Where the accused hurled stones at the deceased and the fourth accused inflicted a stick blow, they were not found guilty under s 302, since all of them assaulted the deceased conjointly, nor were they were found guilty under s 302 read with s 34 or under s 324 but were found guilty under ss 325 / 34, IPC .[14] Where the main accused inflicted lathi blows on the deceased the co-accused caught hold of the deceased2492 while the main accused inflicted blows; only intention to cause grievous hurt was attributed to the co-accused, while the main accused was convicted under s 302 and conviction of co-accused was altered from ss 302 / 34 to s 325 read with s 34, IPC .[15] When a mob of 200 persons armed with different weapons assaulted the complainant party causing death to the deceased, all accused were not convicted under ss 304 / 34, the conviction of the accused persons was based on assaulting the deceased not on his vital parts but only causing minor injuries was converted from ss 302 / 34, IPC to ss 325 / 34, IPC .[16] Where accused persons inflicted blows resulting in injuries to several persons and death of one of them, the incident occurred on the spur of the moment and no intention or knowledge of causing death could be attributed to the accused but it could be inferred from the circumstances of the case that the accused persons had shared common intention of causing only grievous hurt to the deceased, maintaining the conviction under ss 323 / 34, and the conviction under ss 302 / 34 of the accused persons was changed to one under ss 325 / 34, IPC .[17] Where the incident occurred on the spur of the moment during an altercation between the accused and the deceased, and all the injuries were caused by the blunt side of the weapon, and none of the injuries was on a vital part, it could not be said that the common object of the unlawful assembly was to cause murder or such bodily injuries which were likely to cause death, the conviction of the accused persons was altered from ss 302 / 149 to ss 325 / 149, and that under ss 323 / 149 regarding simple injuries caused to a person other than the deceased was maintained.[18] Where the three accused persons assaulted the deceased and others with pharsa and lathis, and there was no evidence as to who caused the fatal injury, all other injuries on the person of the deceased were simple injuries by blunt weapons, the conjuction of accused persons under ss 302 / 34 was modified to ss 325 / 34, IPC .[19] Where, in a case of assault and murder the evidence of eyewitness established that the accused persons assaulted the deceased with sticks, their statements were corroborated by medical evidence, no injury was found on the vital part of the body of the deceased and injuries suffered were not sufficient in normal course to cause death, the accused were acquitted of the charge under s 302 but were held liable to be convicted under ss 148 and 325 read with s 149, IPC .[20] Where the weapon of offence is a wooden stick of soft wood, the conviction of the accused under s 325 is proper as against one under s 302, IPC .[21] Where the accused and the main accused arrived at the scene with lathis, the accused held the deceased and main accused gave a lathi blow on his head with severity, the accused did not use the lathi though he was alleged to have given a kick and the fist blows to the deceased, this story was not corroborated by medical evidence, and the main accused died during the pendency of appeal, the conviction of the accused under ss 302 / 34 was altered to under s 325, IPC .[22]

Due to enmity between two rival groups in the incident, one person died. Medical evidence showed that the deceased was aged 60 years and suffering from cervical spondylosis. The deceased had sustained fracture of cervical spine. The injuries2493 sustained by the deceased were simple in nature. The injury caused to the deceased was neither intentional nor did the members of the unlawful assembly have knowledge that the injury received by the deceased could cause death. Accused were convicted under ss 325, 323 read with s 34 .[23]

When a large number of persons were armed only with sticks and pelted stones which they could find anywhere either near the fields or on their way, and it was not established as to who specifically attacked whom, it was not clear as to whether the intention was to cause death, it is more probable that intention was to give a beating only, so the accused persons were acquitted of the charges under s 302 read with s 149 while they were convicted under ss 147, 323 and 325, IPC .[24]

There is abundance of cases in which the High Courts and the Supreme Court, depending upon the facts and circumstances of the cases, have altered the conviction of the accused from one under ss 300 / 302 IPC to ss 299 / 304, Pt I/Pt II, IPC . The facts and circumstances in a particular case may be so peculiar that may necessitate the conversion of conviction under ss 300, 302 to one under ss 320, 325 or 326, IPC, where, according to the doctor, the cause of death of the deceased was asphyxia associated with shock, and not the injuries inflicted by the accused on the person of the deceased, where some of the injuries caused the accused on the person of the deceased were grievous injuries, so the conviction of the accused under s 302 read with s 34 was set aside and instead the accused was convicted under s 326 read with s 34 .[25] Where the gunshot injuries were not the immediate cause of death of the deceased, but the deceased died due to improper care, and the injuries sustained by the deceased in the normal course were not sufficient to cause death, conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 326, IPC .[26]

Where the appellant had inflicted several injuries on the deceased by sickle, the deceased died on next day of the occurrence on account of heart attack, the deceased had already undergone angioplasty, the injuries caused by the appellant accused were not sufficient to cause death in the ordinary course of nature, the appellant accused was convicted under s 326, IPC and not under s 304, IPC .[27] Where the accused persons were alleged to have caused firearm injuries on the deceased, and excepting one incised injury on the skull of the deceased, all other injuries were found to be lacerated and no injuries were found on vital parts of the body, such being the state of evidence in record, the common object of unlawful assembly was not to cause death but to cause injuries of hurt to the deceased with dangerous weapons the conviction of the two accused persons was converted from s 302 to s 326, and the other from ss 302 / 149 to ss 326 / 149, IPC .[28] Where there was enmity between the accused and the prosecution witnesses, the accused persons armed with weapons like country-made gun, pharsa and ballam came to the place of incident to teach lesson to the prosecution witnesses, the deceased intervened and was shot dead, there was no enmity between the accused and the deceased and no motive for the accused to cause death of the deceased, common object of assembly cannot be said to cause death of2494 the deceased, grievous injuries found to have caused to the deceased and the prosecution witnesses, common object of unlawful assembly can be said to cause grievous injuries. The conviction of the accused persons was altered from ss 302 / 149 to offence under s 326 read with s 149 .[29]

The prosecution case was that the accused appellant along with other co-accused assaulted the deceased causing death and inflicted injuries to others. The injured witness deposed before the Court that co-accused inflicted injury by sword on the deceased. The other eye-witness deposed that the appellant had given blow on the belly of the deceased but no injury was found in the belly. The conviction of the accused was altered to one under s 326, IPC .[30]The appellant and the accused no. 1 had entered the house of the deceased, and accused no. 1 poured a watery substance over her from the pot carried by him leading to her death. The deceased had refused sexual favour to them. However, no overt act was attributed to the appellant. Held, in absence of any active role played by the appellant or overt act being done by the appellant, it cannot be said with certainty that the appellant had accompanied the accused no. 1 to the house of the deceased with a common intention to murder the deceased. In view thereof, the conviction of the appellant under s 302 read with s 34, IPC was not sustained. The appellant was convicted under s 326, IPC and s 304, Pt II, IPC . As the death ensued after twenty six days of the incident as a result of septicemia and not as a consequence of burn injuries, the sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[31]

Where the injury which caused the death of the deceased was attributed to accused X and accused Y was sought to be made vicariously liable for that injury by the operation of s 34, IPC, assuming that substance of the prosecution case against Y was proved, then also as a result of acquittal of accused X, s 34 became inapplicable and accused Y would be liable under s 326, IPC, for causing grievous hurt to the deceased.[32]

Where only accused A2 gave fatal blow, and other accused A2, A3 and A5 had not caused any injury but had carried deadly weapons, the knowledge that grievous injury may be caused can be attributed to them. Accused A2, A3 and A5, could not be convicted under ss 302 / 149, IPC, but were convicted under s 326 read with s 149, IPC .[33]

Where the deceased was assaulted with sticks, axes, etc and sustained multiple injuries; the nature and gravity of injuries could not be assessed from the inquest report, and there was no evidence that there were internal injuries corresponding to external injuries which were sufficient to cause death, the cause of death of the deceased could not be assessed though involvement of the accused person in attacking the deceased which was proved satisfactorily by the eyewitness; the conviction of the accused was modified from s 302 to s 326, IPC .[34] Where the accused allegedly poured kerosene and set the deceased wife ablaze when she refused to give him money, statement of the eye-witness, two dying declarations and2495 medical evidence amply proved the complicity of the accused, however, death of the deceased had occurred after two and a half months. Initially, the doctor noticed only 32 percent burns and later at the hospital 38 percent burns were noticed, degree of burns increased to 70 percent when autopsy was performed, death of the deceased occurred much after her discharge from hospital, prosecution could not explain as to how the deceased sustained burns once again during intervening period of two months, there was no co-relation between original burns and death, accused would be therefore liable to be convicted under s 326 and not under s 302 .[35]

Where the accused persons acted in self-defence for protecting their property, their common intention was not to cause the death of the deceased. However, since the weapon used by the accused was a sickle, a sharp edged round blade which is sufficient to cause grievous hurt to any person, the conviction of the two accused was modified from s 302 to one under s 326, IPC .[36]

Where one of the accused inflicted fatal blows on the deceased with a gupti and the others assaulted them lathis, the post-mortem reports showed that one of the deceased had sustained an abrasion on the left shoulder, on dissection of which, fracture could be noticed, and the others deceased had no other injury except a stab wound, this clearly indicated that accused who were armed with lathis and bow and arrows had no intention to do away with the deceased, their intention, however, was to give beat them for fooling their womenfolk and children. Though the conviction of the accused who assaulted the deceased with gupti was confirmed under s 302, but that of the accused person were altered from ss 302 / 34 to ss 326 / 34, IPC .[37] Where none of the accused was armed with deadly weapon, only one injury out of two caused on head, caused death of the deceased though no common intention to kill can be inferred, the accused shared common intention to cause grievous injuries hence conviction under ss 302 / 34 was converted into one under ss 326 / 34 .[38]

Where the accused caused two injuries with a dagger on the abdomen and left thigh of the deceased, he did not cause injuries on vital parts like the chest, which shows that his intention was not to kill the deceased, the evidence of the doctor who conducted post-mortem showed that the death of the deceased had occurred 39 days after the injury due to septicaemia; on these facts, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC, was set aside and instead he was convicted under s 326, IPC .[39] Where the two unarmed accused alongwith the main accused with dhasia in his hand, went together, but the two unarmed accused pelted stones on the deceased while the main accused inflicted dhasia blow, the conviction of the two unarmed accused was altered from ss 302 / 34 to ss 326 / 34, IPC .[40] Where the deceased and his brothers were harvesting crops and the accused persons, having failed to obtain police assistance came armed and assaulted deceased and his brother, the fact that the accused came armed with deadly weapons showed that they shared the common intention, but the common intention was not to cause death of the deceased, the fact that the accused had sought police help indicates that they did not intend to take law into their own hands in first instance, and further, though many of accused carried axes, doctor who conducted post-mortem found only one incised wound, the prosecution failed to2496 identify person who caused fatal injury, the conviction of the accused persons was, therefore, altered from s 302 / 34 to 326 /34.[41]

Where some of the accused cannot conclusively be said to have known that murders were likely to be committed in prosecution of common object of unlawful assembly, their conviction under ss 302 / 149 was altered to one under ss 326 / 149, IPC .[42] Where the accused was disturbed because his wife deserted him, so he and one more person attacked her with a kripan, and the wife died in the hospital after 23 days of hospitalisation, there was no evidence that the injury on the person of the deceased was sufficient to cause death or the accused had knowledge that the death of his wife would be caused, whereby the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 326, IPC .[43] In the absence of conclusive evidence to prove that injuries inflicted by the accused resulted in the death of the victim, conviction by the accused under s 302 was altered to s 326, IPC .[44] Where the main accused gave a solitary blow with tangia (sharp-edged weapon) on the head of the deceased causing his death while the other accused persons assaulted the deceased by means of a cycle chain and lathis, causing grievous injuries, the main accused was convicted under ss 302 and 323 read with s 34, while the conviction of the accused persons was altered from ss 302 / 34 to ss 326 / 34, IPC .[45] Where the doctor who examined the deceased stated that the deceased who was injured at that time was initially given blood from group A but subsequently the blood of that group went out of stock, and therefore, he was given blood of O+ group, and the witness further stated that he was concerned that the patient might die because of blood rejection or because of injuries suffered by him, so he gave medicines to prevent it, the conviction of the accused persons under ss 302 / 34 was converted into under ss 325 to 326 read with s 34, IPC .[46] The fact that for four full hours the deceased did not receive any medical assistance and as a result had lost a lot of blood, and none of the injuries were on vital parts of the body or serious enough to endanger life, in the circumstances, the accused at the most could be held guilty of having caused grievous hurt under s 326 read with s 34, and not under s 302 read with s 34, IPC .[47] Where, it was alleged that accused persons armed with bassi lathis assaulted the deceased and injured the person who come to his rescue, and the deceased died of a head injury caused by a blunt weapon, but it could not be proved which accused caused the fatal injury; there was no equity between the accused persons and the deceased, nor the common intention of accused persons to commit the murder to the deceased was established, the accused persons were held liable to be convicted under ss 325 / 34, 326 / 34 and 324 / 34, and not under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[48] In a case of murder, and grievous injuries, and simple injuries caused by unlawful assembly of accused persons, the accused who only caught hold of the hands of the deceased, and there was nothing on record to suggest proof of their intention or knowledge to kill, were however, entitled to the benefit of the doubt for the offence under s 302, but were convicted under ss 326, 323 read with s 34 instead of s 302 read with s 149, the accused who was allegedly holding a gun but did not2497 participate in the incident nor proved to have uttered instigating word, was given the benefit of doubt and was acquitted.[49]

Where the accused in police custody was assaulted and died of the injuries at the hands of the police officials, the co-accused police officials against whom there was no evidence and his presence at the police station at the relevant time was doubtful, was acquitted and keeping in view that intention of the main accused police official was to assault and cause hurt to the deceased and not to cause such bodily injury as was likely to result in his death, he was convicted under s 326 instead of ss 302 / 34, IPC .[50] Where the assaulted person died due to a single head injury caused by the accused after 35 days from the date of the incident, the prosecution did not come forward with any explanation, or with any material as to what happened during the interregnum period, more specifically with regard to the condition of the patient and the treatment received by him, and the doctor who gave treatment to the deceased was not being examined; the accused was held liable to be convicted under s 326, IPC and not for the offence of the murder.[51]

The conviction under s 326 cannot be altered to s 302 read with s 149 in the absence of any charge framed against accused under ss 302 / 149, IPC, since failure to mention nature and ingredients of offence committed by accused in charge-sheet is not a mere irregularity.[52] Where none of the accused persons used any deadly weapon carried by them on any vital part of the body like the head, head injury which led to the death of the deceased was caused by the fall caused by the accused no 1, the fact that he only kicked the deceased after the fall shows that he had no intention to kill him. Similarly, even according to the prosecution, the other three accused used the iron rods and oars to hit the deceased on his limbs only and not on any vital part of the body, all these facts show that the accused persons did share a common intention but the same was only to cause grievous hurt to the deceased and not to cause his death, under the circumstances the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 read with s 149 to s 326 read with s 34, IPC .[53]

226. Juvenile Accused

As one of the accused found guilty and convicted under s 302, IPC was juvenile on the date of the offence, his conviction under s 302, IPC and sentence of life imprisonment were quashed.[54]

Accused appellant on the date of the commission of offence was above 16 years, but below 18 years of age. As accused on the date of the hearing of appeal was aged 40 years and had undergone sentence of more than three years, his sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[55] The appellant accused convicted under s 302 IPC did not raise the plea that he was juvenile before the courts below, but2498 raised the plea for the first time before the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court called report from the trial court about the age of the appellant accused at the time of commission of offence.[56]

227. Accused Acquitted-Illustrative Cases

The prosecution case was that the accused appellant, his father and mother (Both father and mother acquitted by courts below), committed the murder of deceased for dowry and also subjected her to cruelty on account of demand of dowry. Allegation that the deceased was severely beaten by slaps and fists was not supported by medical examination. Copy of FIR was not sent to the concerned Magistrate as required by s 157, CrPC . The testimony of the eye-witnesses was found not reliable. The father and mother of the accused appellant had been acquitted by the courts below. There was no convincing evidence that it was the accused husband alone who throttled the deceased to death. Accused husband was also acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC, his conviction was set aside.[57]

Eye-witness (Police Officer) deposed before the court that he saw the accused from a distance of 30 yards when the latter were chasing the deceased and inflicted 10 knife injuries on the deceased. The evidence of the eye-witnesses was not corroborated by medical evidence. Recovery of offence weapon viz knife was also not found reliable. Accused were acquitted of the charge under s 302 IPC .[58]

Accused (A3) armed with stick and another armed with iron pipe had assaulted the deceased. The eye-witness did not assign any role to the accused (A3), did not depose that the accused (A3) assaulted the deceased on head by stick. The doctor who conducted postmortem deposed that the death of the deceased was caused by head injuries. The conviction of the appellant Accused A3 under s 302 / 34 IPC was set aside.[59]

Evidence showed that two groups of people clashed interse with weapons causing injuries to each other. Accused persons had sustained injuries, including grievous injuries, which were not explained by the prosecution. The complainant party was held aggressor. Accused persons were acquitted of the charge of murder.[60]

The accused appellant was alleged to have caused the death of the deceased by firing gunshots. Eye-witnesses were close relatives of the deceased, their testimony suffered from material contradictions, omissions, was not corroborated by medical and ballistic expert report. The case against the accused appellants was held not proved beyond reasonable doubt, they were acquitted of charges under ss 302, 149, IPC .[61]

It is true that five persons were done to death in the dead of night in a ghastly manner and the whole incident is quite shocking but in the absence of cogent and reliable evidence against the appellants connecting them to crime, view of the trial2499 court in passing the judgment of acquittal could not be said to be unjustified.[62] Accused persons were prosecuted on charge of murder on allegations that enmity existed between the parties, the accused persons and the deceased were travelling by the same bus, the accused after stopping the bus fired shots at deceased causing death. Evidence of injured eye-witness was falsified by medical evidence, another passenger travelling in the same bus could be eye-witness, but he was not examined in the case. Acquittal of the accused respondents by the High Court on the charge of murder s 302, IPC was held proper.[63]

The prosecution case was that the accused assaulted the deceased with sharp edged weapon, committed his murder and also injured another person. The injured did not depose anything about the assault on the deceased. She stated that someone else was the assailant, she did not name the accused. There was enmity between the parties and the complainant had every reason to falsely implicate the accused appellant. Appellant accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 302 and 307, IPC .[64] Appellant accused was prosecuted for offence under s 302, IPC on allegation that he assaulted his mother with burning wooden plank, causing death. The witnesses of the extra judicial confession did not inspire confidence, merely on the ground of recovery of weapon of offence at the instance of the appellant, it was found unsafe to record conviction of the appellant. Appellant accused was given benefit of doubt, was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[65] Appellant no. 1 had illicit relations with the wife (accused no. 2) of the deceased, had taken the wife of the deceased in the presence of the relatives of the deceased. The deceased suffered humiliation and committed suicide. The close relatives of the deceased who were also examined as witnesses had categorically stated in their statements that on coming to know of the fact that Appellant no. 1 has taken Accused no. 2 from the house of PW5 and left her only on 06.01.1996 at her parents' house, the deceased stated before the inmates of his house that because of the said insult and humiliation he does not like to live. It is also established that immediately thereafter in the night intervening 7th and 8th of January 1996 the deceased committed suicide. Held, the facts lead to only one conclusion that it is on account of humiliation and insult due to the behavior and conduct of Appellant no. 1 and Accused no. 2 that deceased committed the suicide. The conviction of the appellant under ss 107 and 306, IPC was held proper.[66] There was unexplained delay in sending FIR to concerned Magistrate. Inquest had started before FIR was filed in the case. Prosecution evidence was full of discrepancies. Conviction of the accused appellants under ss 302 / 34, IPC was set aside.[67]

There was no evidence that the accused appellant was present at the place of the occurrence. There was also no evidence that the appellant accused and the deceased were last seen together. Appellant accused was acquitted of the charge of murder under ss 302 etc. of the IPC .[68] Appellant accused was alleged to have committed2500 murder of the deceased and robbed her gold ornaments. Evidence showed that the accused was present in the funeral ceremony of the deceased. Motive was also not proved. No test identification parade of the recovered gold ornaments was held. Accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 302, 392 read with s 397, IPC .[69]

The prosecution case was that the appellant accused fired at the deceased causing death. PW deposed that appellant was not present when the incident took place. IO and the Doctor were not examined in the case. Appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[70] The prosecution case was that the accused S driver of the car along with the occupants of the car (other accused) committed the murder of the deceased. Name of accused S was not mentioned in FIR nor in statement under s 161, CrPC . No test identification parade was held, though the witnesses did not know him from before. The High Court had drawn an inference that because he was a driver in preplanned manner, the role of such driver is crucial. Such an inferential conclusion was without any evidence to show participation of accused S. The conviction of the accused S under s 302, IPC read with s 149, IPC was found not sustainable, hence was set aside.[71]

Where the prosecution case was that the appellant accused kidnapped a 12 years old girl, raped her, committed her murder and threw her dead body in the bushes, the evidence of last seen was found not reliable, the identity of the appellant accused was not fully established, the appellant accused was not convicted of offences under ss 363, 376, 302 and 201, IPC .[72] Seven accused persons were alleged to have indiscriminately attacked the deceased. Three accused persons in the case in view of the discrepancies in the FIR, alleged dying declaration and superficial injuries, were given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under ss 302, 307, 326, 148 and 149, IPC and conviction of the other four accused appellants under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[73]

Deceased along with his wife was returning to his village when the accused fired at the deceased causing death. Wife eye-witness was not examined in the case. In medical examination only exit wound was found, no wound of entry was found, though the eye-witness (PW1) examined in the case stated that the accused fired with gun hitting on the back. Another eye-witness (PW2) examined in the case was highly inimical, he had committed the murder of the uncle of the accused, accused would not have spared him also, his presence on the spot was doubtful. Acquittal was not interfered.[74] Husband, wife and their servant were found murdered during night. Three injured children were found unconscious next day morning. Apart from the delay in the examination of the injured witnesses, the three injured children did not depose before the court that any of the appellants accused assaulted the deceased persons. Possibility of dacoity was not ruled out. Benefit of doubt was given. All accused were held entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of charge under s 302, IPC .[75]2501

The main accused in his confessional statement named R as conspirator. But there was no independent evidence that the accused R actively participated in the commission of the offence. Accused 'R' was given benefit of doubt and acquitted of charge under s 302, IPC .[76]Where a large number of persons are made accused, the possibility of some accused persons committing murder at the spur of the moment cannot also be ruled out. Co-accused to whom no overt act was attributed, the common object of unlawful assembly also not proved, were acquitted of the charge under s 302 / 149, IPC .[77]

Four appellant brothers were alleged to have murdered the deceased at about 8.45 p.m. in the night. All the four appellants were named in FIR, but IO had charge sheeted only one appellant and filed final report against the three appellants. Information about the commission of offence was received at the police station at 10.30 p.m., but FIR was registered at 11.30 p.m. Independent eye-witnesses were not examined in the case, no offence weapon was recovered from any appellant nor blood stains were found on the scene of occurrence. There was a reasonable possibility of some accused who were not involved in the attack having been convicted. Benefit of doubt was given to the appellants, all were acquitted of the charge under s 302 / 34, IPC .[78] The prosecution case against the accused R was that he exhorted PW-1 to fire at the deceased. It was not the prosecution case that though carrying a weapon, he fired at anyone. If all the four accused had come determined to kill the deceased and three of them were armed with country made pistols, there was no need for the accused R to exhort his companion to fire at the deceased. Accused R was given benefit of doubt, he was acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[79] A mob consisting of 18-20 persons came to the house of the deceased, abducted the five deceased and committed their murder. Out of the eleven accused persons four were not named in the FIR. Hence they were acquitted of the charge under ss 302 / 149, IPC .[80] Accused policemen entered the house of the deceased with intention to commit rape, but could not succeed, co-accused killed the deceased. No role was assigned to the accused appellants in killing the deceased. Conviction of the accused appellants under s 302, IPC was set aside. However as the appellants had forcibly entered the house of the deceased, they were convicted under s 450, IPC .[81]

There was no direct evidence to prove that the accused respondent had either assaulted the deceased or had buried her dead body. The prosecution relied upon three main circumstances. The first circumstance was that PW3 was shown two ear tops by the accused at the bus stop. Secondly, the respondent had mentioned about the ear tops and chain to PW2 though he had not shown them to him. In his statement to the Police he had mentioned only about the chain and not about the ear-studs. Lastly, the respondent had buried the dead body of the deceased in his own field and the said body was recovered on the basis of the disclosure statement made by the respondent himself. The circumstances were not sufficient to prove the guilt of the accused. The evidence on record disclosed that a part of the dead body was exposed and had come out from the grave and was visible, even before the body was2502 exhumed, a large number of persons had already collected there, which itself established that the fact was known to everyone in the village, and the body was really not discovered at the instance of the respondent. Accused was acquitted of offence under s 302, IPC .[82]

Accused persons armed with lathi and dharias assaulted the deceased, caused injuries which resulted in death of the deceased. Injuries were not caused on the vital parts of the body of the deceased. The absence of any injury on any vital part and particularly the absence of external injury on the skull clearly showed that the accused did not intend to cause the death of the deceased nor caused any bodily injury as was likely to cause death. Accused persons were acquitted of the charge of murder under s 302, IPC .[83]

228. Accused Convicted-Illustrative Case

There was evidence that the appellant accused S actually participated in the conspiracy. There was independent evidence to prove that he made all the arrangements pursuant to the criminal conspiracy and induced appellant to commit the murder of deceased. S was present at the scene of the occurrence and that fact is proved by the evidence of PWS. It was proved that S abetted the commission of the murder and as he was present at the scene of occurrence at the time of commission of the crime, s 114, IPC also would apply. Appellant S was convicted under s 302 read with ss 120B and 34, IPC .[84]

Medical evidence stated that the death of the deceased was caused by hard and blunt object like lathi. Motive for commission of the crime was shown. There was extra judicial confession of the accused made before the witness that he had killed his deceased wife with stone. Blood stained stone was also recovered near the body of the deceased. Accused was not suffering from any mental order at the time of the occurrence. The conviction of the accused for offence under Section 302IPC was held proper.[85]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 303.

Punishment for murder by life convict.--

Whoever, being under sentence of [1][imprisonment for life], commits murder, shall be punished with death.

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section prescribes the punishment for murder committed by a person already under sentence of imprisonment (formerly transportation) for life. Where a person under the sentence of imprisonment for life, on a conviction for murder, is found guilty of murder on a subsequent and different charge, the only sentence, that can be passed on him according to this section, is the sentence of death.[2] The section which is like a proviso to s 302, removes the alternative punishment of life-imprisonment and makes the sentence of death compulsory.[3]

Section 303 is not confined only to cases where a person undergoing sentence of imprisonment for life, actually and infact, himself commits an act which results in the death of the victim. The section would apply even in cases where a person undergoing a sentence of imprisonment for life, is convicted under s 302 read with s 34, or under s 302 read with s 149 .[4]Where a person is convicted under ss 302 / 34, it must be said that he has committed the murder as much as the person by whose act the victim was killed. Similarly, where a person is convicted under ss 302 / 149, the true legal position is that, in law he must be deemed to have committed the murder as much as the actual murderer has.

An accused cannot be under a sentence of imprisonment for life at the time of commission of the second murder, unless he is actually undergoing such a sentence or there is legally standing a judicial final sentence which he is bound to serve without the requirement of a separate order to breathe life into the sentence which was otherwise dead on account of remission under s 432, Crpc . Section 303 , IPC, is applicable only to an accused who on the date of commission of the second offence of murder had earlier committed a murder for which his conviction and sentence of imprisonment for life were beyond judicial controversy and were operative.[5] A person must be actually and irrevocably a lifer beyond the pale of judicial controversy at the time of commission of the second offence of murder to be visited with a penalty of death under s 303, IPC . If the sentence of a convict has already been remitted, either conditionally2509 or unconditionally, at the time of commission of the second murder, he would cease to be an actual lifer to come within the lethal clamp of s 303, IPC .[6] 'Under sentence of imprisonment for life' means, under an operative and executable sentence of imprisonment for life. A sentence once imposed but later set aside is not executable, and such a sentence cannot, therefore, be taken into account.[7] However, suspension of sentence by virtue of granting of bail to a convict, by the appellate court during the pendency of an appeal against a sentence of imprisonment for life, does not mean that the sentence has been set aside.[8] The crucial point of time to be considered is the time when the second murder is committed.[9]

2. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and exclusively triable by a court of sessions.

3. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of sessions judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, while under a sentence of imprisonment for life, on or about the.....day of .....at.....committed murder by intentionally (or knowingly) causing the death of (name of the deceased) and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 303 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

4. Proof

Prove that:

(i) the accused committed the murder of the deceased under consideration; and
(ii) the accused at the time of committing the murder aforesaid was under a sentence of imprisonment for life.

5. Section 303 Struck down being not Constitutionally Valid

In Mithu v State of Punjab [10] the Constitutional Bench of the Apex Court after discussing the forty-second report of the Law Commission of India brought out in 1971 and the thirty-fifth report on capital punishment published in 1967 considered by the Law Commission of India and the recommendations of the Parliamentary Committee that s 302 and s 303, IPC should be brought under one section of the IPC and considering that the sentence of life imprisonment is provided in 51 sections of the IPC, and a convict sentenced to imprisonment of life other than the offence of murder would also be liable to sentence of death by virtue of s 303, IPC, which was2510 not found proper, and hence, struck down s 303 of the IPC as unconstitutional and declared void with the following observations of Chandrachud CJ (for himself and on behalf of Murtaza Fazal Ali, Tulzapurkar and Vardarajan JJ):

> On a consideration of the various circumstances which we have mentioned in the judgment, we are of the opinion that s 303 of the Penal Code violates the guarantee of equality contained in art 14 as also the right conferred by art 21 of the Constitution that no person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to procedure established by law. The section was originally conceived to discourage assaults by life convicts on the prison staff, but the legislature chose language which far exceeded its intention. The section also assumes that life convicts are a dangerous breed of humanity as a class. That assumption is not supported by any scientific data. As observed by the Royal Commission in its Report on Capital Punishment, 1949-1953, para 517, 'There is a popular belief that prisoners serving a life sentence after conviction of murder form a specially troublesome and dangerous class. That is not so. Most find themselves in prison because they have yielded to temptation under the pressure of a combination of circumstances unlikely to recure'. In Dilip Kumar Sharma v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[11] this court was not concerned with the question of the view of s 303, but Sarkaria J in his concurring judgment, described the vast sweep of that section by saying that the section is draconian in severity, relentless and inexorable in operation. We strike down s 303 of the Penal Code as unconstitutional and declare it void.

Justice Chinnapa Reddy supporting the above observation of four judges in the same judgment made the following observations:

> Judged in the light shed by Maneka Gandhi and Bachan Singh, it is impossible to uphold s 303 as valid. Section 303 excludes judicial discretion. The scales of justice are removed from the hands of the judge as soon as he pronounces the accused guilty of the offence. So final, so irrevocable and so irrestitutable is the sentence of death that no law which provides for it without involvement of the judicial mind can be said to be fair, stigmatised as arbitrary and oppressive. Section 303 is such a law and it must go the way of all bad laws. I agree with my Lord Chief Justice that s 303, IPC, must be struck down as unconstitutional.

6. Effect of Striking down Section 303

The Constitution is the basic law of the land and all other laws made by Parliament are subordinate to it. Any provision of any law, Act or notification which infringes the constitutional provisions is declared void and is ineffective. After declaring s 303, IPC as void by the Apex Court, this provision of law though remains in the IPC and is not yet deleted by the legislature, however, has become ineffective and unenforceable.

It is needless to add that all cases of murder will now fall under s 302, and there shall be no mandatory sentence of death for the offence of murder.[12]

Thus, if an accused is convicted under s 303, IPC, after the same has been struck down by the Supreme Court, the conviction and sentence of the accused has to be set aside and conviction of the accused is liable to be altered to s 302, from s 303, IPC, and the sentence needs to be accordingly awarded.[13]2511

7. Accused convicted under Sections 302 / 34 cannot be convicted under Sections 506 / 34 or under Section 303,IPC

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 304.

Punishment for culpable homicide not amounting to murder.--

Whoever commits culpable homicide not amounting to murder, shall be punished with [14][imprisonment for life], or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine, if the act by which the death is caused is done with the intention of causing death, or of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death;

or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, or with fine, or with both, if the act is done with the knowledge that it is likely to cause death, but without any intention to cause death, or to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.2512

Comments

1. Scope

Section 304, IPC does not create any offence; it merely provides the punishment for culpable homicide not amounting to murder and draws a distinction between the penalty to be inflicted in cases, where, an intention to kill being present, the act would have amounted to murder, but for its having fallen within one of the exceptions in s 300, IPC, and cases in which the crime is culpable homicide not amounting to murder, that is to say, where there is knowledge that death will be a likely result, but the intention to cause death, or bodily injury likely to cause death, is absent.[15] The section is in two parts; the first part is concerned with culpable homicide committed with either of the two types of intention and the second part is concerned with culpable homicide committed with particular knowledge.[16] The first and second forms of culpable homicide, viz, where there is an intention to cause death, or bodily injury likely to cause death, fall under the first part of the section, are under the terms of this section, more severely punished than culpable homicide of the third form in which there is only knowledge of a likelihood of death which falls under the second part of the section.[17]So, different punishments are prescribed for the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder according to the different state of mind of the offender with which the act, by which the death is caused, is done. In short, the degree of punishment is made commensurate with the degree of culpable evidence of the state of mind of the offender with which the act by which the death is caused, is done.[18]

Where the injuries to the deceased were caused during the course of a mutual fight and there was no evidence as to the nature of the injuries, the accused was held guilty under s 304, IPC .[19] Where accused appellant inflicted knife blow2513 causing injury on posterior thoracic wall, death was due to lung injury, there was no motive to cause death, held offence fell under s 304, IPC .[20] When there is absolutely nothing to connect the accused with the offence, culminating in the death of the deceased, conviction under s 304, IPC is not sustainable.[21] If, however, the injury, found to be sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause the death of the deceased, is not found to have been caused by the accused intentionally, the accused cannot be held guilty of an offence under s 302, IPC . On the other hand, he can be convicted of a lesser offence falling under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[22] So also, if the death of a deceased is committed without any premeditation, in a sudden fight, in the heat of passion, upon a sudden quarrel, and without the accused having taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner, the accused can be convicted only under Pt II of s 304, IPC .[23]

The accused picking up a heavy stone weighting about 15 kilograms and dropping it from the roof of his house on the head of the deceased could be said to have knowledge that he would by his act likely to cause death of the deceased and so liable under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[24] However, a fatal injury caused with force on a vital part of the body by a sharp and formidable weapon, would bring the offence clearly under s 302, and not under Pt I or II of s 304 .[25] When the medical evidence shows that the blow given by the accused on the head of the deceased, caused extensive injury resulting in fracture of the skull and breaking of the bone into four pieces, as a consequence of which the deceased died, he can only be convicted under s 302, and not under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[26] Where the accused appellant used steel pipe for supplying water in bathroom and caused injuries to the victim, held the accused was guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[27]

The section must be interpreted as providing punishment for the offence of culpable homicide in all cases where the accused cannot be convicted of murder,[28] though the tendency on the part of judges avoiding conviction of the accused for offences under s 302 and bringing the offence under s 304 cannot be countenanced.[29]2514

2. Applicability

The section 304 applies:[30]

(i) when the case falls under one or the other of the clauses of s 300, but is covered by any of the exceptions to that section;[31] or

(ii) when the injury caused is not of the higher degree of likelihood, which is covered by the expression 'sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death', but is of a lower degree of likelihood which is generally spoken of as an injury likely to cause death and the case does not fall under cl 2 of s 300 ;[32] or

(iii) when the act is done with the knowledge that death is likely to ensue, but there is no intention to cause death or an injury likely to cause death. In such cases, there may be either no intention to cause any injury at all, or there may be an intention to cause simple or grievous hurt, but not an injury likely to cause death.

Commission of the offence of culpable homicide would require some positive act on the part of the accused as distinguished from silence, inaction or a mere lapse. Allegations of not carrying out a prompt search of the missing children; or delay in the lodging of formal complaint with the police and failure to take adequate measures to guard the access from the ashram to the river, which are the principal allegations made in the FIR, cannot make out a case of culpable homicide not amounting to murder punishable under s 304, IPC . To attract the ingredients of the said offence something more positive than a mere omission, lapse or negligence on the part of the named accused will have to be present.[33]

3. Death must be caused

Commentary under the same heading in s 299, ante, may be referred to.

