refusal or an omission by a person, bound by law to render or furnish assistance to a public servant, to do so.

An omission by a landholder, bound under s 21, Reg 20 of 1817, to nominate some person to act as a village watchman, on the occurrence of a vacancy, to do so, was not an offence under either s 187 or s 188, IPC .[43] A similar view has been taken by the Allahabad High Court in Joti Prasad v Emperor .[44] In that case, an agent of a zamindar had refused to lend the gun of the zamindar to a police sub-inspector, and some villagers refused to join an expedition of the sub-inspector of police in the search of dacoits; and the learned judges held that in those circumstances, the accused were not guilty of an offence punishable under s 187, inasmuch as the refusal of the accused to the public servant so to assist did not amount to a failure of public duty required under s 37, CrPC .[45]

2. Analogous Law

Under the English Law, every person, who refuses to assist a peace officer in the execution of his duty in preventing a breach of the peace, when there is a reasonable necessity for calling upon that person, and he is called upon to assist the officer and is not prevented by any physical impossibility or lawful excuse, is guilty of a 1349common law misdemeanour. It is immaterial that the assistance would have been useless if it had been rendered. The punishment for this offence is fine and imprisonment.[46] As regards the duty of private persons to assist peace officers, it is said:

> If a peace officer sees a breach of the peace committed, or is assaulted or obstructed in the arrest of a felon, he can, if there is a reasonable necessity, call upon a private person for his assistance in arresting an offender, > and that person commits an indictable offence if he refuses to aid the constable. So it is the duty of magistrates at the time of a riot to keep the peace and restrain rioters and pursue and take them, and to enable the magistrates to do this they may call on all the Queen's subjects to assist them, and all the Queen's subjects are bound to do so upon reasonable warning.[47]

3. 'Assistance'

This word 'assistance' referred to in the former part of the section is ejusdem generis with the various forms of assistance specified in the latter half. The word 'assistance' must have some direct personal relation to the execution of the duty by the public officer. The signing of the search-list required by s 100 is an independent duty imposed on the witness. The word 'assistance' as used in the section implies that the party who assists in doing something which, in ordinary circumstances, the party assisted could do for himself.[48] The assistance, that can be demanded under this section is personal assistance by the individual of whom it is demanded and not the supply of a contingent of men to assist.[49] The assistance demanded may not be actual physical assistance.[50]

4. 'Bound by Law to Render or Furnish Assistance'--Meaning of the Term

The words 'bound by law' must mean the same thing as 'legally bound' defined by s 43 . The words 'legally bound' in this section must be taken as something which it is illegal to omit, and which illegal omission is an offence, or is prohibited by law, or would furnish ground for a civil action, and that therefore it does not apply to omissions which are merely a breach of departmental rules.[51]

As to when a person is bound by law to render or furnish assistance to a public servant, see ss 37, 72, 73, 100 and 129(2), CrPC 1973.

5. Delegation of Powers not Permissible

Under s 38 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, when a warrant is directed to a person other than a police officer, any other person may aid in the execution of such warrant, but it is not obligatory for him to do so. Under s 43 a private person may himself arrest; under s 32 he must assist a police officer to arrest, but the police officer must be present before he can demand the private person's aid. This section does not 1350intend the delegation by the police of their duties.[52] Police officers who are not in the raiding party set out to search and arrest the accused, have no legal authority to give directions to private individuals to arrest the accused.[53]

6. Limitations of Police Powers

Under s 37 CrPC, every person is bound to assist a magistrate or police officer reasonably demanding his aid in taking, or preventing escape, of any other person whom such magistrate or police officer is authorised to arrest or in preventing or suppressing a breach of peace, etc. It would be easy to suggest cases in which a refusal to render active assistance in the arrest of an absconding criminal, or to place at the disposal of a responsible police officer material assistance, such as the use of a firearm or of a bicycle or other means of locomotion urgently required by the circumstances of the case, might involve a criminal liability. But obviously the law does not intend that police officers should have a general power of calling upon members of the public to join them in doing the work for which they are paid, such as tracing out the whereabouts of an absconding criminal or collecting evidence to warrant his conviction.[54]

In a case, two constables and two chowkidars arrested a man suspected of having taken part in a riot. On being arrested, the man lay down on the ground and refused to move. The constables demanded the assistance of the accused, a patwari and a mukhia, who not only refused the assistance but showed sympathy with the man arrested. It was held that the man was lying down in order to secure his eventual escape, that the demand for assistance was reasonable as the constables may have realised that, if left by themselves, they could have, with the assistance of the chowkidars, tackled the recalcitrant and taken him to the police station, but it had become another matter because people, who had collected around, were his sympathisers. They may well therefore, have desired to have the moral, if not the actual physical assistance, of the patwari and the mukhia as they were persons of influence in the village, and so it was held that the accused were guilty of the offence under this section.[55]

There is no provision of law which requires a landholder 'to find a clue' in a case of theft and 'assist the police', and he cannot be convicted under this section or under s 188 for disobeying an order of a magistrate to do so.[56]

A refusal to serve as a panch when called upon to do so by a forest guard,[57] or to answer questions put by a police officer under s 161,[58] is not an offence under this section.

It is incumbent, under this section that the accused concerned must be bound by law, to render or furnish assistance and, under s 37, CrPC, such aid or assistance must have been reasonably demanded by the officer concerned. If there is no proof of demand, the charge must fail.[59]1351

7. Refusal to Assist in Making Search--Refusal to Sign Search List--Implications of Assistance

Sub-section (8) of s 100, CrPC 1973 expressly provides that any person who, without reasonable cause, refuses or neglects to attend and witness a search under this section, when called upon to do so by an order in writing delivered or tendered to him, shall be deemed to have committed an offence under s 187 of the Indian Penal Code .[60] But, when there is nothing to indicate that an authorised officer had served or even attempted to serve an order in writing upon any public witness, as envisaged by sub-s (8) of s 100, CrPC,[61] or that there is a vague explanation that public witnesses were approached but they declined but neither the name of the witness has been given nor has any order in writing to that effect been preserved, nor is it asserted that a mention about the same has been made in the case diary, then obviously, there is a deliberate attempt to defeat the legislative safeguards.[62] It has to be borne in mind that where the error, irregularity or illegality, touching the procedure committed by the authorised officer is so patent and loudly obtrusive, that it leaves on his evidence an indelible stamp of infirmity or vice which cannot be oblitered or cured, then it would be hazardous to place implicit reliance on it. The aforesaid and such like circumstances make the court to be circumspect and look for corroboration of the testimony of the said police officials from an independent source.[63] Thus, assisting a search officer by attending and witnessing a search has been made ejusdem generis by the legislature with the kind of assistance referred to in the second part of the section. But it is the refusal to attend and witness the search that has been made penal and not the signing of the search list. The assistance which a person is required to give to a public officer must have some direct personal relation to the execution of the duty by the public officer and the signing of the search list required by s 103, is an independent duty imposed upon the witness. The word 'assistance' implies that the party who assists is doing something which, in ordinary circumstances, the party assisted could do for himself.[64]

8. Public servant

Section 21 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

9. 'Legally Competent'

The commentary under s 174 may be referred to.

10. Court of Justice

Section 20 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

11. 'Offence'

An 'offence' denotes a thing punishable under this Code or under any special or local law.[65]1352

12. Riot

Section 146 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

13. Affray

Section 159 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

14. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under s 172, ante. The prescribed period of limitation for an offence under this section is one year.

15. Complaint

A complaint in writing, by the public servant concerned, or of some other public servant to whom he is administratively subordinate, is required under s 195(1)(a) of the Code of Criminal Procedure for the prosecution of an accused under this section.

16. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and officer of the magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about .....day of....., at ....., being bound, by law, to render (or furnish) assistance to a public servant..... (name or official designation as public servant) in the execution of his public duty, intentionally omitted to give such assistance, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 187 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

17. Burden of Proof

For conviction under this section the following must be proved:

For cl (I) that:

(i) the accused was bound by law to assist the public servant;
(ii) the person to be assisted was a public servant;
(iii) he was then in the execution of his public duty;
(iv) the accused omitted to give such assistance; and
(v) he did so intentionally;

For cl (II), it must be further proved that:

(i) the assistance required was demanded:

(a) for the purpose of executing a legal process of a court of justice; or
(b) for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence, or for suppressing a riot or affray; or
(c) for the purpose of apprehending an offender; and

(ii) the public servant demanding the assistance of the accused was competent to make the demand. 1353

65 Section 40, Indian Penal Code 1860.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 188.

Disobedience to order duly promulgated by public servant.--

Whoever, knowing that, by an order promulgated by a public servant lawfully empowered to promulgate such order, he is directed to abstain from a certain act, or to take certain order with certain property in his possession or under his management, disobeys such direction, shall, if such disobedience causes or tends to cause obstruction, annoyance or injury, or risk of obstruction, annoyance or injury, to any person lawfully employed, be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both;

and if such disobedience causes or tends to cause danger to human life, health or safety, or causes or tends to cause a riot or affray, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Explanation.--It is not necessary that the offender should intend to produce harm, or contemplate his disobedience as likely to produce harm. It is sufficient that he knows of the order which he disobeys, and that his disobedience produces, or is likely to produce harm.

Illustration

An order is promulgated by a public servant lawfully empowered to promulgate such order, directing that a religious procession shall not pass down a certain street. A knowingly disobeys the order, and thereby causes danger of riot. A has committed the offence defined in this section. 1354

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with disobedience of orders promulgated by public servants, lawfully empowered to do so. It is one of the several sections dealing with various offences relating to contempt of the lawful authority of a public servant.[66] It contemplates orders made by public functionaries in the public interest,[67] and refers to acts which are prima facie lawful, but which may be prohibited by a magistrate under circumstances which show a tendency in these acts to endanger the public tranquillity, by obstruction, annoyance or injury, or the risk of such, to other persons who are lawfully employed. The magistrate in such cases, does not create or decide on rights; he merely forbids the exercise of those rights on the ground of public policy, viz., that their exercise endangers or tends to endanger the public peace. As the section is enacted to ensure public tranquillity, health, safety and convenience,[68] it is obvious that the order of any public servant, whether on the executive or on the judicial side, which is made for this purpose is governed by this section.[69]

2. Constitutionality of the Section

The constitutionality of this section was challenged by the national leader, late Dr Ram Manohar Lohia, before the Allahabad High Court and it was held that the section is constitutional and is not ultra vires of the Constitution. What is made punishable under this section, when an order, placing constitutionally permissible restrictions on certain fundamental rights, is disobeyed, is not the exercise of the fundamental rights, but the transgression of the constitutionally valid restrictions imposed upon the exercise of the rights.[70]1355

3. Views of Authors of the Code

The authors of the Code say:

> We have, to the best of our ability, framed laws against acts which ought to be repressed at all times and places, or at times and places which it is in our power to define. But there are acts which at one time and place are perfectly innocent, and which at another time or place are proper subjects of punishments; nor is it always possible for the legislator to say at what time or at what place such acts ought to be punishable.

> Thus it may happen that a religious procession which is in itself perfectly legal, and which, while it passes through many quarters of a town, is perfectly harmless, cannot, without great risk of tumult and outrage, be suffered to turn down a particular street inhabited by persons who hold the ceremony in abhorrence, and whose passions are excited by being forced to witness it. Again, there are many Hindu rites which in Hindu temples and religious assemblies the law tolerates, but which could not with propriety be exhibited in a place which English gentlemen and ladies were in the habit of frequenting for the purposes of exercise. Again, at a particular season hydrophobia may be common among the dogs at a particular place, and it may be highly advisable that all people at that place should keep their dogs strictly confined. Again, there may be a particular place in a town which the people are in the habit of using as a receptacle for filth. In general, this practice may do no harm, but an unhealthy season may arrive, when it may be dangerous to the health of the population, and under such circumstances it is evidently desirable that no person should be allowed to add to the nuisance. It is evident that it is utterly impossible for the legislature to mark out the route of all the religious processions in India, to specify all the public walks frequented by English ladies and gentlemen, to foresee in what months and in what places hydrophobia will be common among dogs, or when a particular dunghill may become dangerous to the health of a town. It is equally evident that it would be unjust to punish a person who cannot be proved to have acted with bad intentions for doing today what yesterday was a perfectly innocent act, or for doing in one street what it would be perfectly innocent to do in another street, without giving him some notice.

> What we propose, therefore, is to empower the local authorities to forbid acts which these authorities consider as dangerous to the public tranquillity, health, safety or convenience, and to make it an offence if a person does anything which that person knows to be so forbidden, and which may endanger the public tranquillity, health, safety or convenience. It will be observed that we do not give to the local authorities the power of arbitrarily making anything an offence, for unless the court, before which the person who disobeys the order is tried, shall be of the opinion that he has done something tending to endanger the public tranquillity, health, safety or convenience, he will be liable to no punishment. The effect of the order of the local authority will be merely to deprive the person, who knowingly disobeys the order, of the plea that he had no bad intentions. He will not be permitted to allege that if he has caused harm, or risk of harm, it was without his knowledge.

Thus, if in a town where no order for the chaining up of dogs has been made, A suffers his dog to run about loose. A will be liable to no punishment for any mischief which the animal may do, unless it can be shown that A knew the animal to be dangerous. But, if an order for confining dogs has been issued, and if A knew of that order, it will be no defence for him to allege, and even to prove, that he believed his dog to be perfectly harmless. If the court thinks that A's disobedience has caused harm, or risk of harm, A will be liable to punishment. On the other hand, if the court thinks that there was no danger, and that the local order was a foolish one, A will not be liable to punishment.

We see some objections to the way in which we have framed this part of the law; but we are unable to frame it better. On the one hand, it is, as we have shown, absolutely necessary to have some local rules which shall not require the sanction of the 1356legislature. On the other hand, we are sensible that there is the greatest reason to apprehend much petty tyranny and vexation from such rules, and this although the framers of those rules may be very excellent and able men. There is scarcely any disposition in a ruler more prejudicial to the happiness of the people than a meddling disposition. Yet, experience shows us that it is a disposition which is often found in company with the best intentions, with great activity and energy, and with a sincere regard for the interest of the community. A public servant of more than ordinary zeal and industry, unless he has very much more than ordinary judgment, it the very man who is likely to harass the people under his care with needless restrictions. We have, therefore, thought it necessary to provide that no person should be punished merely for disobeying a local order, unless it be made to appear that the disobedience has been attended with evil, or risk of evil. Thus, no person will be punished for disobeying an idle and vexatious order.

4. Ingredients

To constitute an offence under this section it is essential:

(i) that there must be an order promulgated by a public servant;[71]
(ii) that the public servant must have been lawfully empowered to promulgate such order;[72]
(iii) that a person, having knowledge of such order and directed by such order, (a) to abstain from a certain act, or (b) to take a certain order, with certain property in his possession or under his management, has disobeyed such direction; and
(iv) that such disobedience causes, or tends to cause, (a) an obstruction, annoyance, or injury, or risk of it, to any person lawfully employed, or (b) a danger to human life, health or safety, or (c) a riot or affray.[73]

5. Disobedience of the Order--When Punishable

The first paragraph of this section deals with the disobedience of an order promulgated by a public servant lawfully empowered to promulgate such an order, fully knowing that such an order has been promulgated. It does not lay down any penal provision. The second paragraph deals with the consequences of such disobedience in regard to any person lawfully employed. The third paragraph deals with the consequences affecting human life, health, safety, riot or affray and prescribes a more severe punishment. Thus, the mere disobedience of a duly promulgated order is not punishable unless the consequences enumerated in the second and third paragraphs follow.[74]1357

6. Applicability of the Section--Judicial Orders

This section applies to orders made by public functionaries for public purposes, and not to an order made in a civil suit between two parties. Thus a disobedience of an injunction, issued in a civil proceeding, is not an offence under this section.[75] Offence under s 188, IPC is not attracted or committed if the order alleged to be violated has been passed by Civil or Revenue Court.[76]

In Dalganjan Koeri v State ,[77] it has been held:

> We are of opinion that section 188 , IPC does not contemplate orders passed by civil or revenue courts in judicial proceedings. Any breach of such orders can be adequately dealt with under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, but it cannot be said that they are orders promulgated with in the meaning of s 188, IPC, the disobedience of which would result into obstruction, annoyance or injury.
> Our answer, therefore, to the question referred to us is that orders passed in judicial proceedings by civil, revenue or criminal courts are not governed by s 188, IPC .

But the last observation in the said case, seems to go a little too far. This section includes in its ambit both executive as well as judicial orders. As it is enacted to ensure public tranquillity, health, safety and convenience, the order of any public servant, whether on the executive or judicial side, which is made for this purpose, should be governed by this section. The test is whether the order is for the purpose of maintaining public tranquillity, health, safety or convenience, or not. If the order fulfills this requirement, its breach would be punishable under this section. Whether the order is of a civil, revenue or a criminal court, if it affects only the parties concerned and does not affect the public tranquillity, health, safety or convenience, the application of this section will not be permissible. Normally, the orders of these courts affect only the parties and not the public at large. It is therefore, right, that orders passed in judicial proceedings are normally not governed by this section. An order under s 145, CrPC, is however, amongst the exceptions.[78]

Orders under Sections 133 , 136 and 138, CrPC

The provisions of ss 136 and 141 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, themselves show that this section applies not only to the preliminary order under s 133, but also to orders made absolute under ss 136 or 138 of that Code. Where once an order has been made absolute under s 136, it is incompetent for the party against whom that order has been made to go behind it and question its validity in any way,[79] unless it was passed without an inquiry.[80]1358

Judicial Discretion has a Mandatory Import--Order under this Section can be Issued against Municipal Authorities--Prohibitory Act a Mandatory Duty

Judicial discretion, when facts for its exercise are present, has a mandatory import. Therefore, when the sub-divisional magistrate has, before him, information and evidence, which disclose the existence of a public nuisance and, on the materials placed, he considers that such unlawful obstruction or nuisance should be removed from any public place which may be lawfully used by the public, he shall act. Thus, his judicial power shall, passing through the procedural barrel, fire upon the obstruction or nuisance, triggered by the jurisdictional facts. The magistrate's responsibility under s 133, CrPC is to order the removal of such nuisance within a time, to be fixed in the order. This is a public duty, implicit in the public power, to be exercised on behalf of the public and pursuant to a public proceeding. A failure to comply with the direction will be visited with a punishment contemplated by s 188, IPC . Therefore, the municipal commissioner or other executive authority bound by the order under s 133, CrPC, shall obey the direction because disobedience, if it causes an obstruction, annoyance or injury to any persons lawfully pursuing their employment, shall be punished as prescribed in the section. The imperative tone of s 133, read with the punitive temper of s 188, IPC, makes the prohibitory act a mandatory duty.[81]

It is well settled that this section applies to orders passed under s 144, CrPC, and the disobedience of an order passed under that section is punishable under this section.[82] In a case of dispute between two textile unions, when it is extremely difficult for those who are in-charge of law and order, to differentiate between the members of the public and the members of the two textile unions, the only practical way in which the particular activities referred to in the order under s 144, CrPC could be restrained or restricted, would be by making those restrictions applicable to the public generally.[83] But if there is no proof that an order under s 144 has been duly promulgated, there would be no offence under this section.[84] The penalty for infringing an order under s 144 is that which is provided in s 188, IPC . When, therefore, a prosecution is launched thereunder, the validity of the order under s 144, CrPC could be challenged.[85]

The ultimate sanction behind an order passed under s 144 is the punishment provided for its disobedience in this section; if this section did not exist, everybody would be free to disobey the order and nobody would be able to complain that his freedom was restricted by the order. The order by itself, does not infringe upon any of the rights of a person guaranteed by the Constitution; it is merely an act in writing of a magistrate which by itself, cannot affect the rights of anyone. Consequently, when a person complains that his rights under the Constitution have been infringed 1359upon by the passing of the order, the order must be considered not in isolation, but in conjunction with the provisions of this section, through which it is enforced.[86]

It is fairly well settled that this section applies to orders under s 145, CrPC .[87] But before a person can be punished for disobedience of an order under s 145, CrPC, there should be evidence and a definite finding, based on that evidence, that his act of disobedience caused, or tended to cause, a riot or an affray.[88]

Orders under Section 146 , CrPC

Disobedience of an order under s 146, CrPC, is not an offence falling under this section.[89] An order under s 146, CrPC, directed not to the parties but to the receiver or custodian, makes a party disobeying it, not guilty of the offence under this section.[90]

In Ramlubhaya v Prem Lata ,[91] an order under s 146, CrPC was passed by the city magistrate. In a proceeding under s 145, CrPC, it was held by the Allahabad High Court that an order passed under s 146 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is an order promulgated by a public servant within the meaning of s 188 of this Code.

Orders under Section 149 , CrPC

Disobedience of a lawful order under s 149, CrPC, may constitute an offence under this section or under s 151 .[92]

Orders under the Police Act

Though disobedience of an order under s 23(3) of the City of Bombay Police Act (Bombay Act 4 of 1902) is an offence punishable under s 127 of that Act, yet it would be equally punishable under this section if all the conditions laid down by this section, are fulfilled.[93]

Orders Regulating Processions

The most frequent application of this section is to cases of contemplated public processions. Prima facie, every member of the public, and every sect, has a right to 1360use the public streets in a lawful manner. But the right to conduct processions in public, religious or otherwise, through the public streets is not their exclusive right, for all members of the public enjoy such right, and no exclusive right can be obtained by any usage or custom.[1] It is this limitation to the general right that a magistrate has to consider and enforce, if necessary, by an order.[2] It is not the duty of the authorities to enforce a decree in all circumstances and at all costs. Where there is a conflict between public interest and private right, the former must prevail.[3] As to the further exposition of the law relating to processions, see the undermentioned cases.[4]

Lawful Use of Public Street--Not an Offence

No person has a right to obstruct others when making a lawful use of a public street, and customs to the contrary, founded on religious intolerance cannot be recognised.[5] If the members of any sect desire to prevent the use of the street in the neighbourhood of their houses by the members of another sect, their proper course is to erect their houses on streets which are private property.[6] But the fact that a procession is a luxury, is not a sufficient ground for passing an order under s 144, CrPC .[7]

Where the petitioners were not under any prohibition or restraint on the date when the alleged offence of trespass, in breach of a prohibitory order, according to the complaint petition, was committed, the alleged offence under s 188, IPC, could not have been committed by the petitioners and the order of taking cognizance of the offence and the subsequent proceedings of the case being illegal were liable to be quashed.[8]

7. Civil and Criminal Contempt

The line between civil and criminal contempt can be broad as well as thin. Where the contempt consists in a mere failure to comply with or carry out, an order of a court made for the benefit of a private party, it is plainly a civil contempt and it has been said that when the party, in whose interest the order was made, moves the court for action to be taken in contempt against the contemner, with a view to the enforcement of his right, the proceeding is only a form of execution. In such a case, there is no criminality in the disobedience and the resultant contempt is not criminal. If, however, the contemner adds defiance of the court to the disobedience of the order, and conducts himself in a manner which amounts to obstruction to or interference with, the course of justice, the contempt committed by him is of a mixed character, partaking as between him and his opponent, being of the nature of a civil contempt 1361and, as between him and the court or the state, of the nature of a criminal contempt. In cases of this type, no clear distinction between civil and criminal contempt can be drawn and the contempt committed cannot be broadly classed as either civil or criminal contempt. There is, however, a third form of contempt which is purely criminal and which consists in a conduct tending to bring the administration of justice to scorn and to interfere with the course of justice as administered by the courts. Contempt of this class is purely criminal, because it results in an offence or a public wrong, whereas contempt consisting in the disobedience of an order made for the benefit of a private individual, results only in a private injury. To put the matter in other words, a contempt is merely a civil wrong where there has been disobedience of an order made for the benefit of a particular party, but where it consists in setting the authority of the courts at naught and has a tendency to invade the efficacy of the machinery maintained by the state for the administration of justice, it is a public wrong and consequently of criminal nature. It has been held that:

> If, on the facts of a case, it appears that a party, directed to conduct himself in a certain way by an order under s 145 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, does not comply with the direction, but conducts himself in such a way as again creates an apprehension of a breach of the peace, the wrong resulting from his misconduct may become a public wrong and, therefore, the contempt may be regarded as a criminal contempt. Where, however, the only allegation made is that the private party, in whose favour the order was made, himself made an attempt to serve the order and was then abused and the only other complaint made is that the adverse party has not voluntarily restored possession or returned certain goods, but nothing is said as to any contumaciousness to the court itself, nor as to any apprehension of the breach of the peace, there cannot be any question of any criminal contempt.[9]

8. 'Whoever'

An order under s 145, CrPC, is binding not only on the actual parties to the proceedings but also on persons who may have notice of the proceedings. Any person who, knowing that an order under that section has been passed, disobeys it would be liable under this section, even if he was not a party to the proceedings in which the order was made.[10] In Balbhadra Jha v State ,[11] relying on Parmeswar Rai v King-Emperor ,[12] and Umanath Prasad v Dhirendra Kumar Singh ,[13] however, a contrary view has been taken.

9. 'Knowing That'--Knowledge, a Necessary Ingredient

Knowledge of the order is a necessary ingredient of both the offences, namely, the offence punishable under this section, and the one under s 32, Police Act.[14] There can be no conviction under this section if there is no finding that the accused knew of the 1362order which he disobeyed.[15] Before it can be said that the accused had knowledge of the order under s 144, CrPC, it must be shown that its terms were communicated to them. The mere fact that the police officer gave his own interpretation of it, is quite a different thing.[16]

10. 'By an Order'--What is an Order?

The word 'order' here means an order made by a public functionary for a public purpose, and not an order made in a civil suit between two parties, such as an injunction,[17] or on order to a public officer to take possession of a land under s 146 of the Code of Criminal Procedure .[18]Section 188, IPC does not contemplate orders passed by civil or revenue courts in judicial proceedings. Any breach of such orders can be adequately dealt with under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, but it cannot be said that they are orders promulgated within the meaning of s 188, IPC, the disobedience of which would result in an obstruction, annoyance or injury.[19] The order must be on the record,[20] which should contain a clear statement of the facts giving rise to the order.[21] If no particular order has been contravened, there can be no offence.[22]

Order Need not be in Writing or Addressed to any Individual

A notice under s 98 of the Madras Local Boards Act (5 of 1884), is not an order of the kind contemplated by the section.[23] But an order does not cease to be an order simply because it is misdescribed as a notification.[24] It is not necessary that the order should be in writing.[25] It need not be addressed to the accused or to any particular individual. It may be a general order directed to the public generally.[26]

11. 'Promulgated'--Meaning and Form of

The word 'promulgated' has not been defined in the Indian Penal Code . Its ordinary meaning is 'to make known by public declaration, to publish, to disseminate or to proclaim'. Promulgation of an order connotes publication of an order publicly and openly and it does not take in its purview private information.[27] In essence, the word connotes two ideas: (a) making known of an order; and (b) the means by which the 1363order is made known must be by something done openly and publicly; private information will not be 'promulgation'. But the law does not prescribe any particular mode in which an order can be made known openly and publicly. It may be by a beat of drum; it may be by a publication in the Gazette; it may be by reading out an order openly in public, etc.[28]Prima facie, 'promulgate' seems to indicate, if not a formal document printed or written, at any rate some form of publication. It is not necessary that the order should be in writing or printed.[29] The word 'promulgation' is not used in any narrow or technical sense in this section. The question whether the requirement of promulgation prescribed in s 188 has been complied with would depend on the particular circumstances of each case. In some cases a proclamation by a beat of drum might be considered to be a proper mode of promulgation of orders passed by magistrates, not in the open court, but framed in their office. Such, for example, would be orders under 144, CrPC . The public would be unaware of such orders unless they are announced in some form, in some open place, either by the beat of a drum or by some other form of proclamation. In other cases, the requirement might be satisfied by affixing the order on some conspicuous place or by publishing the same in the Gazette or some other paper. 'Promulgation', as used in this section, is an elastic term and is deliberately not defined in the Penal Code. So long as an order is openly declared for the purpose of notifying it to the public, or any section of the public, the requirement of law relating to promulgation would be satisfied.[30]

Essence of Word 'Promulgation'

The word 'promulgation', in essence, means that the contents of the order which is promulgated, should be known to the person against whom proceedings are taken under this section. When a judgment or order is passed in open court, it constitutes a formal declaration to the public of the decision of the court in the case in which the order is given or the judgment is passed. The delivery of a final order, in a case under s 145(6), CrPC, constitutes promulgation within the meaning of this section.[31] But when a person or party is asked to do something, it is merely a direction to the party, and not a promulgation of the order.[32]

The Word 'Promulgated' Refers to Orders Passed under CrPC

The word 'promulgated' in this section, however, refers to orders passed under the Criminal Procedure Code and not to judgments and orders of civil courts.[33] When the respondents violated the injunction order passed by the civil courts in a suit filed by the appellant, it was, held that a criminal court can sustain a complaint filed by the appellant, independent of a complaint filed by the civil court under this section.[34]1364

The operation of this section is confined to the promulgation by public servants of public orders relating to the safety, the health or the convenience of the public.[35]

Irregularity in Promulgation, Whether Renders the Order Invalid

If the order has not been promulgated, disobedience to it is no offence. Thus, if a temporary order under s 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure has expired, and no fresh order has been issued, to do that which was forbidden by the old order is no offence.[36] Whilst an order should be promulgated in the way prescribed for the particular order in question, an irregularity in the method of promulgation will not render the order invalid, so long as it has been brought to the actual knowledge of the persons sought to be affected by it.[37] Even if there has been an irregularity in the method of promulgation of the order, that in itself would not make it ultra vires, so as to prevent the conviction of any person who, being proved to have had knowledge of the order, nevertheless disobeyed it.[38] If it is established that the matter was brought to the notice of the accused, then mere irregularities in the method of service would have no effect on the proceedings under this section.[39]

A mere irregularity in the promulgation of an order under s 144, CrPC, would not make the order ultra vires, so as to prevent a conviction of the person disobeying it, if he is proved to have had knowledge of it.[40]

It is necessary to distinguish carefully between the jurisdiction of the magistrate to make an order and a possible practical difficulty in showing that it has been disobeyed. It does not follow that because it is difficult for the state to secure a conviction, that the order itself was made without jurisdiction.[41] An order passed by a magistrate under s 144, prohibiting the holding of a rival hat on certain days near an old hat, is not ultra vires and inoperative. Therefore, disobedience to such an order is an offence punishable under this section.[42] If the order itself is illegal, there cannot be a conviction under this section for disobeying it.[43]

12. 'By a Public Servant'

This section applies only when an order has been promulgated by a public servant and disobeyed.[44] A receiver appointed under s 56 of the Land Registration Act,[45] is not a public servant within the terms of ss 174, 175, 186 and 188 of this Code. An order by such a receiver, forbidding persons to pay rent to any person other than such receiver, is not an order promulgated by a public servant, lawfully empowered 1365to do so, and consequently disobedience to such order is not an offence under the section.[46] But the sarpanch of the gram panchayat, while passing a prohibitory order directing parties not to cut the paddy, under s 64(1) of the Bihar Panchayat Raj Act, acts as a public servant and as such is competent to move a complaint under s 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure for a violation of the order under this section.[47]

For the definition of a public servant, s 21 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

13. 'Lawfully Empowered to Promulgate Such Order'--Person Disobeying not Guilty, If Promulgation not by Lawfully Empowered Person

The phrase 'persons lawfully employed', used in the second clause of this section, refers to authorities who are entrusted to perform their functions for maintaining public peace and tranquillity.[48] For a conviction under this section, it is necessary not only that an order should have been promulgated by a public servant, but also that the public servant should have been lawfully empowered to promulgate the order.[49]To be justified in directing a certain act to be done or not to be done is one thing and to be legally empowered to order its commission or omission, with the consequence of the disobedience being punishable under this section, is quite another. If the public servant was not legally empowered to promulgate the order, the person disobeying the same cannot be held guilty under this section.[50] If the order is both in substance and in its manner of publication illegal, as being beyond the powers conferred by law, the conviction will not stand.[51]

When a notification is issued by an executive authority in an exercise of a power conferred by a statute, that notification is as much a part of the law as if it had been incorporated with the body of the statute at the time of its enactment.[52] Under s 33 of the Police Act,[53] the district magistrate has general control over the matters referred to in ss 30, 31 and 32 of the Act, and an order restricting traffic on a public road promulgated by him is not without jurisdiction.[54] Orders under s 144, CrPC, are merely temporary orders in urgent cases of apprehended danger, and cannot remain in force for more than two months, unless in certain cases the State Government, by 1366notification in the official Gazette, otherwise directs.[55] A magistrate cannot issue a perpetual injunction under that section.[56]

On a conviction under this section, for a disobedience of the order of a magistrate directing the pruning of hedges, it was held, that as the circumstances showed that there was no necessity for a speedy remedy, the magistrate had no power to issue the order disobeyed.[57]

No Prosecution if the Order Disobeyed is Without Jurisdiction

Repeated recourse should not be made to the provisions of s 144 in the same dispute. If it is considered probable that danger to public peace may remain after the expiry of two months from the date of the order under s 144, steps should be taken in due course to obtain an order of the government under the proviso to sub-s (4); or recourse should be made to the provisions of s 145 or s 107, CrPC .[58] Where, upon a petition that there is a dispute regarding a piece of land and that there is a likelihood of a breach of peace being committed, the magistrate orders the police to attach the land and report, and proceedings under s 145 are started about three months after the attachment. The order of attachment, having been passed without starting proceedings under s 145, is without jurisdiction and no question of prosecution under this section for its disobedience arises.[59]

Where as a result of the order passed under s 144, CrPC, conditions became peaceful, and the relations between rival parties became normal, as they were before the dispute, but all of a sudden, after a few days, relations between the parties become tense and it is again apprehended that a disturbance of public tranquility may take place, the magistrate would be acting in good faith when he issues a fresh order under s 144, CrPC . But if conditions do not become peaceful and apprehension is expected even after the expiry of the prescribed period of two months from the date of the issue of the original order under s 144, CrPC, any fresh order to be promulgated under this section, would be in continuation of the first, and in the eye of law, the magistrate shall be deemed to be promulgating an order of a period exceeding two months, which would be beyond his jurisdiction. It is a settled law that one cannot do an act indirectly which he could not do directly, or that one cannot flout the express provisions of an enactment.[60]

14. Legality of Order, When can be Questioned--On Appeal from Conviction

Although an order made under s 144, CrPC is not appealable, still, if a person is convicted for its disobedience under this section, he might appeal on the ground of its 1367illegality, and the validity of the proceedings can then be inquired into.[61] In King v Darbarilal Shaw ,[62] Sen J observed:

> It is not open to the court trying an accused person for disobedience of such an order under section 144 to decide whether he would have passed such an order in the circumstances of the case. He has to take the order as a good and valid order, unless it is shown that the order was a nullity by reason of the fact that the magistrate had no jurisdiction, or by reason of some other similar circumstance. He is not to superimpose his view on the propriety of the order.

It is not easy to appreciate what the learned judge meant to hold by qualifying the statement by saying that it was open to the accused to show that the order violated was bad by reason of want of jurisdiction or other similar circumstances. The learned judge appears to have held that if the order was bad for want of jurisdiction or if it was otherwise fundamentally bad, the accused person could plead that as a circumstance, in answer to a charge of disobedience to that order. Therefore, it is not right to say that Sen J limited the attack to jurisdiction only. 'Similar circumstances' must be circumstances of grave import, as for instance, where it is shown that the order could not possibly have been made by any public servant in the circumstances of a particular case.

Pleas Challenging Legality of Order, Open in Defence

A court trying a charge of a contravention or disobedience of an order of a public servant, has to proceed on the footing that prima facie the order is a good and valid order, but that does not necessarily mean that the persons charged can in no circumstances, show that the order, although made with jurisdiction, was otherwise fundamentally bad. It is open to a person charged with disobedience to an order promulgated by a public servant lawfully empowered to promulgate such order, to plead in defence that the order, though made with jurisdiction, was utterly wrong or improper on the merits,[63] or the order though validly made, came to an end on the date of the alleged disobedience.[64] In the case of Brojo Nath Ghose v Empress ,[65] it was held by a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court that to constitute an offence under this section, it is necessary to show, first, a lawful order promulgated by a public servant, secondly, a knowledge of the order and disobedience of it, and thirdly, the result that is likely to flow from such disobedience. It is indeed one thing to say that the public servant concerned was lawfully empowered to make an order and it is a very different thing to say that the order itself was a lawful order in the sense of being a valid and a proper order. In the case of Prem Chand Roy v Dharmadas Singh Roy ,[66] it was held:

> The intended prosecution was for disobedience to an order, dated 22nd September last, which amongst other things directed that the petitioners should refrain from collecting rents from any tenants on certain lands. That order which purported to have been made under section 144 , CrPC, was not an order which could properly be made under the 1368section. The order, therefore, directing the prosecution of the petitioners for disobedience to that order cannot stand.

As observed by Jackson J, in Empress v Surajanarain Dass ,[67]

> When the Code of Criminal Procedure authorises the making of orders by executive authorities with the view of preventing a breach of the peace or for similar purpose, it has always been held, and is now enacted in the existing Code, that the propriety of such orders is not a matter of question in that state of things for the appellate judicial authorities. It is when the executive officers seek to enforce those orders by the infliction of penalties that the courts have to step in and see whether the orders made were with authority or not. This was precisely the occasion on which it was the duty of the sessions judge to consider whether that order was properly made or not.

In Superintendent and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs, Bengal v Khodabaksh Shah ,[68] in proceedings under s 133, CrPC no objection was raised as to a co-sharer not being made a party. It was held that the objection could not be raised in subsequent proceedings. It was in that connection that it was remarked that a question as to the validity of a final order under s 133, CrPC could not be raised in a trial for an offence under this section. Again in the case of Rupan Singh v Emperor ,[69] it was remarked that if the order disobeyed was made with jurisdiction, it would not matter if the public servant concerned had acted improperly in making that order. But it does not appear that the learned judge who decided the case considered the extreme point of view, namely, whether it was at all open to the person charged with the disobedience of an order of a public servant, to plead and prove that the order itself though made with jurisdiction, was fundamentally wrong on merits.

15. Orders Found Ultra Vires

The following are some examples of orders ultra vires the powers and authority of a public servant, the provisions of CrPC, this section and art 21 of the Constitution :

(i) A, a magistrate, issues a general order prohibiting the use of public roads between 9 pm and sunrise.[70]

(ii) A, a mamlatdar, orders B not to allow water from his house to fall on C's premises[71] or directs D to keep a gateway open.[72]

Order Providing more than the Maximum Penalty Even Without Trial is Void and Ultra Vires

No one can be shot at for a mere breach of the curfew order issued under s 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973. The maximum penalty to which such person renders himself liable is provided by s 188 of the Indian Penal Code which, in its turn, is a trifling nothing as compared to the threatening penalty of being shot at. It cannot be gainsaid that the executive has no power, authority or jurisdiction to threaten to inflict punishment upon one who commits a mere breach of the curfew order greater than the maximum penalty to which he would be liable upon a judicial trial before a court of law. The executive directions contained in the 'important announcement' insofar as they hold out to the members of the public the threat that a curfew-breaker for a mere breach of the curfew order is liable to be shot at, is ultra vires their powers and ultra vires s 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, s 188 of the Indian Penal Code and arts 20 and 21 of the Constitution and are, therefore, void and of no effect whatsoever. The law and order forces of the state have no authority to shoot at any one for a mere breach of the curfew order and, therefore, the executive directions contained in the 'important announcement' insofar as they direct the threat of such an action are void and unlawful.[83]

16. 'He is Directed to Abstain...Under His Management'--Meaning Explained

This section speaks of an order promulgated by a public servant, which directs certain persons to abstain from a certain act or to take certain order with certain property in their possession or under their management.[84] The liability under this 1370section is for disobedience of the direction in the order and not for the disobedience of the order. The main purpose of an order of attachment under s 145, CrPC is to prohibit any breach of peace and not necessarily to restrict possession by either of the parties, unless there be a definite order to that effect. If there is no such order of prohibition passed by the court against the accused persons from entering into possession of the land, their alleged violation cannot be taken to be an offence coming within the purview of this section.[85]

An order under s 146, CrPC is directed not against parties, but to the custodian or receiver. Such an order does not direct the accused to abstain from any act or to take a certain order with respect to the property in dispute. So, even if the accused person encroached upon the attached property, such encroachment will not amount to an offence under this section.[86] The Allahabad High Court has, however, taken the view that an order passed under s 146, CrPC, by a magistrate in a proceeding under s 145, CrPC, is an order promulgated by a public servant under this section.[87]

17. 'Disobeys such Direction'

Where the crop had been raised and harvested by a party to s 145, CrPC proceedings, before the possession was restored to the opposite party, there is no disobedience of the order prohibiting the party from interfering with the possession of the opposite party and hence, the conviction of the party under this section is unsustainable.[88]

Where the accused had grounds for questioning whether the magistrate's order enforced a positive action on his part, and his neglect to take that action did not appear to have been due to a deliberate defiance, the prosecution of the accused under this section is not justified.[89]

18. 'If Such Disobedience Causes or Tends to Cause' Obstruction, etc--Mere Disobedience of an Order is not an Offence--Riot or Affray Need not Actually

Follow

The disobedience of an order promulgated by a public servant, is not, by itself, an offence under this section. Such disobedience, to amount to an offence under this section, should amongst others, cause or tend to cause obstruction, annoyance or injury to any person 'lawfully employed'.[90] So, to justify a conviction under this section, it is necessary to establish that the disobedience causes, or tends to cause, obstruction, annoyance, or injury to any person lawfully employed; and to make the offence graver, it must be further established that such disobedience causes, or tends to cause, a danger to human life, health or safety; or causes, or tends to cause a riot or affray.[91] Mere disobedience of an order promulgated by a public servant is thus, not in itself an offence under this section unless it entails one or the other of the 1371consequences, which the section itself mentions.[1] It is true that a riot or affray need not actually follow such disobedience so as to make a person liable, but there must be such a tendency. Doubtless this tendency has to be inferred from the proven facts and circumstances of each case and is not capable of direct proof.[2] Before a person can be punished for disobedience of an order under s 145, CrPC, there should be evidence and a definite finding on affray. Where there was no such finding by the lower court in the case, the conviction of the accused for an offence under s 188 could not be sustained by the High Court and was set aside.[3]

19. 'Annoyance to any Person Lawfully Employed'--Meaning of

The phrase 'persons lawfully employed', used in the second clause of s 188, refers to authorities who are entrusted to perform their functions for maintaining public peace and tranquillity. As the prohibitory order under s 144 is not concerned with the rights of the individual persons to that proceeding, the phrase 'persons lawfully employed' cannot refer to the first part of that proceeding.[4]

In Wangkheimayan Kulabindhu Singh v State ,[5] the Judicial Commissioner of the Manipur Judicial Commissioner's court, however, distinguished the Assam case cited above and observed:

> The agitation was in full swing at the time. The police party and the PWS had to go round to see that there was no disturbance to peace and that law and order were kept. They were thus engaged in their legitimate duties. If in the midst of such duties, annoyance was caused to them by such disobedience of lawful order on the part of the petitioners, it will certainly come within the purview of section 188 , IPC .

It is submitted that this decision requires reconsideration in the light of the reasons given in the Assam decision which it distinguishes.

Entering into possession in spite of an order under s 145(6), CrPC, has at least a tendency to annoy the person at whose instance the order was passed, and is, therefore, an offence under this section.[6]

Annoyance may be Physical or Mental Annoyance may be either physical or mental. In the case of physical annoyance, no doubt, a certain degree of proximity between the object annoyed and the annoyance is necessary, but in the case of mental annoyance, no question of proximity arises. A person may be as much annoyed by a defamatory statement published thousands of miles away as by one made in his presence.[7] In order to establish that the annoyance 1372was the result of the disobedience of the order, there must be some proximity between the conduct of the accused and the disobedience. The annoyance has to be proved as a fact; a mere mental annoyance of the authorities concerned does not come within the ambit of this section. If that interpretation is to be accepted, then this section will apply in all cases of breach of order. Where an order has been passed and if any breach is committed of that order, the authorities can legitimately say that the breach itself has led to their annoyance. But that is not contemplated by s 188 . Unless the conduct of the accused is pointed out which, in the circumstances of the case, would have caused annoyance or interference with the public safety, or had the natural tendency to create annoyance or interference with the public safety, this section is not attracted.[8]

20. 'Injury to any Person Lawfully Employed' and 'Danger to Human Life or Safety'

In the case of Emperor v Habibullah ,[9] Mahmood J, observed:

> ...the obstruction, annoyance, or injury on the one hand, and the danger to human life, health, or safety on the other hand, are intended by the section to be applicable to cases in which the injurious results, therein contemplated, arise in the ordinary course of lawful employment to persons who, in the exercise of their rights as ordinary citizens, may incur such evil consequences on account of any act or omission of the accused, which act or omission occurs in disobedience of a lawful order. In the next place, I am of the opinion that the section has no application to cases in which a person simply neglects his property, and by allowing a wall or a gateway to remain in a dilapidated condition, renders theft or other crime more easy of commission than would otherwise be the case. The law does not contemplate that the physical barrier of a wall or a gate is the means of restraining persons from crime, and no order of this nature can be made on the mere ground of any such apprehension.

Injury to Person, Not to Property

The 'injury' used in this section must be an injury to a person and not to property. Government is not a person and therefore, where the disobedience is alleged to cause injury to the government, it cannot be said that the ingredients of this section have been satisfied.[10]

21. Riot

Section 146 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

22. Affray

Section 159 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

23. Disobedience Tending to Cause Breach of Peace

Where there is an immediate apprehension of a breach of peace between two unlawful assemblies, the officer incharge of a police station may order either or both 1373of the two unlawful assemblies to disperse, and failure to obey his order would amount to an illegal act and may constitute an offence under this section.[11]

24. Explanation-- Mens Rea not Necessary

The explanation appended to the section, makes it clear that in order to constitute an offence under this section, it is not necessary that the offender should intend to produce harm, or contemplate his disobedience as likely to produce harm. It is sufficient that he knows of the order which he disobeys, and that his disobedience produces, or is likely to produce, harm, as contemplated by the section. Mens rea is, therefore, not a necessary ingredient of an offence under this section.

25. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable and triable by any magistrate and may also be tried summarily. The cognizance under this section can, however, be taken only on a complaint in writing by a public servant, and not on a police challan.[12]

The prescribed period of limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is one year.

26. Complaint

Under s 195(1)(a) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, no court can take cognizance of an offence punishable under this section, except on a complaint in writing by the public servant concerned, that is, the public servant whose order is disobeyed,[13] or some other public servant to whom he is subordinate.[14] The complaint must state that the disobedience of the order caused, or intended to cause obstruction, annoyance, or injury to any person lawfully employed. Where this fact is not stated, the complaint is defective.[15] Before an offence under this section is made cognizable by a magistrate, the preliminary step pointed out by s 195(1)(a) is necessary and a failure to do so vitiates the trial.[16] But where the order disobeyed was promulgated not by a public servant but by the government, no sanction or complaint is necessary.[17] Where final report was filed by police alleging violation of order passed by RDO and commission of offence punishable under s 188, IPC, prosecution was held barred by s 195, CrPC, as such was quashed.[18]1374

For prosecution under s 188, IPC a written complaint by a public servant is necessary. Where complaint for offence under s 188, IPC was not filed by the public servant concerned but by the S.I. of Police, the FIR and the final report in the case were quashed.[19]

The purpose of a complaint under the section is to show that the officer concerned or his superior had considered the matter and had moved the court. Where the charge-sheet is signed by the additional district magistrate who promulgated the order under s 144, CrPC, as also by the district magistrate, the purpose of a complaint is served, there is no disregard of s 195 and the trial for the offence is not without jurisdiction.[20] But where the order of the SDM, promulgated under s 144, CrPC, was violated and a complaint was filed by the ASI of police, it was held that the case was not maintainable and the prosecution was bad in law.[21] Proceedings under s 188, IPC initiated on the basis of FIR and not on the basis of any complaint in writing of the public servant concerned, as is required by s 195(1)(a), CrPC, is not maintainable.[22]

Section 195(1)(a), CrPC mandates that no Court shall take cognizance of offence punishable under s 188 of the IPC, except on the complaint in writing of the public servant concerned or some other public servant to whom he is administratively subordinate, except when the complaint in writing is made by the concerned public servant. In the instant case, the status quo order alleged to be disobeyed was passed by the Additional Commissioner. He or any officer to whom he was administratively subordinate did not file written complaint. The Additional Commissioner sent report to concerned police station, and the investigating officer filed a charge-sheet on which cognizance was taken. The cognizance taken by the Magistrate was illegal, thus, the criminal proceedings were quashed.[23]

Filing the Complaint is Public Duty--Not a Privilege

A change of the incumbent leaves it still the same court.[24] The complaint prescribed in s 195(1)(a) is a public duty and responsibility, and not a personal privilege and the successor-in-office of the public servant to whom information is given, can make a complaint under s 188, IPC .[25]

But where the offence under s 188, IPC is committed in respect of an order by a Mandal revenue officer, but he, being the public servant concerned, did not file the complaint and instead the complaint was filed by the sub-inspector of police, it was held that the court had no jurisdiction to take cognizance of such a complaint, not filed by the public servant to whom he was subordinate, and the proceedings before the trial court were quashed under s 482, CrPC .[26]1375

27. Form of Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, [*] on or about the ..... day of ..... at ....., knowing that, by a certain order, to wit ..... promulgated by a public servant lawfully empowered to promulgate such order, you were directed to abstain from (specify the act) (or to take certain order, with certain property, to wit .... In your possession or under your management), disobeyed such direction, such disobedience causing or tending to cause ..... (mention the particular consequence caused or was likely to be caused), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 188 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on that charge.

Where disobedience of an order is an offence both under this section as well as under a Police Act, a mention only of the section of the Police Act in the charge, is a defect curable under ss 215 and 464 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, if the accused has not been prejudiced thereby.[27]

28. Burden of Proof

It is the duty of the prosecution in a case under this section, to prove by positive evidence that the accused had knowledge of the order with the disobedience of which he is charged. The mere promulgation of the order is not sufficient to establish the knowledge.[28] But evidence of knowledge can rarely be direct, in most cases, knowledge can only be proved by circumstantial evidence. The question of knowledge must generally be a matter of inference.[29] It is permissible to presume knowledge of the order on the part of the accused in certain circumstances.[30] All that can reasonably be demanded of the prosecution is a proof of the circumstances from which it may be inferred that the accused had knowledge of the order. If such proof is forthcoming, the onus is on the accused to prove ignorance of the order, despite publication.[31]

In the absence of proof, it is wrong to think that selling drinks in continuation of an order promulgated by the district collector will, as a matter of course, lead to riots or disturbance.[32]

29. Convictions when can be made--Judicial Notice Cannot Fill up Gap

In order to constitute an offence under this section, it must be proved that the disobedience of the order caused or tended to cause one or other of the consequences mentioned in the second and third paragraphs of the section. It is only if the prohibited act when indulged in, brings about or tends to bring about, the above result, it becomes an offence. Any violation of the order which does not cause or tend 1376to cause the above result will not amount to an offence.[33] If no one has come forward to state that the disobedience has had this effect and it cannot be said that the irresistible conclusion from the fact of this disobedience is that it would have the effect of causing or tending to cause obstruction, annoyance or injury or risk of obstruction, annoyance or injury, to any person lawfully employed, the person disobeying cannot be punished under this section.[34] Some definite evidence on this point must be on record to support a conviction under the section.[35] If there is no evidence to show that the disobedience actually caused any obstruction, etc., and there is no finding that it tended to cause such obstruction, etc., a conviction under this section cannot stand.[36] There can be no conviction unless the likely consequences of the breach of the order are proved affirmatively. If there is no proof, the gap cannot be filled up by a judicial notice.[37] It is also not permissible to presume the existence of these ingredients because of the disobedience of the order.[38]

Where a person was not only aware of the proceedings under s 145, but acted in collusion with one party in order to deprive the other of the fruits of their success in the s 145 case, it was held that he was liable under this section, even though he was not a party to the proceeding in which the order was passed.[39]

30. Punishment

The confiscation of tools, weapons or other articles, used by the accused in the commission of the offence, is not wanted under this section.[40] Where the offence is merely of a technical nature, token punishment under this section would suffice.[41] Where it was clear from the record that the committing of the offence by the accused was an act of misguided, over-enthusiastic and ill-advised outburst, it was held that a lenient and liberal view should be taken in the matter of sentence.[42] Reformative justice is an accepted norm in present times.[43]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 189.

Threat of injury to public servant.--

Whoever holds out any threat of injury to any public servant, or to any person in whom he believes that public servant to be interested, for the purpose of inducing that public servant to do any act, or to forbear or delay to do any act, connected with the exercise of the 1377public functions of such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

STATE AMENDMENT

Andhra Pradesh.--In Andhra Pradesh offence under section 189 is cognizable.--A.P.G.O. Ms. No. 732, dated 5-12-1991.

Comments

1. Scope

This section and s 190, IPC deal with criminal threats affecting public servants. Under this section the threat is directed against the public servant himself, while in the next section it is directed against the person who seeks his protection. This section is similar to s 503, IPC which defines criminal intimidation. Section 503 is general in character, while this section is particularly confined to criminal intimidation of a public servant.

It is the essence of an offence under this section that the threat or injury should have been held out for the purpose of inducing a public servant to do any act or to forbear or delay the doing of an act. A mere threat, uttered as an exhibition of bad temper or in the course of an altercation, is not necessarily an offence under this section.[44] What the section deals with are menaces which would have a tendency to induce the public servant to alter his actions because of some possible injury to himself or to someone in whom the accused believes he has an interest.[45]

2. 'Holds out any Threat'--Threat of Injury, a Necessary Ingredient

In order to sustain a conviction under this section, there must be a threat of injury to either the public servant or to anyone in whom the accused believes that, public servant to be interested.[46] If the threat is verbal, the exact words used should be proven to enable the court to decide whether an injury or a lawful complaint was threatened. It is most material in a prosecution under this section that the actual words, used by the accused towards the public servant, be before the court to enable it to ascertain whether, in fact, a threat of injury to the public servant was really made by the accused. Where there is a serious conflict of testimony as to the words used by the accused regarding the public servant, it is exceedingly doubtful if a conviction 1378could be had merely because the witnesses are agreed as to the general effect of those words.[47] Words amounting to an idle threat uttered in anger is no threat.[48]

Laws of Land to be Respected even by Politicians--Mere Raising Slogans not an Offence

A citizen of India is a citizen, whether he is a political worker or otherwise. A political worker cannot claim any impunity in the eye of law to commit any offence, however good the motive may be. The law of the land is to be obeyed and respected by all citizens, irrespective of their profession, vocation, status and political thinking. Before the majesty of law, no one is either exempted from its rigour, for amenable there seriously. They are all equal. So, even though the accused may have been the party workers of a political party, and even though a case against was false, they had no business to threaten the police officers with injury and on that threat, to demand their release. The case would not have been under s 189, IPC, if the case had been limited to the raising of slogans or demanding a release.[49]

Mere Use of Impolite Language not an Offence

Where an office-bearer of the revenue officials' association, by writing a letter, requested the collector to withdraw the prosecution against one revenue officer, without holding out any threat of injury to induce him to do or forbear from doing any act in exercise of his public functions, the mere use of impolite language in the letter did not amount to an offence under this section.[50]

3. Injury--Injury Implies Illegal Harm

The word 'injury' has been defined in s 44 of this Code as denoting any harm whatever, illegally caused to any person in body, mind, reputation or property.[51] Injury implies an illegal harm, but it is unsafe to hold that a mere threat to bring a legal complaint either before a court or before the constable is an injury. Thus, it would not be criminal to threaten to report to his superiors, an official, who was about to perform an illegal act, for this would be the lawful result of the act he was committing.[52] Police constables in the execution of their duty must be protected, but when a member of the public considers that he is being harshly treated, or that a constable is exceeding the powers given to him by law, it would be absurd to hold that a protest or oral threat to report the matter either to the court or to the constable's superior officers amounts to an illegal harm. If the constable is acting within his powers, the complaint can do him no harm, if he is acting beyond his powers, he has no cause for complaint and the public has every right to protest.[53]

Section 44 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

4. Public Servant

Section 21 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to. 1379

5. In Whom the Public Servant is Interested

In order to sustain a conviction under this section, the threat of injury need not be to the public servant directly. It may be to anyone in whom the accused believes that public servant to be interested.[54]

6. 'For the Purpose of Inducing that Public Servant' etc--Essence of the Offence

It is the essence of an offence under this section that the threat or injury should have been held out for the purpose of inducing a public servant to do any act or to forbear or delay the doing of an act. A mere threat, uttered as an exhibition of bad temper or in the course of an altercation, is not necessarily an offence under this section.[55] What the section deals with are menaces, which would have a tendency to induce the public servant to alter his actions because of some possible injury to himself or to someone in whom the accused believes he has an interest.[56]

7. Procedure

The offence is non-cognizable. Summons should ordinarily be issued in the first instance. The offence is bailable, but not compoundable. It is triable by a magistrate and can also be tried summarily. The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within three years.

8. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the ..... day of ..... at ..... held out a threat of injury to a public servant, to wit ....., (or to ....., in whom you believed that a public servant, to wit ..... was interested) for the purpose of inducing that public servant to do an act, to wit ....., (or to forbear or delay to do.....), connected with the exercise of the public functions of such public servant, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 189 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Proof

To establish an offence under this section it must be proved that:

(i) the accused held out a threat;[57]
(ii) the threat was directed against a public servant or a person, in whom the accused believed the public servant to be interested;
(iii) the threat was of injury; and1380
(iv) the object of the threat was to induce the public servant to do or forbear, or delay doing, an act connected with the exercise of his public functions.

10. Separate Convictions

Separate convictions under ss 186 and 189 in a case, have been held to be bad in law.[58]

11. Sentence

A court, in passing a sentence, should inflict such a sentence as the gravity or otherwise of the crime with which the accused has been convicted, warrants and merits, irrespective of whether the sentence inflicted will involve a right of appeal or not. A court should weigh the sentence with reference to the crime committed and the circumstances of the case, and not with reference to anything which may happen subsequently.[59] After considering the mitigating circumstances and the long delay in the trial, a lenient view can be taken in awarding the sentence in a case under this section.[60]

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

S. 190.

Threat of injury to induce person to refrain from applying for protection to public servant.--

Whoever holds out any threat of injury to any person for the purpose of inducing that person to refrain or desist from making a legal application for protection against any injury to any public servant legally empowered as such to give such protection, or to cause such protection to be given, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Andhra Pradesh.--In Andhra Pradesh offence under section 190 is cognizable.--A.P.G.O. Ms. No. 732, dated 5-12-1991.

Comments

1. Scope and Object

The object of the section is to protect persons against being terrorised and threatened into inaction with the object of inducing that person to refrain or desist from making a legal application to a public servant for protection against any injury, which that public servant is legally empowered to give. This section punishes those holding out a threat of any injury to a person, to prevent him from seeking protection from any public servant legally empowered, as such, to give him protection, or cause such protection to be given. 1381

2. Holds Out any Threat

Synopsis note 2 under the preceding s 189 may be referred to.

3. Injury

A question may arise as to whether a threat to excommunicate, or exclude from caste, is an injury within the meaning of this section. Now, under s 44 of this Code, the word 'injury' denotes a harm illegally caused to another. Therefore, it will not be an offence to threaten another with an action, or indictment, which might lawfully be preferred against him.[61] There can be no criminality when the sentence of excommunication is legal, that is to say, where it is justified by the usages of the class or sect to which the complainant has voluntarily submitted. It has been held that:

> There can be no criminal intimidation where the injury of which complaint is made is the hardship arising from a conventional punishment, which a spiritual superior, acting in the exercise of his authority as regulated by the custom of the caste, is competent to inflict. The custom implies a common submission to his authority, and, assuming that there was an error of judgment on his part, the error cannot be accepted as sufficient for turning a case of conventional discipline into a criminal offence.[62]

A threat to institute a civil suit for a mere declaration of right against any person who objects to that right, cannot be said to be an injury within the meaning of this section, as it cannot be said to be a harm illegally caused in body, mind, reputation or property.[63]

Section 44 and the commentary thereunder and the synopsis note 3 to the preceding s 189 may be referred to.

4. Public Servant

Section 21 under and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

5. Procedure

The procedure will be the same as in the case of an offence under s 189 . The limitation prescribed for prosecution under this section is one year.

6. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....held out a threat of injury, to wit.....to....., for the purpose of inducing him to refrain or desist from making a legal application for protection against such injury to a public servant legally empowered to give such protection (or to cause such protection to be given), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 190 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

7. Proof

For an offence under this section the prosecution must prove the following:

(i) that the accused held out a threat;
(ii) that such threat was of an injury;
(iii) that the purpose for which such threat was held out was to induce the person threatened to refrain or desist from making a legal application for protection against some injury;
(iv) that the person to whom such legal application was about to be made was a public servant; and
(v) that such public servant was legally empowered, as such, to give the protection or to cause the same to be given.1383

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 191.

Giving false evidence.--

Whoever, being legally bound by an oath or by an express provision of law to state the truth, or being bound by law to make a declaration upon any subject, makes any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, is said to give false evidence.

Explanation 1.--A statement is within the meaning of this section, whether it is made verbally or otherwise.

Explanation 2.--A false statement as to the belief of the person attesting is within the meaning of this section, and a person may be guilty of giving false evidence by stating that he believes a thing which he does not believe, as well as by stating that he knows a thing which he does not know.

Illustrations

(a) A, in support of a just claim which B has against Z for one thousand rupees, falsely swears on a trial that he heard Z admit the justice of B's claim. A has given false evidence.

(b) A being bound by an oath to state the truth, states that he believes a certain signature to be the handwriting of Z, when he does not believe it to be handwriting of Z. Here A states that which he knows to be false, and therefore gives false evidence.

(c) A, knowing the general character of Z's handwriting, states that he believes a certain signature to be the handwriting of Z; A in good faith believing it to be so. Here A's statement is merely as to his belief, and is true as to his belief, and therefore, although the signature may not be the handwriting of Z, A has not given false evidence.

(d) A, being bound by an oath to state the truth, states that he knows that Z was at a particular place on a particular day, not knowing anything upon the subject. A gives false evidence whether Z was at that place on the day named or not.

(e) A, an interpreter or translator, gives or certifies as a true interpretation or translation of a statement or document which he is bound by oath to interpret or translate truly, that which is not and which he does not believe to be a true interpretation or translation. A has given false evidence.13861387

1. Scope of the Section

Section 191, IPC defines 'giving false evidence' and s 192 defines 'fabricating false evidence'. Section 193 , IPC penalises giving or fabricating false evidence. That a person should always tell the truth is a moral principle. It cannot, however, be said to be a legal principle as such. Whenever the Legislature requires a person to tell the truth, it has so enacted in various enactments. It is only where it has been so enacted and a person fails to tell the truth that he comes within the mischief of the provisions of this section.[8]

No promise or undertaking, however, formal, or however important it may be as evidence, in the ordinary acceptance of the word, comes within the meaning of the term as used in this section. It must be a statement made in reference to some matter to which the person is legally bound on oath, or by some express provision of law to state the truth; or it must be a declaration which he is bound by law to make.[9]

The most appropriate stage for a trial judge to take a decision relating to an alleged perjury would be at the final stage of disposal of the main matter on its merits and not at the preliminary stage, otherwise, the decision relating to the alleged perjury or false statement at the initial stage will prejudicially affect the fair disposal of the main matter on its merits.[10]

2. English Law

'Giving false evidence', which expression is defined in this section is, in English Law, designated as 'perjury'. In England, perjury, which was a common law offence, has now been made a statutory offence. Under s 1 of the Perjury Act 1911,[11]as amended by the Criminal Justice Act 1948,[12] perjury is defined as follows:

Section 1 .--

(1) If any person lawfully sworn as a witness or as an interpreter in a judicial proceeding willfully makes a statement material in that proceeding, which he knows to be false or does not believe to be true, he shall be guilty of perjury, and shall, on conviction thereof on indictment, be liable to penal servitude for a term not exceeding seven years, or to imprisonment . . . or a term not exceeding two years, or to a fine or to both such penal servitude or imprisonment and fine.

(2) The expression "judicial proceeding" includes a proceeding before any court, tribunal, or person, having by law power to hear, receive, and examine evidence on oath.

(3) Where a statement made for the purposes of a judicial proceeding is not made before the tribunal itself, but is made on oath before a person authorised by law to administer an oath to the person who makes the statement, and to record or authenticate the statement, it shall, for the purposes of this section, be treated as having been made in a judicial proceeding.

(4) A statement made by a person lawfully sworn in England for the purposes of a judicial proceeding--

(a) in another part of His Majesty's dominions; or1388
(b) in a British tribunal lawfully constituted in any place by sea or land outside His Majesty's dominions; or
(c) in a tribunal of any foreign state, shall for the purposes of this section, be treated as a statement made in a judicial proceeding in England.

(5) Where, for the purposes of a judicial proceeding in England, a person is lawfully sworn under the authority of an Act of Parliament--

(a) in any other part of His Majesty's dominions; or
(b) before a British tribunal or a British Officer in a foreign country, or within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England;

a statement made by such person so sworn as aforesaid (unless the Act of Parliament under which it was made otherwise specifically provides) shall be treated for the purposes of this section as having been made in the judicial proceeding in England for the purposes whereof it was made.

(6) The question whether a statement on which perjury is assigned was material is a question of law to be determined by the court of trial.

Even at common law perjury consisted in giving upon oath, in (or for the purposes of) a judicial proceeding, before a competent tribunal, whether it be a court of the common law or acting under a statute,[13] evidence which was material to some question depending in the proceeding and was false to the knowledge of the deponent, or was not believed by him to be true.[14]

Save in a most exceptional case, an immediate custodial sentence should be imposed for perjury.[15]

3. Canadian Law

It is an offence punishable on summary conviction for a person who, not being specially permitted, authorized or required by law to make a statement under oath or solemn affirmation, makes such a statement, by affidavit, solemn declaration or deposition or orally before a person who is authorized by law to permit it to be made before him, knowing that the statement is false. This does not apply to such a statement that is made in the course of a criminal investigation. A commissioner whose authority to take oaths was limited to work for his law firm, who administered the oath to an affiant in unrelated litigation, was not 'a person ... authorized by law to permit it to be made before him' and had no authority to take the accused's oath, and the accused could not be convicted of an offence.[16]

4. Prevention of Corruption Act 1988

Section 21 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1988 makes a similar provision with respect to the offences under that Act.

5. 'Perjury' and 'Giving False Evidence'

As regards the offence of 'giving false evidence', the framers of the Indian Penal Code, for reasons stated in note G to their report, dated the 14 October 1837,[17]1389 thought it proper to discard the English Law of 'perjury' and to draft the provisions of the Indian Penal Code in this respect upon the lines of the French Code Penal regarding faux temoignage. The Indian law commissioners were afterwards pressed to at least allow the word 'perjury' to be retained in their Code, as being one familiar to the people of India and long in use, but they refused to give way[18] on the ground that 'the authors of the Code' thought it inexpedient to use the technical terms of the English law where they did not adopt its definitions, and so materially departed from it in substance'.[19]

6. Tampering with Witnesses

The criminal justice system has been not only polluted but totally corrupted in through one practice that has become endemic and has almost reached malignant dimensions. The number of criminal cases in which one or more witnesses have been tampered with and has found that in over 90 per cent of the cases one or more witnesses have turned hostile. Nothing can be more destructive to the success of a prosecution than the obnoxious practice of bribing or pressurising witnesses and getting them to turn hostile. The Karnataka High Court had earlier directed the trial courts to ascertain in all cases where the witnesses turn hostile as to why this has happened and since the majority of witnesses are gullible they have openly disclosed that it was the accused or persons on behalf of the accused who had either used inducements or pressure and threats to get them to turn hostile. There can be little doubt about the fact that the source of this corruption or this corrupt practice can be traced to the accused because it is the accused who is the direct beneficiary of the failure of the prosecution insofar as the accused secures an acquittal in cases where this is not warranted. This practice of tampering with the witnesses has now become so widespread that the prosecutors cheerfully and openly get up and tell the trial courts that the witnesses are hostile and that there is no purpose in examining them. The source of this information is the police who are often a party to what is going on for obvious reasons. While in the rest of the world the prosecuting agency takes all necessary steps to ensure that pressures and inducements do not affect the evidence, it is unfortunate that here no such preventive steps are taken even though it is possible. The police authorities in collusion with the accused were assisting the defense by keeping back witnesses and falsely informing the court that they were not available and this court was required to take stringent steps to combat this dishonest practice with considerably improved results over the last two years. The tampering with witnesses, however, continues unabated.[20]

It would be necessary, at least in a few cases, to make a thorough example of all those responsible, irrespective of their designation or profession, for witnesses turning hostile. Whenever this happens, the trial court shall then and there make a serious attempt to ascertain the names of the culprits and in appropriate cases, if it becomes necessary, even by according pardon to the witness who is really the victim on the condition that a full and true disclosure of the facts is made. It will be necessary that the courts send out the message very clearly that nobody who tampers with witnesses will be spared and that every single guilty person, including the1390 witness who acted on their instructions, will be prosecuted for perjury and in appropriate cases under the contempt of courts Act for interfering with the course of a judicial proceeding. The trial courts should ensure that appropriate corrective steps are taken.[21] Any person found guilty of perjury has to be dealt with seriously as it is necessary for the working of the Court as well as for the benefit of the public at large.[22]

7. Difference between English and Indian Law

(a) Under the English law, in order to constitute 'perjury', the false statement must be made in (or for the purpose of) a judicial proceeding. Under this Code it is not necessary that it should be made in a judicial proceeding. The only distinction between false evidence given in a judicial proceeding and that given in any other case lies in the degree of punishment.[23]

(b) The law of England requires that a false statement, in order to support a charge, should be material to the question in dispute; but the Penal Code does not impose that qualification.[24] It is only s 192, which requires that the fabricated false evidence should affect a point material to the result of the proceeding in which it appears. This provision is omitted in this section which defines the offence of giving false evidence and does not lay down anywhere the above restrictive proviso. If the statement made is designedly false, the accused is liable irrespective of the fact whether the statement had a material bearing or not, upon the matter under inquiry before the court. The materiality or immateriality can have a bearing only upon the sentence to be passed.[25] The words in this section are very general and do not contain any limitation that the statement made shall have any bearing upon the matter in issue. It is sufficient to bring a case within that section if the false evidence is intentionally given, that is to say, if the person making the statement makes it advisedly, knowing it to be false, and with the intention of deceiving the court and of leading it to suppose that that which he states is true.[26]

(c) According to the Criminal Law of England, from which our system is so largely drawn, the assignment of perjury must be proved by two witnesses, or by one witness and the proof of other material and relevant facts confirming his testimony. The Indian Evidence Act does not provide that there must be corroboration to support a conviction, but in ordinary cases, and where the provisions peculiar to Indian law do not apply, a rule which is founded on substantial justice may well serve as a safe guide to those who have to administer the criminal law in India.[27]1391

8. Section 191 Considered with Section 199

Section 199 deals with statements and declarations made voluntarily, provided that they are capable of being used as evidence and which the court is bound to receive as evidence. Whereas, s 191 deals with statements and declaration falsely made by a person legally bound by on oath or by an express provisions of law to state the truth. For example, statements under ss 161(2) and 164 of the CrPC or those under ss 13 and 14 of the Oath Act, etc.[28] Under this section the declaration is made under compulsion due to some requirement of law, while under s 199 it is made voluntarily provided such declaration is admissible in evidence in a court or before a public servant or other person bound or authorised by law to receive as evidence, of any fact touching any point material to the object of declaration.[29] This section read with ss 193 and 199 of the Penal Code make the making of false declarations an offence. The distinction between the two provisions, insofar as the making of the declaration is concerned, is that under s 191 the 'declaration' is one in which a person is bound by an oath or by an express provisions of law to state the truth, or being bound by law to make a declaration upon any subject, makes a statement which is false. The declaration contemplated in s 199 is not necessarily one which the person making the declaration is bound by law to make. The essential element of the offence under s 199 is that the declaration containing the false statement must be one which any court of justice or any public servant or other person is bound or authorised by law to receive as evidence of any fact.[30] No oath is required under s 199 . No oath is required even under s 191 where the declaration is made by a person, when he makes one on being bound by law to do so.

9. Essentials

Commentary under same heading in s 193, post may be referred to.

The essentials of an offence under s 193, IPC, read with this section, are:

(a) The accused must have been legally bound to speak the truth or make a declaration.
(b) He must have stated or declared what is false.
(c) He must have known or believed that what he stated or declared was false, or he did not believe it to be the truth.[31]

If the false evidence is given in a judicial proceeding the offence is more severely punished under the first part of s 193 than if given in any other case, punishable under the second part of the section.

A person may not positively know a statement to be false and he may not even believe it to be false. But if, nevertheless, he does not believe the statement to be true, then he commits the offence of giving false evidence.[32]

10. 'Whoever'--Meaning of--Whether Includes Accused

Commentary under same heading 'Whoever' in s 193, post may be referred to.1392

On the language of this section and s 192, IPC it is not possible to hold that the accused is in any way in a more privileged position than an ordinary person. To say so would be dangerous and would put a premium on the giving or fabrication or manufacturing of false evidence in judicial proceedings by accused persons.[33] Under s 4 of the Indian Oaths Act 1969, oaths or affirmations shall be made by witnesses, interpreters and jurors. However, the sub-s (2) of that section lays down that 'nothing herein contained shall render it lawful to administer, in a criminal procedure, an oath or affirmation to the accused person, unless he is examined as a witness for the defence'. Section 342A,Criminal Procedure Code 1898 which was inserted in the Code by s 315 of the new Code of 1973 enables an accused person to be a competent witness for his defence but he cannot be compelled to be a witness and cannot be called as a witness except at his own request in writing, and his failure to give evidence cannot be made the subject of comment by the parties or by the court.[34]But once the accused offers himself as a witness and is put on oath, his position is no better or worse than that of any other witness, and s 132 of the Evidence Act 1872 would apply to him. That section itself makes a distinction between those cases in which a witness voluntarily answer a question and those in which he is compelled to answer; and gives him protection in the latter of these cases only. Protection is afforded only to answers which a witness has objected to give, or which he has asked to be excused from giving, and which then, he has been compelled to give, and not to answers given voluntarily.[35]

11. Statements of Accused under Section 313 , CrPC

Under cl (a) of sub-s (1) of s 313 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, a court may put such questions to the accused as it considers necessary, 'for the purpose of enabling the accused personally to explain any circumstances appearing in the evidence against him'. Under sub-s (2) of that section no oath shall be administered to the accused when he is examined under sub-s (1), and under sub-s (3) of the section so that 'the accused shall not render himself liable to punishment by refusing to answer such questions, or by giving false answers to them'. But this protection afforded to the accused is limited to statements made by the accused in answer to questions which are for the purpose of enabling the accused to explain any circumstances appearing in the evidence against him and which are put at some stage of the inquiry or trial.[36] Statements made by an accused person under s 313 of the CrPC or contained in a written statement filed by him with the court's permission, are not absolutely privileged, as there is nothing in that section to give him an1393 absolute privilege as regards defamatory statements made in the course of examination.[37] Thus, any body who makes a false statement on oath, knowing it to be false, makes himself liable to be prosecuted for perjury.[38]

Whenever a man makes a statement in court on oath, he is bound to state the truth and if he does not, he makes himself liable under the provisions of s 193 . It is no defense to say that he was not bound to enter the witness-box.[39]

12. 'Being Legally Bound, by an oath to State the Truth'--Meaning of

For the essentiality of s 191, the person must have been legally bound to speak the truth or make a declaration and he must have stated or declared what is false.[40]A person is legally bound to state the truth when the omission to do so is illegal, by which is meant an offence, that is an act made punishable by this Code[41] or an act which is prohibited by law or which furnishes ground for a civil action.[42] Making false statement on oath before the Court is an offence under s 191, IPC and punishable under s 193, IPC .[43]

If there is no compulsion to make any declaration as required by the law, s 193 will not have any application.[44] If s 191 will not apply, s 193 immediately goes out of the picture since it deals with false evidence as stated in s 191 .[45]

'Oath'--Meaning of

The term 'oath' has not been defined in this Code or in the Oaths Act 1969. An oath is a solemn appeal to the creator of the universe that the truth only shall be witnessed. It is an adjuration to God to punish the affiant if he swears falsely. It is an outward pledge given by the person taking it that the attestation or promise is made under an immediate sense of his responsibility to God. An oath is a religious act by which the party invokes God not only to witness the truth and the sincerity of his promise, but also to avenge any imposture or violated faith. Where a person has no belief in the Supreme Being, he can do nothing which would be binding on his conscience as an oath.[46]

The practice of supporting a promise by an oath is practically as old as the existence of belief in God and it appears to have been utilised from the very earliest times to ratify and insure the fulfillment of any special contract or undertaking, by importing into the transaction the fear of divine wrath in case of a wilful failure to perform the obligation entered into.1394

Oaths are, thus, as old as the Creation. The nature of an oath is not at all altered by Christianity, or any other religion, but only made more solemn from the sanction of rewards and punishments being more openly declared. All oaths spoken of in the scriptures, both of the old and new testaments, are obviously regarded as religious ceremonies.

Object of Oath

The real object of giving an oath is the idea that there will be a super human retribution in case of a falsehood and consequently actual words or ceremonies are immaterial. The purpose of giving an oath is not to call the attention of God to the party but to call the attention of the party to God.[47]

Provisions of Oaths Act

Section 3 of the Oaths Act 1969 lays down the authority to administer oaths and affirmations, and it prescribes the courts and persons authorised to administer, by themselves or by their officers empowered in that behalf, oaths and affirmations in discharge of the duties or in exercise of the powers imposed upon them and they are all courts and persons having by law the authority to receive evidence. Section 4 prescribes the persons by whom oaths or affirmations must be made and they include all witnesses, that is all persons who may lawfully be required to give evidence on or before any court. Section 8 provides that 'every person giving evidence on any subject before any court or person hereby authorized to administer oaths and affirmations, shall be bound to state the truth on such subject'.

Meaning of the Phrase--Sanctity of Oath

The opening words of this section 'whoever being legally bound by an oath or by an express provision of law to state the truth...' do not support the submission that a man, who is not bound under the law to make an affidavit, can, if he does make one, deliberately refrain from stating truthfully the facts which are within his knowledge. The meaning of these words is that whenever in a court of law a person binds himself on oath to state the truth he is bound to state the truth and he cannot be heard to say that he should not have gone into the witness-box or should not have made an affidavit, and therefore the submission that any false statements which he has made after taking the oath is not covered by the words of this section is not supportable. Whenever a man makes a statement in court on oath he is bound to state the truth and if he does not, he makes himself liable under the provisions of s 193 . It is no defense to say that he was not bound to enter the witness box. A defendant or even a plaintiff is not bound to go into the witness-box, but if either of them chooses to do so, he cannot, after he has taken the oath to make a truthful statement, state anything which is false. Indeed the very sanctity of the oath requires that a person put on oath must state the truth.[48]

Presumption of Oath Till the Statement Concluded

Where a statement is made, on solemn affirmation, on a certain date and is continued on a later date, it must be presumed that the oath, which is administered to the1395 witness on the first day of his statement, continues to bind his statement and he continues to be on oath till the evidence is concluded.[49]

Where a first informant turns hostile and does not support the prosecution version as set forth in FIR, he commits no offence under ss 191 and 193, IPC .[50]

13. Effect of Omission to Take Oath, or Irregularity in Administering Oath

Under the English law, for a person to be found guilty of perjury, he must have been 'lawfully sworn'.[51] A person is lawfully sworn if the court or person whom the oath, affirmation, or declaration is taken, has the power to administer it for the purpose of verifying the statement in question and the oath, affirmation, or declaration has been administered in a form and with ceremonies which the person has accepted without objection or has declared to be binding upon him.[52] But in India, under s 7 of the Oaths Act 1969, no omission, intentional, accidental or negligent,[53] to take an oath or make an affirmation, nor any irregularity therein shall invalidate any proceeding or render inadmissible any evidence, nor shall it affect the obligation of a witness to speak the truth, and every person giving evidence before any court or person authorized to administer oath or affirmation is bound to speak the truth.[54] But if there is no such authorisation, there is no such obligation on the witness,[55] as where a magistrate examining an accused person for the sake of gaining information on which proceedings could be taken, examined him on oath.[56] The administration of an oath or affirmation is, thus, merely a ministerial function, and is no longer an essential part of evidence. Therefore, the offence of intentionally giving false evidence may be committed, although the person has neither been sworn nor been affirmed.[57]

Where statement of a juvenile is recorded under s 164, CrPC without administering oath to him, s 191 would not be attracted. Section 193 , IPC would not apply.[58]

14. Power to Administer Oath

Section 3 of the Oaths Act 1969 authorises all courts and persons having by law or consent of the parties, authority to receive evidence, have power to administer oaths. The commanding officer of any military, naval or air force station or shop occupied by the armed forces of the Indian Union has also power to administer oath provided1396 that the oath or affirmation is administered within the limits of the station. The court, judge, magistrate or person may also administer oath and affirmation for the purpose of affidavits, if empowered in this behalf by the High Court in respect of affidavits for the purpose of judicial proceedings, or by the State Government in respect of other affidavits.[59]Under s 3 of the Evidence Act the word 'court' includes all magistrates. A magistrate is, therefore, ordinarily empowered to administer an oath or affirmation.[60]

A sub-divisional officer called upon the complainant in a case pending before him to show cause why he should not be prosecuted for an offence under s 211, IPC, and on the complainant showing cause sent the case to an honorary magistrate for recording evidence. The latter recorded the evidence and sent the case back to the sub-divisional officer. It was held that the preliminary inquiry required to be held under s 476 of old CrPC 1898 (new s 340 of CrPC 1973), could not be held by any other magistrate except the sub-divisional officer himself who thought that the case of the complainant was a false one and gave him a chance to show cause, that the honorary magistrate had, therefore, no jurisdiction to record the evidence of the petitioner and that the petitioner therefore did not give false evidence at any stage of a judicial proceeding within the meaning of s 193, IPC and could not be prosecuted for perjury.[61]

Where the magistrate had no power to administer an oath to a witness when he was examined as a witness in an inquiry regarding a headman, the orders of the magistrate in respect of such matters were held to be executive orders and the witness could not be convicted under s 193, IPC .[62]

15. Statements under Sections 121, 133, 164 and 202,Crpc

A magistrate acting under s 164 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 or when he is acting under s 202,[63] s 121,[64] or s 133 [65] thereof, has the power to administer an oath, and a charge of perjury can be framed on statements made before him on oath when he is so acting.[66]

A magistrate, setting out to record under s 164, CrPC, what any person has to say to him, may adopt one of two alternatives: he may record it as a statement or as a confession, using the appropriate procedure in each case. In either case, the record may be used, as allowed by law, for the purpose for which it was taken, but its use for a different purpose may be open to diverse objections. For example, a confession cannot be used as the basis of a prosecution for perjury. A statement cannot be used as a confession, that is, an admission of the truth of the facts set out in it in a criminal prosecution based on those facts, either against the person making it or against the person with whom he may be jointly tried. Inculpatory statements made under s 164, CrPC, by a person who was not treated as an accused, nor subsequently tried for any offence based on such statements, are admissible in a prosecution against him for1397 perjury. Such statements are not confessions and the magistrate's failure to record them in the manner laid down under s 164 does not preclude their being used in evidence.[67]

16. Relative Scope of Sections 182 and 191

Commentary under the same heading in s 182, ante may be referred to.

17. Contradictory Statements under Section 164 and at Trial--Effect of

A statement made on oath by a witness before a magistrate under s 164, CrPC, can be made the basis of an alternative charge together with a statement made on oath at the trial, provided there was a common relation between the two statements.[68] There is no legal objection to framing a charge in the alternative under s 193, IPC, against an accused for making contradictory statements, one under this section and the other before the court.[69] A statement made under s 164, CrPC is a judicial proceeding and can constitute the basis of prosecution for perjury[70] or of a complaint under s 340, CrPC,[71] when the deponent resiles therefrom and gives a statement contradictory thereto.

Where the eye-witness made a statement which was recorded by a magistrate under s 164, CrPC and despite all the precautions, at the trial the witness turned hostile and did not support the prosecution, even though she had squarely implicated the accused in a statement under s 164, CrPC as the persons who had killed the deceased in her house, a direction was issued to the trial court to issue a show cause notice to the witness calling upon her to show cause as to the offence of perjury and in the course of the inquiry pursuant to the show cause notice, the trial court was directed to ascertain as to who were the persons responsible for the witness having turned hostile even after having made a statement before the magistrate on an earlier occasion.[72]

Where a person was offered a pardon under s 306 and on his acceptance of the same, was placed before a magistrate in order that his statement may be recorded, the magistrate was held to have the power to administer an oath or solemn affirmation to him while taking his statement under s 164, CrPC, and the statement so recorded could form the subject of an alternative charge under the perjury sections of this Code.[73]

Such Contradictory Statements Show Prima Facie Case for Perjury

When a person makes two contradictory statements, one recorded under s 164, CrPC, and another as a witness in court, a prima facie case is made out for launching a complaint for perjury. It is not necessary to investigate and find out whether the deposition recorded under s 164, CrPC or the deposition given in the court is false.[74]1398

18. Magistrate not Competent to Record Statement--Effect of

In Queen-Empress v Bharma ,[75] it was held that a statement taken by a third class magistrate under s 164 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898, such magistrate not having the authority to carry on the preliminary inquiry in the case, is not evidence in a stage of a judicial proceeding, within the meaning of ss 191 and 193, such that when the statement is contradicted afterwards before the magistrate having jurisdiction and exercising it in the preliminary inquiry into an accusation of murder, it will form a sufficient basis for an alternative charge of giving false evidence in a judicial proceeding. But now under sub-s (1) of s 164, CrPC 1973, it is not necessary that the magistrate receiving or recording a confession or statement should be a magistrate having jurisdiction in the case. According to this sub-section a confession or statement can only be recorded by any metropolitan magistrate or a judicial magistrate irrespective of class and not by any executive magistrate except in Andaman and Nicobar Islands and Lakshadweep for which a special provision has been made by amendment. A police officer enjoying the powers of a magistrate under any law is, however, not empowered to record a confession.

19. Power To Administer Oath Under Other Acts

Power to administer oaths is given not only by the Oaths Act, but also by other Acts. Thus, under s 131(1)(b) of the Income Tax 1961,[76] an income tax officer, appellate assistant commissioner and commissioner of income-tax have the power to enforce the attendance of any person and examine him on oath.[77] Although an income-tax officer making an assessment is not strictly acting as a court of law, it is clear from these sections that he is acting in a quasi-judicial capacity, and he ought to conform to the mere elementary rules of judicial procedure, and in particular to conduct the case himself, and not allow somebody else, even his superior officer, to take the conduct out of his hands.[78]

20. Statements under Indian Registration Act and Indian Stamp Act

Under s 63 of the Indian Registration Act 1908, every registering officer may, at his discretion, administer oath to any person examined by him under the provisions of that Act. A person making a false statement before the sub-registrar, is punishable under s 82(a) of the Registration Act and s 193, IPC .[79] So also under ss 52 and 53 of the Indian Stamp Act 1899, the collector is empowered to make certain allowances for misused or spoiled stamps, and for this purpose, he is, under the rules framed under s 75 of that Act, empowered to require a claimant to make a declaration on oath.

21. Want of Jurisdiction to Administer Oath--Effect of

For an offence of giving false evidence, the accused should be bound by an oath to state the truth. Now, under s 8 of the Oaths Act, a person is bound to state the truth1399 when he gives evidence on any subject before any court or person authorised to administer oath and affirmations. Under s 3(1) of the Oaths Act, only courts and persons having, by law, or the consent of the parties, an authority to receive evidence are authorised to administer oaths and affirmations in discharge of the duties or in exercise of the powers conferred upon them by law. It may be necessary or desirable, for the purpose of s 193 to determine whether the statement alleged to be false was made in the course of a judicial proceeding. However, if it is held that it was not so made, the accused might still be liable to conviction of the offence of giving false evidence. But still in order that a person making a statement to an officer may be legally bound to speak the truth, it is necessary that the officer should be acting in the discharge of some duty or in the exercise of some power imposed or conferred upon him by law. If, in making an inquiry, the officer is not proceeding in the discharge of some duty or in the exercise of some power imposed or conferred upon him, a charge of false evidence in respect of the statements made in such an inquiry will not lie.[80] No charge of false evidence can lie in respect of a statement made in the course of proceedings which are ultra vires and illegal.[81]

22. Illustrative Cases

It is no offence to make a false statement before a person purporting to act in execution of a duty under the Indian Registration Act but not legally authorised to do so.[82]

A deputy magistrate, in the absence of authorisation, has no power to administer an oath to a person making a declaration in the shape of an affidavit; and such person cannot, on the facts stated in such declaration, be prosecuted for committing an offence either under s 193 or s 199 of the IPC .[83]

It is not competent to a court conducting an inquiry into the conduct of a vakil under Legal Practitioners Act to take a statement from him on solemn affirmation, and the vakil making a false statement before the court conducting the inquiry does not render himself liable under s 181 or s 193 of this Code.[84]

Where a person applied for a refund under ch 6 of the Stamp Act 1879, and the collector made over the application for inquiry to a deputy collector, the deputy collector was not entitled to put the witnesses produced by the applicant on oath, and consequently, in reference to the statements of such witnesses, no charge under s 181 or s 193 of the IPC was sustainable.[85]

Where on a police report the district magistrate ordered an investigation by the superintendent of police and on the latter's suggestion, directed a magistrate to hold an inquiry into the case, it was held that there was no legal authority for the inquiry by the magistrate and witnesses examined by him could not be prosecuted for giving false evidence.[86]1400

Where a suit by A is decreed against B but dismissed against C, there is no provision in the Code of Civil Procedure to reopen the case at the instance of C. If the case is reopened, the court's procedure is illegal, and witnesses examined at the re-hearing cannot be prosecuted for giving false evidence.[87]

Consent given by the Attorney General of India, without due care and caution, for the prosecution of an officer of the Indian Navy cannot lead to an inference that the document conveying the consent was a false document or that giving of consent amounted to giving of false evidence or fabricating false evidence at any stage of the judicial proceeding.[88]

23. Deposition not Read out to Witness--Effect of Section 278(1), CrPC provides that as the evidence of each witness taken under s 275 or s 276 is completed, it shall be read over to him and shall, if necessary be corrected. Some courts have taken the view that no statement by a witness, in a deposition, can be regarded as a complete statement until the deposition is finished and corrected, if necessary, because, till then, every statement is liable to be retracted, corrected, varied or qualified. The whole deposition must be read and construed as one and if a later statement in it is contradictory to, or at variance with, a previous statement in the same deposition, the statement first made will be deemed to be modified by the subsequent statement which can be regarded as a retraction or correction of it. An intention of giving false evidence is a necessary element to constitute an offence under s 193 . The intention can only be gathered from the surrounding circumstances and the subsequent correction or retraction by the witness of his statement, in the same deposition, might negative the existence of such an intention.[89] The other view is that if a deposition is not so read over, it is merely an irregularity according to the criminal as well as the civil law, and does not render the deposition inadmissible in evidence.[90] Convictions or orders of prosecution for perjury were, however, set aside on the ground of this irregularity on some cases,[91] but maintained in others.[92]1401

24. Curable Irregularity Not Vitiating Trial Unless Prejudice Caused

Reviewing the entire case-law, then in existence, it was held by the Allahabad High Court that where a deposition made by a witness contains a false statement, the deponent is guilty of perjury. The deposition is false notwithstanding its not being read over to the witness as required under s 278, CrPC . The provisions of the Penal Code relating to punishment for perjury do not pay any regard to the question of whether the deposition was read over or not. If a deposition is not read over to the witness, it is only an irregularity and the irregularity does not vitiate the conviction.[1] The view is in conformity with the view expressed by the Supreme Court in Bhagwan Singh v State of Punjab ,[2] following the Privy Council view taken in Abdul Rahman v Emperor [3] in which it was held that if the deposition is not read over that would only amount to a curable irregularity in the absence of prejudice which must be disclosed in an affidavit. The Saurashtra High Court also has taken the same view.[4] But the essence of the offence of perjury consists in an attempt to mislead and deceive the court. A deposition must be read as a whole and a witness must always be given an opportunity of correcting any answer given by him. Where a witness makes a false statement and subsequently corrects it in the course of his examination, it is undesirable that he should be subjected to a prosecution for perjury as he withdraws the lie and leaves the court under the impression of the truth.[5]

25. Legally Bound by an Express Provision of Law to State the Truth

The obligation to state the truth may be either by an oath or 'by an express provision of law.' In order to constitute the offence of giving false evidence, the alleged false statement must have been under the sanction of the law.[6]

If a petitioner, who is legally bound by an oath to state the truth in his affidavit accompanying the writ petition, makes a false statement which constitutes an offence of giving false evidence under s 191, IPC, punishable under s 197, IPC, then to eradicate the evil of perjury the court can issue a direction to file a complaint under s 193, IPC against him before the magistrate of competent jurisdiction.[7]

Some Express Provisions--Present Code Contains an Express Provision

Besides s 8 of the Oaths Act 1969 there are several other express provisions binding a person to state the truth. Witnesses are bound to speak the truth in proceedings under ss 52 and 84 of the Bengal Land Registration Act (Bengal Act, 7 of 1876)[8] and so are applicants under s 53, read with s 88 of the same Act.[9] In view of the Christian Marriage Act 1872, s 66, as amended by s 5 of Act 2 of 1891, false oaths or declarations and false notices or certificates made for the purpose of procuring a marriage fall within this section. In view of the Government Savings Bank Act 1873, 1402 s 7, false statements by any person claiming to be entitled to deposits belonging to deceased persons, fall within this section. A sub-registrar is, for the purposes of the Indian Registration Act 1908, competent to examine any person, and any false statement by such person before an officer in any proceedings or inquiries under the Act, renders such person liable for giving false evidence besides the liability under s 82 of that Act.[10]

26. Statements Under Section 161 , CrPC

Under the Code of Criminal Procedure 1861 and 1872, a person examined by a police officer was bound to answer all material questions, but was not liable to be prosecuted for giving false evidence in respect of his answers under s 193, IPC .[11] Under s 161 of the Code of 1882, persons being examined by the police in the course of an investigation made under ch 14 of that Code were bound to speak the truth in answering questions put by the police,[12] and not to do so was an offence under this section.[13]But the Code of 1898 restored the provision of s 118 of the CrPC of 1872, requiring the person examined simply 'to answer' instead of 'to answer truly', and this was thus not an 'express provision of law to speak the truth' within the meaning of this section.[14] The provisions of s 161 of the present CrPC 1973, however, revive the provisions of the Code of 1882 regarding the statements to be recorded by the police. Sub-section (2) of s 161 of the present Code uses the words 'person shall be bound to answer truly' and thus introduces an express provision of law to state the truth so as to attract the provisions of s 191, IPC with the exception of questions the answers to which would have a tendency to expose the maker of the statement to a criminal charge or to a penalty or forfeiture.[15]

27. Statements under Section 175 , CrPC

Section 174, CrPC empowers a police officer to inquire and report on cases of suicide. For this purpose s 175 of that Code empowers him to summon persons and examine them, and 'every person so summoned shall be bound to attend and to answer truly all questions other than those the answers to which would have a tendency to expose him to a criminal charge or to a penalty or forfeiture'. But under the Code of 1898, he was only bound to answer questions truly if he had been summoned in writing to attend before the police officer. Investigation in the nature of an inquest consist, under s 174, of the investigation into the apparent cause of death. Such an investigation ceases when the cause of death is ascertained, that is, when it is determined whether the death was natural, suicidal, accidental, or due to homicide.1403

28. Pleadings--Verification of Order VI, r 15 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Act 5 of 1908), requires every pleading, which means plaint or written statement (O VI, r 1), to be verified by the party or by one of the parties or by some person acquainted with the facts of the case. It also requires that the person verifying should specify what he verifies from his own knowledge and what upon information received and believed to be true. The ordinary dictionary meaning of the word 'verify' is 'to confirm the truth or truthfulness of'. So it has been held that O VI, r 15, CPC, is an 'express provision of law' requiring a party filing a plaint or written statement to confirm the truth of the statements made in the plaint or written statement to confirm the truth of the statements made in the plaint or written statement, and that if he does so knowing that the verification is false, he gives false evidence within the meaning of this section.[16]

False Pleading--Party and not the Counsel Responsible

It is not only a question of ethics, but an inflexible requirement of law that every statement made must be true to the extent that it must be verified and correct to the knowledge of the person making it. When a client instructs his learned advocate to draft the pleadings, the basic responsibility lies on the clients because the advocate, being an officer of the court acts entirely on the instructions given to him, though the lawyer will not be immune from even a prosecution. If the situation is uncertain, it is for his client to inform his learned advocate and consequently, if false statements are made in the pleadings, the responsibility will devolve wholly and completely on the party on whose behalf those statements are made.[17]

Returns--Effect of Making Wrong Verification

A false verification is not 'evidence' on which a decree can be founded in a civil suit, but it may be the basis of a prosecution for perjury.[18] A person filing a written statement in a civil suit is bound to speak the truth therein.[19] So is a person making a return to the income-tax commissioners, or in filing municipal assessment papers, or in answering questions asked by a registrar of deeds.[20] In a Nagpur case[21] it has been held that:

> The declaration contemplated in section 199 is a species of the genus of declaration contemplated in this section. We have therefore to study the character of the declarations mentioned in the section. They are declarations which a person is bound by law to make. The most familiar instances of such declarations are plaint, and pleadings in a suit. A person is under a legal obligation to verify the allegations of fact made in the plaint and pleadings. If he verifies falsely, he comes under the clutches of this 1404section and is liable to be punished under section 193 for giving false evidence. A man who voluntarily and officially verifies a statement, when the law does not want him to do so, does not render himself liable to punishment.[22]

So, a petition not requiring verification cannot, from the fact of its being verified unnecessarily, be made the subject of a prosecution for giving false evidence.[23] But a contrary view has been expressed by the Supreme Court, where a false affidavit was filed, though not required.[24]

A False Declaration in a Written Statement--Whether it can be Basis of Prosecution

In some cases, however, taking a contrary view, it has been held that 'in many cases persons in verifying pleadings, are often found to say something which is not strictly true, but by such action they do not render themselves liable for prosecution for perjury for making a false statement. This by itself does not constitute an offence under s 193, IPC '.[25]

In an Allahabad case,[26] a learned judge has gone to the length of saying that an allegation in a written statement is not evidence of any fact, which a court is bound or authorised by law to receive and, therefore, a false declaration in a written statement which is verified as required by the provisions of O VI, r 15, Civil Procedure Code, but of which the court has not ordered proof by affidavit, cannot be the basis of a conviction under s 199 .[27]Section 139 of the Income Tax Act 1961 provides for the furnishing of a return of income in the prescribed form and verified in the prescribed manner.

Section 249 of that Act requires an appeal also to be in the prescribed form and to be verified in the prescribed manner. Section 277 of the Income Tax Act prescribes a punishment for making a statement in any verification which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true. Therefore, a person making the false statement even in verification would be liable for giving false evidence.

29. Affidavit--What is

'Affidavit' means an instrument in writing containing a declaration as to certain facts, signed by the person making it and sworn before a person having authority to administer oath. The provisions of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 are not applicable to the affidavits filed in courts or elsewhere.[28] The provisions relating to affidavits have, therefore, to be found in the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 and the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973. Order XIX, rr 1 to 3, CPC, lay down the procedure of filing affidavits in a civil court. By an amendment, rr 4 to 15 were added to O XIX, CPC for their application in the State of Uttar Pradesh only. Order XIX of the CPC1405 empowers the court to have particular facts proved by an affidavit. Under r 1 thereof, any court may, at any time, for sufficient reason, order that any particular fact or facts may be proved by an affidavit, or that the affidavit of any witness may be read at the hearing on such conditions as the court thinks reasonable. Under r 2, evidence upon any application may be given by an affidavit, but the court may, at the instance of either party, order the attendance for cross-examination of the deponent. The combined effect of the relevant provisions is that ordinarily, a fact has to be proved by oral evidence, but the court may, subject to the conditions laid down in O XIX, ask a particular fact or facts to be proved by affidavits.[29] The oath may be administered to the deponents of affidavits to be filed under the CPC by (a) any court or magistrate, or (b) any notary appointed under the Notaries Act 1952 or (c) any officer or other person appointed by the High Court, or (d) any officer appointed by any other court which the State Government has generally or specially empowered in this behalf.

Authorities for Criminal Cases

Under s 68 of the CrPC 1973 affidavits made before a magistrate are in certain circumstances admissible as evidence in proof of the service of summons. Under s 296 of that Code, the evidence of any person whose evidence is of a formal character, may be given by an affidavit and may, subject to all just exceptions, be read in evidence in any inquiry, trial or other proceedings under the Code. Under s 295 when any application is made to any court in the course of any inquiry, trial or other proceeding under the Code, and allegations are made therein respecting any public servant, the applicant may give evidence of the facts alleged in the application by an affidavit, and the court may, if it thinks fit, order that evidence relating to such facts be so given. Such affidavits shall be confined to, and shall state separately, such facts as the deponent is able to prove from his own knowledge and such fact as he has reasonable ground to believe to be true, and in the latter case, the deponent shall clearly state the grounds of such belief.[30]Section 297(1) lays down the authorities before whom affidavits to be used before any court may be sworn. They are: any judge or any judicial or executive magistrate, or any commissioner of oaths appointed by a High Court or a court of session, or any notary appointed under the Notaries Act 1952.

The above are 'express provisions of law' which authorise the use of affidavits as evidence, and under which the person making the affidavit is bound to state the truth. The filing of a false affidavit, by a witness, in proceedings before a court, constitutes an offence under ss 191 and 192, and not under s 199, IPC .[31] But where a deponent is illiterate and the affidavit has been written in one language and signed by the deponent in another language and the evidence is lacking to show that the contents of the affidavit were read over to the deponent, prosecution under s 193 is not expedient.[32] In Asgarali Mulla Abrahimji v Emperor ,[33] a learned judge of the Nagpur High Court classified affidavits as declarations and observed:1406

> Declarations or verified statements are of two kinds: (i) Declarations which a person is bound by law to make such as the verification of pleadings under the Civil Procedure Code. (ii) Declarations which a person makes for the purpose of their being used as evidence, such as affidavits filed under O 19, CPC. Of these, the second kind of declaration alone can be used as evidence and can therefore found a conviction of the offence under s 193, Penal Code.

It is however, stated that when a person has to make the verification of his pleadings etc. under a specific provision of law and if he does so knowing that that verification is false, he is said to give false evidence, thereby making himself liable for punishment under s 193, though the verification is not used as evidence.[34]

Affidavit Attested/Sworn Before Magistrate Not Competent to Do So--Effect

Where a deputy magistrate has no power to administer an oath to a person making a declaration in the shape of an affidavit, such person cannot, on the facts stated in such declarations, be prosecuted for committing an offence either under ss 193 or 199 of the IPC .[35] Where an affidavit by an accused in a criminal case is sworn before a magistrate who has no jurisdiction to take evidence in the case, the accused cannot be prosecuted under s 193 or s 199, IPC for filing a false affidavit.[36] A declaration, before it can be made the foundation of a prosecution under s 193, IPC, must be one which is admissible in evidence, and which the court, before which it is filed, is bound or authorised by law to receive in evidence.[37]

Mere Omission to State Facts in Affidavit in Examination-in-Chief, No False Evidence

Mere omission to state certain facts in affidavit in examination-in-chief about the accused's previous conviction does not amount to false evidence when in cross-examination, he admits of his conviction for the offence under s 304A, IPC .[38]

Coram Non Judice

In order to found a prosecution for perjury the affidavit must be such as may be used as evidence. Where, therefore, in support of an application for transfer of a criminal case affidavits were filed of persons who were neither parties nor witnesses in the case; it was held that the statements were coram non judice and could not form the subject of a charge under s 193, IPC .[39] This view, however, does not appear to be sound in Badri Prasad v Jhamman ,[40] disagreeing with its earlier view in Emperor v Mattan ,[41] the Allahabad High Court has held that if the accused person chooses to come within the scope of this section and swears an affidavit on false facts, he would be liable to punishment which can be inflicted upon persons who swear, such false affidavits. Therefore, if the affidavit filed by the accused is required by law to be sworn, the accused cannot take shelter behind the plea that the affidavit was not1407 required[42] and if he makes false allegations in an affidavit in support of an application, he can be convicted under this section.[43] It is submitted that a witness cannot otherwise be in a better position in respect of his filing a false affidavit in any case, whatsoever.

Affidavit to Conform to Truth Though Made Voluntarily When Not Required

It is not disputed that an affidavit is evidence within the meaning of s 191, IPC and a person swearing to a false affidavit is guilty of perjury punishable under s 193, IPC .[44] The opening words of this section do not support the contention that a man who is not bound under the law to make an affidavit can, if he does make one, deliberately refrain from stating truthfully the facts which are within his knowledge. The meaning of these words is that whenever in a court of law a person binds himself on oath to state the truth, he is bound to state the truth and he cannot be heard to say that he should not have gone into the witness-box or should not have made an affidavit and therefore the submission that any false statement which he had made after taking the oath is not covered by the words of this section, is not supportable.[45]

Complaint by the Magistrate Before Whom Affidavit is Sworn--Not Necessary

Adducing evidence and swearing an affidavit is entirely a different concept. The swearing of an affidavit is a form prescribed by law to be used as a piece of evidence acceptable in a court or before any other authority.[46] Thus, complaint for perjury can be made by the court or the authority before whom the false affidavit is filed or used notwithstanding the fact that the affidavit was sworn before a magistrate and not before such court or authority.

Principle Applicable to Affidavits

The filing of a false affidavit, by a witness in proceedings before a court, constitutes an offence under ss 191 and 192, and not under s 199, IPC .[47] But where a deponent is illiterate or the affidavit has been written in one language and signed by the deponent in another language and the evidence is lacking to show that the contents of the affidavit were read over to the deponent, prosecution under s 193 was held to be not expedient.[48]

False Affidavit in Support of Writ Petition

In a writ petition which was supported by an affidavit, the petitioner stated that he had not used or permitted to be used the building in any manner contrary to the terms imposed by the respondent (Delhi Development Authority). The court found that this statement which was false, was made to mislead and overreach the court and directed the registrar of the High Court to file a complaint for the offence of perjury in a competent court.[49]1408

Where an affidavit was filed in support of a writ petition, by a concealment of facts which misled the High Court to pass an ad interim order, the petitioner shall be deemed to have intentionally given false evidence in a stage of judicial proceeding and can be charged with having offended public justice under ch XI of the IPC 1860, particularly s 191 read with s 193 of the Code.[50] Where the respondent filed an affidavit in support of a writ petition, for the purpose of being used in judicial proceedings, and wrongly made a statement that the age of Dr Justice AS Anand had not been determined by the President of India in terms of art 217 of the Constitution, the respondent being legally bound by an oath to state the truth in the affidavit accompanying the petition was prima facie held to have made a false statement which constitutes an offence of giving false evidence as defined under s 191 IPC, punishable under s 193, IPC .[51]

Where a petitioner made a statement on oath in a writ petition supported by an affidavit that the timings of a law college were changed by the principal arbitrarily, the true fact being that the principal had the powers to change the timings and the change was made by him after receiving the representation of the majority of the students of the college to the said effect, the petitioner was held liable to be prosecuted for deliberately making a false statement before the court in a judicial proceeding, more so when he was one of the students signing the representation.[52]

30. 'Or Being Bound by Law to Make a Declaration on any Subject'--Scope of

This clause is concerned with that class of cases of which the declaration to be made by a person obtaining a marriage licence, is an example.[53]The declarations contemplated in this section are declarations which a person is bound by law to make. The Income Tax Act requires a person to deliver certain accounts or statements and penalises the delivery of any account or statement which is false.[54] It is submitted that such statements come under this clause and the person delivering a false account or statement would be liable for giving false evidence. In some cases, it has been held that declarations, which a person is bound by law to make, are such as the verification of pleadings under the Civil Procedure Code.[55] The Code of Civil Procedure requires an application for execution of a decree to be in writing, signed and verified by the applicant and to contain certain particulars, among which is a statement whether any and what payment or adjustment has been made between the parties subsequent to the decree sought to be executed. It has been held that an intentional omission to make such a statement or making a false statement amounts to an offence of giving false evidence.[56] A declaration, before it can be made the foundation of a prosecution must be one which is admissible in evidence, and which the court, before which it is filed, is bound or authorised by law to receive in1409 evidence.[57] But it need not be material to the case,[58] nor need it be on oath or solemn affirmation.[59]

31. A Statement Must Contain the Whole Truth

This section requires that there must be a statement made by the accused and that the statement must be false. The statement covered by this section, must be a definite statement of fact or of belief. These must be a definite assertion and not a statement qualified by expression of doubt or want of knowledge.[60] The accused must also know or believe what he has stated or declared is false.[61] To support a prosecution for giving false evidence it must be shown that the false statement charged against the accused is literally false. There must be a statement of fact which is false. It is no offence if the facts stated are true but some circumstances are suppressed, with the result that a wrong inference may be deduced.[62] But the Allahabad High Court expressed a contrary view in Narottam Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[63] wherein it has been held that a person is guilty of perjury not only when he does not state the truth but also when he states something which is not the whole truth. This view seems to lay down the correct proposition of law. The statements made by the accused must be false. It must be proved beyond any reasonable doubt that those statements are deliberately false.[64] In Queen v Ahmed Ally ,[65] it was observed:

> It appears to us that the true rule is that no man can be convicted of giving false evidence except on proof of facts which, if accepted as true, show not merely that it is incredible, but that it is impossible that the statements of the party accused, made on oath can be true. If the inference from the facts proved falls short of this, it seems to us that there is nothing on which a conviction can stand; because assuming all that is proved to be true, it is still possible that no crime was committed. The evidence of a medical man or other skilled witness, however eminent, as to what he thinks may or may not have taken place under a particular combination of circumstances, however, confidently he may speak, is ordinarily a mere matter of opinion. Human judgment is fallible. Human knowledge is limited and imperfect.

32. Contradictory Statements

The question as to whether a witness who makes contradictory statements at different stages of his examination by the same court, for example one in cross-examination and the other in re-examination, can be convicted on a charge in the alternative, i.e., that one or other of the two statements made by him must be false, without proving which of them is false, has led to some difference of judicial opinion, the majority of1410 judges holding that such a conviction is good.[66] If an accused has made two statements, which are so contradictory and irreconcilable that both cannot possibly be true, it means that one of them is false and if the other ingredients of the offence are made out, he can be convicted without proving which of the two statements is false. It is only when the prosecution charges him with making a particular statement falsely that it has to prove that that particular statement is false and not the other. In such a case, the mere fact that he made conflicting statement would not suffice, because it may very well be that the other statement was false and not the statement with which he was charged. When all that is proved is that one of the two statements is false, it means that it is not proved that a particular statement is false. If the accused is charged with making that statement falsely, naturally the charge must fail.[67] The essence of the offence lies in the intention to give false evidence, and that intention may, I think, just as well exist when the contradiction is in various stages of the same deposition as where it is in different stages of the same proceedings. To consider whether the false statement was made in the course of the deposition or in the course of two separate depositions seems to be irrelevant, and calculated to obscure the real question. An intention to give false evidence is a necessary element to constitute an offence under s 193 . That intention can only be gathered from the surrounding circumstances, and the subsequent correction or retraction by a witness of his statement in the same deposition might negate the existence of such an intention.[68]

33. Conviction Only When Two Statements are Irreconcilable

To convict an accused of giving false evidence, it is necessary to show not only that he has made a statement which is false, but also that he either knew or believed it to be false or did not believe it to be true. It is a well-known rule of law, applied by eminent judges to the cases of perjury arising out of contradictory statements, that the courts dealing with them should not convict unless fully satisfied that the statements are from every point of view irreconcilable, and if the contradiction consists in two statements opposed to each other as to matters of inference or opinion on which a man may take one view at one time and a contrary view at another, there can be no perjury, unless he has on oath stated facts on which his first statement was based and then denied these facts on oath on a subsequent occasion. Where it is sought to establish the offence of perjury on contradictory statements, although the court may believe that on the one or the other occasion the prisoner swore what was not true, it is not a necessary consequence that he committed perjury for there are cases in which a person might very honestly and conscientiously swear to a particular fact from the best of his recollection and belief, and from other circumstances at a subsequent time1411 be convinced that he was wrong and swear to the reverse, without meaning to swear falsely either time.[69]

Where in an application to dismiss order on compromise petition allegedly signed by impersonating the respondents instead of the real respondents in writ appeal an admission was made by the accused on oath that some persons impersonated real contesting respondents in writ appeal, subsequently, however, in suo motu proceedings for contempt of court the accused stated that he had given false statement in course of those proceedings when his sworn statement was being recorded, it was held that the act of the accused amounts to commission of the offence of perjury.[70]

Court Cannot Assume Existence of Explanation to the Inconsistency of Two Statements

When two statements, given by the accused on two different occasions, are mutually inconsistent and the inconsistency is nowhere resolved in the subsequent correspondence, the accused may be able to show that the statement made by him on one of the two days was a true and correct statement and he may even have some reasonably acceptable explanation for the apparent inconsistency between the two. But the court cannot assume that such an explanation exists. Once the inconsistency in his subsequent statement made on oath is brought home to the court, the court cannot just wish away the inconsistencies and cannot hold that the accused may have some plausible explanation to the inconsistency. If the accused wants to give some explanation, he must give it.[71]

Law does not Punish a Man for Changing Opinion

The court should, however, not convict a person for perjury unless fully satisfied that the statements are from every point of view irreconcilable;[72] and if the statements opposed to each other are as to matters of inference or opinion on which a man may take one view at one time, and a contrary view at another, there can be no perjury unless he has stated facts on oath which are in conflict with the facts on oath on a subsequent occasion. The law does not punish a man because he has changed his opinion.[73] A witness should always be given an opportunity for explaining an apparently contradictory statement at the time it is made.[74]

The Whole Statement must be Read as One

As observed by Bhashyam Iyendgar J in Re Palani Palgan,[75] no statement by a witness in a deposition can be regarded as a complete statement until the deposition is finished, and corrected if necessary; for till then, every statement is liable to be1412 retracted, corrected, varied or qualified, the whole deposition must be read and construed as one, and if a later statement in it is contradictory to or at variance with a previous statement in the same deposition, the statement first made will be deemed to be modified by the subsequent statement which can be regarded as a retraction or correction of it.

Where a double record is maintained by the court and two versions are taken down of a statement--one in English and other in vernacular--and the latter statement of such a witness in court is in accord with the English version, then it cannot be said in law that the witness had in fact committed perjury in making a statement in court which ran counter to the version of his earlier statement.[76] The question as to whether one of the two contradictory statements must necessarily be false is a question of construction and therefore of law.[77]

Contradictory Statements--Intention is a Question of Fact

The decisions referred to above show that the existence of contradictory statements in the same deposition or different depositions makes no difference. It is the intention of the witness at the time of making the statements which is material. If the first statement was made through an error or mistake or under the stress of cross-examination, without fully understanding the implications of the question, there could be no intention on his part to deceive the court. In such a case, the subsequent correction must be accepted as the only statement of the witness. On the other hand, if the first statement is deliberate, the intention to deceive the court is apparent. The subsequent statement in such a case would be equally deliberate and intended to deceive the court. The intention is a question of fact to be decided in each case.[78]

Contradictory Statements--Completion of Offence Does Not Remain in Abeyance

It has been held that it is quite immaterial that two contradictory statements were made in the course of one deposition in one trial. If the first statement is false, the applicant committed the offence of perjury as soon as he made it. Whether he made it deliberately and whether he knew or believed it to be false or did not believe it to be true is to be seen with reference to the time at which he made it. If the requirements of this section are fulfilled, he committed the offence of perjury as soon as he made it. The completion of the offence does not remain in abeyance for a short time in order to give him an opportunity of repenting and correcting himself. It does not remain in abeyance so long as the trial is not over or so long as he has not been cross-examined under ss 243 or 247 of the Code or so long as he has an opportunity of being recalled and making the correct statement later. What he does subsequently has absolutely no bearing on the offence already committed by him. The offence is not purged or wiped off by subsequent repentance or retraction or correction.[79]

A witness who endeavours to correct his evidence as recorded by a magistrate by means of an affidavit stating what he really said, does not make any contradictory statement.[80] Where a witness made a statement which was false and at once admitted it, and stated what was the real truth, it was held that he should not be prosecuted for1413 giving false evidence.[81] But where a witness deliberately gave false evidence and, when confronted with incontestable proof of his falsehood, admitted it to be false, it was held that he was guilty of perjury.[82]

As to a charge in the alternative, see CrPC 1973, s 221 and illust (c) thereto. For further discussion of the subject see commentary under s 193 .

34. Knowledge or Belief that the Statement is False or is not True

A man cannot be convicted of perjury for having acted rashly, or for having failed to make reasonable inquiry with regard to the facts alleged by him to be true. It must be found that he made some statement or, statements which he knew to be false or which he believed to be false or which he did not believe to be true.70 The accused must have known or believed that his statement was false at the time he made it, or not have believed it to be true.[83] The accused must have known or believed that his statement was false at the time he made it, or not have believed it to be true. [84]The mere fact of a person placing his signature on a written report, without knowing its contents, is no ground for holding that he necessarily knew or had reason to believe that the contents of the report were false; at most, the act is indiscreet and does not amount to an offence under s 193 . It may be a very foolish thing for a man to attest a document and without being made aware of the contents, however, this indiscretion does not amount to an offence under the IPC .[85] A person, going into the witness-box, must believe that all the evidence he is about to give is true, otherwise he gives false evidence. Where the evidence is proved to be false to the knowledge of the accused, his intention to give such evidence is proved.[86] The criminal intention must always be proved.[87]

Making a Statement not Believing it to be True Amounts to Perjury

The law requires that a person may not positively know a statement to be false and he may not even believe it to be true, but if, nevertheless, he does not believe the statement to be true, then he commits the offence of giving false evidence.[88]

Where in an affidavit the deponent makes certain allegations based on information conveyed to him by other persons, even if the information which was given to him was wrong, he cannot be held liable unless at the time he swore the affidavit he knew that it was wrong and in spite of the knowledge, he swore the affidavit.[89] Even belief would fall under expln 2 to this section.[90]1414

35. Whether the Proceedings Must be Sanctioned or Authorised by Law

It is only when a person is legally bound by an oath or by an express provision of law to state the truth or is bound by law to make a declaration upon any subject and he makes any statement which is false and which he knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, that he is said to have given false evidence.[1] Where a magistrate had no power to administer oath to a witness when he was examined as a witness in an inquiry regarding a headman, the orders of the magistrate in respect of such matters were held to be executive orders and the witness could not be convicted under s 193, IPC .[2] Since a headman cannot examine a witness in an inquiry, the statement made to the headman can be used only under ss 145 and 157 Evidence Act 1872.[3] Where the affidavit by the accused in a criminal proceeding was sworn before a first class magistrate who had no jurisdiction to take evidence in the particular matter in respect of which the accused was prosecuted, the provisions of ss 4 and 5 of Oaths Act were contravened and the accused therefore, could not be prosecuted under ss 193 and 199 for filing a false affidavit on oath.[4]

36. Abetment in Giving False Evidence

Where an accused asks a witness to suppress the mention of certain facts while giving evidence before a magistrate in reference to a charge of defamation, it would constitute abetment of giving false evidence in a stage of a judicial proceeding.[5]

Where C falsely represented himself to be U, and the writer of a document signed by U and T knowing that C was not U, and had not written such document, adduced C as U and as the writer of that document, it was held that T ought to have been convicted on a charge of abetting the giving of false evidence.[6] There can be no offence of abetment of giving false evidence unless the person charged with abetment intended not only that a statement should be made, but also that the statement should be made falsely.[7]

Where a person having reason to believe that a certain man has committed an offence punishable under s 457, IPC, instigates the complainant and the witnesses in the case to make statements which he knows to be false, he commits an offence under ss 109 and 193 and not under ss 201 and 511 of the Code.[8]

Explanation 1

A false statement made punishable under this section may be oral or in writing.[9] An oral statement made on oath before a court or a person legally authorised to receive evidence, comes within the category of verbal statement. The statements and declarations made in any affidavit on oath or solemn affirmation or any other statements or verification made under the requirement of any law, though not on1415 oath, come within the category of a statement made in writing. The expln 1 to this section, however, contemplates a statement even made otherwise, which is neither verbal nor in writing. Signs or visible representations may fall in this category. It is, however, submitted that to make a sign or visible representation punishable, it should fulfill the other requirements of this section discussed above.

Explanation 2--'Attest'--Meaning of

The dictionary meaning of the word 'attesting' used in expln 2 is 'certifying the validity of' and it has been used in the sense of certifying a statement or document to be true. This may be evident from illust (e) to this section. It, therefore, follows that not only an interpreter or translator is liable to be prosecuted under this section but even any other person who knowingly certifies a false document to be a true document, while being bound by on oath or other requirement of law, will have to face the same consequences and he can be punished for committing perjury under s 193, IPC . A voluntary act of attesting or certifying a document by a private person may not fall under expln 2 and to bring it within the clutches of this section it must be proved that the attestation was made while being bound by an oath or by an express provision of law.

Effect of Statement Without Knowledge

It will appear from the foregoing discussion that it is not necessary that a statement or declaration made by the person is true to the personal knowledge of the maker, even if it is based on belief it is sufficient to bring the case under this section. In case the information received by a person is not believed to be true but he still uses it as true, he commits an offence under this section.[10] The Supreme Court in Ranjit Singh v State of Pepsu ,[11] has specifically held that even belief would fall under expln 2 to this section. The law further contemplates a situation where a person does not know any fact, in controversy, but still says that he knows it. Illustration (d) to this section amply explains this. Such statements are also covered under this section.

37. Prosecution not Necessary in All Cases of Perjury

It is now well settled that the prosecution for perjury should be sanctioned by courts only in those cases where it appears to be deliberate and conscious and conviction is reasonable, probable or likely. It is also well recognised that there must be a prima facie case of a deliberate falsehood on a matter of substance and the courts should be satisfied that there is reasonable foundation for the charge.[12] Where evidence evenly balanced in weakness and the case is one of oath against oath, the prosecution should be withdrawn.[13] Where the offence of rape was alleged to be committed, the government doctor who examined the victim gave the certificate of a commission of rape on the victim but turned hostile during the trial and tried to protect the accused, the Karnataka High Court took a serious view of the matter, particularly since the man was a government doctor and observed that it was unfortunate that a professional, while dealing with such a serious case, has attempted to give evidence1416 which is nothing short of perjury, but this fact does not necessarily prove fatal to the prosecution. The Karnataka High Court recommended that the concerned authorities take appropriate disciplinary action against the doctor after affording him a reasonable opportunity to show cause.[14] But the direction to file a complaint under s 340 read with s 195(1)(b), CrPC for offence under s 191 read with s 193, IPC was not issued.

In a case, petitioner officer of bank was being prosecuted under s 191, IPC for giving false evidence in writ petition. Proceedings started against the complainant, defaulter in re-payment of loan under ss 13 and 14 of SARFAESI Act 2002. The petitioner acted in good faith representing the Bank, as instructed by the Bank on the basis of the documents available in the Bank in respect of the transaction. If any bona fide mistake has been made in the calculation by the petitioner, it will not amount to an offence under s 191 of the IPC . Petitioner held protected by s 32 of the SARFAESI Act. Complaint filed under s 340, CrPC for prosecution under s 191, IPC quashed.[15]

Court to Strike Delicate Balance Between Two Extremes

While issuing notices of perjury, the court has to exercise a delicate balance between two extremes, one being that people giving perjured evidence should not be allowed to go scot free for that would be giving a licence to people to give perjured evidence. On the other hand, the court has to equally bear in mind that being very sensitive on this issue and approaching every evidence scathingly and easily jumping to the conclusion that witnesses are liars would result in people shying away from giving evidence in courts; a tendency which is on the increase in our country.[16] Thus, where a notice under s 191, IPC for perjury was issued to eye-witnesses alleged to have committed perjury while the evidence on record did not indicate with certainty that they were liars, the issue of a notice of perjury was found not proper and therefore, quashed by the Bombay High Court invoking inherent powers, even though only one of the witnesses had challenged the notice both on his behalf and that of the others.[17]

It is not that every case of perjury, irrespective of facts and circumstances, should form the subject of an inquiry, but it is only in such cases where the courts are of an honest belief and opinion; on an objective consideration of the facts and circumstances, that the interest of justice requires the laying of a complaint. It is not mandatory, but discretionary for the court, depending upon the facts and circumstances of each case, either to conduct a preliminary inquiry or to dispense with the same, to form an opinion that it is in the interests of justice to prosecute the person or persons who committed the perjury.[18]

38. Burden of Proof to Prove Falsehood

The burden of proving the falsehood of the statement lies on the prosecution. Where, therefore, in a suit for sale on a mortgage consisted of two promissory notes, and the accused in his defense pleaded that the promissory notes were without consideration,1417 and he was accused of giving false evidence in respect of that pleading, it was held that:[19]

> For the purpose of the civil courts the Negotiable Instruments Act lays down that the presumption is that a promissory note has been passed for consideration. That rule of law would not necessarily apply to a criminal trial in which every element which goes to constitute a particular offence has to be proved by the prosecution. In the present case it was necessary for the prosecution to prove that the promissory notes were for consideration and it was not for the accused to prove the contrary.

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 192.

Fabricating false evidence.--

Whoever causes any circumstance to exist or [20][makes any false entry in any book or record, or electronic record or makes any document or electronic record containing a false statement], intending that such circumstances, false entry or false statement may appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding, or in a proceeding taken by law before a public servant as such, or before an arbitrator, and that such circumstance, false entry or false statement, so appearing in evidence, may cause any person who in such proceeding is to form an opinion upon the evidence, to entertain an erroneous opinion touching any point material to the result of such proceeding, is said "to fabricate false evidence".

Illustrations

(a) A puts jewels into a box belonging to Z, with the intention that they may be found in that box, and that this circumstance may cause Z to be convicted of theft. A has fabricated false evidence.
(b) A makes a false entry in his shop-book for the purpose of using it as corroborative evidence in a Court of Justice. A has fabricated false evidence.
(c) A, with the intention of causing Z to be convicted of a criminal conspiracy, writes a letter in imitation of Z's handwriting, purporting to be addressed to an accomplice in such criminal conspiracy, and puts the letter in a place which he knows that the officers of the police are likely to search. A has fabricated false evidence.1418

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

The words 'makes any false entry in any book or record, or electronic record or makes any document or electronic record containing a false statement' were substituted by Information Technoloty Act 2000, s 91 and sch I, for 'makes any false entry in any book or record, or makes any document containing a false statement' (wef 17-10-2000).

2. Scope

This section defines 'fabricating false evidence', which is made an offence under s 193 . The offence consists in 'perverting the course of justice'. Under the English Law 'steps taken for the manufacture or fabrication of false evidence may be indicated as attempts to commit the misdemeanor of perverting the course of justice'.[21]

Unlike ss 211 and 463, this section does not require an 'intent to cause injury to any person'; nor does it require that the fabrication of evidence should be done dishonestly or fraudulently within the meaning of sub-s (2) of s 464 .[22]

If the principal motive of the action was to make a false document with the object that an erroneous opinion be formed in some judicial proceeding, whether actually pending or likely to come into existence subsequently, the provisions of this section are attracted. The proximity to a judicial proceeding, pending or likely to come into existence, is the test by which the applicability of this section is to be determined.[23]

A judicial proceeding may not be pending at the time of the fabrication.[24]

3. Essentials

To constitute this offence three things must exist:

(a) The circumstance, entry or document must be false;
(b) An intention, that the one or the other should appear in one or other of the three kinds of proceedings specified;
(c) An intention to cause the person, who is to form an opinion on the evidence, to form an erroneous one 'on any point material to the result'.[25]

Neither s 192, IPC, incorporate the principle of vicarious liability, and therefore, it is incumbent on the complainant to specifically aver the role of each of the accused in the complaint.[26]

Commentary under same heading in s 193, post may also be referred to.1419

4. 'Whoever'

The word 'whoever' would include an accused person. It is not possible to accept the proposition that as a matter of law an accused person can use as genuine fabricated evidence so long as he uses it for his defence.

There is no legislative provision to that effect. Section 313 of the CrPC provides that the accused shall not be liable to be prosecuted for giving false evidence in respect of any statement by him as an accused person. But there is no provision giving him such immunity as regards the use of fabricated evidence, and no such immunity can be implied in his favour simply because he uses it as an accused person in his defence.[27]

Commentary under same heading in s 193, post may be referred to.

Police, Public Servants and Citizens, all Fall within the Term 'Whoever'

'The police are too often tempted to introduce padding in a case in their overzealousness to establish a charge, which they believe to be true in support of which the evidence in their possession is weak. But this practice has to be condemned in no uncertain terms' observed Dixit J of the Madhya Pradesh High Court while delivering the judgement on behalf of the division bench in State of Madhya Pradesh v Babulal Ram Ratan .[28] His Lordship found it useful to quote the warning which Young CJ gave in Ashiq Mahommad v Emperor ,[29] to those who try to procure and use false and fabricated evidence of recoveries, etc. It runs as follows:

> It may be well that we should give a warning to anyone who may hereafter be tempted to interfere with the course of justice by the procuring of false evidence or the fabrication of evidence of recoveries, that the duty of everyone, police officers or constables, government officials and plain citizens, is to allow a case to come before the court as it is without fabrication, or 'padding'. It is for the courts to decide whether an accused person is innocent or guilty, and not for the prosecution to determine his guilt in advance and attempt to deceive the court into giving a verdict based on false evidence. Anyone procuring false evidence runs the risk of imprisonment and degradation from office, and what is still more serious, may have the burden on his shoulder of sending an innocent man to the gallows.

When the Investigating Officer deliberately manipulates the statements of witnesses under s 161(3), CrPC to be used as evidence in the Court, the investigating officer would be guilty of committing the offence punishable under s 192, IPC .[30]

5. 'Fabricates False Evidence'--Meaning of

'Fabricate' means 'to frame, to construct, to manufacture, to forge, or to devise falsely'. The fabrication contemplated by this section is (a) the causing of any circumstance to exist, or (b) making any false entry in any book or record, or (c) making any document containing a false statement. The section contemplates the actual fabrication and not merely a preparation or an attempt to fabricate false1420 evidence. For an example of causing a circumstance to exist, see illust (a) to this section. For an example of making a false entry, see illust (b) and for making a document containing a false statement, see illust (c). In a Madras case one A owed B a certain amount of money. He sent a registered and insured packet to B, purporting to contain currency notes in settlement of the debt and got an acknowledgement of the receipt of the packet. The packet was found to contain waste paper. B sued A for the recovery of the money due to him. A applied to the court to admit the acknowledgement in evidence. It was held that the postal acknowledgement was a circumstance caused to exist with the intention of causing an erroneous opinion within the meaning of this section.[31]

Hiding stolen railway pins in a man's field intending that they may be found there and that the circumstance of their being found there might appear as evidence in a judicial proceeding and lead the magistrate to believe that the man was connected with the theft, would be fabricating false evidence.[32] So also putting stolen goods in a man's house to serve as evidence of theft against him.[33]

One C, whose brother was an accused person, applied to the court on behalf of the accused asking that the witnesses for the prosecution might first of all be made to identify D. The court assenting to this request, he produced before the court ten or twelve persons, none of whom could be identified as D by any of the prosecution witnesses. Upon being asked by the court where D was, C pointed out another man who, upon further investigation, was discovered to be wearing a false moustache and to be not D but one M. It was held that C, by placing before the magistrate a person who was not D, and representing that he was D, caused a circumstance to exist.[34] The tutoring of a man to give false evidence also amounts to the causing of a circumstance to exist within the meaning of s 192 .[35]

The accused petitioner had obtained interim order staying the election to the post of President Town Panchayat by filing forged and fabricated documents and swearing false affidavit. A prima facie case for proceeding under ss 192 and 193, IPC against the petitioner was held made out.[36]

False Recitals in Documents

A document containing recitals implying a false statement is a fabricated false evidence,[37] but a true copy of a mortgage-deed, though not containing a copy of endorsements subsequently made on the original, is not a false document.[38] Consent given for prosecution even if it is false cannot amount to a 'false document' or 'fabricating false evidence'.[39]

An entry would be a false entry or a statement in a record or document would be a false entry if it, either by reason of some false additions or of some material1421 omissions, misrepresents the truth. The omission may or may not be illegal. The thing to be considered is the effect of the omission on the entry as made or on the statement as occurring in a document.[40]

False Statement Need Not be in Express Terms

The false statement need not be in express terms. Where the accused made a document containing many false recitals implying that certain persons executed a sub-lease when, as a matter of fact, no such sub-lease was executed, it was held that he was guilty of fabricating false evidence.[41]

To sign a statement in an application for the execution of a decree under O XXI, r 11(2) of the CPC 1908, which contains a false statement, is punishable under this section, and it makes no difference that at the time of signature, the document was blank.[42]

Attestation of a Document

A person who attests a document knowing that it was forged and was intended to prove the discharge of a decree debt, is guilty of fabricating a false document, even if the document was not required to be attested.[43] However, mere attestation is not sufficient to justify an inference that the person attesting knew that he was attesting a forged document.[44]

It cannot be concluded that because the accused put his signature to a written report, he necessarily knew or had reason to believe that the contents of the report were false. It is for the prosecution to prove that the written report was a false report and that the accused countersigned it with this knowledge and with the intention that the report should be used as evidence in a judicial proceeding.[45]

A, the servant of B, at B's instigation, personated before a stamp-vendor and obtained a stamp-paper in C's name for the purpose of forging a deed in C's name. The endorsement on the paper in C's name would be evidence that C had executed the deed. It was held that A was guilty of fabricating false evidence, and B of abetment thereof.[46]

Where a medical officer, while giving evidence as an expert, produced a fabricated diploma in a court with the object that the court may believe him as an expert in criminology, the Supreme Court held that an offence under this section was made out.[47] The filing of a false affidavit by a witness in a proceeding before a court also constitutes an offence under this section.[48] If a false entry is made in a book or a record and that circumstance assists the court in forming an opinion upon that evidence in favour or against somebody, that is enough to hold that false evidence1422 was fabricated. If such evidence is used in a judicial proceeding, the offence made out is under this section.[49]

Where the accused fabricated an endorsement in the promissory note so as to bring a claim within limitation, it was held that the act of the accused constituted an offence under this section.[50]

Where a police officer who took the delivery of a draft of a counter-affidavit from the standing counsel for being signed by his superior for filing in the Supreme Court, asked a police official to forge the signature of his superior on a carbon copy of the counter affidavit. On refusal, he contacted his superior and the latter directed the official asked to forge his signature. The official asked accordingly and the accused sent the carbon copy with other affidavits for filing in the Supreme Court. The said affidavit contained false documents. The accused officer was present in the Supreme Court premises along with the officer whose signature was forged on the date of filing the affidavit. The accused was held guilty of an offence under s 193, IPC as he abetted the officer to forge the signature of his superior.[51]

6. 'Intending that Such Circumstance Etc. May Appear as Evidence'--Meaning of

The second essential of the offence of fabricating false evidence is the intention to use what is fabricated as evidence. The gist of the offence lies in the intention to cause a failure of justice by the use of the false thing in evidence.[52] The judicial proceeding may not be pending at the time of fabrication. It is enough if the object of the fabrication is that it may appear in evidence.[53] But if there is no evidence to prove that the accused intended, at the time he made a false entry in a record, that it should appear in evidence, he cannot be held guilty of fabricating false evidence.[54] It is well-established, and indeed this section and s 193 make it perfectly clear, that the mere fabrication of a false statement is not punishable under s 193 . In order that the offence may be committed, it must be established that the person fabricating the false evidence, intended to use that false evidence in a judicial proceeding or in a proceeding taken by law before a public servant as such or before an arbitrator, etc.[55] It has been held that where an accused person fabricates false evidence with the sole object of diverting suspicion from himself and concealing his guilt, he cannot be convicted under s 193, IPC . Of course, the mere intention to divert suspicion and concealing his guilt need not necessarily amount to fabricating evidence which may appear in a judicial proceeding or in a proceeding taken before a public servant or before an arbitrator so that such authorised person would form a different opinion.[56]But if the act of an accused person comes within the language of this section, it is1423 difficult to see how he can take shelter behind the circumstance that he is an accused person.[57]

An application or interlocutory application filed by either party for some relief is not evidence within the meaning of s 3, Indian Evidence Act, as same would not fall within the meaning of s 294, CrPC . No offence is committed under s 193 or s 194, IPC .[58]

Judicial Proceeding Need Not be Pending

It is not necessary for the purpose of the application of this section that the judicial proceeding in which the person intends to use the false evidence be pending at the date of the fabrication.[59]

Fabrication of Documents Not Admissible in Evidence

It has, however, been held in several cases that what is fabricated must be capable of being used as evidence and that the offence of fabricating false evidence cannot be committed in respect of a document which is not admissible in evidence, the reason being that a document which is inadmissible in evidence can never be produced for the purpose of enabling an officer to arrive at any conclusion, erroneous or otherwise, upon a relevant point.[60] Thus, it has been held that a police officer who fabricates a police special diary does not commit an offence under this section since such a document is not evidence under the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure, s 172,[61] but under s 218 .[62] So too a false report made by an amin of a civil court, deputed to deliver possession of a certain property in execution of a decree, as to his having been obstructed in so doing, and a similar report made to the police, do not constitute offences under this section.[63]

Actual Use of Fabricated Evidence Not Necessary

It has been held, however, in other cases that the words of the section show that it is the intention that creates the criminal offence and not the fact as to whether, under the terms of the law, the document is admissible in evidence, and that the mere fact that an entry or document is not admissible in evidence does not necessarily take it out of the mischief of s 193 .[64]

It is not necessary, in a charge based upon this section to show that any actual use has been made of the evidence so fabricated. Mere fabrication is punishable under s 193 . The use of the fabricated article is punishable under s 196 .1424

7. 'Judicial Proceeding'--Meaning of

The expression 'judicial proceeding' is not defined in this Code, but in s 2(i) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, and it includes 'any proceeding in the course of which evidence is or may be legally taken on oath'. The definition in the CrPC is only for the purpose of that Code.[65]Section 1(2) of the English Perjury Act 1911, also lays down that the expression 'judicial proceeding' includes a proceeding before any court, tribunal, or person, having by law power to hear, receive and examine evidence on oath.

Characteristics of Judicial Proceedings

In one of the earliest cases in which the question as to the meaning of a 'judicial proceeding' arose, Scotland CJ, said: 'It is nothing more nor less than a step taken by the court in the course of the administration of justice, in connection with a case pending'.[66] In Queen-Empress v Tulja ,[67] West J observed that 'an inquiry is judicial if the object of it is to determine a jural relation between one person and another, or a group of persons; or between him and the community generally; but, even a judge, acting without such an object in view, is not acting judicially'. The power to take evidence on oath is the characteristic test of a judicial proceeding.[68] A judicial proceeding is not deprived of its character as such merely because it becomes abortive owing to the incompetency of one of the jurors, and the giving of false evidence in the course of such proceeding is an offence under s 193 .[69] But where the proceeding is such under which no evidence can be legally taken, then it is not a judicial proceeding.[70] A mere irregularity in a judicial proceeding does not alter its character as such.[71] But no inquiry or trial held without jurisdiction is a judicial proceeding.[72] The criterion for deciding whether an order is a judicial or an administrative order is not whether the authority acts under a statute; it is, as pointed out by Sapru J, in Mahommad Buksh v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[73] whether it is required to act judicially in passing the order or not. If it is required to act judicially, the order is judicial or quasi-judicial, and if it is not, it is administrative. A sub-divisional magistrate is a judicial authority and, therefore, his order would be either judicial or executive. As an order passed by him under s 45(3) of the old CrPC, 1898 (having no corresponding provision in the CrPC of 1973) has been held to be not a judicial order, it can only be an administrative order.[74]Section 136 of the Income Tax Act 1961, provides that proceedings under that Act before an income tax authority shall be deemed to be a judicial proceeding within the meaning of ss 193 and 223 and for purposes of s 196 of the IPC but the filing of a return is not a stage of a judicial proceeding.[75]1425

Pendency of Judicial Proceeding Not Essential

Section 37(4) of the Income Tax Act 1922 makes the proceedings before the income tax officer judicial proceedings within the meaning of s 228, IPC .[76] It could not have been the intention of the legislature in making the offence committed during the cause of a proceeding before an income tax officer more serious without affording a corresponding safeguard provided by s 195(1)(b), CrPC in respect of complaints which can be made in this behalf. Where, therefore, an offence under s 193, IPC is committed in respect of the proceedings before the income tax officer, the complaint by the officer is a condition precedent, as prescribed under s 195(1)(b), CrPC to a magistrate taking cognizance of the offence.[77]

It is not essential for the purpose of s 192 of IPC that there should be any judicial proceeding pending at the time of the fabrication. It is enough that there is a reasonable prospect of such a proceeding, having regard to the circumstances of the case, and that the document in question is intended to be used in such a proceeding.[78]

Instances of Judicial Proceedings

The following have been held to be judicial proceedings:

(a) proceedings in which a magistrate comes to his determination as to the fitness of sureties under ch VIII of the CrPC ;[79]
(b) an inquiry held by a magistrate before issuing an order under s 144, CrPC ;[80]
(bc) Recording of a statement under s 161 CrPC is a judicial proceeding;[81]
(c) a proceeding in which the statement of a witness is recorded under s 164, CrPC ;[82] (some High Courts have expressed a contrary view on this point).[83]
(d) an investigation under ch 12 of the CrPC 1973 by a magistrate;[84]
(e) investigation proceedings under s 202, CrPC, conducted by a subordinate magistrate on a complaint which was taken cognizance of by another magistrate and sent to him for inquiry and report under the old Code;[85]
(f) issue of process under s 202, CrPC is a judicial determination (Order).[86]1426
(g) proceedings under s 299, CrPC 1973;[1]
(h) the proceedings of a court holding a preliminary inquiry under s 340, CrPC 1973;[2]
(i) maintenance proceedings under ch 9, CrPC 1973;[3]
(j) proceedings under s 446, CrPC 1973;[4]
(jj) Bail proceeding;[5]
(k) an inquiry conducted by a magistrate into the truth of an allegation against a subordinate official contained in a petition presented to the deputy commissioner;[6]
(l) proceedings in execution of a decree;[7]
(m) proceedings under s 8 of the Reformatory Schools Act V of 1876 (now Act 8 of 1897);[8]

(n) an inquiry under the Legal Practitioners' Act, 18 of 1879;[9]
(o) an inquiry under the Coroners Act, 4 of 1871;
(p) an inquiry under the Income Tax Act hearing objections to assessment;[10]
(q) inquiry by the registrar of the Presidency Court of Small Causes as to proper service of summons;[11]
(r) a proceeding before a magistrate for the recovery of municipal cesses under the Bombay Municipal Act;[12]
(s) an inquiry into a claim under s 83(6), CrPC 1973;[13]
(t) an inquiry by a magistrate under Police Order No 157 (Madras) in which statements of witnesses are taken on oath;[14]
(u) examination of an insolvent by the official assignee conducted under s 33(2) of the Presidency Towns Insolvency Act 1909;[15]
(v) a trial before a court-martial;[16]
(w) an investigation directed by law preliminary to a proceeding before a court of justice, though not made before a court of justice;[17]1427
(x) an investigation directed by a court of justice according to law and conducted under its authority, though may not take place before it;[18]
(y) proceedings before an income tax officer under s 37 of the Income Tax Act 1922 (Act 11 of 1922);[19]
(z) affidavit filed in support of a writ petition by concealing facts and obtaining interim order from High Court.[20] Affidavit filed by the petitioner in support of writ petition with false statement to mislead and overreach the court;[21]
(za) false counter affidavit in proceedings before the Supreme Court.[22]

Proceedings Not Considered Judicial Proceedings--Instances

The following have been held not to be judicial proceedings:

(a) examination by a police officer under s 161, CrPC ;[23]
(b) giving a sanction under s 197, CrPC, by the local government;[24]
(c) a preliminary inquiry held by a sub-divisional magistrate at the direction of a district magistrate, into the circumstances of a complaint against the police with a view to ascertain whether or not the district magistrate should grant sanction under s 197 ;[25]
(d) the proceedings of a district magistrate under s 123(9), CrPC for cancelling a bond for keeping the peace or for good behaviour,[26] in the case of an order passed under s 117 by an executive magistrate;
(e) a departmental inquiry falling within s 197 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code (Act 5 of 1879);[27]
(f) where telegraph authorities, having had a claim made against them by the heir of a deceased employee, referred it to the district judge for verification, his inquiry into such claims;[28]
(g) where the person conducting the proceedings was coram non judice;[29]
(h) proceedings under s 83, CrPC ;[30]
(i) an inquiry by a magistrate to find out the writer of an anonymous letter,[31] or of a petition,[32] or to discover the truth of statements made to the1428 telegraph department by a person claiming money in their hands as heir to an employee therein;[33]
(j) proceedings in which evidence is taken before a police patel;[34]
(k) an inquiry in regard to refunds for spoiled stamps conducted by a deputy collector;[35]
(l) proceedings directed by a district registrar to inquire into certain matters regarding the registration of a document;[36]
(m) proceedings before a district judge calling upon a person to show cause why he should not hand over documents relating to property over which a common manager had been appointed under the Bengal Tenancy Act, there being no provision in the act authorising such an inquiry.[37]

8. 'Taken By Law'--Meaning of

For an offence under this section it is not necessary that the fabricated evidence should be intended to be used only in a judicial proceeding. It is enough if it is intended to be used in any proceeding taken by law before a public servant as such. All that is necessary under this clause is that the proceeding must be taken by law and that it should be before a public servant as such. The section thus contemplates even a proceeding which is non-judicial. The expression 'taken by law' in the section only means taken under the provisions of any law; similarly the word 'evidence' as used in the section is used in its ordinary sense, namely, 'information (given personally or drawn from documents, etc.) tending to establish a fact'.[38] Thus, the police having power to investigate the circumstances of a person's death, the accused caused a circumstance to exist intending that it should cause the investigating officer to form an erroneous opinion as to how the deceased met her death. It was held that he was guilty of fabricating false evidence.[39]

9. 'Material'--Meaning of

The word 'material' means 'of such a nature as to affect in any way, directly or indirectly, the probability of anything to be determined by the proceeding, or the credit of any witness,[40] and a fact may be material although evidence of its existence was improperly admitted'.[41]

In a case, A sells goods to B, but omits to enter the sale in his books. Subsequently, he makes the entry intending it to be used as evidence in a judicial proceeding relating to the sale. The question whether the vendor's books contained such an entry is a material point. A has fabricated false evidence.[42]1429

A, a vakil, forges a magistrate's authentication of his genuine signature to a vakalatnamah. The vakalatnamah is not an evidence in the case, and the error (if any) induced in the mind of the judge as to its genuineness could not affect his decision of the case, and therefore, A is not guilty under s 193 .[43]

Where the accused prepared certain receipts in respect of sales of cattle actually effected but antedated them, and the receipts were intended to be produced before a sub-inspector of police who wanted to ascertain whether the cattle were stolen property it was held that the receipts could not possibly cause the sub-inspector to entertain an erroneous opinion touching a point material to the result of the inquiry he was making, and that the accused could not be held guilty of fabricating false evidence.[44]

Fabricated False Evidence Should Help in Formation of Erroneous Opinion

It is not merely the making of a document containing a false statement which is relevant, but that the making of a document containing a false statement should be such as to lead any person, who in a judicial proceeding is to form an opinion on evidence, to entertain an erroneous opinion touching the point material to such a proceeding. Where, therefore, in a proceeding between a raiyat and his bataidar under s 144, CrPC, the raiyat produces a deed of exchange of title between him and another raiyat but which contains no recital as to past possession, the deed of exchange, even if antedated, cannot be said to have any prejudicial effect upon the interest of the bataidar who claims to be in possession, and therefore, the deed of exchange, even if antedated, cannot amount to fabricating false evidence.[45] Since the executive officer of a municipality has no authority to investigate whether an applicant for permission to build has a right to build on the land in question, production of a false document in such an inquiry by the applicant would not make him fall within the mischief of s 192 .[46]

Actual Failure of Justice is not the Gist of the Offence

Whether the accused could or could not succeed in carrying out his intention is immaterial. The gist of the offence does not consist in actually causing a failure of justice but in the intention to cause a failure of justice by misleading the court, and with such intent causing the existence of any circumstances which might appear in evidence.[47] Of course the materiality of the fabricated evidence must always be shown.[48]

20 Substituted by Act 21 of 2000, s 91 and Sch I, for 'makes any false entry in any book or record, or makes any document containing a false statement' (wef 17-10-2000).

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 193.

Punishment for false evidence.--

Whoever intentionally gives false evidence in any stage of a judicial proceeding, or fabricates false evidence for the purpose of being used in any stage of a judicial proceeding, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine,1430 and whoever intentionally gives or fabricates false evidence in any other case, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation 1.--A trial before a Court-martial is a judicial proceeding.

Explanation 2.--An investigation directed by law preliminary to a proceeding before a Court of Justice, is a stage of a judicial proceeding, though that investigation may not take place before a Court of Justice.

Illustration

A, in an inquiry before a magistrate for the purpose of ascertaining whether Z ought to be committed for trial, makes on oath a statement which he knows to be false. As this inquiry is a stage of a judicial proceeding, A has given false evidence.

Explanation 3.--An investigation directed by a Court of Justice according to law, and conducted under the authority of a Court of Justice, is a stage of a judicial proceeding, though that investigation may not take place before a court of Justice.

Illustration

A, in an inquiry before an officer deputed by a Court of Justice to ascertain on the spot the boundaries of land, makes on oath a statement which he knows to be false. As this inquiry is a stage of a judicial proceeding, A has given false evidence.1431

Comments

1. Scope

This section prescribes the punishment for the two offences defined in the preceding two sections. Paragraph 1 of this section provides higher punishment for giving false evidence, or for fabricating false evidence for the purpose of being used in any stage of a judicial proceeding and para 2 provides lighter punishment for giving false evidence, or fabricating false evidence in any other case. It may be noted that s 191 defines the offence of giving false evidence. This section provides for the punishment. It does not say that there are two kinds of perjury, but that if perjury is committed in the stage of a judicial proceeding it may be punished more severely1432 than if committed in any other case. The offence is perjury wherever it may be committed.[49] The gravity of the offence is then measured, not by its nature and character, but by the nature and character of the tribunal before whom it is committed.[50] The argument that this section applies only to false evidence given in a judicial proceeding applies only to para (1) of the section. It does not apply to para (2).[51] The developments are of some consequence and of concern insofar as the proceedings before the court are concerned; that the parties and the persons seeking for relief do come with material which is suspect, which is fabricated, which is forged and seek for orders, interim or final, on the basis of such concocted documents and further if they further embolden themselves to swearing to an affidavit indicating that such documents are either true copies or certified copies, then matter calls for an appropriate action at least to send a right message to such errant and irresponsible persons.[52]

Where a candidate at an election does not furnish required information or knowingly furnishes false information or conceals any information, he is liable to be prosecuted for offence under s 125A of the

Representation of the People Act, but he cannot be prosecuted for offence under s 193, IPC .[53]

Making false statement on oath before the court is an offence under s 191, IPC, and punishable under s 193, IPC .[54]

Tendering of false evidence as well as threats and intimidation to any person to give false evidence have been made penal offences under ss 193 and 195(A), IPC .[55]

2. Legislative Changes

In expln I, the words 'or before a Military Court of Inquest' between 'court-martial' and 'is' were repealed by the Cantonments Act 1889, s 2 and schedule.

3. Analogous Law

Commentary under s 191, ante may be referred to.

4. Essentials

Section 193, IPC is a penal provision. Whoever intentionally gives false evidence in a judicial proceeding or fabricates false evidence for the purpose of being used in a judicial proceeding is made punishable under this section. The offence of giving false evidence is constituted if the following ingredients are satisfied or found to exist:

(a) A person is legally bound:

(i) by an oath or any express provision of law to state the truth, or
(ii) to make a declaration upon any subject.1433

(b) He must make a false statement;
(c) He must:

(i) know or believe it to be false, or
(ii) not believe it to be true.

The offence of fabricating false evidence is constituted if the following ingredients are satisfied:

(a) Causing any circumstance to exist or making any false entry in any book or record or making any document containing a false statement.
(b) Doing one of the above acts with the intention that it may appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding or in a proceeding taken by law before a public servant or an arbitrator.
(c) Doing such act with the intention that it may cause any person who in such proceeding is to form an opinion upon the evidence to entertain an erroneous opinion touching any point material to the result of such proceeding.[56]

Commentary under same heading in ss 191 and 192, ante may be referred to.

To hold a person guilty under s 193, IPC, it must be determined as to whether the earlier statement was false or true.[57]

5. Distinction Between Sections 167 And 193

Commentary under the same heading in s 167, ante may be referred to.

6. Section 193 Distinguished from Section 199

Section 191 read with ss 193 and 199 of this Code make the making of false declarations an offence. The distinction between the provisions of these two sections, insofar as the making of the declaration is concerned, is that under s 191, the declaration is one in which a person is bound by an oath, or by an express provision of law, to state the truth, or being bound by law to make a declaration upon any subject, makes a statement which is false. The declaration contemplated in s 199 is not necessarily one which the person, making the declaration is bound by law, to make. The essential element of the offence under s 199 is that the declaration, containing the false statement must be one which any court of justice or any public servant or other person is bound or authorised by law to receive as evidence of any fact.[58]

7. Section 193 Distinguished from Section 218

The offence under this section is a general one and does not specify the person or the kind of document. It may be any person and the fabricated evidence may be in any form. Section 218, on the other hand, deals with the intentional preparation of a false record by a public servant with the object of saving or injuring any person or property. Under this section, the evidence is intended to be used in a judicial proceeding whereas, s 218 deals with public servants and the1434 gist thereunder is the intentional preparation of a false record with a view to saving or injuring any person or property. This need not have any relation to a judicial proceeding as such.[59]

8. Sections 193 and 195 Distinguished from Section 211

A statement on oath falsely supporting the prosecution case against an accused person more appropriately amounts to an offence under ss 193 and 195, IPC and not under s 211, IPC . The offences contemplated by ss 193 and 195, IPC on the one hand and s 211, IPC on the other were not intended by the Legislature in this context to overlap so as to make it optional whether to proceed under one or the other.[60]

9. Sections 193 and 108 of Customs Act

The requirement to state the truth, enacted under sub-s (3) of s 108 of the Customs Act must be read in the light of the penalty provided for its breach, that the person summoned is liable to be prosecuted under s 193 as also under s 228, IPC . It should, however, be kept in mind that s 108 of the Customs Act does not compel a person summoned to incriminate himself. In other words, he can maintain a studied silence if the answers to the questions put to him are likely to incriminate him. In such a situation, s 193, IPC is not attracted. The right of silence is also not an offence and it cannot be said to be an obstruction to the proceedings referred to under s 108 of the Customs Act.[61]

10. Distinction between Sections 463, 465, 471 and Sections 193, 196

Commentary under same heading in s 196, post may be referred to.

11. Show Cause Notice to Hostile Witness

Where hostile witnesses stated before the court that the investigating officer had not recorded their statements as per their say but did not point out as to why he recorded their statements falsely, there was reason to believe that they have given false evidence before the court. It was held that such incidents need to be taken seriously and show cause notice as to why proceedings under s 193 of the Indian Penal Code 1860 should not be initiated against them, was directed to be issued to them.[62]

12. 'Whoever'

Commentary under same heading in ss 191 and 192, ante may be referred to.

The word 'whoever' is quite general and includes an accused person.[63] Anybody who makes a false statement on oath knowing it to be false makes himself liable to be prosecuted for perjury.[64]1435

13. 'Intentionally'--Meaning of

In order to sustain an indictment for perjury the prosecution must establish, inter alia, two things: (a) that the statement was false, and (b) that it was known or believed to be false or not believed to be true. In other words, the statement must be intentionally false.[65] False evidence is intentionally given if the persons, making the statement, makes it advisedly, knowing it to be false, and with the intention of deceiving the court and leading it to be supposed that that which he states is true.[66]Even under the English Perjury Act 1911,[67] the false statements must be willfully made, that is, the false evidence must be given intentionally.[68]Mens rea is an essential ingredient of the offence of perjury and it is the intention that creates the offence.[69] The mere fact that a statement made by a witness turns out to be wrong or inaccurate, does not make him liable to punishment. He must make the statement deliberately and must know or believe it to be false or must not believe it to be true. It is not difficult to imagine a witness making two statements which are contradictory to each other and one of which he does not know or believe to be false.[70] Mere contradiction is not sufficient. The deponent's intention to give false evidence or fabricated false evidence is necessary.[71] To sustain a conviction under this section, among other things it must be proved beyond doubt that the statements of the accused are deliberately false.[72] The essence of the offence is the intention.[73] The primary ingredient of s 193 of the Code is intentionally giving false evidence in any stage of judicial proceedings or intentionally fabricating false evidence for the purpose of being used in any stage of the judicial proceedings.[74]

Where in petition filed under s 482, CrPC, the petitioner filed affidavit that he had not approached the Supreme Court or the High Court earlier, but the petitioner had filed application for anticipatory bail before the Court of Sessions, held, it does not amount to perjury so as to call for action for offence under s 193, IPC .[75]

Intention is a question of fact to be decided in each case.[76] The offence described in this section is the offence of intentionally giving false evidence and the intention can only, as a rule, be judged by the surrounding circumstances. If the matter deposed to1436 was irrelevant or of minor importance, the court cannot infer that there was any deliberate intention.[77] In Queen v Aidrus Sahib ,[78] Scotland CJ, observed:

> For the giving of false evidence, to come within section 193, must be an intentional giving; and in deciding whether or not the subject-matter of the statement were material to the result of the proceeding, inasmuch as if that subject-matter were wholly immaterial, they might well attribute the statement to indifference or carelessness on the part of the prisoner.

Corrupt intention may be inferred from the surrounding circumstances.[79] If the statement was false and known to the accused to be false, it may be presumed that in making it the accused intentionally gave false evidence.[80]

14. Giving False Particulars of his Educational Qualifications on Website

Where a person gives false particulars of his educational qualifications on website, even if he is a MLA, he cannot be prosecuted under s 193, IPC . Likewise, where biodata of members of the Legislative Assembly are published by the Legislative Secretariat, no offence under s 193, IPC is committed.[81]

15. 'Gives False Evidence'--Words Refer to Oral Evidence

The words 'whoever intentionally gives false evidence in any state of a judicial proceeding' used in this section, refer only to oral evidence given by a person in any state of judicial proceedings. Accordingly, merely because a false or fabricated document has been produced before a court it cannot be said that the person producing the document has given 'false evidence' as contemplated by s 193, IPC in the case.[82] But giving false evidence before the High Court by swearing a false affidavit in support of a writ petition has been held to be an offence under this section.[83]

A close scrutiny of ss 191 - 193 shows that they deal with false evidence.[84] An affidavit can be termed to be an evidence within the ambit of s 3 of the Evidence Act only in those cases when the same is filed at the instance and under the direction of the court.[85]

Thus, an affidavit filed suo motu by a party and not under the direction of any court, does not attract ss 191 - 193, IPC .

16. 'In any stage of a Judicial Proceeding'--Whether Existing or Foreseen

This section consists of two paragraphs. The first applies to intentionally giving false evidence in any stage of a judicial proceeding or fabricating false evidence1437 for the purpose of being used at any stage of a judicial proceeding. The giving of false evidence in a judicial proceeding plainly contemplates a judicial proceeding being in existence; while fabricating false evidence for the purpose of using it at any stage of a judicial proceeding contemplates some definite judicial proceeding being foreseen.[86]If an accused can be found to have intentionally given false evidence at the stage of trial, his act would obviously fall within the mischief of this section.[87]

The accused petitioner had obtained interim order staying the election to the post of President Town Panchayat by filing forged and fabricated documents and swearing false affidavit. A prima facie case for proceeding under ss 192 and 193, IPC against the petitioner was held made out.[88]

Meaning of any Stage

By 'any stage of a judicial proceeding' is meant 'any step taken by the court in the course of administration of justice in connection with a case pending'.[89] It is immaterial that the trial in which false evidence is given subsequently becomes abortive for any reason.[90]

An investigation under ch 12 of the CrPC, 1973 has been held to be a stage of a judicial proceeding.[91] The Kerala High Court has, however, held that every investigation conducted by the police is not a judicial proceeding unless it is an investigation directed by a law preliminary to a proceeding before a court of justice or it is an investigation directed by a court of justice.[92] Committal proceedings are a stage of the judicial proceedings before the sessions judge.[93]

Proceedings Without Jurisdiction

A preliminary inquiry under s 476 of old CrPC 1898 (new s 340 of the CrPC 1973), conducted by a magistrate having no jurisdiction to conduct it, is not a 'stage of judicial proceeding' within the meaning of this section.[94]

Proceedings before the income-tax authorities are judicial proceedings,[95] but the filing of a return is not a stage of a judicial proceeding.[96] Section 37(4) of the Income Tax Act makes the proceedings before the income tax officer judicial proceedings under s 193, IPC .1438

Where, therefore, an offence under s 193, IPC is committed in respect of the proceedings before the income tax officer, the complaint by the officer is a condition precedent prescribed under s 195(1)(b), CrPC before a magistrate can take its cognizance.[1]

17. 'In any Other Case'--Meaning of

These words have been used in the second paragraph of this section and mean in any case, other than a judicial proceeding, in which the giving or fabricating false evidence is an offence. Such cases have been dealt with in ss 191 and 192 . A statement recorded under s 164, CrPC, in the course of an investigation has been held to be an 'evidence in any other case'.[2]

18. Explanations to the Section

The first para of this section uses the term 'judicial proceeding' twice but it has not been defined anywhere in the Code. Clause (i) of s 2 of the CrPC 1973 deals with this term but does not define it exhaustively.

It simply states that a 'judicial proceeding' includes any proceeding in the course of which evidence is or may be legally taken on oath. Explanation 1 to s 193 states and clarifies that a trial before a court-martial is a judicial proceeding.

For a detailed discussion the commentary under s 192 may be referred to.

Investigation and Inquiry--Explanation 2

Again for the definition of the term 'investigation' used in expln 2 we have to fall back on the provisions of cl (h) of s 2, CrPC 1973 which defines 'investigation' as follows:

> Investigation' includes all the proceedings under this Code for the collection of evidence conducted by a police officer or by any person (other than a magistrate) who is authorized by a magistrate in this behalf.

Like the definition of a 'judicial proceeding', even this definition of investigation is not exhaustive but one thing is clear from it that an investigation cannot be conducted by a magistrate. It is, therefore, submitted that the illustration appended to expln 2 does not appear to be very appropriate. Though this explanation also speaks of an investigation which may not take place before a court of justice, the illustration, however, speaks of an inquiry before a magistrate for the commitment of the accused for trial. According to cl (g) of s 2, CrPC, 'inquiry' means every inquiry, other than a trial, conducted under this Code by a magistrate or court. Thus, an inquiry has to be conducted by a magistrate while an investigation cannot be conducted by any magistrate. The word 'inquiry' mentioned in the illustration to expln 2, therefore, cannot be read as an 'investigation' mentioned in this explanation. An investigation directed by s 156, CrPC may be cited as an appropriate illustration to expln 2.

Again expln 3 speaks of an investigation but the illustration thereto is in respect of an inquiry. This illustration, however, cannot be termed to be inappropriate as it is not1439 conducted by a magistrate. An investigation contemplated and ordered by a magistrate under sub-s (2) of s 155 in a non-cognizable case or the one directed under sub-s (3) of s 156 or sub-s (1) of s 202, CrPC in other cases may be other illustrations to expln 3. Though the police is not authorised to administer oath to persons during the course of an investigation and their statements are not recorded on oath, the persons interrogated by the police are bound to answer truly, as required by sub-s (2) of s 161, CrPC and they are liable to be prosecuted for making a false statement as discussed above under s 191 . It seems to be the reason for treating the investigation as a judicial proceeding for a limited purpose under this explanation.

19. Procedure

The offence is non-cognizable but a warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. The first part of the offence, namely, giving or fabricating false evidence in a judicial proceeding is triable by a magistrate of the first class. The second part regarding giving or fabricating false evidence in any other case is triable by any magistrate.[3] But the cognizance can be taken by the magistrate only on the complaint of the court concerned under s 195(1)(b), CrPC . The entire proceeding is violated if the complaining magistrate himself takes the cognizance.[4] If the complaint is not filed by the court, the court cannot take cognizance thereof by virtue of s 195(1)(b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[5]

It is well settled that a complaint under s 195 of the Code must be a regular formal complaint in writing. Where the Chief Judicial Magistrate was the complainant, he should have filed complaint in some other Court to which he was subordinate. Since he filed complaint in his own Court, the conviction of the accused appellant under s 193, IPC was set aside.[6]

Where a false affidavit is filed in a judicial proceeding pending before an additional district judge, Delhi, which is a serious matter, any action to be taken in the matter is primarily a matter of the court's discretion. The offence under s 193, IPC is attracted and the appellant court cannot examine the defence of the accused or the appellant and record the finding thereon.[7]

The procedure for warrant cases has to be followed in the cases under this section. To try such case as a summons case is an illegality.[8]

In case forged affidavits are filed before the Supreme Court, it cannot try and punish the accused, and the order of the Supreme Court convicting the accused and sentencing him to 3 months' imprisonment under s 193, IPC is liable to be set aside for non-compliance with the procedure under s 195, CrPC read with s 304, CrPC and also account of want of original jurisdiction to try a criminal offence under s 193, IPC .[9]1440

Section 340, CrPC prescribes the procedure as to how a complaint may be preferred under s 195, CrPC . While under s 195, CrPC it is open to the court before which the offence was committed to prefer a complaint for the prosecution of the offender, s 340 CrPC prescribes the procedure as to how that complaint may be preferred. Provisions under s 195, CrPC are mandatory and no court can take cognizance of offences referred to therein. It is in respect of such offences that the court has jurisdiction to proceed under s 340, CrPC and a complaint outside the provisions of s 340, CrPC cannot be filed by any civil, revenue or criminal court under its inherent jurisdiction.[10]

Offences under s 193, IPC and s 344, CrPC are distinct offences, thus, conjunction of the two offences and prosecution of the accused at one trial is neither permissible nor proper.[11]

20. Limitation

There is no period of limitation for an offence following under the first para of this section as the offence of giving false evidence in a judicial proceeding or fabricating false evidence for the purpose of being used in any judicial proceeding is punishable with imprisonment extending to seven years. Before the enactment of s 468, CrPC 1973 the courts discouraged prosecution or proceedings for prosecution under this section in belated cases. The observations of the Supreme Court in KN Mishra v Jiwaji University [12] made in this respect are reproduced below:

> It is not expedient in the interest of justice that a complaint should be laid against the appellant after so many years. The laying of a complaint at this belated stage would make the prosecution a veritable prosecution. It is not possible to agree that since the appellant had obtained a decree against University for a large amount by making a false statement on oath the interest of justice required that a complaint should be laid against him and that unless a complaint was laid the University would not be able to get back its money from the appellant.

> It is not the function of the court hearing an application under section 476[13] to cater to the acrimonious and vengeful attitudes taken up by the parties and to advance their interest elsewhere. It is not expedient to permit the continuance of proceedings for the laying of a complaint in regard to a state matter which took place years ago.

These observations were made by the Supreme Court while dealing with a proceeding under s 476 of the CrPC 1898. It is submitted that these observations now no longer hold good and cannot be relied upon while dealing with the cases governed by the Code of 1973 and no complaint for an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term exceeding three years can now be thrown away merely on the ground of delay unless it is not otherwise expedient to proceed with it.

Exclusion and Extension of Time

The period of limitation for an offence falling under the second para of this section is three years. If after concluding the preliminary inquiry, if any, under s 340, CrPC the complaint in such cases is not made well before the expiry of three years and the1441 cognizance is not taken by the court before the expiry of such period, the cognizance cannot be taken thereafter unless any period is excluded under ss 470 and 471 or the limitation is extended by the court under s 473, CrPC .[14]

21. Merger of the order in the order of Higher Court or Authority

The merger of the judgement or order of the trial court in the judgment or order of the court of appeal or revision does not affect the powers of the trial court to file a complaint for prosecution under this section. Where the offences under ss 193 and 196 were committed, according to the complainant, at the time of the proceedings before the first income-tax officer, the fact that subsequently the order of the income tax officer has merged in the order of the tribunal does not in any manner obliterate the guilt of the offence and as such, the officer, who is the successor to the office of the forum from where the complaint had been made, retains the jurisdiction to make the complaint. Furthermore, after the disposal of the appeal by the tribunal, the income-tax officer gets seisin of the matter for the purpose of implementing the order of the tribunal. It is not possible to accept the contention that because there was an appeal before the appellant assistant commissioner and thereafter before the tribunal, the income tax officer concerned has lost jurisdiction to proceed to make the complaint. It is true that the original income tax officer had not made the complaint. But his successor to the office, who has filed the complaint, was competent to make the complaint.[15]

22. Complaint Necessary only if Offence Committed in or in Relation to Any Proceeding in Court

Commentary in s 195(1)(b) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 may be referred to.[16]

Any Proceeding in Court

So far as the provisions of s 195, CrPC are concerned, it is significant that cl (b) refers to 'any proceeding in any court', and is not confined to a judicial proceeding. It is, therefore, not necessary for its application that the court should be engaged in a judicial proceeding. It is also clear from sub-s (3) that the term 'court' in s 195, CrPC is used in a very wide sense. The word 'includes' indicates that there may also be courts other than civil, revenue or criminal courts. The recording of a confession under s 164, CrPC has been held to be a proceeding in a court within the meaning of this section.[17]

Mutation proceedings before a mamlatdar or muktiarkar are not judicial proceedings,[18] but they are proceedings before a court within the meaning of s 195, CrPC .[19]A proceeding for a composition or scheme under the Insolvency Act is in relation to the original insolvency proceedings itself which is a proceeding in court within the meaning of s 195(1)(b), CrPC . Consequently the use by the insolvent of an1442 affidavit, showing a person as his creditor in a composition, which to his knowledge was false, constitutes an offence committed in relation to a proceeding in a court within the meaning of s 195(1)(b) .[20]

The accused filed forged and fabricated documents before the Motor Accident Claims Tribunal. Prima facie offence under s 193, IPC was committed. No separate complaint by the public servant was held necessary, and bar of s 195, CrPC was not attracted. Inquiry under s 340, CrPC was also not required.[21]

Where a false charge was made to the police and on the report of the police after investigation, a magistrate discharged the accused and cancelled his bail bond, it was held that the offence under s 211 was committed in relation to a proceeding in court and a complaint of the magistrate was necessary.[22]

A prosecution for offence under s 193, IPC was initiated by the complainant and not by any court or a public servant, as contemplated under sub-cl (i) of sub-s 1(b) of s 195, CrPC . If the complaint had come to be filed without their being a case pending in the court, the matter would have been different. However, this being not the case, the discretion exercised by the magistrate in issuing the process was held capricious and arbitrary and such complaint suffered from a fundamental legal defect.[23] Offence punishable under s 193, IPC cannot be taken cognizance of on the basis of a private complaint.[24]

Where an offence is committed by a constable in a transaction which arose out of the execution of a warrant issued by a court, the offence is committed in relation to a proceeding in court and a complaint of the court is necessary.[25]

Offence in or in Relation to a Court Proceeding

The offence committed must be in connection with 'any proceeding' in any court.[26] Clause (b) of s 195(1), CrPC applies not only when an offence mentioned in it is committed in a proceeding in any court but also when it is committed in relation to a proceeding in a court. It has been held by the Allahabad High Court that it is not possible to hold that an offence is committed in relation to a proceeding when in fact there has been no proceeding, and to hold it to be in relation to the proceedings in a court retrospectively because subsequently some proceedings did go into court.[27] But some of the offences enumerated in the clause are capable of being committed in relation to a judicial proceeding which did not exist. False evidence, for instance, may be fabricated for a contemplated suit, or property may be fraudulently concealed in contemplation of an execution proceeding. The clause applies if a judicial proceeding is in existence at the time when it is sought to prosecute the offender for the offence in question. As held in Re Indrachand Bacharai[28] the crucial date for the1443 purpose of s 195, CrPC, is the date when the court takes cognizance of the offence.[29] The words 'in relation to' make it clear that s 195(1)(b) is sufficiently wide to cover cases where the offence alleged was committed in relation to proceedings subsequently instituted in court.[30] It is, however, necessary that the 'proceeding in any court' referred to in the clause should be actually instituted before the criminal court is asked to take cognizance of the offence.[31]

The clause does not apply to a prosecution for the offence of making a false charge which had not reached any court of law.[32] No complaint of court is required under cl (b) of sub-s (1) to prosecute a person for having fabricated false evidence during a police investigation and when there was no proceeding pending in any court in relation to which the alleged false evidence was said to have been fabricated.[33]

Section 195(1)(b), CrPC also does not apply to an offence committed under s 193, IPC, in respect of proceedings in a court of law which are contemplated but which in fact are never started.[34]

If a false charge to the police is the basis of subsequent proceedings in court, a complaint of the court is necessary even if the accused is discharged in the proceedings,[35] or the proceedings are withdrawn.[36]

A returning officer deciding on the validity of a nomination paper under s 36 of the Representation of the People Act 1951, is not a court for the purpose of s 195, CrPC . An offence under s 193, IPC proceeding before him is not committed in relation to a proceeding before a court so as to require a complaint by him. But there is no legal impediment to the returning officer himself filing a complaint under ss 181 - 182, IPC, as provided in cl (a) of that section and charging the accused therein with also an offence under s 193, IPC .[37]

When Offences Falling Under Section 195 , CrPC and Other Offences are Inseparable

When offences under ss 420, 464, 466, 468 and 471 of the IPC are, on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, so intermingled with offences under ss 193 and 209 of the IPC and they are alleged to have been committed in the same transaction and it is not possible to separate the trial in respect of some of the offences which do not attract the provisions of s 195 (1)(b) of the Code, it is well settled that it is not open1444 to a court to proceed with the trial by dropping the charge for offences which attract the provisions of s 195 of the Code.[38]

23. First Information Statement under Section 154 , CrPC

First information statement is the only information on which the concerned police officer has to start the investigation, to find out the truth and collect the materials. It can be given on hearsay information also. A wrong first information statement purposely made for initiating action may be of consequence under some other provision, for example in an action for malicious prosecution, but it is not penal under s 193 on the basis of s 191 .[39]

To hold a person guilty under s 193, IPC, it must be determined as to whether the earlier statement was false or true. Merely because an informant does not support the allegations made in the FIR, he commits no offence punishable under s 193, IPC .[40]

24. Prosecution of an Approver for Perjury

Provisions of ss 195 and 340, CrPC 1973 do not apply to an offence committed by an approver under this section. In one case, a petitioner had turned approver but at the trial he resiled from the earlier statement made by him before the magistrate, by whom the pardon was tendered to him. On a certificate issued by the public prosecutor, he was tried for the main offence. The sessions judge, while acquitting him, passed an order directing that he shall be prosecuted under s 193, IPC for giving false evidence and filed a complaint to that effect in the court of the magistrate. The High Court held that the complaint could not be filed as there was no sanction of the High Court as required by the second proviso to sub-s (1) of s 308, CrPC .[41]

25. Distinguishing Features of Sections 340 and 344, CrPC[42]

There is nothing in s 344 which makes a distinction between flagrant offences and offences which are not flagrant, or between serious offences and offences which are not serious. If the court does not form and express an opinion that the witness has intentionally given false evidence or intentionally fabricated false evidence or it is not satisfied that it is necessary and expedient in the interest of justice that the witness should be tried summarily for giving or fabricating false evidence, no question of taking an action under s 344 can arise. Even under s 340, the court must, before making a complaint, be satisfied that it is expedient in the interests of justice to make an inquiry into the offence committed by the witness. The court has an option to proceed either under s 344 or s 340 and if it does not take action under s 344, it can do so under s 340 . The power of the court to this effect has been specifically saved by sub-s (3) of s 344 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973. But where no complaint is filed under s 340, CrPC and the requisite opinion is not expressed in the judgement, no action under s 344 is permissible. Whereas s 340 is a general provision dealing with the procedure to be followed in respect of a variety of offences affecting the administration of justice, insofar as certain offences falling1445 under ss 193 to 196 and s 471, IPC, etc. are concerned, every court before which that person has appeared as a witness and which disposed of the case can make a complaint.

For the purpose of s 340 a court means a civil, revenue or criminal court, and includes a tribunal (ss 340(4) and 195(3), CrPC 1973) but an action under s 344 can be taken only by a court of sessions or a magistrate of the first class. An order passed under s 340, CrPC is appealable under s 340(1), CrPC and even when no order for making a complaint or rejecting an application for making a complaint is made under s 340(1), CrPC the superior court can exercise such power under sub-s (2) of s 340 . Unlike s 340, no such powers have been given to a superior or appellate court against an order passed or omission to pass an order under s 344 for the trial of a witness for committing perjury or fabricating false evidence.[43] If on summary trial by the concerned court of session or the magistrate of first class, before whom the offence was committed by the witness, he is convicted, the general provisions of appeal or revision against such conviction shall apply. In case an appeal or revision is preferred against the judgment or order, in which the opinion for trying the witness was expressed, the trial has to be stayed until the disposal of the appeal or revision and thereupon, the further proceedings of the trial shall abide by the result of the appeal or revision.[44]

An essential prerequisite for proceedings under s 344, CrPC is that at the time of the delivery of the judgment, the court should have formed an opinion about the falsity of the evidence of the witness. It will not apply where the court cannot form such an opinion as the perjury is discovered after the delivery of the judgment.[45]

Successor Magistrate cannot act under Section 344 , CrPC Without Required Observations in Judgment

It will also not apply where the predecessor magistrate did not manifest in his judgment that he was proceeding to try the offenders for an offence under s 193, IPC . The steps taken by the successor magistrate to have the accused summoned before him under s 344, CrPC therefore, cannot be allowed to sustain.[46]

26. Whether Offence Cognizable under Section 344 , CrPC Different from the Offence under this section

The relevant part of para 1 of s 193 runs:

> Whoever intentionally gives false evidence in any stage of a judicial proceeding, or fabricates false evidence for the purpose of being used in any stage of a judicial proceeding, shall be punished with imprisonment.... which may extend to seven years, and.....fine.

On the other hand, the relevant part of s 344(1), CrPC runs:

(1) if, at the time of delivery of any judgment or final order disposing of any judicial proceeding, a court of session or magistrate of the first class expresses an opinion to the effect that any witness appearing in any such proceeding had knowingly or fully given false evidence should be used in such proceeding it or he may, if satisfied that.... The1446 witness should be tried summarily for giving or fabricating.....false evidence, take cognizance of the offence and may, ... Try such offender summarily and sentence him to imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months, or to fine..... or with both.

Difference in Procedure--Forum and Quantum of Punishment only

A close scrutiny of the provisions of both the sections cited above reveals that the nature of the offence and its ingredients are the same in both the sections. The real difference in the two sections is regarding the procedure, forum and quantum of punishment. An offence under para one of s 193 is triable by a magistrate of the first class[47] on the complaint being filed by the concerned court under s 195(1)(b), CrPC .

On the other hand, if such offence is committed in any judicial proceeding before a court of session or magistrate of the first class and at the time of finally disposing of such proceeding, the sessions judge or the magistrate expresses an opinion in his judgment or order to the effect that a particular witness appearing in such proceeding had knowingly or willfully given false evidence or had fabricated false evidence with the intention that such evidence should be used in such proceeding and on his satisfaction that it is necessary and expedient in the interest of justice that the witness should be tried summarily for giving or fabricating false evidence. He may himself take cognizance of the offence if the concerned court feels that it is expedient in the interest of justice that the person committing an offence under s 193 should be punished, or after making the necessary inquiry as provided by s 340, CrPC, it may make a complaint for his prosecution in the court of the magistrate of the first class having jurisdiction. Such court may be a civil court, criminal court, revenue court or a tribunal. Sub-section (3) of s 344 leaves no room for any controversy or doubt about the nature of the offence dealt with by these two sections (i.e., ss 340 and 344, CrPC) as it clearly provides that nothing in s 344 shall affect the power of the court to make a complaint under s 340 for the offence, where it does not choose to proceed under s 344 . It means that s 344 provides the summary trial of the same offence for which a provision has been made in s 340 .

In Ismail Khan v State ,[48] while acquitting the accused of offences punishable under s 143 and s 506, IPC, the trial magistrate ordered to issue notice to the complainant, who had appeared as PW 1 before him to show cause as to why he should not be punished for giving false evidence in the judicial proceedings. Not satisfied with his reply, the magistrate came to the conclusion that he should be tried for having committed the offence punishable under s 193, CrPC . On a petition under s 482, CrPC by PW 1 before the Karnataka High Court, MM Mirdhe J, constituting the single bench, quashed the order of the magistrate initiating the proceeding against the petitioner. The following observations made by Mirdhe J, are relevant:

> The offence under s 193, IPC is punishable with imprisonment for seven years in maximum whereas the offence for which the person can be tried summarily by a court under s 344 CrPC is punishable in maximum with imprisonment for 3 months or fine which may extend to Rs 500 or with both. Looking to the punishment prescribed for the offence of giving false evidence contemplated under s 344, CrPC it is clear that the offence for which a person can be summarily tried under s 344, CrPC is not the offence punishable under s 193, IPC and if the magistrate is to proceed under s 344, CrPC against a person no complaint will be necessary. But, in the instant case, the magistrate1447 has proceeded against the petitioner for the offence under s 193, IPC when there is no complaint by the court itself.

Quantum of Sentence not the Yardstick to Determine the Offence

With respect it is submitted that s 344, CrPC prescribes the procedure for the summary trial of the offence punishable under s 193, IPC and merely on the basis of sentence the conclusion that the offence of giving false evidence contemplated under s 344, CrPC is not the offence punishable under s 193, IPC is not correct. These observations completely overlook the concept of summary trials meant for the speedy disposal of cases. In general, all offences not punishable with imprisonment for a term exceeding two years can be tried summarily but certain offences punishable with imprisonment, which may extend to three years or even seven years can be tried summarily.[49] The maximum sentence that can be passed in the case of conviction on summary trial is three months only.[50] If the yardstick of sentence is to be applied to determine the nature of an offence as done by the Karnataka High Court, the provisions of s 260(1), CrPC will be rendered nugatory or at least inconsistent or irreconcilable. To quote one more example, under para 4 of s 174, IPC non-attendance in a court of justice in obedience to a summons is an offence punishable with simple imprisonment extending to six months or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both. If the summoned person had to appear before any criminal court, instead of making a complaint against the offender, the court has been empowered by s 350, CrPC to take cognizance of the offence itself and try him summarily but in that case the maximum punishment that can be awarded is a fine not exceeding one hundred rupees. The punishment that can be awarded in summary trials is thus always less than the punishment to be awarded in regular trials under other provisions of CrPC though the offence is the same.

Offence is same under Sections 193 , IPC and 344, CrPC

After the above discussion, it is evident that both s 193, IPC and s 344, CrPC make provisions for the punishment of one and the same offence under two different procedures and there seems to be no reason to say that the offence of which the cognizance can be taken under s 344, CrPC is a new or different offence, other than one punishable under s 193, IPC and the Karnataka case has not been correctly decided on this point.

27. Factors to be Considered before Making Complaint--Expediency

'Expediency in the interest of justice' does not correspond to 'interests of justice'. The court must be satisfied about expediency and must clearly record that jurisdictional finding before taking any step for prosecution. Where on notices being issued to the petitioners to show cause as to why they should not be prosecuted under s 193, IPC, they filed a joint reply and it was submitted on their behalf that whatever they stated before the committing court and at the trial was truthful. They were illiterate persons and the police gave them beating and forced them to give their statements against their will before the sub-divisional magistrate, and accordingly they gave their statements under s 164, CrPC, as directed by the police. Their statements before the committing court as well as before the session judge, according to them, were the correct statements. The sessions judge was not satisfied with the1448 reply made by these petitioners and recorded the order that separate complaints be made against them for having given false evidence. On appeal, the High Court held that in the circumstances of the case, it shall not be in the interest of justice to prosecute the petitioners under s 193, IPC . It is also not expedient in the interest of justice to prosecute a person under s 193, IPC, who in the witness-box resiles from his statement made under s 164, CrPC, and says that he was forced by the police to make that statement, specially when the person is an illiterate and it is impossible to rule out the possibility that he was forced to make the statement.[51]

Court not to Become the Handle in the Hand of any Party

The court should also see that it does not become the handle in the hands of the parties who move in the matter out of spite or grudge which they bear against their opponents.[52] Where the account books called upon by the income tax officer, which are proved to be in existence, are not produced and where the person called upon to do so, does not give any reason for not producing them, but makes the statement that he had no account books other than those already produced by him, which was clearly false, the statement being a wrong statement, his conviction under s 193 of Indian Penal Code was held to be correct.[53]

28. Other Facts to be taken into account in Making a Complaint for Perjury--Statement must be Intentionally False

In making a complaint for perjury against a witness, the magistrate should remember that the statement must be intentionally false in order to justify a prosecution. When the question is neither material to the issue in the case nor goes to the credit of the witness, proceedings ought not to be started. Further, prosecution for perjury should be launched only in cases wherein it appears to be deliberate and conscious and conviction is reasonably probable or likely.[54] Some allowance ought to be made to a witness seeking to evade some matter relating to, for instance, his past history.[55] It has been held that it is not necessary that the statements which form the subject-matter of a charge under s 193, IPC should be material for the decision of the suit and the question can only be considered for the purpose of the sentence, in the event of a conviction.[56] But if the statement is not material in the sense that it did not hamper the course of justice, it is not in the interests of justice to prosecute the witness for perjury.[57] The materiality of the evidence to the matter in issue is not the only point1449 to be considered.[58] Where the evidence of a witness was disbelieved by the trial court but was accepted by the appellate court, it is not in the interest of justice to prosecute him for perjury.[59]

Prosecution on Merely Disbelieving the Case and the Witnesses not Justified

The mere fact that the court does not accept the complainant's version or does not rely upon the evidence of the persons produced as witnesses in the case, cannot justify prosecution under ss 211 and 193, IPC . Such prosecutions can be ordered only when the record shows unmistakably that a false complaint was filed with the knowledge that there was no just or lawful ground for such proceeding or that a witness intentionally gave false evidence.[60]

Interest of the State also to be Considered--Nature of Litigation and Motive

In dealing with an application to prosecute for perjury, courts are entitled, in doubtful cases, to consider the grounds on which the government may suggest that a prosecution is inexpedient. Although the scheme of procedure adopted in this country recognises the right of a private person to institute criminal proceedings, it also recognises the right of the state which is a party to all criminal trials as representing the public, to intervene and procure a stay of proceedings.[61] The explanation furnished by the offender has also to be given due consideration.[62] The circumstance that the false statements were made in a family dispute is not a sufficient reason for refraining from action by prosecution under s 340 against those who made those false statements. If the false statements have been made from motives not in themselves evil, that circumstance can be taken into account when awarding punishment.[63]

Where an advocate created a false evidence before the High Court by appending a false certificate to the effect that no revision was filed earlier, it was observed that it is the incumbent duty of the court to rise to the occasion in the interest of orderliness in the society and directed a complaint to be filed against him.[64]

Where the petitioner made a false statement on oath in a writ of habeas corpus filed in the High Court and also obtained an interim order in his favour, the High Court ultimately found that the petition amounted to an abuse of the process and the facts stated in the petition on oath were fabricated and false. The petitioner, who had made a false statement on oath, was accordingly directed to be prosecuted by the registrar of the High Court for the offence punishable under s 191 read with ss 193 and 199, IPC .[65]

Panchnama not a Record of Statement of Attesting Witnesses

It is to be noted that a panchnama or a mahazar is not a record of the statement made by the attesting witness. It is intended to contain the minutes or a record of what the1450 investigating officer sees or witnesses. It is the contemporaneous record of his actions and not that of the attesting witnesses. Just because there is a conflict between the evidence of a witness in court and the recitals in the panchnama, it cannot be concluded that what the witness said in the court is untrue because the real facts would be just the other way round. It is possible that the witness was tendering true evidence and the contents of the mahazar were wrong. Therefore, unless there are other materials before the court to determine that the witness perjured in court, proceedings are not to be taken against him for perjury.[66]

Where Proceedings are Illegal

If, during the course of proceedings which were ultra vires and illegal, any offence under ss 193 or 471, IPC was committed, it cannot be said that it was committed in or in relation to, or by a party to, any judicial proceedings, and no complaint can be made under this section in respect of that offence.[67]

Offending Portions of Statements to be Set Out in an Annexure

Where the notice besides being not happily worded was laconic and did not satisfy the essential requirements of law, nor did it specify the offending portions in the appellant's lengthy statement, which in the opinion of the High Court, were false, it was held that in cases of this nature, it is highly desirable and indeed very necessary that the portions of the witness's statement in regard to which he has, in the opinion of the court, perjured himself, should be specifically set out in or form an annexure to the notice issued to the accused, so that he is in a position to furnish an adequate and proper reply in regard thereto and be able to meet the charge.[68]

No Inquiry Where it is Tantamout to Abuse of the Process of Court

Where the remarks or observations made by the trial judge against the petitioners were perverse and against the record and the trial judge had exceeded in exercising his jurisdiction for holding an inquiry under s 340, CrPC for the prosecution of the petitioners for the offences under ss 193 and 195, IPC, it was held that the order directing an inquiry is tantamount to abuse of the process of court and deserves to be quashed.[69] The proceedings under s 340 of the CrPC 1973 should not be initiated as a matter of course, even when the witnesses give contradictory evidence. In a case where there is no legal evidence for its success, prosecution should be avoided. The courts should act with utmost circumspection in launching a prosecution.[70]

Most Appropriate Stage for Deciding Complaint of Perjury

If the particular judicial or legal proceeding relates to a trial of civil proceeding or the contentious issues in a legal proceeding, raised therein by the respective pleadings of the parties, to which the final adjudication of the trial court is required, on the merits of the evidence to be let in on record by the parties in support of their respective case, there it goes without saying that the most appropriate stage for the trial judge in such1451 a trial proceeding is to formulate his opinion on the filing or non-filing of complaint contemplated under s 340 of CrPC, would be at the final stage of disposal of the main matter on merits.[71] Otherwise if the presiding officer of a trial court is to take a decision relating to an alleged perjury or a false statement at the initial stage of the proceeding, then in all probability, it will prejudicially affect the fair disposal of the main matter on its merit and therefore, it would certainly deflect the course of justice.[72]

29. 'Locus Paenitentiae'--Meaning of

The term '*locus paenitentiae'*according to Law Lexicon, means a place or chance of repentance. It also means a power of drawing back from a bargain before any act has been done to confirm it in law. No question of locus paenitentiae should arise when an accused is prosecuted for making two contradictory statements.[73] But where the question is whether a complaint for perjury shall or shall not be made, the safest rule is to give the witness as far as possible a locus paenitentiae, and if the witness avails himself thereof, a prosecution for perjury is inexpedient.[74] The fact that the person making a wrong statement applied for withdrawal of it as soon as he found that the statement was wrong is a factor in his favour. A prosecution for perjury is hardly desirable in such a case.[75] But though it is true that a witness must be allowed a locus paenitentiae in the interests of justice, there must be some reasonable limit as to its extent. Where a witness, several weeks after giving false evidence, fearing a prosecution, applied to the court to be recalled so that he might correct a certain answer he had given at the time of the previous examination, it was held that the previous statement was a deliberate falsehood calculated to deceive the court and it was a proper case for a complaint of court being made.[76]

30. Contradictory Statements--Outlook at Trial not the same as in Proceedings under Section 340 , CrPC

The questions which are in issue when a person is prosecuted for perjury are quite different from those which arise in proceedings under s 340 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973. In the latter, the court has to see whether it is expedient in the interests of justice to prosecute the witness for committing perjury, whereas in the former the court has only to see whether the ingredients of the offence of perjury are proved by the prosecution, and it is not at all concerned with the question of the expediency. A court may refuse to hold that it is expedient to prosecute a witness who has deliberately made two contradictory statements, at least one of which is false, but cannot refuse to convict him of perjury when that is proved. In a prosecution for perjury, it is quite immaterial that the two contradictory statements were made in the course of one deposition in one trial. If the first statement is false, the applicant committed the offence of perjury as soon as he made it. Whether he made it deliberately and whether he knew or believed it to be false or did not believe it to be true is to be seen with reference to the time at which he made it. Where the witnesses were examined in 1983 and 1986 and the incident had taken place in 1977,1452 it was held that it cannot be said that they gave false statements.[77] If the requirements of s 191 are fulfilled, the witness committed the offence of perjury as soon as he made it. Section 191 does not take into consideration the fact that the false statement was subsequently in the same deposition or in the same trial, admitted to be incorrect and replaced by the correct statement or that the deposition was not finished before the accused corrected himself.[78]

Contradictions in Statements in the Cases of Grave Nature

In a capital case, where irreconcilable or totally contradictory statements are made by witnesses to the crime at different stages of time and the only explanation offered is that at one stage they were threatened by the prisoners and at another stage by the police, the witnesses in such a case should be proceeded against under s 193, IPC read with s 340, CrPC and a complaint should made in order to determine whether they are liable to be convicted of the offence of perjury.[79] It has been repeatedly pointed out how the fact that a witness appears to have made contradictory statements at two different stages of a case is not by itself always sufficient to justify his prosecution for perjury. The fact that the evidence is given in a case of a grave nature should only make the court all the more careful is weighing all the circumstances before embarking on prosecutions for perjury on the basis of contradictions.[80]

Witnesses to be Encouraged to Tell the Truth

It is in the interests of the State as well as that of justice that prosecution witnesses be free to tell the truth to the court of session irrespective of whatever evidence they may have given in the court of the committing magistrate.[81] A Division Bench of the Kerala High Court has gone to the extent of saying that a witness is expected to speak the truth and he must be encouraged to do so even if the statement before the court is against his previous statement, without the danger of exposing himself to a prosecution for perjury.[82] Where a witness made a false statement under s 164 and then told the truth at the trial, it is not expedient in the interests of justice that he should be prosecuted.[83]

Deposition as a Whole has to be Considered

The deposition should be considered as a whole and regard should be given to the circumstances in which the contradictory answers were made.[84] Usually it would not be expedient to prosecute a witness who had made contradictory statements in the course of the same deposition, because the presumption is that the witness is trying to correct a false statement by his subsequent statement, and in such cases some locus paenitentiae should be given to the witness, but this does not apply where different1453 depositions are recorded after an interval of time.[85] It would be most undesirable that a witness should be afraid to correct a mistake made in his deposition for fear of rendering himself liable to prosecution for perjury. Prosecution for contradiction in the same deposition is maintainable if the contradiction was made not to correct a bona fide error, but with a dishonest intention.[86]

Mere Contradiction not Sufficient for Inquiry

The mere fact that the statement made by a witness before the magistrate under s 164 and before the committing magistrate were undoubtedly contradictory to those made in the sessions court does not make it incumbent on the court to order prosecution. The court must exercise proper judicial discretion, giving due regard to its reaction on the administration of justice.[87] There may be cases where offences like perjury complained of against a particular person may not be of a kind in which prosecution should be resorted to, because in every case a mere contradiction by itself will not attract the operation of the provisions of s 340, CrPC, but there may be cases where contradictions made in the depositions were conscious and deliberate, made in order to thwart the administration of justice, or to obstruct the court in coming to a correct conclusion. In such cases, the court has to consider whether, in the light of the evidence before it, it is a fit case or that it is expedient in the interest of justice that an inquiry be made into the offence.[88] The court should consider how it has come about that there are contradictions and why the witness has resiled from his statements before the magistrate. The High Court refused to grant a sanction in one case though it found that the witness had made false statements before the committing magistrate, but deposed truly in the trial court.[89]

Prosecution in Doubtful Cases

It, however, cannot be laid down as a general rule that a witness is exempt from prosecution with regard to a statement made in the sessions court differing from a previous statement made by him before the committing magistrate even though the subsequent statement is considered to be true. There may be good reasons for not prosecuting the witness in many cases should the subsequent statement be held to be true; but where it is doubtful which of the two statements is true and where it may be held with some degree of certainty that the subsequent statement is the false one, a complaint for giving false evidence should, as a rule, be made. Other matters, it is true, should of course be considered, such as any compulsion brought to bear on the witness in making either of the statements, but where no compulsion has been shown, the courts should not refrain from making a complaint except for good reasons.[90]

Contradictory Statements When not to be Viewed Leniently

Where a report was made by the petitioner to the Director, ACB, Hyderabad against the sanitary inspector of Warangal municipality for demanding illegal gratification1454 and on his supporting the report in his statement recorded under s 164, CrPC, the sanitary inspector was trapped with the assistance of the petitioner. In the trial against the inspector the petitioner appeared as PW 1 and rescinding from his report and statement under s 164, CrPC, he stated that he himself had tried to put the money in the pocket of the inspector. The trial judge acquitted the accused inspector but made an observation in the judgment that the petitioner be prosecuted under this section for his giving a totally variant version as PW 1. He was accordingly tried and convicted and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for six months under this section by the magistrate and it was held that out of his three versions, at least one was known to him to be false. His appeal failed and thereafter the revision filed by him was also dismissed by the Andhra Pradesh High Court with the observation that no interference was called for with the findings arrived at by the two courts below.[91]

Presumption in Favour of Reconciliation of Contradictory Statements

Whether a sanction should be granted on a complaint made for giving false evidence on the mere fact that the witness made contradictory statements depends on the circumstances.[92] The practice of charging a man with making two mutually contradictory statements should be adopted only where the two statements are necessarily and irreconcilably contradictory.[93] Every possible presumption must be made in favour of the reconciliation of the two statements.[94] No sanction should be granted or complaint made when a witness has corrected his false statement in his cross-examination.[95]

In Ismail Khan v State [96] a Special Bench of the Karnataka High Court has held:

> The learned magistrate has perused the complaint given by the accused and his deposition and then came to the conclusion that the petitioner has committed perjury. It is necessary that in order to make a person liable for perjury he should have made a statement on oath regarding the facts on which his statement was based and then deny those facts on oath on a subsequent occasion. His earlier statement regarding the facts must be on oath and his subsequent statement also must be on oath and if both the statements are opposed to each other and they cannot be reconciled, then a person may be liable to be proceeded against for perjury under section 344 , Crpc or under section 193,IPC .

31. Contradictory Statements Made in two different Courts--Deposition which is false to be Ascertained

Where the evidence given before the committing magistrate was contradicted by the same witness before the sessions judge, it is not competent for the sessions court to order the trial of the accused for perjury without specifying which of the depositions made by the accused was false, especially when there is nothing on the record to show that the judge was satisfied that the evidence given before himself was false.[97]1455

A view has been taken that when prosecution is ordered in respect of two contradictory statements made in two different courts, an order under s 340, CrPC of one of the courts is insufficient. Both courts must make an order under this section in respect of the alternative charge,[1] or, at all events, the courts which desires to take action should obtain the sanction of the court before which the other statements were made, unless it is itself a court to which the other is subordinate.[2]

When Statement Before Committing Court Contradicts Statement Before Sessions Court

When a person makes one statement in the committing court and contradicts it in the sessions court, the sessions judge can complain in the alternative that one or other of the statements must be false. If the statement in the sessions court is true, the sessions judge can complain of the statement in the committing court. A statement made by a witness at the preliminary inquiry leading up to the trial in the sessions court is to be regarded as having been in relation to the subsequent proceedings in the sessions court.[3]

In Tilak's case,[4] an offence under s 211, IPC alleged to have been committed in the court of the Poona city magistrate was brought to the notice of the district court of Poona in the course of a civil judicial proceeding. The district judge acted under this section and sent the case down to the first class magistrate, Poona. It was held that the offence was not cognizable by the first class magistrate, as there was neither the previous sanction nor the complaint of the Poona city magistrate or of the sessions court to which he is subordinate. The fact that the district court and the sessions court are represented by one and the same individual will not in any way cure the illegality.[5]

32. Complaint in Respect of Fabricating False Evidence cognizance of an offence in respect of documents produced in court can be taken only on a written complaint of the court concerned.[6] If a litigant is suspected of having fabricated false evidence, it is the duty of the court to direct an inquiry into the matter. Whenever it appears to the court that it is expedient in the interest of justice that the attempted fabrication should be penalised and punished, the court should not hesitate to adopt that course. But, on the other hand, a distinction must always be drawn between a document which does not appear to the court to be genuine on the evidence produced and a document which may be regarded as fabricated. This distinction is of considerable importance in deciding whether criminal proceedings should be started against a party or not.[7]

When False Entry Amounts to Fabrication

If a false entry is made in any book or record and that circumstance assists the court to form an opinion upon that evidence in favour or against somebody, that is enough1456 to hold that false evidence was fabricated. If such false evidence is used in a judicial proceeding, the offence made out is under s 193 .[8]

When during a pendency of proceeding for assessment of compensation under Bihar Land Reforms Act, the accused persons (clerks of the office of DCLR) submitted false and collusive reports and made interpolations in collectible demands and altered touri numbers for facilitating a false payment to a land owner, it was held to amount to fabricating false evidence within the meaning of s 192, IPC, more so when ad interim payment of compensation in excess was actually made to the land owner. In such a case, offences under ss 193 and 209, IPC were clearly made out and the provisions of s 195(1)(b), CrPC were attracted for the prosecution of the accused for those offences.[9]

33. Charge--Particulars of

Where the witnesses who had taken oath named one of the four accused causing injuries to deceased when they appeared against the other accused but changed their version with regard to participation of said accused when they appeared against him, the changed version of witnesses prima facie attracts the provisions of s 193 and they need to be prosecuted for the offence under s 193 .[10] A charge in a criminal trial is framed with a view to enable the accused person to understand what the prosecution alleges against him and what they are seeking to prove and what it is that he has got to meet in order that he may be acquitted. By failure to convey to the accused and inform him what he is being charged with, what he has to meet and against what he has to defend himself, whether by framing an unintelligible charge or not framing a charge at all, prejudice is assumed and the conviction is to be set aside.[11]

It was alleged that the accused R made some overwriting in the bed-head-tickets and the accused M made false entries in the call register of the employees of the hospital, but the two documents, despite Court's order, were not produced before the Court, and as the charge was without evidence, the two accused R and M were discharged.[12]

Charge--Contradictory Statements not the only Material to Prove Perjury

Charges of perjury should contain a distinct assertion with regard to each statement intended to be characterised as perjury, that it was made, that it is untrue in fact, and the accused knew it to be so when he made it,[13] when the perjury is sought to be established on the basis of contradictory statements made on oath. Even in Emperor v Bankatram Lachiram ,[14] on which reliance was placed by the Karnataka High Court, the controversy before the Bombay High Court was in a case of perjury arising out of contradictory statements. It is, therefore, not correct to say that whenever perjury is sought to be established it can be done only by proving two contradictory statements of a person made on oath. It can also be established in1457 other ways as discussed above. While drawing up a charge, the following points should be kept in mind:

(i) Date must be given--The charge should disclose the exact date on which the offence was committed.[15]
(ii) Court--The court or other officer before whom the offence was committed must be specified.[16]
(iii) Stage of the judicial proceeding--The particular stage of the judicial proceeding should be specified.[17]
(iv) Exact words of the statement alleged to be false must be set out in the charge. See the undermentioned cases.[18]

Where the charge was that 'You, on or about the 7 May 1904, at L, gave false evidence in a judicial proceeding, namely, in a case under s 133, IPC and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 193 ', it was held that the charge was vague and the conviction was set aside.[19] Where an accused makes numerous false statements in a case, there should be a separate charge for each statement, but all such charges can be tried at one trial if they form part of one and the same transaction.[20] But compare Re Chan Hang Kin,[21] wherein it was stated that the whole evidence of a witness was a tissue of falsehood and it was held that the charge did not admit of being formulated in a series of specific allegations of perjury, but the gist of the accusation was sufficiently clear to the accused.

Charge in a Case of Contradictory Statements--Not Necessary to Allege which of the Contradictory Statements is False

Section 221(1), CrPC settled the law that contradictory statements by a witness which are irreconcilable constitute the offence of intentionally giving false evidence, though it cannot be proved which of the two statements is false.[22] In a charge under s 193, IPC it is not necessary to allege which of the two contradictory statements upon oath is false, but it is sufficient (unless some satisfactory explanation of the contradiction should be established) to warrant a conviction of the offence of giving false evidence to show that an accused person has made one statement upon oath at one time and a directly contradictory statement at another.[23] The undermentioned cases,[24] in which a contrary view was expressed, now stands superseded to this extent. Illustration (c) to s 221, CrPC adopts the full bench view in Queen Empress v Muhomed Hymayoon Shah. [25]1458

Applicability of illust (c) to s 221, CrPC

In Babari Bhura case,[26] it is laid down that this illustration must be strictly confined to the case of two contradictory statements of the same kind and cannot be applied to statements falling under the two different parts of this section. Therefore, the accused making a false statement in an investigation under s 175, CrPC and a contradictory statement before a magistrate, could not be convicted in the alternative.[27] The illustration is, however, subject to the condition that the several acts for which a charge in the alternative can be framed must form a series of acts, which means that the facts should have something in common between them. There must be a common link to connect the one fact with the other.[28]

Where a magistrate makes a complaint under s 193, IPC in respect of the statement made in his court on the definite allegation that a particular portion of that statement was false, the provisions of s 195, CrPC are fully complied with and the accused can only be charged on the definite allegation that he had intentionally given false evidence before the magistrate. The accused cannot be charged in the alternative that his previous statement in a certain suit before the civil judge was false, as such a charge requires a complaint in respect of the statement by the civil judge. In the absence of such a complaint from the civil judge, the offence in the alternative in respect of the statement before the civil judge made in the other proceeding could not be the subject of the charge.[29]

Charge--Contradiction in the Same or Different Depositions is Immaterial

The language of s 22(1), CrPC is general enough to justify alternative charges under s 193, IPC for contradictory statements, whether they be in the same or in different depositions. The illustration is only a particular instance of the principle given in the section and does not limit it to depositions in different courts. The existence of contradictory statements in the same deposition or different depositions makes no difference.[30]

34. Alternative Charge in Case of Contradictory Statements

In Emperor v Ningappa Banappa ,[31] the first statement made by the witness was in the course of the police investigation under s 164, CrPC, and when the case went to the committing magistrate, he resiled from the statement. It appears that the learned additional sessions judge who ultimately tried the case was disposed to think that the statement made under s 164, CrPC was false and that the subsequent statement at the trial was true. In those circumstances, it was held that it would not be expedient in the interests of justice to compel a witness to stick to a false statement which had been made by him in the course of the investigation. This ruling does not lay down that in a proper case a charge in the alternative as contemplated by illust (c) to s 221,1459CrPC cannot be framed or prosecution for such a charge should not be sanctioned.[32] The same remark applies to the ruling in Keramat Ali v Emperor. [33]

Proof of Alternative Charge

Prosecution on alternative charges of persons who make contradictory statements to the police and to a court has its convenience, but it has also its drawbacks. It is not a prosecution to be encouraged and is justifiable only when the prosecution is unable to prove which of the contradictory statements was false.[34] The accused must have been under a legal obligation to speak the truth on both the occasions.[35] It must be remembered that the accused might have made two statements, in perfect good faith, and yet quite irreconcilable.[36] Where a person was convicted of giving false evidence upon an alternative charge, it was held by the majority of a Full Bench (Jackson and Phear JJ, dissenting), that the conviction was good, notwithstanding that the jury had not distinctly found which of the two statements charged was false.[37] If no alternative charge is framed, it is difficult to find which of the two statements made by a person, who is admittedly a liar, is true, in the absence of other evidence besides the statements of the accused, the liar, himself.[38]

35. Evidence in any other Case--Meaning of

Although a statement which is made in the course of a police investigation under s 164 of the IPC[39] is not evidence in a stage of judicial proceeding, it comes within the words 'evidence in any other case' in s 193, IPC . However, it can be linked with a statement which is in evidence in a stage of the judicial proceeding following on the investigation, so that the two can be said to be a series of acts on which an alternative charge can be framed for intentionally giving false evidence under s 193, IPC .[40]

36. Form of Charge

Form Nos 32 I (5) and II (4) in Sch II, CrPC 1973, which are supposed to be model charge and alternative charge under this section, run as follows:

(I) Charge:

I, (name and office of the magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....in the course of the trial of.....before.....stated in evidence that '.....' which statement you either knew or believed to be false, or did not believe to be true, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 193 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this Court.1460

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

(II) Alternative charge:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the day of.....at.....in the course of the inquiry[41] into.....before.....stated in evidence that '.....' and that you, on or about the.....day of....., at.....in the course of the trial of..... Before.....stated in the evidence that '.....'., one of which statements you either knew or believed to be false, or did not believe to be true, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 193 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of session/within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

(III) For fabricating false evidence following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate, etc) hereby charge (name of accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the day of.....at....., fabricated false evidence, to wit.....for the purpose of being used in pending/prospective judicial proceeding (or in a proceeding taken by law before a public servant or before an arbitrator) intending that the person conducting such proceeding they entertain an erroneous opinion.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

37. Accused should have an Opportunity of Explaining Contradictory

Statements

Where there is a trial on a charge of giving false evidence by reason of contradictory statements, it is of the first importance (a) that there should be the clearest and most precise evidence of what the statements alleged to be contradictory really are; and (b) that the accused should have every possible opportunity of explaining the statements in question and of showing that the alleged contradiction does not really exist. Where in a case the accused had no such opportunity, the High Court ordered a re-trial.[42] Extreme care has to be taken that the accused person really understands the nature of the case against him, and the circumstances which he is asked to explain.[43] Every presumption in favour of the possible reconciliation of the statements must be made.[44]

38. Proof

For a conviction under this section, the following points have to be proved:

(1) For giving false evidence:

(a) the accused was legally bound to state the truth either by an oath or by an express provision of law;1461
(b) the accused made the statement or declaration;
(c) he did so intentionally;
(d) the statement was false;
(e) the accused either knew or believed it to be false, or did not believe it to be true;

The following aggravating circumstance may be added where applicable:
(f) such statement or declaration was made in a stage of a judicial proceeding. (s 191, IPC)

(2) For fabricating false evidence:

(a) the accused caused certain circumstance to exist, or made a false entry, or made a document containing a false statement;
(b) he did so intending that such circumstance, entry or statement should appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding pending or prospective[45] or in a proceeding taken by law before a public servant[46] or before an arbitrator;[47]
(c) the person conducting the judicial or other proceeding had to form an opinion upon the evidence in which such false evidence appeared;
(d) the accused intended that person conducting the proceeding may entertain an erroneous opinion upon that evidence;
(e) such erroneous opinion touched a point material to the result of such proceedings. (s 192, IPC).

Proof--False Statement must be Literally False

The prosecution must establish all the ingredients of the offence and the decision is to be based only on the evidence and materials placed before the criminal court.[48] To support a prosecution for giving false evidence, it must be shown that the false statement charged against the accused is literally false. There must be a statement of fact which is false. It is no offence if the fact stated is true but some circumstance is suppressed, with the result that a wrong inference may be deduced.[49] In a prosecution under ss 193 and 199 it is not sufficient for the prosecution to show that the statement is false and thus throw the burden of proof on the accused to establish good faith as a defence, but the prosecution must show affirmatively the knowledge that the evidence given or declaration made was false or else show the belief in its being false or an absence of a belief in its truth.[50] To punish one under s 193, IPC among other1462 facts, it has to be proved that one had intentionally given false evidence in any stage of judicial proceeding.[51]

In Queen v Ahmed Ally ,[52] Norman J, pointed out the true rule on the subject to be that:

> No man can be convicted of giving false evidence except on proof of facts which, if accepted as true, shew not merely that it is incredible, but that it is impossible that the statements of the party accused made on oath can be true. If the inference from the facts proved falls short of this, it seems to us that there is nothing on which a conviction can stand; because assuming all that is proved to be true, it is still possible that no crime was committed. The evidence of a medical man or other skilled witness, however eminent, as to what he thinks may or may not have taken place under a particular combination of circumstances, however confidently he may speak, is ordinarily a mere matter of opinion. Human judgment is fallible. Human knowledge is limited and imperfect.

The same view has been taken in the undermentioned cases.[53] But dissenting from this, it has been held in an Oudh case that:

> The definition of proof in the Evidence Act is of little positive assistance, but it is of some negative assistance. Its meaning clearly is that a fact may be held proved even though it is impossible to show that its existence is a mathematical or scientific certainty. This definition is of general application and thus applies to a case where the offence is one of perjury. I have no hesitation in saying that it is certainly sufficient if the statement of the accused party is proved to be incredible.[54]

Reasons Given in the Judgment and Opinion Expressed in the Order not to Weigh with the Trial Court

In a prosecution for perjury, the criminal court must form its own opinion, it must not arrive at its conclusions by reference to some other decision.[55] When the trial of the accused commences under s 193, IPC the reasons given in the main judgment of the High Court or those in the order passed under s 340(1), CrPC should not weigh with the criminal court in coming to its independent conclusion as to whether the offence under s 193, IPC has been fully established against the appellant beyond reasonable doubt. It will be for the prosecution to establish all the ingredients of the offence under s 193, IPC against the appellant and the decision will be based only on the evidence and the materials produced before the criminal court during the trial and the conclusion of the court will be independent of opinions formed by the High Court.[56]

In a prosecution under s 193, it is incumbent on the prosecution to show first, that the statement made by the accused was false and secondly, that he knew it or believed it to be false or did not believe it to be true at the time he made the statement.[57]1463

The intention of the accused is an essential ingredient in the constitution of the offence of perjury.[58] In order to sustain an indictment for perjury the prosecution must establish inter alia, two things: (a) that the statement was false; and (b) that it was known or believed to be false or not believed to be true. In other words, the statement must be intentionally false.[59]

An accused could be guilty under s 193, IPC only if he had the intention of fabricating evidence in order that it should appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding or in a proceeding taken by law before a public servant, as such, or an arbitrator as laid down in s 192 . The prosecution must, therefore, show that there was such an intention and that the accused did not fabricate evidence merely to screen himself in the belief that his conduct would result in no proceeding being taken.[60]

Mere Fabrication of Accounts not an Offence

The mere fabrication of accounts is not in itself a criminal offence. For instance, if a man prepares false accounts for his own edification, to persuade himself that he possesses more money than he actually does, although that may be a proceeding lacking in wisdom, it is not a criminal offence; you must show that the false accounts were to be used in some proceedings pending or contemplated at the time when the offence was committed.[61]

Where the food inspector obviously made false statements in his sworn statements that the court had not fixed any further date of hearing and had taken up the case on the date in question without notice to the police prosecutor or the complainant and on the date neither of these two persons were present in court, it was held that prima facie, he seems to have committed an offence under s 193 of the Indian Penal Code .[62]

39. Punishment

Nowadays a peculiar trend has developed. Witnesses change their statement during different stages of the criminal proceeding at their own sweet will and thereby affecting the course of justice, though under the law, they are bound to state truth and truth only. The witnesses try to pollute the course of justice by taking a complete turn from his original version of the occurrence at later stage of the proceeding/trial. This trend should be arrested and such witnesses should not be allowed to escape consequences of their sin.[63] The perjury in judicial proceedings must be punished severely.[64] Where the accused files a false affidavit in court with the object of securing an admission of an appeal,[65] or in support of a transfer application,[66] it would be dangerous to take a lenient view. The court should not take into account the1464 effect of a conviction or prosecution on the dependants of the accused.[67] The measure of punishment depends upon the gravity of the offence. A deliberate mis-statement whether it tends to endanger the life and property of others, or to defeat and impede the progress of justice, is not an offence which should be lightly passed over. But for a simple mis-statement from which no such inferences can be drawn, a comparatively light sentence will suffice, particularly where the prisoner pleads guilty and throws himself on the mercy of the court.[68] In the instant case, the accused appellant very foolishly, under the influence of some other persons made the report and the statement in question, and at the earliest brought to the notice of the court that she had been misled and unduly influenced in making the false report and the statement. From the defence documents it did appear that the appellant was misled and unduly influenced in making a false report and the statement. In the circumstances, the conviction of the appellant was maintained under ss 193 and 211, IPC, but the sentence awarded to her was set aside and she was ordered to be released on probation.[69] A false statement by a witness as to his position or character, ought not to be punished so severely as a false charge on a false claim.[70] Where the accused, when he gives false evidence, was on bail and it appeared that he gave false answers to the questions put to him either under the influence of the police or because he was under the impression that if he gave such evidence, he would be able to obtain a discharge in the case which was then pending before him, it was held that under the circumstances no severe sentence was called for.[71] Where the trial has been pending for a long time, the court should take a lenient view of the offence.[72] In a case, the imprisonment, on an admission of having made interpolations in books of account, which was committed 8 years ago, was reduced by the Andhra Pradesh High Court to one week while the fine was retained.[73] Where no counsel was provided to the accused at state expense during the trial, his sentence of imprisonment under this section was reduced to the period already undergone.[74]

40. Illustrative Cases

Where a person representing the company was assistant secretary of the complainant company before its amalgamation and general manager in the new company, signed a vakalatnama without mentioning his designation and the name of the company, he could not be said to have committed any offence under s 467, s 471 or s 193 of the Penal Code.[75]

Where in a writ petition against the housing board, the plea by the housing board was that the matter was settled and there was an agreement between the parties, however, the official of the housing board who signed the agreement on its behalf, subsequently retracted from the agreement even before the decision of the petition was taken, on the ground that he was not authorised to act, it was held that such an act of unsettling settled issues or wrongfully settling issues without sanction interferes with public justice and amounts to perjury and contempt of the court. But1465 since the record shows that the contemnor himself noticed the higher authorities, and the said defect was found to be rectified by the housing board and the contemnor sought forgiveness for the action of perjury and apologised in the contempt proceeding, the contempt action was consigned after admonishing the contemnor.[76]

In one case the police officials made interpolation in entries of the case diary to keep the sequence of the entries in order and prove the time of arrest and thereby cooked up false stories of possession of illegal arms by the accused to justify his detention after receiving an order of the magistrate directing the station house officer to give a report. On these facts, the Apex Court not only acquitted the accused but also intended an inquiry under s 340(1), CrPC into a commission of offence under ss 193, 195 and 211, IPC and directed for the issuance of a show cause notice to the police officials through the commissioner of police as to why they should not be proceeded against for the said offences.[77] Where the accused officer-in-charge of the police station prepared false statement said to be given to the deceased, he was prosecuted for offences under ss 193 and 194,[78]IPC .

Where a certified copy of a judgment appeared to be interpolated ex facie, the inquiry revealed that it was forged by changing its date of delivery, the court directed the petitioner to face a criminal trial for perjury. The petition pleaded innocence stating that the accused depended on her advocate who might have done it and the lawyer who represented the petitioner in the trial court had since died. On these facts, the Orissa High Court recalled its order to SDJM, Bhubaneshwar for a criminal trial and gave a benefit of doubt to the petitioner.[79]

Where the petitioner made a statement on oath in a writ petition supported by an affidavit that the timings of a law college were changed by the principal arbitrarily, but the fact was that the principal had the powers to change the timings and the change was made by him after receiving representation of a majority of the students of college to the said effect, and the petitioner was one of the students signing the said representation, it was expedient in the interest of justice to eradicate the evil of perjury and the petitioner was ordered to be prosecuted under s 193, IPC for making the said false statement in the writ petition supported by the affidavit.[80]

Where in case under ss 489B and 489, IPC, the prosecution witness on being threatened by the higher police officers did not to support the prosecution case, filed affidavits before the Court and resiled from the prosecution case, the High Court directed the Presiding Officer of the trial Court to file complaint for offences under ss 193 and 195A, IPC .[81]

A sub-inspector gave a false affidavit in support of a petition to mislead the court with a view to obtain condonation of a delay in filing the appeal, which may amount to an offence under the relevant provisions of IPC . On these facts, the Andhra Pradesh High Court directed its registrar (judicial) to file a complaint under s 195 of the CrPC against the sub-inspector of police, who gave such false affidavit, for the offences under ss 191 - 193, IPC before the concerned magistrate having the jurisdiction.[82]1466

The respondent converted to religion of Christanity and married the daughter of his maternal uncle. After conversion, the marriage did not fall under 'Sapinda relationship', thus, the married couple had not filed false declaration in Church, and had not committed offence under s 193, IPC .[83]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 194.

Giving or fabricating false evidence with intent to procure conviction of capital offence.--

Whoever gives or fabricates false evidence, intending thereby to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, any person to be convicted of an offence which is capital by the law for the time being in force in India, shall be punished with imprisonment for life, or with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine;

If innocent person be thereby convicted and executed.--and if an innocent person be convicted and executed in consequence of such false evidence, the person who gives such false evidence shall be punished either with death or the punishment hereinbefore described.

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

The words 'by the law of British India or England' were substituted for the words 'by this Code' by the India Railways Act 1890, s 149, which is now repealed. The words 'by the laws for the time being in force in the Provinces' were substituted for the words 'Law of British India or England' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1948. The words 'the Provinces' were substituted by the words 'the States' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The words 'the States' were substituted by the word 'India' by Act 3 of 1951. The words 'imprisonment for life' were substituted for the words 'transportation for life' by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Schedule.

2. Scope and Applicability

This and the next section deal with two aggravated forms of giving or fabricating false evidence: (a) where the intention is to procure the conviction of a person for a capital offence (s 194, IPC), or (b) for an offence punishable with imprisonment for life or imprisonment for seven or more than seven years (s 195, IPC). If in the first case the capital punishment is actually awarded and carried out, and the person executed was innocent, then the giver or fabricator of the false evidence can also be punished with death under the latter part of this section.1467

To constitute an offence under this section, the accused must give or fabricate false evidence, intending thereby to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, any person to be convicted of a capital offence.

An application/interlocutory application filed by either party for some relief is not evidence within the meaning of s 3, Indian Evidence Act, and as such, would not fall within the meaning of s 294, CrPC . No offence is committed under s 193 or s 194, IPC .[84]

3. Tutoring of Person is Fabricating False Evidence

In one case, the Allahabad High Court held that the tutoring of a man to give false evidence is not fabricating false evidence,[85] but dissenting from this, it has been held in a subsequent case that the tutoring of a man to give false evidence amounts to the 'causing of a circumstance to exist' and therefore, amounts to fabricating false evidence within the meaning of s 192 .[86] If a police officer coerces a person to make a false statement under s 164, CrPC 1973, he fabricates false evidence and is liable to be punished under this section.[87]

4. 'Intending Thereby to Cause'--Meaning of

The words 'in any stage of a judicial proceeding' which occur in s 193 are not repeated in this section. In this respect the terms of this section are wider than those of s 193 . According to one view, this section refers only to the final stage, that is the trial of the case.[88] So, a witness, who gives false evidence in the committing proceedings against an accused person subsequently committed to the sessions on a charge of murder, would not be guilty of an offence under this section, the reason being that it is difficult to affirm the existence of an intention to cause, or of knowledge that the false evidence is likely to cause, a person to be convicted of a capital offence, when the proceeding in which the evidence is given, is one is which such a conviction is not legally possible.[89] It would follow from this a fortiori that the offence of a person accusing another falsely of murder to a head constable in an inquiry under s 174, CrPC, would not fall under this section.[90]

In a Calcutta case, however, it has been held that it is not necessary under this section that the false evidence which is given should be evidence given in a court of justice. Such statement, if made to a police officer, would amount to the offence of giving false evidence as defined by s 191, taking s 118 of the Code into consideration.[91]

Where the accused officer-in-charge of the police station prepared false statement said to be given to the deceased, he was prosecuted for offences under ss 193 and 194, IPC .[92]1468

An inspector of police, while making the investigation in respect of the murder of A, falsely implicated the accused with the connivance of two sarpanchas and a village witness by concocting the whole evidence and got the accused convicted by the trial court. In the appeal, the alleged deceased A appeared in the High Court and he was not found murdered. The High Court held that the inspector, sarpanchas and other witnesses were liable to be prosecuted under s 194, IPC read with s 340, CrPC .[93]

5. Fabrication in Investigation Papers by Investigating Officer

Time was not mentioned in the documents prepared during investigation. Time was inserted later by the appellant, Investigating Officer in the case. His purpose was to see that the accused persons were convicted in the case. Appellant was convicted under s 194, IPC .[94]

6. 'Likely'--Meaning of

To bring a case within the section, it must at least be possible that a conviction may be the result of giving or fabricating false evidence. A is being tried for murder, B falsely swears that A did not commit the murder, but that C (not in custody) did. His evidence being inoperative to secure the conviction of any one for the capital offence, B has not committed an offence under s 194, though he has committed one under s 193 .[95]

7. Capital Offence --What is?

Capital punishment means the penalty of death inflicted in pursuance of judicial sentence, it being a cardinal constitutional principle that no one is to be put to death without being brought to answer in due process of law.[96] Capital offence is that offence for which death penalty may be inflicted.

The following are capital offences under this Code:

(a) Waging, etc, a war against the Government of India (s 121, IPC).
(b) Abetment of mutiny in the Army, Navy, or Air Force, if mutiny is committed in consequence thereof (s 132, IPC).
(c) An offence under the second paragraph of s 194, IPC .
(d) Murder (s 302, IPC).
(e) Murder by a person sentenced to imprisonment for life (s 303, IPC).
(f) Abetment of suicide by a child, insane person, etc (s 305, IPC).
(g) Hurt caused in an attempt to commit murder by a life convict to murder (s 307, IPC).
(h) Murder in dacoity (s 396, IPC).1469

Offences capital by the Law of England are the following:

(i) High treason.[1]
(ii) Murder.[2]
(iii) Piracy within violence.[3]
(iv) Burning or destroying ships of war, arsenals, magazines, etc.[4]
(v) Numerous offences in the Navy.[5]
(vi) Numerous offences in the Army.[6]

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable but a warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is non-bailable and non-compoundable and is triable only by a court of session. There is no period of limitation to prosecute a person for committing an offence under this section.

Based on a judgment of acquittal, the investigating officer was sought to be proceeded against for the offence under s 194, IPC . During the progress of preliminary inquiry under s 340, CrPC, a notice was issued to the investigating officer who sought summoning for the production of the case diaries relating to the matter. The prayer was refused. It was held that the court having summoned the proposed the accused it, ought not to shut him out when he wanted to aid the court in determining the question before it.[7]

9. Complaint

Section 195(1)(b), CrPC provides that no court shall take cognizance of an offence punishable under this section when committed in, or in relation to, any proceeding in any court except on the complaint in writing of that court, or some other court to which that court is subordinate. So a complaint by the concerned court is necessary for the prosecution of an offender under this section.

For detailed commentary Sohoni's Code of Criminal Procedure, twenty-first edn, Lexisnexis may be referred to.

10. Stage of Sanction under Section 197 , CrPC

Whether a sanction is necessary or not may have to be determined from stage to stage. The necessity may reveal itself in the course of the progress of the case. The complaint may not disclose that the act constituting the offence was done or purported to be done in the discharge of public duty, but facts that may come to light subsequently in the course of the prosecution evidence at the trial or otherwise, may establish the necessity for a sanction. In that event, the court shall dismiss the1470 complaint on the ground that the accused could not be prosecuted without a sanction of the State Government under s 197, CrPC .[8]

11. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of the sessions judge etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the day of.....at.....in the course of trial of.....before.....gave false evidence (or fabricated false evidence), intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby cause..... (give the name of the person) to be convicted of an offence, which is capital by the law in force in India. (Where the charge is under the second part of section194) and an innocent person..... (give the name of the person) has been convicted and executed, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 194 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge by this court.

12. Proof

In addition to the points mentioned under the last section, the following further points must be proved:

The accused, when giving or fabricating false evidence, intended thereby to cause or knew that it was likely that he would thereby cause the person in question to be convicted of the capital offence, by the laws for the time being in force in India.

For the second clause, prove further:

(i) that the capital punishment was awarded and carried into effect;

and

(ii) that the person executed was an innocent person.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 195.

Giving or fabricating false evidence with intent to procure conviction of offence punishable with imprisonment for life or imprisonment.--

Whoever gives or fabricates false evidence intending thereby to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, any person to be convicted of an offence which [9][by the law for the time being in force in [10][India]] is not capital, but punishable with [11][imprisonment for life], or imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards, shall be punished as a person convicted of that offence would be liable to be punished.

Illustration

A gives false evidence before a Court of Justice, intending thereby to cause Z to be convicted of a dacoity. The punishment of dacoity is [12][imprisonment for life], or rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, with or without1471 fine. A, therefore, is liable to [13][imprisonment for life] or imprisonment, with or without fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The offence under this section is an aggravated form of an offence under s 193 [14] but is an attenuated form of the offence under the last section. This section applies only to cases where the intention is to procure conviction for an offence which is neither capital nor punishable with imprisonment for less than seven years. Statement on oath falsely supporting the prosecution case against an accused amounts to an offence under ss 193 and 195, IPC .[15] To sustain a conviction under this section it must be proved that the accused, when giving or fabricating the evidence, intended thereby to cause, or knew that it was likely that he would thereby cause, the person in question to be convicted of an offence punishable with imprisonment for life or imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards under this Code.[16] If the charge is of giving false evidence, it must be proved not only that the accused spoke falsely, but also knew that he was speaking falsely.[17] Merely persuading a person to give false evidence in a case does not amount to fabrication of false evidence under this section, unless the person persuaded is produced as a witness and he gives false evidence in the case.[18]

On the basis of answer given in examination under O 2, r 2, CPC, a party cannot be prosecuted for offence under s 195, IPC as a party is not examined on oath or affidavit in examination under O 2, r 2, CPC.[19]

Where prosecution of one of the PWS under s 195, IPC was filed on allegations that in case under the Prevention of Corruption Act he had given evidence before the Court contrary to his statement under s 164, CrPC, when the statement of the PW was recorded after lapse of four years, held that the prosecution of the PWS was not proper, especially when the case under s 195, IPC was filed after a lapse of 11 years from the date of giving false evidence.[20]

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'by the law of British India or England' were substituted for the words 'by this Code' by the Indian Railways Act 1890,[21] s 149 . The same section, i.e. s 149 1472 was repealed by the Repealing Act 1 of 1938. The words 'by the law for the time being in force in the Province' were substituted for the words 'Law of British India or England' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1948. The words 'the Provinces' were substituted by the words 'the States' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950 and the words 'the States' were substituted by the word 'India' by Act 3 of 1951. The words 'imprisonment for life' were substituted for the words 'transportation for life' by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Schedule. In the illustration the words 'transportation for life' were substituted by the words 'imprisonment for life' by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Schedule with effect from 1 January 1956.

3. Illustrative Cases

Where a man burns his own house, it is the causing of a circumstance to exist within the meaning of s 192, and he may be liable under this section if he intended thereby to procure the conviction of another person. But if the act was committed in a most public manner and not in a way calculated to lead to the conviction of that person, he cannot be held guilty under this section.[22] If he burnt the house and charged another with the offence of doing so, he should be convicted and sentenced under s 211 (making a false charge) and not under this section.[23]

Where the accused concealed certain stolen property in another's field with a view to having that innocent person punished as an offender, it was held that the accused committed the offence under this section.[24] So also, when the accused coined false rupees not for the purpose of making a gain by passing them off as good coins but for the purpose of getting the coins secretly into the house of their enemies, against whom they were making to the police a false charge of theft, accompanied by a request for a house search, it was held that the accused were guilty of the offence under this section.[25]

The accused who owed a certain amount to another, sent a registered and insured packet, purporting to contain currency notes, in settlement of the debt, but actually containing waste paper and in a suit by the creditor, applied to the court to admit the acknowledgment receipt in evidence. It was held that the accused was guilty of the offence under this section.[26]

4. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under the preceding s 194, IPC . There is no period of limitation for taking cognizance under this section also.

5. Complaint by the Court cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken only on the written complaint of the concerned court as provided by s 195(1)(b), CrPC 1973. For a detailed commentary on this point, the commentary under s 193, ante may be referred to.1473

The successor-in-office of a magistrate can file a complaint under this section in respect of an offence committed before his predecessor.[27]

Where forgery in a document was committed prior to it being produced in Court, a private complaint is not barred.[28]

6. Trial for other Distinct Offence not Barred

Section 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure does not bar the trial of an accused for a distinct offence disclosed by the same set of facts but not so stated therein. Section 195 also does not provide further that if in the course of the commission of that offence, other distinct offences are committed, the magistrate is debarred from taking cognizance in respect of those offences as well.[29]

7. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of the sessions judge etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you, on and about the day of.....at.....in the course of trial of.....before.....gave false evidence (or fabricated false evidence), intending thereby to cause (or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby cause) .....(give name of the person) to be convicted of an offence.....punishable with imprisonment for life or imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 195 of the India Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried, on the said charge, by this court.

8. Proof

In order to prove the guilt under this section the prosecution has to prove that the accused when giving or fabricating false evidence intended thereby to cause or knew that it was likely that he would thereby cause, the person in question to be convicted of an offence (other than capital) punishable with imprisonment for life, or imprisonment for a term of seven years or more.

[30][S. 195A.

Threatening any person to give false evidence.--

Whoever threatens another with any injury to his person, reputation or property or to the person or reputation of any one in whom that person is interested, with intent to cause that person to give false evidence shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both;1474 and if innocent person is convicted and sentenced in consequence of such false evidence, with death or imprisonment for more than seven years, the person who threatens shall be punished with the same punishment and sentence in the same manner and to the same extent such innocent person is punished and sentenced.]

This section is inserted by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act of 2005, wef 16-04-2006.

2. Scope

Tendering of false evidence as well as threats and intimidation to any person to give false evidence have been made penal offences under ss 193 and 195A, IPC .[31]

Where in case under ss 489B and 489, IPC, the prosecution witness, on being threatened by the higher police officers did not support the prosecution case, and filed affidavits before the Court resiling from the prosecution case, the High Court directed the Presiding Officer of the trial Court to file complaint for offences under ss 193 and 195A, IPC .[32] Where the accused gave speech that no false evidence should be given against the workers of party in murder case against the accused, held it did not amount to holding threat to any witness, and s 195A, IPC was not directed in the case.[33]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 196.

Using evidence known to be false.--

Whoever corruptly uses or attempts to use as true or genuine evidence any evidence which he knows to be false or fabricated, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave or fabricated false evidence.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with (a) the corrupt use of false or fabricated evidence or (b) an attempt to use as true or genuine evidence, any evidence which the accused knows to1475 be false or fabricated. It must be read with ss 191 and 192, and can only apply to the use of evidence which was false evidence within the meaning of s 191 or fabricated evidence as laid down in s 192 . False evidence is not always fabricated evidence unless there was, at the time of making it, an intention that it should appear in evidence.[34] The gist of an offence under this section is the procuring of false circumstances or the making of a document containing false statement, so that the court may form a wrong opinion in a judicial proceeding, on the basis of such false evidence.[35] The section makes it punishable not only to use but also to attempt to use false or fabricated evidence corruptly. So, to constitute the offence under this section it is necessary that the false or fabricated evidence should be used or attempted to be used as true or genuine evidence.[36]

2. Evidence must be in Existence

An offence under this section can be held to have been committed only if it is shown that the evidence which the accused used or attempted to use as true or genuine was in existence at the material time.[37] A mere attempt to get a false medical certificate, which is refused, does not fall under this section.[38]

3. 'Uses or Attempts to use'--Explained

The offence under this section is the using or attempting to use corruptly as true or genuine evidence knowing it to be false or fabricated. 'Fabricated' means so fabricated as to constitute an offence. Evidence fabricated out of India, consequently, is not 'fabricated' in the sense of this section, and a person who uses such evidence, however corruptly, is not subject to punishment for it. He, in fact, commits no offence.[39]Where an assessee fabricated his account books for producing before the income tax officer and also produced the same before him, his act thereby attracts the provisions of ss 193 and 196 .[40]

4. Production of a Summoned Document does not Amount to user

The production of a copy is an attempt to use the original.[41] The production of a document, which a person is summoned by a court to produce, however, does not amount to using the document as genuine. The expression 'using a document' is apparently used in the sense of its being put forward in some way for one of the purposes mentioned in s 463, IPC .[42] The production by a party of a document, which he is bound by law to produce, cannot by itself constitute a user of that document by him. He cannot be put to the risk of having to consider whether a document1476 answering the description contained in the summons is in fact genuine, and whether there is any reason to believe it to be not genuine. The mere production of a document in answer to a command of court can in no case be regarded as fraudulent in law.[43]

The giving of false evidence by the accused that a witness delivered the document to him with a fraudulent intention does not amount to a fraudulent user of the document with reference to which the evidence was given, though it might expose him to a prosecution for perjury.[44]

5. Knowledge and its Burden of Proof

The mere production of false evidence throws on the producer the burden of proving his innocent knowledge, and the production may be made either by himself personally, or through another.[45] If the evidence was produced through another person or persons, it must be proved that he or they knew it to be false, as well as the producer, it being necessary that the witnesses should have the same knowledge, for, otherwise, the evidence is not false.[46] Where a person produced in evidence an account book, one page of which had been extracted and another substituted in its place, it was held that he could not be guilty under this section unless he knew of the forgery, and intended to use the forged evidence for the purpose of affecting the decision on the point at issue when the book was tendered.[47] The document sought to be used may have been fabricated for a different purpose. Thus, where the accused, in a suit upon a bond, sought to support his claim by a letter fabricated for the purpose of enabling him to get the bond registered, it was held that the fact that the letter was fabricated for use before the registrar was no objection to his conviction under this section.[48]

6. Forged and Fabricated--Not the Same

It has been held that the offence imputed against an accused, who, in a civil suit, is alleged to have used as genuine a document which he knew to be a forged document, is one cognizable under s 471 of the IPC .