4. Section 304 and Section 304A --Distinction

In order to be encompassed in the protection under s 304A, IPC, there should neither be intention nor knowledge to cause death. When any of these two elements is found to be present, s 304A has no application. Where the accused picked up the gun, unlocked it, loaded it with cartridges and shot the gun from a close range of about 4/5 ft aimed at chest of deceased, in view of the scenario described by prosecution witnesses and evidence of ballistic expert, the accused was held liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt II.[34]2515

5. Doctors Deliberately Conducting Surgery in Ill-equipped Store-room

Where the accused doctors were deliberate in conducting surgery keeping the victim patient who complained of severe stomach pain in a store-room which was ill-equipped for such a major surgery to be held, registration of case against accused doctors not for negligence, but for offence punishable under s 304 was found proper, therefore, the court declined to interfere with chargesheet.[35]

6. Scope of Part I of Section 304

The first part of s 304, IPC is intended to include those cases in which the act of the accused person would be culpable homicide amounting to murder but for the fact that it was committed in circumstances which render one or the other of the exceptions to s 300 applicable.[36]Section 304, Pt I, IPC, applies where the accused causes bodily injury with intention to cause death.[37] It is intention to cause death which is essential in such cases and is that to which the law principally looks.[38] If the case of an accused, on facts, falls under exception 1 to s 300, he can be convicted under s 304, Pt I, and not under s 302, IPC .[39] Similarly, if the case of an accused falls, on the facts of the case, under exception 2 to s 300, IPC, he will be punishable under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[40]If, from the circumstances, it becomes clear that the act of the accused comes under any of the exceptions, mentioned under s 300, it is not necessary that the accused ought to have pleaded it.[41] Culpable homicide may not, therefore, amount to murder: (a) where, though the evidence is sufficient to constitute murder, one or more of the exceptions to s 300 apply, or (b) where the degree of mens rea, specified under s 299, IPC, is present, but not the special degree referred to by s

300 .[42] The Supreme Court stated, in one case, that when 'all the conditions, mentioned in Exception 4 to s 300, are fulfilled, the conviction of the accused cannot be sustained under s 302, instead the conviction can be sustained under s 304, Pt I.[43] In another case, an accused, while exceeding the right of private defence, caused death of the victim, his conviction under s 304, Pt I, was confirmed.[44] In the instant case though the appellant accused person was exercising right of private defence, but had exceeded the same by continuing the attacks after the threat to life had ceased.2516 Conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, ten years RI was awarded.[45]

Appellant accused seeing the deceased plucking of Mahua from his tree, protested against the same. There was exchange of hot words between them in course of which the appellant accused by means of an axe assaulted the deceased who succumbed to the injuries. Held in the due exercise of private defence of person and property and as a result of the exchange of hot words, appellant accused got excited and assaulted the deceased. Therefore, the act committed by the accused did not attract the provisions of s 302, IPC, but it fell under the purview of s 304, Pt I, IPC .[46]Again, in Baljit Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh [47] the accused were found to have grossly exceeded their right of private defence and their case was, therefore, held to be covered by exception 2 to s 300 and, as such their conviction was altered from ss 302 / 149 to that under s 304, Pt I. There was land dispute between the parties. The accused was in possession of the land, the deceased with oxen came and started cultivating the land of the accused. The accused lifted stone boulders and gave three blows on the deceased causing death. Held, the incident occurred all of sudden. The accused exercised right of his private defence to save his property agricultural land in his possession but he exceeded his right by giving repeated blows of stone boulders and, therefore, he had committed the offence under s 304, Pt I, IPC . A sentence of ten years RI was imposed.[48] The appellants accused exceeded the right of private defence. In a boundary dispute between the parties, the accused appellants armed with lethal weapons had caused the death of two persons. However, their conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[49]

Accused appellant upon seeing his sister with the deceased at odd hours assaulted with knife. It was a case of loss of control on the spur of moment. The accused appellant had not taken undue advantage of the situation or acted in cruel or in unusual manner. Conviction of the accused appellant under s 302, IPC was altered into one under s 304, Pt I and in the ends of justice ten years RI was imposed.[50] Where the circumstances clearly indicated that the accused while exercising their right of private defence, took undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner so as to almost take them beyond the protection of exception 4 to s 300, and their acts, by which the deaths were caused, were done with the intention of causing death, or at least, of causing such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, they were held liable under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[51]

Where the accused inflicted injuries on his younger brother who was in illicit cohabitation with his wife, it was held that this fact would straightway show that the accused was subject to grave and sudden provocation, which, in the event of the subsequent death of the victim, would make exception 1 to s 300 applicable and2517 reduce the offence to one under s 304, Pt I.[52] There was a verbal argument and heated exchange of words amongst the accused and complainant and his family members over a trivial issue of parking of auto rickshaw. The accused appellant no. 3 being driven by grave and sudden provocation gave knife blows to the deceased causing death. There was no pre-meditation and intention to kill the deceased. The case of the accused appellant fell under s 300, Exception I, his conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[53] In the instant case one blow was given with a small stick, and the place where the assault took place was dimly lit. Held, case fell under s 304, Pt I, conviction of the accused appellant under s 302 was converted into one under s 304, Pt I.[54] Considering the fact that the occurrence took place in the night in almost dark conditions with feeble light and attack was made indiscriminately, appellant accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC . Custodial sentence of 10 years RI was held proper.[55]

Appellant accused immobilized the deceased by attack on his legs. Co-accused thereafter caused fatal injuries leading to death. Held, the appellant had common intention to cause death, his conviction under s 304, Pt I read with s 34, IPC was held proper.[56]

The mother (deceased) was advising his son appellant accused that he should not quarrel with his wife. On hearing this, the appellant caught hold of his mother and dragged her out from the house and took her in front of the temple of deity Karni Mata, where he throttled her neck, on account of which she died. The conviction of the accused under s 302 was converted into one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[57] The appellant accused a lame person who normally moved on a tricycle gave single knife blow on the deceased while the latter was asleep. Held, offence was not murder, the appellant accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I.[58]

There was no evidence that the death of the deceased wife was unnatural or the appellants husband and in-laws committed the murder of the deceased wife and to conceal the evidence of offence, consigned her dead body to flames. Appellants were acquitted of the charge under ss 201 and 304, Pt I, IPC .[59]

As stated above, there is another class of cases to which Pt I of s 304 applies and in which no question of application of exceptions to s 300 arises. If the injury, which the accused intended to cause, was likely to kill, his case would fall under Pt I[60] because an offence may amount to culpable homicide, but not murder, even though none of the exceptions, mentioned in s 300, are applicable to the case.[61] If, on2518 referring to s 300, IPC, the judge is of the opinion that the killing does not come within one of the four clauses of that section, he can then refer to s 299 . If the killing comes within the second part of s 299, which relates to the intention of causing a bodily injury likely to cause death, it comes under s 304, Pt I.[62] Where it was found that the accused caused the death of the deceased with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, the accused was held guilty under the first part of s 304 .[63] Occurrence had taken place in course of sudden quarrel, the accused assaulted the deceased. Held, case was covered by Exception 4 of s 300, accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I.[64] The appellant accused S had caused 4 inches wound by ballan (spear) in the abdomen of the deceased. Injury was caused out of sudden altercation. Appellant accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[65]Where the accused inflicted injuries upon the deceased in order to extricate himself from the latter's grip when he (the deceased) was trying to catch hold of him (the accused) who was running away after causing fatal injuries to another deceased, the conviction of the accused was altered by the High Court, from one under s 302 to that under s 304, Pt I, with regard to the death caused due to injury inflicted by the particular accused with the sole object of extricating himself from his grip.[66] PWS deposed that the deceased who first pulled the collar of appellant's shirts and tried to press his neck, in the process, the appellant inflicted knife blow in the abdomen of the deceased with a view to escape from the clutches of the deceased. The appellant accused clearly exceeded the right of private defence. In these circumstances his case fell under s 304, Pt I, IPC . The conviction of the accused appellant under s 302 was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[67]

The theory of firing in self-defence was probable. The accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I.[68]Where the common object of the unlawful assembly, of which the accused were members at the time of the incident, was merely to cause injuries which were likely to cause death, it was held that the accused were guilty of an offence under s 304, Pt I read with s 149, IPC .[69]

In a sudden fight going on the deceased out of curiosity came to enquire about the fighting going on, the accused dragged him and his brother inflicted solitary Hasua blow on neck causing instantaneous death. Held, the act done was in heat of passion, upon sudden quarrel, the accused had not taken undue advantage, nor acted in cruel manner. Case was covered by s 300, Exception 4, fell under s 304, Pt I and not s 302, IPC, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, sentence of 10 years RI was held sufficient.[70] At the time of the incident the deceased was cutting karuvela trees. He was having a spade and aruval in hand. At that time, the accused came there and questioned how he could cut the trees, and following the same, there was a wordy duel. Immediately, the accused snatched the2519*aruval* and cut him on the neck and shoulder indiscriminately, causing instantaneous death. Held, the occurrence took place in course of sudden quarrel, Exception 4 to s 300, IPC applied. The appropriate conviction would be under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[71]

In a sudden quarrel/fight the accused had given two blows by wooden log on the head of the deceased resulting in death. Held, accused was entitled to benefit of Exception 4 to s 300, IPC, he was convicted under s 304, Pt I and not under s 302, IPC .[72]

Pushing a person into the sea, with a bleeding head injury may not have been with the intention to kill, but it would certainly show the "intention of causing a bodily injury as was likely to cause death", within the meaning of ss 300 & 304, Pt I of the IPC .[73]

Where one accused on being infuriated brought a dah (a sword like weapon), and at the instigation of another accused struck a blow on the neck and hit another blow on the hands of the deceased, the conviction of the accused persons under ss 302 / 34 was altered to one under s 304, Pt I read with s 34, IPC .[74] There was heated exchange of words between the deceased and the appellant. The deceased had thrown the accused appellant on the ground. They were separated by A and R. PW1 admitted that her husband/deceased had told the appellant that he could shoot at him if he had the courage. It was upon this provocation that the appellant fired the shot which hit the deceased in his stomach and ultimately resulted in his death. The conviction of the appellant accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[75]

Death caused by the accused was not premeditated, accused had no common intention to cause death of deceased, the injuries were not sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to have caused his death. Only accused no. 1 had caused vital injury on the head of the deceased. Held, the case was covered by Exceptions 1 and 4, IPC . Appellant accused No. 1 was convicted under ss 304, Pt I/149. Other accused were convicted under ss 323 / 149, 147 and 148, IPC .[76] Where A and B accused caught hold of the deceased and the C accused with knife inflicted two fatal blows on the deceased, the intention was not to cause death but to create terror, all would be guilty and convicted under s 304, Pt I/34 IPC .[77]

It was established on record that the appellants and the deceased were taking liquor and an altercation had taken place amongst the three. After the altercation the appellant N had slapped the deceased resulting into some grappling. It was at this moment that appellant B had picked up an iron rod which was lying nearby and in the heat of passion had given the fatal blow on the head of the deceased. Only one injury was given which clearly shows that appellant B had not taken any undue advantage nor had he acted in a cruel manner. Held, the case falls under Exception IV to s 300, conviction of the appellant under s 302 / 34 IPC was altered to one under2520 s 304, Pt I, IPC .[78]There was evidence that the bullocks of the accused had damaged the crops standing in the field of the complainant. This led to exchange of hot words between the accused persons and the complainant. After initial exchange of hot words and quarrel the accused persons went inside their house and immediately i.e. in less than two and three minutes they came back with arms and assaulted the deceased. The conviction of the accused appellants under ss 302 / 149, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, read with s 149 .[79]

There was no mensrea on the part of the accused to commit the murder of the deceased. The act appeared to have been committed out of deep frustration, the accused was a vagabond. The conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[80]

Where the common object of the unlawful assembly originally was to cause hurt, but, later, the object developed into killing the deceased, or, at least, into giving him a beating likely to cause death, the conviction under Pt II of this section, read with s 149, was upheld.[81] As no injuries were inflicted on any vital parts of the body of the deceased, the appellants never intended to kill the deceased. They being armed with axe and Lathi could have assaulted on the vital parts of the body of the deceased if they had any intention to cause death. The very fact that the appellants were alleged to have assaulted on arm and wrist and corresponding injuries were also found in course of post-mortem examination, it was held proper to convict the appellants for commission of offence under s 304, P II read with s 34, IPC since they had no intention to cause death but had knowledge that such injuries may cause death.[82]

In a sudden fight between two religious groups over the issue of prayer, a single blow from a small knife was given to the deceased. Held the accused could not be convicted on the charge of murder, his conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[83] Where the deceased and the accused were close friends, there was no previous enmity between them, the incident took place on the spur of the moment, the accused had not taken any undue advantage nor acted in cruel manner, conviction of the accused for offence under s 304, Pt I was held proper.[84]

The accused in a sudden altercation with his wife and mother-in-law assaulted his mother-in-law causing three injuries which proved fatal. The accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I and not under s 302, IPC .[85] On sudden quarrel and exchange hot words, the accused appellants went to their nearby house, brought weapons viz axe, knife and gupti, and caused injuries which proved fatal. Held, the case fell under Exception 4 of s 300, the accused were convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[86]

In a sudden quarrel and exchange of hot words the accused husband hacked the deceased (wife) on her back with a sickle and the deceased fell down and the accused once again hacked on the neck and left ear of the deceased causing severe bleeding2521 injuries. The deceased fell down and died, the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I and not under s 302, IPC .[87] In the course of sudden quarrel the occurrence took place, the case fell under Exception 4 of s 300, IPC the conviction of the accused appellant under s 304, Pt I, instead of s 302, IPC was held proper.[88]

(a) Causing Death by Arrow from Distance

The facts of the case showed that appellants accused fired arrows from a distance, not with any accuracy, one of such arrows hit the deceased. There was no sudden quarrel. Conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[89]

(b) Sudden Firing after Verbal Altercation

There was exchange of abuses between the accused persons and one of the deceased. Being provoked accused D asked his son L to bring revolver, L brought revolver and fired causing death. Both accused D and L were convicted under s 304, Pt I.[90]

(c) Frequent Quarrel between Accused and Deceased wife

As appellant accused was involved in wayward habits, there were frequent quarrels between the accused husband and the deceased wife. On the day of occurrence the deceased poured kerosene oil over herself and the accused lighted match stick, set the deceased on fire, causing death. Appellant accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I.[91]

Accused belonging to scheduled tribes and inhabitant of tribal area committed the murder of his wife. There were frequent quarrels between the accused and the victim. On the date of incident the accused under provocation assaulted his wife from the blunt side of the axe. Since he did not assault from the sharp cutting side of the axe, he could not be imputed with intention to cause the death of the deceased. His conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC, a sentence of ten years RI already undergone by him was found sufficient.[92]

(d) Accused Shot in Air/Indiscriminately Causing Death

Where the deceased had refused to take wine with the appellant, the later first fired in the air and thereafter fired indiscriminately. Offence was committed under s 304, Pt I and not under s 302, IPC .[93]

(e) Solitary Injury

On account of election rivalry, the appellant accused inflicted a single lathi blow on the deceased, supporter of the opposite party. The injury proved fatal. The second injury found on the person of the deceased was in the nature of abrasion on left arm. No other injury was caused by the appellant to the deceased after he became unconscious. The evidence did not show that the appellant inflicted injury with the2522 intention/knowledge to cause the death of the deceased. Conviction of the appellant accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[94]

There was enmity between the parties. The accused gave single blow of yoke to the deceased in night, causing death by single injury. His conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[95]

In the instant case single blow was given on the head of the deceased by a small wooden yoke. Conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[96]

(f) Honour Killing

The accused respondents were prosecuted on allegations that they had taken the deceased from his field to their house and strangulated the deceased (G) and their sister (P) as both had sexual relations. The accused persons took defence that the deceased sneaked into the house of the accused persons and tried to strangulate their sister and when the accused saw, they strangulated the deceased. The High Court in appeal on the basis of the postmortem report that semen was found in the vaginal swabs of deceased which were sent for chemical examination, came to the conclusion that it was deceased G who himself sneaked into the house of the accused persons and must have had sexual intercourse with P and on seeing them in a compromising position, the accused persons must have killed them. The High Court came to the conclusion that even if this was proved, it was a case of grave and sudden provocation and as such it could not be a case of murder and would come under s 304, Pt I read with s 34, IPC on the basis of first exception to s 300, IPC . The Supreme Court agreed with the view taken by the High Court. Conviction of the accused respondents under s 304, Pt I was affirmed.[97]

(g) Honour Killing -- Sentence Undergone held Proper

The incident was old, the accused were below 25 years at the time of the offence, the sentence of five years already undergone was not interfered with.[98]

7. Applicability of Section 34 to the first part of Section 304 of IPC

Commentary under s 34, ante, Vol. 1, may be referred to.

Where two or more accused persons in furtherance of their common intention commit an offence punishable under s 304, Pt I, IPC, the liability under s 304, Pt I can be fastened on them by taking recourse to s 34, IPC .

Where the accused entertaining apprehension that the complainant party had come to take forcible possession of land, attacked them by chasing the complainant party and firing 30-40 rounds of gunshot unnecessarily at the complainant party killing some persons, the accused were held to have exceeded their right of private2523 defence, and thereby, held to have committed the offence under s 304, Pt I read with s 34, IPC .[1]

Where the accused persons in furtherance of their common intention caused the death of two persons, none of the injuries on the persons of the deceased could be attributed to any sharp cutting weapon, most of them were lacerated injuries and others were bruises or aberrations, the conviction of the accused persons was altered from s 302, read with s 34 to s 304, Pt I read with s 34 .[2] Where some of the accused persons formed common intention to commit an offence and used weapons like spears, lathis and inflicted injuries on the vital parts of the body of the deceased, alteration of their conviction from ss 302 / 149, IPC to one under s 304, Pt I read with s 34, IPC, was held justified.[3]

Where the deceased died of banka blows not attributed to one of the accused who had only pressed down the deceased before the other two accused persons gave the blows, the Apex Court held on these facts that by merely pressing down the victim before the other two accused persons assaulted, it cannot be held that the accused had shared common intention of causing the death of the victim; in the facts and circumstances of the case it has to be held that he shared only the common intention of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. He can be attributed with the intention that the injuries which were being caused by the other two accused persons were likely to cause death of the victim, accordingly; the conviction of this accused was converted from s 302 read with s 34 to s 304, Pt I read with s 34, IPC .[4]

8. Applicability of Section 149 to Part I of Section 304

Commentary under the same heading in s 149, ante, Vol. 1, may be referred to.

Where two groups of accused persons came from different directions, and attacked the victims causing fatal injuries to one and grievous hurt to another, it amounted to formation of unlawful assembly on the spot with the common object of atleast causing injuries likely to cause death to one and grievous hurt to another victim; the fact as to which accused person caused injuries to the victim and with which weapon, pales into insignificance in view of their common object, the two accused persons had gone to the place of occurrence armed with pistol but they did not use the pistol, however, they did not even protest against the fatal attack on one of the victims by the other accused persons and throughout remained at the place of occurrence till the victim met his death, the non-user of pistol by the accused on the two victims proved that they had not formed an unlawful assembly on the spot with the object of causing death of the victim; thus, all accused persons were liable under s 304, Pt I read with s 149, and not under s 302 read with s 149, IPC .[5] Where there was a free fight between the parties, and the fatal injury was caused on the deceased by the accused in the course of a sudden quarrel and was not found sufficient in the ordinary course to cause death, conviction of the accused under s 302 read with s 149 was altered to s 304, Pt I, s 325 and s 148, IPC .[6]2524

9. Part I Distinguished from Part II

Section 304, IPC does not create an offence, but provides the punishment for culpable homicide not amounting to murder. In view of s 299, whoever causes death by doing an act with the intention of causing death, or with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, or with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely by such act to cause death, commits the offence of culpable homicide. In view of s 300, except in cases covered by the five exceptions mentioned therein, culpable homicide is murder. It is well-known that if death is caused and the case is covered by any one of the five exceptions of s 300 then such culpable homicide shall not amount to murder. Section 304 provides punishment for culpable homicide not amounting to murder and draws a distinction in the penalty to be inflicted in cases covered by one of the five exceptions, where an intention to kill is present and where there is only knowledge that death will be a likely result, but intention to cause death or such bodily injury which is likely to cause death is absent. To put it otherwise, if the act of the accused falls within any of the cll 1, 2 and 3 of s 300, but is covered by any of the five exceptions, it will be punishable under the first part of s 304 . If, however, the act comes under cl 4 of s 300, i.e., the persons committing the act knows that it is so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death but without any intention to cause death and is covered by any of the exceptions, it will be punishable under the second Part.[7]

We need to record here that there is a fine distinction between the class of cases that the framers of the IPC contemplated while prescribing the two parts of s 304, IPC . The first part of the section postulates a more serious class of offences where the court can infer that there is a clear intention to cause death, whereas, the second part of the section contemplates a slightly lesser class of offence where there is knowledge that the act is likely to cause death, but where the intention to cause death is not present.[8] The first part of the section applies where there is guilty intention and the second where there is no such intention, but there is knowledge.[9] In Pt I, the mental element or mens rea is intention, whereas, in Pt II, the mens rea is knowledge.[10] Where the accused intended to cause such bodily injury to the deceased which was likely to cause death, the offence made out against him is under s 304, Pt I and not under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[11] Where the injuries intentionally inflicted are not such as are sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, but are merely injuries which are likely to cause death, then the accused are guilty under s 304, Pt I, and not under Pt II.[12]However, the punishment is lighter in a case falling under Pt II, where there is no intention, either to cause death or even to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, but only knowledge that death would fall under Pt I, and not under Pt II. Stated differently, Pt II comes into play when death is caused by doing an act with knowledge that it is likely to cause death, and when such act is the infliction of bodily injury, the infliction must not be intentional. A person who intentionally causes bodily injury with knowledge that such act is likely to cause2525 death, must necessarily be a person who does an act with intent to cause bodily injury likely to result in death.[13] Where it appeared that the occurrence took place suddenly, without any intention to cause death of the deceased, where only one blow from the corner of an axe was caused by the accused, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 304, Pt I to s 304, Pt II, IPC .[14] Cases under the exception to s 300 fall under s 304, Pt I of the IPC .[15]

If the accused commits an act while exceeding the right of private defence by which the death is caused, either with the intention of causing death or with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, then he would be guilty under Pt I of s 304, IPC . On the other hand, if, before the application of any of the exceptions of s 300, it is found that he was guilty of murder within the meaning of clause 'fourthly', then no question of such intention arises and only knowledge is to be fastened on him that he did indulge in an act with the knowledge that it was likely to cause death, but without any intention to cause it or without any intention to cause such bodily injury as was likely to cause death.[16] In the latter case, the accused is liable to be convicted only under Pt II of s 304, and not under Pt I of s 304, IPC .

Whether the act committed would bring the offence within Pt I, or Pt II, of s 304, would ultimately depend upon the lower or the greater degree of likelihood of death being caused.[17] In other words, whether a case would fall under s 304, Pt I, or under s 304, Pt II, would depend upon whether the injury was caused with an intention or with knowledge that it was likely to cause death. If a person loses self-control and uses a stick, one cannot say that he intended to inflict the very injury which was caused by him. If that injury was not intended to be inflicted, but it landed at that particular place, and if the court comes, under the circumstances, to the conclusion that he had only knowledge that death was likely, it cannot be suggested that the view taken by the court is wrong.[18] Where the accused could only have known that death was likely to be caused, but he did not intend to cause death, it was held that the accused could only be convicted under the second clause of s 299, i.e., for culpable homicide, punishable under Pt II of s 304, instead of s 302,[19] but where considerable force was applied in strangulating an old lady and death was caused by asphyxia, the offence was held to fall under s 302, and not under s 304 .[20] If an accused causes a blow on the head of the deceased, with a lathi, he should know that he is likely to cause death or he is likely to cause such injury which is likely to cause death. His case would fall under s 304, Pt II, and not under s 304, Pt I, IPC, if, taking into consideration, the past relations between the parties and the manner of occurrence, it cannot be said that the accused had the intention of causing the death of the deceased or of causing such bodily injury as was likely to cause his death.[21]2526

10. 'Death Caused by Act done with Intention of Causing such Bodily Injury as is Likely to Cause Death'

Such homicide is culpable homicide and falls under the second clause of s 299 . It would be murder under clause 'secondly' of s 300 if the offender does the act with the intention of causing such bodily injury which, he knows, is likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm is caused. If the element of knowledge is wanting, the offence would not be murder, but only culpable homicide not amounting to murder or even a lesser offence.[22] If the bodily injury intentionally caused is so likely to cause death that it can be said to be sufficient, in the ordinary cause of nature, to cause the death of a normal human being, the homicide would be murder under clause 'thirdly' of s 300 . However, if the injury intentionally caused is only likely to cause death, but is not sufficient in the ordinary cause of nature to cause death, it does not amount to murder, but remains culpable homicide not amounting to murder which is punishable under the first part of s 304 .[23] Where the two accused were teenagers at the time of the incident, and one accused inflicted one blow with a sharp edged weapon, and the deceased died after six days of the injury, it was a penetrating wound according to the medical report, it appeared that there were some other injuries which admittedly were neither serious nor fatal; on these facts the Apex Court opined that the offence under s 302 cannot be attributed to the accused, the conviction of the two accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I read with s 34, IPC .[24] When the injury is not serious and there was no intention to cause death or grievous hurt, nor had the accused knowledge that it was likely to cause grievous hurt or death, the accused will be guilty of causing hurt, and not death, even though death is caused.[25] It is only grievous hurt if death is not caused, and wherever death is caused, it immediately becomes culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[26] A person, who voluntarily inflicts injury such as to endanger life, must always, except in the most extraordinary and exceptional circumstances, be taken to know that he is likely to cause death and if the victim is actually killed, the conviction, in such cases, ought ordinarily be of the offence of culpable homicide.[27] However, in a subsequent Full Bench case, the same court held that 'the line between culpable homicide not amounting to murder and grievous hurt is a very thin and subtle one'. In one case, the injuries must be such as are likely to cause death; in the other, the injuries must be such as endangers life.[28] Following this, it has been held that an act which is not likely to cause death, amounts to grievous hurt even though death is caused.[29]

11. Intention and Knowledge

The framers of the IPC designedly used the words 'intention' and 'knowledge', and it is accepted that knowledge of consequences which may result in doing an act is not the same thing as the intention that such consequences should ensue. Firstly, when an2527 act is done by a person, it is presumed that he must have been aware that certain specified harmful consequences would or could follow. However, that knowledge is bare awareness and not the same thing as intention that such consequences should ensure. As compared to 'knowledge', 'intention' requires something more than mere foresight of the consequences, namely the purposeful doing of a thing to achieve a particular end.

Kenny in Outlines of Criminal Law[30] has observed:

> Intention: To intend is to have in mind a fixed purpose to reach a desired objective; the noun 'intention' in the present connection is used to denote the state of mind of a man who not only foresees but also desires the possible consequences of his conduct. Thus if one man throws another from a high tower or cuts off his head it would seem plain that he both foresees the victim's death and also desires it: the desire and the foresight will also be the same if a person knowingly leaves a helpless invalid or infant without nourishment or other necessary support until death supervenes. It will be noted that there cannot be intention unless there is also foresight, since a man must decide to his own satisfaction, and accordingly must foresee, that to which his express purpose is directed.

> Again, a man cannot intend to do a thing unless he desires to do it. It may well be a thing that he dislikes doing, but he dislikes still more the consequences of his not doing. That is to say he desires the lesser of two evils, and therefore has made up his mind to bring about that one.

Russell on Crime[31] has observed:

> In the present analysis of the mental element in crime the word 'intention' is used to denote the mental attitude of a man who has resolved to bring about a certain result if he can possibly do so. He shapers his line of conduct so as to achieve a particular end at which he aims.

It can thus be seen that 'knowledge' as contrasted with 'intention', signifies a state of mental realisation with the bare state of conscious awareness of certain facts in which the human mind remains supine or inactive. On the other hand, 'intention' is a conscious state in which mental faculties are aroused into activity and summoned into action for the purpose of achieving a conceived end. It means shaping of one's conduct so as to bring about a certain event. Therefore, in the case of 'intention', mental faculties are projected in a set direction. Intention need not necessarily involve premeditation. Whether there is such an intention is a question of fact.[32]

12. Intention main criterion of Part I

Intention of causing death, or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, is the main criterion of the first part of the section. In ascertaining the intention of the accused, the true rule is that where the injury caused is not the result of accident or negligence, a strong presumption arises that the injury caused was intended to be caused, though this presumption may be rebutted by other circumstances, e.g., the motive of the accused, the nature of attack, the time and place of attack, the position and condition of the deceased, the number of injuries and the force used etc.[33] When the intention of the accused persons might be to cause bodily injury to the deceased2528 but their intention was not to cause the death of the deceased, in such circumstances, the case of the accused person will not fall within the purview of s 300, IPC and under the definition of murder but the case will fall only within the purview of s 299, IPC culpable homicide not amounting to murder and for that accused persons can only be convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[34] But when from the evidence it is evident that the deceased died due to the wound in his abdomen which was 4 inches deep, this shows the intention of the accused was to kill or to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.[35] If it is found that there was no intention to cause death, the injury, resulting even in internal hemorrhage and causing death, would suffice conviction only under s 323, and not under Pt I of this section.[36] If a small stone is thrown at another man, it is very rare that his stomach would be ruptured so as to entail death. In such a case, an intention to cause death cannot be attributed to the assailant, and therefore, there can be conviction only under s 323, and not under the first part of this section.[37]

13. Intention and Knowledge are Distinct, but may also merge

In many cases, intention and knowledge merge into one another, and mean the same, more or less, and intention can be presumed from knowledge. The demarcating line between knowledge and intention is, no doubt, thin, but it is not difficult to perceive that they cannot mean to be very different.[38] The IPC in the current section, has used two different terms, 'intent' and 'knowledge', and has provided different punishments according to the act being done with the requisite 'intent' or the requisite 'knowledge'. The two terms, 'intent' and 'knowledge', cannot, therefore, be equated with each other. Sometimes, the consequence is so apparent that from the knowledge, 'intent' may be presumed. However, it will not mean that 'intent' and 'knowledge' are to mean the same. 'Knowledge' will be only one of the circumstances while determining or inferring the requisite intent.[39]

14. Distinction between Injury being likely to cause death and of its being Sufficient to cause death

The distinction between the knowledge that injury is likely to cause death and one that is sufficient in the ordinarily course of nature to cause death is, though subtle, real. It is, indeed, a question of probability which depends on the nature of the weapon used and the particular part of the body against which it is used.[40] To quote an example, if the weapon used happens to be a small club, the manner in which the blow is inflicted, viz, the degree of force used and more importantly the part of the body at which it is aimed would be of prime relevance, but the courts would still take cognizance of the fact that the use of this sort of weapon would signify the intention of really causing hurt rather than of killing.

The real difference is between the aspect of intention and knowledge. If on the other hand, the weapon used is a lethal weapon such as a dagger and the blow is2529 aimed at a vital part of the body, the only legitimate inference which the court will draw is that the accused definitely intended to kill.[41] A blow with the fist or a stick on a vital part may likely cause death; a wound with a sword on a vital part is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death.[42]

Where there was no escape from the conclusion that the injuries sustained by the deceased were sufficient in the ordinary cause of nature to cause death, but there was difficulty to say that the accused intended more injuries, the conviction of the accused under s 302 was altered to s 304, Pt II, IPC .[43]

15. Scope of Part II of Section 304 , IPC

Part II of this section covers those cases which fall within the third part of s 299, but do not fall within the fourth clause of s 300 .[44]If the act is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death, the offence would still be murder unless an exception to s 300 is applicable.[45]Section 304, Pt II comes into play when the death is caused by doing an act with knowledge that it is likely to cause death but there is no intention on the part of the accused either to cause death or to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.[46]If the act, by which the death is caused, was done with the knowledge that it was likely to cause death, but without any intention to cause death or to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, the offence is not murder, but culpable homicide not amounting to murder under Pt II of this section.[47] Similarly, where it is difficult to conclude whether an offence is culpable homicide or culpable homicide not amounting to murder, the accused can only be convicted under the second part of this section.[48] In an offence punishable under s 304, Pt II, 'knowledge' is an important element.[49] If, however, there is no evidence to show any knowledge of the likelihood of causing death on the part of the accused, the second part of this section will not apply; but if the injury is such as to endanger life, the accused would be guilty of the offence under s 325 .[50]

In one case, after the deceased become unconscious, in panic the accused hung him unmindful of whether he was alive or dead. It was held that in hanging the deceased, the accused must be attributed to have knowledge that their act was likely to cause death, and, therefore, though they were not liable for the offence of murder, they2530 were punishable under s 304, Pt II.[51] Where the accused's father had killed his child by throwing her in a well, the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II was upheld.[52] The accused appellant robbed the deceased of money and tractor and after committing robbery threw the deceased and one more person into canal. The evidence available on record did not suggest that there was any intention of causing the death of the deceased. The case fell under Pt II of s 304, IPC . The appellant committed the offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The appellant was accordingly convicted under Pt II of s 304, IPC and sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 7 years.[53]. Where the blow struck by the appellant, was at random and in all probability, intended to be struck on A, but, as D flung herself on A, it accidentally struck D on the right side of her back on account of which she died, it was held that the appellant could not be fastened with the intention of causing such bodily injury as was likely to cause death of D, and, the offence of the appellant fell under s 304, Pt II.[54]

Where a quarrel arose all of a sudden, and only one injury was caused with a pair of scissors, which is not usually a weapon of offence for committing murder or for causing injuries, and the accused had not taken any undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner, and verbal altercation had taken place before the accused inflicted the injury on the person of the deceased, it was held that the case fell within exception 4 to s 300 and the accused was liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt II.[55] On quarrel between the appellant and the deceased over trivial issue, the accused appellant picked up the Dhangu and gave two Dhangu blows on the head of the deceased. Two wounds proved fatal. Appellant accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[56] The facts of the case showed that there was no premeditation, the fight resulted on drinking of water from the hand pipe after an exchange of abuses. There appeared no intention on the part of the appellants to cause the death of the deceased, nor were the injuries caused with the intention of causing such bodily injuries as the accused knew were likely to cause death. The case was covered by Exception 4 to s 300 IPC, the offence committed by the appellants, was culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The accused appellants were convicted of the offence under s 304, Pt II of the IPC and not under s 302 of the IPC .[57] The Accused A-2 had himself received severe injuries and he might have apprehended that the deceased would further assault him. As such he gave axe blows on the neck of the deceased. However, he used excessive force and caused injuries on vital parts of the body of the deceased. The Accused A-2 was given benefit of doubt of Exception 4 to s 300, his conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[58] Where the deceased was put on the ground and run over by a2531 bullock-cart, driven by the accused, but he took steps to bear the expenses of his (deceased's) treatment, it was held that the accused had no clear intention to cause the murder of the deceased, and therefore, he could be convicted under s 304, Pt II, and not under s 302 .[59]Where it appeared to the court that the death of the deceased was caused by an act of causing such injury as was likely to cause death and there was no intention of the accused to kill the deceased, it was held that the conviction of the accused was not warranted under s 302 read with s 149, and the accused were liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[60] Appellant and co-accused were tenants of the landlord PW2. The appellants accused assaulted the landlord when the latter asked for payment of rent. Nephew (deceased) of the landlord intervened, the appellant S delivered a knife blow to the deceased. Held, Exception 4 to s 300 was fully attracted in the case, the conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC recorded by the trial court was converted into one under s 304, Pt II.[61] The appellant accused wanted to keep, the widow of his brother, as his mistress, but she refused to be his mistress. On the day of the incident the accused was forcibly trying to drag the widow to his house. At that very time, he was told by his brother (the deceased) that he could not force and drag the widow to his house. The appellant got enraged by such unwarranted advice lifted a wooden plank (pat) and hit deceased with it on his head, and also kicked and punched him, deceased died on the spot. As the incident occurred in a sudden fit of anger, the Supreme Court held that the case fell under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC . The appellant accused had already undergone 11 years imprisonment, the sentence was reduced the period already undergone.[62]

The son of the deceased threw stone on a cat which while jumping landed on the terrace of the first accused (acquitted for want of evidence), where some grain was lying for drying. The boy was scolded and beaten by the appellant. The mother of the boy hearing altercation called his husband (deceased). There was scuffle between the accused and the deceased, the accused struck the head of the deceased with tekani (piece of wood) used for supporting the bullock carts. The deceased fell down, was shifted to the hospital, when he died nearly four hour after the incident. The available evidence showed that there was no premeditation on the part of the accused appellant and that it was a sudden fight. The wife of the deceased had called the deceased on the spot to settle the dispute once for all. The blow was given in scuffle between the accused and the deceased. There was only one hit. There was nothing to show that there was any cruelty involved by inflicting any other injury or by any other conduct on the part of the appellant so as to hold that the appellant was taking any undue advantage of the situation or that he behaved in a cruel or unusual manner. There was no evidence that the accused intended to cause the death of the deceased. The case was fully covered by Exception 4 to s 300, IPC, fell under s 304, Pt II, IPC . The life imprisonment awarded by the Sessions Judge confirmed by the High Court was substituted by imprisonment for ten years and a fine of Rs. 50,000/- payable to the wife of the deceased.[63]

Accused entered the house of the deceased to commit rape on the deceased. When resisted the accused poured kerosene oil and set her on fire. When she cried the2532 accused also poured water on her to save her life. As the act of the accused was not premeditated, the accused only wanted to frighten the deceased, conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[64]

The accused husband suspected illicit relation of his deceased second wife, he sat on her chest, assaulted with hands which resulted in death. Considering the manner of assault, the conviction of the accused appellant husband under s 304, Pt II was held proper. Sentence of ten years RI was imposed.[65]

The defence of the appellant was that he had gone to the deceased's house for repairing his TV. The deceased had just come home. He expressed a desire to have unnatural sex with the appellant. The appellant said no to it. Thereupon the deceased removed all his clothes. He became naked and with a view to having unnatural sex with the appellant and for the purpose of gratifying his unnatural lust he attacked the appellant. The appellant received bruises and contusions. The appellant apprehended that the deceased would force him to have unnatural sex with him. He felt that he may not be able to prevent it and he may fall prey to the deceased's desire for unnatural lust. Since he was certain that he would be a victim of unnatural lust, he picked up a weapon and to protect himself from unnatural sex and assault, he attacked the deceased with the weapon. The deceased fell down because of the assault. Held, the defence version was probable, accused caused death in exercise of right of private defence, but exceeded the right of private defence, he was held guilty under s 304, Pt II.[66]

Initially the accused-appellant also did not have any weapon with him, during the course of the incident he went inside and came back with a knife with the help of which he stabbed the deceased. Held, the case cannot be said to be a case under s 302, IPC but it is a case falling under s 304, Pt II, IPC . Accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[67]

Where there was no preparation, nor any premeditation after altercation in heat of passion, the accused inflicted knife blow in the abdomen of the deceased, which hit in latter's kidney and proved fatal, accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II instead of s 302, IPC .[68]

Evidence showed that it was a case of free fight preceded by sudden provocation. Accused A1 fired shots in the air and not on the deceased. Thereafter he picked up axe and gave blow with axe on the neck of deceased who being old man succumbed to injuries. Held, the accused A1 had no intention to cause the death of the deceased but he had knowledge that the axe assault was likely to cause the death of the accused. Accused A1 was convicted under s 304 IPC, Pt II.[69]

The accused after consuming alcohol had gone to the house of the deceased. There was exchange of hot words, the accused caught-hold of the deceased by neck and dashed against the mud wall. Asphyxia and cardiac arrest were the cause of death.2533 There was no preparation or pre-meditation on the part of the accused. The accused had no intention but he could be imputed with knowledge that his act was likely to cause the death of the deceased. The accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[70]

Mere fact that no single injury sustained by the deceased is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause the death of the deceased is no ground to convict the accused under s 304, Pt II, or s 326, IPC .[71]

In a restaurant when the deceased and his friends were having food, the accused while passing by made an abusive comment on the complainant party at which the deceased laughed. The accused stabbed the deceased with a broken bottle causing death. Held the incident was out of sudden quarrel, the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC . The incident had taken place 15 years before and the accused had a mentally challenged brother, sentence of three years was imposed.[72]

In a case of voluntary drunkenness, knowledge has to be presumed as in the state of not being drunk. Where death was caused by an accused when he was heavily intoxicated and clearly out of his mind, it was held that he would be guilty of the offence under Pt II of this section.[73]Prosecution evidence proved that the accused appellant in the state of drunkenness, by rash and negligent driving, caused the death of seven persons and injuries to eight persons sleeping on footpath. The appellant could be attributed with the knowledge that his act of driving the vehicle at a high speed in the rash or negligent manner was dangerous enough and he knew that one result would very likely be that people who were asleep on the pavement may be hit, should the vehicle go out of control. Essential ingredients of s 304, Pt II were satisfied in the case. Accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[74]The appellant accused in drunken condition was quarrelling with his wife when the son intervened. Accused picked up chopper and inflicted injury on the leg of his son. Due to excess blood loss son died. The accused could not be said to have caused injury which would be likely to cause the death but he could be imputed with knowledge that the injury caused with a weapon like chopper may cause such injury as is likely to cause death. The offence fell under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[75]However, if, on direct or circumstantial evidence, an offence under s 302, IPC, is established against the accused, then merely because of heavy intoxication and/or want of motive or enmity of the accused, the offence does not get reduced to an offence under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[76]

(a) Single Gun Shot Jnjury on Left Side of Chest

Appellant accused inflicted single gun shot injury on the left side of chest resulting in death. The act was done with the knowledge that by such act the accused was likely to cause the death of the deceased, the case fell under IIIRD Pt of s 299, as culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The conviction of the appellant accused under2534 s 302, IPC was converted into one under s 304, Pt II, a sentence of five years RI was imposed.[77]

(b) Single lathi Blow Injury which Proved Fatal

Accused appellant gave a single lathi blow on the head of the accused, deceased was hospitalized and died after six days. Other co-accused had not given any blow, as such were acquitted by the courts below. There was no intention or pre-meditation in the mind of the accused appellant to inflict such injuries to the deceased as were likely to cause his death in the ordinary course of nature. Accused appellant was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[78]

In a sudden quarrel without premeditation, the appellant accused inflicted one lathi blow on the deceased, prior to it he was not armed. Appellant accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II.[79] Where in a sudden quarrel on a minor issue in heat of passion, the appellant No. 1 had given a single lathi blow on the head of the deceased, he did not repeat the blow, he was convicted under s 304, Pt II.[80]

(c) Single Firearm Injury on Thigh

Appellant accused had caused single firearm injury on the thigh of the deceased. His conviction under s 302 was altered into one under s 304, Pt II, and a custodial sentence of 7 years was imposed.[81]

(d) Injuries Simple

The respondent accused was alleged to have caused injuries by knife on the person of the deceased. However, the medical evidence in the case disclosed that the injuries found on the person of the deceased were simple injuries and none of them was described as grievous. There was no evidence to prove that the injuries inflicted on the deceased were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. There was a bruise on the front of the neck of the deceased and the medical evidence disclosed that there was bleeding of the trachea as a result in clotting of the blood in the trachea leading to Asphyxia. This injury was not attributed to the respondent accused, and there was nothing to establish that the injury which ultimately resulted in the death of the deceased was intended by any one. Both the High Court and2535 Supreme Court held that offence under s 302, IPC was not made out and that the offence made out was one punishable under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[82]

(e) Air Gun Weapon of Offence

Appellant accused caused the death of the deceased by air gun. Air gun was recovered at the instance of the appellant. Appellant was convicted under s 304, Part II.[83]

(f) Accused Fired Indiscriminately

Over the cable connection, a sudden quarrel took place between the appellant accused and the son of the deceased. On account of heat of passion, the appellant went home; took out his father's revolver and started firing indiscriminately, and one of the bullets hit the deceased on her chin. The appellant had the knowledge that the use of revolver was likely to cause death and, as such, the present case would fall within the third clause of s 299, IPC . The offence committed by the appellant was only "culpable homicide not amounting to murder". The accused appellant was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[84]

(g) Grave and Sudden Provocation

The appellant's niece had eloped with teacher in the school. The appellant suspected the hand of the deceased. On the date of the incident the appellant was working in his field, the deceased came there. After verbal duel, which had lasted for pretty long time, the appellant had picked up a sickle which is an agricultural implement, lying on the ground and delivered a blow on the neck of the deceased. There was no pre-meditation or pre-plan of the accused to cause the death of the deceased. The accused did not repeat the blow, he acted under grave and sudden provocation. The accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not s 302, IPC .[85]

The deceased who used to collect waste papers from the roadside, collected the waste papers and cardboard boxes and threw them inside the shop of the accused. On seeing this the accused got angry and shouted at deceased "why do you do this everyday?" and pulled his hair. The deceased thereupon pushed the accused. Then the accused took a knife from the top of a table in the shop and stabbed deceased in the chest. Deceased fell down due to this injury and died. Held the accused was deprived of the power of self control by grave and sudden provocation which led him to commit the offence. If rubbish is thrown into one's house or shop one would naturally get very upset. It is evident that the accused had no motive or intention to cause the death of the deceased since the accused was not carrying the knife from before, and only picked it up during the scuffle with the deceased. The incident in question occurred in a sudden fight and a heat of passion by a sudden quarrel without the accused having taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner.2536 Hence, the accused is entitled to the benefit of Exceptions 1 and 4 and the case comes under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[86]

(h) Accused Throwing Stone Causing Death

In the present case, appellant was not armed with any deadly weapon. The appellant and deceased were grappling and fighting and in that sequence when the deceased jumped down in another's field the appellant threw a stone which hit the deceased on his head. Held, s 304, Pt II was attracted in the case. Appellant accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[87]

(i) Death by Throwing Bricks

Accused appellant along with other accused persons had thrown bricks at the deceased causing his death. When the bricks were thrown on the vital parts of the body of the deceased who was an old man of 78 years, in that event, knowledge to commit murder can definitely be attributed to the appellant. The deceased died instantaneously after receiving the brick injuries. The conviction of the accused appellant under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II, sentence of five years imprisonment was imposed.[88]

(j) Incident Occurred at Spur of Moment

As the incident occurred over cutting of the bazra crop on the spur of moment, appellant accused had no motive, he was convicted under s 304, Pt II IPC .[89]

(k) Single Blow with a Pen Knife Causing Death

The accused appellant inflicted single blow with pen knife which caused the death of the deceased. The blow as not repeated. Held, intention to cause death could not be imputed to the accused. However, the accused knew that his act was likely to cause the death of the deceased. The case was covered by Exception 4 to s 300 . Conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered into one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[90]

There was clear evidence of the doctor that the accused appellants inflicted injuries on the deceased from blunt side of the gandasi. The accused appellants did not intent to cause the death of the deceased, their conviction under s 302 IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC, and sentence of five years RI was imposed.[91]

(m) Use kandali from Reverse Side

The defence substantiated that accused R received injuries in this incident and accused M in order to save his son, gave kandali blow from the reverse side on the2537 head of deceased. Right of private defence of the accused stood established from the evidence of the prosecution. The Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's view and conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II.[92]

(n) Death of the Accused in Police Custody

Accused police officers being annoyed with the stabbing of their constable, in police custody gave beating to the deceased causing death. Held, the accused appellant did not intend to cause death, but the act was done with the knowledge that it was likely to cause the death of the deceased. The case falls within the IIIRD Pt of s 299 and will be punishable under the IIND Pt of s 304, accordingly the accused appellant was convicted under s 304, Pt II.[93]

(o) Parents Confining their Child in Bathroom Causing Death

The appellant mother and her husband had confined their child (deceased), in a bathroom for 14 days, did not provide food and water and caused her death. The appellant and her husband had definite knowledge that their act of confining child, in a bathroom would result into her starvation which was likely to cause her death. Both the accused were convicted for offence under s 304, Pt II of the IPC . The accused husband had not preferred appeal and served out the sentence. Only appellant mother filed appeal. Sentence of the appellant mother was reduced to the period already undergone.[94]

16. Applicability of Section 34 to Part II of Section 304

Commentary under s 34, ante, Vol. 1, may be referred to.