Such accused should, therefore, be charged under that section, and not under this section.[49]

7. 'Corruptly'--Not Confined to Bribes

The word 'corruptly' has not been defined in the Code. It must, therefore, be given its ordinary dictionary meaning. According to the Webster's Dictionary, 'corruptly' means 'without integrity', 'contrary to parity', 'viciously', 'wickedly'. Accordingly to Black's Law Dictionary[50] corruptly, when used in a statute, generally imports a wrongful design to acquire some plenniary or other advantage.[51] According to1477*Morgan and Macpherson's Indian Penal Code*, the word 'corruptly' is used in ss 196, 198, 200, 219 and 220, IPC to denote that those whose duty it is to submit evidence for the consideration of judicial and other functionaries on behalf of clients do not incur the penalties for using false evidence unless they use the evidence corruptly. In Bhan Singh v Jalan Singh [52] it is said that the word is not used in the sense of 'dishonestly' or 'fraudulently'.[53] It is of a wider import and is not confined to the taking of bribes.[54] Convictions have been made under this section where the word was not confined to the restricted sense indicated above.[55] 'Corruptly' is, therefore, not the same as 'dishonestly or fraudulently'. The user of false evidence, with the knowledge that it is false, must ordinarily be corrupt from its very nature, and the onus lies on the accused to show that there are circumstances in the case which prevent its being corrupt. The fact that he was defending himself against a criminal charge is not enough. Where a public servant has been induced by an accused person to produce a fabricated document in order to support his false defence, it is not difficult to support the inference as to the corrupt use by him of the fabricated evidence as being within the scope of this section.[56] The word 'corruptly' is not intended to connote a motive necessarily connected with the passing of money as an inducement to the person impugned to use or attempt to use the fabricated evidence. An intention to procure a false conviction is also a corrupt intention.[57]

8. Illustrative Cases

A brought a suit upon a bond, and at the trial supported his claim by a letter fabricated for use before a registrar.[58]A is guilty of the offence under s 196 .

A, a debtor, procures B as a witness to swear falsely that he witnessed a payment made by A to his creditor. A is guilty.[59]

A accused B of having assaulted him with a pitna, which he produced, and which bore some red stains alleged by A to be bloodstains. On being chemically examined, it was found that the stains were not of blood. It was held that A committed an offence under this section.[60]

A, a minor, was present at the time a false swearing was committed in his favour. It did not appear that he was concerned in procuring such evidence. It was held that A had no guilty knowledge and was therefore not liable.[61]

9. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable. It is bailable or non-bailable depending on whether the offence of giving such evidence is bailable or non-bailable1478 and is triable by the court by which the offence of giving or fabricating false evidence is triable.[62]

In other words, if the giving or fabricating of false evidence, which is corruptly used or attempted to be used, is punishable under s 193, the offence under this section is bailable and triable by a magistrate. The period of limitation for taking cognizance of such offence is three years if the offence falls under para 2 of that section. In case such offence is punishable under s 194 or s 195, the offence under this section is non-bailable and is triable by the court of session. There is no period of limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section if the offence of giving or fabricating false evidence, which is used, is punishable under para 1 of s 193 or under s 194 or s 195 of this Code.

Where the income tax department instituted a prosecution against the assessee under ss 276(c) and 277 of the Income Tax Act and under ss 193 and 196 of the Penal Code, the prosecutions are maintainable and the pendency of the reassessment proceedings cannot act as a bar to the institution of such criminal prosecution.[63]

10. Complaint by Court

In view of the prohibition contained in cl (b) of s 195(1), CrPC the cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken only on the written complaint of the court if it is committed in, or in relation to, any proceeding of that court. The provisions of s 195, CrPC are mandatory. Registration of a case against a public servant under ss 196 and 208, IPC without following the proceedings of ss 195 and 240, CrPC was illegal and as such the proceedings were quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[64]

Where the offence, under this section, has been committed before an income tax officer, the magistrate can take cognizance of the offence, as the income-tax officer has been held to be a court.[65]

Where on the court's direction to hold an inquiry, a deputy superintendent of police reported that the girl produced before the court was not the girl whose production was directed, the custodian, by producing another girl, evidently gave false evidence with a view to mislead the court to make it believe that the girl produced was the petitioner's daughter. It was held that the conduct of the custodian is one which immediately attracted ss 193, 196, 199 and 201 of the IPC . These offences, however, are covered by s 195 of the CrPC, which states that no court shall take cognizance of such an offence except on the complaint in writing by that court, or some other court to which that court is subordinate, when such offence is alleged to have been committed in or in relation to, to any proceedings in any court. Therefore, a direction was given to the registrar to lodge a complaint against the custodian.[66]1479

11. Distinction between Sections 463, 465 and 471 and Sections 193 and 196, IPC

The gist of this provision is that an offence of forgery of a document as described in s 463, IPC and of using such forged documents, if produced or given in evidence by a person other than a party to a proceeding in a court, do not require a complaint in writing by the court concerned, but prosecution in respect of offences under ss 193 - 196, 199 and 200 (among others), committed in a judicial proceeding by a person (whether a party or not), requires a complaint in writing of the court before which the offence is committed or of some other court to which such court is subordinate. It is this difference which has apparently induced the selection of ss 463 - 471 rather than ss 193 to 196, IPC . The former do not require a complaint by the court but the latter do, and this is the main point of controversy before us also.[67] The broad distinction between offences under the two groups is that s 405 deals with an offence of forgery by making of a false document and s 471 with the offence of using forged document dishonestly or fraudulently. Section 193 deals with the giving or fabricating of false evidence and s 196 with corruptly using evidence known to be false. The gist of the offences in the first group is in the making of a false document and the gist of the offences in the second group is in the procuring of a false circumstance or the making of a document containing a false statement so that a judicial officer may form a wrong opinion in a judicial proceeding on the faith of the false evidence. Another important difference is that whereas s 471 requires a user to be either fraudulent, dishonest or both, s 196 is satisfied if the user is corrupt. The IPC defines the expressions 'fraudulently' and 'dishonestly' but not the expression 'corruptly'.[68]

12. Charge

The charge should specify whether the accused used or attempted to use the false or fabricated evidence.[69]

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused), as follows:
> That you, (*) on or about the .....day of.....at.....corruptly used (or attempted to use) as true or genuine evidence, the evidence, to wit.....which you knew to be false (or fabricated) and as such punishable under s 193 (or 194 or 195) of the Indian Penal Code, and thereby committed an offence under s 196 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

13. Proof

The prosecution has to prove that:

(a) the accused used or attempted to use some evidence;
(b) it was false or fabricated;
(c) he used or attempted to use such evidence as true or genuine evidence;
(d) he then knew it to be false or fabricated evidence; and
(e) he used or attempted to use it corruptly.1480

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 197.

Issuing or signing false certificate.--

Whoever issues or signs any certificate required by law to be given or signed, or relating to any fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence, knowing or believing that such certificate is false in any material point, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

Comments

1. Scope

Sections 197 and 198, IPC relate to false certificates. This section penalises issuing or signing a false certificate and the next section penalises its use as a true one. The offence is similar to the giving or fabricating of false evidence. In order to constitute the offence under this section (a) the certificate must be one required by law to be given or signed, or it must relate to any fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence, and (b) it must be given or signed knowing or believing that it is false on a material point.

2. 'Issues'--Meaning of

As the words 'required by law to be given or signed' show, the word 'issues' simply means 'gives' or 'delivers'.

3. 'Any Certificate'--What is?

A 'certificate' is a testimony given in writing to declare or verify the truth of anything.[70]The word 'certify' means primarily, to assure, to vouch, to make certain. Every act of certifying does not necessarily result in a 'certificate', meaning thereby a signed document vouching a particular fact. The word 'certificate' may no doubt be used as synonymous with 'certification'[71] but that is clearly not its meaning in ss 197 and 198 .

The certificate contemplated by this section is a certificate which is required by law to be given or signed for use in the course of administration of justice.[72]

As per s 197, a certificate contemplated therein is a certificate, which is required not to be given or signed for the use in the court's administration of justice.[73]1481

In order that a statement in writing may amount to a certificate within the meaning of s 197, IPC, it would not be sufficient that the makes of the certificate should describe it as a certificate. In order to treat such a statement as a certificate it would be necessary that there should be a law requiring the issue of such certificate or providing that such written statement may be treated as a legal statement without formal proof and without formal scrutiny.[74]

4. Requisites of such Certificates--Documents which are not Certificate

The certificate issued should be as required by some law and it has some reference to some statutory requirements.[75] The certificate in respect of which a man may be punished, if it is false to his knowledge or belief, must be either (a) one which is required by law to be given or signed, or (b) one which relates to any fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence. One or other of these requirements must be fulfilled before a man can be dealt with under ss 197 and 198 .[76] The certificate contemplated by this section is a certificate which is required by law to be given or signed for the purpose of being used in evidence in the course of administration of justice. The offence of issuing a false certificate is one which is intimately connected with the administration of justice.[77] Various instances are given in textbooks of the class of certificates contemplated by these sections. They are no doubt for the most part official or quasi-official certificates, to be given by officials or others, as prescribed in various statues. There is, however, no particular limitation to the character of the certificate meant, except that which we find in the section itself. It must fulfil one of the requirements there set out. If it does not, a man cannot be punished under these sections in respect of it. Thus, a signed petition filed in a court by the accused purporting to represent the decree-holder and falsely stating that the judgment-debtor had paid off the decretal amount to the decree-holder, is not a certificate within the meaning of this section, as there is no provision of law which requires a decree-holder or his agent to give or sign a certificate of payment or adjustment. Nor is there any provision of law which makes the statement of the decree-holder or his agent as to the payment or satisfactionadmissible in evidence as such a certificate, that is, without further proof.[78] A written statement, filed in a civil suit, is also not a certificate within the meaning of this section.[79]

5. Statement Amounting to or not Amounting to Certificate under Section 197 , IPC

There is substantial distinction between a mere statement in writing not amounting to a certificate contemplated by s 197, IPC and a statement in writing amounting to a certificate contemplated by s 197, IPC . The distinction between the statements in writing not amounting to certificate and the statement in writing amounting to certificate, is that the former cannot be used as legal evidence of the facts mentioned in the certificate, but the statement in writing which amounts to a certificate can be1482 used as legal evidence of the facts mentioned in the certificate. Having this distinction in view between the two statements in writing, one which can be used as evidence without any formal proof and the other which cannot be used as legal formal proof is given according to law and the statement is subjected to scrutiny by cross-examination or otherwise, it would be proper to hold that no statement in writing can amount to a certificate within the meaning of s 197, IPC unless the law enacted by a competent legislature permits the issue of such a certificate or provides that the certificate shall be receivable as legal evidence of the fact mentioned therein. The mere fact that the document is described as a certificate does not make it a certificate in the eyes of law. This distinction must be kept in view by all those persons who have to deal with written statements of other persons. The hazard of dispensing with formal proof and the necessity of scrutinising the veracity of the statements cannot be overestimated, particularly when unscrupulous persons frequently indulge in making false certificates for the purpose of obtaining wrongful gain or causing wrongful loss to others.[80]

6. 'Required by Law to be Given or Signed'--Meaning of

The phrase 'required by law', occurring in this section, has reference to some statutory requirement.[81]Several Acts of the legislature provide for such certificates. A certificate issued by a registered medical practitioner is required by s 509 of the Calcutta Municipal Act 1951 to be given before a corpse can be interned or cremated.[82] A certificate may be given by the administrator-general,[83] entitling the claimant to the estate of a deceased person to recover any sum belonging to him up to the extent of Rs 1,000. A similar certificate may be given by a court under the Indian Succession Act,[84] which has the effect of indemnifying all persons making payments on its strength.[85] The registrar of companies is empowered to issue a certificate of incorporation.[86] Section 61 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act[87] provides for the giving of a marriage certificate. The registrar of assurances is, on completion of the registration of an assurance, empowered to indorse thereon a certificate containing the word 'registered'. 'Such certificate shall be signed, sealed and dated by the registering officer and shall then be admissible for the purpose of proving that the document has been duly registered in the manner provided by the Registration Act, and that the facts mentioned in the endorsements, referred to in s 59 (of the said Act) have occurred as therein mentioned'.[88]

In a case, the petitioner, a qualified doctor, had issued a certificate which he knew to be false in respect of the death of a person under s 509 of the Calcutta Municipal Act, to satisfy the authorities of the burning ghat that the death was not due to any unnatural causes. By virtue of the provisions of the Calcutta Municipal Act, that certificate is admissible in evidence without further proof and the petitioner can be successfully prosecuted under this section.[89]1483

A civil court may certify a payment of adjustment of a decree made out of court,[1] or grant a certificate of sale to an auction-purchaser,[2] or of a case being a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court.[3]

A person giving a certificate which is not required by law to be given or signed, may be convicted for giving false information to a public servant but not under this section.[4]

A copyist preparing an incorrect copy of a document and thereby enabling the applicant of the copy to use it in a suit would be liable to be convicted under this section and not under s 167 .[5]

A certificate given under r 18 of the rules framed under s 14 of the Government Savings Bank Act,[6] is not a certificate required by law to be given or signed for the purpose of being used in evidence in the course of administration of justice and is not covered by this section.[7] A caste certificate issued by a member of legislative assembly for the purpose of enabling the students to obtain pre-matric scholarships without specifying the caste or tribe of the applicant cannot be held to be a certificate within the meaning of s 197 of the Indian Penal Code . The expression 'required by law' refers to some statutory requirements and there being no statutory requirement requiring the member of legislative assembly to issue the certificates in question, s 197 cannot have any application.[8]

7. Certificate Relating to any fact of which such Certificate is by law Admissible in Evidence on any Material Point

What this expression contemplates is that the certificate should, by some provision of law, be admissible in evidence as such a certificate without further proof. A certificate issued by the chairman of a municipality is not such a certificate as it cannot be used in evidence unless it is formally proved by the chairman.[9] Similarly, a medical certificate is not admissible in evidence without further proof. Consequently, the issuing and uses of a medical certificate, in a criminal proceeding stating, contrary to the fact, that the accused was ill would render neither the accused nor the issuer of the certificate liable under s 197 or s 198 .[10]

Where a false medical certificate is obtained from a doctor for the purpose of a life insurance by a false personation of the real person, who intends to apply for a policy of life insurance and the doctor issues such a medical certificate of fitness in ignorance of the false personation, the doctor is not guilty under this section.[11] The principal of a college gave a certificate in respect of the age of a student so that he may take part in sports. The principal was not required by any law to give such a1484 certificate and therefore, he cannot be said to have committed an offence under s 197 .[12]

8. 'Knowing or Believing it to be False in any Material Point'--Meaning of

For a conviction under this section, the certificate must be false on a material point, and the person issuing or signing it, must do so knowing or believing that the certificate is false on a material point. In the absence of such knowledge or belief, a person cannot be convicted of this offence or its abetment.[13] It may be noted that under s 79 of the Evidence Act, there is a presumption of the genuineness of a certificate issued by an officer of the government but that presumption does not extend to its truth or falsity.

9. Certificate Issued in Good Faith on the Basis of Earlier Certificate

Where the accused Sarpanch issuing a false certificate stated therein that the complainant had died, however, the said certificate was issued on the basis of earlier certificate issued by a former Sarpanch in which the complainant was shown as dead, it can be said that the accused issued certificate in good faith and he was not aware that it was false. On these facts the accused was held entitled to acquittal.[14]

10. Procedure

An offence under this section is non-cognizable, but a warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by the court by which the offence of giving false evidence is triable. See also commentary on the previous section. For the purposes of limitation s 468, CrPC may be referred to.

No complaint by any court is required for the prosecution of a person under this section.

11. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of .....at.....issued (or signed) a certificate required by law to be given (or signed) (or relating to a fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence) which was false in a material point, to wit.....and known or believed by you to be false and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 197 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

12. Proof

To obtain a conviction under this section the following points have to be proved:

(a) that the accused issued or signed a certificate;
(b) that the certificate was required by law to be given or signed, or that it related to a fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence;1485
(c) that the certificate is false in any material point; and
(d) that the accused issued or signed the certificate knowing or believing it to be false in any material point.

13. Punishment

A person committing an offence under this section and s 198, IPC is punishable in the same manner as if he had given false evidence. Sections 193, 194 and 195 of this Code prescribed the punishment for giving false evidence, the severety of the punishment depending on the intention of the giver and the nature of the proceedings where it is given. A certificate, say a succession certification, may be required to be filed in a court or/and in any bank post office or any other office. After such a certificate is issued, which is false in any material point, it may not be used at all by the person in whose favour it is issued, for fear of prosecution under s 198, IPC . A marriage certificate issued by the marriage officer falsely showing the minor girl as a major to validate her marriage, may not be required to be produced anywhere by the parties to the marriage, at being obtained only by way of abundant precaution. A difficulty may arise in such cases in ascertaining the exact amount of punishment prescribed by law for issuing or signing a certificate which is not used at all for any reason. The offence committed by the presiding officer of a court or other authority under this section, or its gravity, cannot remain suspended till the certificate, so issued, is used. The commission of an offence under this section is also not subject to the fulfilment of any subsequent condition. Thus, there appears to be some ambiguity in this section in this respect.

Following the rule of harmonious interpretation of statutes, it is stated that in case it is apparent from the nature of the certificate, attending circumstances and the intrinsic evidence if any, that it has been issued or signed for being produced in any judicial proceeding, the offence may fall under para 1 of s 193 or under s 194 or s 195, IPC and may be punishable accordingly. On the other hand, if it appears to have been issued or signed for producing in any other case or it is not ascertainable as for what purpose it has been so issued or signed, the offender should be liable to be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years and also with a fine under the second paragraph of s 193, IPC .

Where the amount of an alleged evasion of tax on the income of Rs 16,000 was meagre, without going into the merits of the case, the complaint filed under ss 276(c)(1) and 277 of the Income Tax Act, 1961 and s 197 read with s 120-B, IPC for the assessment year 1982-83 was quashed, as even according to the instructions of the board, the prosecution in cases where the income concealed is less than Rs 25,000 is not warranted now.[15] But the pendency of a civil suit with respect of forged documents cannot be a ground for quashing the complaint under ss 193, 196, 197, 406, 465, 468, 471, IPC by invoking s 482, CrPC as the onus of proving the allegations beyond a reasonable doubt in criminal cases is not applicable in civil proceeding, which can be decided merely on the basis of probabilities with respect to the acts complained of.[16]1486

S. 198.

Using as true a certificate known to be false.--

Whoever, corruptly uses or attempts to use any such certificate as a true certificate, knowing the same to be false in any material point, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

Comments

1. Scope

Section 198 must be read with the last section. The words 'such certificate', occurring in this section, refer to the certificate contemplated in s 197 .[17] The last section dealt with the issuing or signing of a false certificate and this section deals with using it corruptly. The certificate which is referred to in this section, must be one which is either required by law to be given or signed or is by law admissible in evidence.[18]

The section penalises not only corruptly using, but even the attempt to use a false certificate, knowing it to be false. In the absence of such knowledge a prosecution under this section is misconceived.[19] If the falsity of the certificate is not established, its use cannot attract this section.[20]

2. Meaning of 'Corruptly'

The commentary under s 196 may be referred to.

3. Procedure

The procedure to be followed under this section is the same as in the case of an offence under s 17 . A delay in the prosecution and trial may be fatal.[21]

4. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of .....at.....corruptly used (or attempted to use) as true a certificate required by law to be given and signed (or relating to fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence), which was false in a material point, to wit.....and known or believed by you to be the same, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 8 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Where a false certificate was issued by the co-accused, the head of the institution, to the accused, enabling her to obtain an appointment as 'Pracheta', the headmaster not1487 being authorised by law to issue such a certificate, the same cannot be admissible as legal evidence of facts mentioned therein, but since the accused used the said certificate to obtain an appointment, a prime facie charge under s 198, IPC would be said to be made out against the accused.[22]

5. Proof

The following points have to be proved to establish a charge under this section:

(a) that the document in question purports to be a certificate;
(b) that it was either required by law to be given or signed, or that it related to some fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence;
(c) that the certificate is false on a material point;
(d) that the accused used or attempted to use such certificate;
(e) that he did so corruptly; and
(f) that he so used it knowing or believing it to be false in a material point.

Where it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that the accused used a duplicate certificate with some changes as a true certificate, knowing it to be false in material particulars and thereby got admission, a conviction of the accused under ss 198, 420 and 471, IPC was found proper but keeping in view the nature of the offence and that the accused's past and present record had been good and the fact that he had already lost his career and was now married, the Apex Court reduced the sentence to that already undergone.[23]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 199.

False statement made in declaration which is by law receivable as evidence.--

Whoever, in any declaration made or subscribed by him, which declaration any Court of Justice, or any public servant or other person, is bound or authorised by law to receive as evidence of any fact, makes any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, touching any point material to the object for which the declaration is made or used, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.1488

1 Scope

This and the next section deal with declarations as ss 197 and 198, IPC deal with certificates. This section penalises the making of a false statement in a declaration and the next section penalises the using as true of such a declaration knowing it to be false. This section subjects any person, who makes a false declaration, which declaration may be used as an evidence of the matters stated in it, to the penalties for perjury.[24] It is intended to make the penalty attached to this offence of giving of false evidence applicable to declarations which, although not compellable, have, on being made, the same effect as the compulsory declarations referred to in ss 51 and 191 .[25] In other words, the section intends to extend the penalty attached to compulsory declarations referred to in ss 51 and 191, IPC, to voluntary declarations also, provided that such declarations are capable of being used as evidence. A court of justice cannot use any declarations as evidence, unless they are of the nature of declarations contemplated in O 19 of the CPC 1908,[26]i.e., in the form of affidavits. Declarations or verified statements are of two kinds: (a) declarations which a person is bound by law to make, such as the verification of pleadings under the CPC; and (b) declarations which a person makes for the purpose of their being used as evidence, such as affidavits filed under O 19 of the CPC. Of these, the second kind of declarations alone can be used as evidence and can form the basis of a conviction for an offence under s 199 .[27] This section is wider than s 192, and applies to every kind of affidavit which the court is bound or authorised to receive by the CPC or by circular orders of the High Court.[28] Under O 38 of the CPC, evidence may be given by an affidavit in support of an application for attachment before judgment and if such an affidavit is intended to be used in a judicial proceeding before a court of justice, and the declarant has made a statement for which the affidavit is to be used, the declarant will be guilty of an offence under s 199 .[29]

Where false affidavits were sworn to obtain a leave and licence to run a sales counter granted on compassionate grounds, a direction was issued by the Apex Court to the notary to show cause why he should not be prosecuted and punished for attesting a false affidavit furnished by the respondent. No such notary, however, was found available in Tis Hazari Court, Delhi. Then direction was given to the respondent through his counsel, to name the oath commissioner who had allegedly attested the affidavits. No response was received from the respondent, and consequently, the respondent who had given a false affidavit in the court was1489 convicted under s 199, IPC for producing false certificates and false affidavits and was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 6 months in addition to the payment of a fine of Rs 1,000 and in default to undergo a further sentence of six weeks.[30]

Where a rent control petition was dismissed in default, the plea taken by the petitioner was that he was out of station and could not appear before the court on the stipulated date. However, an affidavit sworn by him before the other court in the same town, on the same date, indicated his presence in the town. On a complaint being filed against him, the petitioner was convicted under ss 199 and 200, IPC . On these facts it was held that the oral evidence by the petitioner against the contents of the affidavit cannot be accepted, the conviction of the petitioner under ss 199 and 200, IPC was found proper.[31]

Neither s 192, IPC, incorporate the principle of vicarious liability, and therefore, it was incumbent on the complainant to specifically aver the role of each of the accused in the complaint.[32]

2. Analogous Law

This section is somewhat analogous to s 5 of the English Perjury Act 1911,[33] which runs as follows:

> S. 5 . False statutory declarations and other false statements without oath.--If any person knowingly and wilfully makes (otherwise than on oath) a statement false in a material particular, and the statement is made
> (a) in a statutory declaration; or
> (b) in an abstract, account, balance-sheet, book, certificate, declaration, entry, estimate, inventory, notice, report, return or other document which he is authorised or required to make, attest, or verify, by any public general act of parliament for the time being in force; or
> (c) in any oral declaration or oral answer which he is required to make by, under, or in pursuance of any public general Act of Parliament for the time being in force,
> He shall be guilty of a misdemeanour and shall be liable on conviction thereof on indictment to imprisonment.....for any term not exceeding two years, or to a fine or to both such imprisonment and fine.

By s 15(2) of the same Act, a statutory declaration is defined as follows:

> ...
> (2) In this Act--

...

The expression "statutory declaration" means a declaration made by virtue of the Statutory Declarations Act 1835, or of any Act, Order-in-Council, rule or regulation applying or extending the provisions thereof.1490

3. Swearing in False Affidavit

In Baban Singh v Jagdish Singh ,[34] the Supreme Court has, however, ruled that the swearing of false affidavits constitutes an offence under ss 191 and 192, and not under this section. In its view the offence defined by s 191 is constituted by swearing falsely when one is bound by oath to state the truth. An affidavit is a declaration made under an oath. The definition of the offence of giving false evidence thus applies to affidavits also. The offence may also fall within the ambit s 192 . It was held that the offence of making false declarations in the affidavits tendered in a court, to be taken into consideration as evidence in a judicial proceeding, came within the words of ss 191 and 192 rather than s 199 of the IPC . All decisions to the contrary are, therefore, no longer good law.

4. Verified Applications

Apparently, there is no express provision of law which binds or authorises a court to receive a verified application as 'evidence of any fact' although for the purposes of ss 191 and 193, a false averment in such an application is regarded as a false evidence. Such applications are, therefore, not covered by this section.[35]

5. Ingredients of an Offence under Section 199

The ingredients to constitute an offence under this section are:

(a) making of a declaration which a court or a public servant or other person is bound or authorised by law to receive in evidence;
(b) making of a false statement in such declaration knowing or believing it to be false; and
(c) such false statement should be touching any point material to the object for which the declaration is used.[36]

6. Intention is an Important Ingredient

For an offence under ss 199 or 200 of this Code the punishment is in the same manner as if the accused gave false evidence under s 193 of the Code. The primary ingredients of s 193 of the Code is intentionally giving false evidence at any stage of judicial proceedings or intentionally fabricating false evidence for the purpose of being used in any stage of judicial proceedings. Thus, the intention is also a major ingredient for the offence under ss 199 or 200 of the Code.[37]

7. Reckless Statement--when it does or does not Constitute an Offence

The section requires three essentials--(a) making of a declaration which a court or a public servant is bound or authorised by law to receive in evidence, (b) making of a false statement in such declaration knowing or believing it to be false, and (c) such1491 false statement should be touching any point material to the object for which the declaration is made or used. There must be a deliberate false statement. Statements made in a reckless and haphazard manner, though untrue in fact, may not constitute any offence when the person, making such statements, immediately admits the mistake and corrects the statement. If, however, a person makes a reckless and false allegation against a judge in his affidavit, he lays himself open to a prosecution under this section.[38]

8. Section 199 and Section 200

In order to attract s 200 the declaration has not only to be false, but also one which any court of justice or public servant is bound or authorised by law to receive as evidence. Section 199 , IPC makes punishable, the making of a false declaration whereas, s 200 punishes the use of or an attempt to use a false declaration. To attract the application of this section, the declaration must be used or attempted to be used corruptly.[39] The words 'such declaration' appearing in s 200, have reference to the declaration dealt with by s 199, with all its requirements. Section 199 deals with a declaration which a person is not bound under the law to make, but which if made, is admissible under an express provision of law in evidence and the facts declared without any further proof. It is possible, as stated already, that in some cases the declaration may be both, one which a person is bound by law to make as well as one which by law is receivable as evidence as part of the facts stated therein without any other proof.[40] In order to fall within the purview of s 200, the declaration must not only be false but also receivable by law as evidence by a court of justice or a public servant or other persons.[41]

9. Similarity with Section 193

The offence under ss 199 or 200, IPC, the punishment is in the same manner as if the accused gave false evidence under s 193 of IPC . The primary ingredient of s 193 of IPC is intentionally giving false evidence in any stage of judicial proceedings or intentionally fabricating false evidence for the purpose of being used in any stage of the judicial proceedings. Thus, the intention is also a major ingredient for the offence under s 199 or s 200 of the IPC .[42]

10. Section 199 and Sections 191, 193 Distinguished

The distinction between the two provisions insofar as the making of the declaration is concerned, is that under s 193, read with s 191, the declaration is one in which a person is bound, by oath or by an express provision of law, to state the truth, or, being bound, by law, to make a declaration upon any subject, makes a statement which is false. The declaration contemplated in s 199 is not necessarily one which the person making the declaration is bound, by law, to make. The essential element of an offence under s 199 is that the declaration, containing the false statement, must be one which any court of justice or any public servant or other person is bound or1492 authorised, by law, to receive as evidence of any fact.[43] In the words of the Supreme Court[44] the difference between ss 191 and 199 is as follows:

> Section 191 deals with statements and declarations falsely made by a person legally bound by an oath or express provision of law to state the truth. Section 199 deals with statements and declarations made voluntarily provided they are capable of being used as evidence and which court is bound to receive as evidence.

> Section 199 deals with a declaration and does not state that the declaration must be on oath. The only condition necessary is that the declaration must be capable of being used as evidence and which any court of justice, or any public servant or other person, is bound or authorised by law to receive as evidence. Section 191 deals with evidence on oath.

11. 'Declaration'--Meaning of

The declaration contemplated in this section, as explained in the Madras case of A Vedamutu,[45]is a statement of fact in the form simply of a declaration, which, for the purpose of proof of the fact declared, has, by itself, all the legal force of evidence given on oath or solemn affirmation. It must be a declaration which, having been made, is afterwards receivable as evidence of the fact declared. Examples of the kind of declarations contemplated in this section are affidavits in civil suits, statutory certificates under s 2 of the Banker's Book Evidence Act, and declarations and certificates under the Special Marriage Act 1872.[46] A declaration may be in an affidavit in cases in which evidence may be given by affidavit.[47] In view of the explanation to s 200, an affidavit, not fully complying with the provisions of O 11, r 3 of the CPC is more or less a declaration within the meaning of this section.[48] There is no provision of law which makes the recitals made in a sale-deed admissible as evidence of any fact by any court of justice or any public servant. It has accordingly been held that the alleged declaration in the sale deed will not be a declaration within the meaning of s 199, IPC .[49]

12. Identification of a Surety by a Lawyer is not a Declaration

A declaration by a lawyer to identify a person, for the purposes of acceptance of such person as surety, is not a declaration which a court is bound or authorised by law to receive as evidence within the meaning of s 199, IPC . It is necessary that the declaration must be admissible in evidence as proof of the fact declared under any law, in consequence of which the court is bound or authorised to receive it as such. It is not enough that there is no prohibition against the reception of such a declaration as evidence by the court. No law provides for a declaration of the identity of a surety by a lawyer; it is a matter wholly discretionary with the court, and, in appropriate cases, the court is fully competent to reject such a declaration.[50]1493

13. A Declaration need not be on Oath

A declaration contemplated in this section, need not be on oath. But it must be capable of being used as evidence and which any court of justice or any public servant or other person is bound or authorised by law to receive as evidence.[51] Where a person, in swearing an affidavit, only repeats what another person had written on a notice,[52] or what the prosecution witnesses say,[53] it will not have the same effect as of swearing a false affidavit. This section has no reference to the examination of a witness in a judicial proceeding.[54] False statements in applications for execution are not punishable under this section but they are under s 193 .[55] A person who makes false statements in the course of a voluntary declaration in the shape of an affidavit to a magistrate, cannot be charged under either s 199 or s 193, though the magistrate administers an oath to him, such a course being ultra vires.[56] A false report made to a revenue surveyor for a mutation of names in the revenue register is not a declaration within the meaning of this section.[57] Making, signing or attesting false declarations or certificates of marriage are punishable under s 199, read with s 21 of the Special Marriage Act. Where a person, not being the natural or legal guardian of a girl, subscribed to a declaration by her that the consent of her guardian to her marriage, as required by s 2(3) of the Special Marriage Act 3 of 1872, had been obtained, it was held that he was guilty of the offence under this section read with s 21 of the Special Marriage Act.[58]

14. 'Made or subscribed'--Meaning of

According to the Oxford Dictionary the word 'subscribe' means to write one's name at the foot of or sign a document, picture etc, express one's adhesion to an opinion or resolution. According to Aiyar's Judicial Dictionary,[59] 'subscribe' means 'to write under'; 'to make oneself liable for some thing'. In Shabbir v State ,[60] the Allahabad High Court has observed that the word 'subscribed' would show that the statement made on oath orally should be reduced to writing and be signed by the person making it in token of his adhesion to what is written. The word is not co-related with the particular form but with what is said in the oath and what is reproduced in writing.

A verbal declaration may be made, but when reduced to writing, it must be subscribed by the person making it in token of the correctness of the facts contained therein.

15. 'Bound or Authorised by law to Receive as Evidence'--Documents Fulfilling the Requirements

A declaration, before it can be made the foundation of a prosecution under this section, must be one which is admissible in evidence, and which the court before which it is1494 filed, is bound or authorised by law to receive in evidence. The mere fact that there is no prohibition against the reception of such declaration in evidence does not render it admissible or the declarant amendable to the provisions of this section.[61] Where the declaration contained in the affidavit in question is not of the type mentioned in ss 199 and 200, IPC, i.e., it is not a declaration which any court or public servant or any other person is bound or authorised by law to receive as evidence of any fact, the petitioner could not be said to have committed any offence falling under s 199 or s 200 of the IPC, even if that declaration was false to the petitioner's knowledge. The charge framed against the petitioner under ss 199 and 200, IPC, in such a case, cannot be sustained.[62]Where the false declarations were made with a view to facilitate an offence under Imports and Exports (Control) Act, the false declarations were not such as would be received as evidence of facts before any court or public servant, and so it was held that no offence under s 193 or s 199, IPC is made out.[63]

An affidavit sworn to in the court of a munsif is a declaration which a court of justice is bound to receive as evidence of the facts stated in it.[64] Before effecting a mutation, the officer of DDA is authorised by law, to seek and receive information regarding legal heirs of the allottee, the declaration in that behalf prima facie falls within the ambit of s 199, IPC .[65]

The statements in a petition of insolvency are very analogous to statements made in ordinary civil pleadings--statements which are verified by law on the part of the person who places them on the record. But they certainly do not constitute evidence which is bound to be accepted by the court.[66]

Neither under Act I of 1876, nor under any other law, is a Mahommadan registrar of marriages bound or authorised to receive the statements of any person in evidence. Therefore, this section does not apply to them.[67]

There is no provision of law authorising the use of affidavits, or the administration of an oath to a person called upon by a district judge to show cause as to why he should not hand over the papers relating to some property over which a common manager has been appointed under the Bengal Tenancy Act 1885.[68]

16. Swearing False Affidavit before an Unauthorised Magistrate or Oath Commissioner--No Offence Committed

Except as specifically provided,[69] the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 does not contain a general provision to prove a matter by affidavits. It has been held that1495 affidavits filed in support of an application for the transfer of a case cannot, therefore, form the subject of a charge under this section.[70] An affidavit sworn before a magistrate having no jurisdiction in the particular matter to which it relates, is not admissible in evidence and the person swearing it cannot be prosecuted under ss 193 or 199 .[71] Similarly, where an accused swore an affidavit before an oath commissioner, who was not authorised to administer an oath, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under s 199 because such an affidavit was not admissible in evidence.[72]

17. 'Knows or Believes to be False'--Burden of Proof

In order to convict a person under this section, the prosecution has to prove that he either knew or believed his statement to be false or that he did not believe it to be true. If there was a reasonable possibility that the defence story was true, then these essential ingredients of the prosecution case would not be established.[73] The burden of proof is clearly on the prosecution to show that at the time of making the affidavit, the accused either knew or believed it to be false, or did not believe it to be true, and it is not upon the accused to prove the correctness of the statement and his good faith in making it.[74] The prosecution must bear the burden of proving every ingredient which is comprised in the definition. And the difficulty in proving the ingredients of an offence is no good reason for exempting the prosecution from the duty of proving them before a conviction is recorded.[75] The ingredients of the offence are, however, to be established at the trial, and not at the stage when cognizance is taken.[76]

'Or does not believe it to be true', e.g., swearing to the truth of the contents of a false document, without knowing what the contents are, because of an ignorance of the language, which is not translated.[77]

18. Touching any Point Material to the Object

To hold a person liable under this section for making or subscribing to a false declaration, it is necessary to prove that the said declaration is touching a point material to the object for which the declaration has been made. Where the accused, in a petition under O 1, r 10, CPC gave a wrong date of birth of his son, but the wrong date of birth did not touch any material point involved in the suits and he stood to gain no advantage by giving a wrong date, it was held that no offence under s 199, IPC was committed.[78]1496

19. Procedure

The procedure to be followed is the same as in the case of an offence under s 197 .

Where the complaint was made under s 199, IPC on the ground that certain averments made in the affidavits filed before a rent control officer were false but no specific averment was singled out in the complaint, the complaint was held not entertainable.[79]

20. Complaint

Under s 195(1)(b)(i) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, no court shall take cognizance of an offence under s 199 when such an offence is alleged to have been committed in or in relation to, any proceeding in any court, except on the complaint in writing of that court, or of some other court to which that court is subordinate.

When it is alleged that a false statement has been made in a declaration which is receivable as evidence in any court of justice or before any public servant or other person, the statement alleged to be false has to be set out and its alleged falsity with reference to the truth, found in some document, has to be referred to, pointing out that the two situations cannot co-exist, both being attributable to the same person and, therefore, one to his knowledge must be false. Rival contentions set out in affidavits, accepted or rejected by courts, with reference to onus probandi do not furnish foundation for a charge under s 199, IPC . Acceptance or rejection of evidence by itself is not a sufficient yardstick to dub the one rejected as false. Falsity can be alleged when truth stands out glaringly and to the knowledge of the person who is making the false statement. Day in and day out in courts, averments made by one set of witnesses are accepted and the counter averments are rejected. If in all such cases, complaints under s 199, IPC, are to be filed, not only will they open up floodgates of litigation but it would unquestionably be an abuse of the process of the court.[80]

The view that no procedings can be initiated under s 340 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 if a document is forged before its production before a court would not apply in case where offence under s 199 or s 200, IPC is made out during consideration of the application under s 340 .[81]

21. Section 195 , CrPC not attracted to other Offences Clubbed with Sections 199 and 200, IPC

In one case, the offences under ss 199 and 200, IPC as mentioned in the private complaint, related to separate transactions, which were separable from the main offence alleged to have been committed by the accused in some other transaction. Then embargo under s 195, CrPC was not held to be applicable for other offences except under ss 199 and 200, IPC .[82]

Therefore, when the lower court discharged the accused of the offences under ss 166, 167, 199, 200, 213, 344, 345, 347, 379, 380, 387, 323, 448, 506(2), IPC read1497 with s 34, IPC merely on the basis that under s 195, CrPC, the court cannot take cognizance in respect of offences under ss 199 and 200, IPC the order passed by the lower court discharging the accused in respect of all the offences was held to suffer from infirmity and was set aside. The case was remitted back to the trial court to proceed with the trial against the accused in respect of the remaining offences.[83]

For further discussion on this topic, the commentary under s 193 may be referred to.

22. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, (*) on about the..... day of..... at..... made (or subscribed) a declaration, which a court of justice to wit....., (or any public servant or other person to wit.....) was bound (or authorised by law) to receive as evidence of a fact, and therein you made a statement, to wit..... which is false, and which you knew or believed to be false (or did not believe to be true), on a point material to the object, for which the declaration was made (or used), and thereby committed an offence under section 199 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

23. Rival Contentions do not Furnish Foundation for a charge

Rival contentions set out in affidavits, accepted or rejected by courts, with reference to onus probandi do not furnish a foundation for a charge under s 199, IPC . Acceptance or rejection of evidence by itself is not a sufficient yardstick to dub the one rejected as false. Falsity can be alleged when truth stands out glaringly and to the knowledge of the person who is making the false statement.[84]

Before a declaration can be made the foundation of charge under s 199, IPC it is necessary that it must be admissible in evidence as proof of the fact declared under any law in consequence of which the court is bound or authorised to receive it as such.[85]

24. Proof

The following points should be proved for establishing an offence under this section:

(a) that the accused made, or subscribed, the declaration in question;
(b) that a court of justice, etc., was bound or authorised to receive such declaration as evidence;
(c) that the accused made the statement in question contained in such declaration;
(d) that such statements is false;
(e) that such false statement touched a point material to the object of such declaration; and1498
(f) that when making such false statement, the accused knew or believed that it was false, or did not believe it to be true.[86]

Mere Making of False Declaration Sufficient--Its use not Material

The mere making of a false declaration is punishable under this section. The fact whether such declaration is or is not used in the evidence is not a relevant consideration under this section.[87]

Conviction for an offence under this section may be based on purely circumstantial evidence.[88]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 200.

Using as true such declaration knowing it to be false.--

Whoever corruptly uses or attempts to use as true any such declaration, knowing the same to be false in any material point, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

Explanation.--A declaration which is inadmissible merely upon the ground of some informality, is a declaration within the meaning of sections 199 and 200 .

Comments

1. Scope

This section penalises the using or attempting to use corruptly, as true, any such declaration as is referred to in s 199, knowing the same to be false on any material point. This section bears the same relation to s 199 as s 198 bears to s 197, IPC .

The ingredients to constitute an offence under this section, are:

(a) that the declaration is false;
(b) that a court of justice, etc. was bound or authorised by law, to receive the same in evidence;
(c) that such declaration is false on a material point;
(d) that the accused made such false declaration or attempted to do so; and
(e) that he did so in the declaration corruptly.[89]

Where a rent control petition was dismissed in default, the plea taken by the petitioner was that he was out of station and could not appear before the court on the stipulated date. However, the affidavit sworn by him before another court in the same1499 town on the same date indicated his presence in the town. On a complaint being filed against him the petitioner was convicted under ss 199 and 200, IPC . On these facts it was held that the oral evidence by the petitioner against the contents of the affidavit cannot be accepted and the conviction of the petitioner under ss 199 and 200, IPC was found proper.[90]

2. 'Corruptly'--Meaning of

Commentary under s 196, ante may be referred to. The declaration must be used corruptly in order to attract the application of s 200, IPC .[91]

3. 'Uses or Attempts to use as true'--Meaning of

The commentary under s 196, ante may be referred to.

4. 'Declaration'--Meaning of

Commentary under s 199, ante may be referred to.

5. 'Knowing the same to be false in any Material Point'--Meaning of

Commentary under s 197, ante may be referred to.

6. Procedure

The procedure to be followed is the same as in the case of an offence under s 197 .

7. Complaint by the Court

As provided by s 195(1)(b)(i), CrPC, cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken only on a complaint in writing of the court concerned when an offence under this section is committed in or in relation to, any proceedings in the court.

In one case, the offences under ss 199 and 200, IPC, as mentioned in the private complaint, related to separate transactions which were separable from the main offences alleged to have been committed by the accused in some other transaction. The embargo under s 195, CrPC was not held to be applicable for other offences except under ss 199 and 200, IPC .[92] Therefore, when the lower court discharged the accused of the offences under ss 166, 167, 199, 200, 213, 344, 345, 347, 379, 380,

387, 323, 448, 506(2), IPC merely on the ground that under s 195, CrPC, the court cannot take cognizance in respect of offences under ss 199 and 200, IPC, the order passed by the lower court discharging the accused in respect of all the offences, was held to suffer from infirmity and was set aside and the case was remitted back to the trial court to proceed with the trial against the accused in respect of the remaining offences.[93] The view that no procedings can be initiated under s 340 1500 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 if a document is forged before its production before a court would not apply in case where offence under s 199 or 200, IPC is made out during consideration of the application under s 340 .[1]

The commentary under s 193, ante may be referred to.

8. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of .....at.....corruptly used (or attempted to use) as true the declaration as is referred to in section 199 of the Indian Penal Code, knowing the same to be false in any material point, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 200 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried, on the said charge, by this court.

9. Proof

The points requiring proof for an offence under this section are:

(a) that there is a declaration such as is referred to in s 199 ;
(b) that the accused used or attempted to use it as true;
(c) that he did so corruptly; and
(d) that he did so knowing the declaration to be false on a material point.

Chapter XI

S. 201.

Causing disappearance of evidence of offence, or giving false information to screen offender.--

Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed, causes any evidence of the commission of that offence to disappear, with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment, or with that intention gives any information respecting the offence which he knows or believes to be false, if a capital offence.--shall, if the offence which he knows or believes to have been committed is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

if punishable with imprisonment for life.--and if the offence is punishable with [2][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

if punishable with less than ten years' imprisonment.--and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment for any term not extending to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of the imprisonment provided for the offence, or with fine, or with both.1501

Comments

1. Scope

Section 201,IPC presents a case of accessory after the fact. 'An accessory after the fact' said Lord Hale, 'may be, where a person knowing a felony to have been committed, receives comforts, or assists the felon'.[3] Therefore, to make an accessory ex post facto it is in the first place requisite that he should know of the felony committed. In the next place, he must receive, relieve, comfort, or assist him. In short, generally any assistance whatever given to a felon to hinder his being apprehended, tried or suffered punishment, makes the assister an accessory. What s 201 requires is that the accused must have had the intention of screening the offender. To put it differently, the intention to screen the offender, must be the primary and sole object of the accused. The fact that the concealment was likely to have that effect is not sufficient, for s 201 speaks of intention as distinct from a mere likelihood.[4]

Sections 191 - 200 dealt with giving or fabricating false evidence. Sections 201 - 209 deal with offences against public justice. Of these, ss 201 - 203 themselves form a group. Section 201 deals with causing the disappearance of evidence or an offence of giving false information to screen the offender, and ss 202 and 203 deal with the giving or omitting to give information regarding the commission of an offence.

For considering the application of ss 201 and 202, the subsequent result of the trial cannot be taken as the basis ie whether the offences were proved or not. It is enough if the fact shows that the evidence was made to disappear and there was an intentional omission in giving information on the basis of the information available at that point of time, indicating that the accused knew or had reason to believe that an offence had been committed.[5] Screening the offender is a pre-requisite of this section and a person cannot be convicted of screening an offender when the offender himself has been tried and acquitted of the offence. Once it is held that the alleged offender is not guilty, any other person cannot be convicted for screening him from punishment.[6]

Provisions of s 201 would not apply to a person who has committed an offence.[7]

2. Analogous Law

Section 201 is an attempt to define the position known in England as that of an accessory after the fact.[8] According to Lord Hale, 'an accessory after the fact may be, where a person knowing a felony to have been committed, receives, relieves,1503 comforts or assists the felon'. Therefore, to make an accessory ex post facto, it is in the first place requisite that he should know of the felony committed. In the next place, he must receive, relieve, comfort or assist him. Besides, generally any assistance whatever given to a felon to hinder his being apprehended, tried or suffering punishment makes the assister an accessory.[9]

3. History of the Section

Aiders and abettors have been classified in English law as accessories before the fact, accessories at the fact, and accessories after the fact. The first two are reached by the Code under the law of abetment. The Indian law commissioners dealt with them as 'subsequent abettors'. But the English law commissioners found no justification for the tripartite division of accession of English law and this was agreed to by the Indian law commissioners, and s 201 with its illustration, which formed s 106 of the original bill as part of the chapter on abetment, was transposed to this place.[10]

4. Policy of the Section Underlined

The offence of an accessory after the fact was never regarded so serious as that of other accessories, as such an accessory might have been moved by feelings of love or pity to assist the felon, in which case his prosecution was seldom ordered, and it was always discouraged. That policy has led to the elimination of that class of offenders from the Code, but there still remained persons whose offence could not be similarly overlooked. There are those who know of the felony committed and that it is complete and still assist the felon not only by relieving, comforting or assisting him, but also by weakening the prosecution against him. Such a case is made punishable by s 201, the policy of which is to prevent such accessories from tampering with justice.[11]

5. Three Groups of Sections Relating to Information

There are three groups of sections in the Code relating to the giving of information. First, ss 118 - 120 deal with the concealment of a design to commit an offence; secondly, ss 176, 177, 181 and 182, IPC deal with the omission of giving information and with the giving of false information, and thirdly, ss 201

- 203 deal with the giving of false information with the intention of screening the offender. Section 201 is intended to include acts to which ss 193 - 196 does not extend and not to include acts falling under those sections.[12]

6. Section Deals with two Offences

Section 201 is designed to penalise attempts to frustrate the course of justice.[13] It deals with two offences:

(a) Causing the disappearance of an offence committed, with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment.1504
(b) Giving false information respecting an offence committed with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment.

In either case the intention must be to screen the offender.[14]

7. Three Important Considerations

There is no law which casts a duty on a criminal to give information which would incriminate himself. Secondly, the language used in ss 201 and 202 does not suggest that the sections would apply to a person who has committed an offence. Thirdly, the phrase 'knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed' clearly indicates that the actual culprit is a person other than the one who knows or has reason to believe that an offence has been committed, as was observed by the Apex Court in the case of Harishchandrasing Sajjansing Rathod v State of Gujarat .[15] In other words, the language of the said section does not suggest that the section would apply to a person who has committed an offence. In this connection, the case in Bhagwan Swarup v State of Rajasthan [16] may well be referred to. Hence, there was no scope for framing charge under s 201, IPC against the accused in this case.[17]

8. Offence Means Real one not Imaginary

The first paragraph of s 201 lays down the essential ingredients of the offence under that section. By the second, third and fourth paragraphs, the measure of the punishment is made to depend upon the gravity of the offence. The word 'offence', wherever used in the first, second, third and fourth paragraphs, means some real offence, which, in fact, has been committed and not some offence which the accused imagines has been committed. The punishment depends upon the gravity of the offence which was committed by the offender intending to be screened and which the accused knew or had reason to believe to have been committed.[18]

9. Section 201 and Section 313,CrPC

Where some incriminating material appearing in the prosecution evidence against some accused who were charged for an offence under s 201, IPC only, was not put to them in their statements recorded under s 313, CrPC and no opportunity was afforded to them to explain these circumstances, they had been seriously prejudiced and no conviction could, therefore, be recorded against them for the offence under s 201, IPC .[19]

10. Relative Scope of Sections 177, 182, 201 and 203

Commentary under the same heading in s 182, ante may be referred to.1505

11. False answers by accused in Statement under Section 313 , CrPC --Effect

When the answer given by both the accused-respondents to all the questions put to them appear to be contrary to the materials on record and as such not correct, the adverse inference against both the accused-respondents is warranted in the circumstances of the case for giving false answers to the questions regarding facts which are established on the basis of evidence on record.[20] In the case of Mani Kumar Thapa v State of Sikkim [21] the Hon'ble Supreme Court has held that where the accused gives false answers to the questions under s 313, CrPC, the court will have to proceed on the basis that the accused has not explained the inculpating circumstances established by the prosecution against him and such failure to explain would form an additional link in the chain of circumstances. In State of Maharashtra v Suresh ,[22] the Hon'ble Supreme Court has held that a false answer offered by the accused when his attention was drawn to any inculpating circumstance would render such circumstance as capable of inculpating him. In such a situation, it was further held that a false answer can also be counted as providing 'a missing link' in completing the chain. To the similar effect are the observations of the Apex Court in Mohibur Rahman v State of Assam .[23] It has been held in that case that accused's failure to offer any reasonable explanation of any of the inculpating circumstances would be sufficient to conclusively point to the commission of the alleged offence by the accused.[24]

In this regard, a useful reference can also be made to the judgment of the Supreme Court in the case of Joseph v State of Kerala .[25] The Supreme Court held that if the accused flatly denies all the incriminating circumstances, then such a flat denial is an additional link in the chain of the circumstances. In the case of Deonandan Mishra v State of Bihar ,[26] it was held by the Supreme Court that where various links have been satisfactorily made out and the circumstances point to the accused as the probable assailant, with reasonable definiteness and in proximity to the deceased as regards time and situation, and he offers no explanation, which if accepted, though not proved, would afford a reasonable basis for a conclusion on the entire case consistent with his innocence, such absence of explanation, or false explanation would itself be an additional link which completes the chain.

12. Essential Ingredients

The necessary ingredient of an offence under s 201, IPC is actually causing any evidence of the commission of an offence to disappear with the intention of screening1506 the offender from legal punishment.[27] The essential ingredients of an offence under this section are that:

(i) an offence has been committed;[28]
(ii) the accused knows or has reason to believe that the offence has been committed;
(iii) with such knowledge or belief the accused has:

  (a) caused any evidence of the commission of the offence to disappears, or
  (b) given any information respecting the offence, which he knew or believed to be false; and

(iv) the accused has done so with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment;[29] and
(v) if the charge be of an aggravated form, as in the given case, it must be proved further that the offence in respect of which the accused did as in (c) and (d) was punishable with death, or with imprisonment for life or imprisonment extending to ten years.[30]

There was no evidence to show that after committing the murder, the accused buried the body to screen possible evidence of alleged offence, thus, the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 201, IPC .[31]

13. Two Indispensable Ingredients

Two most important ingredients out of three of the offence under s 201, IPC are that (1) the accused knew or had reason to believe that such an offence had been committed; and (2) the accused caused evidence thereof to disappear with the intent of screening the offender from legal punishment or had given any false information respecting the offence.[32]

The necessary ingredient of an offence under s 201, IPC is actually causing any evidence of the commission of an offence to disappear with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment. Oral threat or inducement allegedly given by the two lady lawyers to approver not to give any statement against the petitioner cannot amount to commission of an offence under the s 201 .[33]

The gravest degree contemplated in s 201 is punishable with a maximum sentence of imprisonment for seven years. The minimum requirement for the offence to reach the said peak degree is that the offender should have caused the disappearance of evidence of another offence which is punishable with death, and that should be1507 established in addition to the above mentioned two basic ingredients. Even if the two basics are established, and the prosecution failed to establish the next requirement, the court cannot convict the accused for the highest tier specified in the section.[34]

14. 'Whoever'--Meaning of

In some earlier cases, it was held that this section applies merely to the person who screens the principal or actual offender and not to the principal or actual offender himself.[35] But it is now well-settled that the section is not restricted to the case of a person who screens the actual offender, it can be applied even to a person guilty of the main offence, and the offence under this section.[36]

15. 'Offence'--What is?

'Offence' means a thing punishable under the Indian Penal Code or under any special or local law, if punishable thereunder with imprisonment for a term of six months, or upwards, whether with or without fine.[37] A thing is not an offence if it falls within any of the sections in ch IV.[38]

'Offence', in this section and ss 202 and 203 of this Code, includes any act, committed at any place out of India, which, if committed in India, would have been punishable under any of the following sections, namely, 302, 304, 382, 392, 393, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 450, 457, 458, 459 and 460.[39] The word 'offence' wherever used in the first, second, third and fourth paragraphs of the section means, some real offence, which, in fact, has been committed, and not some offence which the accused imagines, has been committed.

The word 'offence' as used in this section does not contemplate that the accused should know the particular section of the Penal Code under which the offence falls, or the precise character of the offence committed. What the court has to decide is what offence, the accused knew, or had reason to believe, had been committed. When s 201 refers to an 'offence', it refers to the offence as it appeared to the accused, crediting him with the knowledge that can reasonably be expected of him. By s 309 of the Code, an attempt to commit suicide is punishable but there is no section in the Code making suicide itself an offence, obviously because in that case there would be1508 no offender who could be brought within the purview of the law. Under certain circumstances covered by s 40, CrPC the concealment of a suspicious death might be punishable under s 176, IPC but a person not bound to communicate an occurrence of that sort would not be liable. The removal or concealment of the body of a man not proved to be murdered does not amount to an offence under this section.[40] There was no evidence to prove the fact that it was the accused appellant who had concealed the dead body of the deceased in the water of 'Tumki Darha' of river Bheden and that the shawl tied to the waist of the deceased belonged to him, hence, the accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under s 201 .[41]

The evidence showed that the accused appellant a guide took a young girl of a foreign country to his village, committed her murder and buried the dead body in his own house. The skeleton of the deceased was recovered from the house of the accused on the disclosure statement made by him.

The DNA sample got from the skeleton matched with the blood sample of the father of the deceased. The conviction of the accused appellant concurrently recorded by the Courts below under ss 302 and 201, IPC was affirmed.[42]

A killed B in the lawful exercise of the right of self-defence. C and D helped A to dispose of the body. No offence was committed by C and D[43]

16. Section Presupposes Actual Commission of an Offence

The disappearance of the evidence should be after the commission of the offence.[44]Sections 201, 203, 213 and 214 all imply that the offence screened has been committed and not the guilt of the person screened. Where no principal offence has been committed, there can be no conviction under these sections.[45]B was killed by A in the lawful exercise of his right of self-defence. C and D helped A in the disposal of the body. It was held that no offence was committed by C and D.[46] 'Concealing an offence and screening any person from legal punishment for any offence, therefore, presupposes the actual commission of an offence.[47] As pointed out by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Palvinder Kaur v State of Punjab ,[48] in order to establish the charge under this section, it is essential to prove that an offence was committed, mere suspicion that it has been committed not being sufficient, and that the accused knew or had reason to believe that such offence had been committed. In this case a lady was charged under ss 302 and 201 on the allegations that she killed her husband by administering potassium cyanide to him and caused the disappearance of his body. The evidence proved only that the husband had died and that his body was found in a1509 trunk and was discovered in a well and that the accused took part in the disposal of the body. It was held that as there was no evidence to show the cause of the death or the manner or circumstance in which it came about, the accused could not be convicted even under this section.[49] Where both the appellant accused and the deceased had gone together on motor cycle, only the appellant returned, and the appellant sold the motorcycle within two days of the occurrence, and the dead body of the deceased was found lying near the bridge, the appellant accused was convicted under ss 300 and 201, IPC .[50]

Where the accused was charged under ss 465 and 201 for forging some bills and attempting to destroy the bills by setting fire to them, but the charge under s 465 failed, it was held that he could be convicted even under this section.[51]

17. An Offence must have been Committed

In order to justify a conviction under this section it is necessary that an offence, for which some person has been convicted or is criminally responsible within the definition of s 40, should have been committed.[52] There can be no offender liable to legal punishment, unless some offence has been committed, and the thing, which a person causes to disappear, cannot be said to be evidence of an offence unless an offence has been committed.[53] The cremation of a dead body when the death was natural, cannot amount to an offence under s 201, IPC .[54] In the absence of any positive material to show that the accused persons were aware of any offence having been committed, their act in cremating the dead body cannot amount to an offence under s 201, IPC .[55]The terms used in the section 'knowing or having reason to believe' conclusively negate and preclude the view that its provisions are applicable in cases in which an offence has not been committed. For it is impossible for anyone to know or to have reason, or sufficient cause, to believe that an offence has been committed when it has not been committed. A person may fancy that he knows or has reason to believe that an offence has been committed when it has not been committed, but he is mistaken in so fancying. He may, under the influence of such a mistake, remove something which he imagines to be an evidence of the offence which he supposes to have been committed, and he may be morally blameable for so doing. But it is beyond the province of criminal legislation to punish a man for a delusion or even for an act which has not caused any actual harm to the public or any individual member of the society.[56]1510

18. 'Knowing or Having Reason to Believe that an Offence has been Committed'--Meaning of

Assuming that an offence was committed, and that there is an offender awaiting justice, the next thing which the prosecution has to prove, for invoking the provisions of this section, is that the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that an offence had been committed.[57] But he may not have much knowledge about the offence. He may believe a person to be guilty, but he may have no reason for his belief. In that case, he does not transgress the provision of this section by doing what is here condemned. The section only punishes him who either knew or had reason to believe that an offence had been committed. Now, no one can be said to have reason to believe a thing unless he had sufficient cause to believe that thing. It lies on the prosecution to prove that the accused had such sufficient cause for his belief. This must depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[58]

In the absence of reliable evidence which would show that the accused had such knowledge and they knowingly became privy to the destruction of evidence, a conviction under s 201 cannot be based.[59]

Question of Fact

Whether the circumstantial evidence in a particular case is sufficient and safe enough to warrant a finding that an offence has been committed, is a question which belongs to the realm of facts and not of law. So is the question whether the accused knew or had reason to believe that such an offence had been committed. It is true that this question further depends on the assessment of the accused's mind. Nevertheless, it is a question of fact.[60]

Mere Probability not Sufficient

'May have known or may have reason to believe that an offence has been committed' is not enough to warrant a conviction under this section. Where there is a possibility that the accused may not have known, or may not have had reason to believe, and he may have had only a suspicion that an offence had been committed, he is entitled to the benefit of doubt.[61]

Presumption as to Deemed Knowledge

There must be direct and legal evidence to prove a charge under s 201 . Merely because the accused are the brothers of the deceased's husband, it cannot be presumed, as a matter of legal proof, that they must be deemed to have knowledge of the murder of the deceased, by her husband.[62] But a person, who secretly buries the1511 headless body of a man just murdered, is prima facie guilty under this section unless he can establish that his act was innocent.[63]

In one other case the accused was alleged to have intentionally caused the disappearance of the evidence by helping in the burial of the dead body. It was not shown that he had knowledge of the offence alleged to have been committed by his co-accused in the murder trial. It was held that conviction under s 201 read with s 34, IPC was not sustainable.[64]

In a case, the prisoner was present at a murder without being aware that such an act was to be committed. Because of fear he not only did not interfere to prevent the commission of the crime, but also joined the murderers in concealing the body. It was held that he was guilty, not of abetment of murder, but of causing the disappearance of evidence of a crime under s 201 of the IPC .[65]

Knowledge of Offender's Identity not Necessary

The section does not say that the accused should be aware of the identity of the offender whom he intends to screen.[66]

Two Expressions Explained

Explaining the expressions 'knowing or having reason to believe' and 'knows or believes' used in this section, their Lordships of the Supreme Court observed:[67]

> Section 201 is somewhat clumsily drafted, but we think that the expression 'knowing or having reason to believe' in the first paragraph and the expression 'knows or believes' in the second paragraph are used in the same sense. Take the case of an accused who has reason to believe that an offence has been committed. If the other conditions of the first paragraph are satisfied, he is guilty of an offence under section 201 . If it be supposed that the word 'believes' was used in a sense different from the expression 'having reason to believe', it would be necessary for the purpose of inflicting punishment upon the accused to prove that he believes in addition to having reason to believe. We cannot impute to the legislature an intention that an accused who is found guilty of the offence under the first paragraph would escape punishment under the succeeding paragraphs unless some additional fact or state of mind is proved. If an accused, on seeing blood marks on the ground made as a result of an offence punishable under s 323, erases the blood marks with the intention of screening the offender whom he erroneously believes to have committed the offence of murder, he could be convicted only on the footing that an offence under s 323 was committed and that he acted with the intention of screening such an offender believing that such an offence was committed, and he may be punished accordingly under the fourth paragraph with imprisonment extending to three months; but he could not be convicted on the basis of his having screened a murderer merely because he wrongly imagined that an offence of murder had been committed.

19. Knowledge to be Distinguished from Intention and Motive

A distinction must be drawn between motive, intention and knowledge. A motive is something which prompts a man to form an intention, and knowledge is an1512 awareness of the consequences of the act. In many cases intention and knowledge merge into each other and mean more or less, the same thing and intention can be presumed from knowledge. The demarcating line between knowledge and intention is no doubt thin, but it is not difficult to perceive that they connote different things.[68]

Knowledge, as contrasted with intention, would properly signify a state of mental realisation in which the mind is a passive recipient of certain ideas and impressions arising in it or passing before it. It would refer to a bare state of conscious awareness of certain facts in which human mind might itself remain supine or inactive. On the other hand, intention connotes a conscious state in which the mental faculties are roused into activity and summoned into action for the deliberate purpose of being directed towards a particular and specified end which the human mind conceives and perceives before itself. Mental faculties which might be dispersed in the case of knowledge are, in the case of intention, concentrated and converged on a particular point and projected in a set direction. The difference between the shades in the meaning of the two words is fine but clear and the use of the one in place of the other by the legislature cannot be without purpose. The words used by the legislature must, therefore, be given their full effect. An accused, though he may have known that, if discovered, his act would be likely to cause annoyance to the owner of the house cannot be said to have intended either actually or constructively to cause such annoyance. It is one thing to entertain a certain intention and another to have the knowledge that one's act may possibly lead to a certain result.[69]

20. 'Reason to Believe'--Rumour or Suspicion not Knowledge

A person is said to have 'reason to believe' a thing if he has sufficient cause to believe that thing but not otherwise.[70] It is not enough that the accused was aware of a rumour or of a suspicion relating to the commission of an offence.[71]

21. Causing Disappearance of Evidence--Active Participation Required

The dictionary meaning of the expression 'cause' clearly envisages some active step on the part of the doer of the act.[72] The word 'disappear' means 'cease to be visible', 'vanish' 'pass from sight or existence'. A thing may cease to be visible or it may be out of sight when it is either moved from one place to another without actually concealing it or is concealed somewhere for the time being or its condition or shape is changed or it is destroyed completely. This section deals with the destruction or disappearance of material or tangible evidence. It does not relate to withholding of oral evidence or tampering with witnesses,[73] or anything that is likely to make the crime evident, such as the existence of a wounded corpse or of blood-stains, fabricated documents, or similar material objects indicating that an offence has been committed.[74] In view of this the disappearance of the evidence will be caused if the evidence ceases to be visible or traceable.[75]1513

To make out an offence under this section it is necessary to prove that the person charged, among other facts, knew that an offence had been committed and that he caused the evidence thereof to disappear. Where the accused persons had participated in taking away the victim's body, their conviction under s 201, IPC was found proper.[76] So, in the matter of causing a disappearance of the evidence relevant to a particular offence, the person charged must be proved to have actively participated in the matter of the disappearance of the evidence and a mere sufferance by him or her, of the removal of such evidence by others, is not sufficient. A mere knowledge on the part of the accused about the removal of the dead bodies does not bring the case within the ambit of s 201, IPC, as that section's essential requirement is causing any evidence of the commission of an offence to disappear. Unless the prosecution can establish that the accused had caused any evidence to disappear, the charge under s 201, IPC, would not be sustainable.[77] Where there was no evidence that the two appellants A and G made attempt to destroy the evidence, they were acquitted of the charge under s 201, IPC .[78]

Where the accused had taken the dead body of the deceased from his house to that of his parents-in-law in the presence of everyone, he was not convicted under s 201, IPC .[79] He should be instrumental in the disappearance of the evidence of the crime. As stated above, the words 'cause disappearance' imply some positive act and not a mere passive acquiescence or neglect.[80] Seven accused persons assaulted the victim by stones, caused his death, and burnt the dead body. Held, the accused persons caused the evidence of the commission of offence to disappear to screen the offenders from legal punishment. They were convicted under s 201, IPC .[81]

Where the appellant accused had committed the murder of the deceased by strangulation, burnt the dead body and had thrown it into a well, and the dead body of the deceased was recovered at the instance of the appellant accused, he was convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[82]

Where the report of FSL test showed that the victim girl was murdered and thrown into water, and there was reliable evidence that on the day of occurrence, the respondent accused was seen carrying the deceased on his bicycle carrier, the respondent accused was convicted under s 201, IPC .[83]

The act of dragging the body for some distance and leaving the same in an open field cannot be termed to be causing a disappearance of the evidence.[84] In the absence of evidence showing that the dead bodies were buried or made to disappear by the accused persons, their conviction under s 201 is liable to be set aside.[85]1514

It must be, therefore, positively proved that it was the accused, who had caused the evidence of the commission of the offence to disappear.[86] The accused appellants gangraped the deceased and when she was dead, threw her into pit. The evidence of wife of co-accused was found reliable. The conviction of the appellants under ss 302 and 201 read with s 34, IPC was found proper.[87]

There was evidence that the accused husband caused the death of his wife by giving beating and burnt her dead body to destroy evidence of commission of offence. Accused husband was convicted under s 201 .[88] The evidence proved that the appellants accused persons committed the murder of the deceased by strangulation and threw the dead body in well. The dead body of the deceased was recovered from the well. There was extra judicial confession of the accused also. Appellants were convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[89] It was the prosecution case that the accused appellant committed murder of the minor son of the informant and threw the dead body in the maize filed of another person. There was evidence that the deceased minor son was last seen in the company of accused appellant, and no explanation was furnished by the accused as to what happened to the deceased thereafter. Accused appellant was convicted under ss 201 and 302, IPC .[90]

Hacked pieces of dead body of the deceased were recovered from the field of the appellant accused for which he could not give an explanation. Further, cell phone of the deceased was also recovered at the instance of the appellant accused, thus, conviction of the appellants under s 201, IPC was upheld.[91]

Evidence showed that accused husband had strangulated his wife causing death. But there was no evidence that he concealed or screened the evidence of the case. He was acquitted of the charge under s 201, IPC .[92]

Mere production of bottle containing poison allegedly consumed by the deceased could not raise any presumption that the same had been done to remove evidence of homicidal throttling.[93]

There was nothing on the record to show that appellant husband tried to make the dead body of the deceased disappear with an intention to screen himself from legal punishment and only because the appellant is husband of the deceased and the dead body of the deceased was found under the jurisdiction of the police station, it cannot be said that dead body of the deceased had been thrown by the appellant. Conviction of the accused husband on charge under s 201, IPC was set aside.[94]

Illustrative Cases

(a) Where the accused merely allowed a dead body to remain near the fields and gave no information of the crime to the police, but no positive act of1515 concealment was proved against him, it was held that he was not guilty under this section.[1]

(b) The failure of some doctors to give information about an admission of a burnt patient and that the patient may die, cannot be said to screen the evidence of the burns, unless it had been a statutory or moral duty or even a duty according to the rules for doctors to inform the police. Non-information by them will not amount to causing the disappearance of evidence.[2]

(c) Where the evidence showed and proved the incident of carrying of the dead body towards the river Gandak and thereafter throwing the same into the rivers, the conviction of the accused under ss 201 and 34, IPC must be confirmed, but since the accused was 18 years of age and staying with his brother at the time of the incident, the possibility of his having been pressurised by his brother cannot be ruled out. On the facts and circumstances of the case, the sentence of seven years imprisonment was reduced to the period already undergone.[3] In a case of gang rape and murder of a minor girl, the evidence showed that the accused concealed and took steps to destroy vital pieces of evidence of the rape and murder. They threw the body as well as the cycle in the septic tank, removed the blood stains, concealed the clothings having blood marks on them and the semen marks in the fodder room as also the knife in a cow dung heap. Thus, they caused the evidence of the commission of the offence to disappear with the intention to screen themselves from punishment and their conviction under s 201, IPC was upheld.[4]

(d) There was reliable evidence that the accused appellant was last seen in the company of the deceased. Half burnt discarded clothes of the accused were recovered by the police. The alibi taken by the accused appellant was not established. Appellant accused was convicted for offence under ss 201 and 302, IPC .[5]

(e) Where the evidence showed that the accused handed over a set of clothes to the witness for the main accused and the accused also resisted the police and the other witnesses from searching her house, upon which the blood stained clothes of the main accused were recovered from her (accused) house, the conviction of the accused under s 201, IPC was held proper.[6]

The evidence proved that the appellants accused persons committed the murder of the deceased by strangulation and threw the dead body in well. The dead body of the deceased was recovered from the well. There was extra judicial confession of the accused also. Appellants were convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[7] It was the case of the prosecution that the accused appellant committed the murder of the minor son of the informant and threw his dead body in the maize filed of another person. There was evidence that the deceased minor son was last seen in the company of the1516 accused appellant, and no explanation was furnished by the accused as to what happened to the deceased thereafter. Accused appellant was convicted under ss 201 and 302, IPC .[8]

(f) In one case the accused was proved to have caused the death of his wife by throttling her and caused the evidence of the commission of that offence to disappear by putting the dead body on fire. He gave a false report to the police in respect of the offence in order to screen himself from legal punishment, and so the conviction of the accused under s 201, IPC was upheld.[9]

(g) Where the appellant husband committed the murder of his wife for non fulfillment of dowry demand and threw her dead body in a well, he was convicted under s 201, IPC .[10] The accused appellant had committed rape of a minor girl aged about 10 years and thereafter, committed her murder. After the murder, he had concealed the dead body by covering it with branches and leaves. He was convicted under ss 376, 302 and 201, IPC .[11]

(h) In another case the accused, alongwith other co-accused, were charged with the offence of causing a dowry death and the disappearance of the evidence of the offence. The co-accused was acquitted, simply because the accused was the husband of the deceased and was with her on the night of the incident. That by itself will not lead to any presumption that after the murder of his wife her body was thrown in the well by the accused only. There should have been cogent and convincing evidence to prove that it was the accused and no one else who caused the disappearance of the evidence of the offence of murder by throwing the dead body in the well. The conviction of the accused, under Pt I of s 201, IPC was set aside.[12]

(i) Where in a case of kidnapping and murder, the dead body of one boy was found in a decomposed state in a flat and that of the other in a pit, the keys of the said flat were in the exclusive possession of the accused. He used a perfume to put the neighbours off track when they started becoming curious about the foul smell emitting from the said flat. The prosecution witnesses had seen the accused while he was disposing of the second dead body in a pit near a village and reliable evidence on record also showed that the accused had made purchases of certain items which were to be used by him while removing the dead bodies and he had also purchased a perfume (aattar) to reduce the foul smell. On these facts, the accused was held under s 201, IPC for causing the disappearance of evidence and other offences.[13]

(j) In a case of kidnapping and murder, one of the accused was detected by the informant while he was disposing of the dead body in a pond. Later, the same accused made an extra-judicial confession about the offence, before the informant. The recovery of pooja materials for the purpose of sacrificing the child he had kidnapped and murdered also strengthened the1517 prosecution case. The conviction of the accused under s 201, IPC and other offences was found proper.[14] In a cases, the assertion by the accused was that the death of his wife occurred on account of a brief illness, though he did not produce the evidence of the doctor attending on the deceased or the evidence of co-villagers in support of his defence version. He also did not inform about the death of the deceased to her parents. The dead body was cremated surreptiously, in the absence of her family members. The accused was convicted under the third part of s 201, IPC .[15] Where the accused beheaded the victims, severed their limbs and threw their bodies in a raging fire, their conviction under ss 201 and 149, IPC was upheld.[16] Where the deceased and the husband were living in the upstairs home, the death took place in the bedroom of the spouse and an attempt was made to destroy the evidence of the murder by burning the dead body. The unnatural conduct of the husband immediately after the occurrence, the false plea of suicide and the absence from the house were material relevant circumstances which would complete the chain of circumstantial evidence, leading to only one conclusion, that the husband himself committed the ghastly offence of the murder of his wife and was liable to be convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[17]

(k) The deceased, wife of the accused was inmate in his house, therefore, after the incident occurred in the house of the accused, the dead body of the deceased could be expected lying in the house of the accused but the dead body was taken by the accused to a well belonging to uncle of the deceased. Thus, the criminal intention of the accused is established to cause disappearance of the dead body and the accused was held guilty of the offence under s 201 .[18]

(l) Where the appellant husband had buried the dead body of his wife in a dry portion of the pond located in his house, he was convicted under s 201, IPC .[19]

(m) Where it was proved that the accused person abducted the deceased and disposed of his body at Singla, on the other side of the river which falls within the West Bengal side, the conviction of the accused under ss 364, 300, 201, IPC was upheld.[20]

(n) The accused persons kidnapped the victim, chopped off head, buried trunk of body and threw head in river. There was reliable evidence of the eye-witnesses that the deceased was last seen in the company of the accused. Accused were convicted under ss 201, 302 and 364, IPC .[21]

(o) In a multiple murders case the co-accused was found not involved in offences punishable under s 302, IPC . However, he had seen his father committing multiple murders and when he destroyed the evidence related1518 to those murders by throwing the articles from the Mhatre bridge on two separate occasions, it was absolutely clear that he did this with the primary object of saving his father and therefore, he was held to be liable to be convicted for the offence under s 201, IPC .[22]

(p) Where there was no material to suggest that by getting his car washed five days after the murder, the accused caused any blood or other evidence related to the murder of the deceased to disappear, the mere washing of the car could not, by any stretch of imagination, be prima facie evidence of the factual ingredients of the offence and he could not be convicted of an offence under s 201 .[23]

(q) Where the accused appellant had killed his son aged 5 years, had strangulated him and buried his dead body as he suspected that the deceased was not born to him, he was convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[24]

(r) Accused persons committed the murder of the deceased boy aged 5 years and concealed her dead body in the cave. On search, the dead body of the boy was found in the cave. Accused persons were convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[25]

(s) Charge under s 201, IPC against the accused appellant was that he threw the dead body of the deceased at a different place and tried to make the evidence against him disappear. However, the evidence established that he took the prosecutrix to the field of one R and he was found coming back from that field by some witnesses. It was possible that the rape was committed upon the prosecutrix at the same place where her dead body was found. Her underwear was also found near her body. Hence the prosecution could not establish the fact that the appellant killed the prosecutrix at a different place and threw her body at the spot where her body was found. There was no specific evidence produced by the prosecution to show that the appellant did something to make the evidence disappear. Under such circumstances, the prosecution failed to prove that the appellant committed an offence under s 201, IPC .[26]

(t) The accused committed the murder of a lady and her two children, and concealed their bodies. He committed offence under s 201, IPC .[27]

(u) Accused husband strangulated his wife, and set her on fire along with her infant child. Accused husband was convicted under ss 201, 302, 398A, IPC .[28]

(v) The accused after committing rape on deceased girl aged 8 years threw her dead body in a well. The dead body was recovered from the well. Eye-witness1519 deposed that he had seen something being thrown into the well the previous night. Accused was convicted under ss 376, 302 and 201, IPC .[29]

(w) Where there was no satisfactory evidence regarding recovery of the articles allegedly belonging to the deceased from the possession of the accused appellant, and there was no satisfactory evidence regarding the recovery of the bones and human skeleton from the land over which the accused appellant and his family members had exclusive possession, the accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under ss 201, 302 and 364, IPC .[30]

(x) Appellant accused was alleged to have committed the murder of the deceased as the accused suspected illicit relationship of his wife with the deceased. Dead body of the deceased was found at the distance of half a kilometer. There was no evidence of dragging of the body of the deceased by the accused. Accused was acquitted of the charge under s 201, IPC .[31]

22. Acts not Amounting to Causing Disappearance

The section contemplates concealment or destruction of evidence of a crime,[32] but it is not confined to the destruction of the evidence alone.[33] Merely delaying the discovery of the evidence of the crime is not causing its disappearance. So, where an accused, finding in her house the dead body of a girl who had been murdered by her son, locked the outer door without moving the corpse or concealing it, it was held that she was not guilty of an offence of causing a disappearance of the evidence of a crime under this section.[34] The taking of measures to keep a person, such as a witness, possessed of the knowledge of the occurrence of a crime, out of the way, does not amount to causing disappearance of evidence with the meaning of this section.[35]

Where the body of the deceased was alleged to have been burnt, but the serologist failed to give any opinion in respect of the origin, sex or age of the deceased from the bones recovered and the other evidence regarding burning of the body was not found to be reliable, the conviction of the accused under s 201, IPC was set aside.[36] Where according to the disclosure statement of the accused, the dead body was lying buried in the courtyard of younger brother of the informant, the dead body, however, was recovered from the courtyard of the informant, the accused being the members of the same family, the possibility of confusion about the courtyard of one or other was ruled out and the dead body cannot be said to be recovered pursuant to alleged disclosure statements made by the accused.[37]

Where the dead body of the deceased and a sickle, the offence weapon, were found lying in the house of the deceased in unhidden condition, conviction of the accused appellant for offence under s 201, IPC was set aside.[38]1520

In case of dowry demand, the dead body of the deceased was cremated after the members of the family of the deceased had arrived, the respondents accused had not concealed the dead body of the deceased, thus, they were acquitted of the charge under s 201, IPC .[39]

In some cases it has been held that, in a case of murder, moving the corpse of the victim from one place to another in order to divert suspicion does not amount to causing evidence of the murder to disappear.[40] Mere knowledge of the removal of the dead body to another place also does not, by itself, necessarily amount to causing the disappearance of the evidence of the offence. It is a matter of evidence in each case.[41] But in some cases it has been held that the mere removal of a body from one place to another, so as to remove the traces of the place where the murder took place, or indications which might implicate a particular individual, even though such removal does not remove undoubted evidence that a murder has taken place, is within the section.[42]

Accused A1 to 5 were alleged to have committed the murder of the deceased. A6 and A7 were driver and cleaner of the truck. It was alleged that A6 and A7 caused the disappearance of evidence to protect the accused persons by washing the truck so as to free it from bloodstains. It had come in evidence that the deceased was bleeding profusely and there was blood in the cabin and, therefore, the truck was washed. The investigating agency had collected sample of blood from the seat in the rear part of the driver's seat and from the wooden strip on the lower portion and same was found to contain human blood of group 'A', which was of the deceased. Therefore, A6 and A7 cannot be said to have caused disappearance of evidence because evidence was collected from the truck, the disappearance of which was alleged against them. They were both drivers of the truck and were not connected in any manner with the other accused. From the prosecution evidence, it transpired that when the deceased was assaulted, the driver objected to his being beaten and the reply given by the accused was that he was their man and they were beating him. A6 and A7 were acquitted of the charge under s 201, IPC .[43]

23. Disposal of Dead Body in Mysterious Circumstances

Where the accused persons secretly and clandestinely cremated the deceased to wipe out the entire evidence of murder, this clearly attracted s 201, IPC .[44] Where the accused killed a child, buried the corpse of the child and proclaimed that the child had died a natural death, the conviction of the accused under s 201, IPC and other offences was upheld.[45]

Where the death of the wife was not natural and was caused in mysterious circumstances and the dead body was disposed of by the accused and other persons hurriedly on the same night, it was held that the prosecution had been able to substantiate the charge under s 201, IPC against the accused beyond reasonable1521 doubt.[46] In a dowry death case if the appellants after committing murder of the victim of dowry demand, hurriedly cremate the dead body without informing her parents, they would be guilty of offence under s 201 .[47]

The deceased died unnatural death within seven years of her marriage at her matrimonial home as ligature marks were found on her neck, the in-laws used to quarrel with her, she wanted to go to her husband who was serving outside the village, and as the appellants father-in-law and mother-in-law cremated the dead body without informing the parents of the deceased and post mortem of the deceased, the in-laws were convicted under s 302 and s 201, IPC .[48]

Where in a dowry death case the deceased died unnatural death within nine months of marriage, and the appellant accused cremated the dead body of the deceased without informing her parents or relatives, the appellant was convicted for offence under s 201, IPC .[49]

Where the appellant husband after committing the murder of his wife, had buried the dead body in a soakpit near his house, and the dead body of the deceased was recovered in decomposed condition from the pit on the disclosure made by the appellant, and the appellant had not informed the parents of the deceased about the deceased being missing, the appellant accused was convicted for offences under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[50]

The body of the deceased may give certain clues as to cruelty and harassment and consequently, the destruction of the body without information to the police would attract the provisions of ss 201 and 202, IPC .[51]

24. Deceased Clandestinely CrematedConviction under Section 201 , IPC

In the instant case, the deceased was killed by poison being administered to her during the night. Neither the deceased was taken to any doctor nor was any doctor called to examine her, further, no medical treatment of any kind was given to the deceased. This was extremely unnatural human conduct. The dead body was secretly and clandestinely cremated causing disappearance of evidence of offence, without even intimating the parents of the deceased who were living only a few miles away from their village. They learnt about the murder of the deceased from a barber after about three days. The appellants secretly and clandestinely cremated the deceased to wipe out the entire evidence of murder. Held, s 201, IPC was attracted in the case, and the appellants were convicted under s 201, IPC .[52]

25. Discovery of dead body on the Statement of Accused--three Possibilities--Effect of Non Explanation of Accused

When the dead body is recovered on the statement of an accused then three possibilities can be adduced: (i) that the accused would have seen someone else concealing the dead body at that place; (ii) he would have been told by some one else1522 that the dead body was concealed there; and (iii) he himself concealed the dead body.[53]The Supreme Court further held that if the accused does not tell the court about the happening of any of the two possibilities, then the court can presume that the accused had himself concealed the dead body. This is because according to the prosecution, the accused is the only person who could offer an explanation as to how he came to know of such concealment and if he chooses to refrain from telling the court as to how he came to know about it, the presumption is a well justified course to be adopted by the criminal court that the concealment was made by the accused and such an interpretation is not inconsistent with the principle embodied in s 27 of the Evidence Act .[54]

Where there was evidence that the appellant husband suspected the fidelity of his deceased wife, cut her with aruvamanai over the left side of her neck, put the dead body in a gunny bag and placed it on the railway track, recovery of blood stained bed sheet from the house of the appellant husband established that the murder was committed inside the house, and the appellant having not lodged FIR with the police about his wife being missing, he was convicted under ss 201 and 304, Pt I, IPC .[55]

The husband accused was having strained relations with his wife. There was evidence that the he was last seen with his wife and son in the village, thereafter his wife deceased was not seen. On the disclosure statements made by the accused the parts of the dead body of the deceased were recovered. Held, the accused appellant was guilty of having committed the murder of his wife and causing disappearance of the evidence of offence. He was convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[56]

The three appellants accused had strangulated the deceased, chopped off her head, cut the body into pieces and disposed of the body. The deceased had gone to the accused to demand money, her share in the property sold, as her husband was inside the jail in connection with a case under the NDPS Act. The human skeleton of the deceased and her garments were recovered at the instance of the accused appellants. Accused appellants were convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[57]

Where there was circumstantial evidence of last seen, but the dead body was recovered after a gap of fifteen days, the participation of the accused in the commission of offence was found doubtful, thus, conviction of the accused appellant under ss 302 and 201, IPC was set aside.[58]

Where the accused tenant after killing the victim boy had concealed the dead body in his room, and the separated head of the deceased body wrapped in polythene cover was recovered from the room of the accused, accused was convicted for offence under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[59]1523

26. Mere Discovery of Dead Body not Sufficient--Nature of Evidence Explained

The recovery of the body of a person murdered, on its being pointed out by the accused, would be very strong evidence of an offence under this section.[60] Where the accused failed to explain as to how the body of the deceased came to be exhumed from his house, despite his admission that the house from where the body of the deceased was exhumed belonged to him, the conviction of the accused under s 201 was confirmed.[61] Where the severed head of the deceased, lying concealed under shirts, was recovered on the information furnished by the accused and on being shown by him the conviction of the accused under s 201, IPC was held proper.[62] But in the absence of some other evidence, the mere discovery of the dead body, only at the instance of the accused, cannot fasten him with the offence of a concealment of the dead body with the intention of screening himself from an offence under s 201, IPC .[63] When the dead body of the deceased put inside a truck was recovered from a room of the house of the two accused and further the part played by the accused in the placing of the dead body in that trunk was evidently not proved, the accused persons were not liable to be convicted under s 201, IPC read with s 34, IPC .[64] In some cases it has been held that concealing the bloodstained weapon, with which the murder has been committed, would amount to causing evidence of the offence to disappear within the meaning of this section.[65] But in Jogta Kikla v State [66] it has been held that:

> The expression 'any evidence of the commission of that offence' clearly refers, not the to evidence in the extensive sense in which that word is used in the Indian Evidence Act but to evidence in its primary sense, as meaning anything that is likely to make the crime evident, such as the existence of a wounded corpse or of bloodstains, fabricated documents, or similar material objects indicating that an offence had been committed.

In Chunder Giani v State [67] it was observed:

> I can well visualise to myself that in certain cases a corpse may be removed from one place to another without the intention or object of causing disappearance of evidence of the offence; and again, there can be cases in which removal to an unknown obscure, out of the way, or a distant place may be with a view to cause disappearance of evidence within the meaning of section 201 , Indian Penal Code .1524

The question thus depends upon whether what is removed or concealed is 'evidence of the commission of that offence' within the meaning of the section. This question will be separately considered presently. What is to be noted is that for the application of this section what is caused to disappear must be evidence of the commission of the offence.[68] There was no evidence that the death of the deceased wife was unnatural or the appellants husband and in-laws committed the murder of the deceased wife and to conceal the evidence of offence, consigned her dead body to flames. Appellants were acquitted of the charge under ss 201 and 304, Pt I, IPC .[69]

In case of dowry demand, the dead body of the deceased was cremated after the members of the family of the deceased had arrived, and the respondents accused not having concealed the dead body of the deceased, were acquitted of the charge under s 201, IPC .[70]

The removal or concealment of the body of a man, not proved to be murdered does not amount to an offence under this section.[71] So also where the accused helped in the burial of a dead body without any knowledge of the offence committed, it was held that the conviction under the section was not sustainable.[72]

Where the accused father-in-law had no knowledge of the commission of offence in respect of his daughter-in-law by his son accused, held the appellant accused A2 father-in-law could not be convicted for offence under s 201, IPC . Mere presence of the appellant A2 in the house was not sufficient to draw inference that he had the knowledge of the commission of offence by his son appellant A2, and his conviction for offence under s 201, IPC was set aside.[73]

Where all that the prosecution could establish was that the dead body of the deceased was recovered from the well situated in the compound of her marital home and that the cremation was hurried through after physically keeping her kith and kin away from the scene. No doubt, such a culpable haste enkindles fumes of suspicion which can be regarded as an incriminating circumstance against those who showed such a haste, but that circumstance stands isolated and unconnected with any other circumstance. The prosecution did not even attempt to show, much less to prove, that any offence had been committed by anyone in respect of the death of the deceased, which should have been the foundation for establishing the offence under s 201, IPC . On these facts, the order convicting the accused and imposing a maximum sentence of seven years was set aside.[74]

Where the allegation was that the accused killed his mother and after cutting her body into pieces, he had packed the same into different packs and thrown some bags in a rivulet (naala) and buried some in a pit used for stacking or placing cow-dung, the circumstantial evidence was not convincing. The body of the deceased was recovered before a memorandum of the accused under s 27 of the Evidence Act was1525 prepared. The recovery of the head and the stump of the deceased from the pit at the instance of the accused was doubtful, so the conviction of the accused under ss 301 and 201, IPC was set aside.[75]

Mere helping the authority for discovering the dead body/skeleton cannot itself establish that a person is involved unless by way of evidence it is established that the person is aware and he had/has reason to believe that an offence has been committed, and he is causing the disappearance of the evidence of the commission of offence with an intention of screening the offender from legal punishment, or with that intention gives any information respecting the offence which he knows or believes to be false. In the instant case, there was no evidence that the appellant tried to shield the offender intentionally and also had gone for helping the evidence relating to commission of offence disappear as required under s 201, IPC . Appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 201, IPC .[76]

27. Discovery of Incriminating Article at the Instance of Accused

Where on information given by the accused, incriminating articles were discovered by the police at the place pointed out by the accused, the investigating police officer may prove the fact of the discovery without proving the statement of the accused and without relying on s 27 of the Evidence Act . The evidence of the police officer would no doubt show that the accused knew of the existence of the fact discovered in consequence of the information given by him. But that would not necessarily show his direct connection with the offence. It would merely be a link in the chain of evidence which, taken along with other pieces of evidence, might go on to establish his connection therewith.[77]

An accused, in police custody, led the police party and witnesses to the grove, dug out the earth from near a mango tree and took out a human chopped head of the deceased which was identified by his father. Soon after the aforesaid recovery the accused led the party to another mango tree situated in the same grove, dug out earth from there and took out the beheaded body of the deceased. The accused then took the police to a tube well which was locked from the outside and then he himself opened the lock with a key which he himself took out from a concealed place and recovered some articles including one yellow coloured handkerchief (towel type) belonging to the deceased. The motive of the murder and other circumstantial evidence were also established and the conviction of the accused under ss 302, 364 and 201, IPC as recorded by the trial court was thus maintained.[78]

Where the appellant was the real brother of the main accused charged and convicted under s 302, IPC, and was seen with the main accused in the forest, and rope used in the commission of the offence was recovered on the disclosure statement made by him, he was convicted under s 201, IPC .[79]

28. Each Case Depends on Variety of Facts

The decision on the question whether when an accused person leads the police to a place not his own or in his exclusive possession and from there disinters some1526 incriminating article, the court is entitled or not to infer that the accused himself must have put that article there. Each case depends on a variety of facts. No absolute rule on the point can be laid down. Where the evidence in such a case is circumstantial, it must in order to sustain conviction, be incompatible with the innocence of the accused and incapable of explanation on any other reasonable hypothesis than that of his guilt. The hypotheses that are possible in such a case are: (a) that the accused saw someone bury the article there; (b) that someone told the accused that the articles lay buried in that place; and (c) that the accused himself alone or with others buried the article there. The third hypothesis is undoubtedly the most natural and prominent in such a case and if the other two hypotheses are excluded, or are not reasonably possible, there is no reason why the court should not hold the third hypothesis proved. In determining which of these three possible hypotheses is more probable and presents such a degree of certainty that the court, like a reasonable man, ought to act upon the assumption of its existence, the court shall have to consider a variety of circumstance in each case.

29. Question as to Inference is a matter for Judge to Decide

No general rule can be laid down that in such cases the court is not justified in drawing the inference that the accused himself placed the incriminating article at the place pointed out by him. The true position is that it is for the court in each case to draw any such inference as may be legitimate or reasonable in the circumstances. The question as to what inference from a relevant fact may be drawn as to the existence or otherwise of a fact in issue and with what degree of certainty is, in each case, a matter for the judge to determine on the facts of that case and cannot be regulated by a generalisation. The outstanding fact in such cases is that the discovery of the incriminating article from a place which is hidden from public view, but is pointed out by the accused, unmistakably shows that the accused was in some way privy to the felony. This is the most natural and prominent inference which the court will draw under s 114, Evidence Act, and the fact being within the peculiar knowledge of the accused, it is for him to show that he acquired the knowledge of the place of concealment in some other way. If, therefore, the prisoner makes no attempt to explain how he acquired the knowledge of the place, leaving aside the question of proving the truth of the explanation if given, there is nothing in law to prevent the court from convicting him, if after considering all the surrounding circumstance and bearing in mind the other possible hypotheses and the principle that it is better that ten guilty men should escape than one innocent man be punished, the court comes to the conclusion that the accused himself must have put the article or articles there, and then it not only may but it is its duty to convict.[80] From the mere fact that the accused pointed out the existence of parts of the body of a murdered person, it cannot be inferred that he caused the disappearance of those portions of the body.[81] The conduct of the accused in pointing out the spot, where the dead body was, would show, at the most, that he had knowledge that a dead body was lying there. That knowledge could be acquired in various ways. Without any further evidence, it is not sufficient to hold that the dead body was thrown there by him.[82] The fact of discovery, of course, proves knowledge on the part of the person discovering the fact, that a certain thing had been discovered by him. But a mere knowledge of the1527 existence of such a fact is not sufficient to make him guilty under this section. To make him guilty under this section, it must be proved that he had caused the evidence of the commission of the offence to disappear and not merely that he knew that some other person had caused the evidence of the commission of the offence to disappear. It must be positively proved that it was he who had caused the evidence of the commission of the offence to disappear.[83] But where there is sufficient evidence to show that the accused knew as to how the dead body of the deceased was carried for disposal by other accused persons and that she refrained from informing the police about the missing of the deceased, she can be held guilty under ss 201 and 34, IPC .[84]

30. Attempt to cause Disappearance

Where the accused persons, were found carrying the dead body of a murdered man and on being confronted and questioned, the accused left the body at a place which was near the public path and disappeared and most of them were arrested only the next day, it was held that there was only an attempt to cause the disappearance of the evidence of the offence and the accused were liable to punishment only under this section read with s 511 .[85]

Mere Preparation of a Document not an Attempt

However, a different view was taken by the Allahabad High Court. Where the removal of the dead body to the cremation ground was intercepted on the way, it was held that the commission of the offence under s 201 was prevented and the accused could not be convicted under s 201 .[86] An appellant, who was a doctor by profession, was found guilty, by the trial judge and the High Court, of an attempt to cause the disappearance of the evidence by issuing false certificates regarding the cause of death of a deceased body. The first certificate indicated his inability to express any opinion about the cause of death, the other certificate indicated same cause of death. The dead body was sent for a regular post-mortem and a case of murder was registered against the husband of the deceased. It was held by the Supreme Court that there was a marked difference between the preparation and an attempt and in this case it was highly doubtful as to whether the appellant had attempted to commit an offence under s 201, IPC or not. There was absolutely no material to show whether any body had seen the second certificate earlier and whether there was any attempt to put the same to use for facilitating the cremation. His appeal was accordingly allowed.[87]

31. 'Any Evidence of the Commission of that Offence'--Evidence Explained

Withholding of oral evidence or tampering with witnesses does not fall within the purview of this section. It relates to destroying or making to disappear material that is, tangible evidence.[88] As pointed out above, what is caused to disappear must be1528 evidence of the commission of the offence that has been committed. The expression 'any evidence of the commission of that offence', refers not to evidence in the extensive sense in which that word is used in the Evidence Act, but to evidence in its primary sense as meaning anything that is likely to make the crime evident, such as the existence of a wounded corpse or of bloodstains, fabricated documents, or similar material objects indicating that an offence had been committed. The statement of a witness and panchanamas do not constitute such evidence.[89]

A pushed B violently into a boat, B was killed thereby. A set the boat adrift. A committed no offence under this section.[90]

A and B killed C in the presence of D. A removed the razai on which the deceased had been sleeping, and concealed it in a stack in D's presence. It was held that as the presence or existence of the razai would have been no evidence of the murder, D committed no offence under this section.[91]

Appellant accused had committed the murder of his wife by firing katta on her, had dropped her dead body in a culvert by the side of the road, sprinkled petrol over the dead body and set fire to it, hence, he was convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[92]

Particular Evidence has to be Disclosed

Where it is not disclosed in the complaint as to what existing evidence was destroyed by the accused in respect of an offence which has been committed, with the intention of screening the offender, no case under this section is made out.[93]

32. Removing Corpse from one Place to another--whether Amounts to an Offence

When an offence is committed, there may be evidence of various types: (a) evidence to show that the offence had been committed; (b) evidence to show that the offence had been committed at a particular place; and (c) evidence to show that the offence had been committed by a particular person or persons. In a case of murder, the wounded corpse of the victim would be the evidence of the commission of the offence of murder. If the corpse is caused to disappear with the necessary knowledge and intention, it would be an offence under this section. But if the corpse is only removed from one place to another in order to divert suspicion, the corpse itself existing, it cannot be said that the evidence of the commission of 'that offence' has been caused to disappear within the meaning of this section. The removal of the corpse from one place to another however, may be evidence of the place where, or of the person by whom, the murder was committed. The question then arises whether the removal of the corpse amounts to causing disappearance of any evidence of the commission of that offence within the meaning of this section. There is a conflict of judicial opinion on this question.1529

Allahabad View

In Empress of India v Kishna ,[1] the Allahabad High Court had earlier held that by removing the corpse from his own field to that of another, the accused did not cause the evidence of the murder, which that corpse afforded, to disappear. But dissenting from this, in subsequent cases the court held that the mere removal of a body from one place to another so as to remove traces of the place where the murder took place, or indications which might implicate a particular individual, even though such removal does not remove undoubted evidence that a murder has taken place, is within the section.[2]

Calcutta View

The Calcutta High Court has taken a different view and it was held that the essence of the offence under this section 'is the causing of evidence of the commission of an offence to disappear and it cannot be considered correct to say that the mere moving of a body amounts to causing disappearance of evidence of an offence'.[3] In Nagendra Bhakta v Emperor [4] it was observed that:

> The offence that was committed in the present case was an offence of murder and the evidence that was caused to disappear was the fact that the corpse was lying at Sarat's house. This fact, namely that the corpse was lying at Sarat's house and at no other place, was no evidence of the commission of the offence of murder. It may be some evidence of where the offence was committed or who had committed it, but it was no evidence of the fact that a murder had been committed. It is not impossible to conceive of the commission of an offence apart from where and when and by whom it was committed.

Gujarat View on Concealment of Weapon

Similarly, the Gujarat High Court has held that:

> When section 201 uses the expression 'whoever causes any evidence of the commission of that offence to disappear, it refers to a person who causes the evidence of actual commission of the offence to disappear and not to a person who causes the disappearance of evidence as to by whom the offence was committed, and that the removal or concealment of the weapon used for the commission of an offence and the bloodstained clothes of the accused, is not causing the disappearance of the evidence of the commission of the offence within the meaning of this section.[5]

Punjab View

According to the Punjab High Court

> ....there cannot be the slightest doubt that the weapon with which an offence is committed is a very valuable piece of evidence of its commission. More so when the offence is said to be of murder and that the weapon is bloodstained, and if a person1530 conceals that weapon, provided his intention in doing so is to screen the offender, he is, in my opinion, guilty of causing that evidence to disappear, etc.[6]

This section does not refer exclusively to causing the disappearance of the corpus delicti, but to causing the disappearance of 'any evidence' of the commission of the offence.[7] The words 'any evidence of the commission of that offence' clearly include any evidence of the commission by the offender of that offence.[8]

Orissa View--Act of Removal of Dead Body or Hanging it on a Tree

The Orissa High Court has held that even if the appellant was the author of the removal of the dead body of the deceased from the place of murder to another place where the dead body was found, s 201 of the Code would be inapplicable as merely removing the dead body of the murdered person from the scene of occurrence to another place and throwing or keeping it there or hanging it on a tree to give a colour of suicidal hanging, would not amount to causing the disappearance of the evidence of the causing of the offence of murder.[9]

33. 'With the Intention of Screening the Offender from Legal Punishment'--Meaning of

The essence of the offence under this section is the intention to screen the offender from legal punishment. In the absence of such intention, the accused cannot be convicted under this section. The requirements of the section are not fulfilled if the disappearance of the evidence was merely likely to have the effect of screening the offender.[10] A person causing the disappearance of the evidence of an offence under compulsion cannot be said to have caused such disappearance with the intention of screening the offender.[11]

Awareness of the Identity of the Offender not Necessary

It is necessary, in order to justify a conviction under this section, that an offence for which some person has been convicted or is criminally responsible should have been committed.[12]But the section does not say that the accused should be aware of the identity of the offender whom he intends to screen. The expression 'with the intention of screening the offender' excludes cases where there was no active criminal intent, but merely a knowledge that a possible result of the act would be the screening of the offender. Such a case was that of Queen v Toolshee Rai [13] where a corpse was removed with no other intention than a desire to prevent the blame attaching to the village. But the fact that the section requires a positive criminal1531 intention does not imply that the intention must have reference to an individual known to the accused. For instance, in case of a house trespass, the facts might lead to the inference that the accused intended to annoy the inmate of the house although he was unaware of their identity.[14]

Intention a Question of Inference

The intention of a person causing the disappearance of the evidence is a matter of inference. If persons are found carrying the dead body of a murdered man from a particular house to a piol of a mosque and leaving it there, that by itself cannot lead to an inference that they had an intention to screen the offender or to hide the scene of the crime.[15] Where the accused stated that he had hidden the shoes of the deceased, the intention to screen the offender from punishment must be inferred.[16]

Where the witnesses consistently deposed that with regard to the death of the deceased woman, her father was never informed and the cremation had been done behind the back of the parents of the deceased, both the accused could not escape from the liability under s 201, IPC because they wanted to screen themselves from the legal punishment, fully realising that the offence under s 498A, IPC had been committed by the accused as he had been causing harassment to the deceased alongwith his father.[17]

But where the accused persons were found carrying the dead body of a murdered man and on being confronted and questioned, they left the body at a place which was near the public path and disappeared and most of them were arrested only the next day, it was held that their intention was to commit an offence under this section, and that since the causing of disappearance of the evidence was not completed, they were guilty of an attempt to commit the offence under this section.[18]

In a multiple murder case, the co-accused was found not involved for offences punishable under s 302, IPC, however, he had seen his father commit the multiple murders and when he destroyed the evidence related to those murders by throwing the articles from Mhatre bridge on two separate occasions, it was absolutely clear that he did this with primary object of saving his father and therefore, he would be liable to be convicted for the offence under s 201, IPC .[19]

Where the accused removed the body of a murdered person from the village and left it by the side of the Grand Trunk Road in order to divert suspicion of the crime from themselves and to make it appear that the man was done to death by some passerby, it was held that they were guilty under this section.[20]

Where the circumstantial evidence established the commission of a murder of the victim by the father-in-law and brother-in-law and the third accused helped them in the removal of the dead body in order to screen the offenders, the conviction of the1532 first two accused under ss 302, 201 and 34, IPC was held proper and the third accused was convicted under ss 201 and 34, IPC .[21]

Appellant husband, present in the house, had caused the homicidal death of the wife and to conceal evidence, had burnt her dead body. He was convicted for offences under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[22]

Wife Shielding Husband--Permissibility

Under the law, a wife is completely privileged in the matter of disclosing any communication made by her husband to her during the subsistence of their marriage. It is the policy of the law as well that a wife should not be guilty of harbouring her felonious husband because the law conceives a legal unity between the spouses. No doubt it cannot be said that if a wife causes the disappearance of the evidence of a crime committed by her husband she will not be guilty under s 201, IPC . But where the wife finds the dead body of a person who has been murdered by her husband in the house, but, without removing the dead body, locks up the door and does not allow anyone to enter the house in the absence of her husband, she cannot be said to commit an offence under this section. From her refusal to disclose information, no inference can be deduced, so as to ascribe to her any criminal intention or motive.[23] Where there is not an iota of evidence on record, not even a whisper to the effect that it was the wife of the accused who helped him in concealing or causing the evidence of the commission of the offence to disappear, simply because she is the wife of the accused and as such is supposed to be living in the same house, it cannot be assumed that she was guilty of the offence under ss 201 and 34, IPC .[24] The accused may or may not have taken her help in concealing the dead body. Her being the wife of the accused is not sufficient to prove the charge under ss 201 and 34, IPC against her.[25]

34. 'Giving False Information with Intention to Screen Offender'--Meaning of Sections 201 and 203 contemplates the giving of information in respect of an offence which the accused person knows or believes to be false. For the offence under this section the false information should also be furnished with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment. Unlike s 182 which deals with giving false information to any public servant, this section and s 203 do not refer to whom the false information should be given; it would include private persons as well as public servants including the police.[26] For the application of this part of the section, the false information need not be given to the police or a magistrate.[27] It is immaterial whether the information is volunteered or given in reply to inquiries.[28] A person is guilty under this section if he gives any information in respect of an offence which he1533 knows or believes to be false.[29] If any person gives the first information statement to the police, even though not voluntarily, which is recorded under s 154, CrPC and if it ultimately turns out to be false, it would amount to giving false information and the offender would be punishable under s 201, IPC provided the requisite intention is proved.[30] Where the accused, driver of lorry, caused the death of the cleaner, crushed the head by running the vehicle over the head of the deceased twice in order to screen evidence and gave false statement that the cleaner deceased had got down from the lorry for the purpose of taking tea, he was convicted under ss 201 and 302, IPC .[31]

Keeping silence about the commission of offence

Where a suspect dies in police station, but the police officials keep silence, and do not disclose or divulge facts about the cause of death, it indicates that the accused police official caused disappearance of the evidence to screen the real offenders, such that accused police officials commit offence under s 201, IPC .[32]

Refusal to Give Information

There is, however, a distinction between a case of refusing to give correct information and a case of giving false information. Where an accused refuses to give information, his act does not amount to giving false information and he cannot be convicted under s 201 .[33] The information given to a neighbour that someone died, cannot be taken as false. It will become false only if it is shown that the cause of the death was stated to be anything other than what actually happened. A mere omission to narrate the circumstances of the death cannot be taken as false information. It must be proved that an offence was committed. The accused must know or have reason to believe that the offence has been committed. With such knowledge or belief, he must give information respecting the offence which he knows or believes to be false. So also the accused must have acted with the intention of screening the offender. The intention must be to screen the offender, whether himself or somebody else, from legal punishment.[34] It is not necessary that the offender himself should have been found guilty of the main offence for the purpose of convicting him of an offence under s 201 . Nor is it absolutely necessary that somebody else should have been found guilty of the main offence. Nonetheless, it is imperative that the prosecution should have established two premises. First, that an offence has been committed and second, that the accused knew about it or he had reasons to believe the commission of that offence. Then and then alone the prosecution can succeed provided the remaining postulates of the offence are also established.[35] Where the offence of the murder of his wife by the accused, with the assistance of somebody else had already taken place and the co-accused, is the father of the accused, was not one of the participants, he at least knew that the lady had been murdered as he was living in the same house. The severe beating given to the lady must have caused enough noise because she had been definitely resisting, as appeared from the injuries that she had sustained on the hand. Then she was hanged and this could not be done without the1534 assistance of some other member of the family. Hence, it would be reasonable to hold that the co-accused knew or had reason to believe that the offence of murder had been committed and with that knowledge and belief he directed the choukidar to go and lodge a report about a suicide by the deceased, a fact which he must be held to have believed to be false. The only reason for all this could be that he wanted to screen the offender namely, his sons from legal punishment. There is no evidence to show that the accused and his mother did anything which might attract s 201 to their case. The charge under s 201, IPC was clearly established against the co-accused and it was not so established against the accused and his mother.[36] The accused persons, with a definite intention, calculatively poured kerosene oil on the person of the deceased to give a colour of suicidal death. In doing so, the accused number 1 and number 2 were deeply interested. They did this to escape from justice inasmuch as they are also guilty for the offence punishable under s 201 of the Indian Penal Code . It was held that giving false explanation in the incriminating circumstances shows the involvement of the accused in the crime.[37]

The accused had strangulated his deceased wife and threw her dead body into the well. The accused took the plea that the deceased fell into the well accidentally. After the body of the deceased was taken out from the well, no water came out from her mouth when her dead body was pressed. The defence theory of accidental fall was ruled out. The accused was convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[38]

Where the husband of the accused died and at the time of his death, the accused wife and their minor child were the only inmates of the house where the incident occurred, the version of the accused wife was that deceased tried to commit suicide by putting a rope around his neck and while doing so he fell on a blunt object and died. However, on a subsequent discovery and search, a crow bar was found from the said house with human blood on it which proved to be the blood of the deceased. The circumstances under which the deceased died were within the special knowledge of the accused wife and so the falsity of information given by her cannot but warrant a punishment under s 201, IPC, since there was a deliberate attempt on her part to screen the offender from legal punishment by way of providing false information regarding the offence.[39] Appellant 1 husband and his second wife appellant 2 committed the murder of the wife of the appellant 1 and buried the dead body of the deceased in the cattle shed of the house. The prosecution witnesses deposed before the Court that the two appellants were present in the house on the day of the incident. The two appellants failed to furnish any explanation as to how the deceased was murdered and how the dead body was buried in the cattle shed. On the pointing out of the accused appellants, the dead body of the deceased was recovered. The two appellants were convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[40]

There was convincing and trustworthy evidence of the witnesses that after committing the murder of the child, the appellant accused concealed the dead body. It was the appellant and the appellant alone who caused the death of the deceased, an innocent child, by strangulating him and then concealing his body inside a tin box in1535 the inner room of the quarter exclusively occupied by the appellant. Appellant accused was convicted under ss 302 and 201, IPC .[41]

In the case of Kalawati v State of Himachal Pradesh [42] the accused made a statement to a head constable that some unknown dacoits had invaded her house, killed her husband and robbed her of jewellery. This statement which was treated as first information statement was found on investigation to be false, and it was proved that she knowingly gave the false information to screen the real offender who was her paramour. She was, therefore, convicted under this section.

In an old case, it had been held by the Calcutta High Court that a person who gives false information to the police, accusing another of an offence of murder in order to screen the real offender, commits offences not only under ss 201 and 203, IPC but also under s 211 .[43]

But where the first information has already been laid and investigation already started, the witnesses who are questioned by the police cannot be proceeded against under ss 182, 201 or 203, for giving false information.[44]

Screening of Specified Offender not Necessary

To convict a person under s 201, IPC, it is not necessary that the accused should be aware of the identity of the offender whom he intends to screen. It is sufficient if he had the knowledge that by this act he was likely to save a person from legal punishment. There is nothing in s 201 to require the prosecution to prove that the accused intended to screen a specified offender,[45] or the offender must be named or identified or convicted of the principal offence.[46]

35. Notwithstanding Acquittal under Section 302 , IPC, Accused can be Convicted under Section 201,IPC .

Even though the accused has been acquitted under s 302, IPC, his conviction under s 201, IPC is permissible.[47]

36. Procedure

The offence under cl 1 of this section is cognizable or non-cognizable according as the offence in relation to which the disappearance of evidence is caused is cognizable or non-cognizable. It is bailable and triable by a court of session. An offence under cl 2 is non-cognizable, bailable and triable by a magistrate of the first class. The offence under cl 3 is also non-cognizable and bailable and is triable by the court by which the principal offence is triable.

There is no period of limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under cl 1. The period of limitation for taking cognizance of an offence falling under cl 2 is three1536 years and for an offence under cl 3, the period of limitation may be one year or three years depending on the sentence provided for the offence committed.

No complaint of the court is required for taking cognizance of an offence punishable under this section.

37. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate,etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:
> That you (*) on or about the.....day of.....at .....knowing (or having reason to believe) that a certain offence, to wit.....punishable with....has been committed, did cause certain evidence of the said offence to disappear, to wit.....(or knowingly gave false information, to wit.....) with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 201 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

In a complaint filed under s 201, there was not a single word as to what existing evidence was destroyed by the accused individually or conjointly, in respect of an offence which was already committed, with the intention of screening the offender. Therefore, on the averment of the complainant himself in the complaint no court could have taken cognizance of an offence under s 201, IPC . It was held that the complaint, in respect of an offence under s 201, IPC is liable to be quashed on the ground that there is not even the slightest allegation to constitute an offence.[48]

Where the deceased died out of electric shock received from the naked electric wire laid down by the respondents and the respondents threw the dead body near the road, prima facie case for framing charges under ss 304 and 201, IPC was made out, thus, the order of discharge was set aside.[49]

Where looking at the condition of the patient, the accused doctor had given treatment and thereafter referred the patient for further treatment to a government hospital, the accused had not committed any offence. There was no ingredient available in the charge sheet and the allegation levelled by the prosecution for establishing the second ingredient that the accused was knowing or had reason to believe that the offence was committed was also not proved. The third ingredient that the accused must either cause any evidence of commission of that offence to disappear or give any information respecting the offence which he knew or believed to be false was also not present. The applicant had not given any incorrect or false information to anybody and also did not cause the disappearance of evidence of any offence. As per the direction of the Supreme Court above it was the duty of the accused doctor to give the patient who was brought to her hospital in serious condition immediate treatment. However, no prima facie case worth punishable under s 201, IPC was made out against the accused. Therefore, framing of the charge for the said offence by the trial court was quashed.[50]1537

Where the allegation against the accused was that he removed and made the weapon of the offence disappear, there was no evidence that the accused had gone to the spot of recovery and retrieved the weapon of offence, the disclosure statement of the accused was inadmissible in the absence of any recovery, and hence no charge could be proved under s 201 read with s 120, IPC against the co-accused on that count.[51]

Also the commentary under the head 'whoever' on the point of charge may be referred to.

Charge in the Alternative--Applicability of Section 354(2) , CrPC

The proper approach in such cases should be that a person be charged first with having committed a murder and in the alternative, if the evidence does not show that he has committed the murder, for causing evidence to disappear with the intention of screening the offender; in other words, of having been an accessory after the fact. If he is acquitted of murder, he can be convicted of the offence under this section.[52] It has been held that where a person is charged under ss 302 and 201, the sessions judge should not record a finding of acquittal on the charge under this section without going into that question and taking the evidence into consideration, on the mere ground that the accused has been convicted under s 302 . If the evidence discloses an offence under this section, he may be convicted under it even if acquitted under s 302 or when the appellate court sets aside the conviction under s 302 .[53] But in an appeal before them, their Lordships of the Privy Council have held that the proper avenue of approach in such a case is first and foremost, to consider whether the case under s 302 has been made out. If so, that is an end of the matter. If, on the other hand, the case under that section is not made out, then and only then, would it be proper to consider whether an offence under s 201 has been established.[54] Where the charge is framed in the alternative in respect of offences under ss 302 and 201, a position may arise as contemplated by s 72, IPC . It may be open to the court to give the judgment that a person is guilty of one of the several offences specified in the judgment, but that it is doubtful of which of these offences he is guilty. Such a finding is in accordance with s 254(2), CrPC[55] and will have the consequence that under s 72, IPC, the offender is to be punished for the offence for which the lowest punishment is provided, the same punishment not being provided for all.[56]

38. Proof

In order to bring home an offence under this section, the prosecution has to prove:

(a) that an offence has been committed;
(b) that the accused knew or had reason to believe the commission of such offence;1538
(c) that with such knowledge or belief he--

  (i) caused any evidence of the commission of that offence to disappear, or
  (ii) gave any information respecting that offence which he then knew or believed to be false; and

(d) that he did so as aforesaid with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment; and
(e) if the charge be of an aggravated form, it must be proved further that the offence, in respect of which the accused did, as in (iii) and (iv) was punishable with death, or with imprisonment for life or imprisonment extending to ten years.[57]

Where the charge against police officers, accused numbers 14-17, was that as a part of a criminal conspiracy with Bhai Thakur and his men, they had caused the evidence of the commission of the offence to disappear and by that dishonest investigation had tried to screen the real offenders from legal punishment, they were held to have committed offences punishable under ss 201, 217 and 218 read with s 120B, IPC and also under TADA. However, except the confessional statement of a co-accused, there was no other independent evidence to show the involvement of the accused numbers 14-17 as alleged the confession, no doubt, created a strong suspicion that these accused numbers 14-17 were maintaining good relations with Bhai Thakur and they had possibly helped Bhai Thakur and Manik Patil in screening the real offender. However, it was not safe to convict them on the basis of the confession of a co-accused.[58]

Where the prosecution case was that the appellant accused kidnapped a 12 year old girl, raped her, committed her murder and threw her dead body in the bushes, the evidence of last seen was found not reliable, and the identify of the appellant accused not being fully established, the appellant accused was not convicted of offences under ss 363, 376, 302 and 201, IPC .[59]

Where evidence was lacking to show that the appellant accused T had beheaded the deceased or concealed the blood stained head part of the deceased in a cave in the forest, the appellant accused T was acquitted of the charge under s 201 read with s 34, IPC .[60]

Where the oral evidence of the PWS that the appellant accused after committing the murder of his brother-in-law had dumped the dead body of the deceased in the septic tank was found not reliable, appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 201, IPC .[61]

An offence under this section is established when the approver's deposition relating to the offence, is coupled with very reliable material in proof of the recovery of the dead body of the deceased at the instance of the accused and the recovery is1539 believed by the court for good reasons.[62] Where there was no evidence to show that any attempt was made by the appellants A and G to destroy the evidence of rape, they were acquitted of the charge under s 201 read with s 34, IPC .[63]

In one case, charges against the accused were of offences of criminal conspiracy and causing the disappearance of evidence, under ss 120B and 201, IPC respectively, and the evidence on record corroborated the evidence of the approver. The Apex Court upheld the conviction of the accused for these offences.[64]

This Offence can be Proved by Circumstantial Evidence

An offence under this section can also be established by circumstantial evidence.[65] The fact that a photographer had been sent for and his arrival was awaited before the discovery of the dead bodies tells its own story. The police were so sure about the dead bodies that they had decided to secure the presence of a photographer beforehand. The fact that they were so sure about the presence of the dead bodies is suggestive that the presence of the dead bodies was known to them already. It was held that the prosecution evidence regarding the alleged recovery of the dead bodies at the instance of the accused does not inspire confidence and their conviction under s 201, IPC, was not maintainable.[66]

Where the accused made a statement to the sub-inspector that he had buried the dead body of his wife in the forest, which statement was not admissible in evidence under s 27 Evidence Act as the police sub-inspector had already come to house on the basis of a prior first information report by prosecution witness 1 that the dead body of the wife of the accused had been buried in the forest, there could not be any conviction under s 201, IPC on the basis of evidence which was legally inadmissible.[67]

39. Conviction when Accused not Found Guilty of Main Offence

The fact that since the accused persons have been acquitted of the primary charges, recording of guilt under ss 201 and 34 of the Indian Penal Code, which were the ancillary charges, was not of much consequence. So the accused persons are entitled to be acquitted on the charges under ss 201 and 34 Indian Penal Code 1860 as well.[68] The charge under s 201, IPC, namely the destruction of evidence relating to the commission of an offence is intrinsically interlinked with the first head of charge1540 under s 302, Indian Penal Code 1860 and it was submitted that if the first charge fails, automatically the conviction under the second head would also have to go. In the majority of cases this position would hold good. There could, however, be a category of cases in which the charge under s 201, IPC, could result in an independent conviction even if for technical reasons the charge as regards the main offence has not resulted in a conviction. Undoubtedly, this would be in a microscopically small number of cases.[69]

In Reg v Kashinath Dinkar ,[70] the illustration appended to this section was relied on for showing that the section was intended to apply exclusively to a person other than the offender himself. But illustrations rank only as cases decided on the section;[71] and it has often been decided that they ought never to be allowed to control the plain meaning of the section itself.[72] The true principle seems to be that there is no law preventing the main offender from being convicted under ss 201 - 203, but in practice no court will convict an accused both of the main offence and under these sections. It has been held that where in a case of murder, the disposal of the bodies is a separate transaction from the murder, the conviction of the murderers under this section in addition to a conviction under s 302 is not illegal, although a separate sentence is not called for.[73] In a particular case, notwithstanding that the accused was acquitted of offences under ss 304B and 498A, IPC he has to be convicted of the offence punishable under s 201, IPC inasmuch as the body of the deceased who had committed suicide was cremated without informing the police.[74] There is no quarrel with the legal principle that notwithstanding acquittal with reference to offence under s 302, IPC, conviction under s 201 is permissible, in a given case.[75]

If the commission of the main offence by the accused is not brought home to him, then he can be convicted under ss 201 - 203 .[76] A conviction on a charge of having been an accessory to an offence under s 201 is not illegal merely because it is suspected, but not proved or admitted, that the accused committed, or was one of the several persons, who committed the principal offence.[77] In Nazru v Emperor ,[78] it was remarked:

> We are not prepared to propound the extreme view that mere suspicion that an individual is the actual murderer would prevent his conviction under section 201 , Indian Penal Code, on proof that he had made away with evidence of murder, and we do not think that the rulings, all of which deal with the special circumstances of particular cases go so far as that. We think that if there is clear and independent proof that any person has caused evidence to disappear in order to screen some 'person or persons unknown', the mere fact that the had been suspected, or even tried and acquitted of the crime itself, would not, in itself, prevent his conviction under section 201 . A person1541 who has been acquitted of a crime is in the eye of the law not the principal offender, who, if no one has been convicted, would be some person unknown.

40. Conviction when Main Accused is Acquitted of Main Offence

When the main accused is acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC, conviction of a co-accused under s 201, IPC cannot be sustained.[79]

But subsequently the same Apex Court took a contrary view when it held that it was not absolutely necessary that somebody else should have been found guilty of the main offence so as to convict the accused under s 201, IPC .[80]

Mere removal of the dead body at the instance of the main accused from one place to another would not amount to causing disappearance of evidence particularly when main accused was ultimately acquitted of not only principal offence under s 304 but also offence under s 201 .[81]

When the main accused against whom the allegations were levied under ss 302, 201,c109 and 34, Indian Penal Code 1860 were acquitted and only the allegation against the petitioner accused was that he assisted in cremating the body, in such circumstances, it was held that the order taking cognizance under s 201 cannot be sustained, so the proceedings against the absconding accused were quashed under s 482 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[82]

41. Conviction--Two Premises

It is not necessary that the offender himself should have been found guilty of the main offence for the purpose of convicting him of an offence under s 201 . Nor is it absolutely necessary that somebody else should have been found guilty of the main offence. Nonetheless, it is imperative that prosecution should have established two premises. First is that an offence has been committed and second is that the accused knew about it or he had reasons to believe the commission of that offence. Then and then alone the prosecution can succeed, provided the remaining postulates of the offence are also established.[83]

42. Conviction without Charge

Even if there is no charge under s 201, a man may be convicted of the offence under it if the evidence is such as to establish a charge that might have been made[84] and where a person is acquitted of the charge of murder and other cognate charges, with which he is charged, his conviction under s 201 without any further charge is not illegal.[85]1542

A Division Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court has also held that it is a well settled proposition that where a charge under s 302, IPC has been framed and the prosecution has failed to prove the same and where the screening of offence has been made out and the accused person has got knowledge about the death and purposely misled the police and public, conviction under s 201, IPC can be made even without framing a charge.[86]

43. Accused Charged under Sections 302 , 201, 324 and 34, IPC can be Convicted under Sections 302 and 201,IPC

Even if charge has been framed under ss 302, 201, 324 and 34, IPC conviction can be made under ss 302 and 201, IPC unless prejudice is shown to have been caused to the accused.[87]

44. Sentence

The offence under this section is not punishable more severely than the principal offence. The punishment varies according to the gravity of the offence and the punishment for the principal offence. The erroneous belief or delusion of the accused does not furnish the measure of punishment under this section.[88]

The first paragraph of the section contains the postulates for constituting the offence while the remaining three paragraphs prescribe three different tiers of punishments depending upon the degree of offence in each situation. The two indispensable ingredients for all the three tiers in s 201, IPC are: (a) the accused should have had the knowledge that an offence has been committed or at least that he should have had reasons to believe so; and (b) he should then have caused the disappearance of the evidence of the commission of that offence. The prosecution cannot escape from establishing the aforesaid two basic ingredients for conviction of the accused under s 201 .

The gravest degree contemplated in s 201 is punishable with the maximum sentence of imprisonment for seven years. The minimum requirement for the offences to reach the said peak degree is that the offender should have caused the disappearance of evidence of another offence which is punishable with death, and that should be established in addition to the above mentioned two basic ingredients.

Even if the two basics are established, and the prosecution failed to establish the next requirement, the court cannot convict the accused for the highest sentence specified in the section.[89]

Before a person may be convicted of an offence under this section, it must be found what the original offence committed was, evidence of which was done away with, and before he could be sentenced thereunder, the part of this section applicable to the case must be determined. Without doing this, a conviction and sentence under this section cannot be sustained.[90]1543

In a case of gangrape and murder of a minor girl where the accused caused the evidence of commission of the offence to disappear with the intention of screening themselves from punishment, their conviction under s 201, IPC was upheld and since they knew that the offence committed by them was punishable with death, they could be punished under s 201, pt II, IPC with imprisonment upto seven years, and their sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment each under this provision was confirmed.[91]

45. Sentence Undergone

Considering the fact that all the appellants accused were above 70 years of age, and they were not connected with the first part of the occurrence, in the interest of justice, sentence was reduced to the period already undergone. One appellant had been in custody for about five months and another appellant had been in custody for three months fifteen days.[92]

A person causing the disappearance of the evidence of two offences commits two separate offences under this section. But the court should not ordinarily award two separate punishments for the same act constituting two such offences under this section.[93] The court should not also award the maximum sentence in each and every case. Unless there are very aggravating circumstances, a sentence of three to five years in cases falling under cl 1 would meet the ends of justice though there cannot be any hard and fast rule about it.[94] In Sugni v State of Rajasthan ,[95] the appellant, when her appeal was heard by the High Court, was aged about 64 years and remained under custody for a period of eight months and ten days. Looking at her old age, her sentence of three years simple imprisonment was reduced to the period of her custody.

The Division Bench of the same Rajasthan High Court in Heeru Das v State of Rajasthan , where the age of the accused lady was 83 years, reduced her sentence under s 201, IPC to the period already undergone, keeping in view the age of the accused.[96] Keeping in view the age and family background of the accused, sentence of five years imposed by the Courts below was reduced to two years RI.[97]

In case of dowry death, where the appellants accused were relatives of the husband of the deceased, and the accused had already served 10 months imprisonment during trial, the occurrence being 12 years old, sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[98]

In the Mumbai Bomb Blast case, the co-accused *A*124 was convicted under s 25(1-B), Arms Act and s 201, IPC for destroying the arms of the co-accused. The co-accused was aged 82 years, so, considering his age and also the fact that there was no substantive evidence for convicting him for offence under s 25(1-A) of the Arms Act,1544 the Supreme Court reduced the sentence to one year and also directed that the sentences shall run concurrently.[1]

The sentence of a woman accused and convicted under s 201, IPC was reduced by the Apex Court from 7 years rigorous imprisonment to already undergone imprisonment of about four years and eight months.[2] Where the accused was 18 years of age and staying with her brothers at the time of the incident, the possibility of his having been pressurised by his brothers for causing the disappearance of evidence cannot be ruled out and on these facts and circumstance, the sentence of seven years of imprisonment awarded to the accused was reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone by him.[3]

Where the accused persons convicted under ss 201 and 120B, IPC were government employees, their substantive sentence was reduced to the period of imprisonment which they had already undergone.[4]

46. Probation

The accused 1 had committed rape on his cousin, his wife, accused 2, when apprised by the prosecutrix, asked her not to disclose the incident to any one and cleaned the blood stained clothes of the prosecutrix, blood stained door, took her to the hospital for medical aid, and informed her parents also. Considering the conduct of the accused, she was granted probation under s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958.[5]

2 Substituted by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Sch., for 'transportation for life' (wef 1-1-1956).

Intentional omission to give information of offence by person bound to inform.--

Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed, intentionally omits to give any information respecting that offence which he is legally bound to give, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with an offence of not giving any information,[6] and punishes those who knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed, and1545 being legally bound to give information respecting it, intentionally omit to give that information.

This section should be read with ss 39 and 40 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973. Under s 39 of the said Code every person is bound to give information of the commission of certain offences or of the intention of any other person to commit the same to the nearest magistrate or police officer. Under s 40 of the same Code, every officer employed in connection with the affairs of a village and every person residing in a village are also bound to give some such information. This section penalises the intentional omission to do so. Section 39 of the CrPC mentions the offences of which every person, who is aware of the commission of or of the intention of any other person to commit the same, is bound to give an information to the nearest magistrate or police officer, and his failure to do so is made punishable under s 202 of this Code. The crime of murder is one such offence of which every person is required, under the law, to give an information, either to the magistrate, or to the police at once.[7]

Unless the alleged offence(s) come within cl (i) to cl (xii) of sub-s (1) of s 39, CrPC, an offence under s 202, IPC is not attracted. As the offence under ss 363, 465, 466 and 471, IPC did not come within cl (i) to cl (xii) of sub-s (1) of s 39, CrPC, s 202, IPC would not be attracted in the case.[8]

For considering the application of ss 201 and 202, we cannot take as the basis the subsequent result of the trial as to whether the offences were proved or not. It is enough if the evidence shows that the evidence is caused to disappear and there is an intentional omission to give information on the basis of the information available at that point of time indicating that the accused knew or had reason to believe that offences had been committed.[9]

2. Analogous Law

Sections 202 and 203 are very similar to ss 118 - 20, 176, 177 and 182. These groups of sections may be thus distinguished. Sections 202 and 203 refer only to cases where offences have actually been committed, the motive of the accused being immaterial;[10] whereas under ss 118 - 120, the fact concealed is a design to commit an offence, and the motive is to facilitate the commission thereof. Sections 176 and 177 are much wider, inasmuch as they refer to 'information on any subject', and under s 182 the motive is to cause a public servant to use his lawful powers to the injury or annoyance of others. Sections 176, 177 and 182 contemplate only information given to public servants, ss 201 - 203 contemplate information given to private persons as well as to public servants.[11]

3. Essentials

This section punishes the illegal omission of those who, under law, are bound to give information in respect of an offence which he is legally bound to give particularly,1546 being the head of the family.[12] To constitute an offence under this section (a) the accused must have had knowledge or reason to believe, that an offence has been committed; (b) he must be legally bound to give information respecting that offence, and (c) he must have intentionally omitted to give such information.[13]

4. 'Whoever'--Principal Offender not Included

It has been held that the word 'whoever' in this section means any person other than the offender. It has no application to the person who is alleged to have committed the principal offence because there is no law which casts a duty on a criminal to give information which would incriminate himself.[14]

However, the fact that the accused himself was made an accused in other offences subsequently does not absolve him of his complexity in respect of the offence punishable under s 202, IPC .[15]

5. An Offence must have been Committed

This section can apply only where, in the first instance, an offence has been committed. There can be no conviction for intentional omission to give information of an offence which has not been proved to have been committed.[16] It is necessary for the prosecution to establish the main offence before making a person liable under this offence.[17]

Where a police patel failed to report the arrival of dacoits at his village and supplied them with food and drink, it was held that he could not be convicted under this section as there was nothing to show that an offence was committed by the person who visited his village.[18]

The commentary on this point under s 201 may be referred to.

6. 'Knowing or having Reason to Believe that an Offence has been Committed'--Mere Probability Not Enough

After an offence is committed, this section can be applicable only where the accused 'knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed' intentionally omits to give information of the crime.[19] It must be shown that the1547 accused knew or had reason to believe that an offence had been committed, that he might have though it very probable is not enough.[20]

When a doctor gives treatment to an injured assailant involved in a crime, but does not inform the police about the commission of the crime, he commits offence under s 202, IPC .[21]

Where no material had been placed on record to show that the accused doctors knew that in the burn injuries of the victim lady, some offence was involved, these doctors cannot be convicted under s 202, IPC for non-furnishing of information to the police about the admission of the burnt patient.[22]

The commentary under s 201 may be referred to.

7. Intention is Gist of the Offence

The main consideration under this section is whether the omission is intentional. There may be knowledge or a reason to believe that an offence has been committed; there may also be an omission to give any information, but it is clear that the gist of the offence is the intention.[23] A request by a villager to the Ywagaung, to whom an offence has been reported, not to report the offence, is not such an intentional omission to give information as deserves punishment under this section.[24]

Where the accused had knowledge or atleast had reason to believe that an offence has been committed even if, at that stage he thought that it was only a suicide, therefore it was his binding duty, particularly as the head of the family, to inform the authorities, he omitted to do so and on the other hand, he told others that the deceased was still alive but her condition was serious. The accused told the brother of the deceased that the body would be cremated and he intended to do so without informing the authorities. All the ingredients of s 202 were made out against the accused and he clearly committed the offence under this section at that stage.[25]

Where from the fact of the police patel ordering the kulkarni to write a report regarding a suspicious death in his village, his good faith was apparent, and it did not seem that he had an intention to omit the report, it was not proper to convict him under this section for an intention to evade the law about the first report.[26]

8. Reasonable Excuse--Whether a Defence

This section deals with the negative offence of not giving any information.[27] A person is not bound to give information of a murder of which he is aware, if he has reasonable excuse for not making a report, as where the accused had no reason to believe that his informant had himself committed the offence when he came and told him of the murder as having been committed by someone else and where there was clearly no attempt at concealment of the fact of murder, and where the probability, as1548 it would present itself to the mind of the accused at the moment, was that the husband of the murdered woman, after giving the alarm to his neighbours, would go on to the police station.[28]

Certain wheat was stolen from the grain-pit of the accused who was a lambardar. He did not report the theft to the police. It was held that as he was bound to give such information to the police under s 90, CrPC 1872, and he was rightly convicted of an offence under s 202, IPC .[29]

9. 'Legally Bound'

Commentary under s 176, ante may be referred to.

10. 'Offence'

The word 'offence' in this section has to be interpreted in the light of the explanation to s 203, IPC .

11. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable. Summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by any magistrate. The magistrate, mentioned in s 260, CrPC may also try an offence under this section in a summary way and offence under s 202, IPC is a bailable offence.[30]

The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is one year.[31]

It is clear that an offence under s 202, IPC cannot be tried alongwith the charge of ss 306 and 498A, IPC . It doesn't fall under s 223, CrPC or with any other provision thereof. The accused could not be tried jointly in the assumed offence in the s 202, IPC alongwith those who committed an offence under s 306 or s 498A, IPC .[32]

12. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) do hereby charge you (name of the accused), as follows:

That you (*) knowing, or having reason to believe that on or about the.....day of ..... At..... the offence of .....was committed (by.....), intentionally committed to give information respecting its commission, which you were legally bound to give and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 202 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

The offence under this section cannot be treated as a minor offence included under s 201, because an essential ingredient of the offence under this section is the legal duty of the accused to give information, which is no part of the offence under s 201 . Consequently, an accused against whom only a charge under s 201 is framed cannot1549 be convicted of an offence under this section without a charge to that effect being framed against him.[33]

13. Proof

This section punishes the illegal omission of those who are bound by law to give information in respect of an offence. Under this provision it is necessary for the prosecution to prove:

(a) that the accused had knowledge or reason to believe that some offence had been committed;
(b) that the accused had intentionally omitted to give information respecting that offence; and
(c) that the accused was legally bound to give the information.[34]

For a conviction under the section, the prosecution has to prove the following facts:

(a) that the offence of which no information was given, was committed;[35]
(b) that the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that such offence had been committed;
(c) that he omitted to give information thereof;
(d) that such omission was intentional; and
(e) that the accused was legally bound to give the information which he omitted to give.[36]

Proof of intention as well as omission is essential.[37] In a prosecution under s 202 of the IPC, it is necessary for the prosecution to establish the main offence before making a person liable under this section.[38]

An offence under s 202, IPC has also to be proved beyond reasonable doubt.[39]

The body of the deceased may give certain clues as to cruelty and harassment and consequently, the destruction of the body without information to the police should attract the provisions of ss 201 and 202, IPC .[40]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 203.

Giving false information respecting an offence committed.--

Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed, gives any information respecting that offence which he knows or believes to be false, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.1550

Explanation.--In sections 201 and 202 and in this section the word "offence" includes any act committed at any place out of Indian, which, if committed in India, would be punishable under any of the following sections, namely, 302, 304, 382, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 457, 458, 459 and 460.

Comments

1. Scope

This section penalises the giving of false information respecting an offence. It prohibits the giving of misleading information by persons who may or may not be under a legal obligation to give that information. In this respect it differs from s 202, IPC . The section also does not require that the information be given with any particular intention as under s 202 .

But as observed by Jackson J:

> In order to establish an offence under section 203, it is necessary that there should have been some offence committed; that the accused should have known or had reason to believe that such offence has been committed and that so knowing or believing or having reason to believe that it has been committed he should have given some information respecting that offence which he knew or believed to be false. The object of the legislature is not to insure general veracity or the making of correct statements in regard to supposed, offences, or to offences the commission of which might be falsely or incorrectly reported, but to discourage and punish the giving of false information to the police in regard to offences which had been actually committed, and which the person charged knew or had reason to believe had been actually committed.[41]

The commentary under ss 40 and 201 may be referred to.

2. Legislative Changes

The explanation to this section was added by s 6 of the Indian Criminal Law (Amendment) Act III of 1894. The words 'British India' in the Explanation were substituted by the words 'the Provinces' by the AO 1948. Subsequently by the AO 1950 the words 'the Provinces' were substituted by the words 'the States'. The words 'the States' were ultimately substituted by the word 'India' by Act, 3 of 1951.

3. Analogous Law

The commentary under s 202 may be referred to.1551

4. Ingredients of the Offence

The main ingredients necessary to be satisfied to constitute an offence under s 203 of the Indian Penal Code are:

(a) that an offence has been committed;
(b) that the accused knew or had reason to believe that such an offence had been committed;
(c) that he gave the information with respect to that offence;
(d) that the information so given was false; and
(e) that when he gave such information he knew or believed it to be false.[42]

5. Relative Scope of Sections 177, 182, 201 and 203

See commentary under the same heading in s 182, ante.

6. 'Whoever'--Meaning of

Commentary under s 202 may be referred to.

7. 'Knowing or Having Reason to believe'--Meaning of

Commentary under ss 26 and 201 may be referred to.

A belief that an offence has very probably been committed is not enough.[43]

8. 'Offence'--Meaning of

Under this section 'offence' signifies a thing punishable under the Code, or under any special or local law, and even though it is committed out of India in the cases specified in the explanation.

In one case[44] it was observed, with respect to ss 201, 202 and 203, that 'If a person has reason to believe (refer to s 26, IPC) that an offence has been committed, and acts in the manner described in either of those sections, he would be liable to punishment, even although it might subsequently transpire that he was mistaken in his belief'.

9. False information without knowledge is punishable

By the words 'gives information' is meant volunteering information or at least the making of positive statements.[45] If a person make a false statement, having in all probability, no knowledge whatever on the subject one way or the other--still the offence will equally be a giving of false evidence under the law as he could not have believed what he deposed as true.[46]1552

10. Information must be Proved to be False

A bare perusal of this section shows that the offence under s 203 relates to the giving of a false information about the commission of an offence, though no such offence has been committed. The most essential ingredient for an offence under this section is the giving of information known to be false. The information contemplated under this section must be proved to be false to the knowledge of the accused. Where there was no material on record to show that the petitioner had given a false information, the prosecution of the petitioner under s 203 was held not justified.[47]

A person giving false information to the police, charging another person of an offence of murder in order to screen the real offender, commits offences under ss 201, 203 and 211, IPC .[48] The husband even though knowing that death of his wife was not natural but nevertheless, gives false information in the complaint filed to police, is liable to be convicted under s 203 .[49]

Appellant accused had beaten his wife brutally leading to her death, but he made false declaration before the police that his wife had fallen down from the water tank due to sickness and had died. The testimony of the child witness and the medical evidence was found reliable, thus, he was convicted for offence under s 203, IPC .[50]

11. Statement to Police During Investigation Not Information

Section 203 is not intended to apply to the case of a person who gives false evidence as a witness to the police in the course of investigation, and that too in reply to questions put to him.[51] A statement made by a witness to the police does not amount to 'information' within the meaning of the word as used in this section.

A complaint to prosecute petitioners/accused for the offence under s 203 of the IPC would lie only in a case where such accused had voluntarily given false information in respect of an offence committed knowing or believing it to be false. Statement given by the accused to the police during investigation of the crime and recorded under s 161 of the Code, even if it is false, will not constitute an offence under s 203 of the IPC . Criminal proceedings against the petitioners for offence under s 203, IPC being abuse of the process of the Court, were quashed on petition under s 482, CrPC .[52]

12. Procedure

The procedure will be same as in the case of an offence under s 202 .

The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

13. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:1553

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, knowing or having reason to believe that on or about the.....day of....., at ....., the offence of .....was committed, (gave information respecting the said offence) committed the offences punishable under section 203 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

14. Proof

To prove an offence under this section the prosecution has to prove:

(a) that an offence was committed;[53]
(b) that the accused knew or had reason to believe that such offence had been committed; and
(c) that he gave information which he knew or believed to be false.[54]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 204.

Destruction of [55][document or electronic record] to prevent its production as evidence.--

Whoever secretes or destroys any [56][document or electronic record] which he may be lawfully compelled to produce as evidence in a Court of Justice, or in any proceeding lawfully held before a public servant, as such, or obliterates or renders illegible the whole or any part of such [57][document or electronic record] with the intention of preventing the same from being produced or used as evidence before such Court or public servant as aforesaid, or after he shall have been lawfully summoned or required to produce the same for that purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.1554

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with secreting, destruction and obliteration of a document to prevent its production as evidence. Section 175 , IPC deals only with the omission to produce or deliver a document to a public servant, but this section requires the secreting, destruction or obliteration of a document to prevent the same from being produced or used as evidence.

To secrete or destroy or obliterate a document, which can be used as evidence, would be causing a disappearance of evidence. Section 201 deals with the causing of the disappearance of evidence, but it is limited to causing disappearance of evidence of the commission of an offence which has been committed. This section is not so limited. The evidence caused to disappear may be relevant in any proceeding, civil, criminal or revenue.

Section 477 also deals with secreting, destruction or defacing of a document but it is limited only to three kinds of documents. The document secreted, destroyed or obliterated must be a will or an authority to adopt or a valuable security. But there is no such limitation with this section. The document contemplated by it may be any document which may be used as evidence in any proceeding. But it must be a document which the offender may be compelled to produce in evidence.[58] If in a case under s 477 it is found that the document destroyed is not one of the three kinds of documents mentioned therein, the case may still fall under s 204 .[59] Again the secreting, destruction or obliteration must be with the intention of preventing the document from being used as evidence.

2. Legislative Changes

The word 'document' has been substituted by words 'document or electronic record' by Information Technology Act 2000, s 91 and Sch. I wef 17 October 2000.

3. Essential Ingredients

The essential ingredients of the offence under this section are: (a) that the accused secreted, destroyed or obliterated a document; (b) that he was legally compellable to produce that document as evidence in a proceeding lawfully held before a public servant;[60] and (c) that the secreting, destruction or obliteration was with the intention of preventing the document from being used as evidence.

4. Meaning of Secretion of Document

The expression 'secretes any document' means to put the document into a place of concealment or not to make it known or exposed to view. A person may secrete a document not only when the existence of the document is unknown to other persons and for the purpose of preventing the existence of the document coming to the knowledge of anybody, but also when the existence of the document is known to others. In the latter case he may secrete it for the purpose, for example, of preventing it from being produced in evidence or for the purpose of raising difficulties in the way of its being produced in evidence. But it is not necessarily enough to show that1555 upon an occasion upon which it became his duty to produce the document, he failed to discharge that duty, though this may be a cogent piece of evidence in certain circumstances. The fact that a man perjures himself by denying the existence of a document which to his knowledge, is in his custody would be a still more cogent piece of evidence. But whether the offence of secreting the document is committed or not must depend in each case upon the facts.[61] An honest refusal to produce a document is obviously not a 'secretion' of a document within the meaning of the section. But where there is a refusal coupled with a secret dealing with the document or with a dealing intended to be kept secret, it amounts to an offence under this section.[62]

5. Mere Refusal May Amount to Secretion

The Madras High Court has, however, held that it is wrong to say that a mere refusal to produce could never amount to secreting, as that term is used in this section. The court must consider the whole case. If a search warrant had been issued, the result of the search and any evidence which may be adduced on behalf of the accused upon that material must be considered and the court must come to a conclusion whether or not there has been any secreting.[63] Before holding a person guilty for refusal to produce a document the provisions contained in ss 130 and 131 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 should also be examined.

6. Snatching a Document May Amount to Secreting

Where the plaintiff in a suit referred to an arbitration by consent, with a view to prevent a witness from referring to an endorsement on a bond (which tended to show that the defendant had paid more than it was allegedly paid by him), snatched up the bond which was lying beside the arbitrator, ran away, and refused to produce it, it was held that the offence committed was not theft, but secreting a document under this section.[64]

7. 'Destroys' any Document--Meaning of

The offence of destroying public reports is a serious one. In the interest of the public, it is necessary that these reports should be recorded faithfully and truly by police officers. It is detrimental to the public interest, peace and tranquillity that offences be concealed by the police and the reports falsely recorded.

8. Non-Production of Original will in the Case Amounts to its Destruction

Where the evidence showed that the will in question was a forged one and was got prepared by the co-accused and relatives of the accused, and this forged will was presented before the sub-registrar for registration by the accused, further evidence showed that the original will was returned to the accused who had not produced it in the case meaning thereby, the same had been destroyed by the accused, hence, the1556 finding of the court below convicting the accused for the offence under s 204, IPC was confirmed.[65]

9. Replacing a False Report after Destroying the Original--Effect of

Where a report of the commission of a dacoity was made at a thana and the police officer in charge of the thana at first took down the report which was made to him, but subsequently destroyed that report and framed another and a false report of the commission of a totally different offence to which he obtained the signature of the complainant and which he endeavoured to pass off as the original and the correct report made to him by the complainant; it was held that on the above facts, the police officer was guilty of the offences under this section for having secreted or destroyed the first signed report.[66] In the course of a certain investigation in a case of theft, a police officer had a certain document drawn up and signed by a panch. When, however, he came to look at this document he found it so disfigured by interlineations and scratches that he thought it desirable to have the document fairly written out again. Therefore, employing the same writer and the same panch, he had the document re-written in textually the same form as the untidy notes which had first been drawn. The rough document was thereupon destroyed and its place was taken by the fair document. It was held that, on a true view of the facts, the fair document, which was preserved and ultimately presented to the court, must be regarded as the only document which the police officer was lawfully compelled to produce as evidence, that the original writing must be regarded merely as rough notes designed for the preparation of the fair original document, and that the conviction of the police officer under this section could not be sustained.[67]

10. 'Document'--Meaning of

Section 29, and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

11. Provisions Compelling Production in Court

Before any proceedings may be taken under this section against the accused, it has to be determined whether the document in question is one which he could be compelled to produce.[68] The legislature has endowed the courts with wide powers of ordering the production of documents necessary for the determination of matters before the court and for directing inspection of those documents. Thus, s 91 of the CrPC empowers a criminal court to issue a summons to a person to produce a document in his possession. So also rr 6 and 7 of O 16 of the Code of Civil Procedure empower a civil court to require a person to produce a document in his possession.

12. Provisions Compelling Production before Public Servants

Not only courts, but some public servants also are, by some provisions of law, empowered to require the production of documents. Thus, under s 171A of the Sea Customs Act 1878,[69] an officer of the customs, duly empowered, has the power to1557 require any person to produce documents in his possessions. So also s 13A of the Bombay Money Lenders' Act 1946, authorises the officers mentioned therein to direct the production of books which they require. An officer in charge of a police station can also require the production of documents before him, if found necessary for investigation etc, as authorised by s 91, CrPC .

Refusal to produce a document without reasonable excuse is punishable under s 175, IPC and also under s 349 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.

13. Whether Accused May be Compelled to Produce a Document

The power to be exercised by a court in summoning a person to produce a document in any criminal proceeding is contained in s 91, CrPC . The word 'person' in sub-s (1) of that section does not include an accused person and no process can, therefore, be issued against him for the production of a document.[70] The accused, therefore, cannot be compelled to produce a document which may be used as an evidence against him.

14. Constitutional Protection to Accused

An accused enjoys full protection in this respect even under art 20 of the Constitution of India . Under art 20(3) of the Constitution 'no person accused of any offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself'. Whether or not the order requiring the production of a document by an accused person is hit by the prohibition contained in art 20(3) of the Constitution would depend upon the nature of that document. If the document is not such as his statement, conveying his personal knowledge relating to the charge against him, he may be called upon by the court to produce that document. But if the order relates to a document which contains any statement of the accused based on his personal knowledge, the order for its production will attract the constitutional bar against testimonial compulsion.[71]

Article 20(3) of the Constitution will come into play only when two facts are established:

(a) the individual concerned was a person accused of an offence; and
(b) he was compelled to be a witness against himself.

If only one of these two facts and not the other is established, the requirements of art 20(3) will not be fulfilled.[72]The law prohibits a summons to be issued under this section against an accused person requiring him to produce documents in support of a prosecution case, as to produce a document in a criminal case in support of the prosecution, is a testimonial act.[73]1558

15. Protection from Civil Proceedings or Future Prosecution not available

The immunity granted by art 20(3) does not extend to civil proceedings. In order that the protection of this article be available to a person, he must be accused of an offence, which would mean that an information is laid against him before an officer or a court entitled to take cognizance of the offence and proceed upon the information to investigate into it. Merely because the evidence might disclose some crime and it might form the subject-matter of a future prosecution, would not enable the person, who is asked to furnish the evidence, to claim protection under that article in any proceedings other than where he is accused of any offence.[74]

16. 'Court of Justice'--Meaning of

Section 20 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

17. 'Public Servant'--Meaning of

Section 21 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

18. Intention under Section 204 Must be to Prevent Production of document

In order to convict a person under this section, it must be proved that he destroyed the document with the intention of preventing it from being used or produced as evidence.[75] The intention of the secretion, destruction, obliteration, etc. must be to prevent the document from being used as evidence,[76] and this intention is presumed conclusively if the secretion, etc. takes place after a lawful requisition to produce the same has been made.

A, a plaintiff in a suit referred to arbitration, snatches up a document and runs away with it, in order to prevent a witness from referring to it. A is guilty under this section.[77]

19. Procedure

The offence is non-cognizable. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The offence is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by a magistrate of the first class. The magistrate, mentioned in s 260 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 may also try an offence under this section in a summary way.

The period of limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

20. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:1559

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....secreted (or destroyed) a document, to wit.....which you could be lawfully compelled to produce as evidence in a court (or in any proceeding lawfully held before a public servant, to wit.....), or obliterated (or rendered illegible) the whole (or a part) of such document after you were lawfully summoned (or required) to produce the same, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 204 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

21. Proof

In order to bring home the guilt under this section the prosecution has to prove:

(a) that the accused secreted or destroyed a document; or that he obliterated, or rendered illegible, the whole or any part of such document;
(b) that he was lawfully compellable to produce the same as evidence (a) in a court of justice or (b) in proceedings lawfully held before a public servant; and
(c) that he did so with the intention of preventing the same from being produced or used as such evidence or he did so after he had been lawfully summoned or required to produce the same for that purpose.

Whoever secretes or destroys any document to prevent its production as evidence is made punishable under s 204, IPC . For establishing such offence, the prosecution has to show that:

(a) the accused secreted or destroyed the document or that he obliterated or rendered illegible the whole or any part of such documents;
(b) the accused did the same with the intention of preventing the same from being produced or used as such evidence or he did the same after he had been lawfully summoned or required to produce the same for that purpose;
(c) the accused was lawfully compellable to produce the same as evidence in a court of justice or in the procedure lawfully held by a public servant.[78]

Where, out of seven accused persons before the trial courts, only the accused numbers 2-4 were convicted under s 204, IPC and the remaining of the accused, including the accused appellant, were convicted under s 204, IPC, read with s 34, IPC . After the appeal and revision to High Court all the accused persons were acquitted and the accused appellant was convicted under s 204, read with s 34, IPC . Even on facts emerged from the evidence, the only part in respect of the offence under s 204, IPC which was attributed to the accused-appellant was that he was present on the scene of occurrence. The Apex Court held that when the accused numbers 2-4, who were convicted for their acts constituting an offence under s 204, IPC had been acquitted of the substantive offence, it was not possible for the Apex Court to sustain the conviction of the accused appellant under s 204 read with s

34, IPC .[79]1560

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 205.

False personation for purpose of act or proceeding in suit or prosecution.--

Whoever falsely personates another, and in such assumed character makes any admission or statement, or confesses judgment, or causes any process to be issued or becomes bail or security, or does any other act in any suit or criminal prosecution, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with a false personation in relation to a suit or a criminal prosecution. The offence under this section consists, not merely in falsely personating another, but in doing certain acts as such assumed character.[1] The act of impersonating the prosecutrix for the purpose of giving evidence in court in sessions trial was an offence under s 205, IPC .[2]Such an act does not fall under ss 419, 420, 467 and 468 of the IPC . Section 419 , IPC relates to punishment for cheating by personation. Cheating is defined under s 415, IPC wherein there has to be a fraudulent or dishonest inducement of any person to deliver any property to any person. Section 420 of the IPC relates to cheating and dishonestly inducing delivery of property. Section 467 , IPC relates to forgery of valuable security, will, etc. and s 468, IPC relates to forgery for purpose of cheating.[3] The section does not require any fraudulent intent.[4] Fraudulent gain or benefit to the offender is not an essential element of the offence of false personation, and a conviction may be upheld even where the personation is with the consent of the person personated.[5] The offence under the section is essentially an offence against public justice and consists in deceiving the court and falsifying its records.

2. Analogous Law

This section deals with false personation for the purpose of doing certain acts in a suit or criminal prosecution. Other cases of false prosecution have been dealt with under ss 140, 170, 171, 171D, 229, 416 and 419, IPC . Section 140 deals with the case of a person who poses to be a soldier, sailor or airman by wearing the garb, or1561 carrying the token, resembling one used by a soldier etc. Section 170 deals with the case of a person pretending to be or falsely personating a public servant. Section 171 speaks of the case of a person who, with fraudulent intent, wears the garb, etc. resembling one used by a public servant. Section 171D deals with personation at an election. Section 229 deals with the case of a person who allows himself to be empanelled or sworn as a juryman or assessor knowing that he is not entitled to be so empanelled or sworn. Section 416 deals with the case where a person cheats by pretending to be some other person or by knowingly substituting one person for another or by representing that he or any other person is a person other than he or such other person really is, and the explanation under this section says that the offence is committed whether the individual personated is a real or imaginary person. Section 419 provides the punishment for cheating by personation.[6]

False personation and, in such assumed character, doing certain acts under the Indian Registration Act 1908, is also an offence under s 82 of the said Act.

In England, the False Personation Act 1874 (37 and 38 Vict, c 36) s 1 provides as follows:

(i) If any person shall falsely and deceitfully personate any person or the heir, executor or administrator, wife, widow, next-of-kin, or relation of any person with intent fraudulently to obtain any land, estate, chattel, money, valuable security, or property, he shall be guilty of felony, and upon conviction shall be liable...to be (imprisoned) for life...

3. 'Falsely Personates Another'--Meaning of

In the case of Kadar Ravuttan v Ayangana Ravuttan ,[7] it was held:

> To constitute the offence of false personation under Section 205 of the Penal Code it is not enough to show the assumption of a fictitious name. It must also, we think, appear that the assumed name was used as a means of falsely representing some other individual. It is not an uncommon thing for men to pass under names not their own for the purpose of disguise, in some instance from blameless and in other instances indifferent or bad motives: 'incog' as the disguise is often termed in the former, and 'with or under an alias' in the latter instance. But whatever the motive, the use of an assumed name without more is not a criminal offence. It only becomes a crime when connected by proof with some other act or piece of conduct; and the gist of the offence of false personation under section 205, we think, is the feigning to be another known person.

Personation of Imaginary/Fictitious Person

No doubt the explanation to s 416, IPC says that 'the offence is committed whether the individual personated is a real or imaginary person', but the offence referred to therein is the offence of 'cheating by personation' which is quite different from the offence under this section. As observed in the case of Kadar Ravuttan v Ayangana Ravuttan [8]:

> There are sections of the Penal Code under which the false assumption of appearance or character may be an offence, though no individual is meant to be represented, or only an imaginary person. Such are the sections 140, 170, 171 and 415, but they have no1562 application to the present case, and the last section is made applicable to personation of an imaginary person by an express enactment.

A contrary view has been taken by the Allahabad High Court in State v Inder Sen ,[9] wherein it has been held that the decision in the case of Kadar Ravuttan v Ayangana Ravuttan ,[10] is not an authority in support of the proposition that there can be no personation if the personality assumed is that of a fictitious person. In that case, the accused was proved not to have been guilty of personation because nothing else was proved than mere assumption of another name. But it is submitted that the judgment in Kadar Ravuttan's case has not been properly read. Towards the end of that judgment it was said:

> Then as to the evidence here: it shows no more than that first prisoner used a name different from that by which he was commonly known, and had recently before been examined as a witness in another suit. He no doubt had a purpose, and most probably an improper one, in so acting, but there is nothing in the case to show that he was personating any other person.

There was, therefore, no question of the accused not acting on the assumed character, and the decision was based on the fact that the accused assumed only a fictitious name and not the name of any existing or known person.

Mere use of Assumed Name without an Act not an Offence

The mere use of an assumed name without more is not a criminal offence. It only becomes a crime when connected by proof with some other act or piece of conduct. The whole language of this section clearly imports, acting the part of another person, the actor pretending that he is that person.[11]

No False Personation without assuming the Name or Character of another

Where a person does not assume the name or character of another but merely a character which he does not possess, he cannot be said to personate falsely. Thus, where the accused, representing himself as a servant of another, accepted a notice to be served on that other person signing his own name on the receipt and saying that he received the notice addressed to his master, it was held that no offence under this section was committed as the accused, having signed his own name, did not assume the name or character of another, and the only thing that was false was the status which the accused gave to himself.[12]

Where the accused presented a petition in the name of his uncle, who was ill, but, when asked his name, he gave his own name, it was held that there was no false personation.[13]

False Personation and assuming Fictitious Name--Position under this Section and Section 82(c), Registration Act

In all the material parts, the wording of s 82(c), Registration Act 1908 is identical with that of this section and in a case under that section, the Madras High Court held that falsely assuming a fictitious name is not false personation. The wordings of both1563 this section and s 82(c) of the Registration Act are: 'Whoever falsely personates another'. This is quite different from saying 'whoever falsely assumed a fictitious name'.[14]

A person personated must be someone in existence and the mere assumption of a fictitious name is not an offence under s 82(c) .[15] Neither fraud nor dishonesty is an essential ingredient to constitute the offence of false personation under s 82(c) .[16] On a charge under s 82(c), it is not improper for the court to take fingerprints of the accused in its presence and to have them compared by an expert with the disputed fingerprints.[17]

Where an illiterate village lady impersonated as the first wife of her husband and appeared as witness before the court, but she had deposed without any fraudulent intention, she disclosed her name and also the name of the first wife, no action for alleged impersonation against her was taken.[18]

A person who has been tried and acquitted under the Indian Penal Code 1860, of offences of forgery and abetment thereof cannot be retried on the same facts for a separate offence under s 82(c) of the Registration Act.[19] However, if the trial is on two counts, for forgery and for an offence under s 82(c) and the charge of forgery fails for want of sanction, the accused may be convicted on the other count under s 82(c) of the Registration Act.[20]

Bona fide* Mistake not an Offence

Where, what was actually done by accused woman was to put her own signature to a counter statement that was to have been signed by her son, the son did not disown the mother, he did endorse the statement signed by his mother and the courts below were convinced by the stand of the mother and the son that the mother's act was only a bona fide mistake and not an offence and were also convinced that designs of the petitioner in seeking initiation of criminal proceedings against the accused sister-in-law and nephew was not to uphold the honour and purity of the justice administration system but instead to wreak vengeance on his accused sister-in-law and nephew who had successfully launched a civil litigation against him. The order acquitting the accused of false personation was found.[21]

4. Suit and Proceedings Distinguished

By the ordinary rule of construction all the acts detailed in s 205 are acts 'in any suit or criminal prosecution'. Proceedings under the Succession Act and such other proceedings are not acts in any suit.[22]

It is beyond question that 'case' is not synonymous with 'suit'; while every suit is a case, it cannot be said that every case is a suit. The word 'case' is a more1564 comprehensive expression and includes not only a suit but other proceedings which cannot be described as a suit, for example, proceedings under the Guardians and Wards Act, Probate and Administration Act, Succession Certificate Act, Provincial Insolvency Act, Religious Endowments Act, etc.[23]

5. Procedure

The offence is non-cognizable. Warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The offence is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

6. Lok Adalat has no Jurisdiction

It is clear from s 19(5) of the Legal Services Authorities Act 1987 that if the offence in respect of which the accused were being tried was not compoundable under any law, the lok adalat had no jurisdiction to decide the said case. When undisputedly the offences under ss 205, 419, 468, and 471, IPC, for which the accused were being tried were not compoundable, lok adalat had no jurisdiction to pass any order in the case. The decision of the magistrate in such a case, being without jurisdiction, is liable to be set aside.[24]

7. Complaint

An offence under ss 205 - 211, IPC fall under s 195(1)(b)(i) of the CrPC and no court shall take cognizance of any of these offences, when such offence is alleged to have been committed in or in relation to any proceeding in any court, except on a complaint in writing of that court,[25] or of some other court to which that court is subordinate. There are many offences of which cognizance can be taken without any complaint from the court. In case any such offence is so integrated with s 205 or any other offence requiring a complaint from the court, for which the accused is jointly put up for trial and the trial for that offence cannot be separated from the trial for the rest of the offences and if the trial in respect of the offence under s 205 or under any other section requiring a complaint from the court is not competent for want of a proper complaint, then the trial for such offence, would also be incompetent.[26]

The commentary on this point under s 201 may be referred to.

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the .....day of.....at.....falsely personated (name) and, in such assumed character, did (specify the admission or statement made, or judgment confessed, or process caused to be issued, or bail or security given or any other act done), in.....(specify) the suit or criminal prosecution) and that you thereby committed1565 an offence punishable under section 205 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

9. Proof

For a conviction under this section it must be proved:

(a) that the accused falsely personated another; and
(b) that, in such assumed character, he made any admission or statement, or confessed judgment, or caused some process to be issued, or became bail or security, or did some other act, in a suit or criminal prosecution.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 206.

Fraudulent removal or concealment of property to prevent its seizure as forfeited or in execution.--

Whoever fraudulently removes, conceals, transfers or delivers to any person any property or any interest therein, intending thereby to prevent that property or interest therein from being taken as a forfeiture or in satisfaction of a fine, under a sentence which has been pronounced, or which he knows to be likely to be pronounced, by a Court of Justice or other competent authority, or from being taken in execution of a decree or order which has been made, or which he knows to be likely to be made by a Court of Justice in a civil suit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

Sections 206, 207 and 208, IPC, which deal with fraudulent transfers and suits, aim at rendering criminal, all contrivance by which the owner of a property withdraws it from a liability to seizure under a sentence or judgment of court. It is impossible that anyone can allow a decree to be passed, or process to be executed against him, for property which is his own, or money which is not due by him, except to cheat someone else. When he does so, it is not necessary to allege or prove any special intention. The offence consists in fraudulently employing the machinery of the court.1566 Section 206 penalises the removal or concealment of property, or any dealing with it, in order to prevent its being taken in execution of an order of forfeiture or a sentence of fine passed or likely to be passed by a criminal court, or in execution of a decree or order passed or likely to be passed by a civil court. 'Here, the accused is an owner dealing with his own property, and his acts which would otherwise be innocent, are rendered criminal if done for certain specified purposes and with that state of mind which is described by the word 'fraudulently'.[27] Both these elements must co-exist. To bring the offence within this section there must be a fraudulent removal, sale or transfer of property, or of some interest therein, intending thereby to prevent that property from being taken as a forfeiture or in satisfaction of a fine, or from being taken in execution of a decree.[28] This section does not penalise all fraudulent transfers, but only those made with the particular intent specified in it.

2. Principle

It has been pointed out:

> (ii) As given in section 162 --it is an offence against justice in a culprit to escape from custody, in order to avoid execution of a sentence of imprisonment, and an offence to harbour, or imprison him and that such offences are fit subjects of punishment, upon the same grounds that the removal or concealment, of property or any dealing with it in order to prevent the execution of a sentence of fine, for example, instead of imprisonment, is an offence against justice and fit subject of punishment.[29]

3. Sections 206 and 406, IPC --Difference between

The criminal intention necessary for an offence punishable under this section is that of a fraudulent prevention of property or any interest therein from being forfeited or taken in execution of a decree or order. Such an intention is certainly materially different from the intention required in an offence punishable under s 406,[30] Therefore, an offence punishable under s 406, is substantially an offence different from the one punishable under this section.

4. 'Whoever'--Meaning of

The section is not restricted to the transfer, removal or concealment of one's own property. The word 'whoever', therefore, means any person and not necessarily the owner of the property.

5. 'Fraudulently'--Meaning of

The general nature of fraud has already been explained under s 25 . As the late Sir JF Stephen said:[31]1567

> There was always been a general reluctance amongst lawyers to attempt to define fraud, and this is not unnatural when we consider the number of different kinds of conduct to which the word is applied in connection with different branches of law, and especially in connection with the equitable branch of it. It shall not attempt to construe a definition which will meet every case which might be suggested, but there is little danger in saying that whenever the words 'fraud' or 'intent to defraud', or 'fraudulently' occur in the definition of a crime, two elements at least are essential to the commission of the crime, namely, firstly deceit, or an intention to deceive or in some cases mere secrecy; and, secondly, either actual injury or possible injury or an intent to expose some person either to actual injury or to risk of possible injury by means of that deceit or secrecy. This intent, I may add, is very seldom, the only or the principal intention entertained by the fraudulent person, whose principal object in nearly every case is his own advantage. The injurious deception is usually intended only as a means to an end, though this, as I have already explained, does not prevent it from being intentional. Where, therefore, there is an intention to deceive, and by means of the deceit to obtain an advantages, there is fraud.[32]

The word 'fraudulently' in this section is not equivalent to 'dishonestly'. Where there is no intention to deceive and there is no secrecy, a removal may be dishonest but not fraudulent.[33] There is nothing whatever in law to prevent a judgment-debtor from disposing of his interest such as it may be in an attached debt. The court has no right to presume a fraudulent intent because a person does what he is legally entitled to do.[34]

Fraud is the Gist of Offence under this Section

An intention to cause injury clearly exists in a case where the accused judgment-debtor gives an undertaking to the court not to transfer certain property and immediately transfers the same by a sale-deed in favour of his son with the knowledge that the son would be in a position to claim the property as his own. The object of the transfer is thus to injure the creditor and to prevent execution against the property. Therefore, such a case falls clearly under s 206 and it does not matter whether or not the creditor might, by taking troublesome proceedings in civil courts, circumvent the fraudulent transfer.[35] Fraud is the gist of the offence under this section and there can be no conviction in the absence of fraud.[36]

6. Fraudulent Removal or Concealment--Transfer under Mistake not an Offence

Fraudulent removal or concealment is the essence of an offence under this section. Under r 45(2) of O 21, CPC, judgment-debtors are at liberty, notwithstanding the attachment of a growing crop, to cut, gather and store the produce, in default of any conditions imposed, or orders passed, by the civil court to the contrary. This does not of course entitle them and their men to take the produce away as is apparent from sub-r (3) of r 45 . If the judgment-debtor not only cuts, gathers and stores the crops, but removes or conceals them fraudulently, they would be liable under this section. If1568 the removal of the crop is not fraudulent, he may be liable for theft.[37] Before a person can be ordered to be prosecuted under this section, there must be some evidence to show that he had fraudulently removed, concealed, transferred or delivered to any person, any property or any interest therein, intending thereby to prevent the property or interest from being taken in the execution of a decree which was passed against him. The mere harvesting of crops, which have been attached in the execution of a decree, would not bring the person doing so within the scope of this section unless it is shown that he did one of the things mentioned above with a fraudulent intent. It must further be shown that he harvested the crops with the intention of preventing them from being taken in execution of the decree and not merely with the intention of saving them.[38] Where an amin was sent by the court to harvest the crop which was attached and the accused, in order to forestall the action of the court, went openly to the field and harvested the same crop, it was held that as there was no deceit or intention to deceive or secrecy on the part of the accused, the action of the accused, though dishonest, could not be held to be fraudulent within the meaning of this section.[39]The cutting and carrying off of crops, which the accused knew to be under attachment in the execution of a certificate under the Public Demands Recovery Act of 1895, is an offence under the latter part of this section. The amount due under the certificate cannot be regarded as a forfeiture or fine, but is money due under a decree, the certificate having the force and effect of a decree of a civil court.[40] A person who, in order to protect his own property, not legally liable for a decree, from confusion with property which is so liable, makes it over to another person, does not commit an offence under this section.[41]

7. Fraudulent Transfer--Meaning of

There is no definition of the word 'transfer' in the IPC, but it has the same meaning as 'transfer of property' defined in s 5 of the Transfer of Property Act 1882, which reads thus:

> S. 5 . "Transfer of property" defined.--In the following sections "transfer of property" means an act by which a living person conveys property, in present or in future, to one or more other living persons, or to himself and one or more other living persons; and "to transfer property" is to perform such act.

> In this section "living person" includes a company or association or body of individuals, whether incorporated or not, but nothing herein contained shall affect any law for the time being in force relating to transfer of property to or by companies, associations or bodies of individual.

The word 'transfer' has long been recognised to be a technical term of law in all countries where English is the language of the legislature and courts of justice. It is often used as a convertible term with 'alienation', 'conveyance' and 'assignment'. Whether any distinction exists between the technical meanings of these expressions--and, if so, what that distinction is--it is not necessary to determine exactly. But it may be safely taken that the word 'transfer' is used in law in the most1569 generic signification, comprehending all the species of contract which pass real rights in property from one person to another.[42]

8. Fraudulent Preference--What is?

For a transfer to come within s 53 of the Transfer of Property Act, the intention must be to defeat or delay the creditors in general and not merely to defeat or delay one creditor.[43] The transfer which defeats or delays creditors is not an instrument which prefers one creditor to another, but an instrument which removes property from the creditors to the benefit of the debtors. The debtor must not retain a benefit for himself. He may pay one creditor and leave another unpaid.[44]

The word 'preference' imports and involves freedom of choice, and no transfer which is not voluntary in the sense that it is a free act of the insolvent, is a preference which can be deemed to be fraudulent and void.[45]

Determination of Fraudulent Preference

The question whether there has been a fraudulent preference depends, not upon the mere fact that there had been a preference, but also on the state of mind of the person who made it. It must be shown not only that he has preferred a creditor but that he has fraudulently done so. It is not necessary to threaten criminal proceedings, to constitute pressure. The threat of civil suits is enough. If it is established that the transaction was the result of real pressure brought to bear by a creditor on his debtor, it cannot be deemed as a spontaneous act.[46] If a debtor sells his property in order to pay some debts for which pressure was the greatest, the other creditors may be defeated or delayed, and it may be a case of fraudulent preference liable to be impugned under the insolvency law, but not a fraud on creditors for which s 53, Transfer of Property Act makes provision.[47] Until the insolvency laws are put into operation, a man is the master of his own money, and may pay any creditor, in the order he wishes, provided he really does pay him, and does not merely pretend to pay him. Apparently then, no payment by way of preference by a man in difficulties would be punishable under this section merely because the insolvency law calls it a fraudulent preference.

In order to satisfy this section, a definite intention must be found to prevent the property dealt with from being seized under an impending decree, or execution of a court of justice. When the intention is to prevent the property from being distributed according to law amongst the creditors, the offence may be one under s 421, but not under this section.[48]1570

9. A Transfer may not be in Writing

A transfer may or may not be in writing.[49] There are various forms of transfer, such as gift, sale, mortgage, pledge, will, grant, etc. In the case of a movable property, a transfer may be effected by a mere delivery.

10. What is Sham Transaction

This section contemplates a real transfer and not a sham transaction. A fraudulent transaction is not a sham transaction. But the fact that a transaction or a transfer of an immovable property without consideration does not make it either a sham transaction or a bogus transaction.[50] A sham transaction by which title was never intended to pass is no transfer at all. It is devoid of operation. Where such a colourable document is brought into existence for the purpose of defeating and delaying creditors, it may be simply ignored by the creditors who need not take proceedings to avoid them. If it is a colourable partition, the creditors can proceed to enforce their claims as if there was no partition.[51]

11. Fraudulent Transfer--Void, Voidable and Sham Transactions and their Consequences

Sections 23 and 24 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, render void every agreement, of which the consideration or object is fraudulent and therefore unlawful. It has been repeatedly held that, 'where there is a real transaction between the parties for valuable consideration, whether it be by way of sale or mortgage, the transaction is valid even as against a creditor, though the object may have been to defeat an expected execution'.[52] And so, 'if a man owes another a real debt, and in satisfaction thereof sells to his creditor an equivalent portion of his property, transferring it to the vendee and thereby extinguishing the debt, the transaction cannot be assailed, though the effect of it is to give the selected creditor a preference'.[53]Such transactions, though made with a view to defeat a probable execution, are not void under ss 23 and 24 of the Contract Act 1872, as being forbidden by law, or fraudulent, or involving injury to the property of another, or opposed to public policy. They involve no dealing with a man's own property which the law does not allow.[54] But if the sale of mortgage be only a colourable transaction or a mere sham, and not intended to confer upon the alleged grantee or mortgagee any beneficial interest in the property, and simply (for the purpose of screening it from execution) to substitute such grantee or mortgagee as nominal owner, in lieu of the real owner (the debtor), and to make such nominal owner nothing more than a trustee for the real owner (the debtor), and thus to endeavour to preserve the property for the latter, such a sale or mortgage would be invalid as against the creditor, and he would be entitled to attach and sell the property.[55] It would also undoubtedly be an offence punishable under this section.1571 There is nothing in ss 23 and 24 of the Indian Contract Act 1872 to support the opinion that a sale, made with the view of defeating a probable execution, is a sale with a fraudulent and unlawful object, and, therefore, void within the meaning of those sections.[56]

Section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act 1882, also deals with fraudulent transfers. The section runs thus:

S. 53 . Fraudulent transfer.--

(1) Every transfer of immovable property made with intent to defeat or delay the creditors of the transferor shall be voidable at the option of any creditor so defeated or delayed.

Nothing in this sub-section shall impair the rights of a transferee in good faith and for consideration.

Nothing in this sub-section shall affect any law for the time being in force relating to insolvency.

A suit instituted by a creditor (which term includes a decree-holder whether he has or has not applied for execution of his decree) to avoid a transfer on the ground that it has been made with intent to defeat or delay the creditors of the transferor shall be instituted on behalf of, or for the benefit of, all the creditors.

(2) Every transfer of immoveable property made without consideration with intent to defraud a subsequent transferee shall be voidable at the option of such transferee.

For the purposes of this sub-section, no transfer made without consideration shall be deemed to have been made with intent to defraud by reason only that a subsequent transfer for consideration was made.

Nothing contained in this section shall impair the rights of any transferee in good faith and for consideration.

Intention Determines the Guilt

Where a debtor effects a sale in order to convert some immovable property, which was capable of being attached and brought to sale for the realisation of the amounts due to the creditors, into cash, which could either be secreted or used for the vendor's own purposes, the transaction is not a sham but a real one, and if the purchaser purchased the property in good faith, and for consideration, his rights will not be affected by s 53 of the Transfer of Property Act . He will also be protected by s 55 of the Provincial Insolvency Act 1920. If, on the other hand, the purchaser is not a transferee in good faith and the transfer itself was a scheme by the transferor, with the knowledge and connivance of the transferee, to put the property out of the reach of the creditors, the sale would be voidable at the option of the creditor defeated or delayed.[57] In either case, however, the intention of the vendor being to prevent the property from being taken in execution of a decree against him, it would appear that he would be liable under this section.

Under s 64 of the Code of Civil Procedure a debtor is free to make any private alienation of his property, until an actual attachment of the property has been made. A creditor commits no fraud if he anticipates other creditors and obtains a discharge of his debt by the assignment of any property, which has not already been attached by another creditor.[58]1572

Fraudulent Intent cannot be Inferred in a Lawful Act

Where a judgment-debtor had sold a decree for a large amount for considerably less than half of its amount in cash, it was held that there was nothing whatever in law to prevent a judgment-debtor from disposing of his interest such as it may be in an attached debt. The court has no right to presume a fraudulent intent because a person does what he is legally entitled to do.[59] On the other hand, an intention to cause injury clearly exists in a case where the accused judgment-debtor gives an undertaking to the court not to transfer certain property and immediately after, transfers the same by a sale deed in favour of his son with the knowledge that the son would be in a position to claim the property as his own. The object of the transfer is thus to injure the creditor and to prevent the execution against the property. Therefore, the case falls clearly under this section and it does not matter whether or not the creditor might, by taking troublesome proceedings in civil courts, circumvent the fraudulent transfer.[60]

Benami* Transactions--Nature of

Section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act postulates that when the impugned transfer was genuine and real, but made with an intent to defeat or delay the creditors of the transferor, then the provisions of s 53 are inapplicable to a case where the transaction is impugned as farzi or benami, that is to say a fictitious and colourable transaction. In some benami transactions, the transfer effected is real though the document stands in the name of another. But in the other class of benami transactions, the transfer is fictitious and colourable. In the latter cases the benami transactions are also fraudulent, because the object of the transferor is to defeat the subsequent transferees of the property.[61] Benami transaction has now been defined by cl (a) of s 2 of the Benami Transactions (Prohibition) Act 1988. Though the said Act does not affect the provisions of s 53 of the Transfer of Property Act and any other law relating to transfers for an illegal purpose, entering into a benami transaction (except the purchase of property in the name of one's wife and unmarried daughter) has been made a non-cognizable offence thereunder, punishable with an imprisonment extending to three years.[62] (For further reference, the Benami Transactions (Prohibition) Act 1988 may be referred to).

12. 'To Prevent that Property or Interest Therein'--Meaning of

The expression means the transferor's interest in the property fraudulently removed, transferred or delivered or in an attached debt.[63]

13. 'Taken'--Meaning of

The word 'taken' in this section has been used in the sense of 'seized' or 'taken possession of'. This is indicated by the marginal note to the section which defines it as a 'fraudulent removal or concealment of property to prevent its seizure as forfeited or in execution'. Where property had already been attached and handed over to the1573 decree-holder, it is difficult to see how it could again be taken in the execution of a decree or be prevented from being taken, in execution. Where the accused, who were entrusted with some articles distrained for arrears of land revenue, produced inferior articles of the same description on the date of sale, it was held that a conviction under s 206 of the Indian Penal Code was wrong: (a) since the distraint had already been made; and (b) since the distraint of the property by a collector was neither a forfeiture, the rights of the owner being only held in abeyance by such distraint, nor effected under a sentence pronounced by a court of justice or other competent authority.[64]

14. 'As a Forfeiture'--Meaning of

'Forfeiture of property' is a recognised form of punishment under s 53 (Fifthly) for certain specified offences such as those under ss 126, 127 and 169 .[65]Section 452, CrPC also makes a provision for a forfeiture (confiscation) of certain property. A certificate issued under the Public Demands Recovery Act 1895 has the force and effect of a decree of a civil court, as regards the remedies for enforcing the same. Money due under such a certificate must be regarded as money due under a decree of a civil court. It cannot be regarded as a forfeiture or a for fine. A removal of crops under attachment, in execution of such a certificate, amounts to an offence under the latter part of s 206 .[66]

15. 'In Execution of a Decree or Order'--Meaning of

The phrase 'taken in execution' in this section should be more widely interpreted as meaning something equivalent to the credit amount to be appropriated towards execution or utilised effectively in the aid of execution.[67] Where a person fraudulently removes property intending thereby to prevent that property from being taken in execution of a decree of order which has been made by a collector, who is a court of justice in a civil suit, i.e., a suit for rent, he commits the offence described under this section.[68]

16. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable. A warrant should issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable and is triable by any magistrate. A magistrate specified in s 260, CrPC can also try this offence in a summary way.

The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

17. Complaint[69]

Under s 195(1)(b)(i), CrPC a complaint in writing of the court concerned, when such an offence is alleged to have been committed in, or in relation to, any proceeding in any court or of some other court to which that court is subordinate, is necessary to1574 institute proceedings under this section.[70] If such an offence is not committed in or in relation to any proceeding in any court, then the question of that court filing the complaint does not arise and even a private person can file a complaint.[71]

18. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you fraudulently removed [or concealed or transferred or delivered to (name the person)] property, to wit .....(specify it) intending thereby to prevent the said property from being taken as a forfeiture (or in satisfaction of fine), under the sentence which had been pronounced (or which you knew to be likely to be pronounced) by (specify the court of Justice etc) in criminal case No....., or from being taken in execution of the decree which had been made (or which you knew to be likely to be made) by (specify the Court) in Civil Suit No.....and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 206 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

19. Proof

The prosecution must prove that the accused fraudulently removed, concealed or transferred the property, in order to prevent its being available in satisfaction of the fine or decree,[72] or for being taken as a forfeiture.

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 207.

Fraudulent claim to property to prevent its seizure as forfeited or in execution.--

Whoever fraudulently accepts, receives or claims any property or any interest therein, knowing that he has no right or rightful claim to such property or interest, or practices any deception touching any right to any property or any interest therein, intending thereby to prevent that property or interest therein from being taken as a forfeiture or in satisfaction of a fine, under a sentence which has been pronounced or which he knows to be likely to be pronounced, by a Court of Justice or other competent authority, or from being taken in execution of a decree or order which has been made, or which he knows to be likely to be made by a Court of Justice in a civil suit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The last section dealt with persons fraudulently removing, concealing or transferring property to prevent its being taken as a forfeiture or in satisfaction of a fine or in1575 execution of a decree or order of a court of justice. This section deals with their accomplices who fraudulently accept or receive the property so removed, concealed or transferred or who falsely claim the property or practise any deception touching such property or interest therein with the same intent. For further details, the commentary under the last section may be referred to.

2. 'Fraudulently'--Meaning of

The commentary under ss 25 and 206, IPC may be referred to.

3. 'Court Of Justice'--Meaning of Section 20, IPC and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

4. Procedure

The procedure will be the same as in the case of an offence under s 206, IPC .

5. Complaint

Complaint of the court is necessary for taking cognizance of an offence even under this section. For details, commentary under s 206, IPC may be referred to.

6. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you fraudulently accepted (or received or claimed) property to wit.....(or any interest therein, to wit.....), knowing that you had no right or rightful claim to it [or you practised deception, to wit.....touching the rights to property to wit.....(or any interest therein) intending thereby to prevent (or interest therein) from being taken as a forfeiture (or in satisfaction of a fine) under a sentence which had been pronounced (or which you knew to be likely to be pronounced) by the court of .....or by a competent authority, to wit.....(or from being taken in execution of a decree or order which had been made on.....(or wit..... in Civil Suit No.....of.....) and thereby committed an offence under section 207 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.
> (i) And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

7. Proof

For a conviction under this section, it must be proved that:

(a) the accused fraudulently accepted, received or claimed any property or any interest therein, or practised any deception touching any right to any property or an interest therein;
(b) the accused knew that he had no right or rightful claim to it;
(c) he intended thereby to prevent that property or interest therein, from being taken as a forfeiture, or in satisfaction of a fine or in an execution of a decree or order of a court of justice;
(d) he then knew that such forfeiture, fine or execution was pending or was likely to be made; and
(e) the forfeiture fine or execution was under the orders of a court of justice or a competent authority.1576

S. 208.

Fraudulently suffering decree for sum not due.--

Whoever fraudulently causes or suffers a decree or order to be passed against him at the suit of any person for a sum not due or for a larger sum than is due to such person or for any property or interest in property to which such person is not entitled or fraudulently causes or suffers a decree or order to be executed against him after it has been satisfied, or for anything in respect of which it has been satisfied, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Illustration

A institutes a suit against Z. Z, knowing that A is likely to obtain a decree against him, fraudulently suffers a judgment to pass against him for a larger amount at the suit of B, who has no just claim against him, in order that B, either on his own account or for the benefit of Z, may share in the proceeds of any sale of Z's property which may be made under A's decree. Z has committed an offence under this section.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is intended to prevent the abuse of the machinery of the court for causing or suffering collusive decrees to be passed or executed in order to secure property from being available for the satisfaction of first debts. The Law Commissioners remarked that the section was drafted to prevent an abuse, then said to be prevalent, by getting someone to file a collusive suit for the recovery of the whole of one's property and suffering a decree to be passed. As mentioned in s 159 :

> No one at the time, is either injured or annoyed. It is only in the course of years, when unsuccessful in his speculations, and at the time his creditors press their claims against him that the original plaintiff, the man of straw, appears, not with a naked claim, but with a decree in his favour, adjudging him with the whole of the defendant's property. This property, he will acknowledge, he has nevertheless left the whole time in the defendant's possession; but he pleads his rights under a decree of court.[73]

2. 'Fraudulently'--Meaning of

Section 25, and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

3. 'To be Executed'--Meaning of

An application for an execution of a decree, which is refused, is not an offence under this section.[74]

4. 'Satisfied'--Meaning of

The word 'satisfied' bears its ordinary meaning and does not only refer to decrees, the satisfaction of which has been certified to the court.[75]1577

5. Procedure

The procedure to be followed will be the same as in the case of an offence under s 206, IPC, with the difference that the offence under this section is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

6. Complaint

No court shall take cognizance of an offence under this section when such an offence is alleged to have been committed in, or in relation to, any proceeding in any court except on a complaint in writing of the court before which the offence is committed, or of some other court to which it is subordinate.[76]

The provisions of s 195, CrPC are mandatory. Registration of a case against a public servant under ss 196 and 208, IPC without following the proceedings of ss 195 and 240, CrPC was illegal and as such the proceedings were quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[77]

7. Charge

The following form may be adopted in framing a charge:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the .....day of.....at.....fraudulently caused (or suffered) a decree (or order) to wit..... in suit No.....of the Court of.....to be passed against you and which has for a sum of not due (or for a larger sum than was due) to such person [or (for any property or interest in property to which the decree-holder was not entitled) (or fraudulently caused (or suffered) a decree (or order, to wit.....), passed in Suit No....passed by the Court .....on .....to be executed against you, after it had already been satisfied in full (or in part)] and thereby committed an offence under section 208 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 209.

Dishonestly making false claim in court.--

Whoever fraudulently or dishonestly, or with intent to injure or annoy any person, makes in a Court of Justice any claim which he knows to be false, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes persons who fraudulently or dishonestly or with an intent to injure or annoy any person, make any claim, having full knowledge of its falsity, in a1578 court of justice. This section is wider than the preceding section as it applies to persons who are acting fraudulently or dishonestly. The offence is complete the moment a false claim is filed. The section is not limited to cases where the whole claim made by the accused is false. It applies even where a part of the claim is false.[78]

The offence under this section relates to false and fraudulent claims in a court of justice and is confined to the civil court in which an original suit was brought.[79]

Where affidavits alleged to have been filed by accused in suit in which complainant was defendant, issue in said suit was about seniority to officiate as headmaster which vacancy occurred due to retirement of the headmaster, no contention to the effect was taken by the complainant in suit that School Committee was not properly represented and that affidavits filed by the accused declaring himself as Secretary of Committee are false and there was no decision on merits on this question in the suit, it was held that the complainant failed to prove offences alleged against the accused and the accused was entitled to acquittal.[80]

2. Essential Ingredients

Falsely attesting the plaint in a false case is an essential ingredient of fraudulently and dishonestly making a false claim in a court of justice and a person cannot be convicted of both.[81]

3. 'Fraudulently'--Meaning of

For details, s 25, and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

4. 'Dishonestly'--Meaning of

Section 24, and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

5. 'With Intent to Injure or Annoy'--Meaning of

The question of fraud or dishonesty or intent to injure or annoy must be decided like any other question of fact on the basis of evidence.[82] The mere dismissal of a suit in the absence of a clear finding as to whether the suit was false and was brought with an intent to injure the defendant, is not a justification for directing the prosecution of the plaintiff under this section.[83]

6. 'Makes any Claim'--Meaning of

The expression 'claim' in this section does not include a claim made in an execution. An attempt to execute a decree cannot correctly be described as making a false claim.[84] The word 'claim' cannot refer to a document produced in evidence to1579 substantiate the relief asked for in the suit.[85] An attempt to execute a decree which has been satisfied also cannot be correctly described as a false claim.[86]

7. Remedy of the Aggrieved Defendant

The ordinary remedy of a person who has had a false suit brought against him is to apply to the court to prosecute the plaintiff under this section. And in that case one has the benefit of the court's opinion as to whether the plaintiff was acting with any sinister and improper intention. As a general rule, it is undesirable that people should be hampered in their access to the courts and in getting justice by the fear that if they are unsuccessful, they may be prosecuted for defamation, and therefore, all courts should be careful when a complaint of defamation is filed in respect of proceedings in a civil court to see whether the provisions of this section and those of the Code of Criminal Procedure generally have not been evaded.[87]

8. Mere Belief not Sufficient per Offence under Section 207

In order to establish an offence under this section, it is essential to prove that the claim made is one which the person making it knew to be false, and it is not sufficient to show that the claim is one which he believed or had reason to believe to be false, or did not believe to be a true claim.[88]

A person, who brings a claim in the civil court, which he knows to be false, commits an offence punishable under this section but he does not, by so doing, commit an offence either of extortion, if he succeeds or, of attempting to commit extortion if he fails.[89]

9. 'In a Court of Justice'--Meaning of

The court of justice intended here is a civil court,[90] and not a persona designata.[91] The essential characteristic of a court is that it is authorised by law to decide, in accordance with law, disputes between parties before it.

In dealing with claims against an estate under the Chhota Nagpur Encumbered Estates Act, the manager was not deciding a dispute between two parties who appeared before him for the determination of their dispute. The manager, in dealing with a claim under the Chhota Nagpur Encumbered Estates Act, was therefore, not a court of justice.[92]

For further details, s 20 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, not compoundable and triable by a magistrate of the first class. It can also be tried summarily as provided by s 260, CrPC .1580

The period of limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

11. Complaint

A complaint in writing by the court in which the false claim was made or of some other Court to which it is subordinate, is necessary[1] for taking cognizance of an offence under this section. In the absence of a complaint in writing of the court concerned or other court to which that court is subordinate, cognizance cannot be taken.[2] Cognizance cannot be taken as the basis of private complaint.[3] The proceeding in relation to a prosecution under s 209, IPC is covered by cl (b)(ii) of s 195(1) . When the offence is committed in proceedings in any court, normally no cognizance of any of these offences coming under ss 209, 471 or 466, IPC could be taken without a complaint of the concerned court.[4]

12. Charge

The following form may be adopted in framing the charge:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you on or about the.....day of.....at.....fraudulently (or dishonestly or with an intent to injure or annoy any person) made a claim, to wit.....(specify the claim) in Suit No.....of .....in the court of .....which you knew to be false, and thereby committed an offence under section 209 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

A person cannot be convicted both of fraudulently and dishonestly making a false claim in a court of justice and of falsely attesting the plaint in the false case, the latter being an essential ingredient of the former offence.[5]

13. Proof

For a conviction under this section, it must be proved that:

(a) a false claim was made by the accused in a court of justice; and
(b) the accused had made such claim: (i) knowing that it was a false claim, and (ii) intending thereby to defraud or to cause a wrongful gain or loss, or to injure or annoy, any person.

It is essential to prove that the claim made is one which the person making it knew to be false.[6] The burden of proof lies on the prosecution. It will not be enough in a criminal proceeding to show that the plaintiff in the civil suit failed to discharge the burden of proof. It will also not be enough to show that in the evidence adduced for the plaintiff, there were discrepancies or improbabilities which made it impossible for the court to rely with confidence on their evidence or even which made it improbable that the fact alleged was true. The onus is on the prosecution to prove1581 affirmatively that the claim was false to the knowledge of the accused, who was the plaintiff in the civil suit.[7] The question of fraud or dishonesty or intent to injure or annoy must be decided like any other question of fact, on the evidence.[8]

Where the oral and documentary evidence on record adduced by the complainant before the trial court did not prove beyond reasonable doubt that accused had committed the offences punishable under ss 182 and 209, IPC, the appellant accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 182 and 209, IPC .[9]

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 210.

Fraudulently obtaining decree for sum not due.--

Whoever fraudulently obtains a decree or order against any person for a sum not due, or for a larger sum than is due, or for any property or interest in property to which he is not entitled, or fraudulently causes a decree or order to be executed against any person after it has been satisfied or for anything in respect of which it has been satisfied, or fraudulently suffers or permits any such act to be done in his name, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section really comprises of three offences, viz (a) fraudulently obtaining a decree for a sum not due, or for a larger sum than is due, or for any property or interest in property to which the accused is not entitled; (b) fraudulently causing a decree or order to be executed after it has been satisfied, or for anything in respect of which it has been satisfied; and (c) fraudulently suffering or permitting any such act to be done in his name.

This section is a counterpart of s 208, the two sections together deal with the plaintiff and the defendant in a fraudulent or collusive suit or execution proceeding. Both are treated alike as principal offenders. While s 208, IPC punishes the fraudulent defendant, this section punishes the fraudulent plaintiff.

2. 'Fraudulently Obtains a Decree or Order'--Implication of

The meaning of 'fraudulently' has been discussed under ss 25 and 206, IPC . An offence under this section is committed when a decree is fraudulently obtained. It, therefore, makes no difference whether the decree alleged to be fraudulent has, or has not, been subsequently set aside at the instance of the parties against whom it was made. The fact that the decree has not been set aside might be evidence to prove that1582 there was no fraud, but that fact cannot be, in any way, a bar to the prosecution under this section. At the same time, even if the decree has been set aside by a civil court on the ground of fraud, that fact would not be evidence in the criminal court of the existence of fraud.[10] The question of jurisdiction, whether the court had power to pass a decree or not, is immaterial.[11] A bona fide mistake negatives the conduct being fraudulent.[12]

3. Section Applies to both Decree and Order

The section applies not only to fraudulently obtaining a decree but also to fraudulently obtaining an order. Where therefore, the accused obtained an order of attachment for a sum not due to him from his judgment-debtor, it was held that this section applied.[13]

4. 'Fraudulently Causing a Decree or Order to be Executed'--Meaning of

In order that an offence under this section may be completed, a decree-holder must cause a decree to be executed fraudulently. The mere filing of an application for execution is not enough. If after making the application by mistake, the decree-holder gets the application for execution dismissed, he cannot be said to have caused the decree to be executed within the meaning of this section.[14] So also, if the application for execution is dismissed on the ground that the decree had been satisfied out of court, it cannot be said that the decree was caused to be executed against the opposite party.[15]

5. Consequences of Unfructuous Execution Application

In Queen v Begum Mahtoon ,[16] after a decree had been fully satisfied, the decree-holder applied for an execution of the decree against the judgment-debtor who produced a receipt signed by the decree-holder showing full satisfaction of the decree. The decree-holder at first denied, but eventually admitted the receipt and the decree was not executed. The decree-holder was then prosecuted and convicted under s 209 . His conviction under that section was set aside on the ground that the section was not applicable to such a case, and the conviction was altered to one under this section read with s 511, for attempting to execute the decree fraudulently, after it was executed.

6. Execution Against Third Party

Where in the execution of a partition decree the tenant, who was not a party to the decree, was physically dispossessed by the court commissioner, contrary to the provisions of the CPC, with the collusion of the landlord decree-holder, the question arose whether the decree-holder had committed an offence under s 210, IPC and the1583 cognizance was barred without a complaint from the court. It was held by the Allahabad High Court that 'neither the complainant, who lodged the report, was a party to the civil suit in question, nor a decree was obtained against him. Section 210 , IPC would not be attracted by any stretch of imagination'.[17] Apart from these considerations this section could not be attracted in the said case as it has not been shown that the decree in the execution of which the tenant was dispossessed, had already been satisfied earlier in any manner as discussed below.

7. 'After it has been Satisfied'--Meaning of

For the application of this section not only must a decree have been executed, but it must have been done so 'after it has been satisfied'.

The words 'after it has been satisfied' indicate only the fact of the satisfaction of the decree. The fact that the satisfaction of the decree is of such a nature, that the court executing it could not recognise it, would not take the case out of the purview of this section.[18] In construing this section, it is necessary to attach to the word 'satisfied' its ordinary meaning and not to understand it as referring only to decrees, the satisfaction of which has been certified.[19] Order 21, r 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that no payment or adjustment of a decree not certified to the court shall be recognised by any court, does not debar a criminal court from recognising such payment where the decree-holder is charged with fraudulently executing a satisfied decree.[20] Where the provisions of s 258 of the old Code of Civil Procedure corresponding to O 21, r 2 of the Code of 1908 had not been complied with, it was held that a civil court is not debarred from admitting evidence that the decree has been satisfied out of court, for the purpose of an investigation with a view to sending the judgment-creditor to a magistrate.[21] The words 'any court' in that clause have no application to a criminal court investigating a charge of fraudulently executing a decree under this section. Those words do not bar any criminal remedy which an injured judgment-debtor may have against a fraudulent decree-holder, whether by a prosecution under ss 193, 210, 406 or any other section of the Indian Penal Code .[22] The Rajasthan High Court, however, quashed the prosecution under this section for an earlier payment which was never got verified in the execution court, terming it as wholly unjustified.[23]

8. Procedure

The offence is non-cognizable, bailable and not compoundable. It can be tried by a magistrate of the first class, and can also be tried summarily under s 260, CrPC . The period of limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.1584

9. Complaint

A complaint in writing by the court where such offence is committed in, or in relation to any proceeding in that court or by some other court to which it is subordinate, is required under s 195(1)(b) of the CrPC for taking cognizance of the offence under this section.

Where the facts primarily and essentially disclose an offence under s 210, IPC, the other offences alleged being merely subsidiary to the main offence, the complainant could not be permitted to evade the provisions of s 195, CrPC, by omitting this section from the complaint.[24] It is essential in the public interest that persons who have decrees in their favour be warned that they must not attempt to deceive the courts and thereby get money from their judgment-debtors to which they are not entitled. So, the sanction (court complaint) to prosecute a decree-holder under this section for failing to give credit in execution for a sum paid to him should not be withheld, merely on the ground that the judgment-debtor making the payment has not been prejudiced or that there is no satisfactory proof of the payment on the file.[25]

10. Competence to Make Complaint

Where a plaintiff first instituted a suit in one court and obtained a decree for a part of his claim and then proceeded to present a fresh plaint in another court in respect of the items disallowed by the first court and obtained an ex parte decree, the action for making a complaint under this section for obtaining the second decree by fraudulent means, if proved, can only be taken by the court to which both the trial courts are subordinate, as the filing of the second suit cannot be held to be an offence committed in relation to any proceeding in the first court.[26]

11. Charge

The following form may be adopted in framing a charge:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....fraudulently obtained a decree (or order) in suit no.....of.....against.....for Rs.....which was not due (orwhich was a larger sum than was due) (or for property or interest in propertyviz.....(specify) to which you were not entitled) (or fraudulently caused a decree (or order) to be executed against.....after it has been satisfied, or fraudulently suffered or permitted.....(specify any such act) to be done in your name), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 210 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

12. Proof

For a conviction under this section, the following points must be proved:

(a) the accused obtained a decree or order, or suffered or permitted the same to be done in his name;1585
(b) the decree or order was for a sum not due, or for a larger sum than was due, or for any property or interest in property to which the accused was not entitled;
(c) or the accused fraudulently caused a decree or order to be executed against any person after it had been satisfied, or for anything in respect of which it had been satisfied; and
(d) the accused did so fraudulently.[27]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 211.

False charge of offence made with intent to injure.--

Whoever, with intent to cause injury to any person, institutes or causes to be instituted any criminal proceeding against that person, or falsely charges any person with having committed an offence, knowing that there is no just or lawful ground for such proceeding or charge against that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both;

and if such criminal proceeding be instituted on a false charge of an offence punishable with death, [28][imprisonment for life], or imprisonment for seven years or upwards, shall be punishable with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.1586

Comments

1. Scope

This section is divided into two distinct parts. The first part contemplates two offences viz, (a) the institution of criminal proceedings wrongly, and (b) making a false charge, with intent to cause injury to any person. All cases of false criminal proceedings and of false charges fall under the first part of the section, except those specified in the second part of the section. The purview of the second part of the section is, however, limited to the institution of criminal proceedings on a false charge, and does not include the making of a false charge, which falls short of the institution of criminal proceedings.[29] Under the latter part, if criminal proceedings are instituted on a false charge of an offence punishable with death, imprisonment for life or imprisonment for seven years or upwards, the offence is more severely punishable. The former of the two offences, contemplated by the first part, necessarily assumes the latter, but the latter may be committed even where no criminal proceedings follow. To constitute the offence of preferring a false charge contemplated in this section, it is not necessary that the charge should be before a magistrate. It is enough if it appears that the charge was deliberately made before a police officer with a view to its being brought before a magistrate. Of course, a mere random conversation or remark would not amount to a charge.[30] A false charge laid before the police, and never intended to be prosecuted in court, may obviously subject the accused party to very substantial injury, as defined in s 44 .[31] It has been held that a person may be charged under two heads, for making a false charge and for instituting criminal proceedings, the two offences being different.[32] It would appear that the legislature must have meant different things when it spoke of 'instituting proceedings' and 'making a charge'. In a full bench case of the Calcutta High Court,[33] Wilson J, delivering the judgment of the court, observed:[34]1587

> I agree in this reasoning in one sense and not in another. I agree that we must take it that the legislature did not regard the two phrases as co-extensive in meaning, but considered that there were, or might be, cases to which the one would apply and not the other. But I do not think we are to suppose that the legislature meant the phrase to be mutually exclusive in meaning, so that the instituting of criminal proceedings must be by something which is not a charge, and a charge must be something which is not the institution of criminal proceedings. This cannot, I think, be for two reasons. First, because there is no mode by which a private accuser can institute criminal proceedings except by making a charge; and if he does not do it by the charge, he never does it at all, to whatever length the proceedings may go. And secondly, because the last part of the section speaks of 'proceedings instituted on a false charge.

2. Essential Ingredients

To constitute an offence under this section the following ingredients must exist, namely:

(a) the accused intended to cause injury to any person;
(b) with that intention, he instituted or caused to be instituted, a criminal proceeding against that person or, in the alternative, falsely charged him with having committed an offence; and
(c) when he did as above, he knew that there was no just or lawful ground for such criminal proceeding or false charge against that person.[35]

There are thus three elements in each of the offences under this section.

The intention and knowledge in (a) and (c) respectively constitute the mental elements in each offence.

The ingredients of this section go a good deal further than the mere absence of proof of the guilt of the person said to have been falsely charged with an offence. The complainant must have falsely charged such person with having committed an offence, that is to say, the person must be innocent.

The complainant must have known that there is no just or lawful ground for the proceeding or charge, that is to say, there is no penalty in this section for incautious or negligible acceptance of information which the complainant might have learnt by inquiry to be unreliable.

Thirdly, there must have been an intention to cause an injury to the person. This can in some cases be inferred from the relation of the parties when the other two elements are established. As regards the other two ingredients, it is important to remember that there is a difference between suspicion and evidence. The prosecution will have to establish facts irreconcilable with the innocence of the accused.[36] The criminal proceedings and false charges contemplated by this section must mean proceedings instituted and charges made according to the provisions of the criminal law in force in India. The section occurs in a chapter relating to offences against1588 public justice, which under the Code must mean public justice in India, unless it is expressly otherwise provided.[37]

3. Distinction between Sections 182 and 211

The commentary under the same heading in s 182, ante may be referred to.

It is true that an offence under s 182 is distinct from one under s 211, though the latter is more serious and may include the offence under the former section.[38]The criminal law makes a clear distinction between a false charge which falls under this section, and false information given to the police, falling under s 182 . A person prosecuting another for an offence under the latter section need not prove malice and a want of reasonable and probable cause except so far as they are implied in the act of giving information known to the police, with the knowledge or likelihood that such information would lead a public servant to use his power to the injury or annoyance of the complainant. In an inquiry under this section, on the other hand, the absence of just and lawful grounds for making the charge is an important element.[39]Section 182 relates only to cases of information given to officials with the intention of causing, or with the knowledge that it is likely to cause, that official to do or omit to do something, which he ought not to do or omit to do, or to use his lawful power to the injury or annoyance of any person. This is a distinct offence from that described in this section, which relates to an attempt to put the criminal courts in motion against another person. The action which this section renders penal, is an action entailing very serious consequences, and, therefore, more serious consideration is required by the individual who takes it. It is sufficient therefore, in such cases, for the prosecution to establish that there was no just or lawful ground for the action taken and that the accused knew this. But something more is required in the case of action referred to in s 182 . To bring a case within that section, it is necessary for the prosecution to prove, not merely the absence of a reasonable or probable cause for giving the information, but a positive knowledge or belief of the falsity of the information given.[40] An accused can commit offences both under ss 182 and 211 in the pursuit of the same purpose, one after the other, but their circles are clearly separated and they do not overlap each other.[41]

Where the information conveyed to the police amounts to a false institution of criminal proceedings against a defined person, or amounts to falsely charging a defined person, with an offence as defined in the Indian Penal Code, then the person giving such information has committed an offence under this section. In such a case, this section is, and s 182 is not, the appropriate section under which to frame the charge. Section 182, when read with this section, must be understood as referring to cases where the information given to the public servant falls short of amounting to the institution of criminal proceedings against a defined person or to the false charging of a defined person with an offence as defined in the Indian Penal Code .[42]

The petitioner filed a complaint against the opposite party alleging that his son was kidnapped by the opposite party. The kidnapped boy appeared before the court and1589 stated that he was not kidnapped by the opposite party but he himself had gone voluntarily to marry a girl. The girl in statement under s 164, CrPC also stated that, she had married the petitioner's son. The petitioner had filed a false case of kidnapping. Cognizance of the offences under ss 182 and 211, CrPC taken by the Magistrate was held proper.[43]

4. Essence of the Two Offences under Sections 211 and 182

The essence of the offence under s 182 is a contempt of the lawful authority of a public servant, whereas the offence under this section is an offence against public justice.[44]

5. When Offence is covered under Section 211, Proceeding under Section 182 cannot continue

The magistrate can take cognizance of an offence under s 182 on a complaint in writing by the police officer by virtue of the provisions contained in s 195(1)(a) of the CrPC . But it would virtually lead to the circumvention of the provisions of s 195(1)(b) if the proceedings under s 182 can continue where the offence disclosed is covered by s 211, IPC and a complaint is pending, which has been filed by the informant on the same facts and allegations as were contained in his first information report (FIR).[45]

For more details, commentary under s 182 may be referred to.

6. 'Whoever'--Person Liable

The word 'whoever' is wide enough to cover not only private individuals but also public servants. If the accused, in bad faith, and knowing that he had no just or lawful grounds for instituting the proceedings, led his superior officer to believe that he had just and lawful grounds and so induced the latter to direct the institution of criminal proceedings against a person, he would be liable under this section, notwithstanding that he was a police officer and in a sense instituted the proceedings by order of his superior officer.[46] If the mere fact of being in a subordinate position is to shield a man from the consequences of official acts originated by himself, no one will be safe from false and malicious charges.[47]

7. Intention to Cause Injury Necessary

It is essential for a conviction for either of the offences under this section, that the accused intended to cause injury to the person he charged or proceeded against.[48] By 'injury' is meant any harm illegally caused to any person, in body, mind, reputation or property.[49]1590

Malice is the Foundation

'The foundation of the action is malice, and malice may be shown at any time in the course of inquiry'.[50] As Cockburn CJ, said in Fitz Jogn v Mackinder [51]

> A prosecution, though in the outset not malicious, as having been undertaken at the dictation of a judge or magistrate, or, if spontaneously undertaken, from having been commenced under a bona fide belief in the guilt of the accused, may nevertheless become malicious in any of the stages through which it has to pass, if the prosecutor, having acquired positive knowledge of the innocence of the accused, perseveres malo animo in the prosecution, with the intention of procuring per nefas a conviction of the accused.

8. 'Criminal Proceeding'--What is?

When the proceeding is before a magistrate, and it is one which may end in conviction, it must be considered to be a criminal proceeding. If there be a provision in a statute that that which is merely a civil liability may be enforced by a proceeding in its nature criminal, that proceeding is nonetheless criminal because it is applied to a civil liability.[52]

Code of Criminal Procedure is not Exhaustive of Criminal Proceedings--Contempt Proceedings are Criminal Proceedings

A contempt of court can be punished by imprisonment and fine, and that brings an accusation charging a man with contempt of court within the wide words 'criminal proceedings'. Such proceedings were described as quasi-criminal proceedings by the privy council because such proceedings are not tried under the CrPC . That does not render it any the less a criminal proceeding because the CrPC is not exhaustive of criminal proceedings and punishments for contempts by summary procedure, before the superior courts are special criminal proceedings which the CrPC does not even seek to regulate. An application to take proceedings under the Contempt of Courts Act, undoubtedly can be regarded as causing a criminal proceeding to be instituted.[53]

Offence--Not Confined to Criminal Proceedings

When the section says that an offence under it may be committed by falsely charging a person with the commission of an offence, it does not intend that the offence must be one which gives rise to a criminal proceeding. There is no authority for a contrary view. Indeed, the definition of the word 'offence' in s 40 of the IPC shows that such a contrary view would be wrong. Under that definition, the word 'offence' in this section, means an offence punishable under this Code or under any special or local law as defined in it. Section 41 defines a special law as a law applicable to a particular subject. Now, the Contempt of Courts Act is an Act dealing with the subject of contempt of courts and is, therefore, a special law. It also provides for punishment for a contempt of court with simple imprisonment up to six months, subject to certain conditions mentioned.[54]1591

Two Ways to put the Criminal Law into Motion

According to the CrPC now in force, there are two modes in which the aggrieved person may seek to put the criminal law in motion. He may make a charge or, in the language of the Code, give information to the police as provided by s 154 . If the information discloses a cognizable offence, the proper police officer may proceed to make an investigation; and if the result of that investigation is adverse to the accused, he is, in due course, brought before a magistrate. All this forms the subject of ch XII of the CrPC . If the information does not disclose a cognizable offence, the police cannot take any step of their own authority. Secondly, the aggrieved person may lay a charge by way of filing a complaint[55]under s 200 before a magistrate or before a judge under the provisions of some special Act.

Whichever of these methods is adopted, the thing done by the accuser is the same, that which is called in the one case giving information, and in the other, making a complaint. In each case, the steps that follow are governed by the CrPC . In each the first step taken by the accused is ordinarily also the last, for from that time the control of the investigation or inquiry passes out of his hands into those of the constituted authorities; subject to this, that if, after an information before the police, the result of their investigation is adverse to the complainant, he may renew his complaint to the magistrate. The procedure by information to the police is by far the more common course of proceeding, especially where any grave offence is alleged.[56]

9. 'Institutes or Causes to be Instituted any Criminal Proceeding'--Scope of Statement

This section refers to three matters: falsely charging a person, instituting criminal proceedings against that person, and causing criminal proceedings to be instituted against that person.

To 'institute' is to originate or found, to begin or commence. It does not require any further steps to be taken. To 'institute criminal proceedings' means to set the criminal law in motion. 'Criminal proceedings' are not defined in this Code, nor in the Crpc . Section 2 (i), CrPC, defines judicial proceedings as including any proceeding in the course of which evidence is or may be legally taken on oath. So, no investigation by the police can be a judicial proceeding, although it is a criminal matter. Chapter XIV of the CrPC 1973 is headed as 'Conditions Requisite for Initiation of Proceedings'. These proceedings, of course, are inquiry proceedings or trials, but they are certainly criminal proceedings as well.[57] Proceedings to compel any one to give security, by reason of an anticipated breach of peace under s 107, or because he is concealing himself, or has no ostensible means of subsistence under s 109 of the CrPC, are apparently criminal proceedings, but they do not necessarily involve a charge of any offence. On the other hand, a charge to the police of a non-cognizable offence may, very possibly, be a charge within the meaning of the section, but could hardly be called the institution of criminal proceedings. So a charge made to the judge of a civil court, or to public officers of other kinds, in order to obtain a sanction to prosecute may well be a charge, but it is not the institution of criminal proceedings.[58]1592

Mere Investigation does not amount to institution of Criminal Proceedings

In the case of Re Thakur Tewary,[59] where a police officer made a coloured or false report that a certain offence investigated by him was proved, sanction to prosecute him under this section was refused, not because he was a police officer and acted under orders of his superior, but because it could not be said that the accused instituted any criminal proceedings against any person.

Report and Complaint as Criminal Proceedings

A person actually institutes criminal proceedings not only upon making a complaint as defined in s 2(d) of the CrPC 1973 but also upon reporting the commission of a cognizable offence to the police under s 154 of the same Code. Under s 2(d) a 'complaint' means an allegation made orally or in writing, to a magistrate, with a view to his taking action under the CrPC, that some person, whether known or unknown, has committed an offence, but does not include a police report. There must be an express or implied request to the magistrate to take action. It is of the essence of a complaint that the accusation should have been made with a view to action being taken under the Code. An express request to that effect is not, however, necessary. Whether the statement was made with a view to action being taken upon it as upon a complaint or not, must be determined in the light of the circumstances.[60]

A Departmental Complaint not Contemplated under this Section

A petition addressed to a collector was directed against an official of the court of wards and asked for a redressal of the petitioner's grievances. It was held that the complaint was purely departmental and that the collector was not justified in treating it as a criminal complaint and ordering a prosecution of the petitioner under this section.[61]

Where a person sent a telegram to the deputy superintendent of police alleging that a certain sub-inspector of police had committed certain offences against him, it was held that in the absence of proof, that the person sent the telegram with the intention of making a report for investigation with a view to prosecution, he could not be held guilty under this section.[62]

Report of Non-Cognisable Offence to the Police is not Criminal Proceeding

Turning to a report made to the police, it is settled law that as the police have no power to take any proceedings in non-cognizable cases, without the order of a magistrate, a false charge of such an offence made to the police is not an institution of criminal proceedings.[63] It may, however, amount to making a false charge.[64]

Option in Case of Cognisable Offence

If a person feels aggrieved by the commission of a cognizable offence, he may either (a) lodge the first information report before the police under s 154, or (b) approach1593 the competent judicial magistrate or court directly and file a complaint under s 200 of the CrPC . The choice is left entirely to his discretion at that stage. The police, after due investigation, may submit a report under s 173, which is usually known as charge-sheet if a prima facie case is made out against the accused, or a final report if no such case is made out. If a charge-sheet is submitted, the magistrate takes cognizance of the same under s 190(1)(b) . If the police submits a charge-sheet and sends the accused for trial, then criminal proceedings have been instituted against a person, and the person who has set the police in motion has caused those criminal proceedings to be instituted.[65]

Submission of Final Report--Whether amounts to Institution of Criminal Proceedings

If, however, the police finds that no case is made out against the accused and accordingly submits a final report and the magistrate accepts the same, the accused, that is, the person against whom the report to the police was made, is not sent up for the trial and is discharged, it can be said that criminal proceedings were instituted on a false charge. On this question, there is a conflict of opinion. The answer to the question depends upon the meaning of the two phrases, 'institution of criminal proceedings' and 'making a false charge.' So far as the first part of the section is concerned, the question whether the two phrases are different and mutually exclusive has no material bearing, for whether a given act amounts to a false charge or the institution of criminal proceedings, the penalty is the same. The difference between the two phrases becomes material when the applicability of the second paragraph of the section has to be considered.

One view is that although criminal law may be set in motion by giving information to the police of a cognizable offence, yet unless proceedings are instituted in a court of law, it is not correct to say that criminal proceedings were instituted.[66] According to this view, where on a false charge of a cognizable offence made to the police, there has only been an investigation by the police and no proceedings have been taken in any court, there has been no institution of criminal proceedings on a false charge within the meaning of the second part of this section, and the person making the false charge is liable only under the first part of the section, even if the offence charged is punishable with death, imprisonment for life, or imprisonment for seven years or upwards.

The other view is that to prefer a complaint (report) to the police in respect of an offence with which they are competent to deal, is to institute a criminal proceeding within the meaning of this section.[67] Hence, a person who sets the criminal law in motion by making a false charge to the police of a cognizable offence, institutes criminal proceedings within the meaning of this section, even though the person charged may not be arrested or the matter may not go further than the police inquiry,1594 and if the offence falls within the description in the latter part of the section, he is liable to the punishment provided for.[68]

The weight of authorities is in favour of this latter view which also finds support from the Supreme Court.[69]

10. Statements which do not Amount to Institution of Criminal Proceedings

Mere Statement of Suspicion is not enough

A mere statement of facts or a communication of a suspicion cannot amount to an institution of criminal proceedings within the meaning of this section.[70]

Statement made to Police during Investigation

Where a complaint of a cognizable offence was made by a person other than the accused, any statement made to the police officer by the accused, after that complaint had been received, however false it might have been, is a statement made in police investigation and cannot be made the foundation of a prosecution under this section, as it is not this statement which set the law in motion, nor can the prosecution be said to have been instituted by it.[71]

Statement of Witness

The mere fact of giving evidence by a witness in a court alone cannot, by any stretch of reasoning, be tantamount to the institution of proceedings within the meaning of this section.[72]

Statement of Counsel

An advocate filing a complaint on behalf of a client, cannot be said to have instituted criminal proceedings. An advocate cannot be expected to constitute himself a judge,1595 either of the law or facts, of his client's case. He is his client's adviser and must act according to his instructions, provided always that those instructions do not require that he should be guilty of an offence or of misconduct or that he should institute in a court, criminal proceedings which to his own certain knowledge are false. Moreover, it is his bounden duty to put into the complaint all the material facts upon which the complaint is based and not wilfully, by acts of omission, to deceive the court.[73]

11. 'Or Falsely Charges any Person with having Committed an Offence'--Meaning of

The Code of Criminal Procedure does not define what constitutes 'making of a charge' and what amounts to the 'institution of criminal proceedings'. It must, therefore, follow that these expressions have been used in their ordinary or popularly understood meaning and not in any restricted or technical sense. Thus, whereas 'making a charge' may mean and imply a false accusation with regard to the commission of an offence, made with a view to take action against the person complained of, to an authority bound by law to move in the matter, the causation and institution of criminal proceeding may also include the setting of criminal law thus in motion.[74]

Bombay View

In Raya Kutti v Emperor ,[75] it was observed:

> Now it is obvious that the word 'charges', as used in the section, means something different from 'give information'. We think, the words 'falsely charges' must be construed with reference to the words which speaks of the institution of proceedings. The true test seems to be: does the person, who makes the statement which is alleged to constitute the 'charge', do so with the intention and object of setting the criminal law in motion > against the person against whom the statement is directed. Such object and intention may be inferred from the language of the statement and the circumstances in which it is made.

Madras View

So also, in Queen-Empress v Karigowda ,[76] Ranade J observed that:

> The words 'falsely charging' used in that section must be construed along with the words which speak of the institution of proceedings. These latter words are obviously used in a technical and exclusive sense, and by parity of reasoning, the same restricted sense must be given to the words which relate to a false charge.

But this narrow construction has not been accepted in other cases. In Sessions Judge, Tinnevelly v Sivan Chetti ,[77] a full bench of the Madras High Court held:

> A false 'charge' in this section must not be understood in any restricted or technical sense, but in its ordinary meaning, of a false accusation made to any authority bound by law to investigate it or to take any steps in regard to it, such as giving information of it to superior authorities with a view to investigation or other proceedings, and the institution of criminal proceedings includes the setting of the criminal law in motion.1596

Calcutta View

Expressly dissenting from the above Bombay decision, in Dasrathi Mondal v Hari Das ,[78] it was observed:

> With due deference to their Lordships, we are unable to accept this narrow construction of section 211 , IPC . If the legislature had intended that the words 'falsely charging' should be read ejusdem generis with the words that precede, viz, 'institutes or causes to be instituted any criminal proceeding' there was hardly any necessity for using the expression 'or falsely charges' because that would have been covered by the words the precede them, namely, 'institutes or causes to be instituted any criminal proceedings.

Supreme Court's View

This view has been upheld by the Supreme Court in Hari Das v State of West Bengal ,[79] where Mudholkar J observed at p 1779:

> In my judgment it would not be right to read the words 'or falsely charges' as being in any way restricted by the words 'institutes or causes to be instituted any criminal proceeding'. The legislature has clearly provided for two kinds of acts: one, the institution of proceedings and the other of making a false charge, and I see no compelling reason for reading the section as if it is limited to the institution of a complaint upon a false charge. Such an interpretation would completely shut out criminal proceedings in which no charge of offence has been made.

Words Refer to Initial Accusation--Intention should be to set Criminal Law in Motion

In the latter case the Supreme Court has observed that the expression 'falsely charges' in this section cannot mean giving false evidence as a prosecution witness against an accused person during the course of a criminal trial. To 'falsely charge' must refer to the original or initial accusation, putting or seeking to put in motion the machinery of criminal investigation in motion and not when seeking to prove the false charge by making a deposition in support of the charge framed at the trial. The words 'falsely charges' have to be read along with the expression 'institution of criminal proceeding'. Both these expressions, being susceptible to analogous meaning, should be understood to have been used in their cognate sense. They seem to have been used in a technical sense as commonly understood in our criminal law. The false charge must be embodied either in a complaint or in a report of a cognizable offence to the police officer or an officer having authority over the person against whom the allegations are made. The statement in order to constitute a 'charge' should be made with the intention and object of setting criminal law in motion. A statement on oath, falsely supporting the prosecution case against an accused person, more appropriately amounts to an offence under ss 193 and 195, IPC and not under s 211, IPC .[80]

Offence Complete when Charge has been Made

So then the meaning of the expression 'falsely charges' is simply 'falsely accuses', and as the section stands, there is no necessity of this false accusation being made in1597 connection with a criminal proceeding.[81] The offence is complete when the false charge has been made, and even though no criminal proceedings follow, for example, owing to the police, on investigation, referring the charge as false.[82]

Definite Accusation Necessary

To constitute a charge, there must be a definite accusation. The section requires a good deal more than a mere suggestion of an inference. There must be a charge of some specific offence made with the intention and object of setting the criminal law in motion, against the man who is said to have committed the offence.[83] The accusation must be that a certain defined person has committed an offence, otherwise, it would only amount to giving information of an offence within the meaning of s 182 .[84]

Test Identification does not Constitute a Charge--Report and Charge Distinguished

A mere suggestion to the police that certain houses should be searched because there is reason to suspect the conduct of the owners of those houses does not amount to a 'charge' within the meaning of this section.[85] The mere expression of a suspicion is, therefore, not enough.[86] Identification of an accused at test identification parades also does not amount to a false charge.[87] In one case it was held:

> If the complainant confines himself to reporting that he knows of the facts, stating his suspicions, and leaving the matter to be further investigated by the police, or leaving the police to take such course as they think right in the performance of their duty, he may be making a report, but he is not making a charge. But if he takes the further step, without waiting for any official investigation, of definitely alleging his belief in the guilt of a specified person, and his desire that the specified person be proceeded against in court, that act of his, whether verbal or written, if made to an officer of the law authorised to initiate proceedings based upon the complainant's statement, whether amounting to an expression of the complainant's belief in the guilt of the specified person or his desire that court proceedings be taken against him, amounts to making a charge.[88]1598

Report not Reduced to Writing--Effect of

The fact that the statement made by the accused to the police officer was not reduced to writing in accordance with the requirements of s 154 of the CrPC, does not prevent the statement made from being a false charge within the meaning of this section.[89]

Charge--Where to be Made

As held by the Supreme Court in Santokh Singh v Izhar Hussain ,[90] a false charge has to be made initially to a person in authority or to someone who is in a position to get the offender punished by appropriate proceedings. It must be embodied either in a complaint or in a report of a cognizable offence to the police officer or an officer having authority over the person against whom the allegations are made.

A false charge may be made in a court or outside it.[91] For this section to apply, the false charge must be made to a court or an officer who has power to investigate and send it up for trial,[92] or to take any step in regard to it.

Some Illustrative Cases

Information of an offence given by a person to a village munsif (village headman), who communicated it to the police, which in turn when investigated found it to be false, may be made the basis of a charge against the informant under this section.[93]

It must be made to a competent magistrate or other person with a statutory standing in the matter and must further be made with the object of setting the criminal law in motion.[94] A resolution condemning the police action in not taking effective steps to apprehend the culprits of a criminal case was passed in a public meeting. The copies of the resolution were sent to various higher authorities. It was held that no offence under s 211 was committed thereby.[95]

A charge which is untrue, but which is made to a person who has no official duty in the matter, cannot amount to a 'false charge'[96] though it may be defamation. 'It is not necessary, however, that the charge should be before a magistrate. It is enough if it appears that the charge was deliberately made before an officer of police with a view to its being brought before a magistrate'.[97] The criminal intention involved in this offence, is to cause injury to the person accused, not merely by a loss of reputation, as in defamation, but by subjecting him to a criminal prosecution and the1599 consequences thereof, and this object can be brought about only by making the false charge to those whose office it is to investigate, and proceed upon an information of the crime--the police and the magistracy. If then A, intending to injure B, by subjecting him to a criminal prosecution, falsely charges him before a policeman or magistrate with having committed an offence, he has falsely charged B, and nothing further is necessary to render him liable to punishment under the first part of this section.[1] As pointed out in Rayan Kutti v Emperor ,[2] the true test is; does the person who makes the statement which is alleged to constitute the charge, do so with the intention and object of setting the criminal law in motion against the person against whom the statement is directed? Such an object and intention may be inferred from the language of the statement and the circumstances in which it is made.[3]

Where an accusation of murder is made, in the first instance to a village magistrate, who has authority to arrest any person whom he suspects of having committed the murder of a person, and whose body is found within his jurisdiction, the accusation is a 'charge', within the meaning of this section, even though it does not amount to the institution of criminal proceedings and even though no criminal proceedings follow it owing to the police, on investigation, referring the charge as false.[4]

When the accused, in order to protect themselves from the oppression of a sub-inspector of police, sent a petition to the superintendent of police, alleging that the sub-inspector committed bribery and extortion, it was held that the object of the accused could only be that the superintendent might punish the sub-inspector departmentally, by transferring him to some other station or by some other act of a like nature, and that as it could not be said with certainty that their intention was to set the criminal law in motion, the accusation did not amount to a false charge.[5]

A petition was presented with the object of bringing to the knowledge of the authorities certain matters

regarding which the petitioner had received information, in order that there might not be a repetition of an alleged tutoring of witnesses, and not with the object that the authorities should institute criminal proceedings. It was held that the petition did not amount to a charge within the meaning of this section.[6]

It has been held that a false accusation against a subordinate judge, that he committed an offence under s 196, made to a district judge, in order to obtain a sanction for a prosecution, amounts to making a charge within the meaning of this section, as the object in making the accusation is to set the criminal law in motion and the district judge has the statutory power to further that object by means of a complaint, though the sanction of the local government is also necessary before any criminal court can take cognizance of the offence.[7]1600

To bring Vexatious Charge not an Offence

For a conviction under this section the charge made must be false. To bring a vexatious charge is not an offence under this section.[8] Compounding of a false charge made to the police is not a conclusive answer to a charge under this section.[9]

12. Charge Partly True and Partly False--Test to be Applied in Such Cases

This section contemplates a charge which is indivisible in its nature. To judge whether a complaint, part of which is true and part false, falls under the section or not, the nature of the complaint or charge made by the accused has to be considered; in other words, no precise rule or principle, to decide whether the complaint is substantially true or substantially false, can be laid down, and each case must depend upon its own circumstances.[10] It has to be considered whether the complaint is substantially true and what is false is a mere fringe to the complaint or whether the substantial complaint is false and what is true is a mere fringe, or a mere accessory circumstance.[11]

13. Charge must be of an offence

Under s 40 of the IPC the word 'offence' denotes a thing punishable under the Code or under any special or local law, and there is no reason why a thing made punishable by the Workmen's Compensation Act should not be taken to be an offence within the meaning of this section. The Contempt of Courts Act, being a special law, a charge of having committed a contempt of court has been held to be an offence within the meaning of this section.[12]

14. Charge should be Wilfully False

Another essential ingredient of an offence under this section is that the accused must have known that there was no just or lawful ground for the criminal proceeding or charge. A mere finding that he made a false report or charge is not sufficient.[13] The prosecution is bound to prove that the charge was wilfully false to the knowledge of the maker of the charge. A mere proof of the falsity of the complaint or the failure to prove its truth is not enough. To adduce evidence of such knowledge may be very difficult, but it is still the unavoidable duty of the prosecution to prove it, if the accused is to be convicted under this section.[14] In a case under this section, two principles must be kept in view, first, that a failure on the part of a complainant to establish the truth of his allegation does not by any means justify the inference that the complaint was false, and second, that to secure a conviction in this class of cases, it must be established beyond reasonable doubt, that the circumstances are not merely1601 consistent with the guilt of the accused but also entirely inconsistent with his innocence.[15]

Where an FIR is lodged containing false and baseless allegations, prima facie to injure and harm the reputation of the complainant and the falsity of the said allegations is proved from the statement of the accused recorded under s 313, CrPC and corroborated from the evidence of independent witnesses on record, the order acquitting the accused of the offences under ss 500 and 211 was set aside.[16]

Presumption in Some Cases--Defence in Such Cases

Where the accused knows that there is no just or lawful ground for his instituting proceedings or making a charge, a conclusive presumption of an intent to injure at once arises. Such a knowledge can only be proved on the facts of each individual case, as they existed, or were supposed to exist, or were known by the accused, at the time the charge was made, and the accused in his defence should be allowed to show the nature of the information he had, and the rumours that he heard, etc.[17] Proof that the accused, upon reasonable grounds sufficient to satisfy a cautious man, honestly believed that the person he accused was probably guilty is a good defence[18] as wholly negativing a presumption of an intent to injure on his part. Rashness in making a charge honestly believed, is not itself indictable.[19] But want of any inquiry (and hence rashness) is important in determining whether there was a reasonable and probable ground for the alleged belief.[20] The prosecution must prove such knowledge on the part of the accused, and, if this is not established, he must be acquitted.[21]

Making Charge when Justified--Purpose behind the Exception

A false charge may be made in two circumstances:

(a) the person making the charge may come forward and say that he had himself seen the offence being committed; or
(b) he may say that he was making the charge on the basis of information received by him.

If the charge is made on the basis of personal knowledge, it would not be difficult for the prosecution to show that there was no just or lawful ground for such charge, if it is able to prove that no such offence was ever committed. That fact alone would be sufficient to show that the person concerned had no just or lawful ground for the charge. But where the charge is made on information supplied to the informant, different considerations arise, and the mere fact that the offence was never committed is not enough to establish that the person making the charge had no just or lawful ground for such charge. If the mere fact that no offence was committed were enough for the purpose, it would block a large source of information to the police where crimes may be suspected in such cases, sometimes the suspicion may prove to be incorrect. But that thing by itself should not be sufficient to make the person informing the Police on suspicion liable to1602 prosecution under this section. It was for the purpose of safeguarding this channel of information to the police that the words 'knowing that there is no just or lawful ground for such proceeding or charge' were put in this section. If the charge is therefore, made on the basis of information supplied to the person making the charge, two further considerations arise which might go to prove that the person concerned knew that there was no just or lawful ground for such charge. In the first place, the person making the charge may have been supplied with a certain information, but in his complaint or report to the police he says falsely that he was supplied with certain other information which on the face of it, justifies his making the charge. In such a case, it is the duty of the police, if they know who the informant of the person making the charge was, to produce that information so that it may be known what information was given to the person making the charge. The other way, in which the prosecution can show that the person making the charge knew that there was no just or lawful ground for it would be to show that, on the basis of the facts put down in the report or complaint making the charge, no person of ordinary prudence would make such a charge. A person may in good faith make a charge, which is subsequently found to be false, believing that there are good grounds for making the charge. In such a case, he does not commit an offence under this section as it is for the prosecution to show that the person making the charge knew that there was no just or lawful ground for such a charge.[22] In Murdad v Queen-Empress ,[23] Plowden SJ observed:

Unless the person making a charge actually knows that there is no just or lawful ground for it, he is not guilty of > the offence, and cannot properly be convicted of it. It is not enough to find that he has acted in bad faith, that is, without due care or inquiry or that he has acted maliciously, or that he had no sufficient reason to believe or did not believe the charge to be true. The actual falsity of the charge, recklessness in acting upon information without testing it, or scrutinising its sources, actual malice towards the persons charged, these are all relevant evidence, more or less cogent, but the ultimate conclusion must be, in order to satisfy the definition of the offence, that the accused knew that there was no just or lawful ground for proceedings. It may be difficult to prove this knowledge, but however difficult it may be, it must be proved, and unless it is proved the informer must be acquitted.

In a Patna case, Rowland J observed that there is no penalty in this section for incautious or negligible acceptance of information which the complainant might have learnt by inquiry to be unreliable.[24]

15. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable but a warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The offence is bailable but not compoundable. If the false charge is of an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life, it is triable only by a court of sessions. In other cases it is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

The limitation for taking cognizance of the offence described in the first para of this section is three years. There is no limitation for taking cognizance of the offence described in the second para of the section.1603

16. Complaint of Court--When Necessary

Section 195(1)(b)(i) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 prohibits taking of cognizance of certain offences, including an offence under this section, 'when such offences is alleged to have been committed in, or in relation to, any proceeding in any court, except on the complaint in writing of that court or of some other court of which that court is subordinate.' The prohibition is, therefore, not an absolute prohibition, and does not preclude the magistrate concerned from taking cognizance of the offences mentioned in the clause without the complaint of the court or a superior court if the offences are not alleged to have been committed 'in, or in relation, to any proceeding in any court'.[25] When an offence under the sections referred to in cl (b) is not committed in or in relation to any court, a complaint of such an offence can be made by a private individual.[26] It is significant that cl (b)(i) refers to 'any proceeding' and is not confined to a judicial proceeding. It is, therefore, not necessary for its application that the court should be engaged in a judicial proceeding. Again the clause applies not only when an offence mentioned in it is committed in a proceeding in any court but also when it is committed in relation to a proceeding in a court.