Even in cases, covered by s 304, Pt II, IPC, it is legally permissible to apply s 34, IPC, if the facts establish common intention. It is wrong to say that the constructive liability under s 34 can, in no case, be fixed on a person when the actual injury, giving rise to an offence under s 304, Pt II, is caused by his co-accused.[95] However, the accused persons should have acted in concert, and not individually. Thus, where the co-accused caused simple injury with an axe, and the main accused caused stab-injury on a vital part of the body of the deceased, though the incident occurred in quick succession, but each accused was found to have acted individually and not in concert, the liability of each accused would thus be individual and not under s 34, the co-accused was convicted under s 324 and the main accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[96] Prosecution evidence was not very specific with regard to the role played by A1, A2 and A3. It was the prosecution version that A 4 had the knife in his pocket which he suddenly brought out and stabbed the deceased. Section 34IPC was not attracted in the case. The conviction of Accused 1, 2 and 3 with the aid of Section 34IPC was not proper, hence was set aside. Only Accused 4 was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[97]2538

When the facts clearly indicate that the accused were acting in furtherance of a common objective, that they had participated in the incident together and consequently, irrespective of the weapons which each one used or what direct effect of the individual blow might have been, the liability in law of all the accused persons would be common,[1] by virtue of s 34 . Thus, where the accused person armed with cart-peg, iron-rod and axe assaulted the deceased, (where the incident was not pre-planned, but the accused were provoked by the fact that the deceased after cutting the tree took its timber), the accused were found liable to be convicted under s 304 Pt II, s 34 instead of ss 302 / 34, IPC .[2] The accused persons acted in furtherance of their common intention to assault the deceased without any intention to cause death, they inflicted a single blow with an iron rod on head of the deceased, the deceased fell down and the other accused persons inflicted lathi blows over different parts of his body, the conviction of the accused persons under ss 302 / 34 was altered to one under s 304, Pt II/ s 34, IPC .[3]

Where the seven accused persons, who were armed with sticks or dharia (a stick with a sickle shaped metal fitted at the top), assaulted the deceased in the field of the deceased, the only injury which caused the death of the deceased was an incised wound inflicted on the left humerus which cut the artery and vein, it was observed that one particular injury on the humerus cannot be said to be a wound specifically intended by the assailant to cause that injury as the deceased was sometimes standing up and at other times running and being surrounded by the assailants, and so the offence did not fall under cl 'thirdly' of s 300 . The conviction was converted from s 302 read with s 149 to s 304, Pt II read with s 34 of only those accused persons who possessed dharia, and not of those who had only sticks with them. However, the conviction under s 447, IPC against all the accused persons was confirmed.[4]

In the factual matrix in which the incident took place, although the deceased did not die on the spot but only a solitary knife-blow was inflicted on him by the accused while the co-accused was catching hold of him, the offence under s 304, Pt II read with s 34 would be made out against the accused, and not an offence under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[5] In a gang-rape, committed in a violent manner, leading to the death of the prosecutrix, the accused persons are guilty of an offence punishable under s 304, Pt II read with s 34 besides under s 376 read with s 34, IPC .[6]

Where no regular weapon of assault was being carried by any of the accused, and each of the deceased had sustained only one fatal injury on the head, there was no clear evidence as to who was the author of which injury, the conviction of the accused persons was altered from ss 302 / 34 to s 304, Pt II/ s 34, IPC .7 The second part of s 304, no doubt, speaks of knowledge and does not refer to intention which is segregated in the first part, but knowledge is the knowledge of the likelihood of death. A question posed is whether it can be said that when three or four persons start beating a man with heavy lathis, each hitting his blow with the common intention of severely beating him, and each possessing the knowledge that death is the likely2539 result of the beating, the requirements of s 304, Pt II, are not satisfied in the case of each of them. If it can be said that knowledge of this type is possible in the case of each one of the accused, there is no reason why s 304, Pt II, cannot be read with s 34 . The common intention is with regard to the criminal act, i.e., the act of beating. If the result of the beating is the death of the victim and if each of the assailants possesses the knowledge that death is the likely consequence of the criminal act, i.e., beating, there is no reason why s 34 or s 35 should not be read with the second part of s 304 to make each liable individually.[8]Similarly, it is possible to convict an accused person of an offence under s 304, Pt II, read with s 34, if the court is of the opinion that each person taking part in committing the crime in furtherance of the common intention of all, had knowledge that their act was likely to cause death.[9] However, the accused cannot be convicted under s 304, unless there is a finding that they intended to cause any injury to any person though they had the common intention to force their right of way by using force, if necessary.[10]

Where intensive damage had been done to the limbs of the victim, where the infliction of vital injury no 1, the doctor opined that leaving aside injury no 1, injuries no 9-13 were collectively sufficient to cause death in the ordinary cause of nature, it could safely be inferred that despite the assailant's choosing non-vital parts of the body for inflicting those injuries, they must be attributed the knowledge that by their concerted act they were likely to cause death of the deceased, for which act they could be punished under s 304, Pt II read with s 34, be punished under s 304, Pt II read with s 34, IPC .[11]

Where evidence against six accused persons was that they in prosecution of their common object of unlawful assembly committed murder of the deceased, the evidence of the eye-witnesses showed that deceased went towards the accused person and two of the accused armed with axes inflicted fatal injuries on the deceased, no overt acts were attributed to the remaining accused persons, the conviction of the two accused persons under s 302 read with s 149 was altered to one under s 304, Pt II read with s 34, IPC, while the acquittal of the remaining accused persons was confirmed.[12]

Where it could not be said that the accused had no intention to kill and the offence would fall only under s 304, Pt II, the rejection of the bail application of the accused was found proper.[13] Where the accused after satisfying his lust, mercilessly and intentionally killed the victim, a girl of 5 years, the accused was charged for the offences punishable under ss 366, 376 and 302, IPC and also under s 135(1) of the Bombay Police Act by the sessions court, the trial court convicted the accused under s 304, Pt II, IPC, and sentenced him to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 10 years and pay a fine of Rs 1000/-, in default, to undergo simple imprisonment for2540 6 months, the accused was also found guilty under s 376 read with s 511, IPC and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for 5 years and pay fine of Rs 1000, and in default to undergo simple imprisonment for six months. Both sentences were directed to run concurrently, however, the accused was granted unmindful acquittal of charges under ss 366, 302 and 376, IPC and also under s 135(1) of Bombay Police Act . The accused preferred an appeal which was dismissed by the High Court. However, the High Court reprimanded the state in acquiescing and not taking any action against the acquittal of the accused for offences under ss 366, 302 and 376, IPC and observed that in the absence of any appeal by the state or revision by private party, the High Court itself could not take action in view of s 401(3) of CrPC .[14]

Where the accused gave several lathi blows on the head of the deceased without any provocation given by the deceased to the accused, the sessions court was held to have diluted the higher offence (s 302, IPC) that was logically flowing from the facts of the case, by convicting the accused under s 304, Pt II, IPC . However, since the state government in its wisdom did not prefer an appeal for enhancement of sentence and the conviction related to the year 1995 and by the time of judgment by the High Court (in 1999) the accused would have served most of his sentence imposed by the trial court so the High Court refrained from giving notice of enhancement of sentence at that stage. However, the appeal filed by the accused was dismissed.[15]

17. Accused Merely Passerby

The accused appellants A2 and A3 were merely passerby and near the spot picked up stone on the spur of the moment caused one simple injury each on the person of the deceased, held, their conviction under s 304, Pt II read with s 34, IPC was not proper, hence was set aside.[16]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 304.

Punishment for culpable homicide not amounting to murder.--

18. Applicability of Section 149 to Part II of Section 304

Where the common object of the unlawful assembly originally was to cause hurt, but, later, the object developed into killing the deceased, or, at least, into giving him a beating likely to cause death, conviction under Pt II of this section read with s 149 was upheld.[17] Once a case of a person falls within the ingredients of s 141, the question that a particular member of the assembly did nothing with his own hands would be immaterial. He cannot put forward the defence that he did not with his own hands commit the offence, committed in prosecution of the common object of unlawful assembly, or as the members of the assembly knew likely to be committed in prosecution of their common object.[18] Therefore, when members of the unlawful assembly knew that death was the likely result of the injuries caused to the deceased, they are liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt II, read with s 149, IPC .[19]

The accused appellants committed the murder of the deceased, packed the dead body of the deceased into a gunny bag and had thrown in the river. There was2541 evidence that some accused persons actively participated in the assault, while others helped them. Conviction under s 304, Pt II, read with s 149, IPC was held proper.[20]

Where all the ingredients of s 149 were clearly indicated in the charge framed against the accused and no prejudice is shown to have been caused by not framing a specific charge under s 149, conviction of the accused persons under s 304, Pt II read with s 149, IPC is proper.[21]

Where accused persons formed an unlawful assembly and armed with lethal weapons entered the house of the complainant and assaulted its inmates and killed his mother with a deadly weapon causing grievous injury, the evidence of the doctor not stating that the said injury was sufficient in the ordinary course to cause death, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 304, Pt II to s 326 read with s 149, IPC .[22]

Where there was an assault by several accused persons resulting the death of the complainant's son, in the absence of evidence showing that the co-accused persons came to the scene of the incident with the common object of trespass and assault on the complainant and his son, the co-accused cannot be made vicariously liable for the overt acts of other accused persons, the conviction of such co-accused persons was therefore, set aside; however, the three accused persons who had knowledge but no intention that their act of giving lathi blows was likely to cause death were liable under s 304, Pt II read with s 149 instead of s 304, Pt II, IPC .[23] Where several accused persons armed with various weapons, attacked the deceased and the members of his family but only one appellant accused had inflicted the fatal injury, accused appellants were convicted under s 304, Pt II read with s 149, IPC .[24]

Where the accused persons assaulted the deceased with daggers but no specific overt acts could be attributed to each accused, i.e., who stabbed and on which part of the body and it was difficult to say as to which injury was the immediate cause of death of the deceased, the evidence of the doctor showed that the cause of death was due to shock and hemorrhage due to multiple injuries, in these circumstances the accused were held liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt II read with s 149, IPC .[25] When it was proved that the accused formed an unlawful assembly and chased a person who was attacked by all the accused with sharp and blunt weapons, and several injuries were inflicted resulting in his death, though the accused had no intention to kill him but they certainly had knowledge that their act could lead to the death of the victim, the accused persons were held liable under ss 323, 324 read with s 149, IPC, for causing injuries to the other person.[26]

Where both the accused persons who as real brothers inflicted repeated injuries to the exclusion of any grievous or fatal injury on a vital part like the head, still inflicted injuries on the chest, back and scapular regions of the deceased with the knowledge that it was likely to cause death but without any intention, the accused persons were found liable under s 304, Pt II read with s 34 and the findings of the trial judge2542 holding both the accused liable under s 302 simpliciter as well as under ss 302 / 149, IPC, was found not sustainable as the same did not stand to legal test and the same was held liable to be modified to that extent.[27]

Where the common object of unlawful assembly initially was to cause grievous hurt but while causing the injuries, the common object developed into causing such injuries to the brother of the informant as the accused knew was likely to cause death, the injuries being inflicted in the head region causing his death, the accused persons were held liable for the offence under s 304, Pt II read with s 149, IPC, as only lathis were used to assault the deceased.[28]

Where the accused formed an unlawful assembly and assaulted the deceased with their respective weapons, the conviction of the accused persons under s 304, Pt II, ss 148 and 323 read with s 149 was upheld.[29]Where the accused persons formed an unlawful assembly and assaulted the deceased with iron bars and sticks and committed the act with the knowledge in terms of cl 3 of s 299, they were held liable for the offence under s 304, Pt II read with s 149, IPC .[30]

Seven accused persons were alleged to have committed the murder of one KR. The appellant (Accused 6 and 7) were named in FIR. The eye witnesses also did not mention the names of the two appellants present on the spot at the time of the occurrence and did not attribute any role to them in the occurrence. It is settled law that mere presence or association with other members alone does not per se be sufficient to hold everyone of them criminally liable for the offence committed by the others unless there was sufficient evidence on record to show that one such person also intended to or knew the likelihood of commission of such an offending act. In this case there was no legally acceptable material to prove that the appellants acted as members of unlawful assembly to connect them with the murder of the deceased KR. In the absence of reliable evidence to prove that the appellants were either present on the spot or that they had committed any overt act that could show that they share the common object of the unlawful assembly it is not possible to support their conviction and benefit of doubt has to be given to them. The conviction of the two accused appellants under ss 304, Pt II, ss 147 and 148, IPC recorded by the High Court was set aside.[31]

19. Section 304, Part II and Section 84

Commentary under s 84, ante, Vol. 1, may be referred to.

In order to establish that the act done are not offences under s 84, IPC, it must be proved clearly that at the time of the commission of the act, the appellant by reason of unsoundness of mind was incapable to either knowing that the acts were either morally wrong or contrary to law. The question is whether the appellant was suffering from such incapacity at the time of commission of the acts. The state of mind before and after the crucial time is relevant. If a person by reason of unsoundness of mind is incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that he is doing what is either wrong or contrary to law, he cannot be guilty of any criminal intent. Such a person lacks the requisite mens rea and is entitled for acquittal. The general2543 burden is on the prosecution to prove beyond reasonable doubt not only the actus reus, but also the mens rea.[32]

Where there was no evidence as to how exactly the accused who was suffering from chronic and incurable illness fell into the well at midnight along with her child aged 1½ years, the child was also suffering from rickets prior to his death; it was observed that it may be possible to hold that the accused attempted to commit suicide by jumping along with her child. However, in absence of any evidence clearly indicating as to exactly how they fell into the well, it would be wrong to play on the operation and hold the accused guilty under s 309 or s 302, IPC and exclude the operation of s 84, IPC . Although the burden of proof of the defence under s 84 is on the accused, that burden is not so heavy on the accused as on the prosecution. The absence of medical evidence does not justify exclusion of common sense.[33]

An act committed by a person by reason of incapability of the person committing the offence of knowing the nature of the act on account of unsoundness of mind or that what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law is not an offence as per s 84, IPC . The burden of proof of the defence under s 84, IPC is on the accused though it is not so heavy as burden to prove the case by prosecution.

Where accused mother attempted to end her life by jumping into well alongwith female child in her lap, the life of female child lost in the incident, mental condition of the accused at the time of the incident was not normal as she was suffering from illness of tuberculosis coupled with severe and continuous stomach pain, the accused was in full sense when she was brought out of the well and had narrated to the witnesses. The reasons justifying her act, the case was not found fit which can be covered for the purposes of plea of insanity available under s 84, IPC .[34]

20. Section 304, Part II is not confined to single Injury Cases

It is wrong to think that s 304, Pt II is confined to cases of single injury only. Cases of more than one injury may also fall within it. As an illustration is the decision of Mathew v State of Kerala [35] where more than one stab wound was caused and even then the offence was held to be one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[36] There is no universal rule that whenever two blows are given on the head or successive blows are given on the head by a hard and blunt weapon by using the back side of an axe, the offence would not be murder, but would be punishable under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[37]

21. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and exclusively triable by the court of session.

22. Jurisdiction

Sections 177 to 189, ch XIII, CrPC, may be referred to.[38]2544

23. Supreme Court's Jurisdiction--Special Leave Petition under Article 136 of the Constitution

It will be necessary to keep in view the limited scope of the proceedings which arise out of grant of special leave to appeal against orders of conviction as rendered by the court below against the accused. The concurrent finding reached by both the court below and the evidence cannot be lightly brushed aside, and unless it is shown that the findings are against the weight of evidence or are vitiated by any legal errors, the Apex Court does not interfere with them as a matter of course, especially when they are based on appreciation of evidence of eyewitnesses found to be acceptable by both the courts below.[39]

Very wide powers have been conferred on the Apex Court for due and proper administration of justice apart from the jurisdiction and powers conferred under arts 32 and 136 of the Constitution . The Apex Court retains and must retain interest, power and jurisdiction for dealing with any extraordinary situation in the larger interests of administration of justice and for preventing manifest injuries being done. This power must, by necessity, be sparingly used only in exceptional circumstances for furthering the ends of justice.[40] Thus, where the co-accused was sentenced and the sentence was confirmed by the Apex Court earlier and his special leave petition and review petition were dismissed by the Apex Court and even his petition for clemency had been rejected by the President, on a finding that another accused is entitled not to the death sentence, the same benefit should be extended to the earlier co-accused inspite of dismissal of appeal and petition for clemency.[41]

302 confirmed, the co-accused was found entitled to alteration of his conviction from s 302 to s 304, Pt I, keeping in view the spirit of art 21 of the Constitution, the Apex Court granted the same benefit to the other accused where the special leave petition had already been dismissed.[42]

It is now well established that the Supreme Court does not, by special leave, convert itself into a court to review evidence for a third time. However, where the High Court is shown to have failed in appreciating the true effect and material change in the version given by the witnesses, in such a situation it would not be right for the Supreme Court to affirm such a decision when it occasions a failure of justice. The power under art 136 of the Constitution is, no doubt, extraordinary in amplitude and the Supreme Court goes into action only to avert miscarriage of justice if the existence of perversity is shown in the impugned judgment. Unless some serious infirmity of grave failure of justice is shown, the Supreme Court normally refrains from reappreciating the matter on appeal by special leave. The findings of the High Court have to be judged by the yardstick of reason to ascertain whether such findings were erroneous, perverse and resulted in miscarriage of justice. If the conclusions of the courts below can be supported by acceptable evidence, the Supreme Court will not exercise its overriding powers to interfere with such a decision.[43]2545

In Pritam Singh v State ,[44] it was held that special leave to appeal can be granted only if it is shown that exceptional and special circumstances exist, that substantial and grave injustice has been done and the case in question presents features of sufficient gravity to warrant a review of the decision appealed against. In Sadhu Singh Harnam Singh v State of Pepsu ,[45] the Supreme Court observed that it is well established that this court does not, by special leave, convert itself into a court of review to review evidence for a third time. However, where the court below is shown to have failed in appreciating the true effect of material change in the version given by the witness, it would be right for this court to interfere to avert the failure of justice.

The Apex Court in State of Jammu & Kashmir v Hazara Singh ,[46] held:

> It is well settled that in appeal by special leave under art 136 of the Constitution, against an order of acquittal passed by the High Court, this court does not normally interfere with a finding of fact based on appreciation of evidence, unless the approach of the High Court is clearly erroneous, perverse or improper or there has been a grave miscarriage of justice.

Where the deceased-sister of the accused had an illicit relationship with a person, the accused was provoked and unable to resist himself, kicked and gave knife blows causing death of his sister, and after more than 6 years lapsed since the occurrence, the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt I was maintained but the sentence of imprisonment was reduced from 7 years to 3 years as awarded by the trial court.[47]

As far as the question of sentence in the bride burning case, which has now become a common affair, is concerned, the Apex Court has also shown serious concern in such matters, since the trial court appears to have taken a lenient view by convicting the accused under s 304, Pt I instead of s 302, but the state has not preferred any appeal and as such it does not become desirable to reopen the question, however, there is no justification in reducing the sentence to the period already undergone on the ground that accused is a lady and has now become old.[48]

24. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

'I (name and office of sessions judge etc,) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows :

That you, on or about the .....day of..... at..... committed culpable homicide not amounting to murder, causing the death of ..... and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 304 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.'

There is no impediment in law for an offender being charged for the offence under s 304, Pt II, IPC and also under ss 337 and 338, IPC . The two charges under s 304, Pt II, IPC can legally co-exist in a case of single rash or negligent act2546 where a rash or negligent act is done with the knowledge of likelihood of its dangerous consequences.[49]

The accused charged with s 304 read with s 149 can be convicted under s 304 read with s 34, IPC .[50] The importance of framing charge need not be over-emphasised. It should not be treated as a mere ritual. The substance and not the form is important while considering the provisions relating to charge.[51] The charge should be so framed that the accused shall not be prejudiced in the trial.[52]Section 211 of the CrPC prescribes the contents of the charge. Sub-section (2), thereof, requires 'if the law which creates the offence gives it any specific name, the offence may be described in the charge by that name only'. The IPC has given the offence punishable under s 304, a specific name: 'culpable homicide not amounting to murder'. While framing charge against the accused, the offence should have been described by that name in terms of the aforesaid provision failing which prejudice to the accused could not be ruled out. The accused could not clearly be convicted on the charge so framed by the learned trial judge. Hence, the necessity for sending back the case on remand for re-trial.[53]

25. Alteration of charge from Section 304 to Section 304A

Where allegations against the accused were that he not being a gynaecologist, pressed and squeezed stomach of the complainant's wife thereby inducing delivery of child, child was born alive and was taken to clinic of child specialist where he died within about 20 minutes, it could not be said that petitioner-accused undertook to conduct delivery of complainant's wife with intention of causing death of child in her womb, though primafacie case under s 304A made out but it could not amount to culpable homicide not amounting to murder, order framing charge under s 304, Pt II was set aside and accused was directed to be charged under s 304A, IPC .[54]

26. Proof

For a conviction under this section, there must be proof that:

(1) there was a death of a human being; and
(2) it was caused, by the accused, by doing an act:

(a) with the intention of causing death when the case does not fall under any of the exceptions mentioned in s 300, or punishment...not amounting to murder;
(b) with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death; or

(c) with the knowledge that he is likely, by such act, to cause death.

Where the accused gave a beating to the deceased who succumbed to the injuries after five days, the motive for the occurrence totally lacking, there was conflict and inconsistency between the version of the witnesses, there was no basis for an opinion on the death of the deceased by the doctor, no X-ray films were produced, the2547 investigation was found not proper, it was held that the prosecution failed to prove the guilt of the accused beyond the realm of doubt, the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II read with s 34, IPC was set aside.[55]

The cause of death of the deceased was consumption of illicit liquor. The prosecution case was that the deceased had purchased illicit liquor from the shop of the accused and drinking of that illicit liquor was the cause of death of the deceased. The complainant deposed that he had seen the deceased drinking illicit liquor in the shop of the accused. However, he did not depose that the deceased had purchased illicit liquor from the shop of the accused. As such there was no evidence to connect the accused with the commission of the crime, the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II, IPC was set aside.[56]

The accused was alleged to have stabbed the deceased inside the car at night time. The solitary eye-witness deposed that he saw the incident which took place in the rear seat of car in the light of headlights of the car was found not reliable. Conviction of the accused appellant under s 304, Pt I, recorded by court below was set aside.[57]

In a case where there is direct evidence, even the seizure of weapon is not material.[58] It would not be proper in acquitting accused person solely on account of defect in investigation.[59] If evidence of a solitary eyewitness is cogent, truthful, unimpeachable, the conviction can be recorded under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[60]

27. Appreciation of Evidence--Typical Cases

Where the doctor who first examined the body, attributed the case of death to extensive burn injuries; on the second occasion after the body was exhumed, the doctor who conducted the post-mortem examination attributed the case of death to homicide-strangulation; this contradictory nature of medical opinion definitely casts a doubt on the prosecution case, the accused might have been the author of the crime, but as the saying goes, there is a lot of difference between moral conviction and legal conviction to sustain the punishment for any crime, the second medical opinion based on the post-mortem report done within two months of death cannot prevail over the post-mortem done immediately after the death of the deceased to convict the accused under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[61] Sometimes it is seen that the doctor who conducted the post-mortem examination on the dead body was not put in the witness box by the prosecution for one reason or the other.

No doubt it is the duty of the prosecution to prove post-mortem findings in murder cases, if they are available; absence of such proof with the prosecution evidence in a murder case is a drawback for the prosecution. However, the case cannot be visited with fatal consequences on account of such a lapse when the accused has admitted that the death of the deceased was a case of homicide.[62]2548

Where the record of the case has been lost or destroyed or the complete record has not been reconstructed, the material available an record is not sufficient to dispose off the appeal on merits and it was not possible to reconstruct the record, no order for re-trial should be passed, if the incident had taken place a long time ago, the conviction and sentence of the accused under s 304, Pt I is liable to be set aside in appeal.[63]

Where the deceased gave sickle blows to the accused causing eight injuries on the person of the accused, and the accused gave only a single tangia blow which resulted in the death of the victim, it could not be expected from the accused that he should have weighed in golden scales as to what was the maximum amount of force necessary in using his tangia for giving that single blow, he was fully within his right to use the tangia in exercise of private defence of his person. The conviction of the accused under s

304, Pt I was therefore set aside.[64]

Where in a fight between two parties the accused himself received injuries, of which two were on his vital parts, and the accused having fired one shot from his gun, cannot be said to have exceeded the right of private defence, however, the gunshot by the accused did not hit the assailants but an innocent person present on the scene, the right of private defence was not available to the accused qua even an innocent party who got fatally hurt on account of exercise of such right of private defence which ensured for the accused under clause secondly to s 100, IPC . Consequently, the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt I, IPC and also under s 27 of Arms Act was set aside.[65]

The alleged eye-witness deposed that he saw the accused sister-in-law (A2) pouring poison in the mouth of the deceased. The witness did not prevent the accused from pouring poison, he should have rushed to the police station rather than waited in the house, his conduct was unnatural, as such was disbelieved, conviction of the accused (A2) under s 304, Pt I was set aside.[66]

The recital in the inquest report regarding the time of death of the deceased is only a reproduction of what witness would have told the investigation officer, it falls within the sweep of the interdict contained in s 162, CrPC, and hence, could not be used for any purpose (except to contradict its author). The mere fact that such recital found a place in the inquest report is not enough to save it from the prohibition provided in the section. Even otherwise the time 10:30 pm shown in the inquest report is only a mistake for 10:30 am and hence no implication would flow out of such an error.[67]

The inquest is held under s 174, CrPC, it is required to be held when the death occurs otherwise than under natural causes. The requirement of law is that the wounds, fractures, bruises and injuries found on the body and the weapon by which such injuries appear to have been inflicted should be mentioned in the inquest memo.2549 Therefore, on the ground that in the inquest memo, names of eyewitnesses are not mentioned, the evidence of three eyewitnesses cannot be seen with suspicion.[68]

As a legal proposition it cannot be agreed that the statement of an accused recorded under s 313, CrPC, does not deserve any value or utility if it contains inculpatory admissions. The need of law for examining the accused with reference to incriminating circumstances appearing against him in prosecution evidence is not for observance of a ritual in a trial, nor is it a mere formality. It has a salutary purpose. It enables the court to be apprised of what the indicted person has to say about the circumstances pitted against him by the prosecution. Answers to the questions may sometimes be a flat denial or outright repudiation of those circumstances. In certain cases, the accused would offer some explanations to incriminative circumstances. In very rare instances, the accused may even admit or own incriminating circumstances adduced against him, perhaps for the purpose of adopting legally recognised defence. In all such cases, the court has to effectively appreciate and evaluate the evidence in the case. If an accused admits any incriminating circumstance appearing in evidence against him, there is no warrant that those admissions should altogether be ignored merely on the ground that sub-s (4) of s 313 of the case contains necessary support to the legal position that answers given by the accused during such examination are intended to be considered by the court. The words 'may be taken into consideration in such enquiry or trial' in sub-s (4) would amount to a legislative guideline for the court to give due weight to such answers, though it does not mean that such answers could be made the sole basis of any finding.

Time and again, the Apex Court has pointed out that such answers of the accused can well be taken into consideration in deciding whether the prosecution evidence can be relied on, and whether the accused is liable to be convicted for the offence charged against him, vide Sampath Singh v State of Rajasthan ,[69]Jethamal Pitaji v Assistant Collector of Customs, Bombay ,[70]Rattan Singh v State of Himachal Pradesh .[71]

The Apex Court made it clear that answers of the accused, when they contain admission of circumstances against him are not by themselves delinked from the evidence, can be used for arriving at a finding that the accused had committed the offence.[72]

The statement of the accused under s 313, CrPC, is not a substantive piece of evidence. It can be used for appreciating evidence led by the prosecution to accept or reject it. It is, however, not a substitute for evidence of the prosecution if the exculpatory part of his statement found to be false and the evidence led by prosecution if reliable, the inculpatory part of the statement can be taken aid of to lend assurance to the evidence of the prosecution. If the prosecution evidence does not inspire confidence to sustain conviction of the accused, the inculpatory part of his statement under s 313, CrPC, cannot be made the sole basis of his conviction.[73]

The law is that the burden of proving such an exception 1 to s 300, is on the accused. However, the mere fact that the accused adopted another alternative defence2550 during his examination under s 313, IPC, without referring to exception 1 to s 300, IPC, is not enough to deny him the benefit of the exception, if the court can cull out materials from evidence pointing to the existence of circumstances leading to that exception. It is not the law that failure to so set up such a defence would foreclose the right to rely on the exception once and for all. It is axiomatic that burden on the accused to prove any fact can be discharged either through defence evidence, or even through prosecution evidence by showing a preponderance of probability.[74]

Statement under s 164, CrPC, is not a substantive piece of evidence. It is not necessary to call the magistrate to give evidence to prove s 164 statements. The statements under s 164, CrPC are available to the defence for contradiction by obtaining the certified copies. The s 164 statements recorded by the magistrate is a public document.[75] Therefore, the practice of calling the magistrate to give evidence to prove s 164, CrPC statement should stop.[76]

In the absence of pendency of any proceeding before any court of law, though the magistrate cannot direct the accused to gave his specimen handwriting on the request of the police for comparison with his recovered handwriting from the place of occurrence by invoking s 73 of the Evidence Act during the course of investigation by the police, but such directions can be issued by the magistrate under s 164, CrPC .[77]

When a person hits another with a danda on a vital part of the body with such force that the person hit meets his death, the knowledge that his act was likely to cause death has to be imputed to the accused. In such situation the case will fall in Pt II of s 304, IPC .[78]

Where, from the injuries mentioned in the post-mortem report, it is not possible to say if anyone of them or all of them cumulatively would be sufficient to cause death of the deceased in ordinary course of nature,[79] or when the doctor who examined the internal organs noted that the left plural cavity was filled with clotted blood and that all organs were normal except that the spleen showed a deep cut injury on the upper surface, when blood was found in the plural cavity and surgical emphysema was also noted by the doctor, there is high possibility of lungs being injured and the death of the deceased cannot unequivocally be attributed to injury no 2--(deep perforated injury- 5 cm × 2cms with a loop of intestine {10´´} projecting outside from the injury, how lungs were perforated cannot be discerned from the default of the medical evidence given by the doctor who conducted post-mortem examination,[80] in such cases it cannot be said that accused inflicted the injuries with the intention to cause death and so the accused in liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt II instead of s 302, IPC .

Where the accused caused only one serious injury to the deceased with a jambia while all other injuries were not serious, the Apex Court held that in the circumstances, it is reasonable to infer that only one serious injury was caused by the2551 appellant to the deceased which is injury no 1 while all other injuries, as opined by the doctor, could have been caused during the scuffle. This appreciation of evidence by the trial court stands to reason. The High Court brushed aside the medical evidence to draw an inference that there was an intention on the part of the appellant to cause all the injuries. The evidence of the doctor means that injury, nos 4 to 10, which are mere abrasions or skin deep, could not have been caused by him, but these abrasions could have been caused by falling on the ground and coming in contact with a rough surface. The probability that while injury no 1 could have been inflicted by the appellant, injury nos 2 and 3 could have been caused in the course of the scuffle, cannot be ruled out. In this view of the matter, we think that the view taken by the trial court is preferable to the view taken by the High Court as there is sufficient cogency in the reasoning adopted by the trial court. The High Court does not appear to have appreciated this aspect of the matter at all.[81]

Where both the complainant and the accused party exchanged blows and sustained injuries, the case can be justifiably brought within the ambit of exception IV to s 300 making the accused persons liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt II.[82]

In a gang-rape committed in a violent manner, the accused persons are presumed to have knowledge that by their action the deceased (prosecution) would have died, making them liable for not only the offence under s 304 Pt II read with s 34, but also under s 376 read with s 34, IPC .[83]

28. Accused charged under Section 304 cannot be convicted under Section 328

When the charge under s 304 framed against the accused was with definite allegation of culpable homicide not amounting to murder by reason of administration of drug without taking precaution for reaction therefrom, this is totally different from causing hurt by means of administration of unwholesome drug. On no count a definite charge of culpable homicide can be an error for causing hurt. Going by s 214, CrPC, in every charge words used in describing an offence shall be deemed to have been used in the sense attached to them by law under which such offence is punishable. Therefore, to construe the section relating to culpable homicide as only an error for causing hurt by unwholesome drug will lead to misleading so far as the accused is concerned resulting in failure of justice so far as his opportunity to defend is concerned. Therefore, an accused charged with s 304, IPC cannot be convicted under s 328, IPC .[84]

29. Release of Convict on Probation

Almost two centuries and a decade back thus spoke Edmund Burke:

> Men are qualified for civil liberty, in exact proportion to their disposition to put moral chains upon their own appetites; in proportion as their love to justice is above their rapacity; in proportion as their soundness and sobriety of understanding is above their vanity and presumption; in proportion as they are more disposed to listen to the counsel of the wise and good, in preference to the flattery of knaves. Society cannot exist unless a controlling power upon will and appetite be placed somewhere and the less of it there2552 is within, the more there must be without. It is ordained in the eternal constitution of things that men of intemperate minds cannot be free. Their passions forge their fetters.[85]

Similar note was expressed by E Barrett Prettyman, a retired chief judge of US Court of Appeals:

> In an ordered society of mankind there is no such thing as unrestricted liberty, either of nations or of individuals. Liberty itself is the product of restraints; it is inherently a composite of restraints; it dies when restraints are withdrawn. Freedom, I say, is not an absence of restraints; it is a composite of restraints. There is no liberty without order. There is no order without systematised restrain. Restraints are the substance without which liberty does not exist. They are the essence of liberty. The great problem of the democratic process is not to strip men of restraints merely because they are restraints. The great problem is to design a system of restraints which will nurture the maximum development of man's capabilities, not in a massive globe of faceless annotations but as perfect realisation of each separate human mind, soul, and body; not in mute, motionless meditation but in flashing, thrashing activity.[86]

> Thus, liberty, a priceless treasure of the human soul, is not an absolute abstract concept. It is true that individual liberty is the most important aspect of human existence but it has to be guided and governed by law. Individuality and the power to exercise free will cannot give total freedom. Liberty is to be achieved by rule of law which includes procedural law. Procedures are to be followed as they are the hallmark of authenticity and exposit sacrosanctity. Sometimes, procedure is evolved to curb wanton moves of unscrupulous litigants, and curtail the unwarranted passion of an unethical and unprincipled mind and further to nip the unnecessary and uncalled for problems, in the bud.[87]

Section 6 of the Probation of Offenders Act, however, provides to give benefit of s 3 or s 4 of the said Act to a person who is below 21 years of age at the time of commission of an offence if such offence is not punishable with life imprisonment. These provisions, no doubt, are of mandatory nature, however, the court is not to give the benefit of probation if it is not warranted in view of the circumstances of the case, nature of the offence and the character of the accused.[88] Where the accused appellants fully armed forcibly entered the land of the deceased, caused instantaneous death by inflicting injuries with barchhi and jei, probation was refused.[89]

To be a student is no reason by itself for showing leniency to a culprit,[90] to release him an probation. Where on account of grave and sudden provocation the accused suddenly pierced the weapon, which adivasis generally have with them, in the chest of the victim causing fatal injury, the accused being 21 years of age at the time of occurrence and not a previous convict, and there was no evidence showing that his antecedents were bad or questionable, the accused convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC was released on probation of good conduct with direction to pay Rs 5000 as compensation to the widow of the victim.[91]

Where appellant accused during free fight had assaulted the deceased with lathi, was convicted under s 304, Pt II, in view the fact that he had secured a doctorate2553 degree was Assistant Professor employed in University, his conduct and attainments after his involvement in the case justified his release on probation, he was released on probation by the Supreme Court.[92]

Where the accused stood charged under s 302 but the sessions court convicted him under s 304, Pt II and sentenced him to 4 years imprisonment, the appeal filed by the convict and also by the state were dismissed by the High Court, the accused was also less than 21 years on the date of occurrence and so was directed to be released on probation on executing a bond to the satisfaction of the concerned magistrate for a period of two years.[93] Where the co-accused persons have been granted benefit of probation, and no appeal has been filed challenging that part of the High Court's judgment, the other accused/appellant in appeal before the Supreme Court cannot take advantage of that if his definite role in the crime was established and he was the main brain behind the crime.[94]

30. Punishment

Section 304, IPC does not create an offence but provides the punishment for culpable homicide not amounting to murder. In view of s 299, IPC whoever causes death by doing an act with the intention of causing death, or with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, or with the knowledge that he so likely by such act to cause death, commits the offence of culpable homicide. In view of s 300, IPC, except in cases covered by the five exceptions mentioned therein, culpable homicide is murder. It is well known that if death is caused and the case is covered by any one of the five exceptions of s 300 then such culpable homicide shall not amount to murder. Section 304 provides punishment for culpable homicide not amounting to murder, and draws a distinction in the penalty to be inflicted in cases covered but one of the five exceptions, where an intention to kill is present and where there is only knowledge that death will be a likely result, but intention to cause death or such bodily injury which is likely to cause death is absent. To put it otherwise, it is that act of the accused which falls within any of the cll 1, 2 and 3 of s 300, but is covered by any of the five exceptions, it will be punishable under the first Pt of s 304, if, however, the act comes under cl 4 of s 300, i.e., the person committing the act knows that it is so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause death but without any intention to cause death and is covered by any of the exceptions, it will be punishable under the second part. The first part of s 304 applies where there is guilty intention, whereas the second part applies where there is guilty knowledge.[95]

The first part of this section authorises a sentence of imprisonment for life or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and also fine. The second part of it authorises a sentence of imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, or to fine or both. It is now well settled that imposition of sentence is the reaction of discretion of the court and2554 unless this sentence is found to be grossly inadequate, the appellate court would not be justified in interfering with the discretionary roles of sentence.[1]

However, where the accused persons alongwith a number of other persons armed with hockey sticks, iron chains etc attacked the aged, defenceless including women and children indiscriminately turning the happy marriage occasion into one of mourning, the High Court was held justified in enhancing the sentence and the fact that the accused persons were settled in life during pendency of appeal did not constitute as mitigating circumstances.[2]

31. Justified Punishment

Long pendency of matter cannot by itself justify lesser sentence, just and appropriate sentence is to be imposed after giving due consideration to facts and circumstances of each case.[3] The sentence of 7 year's rigorous imprisonment under Pt I of this section to the accused for causing the death of his own father, while deprived of the power of self-control, was held justified in State of Assam v Nanda Kumar Singh .[4] Where the accused was sentenced to 7 years rigorous imprisonment under s 304, Pt I, IPC by the sessions judge in appeal pursuant to notice of enhancement, the High Court thought it fit to enhance the sentence to life imprisonment, however, to that extent the decision of the High Court seemed consistent when the High Court held that the accused had not committed the offence of murder, and therefore, as a logical corollary he was not liable to be sentenced to life imprisonment, it is difficult to appreciate now the same sentence of life imprisonment could be imposed on him by enhancing his sentence under s 304, Pt I, on facts of the case it may not be said that the sentence of imprisonment imposed by the trial court is grossly inadequate which order was restored by the Apex Court.[5] In Om Prakash v State of Haryana ,[6] the blow being on a vital part of the body and a life having been lost, a sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment was awarded. State of Mysore v Upparagatti Hanmanthappa [7] was a case in which, owing to the absence of requisite intention, the accused was sentenced to two years rigorous imprisonment under the second part of this section and this sentence, on an appeal by the state, was held to be not grossly inadequate.