Therefore, when a complaint against some accused persons for making false charges in a petition under s 144, CrPC before the executive magistrate was filed, not by the concerned executive magistrate, who is a court for the purpose and meaning of s 195(1)(b)(i), CrPC, but by the aggrieved person, for prosecution under s 211, IPC in relation to a proceeding before the executive magistrate, the cognizance of the said complaint, taken by the chief judicial magistrate was held illegal and without jurisdiction, being hit by the mischief of s 195(1)(b)(i), CrPC .[27] Cognizance in relation to an offence punishable under s 211, IPC when such offence is alleged to have been committed in or in relation to any proceeding in any court, cannot be taken except on the complaint in writing of such court in view of the bar created by s 195(b)(i), CrPC .[28] An accused acquitted by a judicial magistrate in a complaint case under s 407 read with s 34, IPC, cannot file a private complaint against the complainant of the case in which he was acquitted, due to a bar of s 195(1)(b)(i) of the CrPC and it is only the court of judicial magistrate, which passed the acquittal who is empowered to file such a complaint under s 211, IPC . The cognizance of the private complaint of such acquitted accused by the court was erroneous, and so the order of the issuance of process by the said court of the judicial magistrate, who took cognizance of the complaint under s 211, IPC, was quashed in a criminal writ petition.[29] When a private complaint under s 407, IPC was found to be false by the magistrate, the aggrieved party filed a private complaint under s 211, IPC against the complainant. It was held that such a complaint was not maintainable in view of the bar of s 195(1)(b)(i) of the CrPC and the complaint can be filed only by the1604 magistrate who gave the finding that the complaint was false.[30] A Station House Office (SHO) cannot suo motu register a crime under s 211, IPC without the order of the Magistrate.[31]

Section 195, CrPC is a bar for taking cognizance of an offence punishable under s 211, IPC at the behest of the victim or the aggrieved person.[32]

Where an offence under this section is alleged to have been committed in relation to making of a statement under s 164 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, cl (b) of s 195 of that Code would come into play, which clearly bars cognizance of the offence except on a complaint in writing of that court or a court to which that court is subordinate.[33]

Conflict of Opinion as to the Interpretation of the Phrase--Point of Controversy

There is a conflict of opinion as to the interpretation of the words 'in, or in relation to, any proceeding in any court'. The question on which the controversy centres may be stated as follows:

> When a report is made to the police charging any person with the commission of an offence and the police, after investigation, finds that the report is false and gets the case cancelled under the provisions of s 173, CrPC is the order of the magistrate accepting the police report (commonly known as final report) sufficient to bring the offence in respect of the false charge or false information to the police under ss 211 and 182, IPC, within the categories of offences committed in relation to proceedings in court.

Affirmative View

One view is that any proceeding that comes into existence or is taken before a court even before the cognizance of the offence has been taken, is a proceeding contemplated by s 195(1)(b), CrPC . A proceeding held by a magistrate on receipt of an investigating officer's report made under s 167(1), CrPC is a proceeding contemplated by the Code. When a person accused of any non-bailable offence is arrested without a warrant or is brought before a magistrate, he may be released on bail.[34]When he applies to the magistrate for bail, the magistrate has to consider various matters and then decide whether or not he should release him on bail. When an accused applies for bail, a proceeding does come into existence, terminating in the order granting or refusing the bail. Therefore, even though it may be true that no proceeding comes into existence when the magistrate considers a final report submitted to him by an investigating officer under s 173, it comes into existence when he passes a remand order or passes orders on an application for bail. Section 195(1)(b) does not require that the proceeding must be one from which it can be found out whether an offence was committed or not, or that it must be such as to give material to the court for deciding whether to make a complaint or not. It is not essential that the proceeding must be one for an inquiry into the very act which is alleged to be an offence. Section 195(1)(b) simply requires that there should be some relationship between the offence alleged to have been committed and the proceeding;1605 no particular kind of relationship is required. The words 'in relation to' do not mean that the offence must have been committed after the proceeding had started. Even if the offence was committed prior to the proceeding, it can be said to be in relation to the proceeding if the proceeding was undertaken in consequence of it. If a proceeding is related to an offence, the offence itself is related to the proceeding because, if A is related to B, it means that B is related to A. Where, therefore, a person makes a false report to the police against certain persons, resulting in their being arrested and being remanded to custody and leading to an application for bail being made by them, the remand proceedings and the bail proceedings are connected with the false report made by the person and the offence committed by him by making it must be held to be an offence committed in relation to those proceedings. As the proceedings are related to the offence in the manner mentioned above, the offence must be said to have been committed in relation to them. Section 195(1)(b) is therefore, applicable and no cognizance of the offence can be taken without a complaint by the magistrate and on a complaint by a private person.[35]

In Bajaji Appaji v Emperor ,[36] which was a case under the Code of 1898, it was observed at p 11:

> Where information relating to the commission of a cognizable offence is given to an officer in charge of a Police Station under section 154,Criminal Procedure Code, and is followed by an investigation by him, he is bound under section 173(1) to complete it without any unnecessary delay, and as soon as it is completed, to forward his final report to a magistrate empowered to take cognizance of the offence on a police report, in the form prescribed by the local government. That report may be in Form A when the complaint is true, or in Form B when the information is found to be false, or in Form C when the information is neither true nor false and no case is sought to be sent up. An order passed by the said magistrate on such report would dispose of the complaint made to the police. That order, as pointed out by Beaumont CJ is not merely an administrative order but a judicial order of the court. Hence, if the complaint be held to be false and a B summary is issued, the offence under section 211, Penal Code, will have to be alleged to have been committed by the complainant in relation to the proceedings in the magistrate's court which ended in an issue of the B summary.

It has been held in a series of decisions that once a complaint goes to court and the accused is discharged, thereafter, for any complaint by the discharged person in respect of the complaint made against him to the court, the complaint of the court is necessary for an offence under this section.[37]

A similar view was taken in MP Sirajudeen v M Ganesan ,[38] where one A had filed a complaint under ss 147, 448 and 379, IPC against B, before the magistrate, which was referred by him to the police for investigation. On investigation, the dispute was found to be of a civil nature and the report of the police to this effect having been accepted by the magistrate, no process was issued against the accused B. B then made a complaint against A under s 211, IPC assailing the falsity of the allegations made by him in the aforesaid complaint under ss 147, 448 and 379, IPC . On trial, A was acquitted as the charge was not found established. On appeal, the Madras High Court, upholding the finding of acquittal further held that the complaint of B was not1606 maintainable and the complaint of the court for the prosecution of A under s 211, IPC was necessary.

As police cannot investigate a non-cognizable case without the permission of a magistrate under s 155(2), CrPC 1973 and after investigation if it is reported by the police that the FIR is false and the informant has committed an offence under s 211, IPC, the magistrate is not competent to take cognizance of this offence without a proper complaint.[39]

Where a complaint filed under ss 211 and 500, IPC before him, was referred by the magistrate under s 156(3), CrPC to the police for investigation, the police submitted a challan for offences under ss 211 and 500 . The High Court quashed the proceedings in respect of the offence under s 211 and held that the same were not maintainable without the complaint of the court.[40]

Where the application under s 156(3), CrPC of the accused, filed before the additional chief judicial magistrate (ACJM), for sending his complaint for an investigation by the police, was dismissed by the ACJM on the basis of an inquiry report submitted by the police, as directed by him, the complaint filed against the accused under s 211, IPC was held barred by the provision of s 195(1)(b), CrPC . The filing of a complaint for an offence under s 211, IPC was within the competency of the court suo motu, and the complainant himself could also have applied to the magistrate for an initiation of such an action.[41]

Where the applicant, after filing a complaint of dacoity before a magistrate, repeated the charges before the police, and the police found the complaint to be false and at the instance of the police, the applicant was put on his trial under this section, it was held that the offence, if any, was committed in relation to proceedings in court and a complaint in writing of such court was necessary.[42]

The same view has been taken in the undermentioned cases.[43]

Contrary View

The other view is that when a report is made to the police, charging any person with the commission of an offence and the police, after investigation, finds that the report is false and gets the report cancelled under the provisions of s 173, CrPC, the magistrate receiving the information and accepting it does not act as a court and the act of the magistrate in accepting the police report does not give rise to judicial proceedings. The offence of a false charge preferred against the information in respect of such report cannot be in relation to proceedings of a court and a complaint of the court is not necessary for his prosecution under this section.[44]1607

Supreme Court's View

Magistrates are specially labelled as courts by s 6 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973. When a magistrate acts judicially, he cannot but be regarded as a court. On a complaint lodged with the police, the magistrate bailed out the accused and ultimately discharged him on the basis of the final report submitted by the police. The Supreme Court held that the magistrate acted as a court and the proceeding before the magistrate was covered by the expression 'any proceeding before the court', and therefore, a subsequent complaint under s 211, IPC by the accused, against the complainant, was not maintainable in the absence of a written complaint by the magistrate concerned.[45]

Before a court can grant sanction or make the complaint, the record must show that it has exercised its own judgment on the facts proved before it.[46]

Consideration for making Complaint

Where the case is taken on file after investigation by the police under s 202, CrPC the subsequent discharge of the accused would not justify the making of a complaint under this section.[47] It is settled law that no person should be proceeded against for making a false charge against another unless he has been given an opportunity of substantiating his allegations by the tribunal before which the charge is made and which proposes to take action against him. It is the duty of the tribunal which makes a complaint under s 340, CrPC to come to a judicial finding that the allegations made before it are prima facie false, and it is obvious that a tribunal cannot come to such a decision without giving an opportunity to the person concerned to prove his allegations before it.[48]

Thus, where some false entries in the case diary were made by the police officials, by making interpolation in the entries of the case diary, thereby cooking up a false story against the accused, the Apex Court opined that it is expedient in the interest of justice that an inquiry be made in accordance with sub-s (1) of s 340, CrPC, into the commission of offences under ss 193, 195 and 211, IPC by the police officials. So, in the exercise of powers conferred under s 340(2), CrPC, a show cause notice was issued by the Apex Court to the police officials as to why a complaint should not be made against them for the aforesaid offences.[49]

Before granting sanction for a prosecution under this section, the court should be satisfied that: (a) the charge was really a false one, (b) there is reasonable probability that this can be established;[50] and (c) a prosecution is desirable in the interests of justice.[51]1608

The dismissal of a complaint under s 203 of the CrPC, is no bar to granting a sanction to prosecute under s 195 .[52] If the facts proved do not amount to an offence under this section, but disclose an offence under s 182(a), IPC, it is the duty of the magistrate to frame a charge against the accused under the latter section and try him accordingly.

The person accused of an offence under this section ought to be given an opportunity of substantiating the charge which he has brought, before sanction is given.[53]

Criminal Proceedings when not to be Stayed

Where the court is of the opinion that it is in the highest degree desirable, that the inquiry be conducted both, in the interests of justice as well as of the accused and of all the parties concerned, as speedily as possible, the High Court would not be justified in staying the proceedings merely because a civil appeal from the judgment, out of which the criminal proceedings were initiated, is pending in the High Court.[54]

Criminal Proceedings when to be Stayed

On the other hand, if the charge in the criminal proceedings is in respect to a question which is a principal issue in the civil suit (eg the genuineness or otherwise of a document) the criminal proceedings ought to be stayed pending the decision in the suit.[55]

17. Charge

Where there is positive knowledge of the falseness of a charge, a prosecution for a false charge may be made under s 182, or this section,[56] but if the false charge is a serious one, the graver s 211 should be applied, and the trial should be full and fair.[57] Where the case is not a serious one, it is quite legal to prosecute under s 182 .[58]

The communication of a false accusation is, in fact, the laying of a false charge and unless the matter is actually communicated to a superior officer, it cannot be said that a false charge has been made out.

Where therefore, a complaint that a certain village munsif had received illegal gratification, was written and posted at Kumbakonam and addressed to the inspector-general of police, Madras, and the complaint was, on investigation, found to be false and groundless, it was held that it could not be said that by posting the letter at Kumbakonam the complainant even attempted to commit the offence under this1609 section, and the magistrate at Kumbakonam had no jurisdiction to try him for the offence under this section.[59]

Where a false complaint is lodged and dismissed, the magistrate dismissing the complaint is not competent to proceed against the complainant under this section. He should make a complaint under s 195 of the CrPC .[60]

An acquittal under this section will bar a second prosecution for an offence under s 182 .[61]

18. Form of Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, (*) on or about the.....day of.....at.....with intent to cause injury to one .....instituted criminal proceedings before.....charging the said .....with having committed the offence of .....(or falsely charged the said..... before.....with having committed the offence of.....) knowing at the time that there was no just or lawful ground for such proceeding (or charge) against the said.....and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 211 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

19. Proof

This section requires the proof of (a) an intention of the accused to cause injury to any person and (b) an initiation of any criminal proceeding, or the making of a false charge with having committed an offence, against a person, knowing that there was no just or lawful ground for such proceeding or charge.[62] The duty of the prosecution in a case under this section is to prove by satisfactory evidence that the charge was wilfully false to the knowledge of the maker of the charge. It is for the prosecution to establish their case, and if they fail to supply that proof which is required to secure the conviction of the accused, the failure on the part of the latter to examine only a particular person as a defence witness will not imply the guilt as having been proved.[63] Where a person is charged with instituting a criminal proceeding with an intent to cause injury, knowing that there was no just or lawful ground for such proceeding, it is for the prosecution to make out a distinct case against him, not for the accused, in the first instance, to show that he had just or lawful grounds. Where the facts are as consistent with an accused's innocence as with his guilt, innocence must be presumed; and criminal intent for knowledge is not necessarily imputable to every man who acts contrary to the provisions of the law.[64] It is not for the person charged to make out that his report was true, until it has been clearly traversed by evidence produced by the prosecution showing that it was false.[65]1610

The offences under s 182, IPC and this section are distinct. The offence under this section is much more serious. This being so, the positive knowledge or belief of the falsity of the information given, which must be established on a charge under s 182, is not essential under this section, it being enough to establish the negative viz that there was no just or lawful ground for the action taken, and that the accused knew this. Knowledge of the falseness of the information is essential under s 182 ; an insufficient foundation for the professed knowledge or belief is enough under this section.[66]

20. Punishment

If a false charge only has been made, it matters not what kind of offence has been charged; it may be the most grievous or the least serious, but the false charge in every case is punishable alike.[67] This is, however, not the case with a criminal proceeding, for under the second part of this section, if a false charge of an offence punishable with death etc, has been made, and criminal proceedings are instituted upon such a charge, the false accuser is liable to a considerably enhanced punishment. So, if A falsely charges B to the police with having committed a cognizable offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life, etc, he is liable to the enhanced punishment under the second part of the section.[68]

The offence under this section is one which should ordinarily be punished with a substantive sentence of imprisonment. The age of the accused is a factor to be taken into consideration in deciding the nature of the sentence. But if, for that reason, the magistrate deems fit only to impose a fine instead of an imprisonment, the amount of the fine should be determined so as to inflict on the accused a punishment comparable with what he would suffer had he been a younger man.[69]

Where a grave charge was made deliberately by persons who said that they were eye-witnesses of what they knew perfectly well that they had not seen, the case calls for a severe punishment.[70]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 212.

Harbouring offender.--

Whenever an offence has been committed, whoever harbours or conceals a person whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the offender, with the intention of screening him from legal punishment;

if a capital offence.--shall, if the offence is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine;

if punishable with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment.--and if the offence is punishable with [71][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either1611 description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment which may extend to one year, and not to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of imprisonment provided for the offence, or with fine, or with both.

[72]["Offence" in this section includes any act committed at any place out of [73][India], which, if committed in [74][India], would be punishable under any of the following sections, namely, 302, 304, 382, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 457, 458, 459 and 460; and every such act shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be punishable as if the accused person had been guilty of it in [75][India]].

Exception.--This provision shall not extend to any case in which the harbour or concealment is by the husband or wife of the offender.

Illustration

A, knowing that B has committed dacoity, knowingly conceals B in order to screen him from legal punishment. Here, as B is liable to [76][imprisonment for life], A is liable to imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding three years, and is also liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

From the definition it is manifest that it is only harbouring and concealing a person who the person harbouring thinks or has reason to believe to be the offender that the provision is attracted subject to the condition that such harbouring and concealment should be with the intention of screening him from legal punishment given in s 212 .[77]1612 The object of s 212, IPC as it appears from the language of the provision is to prevent intentional harbouring or concealing of an offender with the criminal intention of screening him from legal punishment.[78]

This section applies to the harbouring of persons who have actually committed an offence and it does not apply to the harbouring of persons not being criminals, who merely abscond to avoid or delay a judicial investigation. The section says nothing about the harbouring of an absconder or an accused person. It renders punishable only the harbouring of a person when it is known, or there is reason to believe that he is the offender.[79] Until the offender has been convicted of the offence he is alleged to have committed, no prosecution can be launched under this section for harbouring him.[80]

To attract the provisions of s 212, IPC it is necessary to establish the commission of an offence, the harbouring or concealing of the person known or believed to be the offender, and such concealment must be with the intention of screening him from legal punishment.[81]

For convicting a person under s 212, the following essential ingredients must be established:

(i) the offence must have been committed, ie, completed and there must be an offender;
(ii) there must be harbouring or concealment of a person by the accused;
(iii) the accused knows or has reason to believe that such harboured or concealed person is the offender;
(iv) there must be an intention on the part of the accused to screen the offender from legal punishment.[82]

A mere help given to a person for absconding without any knowledge that he has committed a crime is not enough. The person accused of s 212 must harbour or conceal the person by providing him shelter or otherwise. He must have given shelter to him with knowledge that he is an offender or has reason to believe to be a offender. The word used is 'offender' and not 'accused' or a person convicted for that offence. The person who is sheltering or harbouring or concealing that person must have knowledge or has reason to believe that he is the 'offender'.[83]

For attracting s 212 also, it is essential to prove that an offence has been committed and mere suspicion that it has been committed is not enough and accused knew or has reason to believe that such offence had been committed and with requisite knowledge and with the intention to screen the offender from legal punishment, he must have harboured or concealed the offender, but, the intention cannot be presumed. If the accused did not know that an offence has been committed or is not1613 aware or has no reason to know the identity of the offender, s 212 is not attracted and burden of proof is on the prosecution.[84]

2. Legislative Changes

The clause defining 'offence' under this section was introduced by s 7 of the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act 1894. In para 5, the words 'the Provinces' were substituted for the words 'British India' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1948. The words 'the States' were substituted for the words 'the Provinces' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The word 'India' was substituted for the word 'The States' by Act 3 of 1951. The words 'imprisonment for life' were substituted for the words 'transportation for life' by s 177 and the Schedule of Act 1955.

3. Analogous Law

The offence of 'harbouring', which is dealt with in this section, is that which under English Law, renders a person an 'accessory after the fact' to the crime committed by the person harboured. An accessory after the fact is a person who, knowing a felony to have been committed by another receives, relieves, comforts or assists the felon, eg in the case of a murder, by assisting the murderer to conceal the death or to evade the pursuit of justice.[85] Similar offences under special circumstances are dealt with under ss 130, 136, 157 and 216 . The only exception is in the favour of the husband or wife as the case may be.

4. Section 212 , IPC Considered with Section 3(4) of the TADA Act

A careful analysis of the ingredients of s 212, IPC and s 3(4) of the TADA Act would make it clear that there is a clear distinction between them. Under s 212, IPC an offence must be alleged to have been committed and the offender must be alleged to have committed that offence; whereas under s 3(4) of TADA Act what is made an offence is the harbouring or concealing or the attempt to harbour or conceal any terrorist and no more. If a person is alleged to be a terrorist and ultimately he is proved to be so, it is enough. It is not necessary to have established that even at the time of filing of the charge sheet the offence must have been proved to have been committed. The further ingredient, that the persons who are harboured are known to the harbourer, or he has reason to believe to be the offenders, with the intention of screening them from legal punishment, is also absent. Therefore, the two sections, s 212, IPC, and s 3(4), TADA Act, are different and not identical.[86](The Terrorist and Disruptive Activities (Prevention) Act, 1987 (TADA) has now been repealed.)

5. Essential Ingredients of the Offence

There are three essentials of an offence under this section:

(a) The offence must have been committed, i.e., completed, and hence there must be an offender;

(b) Harbouring or concealment of the person known or reasonably believed to be the offender; and1614

(c) Intention to screen the offender from legal punishment i.e. the mere giving of food and shelter as a matter of humanity to a person in distress is not punishable.[87]

A reading of s 212, IPC will disclose that three things have to be proved by the prosecution viz: (a) there must be an offender, (b) the offender should have already committed an offence and (c) the person accused under the section should have harboured the offender knowing that he is an offender.[88]

Where the prosecution witness had given shelter to the accused, but he had no knowledge that murder had been committed, held the prosecution witness could not be prosecuted for the offence of harbouring an offender under s 212, IPC .[89]

6. Offence

The word 'offence' denotes a thing made punishable under this Code.[90] For the purposes of this section the word 'offence' also includes an act committed out of India, if it is punishable under any of the sections of the Indian Penal Code specified in the second paragraph of this section, or under any special or local law, if punishable thereunder with imprisonment for a term of six months or upwards whether with or without fine.

7. 'Harbours'--Meaning of

'Harbours' means to shelter, afford lodging or protection to, to give refuge to. It also includes 'to conceal'. Harbour or conceal involve an element of secrecy.[91] According to s 52A the word 'harbour' includes supplying a person with shelter, food, drink, money, clothes, arms, ammunitions or means of conveyance, or assisting a person by any means, whether of the same kind as those enumerated in the section or not, to evade apprehension.[92]

In Emperor v Husain Baksh ,[93] the Allahabad High Court took a restricted view of the definition of 'harbouring' and held that it did not include assisting an accused person to escape by merely telling lies and misleading the police as to his whereabouts. So also in Damri v King-Emperor ,[94] where a pony was lent to some dacoits to facilitate them in removing the loot, another judge of the same court held that as the pony was not lent to the dacoits with any of the objects comprised in the definition of 'harbour' in s 216B [95] of the Code, the act of lending the pony did not amount to harbouring. But this view has not been accepted by the Calcutta and1615 Lahore High Courts. In Muchi Mian v Emperor ,[1] the accused, while answering an inquiry of an inspector of police, replied that his brother, who was wanted on a charge under s 411, IPC was in the house and promised to produce him. He then went inside the house and after a delay of 15 minutes returned with his brother's son, and said that he had made a mistake and that it was the son who had come to the house the preceding evening. The inspector, however, subsequently reached the house and found the wanted brother hiding in the thatch of the roof of the house. On these facts it was held that as the accused, by the methods he employed, gave time and opportunity for the offender to conceal himself or effect his escape and thereby gave him material assistance in evading apprehension, he was guilty of harbouring. Following this, in Tara Singh v King-Emperor ,[2] the Lahore High Court has held that when a person gives false information to the Police with respect to a proclaimed offender, or warns him of the approach of the Police, in order that the said offender may make good his escape, he is guilty of the offence of harbouring him.

Where in a murder case the co-accused knew the involvement of the accused in the commission of the offence of murder, the co-accused being one of the directors in the company where the main accused was also a director, the act of the co-accused of sending his car to pick up the accused from the city of occurrence to facilitate the escape of the accused, renders him liable to be charged under s

212, IPC .[3] In the assassination case of the former Prime Minister of India, Sh. Rajiv Gandhi, the accused (namely Irumbori) assisted the main accused persons by concealing them in a house to evade their apprehension, so his conviction under s 212, IPC was confirmed by the Apex Court.[4]

In framing the new definition in s 52A, IPC, the legislature in effect, overruled the Allahabad view and approved the view taken by the Calcutta and Lahore High Courts.

8. Mere Knowledge of Whereabouts is not Harbouring

A mere knowledge of the whereabouts of an offender does not amount to harbouring. Where, therefore, a father who was asked to produce his son, who was charged with an offence and was absconding, produced him when the police demanded him, it was held that the father was not guilty of harbouring his son.[5]

A man who employs another person to harbour or assist the principal, may be convicted as an accessory after the fact, although he himself did no act of relieving or assisting the principal.[6] And a man may make himself an accessory after the fact to a larceny of his own goods or to a robbery on himself by harbouring or concealing the thief or assisting in his escape.[7]

Section 52A and the commentary thereunder may also be referred to.

9. 'Conceals a Person'--Meaning of

In a Patna case, certain offenders were found concealing themselves in the courtyard (dalan) of the accused and were arrested by the villagers. When asked by the1616 villagers how the offenders came to be there, the accused gave no answer. In his defence the accused pleaded that it was he himself who arrested the offenders, but his story was not believed. It was held that these facts were not sufficient to warrant his conviction on the footing that he had concealed the offenders.[8]

10. 'Whom he Knows'--Meaning of

A person can be supposed to 'know' where there is a direct appeal to his senses.[9] It is necessary for a receiver to have had notice, either express or implied, of the felony having been committed.[10]

Where the name of the accused was not mentioned as an accused in an FIR, that she harboured her son, there was also no evidence on record collected by the prosecution that it was in the knowledge of the accused that her son had committed the offence. Even if the son, after committing an offence, came to the house of the accused, and it is not in the knowledge of the accused, even then no offence is made out against the accused (mother). Therefore, criminal proceedings under ss 212 and 216 etc against the accused were quashed.[11]

11. 'Reason to Believe'--What is

A person has 'reason to believe' if he has sufficient cause to believe the thing but not otherwise.[12]

Section 26 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

12. 'To be the Offender'--Meaning of

This section is attracted only when it is established that the person had harboured or concealed a person, whom he knew or reasonably believed, to be an offender.[13] The word 'offender' used in this section means a person who has contravened the provision of any criminal law, which is punishable either with death, imprisonment for life, imprisonment or fine. Where there is neither any affirmative nor any circumstantial evidence to bring home the fact that the accused knew or had reason to believe that the person he was harbouring was an offender within the meaning of this section, his conviction under it cannot be sustained.[14]

'Offender' in s 212 does not mean 'convicted offender'. Even when the main offender is not punished by the court, the persons who harboured or concealed the offender would be tried and convicted if the other ingredients of s 212, IPC are satisfied in the case.[15]

This section says nothing about the harbouring of an absconder or an accused person. It renders punishable only the harbouring of a person when it is known, or there is reason to believe, that he is the offender. The first thing to be proved in a1617 case under this section is that an offence has been committed by the person harboured. Until actually convicted, a person is entitled to the presumption that he is innocent. He becomes an offender only when he has been convicted of an offence. Until he has been actually convicted and pronounced to be an offender, a prosecution for harbouring him is premature.[16]

As seen above, one of the ingredients of the offence under this section is that the person who harbours an 'offender' should know or should have reason to believe that he is an offender and such harbouring should be with the intention of screening such person from legal punishment but all the same, the requirement is that the person whom he harbors, should be believed to be an offender and this character of the person can be proved only when he has been judicially found to be a person guilty of an offence. If he is ultimately acquitted or found innocent or falsely roped in, it cannot be said that the person who was harbouring the said 'offender' was actually harbouring an 'offender' within the meaning of s 212 .[17]

In a Patna case, it was in evidence, that after a dacoity in the neighbourhood, three persons, known as domes, were found concealed in the dalan of the accused and were arrested by the villagers. It was also in evidence that in connection with this dacoity, not only were processes under ss 87 and 88, (now ss 82 and 83) CrPC taken out and served against the three domes, but proclamations by the beat of a drum were made. But the proclamations did not name these particular domes as the offenders, nor specified the particular dacoity of which evidence had been given in the case as the dacoity of which they were suspected. On a charge under this section, the accused pleaded that it was he himself who had arrested the domes but his story was not believed. It was held that suspicion would be aroused by seeing armed domes so as to lead to their arrest; but this is not enough for the section to apply and that the facts established were insufficient to warrant the conclusion that the accused had concealed persons, whom he knew or had reason to believe as the offenders, in relation to the particular dacoity in question.[18]

13. Intention to Screen Offenders

Another essential ingredient to the application of the section is that the harbouring or concealing must be with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment. There can be no conviction under this section until such an intention is established.

14. Special Provision for Husband or Wife

Commentary under s 201, ante may be referred to.

The exception to the section makes a special provision for husband and wife. This exception in favour of the husband or wife of the offender is wider than that of the English law, under which only the wife is exempted from liability. Under the English1618 law, except under special statutory provisions,[19] a married woman does not become an accessory after the fact to a felony committed by her husband by receiving him, nor does she become a principal in receiving her husband when his offence is treason, the law considering that she is bound to receive him and not to discover him.[20] Nor is she liable criminally, for receiving jointly with her husband, any offender. This, however, applies to no other relation except a wife to her husband; therefore, a husband can be guilty as an accessory after the fact to his wife,[21] or a daughter to her father, and so on. But if the wife, acting alone, receives a felon, her husband being ignorant, she is the accessory and not the husband.[22]

The position in India is different. The 'exception' appended to s 212, IPC, clearly provides that the provision of harbouring or concealing the offender does not apply to any case in which the harbour or concealment is by the husband or wife of the offender.

15. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable and a warrant may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by a magistrate of the first class.[23]

The allegation under s 212, IPC is not a separate offence and it can be tried along with main sessions case.[24]

Where the accused against whom offences under ss 212 and 216, IPC were alleged, was produced before the judicial magistrate, the judicial magistrate remanded him to police custody under s 167(3), CrPC without recording the reasons, despite the fact that the offences alleged were bailable offences, the order of remand for police custody was held illegal and against the provisions of s 436, CrPC and so the same was quashed.[25]

The limitation for taking cognizance of the offence falling under paragraph three of this section is three years and that of an offence falling under paragraph four may be six months or one year, depending on the punishment prescribed for the offence actually committed as provided by s 468 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973. There is however, no limitation prescribed for the offences mentioned in paragraph two of the section.

16. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That on or about the..... day of... the offence of..... (specify it) was committed at..... (specify the place) by AB, and that you on or about the....day of.....at....harboured (or concealed) the said AB, knowing (or having reason to believe) at the time of the said1619 harbouring (or concealing), that the said AB had committed the said offence of....; and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 212 of the India Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Where in a murder case, the co-accused knew the involvement of the accused in the commission of an offence of murder, the co-accused being one of the directors in the company where the main accused was also a director, the act of the co-accused of sending his car to pick up the accused form the city of occurrence to facilitate the escape of the accused, renders him liable to be charged under s 212, IPC .[26]

Where the material on record didn't even prima facie indicate that the accused A harboured or concealed B and C, and it was only the opinion expressed by the witnesses that A had the motive to harbour or conceal the offender and he might have done so, the evidence is not sufficient to frame a charge under s 212 of IPC against A.[27]

17. Proof

To establish a charge under this section the following points have to be proved:

(a) That an offence has been committed by the person harboured;
(b) that such offence is punishable with: (a) death, or (b) imprisonment for life or imprisonment not exceeding ten years, or (c) imprisonment from one to ten years.
(c) that the accused had harboured or concealed the offender;
(d) that the accused did so knowing or having reason to believe him to be so; and
(e) that the accused thereby intended to screen such offender from legal punishment.

In order to support a charge of receiving, harbouring, comforting, assisting or maintaining a felon, there must be some active steps proved to have been taken to assist the felon personally; it is not enough to prove possession of various sums of money derived from the disposal of the property stolen.[28] For an offence under s 212, IPC, for harbouring an offender, it has to be proved that an offender was harboured or concealed by a person with the knowledge or having reason to believe that such person was the offender and such harbouring or concealment has to be with the intention of screening him from legal punishment.[29] To support a conviction under this section, there must be evidence of an offence committed in which the accused could have intended to screen the offender as well as harbouring or concealing the offender.[30]

A reading of s 212, IPC will disclose that three things that have to be proved by the prosecution, viz: (a) there must be an offender, (b) the offender should have already1620 committed an offence and (c) the person accused under this section should have harboured the offender knowing that he is an offender.[31]

18. Punishment

Three degrees of punishment are provided in the section, the harbourer's punishment varying with that which can be inflicted on the principal offender.

The law makes harbouring of an offender punishable, but the punishment provided for against the harbourer is made to conform with the gravity of the offence committed by the person who is being harboured, for in the case of the harbourer, the offence does not in its essence vary in gravity. The fact that the law makes a difference in the punishment of the harbourer, according to the to the nature of the offence committed by the absconder, or if we may say, the harbouree, indicates that the more serious the offence committed by the absconder, the greater is the disfavour shown by law to an accused who harbours or screens him from legal punishment.[32]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 213.

Taking gift, etc., to screen an offender from punishment.--

Whoever accepts or attempts to obtain, or agrees to accept, any gratification for himself or any other person, or any restitution of property to himself or any other person, in consideration of his concealing an offence or of his screening any person from legal punishment for any offence, or of his not proceeding against any person for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment,

if a capital offence.--shall, if the offence is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

if punishable with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment.--and if the offence is punishable with [33][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment not extending to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of imprisonment provided for the offence, or with fine, or with both.1621

1. Scope and Object

The offence constituted by this section or s 214, IPC consists in the corrupt motive which is brought into play as much as in the delay to criminal justice. It consists in the compounding of an offence by some agreement not to bring the criminal to justice, and these sections intend to punish those who make a profit out of a public wrong. If the facts found in the case prove that there has been an actual compounding of an offence and there is superadded to it an acceptance of, an attempt to obtain, or an agreement to accept, a gratification or restitution as a consideration for the compounding, the offence is made out.

Once a person accepts a gratification and the consideration for accepting that gratification is his concealing the offence or screening the person from legal punishment, the offence is complete.[34]

2. Analogous Law

Section 213 is similar to the old ss 161 and 162 (since omitted and replaced by ss 7 and 8 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 49 of 1988). Section 213 is the section applicable when the person accepting the gratification is not a public servant. If he is a public servant, there would appear to be no advantage in referring to this section and the offence might more properly be dealt with as one under s 161 or s 162 (now s 7 or s 8 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1988) as may be appropriate.[35]

Section 320, Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, after laying down in its sub-ss (1), (2) and (3) which offences may be compounded, enacts in sub-s (9) that 'no offence shall be compounded except as provided by this section'. Compounding an offence other than those made compoundable by s 320, CrPC will be illegal as such compounding is a thing prohibited by s 320(9), CrPC .[36] The exception to s 214 provides that 'the provisions of ss 213 and 214 do not extend to any case in which the offence may be lawfully compounded' that is, as provided in s 320 of the CrPC .

Under the English law, agreements not to prosecute or to stifle a prosecution for a criminal offence are in certain cases criminal.

It is well recognised that agreements not to prosecute a felony or misdemeanour are illegal and unenforceable.[37] This offence is distinct from that of misprision of felony. It was stated by Lord Westbury in Williams v Bayley ,[38] when speaking of misprision of felony: 'If you are aware that a crime has been committed you shall not convert that crime into a source of profit or benefit to yourself'.

By s 34 of the Larceny Act 1916,[39] it is felony to take any reward for helping a person to recover any property stolen or obtained by false pretences, and by s 102 of1622 the Larceny Act 1861,[40] to advertise a reward for the return of things stolen, the penalty of which involves a forfeiture of fifty pounds.[41]

3. Section not Applicable to Compoundable Offences

This section occurs in ch XI which is headed 'Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice'. An examination of the different sections to be found in this chapter shows that the intention of the legislature was to punish acts--including of course omissions--which do or have a tendency to, or are likely to, affect public justice.[42] Both the ss 213 and 214, are intended to prevent the suppression of prosecutions in cases in which the public is thought to be deeply interested in the punishment of the offender. Penalties are imposed on transactions entered into with this view in mind. But after the rules have been laid down in terms extending to all compromises of offences, an exception is made that the provisions of these two sections do not extend to any case in which the offence may lawfully be compounded.[43]

4. 'Whoever'--Includes a Third Party

This term is wide enough to include not only the victim of an offence who accepts gratification for abstaining from prosecuting the offender, but also any other person who receives gratification for concealing the offence or screening the offender. He may be the person who committed the offence in question or a third party.[44] The offence of compounding a felony applies to all felonies, and is not limited to larceny. It may be committed by a person other than the owner of the stolen goods or a material witness for the prosecution.[45]

5. 'Agree'--Meaning of

Under s 23 of the Indian Contract Act 1872 every agreement of which the object or consideration is unlawful is void. It is, however, not necessarily punishable as an offence. According to s 40 of this Code only a thing made punishable by this Code, is an offence. It therefore follows, that only such agreements are punishable, which have been so declared by this Code. When two or more persons agree to do, or cause to be done, an illegal act or a legal act by illegal means, such agreement is punishable under s 120B as a criminal conspiracy. This section and s 214 further furnish the species of such agreements, which are punishable as an offence. An agreement to accept any gratification for himself or any other person, or any restitution of property to himself or any other person, in consideration of his concealing an offence, or of his screening any person from legal punishment for any offence, or of his not proceeding against any person for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment, is void and is not enforceable under the law, nevertheless, it is an offence punishable under this section.1623

6. 'Gratification'--Meaning of

'Gratification' has not been defined by this Code. The expln 2 to the omitted s 161 and expln (b) to s 7 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1988 simply explain this term as follows:

...

(b) "Gratification" the word "gratification" is not restricted to pecuniary gratifications or to gratifications estimable in money

...

Gratification need not be in Money

It is apparent from this explanation that a gratification need not be in money or in the form of a thing estimable in money. The literal dictionary meaning of gratification is the satisfaction of appetite or desire.[46] Accepting the same, it has been held that the expression has been used in the sense of anything which gives satisfaction to the recipient.[47] But a gift is not a gratification, though it also gives pleasure or satisfaction to its recipient.[48]

Section 161, IPC (since omitted) and s 7, Prevention of Corruption Act 1988, both use the expression 'any gratification whatever other than legal remuneration', which has been interpreted to mean 'any gratification whatever and apart from legal remuneration', and thus there is no scope for the interpretation that the gratification received should be an illegal one, and not a legal one, and must be prohibited by law.[49] This expression has, however, not been used in ss 213 and 214 .

7. 'In Consideration of'--A Discussion of the Phrase

Calcutta View

In enacting this section, the evil sought to be eradicated by the legislature is accepting, or agreeing or attempting to accept, illegal gratification in consideration of doing any of the three things mentioned in the section, namely, (a) concealing any offence, (b) screening the offender from legal punishment, or (c) not proceeding against him. In Hem Chandra Mukherjee v Emperor ,[50] a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court held that there must be an actual concealment of an offence or screening of a person from legal punishment, or an abstention from proceeding criminally against a person, in order to attract the application of this section, and that there would be no offence if a gratification was accepted merely on a promise to conceal, screen or abstain and nothing more. Such was also the contention of the defence in Queen v Bargess ,[51] but was rejected, Lord Coleridge CJ pointing out the extraordinary position which would arise if that construction was accepted, namely, that if the maker of an agreement kept the agreement, he was guilty of an offence; but1624 if, in addition to making such an illegal agreement he is guilty of the further fraud towards the other party by breaking it, he was guilty of no offence at all.

Bombay View

The Calcutta decision has also been dissented from by the Bombay High Court in Behari Lal Kalacharan v Emperor. [52] As pointed out by Chagla CJ in that case, in law a consideration may be as much a promise as something actually done or achieved. The neutral word 'consideration' used by the legislature is wide enough to cover both cases, the case of something having been done or achieved in the past and also the case of something to be done in future. So the consideration contemplated by this section may be either a promise to conceal an offence or screen the person from legal punishment or it may be a past consideration, the person having already concealed the offence or screened the person from legal punishment and receiving gratification for having rendered that service. The section, however, does not require the actual concealment of an offence or the screening of any person from legal punishment or the actual forbearing of taking any proceeding. It is sufficient if an illegal gratification is received in consideration of a promise to conceal an offence or screen any person from legal punishment or desist from taking any proceeding. The offence is then complete and cannot be undone by subsequently doing that which ought to have been done before, for example, by a subsequent prosecution of the principal offender.[53] It may be added that concealing or screening an offender is already an offence under the preceding section, and the offence under this section consists in accepting or agreeing to accept illegal gratification for such concealing or screening.

8. 'Screening'--Meaning of

According to the Oxford Dictionary, the meaning of the word 'screen' is 'to shield or protect from hostility or impending danger; especially to save (an offender) from punishment or exposure; to conceal (a person's offence)'. In this sense, a mere abstention from giving evidence or merely keeping away from the court, would be sufficient to constitute screening. It is not necessary that the accused should physically keep away the offender from the arm of the law or that he should, again, physically destroy some evidence on which the prosecution relies. However, if the accused in the original case is discharged or acquitted of the charge, there can be no screening.[54] In ss 217 and 218, the legislature has used the word 'saving' instead of 'screening' but that does not mean that the two words must have different meanings. There are occasions when the legislature does use two different expressions without meaning to make any distinction between them.[55]

9. 'Offence'--Meaning of

The term 'offence' has been judicially interpreted to mean an actual offence and not an imaginary one. If there is no offence, there is no application of this section.[56] The words 'concealing an offence' and 'screening any person from legal punishment for any offence' presuppose the actual commission of an offence, or the guilt of the1625 person screened from punishment. The intention of the legislature was, in framing these sections, 'to discourage malpractices, when offences have really been committed, or when persons really guilty are screened, and not to ensure general veracity on the part of the public in regard to imaginary offences or offenders'.[57] In the case of Girish Myte v Queen-Empress ,[58] it was observed that this section would seem to be applicable only when it is proved that the person screened or attempted to be screened from legal punishment has been guilty of an offence.

Section 40 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, but a warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The offence is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by a magistrate of the first class. Limitation for taking cognizance of the offence under this section, if the principal offence is punishable with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment extending to ten years is three years; if the principal offence is punishable with imprisonment not extending to ten years, it may be six months or one year depending on the limitation for taking the cognizance, if the principal offence is a capital offence.

11. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That on or about the.....day of.....at.....one AB committed the offence of .....punishable with.....and that you on or about the.....day of.....at .....accepted (or attempted to accept or agreed to accept) any gratification for yourself or X, or any restitution of property, to wit.....to yourself (orX) in consideration of your concealing the said offence of.....(or screening the said AB from legal punishment for the said offence or not proceeding against the said AB), for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 213 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

12. Proof

The points requiring proof are:

(a) that an offence had been committed;
(b) that the accused either: (a) concealed such offence; or (b) screened the offender from legal punishment; or (c) omitted to proceed against such offender so as to bring him to punishment;
(c) that the accused accepted, or attempted to obtain, or agreed to accept, some gratification or restitution of property; and
(d) that the accused accepted, attempted to obtain or agreed to accept, the same in consideration of such concealment, screening or omission.1626

Where there was no offence as the complaint was cleared of the original charge, there could be no screening of the offender or preventing him from being exposed to the consequence of the offence. Unless every ingredient of the charge is established, the conviction is not possible.[59]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 214.

Offering gift or restoration of property in consideration of screening offender.--

Whoever gives or causes, or offers or agrees to give or cause, any gratification to any person, or [60][restores or causes the restoration of] any property to any person, in consideration of that person's concealing an offence, or of his screening any person from legal punishment for any offence, or of his not proceeding against any person for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment;

if a capital offence.--shall, if the offence is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a tern which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

if punishable with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment.--and if the offence is punishable with [61][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment not extending to ten years, shall be, punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of imprisonment provided for the offence, or with fine, or with both.

[62][Exception.--The provisions of sections 213 and 214 do not extend to any case in which the offence may lawfully be compounded.]

[63][**].

Comments

1. Scope and Object

The preceding section dealt with the receiver and this section deals with the offerer of illegal gratification in consideration of concealing an offence, or screening the offender from legal punishment or abstaining from prosecuting the offender.1627 Otherwise the scope and object of this section is the same as that of the preceding section. Synopsis note 2 under s 213, IPC may be referred to.

There cannot be even a slightest doubt that a lawyer appearing for an accused who is facing a murder charge, cannot perform his professional duty as is required of him when he himself is faced with criminal prosecution, for a serious charge like under ss 201 and 214, IPC, which are punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years and also fine.[64]

2. Legislative changes

As originally enacted, the section contained the following exception and illustrations:

> Exception.--The provisions of sections 213 and 214 do not extend to any case in which the offence consists only of an act irrespective of the intention of the offender, and for which act the person injured may bring a civil action.
> (a) A assaults B with intent to commit murder. Here, as the offence does not consist of the assault only, irrespective of the intention to commit murder, it does not fall within the exception, and cannot, therefore, be compounded.
> (b) A assaults B. Here, as the offence consists simply of the act, irrespective of the intention of the offender, and as B may have a civil action for the assault, it is within the exception, and may be compounded.
> (c) A commits the offence of bigamy. Here as the offence is not the subject of civil action, it cannot be compounded.
> (d) B commits the offences of adultery with a married woman. The offence may be compounded.

The courts found various difficulties in construing the exception, and the illustrations to the exception which, far from throwing light on its meaning, created the chief difficulties in its constructions.[65] Both the exception and the illustrations were therefore repealed in 1882, the former by s 6 of the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act 8 of 1882 and the latter by Sch I to the Code of Criminal Procedure, 10 of 1882, and the present exception was inserted in place of the old one by Act 8 of 1882.

The words 'restores or causes the restoration of' were substituted for the words 'to restore or cause the restoration of' by the Repealing and Amending Act 12 of 1953, s 4 and the third Schedule. The words 'imprisonment for life' were substituted for the words 'transportation for life', by Act 26 of 1955, s

117 and the Schedule.

3. 'Whoever'--Meaning of

This term is wide enough to include the person who committed the offence, sought to be concealed or screened, as well as a third party. The section, therefore, includes the offer of a bribe by the person who has committed the offence that he desired to screen.[66]1628

4. 'Agrees to give'--Meaning of

The word 'agree' involves the idea of something of the nature of a demand. But even if the bribe is solicited, the giving or agreeing to give it, is no less an offence under this section.[67]

5. 'Gratification'--Meaning of

Synopsis note 6 under s 213 may be referred to.

6. 'In consideration of'--What is?

Synopsis note 7 under s 213 may be referred to.

7. 'Offence'--What is

Synopsis note 9 under s 213 and the commentary under s 40 may be referred to.

8. Concealing an Offence

In an old case it was held that the words 'in consideration of that person's concealing any offence or his screening any person from legal punishment for any offence, or of his not proceeding against any person for the purposes of bringing him to legal punishment' are applicable not only to the case of a completed offence, but also to the case of an offence in progress, and an offence proposed but not yet commenced.[68] But in subsequent cases it has been held that the words 'concealing an offence' and 'screening any person from legal punishment for any offence' presuppose the actual commission of an offence, or the guilt of the person screened from the punishment.[69] The intention of the legislature in framing these sections was 'to discourage malpractices, when offences have really been committed, or when persons really guilty are screened, and not to ensure the general veracity on the part of the public in regard to imaginary offences or offenders.'[70]

9. Exception

The exception to this section also applies to the preceding s 213 and it provides that the provisions of ss 213 and 214 are not applicable to compoundable offences. Section 320 , CrPC enumerates the offences which may be compounded with or without the permission of the court.

10. 'Compounded'--What is

Compounding an offence is more than a mere promise to withdraw a prosecution. It supposes an arrangement by which the parties have settled their differences, and in the more usual acceptance of the term, implies that the prosecutor has received some consideration or gratification dropping the prosecution. Although the provisions of the Contract Act 1872 may not apply, the proof of the arrangement must be similar to1629 that which the court requires for the proof of any agreement which is in issue. Unless it appears that the parties were free from influence of every kind and were fully aware of their respective rights, it would be impossible to give effect to a so-called arrangement or composition. It signifies that the person against whom the offence has been committed has received some gratification, not necessarily of a pecuniary character, to act as an inducement for his desiring to abstain from a prosecution, and the law[71] provides that if the offence be compoundable, a composition shall have the effect of an acquittal.[72]

Sub-sections (1) and (2) of s 320 of the CrPC specify the offences which may be compounded. Those specified in sub-s (1) may be compounded only by certain persons. Those specified in sub-s (2) can also be compounded only by certain persons, but with the permission of the court trying the offence. Sub-section (9) of that section lays down that 'no offence shall be compounded except as provided by this section'.

11. Offence under Special or Local Laws not Compoundable

Offences created by special or local laws, not being specified in s 320, CrPC, are not compoundable.[73] Compounding an offence, other than those made compoundable by s 320 will be illegal, as such compounding is a thing prohibited by s 320(9), CrPC .[74]

12. Procedure

The offence under this section is not cognizable, but a warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by a magistrate of the first class. Provisions as to the limitation applicable to an offence under the previous section also apply to an offence under this section.

13. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That on or about the....day of.....at.....you have (or caused or offered or agreed to give) a gratification to wit..... to AB (or restored or caused the restoration of a property, to wit.....toAB) in consideration of the said AB's concealing the offence of .....under section.....of.....and which offence is punishable with.....(or of his screening you or any person to wit.....from legal punishment for the offence of.....or of his not proceeding against you or any person, to wit.....for the purpose of bringing you (or him to legal punishment, for the offence punishable under s .....), and you thereby committed an offence under section 214 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

14. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the following points must be proved:1630

(a) that an offence was committed;
(b) that the accused offered or gave, or caused or agreed to give or cause, any gratification, or restored, or caused restitution of, any property; and
(c) that he did so in consideration of the other's concealing an offence, or of his screening the offender from legal punishment for an offence, or of his not proceeding against the offender for the purpose of screening him from legal punishment.

A conviction under this section cannot be upheld in the absence of a proof of the theft for the hushing of which the bribe is alleged to have been offered.[75]

15. Earlier Decision not to be questioned

A court dealing with a charge under this section is not entitled to question or review the correctness of the decision of another court acquitting a person charged with having committed the offence which the person before it is charged with having attempted to conceal.[76]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 215.

Taking gift to help to recover stolen property, etc.--

Whoever takes or agrees or consents to take any gratification under pretence or on account of helping any person to recover any movable property of which he shall have been deprived by any offence punishable under this Code, shall, unless he uses all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.1631

Comments

1. Scope and Object

The primary aim of the section is to punish all trafficking in crime, by which a person knowing that property has been obtained by crime, and knowing the criminal, makes a profit out of the crime, while screening the offender from justice. It is not an offence to take money from another in order to help him to find the property and to convict the thief. It is an offence for one who knew of the commission of the crime, and who could at once have informed the offender, to wait till a reward is offered, and then to take money from the owner of the property under colour of getting the property back for him. It is an offence for one who is mixed up with the original crime to receive or to bargain for money as reward for the restitution of the property.[77] The offence under this section consists in any person taking, or agreeing or consenting, to take any gratification under pretence, or on account of helping any person to recover any movable property of which he shall have been deprived, by any offence punishable under this Code, unless such person uses all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence.[78] The section aims primarily at professional trackers and other persons who, being usually in league with thieves or well aware of their proceedings, obtain money for recovery of stolen property without making any effort to bring the offenders to justice.[79] The section is not intended to punish a person who receives consideration bona fide for helping the owner to recover property which he lost by theft, criminal misappropriation, etc. It is intended to deal with cases which are similar to collections, in the nature of 'Thuppukooli' made by the person, who, from the circumstances of their offer to help the owner, are expected to contact the thief and pay him a portion of the money on the understanding that he won't be exposed if he would release the concerned property to the owner. There is thus, besides the promise by the accused to recover the stolen property, an implied association between him and the thief or the means on his part of discovering the thief and recovering the property, but without at the same time any undertaking on his part to do what the law expects every honest citizen to do in his situation, namely, to help in the prosecution of the person who has committed a cognizable and non-bailable offence like theft or an offence in regard to a movable property.[80]

2. Analogous Law

This section is borrowed from a series of English Statutes, the first of which, 4 Geo, 1, cr 11, s 4, was passed to put a stop to the trade of the notorious Jonathan Wild who was ultimately convicted under it and executed.[81]In England, s 102 of the Larceny Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict, cr 96) provided that:

> Whoever shall publicly advertise a reward for the return of any property whatsoever,[82] which shall have been taken or lost, and shall in such advertisement use any words purporting that no questions will be asked or shall make use of any words in any public advertisement purporting that a reward will be given or paid for any property which1632 shall have been stolen or lost, without seizing or making any inquiry after the person producing such property, or shall promise or offer in any such public advertisement to return to any pawn broker or other person who may have bought or advanced money by way of loan upon any property stolen or lost the money so paid or advanced or any other sum of money or reward for the return of such property, or shall print or publish any such advertisement, shall forfeit the sum of fifty pounds for every such offence (to any person who will sue for the same by action of debt, to be recovered with full costs of suit).[83]

The Larceny Act 1916,[84] s 34,[85]which substantially re-enacts s 101 of the Larceny Act 1861 provides that:

> S. 34 Corruptly taking a reward.--Every person who corruptly takes any money or reward, directly or indirectly, under pretence or upon account of helping any person to recover any property which has, under circumstances which amount to felony or misdemeanour, been stolen or obtained in any way whatsoever, or received, shall (unless he has used all due diligence to cause the offender to be brought to trial for the same) be guilty of felony and on conviction thereof liable to penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years....

3. Ingredients of the Offence

The section has three essential ingredients: (a) taking, or agreeing or consenting to take, any gratification under pretence, or on account of helping any person to recover any movable property; (b) that the owner of such property must have been deprived of it by an offence punishable under the Indian Penal Code ; and (c) that the person in question, having taken or agreed to take the gratification, must not have used all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence.

Mere Omission may Complete the Offence

It is a peculiar section inasmuch as once it is shown that the person charged has taken or agreed to take money, which in itself is no way wrong or illegal if the intention is honest, then the completion of the offence follows not necessarily from any further overt act but merely from an omission, namely as the section puts it, the failure to use all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted.[86]

Knowledge of Offender not Necessary

The knowledge of the offender is not a necessary ingredient of an offence under this section. There is not one word in the section that suggests that such knowledge is necessary. It may well be that a person who receives money for discovering a stolen property may, in the course of his investigation, obtain information which if followed up, would lead to the apprehension of the offender. If he withholds that information from the proper authorities, it is obvious that it cannot be said that he used his best endeavour to cause the offender to be apprehended.[87]1633

Screening the Offender also not Necessary

To bring a case within the purview of this section it is enough to prove that money was demanded and paid for helping the person to recover the property of which he had been deprived of by means of a punishable offence. Screening or attempting to screen an offender is not a further necessary ingredient.[1]

4. 'Whoever'--If Includes thief or Suspected Thief

There is a conflict of judicial opinion on this question. In an early Madras case, it was held that this section is not applicable to the case of the offender himself taking a gratification. This is seen from the part of the section which speaks of his using all the means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence.[2] So also, in one of its earlier decisions the Allahabad High Court held that this section was not intended to apply to the actual thief, but to someone who, being in league with the thief, receives some gratification on account of helping the owner to recover the stolen property without at the same time using all the means in his power to cause the thief to be apprehended and convicted.[3] And this decision was followed by the Madras[4] and the Rangoon[5] High Courts. A similar view was taken by a Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court in Mangu v Emperor ,[6] without reference to any previous decision, but only relying on an observation of Mayne[7] to the effect that the section is not intended to apply to the actual thief, but to someone who, being in league with the thief, receives some gratification on account of helping the owner to recover stolen property without at the same time using all the means in his power to cause the thief to be apprehended and convicted of his offence.

Old View Overruled

The Allahabad ruling in Queen-Empress v Mahommad Ali ,[8] which was followed by the Madras and Lahore High Courts, was dissented from in Emperor v Mukhtara ,[9] and was finally overruled by a Full Bench of that court in DeoSuchit Rai v Emperor. [10] So also in Burma, the correctness of the decision in Twet Pe v King-Emperor ,[11] was doubted in Emperor v Nga Nyan U ,[12] and in King v Nga V Nyein ,[13] this question was thoroughly considered by a judge who followed Emperor v Mukhtara ,[14] which had dissented from Queen-Empress v Mahommad Ali. [15] In the course of the judgment, the learned judge observed:1634

> It does not appear to me to be correct to say as Fox, CJ said in 4 LBR 1998 that the section does not apply to the actual thief because he is under no legal obligation to bring himself to justice. All that the section says is that the person who takes the gratification shall be punished unless he uses all means in his power to bring the actual thief to justice. No doubt the wording of the section makes it apply in the majority of cases to offenders other than the actual thief. But cases may well occur, as was pointed out by Aston JC in (1893-1900) PJLBR 226 where a thief having stolen cattle without a view to obtain money by restoring them to the owner, may offer to restore them for a gratification merely because he knows that detection is becoming imminent.

In Ramanand Telt v Emperor ,[16] a Division Bench of the Patna High Court also followed the decision in Emperor v Mukhtara [17] and held that a person suspected of theft may, if the prosecution fails to prove the fact of theft by him, be convicted under s 215 .

Thief is Covered--Settled Law

It can, therefore, be taken as settled law now, that the accused can be convicted under this section even if he was the thief or a suspected thief. There is nothing in this section which should exclude an actual thief from a liability under it if, in addition to committing the theft, he also tried to realise money by a promise to return the stolen article. Such an act, which is independent of the act of stealing, constitutes a different offence. There is no reason why a thief should not be punishable for an additional offence. The only reason for the view that a thief cannot be held guilty under this section is the fact that it is unnatural for a thief himself to use all means in his power to cause himself to be apprehended and convicted for theft. But the language of the section does not contemplate any exception. The earlier part of the section which really describes the ingredients of the offence, does not lend support to the view that the thief cannot be prosecuted under this section. The latter part of the section is really in the nature of a provision by way of a concession in favour of one who helps, though for personal gain, both in recovering the stolen property, and in bringing the thief to book. An actual thief or a person suspected to be the thief can be convicted under this section.[18]

5. 'Takes, or Agrees or Consents to take any Gratification'--Meaning of

In order to constitute the offence punishable under this section, it is necessary that the person who is willing to take and the person who is willing to give, the illegal gratification, must agree not only as to the object for which the gratification is to be given, but also as to the shape or form the gratification is to take. If a person has actually taken a gratification from another, it must be assumed that he agreed to take, and the other to give it, in that particular form or shape; but where the gratification has not actually passed and there is a disagreement as to the form or shape that the gratification is to take, the idea of agreement or consent is negatived.[19]1635

6. 'Attempt'--When Complete ?

In Queen-Emperor v Chittar ,[20]Dillon J held that an attempt to take a gratification within the meaning of this section, necessarily includes the idea of concurrence of wills between the giver and taker; with this much superadded thereto, that some act has been done preliminary to the act of taking. In other words, an attempt is a stage in the commission of the offence which is intermediate between the agreement or consent and the actual taking. But this has been dissented from in the undermentioned cases.[21] Under s 2 of the Indian Contract Act 1872, when one person signifies to another his willingness to do, or to abstain from doing, anything with a view to obtaining the assent of that other to such act or abstinence, he is said to make a proposal.[22] The assent to a proposal amounts to a promise.[23] The proposals as above defined which are inseparable from the establishment of contractual arrangements are attempts to complete an agreement, or in other words, to arrive at the mutually expressed view of two wills whereby the legal bond called a 'contract' is constituted. When once a proposal has been made for the payment of an illegal gratification, whether or not it fructifies into an agreement, the offence of an attempt to commit an offence under this section is complete.[24] If an attempt to take a gratification within the meaning of this section necessarily includes the idea of a giver and taker, it is no more an attempt to commit an offence, but a substantive offence on the language of the section.[25] In the substantive offence there is a giver and a taker; in an attempt to commit the offence there is merely a proposal or an attempt to enter into an agreement to take from a person who is being induced to give.[26]

7. Gratification

Synopsis note 6 under s 213 may be referred to.

8. Movable Property

Section 22 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

9. Deprived--Meaning of

There is no reason to give the word 'deprived' a restricted interpretation so as to mean 'taken out of the possession of'. To deprive a person of any article may be either to take it away from him or to prevent him from getting possession of it if he would have done so in the normal course of events.[27] Thus, if an animal belonging to a person strays away and he does not know its whereabouts, he may be said to have lost the actual possession or control of the animal, but he cannot be said to have been deprived of it. The judicial possession of the animal remains with him. Temporary1636 loss of property, as by straying of cattle, cannot amount to a deprivation as contemplated by this section. It is only when somebody also takes possession of the animal and misappropriates it, that the owner can be said to have been deprived of it.[28]The deprivation of the property must be by an offence punishable under the Code, but it is not confined to one resulting from an act of theft. A person who commits a criminal misappropriation of a property, also deprives the owner of the possession of the property.[29]

Deprived by any Offence Punishable under this Code

One of the important ingredients of an offence under this section is that the owner of some movable property must have been deprived of it by any offence punishable under this Code. The property for the recovery of which gratification has been taken or promised must be one of which the owner has been deprived of by any offence punishable under the Penal Code.[30] There can be no conviction for an offence under this section until it is proved that a person has been deprived of movable property by an offence punishable under the Code. The mere fact that property has disappeared does not necessarily raise a presumption that the disappearance is due to an offence, eg when a buffalo has disappeared.[31] Where the accused merely undertakes to endeavour to trace out and restore the lost property on payment of some remuneration, then upon this circumstances alone the accused cannot be said to be guilty of an offence under this section, unless over and above that, the prosecution proves that the property has been lost by the commission of an offence and that the accused is endeavouring to screen the offender from justice and is not using all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence which he has committed.[32]

Offence may be Committed even after the Possession is Lost

It is not necessary that the offence should have been committed at the time the property had gone out of the possession of the owner. If an animal belonging to a person goes astray and is subsequently misappropriated by another person, the owner is deprived of the property when it became the subject of criminal misappropriation, but still, he may be said to have been deprived of his property by an offence punishable under the Code.

No Inference to be made in Case of Direct Evidence

Where an offence is committed at the time the owner lost the property or was deprived of it, no further evidence is necessary and the courts can straight away hold that the owner was deprived of the property by an offence, say of theft, punishable under the IPC ; but where no offence was committed at the time of the loss of the property, as in the case of criminal misappropriation, there must be material on1637 record, direct or circumstantial, to show that the offence of criminal misappropriation was committed and that as a result thereof, the owner was deprived of the property. Where the person finding the lost property has the intention to return it to the rightful owner, he shall not be guilty of the offence of criminal misappropriation, even though he is not prompt and wants to make money by making a demand from the owner. Wherever a direct evidence is adduced by the prosecution, it shall have to be assessed to find out if the offence of criminal misappropriation had been committed. If no direct evidence is adduced, the circumstances of the case must be looked into to find out if they lead to only one inference, namely, that the offence of criminal misappropriation had been committed.[33]

Inference is a Question of Fact and not of Law

In such cases there can be no question of any presumption. It is a question of inference from the facts, and what inference may properly be made is not a question of law but a question for the conscience of the person who is supposed to make the inference.[34] In some cases,[35] it was remarked that it must be proved that the deprivation of possession was the result of an offence under the Indian Penal Code and that there can be no inference merely from the disappearance of cattle that any such offence was committed. They were all cases in which the stolen cattle were never recovered; and, very likely, it was not a fair inference in any of these cases that the cattle had ever been stolen or misappropriated. They had strayed and were never found and there was, therefore, nothing whatsoever to suggest that any person had ever taken possession of them. But if a bullock strays at night, the person who ties it up to a tree is depriving the owner of its possession, as normally such a bullock would return to its owner in the ordinary course and by being tied up, it is prevented from so doing. The court is entitled quite fairly to make the inference that the bullock had either been stolen or misappropriated dishonestly by some person. In either case some offence is committed, which prevented the owner from retaining or obtaining possession of his property so that he was deprived of the possession of it. Hence, a person taking money for pointing out such a bullock is guilty under this section.[36]

No Offence when there is no Theft or Misappropriation

A charge to the effect that the accused had taken a sum of money from the complainant as a gift in consideration of returning him his donkey which had gone astray, does not disclose an offence under this section, when there is no evidence that the donkey was a stolen donkey, and a conviction under this section cannot be sustained, although the accused pleads guilty to the charge.[37]

Where an accused represents to the owner of a missing animal that it was stolen, and promises, for consideration, to help him in recovering it, but it is found that the animal was only missing and there was no evidence showing that it was stolen, the accused cannot be convicted under this section. His representation that the animal was stolen and that he was helping him to recover it does not itself show that the1638 animal was really stolen.[38] But in an Allahabad case, where the accused demanded a price for the return of some missing bullocks, it was held that the act of the accused was punishable under this section.[39]

10. 'Abetment'--Advertisement when may Amount to Abetment

To advertise a reward for the return of any property stolen or lost, and to use therein words purporting that no questions will be asked from the person claiming the reward, would constitute an abetment of the offence by instigation.[40]

11. Exception--to be Proved by the Accused

This section does indeed contain a saving clause to the effect that a person, taking a gratification of the nature mentioned in it, shall not be punished if he uses all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence; but this is clearly an exception to the generality. Once the elements of an offence under this section are established by evidence, the onus of proving that the person charged is entitled to the benefit of the exception referred to above is on the defence.[41] The object of the legislature in the clause 'unless he uses all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence' was to exempt from the liability to punishment, a person who is acting honestly, and not to exempt the thief.[42]The clear meaning of the section is that it is an offence to receive money for helping any person to recover property stolen or misappropriated and that there is an exception only in favour of a man who can show that he used all means in his power to cause the apprehension of the offender. Under the provision of s 105, Evidence Act where a person is accused of any offence, the burden of proving the existence of circumstances bringing the case within any special exception or proviso contained in the Code or in any law defining the offence, is upon him, and the courts shall presume the absence of such circumstances.[43]

Merely demanding a gratification to help the complainant to recover his buffaloes, without making any attempt to get the person, who had stolen the buffaloes or the person who was retaining them, to be prosecuted and convicted, clearly amounts to an offence under this section.[44]

12. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable and a warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by a magistrate of the first class.1639

13. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate, etc), hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That A, the owner of....., a movable property, was deprived of it by an offence, namely....., punishable under the Indian Penal Code, that you, on or about the..... day of..... at ..... took (or agreed or consented to take)..... as gratification, under the pretence of (or on account of) helping to recover the property, deprived of but you failed to use all means in your power to cause the offender apprehended and convicted, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 215 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

14. Proof

To establish an offence under this section the following points must be proved:

(i) that the owner of some movable property was deprived of it by an offence punishable under this Code;
(ii) that the accused took, or agreed or consented to take, some gratification;
(iii) that the taking of such gratification was under the pretence of, or on account of, helping to recover such property; and
(iv) that the accused failed to use all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted.

No Conviction when Loss not Due to any Offence

To sustain a conviction under this section there must be evidence to show that the loss of the article complained of, was by means of the commission of an offence punishable under the Indian Penal Code . If there is no such evidence on record, there can be no conviction under this section.[45]

To bring a case within the purview of this section it is enough to prove that money was demanded and paid for helping the person to recover the property of which he had been deprived of by means of a punishable offence.[46]

Exception--Initial Facts have to be Proved by the Prosecution

The first part of the section has to be read in conjunction with the last part, containing the words 'unless he uses all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended'. Therefore, the first part of the section itself is really intended to deal with persons who impliedly have means of contacting the offender and recovering the property, and who then undertake to recover the property from the thief on payment of a sum which will serve to remunerate them and also square up the thief. It is only when this state of affairs has been established by the prosecution, the onus of proof can be thrown on the accused person to prove the terms of the exception, namely, that he had used all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence. These being the facts within his knowledge, the statute has placed the onus on him to establish them. Therefore,1640 though it is clear that the clause 'unless he uses all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence' is in the nature of a special exception or proviso within the meaning of s 105 of the Evidence Act for which the onus of proof is on the accused, the juxtaposition of this clause with the other ingredients of the offence specified in the first portion of the section, shows that the prosecution has initially to establish that the circumstances of the taking of the money were such that the accused received it without any intention of tracing the offender and bringing him to book, assuming that he had the means of getting at the offender.[47]

Negative not to be Proved by Prosecution

In a prosecution under this section, it is not for the prosecution to prove the negative, that the accused did not use all in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended. It is for the defence to establish the positive fact that they did all in their power to cause the offender to be apprehended. Hence, a conviction under this section can be maintained even if there is no evidence to prove that the accused did not use all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence.[48] Once the elements of an offence under this section are established by evidence, the onus of proving that the person charged is entitled to the benefit of the exception, is on the defence, particularly so where there has been a spontaneous demand by the accused of money, indicating an intention not to bring the offender to justice. Thus, where the accused themselves accosted the complainant, who had lost his cycle, and told him that if he spent Rs 10, his cycle could be recovered, and the very terms in which the complainant was approached implied that no questions would be asked as to the actual offender and no attempt made at his apprehension or conviction, and on the complainant's paying Rs 2, the accused told him that the cycle would be restored to him on a particular day, but it was not done, it was held that the accused were guilty under this section.[49] Once it is established by the prosecution that the accused accepted the gratification for restoring the stolen property, he must be found guilty under the section, unless and until he successfully proves that he did everything within his means for the apprehension and conviction of the real culprits.[50]

15. Conviction in the Alternative

A person charged with theft under s 379, can be charged in the alternative with demanding illegal gratification for the return of the same. The court can convict the accused of either offence even if the accused has not been charged with it.[51]

Where a person, who was charged alternatively with offences under ss 379 and 215, was convicted of the offence under s 215 alone and the appellate court, finding that there was no evidence for the offence under s 215 but that there was satisfactory1641 evidence for the offence under s 379, acquitted the accused altogether, it was held that the appellate court ought to have altered the conviction to one under s 379 and maintained the sentence.[52]

On the other hand, where there was no evidence on record to show that either of the applicants was in possession of the buffaloes, the mere fact that the applicants offered to get the buffaloes restored to the complainant, cannot necessarily lead to the inference that the applicants or either of them was in possession of the buffaloes. The mere circumstance that the applicants offered to get the buffaloes restored, is not conclusive to show that the applicants were in possession, for this circumstance is also consistent with the hypothesis that the applicant might have known who was in possession of the buffaloes, and he may have offered to help the complainant. In these circumstances, it cannot be said that the charge under s 411, IPC is made out against the applicants. Their demanding gratification to help the complainant to recover his buffaloes without making any attempt to get the person who had stolen the buffaloes or the person who was retaining them, to be prosecuted and convicted, clearly amounted to an offence under s 215, IPC . So the conviction of the applicants under s 215, IPC was upheld.[53]

A person in possession of stolen property, entering into an agreement with the owner for the restoration of such property, without actually helping to bring the thief to justice, cannot be convicted of an offence under this section, but only of an offence under s 211 .[54]

Where the question is likely to arise whether a person who has accepted a gratification for the return of stolen property is the actual thief or not, alternative charges should be framed under s 221(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure .[55]

16. Double Conviction

As stated above, it cannot be said that this section does not apply to the actual thief because he is under no legal obligation to bring himself to justice. All that the section says is that the person who takes the gratification shall be punished unless he uses all means in his power to bring the actual thief to justice. No doubt the wording of the section makes it apply, in the majority of cases, to offenders other than the actual thief. But cases may well occur where a thief, having stolen cattle with a view to obtain money by restoring them to the owner, may offer to restore them for a gratification merely because he knows that detection is becoming imminent. There is, therefore, nothing illegal in the double conviction of the actual thief who also takes a gratification.[56]

17. Sentence

It is only in such exceptional cases that a severe sentence should be passed for both offences than could have been inflicted for the theft alone.[57] Where the accused was1642 an old man and had already served a sentence of two months, a sentence of six months was reduced to that already undergone.[58]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 216.

Harbouring offender who has escaped from custody or whose apprehension has been ordered.--

Whenever any person convicted of or charged with an offence, being in lawful custody for that offence, escapes from such custody, or whenever a public servant, in the exercise of the lawful powers of such public servant, orders a certain person to be apprehended for an offence, whoever, knowing of such escape or order for apprehension, harbours or conceals that person with the intention of preventing him from being apprehended, shall be punished in the manner following, that is to say, if a capital offence.--if the offence for which the person was in custody or is ordered to be apprehended is punishable with death, he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

if punishable with imprisonment for life, or with imprisonment.--if the offence is punishable with [59][imprisonment for life], or imprisonment for ten years, he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, with or without fine;

and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment which may extend to one year and not to ten years, he shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of the imprisonment provided for such offence, or with fine, or with both.

[60]["Offence" in this section includes also any act or omission of which a person is alleged to have been guilty out of [61][India], which, if he had been guilty of it in [62][India], would have been punishable as an offence, and for which he is, under any law relating to extradition, [63][* *] or otherwise, liable to be apprehended or detained in custody in [64][India]; and every such act or omission shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be punishable as if the accused person had been guilty of it in [65][India].

Exception.--This provision does not extend to the case in which the harbour or concealment is by the husband or wife of the person to be apprehended.1643

Comments

1. Scope and Object

This section deals with harbouring an offender who escaped from custody and whose apprehension has been ordered. It is analogous to s 212, IPC . That section applies only to harbouring an offender who, after the commission of an offence, absconds before his conviction, while this section deals with harbouring an offender, who has escaped from custody, after being actually convicted of, or charged with an offence or where his apprehension has been ordered. It is thus an aggravated form of the offence under s 212 . In the case of an offence under s 212, the offender escapes to avoid his possible arrest. Here he escapes from an arrest, or at any rate, after his arrest has been ordered.

This section provides for the punishment of harbourers where the person harboured is wanted for an offence for which certain punishments are provided. No provision whatever is made in the section for the punishment of a harbourer where the man harboured is wanted for an offence punishable with imprisonment of less than one year.[66]

The purpose of the section is to penalise acts designed to obstruct or defeat the course of justice, which requires that suspected persons should be arrested whether they may eventually prove to be guilty or innocent, and that it is not necessary to show that the offence in respect of which orders of apprehension were issued, was actually committed.[67]

2. Legislative Changes

The paragraph relating to the definition of 'offence' was inserted by s 23 of Act 10 of 1886. The words 'British India' were replaced by the words 'the Provinces' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1948. Subsequently, by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950, the words 'the Provinces' were replaced by the words 'the States'. Finally, the words 'the States' were replaced by the word 'India'. The words 'or under the Fugitive Offenders Act 1881' were deleted by Act 3 of 1951. The words 'imprisonment for life' were substituted for the words 'transportation for life' by act 26 of 1955, s 117 and the schedule.1644

3. Section 216 and Section 224,IPC

In Ajab v State of Maharashtra ,[68] 12 persons apprehended for gaming, had escaped from police custody and there was no evidence of harbouring. The Apex Court held that s 216, IPC is not attracted and the conviction of the accused ought to be under s 224, IPC . The following observation were made by highest court of the land:

> Taking the last point first, we see merit in the contention that the conviction under section 216 , IPC is wrong. Under that section a person who harbours or conceal an offender who has escaped from custody or whose apprehension is ordered, is liable for punishment, if he has done so to prevent the offender's apprehension. In the present case, although the 12 persons who were apprehended for gaming had escaped, there was no evidence to show that any of the appellants was guilty of harbouring any of them. We are, therefore, of the opinion that their conviction under section 216 , IPC is not proper. The correct section to apply would be section 224,IPC which inter alia provides for punishment if a person escapes or attempts to escape from any custody in which he is lawfully detained. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the conviction under section 216 , IPC is not proper and it ought to be under section 224 , IPC .[69]

4. Ingredients of the Offence under this Section

The essential ingredients of the offence under this section are: (a) that a person, convicted of or charged with an offence, being in lawful custody for that offence, escapes from such custody, or that there has been an order for the apprehension of a certain person for an offence, (b) knowledge by the accused of such escape or the order for apprehension; and (c) the harbouring or concealing by the accused of the said person with the intention of preventing him from being apprehended.[70]

It is not an essential ingredient of the offence under this section that the person harboured should be found guilty. It is enough to show that against the person harboured an order of apprehension was issued for an offence, that is to say, for an offence alleged against him.[71] The harbourer is liable for punishment under this section, only if he has done so to prevent the offender's apprehension.[72]

5. 'Convicted or Charged with'

This expression makes it clear that, for the application of the section, it is not necessary that the person harboured should have been convicted of an offence. It is enough if he is charged with an offence and an order for his apprehension has been issued.[73]

6. 'Offence'--Meaning of

Under the general definition of the word 'offence' in s 40, IPC, it denotes a thing made punishable by this Code, but this is subject to certain qualifications. The first is that in certain chapters and in certain sections the word also denotes a thing1645 punishable under the Code, or under any special or local law as defined by ss 41 and 42, IPC . Secondly, in certain other specified sections the word has the same meaning, that is, a thing punishable under the Code, or under any special or local law, only when the thing punishable under the special or local law is punishable under such law with imprisonment for a term of six months or upwards. This section is included among the latter sections, and from this it would appear that it would apply to a case in which the person harboured is wanted for an offence under a special or local law for which he is punishable under that law with imprisonment for a term of six months or upwards. But the section very clearly provides for the punishment of harbourers only where the person harboured is wanted for an offence for which certain punishments are provided. No provision whatever is made in this section for the punishment of a harbourer where the man harboured is wanted for an offence punishable with imprisonment of less than one year. The definition of the word 'offence' in s 40 cannot, therefore, affect the clear provision made in this section for the punishment of a person who harbours an offender and the section does not apply to a case where the person harboured is wanted for an offence under a special or local law for which he is punishable only with imprisonment for six months. To this extent this section has overriding effect over s 40 .[74]

The definition of the word 'offence' as given in this section, further shows that if an act or omission is committed by a person out of India, with a view to harbour or conceal a person who is punishable in India as contemplated by this section, subject to the law relating to extradition, he is liable to be apprehended and punished for such act or omission in India. In this connection, ss 3, 4 and 40 may be referred to.

7. Public Servant

Section 21 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

8. 'Orders a Certain Person to be Apprehended for an Offence'--Explained

The order of apprehension may be for enforcing a punishment inflicted on conviction, or it may be for an offence only alleged and not yet proved with a view to facilitate a trial or to procure his presence for any purpose when avoiding the appearance is an offence. Harbouring or concealing a person for whose apprehension an order has been passed by a public servant for the purpose of enforcing a punishment already inflicted on him for having committed an offence, is an offence under this section.[75] But the purpose of this section is to penalise acts designed to obstruct or defeat the course of justice, which requires that suspected persons should be arrested whether they may prove eventually to be guilty or innocent, and for the application of this section, it is not necessary to show that the offence in respect of which orders of apprehension were issued was actually committed. It is enough to show that against the person harboured an order of apprehension had been issued for an offence, that is to say, for an offence alleged against him, and acquittal of the person harboured cannot affect the legality of the conviction.[76]1646

9. 'Knowing of such Escape or Order for Apprehension'--Presumption as to Knowledge

In order to establish an offence under this section it must be proved that a public servant, in the exercise of his lawful authority, ordered a certain person to be apprehended for an offence, and that the person charged with harbouring him did so knowing of such order, with the intention of preventing his apprehension.[77] Such knowledge cannot be presumed from the mere publication of the name of the offender in the Criminal Intelligence Gazette, nor can it be inferred from the offender adopting a false name and the harbourer misdescribing him as his relation.[78]

'Knowing' and 'Having Reason to believe' are Different Things

The word 'knowing' in this section means something more than and different from the words 'had reason (or sufficient cause) to believe'. The latter words might be satisfied even though no warrant has in fact been issued. 'Knowing', however, implies a fact which can be known. It does not necessarily import actual evidence of the senses, but it does import knowledge of something actual by means of authentic or authoritative information. Where warrants of arrest could not be executed and proclamations under s 82, CrPC, are issued, the proclamations cannot be deemed to establish that the accused 'knew' of the issue of the warrants. The distinction between 'knowing' and 'having reason to believe' cannot be disregarded. To read this section as if it contained the latter words would vitiate the judgment, conviction and sentence.[79] The mere fact that an absconder is found in the house of another person is not sufficient to involve the owner of the house in an offence under this section, unless the knowledge of the accused person as required by the section is proved, and here too the fact that a proclamation had been made sometime before the arrest, is not conclusive evidence of the knowledge of the offender.[80]

Mere Knowledge is Sufficient

This section may be compared with s 212 . If the harbourer knows[81] of the escape or order, it is immaterial whether he knows that the offence has been committed or not, and he will be liable even though no offence has, as a fact, been committed, or no fresh offence, as where the order is to surrender and serve out the remaining portion of a sentence, has been committed.[82]

Where the name of the accused was not mentioned as an accused in the FIR that she harboured her son, there was also no evidence on record, collected by the prosecution, that it was in the knowledge of the accused that her son had committed the offence, even if the son, after committing the offence, came to the house of the accused without the knowledge of the accused, even then no offence is made out against the accused (mother). Therefore, criminal proceedings under ss 212 and 216 etc, against the accused, were quashed.[83]1647

10. 'Harbours or Conceals'--what is?

As to the general definition of the term 'harbour', see notes to s 52A . The word 'harbour' includes supplying a person with shelter, food, drink, money, clothes, arms, ammunition, or means of conveyance, or assisting him in any way to evade apprehension. The last words are general and will include every kind of assistance.[84]

When a person gives false information to the police, in order that an offender may make good his escape, he is guilty of the offence of harbouring him.[85]

It has been held that the word 'harbour' in this section must be construed liberally. The person, at whose instance harbouring is effected, commits the offence, although the house in which the harboured person stays may belong to a different person.[86]

11. Intention to Prevent Apprehension Necessary

The mere fact of harbouring a person, who has committed a dacoity, is not an offence under this section. In order to constitute an offence, it must be done with the intention of preventing the apprehension of such person.[87]

12. Punishable

The word 'punishable' is used in the latter part of the section in reference to the offence, merely for the purpose of describing particular classes of offences in relation to which the punishment indicated in the section is to be inflicted, and, it does not indicate that in a particular case the offence must have been punished.[88]

13. Exception

This special provision appears to have been made in this section and s 212, IPC to maintain the harmonious relationship between the husband and wife and to safeguard the interest of their children. This section does not apply to any other member of the family and according to this exception, if the wife harbours or conceals her husband or she is harboured or concealed by her husband, the provisions of this section will not apply to them and they cannot be held guilty of any offence under this section.

14. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, and a warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

Limitation for taking cognizance of the offence under this section is the same as for the offence under s 213, IPC .

Where the accused against whom offences under ss 212 and 216, IPC were alleged, was produced before the judicial magistrate, the judicial magistrate remanded him to1648 police custody under s 167(3), CrPC without recording the reasons, despite the fact that the offences alleged were bailable offences. The order of remand for police custody was held illegal and against the provisions of s 436, CrPC so the same was quashed.[89]

15. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
>
> That on or about the..... day of....., at ....., one AB was charged with or convicted of an offence under s ..... by the court of,..... (or one AB was ordered to be apprehended for an offence punishable unders ..... by.....a public servant) and that you knowing of the escape of AB (or knowing of the said order for apprehension) on or about the..... day of..... at....., harboured (or concealed the said) AB with the intention of preventing him from being apprehended, and that you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 216 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

16. Proof

For a conviction under this section, the following points must be proved:

(a) Where the Offender Escapes:

(i) that a certain person had been convicted of, or charged with, an offence;
(ii) that the said person was in lawful custody for the same;
(iii) that he escaped from such custody;
(iv) that the accused knew of such escape;
(v) that he, with such knowledge, harboured or concealed such offender;
(vi) that he did so, with intent to prevent him from being apprehended;
(vii) that the offence in question was punishable with (a) death, or (b) imprisonment for life or imprisonment for ten years, or (c) with imprisonment from one to ten years.

(b) Where the Offender is Ordered to be Apprehended-

(i) that a person had been ordered to be apprehended;
(ii) that such order was passed by a public servant;
(iii) that it was passed in the exercise of the lawful power of such public servant;
(iv) that the accused knew of such order for apprehension;
(v) that with such knowledge he harboured or concealed such offender;
(vi) that he did so with the intention of preventing him from being apprehended.

17. Evidence

With regard to an order for the apprehension of a person as being guilty of an offence, there must be admissible evidence to show that lawful warrants or orders for1649 arrest were issued by the proper authorities. Sections 62, 64 and 65 of the Evidence Act prescribe the only evidence which the law permits in order to prove a warrant of arrest under s 62 of the Act, the production of the original order, or, under the conditions specified in s 65, of a certified copy. A warrant of arrest is a public document which affects the personal liberty of the subject. The statute prescribes its form. It has to bear the appropriate signature and seal. Any laxity of proof might have serious consequences. It might, for instance, lead to error as to the identity of the person to be apprehended. Secondary evidence, other than a certified copy, would not necessarily or even obviously show that the statutory form had been complied with.

In the case of proclamation under s 82, CrPC, sub-s (3) of that section provides that a statement in writing by the court issuing the proclamation, to the effect that the proclamation was duly published on a specified day, shall be conclusive evidence that the requirements of that section were complied with, and that the proclamation was published on such day. But this cannot be read as overriding the requirements of the Evidence Act or as making the proclamation evidence that the warrants had been issued. The method of proving the warrants is not a requirement of the section, which is merely dealing with the proclamation itself and the mode of publishing it and the like. Nor does s 82 expressly, or by implication, make the proclamation equivalent to a notice of its contents to the public or even to the inhabitants of the town or village where it is published.[90]

18. Punishment

The section provides that if the person harboured is wanted for an offence punishable with death, the person harbouring him shall be punishable with sentence extending up to seven years; if the man is wanted for an offence punishable with imprisonment for life or imprisonment up to ten years, the person shall be liable to be punished with imprisonment for a term of three years; if the man is wanted for an offence punishable with imprisonment which may extend to one year and not to ten years, the man harbouring him shall be punishable with imprisonment up to one-fourth part of the longest term of the imprisonment provided for the offence. It seems quite clear from this that the section only takes into consideration cases where the man who is harboured is wanted for an offence for which a maximum sentence of at least one year's imprisonment is provided. No provision is made in the section for cases where he is wanted for offences for which the maximum sentence is less than one year.[91]

The acquittal of the person harboured cannot affect the legality of the conviction; but it may well be taken into consideration in awarding the sentence.[92]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

[93][S. 216A

Penalty for harbouring robbers or dacoits.--

Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that any person are about to commit or have recently committed robbery or dacoity, harbours them or any of them, with the intention of facilitating the commission of such robbery or dacoity or of1650 screening them or any of them from punishment, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.--For the purposes of this section it is immaterial whether the robbery or dacoity is intended to be committed, or has been committed, within or without [1][India].

Exception.--This provision does not extend to the case in which the harbour is by the husband or wife of the offender.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section was inserted by the Indian Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1894.[2] This was enacted with a view to empower the court to inflict an enhanced punishment where the persons harboured are dacoits or robbers or where they intend to commit dacoity or robbery. The section is analogous to s 212, which is not appropriate in dealing with the case of robbers and dacoits.

The section requires that no one should harbour any persons who are about to commit a dacoity, with the intention of facilitating the commission of such dacoity. It would appear, therefore, that to attract the penalty of the section it is not enough that a person should be harbouring dacoits in general, but the section renders it penal to harbour persons who intend to commit a particular dacoity,[3] or robbery.

2. Legislative Changes

In the explanation, the words 'British India' were substituted by the words 'the provinces' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1948. The words 'the provinces' were substituted by the words 'the states' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The words 'the states' were substituted by the word 'India' by Act, 3 of 1951.

3. 'Reason to Believe'--Meaning of

Section 26, and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

4. Robbery

Section 390, and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.1651

5. Dacoity

Section 391, and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

6. Harbours

Section 52A, and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

The mere fact that a dacoit or robber was seen talking to the accused is not an evidence of harbouring him.[4]

7. With the Intention of Facilitating the Commission of such Robbery or Dacoity

When a person charged with the substantive offence of dacoity or robbery, has been acquitted of that offence, another person who is said to have intended to screen him from legal punishment in respect of that offence, cannot be held guilty of harbouring the alleged offender under this section.[5] The reason is that no person can be screened from legal punishment if he has not rendered himself liable to it by his conduct. [6]

8. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable and bailable.[7] It is not compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

There is no limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the ..... day of..... at..... knowing (or having reason to believe) that AB was about to commit robbery (or dacoity) [or that he had on or about the..... day of..... committed robbery (or dacoity) at.....] harboured him, with the intention of facilitating the commission of robbery (or dacoity) by the said AB (or with the intention of screening him from punishment) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s 216A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

10. Proof

In a prosecution under this section, the prosecution has to establish the following facts:

(i) that certain persons were about to commit or had recently committed a robbery or a dacoity;
(ii) that the accused knew that fact;
(iii) that the accused harboured them or some of them; and1652
(iv) that the accused did so with the intention of--

(a) facilitating the commission of robbery or dacoity, or
(b) screening them or any of them from punishment.[8]

The accused was prosecuted on allegations that upon receiving intimation about the movement of the dacoits in the ravines (with live cartridges, rifle and large cash amount), an ambush was set up for apprehending them by the Station House Officer of Police Station. A known dacoit R, against whom prize money was also declared, was moving in the territories of Kwaari River Ravines, where respondent was found to be in possession of arms and ammunition, for supplying the same to the declared dacoit R. The entries of the Roznama which is one of the most important documentary evidence were not filed by the prosecution to establish the timings of receiving information as also the details of the information, for connecting the present respondent with the offence. The licence of the gun alleged to be recovered from the possession of the respondent was in the name of the respondent and was subsisting. Respondent was acquitted of the charge under s 216A .[9]

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 217.

Public servant disobeying direction of law with intent to save person from punishment or property from forfeiture.--

Whoever, being a public servant, knowingly disobeys any direction of the law as to the way in which he is to conduct himself as such public servant, intending thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby save, any person from legal punishment, or subject him to a less punishment than that to which he is liable, or with intent to save, or knowing that he is likely thereby to save, any property from forfeiture or any charge to which it is liable by law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The four sections, ss 217 - 220, IPC, deal with the disobedience of the direction of law and disregard of their duties by public servants. They relate to offences by public servants, and could have, as such, formed a part of ch IX. But they have been included in this chapter as they deal with acts or omissions on the part of public servants which affect public justice.[11]1653

This section deals with disobedience on the part of a public servant, in respect of his official duties. The dereliction of any duty must be committed in the discharge of the functions of the public servant concerned.[12]Section 218 punishes public servants framing incorrect records or writing. Section 219 punishes public servants corruptly making, in a judicial proceeding, any report, order, verdict or decision, knowing it to be contrary to law. Section 220 punishes public servants making illegal commitments for trial or confinement.

The section makes punishable, a certain dereliction of duty, quite apart form the question as to whether any bribe was paid to induce such dereliction. The dereliction must clearly, from the nature of the definition of the offence, be committed in the discharge of the functions of the person charged.[13]

2. Direction of Law--Direction Means Positive Direction of Law

The direction of law mentioned in this section means a positive direction of law, such as those contained in ss 39 and 40 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and cannot be made to extend to the more general obligation by which every subject is bound not to stifle a criminal charge.[14]

Before a person can be convicted under this section, it must be shown that there is a direction of law as to the way in which a public servant is to conduct himself, as such public servant, and this direction must be a direction to be found in some positive statute or some rules or regulations which are declared by a statute to have the force of law.[15] Thus, under s 457, CrPC, it is the duty of a police officer seizing property, suspected to be a stolen property, to report the seizure forthwith to a magistrate. So, where a police constable, who retained for himself a piece of gold found in a search for stolen property, but not proved to be a part of the stolen property, and failed to report his possession to his superior officers under s 457 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, it was held that he was guilty of the offence under this section.[16] But where despite the report lodged with the police with regard to the commission of an offence, an FIR was not registered, no offence under ss 217 and 218, IPC is made out against the SHO for not registering the case.[17]

In the instant case, the corporation allowed the telephone authorities to do some digging work for laying down new cables and pipe-lines, and the telephone authorities did not restore the road for a long time. On complaint by a citizen, the process was issued under s 217, IPC against municipal officers. It was held that the municipal authorities had failed in their duty to prosecute the telephone authorities under s 417 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act (3 of 1888). The complaint not only makes out a prima facie case under s 217, IPC, for which the process had been issued, but also under s 166, IPC . The process issued, it was held could not be quashed.[18]

Where the court directed the prosecuting inspector to produce the police diary in the court and, on his failure, filed a complaint, under this section, against the1654 prosecuting inspector, it was held that the police diary being not in the possession of the prosecuting inspector, he did not disobey the direction given to him by the court and, as such, the complaint did not disclose any offence under this section or under any other law, against the accused.[19]

3. 'Intending Thereby to Save' etc--Intention is Material

For a conviction under this section, it is not only necessary that a public servant should have 'knowingly' disobeyed a direction of law, but also that he should have done so with a particular intention, namely, to save a person from legal punishment or minimise his punishment, or with a knowledge that his disobedience is likely to save a person from legal punishment or to minimise his punishment. The intention contemplated under the section is to screen persons believed to be guilty, and thereby to obstruct the course of justice.[20] It is not necessary as in the case of a charge under s 201, IPC, to establish that an offence has actually been committed.[21]It would be sufficient if the circumstances are such that a reasonable inference can be drawn therefrom that the accused had a certain knowledge at the time he did the act, namely, a knowledge that he was likely by his act to save a person from legal punishment.[22]

A police officer, who apprehends several persons at night, on a suspicion that they committed a culpable homicide, and keeps them in the village where they were arrested, after tying them together by the hands, is not guilty of an offence under this section if the prisoners escape in the course of the night.[23]

4. Disobedience of Direction of Law should be Knowingly

In a Bombay case, an old and illiterate police patel, on receiving a complaint of an offence of rape, made some investigation and prepared a panchnama of the scene and arrested the two persons against whom the accusation was laid. He sent them with a report to the police station, but on the way, the parties, presumably to save the girl's reputation, came to a settlement and all of them returned to the village. The relatives of the girl, who were responsible for lodging the proceedings, informed the patel that they had no desire to continue them, and the patel thereupon tore up the panchnama which he had made. It was held that under the circumstances, the patel could not be convicted under this section, inasmuch as it could not be fairly said, in these circumstances, that the patel knowingly disobeyed any direction of the law as to the way in which he should conduct himself or that he intended or knew it to be likely that by tearing up the panchnama he would save any person from legal punishment.[24]

5. 'Any person'

'Any person' means some person other than the public servant or the public servant himself.[25]1655

6. Legal Punishment

'Legal punishment' does not involve departmental punishment. It also does not apply to a fine inflicted on a chaukidar by his superior officer.[26] It means the prescribed punishment for the offence committed by the person sought to be helped.

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable and a summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable, but not compoundable, and is triable by any magistrate. It can also be tried in a summary way by the magistrate stated in s 260 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.

The limitation within which the cognizance of the offence under this section can be taken is three years.

8. Sanction

The very nature of the offence defined in this section makes it clear, having regard to the ratio decidendi in the undermentioned cases,[27] that a sanction as required by s 197, CrPC for a prosecution for this offence, is a pre-requisite.[28] Proceedings commenced in respect of the offence under this section, without first obtaining such sanction are null and void, and a subsequent sanction is not sufficient to validate them.[29]

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That on or about the..... day of..... at....., you being a public servant knowingly disobeyed the direction of law as to the way, in which you were to conduct yourself as such public servant, to wit....., (specify the direction of law) intending thereby to save..... (or knowing it to be likely that you would thereby save.....) from legal punishment (or subject him to a less punishment than that to which he was liable or with intent to save or knowing that you were likely thereby to save some property, to wit..... from forfeiture

(or any charge to which it is liable by law)), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 217 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

When a charge has been expressed in vague terms, the prosecution should be limited to the particular sense in which these terms have been understood in the actual trial. The mere circumstance that some evidence was given about an omission to send a report in order to afford a collateral corroboration to the testimony going to prove a criminal breach of duty of another kind, does not make the accused liable to1656 punishment for the offence thus incidentally deposed to, but with which he was not clearly and directly charged.[30]

Before a person can be proceeded against under this section, there must be some material to show that there was a direction of law as to the way in which the person was supposed to conduct himself as such public servant and that he deliberately disobeyed any such direction of law, intending thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that he would thereby save, any person from legal punishment or subject him to a lesser punishment, to which he was liable, or that he would save some property from forfeiture or a charge to which it was liable by law. It must also be shown that the direction, which the public servant knowingly disobeyed, was a direction to be found in some positive statute or some rules or regulations which have the force of law.[31]

10. Proof

To make out an offence under this section, the following points require proof:

(a) that the accused is a public servant;
(b) that there was a direction of law as to the way in which he was to conduct himself;
(c) that he disobeyed that direction of law;
(d) that he disobeyed it knowingly;
(e) that such disobedience was in conducting himself as such public servant; and
(f) that he did so intending thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that he would thereby:

(i) save any person from a legal punishment or;
(ii) subject him to a lesser punishment than what he is legally liable to; or
(iii) save any property form forfeiture, or any charge to which it is liable by law.

Where the charge against the police officers, accused numbers 14-17, was that as a part of a criminal conspiracy with Bhai Thakur and his men, they had caused the evidence of the commission of an offence to disappear, and by that dishonest investigation had tried to screen the real offenders from legal punishment, they were held to have committed offences punishable under ss 201, 217 and 218, IPC read with s 120B, IPC as well as an offence under TADA. However, except the confessional statement of the co-accused, there was no other independent evidence to show the involvement of accused numbers 14-17 as alleged. The confessions, no doubt, create a strong suspicion that the accused numbers 14-17 were maintaining good relations with Bhai Thakur and accused number 8 (Prashant) and they had possibly helped Bhai Thakur and Manik Patil in screening the real offenders, however, it was not safe to convict them on the basis of the confessions of the co-accused.[32]1657

11. Sentence

When the offence comes under s 161, IPC as well as s 217, IPC the accused can be sentenced either by imprisonment or fine or both. An offence was committed 12 ½ years ago where the accused had taken small amounts for pushing up cases. The accused had since retired from service. The Bombay High Court opined that an imposition of a sentence of fine would meet the ends of justice.[33]

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 218.

Public servant framing incorrect record or writing with intent to save person from punishment or property from forfeiture.--

Whoever, being a public servant, and being as such public servant, charged with the preparation of any record or other writing, frames that record or writing in a manner which he knows to be incorrect, with intent to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, loss or injury to the public or to any person, or with intent thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby save, any person from legal punishment, or with intent to save, or knowing that he is likely thereby to save, any property from forfeiture or other charge to which it is liable by law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with the wilful falsification of public records with the intention of (a) injuring any person, (b) saving any person from legal punishment or (c) saving any property from forfeiture or other charge.

The offence under this section is quite distinct from the one under s 193, IPC . All the necessary ingredients of the one are not included in the other. This section is1658 concerned with bringing erring public servants to book for falsifying public records in their charge; while s 193 makes no reference to public servants or their records but punishes falsification of evidence (whether in public records or otherwise) by any person (whether or not a public servant) for the purpose of being used in a judicial proceeding. These offences may at times overlap, but that would not make them any the less distinct.[34]

Gist of the Section is Stifling of Truth

Section 217 and this section are wider than s 201 . This section embraces cases other than those in which a principal offender is screened. But even as to such cases, the criminal intent is expressed in the following words: 'With intent thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby save any person from legal punishment'. These words also imply that an offence has been committed. The gist of the section is the stifling in cases where an offence has been committed. It is not necessary even to prove the intention to screen any particular person. It is sufficient that he knows it to be likely that justice will not be executed and that someone will escape punishment for the offence. It would be sufficient if the circumstances are such that a reasonable inference can be drawn therefrom that the accused had a certain knowledge at the time he did the act, namely, a knowledge that he was likely by his act to save a person from legal punishment. Further, it is not necessary to show that in point of fact the person so intended to be saved had committed an offence or was justly liable to legal punishment.[35]

Essence of the Offence

In fact, the essence of the offence under s 218 is the intent to cause a loss or injury to any public or person or thereby save any person from legal punishment or save any property from forfeiture or any other charge.[36]

2. Ingredients of the offence

To constitute an offence under this section, the following ingredients must exist:

(i) the offender must be a public servant, charged with the preparation of a record or writing;
(ii) he must have framed that record or writing incorrectly as such public servant;
(iii) he must have done so with an intent to, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby:

(a) cause loss or injury to the public or any person; or
(b) save any person from legal punishment; or
(c) save any property from forfeiture or other charge to which it is legally liable.[37]1659

3. Distinction between Sections 167 And 218

Commentary under the same heading in s 167, ante may be referred to.

4. Distinct Features of Sections 218 and 193

The first question is what the distinct features of ss 193 and 218 of the Indian Penal Code are. Section 198 states the punishment for giving false evidence in any stage of a judicial proceeding or fabricating false evidence for the purpose of being used in any stage of judicial proceeding. Section 191 defines the offence of giving false evidence and s 192, the offence of fabricating false evidence. We may ignore s 191 because here admittedly, there is no giving of false evidence as defined in the Indian Penal Code . The offence of fabricating false evidence comes into existence when a person causes any circumstances to exist, makes any false entry in any book or record or makes any document containing a false statement, intending that such circumstances, false entry or false statement may appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding etc, and such appearance causes an erroneous opinion to be formed, touching a point material to the result of such proceeding. The offence is a general one and does not specify the person or the kind of document. It may be any person and the fabricated evidence may be in any form. Section 218 on the other hand, deals with the intentional preparation of a false record by a public servant with the object of saving or injuring any person or property. The differences between the two sections is clearly noticeable. Section 192 deals with a judicial proceeding and the false evidence is intended to be used in the judicial proceeding. Section 218 deals with public servants and there the gist is the intentional preparation of a false record with a view to saving or injuring any person or property. This need not have a relation to a judicial proceeding as such.[38]

Offences under s 218, IPC, is quite distinct from that under s 193 . Section 218 is concerned with bringing erring public servants to book for falsifying the public records in their charge; while s 193, on the other hand, makes no reference to public servants or their records but punishes the falsification of evidence (whether in public records or not) by any person (whether a public servant or not) for the purpose of being used in a judicial proceeding. These offences may at times overlap, but that does not make them any the less distinct. There is, therefore, no justification for refusing to allow the accused to be prosecuted under s 218, IPC, for his misdeeds (false entry in the birth and death register) as a public servant merely because the falsification of the records in his charge happens also to constitute an offence punishable under s 193, IPC .[39]

5. 'Charged with the preparation of any record or writing'--Meaning of

The words 'charged with the preparation' are not restricted to the narrow meaning of 'enjoined by a special provision of law'. It is sufficient if the document was prepared in accordance with a practice to which it was the official duty of the public servant to conform.[40] To render a public servant liable under this section, he must have been charged with the preparation of a record or writing. A public servant who frames a1660 false document of a character which it was not his duty to prepare, is not punishable under this section.[41]

So also a patwari, who is directed by a revenue court to prepare a fard, prepares a false fard, is not guilty as he is not a public servant charged with the preparation of such a fard.[42]

A pay-sheet drawn up in a railway office and setting out certain sums as due by the railway to certain coolies described as working in a special gang, is a record within the meaning of this section and the railway clerk who prepares a false pay-sheet is liable under the section.[43]

A patwari is responsible for the accuracy of all entries in the khasra and must satisfy himself of the facts by inquiries from the persons concerned as well as by the field inspections. So a patwari who, knowing that a particular person was in possession, fails to enter his name in the khasra, knowingly makes a wrong entry, and if he makes the wrong entry with the intention of causing a loss to the person, he is liable under this section.[44]

6. 'Frames that Record or Writing in a Manner which he knows to be Incorrect'--Not the use, mere Preparation Sufficient to Constitute Offence

To constitute an offence under this section, it is not necessary that the incorrect document should be submitted to another person or be otherwise used by the writer. The requirements of the section are satisfied, if it is shown that the document has been prepared by a public servant, charged with its preparation, in a manner which he knows to be incorrect and with the knowledge that he is thereby likely to cause loss to the public.[45]

Mere making of incorrect entries when not Punishable

If a lekhpal makes entries in revenue records in an exercise of the powers reserved to him by law, and these entries are incorrect, it would be an erroneous exercise of his power which can be corrected by the higher revenue authorities. Such entries cannot, however, be made a ground for the prosecution of the lekhpal under this section.[46] The lekhpal, not being required to make a very detailed inquiry on the point of possession, it could not be inferred from his act in making those entries that he had acted dishonestly in order to cause a wrongful gain to any party and wrongful loss to others. Since there was already a dispute between the parties regarding the possession of a plot, a very heavy burden lay on the prosecution to establish that the lekhpal had acted dishonestly when he had made the entries.[47]

Where the accused, a deputy commissioner of a district, was alleged to have got some land registered in the name of his daughter, by under valuing the price, causing1661 a loss in the stamp duty to the government, the allegations were also that mutation was sanctioned in violation of revenue rules. As per the annual five years average statement, it could not be said that the land was sold for inadequate consideration. For five years since the registration of the case, there was no progress in the investigation. The offence under s 218, IPC and other offences alleged were not made out, so FIRS were quashed by the High Court qua the accused in the petition under s 482, CrPC .[48]

The accused Chairman and member of a Subordinate Staff Selection Board in conspiracy with the accused candidate increased the numbers awarded in *viva voce*test and included him in the list of selected candidates for pecuniary benefits. The act of the three accused persons did not amount to offence of forgery. The accused persons prepared false record of the final result also and therefore were guilty of offences under ss 218, 420, 477A and 120B, IPC .[49]

Mere making of Incorrect Entries when Punishable

But where a patwari who was present when the possession of certain plots was delivered by the court amin to the mortgagees and actually signed the dakhalnama, entered in the khasra the names of the mortgagors as being still in possession of the plots, he must be deemed to have made the entry knowing it to be false.[50]

Mode of Preparation not Material

It is not material what mode is adopted for incorrect preparation of the record. Substitution of one leaf in a record, by another, so as to omit a given entry from the page, is penal within the meaning of the section.[51]

Mere Motive is not Incriminating

A conviction under this section can be maintained for framing the record of an investigation incorrectly only where it is established that during the investigation, the accused recorded statements, which were not made before him, or destroyed the statements that were actually made or made a record of circumstances which, as a matter of fact, did not transpire before him. Where a sub-inspector recorded what was stated before him and he recorded what he actually witnessed, he cannot be held guilty under this section merely because he may have a motive for recording the statement made before him knowing them to be false.[52]

Issue Estoppel

But where the sub-inspector, in his capacity as a public servant, wrongly prepared certain notes in order to concoct a false defence, he was to be convicted under s 218 simpliciter and not with the aid of s 149 . [53]

Where the accused was charged under ss 201 and 218, IPC and it was alleged that he fabricated false evidence records and initiated false cases to screen certain1662 offenders in a murder trial, the prosecution against the said offenders in the murder trial was quashed in view of the rule of issue estoppel and the proceedings against the accused under ss 201 and 218, IPC were held not maintainable, there being no chance of ultimate conviction of the accused.[54]

7. 'With Intent to Cause Loss to the Public or to any Person'--Intention is Dominant

In order to sustain conviction under this section, it is not sufficient that the entries are incorrect, but it is essential that the entry should have been made with the intention mentioned in that section. Where direct evidence proving the necessary criminal intention is lacking in the case, and the circumstantial evidence is too meagre to support any safe conclusion as to the intention with which the accused made the entry complained of, it must be held that the prosecution had failed to prove the necessary criminal intention.[55]

Where the accused made a certain false abstraction and read it over to another, a public servant charged with the preparation of a certain record, and thereby an incorrect record was prepared, it was held that the accused could not be guilty of abetment of such offence and not the less so, because the person charged with the preparation of the record had no guilty knowledge or intention in the matter.[56]

Bona fide* Mistake Rule out Intention

Where the wrong entry has been made due to a bona fide mistake, an intention to cause harm cannot be inferred.[57]

Substitution of Fresh Matter when amounts to framing Incorrect Record

When a police-inspector was charged with framing an incorrect record in that he entered in his diary that certain cartmen told him that they were not beaten by dacoits, while in fact, they had told him that they were beaten by dacoits, it was held that this of itself would not be sufficient to sustain a conviction under this section but, where, without endeavouring to inquire into the truth of the said entry in his diary, he had destroyed certain records which falsified it and substituted fresh note-books, his bona fides were open to question and he must be deemed to have framed an incorrect public record intentionally.[58]

Where a patwari knows that a particular person was in possession and he fails to enter his name in the khasra, he is making an entry which he knows to be false, and if such false entry is made with a criminal intention of causing a loss to the person, an offence under this section is committed.[59]1663

Destruction of Correct Report and Preparation of Incorrect Report

A report of the commission of dacoity was made at a thana. The police officer in charge of the thana at first took down the report which was made to him, but subsequently destroyed that report and prepared another and a false report of the commission of a totally different offence, to which he obtained the signature of the complainant, and which he endeavoured to pass off as the original and correct report made to him by the complainant. It was held that the police officer was guilty of offences punishable under s 204 and this section.[60] But where a report was lodged with the police with regard to the commission of an offence, but FIR was not registered, no offence under ss 217 and 218 is made out against the SHO, for not registering the case.[61]

Where the two accused, whose joint duty was to prepare panchanamas and valuation of fees, knowingly prepared false panchanamas in common concert, with the dishonest intention of benefitting themselves and some other persons and causing loss to the government, it was held that they were guilty under this section.[62]

Intention and not the chance of Success Material

The question under this section is not whether the accused was or will be able to accomplish the object he had in view, but whether he made the entries in question with the intention to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, loss and injury. The fact, therefore, that the accused conceived a foolish plan of injury is no ground for exculpating him from the offence which he has committed.[63]

8. Injury or loss must not be remote

This section contemplates the wilful falsification of a public document with the intent thereby to cause loss or injury, and this means by the document itself or by some transaction with which it is essentially connected. An accused must not be convicted on a remote and speculative chain of possibilities; otherwise the most innocent acts might, by the exercise of a little ingenuity, be perverted into the initial steps of great crimes.[64]

Remote Intention not Material

Where a chowkidar was charged under this section with having made a false entry in his attendance book, with a view to support a charge which was made against a sub-inspector of having made a false report regarding the length of absence from duty of another chowkidar, and thereby to cause loss or injury to the sub-inspector, it was held that the intention was too remote to fall within this section.[65]

9. 'Or with Intent Thereby to save any Person from Legal Punishment--Meaning of

It was been held that a public servant is not punishable under this section, if his object in preparing the false document was to screen himself from punishment, by1664 concealing the fact that he had committed a breach of duty,[66] unless the mode in which he framed the false document had, and must have been known by him to have, the effect of causing injury to the public or to others.[67] In a later case, however, the same court held that if the act charged would tend to save any person from legal punishment, it was equally an offence where the accused intended to save himself. If the legislature had intended that this section should only apply when the intention was to save some person other than the public servant, it would have been easy to insert the word 'other' between the words 'any ' and 'person'. A public servant who does that which, if done to save another from legal punishment, would bring the public servant within this section has equally committed the offence punishable under the section if the person whom he intends to save from legal punishment is himself.[68] To support a conviction under this section it is necessary to prove that the accused believed, or had reason to believe, that the person concerned had committed an offence, though it was not necessary to prove that such an offence had, as a matter of fact, been committed.[69]

A, a kulkarni, falsely reports on an offence committed in his village, intending to save B from punishment. A is guilty under this section.[70]

A, a patwari, alters an entry in his official diary, falsely in order to save himself from punishment. He commits an offence under this section.[71]

A, whose duty it was to make certain reports, made false ones with an intent to prevent the discovery of a fraud previously perpetrated by him. He committed an offence under this section.[72]

A, a sub-inspector in his capacity as a public servant, wrongly prepares certain notes in order to concoct a false defence, he was to be convicted under s 218 simpliciter.[73]

Where a person is charged under this section with framing a report incorrectly, or under s 201, for giving false information, with an intent to save offenders from punishment, the issue to be tried is not whether or not such alleged offenders were in fact guilty, but merely the belief and intention of the accused in respect to their guilt.[74]

For the purpose of obtaining a previous sanction of the Governor under s 197, CrPC, an offence under this section cannot be distinguished from an offence under s 447A, IPC .[75] No complaint of the court is, however, necessary for a prosecution under this section.[76]1665

10. Legal Punishment

The expression 'legal punishment' means the punishment prescribed by law for the offence committed and does not include departmental punishment. It does not apply to a fine inflicted on a chowkidar by his superior officer.[77]

11. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable and a warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. The limitation for taking cognizance of the offence under this section is three years. The cognizance cannot be taken beyond the period of limitation unless the court holds that it was necessary to do so in the interest of justice or the delay in taking cognizance is held to have been properly explained.[78]

12. Sanction

No court can take cognizance of an offence alleged to have been committed by a government servant, not removable from his office, save by or with the sanction of the government, while acting or purporting to act in the discharge of his official duty.[79] A medical officer is supposed to issue a medical certificate based on an act done by him while discharging his duty as a medical officer and not without performing his duty as a medical officer. Issuance of a medical certificate without performing his duty as a medical officer, that is with false allegations, does not amount to an act done while discharging his official duty. Such act does not fall within the ambit of s 197(1), CrPC and no sanction for the prosecution for an offence under this section is required under the law.[80] Where an FIR was not registered, no offence under ss 217 and 218, IPC was made out against the SHO for not registering the case, moreover the SHO cannot be prosecuted without a sanction from the authority.[81]

Where a public servant posted in the traffic police was alleged to have framed an incorrect record or writing to save a person from punishment or from forfeiture of a property, the prosecution against the police official is barred under s 140, Delhi Police Act, if initiated after more than three months or within a year with the previous sanction of the Administrator. The alleged acts were committed by the said public servant in 1977 and the case was instituted in the court against him on 16 April 1979, thus the institution of the prosecution was obviously time barred.[82]

Where the accused, a patwari being a public servant, was charged for committing forgery and using the forged documents as, a genuine one by erasing and manipulating the khasra girdawari register and jamabandhi, the offences being committed by him while discharging his official duties and when this was the1666 petition, the benefit of s 197, CrPC was available to him and his conviction was set aside.[83]

13. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That on or about the.....day of.....you being a public servant charged with the preparation of a record (or writing), to wit.....framed the said record (or writing) in a manner which you knew to be incorrect (specifythe incorrectness of the statement) and which you made with intent to cause (or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby cause) loss (or injury) to the public (or to.....specify the person) [or with intent thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby save any person from legal punishment] [or with intent to save or knowing that you are thereby likely to save any property, to wit.....from forfeiture (or other charge) to which it was liable by order of the court in case No....of.....] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under s 218 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

The charge must set out the manner in which the offence was committed.[84] The material point for establishing the charge is the intention of the accused which should be specifically stated in the charge.[85]

14. Proof

Where the charges against police officers, accused numbers 14-17, was that as a part of criminal conspiracy with Bhai Thakur and his men, they had caused the evidence of the commission of the offence to disappear, and by that dishonest investigation they had tried to screen the real offenders from legal punishment and thereby they had committed offences punishable under ss 201, 217 and 218 read with s 120B, IPC as well as an offence under TADA. However, except a confessional statement of a co-accused, there was no other independent evidence to show the involvement of the accused numbers 14-17 as alleged. The confessions, no doubt, cast a strong suspicion that the accused numbers 14-17 were maintaining good relations with Bhai Thakur and that the accused number 8 (Prashant) and they had possibly helped Bhai Thakur and Manik Patil in screening the real offenders, however, it was not safe to convict them on the basis of the confessions of a co-accused.[86]

15. Sentence

In Harish Chandra Krishna Gadkar v State of Maharashtra ,[87] upholding the conviction of the accused for an offence under this section and some other offence, the Supreme Court held that an admonition was sufficient punishment, considering the fact that he cannot be taken back in service, nor is he entitled to any backwages from the date of suspension to the date of retirement. Earlier these grounds were not1667 found sufficient by the Maharashtra High Court in a case, for taking a lenient view in the matter of sentence.[88]

Where the police took a person from the place where he was alleged to have been causing nuisance to the public, under the influence of liquor, to the civil hospital, and the doctor of the civil hospital gave a certificate stating that the accused had consumed liquor but was not under intoxication, since he was conscious and well-oriented to time and space and his speech was normal there was nothing to show the result of the blood test of the accused. The police even failed to record statements of members of the public who had felt annoyance on account of the conduct of the accused, and the only witnesses cited were the police officials who had arrested him and the doctor who had examined him. On these facts, the Himachal Pradesh High Court, taking a lenient view, did not direct a registration of a criminal case against the police authorities for the abuse of their power on account of illegal arrest and unlawful confinement under ss 465 and 218, IPC after following due procedure and instead, directed the competent disciplinary authority to hold a departmental inquiry against them.[89]

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 219.

Public servant in judicial proceeding corruptly making report, etc., contrary to law.--

Whoever, being a public servant, corruptly or maliciously makes or pronounces in any stage of a judicial proceeding, any report, order, verdict, or decision which he knows to be contrary to law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

Sections 219 and 220, IPC relate to corrupt or malicious exercise of the power of a public servant, in judicial proceedings.

Where a village court judge, charged with the preparation of the register of suits filed in his court, frames that register in a manner which he knew to be incorrect, namely, by making an entry therein that a certain suit had been filed when in fact it was not so filed, and also by making an entry of a judgment purported to have been pronounced, when it was in fact not pronounced, he cannot be convicted under this section but can be convicted only under s 218 .[90]

Where the judicial officers acting in official capacity and not in individual capacity have passed judicial orders, such orders can be challenged by filing appeal or revision, but they cannot be prosecuted for offences under ss 219 and 220, IPC .[91]1668

No cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken if the proceeding concerned is not a judicial proceeding, but only an arbitration proceeding, conducted as per the provisions of the Karnataka Co-operative Societies Act.[1] As the submission of a report by the police under s 112, or 145(1), CrPC is not a judicial proceeding s 219 is not attracted even if the report is corruptly or maliciously furnished.[2]

2. Essence of the Offence

The essence of the offence under this section is (a) that there must be a judicial proceeding, that is, a proceeding actually commenced and pending, wherein a party claims relief against another and invites the decisions of the court in regard thereto, and not a fictitious one where there is no party litigating, and (b) that there must be the making of a real report or a real pronouncement of an order, verdict or decision.[3]

3. Public servant

Section 21 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

4. Corruptly

The commentary under s 196 may be referred to.

5. 'Maliciously'--Meaning of

The meaning of the term 'malice' has been the subject of much controversy and 'maliciously' has been characterised as an unhappy expression by a high judicial authority.[4] The word 'malice' seldom has any meaning except a misleading one. It refers not to an intention but to a motive; and in almost all legal inquiries, intentions as distinguished from motive, is the important matter.[5] The sense of the word as employed in law seems to vary according to the subject-matter and the context, and the only sense in which it is never used, is the popular sense of spite, whilst it also includes the elements of negligence or mischance.[6]The word 'maliciously', though not defined in this Code, has been interpreted to mean where a person wilfully does an act which is injurious to another without a lawful excuse, he does it maliciously. In other words, the term 'maliciously' implies an intention to do an act which is wrongful to the detriment of another.[7] "Maliciously', said Bowen LJ in Mogal Steamship Co v Mc Gregor Cow & Co [8]'means and implies an intention to do an act which is wrongful to the detriment of another', and by 'wrongful' is 'meant an act done without lawful excuse'.[9]

In the interpretation of the statutory provisions, the courts have attributed so many different meanings to 'malice' that it is impossible at the present time to find in1669 judicial authority any precise and universal definition of the word. In this confused situation the late Professor Kenny,[10] in 1902, enunciated a principle which, although it lacked any definite judicial authority, has been repeated ever since without adverse criticism, and has now been approved by the Court of Criminal Appeal,[11] in the following terms:

> In any statutory definition of a crime, 'malice' must be taken not in the old vague sense of wickedness in general but as requiring either: (i) an actual intention to do the particular kind of harm that in fact was done, or (ii) recklessness as to whether such harm should occur or not, ie, the accused has foreseen that the particular kind of harm might be done, and yet has gone on to take the risk of it. It is neither limited to, nor does it indeed require, any ill-will towards the person injured.

Presumption and Inference

The word 'maliciously' is used in s 219, IPC . In order to establish malice as contemplated by this section, it is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused bore ill-will or enmity against a specific person, but if the injurious act was done voluntarily without a lawful excuse, malice may be presumed. Malice is often not capable of direct and tangible proof and in almost all cases has to be inferred from surrounding circumstances having regard to the setting, background and connected facts.[12]

'Malice' is contrasted with 'Corruptly'

In this section the word is contrasted with 'corruptly' and thus, read together, the effect would seem to be that a report, order, etc, deliberately given contrary to law is punishable, whether the public servant's conduct in so doing has been induced by corruption, or prompted by any other feeling.