32. Reduction in Sentence

Following reasons have been found appropriate for reduction of sentence, where:

(a) the accused persons were in custody for some years;[8]
(b) the accused in his twenties lost his life companion by his own act of violence done in the weaker moments of irritation and anger, which could haunt him throughout his life;[9]2555
(c) the accused was a young lady of about 17 years at the time of commission of offence with no criminal history and had not indulged in criminal activities during appeal;[10]
(d) the accused an old person, without any provocation and motive, stabbed his own son on a small matter;[11]
(e) no reason was given by trial court for imposing higher sentence on some accused persons as against other accused persons;[12]
(f) offence was committed in the heat of passion and on the spur of the moment;[13]
(g) accused killed the person seeing him lying in bed with his wife[14] or when both his wife and the person were found in a compromising position;[15]

(h) accused deprived of self control by grave and sudden provocation caused death of person who gave the provocation;[16]

(i) long time elapsed from date of commission of offence and the date of decision of court;[17]

(j) accused being a young boy of 15 years had already suffered imprisonment for two years;[18]

(k) accused a young man of 21 years of age and offence was committed by him 12 years ago;[19]

(l) there were absence of criminal antecedents of accused and the peculiar facts and circumstances in which the crime occurred;[20]

(m) the accused exceeded the right of private defence;[21]

(n) the accused persons young in age gave only single blow to deceased without repeating the same;[22]

(o) the accused was the only earning member of a big family and had already undergone the sentence of imprisonment of four years;[23]2556

(p) the accused was old person and incident took place years ago;[24]

(pp) Case was pending for the last 26 years, ten years' RI was reduced to five years' RI.[25]

(ppp) the wife convicted had minor children, hence the sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[26]

(q) the accused killed his sister by danda blow on account of the fact that she was moving with other persons while her husband was abroad;[27]

(r) the accused was directed to pay compensation;[28]

(s) the accused was young and immature;[29]

(t) several years have elapsed since accused persons (who were later convicted by Supreme Court) were acquitted by High Court;[30]

(u) the accused had three minor children and aged parents to look after and the occurrence took place years before.[31]

(v) Keeping in view of the age of the father-in-law and mother-in-law, convicted under s 304B, IPC, sentence of ten years RI awarded by the courts below was reduced to 7 years RI.[32]

(w) Appellants accused were convicted under s 304, Pt II with the aid of s 149, IPC, they had not committed the substantive offence punishable under s 304, Pt II. Sentence of seven years imposed on the appellants by the court below was reduced to five years RI.[33]

(x) As the death ensued after twenty six days of the incident as a result of septicemia and not as a consequence of burn injuries, the sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[34]

33. Sentence Undergone

Where the accused had acted in exercise of right of private defence, sentence of nine years already undergone was held sufficient.[35]

The conviction of the accused appellant G under s 304, Pt I, IPC, was upheld, but in view of the contentions raised by the Counsel that the injuries sustained by the2557 accused persons have not been explained by the prosecution and the accused acted in exercise of right of private defence, in the ends of justice sentence of ten years RI imposed on the accused appellant was reduced to the sentence to the period already undergone which was more than six years.[36]

34. Enhancement of Sentence

In case of patricide there is no scope for showing any leniency on the point of sentence.[37] When in a sudden quarrel the accused gave single blow of phrasa causing the death of the victim, the sentence under Pt I of s 304, IPC of 2 years and fine of Rs 500 as given by the trial court was found grossly inadequate and unreasonable, the sentence of imprisonment was enhanced to rigorous imprisonment of 6 years and a fine of Rs 1000/- and in default in paying the fine, the accused was to undergo rigorous imprisonment for five months.[38]

Where the trial court sentenced the accused under s 304, Pt I on exceeding right of private defence to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 4 years, on appeal by the state, the Madhya Pradesh High Court observed that the case falls under s 304 when it is not covered by s 302 because right of private defence has been exceeded. Similarly, special leniency cannot be shown because right of private defence has been exceeded. The trial court was wrong in being lenient to the accused persons. No other reasoning has been given to award such a low sentence, therefore, the sentence of the accused persons was enhanced to rigorous imprisonment for 10 years each and a fine of Rs 5000/- each, and in default of payment of fine, further rigorous imprisonment for one year each.[39] Where four injuries were found on the person of the deceased which resulted in injuries as well as fractures damaging vital parts of the body, the sentence of fine of Rs 3000 was found inadequate and so was enhanced to rigorous imprisonment of two years in addition to the fine.[40]

35. Compensation to Victim/Persons Entitled to Recover Damages

Commentary under s 357, CrPC, may be referred to.[41]

The accused under grave and sudden provocation inflicted knife blow on the deceased causing death. The accused had no intention to cause the death of the deceased. The accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I, IPC . In the interest of justice, the accused was directed to pay compensation to the heirs of the deceased.[42]

36. Alteration of Conviction under Section 304 to one under Section 302 or Vice Versa--Legal Position

If, against an order of acquittal passed under s 302, IPC, an appeal is preferred by the state and no appeal is filed by the convicted person against his conviction under s 304, IPC, it is only the order of acquittal which falls to be considered by the appellate court, and not the order of conviction. Similarly, if an order of conviction is challenged by the convicted person, but the order of acquittal is not challenged by the2558 state, then it is only the order of conviction that falls to be considered by the appellate court, and not the order of acquittal. Therefore, the assumption that the whole case is before the High Court when it entertains an appeal against a conviction, is not well founded.[43] Where, therefore, on a trial for murder, the accused is convicted only of culpable homicide not amounting to murder under s 304 and he appealed against his conviction, but no appeal is filed by the state against his acquittal of murder, and the complainant applied in revision for enhancement of sentence, it is not open to the High Court under ss 385(2), 386 and 401 of the CrPC, to set aside the conviction and sentence under s 304, IPC and convict and sentence the accused for murder under s 302, IPC .[44] On the other hand, if the state has appealed against the acquittal on the charge of murder, but the accused has filed no appeal against his conviction under s 304, he is not entitled to challenge his conviction under s 304 in the appeal by the state against the acquittal on the charge of murder.[45] However, when the state had not filed an appeal against acquittal of accused persons under ss 302 / 149, IPC, the informant who is the son of the deceased is entitled to maintain the appeal by special leave before the Supreme Court so as to bring to the notice of the Apex Court that grave miscarriage of justice had occurred by the judgment of the High Court in altering the conviction of accused persons from one under ss 302 / 149 to s 304, Pt II read with s 149, IPC .[46]

37. Alteration of Conviction from Section 304 to Section 302, but not Vice Versa--Cases

The question whether a case comes under s 302 or falls under s 304, Pt I or Pt II has to be decided on consideration of various reasons, viz, intention of the assailant, weapon of offence used, nature of injuries caused, location of injuries on the deceased and other relevant considerations. The single blow inflicted by the assailant, by itself, is not decisive. Each case has to be judged on the facts and circumstances.[47]

In a case where the trial court convicted the accused of an offence under s 304, Pt I, the High Court must be slow in finding him guilty for a graver offence of murder, unless the facts and circumstances clinchingly establish that the case falls under any of the clauses of s 300 .[48]

Where the accused assaulted the deceased with a knife on a vital part of the body, killing him, the conviction of the accused under s 302 cannot be altered to one under s 304, Pt II on the ground that the deceased had no concern with the quarrel between the accused and the complainant.[49]

Where eight accused persons armed with fire-arms entered the house of the complainant, fired indiscriminately caused death of one person and injuries to two persons, the prayer of the accused for alteration of conviction from s 302, IPC2559 to s 304, Pt I or Pt II was refused.[50] Held, no ground to convert conviction under s 302, IPC into conviction under s 304, Pt I.

Where the deceased was taken to the house of the accused and was asked to withdraw the partition suit, and on his refusal, the accused poured kerosene and set him on fire causing his death due to burn injuries. Exception IV of s 300 was not attracted, and so the conviction of the accused could not be altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I.[51]

There was no evidence that there was sudden fight or that the accused attacked the deceased in heat of passion. The case was held not covered by Exception 4 to s 300, IPC . The conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt I, IPC was altered to one under s 302, IPC .[52]

The accused persons had gone together armed with lathis with a common intention to kill the deceased and they brought their intention into effect by simultaneously assaulting the deceased. They had no provocation. The intention to kill was apparent. Held, the case would not squarely fall under Pt II of s 304, IPC . Accused was convicted under s 302, IPC . The Supreme Court refused to alter the sentence into one under s 304, Pt II.[53]

Where the accused persons emerged from the house and beaten the deceased with deadly weapons on the head and other vital parts of the body and death was caused as a result of injuries, which also developed later which cannot be taken into account, the injuries caused to the deceased were sufficient to cause death in ordinary course, the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II was altered to ss 302 / 34, IPC .[54]

Where the accused, a lady alongwith co-accused son and son's associate attacked the deceased by throwing acid and thereafter assisted co-accused in stabbing the deceased, circumstances proved that all accused shared common intention for committing murder of the deceased, accused were found responsible for causing such bodily injuries to the deceased which were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, thereafter, the offence of murder was made out against them and conviction under s 304, Pt II was not found proper and so was altered to one under s 302 read with s 34, IPC .[55]

Pre-meditation can develop on the spot as well, it all depends upon the facts and circumstances of the case. Where the deceased was caught hold by the two accused, and another accused gave five/six dagger blows, the conviction of the accused persons cannot be altered from ss 300 / 302 / 34 to one under Pt I or Pt II of s 304, IPC .[56]2560

Where on account of dispute regarding sharing of agricultural produce the accused threw crude bomb at his brother from close range which hit his head and exploded resulting into death of his brother on the spot and also caused injures to accused and his paternal uncle, case was not found fit for conversion of conviction of accused from s 302 to s 304 Pt I, IPC .[57]

38. Alteration of conviction from Section 302 to either under Section 304, Part I or Part II

Where the accused is convicted under s 302, IPC, by the sessions court but the facts and circumstances of the case attract any of the exceptions to s 300, the conviction of the accused is liable to be altered from s 302 to s 304 by the appellate court. If the death of the victim is caused by the accused with the intention of causing death or causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death but the first three clauses of s 300 are not attracted, then conviction of the accused from s 302 is liable to be altered to s 304, Pt I. However, when the death of the victim is caused by the accused with the knowledge that it is likely to cause death but without any intention to cause death and clause fourthly of s 300 does not apply, then Pt II of s 304 is attracted and conviction of the accused by the trial court in such a case is liable to be modified to s 304, Pt II from s 302, IPC .

The accused appellant had gone to the house of the deceased (maid servant) for asking her to join duty. As the deceased (maid servant) refused to return to duty, the accused poured kerosene oil on her and set her on fire causing death. The accused had gone unarmed, it appeared that he lost self control on the provocative words uttered by the deceased. The case fell under s 304, Pt II, IPC . The conviction of the accused appellant under s 302, IPC was altered into one under s 304, Pt II, sentence of life imprisonment awarded by the court below was reduced to the period already undergone.[58]

Appellant accused A1 had inflicted single dab blow, the deceased sustained injury succumbed to injuries after seven days. His conviction under s 302, IPC was converted into one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[59]

Where in a sudden quarrel, the accused gave single knife blow to the deceased, he was convicted under s 304, Part II, IPC .[60]

Accused appellant assaulted the deceased with iron rod causing death. The accused did not intend to cause death but he can be attributed with knowledge that his act was likely to cause death of the victim. The conviction of the accused appellant under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II and accused was sentenced to ten years RI.[61]

The prosecution evidence was that the accused appellant hit the deceased and the eye-witness by a wooden bat and pushed them into bushes. It could not be stated that the accused appellant intended to cause the death of the deceased. However, knowledge could be imputed to him that his action was likely to cause the death of2561 the deceased. The conviction of the appellant under s 302, IPC was altered into one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[62]

39. Alteration of conviction from Section 302 to Section 304, Part I--Cases

Considering the fact that the occurrence took place in the night in almost dark conditions with feeble light and attack was made indiscriminately. The conviction under s 302 was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[63] The accused causing death of his mother by throttling, incident happening on mother trying to advice his son (accused) that he should not treat his wife cruelly, conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to conviction under s 304, Pt I.[64]

The accused appellants had chased the deceased, the appellants R and M caught hold of the deceased while the appellants A B and S gave knife blows to the deceased, causing death. One day prior to the date of the incident, the deceased in an inebriated state in a marriage ceremony had teased the women folk while they were participating in the marriage ceremony. Held, the cause of conflict arose from the conduct of the deceased in the marriage party which ultimately as a sequence of events resulted in fatal injuries on the person of the deceased. The role attributed to them would, attract the provisions of s 304, Pt I, IPC and not s 302 read with s 34, IPC . The appellants' conviction under s 302 / 34 IPC was altered into one under s 304, Pt I.[65]

Where there was no intention of the accused to kill the person/victim who rushed to rescue the other person and was stabbed on the vital parts only once, which in turn caused his death, the accused was found guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder and his conviction was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I, IPC .[66] Where the evidence on record disclosed that it was blunt side of axe which was used for inflicting blow on deceased, there was only one blow on head of deceased which proved to be fatal, offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder made out so, conviction of accused under s 302 altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[67] Where there was no premeditation and in the course of a sudden quarrel the accused had given only one lathi blow to the deceased which resulted in his death, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I.[68]The accused appellant armed with a large knife inflicted three blows on the head of the deceased causing death. There was no premeditation, the act was committed in a heat of passion and the appellant had not taken any undue advantage or acted in a cruel manner and there was a fight between the parties. Held, his case fell under the fourth exception to s 300, IPC and hence it was just and proper to alter the conviction from s 302, IPC to s 304, IPC .[69]2562

A scuffle had taken place on the dinghy where the accused and his companions were trying to recover the dinghy. The deceased was preventing them from doing so. In the course of this sudden fight and in the heat of passion the accused assaulted the deceased and pushed him into the sea eventually resulting in his death. The act of the accused was punishable under s 304, Pt I of the IPC instead of s 302 of the IPC . Conviction of the accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[70]

When the quarrel between the accused and the deceased parties took place while digging the foundation, the fight which started all of a sudden, there was no evidence to show that the accused attacked the deceased with deadly or dangerous arms, it was only in a fight that both accused and co-accused held the neck of the deceased with such force as to ultimately result in strangulation and death, it could not be definitely concluded as to who actually inflicted the fatal injury, the conviction of the accused under s 302 read with s 34 was set aside and instead he was convicted under s 304, Pt I.[71] Where incident occurred out of sudden and grave provocation on a petty matter and facts and circumstances clearly attract exception I to s 300, the accused is liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt I and not under s 302 . Hence the appeal was partly allowed.[72]

When the death of the deceased-wife was caused by a pistol-shot fired by her husband/accused, the possibility of the husband using the firearm in a fit of rage, owing to quarrel with the deceased could not be ruled out, the accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I and was acquitted of the charge under s 302 .[73] When the hot exchange of words took place between two groups proceeding the incident, the hot exchange of filthy language resulted in some kind of provocation and in the heat of passion without premeditation, a single stab wound was inflicted in the stomach of the deceased, it could not be ascertained that it was inflicted with intention to cause death, the only intention which could be attributed to the accused could be to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I, IPC .[74]

Where the accused/appellant and co-accused had felled the deceased, who had declined to oblige them by offering liquor which infuriated the accused/appellant, who gave a single blow on the chest of the deceased, the conviction of accused/appellant was converted from s 302 to s 304, Pt I, IPC .[75] When the accused without premeditation, at the spur of the moment inflicted a single axe blow on the head of his brother causing his death, his conviction was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I.[76] Where there was a sudden fight without premeditation, the head of the deceased which is a vital part of the body had been inflicted with injuries which were2563 likely to cause death, the accused was convicted for the offence under s 304, Pt I instead of s 302 .[77]

Where the accused inflicted single knife blow on the thigh of the deceased, the deceased died due to external hemorrhage, the accused appellant after causing injury ran away from the spot, his conviction under s 302, IPC was converted to s 304, Pt I, IPC .[78]

Where keeping in view the manner in which blows were inflicted and the parts of the body on which they were inflicted and the manner in which the weapons were used, it was difficult to conclude that the intention of the accused was to cause death or cause such injuries which were sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, but knowledge could be attributed to the accused that by causing such injuries they were likely to cause death of the deceased, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to one under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[79] Where the accused had no previous enmity with the deceased who abused the mother of the accused, and the occurrence had taken place all of a sudden, exception IV of s 300 was found attracted.

Similarly, the conviction of the accused under s 302 for giving a single knife blow at the chest of the deceased was convicted to one under s 304, Pt I.[80] When the accused killed his young sister and her paramour by inflicting multiple stab injuries with a small pen-knife, all of a sudden, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I.[81]

Against mischief to their property, the accused had first degree of right of private defence but he exceeded it by committing murder of the wrong doers as there was no fear of death or grievous hurt of the accused, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I.[82] Where the accused and the deceased were on guard duty on the day of the occurrence, the allegations against the accused were of causing death with a rifle, considering the fact that the crime was committed in the heat of passion, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I.[83] Where the accused went to the victim unarmed, picked up a pair of scissors from a nearby shop giving a blow on a vital part of the deceased, preceding a scuffle, the accused did not have intention to cause such injuries as would cause death so he was convicted under s 304, Pt I and his conviction under s 302 was set aside.[84]Where there was a sudden quarrel over the cutting of a tree, and the accused gave a single blow with a wooden reaper on the head of the deceased causing his death, the act of2564 the accused was due to heat of passion, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I.[85]

Where the accused husband alleged to have wordy altercation with deceased wife suddenly dealt knife blows on her person and thereafter stabbed himself by same knife, there was no allegation that in past also accused had shown his intention to eliminate his wife, accused was held entitled to benefit of exception 4 of s 300 in view of sudden quarrel and giving knife blows to wife in a spur of the moment, hence conviction of accused under s 302 altered to one under s 304, Pt I.[86] Where in a sudden quarrel between two brothers without premeditation, the accused held the collar of the shirt of his deceased brother and his son, and the co-accused gave knife-blows, and the accused did not act in any cruel or unusual manner and did not take undue advantage, the conviction of the accused was altered from ss 302 / 109 read with s 111, IPC to one under s 304, Pt I read with ss 109 and 111, while that of his son co-accused under s 304, Pt I, IPC .[87] Where the accused and the deceased both were drunk, quarreled and had a fight, and the accused who sustained minor injuries had a right of private defence, and presuming the accused had exceeded his right of private defence, he could at the most be convicted under s 304, Pt I; similarly, he was also entitled to get the benefit of exception IV of s 300 because the incident was without pre-meditation, in the heat of passion, on a sudden quarrel and the accused had not taken any undue advantage of the situation, therefore, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I.[88] Where the accused lost balance of his mind and gave a knife-blow to his deceased father without intending to cause his death but with the knowledge that the bodily injury inflicted by him by means of a knife was likely to cause death of his father, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I.[89]

40. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 304, Part II

If the act of the accused, by which death is caused, was done without any intention to cause death or cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, the accused can be attributed with the knowledge that his act was likely to cause death, the offence committed by the accused is not murder but culpable homicide not amounting to murder under s 302 under Pt II of s 304, IPC . If in such a case the accused is convicted by the trial court under s 302, then his conviction is liable to be altered to s 304, Pt II.[90]2565

In a sudden quarrel and in the heat of passion, the accused was in an inebriated condition.[1] Injuries inflicted upon the deceased by the accused were not on vital parts[2] or all injuries except the fatal injury were on non-vital parts of the deceased,[3] the conviction of the accused was modified from s 302 to s 304, Pt II. Where it was not established as to who against the four assailants would have inflicted the fatal injury the conviction of the accused persons was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt II.[4]Where in a marriage ceremony, three persons had fired guns, from the evidence adduced in the case it was not possible to attribute the act of killing to the appellant alone, but since the act of firing was done with the knowledge that it was likely to cause death, the appellant was convicted under s 304, Pt II instead of s 302, IPC .[5] The appellant husband assaulted his deceased wife with a wooden bar, caused severe injuries on back and chest which resulted in internal bleeding and caused death, it could not be said that the appellant had beaten his wife with intention to cause death, his conviction under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[6]When it is difficult to say as to which injury was the immediate cause of death of the deceased or accused caused single injury and deceased died after several days,[7] the accused is liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[8]

The prosecution case was that the cattle of the appellant accused had damaged the standing crops of the deceased. After exchange of hot words between the accused and the deceased over the damage caused to the crops of the complainant by the accused, the appellant accused fired one shot causing death of the deceased. The accused was not apprehended on the spot. It could not be said that the appellant accused had intention to cause the death of the deceased. Explanation 4 to s 300 was attracted. The appellant accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II, IPC, the sentence imposed was reduced to the sentence undergone, which was seven years.[9]

Appellant accused had nurtured grievance against the deceased, gave two or three stick blows on the head of the deceased. The deceased fell down, was admitted in the hospital where he was treated by several doctors and died after about forty days. Appellant accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302, IPC .[10]

41. Alteration of Conviction from Section 304, Part I to Section 304, Part II

Once the sessions court arrives at the conclusion that there was no intention on the part of the accused to cause death or bodily injury likely to cause death, there is no question of convicting the accused persons under s 304, Pt I, IPC ; when by maintaining such conviction, the High Court also appears to have failed to discharge2566 its essential duty of reappreciating evidence in the conviction appeal and of arriving at an independent finding; based on the appraisal of such evidence, the Apex Court altered the conviction of the accused from s 304, Pt I to s 304, Pt II read with s 149, IPC .[11] Where the accused persons were chasing the son of the deceased with the intention to kill, the deceased interfered and was killed instead, the accused had no intention to kill the deceased so the accused who inflicted the fatal injury with an iron angle on the head of the deceased was convicted under s 304, Pt II and his conviction by the trial court under s 304, Pt I was set aside.[12]

Where the accused persons formed an unlawful assembly and armed with lathis, spears etc, assaulted the complainant and his son resulting in the death of his son, where one accused gave a single blow with lathi on the head of the deceased and later another accused hit the deceased with a lathi, the deceased was alive for 32 hours after the incident, the knowledge of the accused and not the intention that their act was likely to cause death can be inferred, so, the conviction of the accused persons was altered from s 304, Pt I to s 304, Pt II read with s 149, IPC .[13] When the deceased started raising alarm, the accused persons possibly to make the deceased to be silent assaulted with slap, and then one of them gave blow with plough. This fact never goes to show that the accused persons had any intention to cause bodily injury for causing death rather the accused persons did assault with a view that the deceased may not raise alarm. In that event it appears that death was caused on account of hitting on the head through plough by one of the accused persons with knowledge that it is likely to cause death. Therefore, case falls under s 304, Pt II of the IPC and not under s 304, Pt I of the IPC, so the conviction was altered to one

42. Alteration of Conviction from Section 304, Part II to Section 323

There was enmity between the parties from before and the deceased was also in the drunken stage at the relevant time as well as the occurrence did not show premeditation, rather it was a sudden fight and no lethal weapon was used at the relevant time. The injury caused was said to be simple in nature and also not on the vital part of the body. There was nothing specific or definite coming forward to show that the deceased died due to said injuries and the injured was treated in the house by the village doctor and the deceased died after five days of occurrence which itself gives suspicion about the death due to said injuries. On these facts conviction of accused persons was altered from s 304, Pt II to s 323 .[15]

Where the accused got hold of the deceased and dashed his head against the wall of the house, who then sat over the chest of the deceased and gave him fist-blows, the evidence available on record did not point to any such injury which was so grievous as to constitute knowledge in the mind of the accused that by infliction of such injuries, he was likely to cause the death of the deceased; in an offence punishable under s 304, Pt II 'knowledge' is an important element which was missing, and hence, it remained simpliciter an offence of 'voluntarily causing hurt' as defined under s 321 and punishable under s 323, the conviction of the accused was therefore, altered from s 304, Pt II to s 323, IPC .[16]2567

Where the accused gave a beating to the deceased who was a frail old man of 60 years weighing only 38 kg, the High Court altered the conviction of the accused from s 302 to one under s 323, the nature of injuries which were found on the deceased went on to show that the accused could not be punished barely for the offence under s 323 as the ribs of the deceased were broken which led to the death of the deceased, holding that the law will presume that the accused intended the consequences of his act and the case would squarely fall within the ambit of s 304, Pt II and the accused must be attributed with requisite knowledge, the Apex Court converted the conviction of the accused from s 323 to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[17]

Where the intention of the accused was merely to beat the deceased on their hands and legs, and it was not clear that they knew that the injuries which they caused were sufficient or likely to cause death, it was held that they could not be convicted for the offence under s 304, though they could be held liable under s 323, IPC .[18]

Commentary under the same heading in s 323, post, may be referred to.

Where the accused going to house of deceased, catching hold of deceased, hitting him on cheek and neck, on sight that neighbours have come, accused stating that he would not leave the deceased alive and kicking him on private parts, deceased dying due to neurogenic shock resulting from injury to private parts, injury opined by doctor to be sufficient to cause immediate death, statement of accused followed by kick shows that he had knowledge that it was likely to cause death, on these facts it was held that conviction of a accused could only be for murder, trial court convicting him under s 304 Pt II, High Court in appeal should not have interfered with the conviction and altered it to s 323, IPC . Hence, Supreme Court altered the conviction of accused from s 323 to s 304 .[19]

Where the accused a police constable alleged to have beaten the deceased old man weighing only 38 kilogram, as a result of which the ribs of the trailed old man were broken leading to his death, the trial court convicted the accused under s 302, IPC, The High Court altered the conviction of the accused from s 302 to s 323 but on appeal against the order of the High Court filed by the state, the Apex Court held that the law will presume that the accused intended the consequences of his act, therefore, his case would sparely fall within the ambit of s 304, Pt II or he must be attributed the requisite guilty knowledge. The

Apex Court accordingly converted the conviction of the accused from s 323 to one under s 304, Pt II, IPC .[20]

44. Alteration of Conviction from Section 304, Part II to Section 324

It need not be stated that to bring a case within the purview of s 304, Pt II, IPC, it is required that the act is done with the knowledge that it is likely to cause death but without any intention to cause death.[21] Where the accused assaulted the victim with a knife and the victim succumbed to the injuries on his way to the hospital, the sessions court convicted the accused under s 304, Pt II, the High Court held that s 304, Pt II is2568 not attracted, it is no doubt true that the victim does not fall in any of the eight categories of 'grievous hurt' as defined by s 320 and as such the case cannot fall either under ss 325 or 326, IPC, considering the fact that the accused did not intend or had any knowledge to cause an injury on a particular part of the body and the injury was a solitary and single lacerated wound on the right elbow joint, the High Court opined that the case squarely fell within s 324, IPC which punishes for voluntary causing hurt by a dangerous weapon, the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II was altered to one under s 324 .[22] Where accused was having cart-peg with him not with a deliberate premeditated determination to kill deceased, incident occurred during altercation between them when both were going to sarpanch to settle a dispute between them, since there was absence of knowledge to cause death; and suspicion existed about place of incident, accused was liable to be convicted under s 324 and not under s 304, Pt II.[23]

Where the deceased was hit by the accused only once by a hard weapon reaper used for wall leveling and was as a weapon very dangerous, two injuries were found on the body of the deceased, and the second injury was caused due to a fall which proved fatal, on these facts it cannot be said that the accused had the intention to kill or knowledge that death was likely to result, however, since the weapon used for causing injury on neck of the victim was dangerous, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 304, Pt II to s 324 .[24] Where the possibility of the deceased receiving fatal injuries on the chest after lodging of FIR could not be ruled out, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 304, Pt II to s 324 .[25] However, where in a sudden quarrel the co-accused caused a simple injury with an axe and the main accused caused a stab injury on a vital part of the body of the deceased, each of the accused was found to have acted individually and not in concert so s 34 was not attracted, the co-accused was convicted under s 324 and the main accused under s 304, Pt II.[26]

45. Alteration of Conviction from Section 304, Part II to Section 325

If amongst the six named accused persons, the blow by some person has struck on the head of the deceased, which has clotted a very fine vein or artery of his brain, it could not be inferred that common object of all the accused persons was to commit an offence of culpable homicide punishable under s 304, IPC . All that could be inferred from the circumstances was that the accused knew that at least grievous hurt would result to the deceased as a result of such altercation. In such circumstances, the accused could appropriately be convicted under s 325 read with s 149, IPC instead of ss 304 / 149, IPC .[27] Where the accused, after a brief quarrel, dragged the deceased towards his house, and then pushed him and in the process the head of the deceased hit the door-frame, as a result of which he died, the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II was altered to one under s 325, IPC and sentence was reduced from 5 years rigorous imprisonment to 2 years rigorous imprisonment.[28] Where the quarrel took place between the accused and the deceased, and the accused pushed the deceased2569 down the steps of the staircase at which the deceased fell on the stepping stone and sustained injuries, and the second accused kicked the deceased with the result that he died, there was no evidence that the accused pushed the deceased deliberately on the stepping stone, the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II was altered to s 325, IPC .[29]

Where four persons attacked the deceased, and caused six injuries out of which five were simple and only the sixth was grievous which resulted in the death of the deceased, and it was not known who caused the grievous injury, it was held that the grievous injury could have been caused by only one of the assailants and only he could be taken to have knowledge that the injury was likely to cause death, and as he was not known, none of the assailants could be convicted of the offence under s 304, Pt II read with s 34, though they could all be convicted under ss 325-34 .[30]

Where there was no evidence to show that the accused had given the fatal blow or any blow which was likely to cause the death of the deceased, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 304, Pt I to s 325 .[31] Where the accused constable gave fist blows to the deceased resulting into pain in his abdomen and flanks, no definite and conclusive opinion given by the doctors that it were abdominal injuries which caused death of deceased, said injuries were also not mentioned to be sufficient to cause death in ordinary course of nature, there was no allegation that any weapon was used as such by anyone in causing injuries to deceased, the conviction of accused was altered from s 304, Pt II to s 325, IPC .[32]

Where the accused assaulted the deceased an account of previous enmity, there was no statement by the doctor that injuries found on the person of the deceased were sufficient in the ordinary cause of nature to cause death of the deceased, there was no finding of the sessions court that the accused had knowledge that he was likely to cause such bodily injury as was likely to cause the death, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 304, Pt II to one under s 325, IPC .[33]

Where the deceased died 28 days after the incident, the size of the injury in the MLC and in the post mortem report did not reconcile, depth of injury was not given by the doctor who examined the patient, all these factors clearly showed that the death could not have been the direct result of the said injury, in that view of the matter it could not be stated that the accused had the intention or could be attributed only to the cause of the death of the deceased, at the best, therefore, the accused persons could only be held guilty of the offence punishable under ss 325 / 34, IPC, therefore the conviction of the accused persons was altered from s 304, Pt II and s 324 to ss 325 / 34 and ss 324 / 34, IPC .[34] Where the accused and the deceased exchanged kicks and fist-blows, with the kicks in the stomach of the victim proving fatal, and the incident having occurred on the spur of the moment, there was no intention to cause death or to cause such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 304, Pt II to under s 325 .[35]2570

The line between culpable homicide not amounting to murder and grievous hurt is a very thin line. In the former, injuries must be such as are likely to cause death, in the latter, the injuries must be such as to endanger life. An injury can be said to endanger life if it is in itself such that it may put the life of the injured in danger. Where there is no intention to cause death or no knowledge that death is likely to be caused from the harm inflicted, and death is caused, the accused would be guilty of grievous hurt if the injury was of a serious nature, but not of culpable homicide.[36] Where the accused had given prasad to the accused and others openly, and no motive to kill the deceased was established by the prosecution, the accused was held liable under s 304, Pt II for causing death of the deceased and also under s 326 for causing grievous hurt to five other persons.[37] Where accused caused only injury to deceased by knife, death of deceased was due to meningitis, which was asserted, was result of air entry and consequent entry of bacteria into skull cavity, doctors were emphatic that there was no specific injury on skull though there is evidence to show that maxilla was cut, specific expert evidence show that injury was not fatal, it was not shown that death was direct and proximate effect of injury, the conviction of accused was altered from s 304 to s 326, IPC .[38]

Where the accused persons formed an unlawful assembly and struck a single blow on the head of the deceased by means of a deadly weapon causing grievous injury, the doctor's evidence did not state that the said injury was sufficient in the ordinary course to cause death, the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II was altered to one under s 326 read with s 149, IPC .[39]Where the act of the accused was one of causing grievous hurt with a deadly weapon which is punishable under s 326, IPC, noticing the fact that the incident in question has occurred as far back as 1978 and the appellant had no enmity against the deceased nor any motive to cause a fatal injury, Supreme Court thought that the ends of justice would be met if the accused's conviction is altered from s 304, Pt I to one under s 326, IPC .[40]

Where the accused hit the deceased on head, which is a vital part of the body with such force with danda, the deceased fell unconscious and later succumbed to his injuries, the conviction of the accused under s 302 was altered to s 304, Pt II; the other four accused were similarly convicted with him with the aid of s 149 and were held guilty only for offence under s 326 .[41] Where accused caught hold of deceased while co-accused inflicted knife-blow on him, accused was convicted under s 326 read with s 34 while the conviction of co-accused was altered from s 302 to s 304, Pt I, IPC .[42] Where two external injuries with corresponding injuries 1 to 5 were necessarily found and the injuries could have been caused due to a beating with the weapon, an iron pipe, these injuries could not have been caused only by one beating and even according to the prosecution these injuries were caused by different persons and it was not known that of the two injuries which injury was responsible for the death and there was no evidence on the prosecution side as to who caused the particular injuries on the head, hence, the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II2571 was found not sustainable and he was held liable to be convicted for the offence under s 326, IPC .[43]

Where the intention to cause death was not proved, and one accused caused injury to the deceased victim with the knowledge that it was likely to cause death and was held liable to be convicted under s 304, Pt II and not under s 302 ; the other two accused who caused injury but not on the vital parts of the body of the deceased, their conviction under ss 326 / 34 was maintained.[44]

The appellant and the accused no. 1 had entered the house of the deceased, accused no. 1 poured a watery substance over her from the pot carried by him on the deceased leading to her death. The deceased had refused sexual favour to them. However, no overt act was attributed to the appellant. Held, in absence of any active role played by the appellant or overt act being done by the appellant, it cannot be said with certainty that the appellant had accompanied the accused no. 1 to the house of the deceased with a common intention to murder the deceased. In view thereof, the conviction of the appellant under s 302 read with s 34, IPC was not sustained. The appellant was convicted under s 326, IPC and s 304, Pt II, IPC . As the death ensued after twenty six days of the incident as a result of septicemia and not as a consequence of burn injuries, the sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[45]

47. Alteration of Conviction from Section 326 to Section 304, Part II

When the co-accused has been convicted under s 326, IPC, his conviction under the same was untenable because he did not inflict any injury on the deceased. He also could not be convicted with the aid of s 34, because main accused had not been convicted under s 326, IPC . His role was that he took out a knife but witness caught hold of him, in fact he did not inflict any injury. Both accused persons were charged under ss 302 / 34, IPC . When the only distinguishing feature in the role of main accused and co-accused was that main accused, infact inflicted the injury whereas co-accused was prevented from inflicting the injury. The conviction of co-accused was, therefore, converted from s 326, IPC to s 304, Pt II, IPC, since he did not inflict any injury on the deceased.[46]

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section is such a provision which discloses that criminality may be there even if there is no mens rea. Inspite of the fact that there may be no motive or intention, a person may venture to practice such rashness or negligence which may cause the death of another. The death caused is, therefore, not the determining factor.[48]It is well settled that the very foundation to constitute an offence there must be an act or omission on the part of the petitioner as defined under s 36 of the Act, but for the purpose of s 304A, IPC, there must be rash and negligent act on the part of the accused which has led to the death of the deceased.[49] The section applies only to acts which are not criminal in themselves, but are punishable by reason of death having been caused[50]by what is described as 'rash' or negligent' act.[51] The section, thus, applies where there is neither intention to cause death nor knowledge that the act done will, in all probability, cause death.[52]The section speaks of death being caused by 'any rash or negligent act'.[53] It has no application to a case where death is caused by an act which is, in its nature criminal,[54]i.e., where there is an intention to cause death or knowledge that the act done will, in all probability, cause death.[55] When intent or knowledge is the direct motivating force of the act complained of, s 304A, IPC, has to make room for the graver and more serious charge of culpable homicide. Section 304A comes out as a specific offence where death is caused by a rash or negligent act and the act does not amount to culpable homicide under s 299, IPC or murder under s 300 . If a person willfully drives a motor vehicle into the midst of a crowd which amounts to negligent driving; the act, then, will amount to culpable homicide punishable under s 304 .[56] Acts, which are offences in themselves, must be judged with regard to the knowledge, or means of knowledge, of the offender and placed in their appropriate place in the class of offences of the same character.[57]In view of the above, in order to constitute an offence under s 304A, there must be positive proof that the rash or negligent act of the accused was the proximate cause,2574 which resulted in the death of the accused,[58] without intervention of another's negligence.[59] The mere fact that the accused contravened certain rules or regulations in the doing of an act which caused the death of another, does not establish that death was the result of rash or negligent act or that any such act was the proximate and efficient cause of the death.[60]

Where the accused driver of the bus even though was driving the vehicle at a slow speed, but hit a scooterist from behind causing death was held guilty under ss 279, 304A, IPC .[61]

For an offence punishable under s 304A, the point to be established is that the act of the accused was responsible for resulting in the death, and such act of the accused was rash and negligent, although it did not amount to culpable homicide.[62]

2. Law of Singapore

Whoever causes the death of any person, by doing any rash or negligent act not amounting to culpable homicide, will be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with a fine, or with both.[63]

As to the meaning of 'cause', the test for causation under this offence is that the death must have been the direct result of the rash or negligent act of the accused and that act must have been the proximate and efficient cause without the intervention of another's negligence. The chain of causation is not necessarily broken whenever another party's negligence intervenes. Instead, criminal liability attaches to the person whose negligence or rashness contributed substantially and not merely peripherally to the result.[64]

In Mohamad Iskandar Bin Basri v Public Prosecutor ,[65] it was observed, 'The appellant wrongly assumed that all other vehicles at the junction had noticed the Red Rhino and would give way to him. It is true that he was being paid to do the public duty and was not doing voluntary firefighting but one would have to be extremely cynical if one were to compare him to a salesman rushing to meet a prospective client. This does not mean that emergencies justify rashness. They do not. This case is a good reminder for all drivers of emergency services vehicles that a duty of care is still owed to other road users whatever the emergency may be.'