6. Judicial Proceedings

The commentary under s 192 may be referred to.

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, but a warrant may issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

There is no period of limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

8. Sanction for Prosecution is Required in Cases Falling under Section 197 , CrPC

Where there were no mala fides on the applicant's part and the whole action of the applicant [the trial magistrate] against the non-applicant, being purely and solely in discharge of his official duties, previous sanction of the State Government was necessary for taking cognizance of the particular offence against him, as enjoined by1670 s 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure ; and as such, in the absence of such compliance, the proceedings initiated under the private complaint, deserve to be quashed. Further, there being nothing on record to show any corruption or malice on the part of the applicant, the offence under s 219 of the IPC could not even be prima facie made out against him.[13]

9. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That, on or about the.....day of .....you being a public servant, corruptly (or maliciously) made (or pronounced), in any stage of the judicial proceeding, to wit.....a report (or order, or verdict, or decision, to wit.....), which you knew to be contrary to law, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 219 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

10. Proof

The essential ingredients of the section, which require proof for establishing an offence under this section are:

(a) that the accused was a public servant;
(b) that he made, or pronounced in a stage of a judicial proceeding, a report, order, verdict or decision;
(c) that he did so corruptly or maliciously;
(d) that the report, order, verdict or decision was contrary to law; and
(e) that the accused was then aware of it.[14]

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 220.

Commitment for trial or confinement by person having authority who knows that he is acting contrary to law.--

Whoever, being in any office which gives him legal authority to commit persons for trial or to commitment, or to keep persons in confinement, corruptly or maliciously commits any person for trial or to confinement, or keeps any person in confinement, in the exercise of that authority knowing that in so doing he is acting contrary to law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.1671

Comments

1. Scope

This section is enacted to prevent abuse of their powers by persons holding any office which gives them authority to commit persons for trial or to confinement. To constitute an offence under this section there must be an illegal commitment for trial or to confinement, plus a guilty knowledge. If the act is legal, there can be no guilty knowledge, and hence no offence.[15] The provisions of this section will apply only when there has been excess by an officer of his legal power.[16]

Where the judicial officers acting in official capacity and not in individual capacity have passed judicial orders, such orders can be challenged by filing appeal or revision, but they cannot be prosecuted for offences under ss 219 and 220, IPC .[17]

2. 'Being in any office'--Meaning of

This section applies to those persons who hold certain, public offices. It does not apply to private persons who have the right to confine persons accused of certain offences under certain circumstances, as provided in ss 43 and 60 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.

3. 'Legal Authority to Commit Persons for Trials'--Meaning of Section 209 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 prescribes the procedure to commit cases to the court of sessions by the magistrate having jurisdiction to do so. The competence or jurisdiction of the magistrates to try or commit cases is determined by the various provisions contained in the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[18]

4. Authority to Commit Persons to Confinement--Relevant Provision Analysed

Section 41 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 authorises a police officer to arrest persons without a warrant in certain cases. A police officer making an arrest under that section may either release the arrested person on bail or, without unnecessary delay, produce him before a magistrate who alone can authorise his further detention (ss 167 and 309, CrPC). A person arrested can in no case be detained by a police officer for more than 24 hours (s 57, CrPC).1672

A police officer may also arrest a person in execution of a warrant of arrest. When he does so, he must produce the arrested person before the court before which he is required by law to produce such person (subject to the provisions of ss 80 and 81, CrPC) without unnecessary delay (s 76, CrPC). The magistrate or the court issuing the warrant of arrest, may then order the further detention of the person (ss 167 and 309, CrPC), if necessary.

Where an offence is committed in the presence of a magistrate, he may himself arrest or order any person to arrest the offender and may thereupon, either release him on bail or commit him to custody (s 44, CrPC).

When a person is convicted and sentenced to imprisonment, a warrant for the execution of the sentence is directed to the officer in charge of a jail and that officer is authorised to keep the person in confinement in the jail.[19]

Order 21, r 39(3) of the Code of Civil Procedure also authorises the detention of a judgment-debtor in a civil prison in execution of a decree for payment of money.

Some local Acts also authorise certain officers to arrest and detain persons under certain circumstances. Thus s 70(i) of the Bihar and Orissa Excise 1915, empowers an excise officer to arrest without warrant, any person found committing an offence punishable under certain sections of the Act, and cl (iii) of that section empowers him to detain any person upon whom he may have reasonable cause to suspect any article liable to confiscation under the Act, or any other law relating to the excise revenue, to be. Section 75(2) of that Act requires every police officer to give reasonable aid to any excise officer in carrying out the provisions of the Act when called upon to do so.[20]

5. Malice not to be Inferred from every Wrongful Confinement

Under s 220, IPC, it is necessary to establish that the officer, who committed any person for trial or to confinement, must have acted corruptly or maliciously and knowing that he was doing that act contrary to law. In absence of these conditions and circumstances, a person cannot be held guilty under s 220 of IPC, merely because he has confined or committed any person to confinement in exercise of the authority given to him under the law.[21]

For the meaning of the words 'corruptly and maliciously' refer to notes to s 219, IPC . The words 'corruptly and maliciously' in this section are wide enough to cover confinement for the purpose of extortion under s 347, IPC . Where a police sub-inspector wrongfully confines certain persons on charges of gambling and extorts money from them by putting them in fear of being challaned and called in court upon offences which he knew to be fictitious, the offence falls under this section.[22] Where the unlawful commitment to confinement is wilful, without any excuse and with a view to put pressure on the person confined to come to terms with a certain person in whom the accused is interested, the accused can safely be said to have acted 'maliciously'.[23] But every unlawful commitment to confinement will not, by itself,1673 warrant the legal inference of malice. In order to bring a case under this section, it should be alleged and proved that the person in office corruptly and maliciously confined the person wrongfully.[24]

Excess by Police Officer attracts the application of the Section

It is only when there has been an excess by a police officer of his legal powers of arrest, that it becomes necessary to consider whether he has acted corruptly or maliciously and with the knowledge that he was 'acting contrary to law'.[25]

6. 'Or Keeps any Person in Confinement'--Meaning of

This phrase makes it clear that, apart from the legality of the arrest of a person, the keeping of him in confinement even by a person, who had legal authority to do so, would be an offence under this section, if in the exercise of that authority, a person kept another in confinement, knowing that in so doing he was acting contrary to law.[26]

7. No Guilty Knowledge when the Arrest Made is Legal

If the arrest was legal, there could be no guilty knowledge 'superadded to an illegal act', such as it would be necessary to establish against the accused to justify a conviction under this section.[27] It is only when there has been an excess by a police officer of his legal powers of arrest that it becomes necessary to consider whether he has acted corruptly or maliciously and with the knowledge that he was 'acting contrary to law'.[28]

Arrest only on Credible Information[29]

It must be remembered that before any arrest can be made by the police without a warrant, either under s 41 or under s 157, CrPC it must be shown that there was credible information given to the police, or that the officer in charge of a police station had reason to suspect the commission of a cognizable offence. The arrest has also to be made in accordance with the procedure laid down by law. Sections 46 and 49, CrPC are material in this respect.

Application of Handcuffs and Fetters not allowed for making Arrest

In a landmark case[30] after a thorough consideration of the fundamental rights of a detenu in the light of well recognised human rights, the Supreme Court has held that:

> when there is no compulsive need to fetter a person's limbs it is sadistic, capricious, despotic and demoralizing to humble a man by manacling him. Such arbitrary conduct1674 surely slaps Article 14 on the face. The minimal freedom of movement which even a detainee is entitled to under Article 19 cannot be cut down cruelly by application of handcuffs or other hoops. It will be unreasonable so to do unless the state is able to make out that no other practical way of forbidding escape is available, the prisoner being so dangerous and desperate and the circumstances so hostile to safe keeping.

In another judgment in Citizens for Democracy v State of Assam ,[31] the Supreme Court taking a more strict view in the matter, totally prohibited the handcuffing or fettering of prisoners--convicted or undertrial--while lodged in a jail or transporting or in transit from one jail to another or from the jail to the court and back, without the permission of the magistrate concerned. Laying down the norms for granting such permission by the magistrates, the Supreme Court has observed as follows:

> Where the police or the jail authorities have well-grounded basis for drawing a strong inference that a particular prisoner is likely to jump jail or break out of the custody, then the said prisoner be produced before the magistrate concerned and a prayer for permission to handcuff the prisoner be made before the said magistrate. Save in rare cases of concrete proof regarding proneness of the prisoner to violence, his tendency to escape, he being so dangerous and desperate and the finding no other practical way of forbidding escape is available, the magistrate may grant permission to handcuff the prisoner.

In another case, the judge observed:

> What is a reasonable complaint or suspicion must depend on the circumstance of each particular case; but it must be at least founded on some definite fact tending to throw suspicion on the person arrested, and not on mere vague surmise or information. Still less have the police any power to arrest persons as they appear sometimes to do, merely on the chance of something being proved hereafter against them. Any wilful excess by a police officer of his legal powers of arrest is, by section 220 of the Penal Code, an offence punishable by imprisonment for seven years.[32]

A police officer is not empowered to detain, without question, any accused person for a period not exceeding 24 hours, but rather he is in no case justified in detaining a person for one single hour except on some reasonable ground warranted by the circumstances of the case.[33]

Knowledge is a Question of Fact not of Law

Proof of an unlawful confinement will not, of itself, warrant the legal inference of malice; knowledge that such confinement is contrary to law is a question of fact and not of law and must be proved to satisfy the requirements of this section.[34] In the case of Budroo Hossain,[35] where there was no malice, no intention of doing any act of the nature spoken of in s 339 or s 340, IPC and no voluntary obstruction or restraint, though there was probably excessive and mistaken exercise of powers not civilly excusable in a police officer, the arrest was held not to amount to criminal offence of wrongful restraint.[36] It has, however, been held that where the release of a person arrested and detained by an excise sub-inspector, was obtained by a payment of illegal gratification, the court was entitled to infer that the explanation of the excise sub-inspector, that he was all the time considering whether the statement of1675 the arrested person as to his innocence should be accepted or not, was not true and that he must have known from the beginning that there was no justification in law or fact for arresting or detaining him.[37]

Acting under the Instructions of Superiors--Consequence of

The circumstances that the accused were acting under the instructions of their superior officers and that they were not known before to the complainant and had no particular personal grudge of their own against him, may be taken into consideration on the question of sentence, but cannot justify the illegal arrest and detention of the complainant.[38]

An honest mistake precludes the knowledge contemplated by the section, because the official then acts in good faith.[39]

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, but a warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

There is no period of limitation fixed for taking cognizance of the offence under this section.

9. Sanction

Where the accused is a judge, magistrate or a public servant not removable from his office save by or with the sanction of the Union or State Government, no court can take cognizance of the offence under this section except with the previous sanction of such government (s 197, CrPC).

Where the accused were members of the Bombay police force, the acts constituting the offences under ss 220, 342, IPC*etc* were committed by them in their capacity, but the requisite sanction was not obtained, the Apex Court held that the accused persons were entitled to protection under s 197(2) of the CrPC .[40]

10. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and officer of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That, on or about the....day of...you, being in office, to wit.....which gave you legal authority to commit persons for trial (or to confinement) (or to keep persons in confinement), corruptly (or maliciously) committed....for trial [(or to confinement) (or kept in confinement)] in the exercise of that authority, knowing that, in so doing, you were acting contrary to law, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 220 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.1676

11. Proof

In order to bring home the charge under the said provision, it must be shown that accused held an office which empowered him to convict any person for trial or to confinement or to keep such person in confinement.

It must next be shown that the accused corruptly or maliciously committed such person for trial or to confinement or kept him in confinement in exercise of that authority, knowing that in so doing he was acting contrary to law.[41]

To establish an offence under this section the following points require proof:

(a) that the accused held an office which empowered him to: (i) commit persons for trial; (ii) commit persons to confinement; or (iii) keep persons in confinement;
(b) that he corruptly or maliciously committed a person for trial or to confinement or kept a person in confinement in exercise of such powers;
(c) that he, in doing so, was acting contrary to law;
(d) that he, at the time, knew that he was acting contrary to law.

It is necessary for the prosecution to prove a case that certain officers have acted corruptly, maliciously and with the knowledge that they were acting contrary to law, then only there would be a justification for a conviction under this offence. Where the arrest or confinement is illegal but there is no knowledge, then in such cases, the conviction cannot be made. Therefore, it is necessary that the onus is on the prosecution to prove that the respondent has kept the accused in confinement in excess of his power and he was acting contrary to law and at the time of acting contrary to law, he was acting corruptly or maliciously.[42]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 221.

Intentional omission to apprehend on the part of public servant bound to apprehend. --

Whoever, being a public servant, legally bound as such public servant to apprehend or to keep in confinement any person charged with or liable to apprehended for an offence, intentionally omits to apprehend such person, or intentionally suffers such person to escape, or intentionally aids such person in escaping or attempting to escape from such confinement, shall be punished as follows, that is to say,-- with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, was charged with, or liable to be apprehended for, an offence punishable with death; or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, was charged with, or liable to be apprehended for, an offence punishable with [43][imprisonment for life] or imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years; or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have1677 been apprehended, was charged with, or liable to be apprehended for, an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term less than ten years.

Comments

1. Scope

Sections 221 - 223, IPC deal with omissions to apprehend offenders and acts of suffering or aiding escape of offenders from confinement, on the part of public servants, which affect public justice. This section and s 222, IPC deal with intentional omissions to apprehend offenders and intentional suffering or aiding the escape of offenders from confinement. The difference between these two sections is that this section deals with persons charged with or liable to be apprehended for an offence, whereas s 222 deals with persons under sentences of court of justice for an offence or lawfully committed to custody. Section 223 deals not with an intentional omission to apprehend, but to negligently suffer the escape of an offender from confinement.

Section 224, IPC punishes not the public servant but the offender himself for escaping from custody. The common object of all the four sections is to prevent the escape of offenders from justice.

2. Applicability

For the application of this section, the accused must be a public servant legally bound as such public servant, to apprehend or keep in confinement a person who is charged with or is liable to be apprehended, for an offence. And then the accused must do one of the three things, namely: (a) omit to apprehend such person if he has not yet been arrested and kept in confinement, (b) if he has already been arrested and kept in confinement, suffer him to escape, or (c) aid him in escaping. Lastly, such omission to apprehend or suffering or aiding the escape must be intentional. Where a court moharrir, whose duty it was to prepare remand papers in respect of a suspect, produced in a court, and also to issue the release order and direct the police escort to release the suspect, after the grant of bail to the suspect by the magistrate, directed the release of the suspect even prior to the grant of bail to him in clear violation of his legal duties, he was held liable to be punished under s 221, IPC .[44]

A convict was entrusted in the custody of the accused appellant a Police Officer for escorting him to hospital. On way the convict escaped from custody. The escaped convict was closely related to the accused. Conduct of the accused showed that the accused intentionally allowed the convict to escape, did not take any steps to arrest1678 him, nor immediately informed the higher authorities. Accused appellant was convicted under ss 221, 222 and 223, IPC .[45]

3. Public Servant

Section 21 and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

4. 'Legally Bound to Apprehend or Keep in Confinement'--Meaning of

In order to render a public servant liable under this section, he must, in the first instance, be legally bound to apprehend a person or to keep him in confinement. A mere power to arrest or keep a person in confinement, as under s 4(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure is not enough. He must be under an obligation to do so, as when he is directed to execute a warrant of arrest issued by a court or when a police officer sees a person committing a cognizable offence[46] or suspects that he has committed such an offence.[47]

A chaukidar, or a village-watchman, is not legally bound as a public servant, to apprehend a person accused of committing murder outside the village of which he is *chaukidar,*such person not being a proclaimed offender, and not having been found by him in the act of committing such murder, and consequently such chaukidar, if he refuses to apprehend such person on such charge at the instance of a private person, is not punishable under this section.[48] A dafadar (head chowkidar), bound to arrest a person found in possession of stolen property, took him in custody under the provisions of Bihar and Orissa Village Administration Act 1922 but instead of taking him to the police station, the dafadar allowed the accused to escape. It was held that he was guilty under this section.[49] A convict was entrusted in the custody of the accused appellant a police custody for escorting him to hospital. On way the convict escaped from custody. The escaped convict was closely related to the accused. Conduct of the accused showed that the accused intentionally allowed the convict to escape, did not take any steps to arrest him, nor immediately informed the higher authorities. Accused appellant was convicted under s 221, IPC .[50]

Escape from Unlawful Custody is no Offence

Where neither the original arrest nor the subsequent custody by the chaukidar was lawful, the chaukidar could not properly be convicted under s 223 of the India Penal Code.[51]

Chaukidar's* Duties as a Private Citizen and as a Public Servant not to be Confounded

The duties of a chaudkidar, as a private citizen, ought not to be confounded with his duties as a public servant. Where the legal obligation of the chaukidar to arrest or1679 detain has not been established, there is no dereliction from his statutory duty within the purview of this section and the chaukidar cannot be penalised for intentionally suffering a pilferer to escape from his detention.[52]

5. 'Intentionally Omits'--Meaning of

When the accused, who were public servants, were legally bound to arrest a man, who had committed murder in their presence, omitted to apprehend him, it was held that:

> There can be no doubt that they did it intentionally. There was nothing involuntary about it. Their motive may not have been that they wanted the man to escape, but that they were afraid of getting hurt, but motive must always be distinguished from intention. They certainly intended not to apprehend the man, and legally they were guilty of the offence under this section.[53]

6. 'Intentionally Aids'--Meaning of

Notes under s 107 may be referred to.

7. Offence

Section 40, and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

8. Offence under this Section as well as under the Police Act

An offence falling under the Police Act and also under the Penal Code should be punished under the latter enactment.[54]

9. Procedure

The offence under the first part of this section is cognizable or non-cognizable according as the offence in relation to which such omission has been made is cognizable or non-cognizable, but a warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.[55]

There is no period of limitation for taking cognizance of the offence falling under punishment cl 1 of this section. For the offence falling under cll 2 and 3, the cognizance can be taken within three years.

10. Sanction

In a case falling under s 197 of the Criminal Procedure Code, a previous sanction for a prosecution under this section is necessary.

For detailed commentary on s 197, see Sohoni's Code of Criminal Procedure, twenty-first edn, Lexisnexis.1680

11. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you being a public servant, to wit.....and being as such public servant, legally bound to apprehend (or keep in confinement) one AB, who was on or about the.....day of.....at.....charged with (or liable to be apprehended for) the offence of.....punishable with.....did intentionally omit to apprehend such person [(or intentionally suffer the said AB to escape) (or intentionally aid the said AB in escaping) (or attempting to escape)] from such confinement, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 221 of the India Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

12. Vicarious Liability

A person must be told as to what offence he is being directly charged with and to what others, if any, he is being sought to be vicariously made liable. There is no rhyme or reason to seek to make a person who had committed a criminal act with his own hand, liable constructively for that act under any of the sections of the Penal Code relating to vicarious responsibility. As the principal offender, the charge and the conviction against him must be for the substantive offence he committed and not for that offence, by virtue of any vicarious responsibility.[56]

13. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it must be proved:

(a) that a certain person was charged with, or liable to be apprehended for, some offence, ie, a breach of the Code, or of a special or local law (s 40);
(b) that the accused was a public servant (s 21), whose legal duty it was as such to apprehend or keep in confinement such offender;

(c) that the accused actually had the offender in custody (if the charge is one of escape); and
(d) that there was an intentional omission to apprehend, or intentional suffering to escape, or intentional aiding to escape or attempt to escape.

14. Conviction

Where the suspect was not granted bail and was remanded to custody, the duty of the accused court moharrir was to have the suspect sent to jail custody. When the accused, instead of sending the suspect to jail custody, directed the police escort to release the suspect, the accused was held guilty of the offence under this section.[57]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 222.

Intentional omission to apprehend on the part of public servant bound to apprehend person under sentence or lawfully committed.--

Whoever, being a public servant, legally bound as such public servant to apprehend or to keep in1681 confinement any person under sentence of a Court of Justice for any offence [58][or lawfully committed to custody], intentionally omits to apprehend such person, or intentionally suffers such person to escape, or intentionally aids such person in escaping or attempting to escape from such confinement, shall be punished as follows, that is to say:

with [59][imprisonment for life] or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to fourteen years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, is under sentence of death; or

with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, is subject, by a sentence of a Court of Justice, or by virtue of a commutation of such sentence, to [60][imprisonment for life] [61][* * ] [62][ * ] [63][ * ] [64][ * *] or imprisonment for a term of ten years or upwards; or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, is subject, by a sentence of a Court of Justice, to imprisonment for a term not extending to ten years [65][or if the person was lawfully committed to custody].

Comments

1. Scope

This section is identical with the last section, except that the person to be apprehended has already been convicted or committed for an offence. It is an aggravated form of the offence made punishable under the last section. Commentary under s 221 may be referred to.

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'or lawfully committed to custody' in the first paragraph, and 'or if the person was lawfully committed to custody' at the end, were inserted by s 8 of the Indian Penal Code Amendment Act (27 of 1870). The words 'or penal servitude for life' and the words 'or penal servitude' which occurred in paragraph three, were1682 omitted by s 2 of Act, 17 of 1949. The words 'imprisonment for life' were substituted for the words 'transportation for life' by Act, 26 of 1955, s 117 and schedule.

3. Public Servant

Section 21, and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

4. 'Legally Bound'--Meaning of Section 43, and synopsis note 4 to s 221 may be referred to.

A convict was entrusted in the custody of the accused appellant a police custody for escorting him to hospital. On way the convict escaped from custody. The escaped convict was closely related to the accused. Conduct of the accused showed that the accused intentionally allowed the convict to escape, did not take any steps to arrest him, nor immediately informed the higher authorities. Accused appellant was convicted under ss 221, 222 and 223, IPC .[66]

Where the accused, a police constable, was proved to have intentionally allowed a prisoner to escape from his custody, but there was no evidence to prove that the prisoner had been lawfully committed to the custody of the Central Jail, the accused was not legally bound to keep the prisoner in custody.[67]

5. 'Court of Justice'--Meaning of

Section 20, and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

6. Offence

Section 40, and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

7. Lawfully Committed to Custody

The prosecution must prove that the offender had lawfully been committed to the custody of the jail, before an accused can be convicted for offence under this section. From the mere fact that the offender had been given in the custody of the accused, the court should not presume that the offender had lawfully been committed to the custody of the jail.[68]

8. 'Intentionally Aids'--Success of the Attempt is not Material

The meaning of this phrase may be seen from s 107, expln 2 of the IPC, wherein it is explained that 'whoever, either prior to or at the time of the commission of an act, does anything in order to facilitate the commission of that act, and thereby facilitate the commission thereof is said to aid the doing of that act'. If the accused did acts which were done in order to facilitate the attempt of certain prisoners to escape, it cannot be gainsaid that he did thereby facilitate an attempt to escape, and he can be1683 properly convicted under this section. It makes no difference that the attempt was in fact frustrated by other circumstances.[69]

9. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, and a warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. An offence under the first and second punishment clauses is not bailable; but one under the third is. The offence is not compoundable. An offence falling under the first punishment clause is triable by a court of session. That under the second and third clause it is triable by a magistrate of the first class.[70] The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence falling under the third punishment clause of this section is three years. There is no limitation for the offence falling under the other clauses.

10. Sanction

Only in cases falling under s 197 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, a sanction is required to prosecute a person under this section.

11. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:
> That you on or about the..... day of..... were a public servant (state the office) and as such public servant, you were legally bound to apprehend (or keep in confinement) one AB, a person under sentence of..... of the court of..... for the offence of..... under section..... of the (state IPC or the local or special law, whichever may be the case) (or who had been lawfully committed to custody by.....), you intentionally omitted to apprehend the said AB (or intentionally suffered the said AB to escape) (or intentionally aided him in escaping or attempting to escape) from such confinement] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 222 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

12. Proof

The following points require proof for a conviction under this section:

(a) that the accused was a public servant;
(b) that, as such, he was legally bound:

  (i) to apprehend or
  (ii) to keep in confinement any person who was under sentence of a court of justice for some offence; or had been lawfully committed to custody;

(c) that the accused omitted to apprehend him, or intentionally suffered him to escape, or intentionally aided him in escaping or attempting to escape; and
(d) that the person who ought to have been apprehended was:1684

  (i) under sentence of death, or
  (ii) under any sentence of imprisonment.

61 The words 'or penal servitude for life' were repealed by s 2 of the Criminal Law (Removal of Racial Discriminations) Act 1949 (17 of 1949) (wef 6-4-1949).

62 The words 'or to' omitted by Act 36 of 1957, s 3, Sch II.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 223.

Escape from confinement or custody negligently suffered by public servant.--

Whoever, being a public servant legally bound as such public servant to keep in confinement any person charged with or convicted of any offence [71][or lawfully committed to custody], negligently suffers such person to escape from confinement, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is supplementary to and further extends the principles laid down in the two preceding sections. It punishes a public servant who negligently suffers any person charged with an offence to escape from confinement. The last two sections dealt with cases of an intentional omission to apprehend such person or suffering them to escape.

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'or lawfully committed to custody' were added by s 8 of the Indian Criminal Law Amendment Act (27 of 1870).

3. Essential Ingredients of the Section

In order to constitute an offence under this section:

(a) the accused must be a public servant;
(b) he must be legally bound to keep in confinement a person charged with or convicted of an offence, or lawfully committed to custody; and
(c) he must negligently suffer such person to escape.1685

4. Public Servant

Section 21 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

Convict-warders are 'public servants' within the meaning of this section.[72] A watchman in the Kaira collectorate, who does the work of rakha, though not entered on the village records as a village servant, and receives a portion of the emoluments assigned as remuneration for the services of a rakha, is a person in actual possession of the situation of a public servant within the meaning of expln 2 of s 21 of the Indian Penal Code .[73] A village revenue servant, as distinguished from a village police servant, is not a 'public servant' within the meaning of the section.[74]

The offence, envisaged in terms of this section, is one of which a public servant is guilty only while acting as a public servant, and not otherwise. He cannot be guilty of an offence under this section unless he was acting as a public servant.[75]

5. 'Legally Bound to Keep in Confinement'--Meaning of

For the meaning of the expression 'legally bound', notes to s 43 may be referred to.

When Public Servant not Entitled to Custody

An offence under this section is committed when the custody is lawful. If a public servant is not authorised to keep a person in custody, he is not guilty of an offence under this section for suffering that person to escape.[76]

The Patna High Court has held that it is only when the letting off is from a lawful confinement, that an offence under this section can be said to have been committed. Therefore, when an authority, not authorised to confine a person, but only to detain, lets off such person from his custody, no offence under this section is committed.[77]

A village chaukidar is not a police officer entitled to arrest and keep in custody a person without warrant.[78]

Escape from Unlawful Custody is no Offence

In Kalai v Kalu Chowkidar ,[79] it was held that where a person had committed a theft and had been made over to the custody of a village chaukidar, the accused could not be convicted under s 225, for rescuing the alleged thief from lawful custody. The court held that the chaukidar was not 'lawfully detaining' the alleged thief. The same view was taken in the case of King-Emperor v Johri .[80]

Where the police of a former native state arrested in an adjoining territory, a person suspected of having committed an offence in the native state, and made him over to one Debi, a chaukidar, from whose custody he escaped, it was held that neither the1686 original arrest, nor the subsequent custody by the chaukidar was lawful, and, therefore, the chaukidar could not properly be convicted under this section.[81]

In a Bombay case, a complaint by a private person was presented to a magistrate that a certain person was concerned in a murder, and the magistrate arrested him, and, after hearing the complainant and such person, sent him to the superintendent of the police. He, in turn, sent him to a sub-inspector. It was held, that the magistrate's order might be held to have been passed under s 167, CrPC, and the sub-inspector was bound to detain him in custody, until released by due course of law, and that he was guilty of an offence under s 222, IPC, by negligently suffering him to escape from the custody.[82]

Commentary under the same heading in s 221, ante may be referred to.

6. 'Charged with'--Meaning of

The words 'charged with an offence' in this section are used only in the sense of inculpation or accusation of an offence and do not mean 'against whom a charge has been framed'.[83] Where the person who escapes, is neither charged nor convicted of any offence, no offence under this section is made out.[84]

7. Offence

Section 40, and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

8. 'Lawfully Committed to Custody'--Whether Custody and Confinement Co-Extensive

This phrase and the phrase 'legally bound to keep in confinement' though distinct, are somewhat overlapping. No public servant can be legally bound to keep any one in confinement unless he is lawfully committed to custody. It has been held that in ss 220 and 225, IPC the words 'custody' and 'confinement' have been used as co-extensive.[85] The custody must be lawful; for, if a man is arrested for a supposed crime, when no such crime was committed, and the party is neither indicted nor charged, or for such a slight suspicion of an actual crime and by such an irregular process as will not justify an arrest or detention, the officer is not guilty of an escape by suffering the prisoner to go at large. But if the warrant of commitment plainly and expressly charges a man with treason or felony, though it be not strictly formal, the custodian suffering an escape is punishable, and where commitments are good in substance, the custodian is as much bound to observe them as if they were made ever so exactly. Whenever an imprisonment is so far irregular that it will be no offence in the prisoner to break from it by force, it can be no offence in the officer to suffer him to escape. It is generally considered that the imprisonment must be for some criminal matter.[86] But a person may be 'lawfully committed to custody' even though he is not charged with or convicted of an offence. Thus, a person lawfully arrested on suspicion, eg, under s 41, CrPC, is lawfully committed to custody, though not1687 actually charged with any offence.[87] So also a person failing to give security under ss 106, 116 or s 117, CrPC, and detained in prison under s 122, CrPC, is lawfully committed to custody, although he has not been charged with or convicted of an offence.

9. 'Negligence'--What is?

In criminal law, negligence is a subjective state of mind. It connotes inadvertence. It consists not merely in omitting to do what ought to have been done, but in not thinking of the result which one's conduct might produce.[88]

Escape should be Natural and Probable cause of Negligence

In Durga Prasad v Emperor ,[89] it was held by the Allahabad High Court that before a person can be convicted under s 223, IPC, it must be shown not only that he was guilty of negligence, but that the escape was at least the natural and probable consequence of his negligence. In a case, a police officer A, incharge of a police station had been ordered to send certain prisoners to a certain place. He went out on some other work leaving orders with the head constable to send the prisoners off. The head constable complied, but the prisoners escaped from the custody of those sent in charge of them. It was held that the escape of the prisoners was not the natural and probable consequence of A's negligence and he could not be convicted under this section.[90] Where the accused happened to be in overall charge of the case but was not a co-conspirator in the escape of the person in custody, the very conduct of the accused in making a hectic search for the escaped accused shows that the accused was not a co-conspirator in the escape of the said accused from lawful custody, and therefore, charges framed under s 223, IPC and ss 132 - 137, Customs Act 1962, framed against the accused, were quashed.[91]

Escape should not be a Remote Consequence

The escape of the prisoner must not be too remote a consequence of the negligence of the accused.

Where all that was shown was that the accused marched the prisoner by night and he was rescued, it was held that as there was no evidence that the accused had any reason to expect that any attempt would be made at a rescue, no offence under this section was made out.[92]

Negligence to be Determined with Reference to Duties

It must be shown that there was negligence on the part of the accused and that the escape of the prisoners was the consequence of this negligence. Before the court can decide the question of negligence, it must know what the duties of the accused were, and unless they are known exactly, it is impossible to find whether he was negligent in the performance of his duties and whether the escape of the prisoners was due to that negligence.[93]1688

Special Duties Require Special Care--Places Burden on Accused

In the case of a prison-guard, the escape of a prisoner is a prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the guard on duty. Where a person undertakes a special duty which requires extra vigilance, he must satisfactorily establish that he took all reasonable care in performing his duty, which is expected of a person performing similar duties. If he fails to establish it, he would render himself liable under this section.[1]

Where a daffadar in charge of one of the gates of a jail, suffered certain convict prisoners to pass out of the gate and they escaped, it was held that the daffadar was guilty under this section, even if he did not intend that the prisoners should escape and allowed them to pass out of the gate to have an interview with their friends.[2]

In a Lahore case, a jail warder was placed in charge of a gang of prisoners who were sent off to do agricultural works. Contrary to his orders, he permitted a convict-warder to take two of the convicts to a cemetery to water the trees there. The cemetery was at some distance and was not within sight, and the accused made no attempt to patrol in that direction. Owing to the negligence of the convict-warder, one of the convicts escaped. It was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under this section.[3]

Two policemen were conveying a prisoner from one place to another in a camel-cart. The prisoner was secured by two pairs of handcuffs and a rope round the waist. He wanted to be let down from the cart to answer the call of nature and thereupon, one set of handcuffs was removed and he was let down. He suddenly raised an alarm of a snake and in the confusion, jerked at the waist rope and ran away. It was held that the policemen were not guilty of negligently suffering the prisoner to escape within the meaning of this section.[4]

A convict was entrusted in the custody of the accused appellant a police custody for escorting him to hospital. On way the convict escaped from custody. The escaped convict was closely related to the accused. Conduct of the accused showed that the accused intentionally allowed the convict to escape, did not take any steps to arrest him, nor immediately informed the higher authorities. Accused appellant was convicted under ss 221, 222 and 223, IPC .[5]

10. Confinement--Meaning of

The word 'confinement' in this section, should not be restricted to confinement within circumscribing limits. In ss 220 and 225, the legislature appears to have used the words 'custody' and 'confinement' as co-extensive.[6]

11. 'To Escape from Confinement'--Meaning of the Expression

The expression 'escape from confinement' in this section is not limited to escape from the particular sort of place of confinement to which a prisoner is subjected to or1689 in which he is restrained at the time of the occurrence. A prisoner cannot be said to have escaped from confinement until he has regained his liberty. In one case, the accused public servants were posted to keep guard on certain cells in a jail where certain prisoners were confined. When the accused were relieved, the prisoners were not in their cells but were found crouching on the roofs of their cells and were immediately recaptured. It was held that, under the circumstances, the accused were not guilty of the offence under this section, for the prisoners were still in confinement and crouching upon the roofs of their cells, inasmuch as they were still within the prison walls and were not at liberty. An attempt to escape from confinement had no doubt been made, but negligently suffering such an attempt is not an offence within the provision of this section.[7]

12. Procedure

The offence under the section is non-cognizable, and a summons should ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable, and is triable by any magistrate.

The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

13. Sanction

Sanction is only necessary in cases falling under s 197, CrPC, for a prosecution under this section.

14. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc), hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:
> That you, on or about..... day of..... were posted as..... (state the office) and as such a public servant, were legally bound to keep in confinement one AB, who was charged with (or convicted of) an offence of..... under section..... of the Indian Penal Code [(or of a special or local law (specify)] (or lawfully committed to custody) but negligently suffered the said AB to escape from confinement and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 253 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

15. Proof

In order to establish the charge under this section the following facts have to be established:

(a) that the accused was a public servant;
(b) as such public servant he was bound to keep in confinement any persons;
(c) such person was: (i) charged with; (ii) convicted of an offence; or (iii) lawfully committed to custody;

(d) the accused suffered such person to escape; and
(e) the escape was due to the negligence of such public servant.[8]1690

16. Sentence

The sentence of imposing only fine in a case of an inexcusable dereliction of duty, leading to the escape of prisoners from a well-guarded prison, is out of all proportion to the gravity of the offence. Officers guarding a prison must know that if they are negligent in the performance of their duty, and this negligence leads to the escape of any prisoner under their charge, the consequences will be very serious for them. A sentence of fine will tend to create a belief that their negligence is not likely to be visited with anything more serious than the loss of service and a few visits to the court. The sentence of the court is as important as the trial itself. It should be commensurate with the gravity of the crime, though it may not be harsh and should not amount to useless cruelty. It must, however, serve as a deterrent to other members of the public services, who are charged with looking after the security of the community.[9]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 224.

Resistance or obstruction by a person to his lawful apprehension.--

Whoever intentionally offers any resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of himself for any offence with which he is charged or of which he has been convicted, or escapes or attempts to escape from any custody in which he is lawfully detained for any such offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.--The punishment in this section is in addition to the punishment for which the person to be apprehended or detained in custody was liable for the offence with which he was charged, or of which he was convicted.1691

Comments

1. Scope

Sections 221 - 223, IPC dealt with public servants, intentionally or negligently, omitting to apprehend or keep in confinement offenders, or suffering them to escape or aiding them in their escape. This section deals with the offender himself, who offers resistance or illegal obstruction to his lawful apprehension, or escapes or attempts to escape from lawful custody. Section 225 , IPC deals with other persons who offer resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of an offender or rescue or attempt to rescue him from lawful custody.

Where the accused ran away while in the custody of the police authorities, the plea by the accused that he never escaped from the custody but left the place to answer call of nature and on his return, finding no police at office left that place, was dispelled by the fact that on the following day he was caught by the police personnel while trying to escape on seeing them, he had thus escaped intentionally, and hence, his acquittal in the case in which he has been arrested will not negate charge of his intentional escape from custody so he is guilty under s 224 .[10]

The accused, a wanted criminal, attacked police squad when they surrounded the hut in which he was hiding and apprehended him. The accused pelted bottles and glasses and also tried to give blow on head of PSI with a heavy chopper but he warded off the blow. Attempt on his part to commit murder amply proved, police officers had no reason to tell falsehood in their deposition, as medical evidence proved that the accused sustained injuries in the scuffle with the police, conviction of the accused for offences punishable under ss 224, 332, 307 was found proper.[11]

Two Parts of the Section

First Part

This section itself is in two parts and deals with two offences. The first deals with the offence of intentionally offering resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of himself for an offence with which he is charged or of which he has been convicted. For the application of this part of the section:

(a) the accused must have been charged with or convicted for an offence;
(b) there should have been an attempt to lawfully apprehend him for that offence;
(c) he must have offered resistance or illegal obstruction to such apprehension; and
(d) he must have done so intentionally.[12]1692

Second Part

The second part of the section deals with the offence of intentional escape or attempt to escape from lawful custody. For the application of this part of the section:

(a) the accused must have been charged with or convicted of an offence;
(b) he must have been lawfully detained in custody for such offence; and
(c) he must have intentionally escaped or attempted to escape from such custody.[13]

So, the essential ingredients for the second part of s 224, IPC are that the accused must have been detained in custody lawfully and that he escaped from such custody intentionally.[14]

Common Features

Both the parts have two common features viz: (a) the accused must have been charged with or convicted of an offence; and (b) the resistance, obstruction or escape must be intentional.

2. Sections 224 and 216, IPC

Commentary under s 216, ante may be referred to.

3. 'For any Offence with which he is Charged or of which he has been Convicted'--Meaning of

The words 'for any offence' in this section mean for any offence with which a person is charged, or of which he has been convicted. It would be an offence to escape from lawful custody before the trial, just as it would be an offence to escape from lawful custody after conviction. The word 'charged' is used in the popular sense as implying inculpation of an alleged offence as distinguished from a charge formulated after trial. It would, therefore, be an offence for a man to escape from custody after he has been lawfully arrested on a charge of having committed an offence, although he may not have been subsequently convicted of such latter offence.[15] So, even if the person in custody is declared afterwards to be innocent, the offence of escape from custody will be complete, provided only the custody be lawful.[16]

The mere fact that a sub-inspector of police put his hand on the applicant's shoulder or caught hold of his wrist without the least intimation to the applicant for what offence he was being arrested, can hardly amount to the applicant being 'charged' with any offence.[17]1693

Arrest or Detention must be in Connection with Some Offence

The section has no application if the apprehension or detention is not for any offence. An escape from custody, when being taken before a magistrate for the purpose of being bound over to be of good behaviour, is not punishable under either this section or s 225, as the person is not charged with or convicted of any offence.[18] So also an escape from custody in execution of a civil process.[19]

4. 'Offence'--Meaning of

The word 'offence' as used in this Code is defined in s 40, IPC . In cl 2 of that section it is said that in s 224, IPC the word 'offence' denotes a thing punishable under this Code or under any special or local law as hereinafter defined.

Under s 41, IPC, a 'special law' is a law applicable to a particular subject and under s 42, IPC a 'local law' is a law applicable only to a particular part of India. Reading this section with these sections, the only conclusion which can be arrived at is that for its application the apprehension or detention should necessarily be for any of the offences mentioned in the Indian Penal Code or under any local or special law applicable to any part of India.

5. Proper Attempt to Arrest

There must be a proper attempt to arrest a person before he can be said to offer resistance or obstruction to it.[20]Sections 41, 46, 49, 157 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973[21] may be referred to.

Resistance and Obstruction Explained

'Resistance' and 'obstruction' imply some active opposition to the arrest by the use or show of force. A mere evasion of arrest[22] by running away[23] or by shutting oneself in the house,[24] does not amount to resistance or illegal obstruction to the arrest.

Obstruction Must be Illegal

Where the accused, a lady, on seeing the peon entrusted with a warrant of arrest, goes inside her house and shuts the door, it amounts to obstruction. But this section requires that the obstruction should be illegal, and in construing the term 'illegal', regard must be given to the definition of 'illegal' in s 43 of the Code. The legality or illegality of the obstruction would also depend upon the legality of the arrest, having regard to the provisions of the Civil and Criminal Procedure Code s relating to arrest and imprisonment.[25]

In a Lahore case, the accused was arrested by the police under s 17(2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1908, and it was found that at the time of arrest, he1694 resisted being apprehended by not allowing the police to remove him and by kicking out. No case under s 17(1) or s 17(2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act was made out, and it was contended by the accused that, under the circumstances, his arrest was illegal and therefore, he could resist it. The contention was not seriously considered, the court remarking that the argument was only half-heartedly advanced and that there was no force in it. The conviction of the accused under s 224 was maintained but the sentence was reduced.[26]

Resistance or Obstruction must be Intentional

The resistance or illegal obstruction, in order to constitute an offence under this section, must be intentional. A resistance or illegal obstruction when, one who resists or illegally obstructs, does so with the intention that there should be no apprehension notwithstanding that such apprehension, to his knowledge, is lawful.[27]

Magistrate's Duty to check abuse of Powers by Police

When the offence against an accused is a bailable one, the police have no authority to attempt to put handcuffs on him in the first instance, and would only be justified in using them, if, for some special reason, there is reasonable ground for believing that he, after a proper arrest, would attempt to escape and is likely to do so, or he cannot be made to go to the police station except by such, amongst other, means. Trivial resistance to unlawful force on the part of an arresting officer does not constitute an offence under this section. It is highly important that magistrates should check any abuse by police officers of their powers and should insist on the plain provisions of the law being carried out.[28]

6. 'To the Lawful Apprehension'--What is Lawful Apprehension

For this section to apply, it is necessary that the accused, who is charged under it, must have been lawfully apprehended or detained in custody, which in its turn depends on whether the magistrate ordering the arrest of the accused had power to do so.[29]Sections 224 and 225 deal with a resistance to, or an escape from, lawful apprehension, and s 353 deals with an assault to deter a public servant from discharging his duty. It thus becomes essential for convictions under these sections that the prosecution should show that the apprehension or arrest made or attempted was lawful in every way.[30]

No offence is committed by resisting or obstructing an arrest which is not lawful.[31] An arrest in court for a contempt of court is a lawful arrest.[32] In1695*Jagpat Koeri v Emperor* ,[33] a warrant of arrest signed, not by the magistrate who had taken cognizance of the case, but by an honorary magistrate who lived in the same town, was held invalid under s 70, CrPC . If the apprehension is under a warrant of arrest, the person executing it must notify the substance thereof to the person to be arrested, and, if so required, shall show him the warrant.[34] But s 75 of the Code of Criminal Procedure does not require the fact of the notification to be mentioned in the report.[35] The provision in s 75, CrPC does not extend to arrests without a warrant under s 55 of that Code.[36] Under that section, an arrest by a chaukidar in pursuance of a written order from an officer in charge of a police station is legal, and its resistance is an offence under this section.[37] Where a police officer who is not present on the spot asks the constables to bring a certain person to the thana with some papers, the order does not amount to a direction for arrest as contemplated by s 55, unless the order is given in writing. The use of force by the constables, therefore, is illegal, and if the person against whom force is used resents it and a scuffle ensues in the course of which brickbats are thrown, the person cannot be convicted under this section, nor can the persons assisting him be convicted under ss 225 and 353 .[38]Section 41, CrPC authorises any police officer, without an order from a magistrate and without a warrant, to arrest any person who has been concerned in any cognizable offence or against whom a reasonable complaint has been made or credible information has been received, or a reasonable suspicion exists of his having been so concerned. In Appaswami Mudaly v Emperor ,[39] it was observed that if a constable, in effecting an arrest, specifies a certain power which proves to be wanting, resistance to him or escape from his custody constitutes no offence. To hold that s 41, CrPC applies in such cases without any intimation to the accused, and without any allegation by the constable in his deposition that he proceeded under the section, would be to nullify several salutary provisions contained in Pt B, ch VI of the Code of Criminal Procedure, relating to the execution of warrants of arrest. Where the constable purports to act under a warrant which is found to be invalid, and where there is no allegation by the constable in his deposition that he proceeded under ss 41(1), 41(1) does not apply.[40]

Arrest without Endorsement on Warrant of Arrest

Under the terms of s 74 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the endorsement on the warrant of arrest should be regularly made by name to a certain person in order to authorise him to make an arrest. Where there is no such endorsement, the arrest is not a legal arrest so as to make the accused liable for an offence under this section or s 225 .[41] If a warrant allows bail, that fact must be stated at the time it is executed, otherwise the arrest may become illegal.[42]1696

Lack of Good Faith, whether affects Legality of Arrest

If the apprehension is lawful, it does not matter whether that apprehension was not made, or attempted to be made, in good faith.[43]

7. Of himself--Meaning of

This section requires that the accused person must offer resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of himself, for any offence with which he has either been charged or of which he has been convicted. If the resistance or illegal obstruction is to the lawful apprehension of himself, when not charged with or convicted of any offence, the offence would fall under s 225B, IPC and not under this section. The distinction between the two sections is not merely academic. This section empowers a magistrate to inflict an imprisonment for two years whereas under s 225B, the maximum term of imprisonment is six months.[44]

8. Escape

An escape is where one who is arrested, gains his liberty before he is delivered by due course of law.[45] It is distinct from flight from justice before arrest, for which a provision is made separately.

Escaping from legal custody is an offence under s 224 of the IPC .[46]

Escape how Effected

The term 'escape' is usually applied where the liberation of the prisoner is effected either by himself or others, without force. Where it is effected by the prisoner himself with force, it is called prison-breaking; and where it is effected by others, with force, it is commonly called a rescue. A person legally arrested for an offence must submit to be tried and dealt with according to law. If he gains his liberty before he is delivered by due course of law, he commits the offence of escaping from lawful custody under this section.[47]

Escapes Fall into Three Classes

Escapes fall into three classes-escapes by the prisoner, escape suffered by an officer of the law, and escape suffered by a private person who has the prisoner in custody.[48]

9. Section is Confined to Escape by Accused Himself

In this section we are concerned with escapes by the prisoner. It is his voluntary act.[49] A person forcibly snatched away from custody cannot be said to have intentionally escaped from custody, and, therefore, cannot be convicted under this section.[50] As all1697 persons are bound to submit themselves to the judgment of the law, those who, when lawfully arrested on criminal process, free themselves from custody before they are put in a prison or other legal place of detention, are guilty of a misdemeanour, punishable by fine and imprisonment.[51] When the accused was arrested, the grounds of his arrest were communicated to him and his arrest was legal but the accused police official resisted the arrest by the raiding party, he was guilty under s 224 IPC .[52]

Cogent evidence on the record proved that the accused facing trial in as many as 22 cases escaped from the jail custody, which was also proved by the entry of missing in the roll call, the accused was convicted under s 224, IPC and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment of one year.[53]

10. Escape by Consent or Neglect, or with Knowledge of Keeper

It has been long established that even when the escape is effected by the consent or the neglect of the person that kept the prisoner in custody, the latter is no less guilty, as neither such illegal consent nor neglect absolves the prisoner from the duty of submitting to the judgment of the law.[54]

When the escape is effected by the consent or with the knowledge of the person escorting the prisoner in custody, the accused is no less guilty.[55] But, where a person arrested in execution of a civil process was allowed to go by the decree-holder and the process-server who had arrested him; it was held that there was no offence of escape from lawful custody committed by the person who was arrested.[56]

11. Resistance or Escape must be Intentional

The word 'intentionally' governs both the parts of the section. In order, therefore, to warrant a conviction under this section, it is essential to prove that the accused intentionally escaped or attempted to escape from lawful custody.[57]

Escape not Intentional when Forcibly Rescued

A person forcibly snatched away from custody cannot be said to have intentionally escaped from custody, and cannot therefore be convicted under the section.[58] Where two constables, when on patrol duty, wanted to apprehend a person, some persons surrounded the two constables, assaulted and obstructed them in taking the accused to the police station, the facts of offences under s 224, IPC and other offences were1698 not proved beyond reasonable doubt, the accused persons were held entitled to be acquitted under ss 307, 149, 332 and 224, IPC .[59]

12. Acquittal of Accused in the Case in which he was Arrested--No Effect on his Intentional Escape

Law nowhere provides that acquittal in a case in which an accused is arrested will by itself be sufficient to hold that the arrest was unlawful or to negate a charge under s 224, IPC . If it is established by the prosecution that the accused, who had been taken to custody on the allegation of commission of an offence, escaped from such custody intentionally, he would be guilty of offence under s 224, IPC despite the fact that he gets an order of acquittal in the case in which he had been arrested.[60]

13. Disappearance after being Rescued--Consequences of

Where an accused was rescued by a number of his friends from the lawful custody of the process-server, and he took advantage of this and disappeared, and thus got out of the way of the process-server, it was held that the accused escaped within the meaning of s 225B, although it was due to no fault of his that the accused was released by his friends and that he surrendered himself the next morning.[61]

14. Escape must be 'from any Custody in which he is Lawfully Detained'

In order to warrant a conviction under this section, it is necessary to prove that the accused intentionally escaped or attempted to escape from a lawful custody.[62] He cannot be convicted if his detention in custody was illegal.[63] An escape from custody under a civil process must be distinguished from an escape by a person arrested on a criminal charge. The mere fact that a constable in charge of the accused, who was detained in a jail, became insensible, could not determine the lawful custody of the accused, and escape from such custody is an offence under this section.[64]

15. Lawful Custody how Determined

In construing the terms, 'lawfully detained in custody' in the section, regard must be given to the nature of the custody itself, as well as to the circumstances under which the authority to arrest and keep in custody arises. The 'stocks' were intended by the Regulation (11 of 1816) to be employed for a specific purpose, namely, the infliction of conviction for petty offences as a form of punishment, on the people of lower castes. It was held that detention in stocks, otherwise than as a punishment, was not legal custody, and escape from it was not punishable under this section.[65]

16. Custody in Non-Cognizable Cases

Where a person, apprehended on a charge of a cognizable offence, escapes from lawful custody, his liability to punishment is not affected by the circumstances that a1699 competent court determines his offence to be other than that with which he had been charged. However, if charged with a non-cognizable offence, the police officer, who apprehends him without warrant, does not have him in lawful custody, and his escape is not punishable under this section.[66]

17. Arrest and Custody in a case of Mistaken Identity

A, a police officer, arrested B (bearing the same name as C) thinking that he was C, against whom there was a warrant of arrest. B escaped, but was re-arrested. On being tried for the offence for which he was arrested on suspicion, he was acquitted on the ground that he was not C, the person charged. It was held that he was not lawfully detained in custody, since he (B) had not been charged with the offence and the arrest was therefore unlawful, and therefore he committed no offence under this section.[67]

A, having arrested B in the act of stealing, takes him to the village magistrate, who sends him in the custody of two village servants to the nearest police station. B escapes from the servants' custody. He is guilty of escaping from legal custody.[68]

18. Custody when Arrest by Private Person

In order to convict the accused under this section, the prosecution must prove that there was a lawful arrest within the meaning of s 41 or s 55, CrPC . Under s 43 of the CrPC a private person can arrest any person, but only if that person is a proclaimed offender or is found actually committing a non-bailable cognizable offence in his presence. Arrest by a private person in any other circumstances is illegal and escape from his custody is not an offence under this section.[69]

19. Failure to show Authority before Arrest

It may be desirable or even obligatory that, if called upon, the police officer making the arrest should show the person arrested, the authority under which he is acting, but to hold that he is bound to do so before he can properly arrest and detain in custody such a person, so as to make the arrest and the detention lawful, would be to extend the law beyond what the legislature has thought proper to declare it.[70]

20. Custody when Arrest made without Proper Endorsement in Warrant

An endorsement in a warrant of arrest should be made in accordance with the law. In Abdul Sikdar v Mathu Singh , the court, while it pointed out that initials ought not to be used to authenticate an endorsement upon a warrant, held that a warrant was not invalid when the endorsement was made by initials only, such initials being shown to be those of the proper person to make the endorsement. The endorsement referred to, should be regularly made by name to a certain person in order to authorise him to make the arrest and when there is no endorsement by a person having authority to do1700 so, the arrest is not legal, so as to make any attempt at obstruction or escape, an offence punishable with the terms of this section.[71]

21. 'For any such Offence'--Meaning of

The word 'for any such offence' must mean for any offence with which he is charged or of which he has been convicted. The expression 'charged with' means not that a charge had been framed against the accused by a court of law under the CrPC, but that he was accused of having been involved in an offence.[72] Thus, it would be an offence for a man to escape from custody after he had been lawfully arrested on a charge of having committed an offence, although he may not have been convicted of such latter offence. An accused person is no less guilty than a convicted person, if he escapes from lawful custody.[73] An escape from custody when such detention is not for an offence, is not punishable under this section.[74] The detention contemplated should necessarily be for any of the offences mentioned in the Code or under any local or special law applicable to India. Hence, where an accused arrested for an offence committed in an erstwhile native state, escaped in India while in custody of the state police, he could not be convicted under s 224 even if that state had adopted the Indian Penal Code as its own Code.[75]

22. Explanation--Sentence need not be Consecutive

As the act of offering resistance or illegal obstruction to lawful apprehension or an escape or the attempt to escape is an additional offence punishable under this section, the punishment to be imposed for this offence is also in addition to the punishment for which such person was liable for the offence with which he was charged or of which he was convicted. There is, however, nothing in the explanation to require that a sentence of imprisonment under this section must be made to run consecutively to a sentence imposed for the main offence of which the accused was convicted. A concurrent sentence is nonetheless an additional sentence.[76]

23. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable. A warrant should ordinarily issue in the first instance. The offence is bailable but not compoundable. It can be tried by any magistrate.

The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

24. 'Place of Trial'

The offence of escaping from custody may be inquired into or tried by a court within whose local jurisdiction the offence is committed or the accused person is found.[77]1701

Sections 177 to 189 of the Code of Criminal Procedure[78] may be referred to.

25. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name of office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the .....day of.....at.....intentionally offered resistance (or illegal obstruction) to your lawful apprehension for the offence of .....with which you were charged [(or of which you had been convicted) (or escaped, or attempted to escape from the custody of.....in which you were lawfully detained for the offence of .....)], and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 224 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

26. Proof

Section 224, IPC has two distinct parts. The first relates to resistance to apprehension and the second part relates to escape from custody. In order to bring home the guilt of the accused under the first part, the prosecution is to prove the following ingredients:

(a) that the accused was charged or convicted;
(b) that he offered resistance or obstruction to his apprehension;
(c) that such resistance or obstruction was illegal; and
(d) that the accused offered such resistance or obstruction illegally.

When the offence charged is that of escape or attempt to escape from custody, the prosecution is to prove the following:

(a) that the accused was taken into custody for commission of an offence;
(b) that such detention in custody was lawful;
(c) that the accused escaped from such custody or made an attempt to do so; and
(d) that the accused did so intentionally.[79]

In a prosecution under this section, what would be proved is that the person who escaped from lawful custody, had been charged with an offence, not in the sense that a charge had been framed against him, but in the ordinary sense of that expression, namely that he was accused of having been involved in an offence. It is not necessary that proof should be produced of any formal announcement having been made by the person who apprehended the accused, that he had committed an offence. The question whether a person was or was not charged with an offence should depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case and the inference to be drawn from such facts and circumstances.[80]

It is incumbent on the prosecution to prove that the accused was in lawful custody and he escaped from that custody. When there is no evidence even to indicate that the1702 accused was lawfully arrested and that he escaped from the lawful custody, his conviction under this section cannot be sustained.[81]

27. Punishment

The punishment under this section being in addition to the original sentence, the courts when passing the sentence must comply with the provisions of sub-s (2) of s 426 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[82] A person, who offers resistance to his lawful apprehension, and persons, who manhandle a public servant in discharging his duty and secure the release of a person from lawful custody, can plead no circumstance in extenuation.[83]

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 225.

Resistance or obstruction to lawful apprehension of another person. --

Whoever intentionally offers any resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of any other person for an offence, or rescues or attempts to rescue any other person from any custody in which that person is lawfully detained for an offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both;

or, if the person to be apprehended, or the person rescued, or attempted to be rescued, is charged with or liable to be apprehended for an offence punishable with [84][imprisonment for life] or imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

or, if the person to be apprehended or rescued, or attempted to be rescued, is charged with or liable to be apprehended for an offence punishable with death, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

or, if the person to be apprehended or rescued, or attempted to be rescued, is liable under the sentence of a Court of Justice, or by virtue of a commutation of such a sentence, to [85][imprisonment for life] [86][] [87][] [88][] or imprisonment, for a term of ten years or upwards, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

or, if the person to be apprehended or rescued, or attempted to be rescued, is under sentence of death, shall be punished with [89][imprisonment for life] or imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.1703

Comments

1. Scope

From bare perusal of the provision it appears that the person from whose custody the rescue is effected must have authority to detain lawfully the person rescued. Otherwise, no offence is committed for effecting the rescue. It is not necessary that the custody from which offender is rescued should be that of a police man, it is enough that the custody is one which is authorised by law and it must be proved that the person rescued was in lawful custody at the time. It would be very apt to mention that under s 43 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 even a private individual can have authority to take the culprit in custody. But that power is not unlimited, rather it is a limited one which would be evident from the provision as enshrined in s 43 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973.[90]

The last section dealt with offenders offering resistance to their lawful apprehension or escaping from custody. This section deals with others who do the same thing to rescue the offenders. Like the last section, this section also is in two parts and deals with two offences: (a) intentionally offering resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of an offender, and (b) rescuing or attempting to rescue an offender from any custody in which he is lawfully detained.[91] Offering resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of a person should not be confused with an attempt to rescue him. The former comes in before the actual apprehension or arrest, and the latter only after the apprehension or arrest. An offence, under this section, can be said to have been committed if a person tries to rescue an arrested person.[92] It is not necessary that the person who effects the rescue of another from lawful detention, should be aware of the facts leading to that detention.[93]

The person from whose custody the rescue is effected must have authority to detain lawfully the person rescued. Otherwise, no offence is committed for effecting the rescue. It is not necessary that the custody from which offender is rescued should be that of a police man, it is enough that the custody is one which is authorised by law and it must be proved that the person rescued was in lawful custody at the time. The petitioners were alleged to have rescued the accused while the witnesses were taking him to the police station after the commission of the offence. Where there was no1704 eye-witness to the occurrence, as such the witnesses had no authority to arrest the petitioners. No overt act was attributed to the petitioners. Their conviction under s 225, IPC was set aside.[1]

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'imprisonment for life' were substituted by Act, 26 of 1955. Section 117 and schedule for 'transportation for life' (wef 1 January 1956). The words 'or to' in para 4 were omitted by Act 36 of 1957, s 3 and Schedule II. The word 'transportation' in the same para was omitted by Act, 26 of 1955, s 117 and schedule (wef 1 January 1956). The words 'penal servitude' in para 4 were omitted by s 2,

Act 17 of 1949, (wef 6 April 1949).

3. Section 225 Distinguished from Sections 130 and 225B

Section 130, IPC also deals with rescue, but that relates to the rescue of a state prisoner or a prisoner of war, whereas this section relates to the rescue of an offender. Another section in the Code dealing with rescue is s 225B, IPC, which deals with rescue in cases not provided for in this section. This section deals with the rescue of a person who is charged with or convicted of an offence within the meaning of s 40 of this Code, and is lawfully detained in custody for such an offence. On the other hand, s 225B deals with the rescue of a person who is not charged with or convicted of an offence, but is detained in custody for being bound over to be of good behaviour,[2] or in execution of a civil process.[3] In Abdul Rahiman Sahib v Emperor ,[4] it was held that a person rescuing a person arrested in execution of a civil warrant was guilty under s 225 . It is, however, submitted that in fact, s 225B should have been applied to the case and not s 225 .

4. Demand for Release of Accused

Where though the accused was found uprooting the crops in the land of the victim's family and caught in the action, the intention and resolve of those who detained him and the victim was not to release him till subjected to a village panchayat and it was not as though they were bent upon handing the accused over to police for further lawful custody or action, in the light of such evidence coming to light even from the prosecution case, a conviction under s 225, merely because there was a demand to release him, is rendered impossible, all the more so when except a demand so made, nothing further was done in this direction to get him released.[5]

5. Intention is an Important Ingredient

Intention is an important ingredient in an offence under this section, as under almost every criminal offence, and it is for the prosecution to establish with what intention the accused acted. Unless it is proved by the evidence on record that the intention of the accused was to prevent the arrest, or that the pursuers were lawfully empowered to arrest him, persons stopping them from doing so are not liable under this section.[6]1705 Resistance or illegal obstruction is intentional when those who resist or obstruct, do so with the intention that there should be no apprehension, notwithstanding that such apprehension is, to their knowledge, lawful.[7]

6. Power of Arrest and Resistance are Co-related

Any police officer may, without an order or warrant from a magistrate, arrest a person against whom suspicion exists of his having been concerned in theft, under s 41(1)(a), CrPC, but he cannot send persons who are not police officers to make an arrest which he himself can lawfully make. So, when private persons are sent by a person having the powers of a police officer, to arrest a person suspected of theft, they have no lawful authority to arrest him, and any resistance to such persons does not constitute an offence under this section.[8]Section 43, CrPC gives to a private person the power to arrest any person who, in his view, commits a non-bailable and cognizable offence. But where the man escaping was a thief running away after the theft, an arrest of the offender by a private person in whose presence the theft was not committed, is not justified.[9]

If the offence is not committed in one's presence, a private person can arrest an offender only if he is a proclaimed offender.[10]

A, a private person, arrests B in the act of stealing. C rescues B. C is guilty of an offence under this section.[11]

During an unlawful assembly, A, a police officer, arrests B, a member of the assembly. C and D rescue B; they are guilty of an offence under this section.[12]

7. Mere Threat may Amount to Resistance

Threatening a sub-inspector of excise, in order to prevent him from making an arrest, amounts to offering resistance and an illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of an offender.[13] But resistance to an unlawful arrest does not constitute an offence under this section.[14] Notes under s 224 may be referred to.

8. Illegal Obstruction

Notes under s 224 may be referred to.

9. 'Rescue'--Meaning of

The word 'rescue' though not defined in the Code will always mean an act of getting a person free forcibly from custody against the will of person in whose lawful custody he was. Therefore, some overt act needs to be there if one is said to have rescued a person from the lawful custody.[15]1706

The word 'rescue' is not defined in the Code. Rescue is the act of forcibly freeing a person from custody, against the will of those who have him in custody.[16] 'Rescue, or an attempt to rescue is the offence of a person who forcibly frees another from a lawful arrest, whether the arrest is by a constable or a private person, or whether the person rescued is in prison or not'.[17] In other words, rescue is the offence of forcibly and knowingly freeing another from arrest or imprisonment.[18] The term 'rescue' in this section implies intention and the use of violence or criminal force to achieve the object desired. Rescuing would certainly indicate some positive overt act on the part of the accused by which the liberation of the person arrested is effected. Whether there is any such act done by the accused in a particular case would depend on the facts of each case.[19]

Where, except for a demand to release the accused, nothing further was done in the direction of getting him released, the conviction and sentence under s 225, IPC was set aside by the Apex Court.[20]

Intention not Necessary for Rescue

Rescue from lawful custody, which is made punishable under the section, however, need not be an intentional rescue. It is only the resistance or illegal obstruction to apprehension that has to be intentional before it can amount to an offence.[21]

Intention may Sometimes be Material

Where a daffadar, in charge of one of the gates of a jail, allowed certain convicts to pass out of the gate to have an interview with their friends, but the convicts, taking advantage of the daffadar's over-confidence, effected their escape, it was held that the daffadar was not liable to be convicted under this section as it was not his intention to rescue the convict prisoners.[22]

The use of force is a part of the offence of causing rescue. The accused cannot therefore, be convicted of both, for the illegal act of rescuing the prisoner, as well as for using force.[23] Notes under s 225B may be referred to.

10. Detention must be Lawful

One can be held guilty for an offence under s 225 if he rescues a person who was detained lawfully.[24]

For the application of this section, the rescue must be from custody in which the person rescued is in lawful detention. The person from whose custody the rescue is1707 effected must have authority to lawfully detain the person rescued. It must be shown that the person rescued was in lawful custody at the time. If the warrant of arrest is to arrest a particular person, it must be shown that the person arrested and rescued is that particular person.[25]

Where the arrest is unauthorised by law, the person effecting the rescue, cannot be held guilty under this section.[26] When the accused can never be said to have been lawfully detained by the witnesses and once detention of the accused was not lawful, question of committing offence by other accused for rescuing under s 225 of the Indian Penal Code 1860 never arises.[27]

Consequences of Unlawful Arrest and Detention--Some Illustrative Cases

A warrant of arrest not signed by the magistrate issuing it, is defective, and an arrest made under the warrant is illegal, so that the rescue of the person arrested is not a rescue from lawful custody, and the persons effecting the rescue cannot be held guilty under this section.[28] But where the lower half of the warrant, which provides for the release of the arrest person on bail, has not been filled in, this omission would not make the apprehension unlawful.[29] A warrant addressed to the process server of the court is not invalid merely because it is not addressed to a particular person by name. The accused rescuing the person arrested under the warrant would be guilty of the offence under this section.[30]Where the record shows that the magistrate directed the issuance of a warrant of arrest on 8 July 1874 for the appearance of the petitioner, in fact, no such warrant was ever issued. On the next date fixed in the case, the bench clerk of the magistrate, finding the petitioner moving in the court compound under the impression that a warrant of his arrest has already been issued, asked the court constable to arrest him. Upon such asking, the petitioner was arrested but he managed to escape from the custody of the court constable. On his complaint, the magistrate took cognizance under ss 225 and 353, against the petitioner. Such cognizance being challenged before the Patna High Court, it was held that the conduct of the constable in putting the petitioner under arrest or taking him into custody cannot be a lawful act, rather the arrest in such a circumstance must be deemed to be illegal and unjustified. The petitioner as such did not commit any offence in running from such unauthorised custody or detention and no offence as such under s 225 of the Code is made out. There appears to be a grave error on the part of the learned magistrate in ignoring the provisions of law with respect to the issuance of a warrant of arrest and he has committed an error in the present case in taking cognizance of the offence and issuing processes against the petitioner on the allegations made out in the petition of complaint.[31]

A complaint under ss 323 and 329, IPC was lodged by the complainant against some persons. The head constable investigating the case demanded a bribe from the1708 complainant for arresting those persons. A trap was laid to apprehend the head constable red handed. The complainant gave the agreed amount to the head constable, who in turn gave it to a constable, who was present there. On a signal by the complainant, the raiding party appeared on the scene. However, the head constable and constable resisted the raiding party from taking further steps; they shouted for help; one of them ran away and returned along with some villagers and at the instance of the head constable, attacked the raiding party, snatched their belongings and looted the currency notes which were used for giving the bribe. They rescued the head constable, intentionally assaulted the members of the raiding party, used criminal force and prevented the members of the raiding party, who were public servants, from discharging their lawful duties. The head constable was convicted under s 395 read with s 109, ss 353, 109 and 224, the constable under s 395 and the villagers under ss 353, 149, 225 and 147, on the basis of cogent and reliable evidence.[32]

Section 41, CrPC does not give an unqualified power in all cases to any police officer, to arrest without an authorisation in writing, a person concerned in a cognizable offence. The provisions of s 41 are limited by those of s 55, CrPC . Hence, a police constable who is merely deputed by his superior officer to arrest someone concerned in a cognizable offence and not acting independently, cannot arrest without complying with the formalities mentioned in s 55 . An arrest made without complying with the provisions of s 55, CrPC is illegal and the custody of the person's arrest is not lawful.[33] But it is otherwise if the police officer making the arrest has independent information of the offence and has power to arrest under s 41, CrPC .[34]

Custody need not be of Police

A village chaukidar is not a police officer within the meaning of s 41, CrPC and is not entitled to arrest as a police officer under that section.[35] To support a conviction under this section, it is not necessary that the custody from which the offender is rescued should be that of a policeman, it is enough that the custody is one which is authorised by law.[36] Rescue from the custody of a private person who had arrested a thief in the act of stealing is an offence under this section.[37] But under s 43, CrPC, a private person can arrest only a person who, in his view, that is, in the sight or presence, commits a non-bailable cognizable offence, or is a proclaimed offender. If the person arrested is not a proclaimed offender and has committed no offence in the presence of the private person arresting him, the arrest is illegal and a charge of rescuing him from lawful custody cannot be sustained.[38]1709

Under s 43, CrPC where a private person arrested an offender, he must, without delay, make over the person so arrested to a police officer or take him to the nearest police station.

A, a private person arrested B, who was alleged to have committed theft, but not in A's presence, and handed him over to C, a village chaukidar for custody. D rescued him therefrom. It was held that D did not commit an offence since the village chaukidar was not a 'police officer within the meaning of s 59 of the CrPC 1898,[39] then in force.

Under s 129(2), CrPC a police officer dispersing an unlawful assembly, is fully competent to arrest any member of the unlawful assembly, and a person rescuing the person so apprehended is liable under this section.[40]

11. Offence

An offence denotes a thing punishable under the IPC or any special or local law.[41] An escapee from a custody, when being taken before a magistrate for the purpose of being bound over to be of good behaviour, is not punishable under either s 224 or s 225 .[42]

12. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable if it falls under the first paragraph of the section. The offence falling under the other paragraphs is non-bailable. It is not compoundable.[43] The cognizance of the offence falling under paragraphs one and two of this section can be taken within three years from the date of the offence while there is no period of limitation for taking cognizance of the offence falling under the other paragraphs of this section.[44]

13. Jurisdiction

The offence is triable as follows:

(a) If it is under the first clause--by any magistrate;
(b) if it falls under cll (2), (3) or (4)--by a magistrate of the first class;
(c) if it falls under the last clause--by the court of session.

14. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....intentionally offered resistance (or illegal obstruction) to the lawful apprehension of AB for the offence of.....under section.....of1710 .....[or rescued (or attempted to rescue) the said AB from the custody in which the said AB was lawfully detained for the offence of.....], and that you thereby committed an offence under section 225 , clause....of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

The person who escapes from a lawful apprehension commits an offence punishable under s 224, IPC and not under this section. Where such a person was charged and convicted under this section and was not charged under s 224, his conviction was set aside and he was acquitted of the offence.[45]

15. Punishment

To convict a person of rioting, with a view to attacking the police and obstructing them in the discharge of their duties, and also to convict him of the substantive offence of so attacking and obstructing, is illegal.[46]Similarly, a person, who rescues another from lawful custody, must not be sentenced both for the illegal act of rescuing as well as of using force.[47] Where an accused is convicted under ss 225 and 353 for offences committed in the course of the same transaction and the magistrate feels that a sentence of imprisonment is necessary, the proper course for him is to inflict a sentence of imprisonment for each offence and to direct that the two sentences run concurrently.[48] But where the obstruction has not been such as to constitute a serious offence, the case does not call for heavy punishment.[49] Where the accused persons, convicted under this section, were young boys of 18 years, a sentence of one and a half years was held severe and it was reduced to a rigorous imprisonment of six months only.[50] But the persons who manhandle a public servant in discharging his duty, and secure the release of a person from lawful apprehension, can plead no circumstance in extenuation.[51] In a case falling under this section, it is wrong in principle to take recourse to the provisions of the Probation of Offenders Act in a territory where the law and order situation is alarming.[52] After the decision of this case the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898, which was then in force, was repealed with effect from 1 April 1973 and the provisions of ss 360 and 361 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 have to be kept in view in disallowing the benefit of being a first offender in appropriate cases thereafter.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

[53][S. 225A.

Omission to apprehend, or sufferance of escape, on part of public servant, in cases not otherwise provided for.--

Whoever, being a public servant legally bound as such public servant to apprehend, or to keep in confinement, any person in any case not provided for in section 221, section 222 or section 223, or in any other law for the time being in force, omits to apprehend that person or suffers him to escape from confinement, shall be punished--1711

(a) if he does so intentionally, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both; and
(b) if he does so negligently, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section is analogous to and supplements ss 221, 222 and 223 and punishes public servants who intentionally or negligently omit to apprehend, or suffer the escape, of persons liable to be apprehended or detained in custody, in cases not provided for in those sections or in any other law for the time being in force. This being a general provision for cases not provided for elsewhere, it is necessary before it is applied, to see that there is no other specific provision, in this Code or elsewhere, applicable to the case.

Chapter IV (General Exception), ch V (of Abetment) and ch XXIII (of Attempts to Commit Offences) apply to ss 225A and 225B [54] also.

2. Legislative Changes

Section 225A which was first inserted in the IPC by s 9 of the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act 27 of 1870, ran as follows:

> Whoever escapes or attempts to escape, from any custody in which he is lawfully detained for failing, under the Code of Criminal Procedure, to furnish security for good behaviour, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

It was intended to supplement the provisions of s 224, which extend only to resistance to, or escape from custody for an offence under the IPC, and not to custody under s 123, CrPC for failing to furnish security for good behaviour.

By s 24 of the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 10 of 1886, it was substituted by the present s 225A and the old section was absorbed in the newly inserted s 225B .

3. 'Public Servant'--Meaning of

Section 21 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

4. 'Legally Bound'--Meaning of Notes to ss 43 and 223 may be referred to.

5. 'Confinement'--Meaning of Section 41 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 is independent of ch VIII of the IPC, although proceedings under that chapter may follow an arrest under s 41 as a1712 natural sequence. An officer in charge of a police station can, therefore, arrest or cause to be arrested, without a warrant or order of a magistrate, any person who is by repute a habitual robber, house-breaker or thief, or otherwise comes within the scope of s 110 .[55] And where such a person is arrested, without a warrant or order of a magistrate, the confinement of that person is legal custody within the meaning of s 225A .[56]

6. 'Negligently'--Meaning of

Where a person properly arrested is confined in a room, an omission to secure the door of the room, thereby allowing the prisoner to escape from custody, amounts to negligence.[57]

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is not cognizable. If the offence is under cl (a) a warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance and if it is under cl (b), a summons will issue. The offence is bailable but not compoundable. An offence under cl (a) is triable by a magistrate of the first class and the one under cl (b) is triable by any magistrate.[58] The period of limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

8. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....being a public servant legally bound as such public servant to apprehend (or to keep in confinement) one AB intentionally (or negligently) omitted to apprehend the said AB (or suffered the said AB to escape from confinement) and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 225A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried (by this court) on the said charge.

9. Proof

In order to establish an offence under this section the prosecution has to prove:

(a) that the accused was a public servant;
(b) that he was legally bound to apprehend, or keep in confinement, the person in question;
(c) that he omitted to apprehend that person, or suffered him to escape from confinements;
(d) that he did so intentionally [or negligently for cl (b)];
(e) that the offence does not fall under ss 221, 222 or 223 or any other law for the time being in force.1713

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

[59][S. 225B.

Resistance or obstruction to lawful apprehension, or escape or rescue, in cases not otherwise provided for.--

Whoever, in any case not provided for in section 224 or section 225 or in any other law for the time being in force, intentionally offers any resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of himself or of any other person, or escapes or attempts to escape from any custody in which he is lawfully detained, or rescues or attempts to rescue any other person from any custody in which that person is lawfully detained, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section is analogous to, and supplements ss 224 and 225 . It applies to cases not provided for in ss 224 and 225 . It was added in order to fill up the lacuna referred to in Empress v Shasti Churn Napit [60] and Queen-Empress v Kandhaia ,[61] in which it was held that an escape from custody, when being taken before a magistrate for the purpose of being bound over to be of good behaviour, is not punishable under either s 224, or s 225 of the IPC . Now a person, who escapes from police custody while proceedings under s 109, CrPC are pending against him, commits an offence under this section and not under s 224 .[62] This section penalises not only the resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of oneself, but also that of another. So also it penalises not only the escape from lawful custody but also the rescue of another from such custody.

The gist of the offence under this section is a resistance or obstruction to a lawful apprehension or an escape or rescue from a lawful custody or an attempt to secure1714 such an escape or rescue. For a forcible escape from the custody of a process-server to amount to an offences under this section, two prerequisites must be satisfied and they are: (a) that the process-server had the legal authority to arrest the accused and (b) that the warrant on the authority of which he was making the arrest had been legally issued by a competent authority.[63]

2. Legislative Changes

This section was inserted in the IPC by s 24 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 10 of 1886, and absorbs the old s 225A which was originally inserted in the Code by s 9 of the Indian Penal Code Amendment, Act 27 of 1870, and s 65 of the old Civil Procedure Code, which provided for a resistance to apprehension and an escape from custody in the execution of a process issued by a civil court.

3. Section 225 Distinguished From Sections 130 and 225B

Commentary under same heading in s 225, ante may be referred to.

4. Meaning of Intentional Resistance

The meaning of the word 'illegal' has been discussed in s 43 . An offence under this section is committed only when the resistance to arrest is intentional, and that can only be when the person who makes the resistance knows that he is being, or is about to be arrested.[64]

Mere Evasion of Arrest not enough--Some Overt Act Necessary

To constitute the offence of intentionally offering resistance or illegal obstruction to the lawful apprehension of himself, something more than mere absconding is required; there must be an overt act of resistance or obstruction, some active opposition by the use or show of force.[65]

Merely running away into the house to avoid his arrest in execution of a civil court's warrant could not be regarded as a resistance or obstruction.[66] Something more than an evasion of arrest or a mere assertion by the person sought to be arrested that he would not like to be arrested or that a fight would be the result of such an arrest, is required to constitute an offence under this section.[67] A person who intentionally resists or illegally obstructs a police officer in the apprehension of a deserter from the Army or rescues or attempts to rescue him from the custody of such officer, is guilty of an offence punishable under this section.[68]

Resistance to Arrest by Choukidar

It may seem anomalous that while the law punishes a person who absconds in order to avoid being served with a summons, notice or order, there should be no provision for punishing one who absconds to avoid arrest under a warrant. But in the latter1715 case, the law provides certain coercive procedures which may be followed in the alternative and hence, the recalcitrant does not enjoy impunity. In the case of a warrant issued by a criminal court, there is the coercive procedure by proclamation and attachment, under ss 82 and 83, CrPC .[69] An arrest by a choukidar under s 55, CrPC, in pursuance of a written order from an officer in charge of a police station, is legal; and its resistance is an offence under this section.[70]

5. 'Lawful Apprehension'--Meaning of

In order to constitute an offence under this section, the apprehension and detention must be lawful, that is to say, the warrant on which the arrest was made and detention was ordered must satisfy all the due formalities of law. It does not matter whether that apprehension was not made out, or attempted to be, in good faith.[71] The statutory rules which involve penal consequences for infringement must be strictly interpreted, and it is the duty of the prosecution to prove all the essential ingredients that constitute the offence.[72] It must be shown that the process-server had legal authority to make the arrest, and the warrant of arrest on the authority of which he was making the arrest was legally issued by a competent authority.[73]

Failure of Charge does not effect Validity of Apprehension

The person from whose custody the rescue is effected or escape made, must have authority to lawfully detain the person rescued. If the apprehension or detention is not lawful, then his own escaping as well as the rescuing of such a person by others, is no offence.[74] But where a person, authorised to make an apprehension makes one, such an apprehension, if it is otherwise within the power and authority of the person making it, does not become unlawful by reason of the failure of the charge for which the apprehension was made or attempted.[75]

Arrest--Requirements of

An arrest is a restraint of the liberty of the person and unless there is a submission, an actual contact is necessary to effect it. There must be a touch or confinement or else an acquiescence. Mere words cannot constitute an arrest.[76] An arrest under a civil process is not effected unless either the person to be arrested submits to the arrest or the officer making the arrest actually touches or confines the body of the person to be1716 arrested. A request to the judgment-debtor by the amin to accompany him to the court is not an arrest as required by law, where the judgment-debtor is not informed that he is being put under an arrest.[77]

6. Resistance to Improper Warrant

Resistance or obstruction to the apprehension of a person is made punishable only if the apprehension was 'lawful', but where the imposition of a tax, for the non-payment of which warrants are issued, is itself illegal and ultra vires, the resistance to their execution cannot be punishable.[78]

Similarly, a warrant of arrest issued by a magistrate who neglects to record his reasons for issuing the same, as required by s 87 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, is illegal and a person rescuing a witness arrested on such a warrant is not guilty of an offence under the section.[79]

A warrant of arrest which contains a wrong description of the accused, or is not addressed to the person attempting to execute it, is not a valid warrant, and a conviction under ss 225B and 358, of the accused, who resisted or used criminal force upon his being arrested under such warrant, is illegal.[80]

Where a warrant does not contain the name of the person to be apprehended, the apprehension is not lawful within the meaning of this section.[81] Under s 70, CrPC every warrant must bear the seal of the court. Omission of the seal on a warrant renders it void, and a person offering resistance to apprehension under such a warrant does not commit an offence under this section.[82]

Where the warrant of arrest is signed by the deputy nazir, who had not been empowered legally or given any lawful authority to sign warrants, the fact that it had been the practice for a considerable time for such warrants to be signed by the deputy nazir cannot make the signing of them by that officer legal, in the absence of due authorisation, and resistance to such a warrant is not an offence under this section.[83]

Where a warrant of arrest was signed by the sheristadar of a civil court, duly authorised to sign them, the judgment-debtor resisting its execution would be guilty of an offence under this section. But it cannot be presumed from the mere fact of the sheristadar signing such warrant that he had been duly appointed to sign warrants. Evidence of the fact of appointment should be given.[84] Even if a notice as well as a1717 warrant for the arrest of the judgment--debtor were issued simultaneously by the executing court, the apprehension of the judgment-debtor by the peon executing the warrant of arrest is a lawful apprehension, however mistaken the executing court may have been in exercising its discretion to direct that apprehension, and escape from and obstruction to that apprehension are unlawful acts under this section.[85]

The powers given by s 1 of the CrPC, to the police officer to arrest without a warrant, are only in respect of cognizable offences. If the person arrested is a child under seven years of age, who under s 82 of the IPC cannot commit an offence, it is difficult to see how such an arrest can be a lawful apprehension within the meaning of this section.[86]

7. Resistance to Arrest without Notifying Substance of Warrant

An arrest by a police officer, acting under a warrant, who does not notify the substance of the warrant to the person to be arrested, is not a lawful arrest, and resistance to such arrest is not an offence under this section.[87] An officer armed with a warrant of arrest should produce the warrant before the person sought to be arrested and make an attempt to arrest him, and if the officer is in fact resisted, then the person sought to be arrested would be guilty of an offence under this section.[88]

8. Bailiff to Show Warrant to Person Arrested

It is not necessary that a bailiff, executing a civil court warrant, should in the first instance show the warrant. It is sufficient that he should apprise the person to be arrested of the contents of the warrant and show it, if desired. If the warrant is not shown to the person to be arrested, nor the contents thereof appraised to him before or at the time of arrest, there is no lawful arrest and as such a resistance does not amount to an offence under this section.[89]

9. 'Escape'--Meaning of

A man legally arrested for an offence must submit to be tried and dealt with according to law. If he gains his liberty before he is delivered by the course of law, he commits the offence of escape. It has been long established that even when the escape is effected by the consent or the neglect of the person that kept the prisoner in custody, the latter is no less guilty, as neither such illegal consent nor neglect absolves the prisoner from the duty of submitting to the judgment of the law.[90]

What amounts to an attempt to Escape

Where the offence is under the first part of the section, there must be an overt act of resistance or obstruction.[91] But for an offence under the second part, once a man has1718 been apprehended and he effects an escape, it is immaterial whether at the time of apprehension, he used any force or not and whether the bailiff was actually present or temporarily absent. What has to be considered is whether he escaped or attempted to escape. What amounts to an attempt to escape is a matter of inference. Where the action of the accused person is passive and consists of either standing still or sitting down, it is impossible to hold that an attempt to escape has begun.[92]

Escape when not Charged with or Convicted of any Offence etc

When the person who escapes or attempts to escape has not been charged with or convicted of an offence and has not been detained for any offence, his conviction should be under this section and not under s 224 . Where a person escapes from a jail in which he was confined under a warrant, by reason of his having failed to find security to be of good behaviour, he commits an offence under this section.[93]

Where a tahsildar issued a warrant under s 146 of the Uttar Pradesh Land Revenue Act, against certain defaulting co-sharers, and they were arrested but subsequently they escaped from detention, it was held that this was an escape from lawful custody within the meaning of this section.[94]

A person escaping from police custody while proceeding under s 109, CrPC are being taken against him, commits an offence under this section and not under s 224 of the Indian Penal Code .[95]

Commentary under s 224 may be referred to.

10. There can be no custody without arrest

What the section penalises is an escape or an attempt to escape from custody, and there can be no custody if there was no arrest. An arrest under a civil process is not effected unless either the person to be arrested submits to the arrest or the officer making the arrest actually touches or confines the body of the person to be arrested. A mere request by the amin or process-server to the accused, who is to be arrested, to accompany him to the court, does not amount to an arrest in the absence of any evidence to show that the amin had informed the accused that he was being arrested and that he submitted to the arrest or that the amin in fact touched the body of that accused to evidence the fact of arrest.[96]

Custody to be Lawful

This section requires that the custody from which a man tries to escape must be a lawful custody, he must have been lawfully arrested and detained; then only he is liable to conviction under this section.[97]1719

If a person, who is not under lawful custody or lawful detention, escapes from such detention, he commits no offence.[1]

The person from whose custody the rescue is effected or escape made, must have an authority to lawfully detain the person rescued, otherwise no offence is committed in effecting the rescue.[2]

Right of the Person Sought to be Arrested

A person about to be arrested is entitled to know under what power the constable is arresting him, and if he specifies a certain power, which he knows that the constable has not got, he is entitled to object to such arrest and escape from custody, such custody not being a lawful one.[3]

Where an inspector of police catches hold of the wrist of the accused without informing him for what offence he was being arrested, the accused wrenching himself free is not guilty of any offence under the Indian Penal Code .[4]

Sections 41 , 42, 43, 49, 50A, 56, 57 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973[5] may be referred to.

Delegation of Power to Sign Warrant

When a district munsif passes a general order that all warrants of arrest ordered by the court should thereafter be signed by the head clerk of his office, the delegation of the power to sign the warrants is made by the court, and not by the district munsif personally, and the delegation is made to the head clerk and to any particular or one time head clerk. A warrant of arrest ordered by the successor of the district munsif and signed by the person holding the office of the head clerk at the time, is a valid warrant and a person arrested under the warrant, and escaping from custody is liable under this section.[6] A civil court is not empowered to have a judgment-debtor in custody of a peon after giving him time to pay up a decretal amount, and if he does so, detention in the custody of the peon is not lawful within the meaning of this section, so that escape from such custody is no offence.[7]

Opportunity for Furnishing Fresh Security Necessary

Where a surety giving security under O 38, r 1, CPC applies to be discharged, the court shall, under O 38, r 3, 'direct the surety to be discharged from his obligation, and shall call upon the defendant to find fresh security'. If without directing him to1720 find fresh security, the defendant is arrested and detained, the detention is illegal, and he cannot be convicted under this section for escaping from the custody.[8]

A warrant must be issued to some person for execution; and where no name or description of that person is given in the warrant, the person arrested can have no knowledge that the persons who present the warrant, are legally authorised to do so. It may be that the person who is arrested is unable to read the warrant and has no knowledge as to whether the warrant is or is not properly filled up, but it is the duty of the court to issue a warrant in proper form, and where a warrant is incomplete, it has been held by more than one High Court, that the subsequent release (escape or rescue) of a person arrested under such a warrant is not an offence under this section.[9]

Endorsement on Warrant when Necessary

A warrant had been issued to the nazir, and the nazir, without any endorsement, made it over to a subordinate official. It was held that the warrant was defective and did not authorise the person who directed the peon to make the arrest, and that accordingly, an escape from custody in such a case was no offence.[10]

11. Rescue

For the definition of 'rescue', the commentary under s 225 may be referred to.

Rescue indicates Some Overt Act

'Rescuing' indicates some positive overt act on the part of the accused by which the liberation of the person arrested is effected. Whether there is any such act done by the accused in a particular case would depend on the facts of each case. When the accused escaped on the instigation of another, it amounts to an abetment of escape punishable under this section, read with s 109 .[11] The person from whose custody the rescue is effected or escape made must have authority to lawfully detain the person rescued.[12]

Lawful Custody Necessary

It is not illegal for a magistrate to issue a warrant under s 97, CrPC without confining it to any particular place. But an officer to whom a warrant for searching a person at a particular place is directed, has no power to make a search outside that place and take the person into custody from a different place. If he does so, the custody is illegal and rescue from such custody is not an offence under this section.[13] A search warrant was issued to a police officer to search a house of a particular person to find out a woman who was alleged to be unlawfully detained. She was not found in that house, but was found in a field and was taken custody of. The accused rescued her1721 from police custody. It was held that the search not being in accordance with the warrant, the accused could not be convicted under this section as they did not rescue the woman from lawful custody within the meaning of this section.[14]

Under s 74 of the CrPC, a warrant directed to a police may be executed only by him or by another police officer whose name is endorsed upon the warrant by the officer to whom it is directed or endorsed, and not by any other person. When a warrant of arrest is directed to a court sub-inspector for execution, a court head constable cannot, in his absence, by an order in writing signed by himself, endorse such warrant over to any process-serving peon for execution. If such peon is obstructed in its execution, a conviction under s 225B, IPC will not stand.[15] A person in lawful custody cannot rescue himself and hence, he cannot be convicted for rescuing himself from lawful custody.[16]

12. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable. A warrant may ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It can be tried by any magistrate. The period of limitation prescribed for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is one year.

13. Complaint

Sections 195 and 340, CrPC have no application to an offence under this section. In a case under this section, the proper person to make the complaint is the officer from whom the escape or rescue has been effected, but a complaint by another person aware of the facts is not a nullity.[17] Every person including the presiding officer of a court has power to make a complaint as a rule.[18] The High Court did not interfere, in revision, with an order of acquittal passed by a magistrate of competent jurisdiction, on a prosecution for an alleged offence under this section, irregularly instituted on a report sent in by the munsif, which was treated as a complaint.[19]

14. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of the magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That on or about the.....day of.....you.....intentionally offered resistance (or illegal obstruction) to the lawful apprehension by.....of yourself (or ofAB), [or escaped from the custody of.....in which you were lawfully detained (or rescued (or attempted to rescue) one AB from the custody of.....in which the said AB was then lawfully detained)], and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 225B of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.1722

15. Proof

In the case of resistance or illegal obstruction, the prosecution must prove:

(a) that there was an attempt to lawfully apprehend the accused or another person;
(b) that the accused offered resistance or illegal obstruction to such apprehension;
(c) that he did so intentionally; and
(d) that the case is not provided for in s 224 or s 225, IPC or in any other law for the time being in force.

In the case of escape or attempt to escape, the prosecution has to prove

(a) that the accused was lawfully detained in custody;

(b) that he intentionally escaped, or attempted to escape, from such custody; and
(c) that the case is not provided for in s 224 or s 225, IPC or in any other law for the time being in force.

In the case of rescue or attempt to rescue, the prosecution should prove:

(a) that a certain person was lawfully detained in custody;
(b) that the accused intentionally rescued or attempted to rescue that person from such custody; and
(c) that the case is not provided for in s 224 or s 225, IPC or in any other law for the time being in force.

16. Onus

The onus to show that the accused is the person against whom the warrant was issued is on the prosecution. It is not for the accused to show that he is not the person against whom the warrant was issued.[20]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 227.

Violation of condition of remission of punishment.--

Whoever, having accepted any conditional remission of punishment, knowingly violates any condition on which such remission was granted, shall be punished with the punishment to which he was originally sentenced, if he has already suffered no part of that punishment, and if he has suffered any part of that punishment, then with so much of that punishment as he has not already suffered.1723

Comments

1. Scope

As Breadt observed, this section deals with the violation of any condition of a remission of punishment. Sub-section (3) of s 432, CrPC also provides for such a violation. Under that sub-section, the effect of the violation is that the appropriate government may cancel the remission, and thereupon the person in whose favour the sentence was remitted may, if at large, be arrested without warrant and remanded to undergo the unexpired portion of the sentence. This is all that this section also provides for. It does not provide any punishment for the violation in addition to the punishment to which the person violating was originally sentenced. The effect of the section is only to cancel the remission, so that the original sentence which was remitted may be carried out.[22]

To this extent this section and s 432, CrPC may appear to overlap each other. But the latter only lays down the procedure to be followed on a violation of any condition of remission. It provides only for the cancellation of the remission, but a mere cancellation of the remission cannot revive the sentence remitted, and there is no sentence to undergo, which the person violating may be remanded to under the latter part of sub-s (3) of s 432, CrPC . This is why this section is enacted as a piece of substantive law, enabling the court to re-impose the unexpired portion of the original sentence as a punishment for the violation. No such difficulty arises with regard to a suspension of sentence. And that is why this section deals only with the remission of sentence, whereas s 432, CrPC deals with both suspension and remission of sentence.

Articles 72 and 161 of the Constitution also provide for a remission of punishment, and such remission may be on condition. There seems to be no reason why this section should not apply to the violation of the conditions of such remission.

Section 360 of the CrPC provides for the release of certain offenders on probation of good conduct, instead of sentencing them to punishment, and sub-ss (8) and (9) of that section provide that if the offender so released violates any condition of his re cognizance, the court which convicted him, may order his arrest, and after hearing the case, pass a sentence on him. But the release on probation is not a remission of sentence and so this section can have no application to it.

2. Analogous Law

This section deals with the violation of the conditions of a remission of punishment. There is a similar provision in s 432(1) -(6) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, which runs as follows:1724

S. 432 . Power to suspend or remit sentences.--

(1) When any person has been sentenced to punishment for an offence, the appropriate government may, at any time, without conditions or upon any conditions which the person sentenced accepts, suspend the execution of his sentence or remit the whole or any part of the punishment to which he has been sentenced.

(2) Whenever an application is made to the appropriate Government for the suspension or remission of a sentence, the appropriate Government may require the presiding Judge of the Court before or by which the conviction was had or confirmed, to state his opinion as to whether the application should be granted or refused, together with his reasons for such opinion and also to forward with the statement of such opinion a certified copy of the record of the trial or of such record thereof as exists.

(3) If any condition on which a sentence has been suspended or remitted is, in the opinion of the appropriate Government, not fulfilled, the appropriate Government may cancel the suspension or remission, and thereupon the person in whose favour the sentence has been suspended or remitted may, if at large, be arrested by any police officer, without warrant and remanded to undergo the unexpired portion of the sentence.

(4) The condition on which a sentence is suspended or remitted under this section may be one to be fulfilled by the person in whose favour the sentence is suspended or remitted, or one independent of his will.

(5) The appropriate Government may, by general rules or special orders, give directions as to the suspension of sentences and the conditions on which petitions should be presented and dealt with:

Provided that in the case of any sentence (other than a sentence of fine) passed on a male person above the age of eighteen years, no such petition by the person sentenced or by any other person on his behalf shall be entertained, unless the person sentenced is in jail, and--

(a) where such petition is made by the person sentenced, it is presented through the officer in charge of the jail; or

(b) where such petition is made by any other person, it contains a declaration that the person sentenced is in jail.

(6) The provisions of the above sub-sections shall also apply to any order passed by a Criminal Court under any section of this Code or of any other law which restricts the liberty of any person or imposes any liability upon him or his property.

Section 432, CrPC gives the power of remission to the central and state governments, arts 72 and 161 of the Indian Constitution also give the power of remission to the President of the Union and the governors of states respectively. There is no mention of any conditional remission in these articles, but it has been held that the power to suspend a sentence would include the power to attach lawful conditions to it,[23] and so the power to remit a sentence must be taken to include the power to attach conditions to it.

3. Section 227 , IPC Distinguished from Section 432(3) , CrPC

While s 432(3) of the Code of Criminal Procedure envisages the arrest of a person who violates the conditions of a remission and remand him straightway to jail, s 227 of the Indian Penal Code also envisages the same act of violation of conditions,1725 prosecution and punishment. If the prosecution succeeds the result is the same as the consequence contemplated under s 432(3), CrPC, namely remanding of the person concerned to jail for the rest of his term. In one case, the person is subjected to an executive handling resulting in his being sent to jail, and in the other he has a trial in a criminal court and he is sent to the jail for an identical period, but only if he is found guilty. On the other hand, there is a fair trial in a court, and in the other, there is not even an executive trial. Whether the provisions of s 432(3), CrPC can operate in such circumstances, is a question for serious deliberation. It cannot be that a person is subjected to a prosecution under s 227 of the IPC and simultaneously action is taken against him under s 432(3), CrPC . That would make no sense, however, if it is not cumulative but alternative. To choose between an action under this Code and an executive action under the CrPC would lead to an arbitrary choice which may result in a violation of art 14 of the Constitution . It is difficult to reconcile these provisions. That process is none too easy.[24]

4. Remission of Punishment

A remission is a reduction in the amount of a sentence, without changing its character. In the case of a remission, the guilt of the offender is not affected, nor is the sentence of the court affected, except in the sense that the person concerned does not suffer incarceration for the entire period of the sentence, but is relieved from serving out a part of it.[25]

5. Remission and Suspension are not the Same

Remission should not be confused with suspension. Suspension clearly means that the sentence has not been remitted and it is only kept in abeyance at the pleasure of the person who is authorised to suspend the sentence, and if no conditions are imposed, then the state government has the right to have the accused person re-arrested and direct that he should undergo the rest of the sentence without assigning any reason.

Even a suspension of sentence without any condition, does not amount to a remission of sentence.[26]

6. 'Knowingly Violates any Condition'

In order to make out an offence under this section, it must be proved not only that the accused was granted a conditional remission of punishment, that he accepted the conditions of the remission, and that he violated one or more of those conditions, but also that he did so 'knowingly'. If the conditions are clear and unambiguous, and he violates any of them, he may be considered to have done so knowingly. But if the conditions are vague or ambiguous, the question whether the accused violated them 'knowingly' would be a matter of inference from the nature of the conditions, the status of the accused and the circumstance of the violation.

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and triable by the court by which the original offence was triable.[27] In case an accused,1726 convicted of theft and sentenced to a rigorous imprisonment for six months by the judicial magistrate sadar at Allahabad, after undergoing imprisonment for a month only, was granted remission on certain conditions and was released but commits the breach of those conditions at Kanpur then, he is to be tried for committing the offence under this section by the judicial magistrate sadar, Allahabad or at any other place, where breach of the condition of remission is committed, and the breach being proved he can be sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for five months.

The provisions of limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section will be the same as were applicable to the original offence and have to be determined with the aid of s 468, CrPC .

8. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....were convicted in case No.....of.....by the court of.....and sentenced to.....(mention the punishment) and which punishment was remitted on.....by the order of.....on the condition, to wit.....and which you accepted and which you knowingly violated in that on or about the.....day of.....you.....(state the nature of the violation), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 227 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Proof

In a case under this section, it is necessary to prove the following:

(a) the accused person had been convicted and sentenced; (the conviction and its date and the sentence passed should, under ch V, Evidence Act, be proved by documentary evidence, ie, by judgment in the case, the judgment being a public document, it may, under s 65(e), Evidence Act, be proved by a certified copy; but oral evidence to prove it is not admissible);
(b) the accused person was granted a remission of punishment, on his accepting certain conditions; (again this must be proved by documentary evidence, that is, by the order granting the remission. Here also a certified copy of the order is admissible, but no other form of secondary evidence);
(c) the conditions on which the remission was granted; (this again is provable only as above, ie by a certified copy of the order of remission. The bond executed by the accused should also be put in, or a certified copy of it.)
(d) the fact that the accused is the person convicted, sentenced and granted remission must be proved (for this oral evidence is admissible); and
(e) the fact that the accused has knowingly committed a breach of a condition of the remission. (This may also be proved by oral evidence, but obviously no breach can be proved until the condition itself has been proved as set out in head (c) above).[28]1727

It is for the court to decide whether a conditionally released prisoner has violated the conditions on which remission was granted to him or not. Until he has been found guilty under this section, it is not for the jail authorities to say that he has committed an offence.[29]

22 Section 2 of Burma Act, 3 of 1928 which provides that 'whoever is convicted of absconding in violation of a condition of a remission of punishment under s 227, Penal Code, shall in addition to the punishment prescribed by that section, be punished by the convicting magistrate with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year'.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 228.

Intentional insult or interruption to public servant sitting in judicial proceeding.--

Whoever, intentionally offers any insult, or causes any interruption to any public servant, while such public servant is sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.1728

Comments

1. Scope

Chapter X of IPC deals with contempt of the lawful authority of public servants in general, whether judicial officers or not. This section, which is contained in ch XI, dealing with offences against public justice, contemplates cases of contempt of court occurring in the presence of the court by insulting the officer or interrupting the business of the court.[30] This is the only section of the Indian Penal Code which specifically deals with contempts committed against a judicial officer, that is to say, a court.[31] But as pointed out by the Supreme Court in Bathina Rama Krishna Reddy v State of Madras ,[32] offences under ss 175, 178, 179 and 180 may also, IPC, as s 480 of old CrPC 1898 (new s 345 of the CrPC 1973), shows, amount to contempt of court if the 'public servant' referred to in these sections happens to be a judicial officer in a particular case. The expression 'contempt of court' has not been used as a description of any offence in the Indian Penal Code, though certain acts which would be punishable as contempt of court in England, are made offences under it. It is well known that the aim of the contempt proceedings is 'to deter men from offering any indignities to a court of justice'. And an essential feature of the proceeding is the exercise of a summary power by the court itself in regard to the delinquent. Thus, s 345 of the CrPC 1973 empowers any civil, criminal or revenue court to punish summarily, a person who is found guilty of committing any offence under ss 175, 178, 179, 180 or 228 of the IPC, in the view or presence of the court.

2. Analogous Law

Somewhat similar provisions, with some wider scope, appear in s 345 of the CrPC 1973, which provides that when such offence (as described in s 228, IPC) is committed in the view and presence of any civil, criminal or revenue court, the offender may be punished by that very court the same day. In such a case, the maximum sentence that can be inflicted is a fine of Rs 200, and in default of the payment of the fine, the offender can be sentenced to a simple imprisonment extending to one month. The court itself acts as a prosecutor under s 345, CrPC .

3. Object

The gravity of the offence under this section is clear from the fact that the court, in such cases, has been given the extraordinary power of being the complainant, the prosecutor and the judge. The legislature has thus manifested its anxiety to maintain and uphold the dignity and prestige of the courts of justice.[33] Such a summary jurisdiction for contempt is essential to the proper administration of justice, and it is exercised not from any exaggerated notion of personal dignity, but to prevent instances of indecorum occurring in courts.[34]1729

4. Averments Scandalising the Court are Beyond the Scope of this Section

If the averments go beyond and scandalise the court itself, and further impair the administration of justice, they amount to a contempt of court, and not merely to an offence under this section.[35] What is punishable under s 228, IPC, is an intentional insult or interruption to any public servant, and not a contempt of court. If the act complained of, in addition to insulting a judge, also scandalises the court or lowers the authority of the court, it can be punished as a criminal contempt. Section 228 gives remedy to an aggrieved judge as an individual. The contempt of court is not personal to the judge. It is a wrong done to the public.[36]

5. Criminal Contempt--Object of

The object of a contempt proceeding is therefore, not to afford protection to judges personally, from imputations to which they may be exposed to as individuals; it is intended to be a protection to the public, whose interests would be very much affected, if by the act or conduct of any party, the authority of the court is lowered and the sense of confidence which people have in the administration of justice by it, is weakened.[37]

6. Scandalising the Court--What is?

There are indeed innumerable ways by which attempts can be made to hinder or obstruct the due administration of justice in courts. One type of such interference is found in cases where there is an act or publication which amounts to scandalising the court itself. This scandalising might manifest itself in various ways, but, in substance, it is an attack on the individual judges, or the court as a whole, with or without reference to particular cases, casting unwarranted and defamatory aspersions upon the character or ability of the judges. Such conduct is punished as contempt for the reason that it tends to create a distrust in the popular mind and impair the confidence of people in the courts, which are of prime importance to litigants, for the protection of their rights and liberties. When attacks or comments are made on a judge or judges, which are disparaging in character and derogatory to their dignity, care should be taken to distinguish between what is a libel on the judge and what amounts really to a contempt of court. The fact that a statement is defamatory so far as the judge is concerned, it does not necessarily make it a contempt. A defamatory attack on a judge may be a libel, so far as the judge is concerned and it would be open to him to proceed against the libellor in a proper action if he so chooses. If, however, the publication of the disparaging statement is calculated to interfere with the due course of justice or the proper administration of law by such court, it can be punished summarily as contempt. One is a wrong done to the judge personally, while the other is a wrong done to the public. It will be an injury to the public if it tends to create an apprehension in the minds of the people regarding the integrity, ability or fairness of the judge, or to deter actual and prospective litigants from placing complete reliance1730 upon the court's administration of justice, or if it is likely to cause embarrassment in the mind of the judge himself in the discharge of his judicial duties.[38]

7. Section 228 and Contempt of Court--Distinction

What is made punishable under s 228, IPC is the offence of intentional insult to a judge or interruption of court proceedings but not as a contempt of court. The definition of criminal contempt is wide enough to include any act by a person which would either scandalise the court or which would tend to interfere with the administration of justice. It would also include any act which lowers the authority of the court or prejudices or interferes with the due course of any judicial proceeding. It is not limited to the offering of intentional insult to the judge or interruption of the judicial proceedings.[39]

8. Powers to be Used in Exceptional Cases

The power conferred under this section, would be used only in exceptional cases. The courts, taking action under this section, ought not to give room for the impression that they are unduly sensitive about their dignity. Proceedings under this section on trivial matters will have a tendency to interfere with the proper administration of justice, as they would put the party in fear of possible summary punishment for acts which may be innocently committed.[40]

Section 2(a) of the Contempt of Courts Act 1971 defines 'contempt of court'. Clauses (b) and (c) of s 2 define 'civil contempt' and 'criminal contempt' respectively. Section 10 of the 1971 Act, which corresponds to s 3 of the Contempt of Courts Act 1952, states that every High Court shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction, powers and authority, in accordance with the same procedure and practice, in respect of contempts of courts subordinate to it, as it has and exercises in respect of contempts of itself. The proviso to s 10 of the 1971 Act provides that no High Court shall take cognizance of a contempt alleged to have been committed in respect of a court subordinate to it, where such contempt is an offence punishable under the Indian Penal Code .

The words 'where such contempt is an offence' as used in the proviso to s 10 of the Contempt of Court Act 1971, came for interpretation before the Supreme Court in some cases and it has been held that the proviso excludes the jurisdiction of the High Court only in cases where the acts alleged to constitute a contempt of a subordinate court, are punishable as contempt under the specific provisions of the Indian Penal Code, but not where these acts merely amount to offences of other description for which punishment has been provided for in the Indian Penal Code .[41] In another case the Supreme Court observed:

> The true test is: Is the act complained of an offence under section 228 , Indian Penal Code, or is it something more than that? If in its true nature and effect, the act1731 complained of is really 'scandalising the court' rather than a mere insult then....the jurisdiction of the High Court is not ousted.[42]

Where an act is not punishable as a contempt of court under the provisions of this Code, or for any technical reason (eg for want of intention), the act does not fall under this section and the proviso to s 10 of the Contempt of Courts Act has no application.[43] In such cases, the jurisdiction of a High Court to take an action under s 10 of the Contempt of Courts Act, is not ousted.

Where the offence of contempt was committed when the matter was before the session court and the same was covered by the provisions of s 228, IPC, the session court made a reference of contempt of court to the High Court under sub-s (2) of s 15 of the Contempt of Courts Act 1971. The High Court sent back the reference to the session court concerned, for taking action under s 228, IPC against the contemnor, as the session court had full jurisdiction and the subsequent closure of the case would not take away the jurisdiction of the court.

9. Courts Cannot be Compelled to give 'Command Orders'

A judicial officer of the rank of district judge was attacked in a pre-planned and calculated manner in his court room and when he tried to protect himself from physical harm by retiring to his chambers, was chased till there causing injuries to him. The raising of slogans and demanding unconditional bail for accused further compounded the offence. On three facts, it was held by the Supreme Court that the courts cannot be compelled to give 'command orders'. The act committed amounts to deliberate interference with the discharge of duty of a judicial officer by intimidation apart from scandalising and lowering the dignity of the court and interference with the administration of justice. The effect of such an act is not confined to a particular court or a district, or the State, it has the tendency to effect the entire judiciary in the country. It is a dangerous trend. Such a trend has to be curbed. If for passing judicial orders to the annoyance of the police the presiding officers of the courts are to be assaulted and humiliated the judicial system in the country would collapse.[44]

10. Essential Ingredients of Offence

The essential ingredients of the office under this section are (a) intention, (b) insult or interruption to a public servant, and (c) the public servant insulted or interrupted must be sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding.[45]

Essence of the Offence

Thus, the essence of the offence is that the offender must do something physical, namely, insult or interrupt a public servant in any stage of a judicial proceeding, but that is not enough. There is a mental part of the offence, which should also be taken into consideration, and that mental part is that the offender had the intention to cause1732 the said insult or interruption. Both these elements must co-exist in order to constitute an offence under s 228, IPC . The fact that the court feels insulted, is no reason for inferring contempt when no insult is intended. To put it in a short compass, the elements of an offence under this section are both objective and subjective. Objective in the sense that the factum or interruption must be there and subjective, because the same, has to be accompanied by an intention on the part of the offender to commit the same, and the entire thing must take place against the back-drop of a judicial proceeding.[46]

11. Section 228 , IPC and Section 345 , CrPC Distinguished

The difference between the two sections is that while s 345 of the Code of Criminal Procedure empowers a civil, criminal or revenue court to take action when an offence as described in ss 175, 178, 179, 190 or 228 of the IPC is committed in its presence, s 228 of the Indian Penal Code empowers any public servant to take action when a person intentionally offers insult or causes interruption to him, while he is sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding. Section 345 , CrPC empowers the courts referred to therein to take action not only when offence is committed under s 228 of the IPC but also under the other sections referred to therein whereas the power conferred under s 228 on a public servant is limited only to the extent that if any person offers insult or causes any interruption to him while he is sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding, he can punish such person.[47]

12. 'Intentionally Offers any Insult or Causes any Interruption'-- Meaning of

To constitute an offence under this section, the act must be done intentionally and with intent to insult the court.[48] It has been repeatedly held that the chief ingredient of the offence contemplated by this section is the intention of the offender, and that the question is not whether a judicial officer felt insulted, but whether an insult was actually offered and intended. A judicial officer is no doubt fully entitled to maintain the dignity of the court, but, as often pointed out, he should not be too sensitive and too ready to take offence where none is intended.[49] The mere fact that a judicial officer feels insulted is of no consequence. The intention of the alleged offender must be looked into. The Allahabad High Court has held that in order to render an accused liable under s 228 of the IPC, it is not merely necessary that the judicial officer felt insulted, but it has to be seen whether any insult was intended. This section makes it quite clear that the insult or interruption must be intentional. It is not enough that the work of the court was in fact interrupted.[50] If the facts and circumstances show that he intended to cause an insult or interruption, his act may amount to an offence under this section. If they show that he had no such intention, his act cannot be held to1733 amount to that offence.[51] It is, therefore, essential that a judicial officer, while exercising the extraordinary powers of convicting a person for contempt of court, must never allow his personal feelings to have any weight or importance, because those powers have been conferred on him exclusively for the purpose of supporting the dignity of his important office, and not for upholding his own vanity. A judicial office, being in sacred trust of the presiding officer, is expected never to be influenced or swayed in making its decisions in this connection, by feelings of personal retaliation. It is only by sustaining and keeping in view this high standard, that public confidence in the integrity of the courts, which is so vital to our form of government, can be maintained.[52]

Intention not to be Confused with Knowledge

Intention should not be confused with knowledge. There must be clear proof of intention to insult. The mere fact that the accused knew that such would be the consequences of his act, is not sufficient to hold him guilty of an offence under this section.[53]

Merely Uttering Words without Intending to Insult or Interrupt not an Offence

Merely uttering words, or not keeping silence, can hardly be construed as an intentional insult or interruption.[54] Where a magistrate said that the proceedings in his court were interrupted by an audible remark made by the accused, and there are no materials on which the magistrate could have come to the conclusion that the accused intended to insult him or interrupt his proceedings, it cannot be said that an offence under this section has been committed.[55]

Intention is to be Inferred from Conduct

An intention is a state of mind which has to be inferred from the conduct of a person. No extraneous evidence can possibly be led to read the state of the mind of a person. Inferences are to be drawn keeping in view the ordinary human conduct, the feelings and the working of the mind. Hurling of an abuse on an adversary, in the view and within the hearing of the presiding officer of the court, suggests an intention to insult the court. The intention, therefore, in such a case, has to be imputed to the contemner and it cannot be said that it was an innocent conduct of him, without realising the sanctity and the authority of the court.[56] A contrary view has been expressed by some High Courts and it has been held that where, however, the remark is not addressed to a court, even if it is rude or vulgar, it cannot be made the subject-matter of an offence under s 228, IPC, though the court overhears it.[57]1734

Sometimes a Direction may not Amount to an Order of Court

Where a magistrate dismissed a complaint without hearing the complainant's witnesses or his vakil and then asked the complainant to call his vakil so that he may go through the order passed, the complainant expressed surprise at this, and inquired how his complaint could be dismissed without any examination of his witnesses, and he repeated this several times; it was held that:

> whatever, that be, it is clear that after having pronounced the order of dismissal, the Magistrate lost seisin of the matter and his direction to the complainant to bring his vakil cannot be regarded as an order of the court trying the matter. It was not unnatural for the petitioner whose case had been summarily dismissed by the magistrate, without hearing his witnesses or his vakil, to have remarked that the presence of a vakil at that stage was unnecessary. Any disappointed litigant is likely to make such a statement in such circumstances > and there appears to be no justification to import any intention to insult the magistrate. After all, courts cannot be over-touchy in such matters.[58]

Where a lady litigant, who had a prolonged litigation with her husband, seemed to be very much mentally upset and made derogatory remarks to the learned magistrate, though there was no justification for such remarks against the learned magistrate the Allahabad High Court opined that it would have been better if the learned magistrate had ignored them, considering the mental state of the litigant. It was also held that often, the court should overlook even unfair, malicious and totally unjustified remarks, as the person making such remarks often wants publicity for himself and by ignoring them, the court denies him the publicity which he wants.[59] Where a witness for prosecution in a case being heard by a magistrate, had a scuffle with another person on the verandah of the court-room, it was held that the witness could have no idea whatever of intentionally insulting the magistrate and could not be held liable under this section.[60]

Aspersions in Transfer Application--Effect of

Where an accused person made an application for the transfer of a case pending against him and inserted in such application aspersions of a defamatory nature concerning the magistrate who was trying the case, it was held that there was no intention on the part of the applicant to insult the court, but the intention was merely to procure a transfer.[61]

Where the appellant prayed that he should be given a week's time for bringing a stay order from the High Court because he had no hope of getting justice from the court of the district judge, the district judge stopped dictating the judgment in the miscellaneous civil appeal, and started proceedings under s 345, CrPC, on his coming to the conclusion that this application had been moved by the appellant for blackmailing the court and with an intention of impeding the court of justice, and convicted the appellant. On an appeal before the High Court, it was held that there was absolutely no question of blackmailing the court and under the circumstances of the case, it was most natural for the appellant to infer that he would not get justice from that court. In that application he therefore, expressed his genuine feelings and,1735 therefore, there could be no intention of blackmailing the court. Such a conclusion can be said to have been drawn by the learned district judge only because he developed some prejudice against him. The conviction of the appellant was, therefore, held to be wholly unjustified.[62]

Intention to Offer Insult to be Decided on the Facts etc of each Case

In the similar case of Narotam Das v Emperor ,[63] however, York J held that there was an intention to insult the court and observed that it must be a matter for consideration in each individual case how insulting the expressions that are used are and whether there was any necessity for the applicant to make use of those expressions in the application which he was actually making to the court. But in State of Madhya Pradesh v Ravishankar ,[64] their Lordships of the Supreme Court have not accepted these tests and observed: 'Whether there is an intention to offer insult to the magistrate trying the case or not must depend on the facts and circumstances of each case and we do not consider it necessary, nor advisable to lay down any inflexible rule thereto'. Intention is an inference attaching to the words themselves, and this inference is not rebutted by any excuse as to the motive with which the accused used the words, or the object that he thought would be attained by so doing. Intention should not be confused with motive.[65]

Coming to Court Badly Drunk--Effect of

Where all that was shown against the accused was that he appeared in the court badly drunk and talked irrelevantly, and there was nothing to show that he had taken liquor of his own free will before coming to the court, it was held that it could not be presumed that he had deliberately taken liquor before coming to the court, and consequently, it could not be held that he intentionally offered insult to, or caused interruption in the court.[66]

Merely appearing in a drunken state in a court is neither offering an insult, nor causing an interruption to the presiding officer of the court. Sometimes it is seen that such like persons show more respect to the court than others who may not have taken liquor. The sine qua non of the offence is the causing of intentional insult to the court and obstruction to its proceedings. Where these essential factors of this offence are totally missing, this section is not attracted.[67]

If a counsel appears in the court drunk, without any idea of insulting the court, even if the court feels insulted by his appearing before it in that state, it cannot be said that the he has intentionally insulted it. It cannot be said that the court's feeling insulted by his appearing drunk is a natural and probable consequence of the act which must be presumed to have been intended by him. He cannot be said to have intentionally caused an interruption; there is nothing to suggest that he ever knew or thought that interruption would be caused by his appearing drunk before the court.[68]1736

Intentional Disobedience amounts to Offering Insult

An intentional disobedience of an order of the presiding officer of a court, in his presence, must lead to the conclusion that the person responsible intended, at least, to offer insult to that officer.[69]

Refusal to Vacate Seat on being Directed

In this case the petitioner, a party in a civil suit, in the court of a munsif, occupying the front seat in the court hall, declined to obey the verbal direction of the learned munsif to move out of the seat for accommodating senior lawyers then standing for want of seats. The petitioner, who was conducting his case without the aid of a counsel, persisted in claiming the right to sit at the same place. This conduct of the petitioner was treated as an intentional insult or interruption during the judicial proceedings by the munsif and, exercising his powers under s 345, CrPC, the petitioner was sentenced to a fine of Rs 150 under s 482, CrPC . The High Court observed that in a court room, members of the bar have certain privileges, being officers of the court, and even among the members of the bar, certain special privileges have been conferred on such among them as holding special position and ranking. Thus, when members of the bar are to stand inside a court room due to lack of seating facilities, members of the public, even if they are litigants in the same court, cannot claim any right to occupy the seating facilities available inside the court. It is open to the presiding officer to direct such persons to vacate, for accommodating members of the bar, if there is no other seating facility available. The above must be regarded as a rule of practice to be followed in the court hall for the upkeep of discipline and decorum of the court proceedings. It is held that the learned munsif was right in asking the petitioner to move out of the seat in the front row as senior advocates were standing in the court, without seating accommodation. As the petitioner openly defied obeying the said direction given by the court, his conduct amounted to an offence as specified in s 228 of the IPC . It was further held that the learned munsif was not oversensitive in reacting to the contumacious conduct of the petitioner. The cussedness, unabashedly and persistently displayed by the petitioner in open court, warranted the steps adopted by the learned munsif.[70]

Whether Delay amounts to Interruption

Where the presiding officer of the court sent for the accused, working as a stenographer in his court, and the accused told the daffadar, who called him, that he would come after typing the issues dictated by the presiding officer and the accused went to the presiding officer after typing the issues, it was held that though there was some delay in this process, there was no intentional interruption to the court by the accused and the accused could not be convicted under s 228, IPC .[71]

Threatening a Witness in the Witness Box--Effect of

In an Allahabad case,[72] an accused person made a threat to a prosecution witness in the box and the magistrate convicted him under this section. The magistrate himself found that though there was no intention to insult him, this conduct of the accused1737 had the effect of the magistrate starting at once the proceedings under s 228 and was taken to amount to an interruption to him while sitting as a court. The sessions judge in revision, was of the opinion that if the magistrate thought it his duty to take notice of the threat and start proceedings under this section, it could not be said that an interruption was caused by the accused himself, and referred the case to the High Court with a recommendation that the conviction might be quashed. Stuart J rejected the reference, observing that 'the learned sessions judge has misapprehended the scope of the section. An accused person, who, during the hearing of the case, makes an impertinent threat to a witness in the box, has clearly committed an offence under s 228, IPC .