3. Ingredients of the Offence

The following ingredients are required to be established to prove an offence under s 304A, IPC :2575

(i) death of the person in question;
(ii) accused to cause such death; and
(iii) such act of the accused was rash or negligent, although it did not amount to culpable homicide.[66]

Section 304A excludes all the ingredients of s 299 or s 300 .[67]

4. Sections 279 and 304A --Distinction

Commentary under the same heading in s 279, ante, Vol. 2, may be referred to.

To establish either of the ss 279 or 304A, rash and negligent act has to be established, but the only distinction is that in s 279 rash and negligent act related to the manner of driving or riding on a public way, while the offence under s 304A extends to any rash and negligent act falling short of culpable homicide.[68] This section being distinct from s 279, an accused, if found guilty of rash or negligent act under s 304A as well as 'negligent driving', can be convicted for both the offences.[69]

5. Sections 287 and 304A --Distinction

Commentary under the same heading in s 287, ante, Vol. 2, may be referred to.

6. Sections 304 and 304A --Distinction

Commentary under the same heading in s 304, ante, may be referred to.

7. Section 304A Distinguished from Sections 3 / 112, 89 and 126 of the Motor Vehicles Act 1939 (Now Sections 177, 134 and 18, Motor Vehicles Act 1988)

The offence under this section is quite distinct from that under ss 3 / 112, 89, and 126 of the Motor Vehicles Act 1939, and an acquittal on a charge under those sections is, therefore, no bar to a subsequent trial of the accused on a charge under this section.[70]

8. Section 304A Distinguished from Section 101 of the Railways Act 1890 (Now Section 175 of the Railways Act 1989)

The offence under this section is distinct from the one punishable under s 101 of the Indian Railways Act 1890, (now s 175 of the Railways Act 1989) and, therefore, a person can be punished under both the said provisions.[71]

9. Sections 301 and 304A

Commentary under the same heading in s 301, ante, may be referred to.2576

10. Duty of Court

The courts are expected to appreciate evidence in an unbiased manner to find out whether there was rash and negligent driving or otherwise on the part of the accused-drivers, especially when two vehicles are involved and the accident is head-on-collision, the courts have to scrutinize the evidence carefully.[72]

11. Causa Causans and Causa Sine Qua Non

Causa Causans is nothing but the immediate cause or in other words the last link in the chain of causation. Causa sine qua non is a cause without which the effect in question would not have happened or in other words a necessary or invariable cause.[73]The act causing the death must be the causa causans, it is not enough that it may have been the causa sine qua non.[74]

12. 'Whoever Causes the Death'[75]

> To impose criminal liability under s 304A, Indian Penal Code, it is necessary that the death should have been the directly result of a rash and negligent act of the accused and that act must be the proximate and efficient cause without the intention of another's negligence. It must be the causa sine qua non.

The test applied in this case was whether the act was caused without the intervention of another's negligence, though contributory negligence on the part of the person killed is no defence, by itself, to a charge under this section. This case has been followed generally by the High Courts in India,[77] and applied by the Supreme Court in Kurban Hussein Mohamedalli Rangawalla v State of Maharashtra .[78]

13. No Vicarious Liability

Where the accused, a layman, was putting up a building, employing masons and it was not the case of the prosecution that the accused himself constructed the building, undisputedly the masons constructed the building negligently by not mixing the lime mortar in proper proportions leading to the collapse of building resulting in the death of 35 school children, the accused was held not liable for the negligence of persons who actually constructed the building which negligence was causa causans for the collapse of the building.[79]The death must be a direct result of the rash or negligent act of the accused and the act must be an efficient cause without the intention of2577 another's negligence, and it must be the causa causans, and it is not enough that it may have been the causa sine qua non.[80] Even though, the accused is a co-owner of land where the live wire was spread and victim died, who was a member of a joint family but in a case under s 304A, IPC, vicarious liability does not arise.[81]

14. 'Of any Person'

The term 'person', as used in this section, would include an unborn child in the mother's womb after seven months' pregnancy if the post-mortem report shows that the child had developed sufficiently to have an identity of its own as a child.[82]

15. Essential Components of Negligence

Negligence becomes actionable on account of injury resulting from the act or omission amounting to negligence attributable to the person sued. The essential components of negligence are three: 'duty', 'breach' and 'resulting damage'.[83]

16. 'By doing any rash or Negligent Act'

The death of the deceased must have been caused by the accused 'by doing any rash or negligent act', and not otherwise.[84] The expression 'rash or negligent act', as used in this section, means an act which is the immediate cause of death, and not an act or omission which can, at best, be said to be a remote cause of death.[85] It must be shown that the accident was the direct result of the negligence or rashness of the accused.[86]However, it is very dangerous to attempt to distinguish between the approximate and ultimate cause of death due to a rash or negligent act.[87] Similarly, whenever human life can reasonably be said to be endangered by a rash or negligent act, and the risk of death is not too remote a consequence of it, and death is actually caused by such an act, an offence under this section is committed.[88]

Whether the accused, in a particular case, acted rashly or negligently will depend upon the facts of that particular case. The mere fact that an accident has taken place, or that some lives have been lost, or that some persons have received injuries, will not lead to any presumption of a rash or negligent act on the part of the accused,[89] nor is there any presumption in law that a person, who possesses only a learner's license or possesses no license at all, does not know driving.[90] In Baldevji Bhathiji Thakore v State of

Gujarat ,[91] the accused had run over the deceased while the latter2578 was trying to cross the road. The accused did not make any attempt to save the deceased by swerving to the other side when there was sufficient space. The Supreme Court did not find any reason to interfere with the conviction of the accused under this section. If, however, the accident is due to any weak point in the hitch assembly of the trailer, no negligence can be attributed to the accused.[92] In a case against a motor driver of causing death by rash or negligent driving, the court should not take into account the speed which the accused developed after the accident, the court should judge the speed at which he was driving the truck prior to the accident. It is common human failing, however reprehensible it may be, for a man to attempt to run away if he has committed an accident.[93]

The petitioner accused was found guilty of driving auto rickshaw rashly and negligently. The petitioner had dashed the said vehicle against the deceased and as a result, the deceased, sustained grievous injury and was admitted to the hospital. During treatment the deceased died after 38 days of the accident. The injury sustained by the deceased in the accident caused by the accused was the direct and proximate cause, which led to the death of the deceased. The accused was convicted for offences under ss 279 and 304A .[94]

Evidence of witnesses established that the accused appellant driving a jeep loaded with passengers, dashed with roadside trees, collapsed by the side of the road, and as result 12/13 passengers on board sustained injuries, one injured died later in the hospital. Vehicle was seized from the spot in damaged condition. The Motor Vehicle Inspector reported that the vehicle was having no mechanical defect at the time of the accident. Accused appellant had suffered injuries in the accident. The appellant driver was convicted under ss 279, 338 and 304A, IPC .[95]

For bringing in application of either s 279 or 304A it must be established that there was an element of rashness or negligence. Appellant accused was a driver in Himanchal Pradesh Transport Corporation. On the day of the incident while he was driving the vehicle, the bus had stopped at a bus stop. One passenger after alighting from the bus went to its roof top for the purpose of unloading his luggage. The accused without waiting for a signal from the conductor and without verifying if all the passengers who were to board, had boarded and who were to alight had alighted, all of a sudden started the bus as a result of which the said passenger fell down and sustained injuries. He was carried to the hospital where he succumbed. Even if the prosecution version is accepted in toto, there was no evidence led to show that any negligence was involved. The conviction of the accused appellant under ss 279 and 304A, IPC was set aside.[96]

Where the accused driving vehicle overtakes the another vehicle in fast speed having total disregard to the passengers who might have been crossing the road after alighting from the vehicle, he is guilty of rash and negligent driving. Accused appellant was convicted under s 304A .[97]2579

Where the appellant driver of police jeep under the influence of alcohol was driving jeep at high speed, caused the death of five persons and injured seven, went 93 feet ahead of the incident, could be stopped by the Police Officer who was travelling in vehicle, held it was a case of culpable negligence, he was convicted under ss 304A, 337, 338 and 279, IPC .[1]

17. Relative Scope of Rashness and Negligence

Rashness is a very high degree of negligence. Culpable rashness implies the consciousness that the intended consequences would surely ensue;[2]it conveys the idea of recklessness of doing of an act without due consideration.[3] On the other hand, 'negligence' means a breach of duty caused by omission to do something, which a reasonable man, guided by those considerations, which ordinarily regulate conduct of human affairs, would do, or the doing of something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do;[4] it, in ordinary parlance, connotes want of proper care.[5] Negligence must be of a high degree, and not of the type which gives rise to a claim for compensation. In other words, simple lack of care may give rise to a civil liability, but without a degree of culpability, amounting to gross negligence, there is no criminal liability.[6]

18. 'Act' Includes Omission[7]

An 'act' generally means something voluntarily done by a person, but in the IPC the term 'act' is not confined to its ordinary meaning of possible conduct of doing something, but includes also an illegal omission. The effect of ss 32 and 33, IPC, taken together is that the term 'act' comprises one or more 'acts' or one or more illegal omissions. The IPC makes punishable omissions which have caused, which have been intended to cause or which have been known to be likely to cause certain evil effects in the same manner as it punishes acts, provided they were illegal and when the law imposes on a person a duty to act, his illegal omission to act renders 'him' liable to punishment.[8] This section, i.e., s 304A, uses the word 'act' only, and not an omission. However, under s 32 of IPC, 'In every part of this Code, except where a contrary intention appears from the context, words, which refer to acts done, extend also to illegal omissions'. In this manner, the word 'act', in this section, will include an omission. An omission is the negation of an act.[9] An omission on the part of an overman of a mine to make periodical inspection, as required by the Mines Act 1952, is a negligent act and if death is caused by such act, he may be prosecuted under this section.[10] Where the accused sent boxes, containing fireworks, declaring2580 them to be iron locks, and in loading, one of the boxes exploded and killed a coolie, it was held that the omission on the part of the accused to declare the goods to be fireworks was an illegal omission, which came within the meaning of the word 'act' in this section, and, therefore, the accused was liable.[11]

19. 'Act' may be 'Rash or Negligent', and Not Both

The section requires the causing of death by doing a 'rash or negligent act', and not a 'rash and negligent act'.[12] It has been held that one is exclusive of the other, the same can not be rash as well as negligent.[13] However, in another case, the same act is found to be rash as well as negligent.[14]An act, which is only negligent in its initial stages, may, if negligence exceeds a certain limit (depending upon the circumstances), also become rash.[15]

20. Culpable Rashness and Culpable Negligence defined and Distinguished

Holloway J, in the leading case of Nidamarti Nagabhushanam,[16] defined and distinguished culpable rashness and culpable negligence as follows:

> Culpable rashness may follow, but with the hope that they will not and often with the belief that the actor has taken sufficient precautions to prevent their happening. The imputability arises from acting despite the consciousness (luxuria). Culpable negligence is acting without the consciousness that the illegal and mischievous effect will follow, but in circumstances which show that the actor has not exercised the caution, incumbent upon him, and that if he had, he would have had the consciousness. The imputability arises from the neglect of the civic duty circumspection. It is manifest that personal injury, consciously and intentionally caused, cannot fall within either of these categories which are wholly inapplicable to the case of an act or series of acts, themselves intended, which are the direct producers of death.

Following this, in the well-known case of Empress of India v Idu Beg ,[17] Straight J, observed:

> Criminal rashness is hazarding a dangerous or wanton act with the knowledge that it is so and that it may cause injury, but without intention to cause injury or without knowledge that it will probably be caused. The criminality lies in running the risk of doing such an act with recklessness or indifference as to the consequences. Criminal negligence is the gross and culpable neglect or failure to exercise that reasonable and proper care and precaution to guard against injury either to the public generally, or to an individual in particular, which, having regard to all the circumstances, out of which the charge has arisen, it was the imperative duty of the accused person to have adopted.

The above interpretations of culpable rashness and culpable negligence have been followed in many subsequent cases.[18] In State v Bhalchandra Woman Pethe ,[19] the Bombay High Court observed:

> There is a distinction between rashness and negligence. When one does an act with utter indifference to the consequences, of which the doer may be conscious and which, he knows, may not take place, one is said to be rash while criminal negligence is neglect to take that precaution which a reasonable and prudent person is expected to take under the circumstances obtaining in a given case. In order to infer whether or not there is criminal rashness or negligence on the part of the accused, all relevant facts must be considered.[20]

However, this is only a paraphrase of what has been observed in Empress of India v Idu Beg ,[21] although that case has not been referred to.

Distinction between rashness and negligence is that negligence connotes want of proper care, while rashness conveys the idea of rashness, the doing of an act without consideration of any consequences.[22]

Negligence is the failure to take reasonable care and the degree of the reasonable care is not to be measured by any abstract standard. Negligence does not mean absolute carelessness or indifference, but want of such degree of care as is required in particular circumstances.[23] When the car is in motion, the driver is expected to keep his eye towards the front side, and not on the back side. It is only if the car is being taken on the reverse side that the driver's attention must be towards the back side.[24]

21. Dashing against a Stationary Vehicle

Commentary under the same heading in s 279, Vol. 2, ante, may be referred to.

Where the deceased who was untying rope of a stationary lorry and tractor died in the accident and the accused driver had no knowledge that the deceased was working in front of lorry, therefore dashing against lorry may amount to rash and negligent driving, but death of the deceased cannot be attributed to rash and negligent driving, so, the accused can be convicted under s 279 and not under s 304A .[25]2582

22. Dashing Against Tree

There was reliable evidence of eye-witnesses that the accused was driving bus in rash and negligent manner. As a result, the bus dashed against the tree on the right side of the road. No mechanical defect or defect in the offending bus was found/detected. Conviction of the accused appellant under s 304A, IPC was held justified.[26]

23. Trailer detached from tractor causing death and injury

The testimony of the witnesses showed that the accident took place when the driver accused was driving the tractor overloaded with goods and passengers at high speed resulting in detachment of trailer. Accused was convicted under s 304A and ss 337 and 338, IPC .[27]

24. Passenger Jumping out of bus in Motion

Commentary under same heading in s 279, ante, Vol. 2, may be referred to.

25. Driver Taking Turn should be more Cautious

What matters is not the speed of the bus at 90 kms per hour. What is important is to prove that the speed of the bus was rather high. It has to be noticed that the bus was taking a turn to enter the terminal and it was all the more essential for the driver to be more cautious than on a straight road.[28]

26. Principle of Res Ipsa Loquitur--If Applicable

In a criminal trial, as opposed to civil proceedings, where preponderance of probabilities is sufficient, the burden of establishing the charge against the accused rests on the prosecution and the standard of proving the same is always beyond all reasonable doubt. Criminality is never to be presumed, subject to statutory exceptions, and criminal negligence or rashness should not be presumed in such a case merely on the application of the maxim res ipsa loquitur.[29]Res ipsa loquitur (thing speaks for itself) is a principle which, in reality, belongs to the law of torts.[30] It is thus clear that the principle of res ipsa loquitur has limited application in the domain of criminal law. Useful reference can also be made to the decision of the Apex Court in the case of Jacob Mathew v State of Punjab .[31] While reiterating the fact that the principle of res ipsa loquitur is only a rule of evidence and operates in the domain of civil law, the Apex Court has held that it has limited application in trial on charges of criminal negligence. The Apex Court has also held that a case initiated for an offence under s 304A cannot be decided solely on the basis of this rule.[32]

Where the prosecution witnesses deposed that the appellant accused was driving truck at a very high speed, even one PW deposed that the accused was driving truck2583 like an aeroplane, more than fifty persons were occupants in the truck, appellant accused was convicted under s 304A, IPC .[33]
Eye-witnesses deposed that the accident was due to rash and negligent driving of the truck, the truck dashed against the scooter causing the death of two brothers. The conviction of the accused under ss 279 and 304A, IPC was held proper.[34] The accused driver driving tanker in rash and negligent manner dashed against the car of the complainant, caused the death of the wife of the complainant. The manner in which the accident took place showed that the accident was due to negligence of the driver. Conviction of the accused for offence under s 304A, IPC was held proper.[35]

Where the matador being driven by the accused came at high speed and hit the deceased, and went off the road breaking down the fencing of the roadside plantation and got stuck in the ditch. In the absence of any explanation from the accused as to how it all happened, the maxim res ipsa loquitur (the facts speak for themselves) is liable to be invoked and it can safely be concluded that the incident took place as a result of rash and negligent driving of the vehicle.[36] When in addition to the deposition of witness, the material relating to the rule of res ipsa loquitur is available in the case, the rule should apply.[37] Extending illegal connection over a length of 2200 feet through standing trees is per se culpable negligence on the part of the doer, making him liable under s 304A where any person dies of shock from such live energised wire.[38] Even if there is no oral evidence of rash and negligent driving of the bus by the accused, but the fact that the accused was driving the bus on the wrong side of the road at a high speed proves rash and negligent driving by the accused. Accused appellant was convicted under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[39]

Where the accused driver of the bus in the process of overtaking the bullock cart dashed against the motorcycle coming from the opposite side, the pillion rider of the motorcycle injured in the accident was the best witness about the incident. The accused driver of the bus dragged the motorcycle for about 20 feet and stopped the vehicle on the footpath on the western side of the road. Held, the accused driver of the bus was guilty of rash and negligent driving of the bus. He was convicted under ss 279, 338 and 304A, IPC .[40]

Where the accused driving a bus at a fast speed struck against the deceased at green signal held it was sufficient proof that the accused was driving the bus rashly and negligently.[41]

27. Dragging Marks/skid Marks on Road--Absence of Absence of dragging marks/skid marks on the road are not always or invariably necessary to prove rashness/negligence of the driver of the offending vehicle.[42]2584

28. Poor Maintenance of Vehicle

The accused appellant by rash and negligent driving of scooter had caused serious injuries to a four years old boy. The appellant had taken plea that the accident had occurred as tyre of the scooter had bursted.

Poor maintenance of the vehicle is itself a negligent act as it speaks of 'absence of care' so far as the vehicle is concerned. Accused appellant was convicted under s 279 / 304A .[43]

29. Mechanical Defect in Vehicle

Where the evidence established that the accident by a Road Transport Corporation bus occurred due to mechanical defect in the bus, the accused driver of the bus was acquitted of the charges under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[44]

30. Direct Nexus between Victim's Death and Rash or Negligent Act of the Accused

There can be no general presumption that a person should have driven a motor vehicle in a rash and negligent manner, merely because there was an accident.[45] The requirement of s 304A, IPC is that the death of any person must have been caused by doing any rash or negligent act. In other words, there must be a proof that the rash and negligent act of the accused was the proximate cause of death. There must be a direct nexus between the death of the persons and the rash or negligent act of the accused.[46]The act causing the death must be the causa causans, it is not enough that it may have been the causa sine qua non,[47] the death must be the direct result of rash and negligent act of the accused and that act must be the proximate and affluent cause without the intervention of another's negligence, and it must be the causa causans; it is enough that it may have been the causa sine qua non.[48] Where the cause of the deceased's fall from the running bus was not proved, the accused was acquitted under ss 279 / 304A, IPC .[49] The requirement is that the death of any person must have been caused by the accused by any rash or negligent act. In other words, there must be proof that the rash or negligent act of the accused was the proximate cause of death. There must be a direct nexus between the death of the person and the rash and negligent act of the accused.[50]Where electrocution of boy coming in contact with extra high tension line happened and the accused were employees of KPTCL, the high tension wire transmission lines were drawn much before they entered into service and much prior to the construction of building in question and a disclaimer had also been issued by KPTCL, but the local municipal authority was at fault for issuing licence for construction of said building, and there was no direct nexus between death of boy and alleged act of negligence of the accused, the accused cannot be held negligent and proceedings under s 304A were quashed.[51]2585

31. Degree of Rashness or Negligence Required

Merely because the witnesses did not use the words rashness or negligent in his testimony and instead used the words high speed, cannot be taken that the accused was not driving the vehicle in a rash or negligent manner, what is important is to find out if the driver of the offending vehicle was driving in public place rashly and in negligent manner so as to endanger human life or to be likely to cause hurt or death to any other person.[52]

The question of speed, in each case under s 304A, IPC, has to be decided and considered after considering various facts and circumstances of the case. For instance, in a crowded and busy road in a town or city, even if the speed of the vehicle may not be much, still he has to drive it cautiously and carefully at slow speed to arrest any accident. If, in such a case, an accident is caused on account of rash or negligent driving of the driver, he cannot be permitted to take the only plea that he was driving the vehicle slowly and, therefore, he is not liable. Similarly, speed, though a very material and important factor, would always depend on the facts of each case.[53] For an offence under this section, the degree of rashness or negligence must be higher than what is necessary to establish civil liability.[54] The degree of rashness and negligence on the part of the accused, required to be proved in criminal cases, should be of such a nature that an inference about the commission of a crime may safely be made against him.

Simple lack of care, which may give rise to a civil liability will not be enough for the purpose of establishing the offence under this section.[55] The rashness or negligence to be established must be more than error of judgment.[56] Though the gravamen of the offence consists in the conduct of the accused being rash or negligent, yet the degree of rashness or negligence will have to be proved which will make it safe for the court to infer that the conduct of the accused which is complained of, is a crime.[57] In Public Prosecutor v Pitchaiah Moopanar ,[58] the accused, who was the manager of a school, got a building constructed by masons. As excessive sand was put in the mortar, the building collapsed killing 35 girl students. The accused, being not responsible for the negligence of the masons, was not held guilty under this section.

32. Accidents on account of Mechanical defect in the Vehicle

If the accident is due to any weak point in the hitch assembly of the trailer, no negligence can be attributed to the accused.[59] When there is an accident owing to2586 failure of foot-brake, the driver cannot be held guilty for rash and negligent driving.[60] Similarly, when on account of sudden burst of tyre of the motor vehicle, the driver is unable to control the vehicle or to avoid an accident, he cannot be held guilty for rash and negligent driving.

Where the evidence led by the prosecution as well as by the defence clearly shows that the accident had taken place because of a mechanical defect mainly and that the steering of the bus had got locked, at the time when it met with the accident with the motorcyclist, the accused is entitled to be acquitted.[61] Where the steering wheel of offending vehicle was broken all of a sudden which resulted into an accident causing death of a person, the mechanic stated that it was not possible to control tractor with such steering wheel, so, it can be said that incident was merely an accident and the accused cannot be held guilty of rash and negligent driving.[62]

33. Relationship between speed, Rashness and Negligence

Where there is no speed limits, prescribed by law, the vehicle should be driven only at a reasonable speed,[63] and particularly the act of entering the cross-roads at a speed at which it is not possible for the driver to control the vehicle, would lead to an inference of rash and negligent driving.[64] Where the accused, who was driving a lorry at high speed in order to keep pace with a train running parallel to the road, suddenly swerved to the right, to avoid collision with an approaching bullock-cart, and overturned the lorry, with the result that two persons were killed, it was held that the accident was due to negligent conduct of the accused in concentrating his attention on the train, and not keeping a sharp look on the traffic on the road, and, therefore, he was guilty under this section.[65] In Re Sundaram Pillai,[66] the accused, the driver of an express bus, was coming fast from east to west, dashed against the deceased who was riding a bicycle in the same direction ahead of the bus on the south side of the road. The evidence was that the bus was coming in the centre of the road and overtaking sheep and carts on their south. In the circumstances, it was found that there was a very high degree of rashness or negligence on the part of the accused and his conviction and sentence under the section was maintained.

34. Slow and Fast Speed--Depends upon Individual Motions

Commentary under same heading in s 279A, ante, Vol. 2, may be referred to.

35. Speed alone not the test of Rashness and Negligence--Real test Indicated

Commentary under same heading in s 279A, ante, Vol. 2, may be referred to.

Rashness or negligence are not dependent on the speed of the vehicle. The speed of the vehicle is only one of the several other factors which determine whether the act is2587 rash or negligent. Negligence is the absence of due care and caution, whereas culpable rashness results from lack of circumspection.[67]

36. Speed of opposite coming Vehicle

It is also not possible for the occupants of the jeep to observe the speed of the vehicle coming from opposite, especially during night time. At best he can say the speed of the jeep in which he was travelling, but not the speed of the vehicle coming in the opposite direction.[68]

37. Contributory Negligence[69]

The doctrine of contributory negligence, well known as a defence in the law of torts, has, as such, no place in criminal law,[70] though it may minimise damages in a civil case.[71] The fact that the victim has also contributed a little by his negligence, is absolutely immaterial where there is ample proof that the accused brought about the accident by his own negligent and rash driving.[72] In criminal jurisprudence, if the victim has also contributed to the causation of the accident by contributory negligence and in the absence of any material to show that only on account of rash and negligent driving of the accused driver that the accident occurred, it would not be permissible under such circumstances to hold the accused driver guilty of committing an offence under ss 279 and 304A, IPC, since contributory negligence of the victim affords as intervening circumstances, i.e., without the intervening circumstance, the accident could not have happened. A boatman, who carried passengers beyond his boat's capacity, as a result of which the boat capsizes and some passengers are drowned, cannot plead, in defence, the contributory negligence of the passengers.[73] A driver of a motor vehicle, who is himself negligent, cannot plead, in defence, the negligence of a pedestrian whom he knocked down unconscious and killed.[74] Where the driver of a truck observes a car approaching at high speed, he should, as a matter of prudence and caution, slow down. If he does not do so and an accident occurs, he would be held liable inspite of the contributory negligence of the driver of the car.[75] The negligence of the victim may, thus be relevant in deciding whether the negligence of the accused was the direct and efficient cause of the death, though it is no defence to the case against him. The car should always be kept in a state of2588 control, sufficient to enable the driver to avoid running into any passenger who may fail to stop, off the road, however annoying the dilatoriness of the foot passenger may be to the driver.[76] The crucial question, on which liability depends, is whether either party could, by the exercise of reasonable care, have avoided the consequences of the other's negligence. If he could, then that party is legally responsible for the accident.[77] In Sheo Kumar v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[78] the deceased girl crossed three-fourths of the road and then, instead of proceeding further and crossing the road in full, turned back. Seeing this, the truck driver had to take a turn to the extreme right. In doing so, the victim's legs were crushed and she died. As the girl did not follow the rule of the road, the driver of the truck was held not guilty.

38. Composite Negligence and Contributory Negligence--Distinction

The law keeps a clear distinction between cases of composite negligence and contributory negligence. In cases of composite negligence, the drivers of both the vehicles would be guilty of rash and negligent driving, whereas in a case of contributory negligence, no penal liability can be fastened on the accused/driver, obviously, for the reason that but for the contributory negligence, the accident could not have occurred.[79] Due to rash and negligent driving of cart, the deceased child came under the wheel of the cart, was crushed. Three carts were involved in the accident. As the case was of contributory negligence, sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[80]

39. Accident of Heavy Vehicle with Light Vehicle

Merely because the jeep driver died in the accident, with the bus which is a heavy vehicle when compared to the jeep, it cannot be said that the accident took place on account of the negligent act of driver of bus. Only because more damages were caused to the jeep, it cannot be inferred from that circumstance that the bus driver went at a high speed and hit the jeep. In fact the said damages indicate that the jeep driver went at a high speed and hit the bus and, therefore, there was extensive damage to the jeep and not to the bus.[81]

40. Person Suddenly Crossing a Road

If a person suddenly crosses a road without taking note of the approaching vehicle, there is every possibility of his dashing against the oncoming vehicle without the driver becoming aware of his crossing, till it is too late. If a person suddenly crosses the road, the driver, however slowly he may be driving, may not be in a position to save the accident.[82] Where the deceased alighted from the jeep and was impatient to get to the other side of the road and made his way across the highway regardless of oncoming vehicles and there was every possibility that he was the main contributory2589 to the accident resulting in his death, the accused was acquitted for the offence under ss 279 and 304A, IPC, which was found proper.[83] A lady passenger getting down from another truck and coming under rear wheel of truck, driven by accused while crossing the road does not prove the guilt of the accused. If a person suddenly crosses road on highway, driver of vehicle would not be in position to save accident and it cannot be said that driver was negligent.[84]

While the truck was going on the main thoroughfare from south to north, the ill-fated young girl was crossing the road from east to west and she had already covered 35 ft. of the road. There was sufficient time and margin for the driver to see that the young child was crossing the road and he could have applied brakes instead of knocking down the girl only 17 ft. away from the kerb. Appellant accused was convicted of charge under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[85]

41. Accidents on Highway

The situation that prevails in the open highways is slightly different to the one that the court would take into account had the incident taken place within the city limits. One needs to take into account the factor that on the highway, the vehicle would legitimately be moving at a relatively high speed. The more important aspect is that on the highway the vehicles have a right of way and if a person desires to cross the highway, the rules of the road require that the person would have to wait until the traffic has passed and only then embark on crossing the highway. It is a very familiar error committed by pedestrians even on the national highways that they saunter on to the road regardless of the movement of the traffic and if a person does a suicidal act of this type, then it would be impermissible for a court in situation of this type to hold the driver of the vehicle responsible for the consequences of the act.[86]

42. Automobile Accidents

A person, driving a truck with defective brakes, while in a drowsy condition, would be liable under this section if an accident occurs.[87]If a driver drives a vehicle with its hand brake disconnected and foot-brake poorly functioning, and an accident occurs in which a person meets his death, the driver will be guilty of a rash and negligent act.[88] A person driving rashly, relying upon his brakes, does an act which might bring him within the provisions of this section will be guilty of a rash and negligent act.[89] However, when there is an accident owing to the failure of foot-brake, the driver cannot be held guilty for rash and negligent driving.[90] If a driver is driving his vehicle at a high speed and death is caused, it does not make him guilty under s 304A, unless rashness or negligence of the driver is established.[91] The mere fact that the car was driven on the wrong side of the road, is no proof of negligence on the2590 part of the driver.[1] Similarly, negligence on the part of the driver cannot be presumed by the mere fact that a pedestrian is knocked down and killed by a motorist.[2] If there is an accident because of the negligence of the gateman in keeping the gate open and inviting the vehicles to pass, the driver of the bus cannot be held guilty of negligence under this section.[3] Where the truck driver, while driving his truck through a bazar, swerved to the right in order to save a girl crossing the road but the girl was hit by the rear side of the truck and died as a result, it was held that having seen the girl safely crossing the road, it was no part of his duty to look backward to see if the truck was likely to hit the girl, and therefore, he was not guilty of rashness or negligence.[4]

The expression "high speed" is an unambiguous/unclear expression. There must be prosecution evidence that the accused was driving the vehicle in rash and negligent manner.[5]

Overloading of 60-65 people in the truck like folder contributes to the negligence of the accused driver. In the present case the truck had turned turtle, causing injuries to several persons and death of three persons on the spot. The appellant accused driver was convicted under ss 279, 304A and 338, IPC .[6]

43. Railway Accidents

Where a railway guard omitted to give to the engine-driver, the required signal to sound the whistle before starting the engine and the driver started the engine without sounding the whistle, with the result that a boy was run over and killed, it was held that the death was caused by the negligent act of the guard and he was liable under this section.[7] In Empress v Nand Kishore ,[8] the accused, a railway servant, entrusted with moving trucks down an incline, neglected to uncouple and move the trucks singly, thereby, disobeying official instructions, with the result that the trucks got out of control and a coolie who tried to stop them under instructions of the accused was run over and killed. It was held that the accused was guilty under this section as the death was caused by his negligence. In Tapti Prasad v Emperor ,[9] the accused, a station master, gave the line clear to an incoming passenger train knowing that at the time there was a goods train standing on the line with the result that there was a collision attended by loss of life. It was held that the loss of life was due to that rash and negligent act of the accused and he was, therefore, guilty under this section.

44. Shooting Accidents

If a person, in his zeal to try his hand at shooting, fires a gun, in a jungle at a late hour of the night at a place where no human being can be suspected to be present, at2591 what he considers to be an animal, he cannot be held guilty of a rash or negligent act within the meaning of this section.[10] Where, in a dark night in a cremation ground, the accused believed a man to be a ghost, inflicted injuries which caused his death, it was held that he was not liable under this section as he had no reason to think that a human being would arrive on the scene at such a time and place and that he probably thought that a ghost had actually appeared.[11]

In Re Samuel,[12] an armed reserve police officer, trained in shooting, was shooting birds with a rifle near a police station. Unfortunately, the bullet missed the bird and ricocheted from the water surface and hit a constable in the police station who died of the injury. It was held that this ricocheting was a sheer unforeseen accident and even though it was irregular for the officer to use a rifle for hunting, he could not be said to have committed the offence under the section. Where the accused desiring to show hospitality to a mahant (the head of a religious order), who had visited him (i.e., the accused), and requested him (i.e., the mahant) to stay over and on the mahant's insisting to go away, pulled, in a state of intoxication, the trigger of his gun, without aiming, the mahant was hit and killed, it was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under this section.[13] In Ram Das v State [14] the accused, a man of ordinary prudence or caution, removed the magazine from the rifle, proceeded to witness a nautch, viewed by an assembly of 300 to 400 persons, and sat down with his rifle resting on his knees pointing towards the deceased. When the accused sat down in the assemblage, he had the belief that the chamber of the rifle was no longer loaded.

Unfortunately, a cartridge still remained lodged inadvertently in the chamber of the rifle. When the accused was lifting his towel for wiping his face, the trigger was inadvertently touched and the rifle fired causing the death of the deceased. In these circumstances, it was held that because the accused acted as a man of ordinary prudence and there was no evidence to show that he knew that the chamber of the rifle was loaded and that he never intended to move the trigger, the case was not covered by s 304A . In Hiralal v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[15] the accused, who was a forest guard, while on duty, saw some thieves stealing forest produce. In an attempt to apprehend the running thieves the forest guard shot at them resulting in their death, it was held that the accused's act of shooting, in the manner in which it hit the victim in his back, causing his death, was undoubtedly a rash act which satisfied the ingredients of s 304A, IPC, and not of culpable homicide amounting to murder.

45. Electrocution

There was a coconut tree which was standing between the electric lines. Due to constant rubbing of the trunk of the coconut tree, the aluminium wire snapped and fell on the ground causing the death of two minor school going children. The petitioners, Overseer and the Assistant Lineman of the Major Section of the2592 Electricity Department were found grossly negligent, hence were convicted under s 304A, IPC .[16]

46. Drowning cases

In the instant case school boys and girls of a school who had come on picnic decided to have bath in the river. The accused members of the staff who had accompanied the students before hand inspected the water level, to ascertain whether it was safe for the children and earmarked a zone where children could play. Fourteen children entered the uncharted water and died. Held, there was no negligence on the part of the accused appellants, they were acquitted of the charge under s 304A, IPC .[17]

47. Ferryman's Rashness or Negligence

Where the lessee of a government ferry, having the exclusive right of conveying passengers across a certain river at a particular spot, allowed an unsound boat to be used at the ferry, in consequence of which the boat sank while crossing the river, and some of the persons in it were drowned, it was held that the lessee of the ferry was properly convicted of the offence provided for by this section.[18]A ferry contractor would be guilty under this section if he loses the risk and exposes lives of passengers by his rash or negligent act of putting the boat in the water when the river is in floods and there is every risk of the boat capsizing on account of the waves. 'Negligence of rashness will consist in taking the decision to ferry passengers inspite of the river being in floods.'[19] However, if there is loss of life owing to the sinking of a boat carrying passengers, the boat overturning owing to strong winds and rough water with high waves, the boat itself being not in an unseaworthy condition, the boatman cannot be convicted.[20]

48. Other Cases of Negligence

In the instant case the accused appellant had filled excess quantity of LPG gas in petromax, which on ignition in a hotel got burst and caused the death of an employee of the hotel. Accused was convicted under s 304A, IPC .[21]

49. Legal Position in the Context of Medical Profession

The Supreme Court in Jacob Mathew v State of Punjab ,[22] has elaborately discussed the circumstances under which doctors are liable for the offence under s 304A, IPC . The Supreme Court has summed up the conclusions, to say under what circumstances doctors would be liable for the offence under s 304A, which read as:[23]

(1) Negligence is the breach of a duty caused by omission to do something which a reasonable man guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the2593 conduct of human affairs would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do. The definition of negligence as given in Ratanlal and DhirajlalLaw of Torts, (edited by GP Singh J), referred to hereinabove, holds good. Negligence becomes actionable on account of injury resulting from the act or omission amounting to negligence attributable to the person sued. The essential components of negligence are three: 'duty', 'breach' and 'resulting damage'.

(2) Negligence in the context of medical profession necessarily calls for a treatment with a difference. To infer rashness or negligence on the part of a professional, in particular a doctor, additional considerations apply. A case of occupational negligence is different from one of professional negligence. A simple lack of care, an error of judgment or an accident, is not proof of negligence on the part of a medical professional. So long as a doctor follows a practice acceptable to the medical profession of that day, he cannot be held liable for negligence merely because a better alternative course or method of treatment was also available or simply because a more skilled doctor would not have chosen to follow or resort to that practice or procedure which the accused followed. When it comes to the failure of taking precautions, what has to be seen is whether those precautions were taken which the ordinary experience of men has found to be sufficient; a failure to use special or extraordinary precautions which might have prevented the particular happening cannot be the standard for judging the alleged negligence. So also, the standard of care, while assessing the practice as adopted, is judged in the light of knowledge available at the time of the incident, and not at the date of trial. Similarly, when the charge of negligence arises out of failure to use some particular equipment, the charge would fail if the equipment was not generally available at that particular time (i.e., the time of the incident) at which it is suggested it should have been used.

(3) A professional may be held liable for negligence on one of the two findings: either he was not possessed of the requisite skill which he professed to have possessed, or, he did not exercise, with reasonable competence in the given case, the skill which he did possess. The standard to be applied for judging, whether the person charged has been negligent, would be that of an ordinary competent person exercising ordinary skill in that profession. It is not possible for every professional to possess the highest level of expertise or skills in that branch which he practices. A highly skilled professional may be possessed of better qualities, but that cannot be made the basis or the yardstick for judging the performance of the professional proceeded against on indictment of negligence.

(4) The test for determining medical negligence as laid down in Bolam's case [(1957) 1 WLR 582, p 586] holds good in its applicability in India.

(5) The jurisprudential concept of negligence differs in civil and criminal law. What may be negligence in civil law may not necessarily be negligence in criminal law. For negligence to amount to an offence, the element of *mens rea*must be shown to exist. For an act to amount to criminal negligence, the degree of negligence should be much higher, i.e., gross or of a very high degree. Negligence which is neither gross nor of a higher degree may provide a ground for action in civil law, but cannot form the basis for prosecution.

(6) The word 'gross' has not been used in s 304A of IPC, yet it is settled that in criminal law, negligence or recklessness, to be so held, must be of such a high degree as to be 'gross'. The expression 'rash or negligent act' as occurring in s 304A of the IPC has to be read as qualified by the word 'grossly'.

(7) To prosecute a medical professional for negligence under criminal law it must be shown that the accused did something or failed to do something which in the given facts and circumstances no medical professional in his ordinary senses2594 and prudence would have done or failed to do. The hazard taken by the accused doctor should be of such a nature that the injury which resulted was most likely imminent.

(8) Res ipsa loquitur is only a rule of evidence and operates in the domain of civil law especially in cases of torts and helps in determining the onus of proof in actions relating to negligence. It cannot be pressed in service for determining per se the liability for negligence within the domain of criminal law. Res ipsa loquitur has, if at all, a limited application in trial on a charge of criminal negligence.[24]

Negligence becomes actionable on account of injury resulting from the act or omission amounting to negligence attributable to the person prosecuted. The essential components of negligence are 'duty', 'breach' and 'resulting damage'. The deceased injured in his leg, was admitted in hospital for treatment, died for want of medical treatment. Doctor was guilty for negligence as in ordinary course injury sustained by the deceased would not have caused death.[25]

Rash and Negligence of Doctor(s) -- Patient Admitted in Private Hospital Died for want of Oxygen Cylinder

Even if it is found that the patient admitted died in a private hospital for want of oxygen cylinder, it does not make out a case of criminal rashness or negligence on the part of the accused appellant. It was not the case of the complainant that the accused appellant, was not a doctor qualified to treat the patient whom he agreed to treat. It was a case of non-availability of oxygen cylinder either because of the hospital having failed to keep available a gas cylinder or because of the gas cylinder being found empty. Held, the hospital may be liable in civil law (or may not be) but the accused appellant cannot be proceeded against under s 304A, IPC . Prosecution of the accused appellant under s 304A was quashed.[26]

A complaint for medical negligence of the accused doctor does not lie in the absence of expert opinion which speaks negligence of the doctor.[27]The negligence of the doctor should be gross negligence or carelessness. Mere inadvertence or some decree of want of adequate care and caution is not enough.[28]In case(s) of medical negligence proof of mens rea is not necessary.[29]

Medical Practitioner's Rashness or Negligence

It is a matter of common sense that a medical practitioner is not obliged and can never be expected to achieve success in all cases. This duty like other professionals is to exercise reasonable care, caution and skill. If he is found failing in exercise of such things, then obviously he is to be visited with legal consequences either under civil law or under criminal law. Even the best surgeon is likely to make honest errors in judgment. Therefore, what is required to be judged is causation nexus of injury with the action alleged to be negligent. A doctor can be found guilty only if he fails the2595 standard of reasonable skillful medical practice.[30] For fixing criminal liability on a doctor or surgeon, the standard of negligence required to be proved should be so high as can be described as 'gross negligence' or 'recklessness.' It is not merely lack of necessary care, attention and skill.[31] The principles laid down in the under mentioned authorities[32] show that the death of persons on the operation table is itself not sufficient to prove negligence against the doctor. The criminality lies in running the risk of doing such an act with recklessness and indifference to the consequences. In other words, a doctor is not criminally responsible for the patient's death, unless his negligence or incompetence showed such disregard for life and safety as to amount to a crime against the state.

There may be a few cases where an exceptionally brilliant doctor performs an operation or prescribes a treatment which has never been tried before to save the life of a patient when no known method of treatment is available. If the patient dies or suffers some serious harm, the doctor cannot be held liable.[33].

A medical practitioner is not liable to be held negligent, simply because things went wrong from mischance or misadventure or through an error of judgment in choosing one reasonable course of treatment in preference to another. He would be liable only where his conduct fell below that of the standards of a reasonably competent practitioner in his field. For instance, he would be liable if he leaves a surgical gauze inside the patient after an operation,[34] or operates on the wrong part of the body, and he would be also criminally liable if he operates on someone for removing an organ for illegitimate trade.[35]

There is a tendency to confuse a reasonable person with an error free person. An error of judgment may or may not be negligent. It depends on the nature of the error.[36]

It is not enough to show that there is a body of competent professional opinion which considers that the decision of the accused professional was a wrong decision, provided there also exists a body of professional opinion, equally competent, which supports the decision as reasonable in the circumstances.[37]

The standard of care has to be judged in the light of knowledge available at the time of the incident and not at the date of the trial. Also, where the charge of negligence is of failure to use some particular equipment, the charge would fail if the equipment was not generally available at that point of time.[38]2596

The higher the acuteness in an emergency and the higher the complication, the more are the chances of error of judgment. At times, the professional is confronted with making a choice between the devil and the deep sea and has to choose the lesser evil. The doctor is often called upon to adopt a procedure which involves higher element of risk, but which he honestly believes as providing greater chances of success for the patient rather than a procedure involving lesser risk but higher chances of failure. Which course is more appropriate to follow, would depend on the facts and circumstances of a given case but a doctor cannot be penalized if he adopts the former procedure, even if it results in a failure.[39]

Where the child fell from stairs of the school and sustained injuries on the forehead, and the child was taken to a school dispensary where the pharmacist only applied ice and ointment, and advised that nothing will happen and instructed to take the child home, on the challan being filed by the police after the child succumbed to his injuries, the magistrate took cognizance of offences under ss 304, Pt II, 317 and 304A, IPC . The accused then approached the High Court under s 482, CrPC, for quashing cognizance of offences taken by the magistrate against them, observing that when the child was taken to the dispensary it was the duty of the pharmacist to either diagnose the injury correctly or advise for immediate check-up by an expert or doctor, in the absence of such advise, the headmaster or the class-teacher could not have realised the gravity of the injury, so, they could not be held responsible. Likewise, the order of the magistrate taking cognizance against the headmaster and class-teacher was quashed and not against the pharmacist.[40] Where the surgeon after operating patient declined/refused to examine patient post operation when he was informed about condition of patient, however, he examined patient next day and patient was again operated upon, it was not the case that he made any mistake either in first or second surgery and proximate cause of death was not failure to visit patient when he was informed about condition of patient, so, prosecution under s 304A was held liable to be quashed.[41]

In cases of medical negligence a private complaint should not be entertained unless the complainant has produced prima facie evidence before the court in the form of a credible opinion given by another competent doctor to support the charge of rashness or negligence on the part of the accused doctor.[42]

In ASV Narayan Rao v Ratnamala ,[43] the appellant cardiologist had performed angioplasty and bypass surgery on the husband of the respondent, various complications developed and the husband of the respondent died. The respondent filed complaint against the appellant under s 304A, IPC, on which both the Magistrate and the High Court found prime facie case of negligence under s 304A, IPC against the appellant and summoned the appellant. The State Medical Council had opined that in the present case the doctors had done their best. In appeal, the Supreme Court took the view that it was not a case of gross negligence, and quashed the criminal proceedings against the respondent.2597

The accused staff nurse told the doctor that the snake bite injection was not available in the hospital, though it was available. The husband of the complainant died because of delay in giving injection to the deceased. The deceased was brought to the hospital after delay of two and half hours. There was no direct nexus between the negligent act of the accused and the death of the deceased. Accused was acquitted of the charge under s 304A, IPC .[44]

In Juggan Khan v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[45] the accused, a homoeopathic practitioner, administered 24 drops of stramonium and a leaf of dhatura to the deceased who died as a result thereof. It was held that it was a rash and negligent act to administer such poisonous drugs without studying their effect and the accused was, therefore, guilty of an offence under this section. The fact, that a person, totally ignorant of the science of medicine or practice of surgery, undertakes a treatment or performs an operation, is a materiel fact from which an inference of gross rashness and negligence in the treatment can be inferred. In Khusaldas Pammandas v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[46] a hakim (a unani medical practitioner), who had no knowledge of penicillin injection treatment, yet gave such an injection to a patient, as a result of which the patient died, was held guilty of the offence under this section. In PN De'Souza v Emperor ,[47] a doctor, incharge of a dispensary, carelessly mixed up bottles of poisonous drugs and administered them, without reading the labels on the bottles, with the result that several patients died. He was held guilty under this section. In Ram Niwas v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[48] the accused was not a qualified doctor and had administered injection to the deceased causing his death, there was no evidence that the accused gave any test-dose to the deceased before administering a full dose of injection, the accused was found guilty under s 304A, IPC . Omission on the part of the hospital authorities to provide ambulance service would not constitute medical negligence.[49]

In the family planning the deceased was injected with Alrophine and Fortwine injections by authorized nurse under the supervision of the qualified and skilled doctor. There was no gross negligence or negligence on the part of the doctor, the death of the deceased, was vismajor. Order of the Magistrate for framing charge under s 304A, IPC against the doctor was set aside.[50]

In case(s) of medical negligence, the investigating officer is not bound by the opinion expressed by the Expert Panel, Apex Body Committee. He is free to form his own independent opinion on the basis of the material and evidence of the case.[51]

In this case the wife of the complainant was patient of ovarian tumor. The accused doctor found operation necessary to save the life of the deceased. Even if the decision taken turns out wrong, the accused doctor cannot be prosecuted under s 304A, IPC for medical negligence.[52]A mere injury to leg would not in normal course cause2598 death, prime facie case of negligence due to secondary cause in providing treatment which was required has to be shown for prosecution under s 304A, IPC .[53]

The accused, a doctor having Ayurvedacharya Bachelor of Medicine and Surgery, had administered allopathic medicine, and the patient died. The trial court referred the medical reports of the treatment given by the accused doctor to a panel of specialists for opinion and report.[54]

Where the record of the hospital relating to the treatment given to the cyclist involved in accident was not produced, the medical officer was also not examined in the case, the prosecution failed to prove that the cyclist despite proper treatment died due to injuries recorded in the accident, the accused was convicted under ss 338 and 279, IPC and not under s 304A, IPC .[55]

In the instant case the respondent and team of doctors gave treatment to the deceased, but the deceased died. Held, the respondent and the team of doctors were negligent, but their negligence was not gross negligence, they could not be held guilty for commission of offence under s 304A, IPC .[56]

The deceased B had pain in his body hence was taken to the clinic of the appellant medical practitioner. The appellant administered three injections to the deceased B and the deceased died within half an hour. The illness of the deceased was not of such a nature that he could die during the treatment. Prima facie case of gross negligence was made out against the appellant for proceeding under s 304A, IPC . Process were issued against the appellant.[57]In another case the petitioner doctor made wrong diagnosis of the child, he diagnosed tuberculosis who died later on due to cancer. Held, it was a case of medical negligence to be decided upon the evidence to be adduced by the parties during the trial of the case. Proceedings under s 304A, IPC against the petitioner medical practitioner were not quashed.[58]

50. Accidental Killing

Where the accused kept a bottle of the 'Atlas Tree Killer' in his farm-shed and two of his farm servants, who thought the stuff to be arrack, drank it and died as a consequence, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under s 304A as the accused was protected by s 80 .[59] In Janardan Prasad v State of Rajasthan ,[60]it was observed that though it is unusual to expect death of another man when a person is cleaning a loaded revolver without a safety valve, yet when the accused happens to be a sub-inspector of police, it can safely be said that he must be aware of the dangerous character of a loaded revolver, having no safety catch attached, though the act itself may not be regarded of such a nature which must, in all probability, cause death. In this case, death resulted from the bullet of the revolver accidentally going2599 off while being cleaned by the accused i.e., the sub-inspector of police, and he was convicted under this section.

51. Poison Administered as Love Potion Causing Death

The mere administering of a love potion or drug, which a person thinks might be beneficial, is not, in itself, an offence. If what is administered turns out to be poison and causes death, the person, administering it, cannot be convicted of murder unless it is shown clearly and without possible doubt that his intention was to cause death or that he knew that death was likely to be caused. However, even though the person had neither the intention to cause death, nor the knowledge that his act was likely to cause death, yet if he was careless of the consequences of his act and administered the poison without due care and caution or any inquiry as to what it really was, he would be guilty of the offence under this section.[61] In Empress v Bhakhan ,[62] the facts were that the accused having an intrigue with a paramour, accepted poison from her paramour to administer it to her husband as a charm, with the result that death of the husband was caused by the substance administered to him, the substance being arsenic, though the accused did not know the substance given to her to be noxious till she had seen its effect. It was held that the offence, committed by the accused was punishable under s 304A, because her act did not amount to culpable homicide, but only a rash act, causing the death of her husband. It was further held that because the accused knew that the substance came from her paramour and was to operate on her husband as a charm, it became her duty to ascertain whether it was innocuous before she administered it to him; culpability was imputable for the absence of that caution and circumspection which ought to have been exercised in ordinary prudence under the circumstances stated.

52. 'Act Not Amounting to Culpable Homicide'

This section is directed to offences outside the range of ss 299 and 300, IPC, and therefore, contemplates cases, into which neither intention, nor knowledge of the kind, mentioned in the said sections, enters. Violence, directly and wilfully caused, is, thus, excluded. The section does not say that every unjustifiable or inexcusable act of killing shall be punishable. It specifically and in terms limits itself to those rash or negligent acts, which cause death but fall short of culpable homicide of either description. Cases of direct violence, wilfully inflicted, cannot, therefore, be regarded as either rash or negligent acts.[63]It has, therefore, no application to cases where death has been caused by an act which was intended to cause hurt.[64] When death is caused2600 to a person other than the one whose death was intended, the offence committed is murder under s 300 read with s 301, and not under s 304A .[65]

53. Other Cases of Negligence

The hand of the victim was crushed while he was repairing conveyor belt. No negligence or overt act was attributed to the petitioner. It was also not the case that the petitioner had not taken care/steps against the probable danger. No case under s 287 or s 304A, IPC against the petitioner was made out.[66]

54. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class. The offence under s 304A is punishable with imprisonment or a term not exceeding two years or with fine or both. The period of limitation for taking cognizance of this offence would be three years in view of s 468, CrPC (2 of 1974).[67] Quick justice is sine qua non of art 21 of the Constitution . The delay of 9½ years for taking cognizance vitiates the trial. Keeping a person in suspended animation for 9½ years without any cause cannot be in spirit of the procedure established by law. Even Regulation 32 of the Assam Frontier (Administration of Justice) Regulation 1945 does not save the vitiation of the trial.[68]

Offences punishable under ss 279 and 304A are not mentioned in the two tables of s 320, CrPC, the offences are not compoundable.[69]

55. Sanction under Section 197 , CrPC

Where the accused was on duty as an emergency medical officer on call, previous sanction in terms of s 197 of CrPC is necessary in the absence of which the order framing charge and taking cognizance under s 304A, IPC is liable to be set aside.[70]

Where the death of the victim was caused by the accused, a public servant, by negligence, if no offence was made out, the question of taking cognizance even without sanction under s 197, CrPC,[71] would not arise. If there was, however, negligence, the question whether the acts or omissions of the accused constituted criminal negligence is to be considered, if sanction is accorded as set out in s 197, CrPC .[72]

56. Charge

Framing a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case (s 221, CrPC). Where the accused is charged with the offence under s 302 or s 304, IPC, it is not possible to enter into a conviction under2601 s 304A, IPC without a charge under that section. Section 22 , CrPC, cannot be attracted because s 304A is not a minor offence constituting only some of the several particulars of the major offence punishable under the second part of s 304 . Both are independent and mutually exclusive offences. Even s 221, CrPC is not attracted.[73]

Where the fire in Delhi Vidyut Board's transformer spread upto the parked vehicles outside the cinema hall and emitted thick smoke and toxic gases resulting in entrapment and asphyxiation of patrons in the balcony of the cinema hall, the fire in the transformer alone was not found to be causa causans for the death, but the absence of rapid, dispersal facilities, the various acts of omission and commission, the violation of rules and bye-laws meant for safety of the public were other causes contributing to the tragedy in equal proportion, the accused persons who were found to be incharge of looking after the cinema hall on behalf of the owner/occupier were held rightly charged under ss 304A, 337, 338, IPC, and s 14 of Cinematography Act.[74]

57. Notice under Section 251 , CrPC

In a prosecution of an offence under this section, the following form of the notice under s 251, CrPC, may be adopted:

> I (name and office of the magistrate etc) hereby give notice to you (name, father's name & address of accused) as follows:
> That on or about the..... day of..... at..... (give particular of place of incident), you while driving the vehicle no. ..... make ..... in a rash or negligent manner caused the death of Mr. ..... not amounting to culpable homicide and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 304A of the Indian Penal Code and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried for the said offence.

58. Plea of Guilty

Where on the plea of guilty the accused was convicted under s 304A, IPC, by the trial court and sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for one month and pay a fine of rupees one thousand, and in the appeal filed by the accused before the sessions court, the conviction was maintained, but the sentence catered to payment of fine of Rs 2500 instead of Rs 1000 and the sentence of imprisonment was set aside, in the appeal filed by the state against inadequacy of sentence, the High Court set aside the conviction and sentence of the accused on account of the existence of element of plea bargaining, and remanded the matter for the trial court to record the plea of the accused afresh and defend himself against the charge.[75] The statement made by the accused motor driver with the reservation that the accident was due to the failure of brakes may not be regarded as a plea of guilty. Hence, the conviction and sentence based on such plea of the accused was liable to be set aside and the accused was entitled to a retrial under s 304A, IPC, according to law.[76]2602

59. Can Accused Charged under Section 302 or Section 304 be convicted under Section 304A

There is no legal impediment in convicting an accused under s 304A, IPC who is charged with ss 302 or 304, IPC and no separate charge under s 304A has been framed against him.[77] However, a contrary view is taken by the Kerala High Court in a case,[78] wherein it was held that an accused charged under s 302 or 304 cannot be convicted under s 304A, IPC .

60. Importance of Circumstantial Evidence

In accident cases it is too much to expect oral evidence to prove the rash and negligent driving as accidents take place within fraction of seconds and it may not be possible for any witness to speak about the exact manner in which the accident took place. Therefore, it is only the circumstantial evidence which is very important to come to a conclusion as to how the accident took place, and whether there was any rash and negligent driving on the part of the driver of the vehicle. More so, in accidents of head-on-collision involving two vehicles where it is to be decided as to which driver was responsible for the accident or if both the drivers were responsible.[79]

61. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(i) there was the death of the person in question;
(ii) the accused caused the said death;[80] and
(iii) the act of the accused, causing the death, was rash or negligent, but it did not amount to culpable homicide.

As in any criminal case, in a case under s 304A also, the prosecution must establish the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt. The mere fact that the motor cycle leaves the road and hits against a milestone, would not be presumptive proof of rash or negligent driving requiring an accused to prove the contrary. The prosecution must stand on its own legs rather than take advantage of the weakness of the accused.[81] The accused may refuse to enter any plea; he may refuse to given an explanation, and he may refuse to examine any witnesses on his behalf. Still none of these facts can be taken into consideration to assess the guilt of the accused. The burden of proof, in a criminal case, never shifts and it is on the prosecution to prove its case. Explanation of an accused, to the plea entered by him or the evidence adduced by him, may succeed in making the case of the prosecution somewhat doubtful, and to that extent the plea or the explanation or the evidence may be taken into account by the court.[82] Similarly, the onus of an accused, if any, in a criminal case, is discharged on the theory of balance of2603 probabilities.[83]However, the prosecution must establish that the accused went beyond mere carelessness and that death of the person involved was the direct result of rash or negligently act of the accused without intervention of another's negligence.[84]

It must be proved that the driver was driving rashly or negligently.[85] There can be no burden on an accused to prove that he was not driving the vehicle in a rash or negligent manner.[86] In the case of death by rash or negligent driving, the prosecution has to prove, beyond reasonable doubt, that the accused acted with the consciousness that death or other evil consequences were likely to follow.[87] Failure to do so should result in acquittal of the accused.[88] In Baijnath Singh v State of Bihar ,[89] a number of corrugated iron sheets loaded on the roof of a bus, jerked and fell down, on a kachcha road, thereby injuring some persons including the one who died. The prosecution did not care to find out who had loaded the iron sheets. It was held that unless the driver could be held to be entirely responsible for loading the iron sheets and putting them in a negligent manner or not tying them properly, it was difficult to sustain his conviction either under this section or under s 279, IPC . An accident, merely due to an error of judgment of the driver, or without anything to show that he was conscious of the risk that evil consequences will follow or that his rash driving was of such a degree that injury was most likely to be occasioned thereby, would not make the driver criminally liable for an offence either under s 279, of under s 304A . If there is hardly any evidence against the accused, to the offence that he was rash and negligent in driving the vehicle at the relevant time, he cannot be convicted under s 304A .[90]

In order to maintain a conviction under s 304A, IPC, the prosecution must, therefore, establish, beyond reasonable doubt, that death of the deceased was due to the rash or negligent act of the accused.[91] If a driver is driving at high speed and death is caused, it does not make him guilty under s 304A, unless rashness or negligence is proved.[92] In the absence of any satisfactory and convincing proof regarding the rashness or negligence of the driver of the vehicle, the mere fact, that an accident had occurred, is not sufficient to hold the driver guilty of an offence under s 304A .[93] If the prosecution does not discharge its burden beyond a reasonable doubt, the benefit of doubt should go to the accused.[94]

Where the deceased climbed to get into a moving truck from the back side, over which the accused, i.e., the driver of the truck could not have held watch, but the deceased instead fell down and died, it was held that the accused could not be held guilty of an offence under s 304A, IPC . It was the deceased himself who was rash and negligent in trying to get into the moving vehicle.[95] Where the prosecution neither2604 proved the cause of death of the deceased nor examined any doctor to prove the nature of injuries sustained by the victim, the conviction of the accused under s 304A and s 279 was not found proper.[1] Prosecution case was that the accused driving goods truck in rash and negligent manner dashed against Tata Sumo which was coming from opposite direction. All the PWS were sitting in the rear seats of the Tata Sumo as such they had no opportunity to see the driver of the offending vehicle. The witnesses did not depose before the court that they saw the face of the driver of the offending vehicle. The identity/identification of the accused was not proved beyond reasonable doubt. The accused were acquitted of the charge under ss 279, 337 and 304A, IPC .[2]

Accused driver of a canter was prosecuted on allegations that while driving rashly and negligent he dashed against the two girls, caused the death of one and injuries to another. If the accused is not known to the witness previously and he is identified in the court for the first time then it becomes a question of fact whether reliance is to be placed upon that evidence or not. In the instant case there was evidence of PW1 that the accused alighted from the canter and came to them and disclosed his name, parentage and address and it was only thereafter that he had escaped from the spot leaving behind the canter. Thus, the complainant interacted with the accused and had sufficient opportunity to note his distinctive features which made the basis of identification of the accused by him in the court. There was nothing on the record to disbelieve that part of the testimony of the complainant. The accident had occurred in the day at 10:15 AM. The identification of the accused was found reliable. He was convicted under ss 279 and 304, IPC .[3]

Prosecution case was that the accused was driving a truck at a very fast speed dashed against the deceased from behind, causing his death. There was evidence of one witness who was also not cross-examined, there was no other evidence showing the speed of the truck at the time of the accident. Accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[4]Accused appellant, driver of a van, attempted to overtake the car had hit the scooter, had caused the death of the deceased rider and injuries to the pillion rider of the scooter. The name of the accused was not mentioned in the FIR. He was arrested after one month of the accident. Identifying witness had only a glimpse of the driver of the vehicle. There was no interaction between identifying witness and the driver of the vehicle at the spot for a sufficient longer period. In these circumstances, the identification of the accused for the first time, after six years, in the court, in the absence of any test identification parade, during the course of investigation was held not be said to be sufficient to connect him with the present case. Accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[5]

The eye-witness occupant of the same vehicle stated before the court that the appellant accused driver of the vehicle was driving the vehicle at a very high speed, the road was quite wide and there was no traffic at that time. RTO (PW) deposed that the accident was not due to mechanical defect in the vehicle. Appellant accused was convicted under s 304A, IPC .[6]2605

About 10-15 persons had gathered on the spot at the time of the accident, two of them were examined by the prosecution. One witness deposed that he came to know from the mob assembled on the spot that the accused was driving the offending vehicle, another witness deposed that on the next day of the accident he came to know that the accused was driving the vehicle. The identity of the accused driver was not proved beyond reasonable doubt. He was given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under ss 279 and 304A, IPC .[7]

Panchnama is not substantive evidence and without there being evidence in court the contents of panchnama cannot be relied upon and that the contents can be used only to corroborate the oral testimony given in the court.[8] In a case under s 304A, ordinarily the panchnama of the scene of offence which is recorded soon after the occurrence, assumes importance because it gives the various relevant positions wherefore certain inferences can be drawn for or against the accused. It cannot be said that a document of this nature requires merely a formal proof and can be read in evidence on the establishment of the fact that such a panchnama of the scene of the offence was, in fact, recorded. Panchnama of this nature being significant in a trial for an offence under s 304A, it is highly desirable that the prosecution should examine a least one of the panches to prove the contents of the panchnama. If none of the panches are examined in court, the prosecution is bound to disclose reasons for not doing so.

If the investigating officer, who has recorded the panchnama, merely states in the witness-box that he prepared the panchnama and the same is produced in court and does not even state that the contents of the panchnama are correctly recorded,[9] it cannot be said that the panchnama has been proved and should, therefore, be read in evidence. Mere marking of panchnama is not sufficient, the contents of panchnama are to be brought on record through the mediators or through the investigating officer through whom the panchnama is marked.[10]

63. Inspection of Vehicle by an Expert

Ordinarily, whenever a vehicle is inspected by an expert, after the accident, to find out the condition of the vehicle, he should state his qualifications, his experience, his duties or the capacity in which he inspected the same, so that the court may be in a position to place reliance on the testimony of such a witness. In the absence of such material piece of evidence, his testimony cannot be safely relied upon.[11]

64. Non-examination of Motor Vehicle Inspector

It is to be seen despite the fact the vehicle was coming from the wrong side, whether there was any mechanical defect in the vehicle has to be ascertained as there would have been possibility of the accused losing control over the vehicle at the time of the alleged accident either due to failure of the brake or any other reason. In this regard, it has to be ascertained by securing the report of the motor vehicles inspector and2606 marking the same to know exactly as to whether there was any mechanical defect and if need be, to examine the inspector of motor vehicles who has inspected the vehicle.[12] When occurrence did not take place on account of mechanical defect of vehicle, non-examination of motor vehicle inspector would not prejudice the accused.[13] When the motor vehicles inspector's report is marked as an exhibit without any protest from or with the consent of the defence, it is not necessary to call upon the prosecution to examine the motor vehicles inspector to prove his report.[14] However, when there are no eyewitnesses and if the motor vehicles inspector's report is marked inspite of protest by the defence, it is fatal to the prosecution's case.[15] When the opinion of the motor vehicle inspector that the accident did not occur because of mechanical defect and was a circumstance appearing in evidence against the accused, but while examining the accused under s 213, CrPC, the motor vehicles inspector's report was not put to him to seek his explanation, the conviction of accused is liable to be set aside and inevitable course in a situation like this is to remit the case to the magistrate for re-examining the accused afresh under s 313, CrPC .[16]

65. Non-examination of Doctors Conducting Post-mortem Examination

In the absence of examination by the doctor who performed the postmortem examination on the dead body, the cause of death of the deceased will remain unproved.[17]Due to non-examination by the doctor as to the nature of injuries, the time and cause of death remain obscure so it cannot be said that the deceased died due to the rash and negligent act of the accused.[18] In such a case, the case should not be remanded while deciding criminal revision when the accused has faced trial before the magistrate for 4 years and after his conviction, remained in appeal before the sessions court for over 3 years, and it would not be justified that the accused be troubled over and again after 8 years.[19]

66. Examination of the Accused

Examination of the accused under s 313 of the CrPC after the closure of prosecution evidence and before he is called on for his defence is a very important step in a criminal trial. This examination is not an empty formality. The underlying object behind this provision is to enable the accused to explain any circumstance appearing in evidence against him. This important step in the trial is based on the maxim audi alteram partem, ie, hear the other side or hear both sides, an injunction which means that no man shall be condemned unheard. Therefore, a duty is cast upon the court conducting the trial to formulate questions in such a way that the accused can understand from such questions what adverse material in evidence he is required to explain. There is no need to formulate separate questions for the evidence of each witness. If an inculpatory material is spoken to by more than one witness, question formulated with regard to that material may mention which of the witnesses have2607 spoken to about that material factor. Where a question is a combination of different materials in evidence, there is possibility of the accused being confused about the material which he is required to explain. In that event, if by such omnibus question, the accused has been prejudiced, the trial may be vitiated from that stage. Therefore a trial court shall, while examining the accused under s 313 of the CrPC, avoid stringing together several circumstances into one question and seeking explanation of the accused to such common question. It may also be borne in mind that whatever may be the number of accused persons, each and every accused must be examined separately and distinctly. The answers given by the accused shall not be scribbled, since answers which may be given by an accused in his examination under s 313 of the CrPC may throw light on the question of guilt or otherwise of the accused and in some cases, the truth may be crystallized by such answer. Answers so recorded shall be legible and in understandable handwriting.[20]

67. Defence of Accused

Where the accused has taken a positive defence that he was not driving the truck at the time of the incident, it was necessary for the prosecution to prove by direct evidence that the accused was in fact driving the truck at the time of the incident in question, the mere statement of the owner of the truck that the accused was employed by him as a driver of the said truck is not sufficient to draw a conclusion without any hesitation of the mind that the accused was actually driving the truck at the time of the incident in question.[21]

68. Acquittal

An accused cannot be convicted under s 304A, IPC and is entitled to an acquittal when:

(a) the deceased climbed to get into a moving truck from the back side, over which the accused, ie, the driver of the truck could not keep a watch, due to which the deceased fell down and died;[22]

(b) the accused had taken a positive defence that he was not driving the truck at the time of the incident and the prosecution failed to prove by direct evidence that he was infact, driving the truck at the time of the accident;[23]

(c) the prosecution case was that a motorcycle caused the accident but subsequently the prosecution produced evidence that it was a scooter, but it failed to produce any person who might have seen the scooter causing the accident;[24]

(d) two eyewitnesses stated that the accused was driving the bus at very high speed but their statements were fully disbelieved by another prosecution witness who stated that at the time of occurrence the accused was reversing the bus. There is no question of driving the bus at high speed when it was in the process of being reversed. Further, the deceased had been struck with the right side of the bumper of the bus and was shown to have fallen2608 towards the extreme left side of the bus in the site plan by the investigation officer which was not probable;[25]

(e) the doctor performing post-mortem on the dead body of the victim was not examined and it was not proved that the deceased died due to the negligent act of the accused;[26]

(f) the alleged eyewitnesses appeared to have reached the spot after the accident had taken place, the identity of the accused as the driver of the offending vehicle was not established, there was no evidence showing that the accused was driving the vehicle rashly or negligently or at excessive speed;[27]

(g) the deceased suddenly crossed the road, and therefore, it was not possible for the driver to avoid the accident;[28]

(h) the accused alighted from the jeep and was impatient to get to the other side of the road and made his way across the highway regardless of oncoming vehicles and there was every possibility that he was the main contributory to the accident;[29]

(i) the cumulative effect of evidence of witnesses was that the injuries suffered by the deceased were in consequence of a fall whereon the victim was standing giving way and not the immediate motion of the bus before the victim had completed the process of getting down from the bus;[30]

(j) the accused sitting on the tractor by side of the driver on the mudguard fell down and was fatally wounded, eyewitnesses traveling in the trolley though proved that the accident did take place but were unable to prove that there was any rashness or negligence on the part of the accused driver;[31]

(k) the oral evidence that the bus was driven in a rash and negligent manner and the driver of the bus arrived at the roundabout circle and took a short cut, thus, causing the accident, was contradictory to the documentary evidence, panchnama and rough sketch of the place of accident which revealed that the accident took place much before the circle, i.e., about 50 ft before the circle, therefore, the theory that the driver of the bus avoided taking the roundabout circle proceeded towards the right side of the road, appeared to be an untenable version being contrary to the documentary evidence;[32]

(l) the accident took place due to a mechanical defect in the motor vehicle and not due to rash or negligent driving of the accused driver;[33]2609

(m) the victims jumped out of the truck before it collided with a railway engine and there was nothing in the evidence to show whether the victims died due to jumping or due to collision between the truck and the railway engine.[34]

(n) where the death of the deceased was due to the slip when he was peeping down through the hole near a pulley to see whether the stone had been tied to the rope. The allegation is that the occupier has not provided safety and protective measures which led to the fall and consequently death of the deceased. This act of the deceased cannot be attributed to the accused persons stating that there was a rash and negligent act on the part of the accused persons.[35]

69. Hearing Accused before Sentence

The provision of sub-s 2 of s 248, CrPC,[36] contain a salutary principle and is mandatory and identical to s 235(2) of the said Code. The purpose for which the 'hearing' is given to the accused in both the sections is the same. When the fundamental requirement of hearing the accused before sentencing was not followed by the trial court, the sentences awarded by the trial court are vitiated and have to be set aside, and the matter has to be remanded to the trial court for the limited purpose of hearing the accused before sentencing, as required under s 248(2), CrPC .[37]

70. Benefit of Probation

When the accused has committed the offence only as a result of his over zealousness in the performance of his official duty, in attempting to apprehend thieves of the forest produce, he should be released under s 3 of the Probation of the Offenders Act after due admonition instead of sentencing him to any punishment.[38] Accused was a young man and only earning member of his family and he was a first offender and no previous sentence has been proved against him, in the circumstances, accused was directed to be released on probation.[39] Where the accused-truck driver was convicted under s 304A and persons were dependent upon him, he being a first offender and belonging to a poor family and there being no complaint of his conduct during the trial, the parties having also settled their dispute, the accused was directed to be released on probation under s 360, CrPC read with s 4 of Probation of Offenders Act, on furnishing a personal bond of Rs 10000/- with one surety of the like amount.[40] In another case, where the accused was convicted under s 304A, the Apex Court directed that the accused be released under s 360, CrPC, on entering into a bond with one surety to keep good conduct and good behaviour and peace for a period of one year.[41] However, where the accused in a motor accident case caused the death of 8 persons due to his rashness and negligence, he is not entitled to the benefit of s 360, Crpc or s 4 of Probation of Offenders Act (20 of 1958).[42] Where death is caused as a2610 result of rash and negligent driving, probation should not be granted in such cases. Lenient approach in such cases would increase road accident cases.[43]

Where the accused though not a qualified doctor was found guilty of the offence under s 304A for causing the death of the deceased by administering an injection, the occurrence which took place more than two decades ago there was no allegation of any misuse of bail by the accused, the benefit of s 4 of the Uttar Pradesh First Offenders Probation Act 1938 was given to the accused.[44] The release on probation of the accused convicted under s 304A depends upon the facts and circumstances of the case. In some cases,[45] the Apex Court granted the benefit of probation under s 4 of Probation of Offenders Act and s 361, CrPC .

71. Declining Probation

In Rattan Singh v State of Punjab ,[46] the Supreme Court held that the benefit of probation cannot be extended in a case where the accused was convicted for the offence under s 304A, IPC . Relying upon Rattan Singh's case, the Rajasthan High Court declined the benefit of probation to the accused convicted under s 304A, IPC in some cases.[47] The Supreme Court in State of Karnataka v Krishna alias Raju ,[48] has held that in cases of conviction under s 204-A, leniency should not be shown. In that case the sentence of fine of Rs 250/- under s 304A was found grossly inadequate and enhanced to 6 months rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 1000 and in default to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 2 months. Relying upon Krishan's case, the Rajasthan High Court declined the benefit of probation under s 279 read with s 304 .[49] Relying upon Krishna's case, the Apex Court in Dalbir Singh v State of Haryana [50] and bearing in mind the galloping rise in road accidents in India and the devastating consequence visiting the victims and their families, has held that criminal courts cannot treat the nature of the offence under s 304A as attracting the benevolent provisions of s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act (20 of 1958). In State of Himachal Pradesh v Varinder Singh ,[51] Himachal Pradesh High Court declined the benefit of Probation of Offenders Act to the convict under s 304A relying upon Dalbir Singh's case[52] and also the case of Aitha Chander Rao.[53] In case of rash and negligent driving, normally probation should not be granted. In such case(s) grant of probation would increase road accidents.[54]2611

In the case of Dalbir Singh v State of Haryana ,[55] it is clearly held that s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act, 1958 cannot be made applicable for the offence under s 304A, IPC where the accused is convicted.[56]

72. Probation Instead of undergoing Remainder of Sentence

In the light of the mitigating circumstances especially the accused's age and the fact that a solitary offence was attributed to him, it appeared to be too inequitous to direct him to undergo the remainder of the sentence. So, the accused was put on probation for a period of one year instead of subjecting him to undergo the actual sentence of imprisonment.[57]

73. Sentence

Sentence is a matter of discretion and the limits cannot be fixed by judicial precedents for all times to come.[58] When a life has been lost and circumstances of punishment show that the accused has large family to support and the proprietor of the truck has left his family in the cold, cannot be the mere ground for compassion.[59] Where fine forms a part of the sentence, the amount may be directed to be paid to the surviving relative of the deceased.[60]

While considering the quantum of sentence to be imposed for the offence of causing death by rash or negligent driving of automobiles, one of the prime considerations should be deterrence. A professional driver paddles the accelerator of the automobile almost throughout his working hours. He must constantly inform himself that he cannot afford to have a single moment of laxity or inattentiveness when his leg is on the paddle of a vehicle in locomotion. He must always keep in his mind the fear psyche that if he is convicted for the offence for causing the death of a human being due to his callous driving, he cannot escape jail sentence. This is the role which the courts can play, particularly at the level of the trial court for lessening the high rate of motor accidents due to callous driving of automobiles.[61]

In order to show compassion in favour of the accused, the overall conduct of the accused is very important. If after having committed the offence, which resulted in the death of two persons and injuries to three other persons, a strange defence is taken by the accused that he was not driving the vehicle, in such case he is not entitled to such compassion.[62] In the following cases of Ram Singh v State of Rajasthan and Poonma Ram v State of Rajasthan [63] the deterrent punishment for the offence under s 304A is emphasised.2612

When only the sentence of fine of Rs 250 was imposed upon the accused on his conviction under s 304A, IPC and the High Court also failed to enhance the sentence, the Apex Court enhanced the sentence to 6 months rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs 1000 in default of which to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 2 months.[64] When a life has been lost and circumstances of driving is deemed harsh, no compassion should be shown in the matter of punishment merely on ground that the accused has a large family to support and the proprietor of the truck has left his family in the cold.[65] Where the trial court and the appellate court convicted the accused under ss 279, 337, 338 and 304A, IPC, and sentenced, in revision the High Court reduced the sentence under s 304A to a fine for reasons that the collision took place because of the bursting of the front tyre of the complainants' car on account of which the car dashed against the lorry. The observations of the High Court did not find favour with the Apex Court as the possible cause of the collision because the bursting of the tyre was not accepted by the trial court and appellate court, and the evidence of the motor vehicles inspector also ruled out such possibility, observing that the sentence imposed by the courts should have a deterrent effect on potential wrong-doers and it should commensurate with the seriousness of the offence, and the discretion in awarding sentence should be exercised with due regard to the larger interests of society. The sentence of the accused under s 304A was enhanced to simple imprisonment for 6 months.[66]

75. Reduction of Sentence

Where the accused was of young age and the only bread earner to the family, his sentence was reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone by him.[67] However, this decision runs somewhat contrary to the decision of the Apex Court in Rattan Singh's case.[68] In some other cases where the incident leading to the conviction of the accused under s 304A, IPC took place a long time back[69] or accused was a young man,[70] or when accused had already undergone imprisonment for several months[71] or due to the lapse of several years in the trial,[72] or similar reason,[73] either the sentence of imprisonment was reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone or reduced to some other period. But the Rajasthan High Court in a case[74] has observed that mere pendency of case for 15 years cannot be a ground to interfere with the order of sentence. However, the same High Court in another case[75] on account of the fact that the incident occurred 16 years ago2613 enhanced the sentence of fine of Rs 2500/- under s 304A in place of maintaining the sentence of imprisonment. The Supreme Court also in an earlier case[76] opined that harassment of a criminal trial of more than 8 years and the expenses, which may have been incurred by the accused, is ground of reduction of sentence. The accused appellant after pouring petrol, had set the Tobacco stock on fire kept inside the house. The accused had been suffering from epilepsy and had been treated for that ailment, the sentence was reduced to the sentence already undergone.[77]

While considering the quantum of sentence to be imposed for the offence of causing death or injury by rash and negligent driving of automobiles, one of the prime considerations should be deterrence. The accused respondent by rash and negligent driving had caused the death of five persons. Reduction of sentence to a period of 15 days already undergone by the High Court was held not justified. Sentence was modified to six months RI.[78]

76. Compensation

Accused by rash and negligent driving had caused the death of six persons. Accused was aged 21 years of age and married. He had already served the sentence of two years RI awarded by the High Court. In appeal the Supreme Court directed the accused to pay Rs. 50 lakhs to the Government of India to be used for paying compensation to victims of motor accidents and further directed the respondent to do community service for two years.[79]Appellant accused while driving tanker in rash and negligent manner caused the death of the scooterist. There was no allegation that the appellant at the time of accident, was under the influence of liquor or any other substance impairing his driving skills. The sentence awarded to him was reduced to the period already undergone. In addition he was directed to pay Rs one lac as compensation to the mother of the deceased.[80]

77. Whether Conviction/Sentence both under Section 279 and Section 304A is Permissible

Commentary under the same heading in s 279, ante, Vol. 2, may be referred to.