Only Wilful Error and not Error of Judgment is Material

In all offences in the Indian Penal Code, where the intention is an essential ingredient of the offence, that intention must be strictly made out by the prosecution and this rule applies to the offence under this section also.[73] Where a magistrate, misconceiving his powers and exercising a jurisdiction not vested in him by law, passed an unjustifiable order under s 144, CrPC, restraining a civil court peon from executing a warrant of arrest, it was held that:

> it is not sufficient in such cases for the purpose of visiting a judicial officer with the penal consequences of proceeding in contempt, simply because he committed an error of judgment, or the order passed by him is in excess of the authority vested in him. The error must be a wilful error proceeding from improper or corrupt motives in order that the may be punished for contempt of court.[74]

Improperly Dressed

Where a sessions judge fined an assessor for being 'improperly dressed', it was held that there being no rule as to the dress of assessors, and there being no suggestion that his dress offends public decency, or was intended to be insulting to the court, the learned sessions judge had no jurisdiction to fine the assessor.[75]

Disobedience of Court Order by Marrying a Minor

A mere disobedience of an order of the court, by marrying a minor girl while she is in the custody of a guardian appointed by the court, is not intentionally offering insult or causing interruption within the meaning of this section.[76]

13. What Amounts to Insult or Interruption

It has been held that if a remark is not addressed to a court, however rude or vulgar it may be, it cannot be made the subject of an offence under this section, even if the court happens to overhear it.[77] Vulgar abuse addressed to the court is certainly an offence under this section.[78] Where on hearing the judgment, one of the accused1738 addressed the court uttering filthy abuses, making contemptuous statements, which amounted to an insult to the court, the court had jurisdiction to sentence the accused under s 228, IPC .[79] The use of vulgar language by a villager to emphasise a denial does constitute an offence under this section.[80] Contempt may be shown either by language or by manner; and language which may otherwise be unobjectionable if uttered in a temperate manner, may become highly improper, constituting a punishable contempt, if uttered in a different and disrespectful manner.[81] Even if the words used are innocuous, the tone employed may change their innocent character.[82]

Prevarication, Retraction or Refusal to give answer to Questions while giving Evidence

Though a mere prevarication, a retraction in giving evidence or a persistent refusal to give direct answers to questions, do not necessarily constitute an offence under this section, it may, in particular circumstances, constitute such an interruption to a public servant sitting in a stage of a judicial proceeding as to constitute an offence under this section.[83]

Bidding in Auction Sale without Money

A person who bids at a sale in execution of a decree, knowing that he cannot deposit the ernest money, commits an offence under this section.[84]

Acts not Falling under this Section

Leaving the court when ordered to remain or making signs from outside to a prisoner on his trial[85] or an absence from the court in disobedience to a summons,[86] or listening to the evidence having been directed to go away until required as witness,[87] or the walking out of court by a party when asked if he is going to call witnesses[88] are not offences under this section. In re Bhavani Mudalia[89] a person was fined under this section for chewing betel while under examination as a witness at a trial. In one case it was observed that:

> To wilfully impede, hinder, embarrass, interrupt or obstruct the judicial proceedings, or to insult the court, in its presence, in the course of adjudication of some cause, amounts to undue interference with the administration of justice and therefore to contempt, and, as such, it can never be tolerated or countenanced by this court. The status or the official position of the person who chooses to so interrupt is wholly irrelevant. Indeed, the higher the status of a person, the more responsible conduct and behaviour is expected from him.[90]1739

The mere act of addressing the presiding officer of a court during the pendency of a proceeding does not amount to culpable interruption. Where the court peon maltreated a gentleman entering the court-room, a pleader appealed to the presiding officer against the rude behaviour of the peon. It was held that interruption' as used in this section, contemplates something far more serious and far more obstructive than what was done by the pleader.[91] Every protest made, in fact, does interrupt the court, but it is its duty to listen to protests how much so ever they may delay its proceedings. So long as they are made bona fide they do not constitute the interruption which the section punishes as contempt.[92]

Where the letter allegedly written and addressed to the court which interfered with the course of justice but mostly likely was opened only in chambers by the magistrate when he retired after judicial work, it cannot be said that letter was received by the magistrate when he was in any stage of the proceedings, hence offence under s 228 was held not made out.[93]

Every Act of Disrespect is not Contempt

If a counsel appears before a court while under the influence of liquor, it may be an act of disrespect to the court, but as observed in Joseph Orakwrie Izoura v R ,[94] not every act of disrespect is contempt. A counsel appearing in court after consuming liquor, but without being under its influence, does not affect its dignity or amount to contempt. Even if he argued irrelevantly or incoherently, he does not commit direct contempt. It is a far-fetched argument that interruption is caused because the counsel cannot work normally, or he argues irrelevantly, or incoherently, and has to be pulled up by the presiding officer at the expense of some time if the pending officer's attention is diverted from the proceeding that he is conducting, either to the appearance or behaviour of the counsel or to the behaviour of those standing close to him.[95]

14. Insult or Interruption by Counsel

In a Bombay case[96] it was observed:

> The section requires that the insult or interruption of the court should be intentional. In this case there is no evidence of any intention on the part of the pleader to insult or interrupt the court. The whole affair has been given undue importance and might have been more quietly settled. Some latitude should be allowed to a member of the bar, insisting in the conduct of his case upon his question being taken down or his objections noted, where the court thinks the question inadmissible or the objections untenable. There ought to be a spirit of give and take between the bench and the bar in such matters and every little persistence on the part of a pleader should not be turned into an occasion for a criminal trial unless the pleader's conduct is so clearly vexatious as to lead to the inference that his intention is to insult or interrupt the court.

Relying upon the said case, Bombay High Court reaffirmed this position and held that there is no doubt that a judicial officer is entitled to maintain the dignity of the1740 court, but he should not be too sensitive and too ready to take offence where none is intended. The law allows some latitude to a member of the bar acting bona fide in the discharge of his professional duty, so long as his conduct is not so gross as to lead to an inference that his intention is to insult or interrupt the court.[1]

Procedure for Recording Evidence when an Objection is Raised

If a witness, in response to a question put by the court, gives an answer appearing to be different from the one previously given in response to a question put by the counsel, it is quite natural for the counsel to request the court to record the previous one also, and the appropriate course for the court would be to record both the answers. While it is true that the court has the power, and indeed it is its duty, to see that undue advantage is not taken of the ignorance of witnesses or parties, it is no less the duty of the court to see that there is a faithful record of the proceedings in court. If, for any reason, the court does not see its way to accept the position contended for by a counsel, there is nothing unnatural or wrong in the counsel requesting the court to place on record its ruling. While it cannot be said that the court is bound to record all contentions, objections or representations, even if they are of a trivial or a frivolous character, it is undoubtedly the court's duty to record its decision on any matter of substance that arises in a case. If some time was taken by the counsel in looking up authorities to satisfy the court about the correctness of the position contended for by him, and if the discussion took some time and if all this occupied about 20 minutes, it can hardly be said that the petitioner interrupted the court's proceedings. If the court refuses to record the question put by the counsel and the answer to it, and it also refuses to note his objection to the non-recording of that answer, and the counsel expresses his desire to retire from the case and applies for time to move for a transfer of the case, his conduct cannot be said to constitute a threat or insult. When under some exceptional provisions the court itself is constituted both the prosecutor and the judge, it is all the more incumbent upon the presiding officer not to lose a sense of perspective. While there can be no doubt that it is the duty of all those appearing in court, and more particularly of the counsel, to conduct themselves with becoming decorum and restraint and to do nothing which is likely to bring down the prestige or dignity of the court, it is equally essential that no occasion should be given for any party to feel that he has not been given the fullest opportunity to present his case or that there is not a fair, substantial and faithful record of the proceedings in court.[2]

Mere Persistence in Putting Question not an Insult or Interruption

The mere persistence of an advocate in putting a question again and again to the witness, during cross-examination could not, by any stretch of imagination, be said to be done with an intention of offering any insult or to cause any interruption to the court within the meaning of s 228 of the Indian Penal Code, where it is not suggested that the tone employed by the advocate in persisting the question was such as to create an impression in the court hall that the decorum of the court was not maintained and insult was being offered to the court. When no remark was made by the appellant-advocate to derogate the status of the presiding officer of the court; no1741 gesture was done which would even indirectly suggest that the advocate concerned wanted to run down the presiding officer of the court or in any manner show any disrespect to the court, it could hardly be said that such interruption would be an interruption within the meaning of s 228, IPC, so that the offence under that section could be said to have been established.[3]

Hypersensitiveness on One Side and Rudeness on the Other and Ideas of Domination or

Servility to be Avoided

It is true that a lawyer should always conduct himself properly in a court of law, and exert his best at all times to maintain the dignity of the court, but the court has also a reciprocal duty to perform, and should be not only not discourteous to a lawyer, but should also try to maintain his respect in the eyes of his clients and the general public with whom he has to deal in his professional capacity. Hypersensitiveness on the one side or rudeness on the other must be avoided at all costs. Both the bench and the bar are two arms of the same machinery and unless they work harmoniously, justice cannot be properly administered. Mutual adjustment, and not mutual antagonism, should be the end in view on both sides, eliminating all ideas either of domination or of servility.[4]

Action under this Section and Section 345 , CrPC can be taken against Counsel in Appropriate Cases

The complaint made against the respondent advocate in the order for taking proceedings for committing contempt of a subordinate court was that the respondent, time and again, appeared in court and that a loud and thundering voice was used by him. When asked not to speak in such a loud voice, he responded that he could not put a silencer in his throat. It was observed by the Delhi High Court that it is desirable that in future, if anything transpires in a court, which in the view of the presiding officer of the court, amounts to a contempt of court within the meaning of the Contempt of Courts Act 1971, the conduct of the contemnor should be reflected in the order sheet of the court so as to make it possible for the High Court to peruse the order-sheet and come to a proper conclusion. The High Court further observed: 'In any case we would like to remind the court below that provisions of s 228 of Indian Penal Code, read with s 345, CrPC, can in appropriate cases, be utilised to the court with due discretion and care, and when their application becomes necessary'. No action for contempt was taken.[5]

15. 'To any Public Servant'--Meaning of

An offence under this section can arise only in the case of a public servant, while he is sitting in a judicial proceeding. As to the meaning of 'public servant', see s 21 and notes thereunder. Although an advocate is a part of the machinery of the administration of justice, he is not a public servant within the meaning of that expression in this section. So, where a threat was addressed, not to the judge, but to an advocate in his presence, it was held that the contempt was not punishable under this section.[6]1742

16. 'Judicial Proceeding'--Meaning of

The expression 'judicial proceeding' occurs in s 192, IPC and is explained therein. See notes under s 192 . The expression 'in any stage of a judicial proceeding' occurs in s 193, IPC and is explained therein. Notes under s 193 may be referred to.

Sitting in a Judicial Proceeding--Meaning of

This section relates merely to an insult or interruption to a public servant while sitting in a stage of judicial proceedings. It does not provide against a contempt of court committed by the publication of a libel out of court, when the court is not sitting.[7] It contemplates only cases of contempt of court occurring in the presence of the court, by insulting the officer or interrupting the business of the court.[8] What the section requires is that the public servant must be actually dealing with the matter pertaining to the judicial proceeding at the moment when insult is offered. When a judicial proceeding is pending on the file of a public servant, he cannot be said to be sitting over that judicial proceeding all the time, if he is not actually dealing with it.[9] A private interview with a district magistrate cannot be regarded as a 'stage of a judicial proceeding', even if in consequence of the interview, he expressed his intention to examine the complainant in whose behalf the interview was sought.[10] It cannot be said that the judicial proceedings of a court, in a particular case, are at an end the moment the sentence has been passed, and that a prisoner may then insult the judge with impunity. The judicial proceedings continue until the prisoner is discharged or removed in custody.[11]

Where an order, binding an accused under s 107, CrPC, was pronounced by a magistrate and thereupon, the person bound down, remarked that the court had acted with zulm, it was held that he was guilty of contempt of court, and the magistrate was sitting at a stage of a judicial proceeding when the utterance was made by the accused.[12]

Where panches assemble on a particular day to pronounce the judgment in a case, they should be deemed to be sitting in a stage of a judicial proceeding till their dispersal, unless, of course, the dispersal was delayed. Where, therefore, the pronouncement of the judgment and the utterance of the threat and abuses to the panches were almost simultaneous events, it could not be said that the threat and abuses were hurled at a stage which was not a stage of a judicial proceeding.[13]

An insult to a judge or magistrate may be contained in an application or affidavit presented to him. The practice as to the filing of applications and affidavits varies from court to court, and in some courts, application and affidavits are filed within stated hours before the reader or the bench clerk; they are so filed even when the judge or magistrate is in the chamber or pre-occupied with some administrative duties. So, in order to establish the offence under this section, it must be shown that1743 the judge or magistrate was doing some judicial work when the application or affidavit was presented.[14]

All Proceedings of a Judge are not Judicial

All proceedings of a judge are not necessarily judicial proceedings. In order to be judicial, a proceeding must relate in some way to the administration of justice or to the ascertainment of any right or liability.

Demarcation proceedings under the Himachal Pradesh Panchayat Raj Act do not relate, in any way, to the administration of justice, nor are they directed towards an ascertainment of any right or liability, and are not therefore, judicial proceedings within the meaning of this section.[15]

Functions of Registrar not Judicial

The functions assigned to a registrar and a sub-registrar, in the matter of registering documents, are purely administrative, and not judicial. A sub-registrar is not, for general purposes, a court and he does not become one by making an inquiry for the purposes of ascertaining whether he is justified in registering a document presented for registration. Much less is he a judge.[16]Section 347 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, however, empowers the state governments to direct that any registrar or sub-registrar appointed under the Registration Act 1908 shall be deemed to be a civil court within the meaning of ss 345 and 346 of that Code.

Public Servant not held to be Court

A settlement officer, appointed under the provisions of the East Punjab Holdings (Consolidation and Prevention of Fragmentation) Act 1948[17] or an assistant settlement officer, appointed under the Bihar Tenancy Act,[18] is not a civil, criminal or revenue court, and as such, a conviction recorded by him under s 228, IPC, is without jurisdiction. But an assistant registrar, functioning as a registrar under s 48 of the Bihar and Orissa Co-operative Societies Act, has been held to be a court, subordinate to the High Court, for the purpose of s 3 of the Contempt of Court Act.[19]

17. Procedure

An offence under this section is non-cognizable and a summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable. It is triable by the court in which the offence is committed, subject to the provisions of ch XXVI of the CrPC 1973. This offence can also be tried summarily under s 260, CrPC .[20]

The period of limitation prescribed by s 468, CrPC for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is one year.1744

18. Special Procedure under Sections 345 - 351, CrPC

Abovementioned sections in CrPC 1973[21] may be referred to.

19. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you on or about the.....day of.....at.....intentionally offered insult (or caused interruption), to wit.....(specify the insult, or interruption) to.....a public servant while he was sitting in a stage of a judicial proceeding, namely.....(specify the proceeding), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 228 of the Indian Penal Code, and within any cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

20. Punishment

A presiding officer of a court of justice in this country, representing, as he does, the Indian Republic, is entitled to respect, and any disrespectful or undue hindrance or interruption in the course of judicial proceeding constituting, as it does, a challenge to the court's authority deserves to be severely dealt with.[22]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

[23][S. 228A.

Disclosure of identity of the victim of certain offences, etc.--

(1) Whoever prints or publishes the name or any matter which may make known the identity of any person against whom an [24][offence under section 376, section 376A, section 376B, section 376C, section 376D or section 376E] is alleged or found to have been committed (hereafter in this section referred to as the victim) shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years and shall also be liable to fine.

(2) Nothing in sub-section (1) extends to any printing or publication of the name or any matter which may make known the identity of the victim if such printing or publication is--

(a) by or under the order in writing of the officer-in-charge of the police station or the police officer making the investigation into such offence acting in good faith for the purposes of such investigation; or

(b) by, or with the authorisation in writing of, the victim; or

(c) where the victim is dead or minor or of unsound mind, by, or with the authorisation in writing of, the next of kin of the victim:

Provided that no such authorisation shall be given by the next of kin to anybody other than the chairman or the secretary, by whatever name called, of any recognised welfare institution or organisation.1745

Explanation.--For the purposes of this sub-section, "recognised welfare institution or organisation" means a social welfare institution or organisation recognised in this behalf by the Central or State Government.

(3) Whoever prints or publishes any matter in relation to any proceeding before a court with respect to an offence referred to in sub-section (1) without the previous permission of such court shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.--The printing or publication of the judgment of any High Court or the Supreme Court does not amount to an offence within the meaning of this section.]

Comments

1. Scope and Object

An alarmingly large increase in crime against women in the recent past in India, necessitated some drastic changes in this Code and by Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1983 and the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013, s 376, IPC, the only section dealing with rape, was substituted by a more effective, rigorous and exhaustive new section and other new ss 376A, 376B, 376C, 376D and 376E, IPC, were introduced to deal with sexual intercourse with women not amounting to rape, by persons occupying dominating position in certain peculiar circumstances. As many sexual offences used to go unpunished for want of information to the police and other authorities, for fear of humiliation in the public eye, this section was enacted to save the victims of sexual assaults, punishable under ss 376, 376A, 376B, 376C, 376D or 376E, IPC, from undue publicity and defamation.

The section imposes a ban on the publication of the names or other particulars disclosing the identity of the victims of the aforesaid offences, without the permission of the police, the victims themselves, or recognised welfare institutions or organisations. Even the proceedings of cases relating to such offences, before the courts, and their judgments, except the judgments of High Courts and Supreme Court, cannot be printed or published without the previous permission of such courts. The breach of these provisions has been made a cognizable offences by this new section.

2. Rape and Sexual Intercourse--Definition of

The section applies when either there is an allegation or it is found that rape or sexual intercourse as stated above has been committed with a female. The word1746 'rape' has been defined by s 375, IPC and means a sexual intercourse with a woman under the circumstances falling under any of the six clauses of that section. The term 'sexual intercourse' has however, not been defined by this Code. Explanation to s 375 simply states that penetration is sufficient to constitute the sexual intercourse necessary to the offence of rape. This explanation should also apply to sexual intercourse mentioned in ss 376A, 376B, 376C and 376D, though the same does not amount to rape. An attempt to commit rape or sexual intercourse or any other sexual activity, short of penetration, though it may be an offence falling under ss 354, 509 or any of the ss 376, 376A, 376B, 376C or 376D with the aid of s 511, cannot amount to sexual intercourse and the restrictions imposed by this section will not apply to printing and publishing the name etc. of the victim of that offence.

By the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 2013, the definition of rape has been expanded, but the eseential ingredients of the offence of rape remain the same, while the sentence has been enhanced. See commentary under ss 375, 376, 376A-E .

3. 'Prints or Publishes'--Meaning of

The terms 'prints' and 'publishes' have not been defined by this Code. The word 'print' commonly means to produce a book, picture or other matter by applying inked types, blocks or plates to paper, vellum etc, and includes cyclo-styling.[25]

The word 'publish' according to its dictionary meaning, denotes 'to make generally known, make known to a third party, announce formally, issue copies of books, etc for sale to the public'. According to the Supreme Court, 'publication' is the act of publishing anything; offering it to public or rendering accessable to public scrutiny; making known of something to the public for a purpose.[26]Publication necessarily implies some act and the mere knowledge of a person cannot be regarded as publication.[27]

Section 499, IPC contemplates that one can publish an imputation by words spoken or intended to be read, or by signs or by visible representation. Here what is to be published is the name or the particulars sufficient to disclose the identity of the victim of rape or sexual intercourse contemplated by sub-s (1) and s 499 may not be of any help in the interpretation or appreciation of the provisions of s 228A, and the printing and publication made punishable under this section should be understood to be made by any common mode of printing and publication.

When s 228A, IPC has been enacted keeping in view the social object of preventing social victimisation or ostracism of the victim of a sexual offence, publishing the photographs of such victims in newspapers, journals and magazines would certainly fall under the category of making disclosure of the identity of the victim and thereby such act would fall under s 228A, IPC .[28]1747

Name of Rape Victim should be Avoided in Judgment

The name of a rape victim should not be disclosed.[29] Of course, if it is absolutely unavoidable as, for example, when framing the charge, the identity of the victim may be disclosed, but not otherwise. Sessions judges would be well advised to ensure that when they are dealing with cases of sexual offences, the name of the victim should not be disclosed unless it is unavoidable.[30]

Section 228-A of the IPC makes disclosure of identity of victim of certain offences punishable. Printing or publishing name of any matter which may make known the identity of any person against whom an offence under ss 376, 376-A, 376-B, 376-C or 376-D is alleged or found to have been committed can be punished. The restriction, no doubt, does not relate to printing or publication of judgment by High Court or the Supreme Court. But keeping in view the social object of preventing social victimisation or ostracism of the victim of a sexual offence for which s 228-A has been enacted, it would be appropriate that in the judgments, be it of the Supreme Court, High Court or lower court, the name of the victim should not be indicated. The Supreme Court had chosen to describe her as 'victim' in the judgment.[31]

4. Sub-section (2)--Exceptions to the Section

This sub-section serves as an exception to sub-s (1) and permits the printing and publication of the name or other particulars, making known the identity of the victim of a sexual assault by the following:

(a) the officer-in-charge of the concerned police station or the investigating officer of the case, provided he does so in good faith and for the purposes of investigation; or
(b) the victim herself; or
(c) the next-of-kin of the victim if she is dead or minor or of unsound mind; or
(d) the chairman or secretary of a recognised welfare institution or organisation, in case he has been authorised in writing by her next of kin; if the victim is dead or a minor or of unsound mind.

Authorisation to be in Writing

Where the victim is dead or a minor or of unsound mind, if her next of kin, does not himself resort to printing or publishing her name and identity, he may disclose the same to the chairman or secretary of a recognised welfare institution or organisation, authorising him in writing to get the same printed or published. The proviso to sub-s (2) makes it clear that the next of kin of the deceased or a legally disabled victim cannot authorise any person or institution other than the chairman or secretary of a1748 recognised welfare institution or organisation, which according to the explanation to sub-s (2) means a social welfare institution or organisation recognised in this behalf by the central or state government. Clauses (a) and (b) above also speak of the authorisation in writing. Such further authorisation in writing by the chairman or secretary of the recognised welfare institution or organisation is not inferrable from this sub-section, if he decides to act on the authority of the next-of-kin of the deceased or legally disabled victim. It appears that this sub-section is not happily worded in some respects.

5. An Offence Referred to in Sub-section (1)

This expression used in sub-s (3) means an offence under s 376, or s 376A, or s 376B, or s 376C or s 376D of the IPC, mentioned in sub-s (1) and not the offence of printing and publishing, defined by that sub-section.

6. Sub-section (3)--Court Proceedings not to be Printed or Published

The yellow press, with a profit earning motive, is always interested in covering the day-do-day proceedings of sensational cases pending in courts and giving wide publicity to such cases and the judgments ultimately delivered therein. This many a times causes a lot of embarrassment to the victims and also adversely affects their marriage prospects, if unmarried. To save them from such embarrassment etc, the printing and publishing of proceedings before a court with respect to offences under ss 376, 376A, 376B, 376C or s 376D, without the previous permission of such court, has been made a cognizable offence.

Sub-Section (3) Applies to Certain Judgments also

One commits an offence under this sub-section even while printing or publishing, any matter in relation to any proceeding before a court, the accused may neither name the victim, nor otherwise disclose her identity. The explanation to sub-s (3) makes it clear that this sub-section is not confined to the proceedings before a court upto their termination, but also applies to judgments of trial courts or other subordinate courts. The only exception permitted by the explanation is that the judgments of the High Courts and the Supreme Court can be printed or published with immunity, without any prior permission.

Consideration for Permission

While granting permission, the courts are expected to act with restraint and circumspection, and the permission to print and publish any matter in relation to such proceeding is not to be granted on a mere asking, otherwise the very purpose of enacting this sub-section is likely to be defeated. The interest of the victim and the likely prejudice and embarrassment to her and her family members should be given due consideration when a permission to print or publish such matters is sought.

7. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable and bailable, but is not compoundable. It is triable by any magistrate.

The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.1749

8. Complaint

The general principle is that anybody can set the law in motion, in order to bring to the notice of the court, the offence committed by the person concerned. According to s 2(d), CrPC, a 'complaint' means any allegation made orally or in writing to a magistrate, with a view to his taking action under this Code, that some person, whether known or unknown, has committed an offence. Any person, as a public interest litigant, can approach the court to file the complaint against the accused requesting it to take action against the offence committed by him under the Code of Criminal Procedure . So, this definition section also makes it clear that unless there is a specific prohibition, the locus standi of the complainant cannot be questioned.[32]Locus standi of the complainant is a concept foreign to criminal jurisprudence, save and except cases where the statute creating an offence, provides for the eligibility of the complainant, by necessary implication and the general principle gets excluded by such statutory provision.[33]

The question arises whether the complaint under s 228A, IPC can be made by any person or by only either of the three persons mentioned in the sub-section of s 228A, who alone are competent to give authorisation to publish the name of the victim.

The whole reading of s 228A would only disclose the eligibility of the person who can give an authorisation or permission to make a publication. It does not provide for the eligibility of the persons who could file the complaint. In fact, there are so many other sections found available in the CrPC which provide for the eligibility of the persons who alone can launch a prosecution against the accused. Some of the sections are ss 195 and 198, CrPC, etc. This provision, namely, s 228A(2) cannot be construed to be analogous of the same. So, in the absence of any specific prohibition for the filing of a complaint by persons other than those eligible, it cannot be held that the complaint is not filed by a competent person.[34]

9. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name and the accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....printed (or published) the name.....(or the particulars sufficient to ascertain the identity of.....) .....(mention the mode or medium) against whom an offence under section..... IPC was alleged (or found to have been committed) without the authority of the person competent to give such permission, [or printed (or published) a matter.....(specify) in relation to case no.....before.....in respect of an offence under section..... IPC (or the judgment delivered by that court in that case).....(mention the mode or medium of printing or publishing) without the previous permission of that court] and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 228A(1) (or section 228A(3) as the case may be) of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this Court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.1750

10. Proof

To establish an offence under this section the prosecution has to prove:

(a) that the accused printed or published (a) the name, or (b) some matter sufficient to establish the identity of the woman;
(b) that against such woman an offence under s 376, or s 376A, or s 376B, or s 376C, or s 376D, IPC was alleged or found to have been committed; and
(c) that the name or the particulars establishing the identity of such woman were printed or published, without a written order or authorisation by (a) the concerned officer-in-charge of the police station; (b) the police officer investigating into the case; (c) the victim; (d) the next-of-kin of the victim if she is dead, or minor or of unsound mind (nor otherwise by any of them); or (e) the chairman or secretary of a social welfare institution or organisation recognised by the central or state government, duly authorised in writing by the next-of-kin of the victim, in case she is dead or minor or of unsound mind.

In case the offence falls under sub-s (3) of this section, the prosecution has to prove:

(a) that the accused printed or published any matter in relation to any proceeding before a court, with respect to an offence under s 376, or s 376A, or s 376B, or s 376C, or s 376D, IPC or the judgment delivered in such case by any court other than a High Court or Supreme Court; and
(b) that such printing or publication was made without the previous permission of the concerned court.

In either case the burden to prove the order or authorisation or the permission required by sub-s (2) or (3), shall be on the accused. A mere allegation that rape or sexual intercourse, as contemplated by sub-s (1), was committed against a particular woman, is sufficient for a prosecution under this section and it is not necessary to prove that such act, in fact, was committed with her.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences against Public Justice

S. 229.

Personation of a juror or assessor.--

Whoever, by personation or otherwise, shall intentionally cause, or knowingly suffer himself to be returned, empanelled or sworn as a juryman or assessor in any case in which he knows that he is not entitled by law to be so returned, empanelled or sworn, or knowing himself to have been so returned, empanelled or sworn contrary to law, shall voluntarily serve on such jury or as such assessor, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with the false personation as a juror or assessor. For other offences dealing with false personation, see s 140, IPC (personation of soldier, or airman), ss 170 and 171, IPC (personating a public servant); s 171F, IPC (personation in an1751 election) and s 205, IPC (false personation for the purpose of the act or proceeding in a suit or prosecution).

The system of trial with the aid of assessors was abolished by Act 26 of 1955 and that of trial with the aid of jury, went with the CrPC 1898 and no similar provision in this respect was made in the CrPC 1973, replacing it with effect from 1 April 1974. As a matter of fact, the provision regarding juryman and assessor in clause 'fifth' of s 21, IPC and this section should be deleted as they are of mere academic interest now.

The section is in two parts. The first part makes it an offence to intentionally cause, or knowingly suffer oneself to be returned empanelled or sworn as a juryman, knowing that he is not entitled by law to be so returned, empanelled or sworn. The second part makes it an offence to voluntarily serve as a juror or assessor, knowing himself to be returned, empanelled or sworn contrary to law. In the former, he has guilty knowledge before being returned, empanelled or sworn, whereas in the latter, he has the guilty knowledge after he was returned, empanelled or sworn.

2. 'By Personation or Otherwise'--Meaning of

To constitute an offence under this section, it is not necessary that the accused should personate another. It is enough if he is not entitled to serve as a juror or assessor, and acts in that capacity.

3. 'Empanelled'--Meaning of

A person was 'empanelled' when he was chosen to serve as a juror as provided in ss 276 - 279, CrPC 1898.

4. 'Sworn'--Meaning of Section 281, Crpc 1898 provided for the jurors chosen, to be sworn under the Indian Oaths Act 1873, and the word 'sworn' occurring in this section refers to that requirement.

5. 'Not Entitled by Law to be Returned' etc--Meaning of

Under s 319, CrPC 1898, all persons between the ages of 21 and 60 years were, unless exempted under s 320 of that Code, liable to serve as jurors. Under s 321, CrPC 1898, the sessions judge and the collector or any other officer appointed by the State Government, had to prepare and make out a list of persons liable to serve as jurors and qualified in the judgment of the sessions judge and collector or the other officer so appointed, to serve as such, and not likely to be successfully objected to under s 278, cll (b)-(h), both inclusive of the old CrPC . Only the persons included in this list were entitled to serve as jurors. Others were not so entitled. The section does not apply to persons exempted under s 320, CrPC 1898.

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is not cognizable and a summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is bailable but not compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

The period of limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years as prescribed by s 468, CrPC 1973.1752

7. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That on or about.....day of.....you (*) intentionally caused (or knowingly suffered yourself) to be returned (or empanelled or sworn) as a juryman (or assessor) in case No .....of .....tried by.....when you knew that you were not entitled to be so returned (or empanelled or sworn) (or you, knowing yourself to have been so returned (or empanelled or sworn) contrary to law, voluntary served on such jury (or as such assessors)], and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 229 of the Indian Penal Code, within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.]

8. Proof

In order to establish a charge under this section, the prosecution has to prove:

(a) that the accused was returned, empanelled or sworn as a juror or assessor;
(b) that he was not entitled by law to be so returned or empanelled, or sworn;
(c) that he caused or suffered himself intentionally or knowingly to be so returned, empanelled, or sworn by personation, or otherwise; and
(d) that he, at the time when he was so returned or empanelled or sworn, knew that he was not entitled to be so returned or empanelled, or sworn.

Or prove points (i) and (ii) as above, and further:

(a) that the accused knew that he had been returned or empanelled, or sworn contrary to law; and
(b) that he nevertheless voluntarily served in that capacity.

Failure by person released on bail or bond to appear in Court.--

Whoever, having been charged with an offence and released on bail or on bond without sureties, fails without sufficient cause (the burden of proving which shall lie upon him), to appear in Court in accordance with the terms of the bail or bond, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.--The punishment under this section is--

(a) in addition to the punishment to which the offender would be liable on a conviction for the offence with which he has been charged; and

(b) without prejudice to the power of the Court to order forfeiture of the bond.]1753

COMMENTS

Where the trial of the case is not due to the absence of the accused, the accused cannot be prosecuted for offence under s 229A, IPC .[36]

In the instant case the PW1 was examined five years and PW2 was examined seven years after the framing of the charge, the case was adjourned as the Presiding Officer was on leave, the witnesses had not turned, the trial of the case could not be said to be delayed due to the absence of the accused, charge under s 229A, IPC was not framed against the accused.[37]1754

Comments

1. Scope

The IPC draws a distinction between 'coins' and 'Indian coins'. A 'coin' is defined as a metal used for the time being as money, and stamped and issued by the authority of some State or sovereign power in order to be so used.[8] An 'Indian coin' is defined as metal, stamped and issued by the authority of the Government of India in order to be used as money; and metal which has been so stamped and issued shall continue to be an Indian coin for the purposes of the IPC,[9] notwithstanding that it may have ceased to be used as money.

This section only defines 'coin' and 'Indian coin'. If an offence is committed in relation to the 'Indian coin' (s 231, IPC), it is almost invariably more heavily punished than if it was committed in relation to money stamped and issued by a foreign sovereign power.

2. Legislative Changes

Before the amendment of this section by the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act 1872, coin was defined as 'metal stamped by the authority of some government'. At that time s 17 of the IPC defined 'government' as denoting 'the person or persons authorised by law to administer the executive government of any part of British India'. It thus happened that the coin of the native states of India was not 'coin' within the meaning of the IPC . The definition of 'coin' was amended by the Amendment Act of 1872, in order to check the practice of counterfeiting the copper coin of the Indian states. The words 'for the time being' were introduced as it was suggested that the definition might possibly be held to include old coins, such as those that Graeco-Bactrian states formerly used as money, but which were now regarded only as a curiosity.

The section was again amended by Act 6 of 1896. The reasons for the amendment were stated as follows:

> At present 'coin' is defined as metal used for the time being as money, and the consequence is that, if any offence under these sections has to be proved, it has to be shown that the coin was in use at the time of the offence as money. There is a process in coinage which is provided for by law, namely, in the Indian Coinage Act, which is termed the calling in of coin. This gives government an authority which it exercises under certain circumstances to call in coin and to cause it after a certain time to cease to be used as money. It is extremely doubtful whether if the coin so called in has been counterfeited, a court would hold that it was in use as money after the date of the proclamation which had called it in. After a certain time it would certainly cease to be in use as money. This power to call in money has been exercised in one case--and I think in only one,--namely, that of the Farrukhabad rupee which immediately preceded the existing government rupee, or, as it was at first called, the Company's rupee. It was called in 1877. We have ascertained that this coin has been recently largely1759 manufactured in Bombay. The manufacture has been carried on perfectly openly, and it has been brought to our notice by some of our Political officers who showed that it was being imported into Central India and Rajputana in considerable quantities. This manufacture, we are unable, under the present law, to stop, because that particular coin is not in use at present as money. The immediate practical object of the change which I propose to the Council to make in the Indian Penal Code is to put a stop to this particular coinage. But it is obvious that the same necessity may arise in any future case. We may, at any time, find reason to call in any particular issues of the rupee, and it would be an extremely peculiar state of the law if an act which is today reckoned so harmful as to be punishable with ten years' imprisonment should tomorrow become a perfectly innocent one. It is to protect our action against a consequence of this kind that the measure is proposed
> But there is a special necessity peculiar to India which arises in this connection. In a great part of the Native states of India coin is not current in the same legal sense in which it is current in British India; that is to say, > there is no law of legal tender; and the consequence is that many kinds of coins pass in those Native states from hand to hand, not by reason of being legal tender, but by reason of each person who receives them knowing that they are customarily current in his own or other Native states, and that any other person will receive them in the same way as he receives them. From the fact that these Farrukhabad rupees were imported in such large quantities into Rajputana and Central India...it seems to me, therefore, that we are under some obligation to the Native states in this matter not to permit a coin which passes, or which certainly might pass, there from hand to hand as an ordinary circulating coin, to be fabricated by private individuals in British India.[10]

Illustration (e) also was added by the same Act.

The word 'Central' was added before 'Government' and the words 'of India' were omitted after the word 'Government' by the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order 1937. The original second paragraph was substituted by the present paragraph by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The word 'had' was substituted for the word 'as' by the Adaptation of Laws Order (Third Amendment) 1951. In illusts (d) and (e), the words 'Indian coin' were substituted for the words 'the Queen's coin' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950.

3. Essentials of a Coin

The essentials of a 'coin' are: (a) metal used as money; and (b) stamped, and issued under state authority. Section 3 of the Indian Coinage Act 1906, empowers the Central Government to establish or abolish a mint, and under s 6 of that Act, coins may be coined at the mint for issue, under the authority of the Central Government, of such denominations, of such dimensions and designs, and of such metals or of mixed metals, of such composition as the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, determine.

4.No Metal to be used as Money without the Authority of the Central Government

Section 3 of the Metal Tokens Act 1889, prohibits the making of copper or bronze or of any other metal or mixed metal, whether stamped or unstamped, intended to be used as money except by the authority of the Central Government. Section 6 of the1760 said Act prohibits receipt by local authorities and railways as money or metal which is not coin.

No piece of copper or bronze or of any other metal or mixed metal, which, whether stamped or unstamped, is intended to be used as money, shall be made except by the authority of the Central Government.

Section 7 of the Coinage Act 1906 authorises the Central Government to prescribe the standard weight and remedy (i.e., variation from standard weight and fineness).

5. 'Used for the Time being as Money'

The word 'coin' in this section means a coin which is used for the time being as money, i.e., which is current. A coin which is not current will not be deemed a coin.[11]

To counterfeit a coin of Emperor Akbar's time is not an offence under s 231, as the test of 'money' is the possibility of it being used as a current medium of exchange in the market.[12] Ancient coins which are out of circulation are not coins.[13]

A coin of the time of Emperor Akbar or a gold mohur of the reign of Shah Jahan cannot be deemed to be a coin, inasmuch as it is not used for the time being as money.[14] But in the case of an Indian coin the section expressly states that the metal which has been stamped and issued by the Government of India shall continue to be the Indian coin for the purposes of this chapter notwithstanding that it may have ceased to be used as money. Now a coin may have ceased to be used as money in various ways. It may, for instance, be a coin which has been superceded, or it may pass into territories of some independent chief where it is not accepted as legal tender, or it may be that it has been defaced so badly that no one would accept it as a current coin. But it may still, within the meaning of this section, be deemed to be Indian coin, even though it has ceased to be used as money. Furthermore, the mere fact that a coin is being used as in an ornament by soldering a ring to it does not transform it absolutely into a new article. By removal of that ring the coin in a defaced form will re-appear and may be capable of being accepted by ignorant villagers.[15]

Illustration (c)--This illustration makes it clear that a medal is not a coin. If a person fraudulently represents it to be money to an ignorant villager and the latter is deceived thereby, he would be guilty of cheating.

Illustration (e)--The Murshidabad rupee stood on the same footing as the Farrukhabad rupee and are, therefore, 'Indian coins'.[16]

6. Legal Tender not Necessary

It is not necessary, to satisfy the ordinary definition of money, that a coin should be a legal tender receivable at a value in rupees fixed by the law. Gold mohurs having absolutely no fixed value, but having a current value, which is not ascertained merely1761 by weighing them as lumps of gold, but attaching to them as coins, are 'coin' for the time being used as money.[17]

7. Extradition

All offences in this chapter[18] are 'extradition offences'.[19] Extradition means delivery of a fugitive criminal or accused person to another state. Fugitive criminal means an individual who is accused or convicted of an extradition offence committed within the jurisdiction of a foreign state or a commonwealth country and is, or is suspected to be, in some part of India.[20] Extradition offence has been defined by s 2(c) of the Extradition Act 1962 and means an offence provided for in the extradition treaty, in relation to a foreign state having such treaty and in relation to any other foreign state or a commonwealth country an offence specified in the second schedule or in the notification issued thereunder.

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 231.

Counterfeiting coin.--

Whoever counterfeits or knowingly performs any part of the process of counterfeiting coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.--A person commits this offence, who intending to practise deception, or knowing it to be likely that deception will thereby be practised, causes a genuine coin to appear like a different coin.

Comments

1. Scope

This section penalises counterfeiting 'coin', and the next section penalises counterfeiting 'Indian coin'. In either case the counterfeiting must be of 'coin' and 'Indian coin' respectively as defined in s 230, IPC .

The offence of counterfeiting consists in the mere fact of counterfeiting.[21] It is not necessary that the counterfeit coin should be made with the primary intention of it being passed as genuine; it is sufficient if the resemblance to the genuine coin is so close that it is capable of being passed as such.[22] For the detection of counterfeit coins, one need not be an expert. Experience shows that many have a knack and1762 capacity to mark it out readily even though the same is mixed up with the good ones.[23]

The accused appellant was convicted for circulating fake currency notes as guilt of accused had been proved beyond reasonable doubt.[24]

2. 'Counterfeits'

For the meaning of the term 'counterfeit', s 28, IPC and notes thereunder may be referred to.

3. Counterfeiting Involves an Intention to Deceive

To be counterfeit within the meaning of the statute, the coin must resemble or be apparently intended to resemble or pass for a genuine coin,[25] but this resemblance is a matter of fact which the court has to judge upon the world.[26] Thus, counterfeiting with some small variation in the inscription, effigies, or arms, done probably with intent to evade the law, is yet within it; and so is counterfeiting in a different metal, if in appearance it be made to resemble the true coin.[27] The word 'counterfeiting' involves an intention to practise deceit by causing one thing to resemble another thing[28] and when a counterfeit coin is such an imitation of a genuine one as might deceive people, the presumption of an intention to deceive arises.[29] The limitation need not be exact[30] but must be sufficient to deceive persons using customary caution in receiving money. Thus, a trifling variation in effigies or arms[31] or the absence of all marks of this kind, in order to imitate worn coin,[32] will not prevent the coin being counterfeit. But the absence of any apparent resemblance[33] is a good defence, unless it is due to the fact that the process of manufacture has been imperfectly carried out or interrupted at an early state.[34]

Thus, where a person was apprehended whilst dipping round blanks of brass silver to aqua fortis which gave them the appearance of lead, but, when rubbed, they gave the appearance of silver, it was held that he was guilty of counterfeiting coin.[35]

4. Worn out Impression--Effect

A blank that is smooth and made like a piece of legal coin, the impression of which is worn out and yet sufficient to remain in circulation, is sufficiently counterfeited to the similitude of the current coin of the realm to bring the coiners of such blanks within the statute; these blanks having some reasonable likeness to that coin which has been defeated by time, and yet passed in circulation.[36]1763

A files a genuine sovereign round the edge so as to reduce it by 1/24, and adds a new milling. A is guilty of counterfeiting coin.[37]

5. Consequences of Restoring a Coin to its Original State

To restore a coin to its original state does not amount to counterfeiting, unless the coin had been materially altered at any time, e.g., to remove a ring from a coin which has formed part of the necklace or other ornament and to work up the face of the coin where the ring had been attached.[38]

It is not necessary that the counterfeit coin should be counterfeit of a current coin.[39] To counterfeit a coin of Emperor Akbar's time is, however, not an offence under ss 230-231 of the IPC, since the test of 'money' is the possibility of its being used as a current medium of exchange in the market.[40]

6. 'Performs any Part of the Process of Counterfeiting'

The offence of uttering or putting in circulation is deemed complete even if the counterfeiting is not finished or perfected, nor is the coin in a fit state to be uttered.[41]

7. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no time limit for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I, (name and officer of magistrate, etc), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the..... day of..... at....., counterfeited (or knowingly performed any part of the process of counterfeiting, to wit.....) a coin to wit..... and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 231 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Proof

To establish an offence under this section the prosecution must prove:

(i) that the accused knowingly counterfeited or performed any part of the process of counterfeiting; and
(ii) that the article counterfeited, or intended to be counterfeited, was a coin.1764

Counterfeiting Indian coin.--

Whoever counterfeits, or knowingly performs any part of the process of counterfeiting [43][Indian coin], shall be punished with [44][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section penalises counterfeiting the Indian coin. The only difference between this and the preceding section is that this section imposes a heavier penalty than the previous section. The protection of the coin of the country is greater, hence the offence under this section is visited with heavier penalties.

Commentary under the same heading in s 235 may be referred to.

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'Queen's coin' were replaced by the words 'Indian coin' both in the margin and in the body of the section by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The words 'imprisonment for life' were substituted for the words 'transportation for life' by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Schedule.

3. 'Counterfeits'

Commentary under ss 28 and 231 may be referred to.

If coins are made to resemble genuine coins and the intention of the makers is merely to use them in order to foist a false case upon their enemies, those coins do not come within the definition of 'counterfeit coins' given in the IPC .[45]

4. Coining of False Rupee not for Gain--Effect

Where coining of false rupees was not done for the purpose of making gain by passing the false coins off on the public as good ones, but for the purpose of getting them secretly into the houses of the enemies of the accused against whom they were1765 making false charge to the police of theft accompanied by a request for a house search; it was held that there was no counterfeiting of Indian coin and that the accused could not be convicted under this section, though they might be convicted under s 235 for possessing instruments or material for counterfeiting.[46]

5. Intention to Deceive Sufficient

In order to constitute offences under ss 232 and 235, it is not necessary to prove that the specious coins should go into circulation and be used as money. It is sufficient that there was an intention to practise deception by means of the imitation.[47]

It is not an offence under this section to remove the ring from a coin which has been used to form part of a necklace or other ornaments and to work up the face of the coin wherefrom the ring has been removed.[48]

6. 'Knowingly'

Where a person was charged with having parted with a double piece coin, whitened with quick-silver, for the purpose of changing it for copper-coins as rupees; it was held that he was not liable to be convicted under s 241, unless, at the time of whitening the coin, he intended thereby to practise deception, or knew it to be likely that deception would thereby be caused. Otherwise, the accused could be convicted of abetting the person, to whom the coin was given, to cheat the person to whom he was sent with the counterfeit rupee.[49] The fact that the accused has previously uttered counterfeit money, may be proved to show guilty knowledge under this section.[50]

7. 'Performs any Part of the process'

Notes to s 231 may be referred to.

8. 'Indian Coin'

Section 230 and discussion thereunder may be referred to.

9. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a court of session. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no time-limit for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

10. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I, (name and office of sessions judge, etc), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the ..... day of..... at....., did counterfeit (or knowingly performed any part of the process of counterfeiting) an Indian coin, to1766 wit....., and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 232 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

11. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution has to prove:

(i) that the accused counterfeited or knowingly performed any part of the process of counterfeiting;
(ii) that the article counterfeited or intended to be counterfeited was an Indian coin.

Asking the accused to give a demonstration of preparing the counterfeit coin was held amounting to be witness against himself,[51] and as such is not punishable in law.

The minimum that would be required for prosecution to establish a charge under ss 232 and 235, IPC is that it establishes that the coins seized resembled the original and that the resemblance is such that it would deceive a person or that the accused knew that if the coin is used it would be likely to deceive a person. Merely by seizing the equipment and the coins found in the flat, the prosecution cannot establish its case against the accused. There cannot be a presumption that the equipment was being used for counterfeiting coins or that the coins found in the flat resemble genuine coins. Unless there is intrinsic evidence on record to show that the coins indeed resemble genuine coins, it is difficult to accept the case of the prosecution.[52]

In order to sustain a conviction under this section, the prosecution must show that the accused himself counterfeited, or knowingly performed any part of the process of counterfeiting the Indian coin. Direct evidence on such point is difficult and sometimes it is a matter of inference in the circumstances.[53]

12. Sentence

Separate sentences cannot be passed on an accused person for offences under this section and s 235 for counterfeiting an Indian coin and having in his possession instruments used for counterfeiting such coin.[54] It is not incumbent that when substantive terms of imprisonment are awarded any fine should be super added to those sentences. The fine imposed by the lower court in respect of all the three offences was accordingly cancelled.[55]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XII

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 233.

Making or selling instrument for counterfeiting coin.--

Whoever makes or mends, or performs any part of the process of making or mending, or buys, sells or disposes of, any die or instrument, for the purpose of being used, or knowing or having reason to believe that it is intended to be used, for the purpose of counterfeiting coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either1767 description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

Making or selling any die or instrument for the purpose of being used for counterfeiting coin or Indian coin is punishable under ss 233 and 234, IPC respectively. Such conduct might, however, be justified under s 76 or s 79, e.g., a die-sinker acting in concert with the police[56] or mint authorities.[57] A prisoner went to a die-sinker and ordered four dies of the size of a shilling to be made, stating them to be for two whist clubs. Before making them, the die-sinker communicated with the officers of the mint, who directed him to execute the prisoner's order, which he did by making the first and third dies, and from these counterfeit shillings could be coined. It was held that the prisoner was the principal as the die-sinker was an innocent agent.[58] It is not necessary to show that a coin has actually been made with the instrument.[59]

2. Analogous Law

This section is analogous to s 9 of the English Coinage Act 1946[60] under which:

> Every person who, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused), knowingly makes or mends, or begins or proceeds to make or mend, or buys or sells, or has in his possession, any puncheon, counter-puncheon, matrix, stamp, die, pattern or mould in or upon which there is made or impressed, or which will make or impress, or which is adopted and intended to make or impress, the figure, stamp or apparent resemblance of both or either of the sides of any current gold or silver (Cupro-nickel) coin or any part of both or either sides, shall be guilty of felony and on conviction thereof liable to imprisonment for life.

3. 'Performs any Part of the Process'

It is enough if the puncheon, etc., impress a resemblance, whether exact or not, to the genuine coin such as would impose upon the world.[61]

If one is found to be associated with the performance of any part of the process of making or mending of any die or instrument, which is used, or which he knows, or has reason to believe, is intended to be used, for the purpose of counterfeiting coin, he is punishable under this part of the section. The offence of uttering or putting in1768 circulation is deemed complete even if the counterfeiting is not finished or perfected, nor the coin is in a fit state to be uttered.[62]

4. 'Reason to Believe'

Commentary under s 26 may be referred to.

5. 'Counterfeiting'

Commentary under ss 28, 231 and 232 may be referred to.

6. 'Instruments of Counterfeiting'

The following are common instruments used for counterfeiting:

(i) a galvanic battery;[63]
(ii) a press for coinage;[64]
(iii) a puncheon for coining, though without a counter-puncheon;[65]
(iv) a collar for gaining edges of coin;[66]
(v) a lead mould bearing a stamp of a coin.[67]

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within three years.[68]

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc), hereby charge you (name of accused), as follows:

That on or about the.....day of..... at ..... you made (or mended or performed any part of the process of making or mending or bought or sold or disposed of) a certain die (or instrument) to wit..... for the purpose of being used (or knowing or having reason to believe that it was intended to be used) for counterfeiting a coin, to wit ..... (or a piece of Indian coin, to wit.....), and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 233, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Proof

In a prosecution under this section, the following facts have to be proved that:1769

(i) the accused made, or mended, or performed some part of the process of making or mending any die or instrument or that he bought, sold or disposed of it; and

(ii)

(a) the accused did so intending or knowing that such die or instrument would be used for the purpose of counterfeit coin; or

(b) he knew, or had reason, to believe that the same was intended to be used for such purpose.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XII

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 234.

Making or selling instrument for counterfeiting Indian coin.--

Whoever makes or mends, or performs any part of the process of making or mending, or buys, sells or disposes of, any die or instrument, for the purpose of being used, or knowing or having reason to believe that it is intended to be used, for the purpose of counterfeiting [69][Indian coin], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with the same offence which is covered by the preceding section, the only difference being that this section relates to Indian coin and provides for an enhanced punishment.

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'Indian coin' were substituted for the words 'Queen's coin' both in the margin and the body by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950.

3. Analogous Law

This section is analogous to s 3 of the English Coinage Act 1946[70] which runs as follows:

> Every person who, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused), knowingly makes or mends, or begins or proceeds to make or mend, or buys or sells, or has, in his possession, any instrument, tool or engine adapted and intended for the counterfeiting of any current copper coin, shall be guilty of felony and on conviction thereof liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years.

4. 'Performs any Part of the Process'

If one is found to be associated with the performance of any part of the process of making or ending of any die or instrument, which is used, or which, he knows, or has reason to believe, is intended to be used, for the purpose of counterfeiting coin, he is1770 punishable under this part of the section. It is enough if the puncheon, etc., impress a resemblance whether exact or not, to the genuine coin such as would impose upon the world.[71]

5. 'Reason to Believe'

Commentary under s 26 may be referred to.

6. 'Indian Coin'

Notes under s 230 may be referred to.

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a court of session. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no time limit for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and office sessions judge, etc), hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the ..... day of..... at....., did make (or mend or perform any part of the process of making or mending, to wit....., or buy, sell or dispose of) a certain die (or instrument for the purpose of being used or knowing, or having reason to believe that it was intended to be used) for counterfeiting an Indian coin, to wit....., and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 234 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Proof

In a prosecution under this section, the following facts have to be established:

(i) that the accused made, or mended, or performed some part of the process of making or mending any die or instrument or that he bought, sold or disposed it of; and

(ii)

(a) that the accused did so intending or knowing that such die or instrument might be used for the purpose of counterfeiting Indian coin; or
(b) that he knew or had reason to believe that the same was intended to be used for such purpose.

It is not necessary to allege or prove any intent. The felony consists of knowingly being in possession of a die or instrument and the guilty knowledge required is merely that of being in possession of the die or instrument contrary to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, ie, without lawful authority or excuse. A guilty intention to use the die is not necessary.[72]1771

Chapter XII

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 235.

Possession of instrument, or material for the purpose of using the same for counterfeiting coin.--

Whoever is in possession of any instrument or material, for the purpose of using the same for counterfeiting coin, or knowing or having reason to believe that the same is intended to be used for that purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

if Indian coin.--and if the coin to be counterfeited is [73][Indian coin], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope--Legislative Changes

Before an offence could be made out under s 235, IPC it is obligatory on the prosecution to prove not only the possession of the instrument or the material mentioned therein, but also to prove that the possession was with the intention of using the same for the purpose of counterfeiting coins or with full knowledge and belief that it was intended to be used for that purpose. If the necessary intention, knowledge or belief is not proved, a person could not be convicted under this section by a mere proof of physical possession of an instrument or material.[74]

The words 'Indian coin' were substituted for the words 'Queen's coin' both in the margin and the body by the Adaptation of Laws Orders 1950.

2. Analogous Law

This section is analogous to s 9(2) of the English Coinage Act 1946[75] which runs as follows:

> Every person who, without lawful authority or excuse (the proof whereof shall lie on the person accused), makes or mends, or begins or proceeds to make or mend, or buys or sells, or has in his possession--
> (a) any edger, edging or other tool, collar, instrument or engine adapted and intended for the marking of coin round the edges with letters, grainings or other makes or figures apparently resembling those on the edges of any current gold or silver coin, knowing it to be so adapted and intended as aforesaid; or > (b) any press for coinage, or any cutting engine for cutting by force of a screw or of any other contrivance round blanks out of gold, silver or other metal or mixture1772 of metals, or any other machine, knowing the press to be a press for coinage or knowing the engine or machine to have been used or to be intended to be used for the false making or counterfeiting of any current gold or silver coin.

3. Possession under English Law

Under s 17(c) of the English Coinage Act 1946,[76]

> A thing shall be deemed to be in the possession of any person, if he himself has it in his personal custody or possession, and also if he knowingly and wilfully has it in the actual custody or possession of some other person, or in some building or place (whether belonging to or occupied by himself or not), and whether he has it for his own use or benefit or for that of any other persons.

4. What Is Possession?

The following are instances of 'custody or possession':[77]

(i) a person acting in association with another who has pleaded guilty to having the 'matter' in his possession;
(ii) a person who being the tenant or occupier of a house knowingly sublets a room to another who has the 'matter' in his possession; or who
(iii) knows that a lodger in his house has in his possession, and makes use of the 'matter' in the room which he (the lodger) occupies.

Connotation of Possession

The word 'possession' connotes the intention to exercise power or control over the object possessed (animus sibi habendi) and, therefore, necessarily implies that the possessor has been conscious of the possibility of exercising that power or control. The mere physical relation arising from the possession of the object is insufficient.

It is clear from the wording of s 235, IPC, that it is the possession of an instrument or material for the purpose counterfeiting that is made punishable, not the knowledge that someone else is in such possession.[78] The mere possession of such instrument or material is not enough, such possession should be coupled with intention of using the same for the purpose of counterfeiting coins or with full knowledge and belief that it was intended to be used for that purpose.[79]

Possession to be Voluntary and Conscious

The possession contemplated in this section is not possession, which has never been voluntary, and for the purpose of bringing home to any person the voluntary possession of any object, the mere proof of a fact, of which he knows nothing, would be valueless. The section no doubt also requires, in the accused person, intention or knowledge as to the use to be made of the objects in possession, and these might be implied from the nature of the objects themselves. But before that stage is reached, there must be some circumstance indicating such intention or knowledge as is inseparable from the notion of conscious retention implied in the word 'possession'.1773 Such indication may arise from the position of the object in a place which is constantly used by the person accused and which could not be overlooked by him or from the bulk of the object itself or from any circumstance, such as the locking up of the object, which would point to voluntary and conscious possessions.[80]

Possessor of Material need not be Owner of Building

All that is required to convict a person under this section is that he should be in possession of material for counterfeiting. It is not necessary that he should be the owner of the building in which the material was found stored.[81]

Where a person, who was passing counterfeit Indian coins, was, on being chased, found in possession of instruments or metals used for counterfeiting coin, it was held that he should be convicted under s 235 and not under s 240, as the latter did not apply to the actual coins.[82]

Possession must be Exclusive

'Possession' in this section means an exclusive possession. A man is not in possession of instruments which are found in a box to which others also have access.[83]

Possession of Wife or Servant

Under s 27 of the IPC, the possession of a wife, clerk or servant on account of a husband or master is deemed by law to be the possession of the latter.[84] But it is not so if a servant, e.g., has physical possession for his own purposes as distinguished from the interest of his employers.[85]

The police searched A's house in his absence and found his wife and three other persons in a room, on the table of which was a coining mould. A was arrested on his return. He had passed a bad half-crown thirteen days earlier. A was held guilty of possession.[86]

Mere Knowledge of Someone's Possession not Punishable

It is clear from the wordings of this section, that it is the possession of any instrument or material for the purpose of counterfeiting that is made punishable, not the knowledge that someone else is in such possession. The mere fact that a wife knows that certain implements and materials are in the possession of her husband and the place where those implements and materials are kept, does not necessarily indicate that she herself is in possession of those articles and she cannot be convicted under this section.[87]1774

Possession of Member of Joint Family

The observation of their Lordships of the Allahabad High Court in the case of Queen-Empress v Sangam Lal ,[88] may possibly lend support to the view that presumption as to possession and control of articles found in a house may be made against the housemaster. The presumption that a managing member of a joint family is in possession of the family house is not irrebuttable. It depends upon the circumstances of each case. Where the articles found are large properties and placed in a conspicuous place to which the managing member may have access and over which he could exercise control and which could not be overlooked by him, the presumption against him may fairly be made.[89] But in a case where the articles are small, the presumption cannot be properly raised. Although the managing member as the head of the family is supposed to have control over the house, it is impossible for him to know of tiny things placed by a junior member in a place which is not shown to have been in direct control of the managing member.[90]

When instruments and materials for counterfeiting coins are found in a house and it is sought to fix responsibility upon any member of the family, except the head of the family, it is necessary to prove that the possession and control were not only with the head of the family but with the subordinate members also. The mere fact that a wife knows that certain implements and materials are in the possession of her husband and the place where those implements and material are kept, does not necessarily indicate that she herself is in possession of those articles and cannot be convicted under s 235 of the IPC .[91] This view of the Patna High Court was approved and followed by the Lahore High Court.[92] It has been observed in Queen-Empress v Sangam Lal [93] as follows:

> We are not disposed in the present case to depart from the well known rule of law that where articles are found in a house in such place or place as several persons living in the house may have access to there is no presumption as to possession and control that those articles are in the possession and control of any other person than the housemaster.

But their Lordships further observed:

> We do not lay it down as an invariable rule that where weapons are found in a house occupied by a Hindu family living jointly, possession is necessarily that of the managing member, and the managing member only; but we do lay down that in all such cases where it is sought to establish that possession and control are with some member of the family other than the managing member, there must be good and clear evidence of the fact before we can in an act of this kind, arrive at such a conclusion.

5. 'Instruments of Counterfeiting'

Synopsis note 6 under s 233 may be referred to.

The court has to be convinced of the fact, which may of course be by a necessary inference (but the inference must be the only possible inference) that the1775 dies are capable of striking a complete coin which the accused intended to manufacture.[94]

6. 'Knowing'

Before an offence can be made out under this section, it is incumbent upon the prosecution to prove not only the possession of the instrument or material, but also to prove that the possession was with the intention of using the same for the purpose of counterfeiting coin or with full knowledge and belief that it was intended to be used for that. If the prosecution fails to prove the necessary intention, knowledge or belief, a person cannot be convicted under the section by a mere proof of physical possession of an instrument or material.[95] The fact within the knowledge of one that someone else is in possession of such instrument or material does not make the former liable under this section.[96] Mere possession of instruments and materials capable of counterfeiting coins is no offence. To constitute an offence under this section possession of such instrument should be with the intention of counterfeiting coins and the intention must be proved to establish the charge. Where false coins are made only for the purpose of passing them secretly into the house of the coiner's enemy in order to get him into trouble, the persons making those coins and in possession of the instruments and materials used therefore are neither guilty under s 232 nor under this section.[97]

Merely by seizing the equipment and the coins found in the flat, the prosecution cannot establish its case against the accused. There cannot be presumption that the equipment was being used for counterfeiting coins or that the coins found in the flat resemble genuine coins. The conviction of the appellants under s 237, IPC was set aside.[97a]

7. 'Having Reason to Believe'

Section 26, and the notes thereunder may be referred to.

8. 'For that Purpose'

The offence under this section consists in the possession of moulds etc., capable of being used to manufacture a counterfeit coin. The prosecution is bound to adduce evidence to show that the moulds were capable of producing a counterfeit coin. Broken moulds are of no use for such purpose, though there may be evidence of coining having been previously carried on.[98] In R v Macmillan ,[99] Maule J, seems to have ruled that a mould must be something with which a coin can be made and to have directed an acquittal where a mould, having a perfect impression of one side of a shilling, had no channel through which the metal could run.1776

The court has to be convinced of the fact, which may of course be by a necessary inference (but the inference must be the only possible inference) that the dies are capable of striking a complete coin which the accused intended to manufacture. The fitness of the material for the purpose of counterfeiting a coin has also to be proved by the prosecution.[1]

9. 'Indian Coin'

Section 230 may be referred to.

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non- bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a court of session, if the coin is an Indian coin, otherwise by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under para 1 of this section is three years. There is no time limit for taking cognizance of the offence under the second para.

11. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I, (name and office of sessions judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That on or about the.....day of.....at .....you were in possession of a certain instrument (or material) to wit.....(mention it) for the purpose of using the said instrument for counterfeiting a coin, (or Indian coin) to wit.....or knowing (or having reason to believe) that the said instrument was intended to be used for the purpose of counterfeiting, etc, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 235 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

12. Proof

For a conviction under this section, the following facts have to be established that:

(i) the accused was in possession of an instrument or material; and
(ii) the instrument or material was for the purpose of using for counterfeiting coin, or Indian coin, or, the accused knew or had reason to believe that the same was intended to be used for that purpose.

The minimum that would be required for prosecution to establish a charge under ss 232 and 235 is that it establishes that the coins seized resembled the original and that the resemblance is such that it would deceive a person or that the accused knew that if the coin is used it would be likely to deceive a person. Merely by seizing the equipment and the coins found in the flat, the prosecution cannot establish its case against the accused. There cannot be a presumption that the equipment was being used for counterfeiting coins or that the coins found in the flat resemble genuine1777 coins. Unless there is intrinsic evidence on record to show that the coins indeed resemble genuine coins, it is difficult to accept the case of the prosecution.[2]

It is obligatory on the prosecution to prove not only the possession of the instrument or the material mentioned in s 235, IPC, but also to prove that the possession was with the intention of using the same for the purpose of counterfeiting coins or with full knowledge and belief that it was intended to be used for that purpose. If the necessary intention, knowledge or belief is not proved, a person cannot be convicted under this section by mere proof of physical possession of an instrument or material.[3]

The court has to be convinced of the fact, which may of course be by a necessary inference (but the inference must be the only possible inference) that the dies are capable of striking a complete coin which the accused intended to manufacture. The fitness of the material for the purpose of counterfeiting coin has also to be proved by the prosecution.[4]

To deprive the court of the benefit of looking at dies and moulds (on account of non-production) is a serious infirmity which must be held to be fatal to the prosecution case.[5]

13. Sentence

Having regard to s 71, separate sentences cannot be passed under s 232 and under this section for possession of instruments used for counterfeiting the coins in question.[6] The offence of counterfeiting a coin is no doubt very serious and an exemplary sentence should be given. At the same time when a man is being convicted for being in possession of instruments or materials for counterfeiting coin, it is hardly right to convict and sentence him separately for being in possession of various parts of such instruments or materials.[7]

In the case of NV Rao v State of Andhra Pradesh ,[8] the appellant was convicted for the offence under s 235, IPC and was sentenced to 10 years RI. In appeal, the Supreme Court, keeping in view the guilt, need for rehabilitation and deterrence, opined that the prisoner/appellant may serve a sentence of five years which may be long enough for correctional treatment at the same time not unduly long to be regarded as repugnantly harsh sentence. The sentence was accordingly reduced to five years RI.

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 236.

Abetting in India the counterfeiting out of India of coin.--

Whoever, being within [9][India], abets the counterfeiting of coin out of [10][India], shall be1778 punished in the same manner as if he abetted the counterfeiting of such coin within [11][India].

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides for punishment for abetment in India of an offence of counterfeiting coin committed outside India. The person abetting the offence may be an Indian citizen or a foreigner, but he must be in India and the abetment in India must be complete.

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'British India' were substituted by the words 'the Provinces' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1948, which were later substituted by the words 'the States' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The word 'India' was subsequently substituted for the words 'the States' by Act 3 of 1951.

3. 'Abets'

Section 107 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

4. 'Counterfeiting'

Sections 28 and 231 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a court of session. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance.

6. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and office of sessions judge, etc) here charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That on or about the.....day of.....at.....you being in India abetted.....the counterfeiting of coin out of India at.....and you thereby committed an offence under section 236 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

7. Proof

For a conviction under this section, the following facts have to be established that:

(i) the accused abetted the commission of the offence of counterfeiting coin;1779
(ii) the counterfeiting of coin was out of India; and
(iii) at the time of such abetment, the accused was in India.

9 The words 'British India' have successively been substituted by the AO 1948, the AO 1950 and Act 3 of 1951, s 3 and Schedule to read as above.

10 The words 'British India' have successively been substituted by the AO 1948, the AO 1950 and Act 3 of 1951, s 3 and Schedule to read as above.

11 The words 'British India' have successively been substituted by the AO 1948, the AO 1950 and Act 3 of 1951, s 3 and Schedule to read as above.

Chapter XII

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 237.

Import or export of counterfeit coin.--

Whoever imports into [12][India], or exports therefrom, any counterfeit coin, knowing or having reason to believe that the same is counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

The words 'British India' were replaced by the words 'the Provinces' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1948. Subsequently, by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950, the words 'the Provinces' were replaced by the words 'the States'. Finally, the words 'the States' were substituted by the word 'India' by Act 3 of 1951.

2. Analogous law

The offence under this section consists of importing or exporting any counterfeit coin, knowing, or having reason to believe, that the same is counterfeit.

3. 'Counterfeit'

Synopsis notes to ss 28 and 232 may be referred to.

4. 'Reason To Believe'

Synopsis notes to s 26 may be referred to.

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance.

6. Charge

The following form of the charge maybe adopted:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That on or about the.....day of.....at.....you imported into (or exported from) .....a place in India, certain pieces of coins (or Indian coins) to wit.....(mention the coins) then knowing (or having reason to believe) that the same were counterfeit,1780 and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 237 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance or the cognizance of this Court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

7. Proof

For a conviction under this section the following points have to be proved:

(i) that the accused imported into, or exported from, India some coins;
(ii) that such coins were counterfeit; and
(iii) that the accused knew or had reason to believe that they were counterfeit.

Chapter XII

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 238.

Import or export of counterfeits of the India coin.--

Whoever imports into [13][India], or exports therefrom, any counterfeit coin, which he knows or has reason to believe to be a counterfeit of [14][Indian coin], shall be punished with [15][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with the import and export of Indian coins just as the last section dealt with import and export of other coins. The punishment prescribed by this section is heavier than that prescribed by the previous section as the import or export is of Indian coins.

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'British India' were substituted by the words 'the Provinces' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1948. The words 'the Provinces' were substituted by the words 'the States' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The words 'the Queen's coin' both in the margin and the body were substituted by the words 'Indian coin' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The word 'India' was substituted for the words 'the States' by Act 3 of 1951. The words 'imprisonment for life' were substituted for the words 'transportation for life' by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Schedule.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a court of session. A warrant shall ordinarily issue at the first instance. There is no time limit prescribed for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.1781

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and office of sessions judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That on or about the.....day of.....at.....you imported into (or export from) India, counterfeit Indian coins (specify the amount and name of the coins) knowing (or having reason to believe) that the said coins were counterfeit, and that you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 238 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Sessions (or High Court).
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge.

5. Proof

In a prosecution under this section, the following points have to be proved:

(i) that the accused imported into, or exported from India, Indian coins;
(ii) that such coins were counterfeit; and
(iii) that the accused knew, or had reason to believe, that they were counterfeit.

13 The words 'British India' have successively been substituted by the AO 1948, the AO 1950 and Act 3 of 1951, s 3 and Schedule to read as above.

14 Substituted by the AO 1950, for 'the Queen's coin'.

15 Substituted by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Schedule, for 'transportation for life' (wef 1-1-1956).

Delivery of coin, possessed with knowledge that it is counterfeit.--

Whoever, having any counterfeit coin, which at the time when he became possessed of it he knew to be counterfeit, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed delivers the same to any person, or attempts to induce any person to receive it, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope and Object

Three classes of offences are created by ss 239 - 243, IPC, which deal with possession and delivery of coins:

(i) passing off coin known to be counterfeit from the time of obtaining it (ss 239 - 240, IPC).
(ii) passing off such coin which was for the first time discovered to be counterfeit after its receipt (s 241, IPC); and
(iii) being in wrongful possession of coin known all along to have been counterfeit (ss 242 - 243, IPC).

Further sub-divisions of classes first and third arise, according to the fact that the counterfeit coin is Indian or otherwise.[16]1782

The offence for which punishment is provided by this section is not the offence committed by the coiner. It is directed against a person other than the coiner, who procures or obtains or receives counterfeit coin and not to the offences committed by the coiner.[17]

The object of ss 239 - 241, IPC is to penalise all fraudulent circulation of false coin. A distinction, is however, made between a professional and a casual utterer of false coins, in the matter of punishment, as the former is subject to the penalties in this and the next section, whereas, the casual offender is made subject to the more lenient penalties of s 241, IPC . The distinction between these two classes of offenders was explained by the authors to be very material:

> A professional utterer is a helpmate of the professional coiner and is, therefore, an offender in equal degree. A causal receiver of false coins may, however, be himself imposed upon; but, if he tries to retrieve his loss by passing it on to another, he would naturally be guilty of dishonesty, but the authors regarded it as comparatively venial, and hence the difference in punishment.[18]

The authors of the Code say:

> An utterer by profession, an utterer who is the agent employed by the coiner to bring counterfeit coin into circulation, is guilty of a very high offence. Such an utterer stands to the coiner in a relation not very different from that in which a habitual receiver of stolen goods stands to a thief. He makes coining a far less perilous and a far more lucrative pursuit than it would otherwise be. He passes his life in a systematic violation of the law, and in the systematic practice of fraud in one of its most pernicious forms. He is one of the most mischievous, and is likely to be one of the most depraved of criminals. But a causal utterer, an utterer who is not an agent for bringing counterfeit coin into circulation, but who having heedlessly received a bad rupee in the course of his business takes advantage of the heedlessness of the next person with whom he deals, to pay that bad rupee away is an offender of a very different class. He is undoubtedly guilty of a dishonest act, but of one of the most venial of dishonest acts. It is an act which proceeds not from greediness for unlawful gain, but from a wish to avoid, by unlawful means it is true, that what to a poor man may be a severe loss. It is an act which has no tendency to facilitate or encourage the operations of the coiner. It is an occasional act, an act which does not imply that the person who commits it is a person of lawless habits. We think, therefore, that the offence of a causal utterer is perhaps the least heinous of all the offences into which fraud enters.

> We considered whether it would be advisable to make it an offence in a person to have in his possession at one time a certain number of counterfeit coins, without being able to explain satisfactorily how he came by them. It did not, after much discussion, appear to us advisable to recommend this or any similar provision. We entertained strong objections to the practice of making circumstances which are in truth only evidence of an offence part of the definition of an offence; nor do we see any reason for departing in this case from our general rule.

> Whether a person who is possessed of bad money knows the money to be bad, and whether, knowing it to be bad, he intends to put it in circulation, are questions to be decided by the tribunals according to the circumstances of the case, circumstances of which the mere number of the pieces is only one and may be one of the least important. A few bad rupees which should evidently be fresh from the stamp would be stronger evidence than a greater number of bad rupees which appeared to have been in circulation for years. A few bad rupees all obviously coined with the same die, would be stronger evidence than a greater number obviously coined with different dies. A few1783 bad rupees placed by themselves, and unmixed with good ones, would be far stronger evidence than a much larger number which might be detected in a large mass of treasure.[19]

2. Counterfeit

Commentary under s 28 may be referred to. It is not necessary that the counterfeit coin should be the counterfeit of a current coin.

3. 'Which, at the Time when he became Possessed of it, knew to be Counterfeit'

The words 'which at the time when he became possessed of it he knew to be counterfeit' point to a person other than the coiner, that is to say, the person who procures or obtains or receives a counterfeit coin. It is against such a person that the section is directed.[20]

4. Direct Proof of Fabrication not Necessary

Where the charge is one of counterfeiting Indian coin, direct proof of fabrication is not necessary to render the person punishable under the sections of the IPC with reference to the uttering of false coin. All that is required is a guilty knowledge of the spuriousness of the coin at the time of receiving possession of it or the absence of such guilty knowledge at first.[21]

Where the accused persons were goldsmiths, it was presumed that when they became possessed of the pagodas in question, they knew them to be counterfeit.[22]

5. 'Fraudulently'

Commentary under ss 25 and 263 may be referred to.

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non- bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no time limit for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

7. Charge

The charge under this section may be worded as follows:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That on or about the.....day of.....at.....you had a piece or.....(specify the number) of counterfeit coins to wit.....which at the time you became possessed of it (or them), you knew to be counterfeit, and which you fraudulently (or with intent that fraud may be committed) delivered to AB (or attempted to induce AB to receive it or them) and you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 239 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.1784

8. Proof

Evidence of the possession and attempted disposal of coins of the unusual kind is relevant to a charge of uttering such coins soon afterwards when the factum of uttering is denied.[23] In 2 and 3 Will 4 Cr 34 s 7 (Rep), where the prisoner had entered a shop and asked for tea and sugar, and had in payment placed on the counter a counterfeit shilling but on being told that it was bad, had left the shop and left the coin behind, it was held that a charge of uttering and putting off was proved by evidence.[24]

Offences made punishable under this section and s 240 are separate and distinct offences and s 220, CrPC, permits of double conviction and consecutive sentences as s 71, IPC, is obviously not applicable.[25]

S. 240.

Delivery of Indian coin, possessed with knowledge that it is counterfeit.--

Whoever, having any counterfeit coin which is a counterfeit of [26][Indian coin], and which, at the time when he became possessed of it, he knew to be a counterfeit of [27][Indian coin], fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, delivers the same to any person, or attempts to induce any person to receive it, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The offence under this section is an aggravated form of the offence under the preceding section. The only difference between s 239, IPC and this section is that while s 239 is in relation to any counterfeit coin other than the Indian coin, this section is in relation to counterfeit Indian coin. It is obviously impossible for a person who commits an offence under s 239 to commit a further act in respect of the same coin which will make him liable under this section. In other words, there is no part of s 240, IPC which if absent, would leave an offence under s 239 .[28]

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'the Queen's coin' were substituted by the words 'Indian coin' both in the margin and the body of the section by the Adaptation of Laws Orders 1950.1785

3. 'Counterfeit'

Sections 28 and 231*ante,* may be referred to.

4. 'Knew to be a Counterfeit of Indian Coin'

Knowledge on the part of the accused that the coin was counterfeit, when they first came to possess it, is an element of the offence defined in ss 240 and 243 .[29] The fact that the accused delivered certain counterfeits of the Indian coin knowing them to be counterfeit is not enough for a conviction under this section. The knowledge that the coins were counterfeit at the time the accused became possessed of them has also to be established.[30] For a conviction under this section the point of time to be considered in connection with the offence is the time when the accused became possessed of the false coins and it has to be shown that at that particular time the accused knew that the coins were not genuine.[31] The prosecution may bring out circumstances which might indicate or from which a reasonable presumption could be raised that the accused ought to have known at the time that he became possessed of the coins that they were counterfeit.[32]

5. 'Fraudulently'

Section 25 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and triable by a court of session. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....having in your possession pieces of counterfeit Indian coins, known as.....knowing at the time when you became possessed of the said coins that they were counterfeit, fraudulently (or with intent that fraud might be committed) delivered the same to one AB (or attempted to induce AB to receive the same), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 240 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this Court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court, on this said charge.

8. Proof

The following facts have to be proved in order to prove an offence under this section:

(i) the accused became possessed of counterfeit coin;
(ii) the coin in question is a counterfeit of an Indian coin;1786
(iii) at the time he became possessed of it, the accused had knowledge that it was a counterfeit Indian coin;
(iv) the accused delivered to some person or attempted to induce someone to receive it; and
(v) the accused delivered the same with intention to defraud or intended that a fraud might be committed.

Proof of Guilty Knowledge

It is not always possible or necessary that the particular knowledge be proved by positive evidence. The prosecution may bring out circumstances which might indicate or from which a reasonable presumption could be raised that he knew at the time he became possessed of the coins that they were counterfeit.[33] In a case of this nature it is not always possible or necessary that the particular knowledge should be proved by positive evidence. The prosecution may bring out circumstances which might indicate or from which a reasonable presumption could be raised that the accused ought to have known at the time that she became possessed of the coins that they were counterfeit.[34] Guilty knowledge may be proved either directly or indirectly from surrounding circumstances.[35]

9. Separate Conviction under Sections 240 and 243, Indian Penal Code 1860--Whether and when Permissible

A conviction for an offence under s 243 is no bar to a subsequent trial under s 240, the offence under the two sections being distinct offences.[36] A person having four counterfeit coins in his possession, but uttering only one of them, cannot be separately convicted under this section with respect to one coin and under s 243 regarding the possession of the other three, as an offence, under this section implies prior guilty possession. If such separation were allowable, there might be a conviction for the possession of each coin. The physical acts, though capable of separate existence and perception, coalesce when coincident in time, space and purpose.[37]

10. Sentence

Tampering with an Indian coin is a very serious offence; and to punish it with two months rigorous imprisonment is not calculated to deter coiners from committing it.[38]

Chapter XII

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 241.

Delivery of coin as genuine, which, when first possessed, the deliverer did not know to be counterfeit.--

Whoever delivers to any other person as genuine, or attempts to induce any other person to receive as genuine, any counterfeit coin which he knows to be counterfeit, but which he did not know to be counterfeit at the time when he took it into his possession, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend1787 to two years, or with fine to an amount which may extend to ten times the value of the coin counterfeited, or with both.

Illustration

A, a coiner, delivers counterfeit Company's rupees to his accomplice B, for the purpose of uttering them. B sells the rupees to C, another utterer, who buys them knowing them to be counterfeit. C pays away the rupees for goods to D, who receives them, not knowing them to be counterfeit. D, after receiving the rupees, discovers that they are counterfeit and pays them away as if they were good. Here D is punishable only under this section, but B and C are punishable under section 239 or 240, as the case may be.

Comments

1. Scope

While s 239, IPC dealt with professional utterers, this section deals with a casual utterer of base coin. The offence under this section consists in trying to pass off as genuine a coin which the accused has honestly received, but has subsequently found out to be counterfeit.[39]

2. Essence

The essence of the offence in s 241, IPC, is the delivery of counterfeit coin to any person and three deliveries of counterfeit coin to three different persons are clearly offences of the same kind within the meaning of that term as set out in s 234 of the CrPC .[40]

3. 'As Genuine'--Illustrative Cases

The coin must be delivered as genuine otherwise there will be no offence under this section. If A, in possession of a counterfeit coin, hands it over to a friend in order to prevent its discovery by the police, he commits no offence under the section.[41]

A vagrant entered a shop for drink. The shopkeeper supposing that he had come to commit theft, shut the door and called for a watchman. The vagrant ran away and meeting one Munglee put some coins into his hand and told him to keep them for him. The coins turned out to be counterfeit. A conviction under this section was set aside, as it did not appear that he had passed the coins as genuine or induced Munglee to receive them as genuine.[42]

4. 'Counterfeit'

Notes under ss 28, 231, 232 may be referred to.1788

5. Meaning of 'Which he knows'

The ignorance of the accused as to the nature of the coin when he took it into his possession should be alleged in the charge, though it need not be proved, for if alleged the ignorance will be presumed. A false statement as to how a coin was obtained is prima facie evidence that the accused knew that it was counterfeit,[43] so is the fact that the coin was first tendered for change and was refused on the ground that it was counterfiet.[44] If a person is found in possession of counterfeit coins separated from the genuine ones and he tries to deliver the genuine ones first and the counterfeit ones afterwards and he is unable adequately to explain the purpose behind the separation, it can be inferred that he had knowledge of the counterfeit character of the coins.[45]

6. Possession

Notes under s 235 may be referred to.

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by any magistrate. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within three years.

Where two persons were jointly charged with and convicted under s 241 of the IPC, of passing counterfeit coins on three different occasions on the same day to three different persons it was held that the trial was not illegal within the meaning of ss 234 and 239, CrPC .[46]

8. Charge

The charge under this section should run thus:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That on or about the.....day of.....at .....you delivered to AB as genuine (or attempted to induce AB to receive as genuine) a coin. Ex.....which was counterfeit, and which you then knew to be counterfeit though you did not know it to be counterfeit at the time when you took it into your possession, and you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 241 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

9. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be established that:[47]

(i) the accused delivered or attempted to induce another person to receive a coin;
(ii) the said coin was counterfeit;1789
(iii) the accused delivered or attempted to deliver it as genuine; and
(iv) at the time of delivery he knew it to be counterfeit though he did not know that it was counterfeit when he took it into his possession.

10. Sentence

When a person of position passes off counterfeit coins to others who are not as well off as he is, the matter cannot be dealt with leniently, especially as it is a kind of offence which is difficult to detect.[48]

Possession of counterfeit coin by person who knew it to be counterfeit when he became possessed thereof.--

Whoever, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession of counterfeit coin, having known at the time when he became possessed thereof that such coin was counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The mere possession of counterfeit coin is an offence under this section and s 243, IPC, even though no attempt is made to pass it off, provided it can be shown that it was kept for a fraudulent purpose, and was originally obtained with a guilty knowledge. The mere fact of a single base coin being found in a party's possession would not, without further evidence, be sufficient to create a presumption that he knew it to be counterfeit when he obtained it, and intended to make a fraudulent use of it. But where a considerable number of base coins are found in a man's possession, the presumption of guilt would be sufficient to make a conviction lawful, unless the possession could in some manner be explained or accounted for.[49]

2. Fraudulent

Sections 25 and 463 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

3. 'Possession'

Notes under s 235 may be referred to. For a conviction under this section it must be proved that the accused was in possession of a counterfeit coin with intent to defraud. It must also be shown that at the time he became possessed of the coin he knew it was counterfeit.[50]

4. 'Counterfeit'

Section 28 and notes thereunder may be referred to.1790

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non- bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

6. Charge

The following form of charge under this section may be adopted:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That on or about the .....day of .....at.....you fraudulently (or with intent that fraud might be committed) were in possession of Ex.....being counterfeit coins, knowing at the time when you became possessed of the same that they were counterfeit, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 242 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

7. Proof

To establish an offence under this section the prosecution must prove that:

(i) accused was in possession of a coin;
(ii) the coin was counterfeit;
(iii) he was in possession of it with intent to defraud, or with intent that fraud might be committed; and
(iv) at the time he became possessed of it, he knew it to be counterfeit.

Illustration (e) to s 21 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 reads thus:

A is accused of fraudulently having in his possession counterfeit coin which he knew to be counterfeit.

He offers to prove that he asked a skilful person to examine the coin as he doubted whether it was counterfeit or not, and that the person did examine it and told him it was genuine.

A may prove these facts in his defence as they are explanatory of conduct influenced by facts in issue.

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 243.

Possession of Indian coin by person who knew it to be counterfeit when he became possessed thereof.--

Whoever, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession of counterfeit coin, which is a counterfeit of [51][Indian coin], having known at the time when he became possessed of it that it was counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.1791

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides that whoever, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession of a counterfeit coin, which is a counterfeit of an Indian coin, having known at the time when he became possessed of it that it was counterfeit, shall be punished as stated in the section.[52]

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'the Queen's coin' both in the margin and the body of the section were replaced by the words 'Indian coin' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950.

3. Ingredients of the Offence

To constitute an offence under this section it must be proved that: (a) the accused was in possession of coin; (b) the coin was a counterfeit of the Indian coin; (c) the accused was in such possession fraudulently or with intent to defraud; and (d) at the time he became possessed of such coin he knew it to be counterfeit.

'Fraudulently'

Where in the course of a search of the house of the accused in connection with an offence, counterfeit coins were recovered from a bundle of cloth kept inside a box under lock and key, and it was found that the coins were part of an estate and were sold as such and were purchased by the accused openly in an auction sale and there was no attempt at concealment, and no attempt was made to pass on the coins to other persons as genuine, it was held that it could not be held that the accused was in possession of the coins fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed and therefore, the charge under this section was not proved.[53]

Sections 25 and 463 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

Possession of Coin must be with Knowledge of its Being Counterfeit

In order to find an accused guilty of an offence under this section, it must be proved, inter alia, that at the time of coming into possession of the counterfeit coins, he knew1792 that the coins were counterfeit. If a person who innocently comes into possession of counterfeit coins, discovers later that the coins are counterfeit, he does not thereby become liable to punishment under this section if he retains possession of the coins with him.[54]

Possession--Personal and Constructive

An accused charged under this section may be proved to be in possession if he is in possession in either of two modes, namely: (a) he may be in possession of the coin himself, or (b) he may be in possession of the coin on his account. It is plain that whichever mode of possession is established, it is essential to prove that at the time the accused became possessed of the coin, he knew it to be counterfeit. Section 27 , IPC defines constructive possession and the court is bound to interpret the expression 'in possession' according to that definition.

Possession through Servant

The master becomes possessed, when he personally takes possession on his own account, or when, he authorises the servant to take a thing for him, for his benefit or on his account, or when he consents to, or sanctions, the retention of the thing received by the servant, or knowingly allows the servant to retain in custody for him. If there be prior authority to the servant or arrangement with him to receive, the time when the servant receives is the time when the master becomes possessed. In other cases, the time when the master comes to know or consent or allows the thing to remain with the servant, is the time when he becomes possessed. The master, for purposes of this section, may be in possession in two ways: (a) time when he becomes possessed, and (b) when it can be held that he was 'conscious' of his possession.[55] It is certainly not intended that no person in possession of a house shall be convicted of being in possession of stolen property or counterfeit coin or anything of that kind, if there happen to be other people living in the house and if it cannot be positively established that the person convicted had put the incriminating articles in the place where they were found. It must be shown in the first place that the incriminating articles were found in a place in the possession of the person to be convicted. In the next place it must be shown, either by direct or circumstantial evidence, from which a reasonable inference can be drawn, that the person to be convicted knew that these particular things were in the place where they were found.[56]

Commentary for s 27 may be referred to.

Possession of Large Number of Coins

Merely because the number of counterfeit coins was 85, it would not be conclusive for proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused had come into possession of these coins knowing that they were counterfeit and that he was in possession of these coins fraudulently or with an intent that fraud may be committed.[57]1793

Innocent Possession

Where the accused was a tea-vendor and if customers had been coming to him to tender the counterfeit coins for buying tea, and the coins were not so clearly counterfeit as to make him suspicions of these coins, he may well be considered to have come into possession of these coins innocently.[58]

4. 'Counterfeit Coin'

This section requires that the person must be in possession of counterfeit coin and that the person who was possessed of it must have known at the time when he became possessed of it that it was counterfeit. Section 28 , IPC, defines the expression 'counterfeit', and the essential ingredient of that section is that there must be a resemblance such as to practice deception, although according to expln (1) of that section the imitation need not be exact. But, although the resemblance need not be exact, it is essential that the counterfeit must be of such a character that it would be possible to pass it off as a genuine coin, and unless that is so, it would not be possible to practice deception; and to practice deception is one of the ingredients of the definition of counterfeit in s 28 .[59]

5. 'Indian Coin'

Section 230 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non- bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no time limit for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

7. Charge

The following form of the charge under this section may be adopted:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....fraudulently (orwith intent that fraud might be committed) were in possession of.....pieces of counterfeit Indian coin; knowing at the time when you became possessed of the said coins that they were counterfeit, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 243 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

8. Proof

To sustain a conviction under this section the prosecution must prove that:

(i) the accused was in possession of coins;
(ii) the said coins were counterfeit coins;
(iii) the accused was in possession of them with intent to defraud; and1794
(iv) the accused at the time he became possessed of the coins knew that they were counterfeit.

It has to be established by the prosecution that the accused fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, came into possession of counterfeit coins which were counterfeit of Indian coins, having known at the time he became possessed of them, that they were counterfeit.[60]

9. Knowledge at the time of Obtaining Possession--Presumption and Proof

It is difficult to establish, by positive evidence that a man in whose possession a counterfeit coin is found knew when it came into his possession that it was counterfeit. This difficulty is enhanced when the accused who is in a position to give an explanation refuses to give one. In such a case the guilty knowledge of the accused has to be inferred from the circumstances of the case and the conduct of the accused.[61] The fact that at the time when the accused came into possession of the counterfeit coin for the first time, the accused knew that it was counterfeit need not necessarily be proved by any positive evidence, specially when the accused refuses to give any explanation of his possession and can be inferred from the conduct of the accused and the circumstances of the case. Thus onus in such cases lies on the prosecution to prove that the accused became possessed of the counterfeit coin knowing it to be counterfeit.[62]Section 106 of the Evidence Act 1872 does not entitle the prosecution to throw the onus as regards the time of knowledge on the accused without any qualification, but if the prosecution has succeeded in establishing circumstances suggesting that the petitioner knew at the time he became possessed of the coins that they were counterfeit, then and in that case alone, it would be necessary for the accused to lead evidence to show that it was not at that time he became aware of their counterfeit character.[63]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XII

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 244.

Person employed in mint causing coin to be of different weight or composition from that fixed by law.--

Whoever, being employed in any mint lawfully established in [64][India], does any act, or omits what he is legally bound to do, with the intention of causing any coin issued from that mint to be of a different weight or composition from the weight or composition fixed by law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.1795

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section provides drastic penalties for pilfering of bullion used at the mint for the coinage of money. The provisions of the section apply to those who are employees at the mint, whatever may have been their duties and responsibilities. Section 6 of the Coinage Act[65] 1906, as amended by the Amending Acts, 4 of 1942 and 28 of 1947, provides for coining the coins of such denominations, dimensions, designs and composition as may be prescribed and s 7 provides for prescribing the standard weight and remedy (i.e. variation from the standard weight and fineness) of the coins, which alone can, under s 13 of that Act, be legal tender.

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'the Provinces' were substituted for the words 'British India' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1948. The words 'the Provinces' were substituted by the words 'the State' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The word 'India' was substituted for the words 'the states' by Act 3 of 1951.

3. Object is to Ensure Purity of Coining

The object of this section is to ensure the purity of the coinage and secure its conformity to the legal standard against the acts or omissions of persons employed in the mint. A similar provision is to be found in England also. Not only those who counterfeit coin without authority but even persons employed in the mint or its branches are within the Coinage Offences Act,[66] if for their own lucre they make the money of baser alloy, or lighter than they are authorised and bound by law to do; for they can only justify coining at all under the Coinage Acts and proclamations, and the terms of their appointment; and if they have not pursued that authority it is the same as if they had none. But mere mistake in weight or alloy will not make them guilty; the act must be wilful, corrupt and fraudulent.[67]

4. 'Legally Bound'

Section 43, and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non- bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.1796

6. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in a prosecution under this section:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That, on or about the.....day of.....at.....you being employed as.....in the.....mint lawfully established in India did an act to wit.....(specify the act) or omitted what you were legally bound to do (specify the omission) with the intention of causing the coin issued from the said mint to be of a different weight or composition from the weight or composition fixed by law, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 244 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

7. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused was employed in any mint lawfully established in India;
(ii) as such, he did some act or omitted what he was legally bound to do; and
(iii) the act or omission was with the intention of causing any coin issued from that mint to be of a different weight or composition from the weight or composition fixed by law.

64 The words 'British India' have successively been substituted by the AO 1948, the AO 1950 and Act 3 of 1951, s 3 and Schedule to read as above.

65 The word 'Indian' of the Indian Coinage Act 1906, was omitted by Act 47 of 1975, s 2 (wef 12-8-1975). Now repealed.

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 245.

Unlawfully taking coining instrument from mint.--

Whoever, without lawful authority, takes out of any mint, lawfully established in [68][India], any coining tool or instrument, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The section penalises 'unlawfully taking' coining instruments out of the mint lawfully established in India. Intention is no part of the offence. All that is required is that coining instruments should be taken out of the mint without lawful authority.

2. Legislative Changes

The word 'the Provinces' were substituted for the words 'British India' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1948. The words 'the Provinces' were substituted by the words 'the States' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. The word 'India' was substituted for the words 'the States' by Act 3 of 1951.1797

3. 'Without Lawful Authority'

If the authorities, knowing of a person's intention to remove any coining instrument, allow him to do so, in order to ensure his detention, such authority does not justify the act of the accused.[69]

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no time limit to take cognizance of an offence under this section.

5. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in a prosecution under this section:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of .....at.....without lawful authority, did take out of a mint lawfully established in India to wit, the mint.....a certain coining tool (or instrument), to wit.....and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 245 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of my Court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court, on the said charge.

6. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the tool or instrument in question is a coining tool or instrument;
(ii) it belonged to a mint lawfully established in India; and
(iii) the accused took it out of the mint without lawful authority.

68 The words 'British India' have successively been substituted by the AO 1948, the AO 1950 and Act 3 of 1951, s 3 and Schedule to read as above.

Fraudulently or dishonestly diminishing weight or altering composition of coin.--

Whoever fraudulently or dishonestly performs on any coin any operation which diminishes the weight or alters the composition of that coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.--A person who scoops out part of the coin and puts anything else into the cavity alters the composition of that coin.

Comments

1. Scope

This section and s 247 of the IPC deal with the tampering of coin either by sweating or other means which diminishes its weight or alters its composition.1798

2. Analogous Law

Sections 246 and 247 correspond with s 3 of the English Coinage Act 1946 (as amended by the Criminal Justice Act 1948)[70] which runs as follows:

> (1) Every person who impairs, diminishes or lightens any current gold or silver (cupro-nickel) coin with intent that the coin so impaired, diminished or lightened, may pass, for a current gold or silver (cupro-nickel) coin, shall be guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years...

Section 2(a) of the Coinage Act 1906[71]as amended by the Indian Coinage (Amendment) Act 1947 defines the word 'deface' as follows:

> (a) "deface", with its grammatical variations and cognate expressions, includes clipping, filing, stamping, or such other alteration of the surface or shape of a coin as is readily distinguishable from the effects of reasonable wear.

Section 16 of the Coinage Act 1906 provides that any person authorised by the Central Government shall by himself or another, cut or break the silver coin; if it has been diminished in weight or has been defaced.

Sections 17 and 18 of the said Act provide for the return or payment of the coins so cut to their owners, unless he believes that the coin has been fraudulently defaced. It is provided in the Explanation to s 18 to the said Act that defacing a coin by sweating is deemed to amount to fraudulent defacement.

3. 'Fraudulently'

Section 25 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

4. 'Dishonestly'

Section 24 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

5. Procedure

The offence is cognizable, non- bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

6. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted for a prosecution under this section:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....fraudulently (or dishonestly) performed on the coin, to wit .....an operation which diminished its weight (or altered1799 its composition), and you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 246 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

7. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused performed an operation;
(ii) the thing on which the operation was performed was a coin;
(iii) the operation was performed fraudulently or dishonestly; and
(iv) it diminished its weight or altered its composition.

71 The word 'Indian' of the Indian Coinage Act 1906 was omitted by Act 47 of 1975, s 2 (wef 12-8-1975). Now, repealed

Whoever fraudulently or dishonestly performs on [72][any Indian coin] any operation which diminishes the weight or alters the composition of that coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The only difference between s 246, IPC and this section is that the former deals with the tampering with a coin while this, section deals with the tampering with the Indian coin, either by sweating or other means so as to diminish its weight or alter its composition.

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'any of the Queen's coin' were replaced by the words 'any Indian coin' in the body of the section by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950. By the same order the words 'Queen's coin' were replaced by the words 'Indian coin' in the margin of the section also.

3. Coin with respect to which Offence Defined in Sections 247 or 249 has been Committed

Commentary under s 251 may be referred to.

4. 'Fraudulently'

Section 25 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.1800

5. 'Dishonestly'

The word 'dishonestly' which occurs in this section has been defined in s 24, IPC thus:

> Whoever does anything with the intention of causing wrongful gain to one person, or wrongful loss to another person, is said to do that "thing dishonestly".

Dishonesty With Banks

The banks are not authorised to accept coins which have been fraudulently defaced. If, therefore, a person intentionally defaces a coin and conceals this fact from the bank in order to persuade the bank to accept the coin, he has the intention of causing wrongful gain to himself, even though the bank may not be put to a wrongful loss inasmuch as it has to pay price according to the present weight of the coin. But there would be a wrongful loss to the bank if some silver has been taken away by cutting clipping or filing and the weight is brought up to the required minimum by soldering. The person would therefore be liable under this section.[73]

6. Procedure

The offence is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no time limit for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in a prosecution under this section:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....fraudulently (or dishonestly) performed on an Indian coin, to wit.....an operation which diminished its weight (or altered its composition), and you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 247 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

8. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused performed an operation;
(ii) the thing on which the operation was performed was an Indian coin;
(iii) the operation was performed fraudulently or dishonestly; and
(iv) it diminished its weight or altered its composition.

Altering appearance of coin with intent that it shall pass as coin of different description.--

Whoever performs on any coin any operation which alters the appearance of that coin, with the intention that the said coin shall pass as a coin of a different description, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.1801

Comments

1. Scope

Any performance or operation which alters the appearance of a coin with the intention that the said coin shall pass as a coin of a different description is an offence under this section. The alteration must not diminish the weight of the coin. If so, then ss 246 or 247 will apply.

2. Analogous Law

This section is analogous to s 2 of the English Coinage Act 1946 (as amended by Criminal Justice Act 1948, s 1), which reads thus:

> Every person who:
> (a) Gilds or silvers, or, with any wash or materials capable of producing the colour or appearance of gold or silver by any means whatsoever, washes, cases over or colours:
> (i) any coin whatsoever resembling any current gold or silver (cupro-nickel) coin; or
> (ii) any current copper coin, with intent to make it resemble or pass for any current gold or silver (cupro-nickel) coin; or
> (iii) any piece of silver or copper or of coarse gold or coarse silver or of any metal or mixture of metals; being of a fit size and figure to be coined, with intent that it shall be coined into false and counterfeit coin resembling any current gold or silver (cupro-nickel) coin; or
> (b) Gilds, or with any wash or materials capable of producing the colour or appearance of gold or by any means whatsoever, washes, cases over or colours, any current silver (cupro-nickel) coin with intent to make it resemble or pass for any current gold coin;
> (c) Files or in any manner alters
> (i) any current silver (cupro-nickel) coin with intent to make it resemble or pass for any current gold coin; or > (ii) any current copper coin with intent to make it resemble or pass for any gold or silver (cupro-nickel) coin; > shall be guilty of felony and on conviction thereof be liable to imprisonment for life.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

4. Charge

For a charge under this section, the following form may be adopted:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

1802

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at ..... performed an operation on the coin, Exhibit.....which altered the appearance of the said coin, with the intention that the said coin shall pass as a coin of a different description and you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 248 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I there direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

To establish an offence under this section the prosecution has to prove that:

(i) the accused performed an operation on any coin;
(ii) it altered its appearance; and
(iii) he did so with the intention that the altered coin should pass as a coin of a different description.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Comments

1. Scope

The only difference between the previous section and this section is that in this section the coin altered is an Indian coin and it provides a higher penalty, in other respects, the ingredients of this section are the same as those of the last section.

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'any Indian coin' were substituted for the words 'any of the Queen's coin' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950.

3. 'Indian Coin'

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no time limit for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

6. Charge

For a charge under this section, the following form may be adopted:

I, (name and Office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That on or about the.....day of.....at .....you performed an operation on the Indian coin, Exhibit.....which altered the appearance of the said coin, with the intention that the said coin shall pass as a coin of a different description and you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 249 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

Delivery of coin, possessed with knowledge that it is altered.--

Whoever, having coin in his possession with respect to which the offence defined in section 246 or 248 has been committed, and having known at the time when he became possessed of such coin that such offence had been committed with respect to it, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, delivers such coin to any other person, or attempts to induce any other person to receive the same, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

Sections 250 and 251, IPC are meant to punish persons who trade in spurious or altered coins, and correspond to ss 239 and 240, IPC . In both sections possession with knowledge and fraudulent delivery is essential.

2. 'Fraudulently'

Section 25 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.1804

3. Coin

Coin refers to a coin in respect of which an offence under ss 246 or 248, IPC has been committed. Section 246 , IPC deals with an offence of fraudulently or dishonestly diminishing the weight or altering the composition of a coin. Section 248 , IPC deals with an offence of altering the appearance of a coin with the intention that it shall pass as a coin of different description. This section deals with offences relating to trading in such spurious or altered coins.

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no time limit for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

5. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in a prosecution under this section:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused), as follows:
> That on or about the.....day of.....at.....you had in your possession a coin, to wit.....with respect to which the offence defined in section 246 (or section 248) of the Indian Penal Code had been committed, and having known at the time when you became possessed of the said coin, that such offence had been committed with respect to it, you fraudulently or with intent that fraud might be committed, delivered such coin to AB (or attempted to induce the said AB to receive the same), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 250 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

6. Proof

To establish an offence under this section the prosecution has to prove that:

(i) the coin in the case was one in respect of which an offence under ss 246 or 248 had been committed;
(ii) the accused was in possession of it;
(iii) at the time when he became possessed of it, he knew that any of the said offences had been committed with respect to it;
(iv) he delivered it to some other person, or attempted to induce him to receive the same;

and

(v) he did so fraudulently, or with intent that fraud might be committed.

Delivery of Indian coin, possessed with knowledge that it is altered.--

Whoever, having coin in his possession with respect to which the offence defined in section 247 or 249 has been committed, and having known at the time when he became possessed of such coin that such offence had been committed with respect to it, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, delivers such coin to any other person, or attempts to induce any other person to receive the same, shall be punished with imprisonment1805 of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with Indian coins. The difference between the last and the present section is that the coin possessed in this section is 'Indian coin' for which a higher penalty is prescribed. In all other respects the two are the same.

2. Legislative Changes

The word 'Queen's' in the margin of the section was replaced by the word 'Indian' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950.

3. 'Delivers such Coins'

The mere fact that a coin is used as an ornament by soldering a ring to it does not transform it absolutely into a new article. By removal of the ring, the coin in a defaced form will re-appear and may be capable of being accepted as a coin by ignorant villagers. If these coins are tendered to a bank, they are not tendered as ornaments or other articles into which coins have been transformed, but they are tendered as coins which have been defaced. If, therefore, any person clips and cuts away such coins, makes up their deficient weight by solder and delivers them to a bank, he would be guilty of the offence under this section.[75]

4. Coin with respect to which the Offence Defined in Sections 247 or 249 has been Committed

Sections 247 and 248, IPC both deal with Indian coins. That is the reason for not repeating the word

'Indian' in the body of this section. Section 247 , IPC deals with fraudulently or dishonestly diminishing weight or altering composition of Indian coins, while s 249, IPC deals with the altering of appearance of an Indian coin with the intention that it shall pass as coin of different description. This section deals with offences relating to trade in such spurious or altered Indian coins.

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a court of session. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.1806

6. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in a case under this section:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....had in your possession an Indian coin, to wit.....and in respect of which the offence defined in section 247 (or section 249) of the Indian Penal Code, had been committed, and knowing at the time when you became possessed of the said coin that such offence had been committed, you fraudulently (or with intent that fraud may be committed) delivered such coin to AB (or attempted to induce the said AB to receive the same) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 251 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

7. Proof

To establish an offence under this section it will have to be proved that:

(i) the coin in question was one with respect to which the offence defined in ss 247 or 249, IPC was committed;
(ii) the accused was in possession of it;
(iii) at the time when he became possessed of it, he knew that any of the said offences had been committed;
(iv) he delivered it to someone, or attempted to induce someone to receive it; and
(v) he did so with intent to defraud or with intent that fraud might be committed.

8. Sentence--'And Shall also be Liable to Fine'

The law did not require a sentence of fine as well as imprisonment to be inflicted. The sentence of fine was optional.[76]

The maximum sentence prescribed under this section, is ten years' rigorous imprisonment coupled with a fine. Therefore, a sentence of one years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 1000 on one accused and six months rigorous imprisonment with a fine of Rs 500 on another cannot be said to be severe.[77]

Possession of coin by person who knew it to be altered when he became possessed thereof.--

Whoever, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession of coin with respect to which the offence defined in either of the sections 246 or 248 has been committed, having known at the time of becoming possessed thereof that such offence had been committed with respect of such coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.1807

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes persons who possess debased or altered coins with fraudulent intention. This section and s 253, IPC correspond to ss 242 and 243, IPC . Under this section possession of a debased coin in respect of which an offence defined in either ss 246 or 248, IPC has been committed is made an offence.

2. 'Fraudulently'

Commentary under s 25 may be referred to.

3. Possession

Commentary under ss 27 and 235 may be referred to.

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non- bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

5. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in a prosecution under this section:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....fraudulently (or with intent that fraud might be committed) had in your possession a coin, to wit.....in respect of which the offence defined in section 246 (or 248) IPC had been committed having known at the time of becoming possessed thereof, that such offence had been committed with respect to the said coin, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 252 of the Indian Penal Code and within any cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

6. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused was in possession of a coin;
(ii) it was a coin with respect to which the offence defined in ss 246 or 248 had been committed;
(iii) the accused knew of it when he became possessed of the coin; and
(iv) he was in possession of the coin with intent to defraud, or with intent that fraud might be committed.

Possession of Indian coin by person who knew it to be altered when he became possessed thereof.--

Whoever, fraudulently or with intent that fraud may be committed, is in possession of coin with respect to which the offence1808 defined in either of the section 247 or 249 has been committed, having known at the time of becoming possessed thereof that such offence had been committed with respect to such coin, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The only difference between this and the last section is that in this section the same offence is in respect of an Indian coin and the penalty prescribed is higher than the preceding section. In other respects, there is no difference.

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'Queen's coin' in the margin were replaced by the words 'Indian coin' by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. No period of limitation is fixed for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in a prosecution under this section:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

5. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused was in possession of an Indian coin;
(ii) it was a coin with respect to which the offence defined in s 247 or 249, IPC has been committed;
(iii) the accused knew of it when he became possessed of the coin; and
(iv) he was in possession of the coin with intent to defraud, or with intent that fraud might be committed.1809

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

Delivery of coin as genuine, which, when first possessed, the deliverer did not know to be altered.--

Whoever delivers to any other person as genuine or as a coin of a different description from what it is, or attempts to induce any person to receive as genuine, or as a different coin from what it is, any coin in respect of which he knows that any such operation as that mentioned in sections 246, 247, 248 or 249 has been performed, but in respect of which he did not, at the time when he took it into his possession, know that such operation had been performed, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine to an amount which may extend to ten times the value of the coin for which the altered coin is passed, or attempted to be passed.

Comments

1. Scope

The section makes it an offence to deliver as genuine what is spurious or a coin of one description as a coin of another description, but which has been subjected to an operation described in any of the ss 246 - 249, IPC, which he did not know when he took the coin into his possession. It corresponds to s 241, IPC .

The offender under either section comes into possession of the coin innocently, i.e., without knowing that it has been altered. He then comes to know of it and then delivers or attempts to deliver it to another as genuine. In a great majority of coin offences, the false coin is substantially worthless. It would, however, be a very profitable transaction to make and circulate silver or copper coins of exactly the same intrinsic value as those issued by Government. Such an act would undoubtedly come within the meaning of 'counterfeit coin' under the previous section of this chapter. It is specifically provided for by the Metal Tokens Act 1889, which forbids the making or issuing of metal intended to be used as money, but not authorised by the Indian Government.

Section 3 of the Metal[78]Tokens Act 1889 provides:

> S. 3 Prohibition of making by private persons of pieces of metal to be used as money.--No piece of copper or bronze or of any other metal or mixed metal, which, whether stamped or unstamped, is intended to be used as money, shall be made except by the authority of the Central Government.

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non- compoundable and is triable by any magistrate. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in a prosecution under this section:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

1810

> That on or about the.....day of.....at.....you delivered to AB (or attempted to induce the said AB to receive) as genuine a coin to wit.....(or as a coin of a different description to what it is), in respect of which you then knew (though not at the time when you took the same in possession) that an operation such as is mentioned in section 246 (or sections 246 , 247, 248 or 249) of the Indian Penal Code, to wit.....had been performed, and you thereby committed an offence punishable under section 254 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge.

4. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the coin in question is one with respect to which any such operation as that mentioned in ss 246 - 249, IPC has been performed;
(ii) at the time the accused took possession of it, he did not know that the coin was so operated upon;
(iii) the accused delivered it to someone; or he attempted to induce someone to receive it, as a genuine coin, or as a coin of a different description; and

(iv) at the time he did so, he knew that it had been so operated upon.

Counterfeiting Government stamp.--

Whoever counterfeits, or knowingly performs any part of the process of counterfeiting, any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, shall be punished with [79][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.--A person commits this offence who counterfeits by causing a genuine stamp of one denomination to appear like a genuine stamp of a different denomination.

Comments

1. Scope

Sections 255 - 263A, IPC, of this chapter deal with offences relating to government stamps. These sections correspond to s 13 of the English Stamp Duties Management Act 1891,[80] under which every person who does or causes to be done, or knowingly aids, abets or assists in doing certain acts in relation to stamps or dies used for the purpose of the collection of stamp duties under the care and management of the Commissioner of Inland Revenue, or for the collection of postage (income-tax, national insurance and industrial injuries insurance contributions and entertainments duty) is guilty of felony.[81]1811

This section deals with counterfeiting government stamps. It corresponds to s 241, IPC, which deals with counterfeiting coins.

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'imprisonment for life' were substituted for the words 'transportation for life' by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Schedule, with effect from 1 January 1956.

3. 'Counterfeits'

Sections 28, 231 and 232, and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

An exact resemblance or facsimile is not required to constitute the crime of forgery; it is adequate if there be a sufficient resemblance to show that a false making was intended and that the false stamp is so made as to have an aptitude to deceive.[82]

4 'Any Stamp'

'Stamp' means a stamp impressed by means of a die as well as an adhesive stamp for denoting any duty or fee.[83] Impressed stamp includes: (a) labels affixed and impressed by the proper officer, and (b) stamps embossed or engraved on stamped paper.[84] The word 'stamp' signifies some impression or mark set upon paper or parchment as a token of the payment of some charges, e.g., tax revenue. It includes postage stamps.[85]

5. 'Government'

In ss 255 and 263A, IPC the word 'Government', when used in connection with or in reference to, any stamp issued for the purpose of denoting a rate of postage shall, notwithstanding anything in s 17, be deemed to include the person or persons authorised by law to administer executive government in any part of India, and also in any part of Her Majesty's dominions or in any foreign country.[86]

Section 17 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a court of session. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....counterfeited (or knowingly performed a certain part of the process of counterfeiting, to wit....) a certain stamp1812 issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, to wit.....and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 255 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

8. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused counterfeited, or knowingly performed any part of the process of counterfeiting; and
(ii) the counterfeiting was that of a stamp issued by the government for the purpose of revenue.

In the instant case the accused appellants were caught red-handed when they were processing counterfeit stamps. The printing machinery was also seized from the possession of the accused appellants. Their conviction under ss 255 and 256, IPC was held proper.[87]

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with possession of instruments or material for counterfeiting stamps, and corresponds to s 235, IPC, with the difference that while the present section deals with stamps, s 235, IPC deals with coins. The object of both sections is the same.

In the instant case the accused appellants were caught red-handed when they were processing counterfeit stamps. The printing machinery was also seized from the possession of the accused appellants. Their conviction under ss 255 and 256, IPC was held proper.[88]

2. Possession

Sections 27 and 235 and commentary thereunder may be referred to.

3. 'For the Purpose of Counterfeiting'

The expression 'for the purpose of counterfeiting' means 'for the purpose of causing one thing to resemble another, intending by means of that resemblance to practise deception.1813

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no time limit for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

5. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

6. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused had in his possession an instrument or material;
(ii) the said instrument or material was for the purpose of being used, or knowing or having reason to believe that it was intended to be used, for the purpose of counterfeiting a government stamp;

(iii) the stamp to be counterfeited was one, issued by the government for revenue; and
(iv) the instrument or material was so usable.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with the sale of a counterfeit government stamp and is similar to s 239, IPC .

2. 'Knowledge' or 'Reason to Believe'--Distinction

'Knowledge' is an awareness on the part of the person concerned indicating his state of mind. 'Reason to believe' is another facet of the state of mind. 'Reason to believe' is not the same thing as 'suspicion' or 'doubt' and mere seeing also cannot be equated to believing. 'Reason to believe' is a higher level of a state of mind. Likewise 'knowledge' will be slightly on higher plane than 'reason to believe'. A person can be supposed to know where there is a direct appeal to his sense and a person is presumed to have a reason to believe if he has sufficient cause to believe the same.[89]

Reason to Believe--What is?

What s 26, IPC means is that a person must have reason to believe if the circumstances are such that a reasonable man would by probable reasoning conclude or infer regarding the nature of the thing concerned. Such circumstances need not necessarily be capable of absolute conviction or inference; but it is sufficient if the circumstances are such as creating a cause to believe by chain of probable reasoning leading to the conclusion or inference about the nature of the thing. These two requirements, i.e., 'knowledge' and 'reason to believe' have to be deduced from various circumstances of the case.[90]

Inference of Knowledge or Reason to Believe

Where the appellant was a licensed vendor and admittedly used to purchase stamps from the treasury, but there was absolutely no material, whatsoever, to show that the counterfeit stamps were in fact purchased by the accused from the treasury. A bare allegation by way of an explanation by the accused-appellant that he purchased all the stamps including the counterfeit ones from the treasury, appeared on the face of it to be false, as he had neither produced registers maintained by him nor had he made even an effort to summon the treasury records. There is no material, whatsoever, even to probablise such a plea. In these circumstances, the only inference, that can be drawn is that he had 'knowledge' and 'reason to believe' that the stamp which he had in his possession and which he was selling or offering to sell, were counterfeit ones. These two ingredients of provisions of law are fully established.[91]1816

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no time limit for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....sold (or offered for sale) a stamp, to wit.....which you knew (or had reason to believe) to be counterfeit of the stamp issued by government for the purpose of revenue and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 258 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused sold or offered for sale, a stamp;
(ii) the stamp sold or offered for sale was a counterfeit government stamp; and
(iii) the accused then knew, or had reason to believe, that the stamp was counterfeit.

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....were in possession of a stamp to wit.....which you knew to be counterfeit of a stamp, to wit.....issued by government, for the purpose of revenue, intending to use (or dispose of) the same as a genuine stamp, (or in order that the same might be used as a genuine stamp), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 259 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused had in his possession a counterfeit of a government revenue stamp;
(ii) the accused knew that the stamp was a counterfeit of the revenue stamp; and
(iii) he had it in his possession intending to use or dispose of the same as a genuine stamp, or in order that it may be used as a genuine stamp.