Where a person is convicted and sentenced under this section, a separate conviction under s 279, IPC, for the minor offence which is included in the offence under s 304A, IPC, is not justified.[81]

78. Whether Conviction/Sentence inder Section 304A and under Section 121, Motor Vehicles Act 1939 (Now Motor Vehicles Act 1988) is Permissible

A person, convicted and sentenced under this section for rash or negligent driving, cannot again be punished for the same under s 121 of the Motor Vehicles Act 1939.[82]2614

79. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 304A

Where the accused was convicted under s 302, IPC by the sessions court but the evidence on record showed that the accused was driving the tractor negligently when the accident took place on a kacha road after leaving the main road causing death of the victim, the conviction of accused under s 302 was set aside and instead he was convicted under s 304A .[83]

Where both the accused were convicted for the offence of murder by the sessions court but, on appeal the High Court acquitted one of the accused as he had made a gift of three acres of land in favour of the widow of the deceased as compensation on account of loss of life of her husband and converted the conviction of another accused from s 302 to s 304A, the judgment of the High Court was criticised by the Apex Court and was therefore set aside and the matter was remanded to the High Court for rehearing.[84]

Where the accused-labourer was digging earth with spade, the deceased suffered injury when he came close to the accused, it was held that the accused ought to have been vigilant that nobody came in between the spade and the earth while he was digging, the act of the accused did not attract either s 302 or s 304 or s 80 but the act constituted criminal negligence and fell under s 304A, so, the conviction of the accused under s 302 was set aside and instead the accused was convicted under s 304A, IPC .[85] Where on the basis of evidence led by the prosecution it was difficult to hold that a case of murder was established with the accused intentionally driving the vehicle at high speed and then dashing against the scooter of the deceased in turn crushing the deceased under the truck, can be said to have been made out beyond reasonable doubt, the conviction of the accused under s 302 was altered to one under s 304A,

80. Alteration of Conviction from Section 304A to Section 302

Where there was enmity between the accused, and the accused was seen grappling with the deceased on the day of the incident, on being separated by witnesses the accused went running to his jeep and drove it on the wrong side towards the deceased at high speed and ran over him, the road on which incident took place was wide and deserted and no reason existed for the accused to take his jeep on the wrong side, in these circumstances the alteration of the conviction to s 302 by the High Court from s 304A, IPC, held by the sessions court was found proper by the Apex Court.[87]

Where the statement of eyewitness showed that the accused persons had called the deceased boy aged 11 years and gave him electric shock, and thereafter, threw his body into the river alongwith the wire, the statement of witness cannot be said to be absurd or inherently improbable in view of the fact that five burn injuries were found on the dead body of the deceased boy. As such, the injuries prime facie suggested direct contact of the deceased with live wire and not by the live wire falling in to river in which the boy was allegedly swimming, on these facts the order of the High Court quashing the charges under ss 302 and 304 framed by the sessions court and directing that the accused persons be proceeded only under s 304A, IPC and s 39 of Indian Electricity Act was not found proper, and the Apex Court directed the trial court to proceed with the trial on the basis of charges framed by it.[88]2615

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

[1][S. 304B.

Dowry death.--

(1) Where the death of a woman is caused by any burns or bodily injury or occurs otherwise than under normal circumstances within seven years of her marriage and it is shown that soon before her death she was subjected to cruelty or harassment by her husband or any relative of her husband for, or in connection with any demand for dowry, such death shall be called "dowry death", and such husband or relative shall be deemed to have caused her death.

Explanation.--(1) For the purposes of this sub-section "dowry" shall have the same meanings as in section 2 of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961 (28 of 1961).

(2) Whoever commits dowry death shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than seven years but which may extend to imprisonment for life.]2616

Comments

1. Scope

Even before this section was inserted in the IPC, the Apex Court in a case[2] stated that greed for dowry, indeed the dowry system as an institution, calls for severest condemnation. It is evident that legislative measures such as the Dowry Prohibition Act have not met with the success for which they were designed. Where death in such cases is due to the crime, the perpetrators frequently escape from the clutches of the law because of inadequate police investigation. The Apex Court emphasised the need for expeditious investigation of such cases and also the need of a female police officer of sufficient rank and status in the police force to be associated with the investigation from its very inception.

The highly injurious and deleterious effect on the girl, her parents and the society at large required legislative interference. It started with the enactment of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961, containing some penal provisions also. However, as the evil could not be taken care of by this soft statute, the IPC was amended first by inserting ch XX-A (containing only s 498-A, IPC) in it by the Criminal Law (Second Amendment) Act 1983 (46 of 1983); and then, by insertion of s 304B, IPC by the Dowry Prohibition (Amendment) Act 1986 (43 of 1986). Section 498 -A, IPC seeks to protect a married woman from being subjected to cruelty by her husband or his relative. Section 304B , IPC is aimed at those who indulge in 'dowry deaths'. To give teeth to these provisions, Act 46 of 1983 inserted s 113-A in the Evidence Act, permitting a court to presume, having regard to the circumstances of the case, that suicide by the woman was abetted by her husband or his relative. Similarly, Act 43 of 1986 inserted s 113B in the Evidence Act requiring some presumption to be drawn in case of dowry death. Amendment was also made in the CrPC making the offence of dowry death cognizable, non-bailable and triable by a court of session.[3]

So far as offence under s 304B, IPC is concerned, there may be different facts and circumstances of each case. There may be death of woman within two months of her marriage or within seven years of her marriage. There may be death of woman in an advanced stage of pregnancy. There may be death of a woman where demand of dowry is made, with some more cruelty or regular harassment by her husband or any relative of her husband.[4] To attract the provisions of s 304B, one of the main ingredients of the offence which is required to be established is that soon before her2617 death the deceased wife was subjected to cruelty and harassment in connection with the demand for dowry.[5]

Section 304B, IPC excludes all ingredients of ss 299 and 300, IPC .[6]

If all the other ingredients of s 304-B of the IPC are fulfilled, any death (whether homicidal or suicidal or accidental) and whether caused by burns or by bodily injury or occurring otherwise than under normal circumstances shall, as per the legislative mandate, be called a "dowry death" and the woman's husband or his relative "shall be deemed to have caused her death". The section clearly specifies what constitutes the offence of a dowry death and also identifies the single offender or multiple offenders who has or have caused the dowry death.[7]

Section 304B would apply both in cases of homicide and suicide, if the deceased is subjected to harassment and cruelty on account of dowry demand.[8]

2. Statement of Objects and Reasons

The Dowry Prohibition Act 1961 (28 of 1961) was enacted by the legislature effective from 1 July 1961. The Statement of Objects and Reasons for enactment of the legislation are as follows:

> The object of this bill is to prohibit the evil practice of giving and taking of dowry. This question has been engaging the attention of the Government for some time past, and one of the methods by which this problem, which is essentially a social one, was sought to be tackled by the conferment of improved property rights on women by the Hindu Succession Act 1956. It is, however, felt that a law which makes the practice punishable and at the same time ensures that any dowry, if given does ensure for the benefit of the wife will go a long way to educating public opinion and to the eradication of this evil. There has also been a persistent demand for such a law both in and outside Parliament. Hence the present Bill:
> (1) Ever since the Act came into being there is a sea of change by various amendments so as to make the Act more purposeful and punishment deterrent. Realising that despite the Dowry Prohibition Act, the evil practice of giving and taking of dowry remains unabated and dowry related offences were menacingly on the increase, the Act was amended by Act no 63 of 1984. After taking note of the observations of the Committee on Statute of Women in India and with a view to making a thorough and compulsory investigation into cases of dowry deaths and stepping up anti-dowry publicity, the Government referred the whole matter for consideration by a Joint Committee of both houses of Parliament. The Committee, after examining the whole matter in great depth in its proceedings, recommended the examination of the working of the Dowry Prohibition Act. The Act was further amended vide Act no 43 of 1986. The statement of objects and reasons are as follows:
> The Dowry Prohibition Act 1961 was recently amended by the Dowry Prohibition (Amendment) Act 1984 to give effect to certain recommendations2618 of the Joint Committee of the House of Parliament to examine the question of the working of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961 and to make the provisions of the Act more stringent and effective. Although the Dowry Prohibition (Amendment) Act 1984 was an improvement on the existing legislation, opinions have been expressed by representatives from women's voluntary organisations and others to the effect that the amendments made are still inadequate and the Act needs to be further amended.
> (2) It is, therefore proposed to further amend the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961 to make provisions therein more stringent and effective. The salient features of the Bill are:
> (a) The minimum punishment for taking or abetting the taking of dowry under s 3 of the Act has been raised to five years and a fine of rupees fifteen thousand.
> (b) The burden of proving that there was no demand for dowry will be on the person who takes or abets the taking of dowry.
> (c) The statement made by the person aggrieved by the offence shall not subject him to prosecution under the Act.
> (d) Any advertisement in any newspaper, periodical, journal or any other media by any person offering any share in his property or any money in consideration of the marriage of his son or daughter is proposed to be banned, and the person giving such advertisement and the printer or publisher of such advertisement will be liable for punishment with imprisonment of six months to five years or with fine up to fifteen thousand rupees.
> (e) Offences under the Act are proposed to be made non-bailable.
> (f) Provision has also been made for appointment of dowry prohibition officers by the state governments for the effective implementation of the Act. The dowry prohibition officers will be assisted by the Advisory Boards consisting of not more than five social welfare workers (out of whom at least two shall be women).
> (g) A new offence of 'dowry death' is proposed to be included in the Indian Penal Code and the necessary consequential amendments in the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973 and the Indian Evidence Act 1872 have also been proposed.[9]

In view of the aforesaid statement of objects and reasons, s 304B was incorporated in the IPC by the Dowry Prohibition (Amendment) Act 1986 with a view to curb the increasing menace of evil practice of giving and taking of dowry by imposing deterrent punishment.

3. Analogous Law

Section 113B of the Indian Evidence Act 1872 was inserted by the same Act 43 of 1986 wef 5 January 1986 It reads:

> "113B. Presumption as to dowry death.--When the question is whether a person has committed the dowry death of a woman and it is shown that soon before her death such woman had been subjected by such person to cruelty or harassment for, or in connection with, any demand for dowry, the Court shall presume that such person had caused the dowry death.
> Explanation.--For the purposes of this section "dowry death" shall have the same meaning as in section 304B of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860)."2619

4. Sections 304B and 306

Section 306 of the IPC is much broader in its application and takes within its fold one aspect of s 304B of the IPC . These two sections are not mutually exclusive. If a conviction for causing a suicide is based on s 304B of the IPC, it will necessarily attract s 306 of the IPC . However, the converse is not true.[10]

Cruelty or harassment sans any dowry demands which drives the wife to commit suicide attract the offence of 'abetment of suicide' under s 306, IPC which defines the offence and punishment for 'dowry death.'[11]

5. Sections 304B and 498A, IPC

Section 304B and 498A, IPC are both distinct and separate offences. The 'cruelty' is a common essential ingredient of both the offences. Under s 304B, it is the "dowry death" that is punishable and such death should have occurred within seven years of the marriage. In the statute, no such period is mentioned in s 498A, IPC . The husband or his relative would be liable for subjecting the woman to 'cruelty' any time after the marriage. A person charged and acquitted under s 304B can be convicted under s 498A, IPC . The demand of dowry is an essential ingredients to attract s 304B, IPC, whereas under s 498A, IPC the demand of dowry is not the basic ingredient of the offence. Therefore, even if there is acquittal under s 304B, IPC, still conviction under s 498A can be recorded under the law.[12]

6. Section 304B has no Retrospective Effect

Section 304B, IPC has no retrospective effect.[13]Article 20(1) of the Constitution provides protection in respect of conviction for offences. No person as per this provision of the Constitution shall be convicted of any offence except for violation of the law in force at the time of commission of the act charged as an offence nor be subject to a penalty greater than that which might have been inflicted under the law in force at the time of commission of the offence. Section 304B is a new offence inserted in the IPC wef 19 November 1986 when Act no 43 of 1986 came into force. A person committing such an offence prior to 19 November 1986 cannot be tried for the offence under s 304B as this provision of the law was non-existent,[14] nor a charge under s 304B can be framed against him.[15]

7. Death should be Homicidal and not Accidental--Burden of Proof of Accidental Death

It is well settled that before an accused can be held guilty of offence under s 304-B of the IPC, the prosecution has to establish that the homicidal death had taken place within seven years of the marriage. In case, the death is found to be accidental,2620 s 304B of the IPC is not at all attracted.[16]Having regard to the provision of s 113B of the Evidence Act together with s 304B of the IPC, if accused raises the question of accidental death, whereas all the ingredients of s 304B are satisfied by prosecution, the onus would lie upon the accused to prove that the housewife died in an accident.[17]

8. Essential Ingredients

A careful analysis of s 304B, shows that this section has the following essentials:[18]

(i) the death of a woman should be caused by burns or bodily injury or otherwise than under normal circumstances;
(ii) such death should have occurred within seven years of her marriage;
(iii) she must have been subjected to cruelty or harassment by her husband or any relative of her husband;
(iv) such cruelty or harassment should be for or in connection with demand of dowry;[19]
(v) such cruelty or harassment is shown to have been meted out to the woman soon before her death.[20]

In order to hold an accused guilty of an offence under s 304B, IPC, it has to be shown that apart from the fact that the woman died on account of burn or bodily injury, otherwise than under normal circumstances, within 7 years of her marriage, it has also to be shown that soon before her death, she was subjected to cruelty or harassment by her husband or any relative of her husband for, or in connection with, any demand for dowry. Only then would such death be called 'dowry death' and such husband or relative shall be deemed to have caused the death of the woman concerned.[21]

9. Jurisdiction

Where the occurrence of burning took place at Giridih, i.e., matrimonial house, the victim was immediately shifted to hospital at Bokaro where she died, the2621 consequence of death was result of demand of dowry and torture committed by accused persons and offence under s 304B completed at Bokaro, so, court where victim died has got the jurisdiction to try case.[22]

10. Mens Rea

The requirement of proving that soon before her death the woman was subjected to cruelty or harassment by her husband or any relation of her husband for or in connection with any demand of dowry clearly shows that the legislature had imbibed the necessary mens rea for the offence of dowry death.[23]

11. Death Otherwise than under Normal Circumstances

To attract s 304B, the death of the woman should be caused by any burns or bodily injury or have occurred otherwise than under normal circumstances, provided other ingredients of s 304B are also satisfied. Therefore, in addition to deaths by burn or bodily injury, other deaths under unnatural circumstances are also covered under s 304B, subject to satisfaction of other ingredients of the section. The death of the wife by strangulation,[24] or stomach ache without any history of any dreadful disease of the stomach,[25] are covered within deaths otherwise than under normal circumstances. The expression 'otherwise than under normal circumstances' would mean the death due to an unusual cause and under suspicious circumstances, if not caused by burns or bodily injury.[26]

When it is not a case of unnatural death the question whether the unnatural death of the woman was homicidal or suicidal is irrelevant for the purpose of s 304B . [27]Section 304B applies to a case of suicide, whether it is a sequel to cruelty or harassment with the demand of dowry.[28]

In a dowry death case, deceased died within seven years of marriage, of poisoning. There was evidence of the father of the deceased and one witness about the demand of dowry and harassment. The provisions of s 304B, IPC were attracted in the case. Appellant husband of the deceased was convicted under s 304B, IPC .[29]

Appellant husband was alleged to have administered poison to his deceased wife. Death could not be called unnatural as on examination of the bones and ashes of the deceased, no poisonous substance was found present. Merely because the deceased was a young lady, it could not be inferred/adjudged an unnatural death. There was no evidence of demand of dowry. Appellant husband was acquitted of the charge of murder under s 304B, IPC .[30]

A suicide note cannot be taken to be encyclopedia of the entire situation in which the deceased was placed. It is not possible to infer from the said note that the2622 deceased was unhappy in her matrimonial home. When a young married girl finds herself in helpless situation and decides to end her life, in the absence of any other circumstances, it is natural to infer that she was unhappy in her matrimonial home. A suicide note cannot be treated as conclusive of there being no one responsible for the situation when evidence on record categorically points to the harassment for dowry. The appellant husband was convicted under s 304, IPC .[31]

A young girl in her early twenties ending her life with 100% burns within eight months of her marriage due to ill treatment, by mother-in-law cannot be overlooked to show sympathy towards the mother-in-law found guilty for offences under ss 498A and 304B, IPC .[32]

Section 304B stipulates that 'where the death of a woman is caused by any burns or bodily injury or occurs otherwise than under normal circumstances'. It may appear that the former limb which is described by the words 'death caused by burns or bodily injury' is a redundant because such death would also fall within the wide province of death caused otherwise than under normal circumstances'. The former limb was inserted for highlighting that by no means death caused by burns or bodily injury should be treated as falling outside the ambit of the offence.[33]

12. Suicide by wife

The deceased committed suicide by hanging as she could not fulfil dowry demands made by accused husband. The deceased died unnatural death within seven years of marriage. There was pressure on the deceased to arrange a further sum of Rs.50,000/- and the consequent misdemeanor on the part of the appellant put serious apprehension on the mind of the deceased, that, if she continued to stay with the appellant, she might be assaulted physically and mentally. Threats by the husband of the deceased over the course of two days, when the deceased was in her matrimonial home might have been enough for the deceased who was in a fragile state of mind to reach breaking point and end her life. Accused appellant was convicted under s 304B, IPC .[35]

Allegation was that due to dowry demand the deceased wife committed suicide. The parents of the deceased deposed that she had committed suicide due to stomach ache. The PWS though in examination-in-chief deposed about dowry demand, but in cross- examination turned hostile. Evidence of dowry demand was not produced by prosecution. Accused husband was acquitted of charge under s 304B, IPC .[36]

There was no evidence to show dowry demand by the appellant husband. Parents of the deceased had not filed FIR, appellant husband had filed FIR, case against him2623 was registered on mere suspicion. Appellant accused alleged that the deceased insisted to go to her parents house, she was not allowed, so she committed suicide, the defence version was accepted. Appellant accused was acquitted of charge under s 304B, IPC .[37]

Suicide note written by the deceased in her handwriting signed by her exculpated the accused husband and in-laws. Reasonable doubt was created about prosecution story. Accused husband was acquitted of the charge under s 304B and s 498A, IPC .[38]

In the case of burning the fracture of skull is not a necessary fact but in the present case the skull bones were broken. Therefore, the fact remains that she was killed before death. It was not a case of suicide. The evidence of PWS clearly showed the greed of the accused who was persistently taunting and harassing the deceased for not having brought sufficient dowry. Conviction of the appellant mother-in-law under s 304B, IPC was proper.[39]

Dowry death -- Suicide by pregnant woman

A pregnant woman ordinarily would not commit suicide unless relationship with her husband comes to such a pass that she would be compelled to do so.[40]

13. News of Death and Cremation of wife not sent to her Parents--Effect

The deceased died after eating the prasad and thereafter she was neither taken to any doctor, nor any treatment was given to her. The most suspicious circumstance which supported the story of the prosecution was that the news of the death of the deceased was not sent to the parents of the deceased who were living only a few miles away from the village of the accused. The accused persons clandestinely, secretly and hurriedly cremated the deceased without informing the factum of death to the parents of the deceased. This circumstance strongly proved and lent immense credibility to the prosecution version.[41] But the conviction of the accused husband merely because he did not inform about death of the deceased to her maternal relations is not proper.[42]

Where between 10 am to 5 pm neither the husband nor the in-laws took any step to inform the concerned police about the so-called accidental fall or the death due to hanging as noticed by one of the accused. This would only indicate that they were very well aware of the cause or reason why the deceased met with unnatural death. But they were reluctant to intimate the concerned authority or the parents of the deceased themselves. This would only suggest though the inmates of the house of2624 husband of victim were very well aware of the cause of death of the deceased, they came out with false explanation. Therefore, by taking recourse to s 106 of the Evidence Act, adverse inference can be drawn against them.[43]

The disposal of the dead body in a hush-hush manner clearly established that the accused had done so with the sole object of concealing the real cause of death. Even the parents of the deceased were not informed. Accused appellant husband was convicted for offence under s 304B, IPC .[44]

When the dead body was disposed of, in unceremonious way without giving information to parents of the deceased, the accused was found liable for adverse inference.[45]

14. Accused not Saving his Wife and Taking Long Time in Taking Victim to Hospital etc.--Effect

Where the incident took place at about 12 noon as was apparent from statement of deceased wife made before the investigation officer. Her MLC clearly went to depict that she was brought to the hospital at about 1.40 pm. Besides the accused persons took unusually long time to bring the deceased to the hospital, i.e., nearly an hour and forty minutes considering the distance being of nearly 8 kilometers. The plea of the accused persons that they had promptly rushed deceased to the hospital and their conduct as not of guilty persons does not cut any ice.[46]

The conduct of the accused can also establish his guilt; firstly that the evidence nowhere shows that the accused tried to save his wife as no burn injury on the person of the accused was found. It is a natural phenomenon that in case if the wife of anybody has caught fire on account of any reason then that person would certainly try to save the life of his wife and in this process the person saving the life of his wife will also sustain burn injuries if there was no burn injury found on the person of the accused which may clearly suggest that the accused did not make any attempt to save the life of his wife. The second aspect is that the accused instead of making efforts to save the life of his wife, wasted the time for making irrelevant efforts. The occurrence in this case had taken place at 10.30 pm in the night but the report of this incident was lodged at 2.45 pm at the police station. The doctor found that there were 95 percent burns over the body of deceased, hence in view of the injuries, she needed immediate medical aid, but the accused instead of providing her immediate medical aid, tried to inform the different persons that his wife is burnt and this conduct of the accused shows that he infact tried to create the defence since very beginning.[47] But when information of death of wife was sent to the parents of the deceased to their village, but when no one arrived in time, the dead body was disposed of, no adverse inference can be drawn against accused.[48]2625

15. Expression 'Soon before' used in this Section, Section 113B and Illustration (A) of Section 114, Evidence Act

A conjoint reading of s 113B of the Evidence Act and s 304-B, IPC shows that there must be material to show that soon before her death, the victim was subjected to cruelty or harassment. Prosecution has to rule out the possibility of a natural or accidental death so as to bring it within the purview of the 'death occurring otherwise than in normal circumstances'. The expression 'soon before' is very relevant where s 113B of the Evidence Act and s 304B, IPC are pressed into service. Prosecution is obliged to show that soon before the occurrence there was cruelty or harassment and only in that case presumption operates. Evidence in that regard has to be led by prosecution. 'Soon before' is a relative term and it would depend upon circumstances of each case and no strait-jacket formula can be laid down as to what would constitute a period of 'soon before' the occurrence. It would be hazardous to indicate any fixed period, and that brings in the importance of a proximity test both for the proof of an offence of dowry death as well as for raising a presumption under s 113-B of the Evidence Act . The expression 'soon before her death' used in the substantive s 304B, IPC and s 113B of the Evidence Act is present with the idea of proximity test. No definite period has been indicated and the expression 'soon before' is not defined. A reference to expression 'soon before' used in s 114, illust (a) of the Evidence Act is relevant. It lays down that a court may presume that a man who is in the possession of goods soon after the theft, is either the thief or has received the goods knowing them to be stolen, unless he can account for his possession. The determination of the period which can come within the term 'soon before' is left to be determined by the courts, depending upon facts and circumstances of each case. Suffice, however, to indicate that the expression 'soon before' would normally imply that the interval should not be much between the concerned cruelty or harassment and the death in question. There must be existence of a proximate and live-link between the effects of cruelty based on dowry demand and the concerned death. If alleged incident of cruelty is remote in time and has become stale enough not to disturb mental equilibrium of the woman concerned, it would be of no consequence.[49]

16. 'Soon before Death'

The expression 'soon before' is very relevant where s 113B of the Evidence Act and s 304B, IPC are pressed into service. The prosecution is obliged to show that soon before the occurrence there was cruelty or harassment and only in that case presumption operates. Evidence in that regard has to be led by the prosecution. 'Soon before' is a relative term and it would depend upon the circumstances of each case and no straitjacket formula can be laid down as to what would constitute a period soon before the occurrence. It would be hazardous to indicate any fixed period. The importance of a proximity test lies both for proof of an offence of dowry death, as well as for raising a presumption under s 113B of the Evidence Act . The expression 'soon before her death' used in the substantive s 304B, IPC, and s 113B of the Evidence Act is pregnant with the idea of proximity test. No definite period has been indicated and the expression 'soon before' is not defined. A reference to the expression 'soon after' used in s 114, illust (a) of the Act is relevant. It lays down2626 that a court may presume that a man who is in possession of the goods, soon after the theft, is either the thief or has received the goods knowing them to be stolen, unless he can account for his possession. The determination of the period which can come within the term 'soon before' is left to be determined by the courts, depending upon the facts and circumstances of each case. However, to indicate that the expression soon before would normally imply that the interval should not be much, between the concerned cruelty or harassment and the death in question. There must be existence of a proximate and live link between the effect of cruelty based on dowry demand and the concerned death. If the alleged incident of cruelty is remote in time and has become stale enough not to disturb mental equilibrium of the woman concerned, it would be of no consequence.[50] Days or months are not what is to be seen. The word 'soon' does not mean 'immediate'. A fair and pragmatic construction keeping in mind the great social evil that has led to the enactment of s 304B would make it clear that the expression is a relative expression. Time lags may differ from case to case. All that is necessary is that the demand for dowry should not be stale but should be the continuing cause for the death of the married woman under s 304B .[51]

Where there is no evidence that the wife was subjected to cruelty and harassment soon before her death, the husband or his relative would not be convicted on the charge of dowry death under s 304B, IPC . Conviction of the husband was set aside.[52]

It is not enough that harassment or cruelty was caused to the woman with a demand for dowry at some time, if s 304B, IPC is to be invoked. However, it should have happened soon before her death. The said phrase no doubt is an elastic expression and can refer to a period either immediately before her death or within a few days or even a few weeks before it. However, the proximity to her death is the pivot indicated by that expression. The legislative object in providing such a radius of time by employing the words 'soon before her death, is to emphasis the idea that her death should, in all probability have been the aftermath of such cruelty or harassment. In other words, there should be a perceptible nexus between her death and the dowry related harassment or cruelty inflicted on her. If the interval elapsed between the infliction of such harassment or cruelty and her death, is wide, the court would be in a position to gauge that in all probability the death would not have been the immediate cause of her death. Hence, it is for the court to decide on the facts and circumstances of each case, whether the said interval in that particular case was sufficient to snuff its cord from the concept soon before her death.[53] It is obvious from this provision that the term 'soon before her death' has been employed by the2627 Parliament to refer to cruelty or harassment which has meted out in proximity to the death has to be considered as the cause of the death. The provision does not employ the term 'at any time before' nor 'immediately before' and must be construed according to its true import.[54] The expression 'soon before her death' is not defined. The determination of period which can come within the term 'soon before' is left to be determined by the court depending upon the facts and circumstances of each case.[55]The word 'shown' in s 304B, IPC means to "prove". In other words, it is for the prosecution to prove that a 'dowry death' has occurred, namely: (i) that the death of a woman has been caused in abnormal circumstances by her having been burned or having been bodily injured, (ii) within seven years of a marriage, (iii) and that she was subjected to cruelty or harassment by her husband or any relative of her husband, (iv) in connection with any demand for dowry, and (v) that the cruelty or harassment meted out to her continued to have a causal connection or a live link with the demand of dowry.[56]

The words 'soon before her death' do not necessarily mean immediately before her death. This phrase is an elastic expression and can refer to a period either immediately before death of the deceased or within a few days or few weeks before death. In other words, there should be a perceptible nexus between the death of the deceased and the dowry related harassment or cruelty inflicted on her.[57]

In the present case the deceased died about 7 months after her marriage. There was evidence that she had been harassed for dowry 10 or 15 days before her death. Section 304B , IPC was held attracted in the case.[58]

Cruelty caused to the deceased on any day from the date of her marriage i.e. 20.04.1994 till the date of her death i.e. 22.07.1994 could be cruelty caused 'soon before' her death. Death of the deceased took place within three months and four days. There was evidence that the appellant husband was unhappy over the quantity and quality of the dowry given in marriage. The husband appellant was convicted under s 304B .[59]

Whether or not the cruelty or harassment meted out to the victim for or in connection with the demand of dowry was 'soon before her death' and the proximate cause of her death, under abnormal circumstances, would depend upon the facts of each case. There can be no fixed period of time in this regard.[60]

The basic ingredient of s 304B, IPC is that there should be evidence of cruelty or harassment soon before the death. Thus, when the nearest relatives of the deceased stated that she had complained of cruelty, and that the accused persons wanted more2628 dowry but as there was no evidence of causing cruelty to her by the accused persons in relation to demand of dowry soon before her death, their discharge by the sessions court under s 304B was found proper.[61] Where there was no evidence that soon before her death, the deceased was subjected to cruelty or harassment by the accused husband for or in connection with any demand of dowry, case was not covered by s 304B, IPC .[62]

The expression 'soon before death' has to be given its due meaning as the legislature has not specified any time which would be the period prior to death, that would attract the provisions of s 304B of IPC . The concept of reasonable time would be applicable, which would primarily depend upon the facts of the case, the conduct of the parties and the impact of cruelty and harassment inflicted upon the deceased in relation to demand of dowry to the cause of unnatural death of the deceased. Where the marriage itself has not survived even for a period of two years, the entire period would be a relevant factor in determining such an issue.[63]

17. Cruelty, Demand of Dowry not soon before Death--Effect

The proximity of time between the alleged ill-treatment and time of death is a highly relevant factor, and is an essential and necessary evidence for proof of dowry death.[64]

To attract the provisions of s 304B, one of the main ingredients of the offence which is required to be established is that 'soon before her death', she was subjected to cruelty and harassment in connection with the demand for dowry.[65] The criminal liability under s 304B, IPC is attracted not just by the demand of dowry but by the act of cruelty or harassment by the husband or any relative of her husband in connection with such demand; thus, unless such an act of cruelty or harassment is proved to have been caused by the accused to the deceased soon before her death in connection with the demand of dowry, the accused cannot be held to be liable for the offence of dowry death under s 304B, IPC .[66] Merely making of dowry demand would not attract the provisions of s 304B, IPC .[67]There was no evidence that any demand of dowry was made soon before the death of the deceased. The cause of action for committing the offence was an ego problem on the part of the appellant, namely, the deceased had not been coming to her matrimonial home on her own, while he had been coming to his home on leave. Appellant husband was acquitted of the charge under s 304B, IPC .[68] When the demand of dowry is made soon after marriage by the accused but beyond the range2629 of 'soon before death' of the deceased woman, s 304B is not attracted.[69] Likewise is the position when there is a gap of two,[70] or three to four, years between the harassment by the husband and the in-laws on account of monetary claims which had been satisfied, and the suicide committed by the deceased woman as the nexus or interconnection between these two is not established, but when the gap between the death and last demand of dowry is of two months,[71] there is direct nexus between the two and it can be reasonably inferred that the victim was subjected to cruelty in connection with the demand of dowry soon before her death. Some cruelty, harassment meted out to the deceased one year prior to the date when the deceased committed suicide without anything more was held not cruelty inflicted soon before the death. Appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 304B, IPC .[72]Where there was reliable evidence of the father and brother of the deceased that the deceased had been harassed 10 or 15 days before her death for dowry, appellant husband was convicted under s 304B, IPC .[73]

Where there was no cogent evidence against the appellants/accused that they subjected the deceased to cruelty or harassment for demand of dowry soon before her death, the accused appellants could not be held guilty for the offence of causing death of the deceased wife. Merely because the dead body of the deceased was found inside the house of the husband, the husband cannot be convicted for offence under s 304B, IPC .[74]

Where there is no allegation or evidence of demand of dowry, s 304B, IPC would not be attracted.[75]

18. 'Within Seven Years of Marriage'

The death of a woman in unnatural circumstances must be caused within seven years of marriage to attract s 304B, IPC, or the presumption under ss 113A and 113B of the Evidence Act, if other conditions are also satisfied. When death of the wife by burning took place beyond a period of 8 years[76] from the date of marriage, neither s 304B, IPC, nor s 113A, Indian Evidence Act 1872 is attracted. Where no evidence regarding the date of marriage was tendered, as such it was not proved that death occurred within seven years of marriage, appellant accused was not convicted for offence under s 304B, IPC .[77]

19. Misunderstanding between Accused and his Deceased Wife

If it was a case of misunderstanding between the accused and the deceased, the same would not automatically lead to the conclusion that the accused had committed an offence under s 304-B of the IPC . The law does not raise any such presumption.[78]2630

20. Cruelty

The expression 'cruelty' postulates such treatment as to cause reasonable apprehension in the mind of the wife that her living with the husband will be harmful and injurious to her life. To decide the question of cruelty the relevant factors are the matrimonial relationship between the husband and wife, their cultural and temperamental state of life, their state of health and their interaction in daily life.[79] Human reactions may be different and the more sensitive persons may react more violently even to minor incidents. At the same time, however, unless cruelty is demonstrated to be of a level that would give rise to suicide or it has in fact given rise to the committing of suicide, it would not be correct to record a conviction under s 304B, even in a situation where conviction under s 498A, IPC, is justified. While in many instances the two offences could lead one to the other, there could be and there are many situations in which this is not necessarily so.[80] Explanation to s 498A gives the meaning of cruelty. In s 304B, there is no such explanation about the meaning of 'cruelty'. However, having regard to the common background of these offences, it has to be taken that the meaning of 'cruelty or harassment' is the same as prescribed in the explanation to s 498A under which 'cruelty' by itself amounts to an offence.[81]

Thus, the ordinary dictionary meaning of 'cruelty' would not be applicable to hold that it is vague being interpreted in so many ways. Obviously, the legislature has defined the term 'cruelty' while keeping in view the object which was required to be achieved.[82]

The meaning of the word 'cruelty' for the purpose of s 304B, IPC has to be gathered from the language as it appeared in the explanation of s 498A, wherein cruelty means 'any willful conduct which is of such a nature as is likely to drive the woman to commit suicide or to cause grave injury or danger to life, limb or health (whether mental or physical) of the woman or such harassment to coerce her or any other person related to her to meet any unlawful demand for any property or valuable security or is on account of failure by her or any person related to her to meet such demand'.[83]

Whether one spouse has been guilty of cruelty to the other is essentially a question of fact.

The impact of complaints, accusations or taunts on a person amounting to cruelty depends on various factors like the sensitivity of the individual victim concerned, the social background, the environment, education etc. Further, mental cruelty varies from person to person depending on the intensity of sensitivity and the degree of courage or endurance to withstand such mental cruelty. In other words, each case has to be decided on its own facts to decide whether mental cruelty was established.[84] When persistent and continuous demands for dowry by the accused-husband were not met by his father-in-law and mother-in-law, with the accused going to the extent of even disowning his deceased wife, it is needless to say that such conduct of the2631 accused is eloquent proof of his having subjected the deceased to mental cruelty.[85] Where deceased died within seven years of marriage, the prosecution evidence established that the accused appellants had mentally harassed the deceased for bringing insufficient dowry, conviction of the appellants accused under ss 304B, 498A and 306, IPC was upheld.[86]

Cruelty referable to dowry harassment could be brought under s 304B, but there is need for Parliament to consider such legislation as is necessary to enlarge the scope of s 304B, to include such cruelty meted out to a wife other than only such cruelty referable to dowry harassment.[87]

21. Dowry

For the purposes of sub-s 1 of s 304B, 'dowry' shall have the same meaning as in s 2 of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961 in view of the explanation to sub-s 1 of s 304B .[88] Section 2 of Dowry Prohibition Act is as follows:

> " S. 2 . Definition of "dowry".--In this Act, "dowry" means any property or valuable security given or agreed to be given either directly or indirectly--
> (a) by one party to a marriage to the other party to the marriage; or > (b) by the parents of either party to a marriage or by any other person, to either party to the marriage or to any other person.
> at or before or any time after the marriage in connection with the marriage of the said parties, but does not include dower or mahr in the case of persons to whom the Muslim Personal Law (Shariat) applies.
> Explanation 1.--.
> Explanation 2.--The expression "valuable security" has the same meaning as in s 30 of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860)."

According to the definition of 'dowry', any property or valuable security given or agreed to be given either at or before or anytime after the marriage, comes within the meaning of dowry.[89] 'Dowry' definition is to be interpreted with the other provisions of the Act including s 3, which refers to giving or taking dowry and s 4 which deals with penalty for demanding dowry under the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961 and the IPC . This makes it clear that even the demand of dowry on other ingredients being satisfied is punishable.[90] Customary payments in connection with the birth of a child or other ceremonies, are not enveloped within ambit of 'dowry'.[91]

The definition of 'dowry' beyond all proportions is not permissible by s 2 of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961. To illustrate, after 4 or 5 years of marriage the husband, being in some difficulty in his business, requests or demands some money from his father-in-law directly or through his wife, only with the view that he is able2632 to advance in life. Such demand cannot be termed as 'dowry'.[1] The demand of Rs 50,000 made by the husband and in-laws of the deceased after 4 years of marriage for sending the husband's brother abroad cannot be termed as 'dowry' under s 2 of the Dowry Prohibition Act .[2]

22. Demand of Dowry

The deep rooted social evil of dowry requires to be controlled not only by effective implementation of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961, but also by society. Society has to find out ways and means of controlling and combating this menace of receipt and payment of dowry. It appears that instead of controlling payment and receipt of dowry in one or other form, it is increasing even in the educated class. It may be that it is increasing because of accumulation of unaccounted wealth with the few and others having lesser means following the same out of compulsion.[3]Demand neither conceives nor would conceive of any agreement. If for convicting any offender, agreement for dowry is to be proved, hardly any offenders would come under the clutches of law. When s 304-B refers to 'demand of dowry', it refers to the demand of property or valuable security as referred to in the definition of 'dowry' under the Act.[4] Dowry should be any property or valuable security given or agreed to be given in connection with marriage.[5]

However, the crucial words are 'in connection with the marriage of the said parties'.[6] Demand of any property/valuable security, directly or indirectly having nexus with marriage is dowry demand for the purpose of s 304B, IPC .[7]

If a demand for property or valuable security, directly or indirectly, has a nexus with marriage, such demand would constitute 'demand of dowry, the cause or reason for such demand being immaterial.[8]

When persistent demands for TV and scooter are made from the bride after marriage or from her parents, it would be a case of demand of dowry within the meaning of s 304B .[9] The persistent demand for money from bride or her parents after marriage for purpose of kidney transplantation, would constitute to be in connection with marriage and would be a case of demand of dowry.[10] Where the bride committed suicide not on account of any demand, but on account of harassment caused by the accused husband, conviction of the accused under s 304B, IPC was converted into one under s 306, IPC .[11]2633

Where wife had committed suicide within eight months of marriage, there was adequate evidence that the wife was subjected to torture in connection with demand of dowry by the appellant husband, she was also not allowed to visit her parents, the appellant husband was convicted under s 304B, IPC .[12]

Where evidence of the members of the family of the deceased about dowry demand is reliable and inspires confident, non-production of independent witness(es) to prove the same would not be fatal to the prosecution case.[13]

Where as per the statement of the prosecution witness, the financial position of the accused was good, and one prosecution witness stated that only the accused demanded Rs 50,000 while the other witness stated that demand was also made by the father of the accused, the story regarding the demand of dowry was first made in the FIR which was lodged after seven months of the incident, on these facts it was held that the demand of dowry was not proved and the accused had to be acquitted.[14]

Evidence did not prove demand of dowry, ill-treatment or harassment. The deceased had received 99% burn injuries, was suffering from mental illness, her dying declaration was also not found reliable. Accused appellant was acquitted of charges under ss 304B, 306 and 498A, IPC .[15]

23. Greed for Dowry

The greed for dowry is explained by the Apex Court in the following words:

child in this holy land of ours where in good old days the belief was (where woman is worshipped there is abode of God). We have mentioned about dowry thrice, because this demand is made on three occasions: (i) before marriage; (ii) at the time of marriage; and (iii) after the marriage, greed being limitless, the demands become insatiable in many cases followed by torture on the girl, leading to either suicide in some cases or murder in some.16

24. Demand of Dowry--Agreement not Necessary

Explanation to s 304B, IPC refers to dowry 'as having the same meaning as in s 2 of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961'. The question is what is the scope of dowry, as defined therein.