The possession of government stamps by the accused stamp vendor was established and the accused barely alleged by way of explanation that he purchased all the stamps including the counterfeit ones from the treasury, appeared on the face of it to be false, as he had neither produced registers maintained by him nor had he made even an effort to summon the treasury records. In these circumstances the only inference that can be drawn is that he had the 'knowledge' and 'reason to believe' that the stamps which he had in his possession and which he was selling or offering to sell, were counterfeit ones. Using as genuine a Government stamp known to be counterfeit.--

Whoever uses as genuine any stamp, knowing it to be a counterfeit of any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with using as genuine a government stamp known to be a counterfeit. It corresponds to s 254, IPC . Under this section the stamp used as genuine must be a counterfeit. A person passing off a one-anna stamp as a one-rupee stamp was held to be not counterfeiting a one-rupee stamp.[93]

2. Counterfeit

Where a stamp-vendor of certain forest stamps caused some used stamps to resemble genuine ones and attached them to the licenses issued for grazing cattle. It was held that this act amounted to counterfeiting within the meaning of s 28 and the stamp-vendor was guilty under s 260, IPC .[94] Under s 260 the stamp used as genuine must be a counterfeit. A person passing off a one-anna stamp as a one-rupee stamp was held to be not counterfeiting a one-rupee stamp.[95]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section cognizable, bailable but not compoundable and can be tried by a magistrate of the first class. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. There is no time limit for taking cognizance of an offence under this section.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....used as genuine a stamp, to wit.....knowing it to be a counterfeit of a stamp issued by government for the purpose of revenue, to wit.....and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 260 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

In order to establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:1819

(i) the accused used as genuine a counterfeit stamp;
(ii) the said stamp was counterfeit of a government revenue stamp; and
(iii) the accused used the said stamp knowing that the stamp used was counterfeit.

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 261.

Effacing, writing from substance bearing Government stamp, or removing from document a stamp used for it, with intent to cause loss to Government.--

Whoever, fraudulently or with intent to cause loss to the Government, removes or effaces from any substance, bearing any stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, any writing or document for which such stamp has been used, or removes from any writing or document, a stamp which has been used for such writing or document, in order that such stamp may be used for a different writing or document, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with alteration and defacement of government revenue stamps and is similar to ss 246 and 248, IPC .

The intention with which the acts named in this section are done, may be either fraudulent generally or done with a view to cause loss to the government. Therefore, a conviction would be good where the intention was merely to efface a document with a view to injuriously affect the rights of another person. No intention to cause loss to government can be assumed unless it is shown or inferred that the intention of the party was to use the stamp as a stamp, a second time. Therefore, no conviction will be supported, if the object of removing the writing from a stamped paper was merely to write upon the blank space something which required no stamp.[96]

2. Essential Ingredients Of The Offence

The essential ingredients on an offence under this section are:

(i) fraudulent removal or effacement of any writing or substance, from a document bearing a government stamp, or
(ii) causing such removal or effacement with intent to cause loss to the government; or

(iii) with a view to defraud or cause loss to the government by removing from, any writing or document, a stamp used thereon to use it again.

3. Re-use of Removed Stamp not Necessary

Under the above cl (3) the mere removal of the stamps with a view to use it again is sufficient to constitute an offence under this section. The actual re-use is a separate1820 offence falling under s 262, IPC . Acts contemplated under this section should be committed either to cause loss to the government or to defraud some one not necessarily the government.

4. 'Fraudulent'

Notes under ss 25 and 463 may be referred to.

5. 'Document'

Section 29 and notes thereunder may be referred to.

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....fraudulently (or with intent to cause loss to the Government) removed (or effaced) from any substance bearing any stamp issued by government for the purpose of revenue, any writing or document for which such stamp had been used [or removed from any writing (or document) a stamp which had been used for such writing (or document)] in order that such stamp may be used for a different writing (or document), and thereby committed the offence punishable under section 261 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

8. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) a government revenue stamp was used on a writing or document;
(ii) the accused removed or effaced any writing or document on which such stamp had been used; or the accused removed from any writing or document a stamp which had been used for such writing or document, in order that such stamp may be used for a different writing or document; and
(iii) the accused did so fraudulently, or with intent to cause loss to the government or in order that such stamp may be used for a different writing or document.

Using Government stamp known to have been before used.--

Whoever, fraudulently or with intent to cause loss to the Government, uses for any purpose a stamp issued by Government for the purpose of revenue, which he knows to have been before used, shall be punished with imprisonment of1821 either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section penalises fraudulent use of a government stamp which has already been used. The gist of the offence lies in the use of a stamp which has already been used, not only with the knowledge that it has been used before, but also fraudulently or with intention to cause loss to government. The intent to defraud or cause such loss cannot be assumed.[97]

2. Use of Postage Stamp

Under s 37 of Act 14 of 1866, postage stamps shall be considered to be stamps issued by the government for the purpose of revenue. Hence, fraudulent use of a postage stamp would also be an offence under this section.[98]

The mere affixing to a letter a postal stamp, which has been previously used does not itself prove a fraudulent intent to cause loss to the government within the meaning of this section.[99] It has to be proved by the prosecution.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by any magistrate and can also be tried summarily. A warrant shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. The limitation for taking cognizance of an offence under this section is three years.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

> I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

5. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:1822

(i) the stamp in question was issued by the government for the purpose of revenue;
(ii) it had already been used;
(iii) the accused used it again knowing that it had been used already; and
(iv) he did so fraudulently or with intent to cause loss to the government.

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

S. 263.

Erasure of mark denoting that stamp has been used.--

Whoever, fraudulently or with intent to cause loss to Government, erases or removes from a stamp issued by Government for purpose of revenue, any mark, put or impressed upon such stamp for the purpose of denoting that the same has been used, or knowingly has in his possession or sells or disposes of any such stamp from which such mark has been erased or removed, or sells or disposes of any such stamp which he knows to have been used, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is in three parts and deals with three offences, namely:

(i) erasing or removing marks of cancellation of a stamp to defraud or cause loss to the government;
(ii) knowingly possessing or selling or disposing of a stamp from which such mark has been erased or removed; and
(iii) selling or disposing of such stamp knowing it to have been used.

The endorsements of the names of the vendor and vendee and of the date of the sale of a stamp, which are made upon a stamp by the stamp-vendor, are not put upon the stamp for the purpose of showing that it has been used, and therefore do not come under the purview of this section.[99a]

2. 'Fraudulently'

Section 25 and notes thereunder may be referred to.

'Fraudulently or With Intent to Cause Loss to Government'

The first part of the section makes it an offence to erase or remove, from a stamp issued by the government for the purpose of revenue, any mark put upon it for the purpose of denoting that it has been used, if that erasing or removing is done1823 fraudulently or with intent to cause loss to the government. Therefore, for an offence under the first part of the section, it is necessary to prove fraud or intent to cause loss to the government.[1]

3. 'Mark Put or Impressed for the Purpose of Denoting that the Stamp has been Used'--Purpose of Cancellation

The ordinary purpose for which the stamps are used is collection of revenue. For the application of the first part of the section there must be some mark put on the stamps for the purpose of denoting that they had been so used and the mark must have been erased or removed. It must be proved that the stamp in question had some mark denoting that it had been used and that the same has been erased or removed. The mark erased or removed must be such as to denote that the stamp has been used.

Erasure or removal of any other mark does not come under this part of the section. If the stamps had in fact been used for the purpose of revenue, the fact that they bore no marks would go to show that the marks had been erased. If there are slight marks, but they do not necessarily indicate that the stamp had been used for the purpose of revenue, the section does not apply.[2]

4. Mere Possession of Cancelled Stamp with Knowledge Sufficient

Under the second part of the section it is an offence to have in possession any stamp, from which the mark put upon it for the purpose of denoting that it has been used, has been erased or removed, if those facts are known to the person having such a stamp in his possession. That is to say, it is sufficient to prove that the person in whose possession the stamp was found knew that such a mark had been erased or removed from it; it is not necessary under this part of the section to prove that his possession was fraudulent or with intent to cause loss to the government.[3]

5. Accused Need not Remove the Marks Himself

There is no necessity under this part of the section for the prosecution to prove that the erasure of the marks or impressions had been done by the accused person or that he had any connection with them. It is sufficient to show that he had in his possession such stamps knowing that such marks had been so erased.[4]

6. Effect of Stamps not Punched

Section 30 of the Court Fees Act 1870 requires, that the officer of the court or the head of the office, on receiving any document requiring to be stamped under the Act, shall forthwith effect a cancellation of the stamp by punching out the figurehead so as to leave the amount designated on the stamp untouched and the part removed by punching shall be burnt or otherwise destroyed. But the fact that the stamps were not punched does not, of course, necessarily show that an offence could not be committed in respect of them, as there have been a number of cases in which stamps which have been used have been left unpunched and, subsequently removed probably1824 for nefarious purposes. Of course, if the procedure laid down in the Stamp Act is properly carried out, every stamp ought to be punched, but experience has shown that punching is often omitted.[5]

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by a magistrate of the first class. The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within three years of the date of the commission of the offence. In Shankarlal Bhargava v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[6] it was held under this section that the power to condone delay under s 473, CrPC is an overriding power and is not limited to the time-factor of condonation and can be exercised at any time (even after cognizance is taken) when full facts are brought on record.

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of an offence under this section:

I, (name and office of the magistrate, etc) do hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at..... fraudulently (or with intent to cause loss to government) erased or removed from a stamp issued by the Government for the purpose of revenue, a mark put (or impressed) on such stamp for the purpose of denoting that the same has been used, [or knowingly had in your possession (or sold) (or disposed of) such stamp from which such mark had been erased or removed] [or sold (or disposed of) a stamp which you knew to have been used], and thereby committed the offence punishable under section 263 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved:

(i) In the case of erasing or removing marks of cancellation:

(a) that the stamp in question was issued by the government for the purpose of revenue;
(b) that it had been so used;
(c) that it bore a mark or impression denoting that it had been so used;
(d) that the accused removed or erased such mark or impression; and
(e) that he did so with intent to defraud or cause loss to government.

(ii) In the case of possessing, selling or disposing of such stamp:

(a) to (c) as in case of (i):
(d) that the mark or impression, denoting that the stamps had been used, was erased or removed;
(e) that the accused had possession of such stamp in such cancelled condition; or that the stamp, in such cancelled condition, was sold or disposed of by the accused; and1825
(f) that the accused at that time knew that such mark or impression had been so removed or erased

(iii) In the case of selling or disposing of used stamp:

(a) to (c) as in case of (i) above:
(d) that the accused sold or disposed of such stamp; and
(e) that he, when selling or disposing of the same, knew that it had been so used.

Of Offences Relating to Coin and Government Stamps

[7][S. 263A.

Prohibition of fictitious stamps.--

(1) Whoever--
  (a) makes, knowingly utters, deals in or sells any fictitious stamp, or knowingly uses for any postal purpose any fictitious stamp, or
  (b) has in his possession, without lawful excuse, any fictitious stamp, or
  (c) makes or, without lawful excuse, has in his possession any die, plate, instrument or materials for making any fictitious stamp, shall be punished with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees.

(2) Any such stamp, die, plate, instrument or materials in the possession of any person for making any fictitious stamp [8][may be seized and, if seized] shall be forfeited.

(3) In this section "fictitious stamp" means any stamp falsely purporting to be issued by Government for the purpose of denoting a rate of postage, or any facsimile or imitation or representation, whether on paper or otherwise, of any stamp issued by Government for that purpose.

(4) In this section and also in sections 255 to 263, both inclusive, the word "Government" when used in connection with, or in reference to, any stamp issued for the purpose of denoting a rate of postage, shall, notwithstanding anything in section 17, be deemed to include the person or persons authorized by law to administer executive Government in any part of India, and also in any part of Her Majesty's dominions or in any foreign country.]

Comments

1. Scope and Object

The section deals with making, uttering, selling, using or dealing in fictitious postal stamps. The object is to curb the growing traffic in fictitious postage stamps. The proprietor of a newspaper, which circulated amongst stamp collectors, had in his possession a die, which he had ordered to be made for him abroad. From this die representations of a current Cape of Good Hope postage stamp could be produced. The only purpose for which he had ordered, or had in his possession, the die, was for making upon the pages of an illustrated stamp catalogue, or newspaper, illustrations1826 in black and white, and not in colours, of the stamp in question, such catalogues being intended for sale only to stamp collectors and others as a part of the newspaper. Upon a special case, the court held that the possession of the die for making a false stamp, known to be such to its possessor, was, however innocent the use that he intended to make of it, a possession without lawful excuse, within s 7(c) of the Post Office (Protection) Act 1884.[9]

2. Legislative Changes

This section was added by s 2 of the Indian Criminal Law (Amendment Act) 1895 in consequence of the resolution of the International Postal Congress held at Vienna on 20 May 1891, by which it was agreed to make an organised attempt to prohibit the growing traffic in fictitious stamps, the use of which on postal articles posted abroad resulted in much loss and inconvenience to the post office.[10]

The words 'may be used and, if seized' in sub-s (2) were substituted for the words 'may be seized, and' by the Repealing and Amending Act 1953, Sch III.

3. Analogous Law

This section corresponds to s 7 of the English Post Office (Protection) Act 1894[11] re-enacted as s 6(5), the Post Office Act 1908.[12]

4. 'Fictitious Stamp'

Fictitious stamps as defined by sub-s (3) of this section means:

(i) any stamp falsely purporting to be issued by the government for the purpose of denoting a rate of postage, or
(ii) any fascimile, or imitation or representation whether on paper or otherwise, of any stamp, issued by the government for that purpose.

Any imitation of a government stamp which does not fulfil the requirements of this sub-section, cannot be a fictitious stamp dealt with by this section.

5. 'Government'

Section 17, IPC, defines government and states that the word 'government' denotes the Central Government or the government of a state. Overriding this definition, sub-s (4) of this section gives a special definition for the limited purposes of ss 255 - 263A, IPC and states that the word 'government', when used in connection with or in reference to, any stamp issued for the purpose of denoting a rate of postage, shall be deemed to include the person or persons authorised by law to administer executive government in any part of India, and also in any part of Her Majesty's dominions or in any foreign country. This definition is not of general application to govern all the provisions of the said sections and only when the question arises or is raised about the authority of issuing a stamp for the purpose of denoting a rate of postage, the1827 word 'government' shall be deemed to include the person or persons authorised to administer executive government in any part of India or foreign country.

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by any magistrate. The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within six months.

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) do hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That, on or about the.....day of.....you made, knowingly uttered, dealt in, or sold fictitious stamps (or knowingly used for any postal purpose any fictitious stamp or had in your possession without lawful excuse any fictitious stamp or made or without lawful excuse, had in your possession any die, plate, instrument or materials for making any fictitious stamp) and thereby committed an offence under section 263A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

8. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused made, knowingly uttered, dealt in or sold the fictitious stamp in question or knowingly used it for any postal purposes; or
(ii) he had in his possession, without lawful excuse, such stamps; or
(iii) he made, or, without lawful excuse, had in his possession any die, plate, instrument, or materials for making such stamp.1828

Of Offences Relating to Weights and Measures

S. 264.

Fraudulent use of false instrument for weighing.--

Whoever fraudulently uses any instrument for weighing which he knows to be false, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with fraudulent use of any instrument of weighing. The instrument used must not only be known to be false, but must also be fraudulently so used, that is, it must be used for the purpose of passing off short weight upon persons who are entitled to full weight. In general, the mere possession of false balance, which is used as a true one, will be sufficient evidence of a fraudulent intention. The scales used in markets in the mofussil are of the very crudest construction and are seldom equally balanced. Such defects are generally visible to a purchaser, and the scales are made to balance by putting some substance, generally a piece of earth or a stone, into the lighter scale. In the absence of any intention to use the scales fraudulently, the offence under this section cannot be said to have been committed.[3]

2. 'Fraudulently uses any Instrument for Weighing'

Intention is an essential part of the offence of fraudulently using false instruments of weighing.[4] The intention, however, must be alleged in laying the charge, though it may be a matter of inference only, from the fact of the possession, and the attending circumstances as manifesting the purpose, and the inference may, of course, be rebutted. But where the incorrectness of the scale is visible, and there is no attempt to cover or conceal it, there can be no ground for imputing fraud from the defect alone; the circumstances negative the intention of fraud, and no charge would lie against the party using such a balance.[5]1830

Where the weight was a seer weight (now out of use) and was one tolah,[6] or one rupee short, it was held that the weight in question could not be regarded as a false weight in the sense of the IPC .[7]

'Fraudulently' has been defined by s 25, IPC . Commentary under that section may be referred to.

3. Meaning of 'False Instrument of Weighing'

According to the ordinary use of language, if a measure is described as false, that means that it is something other than what it purports to be. The word false in this and the next section means different from the instrument, weight or measure, which the offender and the person defrauded have fixed upon, expressly or by implication, with reference to their mutual dealings.[8] The offence, under this section, is not committed unless there is proof that the accused knew that his weighing balance was false.[9]

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable and is triable by any Magistrate. It can also be tried summarily,[10] by a Magistrate competent to try cases summarily. A summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance.

5. Inspection and Seizure of Weights and Measures

Under s 153 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973:

> (1) Any officer in charge of a police station may, without a warrant, enter any place within the limits of such station for the purpose of inspecting or searching for any weights or measures or instruments for weighing, used or kept therein, whenever he has reason to believe that there are in such place any weights, measures or instruments for weighing which are false.
> (2) If he finds in such place any weights, measures or instruments for weighing which are false, he may seize the same, and shall forthwith give information of such seizure to a Magistrate having jurisdiction.

6. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in a case of prosecution under this section:

> That you, on or about the.........day of....., at....., fraudulently used a certain instrument for weighing, to wit..... knowing it to be false at the time of using it, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 264 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.1831

7. Proof

To establish an offence under this section the following facts have to be proved:

(i) that the accused used an instrument of weighing;
(ii) that the instrument was false;
(iii) that the accused knew it to be false; and
(iv) that he used it fraudulently.

Chapter XIII

Of Offences Relating to Weights and Measures

S. 265.

Fraudulent use of false weight or measure.--

Whoever fraudulently uses any false weight or false measure of length or capacity, or fraudulently uses any weight or any measure of length or capacity as a different weight or measure from what it is, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The offence under this section is similar to that under the last one. The only difference between the two sections is that whereas the last section dealt with fraudulent use of false instruments of weighing, this section deals with fraudulent use of false weights and measures.

2. Principal Ingredient

The principal ingredient of this offence is the use of a false weight, measure of capacity with intent to defraud.[11]

3. 'Fraudulently'

'Fraudulently' has been defined by s 25, IPC, notes thereunder may be referred to. If a person proposes to use weights of a certain standard, it is incumbent upon him to see that the weights he uses come up to the proper standard. A magistrate is at liberty to infer fraud from the existence of a deficiency in weights used, unless the accused can account for it.[12]

4. Test of 'False Weight or Measure'

The section has no application in cases in which the accused did not profess to sell by any standard weight or measure, e.g., a sale by the measure of a coconut shell.[13] The1832 weight of grain that a measure is found to hold is no evidence of its capacity, as compared with that of another measure, unless the very same grain is used. Grains of rice may be large or small, light or heavy. One sample of rice may contain more large and light grains than another and would therefore measure more, though weigh less than the latter. To ascertain whether a measure is false or not, the only proper test to apply is that of measure, and the same article must be measured in each case, and proof should be adduced that this had been done.[14]

5. Effect of False Misrepresentation of Capacity

The accused who sold liquor, measuring it with a glass which was not a prescribed measure and of which they fraudulently misrepresented the capacity, were convicted of the offence of fraudulent use of a false measure under this section. It was held that they would more appropriately have been tried for the offence of cheating.[15]

Where a tradesman supplied milk, which he sent in his own churns by train, the churns being fitted with a gauge to show how many gallons they held, and the gauge indicated a greater amount than was actually contained, the churns were held to be measures within the meaning of an English Act, similar to ss 265 - 266 of the IPC .[16]

6. Small Deficiency not to be Counted

In considering whether a weight used is false or not, a small deficiency, for instance, a deficiency of one tola[17] in a five-seer weight, should not count.[18]

7. Procedure

Same as under s 264, IPC . A magistrate detecting the offence cannot himself take cognizance of this offence.[19]

8. Complaint

The CrPC does not require any complaint by any particular persons for taking cognizance of an offence under this section, but it has been held that a conviction under this section cannot be maintained where there is no complaint by a purchaser.[20]

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....frequently used a false weight (or false measure of length or capacity) [or fraudulently used a weight(or measure of length or capacity) as a different weight (or measure) from what is/was], and thereby committed1833 an offence punishable under section 265 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

10. Proof

To establish an offence under this section the prosecution has to prove that:

(i) the weight or the measure or length, or capacity used by the accused was false; or
(ii) the weight or the measure of length or capacity used by the accused was a different weight or measure from what it is; and
(iii) that the accused did so fraudulently.[21]

11. Fraud, is not Presumed has to be Strictly Proved

It is the duty of the prosecution to lead some evidence to show that the accused knew the weight or measure in question to be incorrect or that before he used them, he tampered with them. In the absence of any evidence to that effect, the fraudulent intent required by the section cannot be presumed.[22] Where standard weights are prescribed, a bazaar seller would no doubt be bound to take reasonable care that the weights used by him are not defective according to the standard, and if any of his weights varied from the standard so as to give the seller a substantial advantage, the court would probably infer fraud. But where no standard is prescribed, it is clear that no presumption of fraud can arise, and a conviction under ss 265 - 266, IPC cannot be obtained unless the element of fraud is strictly proved.[23]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIII

Of Offences Relating to Weights and Measures

S. 266.

Being in possession of false weight or measure.--

Whoever is in possession of any instrument for weighing, or of any weight, or of any measure of length or capacity, which he knows to be false, [24][] intending that the same may be fraudulently used, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is similar to ss 235, 239, 240 and 259, IPC, and penalises the possession of any instrument for weighing, or any false weight or measure, knowing it to be false and intending that it may be used fraudulently. For an offence under this1834 section, mere possession of false scales, weight or measures is not enough. The prosecution must prove that the accused knew them to be false and intended to use them fraudulently.[25]

2. Legislative Changes

The word 'and' before the word 'intending' was omitted by the Repealing and Amending Act, 42 of 1953, s 4 and Third Schedule.

3. False Instrument, Weight or Measure

According to the ordinary use of language, if a measure is described as false, it means that it is something other than what it purports to be.[26] An actual shortage of weight, etc., cannot be determined until a comparison is made with standard weights or measures and some reasonable allowance should, in any case, be made for wear and tear and for the rough and ready methods of bazaar shopkeepers.[27]

4. 'Which he knows to be False'

For a conviction under this section it is not enough to prove that the accused was in possession of a false instrument for weighing or a false weight or measure. It must further be proved that the accused knew them to be false and intended to use them fraudulently.[28] From the mere fact that a measure in possession of the accused is found to be false, it cannot be presumed that he knew it to be false.[29] The knowledge is an awareness on the part of the person concerned indicating his state of mind. A person can be supposed to know where there is direct appeal to his senses.[30]

5. Intending that the same may be Fraudulently used

Fraudulent intent is a necessary ingredient of the offence under this section. Where everybody, both purchaser and seller, are well aware of the actual measure being used, there can be no question of fraudulent intent. It is only when the seller purports to sell according to a certain standard and sells below that standard, that he can be said to be guilty of fraud.[31] A person in possession of false weights cannot be convicted under this section unless fraudulent intention is charged and proved.[32]

6. Inference or Presumption Against Accused when may arise

A person who represents himself as using weights or a measure of a particular standard, e.g., weights of a certain English standard[33] is bound to see that the weights1835 or measures are correct according to the standard, and if they vary so as to give the seller a considerable advantage, the court is justified in inferring fraud.[34] Where standard weights are prescribed, a bazaar seller would no doubt be bound to take reasonable care that the weights used by him are not defective according to the standard, and if any of his weights varies from the standard so as to give the seller a substantial advantage, the court would probably infer fraud. But where no standard is prescribed, no presumption of fraud can arise, and a conviction under ss 265 and 266 cannot be obtained unless the element of fraud is strictly proved.[35] It has been held that from the mere fact that certain measures in the possession of the accused are found to be false no presumption arises that he knew them to be false and that he intended them to be fraudulently used.[36] But, doubting this, it has been held that the only way in which knowledge and fraudulent intention can be proved in such a case is by the possession and the use of the false weights concerned, and that where it is not the case that the weights were very old ones which the accused had neglected to verify, or that they were new ones which he had accepted as correct, and the weights in his possession were weights which he had kept in his shop for the purposes of his trade and was regularly using, the only reasonable inference is that he knew they were deficient and was using them fraudulently.[37]

Where the accused who carried on the business of selling opium, was found sitting on a gunny bag near which was a box of opium and the scales for weighing it, and false weights were found beneath the gunny bag, it was held that the only inference that could be drawn from these circumstances was that the accused possessed false weights knowing them to be false and intending that they may be falsely used.[38]

7. Procedure

Same as in the case of an offence under s 264, IPC .

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the .....day of.....at.....were in possession of a certain instrument for weighing (or a certain weight, or a certain measure of length or capacity), to wit.....which you knew to be false, intending that the same might be fraudulently used, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 266 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

9. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the instrument for weighing, weight or measure of length or capacity in question is false;1836
(ii) the accused was in possession of the same;
(iii) he knew the same to be false; and
(iv) he intended that such false weight, etc., should be used to defraud someone.

10. Sentence

The offence under this section is an offence against society, and in such cases, any leniency in the matter of sentence will be misplaced.[39]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIII

Of Offences Relating to Weights and Measures

S. 267.

Making or selling false weight or measure.--

Whoever makes, sells or disposes of any instrument for weighing, or any weight, or any measure of length or capacity which he knows to be false, in order that the same may be used as true, or knowing that the same is likely to be used as true, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section penalises making or selling of false instruments for weighing weights or measures. The offence lies in putting false scales, weights or measures in circulation with the knowledge that they may be used as true.

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by any magistrate. The magistrate, mentioned in s 260(1) of the CrPC 1973, may also try this offence in a summary manner. The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within one year.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

I, (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of.....at.....made (or sold, or disposed of) certain instrument for weighing (or a certain weight, or a certain measure of length or capacity), to wit.....knowing it at the time of making (or selling or disposing of) it, to be false, in order that the same might be used as true (or knowing that the same was likely to be used as true) and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 267 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.1837

4. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the instrument for weighing, weight or measure of length or capacity in question is false;
(ii) the accused either made, sold, or disposed of the same;
(iii) he then knew it to be false; and
(iv) he so made, sold, or disposed of it in order that it might be used as true; or that he knew that it was likely to be used as true.1838

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 268.

Public nuisance.--

A person is guilty of a public nuisance, who does any act, or is guilty of an illegal omission, which causes any common injury, danger, or annoyance to the public or to the people in general who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity, or which must necessarily cause injury, obstruction, danger, or annoyance to persons who may have occasion to use any public right.

A common nuisance is not excused on the ground that it causes some convenience or advantage.1840

Comments

1. Scope

This section only defines the offence of 'public nuisance'. Particular kinds of public nuisances are made punishable by other sections of this chapter, and s 290 provides the punishment for public nuisances not falling and hence, not punishable under those sections.

A plain reading of s 268, IPC, would indicate that in order to amount to a public nuisance, a person must have acted in a manner which may cause any common injury, danger or annoyance to the public or to the people in general who might dwell in a certain area or in occupation of any property in the vicinity necessarily causing injury or obstruction or danger or annoyance to persons who may have occasion to exercise any public right in respect of that locality or property.[7]1841

The offence involves any act or illegal omission causing common injury, danger or annoyance to the public. Such ingredient against the people in general who reside or occupy property in the vicinity is also sufficient to make out an offence. It is also sufficient if the acts must necessarily cause injury, obstruction, danger or annoyance to persons who may have occasion to use any public right.[8]

The definition of 'public nuisance' as given in s 268, IPC applies to the Code of Civil Procedure by virtue of s 3(44) of the General Clauses Act.[9]

2. English Law

Public Nuisance

Nuisances may be divided into those which are public and those which are private. A public nuisance is one which inflicts damage, injury or inconvenience on all the Queen's subjects or on all members of a class who come within the sphere or neighbourhood of its operation. It may, however, affect some to a greater extent than others. The question whether the number of persons affected are sufficient to constitute a class is one of the fact. The character of the neighbourhood is relevant for determination of the question whether a particular activity constitutes a public nuisance, and it has been held that the grant of planning permission for a change of use may therefore have the effect of rendering lawful an activity which would have been actionable if carried out in an earlier period before the character of the neighbourhood had changed. There is no requirement that an activity must in itself be unlawful to constitute a public nuisance, and disturbance caused by lawful use of the highway may constitute such a nuisance in an appropriate case.

Nuisance, Negligence and Trespass Distinguished

Some varieties of nuisance closely resemble acts classed under the head of trespass. The distinction between the two is that in trespass the immediate act which constitutes the wrong causes an injury to the sufferer's person or damage to his property or amounts to dispossession, whereas in nuisance the act itself often does not directly affect the person or property of another, but has consequences which become or are prejudicial to his person or property. Nuisance must also be distinguished from negligence although many acts which constitute a nuisance involve an element of negligence and may also be actionable as such.

In addition to the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 and other modern legislation regulating behaviour in highways, there are several other enactments, mainly contained in the Town Police Clauses Act 1847 and equivalent London legislation of 1839, which regulate behaviour and occupations in streets and other public places by creating offences.

Under s 54(17) of the English Metropolitan Police Act 1839, it is an offence to play a game in any thoroughfare or public place in the metropolitan police district or the City of London to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers.[10]

Section 54 of the English Metropolitan Police Act, 1839 provides as follows:

Prohibition of nuisances by persons in the thoroughfares.--Every person shall be liable to a penalty not more than level 2 on the standard scale, who, within the limits of1842 the metropolitan police district, shall in any thoroughfare or public place, commit any of the following offences; (that is to say,)

1 Every person who shall, to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers expose for show or sale (except in a market lawfully appointed for that purpose) or feed or fodder any horse or other animal, or show any caravan containing any animal or any other show or public entertainment, or shoe, bleed, or farry any horse or animal (except in cases of accident), or clean, dress, exercise, train, or break any horse or animal, or clean, make, or repair any part of any cart or carriage, except in cases of accident where repair on the spot is necessary:

2 Every person who shall turn loose any horse or cattle, or suffer to be at large any unmuzzled ferocious dog, or set on or urge any dog or other animal to attack, worry, or put in fear any person, horse, or other animal:

3 Every person who by negligence or ill-usage in driving cattle shall cause any mischief to be done by such cattle, or who shall in anywise misbehave himself in the driving, care, or management of such cattle, and also every person not being hired or employed to drive such cattle who shall wantonly and unlawfully pelt, drive, or hunt any such cattle:

4 Every person having the care of any cart or carriage who shall ride on any part thereof, on the shafts, or on any horse or other animal drawing the same, without having and holding the reins, or who shall be at such a distance from such cart or carriage as not to have the complete control over every horse or other animal drawing the same:

5 Every person who shall ride or drive furiously, or so as to endanger the life or limb of any person, or to the common danger of the passengers in any thoroughfare:

6 Every person who shall cause any cart, public carriage, sledge, truck, or barrow, with or without horses, to stand longer than may be necessary for loading or unloading or for taking up or setting down passengers, except hackney carriages standing for hire in any place not forbidden by law, or who, by means of any cart, carriage, sledge, truck, or barrow, or any horse or other animal, shall wilfully interrupt any public crossing, or wilfully cause any obstruction in any thoroughfare:

7 Every person who shall lead or ride any horse or other animal, or draw or drive any cart or carriage, sledge, truck, or barrow, upon any footway or curbstone, or fasten any horse or other animal so that it can stand across or upon any footway:

8 Every person who shall roll or carry any cask, tub, hoop, or wheel, or any ladder, plank, pole, showboard, or placard, upon any footway, except for the purpose of loading or unloading any cart or carriage, or of crossing the footway:

9 Every person who, after being made acquainted with the regulations or directions which the commissioners of police shall have made for regulating the route of horses, carts, carriages, and persons . . . for preventing obstructions during public processions and on other occasions herein-before specified, shall wilfully disregard or not conform himself thereunto:

10 Every person who, without the consent of the owner or occupier, shall affix any posting bill or other paper against or upon any building, wall, fence, or pale, or write upon, soil, deface, or mark any such building, wall, fence, or pale with chalk or paint, or in any other way whatsoever,...:

11 ...

12 Every person who shall sell or distribute or offer for sale or distribution, or exhibit to public view, any profane, . . . book, paper, print, drawing, painting or representation, or sing any profane, indecent, or obscene song or ballad, ... or1843 use any profane, indecent or obscene language to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers:

13 ...

14 Every person ... who shall blow any horn or use any other noisy instrument, for the purpose of calling persons together, or of announcing any show or entertainment, or for the purpose of hawking, selling, distributing, or collecting any article whatsoever, or of obtaining money or alms:

15 Every person who shall wantonly discharge any fire-arm or throw or discharge any stone or other missile, to the damage or danger of any person, or make any bonfire, or throw or set fire to any firework:

16 Every person who shall wilfully and wantonly disturb any inhabitant by pulling or ringing any door-bell or knocking at any door without lawful excuse, or who shall wilfully and unlawfully extinguish the light of any lamp:

17 Every person who shall fly any kite or play at any game to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers, or who shall make or use any slide upon ice or snow in any street or other thoroughfare, to the common danger of the passengers.

In R v Williams [11] the court observed that where public health endeavours fail to provide adequate protection to individuals like the complainants, the criminal law can be effective. It provides a needed measure of protection in the form of deterrence and reflects society's abhorrence of the self-centered recklessness and the callous insensitivity of the actions of the respondent and those who have acted in a similar manner.

3. Definition of Public Nuisance in the Section

Various definitions of nuisance are given elsewhere,[12] but here we are concerned only with the offence of public nuisance as defined in this section. This definition has been made applicable to all

Central Acts and Regulations made on or after 14 January 1887, when the General Clauses Act was passed.[13]

'Public nuisance' includes an act which causes or which must necessarily cause injury, obstruction or annoyance to persons who may have occasion to use any public right, e.g., an individual has a public right to pass along a public highway practicing his religious observance peacefully and if anyone interferes with his right, he commits public nuisance. A body of persons have the same right as an individual.[14] The definition of 'public nuisance' in this section is wide enough to cover cases of obstruction to village pathway.[15] It is, however, a matter of common experience that, for temporary purposes, the villagers stack logs and fuels on a public road; such an act though causes obstruction on a public road, is not an offence under this section.[16]

4. Analysis

The offence defined in this section may be analysed thus:

(i) it may be caused either by an act or illegal omission;1844
(ii) the effect thereof must be either injury,[17] danger or annoyance;
(iii) it may actually caused either to the public in general, or to that portion of the public who 'dwell or occupy property in the vicinity'; or
(iv) threatened of necessity to 'person who may have occasion to use any public right.'[18]

5. Spreading Infectious Disease is a Public Nuisance

Commentary under the same heading in s 269, post may be referred to.

6. Nuisance--Public and Private

The Supreme Court says:[19]

> Nuisance is an inconvenience which materially interferes with the ordinary physical comfort of human existence. It is not capable of precise definition. It may be public or private nuisance. As defined in s 268 IPC, public-nuisance is an offence against public either by doing a thing which tends to the annoyance of the whole community in general or by neglect to do anything which the common good requires. It is an act or omission which causes any common injury, danger or annoyance to the public or to the people in general who dwell or occupy the property in the vicinity on the alternative it causes injury, obstruction, danger or annoyance to persons who may have occasion to use public right. It is the quantum of annoyance or discomfort in contradistinction to private nuisance which affects an individual is the decisive factor.

According to Pollock, 'Nuisance is the wrong done to a man by unlawfully disturbing him: (a) in the enjoyment of his property, or, in some cases, (b) in the exercise of a common right.'

In Winfield and Jolowicz on Tort,[20] public nuisance has been defined as follows:

> A public or common nuisance is one which materially affects the reasonable comfort and convenience of life of a class of Her Majesty's subject who come within the sphere or neigbourhood of its operation. But this definition is vague and it has been rightly said that nuisance covers a multitude of sins, great and small. Public nuisance of common law include diverse activities as carrying on an offensive trade, keeping a disorderly house, selling food unfit for human consumption, obstructing public highways, throwing fireworks about in the > streets and holding an ill advised pop-festival.[21]

Sir Arthur Underhill in his Law of Torts,[22] describes public nuisance as under:

> A public nuisance is some unlawful act, or omission to discharge some legal duty, which act or omission endangers the lives, safety, health or comfort of the public or by which the public are obstructed in the exercise of some common right.

No action can be brought by a private person of public nuisance unless he has suffered substantial particular damage beyond that suffered by the public generally.1845

A private nuisance has been described as under:

> A private nuisance is some unauthorised user or a man's own property causing damage to the property of another or some unauthorised interference with another's enjoyment of his property, causing damage.

Any private nuisance whereby sensible injury is caused to the property of another, or whereby the ordinary physical comfort of human existence in such property is materially interfered with, is actionable.

Harry Street, in his Law of Tort[23] observes as follows:

> The essence of the tort of nuisance is the interference with enjoyment of land...the generic conception of nuisance can readily be illustrated. It covers interference with use and enjoyment of land by water, foul smoke, smell, fumes, gas, noise, heat, electricity, disease or any other like thing which may cause such an inconvenience. Nevertheless, the term 'nuisance' is used in different senses by the Judges and this has caused confusion both in the development and in the exposition of this branch of the law of torts.

Salmond in Law of Torts,[24] states as follows:

> Nuisance is commonly a continuing wrong that is to say, it consists in the establishment or maintenance of some state of affairs which continuously or repeatedly causes the escape of noxious things into the plaintiff's land (eg a streak of foul water or the constant noise of small factory). An escape of something on a single occasion would not ordinarily be termed a nuisance. Nuisance are of two kinds, public and private. A private nuisance is a civil wrong and a public or common nuisance is a criminal offence.[25]

Same Act may Constitute Public as well as Private Nuisance

Private nuisance affects only private individuals in contradistinction to the public at large. In other words it is an act or omission intended to hurt or create annoyances, injury or discomfort to private individual or to the property possessed by a private individual. In brief, in some cases the same act may constitute a public nuisance as well as a private nuisance. Very often it is evident, that the private nuisance and public nuisance may in few instances, be overlapping. It is the quantum of annoyance or discomfort or injury which distinguishes private nuisance from public nuisance.[26]

When Injury etc. to be actually caused and when mere Threat is enough

Where the nuisance affects the public or the people who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity, the injury, danger or annoyance must be actually caused, and must affect a number of persons. Where, however, the nuisance affects only the person who may have occasion to use any public right, the injury, danger or annoyance need not be actually caused; it is enough if it is threatened. Again it need not affect the public or the people dwelling or occupying property in the vicinity, generally. It is enough if any individual, who may have occasion to use a public right, is threatened to be affected.1846

Where can Nuisance be Committed

The wording of the section, which is not aimed at mere private nuisances implies that an offence of causing a public nuisance can only be committed in a neighbourhood which is dwelt in or occupied by people in general, that is, by a body of a considerable number of persons.[27]

Whether Nuisance may be Committed by One on his Own Land

The acts, done by a person on his own land, may amount to a public nuisance, when they cause any common injury, danger or annoyance to the public or to the people in general, who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity. It is not necessary that the nuisance must have been committed on the land belonging to the public.[28]

Lawfulness of an Act upon One's own Land is no Defence

Where an act is a nuisance to the public, it is no defence that it is in itself a perfectly lawful act, and that it is done upon a man's own ground, in a convenient place, and in a proper manner, for the illegality consists in using one's own property so as to harm the public.[29]

7. Nuisance Distinct from Trespass and Negligence

Nuisance is distinct from trespass and negligence, and, as a general rule, in cases of public nuisance the grievance lies in the inconvenience, in fact, caused,[30] and not in the intent or knowledge of the person responsible as occupier of the premises on which the nuisance is created, or of the owner, if the premises are, in fact, unoccupied.[31]

8. 'Act'

By s 33, the word 'act' in this Code, includes an 'illegal omission', except where a contrary intention appears from the context. The contrary intention does appear in this section, viz, by expressly contrasting the words 'illegal omission' with the word 'act'. Thus, the word 'act' in this section bears its natural sense of positive conduct, doing something, as contrasted with 'omission' or negative conduct, not doing something.[32] 'Act', however, includes a series of acts and 'omission' includes a series of omissions.[33]

9. 'Illegal Omission'

By s 43, IPC the word 'illegal' has a three-fold meaning: (a) anything which is an offence under the Code;[34] (b) anything prohibited by law; and (c) anything which furnishes ground for a civil action. Thus, an omission which is either in itself an1847 offence under the Code, or which is prohibited by law, or which furnishes a ground for a civil action, is an 'illegal omission'.

A public nuisance may be caused by acts or omissions causing terror or danger to the public in general. It is said that a mastiff going in the street unmuzzled, from the ferocity of his nature being dangerous and a cause of terror to the general public, seems to be a common nuisance; and that, consequently the owner may be > indicted for suffering him to go at large, and it is said to be a public nuisance to keep 'a ferocious dog' and noisy dog so near a highway as to be likely to frighten horses owing to its barking. Negligently blasting stone in a quarry and thereby projecting large pieces of stone, so as to endanger the safety of persons in houses and on highways adjoining the quarry, is a misdemeanour indictable at common law. So is allowing a house near a highway to become a dangerous building; and while a man who burns down his own house is not guilty of arson at common law, he commits public nuisance if the house is so situate that its burning causes danger to others.[35]

A, whose duty it is by law to see to the burial of a corpse, omits to do so. This is an illegal omission, and the injury, danger or annoyance caused or threatened thereby is a public nuisance.[36]

A, the occupier of a house in ruins, dangerous to the public, is bound to repair it, and his omission to do so is illegal and causes a public nuisance.[37]

A, the occupier of a house, is bound to prevent the soil in the privy from trespassing. His omission to do so is illegal and causes a public nuisance.[38]

A has a well in his private ground within eight yards of the highway and open thereto. A is not bound to fence the well in, and his omission to do so is not illegal.[39] But, the filling up of the private well from where inhabitants of the village were drawing water for a long time would clearly result in common injury to the public or to the people of the village who dwell or occupy the property in the vicinity of the well, constitute public nuisance.[40]

Where the lambardars, who used to make sanitary arrangement on the occasion of the holding of a fair at a certain village, were found to have omitted to make the arrangement in a certain year, it was held that they could not be convicted of an offence under this section.[41]

Allowing a prickly-pear to spread from his own property on to the public road was held to be a public nuisance within the meaning of this section on the principle that no man shall so use his property as to injure his neighbour and it makes no difference that the neighbour is the public and not an individual.[42] Omission on the part of the owners of pigs to prevent them from straying and committing nuisance in a public place is not an illegal omission and does not, therefore, constitute a public nuisance punishable under s 290 .[43] The omission of a person to keep his ponies from straying is not a public nuisance punishable under s 290 of the Indian Penal Code .[44]1848

Letting loose one's cattle on the public road has been held to be doing an act which must necessarily cause obstruction, danger or annoyance to persons who have occasion to use the public road at night.[45]

10. Offences Affecting the Public and not an Individual

The persons affected by the nuisance, by the terms of the section, must comprise either the public generally, or a section of the public resident near the locality of the nuisance or persons in the exercise of a public right.[46] Thus, the essence of the offence is that it affects the public, and is not merely injurious or annoying to an individual. A nuisance which merely affects an individual or a few individuals is a ground for a civil action for damages, but is not indictable. The inhabitants of three sets of chambers in Clifford's Inn, London, were annoyed by the noise made by a tinman carrying on his trade in the immediate neighbourhood. When the windows were shut the noise was greatly lessened. It was held that this was not an indictable nuisance, but if anything, a private one.[47]

11. Public

The first part of the section refers to injury, danger or annoyance to the public or to the people in general who dwell or occupy property in the vicinity. The word 'public' has been defined in the Code in s 12 as including any class of the public, or any community. The Muslim community or the Muslims of the neighbourhood would, therefore, be included in the word 'public' which is used in the expression

'public nuisance' in this section.[48] The public is a body different from the panchayat.[49] In s 133, CrPC, which deals with abatement of a public nuisance, the word used is 'community', and it has been held to mean the public at large or the residents of an entire locality and not merely the residents of a particular house.[50]

12. 'Common Injury, Danger or Annoyance'

The words 'public', 'in general' and 'vicinity' clearly indicate that there can be no public nuisance unless the general public of the locality is affected by the nuisance. Injury, danger or annoyance caused to residents of a particular house is not enough.[51] What the section in this chapter aims at is general annoyance or danger to persons in the vicinity. When no injury or annoyance is caused to persons in the vicinity, there can be no public nuisance, even if it tends to cause some injury to some owners of property.

There is no manner of doubt that filling up of the well from which the public at large was drawing water would clearly result in common injury to the public or the people of the village to dwell or occupy the property in the vicinity of the well.[52]1849

Where riparian owners of land on one bank of a river throw up an embankment on their own land to protect their fields from flood, and this results to accumulation of water on the fields of the owners of land on the other side of the river, it cannot be said that the embankment causes a common injury to the public in the vicinity. Hence, an embankment of this kind, even if it tends to cause injury to some owners of property, cannot be described as a public nuisance.[53]

Every Member of Public need not be Affected by Injury etc

Because the residents of a single house are annoyed by the noise of a theatre, the householder is not entitled to prosecute, unless he can show that the noise annoys other people living in the vicinity.[54] But the annoyance or injury need not affect every member of the public. It is sufficient if it should affect people in general who dwell in the vicinity.[55]

Individual Versus General Public

It is sufficient even if one person is annoyed, and as the act complained of can hardly be proved except by some person who comes forward to complain, the annoyance is almost necessarily involved in the complaint. It therefore, comes to this, that all that is required is that the act was done in such a way as to annoy a person who complained of it.[56] But when the trade of the non-applicant is causing nuisance only to the applicant and there is no evidence that other neighbours also are troubled, s 133, CrPC, has no application.[57] Similarly, where the noise of the ice-cream making machinery constitutes a nuisance to the residents of the building whose flats are adjacent to the place where the machine is running and not to all the residents of the building, finding to this effect, is not a finding that a public nuisance exists, therefore, s 133, CrPC, has no application is such cases.[58] The public which one must have in view is the general public of a locality, i.e., the villagers in the case of a village, and not an individual of particularly refined susceptibilities.[59]

Whether an annoyance or injury is sufficiently widespread to amount to public nuisance is a question of fact.[60]

Injury or Annoyance to some Persons Drawn from a Higher Class or Society not Sufficient

What is likely to be an annoyance to persons in a town may not be an annoyance to people living in a village. Thus, passing urine in a public place in a village is not likely to cause annoyance, to the villagers. Similarly, quarrelling in a public place, though it might be a source of annoyance in a town, is not likely to cause annoyance to villagers or inhabitants of a village.[61] Regard must be had to the character of the locality, and the class of persons of whom the public is composed. To make an1850 nuisance indictable, it must be a nuisance to the public or to the people in general, not merely to a few persons drawn from a higher class and accustomed to a higher standard of comfort than their neighbours.

Other Persons Committing Other Nuisance is no Defence

Where any act or occupation causes an undoubted public nuisance, a person who is charged with such a nuisance cannot plead that a number of other persons are committing other nuisances as bad as, or worse than his own, and that his contribution to the general annoyance is merely an imperceptible addition.[62]

Smell Injurious to Senses and not to Health--Effect

In order to constitute an offence under this section, it is not necessary that the alleged nuisance should produce smells injurious to health, it is sufficient if they are offensive to the senses.[63] In order to constitute a nuisance, there must be 'not merely nominal, but such a sensible and real damage as a sensible person...would find injurious.'[64]

Smell Rendering Living Uncomfortable, Though not Unwholesome

As regards personal discomfort arising from noxious fumes, smells and the like, it was long ago laid down by Lord Mansfield CJ: 'It is not necessary that the smell should be unwholesome; it is enough if it renders the enjoyment of life and property uncomfortable'.[65] The vitiation of the atmosphere so as to make it noxious to health is specially punishable by s 278, IPC .

Degree of Discomfort Required to Constitute Nuisance

As to the degree of personal discomfort which constitutes a nuisance, Knight Bruce VC said:

> The important point for decision may properly be thus put: Ought this inconvenience to be considered as more than fanciful, or as one of mere delicacy or fastidiousness, or as an inconvenience materially interfering with the ordinary comfort, physically, of human existence, not merely according elegant or dainty modes and habits of living, but according to plain, sober, and simple notions amongst English people.[66]

Where the annoyance neither did, nor could, cause any sensible or real damage, it cannot amount to an offence under this section merely by reason of its hurting the feelings of the members of a particular community. Thus, where the accused cut up, on his verandah, meat that was to be cooked for a dinner party, exposing it to the sight of persons passing along the road, among whom were some Jains, whose temple was close by, it was held that the act of the accused was an annoyance merely by reason of its hurting the feelings of Jains, who have a repugnance to killing of animals, and did not constitute an offence under s 290 .[67] Similarly where certain Mohammedans killed and cut up two cows before sunrise in a private compound, partly visible from the road, and one Hindu saw them doing so, it was1851 held that there was no public nuisance.[68] So also where certain Mohammedan villagers erected a temporary shed near a Hindu temple during Mohurrum, and placed a religious symbol therein, it was held that this did not constitute a public nuisance.[69]

Sentimental Injury or Annoyance not Sufficient

The effect of the act or illegal omission must be any common injury,[70] danger, obstruction or annoyance, but these do not include a sentimental injury or annoyance arising from the susceptibilities of others.[71] Playing the radio loudly at a particular time did not constitute public nuisance.

It was too trivial for being pursued in a court of law. The conviction under s 290, IPC, was, therefore, set aside.[72]A places cakes of cow-dung on the roadside to dry in the sun. This is not a public nuisance, unless a material annoyance is caused to the public.[73] Gambling of itself is not a public nuisance, especially gambling in a private house.[74] But where a lessee of a house permits disorderly people to use it for gambling and thereby causes annoyance to the public, he is guilty of the offence under s 290 .[75]

Some Examples of Public Nuisance

The following are some examples of public nuisance:

(i) Keeping filth upon premises.[76]
(ii) Using a shop as a slaughter house.[77]
(iii) Offensive smells, though not injurious to health,[78]eg a hartshorn manufactory,[79] and brick burning.[80]
(iv) Trades dangerous to human life, eg keeping gunpowder, etc.[81]
(v) Bringing horses with glanders into a public place.[82]
(vi) Taking a plague patient to a house where several persons are living.[83]
(vii) Erecting a privy[84] or placing putrid carrion[85] near the highway.1852
(viii) Keeping swine near a street[86] and boiling the entrails and offal of beasts.[87]
(ix) Violently blowing a speaking trumpet at night,[88] and keeping dogs which make noises at night.[89]
(x) Brothels[90] and common gambling houses.[91]
(xi) Indecent exposure of the person in a public place, with intent to cause annoyance to persons dwelling or being near, or passing by.[92]
(xii) Gambling in a public place.[93]

13. 'Which must Necessarily Cause Injury...Public Right'

Under the second part of the section actual injury or annoyance need not have been caused. It is enough if the act or illegal omission of the accused is such as must necessarily cause injury, obstruction, danger or annoyance to any person who may have occasion to use any public right.[94] If any portion, however small, of a public street is encroached upon, the inevitable result must be to cause obstruction to persons who may have occasion to use the highway, for the public is entitled to use every inch of a road that has been dedicated to the public.[95] The obstruction must be the direct and necessary consequence of the act or the illegal omission of the accused. Where the accused was selling 'satta' tickets at his ship with the result that 10 or 15 customers collected outside and obstructed the traffic in the public street adjoining the shop, it was held that the assembling of 10 or 15 customers and the obstruction of traffic cannot be considered to be the direct or necessary consequence of the offer of 'satta' tickets for sale, that the mere offer of 'satta' tickets for sale by the accused could not itself be the source of any nuisance to the public. Obviously, it should be possible for the customers to purchase tickets in an orderly manner without crowding in front of the shop or blocking the traffic; and therefore, the accused could not be convicted under s 290 .[96]

Levy of registration fees of Rs. 5/- for indoor patients and Rs. 2/- for outdoor patients in Government Hospital imposed by a society providing diagnosis facilities was held as not 'public nuisance'.[97]1853

Private Right to yield to Public Right

In one other case the accused, the master and servant of a toy shop exhibited in the windows of the shop, overlooking the public road, certain clock-work toys during the diwali festival. The result of the exhibition was that thousands of people collected on the road to witness the toys. There were dangerous crowds in consequence; people were knocked down and great obstruction and danger were caused to those using the road. The accused were asked by the police to stop the exhibition, but they would not obey. It was held that the cause of this nuisance was the act of the accused. It consisted of the manner in which they worked the toys in their shop; their object was to attract a crowd; they knew that a crowd would be, and as a matter of fact was, attracted by what they did, and they must be regarded as having intended that consequence. It follows that the nuisance was caused by them.[1] Ordinarily every shopkeeper has a right to exhibit his wares in any way he likes in his shop, but he must exercise the right so as not to cause annoyance or nuisance to the public.[2] As was said by Romer LJ, in Attorney-General v Brighton and Hove Co-op Supply Assn ,[3] 'It does not follow that, because the user is necessary or useful for the purpose of carrying on the business, it must of necessity be held to be a reasonable user'. And the law, as explained by Lindley MR, in the same case, is that, 'In a case of doubt or difficulty, the private reasonable right of a householder to carry on his business must yield to the public right of user of the street'. No man shall so use his property as to injure his neighbour, and it makes no difference that the neighbour is the public and not an individual.[4]

In yet another case, the accused placed a board in the front of his house over the water channel and on to a considerable portion of the road leaving only a small space by which persons could pass by his house. On this board he sat writing and delivering to a large crowd of persons vouchers for bets which they made with him about the government opium sales. It was held that the placing of the board in the way by the accused did necessarily caused obstruction to persons who might have occasion to use the public right of passage past the shop of the accused.[5] It has been held that merely placing a charpoy on the road in a bazaar temporarily does not amount to an offence of causing public nuisance.[6] When the accused raised the level of the public way in front of his house and also constructed a cross-bund across it and the result was stagnation of water leading to breeding of mosquitoes and giving rise to offensive smell, causing to persons living in the vicinity danger to their health and annoyance to persons using that part of the way, it was held that it was a clear case of public nuisance.[7]

Allegation was that the respondent factory had created public nuisance by creating a wall by which the flow of the water by nala has been obstructed and thereby the water is accumulated in the residential houses constructed by petitioner Housing Board for public. The Assistant Engineer of the Housing Board produced in the court admitted that the blockage was due to non-making of proper sewage line by the1854 Housing Board upto the nala. The plea of creating public nuisance was rejected. Order rejecting petition under s 133, CrPC was upheld.[8]

Frequently Causing not the same as Necessarily Causing

Although soliciting by prostitutes in a public place frequently causes annoyance to persons using such place, annoyance is not necessarily caused thereby, and therefore, such soliciting does not fall within this section.[9]

14. Legalised/Recognised Nuisances

There is a limited class of nuisances recognised by law, which are so recognised because they are compromises belonging to social life, by which some apparent natural right is invaded or some enjoyment abridged to provide for the more general convenience or necessities of the whole community; eg, the cremation of the dead. But it does not follow that the cremation of the dead under any circumstances whatsoever is innocent, for if, on the one hand, the use of a ground for the purpose of cremation, in a manner neither unusual nor calculated to aggravate the inconveniences naturally incident to such an act as it is generally performed in India, is perfectly lawful; on the other hand, a ground kept and used in such a manner as to be offensive or a source of injury or annoyance to people in general who dwell in the vicinity will constitute a nuisance under this section.[10] It is, of course, an answer to an indictment for a public nuisance that the acts or omissions on which the indictment is based are authority by statute.[11] This defence has been much discussed in many cases of public and private proceedings for nuisance. The decisions frequently turn on the particular wording of the statute involved, i.e., on the question whether what is complained of was specifically authorised or whether the terms of the statute preserve the common law liability in the case of negligence or nuisance.[12]

Smoking--Use of Cigarette Trademark by another Company, Section 91 , CPC

Injury, damage or annoyance contemplated in s 268, IPC does not comprehend the injury, damage or annoyance which may result from smoking, smoking being regarded as injurious to health. Even though smoking is injurious, neither is manufacture, nor sale, nor advertisement, nor consumption of cigarettes prohibited. Therefore, the use of the cigarette trademark of one company by another company which results in an increase in the sale of cigarettes does not give a cause of action for an action of public nuisance. Nor does that act amount to any other wrongful act. Section 91 does not create any new legal right. It only provides for the procedure in cases of public nuisances and other wrongful acts affecting the public, where no special damage has been caused to such persons by reason of such public nuisance or other wrongful act. There are many forms of harm of which the law takes no account. Damage so done and suffered is called damnum sine injuria. Undoubtedly, such a harm is not comprehended within the expression, 'other wrongful act' affecting the public, occurring in s 91 .[13]1855

Non-Payment of Tax not an Offence under this Section

Non-payment of tax does not necessarily cause injury, danger or annoyance to the public, and does not, therefore, constitute an offence under this section.[14]

15. 'Licensed Trade Causing Nuisance'--No Right to Continue when its user Becomes Nuisance

A previous sanction of the public authorities to the establishment of a trade, eg, the running of a slaughter-house, does not entitle the trader to continue the business after it has become a public nuisance to the neighbourhood.[15]

16. No Prescriptive Right to Maintain Nuisance

No length of enjoyment can legalise a public nuisance involving actual danger to the health of the community.[16] A public nuisance is indictable however long it has existed.[17] In R v Cross ,[18] Ellenborough CJ said:

> It is immaterial how long the practice may have prevailed, for no length of time will legitimate a nuisance. A shell fishery across a river had been established for a vast number of years, but Buller, J held that it continued unlawful, and gave judgement that it should be abated.

Although no length of enjoyment can legalise a public nuisance,[19] yet the long possession or enjoyment of what is said to be a nuisance may give to the objection of the person so possessing or enjoying it the character of a bona fide dispute as to title such as might have the effect of ousting the jurisdiction of the magistrate under ss 133 and 138 of the CrPC, and making the question a proper one for the civil court.[20]

17. Some Convenience or Advantage, no Defence

The section itself says that a common nuisance is not excused on the ground that it causes some convenience or advantage. To a charge of public nuisance, it is no answer that the injury to the public is more than counter-balanced by the benefits resulting from the act or occupation complained of to the general community, or to the locality itself.[21]

18. Master's Liability for Acts of Servant

Under the English law it is no defence to an indictment for nuisance against a master or employer that the nuisance was caused by acts of his servants, if they were done in the course of their employment.[22] But in India the general rule is that a principal is not criminally answerable for the acts of his agent.[23] Where the accused, the manager1856 of a school, had a building put up at a cost of Rs 35,000 employing masons therefor, and the masons constructed the same with excess of sand in the mortar thereby resulting in collapse of the building and killing several inmates. On these facts, the Madras High Court held that it was not the case of the prosecution that the accused himself constructed the building and, it was not disputed that he sought the assistance of the masons and the masons constructed the building. If the masons had not done the work properly and if they had been negligent in not mixing the lime mortar in proper proportions, the accused could not be made liable for the negligence of those persons who actually constructed the building who were supposed to be skilled. The accused was a layman, he, therefore, could not be held liable for the negligence of the persons who actually constructed the building, which is the cause for the collapse of the building. The acquittal of the accused by the sessions court in appeal for offences under s 304A, 337, 338 and 290, IPC, was found proper.[24]

19. Lessor's Liability for Nuisance Caused by the Lessee

So long as a tenancy continues, the lessor may have no control over the premises leased. But it is always open to the landlord to terminate the tenancy, if the lessee commits public nuisance. If he fails to do so, he may be held liable for the nuisance committed by the lessee.[25]

20. Lessee's Liability for Acts of Lessor

If platforms built by owners of houses or shops cause injury, danger or annoyance to the public or to the people in the vicinity, it is the owners who built the platforms that are guilty of causing public nuisance and not the shopkeepers who merely sit on the platforms.[26]

21. Liability of Joint Owner

A joint owner is responsible in law for nuisances caused by his joint property.[27]

22. Abatement of Nuisance

There is a broad distinction between removing an obstruction wrongfully placed in a highway and abating a nuisance created by the non-feasance of persons charged with the duty of repairing a highway or public bridge.[28] In a case in which the defendant had gone on the land of another to re-erect a bridge alleged to be public which had fallen into decay, it was held that this proceeding could not properly be described as abatement.[29] There seems to be no instance in which an individual has been held entitled to abate a public nuisance caused by omission except perhaps in cutting trees allowed to obstruct a highway.[30] In the latter case are discussed the rights of individuals to abate private nuisances caused by the growth of trees. At the present1857 time, save in exceptional circumstances, the only lawful mode of abating a public nuisance is by obtaining an order of a competent court.[31] In the case of easements, s 24 of the Indian Easements Act 1882, gives a dominant owner an accessory right to do all acts necessary to secure the full enjoyment of an easement. But s 36 of the same Act lays down that 'notwithstanding the provisions of s 24, the dominant owner cannot himself abate a wrongful obstruction of an easement'. A summary procedure for abatement of a public nuisance is laid down in ss 133 - 144 of the CrPC .

23. Remedies Available against Public and Private Nuisance

Sections 133 and 144 of the CrPC 1973, deal with public nuisance. It is inconceivable that the provisions of ss 133 - 144 can be made applicable to private nuisance. The remedies available are both in civil and criminal nature. Against a private nuisance a civil remedy is available under s 91 of the CPC 1908, by filing a civil suit for declaration and injunction or for such other relief as may be appropriate in the circumstances of the case and in that suit the plaintiff need not prove, that he has sustained any special damage. The other remedy available is under criminal law by prosecution of the person responsible under different sections provided under ch XV of the IPC . The next remedy is in the form of summary proceedings in urgent matters pertaining to public nuisance etc, and the same has been provided under ss 133 - 144 of the Code. One more remedy is also available against public nuisance that is as provided under special or local laws, including s 405 of UP Nagar Mahapalika Adhiniyam 1959, s 126 of the Cantonments Act 1952 etc. In the instant case, as the nuisance complained of was affecting the public at large inasmuch as while manufacturing wheel-panas, some unusual noise or disturbance was created which certainly affected the public at large and as alleged if cracks were formed in the buildings of the locality that affected the public in general and not only any private individual. Therefore, in the present case nuisance was certainly public nuisance and the remedy available in the summary proceedings was by way of an application under s 133 of the Code. It may be clarified that the remedy against public nuisance under s 133 was essentially a civil remedy but as the matter pertains to an urgent situation the power to pass an appropriate order was given to the magistrate concerned. Otherwise, if for similar purposes some urgent remedy was provided in summary proceedings in a civil court that would have prolonged the proceedings.[32]

Chapter X of the Code of Criminal Procedure deals with 'public nuisance' and not with 'private nuisance' the remedy for the latter is a civil suit, although that constitutes nuisance may be common to both classes. Section 133 , CrPC provides a speedy and summary remedy in case of urgency where danger to public interest or public health is concerned. In all others cases, the party should be referred to the remedy under the ordinary law.[33] As a rule, a public nuisance is only punishable on indictment, and is no ground for a civil action for damages as well.[34] But if an individual member of the public suffers some special damage thereby, but not otherwise, he may bring a civil action.[35] It is competent to a person to bring an action in the civil court for obtaining an order for the removal of a building erected on a1858 portion of waste land belonging in common to all the houses in a street or upon a road, provided he is injured by it, without in the first instance applying to the magistrate for its removal.[36]

An individual has a public right to pass along a public highway practising his religious observances peacefully and if anyone interferes with this right, he commits public nuisance. A body of persons has the same right as an individual. A suit for declaration of such a right and formation restraining those who interfere with it, is a suit for removal of such public nuisance.[37]

A digs a hole in high road. This is a public nuisance, and A may be punished for causing it. But if B falls into the hole and injures himself he may bring an action for damages as well.[38]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 269.

Negligent act likely to spread infection of disease dangerous to life.--

Whoever unlawfully or negligently does any act which is, and which he knows or has reason to believe to be, likely to spread the infection of any disease dangerous to life, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope and Object

This and the next two sections deal with the subject of infectious diseases. This section and s 270, IPC make it an offence to do any act which is, and which the accused knows, or has reason to believe to be likely to spread the infection of any disease dangerous to life. It is further necessary under the former section that the act should have been done 'unlawfully or negligently', and under the latter section 'malignantly'. The object of these sections is the prevention of the spreading of infectious diseases.

It has been illustrated in Ratanlal and Dhirajlal's Law of Crime,[39] that if a man is attacked by a contagious and deadly disease and needlessly goes abroad with it1859 in a public way or if a person carries about a child so infected, he does what he may be supposed to know to be likely to spread the infection. And unless some lawful occasion or reason for this conduct can be shown, as that the sick person had been directed to be removed to a hospital and that the removal was performed with due caution, the act will be an offence punishable under this section. It must be shown that the accused had knowledge that the disease was infectious. Where the disease is generally known to be infectious there will be no difficulty. The infection which is likely to be spread must be of a disease dangerous to life.[40]

2. Legal Obligation of the Sick and his Attendants

Legal rule with respect to infectious diseases has been laid down by Lord Blackburn thus:[41]

> Where the disease is infectious, there is a legal obligation on the sick person, and on those who have the custody of him, not to do anything that can be avoided, which shall tend to spread the infection; and if either do so, as by bringing the infected person into public thoroughfare, it is an indictable offence, though it will be a defence to an indictment if it can be shown that there was a sufficient cause to excuse what is prima facie wrong, causing them to be carried along the public street.[42]

3. Spreading Infectious Disease is a Public-nuisance

In R v Vantandillo ,[43] in which a woman was indicted for carrying her child, infected with small-pox, along a public highway, Le Blane J, in passing sentence, observed that although the court did not find upon its records any prosecutions for this specific offence, yet there could be no doubt, in point of law, that if anyone unlawfully, injuriously and with full knowledge of the fact, exposes in a public highway a person infected with a contagious disorder, it is a common nuisance to all the subjects and indictable as such.

4. Sections 269 and 270, IPC

These two sections spell out two separate and distinct offences by providing that if a person, negligently or unlawfully, does an act which he knew was likely to spread the infection of a disease, dangerous to life, to another person then, the former would be guilty of an offence punishable with imprisonment for the term indicated therein. Therefore, if a person suffering from the dreadful disease 'AIDS' knowingly marries a woman and thereby transmits infection to that woman, he would be guilty of the offences indicated in ss 269 and 270 of the IPC .

The above statutory provisions thus impose a duty upon the appellant not to marry as the marriage would have the effect of spreading the infection of his own disease, which obviously is dangerous to life, to the woman whom he marries apart from being an offence.[44]1860

5. Essentials

Section 269, IPC makes the negligent act likely to spread infection of disease dangerous to life an offence. The essential ingredients are that the accused does any act unlawfully or negligently; that such act is likely to spread infection of any disease dangerous to life; and that he knows or has reasons to believe that the act is likely to cause such infection.[45]

6. 'Unlawfully or Negligently'

If a person, in doing anything which he knows, is in itself likely to spread an infectious disease, dangerous to life, adopts means, which he has no right to adopt, or does not use due care and caution in doing what he is engaged upon, he acts unlawfully in the first case, and 'negligently' in the second. These words qualify the word 'does', and refer to the manner in which the prima facie dangerous act is performed, and do not refer to the act itself, which may be 'any' act. Thus, the gist of the unlawful act is that there must be danger of the infection spreading. If care is taken to avoid such an infection, the act cannot be said to be unlawful or negligent.[46]

Illustrations

(i) A, suffering from a dangerous infectious disease, exhibits himself in the public streets for the purpose of eliciting pity and gaining alms thereby.[47]

(ii) A exhibits in the public streets a child suffering from small-pox.[48]

(iii) A injuriously inoculates children with small-pox, and while they are sick, causes them to be carried through the public streets.[49]

(iv) A knowing that he is suffering from cholera, enters a railway carriage as a passenger without informing the railway officials.[50]

In each of the above cases, A has committed an offence under s 269 .

(v) In a Bombay case, A, a prostitute suffering from syphilis, encouraged and allowed B to have sexual intercourse with her, after assuring him that she was healthy, thereby communicating the disease to B; A was held to be not guilty of the offence under this section. Justifying the decision, West J observed:

Assuming that there was dangerous disease, and culpable negligence still accused's act of sexual intercourse would not spread infection without the intervention of the complaining party, himself, a responsible person and himself generally an accomplice.[51]

7. 'Does any Act'

'Act' here means one or more acts, or one or more illegal omissions.[52]1861

8. Doctor's Negligence during Operation

Where during the course of operation the accused doctor left a cotton bundle in the patient's stomach which caused pain and the patient had to undergo subsequent operation, held a prima facie case for offence under s 269, IPC was made out.[53]

9. Gist of Unlawful Act

The gist of the unlawful act is that there must be danger of the infection spreading. If care is taken to avoid such an infection, the act cannot be said to be unlawful or negligent. To bring the offender within it, he should have unlawfully or negligently done an act which he knew or had reason to believe to be likely to spread the infection of any disease dangerous to life.[54]

10. 'Knows or has Reason to Believe'

It is not enough that the act in question is done in an unlawful or negligent manner; the act must be one which the accused knew or had reason to believe,[55] to be likely to spread infection, eg, s 116, but it does not come within this section unless the accused knew or had reason to believe that his act was likely to spread infection.[56] Where A, living in a house together with her only daughter B and a friend, refused, on B being attacked by small-pox, to allow her to be removed to the small-pox hospital, as ordered by the district magistrate, it was held that in so doing, A had reason to believe that the infection was likely to be spread thereby and that A committed no offence under this section.[57]

11. Infectious Diseases

Infectious diseases have been defined in the Public Health (London) Act 1891 to include small-pox, cholera, diphtheria, membranous croup, erysipelas, the disease known as scarlatina, or scarlet fever and the fevers known by any of the following names, typhus, typhoid, enteric, relapsing continued or puerperal. The section is confessedly inexhaustive but the diseases named may be taken to be those which are regarded as undoubtedly infectious.

Defence in Cases of Infectious Disease

The duty not to spread infectious illness and the limitations upon that duty, were fully examined by Lord Blackburn in the case of the Metropolitan Asylum District v Hill ,[58] where it had to be decided whether a small-pox hospital was a public nuisance. He pointed out that prima facie it was an indictable offence to take an infected person into any place where he would come into contact with other persons, but that it would be a defence to an indictment if it could be shown that there was sufficient reason to excuse what is prima facie wrong. As, for instance, where those who have charge of a person suffering from an infectious disorder, have no means of1862 isolating him from others; or where they can in no other way discharge their legal obligation of doing their best to procure advice and assistance for him, or where some overwhelming necessity, such as a fire in the house, compels them to carry the patient through a crowd.

Where the allegation in the complaint was that the wife of the complainant was examined by the doctors in a nursing home at regular intervals but she was never informed that the position of the child in her womb was not normal. This fact was told by the doctors only when she was admitted for the purpose of delivery. The complainant gave his consent and thereafter a caesarian operation was performed and the child was born. Further allegation in the complaint was that on account of giving of enema the wife had loose motions about six times due to which her condition deteriorated and the doctor suspected some heart problem and advised the complainant to bring a heart specialist. It was held that these facts by themselves do not at all constitute an offence under s 269, IPC . There is neither any allegation nor there is any material to show that the act of the applicants was likely to spread any infections disease. Thus, necessary ingredient for commission of an offence under s 269, IPC, is not at all made out.[59]

A person who keeps a member of the family who is attacked with small-pox in the house, and refuses to allow his removal to hospital, does not commit an offence under this section.[60]

A doctor who caused death of complainant's wife due to negligent acts, by use of wrong medicines and injections and overdose of anaesthesia could be said to have committed offence as described under s 269 .[61]

Liability of Shipping Company in Some Cases

A similar question arose in Bombay, where an action was brought against a steamship company for breach of contract in not shipping five hundred pilgrims from Bombay to Jeddah. The plea was that the persons had arrived at Bombay from Singapore in a ship in which small-pox had broken out on the voyage, and that on the day on which they should have been shipped, fresh cases were occurring not amongst the five hundred pilgrims tendered for shipment, but amongst the others, and that the shipment of five hundred pilgrims would have been an act punishable under this section. This plea was held to be insufficient, apparently on the ground that the company might, by taking sufficient precautions, have shipped the five hundred pilgrims so as not to endanger anyone else, and that their contract bound them to do so, if it was in any way possible.[62]

Small-pox

It is an offence to carry a child suffering from small-pox through the public streets, or into any place of public resort, without necessity.[63]

Where the health officer of the city of Madras directed the removal of a small-pox patient to an isolation hospital, but the patient's father, under advice of his own medical advisor, removed the patient to an isolated house; it was held that as proper1863 precautions were taken to prevent infection and to provide a suitable lodging for the person infected, the mere failure to carry out an order which could otherwise have been bona fide obeyed by the avoidance of the danger of infection, could not be regarded as an offence under this section.[64]

It is not an offence to inoculate with small-pox, when done bona fide as a remedial measure.[65] Inoculation is not in itself an illegal or negligent act, unless it is proved that any act has been done negligently in respect of the persons when inoculated, with the knowledge or belief that it is likely to spread the infection of a disease dangerous to life. It is, however, possible for the operator or a third person to be punishable under the section, on proof of a negligent dealing with the patient or patients after inoculation, with the knowledge or belief required by the section. Whether there has been such negligence accompanied by such knowledge or belief is always a question of fact.[66]

Plague

Hale discusses the question, whether if a person infected with the plague should go abroad with intent to infect another, and another be thereby infected and die, it would not be murder by the common law,[67] and seems to consider it as clear, that though where no such intent appears it cannot be murder, yet if another should be affected by an action of such a person it would be a misdemeanour.[68] Where a person, who was removed to a plague shed against orders, and travelled by rail to another place, it was held that he was rightly convicted under this section as he had sufficient reason to believe that his act was dangerous and likely to spread the infection of a dangerous disease.[69]

Cholera

K, knowing that he was suffering from cholera entered a train as a passenger without informing the erstwhile railway company's servants of his condition. M knowing of K's condition bought K's ticket and travelled with him. It was held that K was properly convicted under this section for negligently doing an act which was, and which he had reason to believe was likely to spread infection of a disease dangerous to life, and M of abetment of K's offence.[70]

Glanders

It is an indictable misdemeanour at common law to bring a horse infected with glanders into a public place to the danger of infecting the people there; and an indictment, which alleges that the defendant knew that a horse was infected with a contagious and infectious disease called the glanders, and that he brought it into a public place among diverse subjects of the King to the great danger of infecting1864 the said subjects with the said disease,[71] has been held sufficient after verdict, though it did not allege that the defendant knew that the disease was communicable to man.[72]

AIDS

If a person suffering from the dreadful disease 'AIDS' knowingly marries a woman and thereby transmits the infection to that woman he would be guilty of offences indicated in ss 269 and 270 of IPC . The above statutory provision thus impose a duty upon the appellant not to marry as the marriage would have the effect of spreading the infection of his own disease, which obviously is dangerous to life, to the woman whom he marries apart from being an offence.[73]

Venereal Disease

Under s 4 of the Venereal Diseases Act 1917,[74] the expression 'venereal diseases' means syphilis, gonorrhoea, or soft chancre.

Syphilis and Gonorrhoea

Syphilis and gonorrhoea are contagious diseases.

A prostitute who, while suffering from syphilis communicates the disease to a person who has sexual intercourse with her, has been held to be not liable to punishment under this section for a negligent act and one likely to spread infection of any disease dangerous to life.[75]

12. 'Dangerous to Life'--Life Means Human Life

Under s 45, IPC, 'life' denotes the life of a human being unless the contrary appears from the context. There is nothing in this section to indicate the contrary. So 'life' in this section must mean human life.

13. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable but a summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable but non-compoundable offence. It is triable by a magistrate.

The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within one year.

14. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in the case of a prosecution under this section:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you on or about the.....day of.....at.....unlawfully or negligently did an act which you knew (or had reason to believe) to be likely to spread the infection1865 of.....a disease dangerous to life, and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 269 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

Where the allegations were that accused was negligent and careless while injecting needles twice for performing amniocentesis test as a result of which the patient had to undergo forced abortion as septic had developed while performing test, no consent of patient and her spouse had been taken by the accused as required as per practice before conducting the said test, in the circumstances, even if the patient had consented, she could not be assumed to have consented for insertion of needle which can cause infection, the prima facie case against the accused was held made out and order framing the charge under ss 313 read with 269, IPC against the accused was held proper.[76]

15. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused did an act unlawfully or negligently; and
(ii) the accused knew or had reason to believe that the said act was likely to spread the infection of a disease dangerous, to life.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 270.

Malignant act likely to spread infection of disease dangerous to life.--

Whoever malignantly does any act which is, and which he knows or has reason to believe to be, likely to spread the infection of any disease dangerous to life, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

The offence under this section is an aggravation of the offence which is punishable under s 269, IPC . Under that section the act is done either 'unlawfully' or 'negligently' while under this section it is done 'malignantly'. The Law Commissioners observed:

> If any person died of the plague and his death could be traced to infection so caused maliciously, the person who caused it, we apprehend, would be chargeable with homicide...It is contrary to the principle of the Code to punish acts which the doer when he committed them knew to be likely to cause certain evil results, if in the same manner as if such evil consequences had actually flown from them.[77]

2. Sections 270 and 269, IPC

Synopsis note 4 of s 269, ante may be referred to.1866

3. No Effect of Repealing Provision of Section 25, Prevention of Food Adulteration Act (37 of 1954)[78]

It is necessary to see the provisions of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act. The object of the Act as it is stated in the preamble is to make provisions for the prevention of adulteration of food. The Act defines what is meant by adulteration and also lays down specific procedure for purchasing a sample of suspect adulterated foods, for getting them examined from public analysts, for getting sanction from the prosecution and for prosecuting the accused thereafter. The Act gives certain rights to the accused and from the scores of judgments that have been delivered under this Act those rights of the accused have been scrupulously protected. However, the crucial question is whether this Act repeals the provisions of the Indian Penal Code or has the effect of repealing this provision viz, ss 270 - 273, and 337 read with s 34 of the IPC, s 25 of the Act provides for repealing and saving and it says that if, immediately before the commencement of this Act, there is in force in any state to which this Act extends any law corresponding to this Act, that corresponding law shall upon such commencement stand repealed.[79] The Indian Penal Code is not a state law but it is a Central legislation. What is repealed by s 25 is the state law relating or controlling adulteration. Provisions of the Indian Penal Code are applicable to all the states including the State of Maharashtra, but it is not state law and these repealing provisions, therefore, do not affect ss 270 - 273, and s 337 of the IPC .[80]

4. 'Malignantly'

Notes to s 153 may also be referred to. The word 'malignantly' involves a deliberate intention to do harm, and in performing the act in question the offender adopts means calculated and intended to produce the prima facie dangerous consequences, known, or believed to be likely in any case. 'Malignantly' means 'maliciously'.[81]

5. 'Does any Act'

Notes under ss 32, 33 and 269 may be referred to.

6. 'Reason to Believe'

Notes under s 26 [82] may be referred to.

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognisable. A summon shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable offence, but not compoundable. It can be tried by any magistrate.

The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within three years.1867

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:

I (name and office of magistrate etc) hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:

That on or about the.....day of.....at.....you malignantly did an act which you knew or had reason to believe to be likely to spread the infection of disease (name of the disease) dangerous to life and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 270 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

9. Proof

To establish an offence under this section it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused did some act malignantly;
(ii) his act was likely to spread a disease, dangerous to life; and
(iii) the accused then knew, or had reason to believe, that his act was likely to spread the infection of a disease, dangerous to life.

The most important ingredient of this offence is that the act attributed to the accused which constitutes the offence, must be shown as likely to spread disease which is both infectious and dangerous to life. The bottle of Bluseal whisky found in possession of the petitioner had traces of methyl alcohol, a poisonous substance. As there was no suggestion, whatever, if this substance was likely to spread the infection of any disease dangerous to life, the conviction and sentence recorded against petitioner for his offence were held not sustainable.[83]

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 271.

Disobedience to quarantine rule.--

Whoever knowingly disobeys any rule made and promulgated [84][by the [85][] Government [86][] for putting any vessel into a state of quarantine, or for regulating the intercourse of vessels in a state of quarantine with the shore or with other vessels, or for regulating the intercourse between places where an infectious disease prevails and other places, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides punishment for breach of a quarantine rule. The motive for disobedience is immaterial. The person who, knowing the rule, disobeys it, does so1868 intentionally, and such disobedience is per se punishable irrespective of any injurious test.

2. Legislative Changes

The words 'by the Central or any Provincial Government or the Crown Representative' was replaced by the words 'by the Government of India or by any Government' by virtue of the Government of India (Adaptation of Indian Laws) Order 1937. Subsequently, the words 'or the Crown Representative', were deleted by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1948. Finally, the words 'Central or any Provincial' were dropped by the Adaptation of Laws Order 1950.

3. No Effect of Repealing Provision of Section 25, Prevention of Food Adulteration Act (37 of 1954)[87]

Commentary under the same heading in s 270, ante may be referred to.

4. 'Any Rule made and Promulgated'

The Indian Ports Act 1901 which repeals the Indian Quarantine Act 1870 provides for the promulgation by the Government of India and the local government of quarantine rules, which are to be published, and taken as rules made and promulgated under this section. A similar provision is to be found in s 2(1) of Epidemic Diseases Act 1897 which runs as follows:

(1) When at any time the State Government is satisfied that the State or any part thereof is visited by, or threatened with, an outbreak of any dangerous epidemic disease, the State Government, if it thinks that the ordinary provisions of the law for the time being in force are insufficient for the purpose, may take, or require or empower any person to take, such measures and, by public notice, prescribe such temporary regulations to be observed by the public or by any person or class of persons as it shall deem necessary to prevent the outbreak of such disease or the spread thereof, and may determine in what manner and by whom any expenses incurred (including compensation if any) shall be defrayed.

...

5. 'Government'

Section 16, and notes thereunder may be referred to.

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is not cognisable. A summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable offence but not compoundable. It can be tried by any magistrate.

The cognizance of an offence under this section can be taken within one year.

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted in case of a prosecution under this section:1869

I (name and office of the magistrate) hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That on or about the.....day of.....at.....you knowingly disobeyed the quarantine rule (mention the rule) made and promulgated by the Government for putting any vessel into a state of quarantine with the shore (or other vessels), (or for regulating the intercourse between placed, where an infectious disease prevailed, and other places) and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 271 of the Indian Penal Code or within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

8. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the rule of quarantine in question, exists;
(ii) the rule was made and promulgated by the government;

(iii) the rule was for one of the purposes mentioned in the section;
(iv) the accused knew of the rule;
(v) he disobeyed it; and
(vi) he did so knowingly.

84 Substituted by the AO 1937, for 'by the Government of India or by any Government'.

85 The words 'Central or any Provincial' omitted by the AO 1950.

86 The words 'or Crown Representative' omitted by the AO 1948.

87 Now repealed by The Food Safety and Standards Act, 2006 (34 of 2006).

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 272.

Adulteration of food or drink intended for sale.--

Whoever adulterates any article of food or drink, so as to make such article noxious as food or drink, intending to sell such article as food or drink, or knowing it to be likely that the same will be sold as food or drink, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

STATE AMENDMENTS

Orissa--In its application to the State of Orissa, in s 272, for the words "shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both", the following shall be substituted namely:--

"shall be punished with imprisonment for life and shall also be liable to fine:

Provided that the Court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life."[88]

Uttar Pradesh--In s 272, for the words "shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both," the following shall be substituted, namely:

"shall be punished with imprisonment for life and shall also be liable to fine:

Provided that the Court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life."[89]

West Bengal--In its application to the State of West Bengal in sections 272 for the words "of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine1870 which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both" the following shall be substituted, namely:

"For life with or without fine:

Provided that the Court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life."[90]

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with adulteration of food or drink, and the next section deals with the sale of noxious food or drink. To make out an offence under this section, it is necessary to show that an article of food or drink was adulterated so as to make such article noxious as food or drink, and that it was intended to sell such article, or that it was known that it would be likely to be sold, as food or drink.[91]

2. Analogous Law

This section is not the only provision which penalises the sale and exposure for sale of adulterated articles of food or drink, but there were several State enactments providing for the punishment of the said or similar offence, which have not been repealed by the Central enactment, the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 37 of 1954.

Under the English Law also it is an indictable misdemeanour knowingly to sell food unfit for human consumption, or to mix unwholesome ingredients in anything made and supplied for the food of man. The offence may be classified either as a public nuisance or as a common law cheat. The common law remedy by indictment is not affected by the provision of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act or the Public Health Acts.[92]

3. No Effect of Repealing Provision of Section 25, Prevention of Food Adulteration Act (37 of 1954)[93]

Commentary under the same heading in s 270, ante may be referred to.

4. 'Adulterate'

According to the Concise Oxford Dictionary, 'adulterate' means 'debase (especially foods) by admixure of other substances'. According to the Chamber's Twentieth1871 Century Dictionary, 'adulterate' means 'to debase, falsify, by mixing with something inferior or spurious'. Thus, 'adulteration' refers to infusion of some foreign substance or mixing up, with food, drink or drugs, other articles of inferior quality or of deleterious character, the object of such mixing being to increase the bulk, weight or apparent size of the article or to give it a deceptive appearance.[94] In this way adulteration involves an alteration in the nature of a substance by the addition of some foreign substance. Hence, mere inferiority in the quality never amounts to adulteration under this section. Under this section the adulteration must be such as to render it injurious to health. Section 2(ia) of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 37 of 1954,[95] however, defines adulteration as follows:

...

(ia) "adultered", an article of food shall be deemed to be adulterated--

(a) if the article sold by a vendor is not of the nature, substance or quality demanded by the purchaser and is to his prejudice, or is not of the nature, substance or quality which it purports or is represented to be;
(b) if the article contains any other substance which affects, or if the article is so processed as to affect, injuriously the nature, substance or quality thereof;
(c) if any inferior or cheaper substance has been substituted wholly or in part of the article so as to affect injuriously the nature, substance or quality thereof;
(d) if any constituent of the article has been wholly or in part abstracted so as to affect injuriously the nature, substance or quality thereof;
(e) if the article had been prepared packed or kept under insanitary conditions whereby it has become contaminated or injurious to health;
(f) if the article consists wholly or in part of any filthy, putrid, rotten, decomposed or diseased animal or vegetable substance or is insect-infested or is otherwise unfit for human consumption;
(g) if the article is obtained from a diseased animal;
(h) if the article contains any poisonous or other ingredient which renders it injurious to health;
(i) if the container of the article is composed, whether wholly or in part, of any poisonous or deleterious substance which renders its contents injurious to health;
(j) if any colouring matter other than that prescribed thereof is present in the article or if the amounts of the prescribed colouring matter which is present in the article are not within the prescribed limits of variability;
(k) if the article contains any prohibited preservative or permitted preservative in excess of the prescribed limits;
(l) if the quality or purity of the article falls below the prescribed standard or its constituents are present in quantities not within the prescribed limits of variability, which renders it injurious to health;
(m) if the quality or purity of the article falls below the prescribed standard or its constituents are present in quantities not within the prescribed limits of variability but which does not render it injurious to health;

1872Provided that where the quality or purity of the article being primary food, has fallen below the prescribed standard or its constituents are present in quantities not within the prescribed limits of variability, in either case, solely due to natural causes and beyond the control of human agency then, such article shall not be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of this sub-clause.

Explanation.--Where two or more articles of primary food are mixed together and the resultant article of food--

(a) is stored, sold or distributed under a name which denotes the ingredients thereof; and
(b) is not injurious to health, then such resultant article shall not be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of this clause.

...

The Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, 37 of 1954 is a special law enacted with more stringent and exhaustive provisions after about a century of the enactment and enforcement of this Code with a specific object in view and they are to be interpreted and applied independently. Mixing water with milk, also leaves with tea, or chicory with coffee, would not be punishable under s 272, while it clearly amounts to an offence under the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act.

5. Noxious as Food or Drink--Expression Explained

A bare glance through s 272, IPC leaves no doubt that a person who adulterates any article of food or drink so as to make it noxious as food or drink, shall be punished with certain terms of imprisonment mentioned therein. The term 'noxious' has not been defined in the Code or the CrPC . Thus, the ordinary dictionary meaning of this term has to be taken into consideration. According to Oxford English Dictionary,[1] the word 'noxious' means injurious, hurtful, harmful and unwholesome.[2] The word 'noxious' means harmful or injurious to health. In s 2(xv) of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, it is said that the words 'unwholesome' and 'noxious' when used in relation to an article of food, mean respectively that the article is harmful to health or repugnant to human use. But this section does not use the word 'unwholesome' and the expression 'noxious as food', in it obviously means unwholesome as food or injurious to health and not repugnant to one's feeling. The mixing of pig's fat with ghee and selling the mixture would be noxious to the religious and social feeling of both Hindus and Mohammedans, but such an act was held not to come within the meaning of the expression 'noxious as food' which occurs in this section.[3] The article of food or drink must be rendered noxious as food or drink, i.e., injurious to health, e.g. paddy soaked in dirty water,[4] or toddy in which worms have germinated,[5] or vegetable oil to ghee.[6]

But mere presence of non-permitted red oil solvable coal tardy, the percentage of which has not been given in the report of the public analyst, would not make the1873 spices as noxious because it will neither amount to injurious or hurtful nor can be said that it has made the spices as unwholesome.[7]

6. Vicarious Liability of Directors

Where 'Rajnigandha Pan Masala' was found to be containing Magnesium Carbonate, a banned substance, incorrect assertion was made by company in newspaper advertisement and in application made for grant of licence that 'Rajnigandha Pan Masala' does not contain Magnesium Carbonate, it cannot be without knowledge and permission of company's directors, therefore, proper investigation of matter would be in the interest of public and proceeding against directors cannot be quashed.[8]

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is not cognisable. A summons shall ordinarily issue in the first instance. It is a bailable offence but not compoundable. It is triable by any magistrate. In Uttar Pradesh and West Bengal there is no period of limitation fixed for taking cognizance of this offence.

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted for an offence under this section:

I, (name of the magistrate with his designation etc) do hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That on or about the.....day of.....in the year.....at.....you adulterated an article, namely..... (specify the article), which is an article of food (or drink), so as to make the same noxious as food (or drink) intending to sell such article as food (or drink), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 272, of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.

And I, hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge by this court.

In Uttar Pradesh and West Bengal the charge may be suitably amended. Where there is no allegation either in the FIR or in the charge sheet of adulterating food or drink intended for sale so as to make the same noxious, there can be no charge or prosecution under this section.[9]

When there is no evidence on the file that the accused had in fact mixed the adulterating material in the packets sold to the complainant, it cannot be said that a prima facie case would be made out against the accused for an offence under s 272, IPC, even if the entire allegation of the prosecution is taken to be true.[10]

9. Proof

To establish an offence under this section it will have to be proved that:

(i) the article of food or drink in question was adulterated;
(ii) it was thereby rendered noxious; and1874
(iii) the person who adulterated the article intended to sell it as food or drink, or knew that it was likely to be sold as such.

The Supreme Court has held that to establish that an offence under s 273, IPC, has been committed, the prosecution has to prove that the article involved was food or drink meant to be consumed by live persons, that the accused adulterated it, that he intended to sell such article as food or drink, or knew it to be likely that such article would be sold as food or drink. The offence is complete on introduction of the adulterant in the food or drink, provided it is meant for the purpose of sale, actual or likely.[11]

The knowledge of the adulteration will seldom be capable of direct proof. Where the article is, in fact, adulterated, and when it is shown that the vendor purchased it at a price below that for which the genuine article could be procured, such knowledge may safely be inferred. The presumption would be strengthened if it could be shown that the vendor had several articles of the same species on hand, at different prices, some adulterated and some not, or adulterated to different degrees.[12]

10. Evidentiary Value of Report of Scientific Expert

Section 293(1), CrPC 1973, provides that any document purporting to be a report under the hand of a government scientific expert (which includes a chemical examiner or assistant chemical examiner to the government), upon any matter or thing duly submitted to him for examination or analysis and report in the course of any proceeding under the Code, may be used as evidence in any inquiry, trial or other proceeding under this Code. But a report of a municipal analyst cannot be used as evidence without formal proof; he should be called as a witness to prove his report.[13]

Where one of the allegations was that the petitioners were manufacturing spurious sodawater, this charge was quashed keeping in view the fact that the contents of the alleged sodawater were never chemically tested.[14]

11. Destruction of Noxious Food or Drink

Section 455(2) of the CrPC 1973, provides:

> The Court may, in like manner, on a conviction under s 272, s 273, s 274 or s 275 of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860) order the food, drink, drug or medical preparation in respect of which the conviction was had, to be destroyed.

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 273.

Sale of noxious food or drink.--

Whoever sells, or offers or exposes for sale, as food or drink, any article which has been rendered or has become noxious, or is in a state unfit for food or drink, knowing or having reason to believe that the same is noxious as food or drink, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.1875

STATE AMENDMENTS

Orissa--In its application to the State of Orissa, in s 273, for the words "shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both", the following shall be substituted namely:--

"shall be punished with imprisonment for life and shall also be liable to fine:

Provided that the Court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life."[15]

Uttar Pradesh--In s 273, for the words "shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both", the following shall be substituted, namely:

"shall be punished with imprisonment for life and shall also be liable to fine:

Provided that the Court may, for the adequate reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life."[16]

West Bengal--In its application to the State of West Bengal in s 273 for the words "of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees or with both" the following shall be substituted namely:

"for life with or without fine:

Provided that the Court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life."[17]

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with the sale, or exposure for sale as food or drink of an article which is noxious or unfit for human consumption. It is more comprehensive than the previous one and includes not only articles adulterated, but also those which have become noxious or unfit for human consumption by lapse of time, such as tinned provisions kept for a long time or those articles which have become unfit for human consumption due to long exposure, neglect or contamination.1876

2. No Effect of Repealing Provision of Section 25, Prevention of Food Adulteration Act of 1954

Commentary under same heading in s 270, ante may be referred to.

3. Essential Ingredients of the Offence

For an offence under this section:

(i) there must be a sale, or offer or exposure for sale, of some article as food or drink;
(ii) the article must have been rendered, or become noxious, or it must be in a state unfit for use as food or drink by a human being; and
(iii) the sale or exposure of such article must have been made with a knowledge or reasonable belief that the article is noxious as food or drink.

The ingredients for constituting offence under s 273 are: (1) accused commits act of sales, or offers or exposes for sale, as food or drink, (2) such article has been rendered or has become noxious or has become unfit for food or drink, and (3) during the sale or offer for sale or exposing for sale, accused knew or has reason to believe that the article is noxious as food or drink.[18]

Noxious Article

The word 'noxious' as stated in Advance Law Lexicon by P Ramanatha Aiyar,[19] when used in relation to article of food is to mean that the article is poisonous, harmful to health or repugnant to human use. In the instant case the report of the State Public Health Laboratory did not indicate that the 'gutka' seized was obnoxious article within the meaning of s 273, IPC . The accused was therefore discharged of offence under s 273, IPC, alleged to be committed by him.[20]

Mere Sale etc of Noxious Article not Punishable

What is punishable under this section is the sale or offer or exposure for sale of noxious articles 'as food or drink', and not the mere sale or offer or exposure for sale of noxious articles. A sale for the purpose of trade other than as food or drink does not fall within the section.[21]

4. 'Sells or Offers or Exposes for Sale, as Food or Drink'

Section 47 of the English Public Health Act (London, 1891) (now s 8 of the Food and Drugs Act 1955)[22] provided for punishment of persons in whose possession were found articles intended for the food of man, but unsound, unwholesome, or unfit for the food of man. But this section provides only for the sale or offer or exposure for sale of noxious food or drink. Where a butcher had killed a sheep and hung it up, and on inspection the flesh was found unfit for food, but the flesh was neither removed to1877 the shop nor was exposed or offered for sale, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section, because the offence was incomplete.[23] But where from the evidence on record, it is clearly established that both the accused who were running the shop have knowingly sold a noxious liquor, they were held guilty for an offence punishable under s 273 .[24]

Where evidence proved that the accused appellant sold spurious liquor which resulted in the death of the deceased, he was convicted under ss 273 and 304, Pt II, IPC .[25]

5. Offer as Food or Drink in its Existing Condition

What is punishable under this section is the sale or offer or exposure for sale of noxious articles as food or drink, and not the mere sale or offer or exposure for sale of noxious articles. A sale for purposes of trade other than as food or drink does not fall within the section.[26] The article must be material offered for sale as food or drink in its existing condition, and not material which in the ordinary course of things would be cleaned, ground and cooked before being consumed. It has been held that the food or drink may be for the use of animals, and not necessarily for human beings,[27] but seeing that ch XIV deals with offences relating to public health etc, and having regard to s 12 which explains the word 'public' the sale of noxious food for the use of animals clearly does not fall within the section.[28]

A person is not indictable at common law for sending meat unfit for human food to a salesman in a market, unless he intends it to be sold for human food.[29]

6. Law in England

Under the English statute, somewhat similar to this section, it has been held that the offence is only committed by the sale of an article which, at the time of sale, professes to be either food or drink. An article such as baking powder, which is not itself food, though used in the preparation of food is not within the Act.[30] But a person is not indictable at common law for sending meat unfit for human food to a salesman in a market, unless he intends it to be sold for human food.[31] Where it was proved that the prisoner was a wholesale fruit dealer, and received for sale a large consignment of foreign nuts, a large proportion of which proved to be bad and he, without examining their condition, sold a quantity of them to retail dealers, who were, however, warned by him to examine the nuts, and destroy such (if any) as were bad, before offering them for sale to the public, it was held that he could not be convicted, since it was not shown that he intended to sell the bad nuts for human food.[32]1878

7. 'Which has been Rendered or has become Noxious or is in a State Unfit for Food or Drink'

The noxiousness of the article in cases falling under s 272, IPC must be caused by adulteration, whereas under this section, it may be caused either by adulteration, or by natural decay, 'or has become noxious'. Thus, a butcher attempting to sell meat which from natural decay or disease is unfit for human consumption could be prosecuted under this section. The word 'noxious' in this section means harmful to health and unwholesome.[33]

8. Mere Adulteration not an Offence

In the absence of evidence to show that the adulteration of ghee with vegetable oil was such as to render it noxious in the above sense, such adulteration cannot be held to constitute an offence under this section.[34]

Milk is not rendered noxious or unfit for drinking within the meaning of this section by being mixed with water.[35]

9. Sale after due Notice of Defect

Where the accused sold atta at the rate of 18 seers per rupee, whereas its ordinary price was 15 seers per rupee, informing the purchaser that it was sold cheap because it was bad or of inferior quality, it was held that the accused was not liable to be convicted under this section.[36]

A person cannot be convicted of an offence under this section for selling wheat containing a large admixture of extraneous matter, eg, dirt, wood matches, charcoal, black-seeds and other matters,[37] as the foreign matter is separable and wheat is not consumed in its existing condition.

10. 'Knowing or Having Reason to Believe'

The necessary ingredient of s 273, IPC is that the offender should know or should have reason to believe the commodity to be noxious.[38] This section is somewhat peculiarly worded. But it appears that before a person can be convicted thereunder it must be shown that the article which he has sold or exposed for sale was, to his knowledge or belief, noxious as food or drink.[39] For the meaning of the expression 'reason to believe' notes under s 26 may be referred to.

As Mayne points out:

> Little difficulty can ever be felt where the bad quality of the article arises, not from any adulteration which might possibly escape notice, but from its own intrinsic defects, for instance, where unsound meat is sold. And, even though the defect has escaped the notice of the purchaser, it must be remembered that the seller has generally such an accurate knowledge of the qualities of his ware, and of the previous history of each1879 particular article, as renders it very unlikely that he could be ignorant of any fault of a glaring character.[40]

According to Russell:

> Victuallers, butchers and other common dealers in victuals, are not merely in the same situation that common dealers in other commodities are, and liable under the same circumstances that they are, so that if an order be sent to them to be executed, they are presumed to undertake to supply a good and merchantable article, but they are also liable to punishment for selling corrupt victuals by virtue of an ancient statute, certainly if they do so knowingly, and probably if they do not.[41]

When the accused is summoned by the magistrate under s 273, IPC for selling noxious oil, in the summon trial it is absolutely necessary to explain the particulars of the offence under s 273, IPC to the accused in order that he may have an opportunity of showing to the court that whatever the condition of the oil may have been in his shop, the circumstances disclosed by him would establish that he neither knew nor had reasons to believe the same to be noxious as food.[42]

11. Vicarious Liability

Synopsis note 6 of s 272, ante may be referred to.

12. Master's Liability under the Section

If a servant adulterates an article of food so as to make it unwholesome, within the knowledge of the master, the master would be answerable criminally. It is for the master to see that more than the required quantity of a foreign matter is not mixed with an article of food so as to make it unwholesome.[43] In the case of public nuisance or breach of status relating to the sale of goods, there is a disposition to treat the master as liable for the acts of his agents.[44]

The Madhya Pradesh and Calcutta High Courts have, however, held that the concept of constructive liability cannot be attracted to the provisions of this section.[45]

As to liability of a husband for the acts of his wife, refer to Lyons v Martin. [46]

13. Procedure

The procedure is the same as under s 272 .

The offence under this section being one for which the police may not arrest without a warrant, an order of a magistrate to a constable to 'bring' before him persons selling unwholesome fruits is plainly illegal.[47]

A case under this section being a summons case, it is absolutely necessary, where a formal charge is not framed, to explain the particulars of the offence to the accused1880 so that he may have an opportunity to show that he neither knew nor had reason to believe that the article he kept for sale in his shop was noxious as food; otherwise his conviction would be illegal.[48]

14. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of the magistrate etc) do hereby charge you (name of accused) as follows:
> That you on or about the date of.....in the month of.....in the year..... at..... sold [(or offered for sale) (or exposed for sale)] as food (or drink), an article namely, ... (specify the article), which had been rendered noxious [(or which had become noxious) (or which was in a state, unfit)] for food (or drink) knowing (or having reason to believe) that the same was noxious as food (or drink), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 273 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance, (or the cognizance of this Court) where triable by a Court of Session.
> And I, hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge by this court.

15. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused sold or offered for sale or exposed for sale;
(ii) the things so sold, offered or exposed was an article of food or drink;
(iii) the said article had been rendered noxious or had become noxious, or was in a state, unfit, for food or drink; and
(iv) the accused then knew or had reason to believe that the same was noxious or unfit for food or drink.[49]

16. Destruction of Noxious Food or Drink

By virtue of s 455(2), CrPC, the court may, on a conviction under this section, order the food or drink, in respect of which the conviction was had, to be destroyed.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 274.

Adulteration of drugs.--

Whoever adulterates any drug or medical preparation in such a manner as to lessen the efficacy or change the operation of such drug or medical preparation, or to make it noxious, intending that it shall be sold or used for, or knowing it to be likely that it will be sold or used for, any medicinal purpose, as if it had not undergone such adulteration, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

STATE AMENDMENTS

Orissa--In its application to the State of Orissa, in s 274, for the words "shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both", the following shall be substituted namely:--

"shall be punished with imprisonment for life and shall also be liable to fine:1881

Provided that the Court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life."[50]

Uttar Pradesh--In s 274, for the words "shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both," the following shall be substituted, namely:

"shall be punished with imprisonment for life and shall also be liable to fine:

Provided that the Court may, for adequate and special reasons, to be mentioned in the judgement, impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life."[51]

West Bengal--In its application to the State of West Bengal in s 274 for the words "of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both", the following shall be substituted, namely:

"for life with or without fine:

Provided that the court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgement, impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life".[52]

Comments

1. Scope

This and the next section deal with adulteration of drugs and the sale of adulterated drugs. The efficacy of a drug as a medicine must have been lessened, or its operation changed, or the drug rendered noxious, as the result of adulteration and therefore, adulteration of drugs with ingredients, which although harmless, have the effect of weakening the effect of the genuine drug, is punishable.

Under this and the next section, it is not necessary to show that the drug was so adulterated as to render it noxious to life. It is sufficient if its efficacy is lessened. The necessity for this enactment is obvious enough. All drugs are of a recognised average strength, and prescriptions are made upon the understanding that they possess such strength. If, however, the drug which a physician prescribes proves to be only half the strength on which he calculated, it may prove wholly useless, and death may ensue before the error is remedied. The section only speaks of the efficacy of the drug being lessened, or its operation charged. It would, however, be necessary to show that the difference in the drug was of so considerable a character as to make an appreciable and important change in its character and effect.[53]1882

2. Analogous Law

In England, the Food and Drugs Act 1955,[54] which consolidated previous Acts of 1938, 1950 and 1954 and certain other enactments, covers offences committed in the preparation and sale of injurious foods and adulterated drugs, falsity in labelling and advertising foods and drugs, and the sale of food unfit for human consumption.

3. Adulteration

The use of the word 'adulteration' implies the mixture of some foreign element. A merely inferior quality of the same medicine, therefore, will not amount to adulteration. For instance, there are different varieties of cod liver oil, and the same oil prepared in different ways may produce different degrees of effect. But, if a chemist having been asked to supply a bottle of the same produces a bottle of the most inferior oil of that description, it would not be an act indictable either under this or the next section, provided the oil, however inferior in quality, is genuine oil.

Notes under s 272 may be referred to.

4. Drug or Medical Preparation

Drug means any substance primarily used for medical purposes. Sometimes kerosene oil is used as an embrocation for muscular rheumatism. But it is not its primary use and it is submitted that it cannot, therefore, be a drug or medical preparation within the meaning of this section.

5. Intention and Knowledge

The essence of the offence under this section lies not so much in the adulteration, as in the passing off the adulterated article as unadulterated. The accused must not only have adulterated a drug or medical preparation, but should also have intended that it should be sold or used for, or should also have known it to be likely that it would be sold or used for, any medical purpose, as if it had not been so adulterated. As Mayne points out:[55]

If a druggist were to sell compounded medicine to an apothecary, communicating exactly its real nature to him, he could not be rendered criminally answerable, because the apothecary sold it again as genuine, even though his knowledge of the apothecary's morals made it very probable that such might be the result. But it would be very different if it could be shown that he supplied the spurious commodity, by mutually understanding for the purpose of being issued to the world as something different.

6. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under s 272, IPC .

7. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) do hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

1883

That you on or about the.....Day in the month of.....in the year.....at..... adulterated the drug (or medical preparation), namely.....(specify the drug or medical preparation) in such a manner as to lessen the efficacy (or to change the operation) of such drug (or medical preparation) (or to make it noxious), intending that it shall be sold (or used for) [(or knowing it to be likely that it will be sold (or used) for] any medical purpose as if it had not undergone such adulteration, and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 274 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of this court) where offence is triable by the Court of Session.

And I hereby direct that you be tried on the said charge by this court.

8. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(i) the article in question is a drug or a medical preparation;
(ii) the accused adulterated it;
(iii) the adulteration:

- (a) lessened the efficacy; or
- (b) changed the operation of the drug or medicine; or
- (c) made it noxious; and

(iv) the accused intended or knew it likely:

(a) that it would be sold or used for any medicinal purpose; or
(b) that it would be so used as if it were unadulterated.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 275.

Sale of adulterated drugs.--

Whoever, knowing any drug or medical preparation to have been adulterated in such a manner as to lessen its efficacy, to change its operation, or to render it noxious, sells the same, or offers or exposes it for sale, or issues it from any dispensary for medicinal purposes as unadulterated, or causes it to be used for medicinal purposes by any person not knowing of the adulteration, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

STATE AMENDMENTS

State of Orissa--In its application to the State of Orissa, in section 275, for the words "shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both", the following shall be substituted namely:--

"shall be punished with imprisonment for life and shall also be liable to fine:

Provided that the Court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life."[56]1884

Uttar Pradesh--In s 275, for the words "shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both", the following shall be substituted, namely:

"shall be punished with imprisonment for life and shall also be liable to fine:

Provided that the Court may, for adequate reasons to be mentioned in the judgement, impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life".[57]

West Bengal--In its application to the State of West Bengal in section 275 for the words "of either description for term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees or with both" the following shall be substituted namely:

"for life with or without fine:

Provided that the Court may, for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgement, impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life".[58]

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with the sale, etc of adulterated drugs. It bears the same analogy to s 274 as s 273 does to s 272, IPC . But there is a noteworthy difference between this section and s 273 . The latter punishes only the sale, or offer or exposure to sale, of noxious food or drink, but this section punishes not only the sale, or offer or exposure for sale, but also issue from any dispensary for medical purposes, of adulterated drugs.

2. Object

The object of the section is to prevent the issue and sale of adulterated or noxious drugs, and thus to protect public health by penalising persons who trade in the sale and issue of adulterated, inefficacious and noxious drugs. The section applies to persons who deal in dispensing and selling adulterated preparations not complying with the standards of the recognised pharmacopoeia.[59]

3. 'Whoever Sells'

The expression 'whoever sells' has been held to include one who sells, be he a master or servant, principal or a person to whom the conduct and management of sale is delegated.[60] But a canvasser getting only commission for receiving orders is not a seller, and he is not liable as he is a mere intermediary who brought the seller and the1885 buyer together, who merely communicated the seller's offer to intending purchasers. He cannot be regarded as offering anything for sale.[61]

4. Knowing any Drug or Medical Preparation to have been Adulterated-Noxious

Knowledge that a drug or medical preparation has been adulterated in order to lessen its effect or to change its operation or render it noxious is essential for the offence under this section.[62] Where a purchaser ordered to be supplied with an ointment containing a lesser proportion of mercury than that prescribed by the pharmacopoeia, it was held that the person supplying the ointment was guilty of the offence punishable under this section.[63]

5. 'Exposes for Sale'

The words 'exposes it for sale' have been held to mean 'exposed to view in the shop in the sight of the purchaser'.[64] It does not mean that the article should be exposed to view. The exposure is sufficient if the article is exhibited in the shop for sale in packets.[65]

If the drug is stored in a room or a cellar, there is no exposure of the article for sale.[66]

6. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under s 272, IPC .

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and office of the magistrate etc) do hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:
> That you on or about the.....Day in the month of.....in the year.....at..... knowing the drug (or medical preparation), namely..... (specify drug or medical preparation) to have been adulterated in such a manner as to lessen its efficacy [(or to change its operation) (or to render it noxious)] sold the same [(or offered) (or exposed) for sale] [(or issued it from the dispensary, to wit....., for medical purposes, by any person, not knowing of the adulteration)] and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 275 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of this court). Where the offence is triable by the Court of Session.
>
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

8. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(i) the article in question was a drug or medical preparation;
(ii) it had been adulterated in such a manner as to:1886

- (a) lessen its efficacy, or
- (b) change its operation; or
- (c) render it noxious;

(iii) the accused:

- (a) sold it, or
- (b) offered it for sale, or
- (c) exposed it for sale, or

(d) issued it, from any dispensary for medicinal purposes, or
(e) caused it to be used for medicinal purposes, by any person not knowing of the adulteration, as unadulteration; and

(iv) the accused then knew that it had been adulterated in the manner mentioned in (ii) above.

"for life with or without fine:1887

Provided that the court may for adequate and special reasons to be mentioned in the judgment, impose a sentence of imprisonment which is less than imprisonment for life."[69]

Comments

1. Scope

The offence under this section is not the sale or attempt to sell an adulterated or inferior article, but the sale or attempt to sell something which is not what it purports to be, and the essence of the offence is the false pretence involved. Thus, if a chemist were to discover a drug which he considered to be just as effective as quinine, and which could be procured for half the price, he would not be justified in selling it as quinine, even though it answered precisely the same purpose. The fraud consists, not in the injury done, but in the false pretence by which persons, who suppose that they are using one medicine, are forced to use another against their will.

The section deals with medical preparations only; the case of food and drink is not within the purview of the section.

2. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under s 272, IPC .

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of the magistrate etc) do hereby charge you (name of the accused) as follows:

That you on or about the.....day.....in the month of.....in the year...at....., knowingly sold or offered (or exposed) for sale (or issued from dispensary to wit.....) for medicinal purposes, the drug (or medical preparation), namely.....(specify the drug or medical preparation) as a different drug (or medical preparation), and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 276 of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance. Where his offence is triable by the court of session (or within the cognizance of this court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

4. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it will have to be proved that:

(i) the accused sold an article or offered or exposed it for sale, or issued it from a dispensary for medicinal purposes;
(ii) the article so sold, etc, was a drug or medical preparation;
(iii) the accused sold, etc, the said drug or medical preparation as a different drug or medical preparation; and
(iv) he knew of such difference at the time it was so sold, etc.1888

Chapter XIV

Of Offences Affecting the Public Health, Safety, Convenience, Decency and Morals

S. 277.

Fouling water of public spring or reservoir.--

Whoever voluntarily corrupts or fouls the water of any public spring or reservoir, so as to render it less fit for the purpose for which it is ordinarily used, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

Under this section, the offence consists in voluntarily fouling the water of a public spring or reservoir, making it less fit for the purpose for which it is ordinarily used. The water of a public reservoir or spring belongs to the public, and they have a right to use it as it is, and no one is entitled to disturb its enjoyment by an act inconsistent with its beneficial use.

The corrupting or fouling of the water contemplated by this section may not affect the public health or safety, but it affects the 'convenience' of the public and is, therefore, a public nuisance.

2. Water (Prevention and Control of Pollution) Act 1974

The Water (Prevention and Control of Pollution) Act 1974 has not repealed the provisions of s 277, IPC . The accused can be prevented both under the provisions of the Water Act and s 277, IPC .[70]

3. Two Relevant Considerations

With reference to a charge under this section, the two questions to be considered are: (a) whether the water of the tank has been ordinarily used for drinking purposes; and (b) whether the accused voluntarily corrupted or fouled the water so as to render it less fit for drinking.[71]

This section does not apply to a public river,[72] or to a continuous stream of water running along the bed of a river.[73] It does not apply to mere bathing in a tank, not set apart by any lawful order for bathing purposes.[74]1889

4. 'Essentials of the Offence'

To constitute an offence under this section, the following three ingredients are necessary, viz:

(i) there must be voluntary corruption or fouling of water;
(ii) the water must be of a public spring or reservoir; and
(iii) the water must be rendered less fit for the purpose for which it is ordinarily used.

To attract s 277, IPC it is sufficient if a person voluntarily corrupts or fouls water to render it unfit for which it is ordinarily used. It need not be for drinking water alone.[75]

5. 'Voluntarily'

To constitute an offence under this section, the act of corrupting or fouling the water must be done 'voluntarily'. Under s 39, IPC a person is said to cause an effect 'voluntarily' when he causes it by means, whereby he intended to cause it, or by means which, at the time of employing those means, he knew, or had reason to believe to be likely to cause it. Intention or knowledge that the act done will corrupt or foul the water is thus essential. If the accused did not intend to foul the water, he must at least have known that his act would foul the water.

6. 'Corrupts or Fouls'

The expression 'corrupts or fouls' as used in this section must be taken in its literal and not its artificial sense. It could not be said that a mahar (a low caste man) by drawing water from a public well, rendered the water less fit for drinking purposes and thus 'corrupts or fouls' it within the meaning of the above section. The quality of the water is not affected by the fact that certain persons, owing to caste prejudices, may refrain from using the well.[76] The defiling or causing to be defiled the water, etc, referred to in s 61(m) of the Bombay Act, 4 of 1890, and voluntarily corrupting or fouling water, etc, referred to in this section, both mean some act which defiles or fouls the water.

Some Offending Acts

Where a woman of the lower caste takes water from a public cistern of water, she cannot be convicted of defiling or fouling the water either under the Bombay District Police Act or under the Indian Penal Code .[77] The mere bathing in a tank, not set apart by any lawful order for bathing purposes, without anything further, is not an offence under this section.[78] But bathing as it is ordinarily practised, fouls drinking water.[79]

Spitting into a public well fouls the water of the well though the degree to which the act of the accused rendered the water less fit for drinking might be small.[80]1890

Where the accused fished with basket nets in a tank used for drinking purposes, thereby causing a light disturbance of the mud and so making the water rather less fit for drinking, it was held that the accused had committed an offence under this section.[81]

Cultivating paddy in the bed of a tank used by the public for drinking purposes is a nuisance and is punishable under this section and s 291 .[82]

Mere angling in a tank is not an offence under this section, without proof that the accused used bait of a foul kind.[83]

The accused loaded toilet waste in a lorry and dumped the latrine waste into the thodu underneath the bridge and polluted the water. Held, the prosecution of the accused for offence under s 277, IPC was maintainable, and same was not quashed on petition under s 482, CrPC .[84]

7. 'Water of any Public Spring or Reservoir'

For an offence under this section, the corrupting or fouling must be of the water of a spring or reservoir, and that spring or reservoir must be public.

Both a spring and a reservoir are sources from which water may be taken. In the case of a spring, the water springs or shoots up from the ground spontaneously. A well may be taken to be a spring as its water comes out from the ground spontaneously. A reservoir is where water is stored. A tank would come under this heading.

The section requires that the spring or reservoir, the water of which is fouled, should be a public spring or reservoir. Relying on an observation in Reg v Wellard ,[85] it has been held in a Nagpur case,[86] that a place is a public place if people are allowed access to it, though there may be no legal right to it. A well is thus a public well, if people are allowed to use its water. But in the case of Ramkewal Singh v State ,[87] a learned judge of the Patna High Court discussed the case of Reg v Wellard ,[88] and quoting the various views of the judges in that case, held that that case cannot be taken as an authority for the proposition that, as a general rule, a place is a public place if people are allowed access to it, though they may have no legal right to it. His Lordship, therefore, held that where the well the water of which was fouled was claimed by the complainant herself to be her private well, this section had no application, even though some of the neighbours were allowed to draw water from it.

Public River, Nullah, Private Well etc not Covered under the Section

The water in question must be that of a public spring or reservoir. A public river is not a public spring,[89] nor is a stream of water running along the bed of river,[90] nor is1891 the water of a rivulet, even though standing in pools and used as drinking water.[91] The water of a nullah does not constitute a public spring. The fouling of the water of a nullah, is, therefore, no offence under this section.[92] Notes under s 290 may also be referred to.

Section 277, IPC does not apply to a case of pollution of a well which the complainant claims to be her private well, particularly in the absence of any evidence to show that the public were using its water by right. The mere fact that the neighbours were using its water does not make it a public well, as they may be doing so by licence.[93] Where a dog-killer buried the carcass of a dog in the bed of a public river near town, it was held that conviction under this section could not be sustained, although there was evidence that the people of the vicinity bathed in, and drank water from the river and also used, for domestic purposes, water taken from there.[94]

8. 'So as to Render it Less Fit for the Purpose for which it is Ordinarily used'