The offence under s 304B, IPC, makes the demand of dowry itself punishable. It is significant that s 4 of the 1961 Act, was also amended by means of Act 63 of 1984, under which it is an offence to demand dowry directly or indirectly from the parents or other relatives or guardian of a bride. The word agreement referred to in s 2 has to be inferred from the facts and circumstances of each case. The interpretation that the appellant seeks that there can be conviction only if there is an agreement for dowry is misconceived. This would be contrary to the mandate and2634 object of the Act. The definition of dowry is to be interpreted with the other provisions of the Act including s 3, which refers to giving or taking dowry and s 4 which deals with penalty for demanding dowry, under the 1961 Act and the IPC . This makes it clear that even a demand of dowry on the ingredients being satisfied is punishable. This leads to the inference that when persistent demands for a TV and scooter are made from the bride, after marriage or from her parents, it would constitute to be in connection with the marriage and it would be a case of demand of dowry within the meaning of s 304B, IPC . It is not always necessary that there be any agreement for dowry.[17]The word 'agreement' referred to in s 2 has to be inferred from the facts and circumstances of each case. The interpretation, that conviction can only be if there is agreement for dowry, is misconceived. This would be contrary to the mandate and object of the Act. 'Dowry' definition is to be interpreted with the other provisions of the Act including s 3, which refers to giving or taking dowry and s 4 which deals with a penalty for demanding dowry, under the Act and the IPC . This makes it clear that even demand of dowry on other ingredients being satisfied is punishable. It is not always necessary that there be any agreement for dowry.[18] Testimony of brother and father of deceased as to payment of part of dowry, cannot be discarded on ground that they failed to establish that there was an agreement to pay the dowry.[19]

The Andhra High Court was of the view that unless any prior agreement to pay some valuable security, money etc is proved, demands made for 'amounts' will not fall under 'dowry' and the accused is not liable for an offence punishable under s 304B .[20] However, this view of the Andhra Pradesh High Court being contrary to the decision of the Supreme Court[21] shall be deemed to be impliedly overruled.

25. Cases not Falling under 'Demand of Dowry'

Following are the instances which were not found to be 'demand of dowry' within the meaning of s 304B, IPC :

(a) when there was no evidence on record to show that land was demanded as dowry though it was given by the father of the deceased woman in the marriage ritual as Pasupukumuma, the harassment or cruelty meted out to the deceased by the husband after marriage, to force her to transfer the land in his name was 'not in connection with any demand for dowry'.[22]

(b) where letters written by the deceased to her sister, mother and friend as well as the suicide note and letters written by her mother to her did not show any demand of dowry, and make the case projected by the prosecution at the trial about demand of a car unacceptable, and there was no evidence on record to suggest that the deceased was being maltreated or tortured, except that she was constantly being taunted for not bringing a car as dowry.[23]2635

(c) Customary payment in connection with birth of child or other ceremonies are not enveloped within the ambit of 'dowry'.[24]

(d) When there is no consistency with regard to the amount of gold allegedly demanded, and the statement of witnesses regarding the promise to give gold after marriage was missing from their earlier statement under s 161, CrPC, recorded by the investigating officer, such demands were found as not falling within the meaning of dowry.[25]

(e) The demand made by the accused from the date of the function, held, to celebrate the seventh month of pregnancy and onwards, cannot be styled as a demand in connection with the marriage. Such demands have no nexus with the marriage and so the conviction of the accused for the offence under s 304B is unsustainable in law.[26]

(f) The demand of Rs 50,000/- made by the husband and her in-laws after four years of marriage for sending her husband's brother abroad cannot be termed as 'dowry' under s 2 of the Dowry Prohibition Act 1961.[27]

(g) When evidence led by the prosecution regarding demand of Rs 15,000 by the accused-husband was self-contradictory, and even otherwise, such mere demand does not constitute cruelty or harassment.[28]

(gg) Verbal alteration about money matters between the accused husband and the deceased wife.[29]

(h) Where the parents of the deceased-wife presented a dining-table to the accused voluntarily but the accused expressed his preference to cash instead of table does not constitute cruelty, harassment.[30]

(i) Where in the letter written by accused to father of deceased wife, he only requested him to help in getting service, it is not a demand for dowry.[31]

(j) Demand of clothes from parents of the deceased/wife for family members of the accused husband in function, i.e., Akhand Ramayan Katha organized at place of the accused and about condition for parents of the accused to live separately from couple do not come within definition of dowry.[32]

(k) A demand for money on account of some financial stringency or for meeting some urgent domestic expenses or for purchasing manure cannot be termed as a demand for dowry as the said word is normally understood.[33]2636

(l) Demand of money by accused husband to repay loan is not dowry demand.[34]

(m) Demand made by the accused husband for purchasing a computer to start a business six months after the marriage, would not be in connection with the marriage and is not really a 'dowry demand' within the meaning of s 2 of the Dowry Prohibition Act, 1961. Conviction of the accused under s 304B, IPC was set aside.[35]

Where the bride is subjected to ill-treatment and harassment which leads the wife to commit suicide by consuming poison, but it is not related to dowry demand, accused would not be convicted under s 304B, IPC . Conviction of the accused under s 304B, IPC was converted under s 306, IPC .[36]

26. Section 304B and Section 498A --Distinction

The offence punishable under s 304B, IPC, known as dowry death, was a new offence created by insertion of the provision in the IPC providing for a more stringent offence than s 498A .[37]Sections 304B and 498A cannot be held to be mutually exclusive. These provisions deal with two distinct offences.[38] Under s 304B, it is 'dowry death', i.e., punishable, and such death should have occurred within 7 years of marriage. No such period is mentioned in s 498A .[39] Unlike s 304B, it is not necessary to establish demand of dowry for conviction under s 498A .[40] If death occurs due to cruelty under the wider definition of 'cruelty' under s 498-A, and is not referable to cruelty in connection with demand of dowry required under s 304B, then it would not be permissible for the court to convict a person under s 304B, although he may be liable for conviction under s 498A .[41]

Unless cruelty is demonstrated to be of a level which would give rise to suicide or that it has in fact given rise to the committing of the suicide, it would not be correct to record a conviction under s 304B even in a situation where conviction under s 498A is justified.[42]

Husband in ss 304B and 498A need not be a legally married person.[43]

28. 'Any Relative of her Husband'

The expression 'relative of the husband' in s 304B, IPC would mean such persons, who are related by blood, marriage or adoption.[44]2637

The respondent brother of the husband's aunt by marriage, who is not relative of her husband within the meaning of s 304B, IPC was not prosecuted under s 304B, IPC, the order summoning him as accused was quashed.[45]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

[S. 304B.

Dowry death.--

29. Death of second Wife--Whether Section 304B Attracted

It is the duty of the court to give effect to the legislative intendment which was directed towards punishing husbands who indulge in atrocities against their spouses, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary all these provisions will have to be applied on the footing that the marriage is presumed to be a valid one, and the parties are presumed to be husband and wife unless the contrary is established. It is to be noted that unless this view is enforced that it will lead to an atrocious situation with double injustice being done to the victim-women who are led through ceremonies of marriage and imparted the status of a wife, in situations where they are not aware of the possible impediments, and if those impediments are upheld to the benefit of the wrong doer-husband, it would lead to the unthinkable and untenable conclusion of allowing a party to take advantage of his own wrong and that is not the scheme of the law.[46] The fact that the deceased was second wife and not legally wedded wife of the accused is no ground to hold that conviction under s 304-B and s 498-A is not attracted.[47]

The provisions of both the IPC and the Dowry Prohibition Act would apply in all cases where there is evidence of marriage between the parties, unless and until it is established that the marriage in question was a void marriage. Even as far as the latter position is concerned, drawing a parallel with the provisions relating to the legitimacy of children in the case of void or voidable marriage, it would be in the interest of justice, perhaps be permissible to construe that even in cases where a marriage was declared void at a point of time after the commission of the offence the court would still treat the parties as having deemed to be husband and wife on the date of commission of the offence.[48]

However, a contrary view is taken by the Madhya Pradesh High Court in a case,[49] where the victim was the second wife of the accused who at the time of the second marriage already had a wife living, holding that the marriage with the victim was thus void in view of the provisions of ss 5 and 11 of the Hindu Marriage Act 1955, and thus, the marriage of the victim and the accused-husband was not a marriage in the eyes of law, and the accused cannot be treated as the husband of the deceased for the purposes of ss 304B and 498A, IPC, the charges framed against the accused under these two sections were quashed, and it was directed that the trial shall proceed against the accused under s 306, IPC .[50]

30. Section 304B Applies even if the Marriage is not valid

Where in the marriage of the deceased with accused no religious rites were performed and the mandap was not made and there was total absence of participation of the priest and the barber in the said marriage and the said marriage in *Chumauna*2638 form was performed in the house of prosecution witness, who was the maternal uncle of the deceased. It, therefore, appeared that the marriage of the deceased with accused was definitely unlawful and void ab initio, but in view of the evidence on the record, it was crystal clear that the deceased was living in the house of the accused persons leading marital life as husband and wife for the last one year prior to the occurrence. The Apex Court has settled the controversy regarding the concept of the marriage for the purposes of s 304-B of the IPC in the case of Rema Aggarwal v Anupam ,[51] and has thus observed in para 12:

> The concept of marriage to constitute the relationship of 'husband' and 'wife' may require strict interpretation where claims for civil rights, right to property etc may follow or flow and a liberal approach and different perception cannot be an anathema when the question of curbing a social evil is concerned.

The Apex Court has further observed:

> The concept of "dowry" is intermittently linked with a marriage and the provisions of the Dowry Act apply in relation to marriages. If the legality of the marriage itself is an issue further legalistic problems do arise. If the validity of the marriage itself is under legal scrutiny, the demand of dowry in respect of an invalid marriage would be legally not recognizable. Even then the purpose for which Sections 498 -A and 304-B, IPC and Section 113-B of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872 (for short the "Evidence Act") were introduced cannot be lost sight of. Legislations enacted with some policy to curb and alleviate some public evil rampant in society and effectuate a definite public purpose or benefit positively requires to be interpreted with certain element of realism too and not merely pedantically or hyper-technically. The obvious objective was to prevent harassment to a woman who enters into a marital relationship with a person and later on, becomes a victim of the greed for money. Can a person who enters into a marital arrangement be allowed to take a shelter behind a smokescreen to contend that since there was no valid marriage the question of dowry does not arise? Such legalistic niceties would destroy the purpose of the provisions. Such hairsplitting legalistic approach would encourage harassment to a woman over demand of money. The nomenclature "dowry" does not have any magic charm written over it. It is just a label given to demand of money in relation to marital relationship. The legislative intent is clear from the fact that it is not only the husband but also his relation who are covered by Section 498-A . Legislature has taken care of children born from invalid marriages. Section 16 of the Marriage Act deals with legitimacy of children of void and voidable marriages. Can it be said that Legislature which was conscious of the social stigma attached to children of void and voidable marriages closed eyes to plight of a woman who unknowingly or unconscious of the legal consequences entered into the marital relationship. If such restricted meaning is given, it would not further the legislative intent. On the contrary, it would be against the concern shown by the Legislature for avoiding harassment to a woman over demand of money in relation to marriages. The first exception to Section 494 has relevance too. According to it, the offence of Bigamy will not apply to "any person whose marriage with such husband or wife has been declared void by a Court of competent jurisdiction." It would be appropriate to construe the expression "husband" to cover a person who enters into marital relationship and under the colour of such proclaimed or feigned status of husband subjects the woman concerned to cruelty or coerce her in any manner or for any of the purposes enumerated in the relevant provisions - Sections 304-B / 498-A, whatever be the legitimacy of the marriage itself for the limited purpose of Sections 498 -A and 304-B, of the Indian Penal Code . Such an interpretation, known and recognized as purposive construction has to come into play in a case of this nature. The absence of a definition of husband to2639 specially include such persons who contract marriages ostensibly and cohabitate with such woman, in the purported exercise of his role and status as 'husband' is no ground to exclude them from the purview of Section 304 -B or 498-A, of the Indian Penal Code, viewed in the context of the very object and aim of the legislations introducing those provisions.

On the touchstone of the ratio of the Apex Court referred to above coupled with the facts mentioned hereinabove, accused falls under the expression of 'husband' by solemnizing his marriage with the deceased in the Chumauna form of marriage and the accused had entered into marital relationship with the deceased under the colour of such proclaimed or feigned status of husband and the absence of definition of husband to specifically include such person to contract marriage ostensibly and cohabitate with such woman in the purported exercise of his role and status as husband is no ground to exclude them from the purview of s 304-B or s 498-A of the IPC, viewed in the context of the very object and aim of the legislations introducing those provisions.[52]

31. Section 304B and Section 34

When the accused-husband and his co-accused parents were convicted under ss 304B / 34, IPC by the sessions court and the conviction was confirmed by the High Court, and it appeared that there was no clear and pointed evidence to maintain the conviction of the parents, the accused-husband was convicted under s 304B simpliciter without the aid of s 34 by the Apex Court, and his parents were acquitted.[53]

32. Section 304B , IPC and Section 113A, Indian Evidence Act

> 113A. Presumption as to abetment of suicide by a married woman.--When the question is whether the commission of suicide by a woman had been abetted by her husband or any relative of her husband and it is shown that she had committed suicide within a period of seven years from the date of her marriage and that her husband or such relative of her husband had subjected her to cruelty, the court may presume, having regard to all the other circumstances of the case, that such suicide had been abetted by her husband or by such relative of her husband.

On a plain reading of s 113A of the Indian Evidence Act 1872, it is obvious that if a wife is shown to have committed suicide within a period of 7 years from the date of marriage, and there is evidence that she was subjected to cruelty by her husband or his relatives, it would be permissible for the court to presume that such suicide was abetted by her husband or by such relatives of her husband.[54]

33. Section 304B , IPC and Section 113B, Indian Evidence Act 1872

Both ss 304B, IPC, and s 113B of the Indian Evidence Act were inserted by the Dowry Prohibition (Amendment) Act 43 of 1986 with a view to combat the increasing menace of dowry deaths. Section 113B reads as follows:

> S. 113 B. Presumption as to dowry death.--When the question is whether a person has committed the dowry death of a woman and it is shown that soon before her death such woman has been subjected by such person to cruelty or harassment for, or in connection with, any demand for dowry, the Court shall presume that such person had caused the dowry death.2640
> Explanation.--For the purposes of this section "dowry death" shall have the same meaning as in s 304B of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860).

The necessity for insertion of the two provisions has been amply analysed by the Law Commission of India in its ninety-first report dated 10 August 1983 on 'Dowry death and Law Reform'. Keeping in view the impediment in the pre-existing law in securing evidence to prove dowry related deaths, the legislature thought it wise to insert a provision relating to presumption of dowry death, or proof of certain essentials. It is in this background that s 113B of the Evidence Act, in the Act has been inserted. As per the definition of 'dowry death' in s 304B, IPC, and the wording in the presumptive s 113B of the Evidence Act, that one of the essential ingredients, amongst others, in both the provisions is that the concerned woman must have been (soon before her death) subjected to cruelty or harassment (for or in connection with the demand of dowry). Presumption under s 113B is a presumption of law. On proof of the essentials[55] mentioned therein, it becomes obligatory on the court to raise a presumption that the accused caused the dowry death. The presumption shall be raised only on the proof of the following essentials:

(1) the question before the court must be whether the accused has committed the dowry death of a woman (this means that the presumption can be raised only if the accused is being tried for the offence under s 304B);
(2) the woman was subjected to cruelty or harassment by her husband or his relatives;
(3) such cruelty or harassment was for or in connection with any demand for dowry; and
(4) such cruelty or harassment was soon before her death.[56]

The legislative intent is clear that the compelling presumption of s 113B of the Evidence Act is confined only to cases where proximity of time by itself lands a safe assurance about the existence of a proximate relation between torture over dowry demand and unnatural death, as cause and effect.[57]

34. Presumption under Section 113B, Indian Evidence Act 1872

In order to establish the offence under s 304B, IPC, the prosecution is obliged to prove that the death of a woman is caused by any burns or bodily injury or occurs otherwise than under normal circumstances and such death occurs within 7 years of her marriage and it is shown that soon before her death she was subjected to cruelty or harassment by her husband or any relative of her husband. Such harassment and cruelty must be in connection with any demand for dowry.[58]2641

If the prosecution is able to prove the aforesaid circumstances, then the presumption under s 113B of the Evidence Act will operate.[59] It is the rebuttable presumption, and the onus to rebut, shifts on the accused.[60] However, merely because the accused had been acquitted under s 302, IPC, the presumption under s 113B of the Evidence Act does not stand automatically rebutted.[61]When there is overwhelming evidence against the accused with regard to the demand of dowry and acceptance of a part of dowry, the presumption as to dowry death envisaged under s 113B of the Evidence Act remains not rebutted, notwithstanding the fact that the accused was examined under s 313, CrPC, and his defence was a total denial of the prosecution case.[62] But when there is no evidence showing that deceased was subjected to cruelty or harassment by accused husband or any of his relative for or in connection with any demand of dowry, the presumption arising either under s 304-B or s 113-B of Evidence Act could not be invoked against accused.[63]

There was evidence that 15-20 days before the death, the deceased was harassed and beaten for dowry. The defence plea was that death was accidental and due to electrocution. The accused husband did not took any such plea in his statement under s 313 CrPC . Held, the accused had not rebutted the presumption under s 113B, Indian Evidence Act. Accused was convicted under s 304B, IPC .[64]

Where the prosecution has proved by cogent evidence that soon before death the lady was subjected to cruelty or harassment in connection with demand for dowry, it becomes obligatory for the court to raise presumption that death is dowry death.[65]

35. Presumption under Section 113B, Indian Evidence Act 1872 is Rebuttable

In order to establish the offence under s 304-B, IPC, the prosecution is obliged to prove that the death of a woman is caused by any burns or bodily injury or occurs otherwise than under normal circumstances and such death occurs within 7 years of her marriage and if it is shown that soon before her death she was subjected to cruelty or harassment by her husband or any relative of her husband. Such harassment and cruelty must be in connection with any demand for dowry. If the prosecution is able to prove these circumstances then the presumption under s 113-B of the Evidence Act will operate, it is the duty of the court to raise presumption under s 113-B, Evidence Act that the accused has caused dowry death.[66] It is a rebuttable2642 presumption and the onus to rebut shifts on the accused. When the defence of the accused was a total denial, the presumption as to dowry death envisaged under s 113-B of the Evidence Act remained unrebutted.[67] Once the prosecution is able to establish the ingredients of s 304B, the presumption against the accused starts as enjoined under s 113-B of the Indian Evidence Act . Of course, it is a rebuttable presumption and the onus lies, on the accused against whom the presumption lies to discharge it. On this aspect the laws are no more res integra. In catena of decisions, Supreme Court has repeatedly held that once the ingredients of s 304-B, IPC have been established by the prosecution, the onus lies on the accused to rebut the presumption under s 113-B of the Evidence Act .[68] The accused were present on the scene at the time of the occurrence, which turned out to be fatal, and that added to their responsibility to give a credible version of their innocence in the dowry death.[69]Where the deceased wife had died within four years of marriage, there was reliable evidence of the witnesses that the deceased was mentally harassed for bringing inadequate dowry, presumption under ss 113A and 113B of the Evidence Act was attracted in the case, appellant accused was convicted under ss 304B, 498A and 306, IPC .[70]

The deceased had died within one year of marriage due to burn injuries. There was reliable evidence of continued demand of Rs. 50,000/- and one sewing machine. The burden lay on the accused to prove that the death was accidental. At the stage of arguments it was urged that the death was accidental, the deceased died while preparing milk. No such assertion was made by the accused in his statement under s 313, CrPC . The accused was convicted under s 304B, IPC and ss 3 / 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act . In appeal the High Court keeping in view the age of the appellant no. 2 husband, reduced the sentence of ten years imposed by trial court to 7 years RI.[71]

36. Investigation

The greed for dowry, and indeed the dowry system as an institution, calls for severest condemnation. It is evident that legislative measures such as the Dowry Prohibition Act have not met with success for which they were designed. What is important to point out is where death is due to crime, the perparators of the crime frequently escape from the nemesis of the law because of inadequate police investigation. It would be of considerable assistance if appropriate priority was given to the expeditious investigation of such cases, i.e., a special magisterial machinery was created for the purpose of prompt investigation of such incidents and efficient investigative techniques and procedures were adopted taking into account the peculiar features of such cases. The Apex Court even before s 304B was inserted in the IPC suggested and recommended that a female police officer of sufficient rank2643 and status in the police force should be associated with the investigation from its very inception.[72]

Thereafter, in another case, the Apex Court directed that investigation into unnatural dowry death of the wife should be conducted by an officer not below the rank of the superintendent of police. In case it has so far been conducted by an officer lower in rank to him, the superintendent of police will also give a fresh look to the whole matter and proceed further with the investigation without being inhibited by the view taken by subordinate officers earlier if circumstances so demand. The Supreme Court also directed the states of Rajasthan and Haryana by way of an interim order to create a special dowry cell at the state level to investigate into dowry deaths through specialised investigative units.[73]

Disturbed by the rate of acquittal rising to 96.7 percent in dowry death cases, the Division Bench of the Karnataka High Court has issued guidelines/directions regarding investigation against and prosecution of offenders in the undermentioned case.[74]

Where the investigating agency took an indifferent attitude in not prosecuting the husband of the deceased and the brother of the husband, but only the mother-in-law of the deceased, the husband being a silent spectator of the dastardly attack on his wife, he had not even taken his wife to the hospital, and did not make any arrangement for securing blood when his wife was struggling for her life, however despite his tacit understanding with the perparators of the crime he was not chargesheeted, the indifferent attitude of the investigating agency was deprecated by the Apex Court.[75]

However, it is not necessary for the investigating agency to implicate every member of the family of the husband indiscriminately in all dowry death cases.

Unless there is specific material, it is downright wrong on the part of the investigating authorities to indiscriminately include the whole of the family as accused persons. The police needs to discriminate by looking at the possibility of strong evidence against the husband or parents or immediate residents of the house before adding the whole of the family as accused persons in the case.[76]

37. Section 304B , IPC and Section 167(2) , CrPC

The circumstances of the situation brings the offences under s 304B, out of mischief of s 167(2)(a)(i), CrPC and lands it under s 167(2)(a)(ii), CrPC . Thus, the result is that in cases under s 304B, IPC, investigation has to be completed within 60 days from the date of arrest/surrender of the accused and if the chargesheet is not submitted then the accused becomes entitled to statutory bail under s 167(2)(a)(ii), CrPC, if he was ready and furnishes bail bonds. This statutory right that had accrued to him cannot be defeated.[77] But a contrary view is taken by Rajasthan High Court by observing that it is clear that the offence under s 304B, IPC is punishable for imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than seven years but which may2644 extend to imprisonment for life, therefore, provisions of cl (i) of proviso (a) to s 167(2), CrPC would be attracted and if chargesheet has been filed within a period of 90 days, the accused persons are not entitled for bail under s 439 read with s 167(2), CrPC .[78]

38. Shock Suffered by Parents of Deceased Daughter

Human nature is very complex. Different persons react differently under pressure or in times of sudden bereavement or grief. The shock suffered by a parent having seen his daughter dead in an unnatural manner can in some cases prevent immediate outpouring of reasons. Each case would have to be tested on its own facts and no hard and fast rule can be laid down in this behalf.[79]

39. Bail

If the accusation is that within seven years of the marriage unnatural death had taken place of the deceased wife in the house of the husband accused who tortured her soon before her death on the demand of dowry, the prayer of bail should be refused.[80] Where the accused was convicted under ss 304B and 498A, IPC, and was in custody for more than three years and there was no likelihood of an appeal being heard early, the accused was found entitled to bail.[81]

40. Anticipatory Bail

In Samunder Singh v State of Rajasthan ,[82] emphasising that it is not prudent to grant anticipatory bail by the High Court in dowry death cases, the Apex Court made the following observations:

> The widespread belief that dowry deaths are even now treated with some casualness at all levels seems to be well grounded. The High Court has granted anticipatory bail in such a matter. We are of the opinion that the High Court should not have exercised its jurisdiction to release the accused on anticipatory bail in disregard of the magnitude and seriousness of the matter. The matter regarding the unnatural death of the daughter in law at the house of her father in law was still under investigation and the appropriate course to adopt was to allow the concerned Magistrate to deal with the same on the basis of the material before the court at the point of time of their arrest in case they were arrested. It was neither prudent nor proper for the High Court to have granted anticipatory bail which order was very likely to occasion prejudice by its very nature and timing. We therefore consider it essential to sound a serious note of caution for future. The High Court is under no compulsion to exercise it jurisdiction to grant anticipatory bail in a matter of this nature. So far as the present matter is concerned, since it has become infructuous, we do not propose to pass any order, subject to these observations, the appeal is dismissed.

41. Dying Declaration

When the dying declaration of the deceased recorded during investigation is not relied or filed by the prosecution in the report submitted under s 173, CrPC, it cannot2645 be considered for any purpose, unless proved in accordance with law.[83] The conviction of the accused, solely on the basis of dying declaration, in the absence of contemporaneous certificate from the doctor that the deceased was in a fit condition, mentally and physically, to understand and answer questions, is improper.[84] Therefore, the dying declaration recorded barely 48 hours after the deceased was certified as unfit without the fitness of the deceased certified by the doctor, subsequently, should not be relied upon when there was possibility that the deceased was brainwashed by her parents.[85] Thus, in the absence of a medical certificate as to the fitness of the deceased to give a statement, the dying declaration cannot be relied upon,[86] and such a dying declaration cannot be used against the accused though admitted by the defense under s 294, CrPC .[87] When the deceased made two dying declarations, one before the investigating officer and other before the magistrate in a fit condition as opined by the doctor, then such dying declaration is reliable.[88] However, the Andhra Pradesh High Court has taken a somewhat contrary view in which mere omission to mention that the deceased was in a fit state of mind by the doctor was held immaterial when the dying declaration was recorded by the magistrate who had put various preliminary questions to the actual recording of the circumstances leading to her death, the answers given pursuant to such questions and what the deceased has stated on the substantial questions and the reasons of her death all go to indicate that the deceased was in absolutely perfect state of mind to know as to what she was talking about and give expression to those thought.[89]

The prosecution case was that the deceased wife died due to burn injuries at her matrimonial home. The reason was demand of dowry. As the dying declaration of the deceased recorded by the Executive Magistrate did not implicate the accused, accused appellant was acquitted for offence under s 304B, IPC .[90]

When part of the dying declaration of the deceased is patently false and not corroborated even by the parents of the deceased, it cannot be relied upon to base the conviction of the accused. [91]Section 32 of the Evidence Act does not require that the statement sought to be admitted in evidence, should have been made in imminent expectation of death. The words 'as to any of the circumstances of the transaction which resulted in his death' appearing in s 32 must have some proximate relation to the actual occurrence. In other words, the statement of the deceased relating to the cause of death or the circumstances of the transaction which resulted in his death must be sufficiently or closely connected with the actual transaction.[92] The death referred to in s 32(1) of the Evidence Act includes suicidal besides homicidal death.[93]

In the absence of corroborative evidence which might prove the participation of the brother of the husband and his wife who had been summoned on petition under2646 s 319, CrPC, benefit of doubt was given and brother, the husband and his wife (since deceased) were acquitted of the charge under s 304B, IPC .[1]

In a case of multiple dying declarations where the divergent statements are capable of being fully and totally reconciled, the court need not reject them merely because prima facie they read differently.[2]

42. Charge

I (name and office of sessions judge/additional sessions judge etc) hereby charge you (name of the accused persons) as follows:

That on or about the ..... day of ..... (month and year) at ..... (place) you being husband of the deceased and you co-accused being mother-in-law, father-in-law etc soon before death subjected the deceased ..... (name of the deceased) to cruelty or harassment by making demand of dowry in furtherance of common intention of you all within seven years of her marriage and there by you accused persons have committed the offence of 'dowry-death' punishable under s 304B, IPC and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

The charge may be framed against the accused on the basis of grave suspicion about commission of offence.[3] When there was no evidence of dowry demand during wedding or after wedding and element of 'soon before her death she was subjected to cruelty or harassment by her husband in connection with, any demand for dowry' was absent, framing of charge under s 304-B was found not proper.[4]

When the facts noted in the charges under ss 302, 201 and 498A, IPC framed against the accused are sufficient to attract s 304B also, and these facts were put to the accused in the examination under s 313, CrPC, merely because there is no separate charge under s 304B, IPC, it cannot be said that any prejudice is caused to the accused since the facts noted in the other charges put together satisfy the ingredients of s 304B, IPC .[5] The accused cannot be convicted under s 304-B, IPC without a charge being framed specifically.[6]

Cancellation of charge after evidence has been led is unknown to criminal jurisprudence. Before a charge is framed an accused may be discharged if the facts and circumstances so justify. After the charge is framed the accused has either to be found guilty or not guilty of the charge.[7] The charge under s 304B as well as under s 302, IPC may co-exist.[8]Sections 302 and 304B, are not mutually exclusive. If in a case, material on record, suggest commission of offence under s 302 as well as under s 304B, the proper course would be to frame charges under both these sections and if the case is established, then the accused can be convicted under both the sections but no separate sentence needs to be awarded under s 304B in view of the substantive2647 sentence being awarded for the higher offence under s 302, IPC .[9] In the undermentioned case the Supreme Court directed all the trial Courts of the country to ordinarily add s 302, IPC to the charge under s 304B, IPC, so that death sentence can be imposed in such heinous and barbaric crimes against the women.[10]Similarly, on conviction no separate sentence under s 498A is necessary in view of the substantive sentence under s 304B .[11]

Section 304B , IPC is not substitute for s 302, IPC . It is generally seen that in cases where a married woman dies within seven years of marriage, otherwise than under normal circumstances, no inquiry is usually conducted to see whether there is evidence, direct or circumstantial, as to whether the offence falls under s 302, IPC . Sometimes, s 302, IPC is put as an alternate charge. In cases where there is evidence, direct or circumstantial, to show that the offence falls under s 302, IPC, the trial court should frame the charge under s 302, IPC even if the police has not expressed any opinion in that regard in the report under s 173(2) of the Crpc . Section 304B , IPC can be put as an alternate charge if the trial court so feels. In the course of trial, if the court finds that there is no evidence, direct or circumstantial, and proof beyond reasonable doubt is not available to establish that the same is not homicide, in such a situation, if the ingredients under s 304B, IPC, are available, the trial court should proceed under the provision.[12]

43. Failure on Charge under Section 304B does not Essentially Lead to Conviction under Section 306

Omission to frame charges under s 306 in terms of s 215 of CrPC may or may not result in failure of justice, or prejudice the accused. It cannot, therefore, be said that in all cases, an accused may be held guilty of commission of an offence under s 306 of the IPC wherever the prosecution fails to establish the charge against him under s 304-B thereof. Moreover, ordinarily such a plea should not be allowed to be raised for the first time before the court, unless the materials on record are such which would establish the said charge against the accused.[13]

44. Accused Charged under Section 302 or 304B cannot be Convicted under Section 306 or 498A

Commentary under the same heading in s 306, post, may be referred to.

45. Deletion of Charge

When cause of death of deceased is attributed to extensive pulmonary tuberculosis which could not be attributed to any of accused persons, death of deceased would not fall within description of death as contemplated under s 304-B so, charge framed under s 304-B is liable to be deleted.[14]2648

46. Accused Charged under Section 304B can be Convicted under Section 498A

As a matter of fact, when there is a charge under s 304B, IPC, it is not imperative in law to frame a separate charge under s 498A, IPC .[15] Further, a person charged and acquitted under s 304B can be convicted under s 498A without charge being there, if such a case is made out.[16]

47. Discharge

The basic ingredient of s 304B, IPC is that there should be evidence of cruelty or harassment soon before the death. Thus, when the nearest relatives of the deceased stated that she had complained of cruelty, the accused persons wanted more dowry, but as there was no evidence of causing cruelty to her by the accused persons in relation to demand of dowry soon before her death, their discharge by the sessions court under s 304B was found proper.[17]

48. Proof

It is the settled law that in order to establish charges under s 304-B of the IPC, four ingredients of the offence were necessarily to be established by the prosecution:

(i) That the death took place within seven years of the marriage.
(ii) The death was not under normal circumstances.
(iii) The deceased was tortured and ill- treated with regard to demand of dowry.
(iv) Soon before her death, the deceased was subjected to mental or physical cruelty with respect to the demand of dowry.[18]

The initial burden of proving the death of a woman within seven years of her marriage in circumstances that are not normal is on the prosecution; such death should be in connection with or for a demand of dowry which is accompanied by such cruelty or harassment that eventually leads to the woman's death in circumstances that are not normal. After the initial burden of a deemed dowry death is discharged by the prosecution, a reverse onus is put on the accused to prove his innocence by showing, inter alia, that the death was accidental.[19]

Where the appellant husband and the deceased wife were living in the same house there was evidence of demand of dowry, wife had died within seven years of her marriage, the cause of death was strangulation, the appellant husband was convicted under s 304 B, IPC .[20]2649

In normal circumstances, in the Indian Society demand for dowry or harassment for the same take place within four corners of the house. Even the parents or relatives of the girl will not be aware of these, unless they are informed either by the girl herself or demand is made directly to them. The police officials or others cannot depose anything about the harassment in connection with demand of dowry in the absence of any complaint or statement made by witness under s 161, CrPC . Seldom, the villagers-neighbours may come to know of the same. In this background, statement of family members of the deceased lady cannot be discarded on the ground that they are relatives and are interested witnesses, till a contradiction is shown in their deposition or cross-examination.[21]

The proximity of time between the alleged ill-treatment and time of death is a highly relevant factor, and is an essential and necessary evidence for proof of dowry death.[22] Performance of a ceremony of the younger sister of the deceased married in the accused's family, about a month before the incident could not believe the case of harassment nor the non-production of letters written by the deceased about the ill-treatment is sufficient to disprove the prosecution case.[23] However, when the injuries found on the person of the deceased-wife could not have caused her death despite the demands being dowry demands, the offence would not attract the mischief of s 304B .[24]

Poisoning--Viscera Report--Absence of

Normally, the viscera are preserved and submitted for chemical analysis under the following circumstances: (1) When the investigating officer requests for such an examination; (2) When the medical officer suspects the presence of poison by smell or some other evidence while conducting an autopsy on injury cases; (3) To exclude poisoning, in cases where the cause of death could not be arrived at on post-mortem examination and there is no natural disease or injury to account for it; and, (4) In decomposed bodies. A chemical examination of the viscera is not mandatory in every case of a dowry death; even when a viscera report is sought for, its absence is not necessarily fatal to the case of the prosecution when an unnatural death punishable under s 304B of the IPC or under s 306 of the IPC takes place. In a case of an unnatural death inviting s 304B of the IPC (read with the presumption under s 113B of the Evidence Act 1872) or s 306 of the IPC (read with presumption under s 113A of the Evidence Act 1872) as long as there is evidence of poisoning, identification of the poison may not be absolutely necessary.[25]

Where poison in prasad was given to deceased causing death, occurred within seven years of marriage, death was unnatural. There was reliable evidence of persistent demand of dowry and continuous harassment. Presumption under s 113B Evidence Act was attracted. Parents living in nearby village were not informed. Appellants husband, his father and mother were convicted under s 304B, IPC .[26]2650

49. Husband accused

Death of the deceased was caused by strangulation and burning within seven years of her marriage at her matrimonial home. Evidence of the father and other relatives of the deceased about the persistent demand for Maruti car and harassment and cruelty meted out to the deceased was found reliable and believed. Both of husband and mother-in-law were convicted under ss 304B and 498A, IPC .[27]

The deceased wife died due to poisoning. There was no evidence showing demand of dowry or harassment. Letter written by the deceased to the appellant prior to death showed cordial relations between the two. Accused husband was acquitted for offence under s 304B, IPC .[28]

The evidence of the brother of the deceased about the demand of dowry by the accused persons was found not reliable. The father of the deceased deposed before the court that the deceased had written/sent two/three letters in this connection, but those letters were not brought on record. The conviction of the accused appellant (husband) under s 304B, IPC was found not sustainable, was set aside.[29]

The deceased wife died within eleven months of her marriage. There was reliable evidence of the father of the deceased about the dowry demand and harassment caused to the deceased corroborated by letters written by the deceased to her father, in which she had mentioned about the demand of dowry and the harassment meted out to her. Conviction of the husband and mother-in-law appellants for offence under s 304B, IPC was sustained.

Death of the deceased occurred at her matrimonial home within 7 months of marriage. Accused husband and his parents were only persons present at the time of death. There was reliable evidence of grand father and parents of the deceased about the demand of dowry, harassment and cruelty meted out to the deceased. Accused husband was convicted under s 304B, IPC .[30]The appellant accused was married to the deceased. The deceased died unnatural death by burning within seven years of marriage. Prosecution evidence proved demand of dowry. Dead body of the deceased was cremated before investigation, parents of the deceased were not informed. Conviction of the accused appellant husband under s 304B, IPC was proper.[31]The deceased set herself on fire within 2½ years of marriage at her matrimonial home. There was convincing evidence that the accused husband had demanded dowry two days before the incident. The plea of accused that it was a case of accidental death was not supported by any evidence. The accused did not say so in his statement under s 313 CrPC . Accused appellant was convicted under s 304B, IPC .[32]Evidence of the mother about dowry demand by the deceased was hearsay evidence, hence is inadmissible in evidence. Conviction of the accused husband and his parents under s 304B, IPC was set aside.[33]2651

Demand of motorcycle and harassment and cruelty by the husband and mother-in-law after marriage was proved. The harassment led the deceased to commit suicide. Both the accused appellants mother-in-law and husband were convicted under s 304B, IPC .[34]Prosecution witness mother and uncle of the deceased gave evidence before the court about demand of dowry by the accused appellant. There was definite ocular, expert and documentary evidence to show that the deceased died an unnatural death, she was subjected to cruelty and ill-treatment, there was demand of dowry of specific items like refrigerator, television and cooler and she died within seven years of her marriage. Conviction of appellant husband and sentence of life imprisonment was held proper.[35]

The deceased wife had committed suicide by hanging herself. Allegation was that the accused husband and father-in-law had persistently demanded dowry which led the deceased to commit suicide. In the suicide note the deceased did not implicate any of the two accused appellants. The evidence of dowry demand was found not reliable. The High Court recorded conviction merely on the basis of probability. The High Court was not justified in reversing the judgment of acquittal and convicting the accused appellants. Appellants accused viz. husband and father-in-law were acquitted.[36]There were material contradictions in the testimony of PWS about the demand of dowry. Accused husband performed the funeral ceremonies of the deceased, had made investments in the name of the deceased. There was evidence that relations between the accused and the deceased were cordial prior to occurrence. Accused respondent husband was acquitted of the charge under s 304B, IPC .[37]

The deceased wife died of poisoning within seven years of marriage. There was no evidence that the deceased prior to her death was subjected to cruelty. Presumption under s 113B, IPC could not be drawn. The husband, his father and mother were acquitted of charges under ss 304B, 306 IPC and 498, IPC .[38] There was evidence of dowry demand, deceased died of burn injuries in her bedroom in wee hours. There was evidence that the accused appellant husband and in-laws burnt the deceased alive within seven years of marriage on account of non-fulfilment of dowry demand. Appellant accused was convicted for offence under s 304B, IPC .[39]

The appellant accused persons, husband and mother-in-law, on account of non-fulfilment of dowry demand poured kerosene oil on the deceased and set her on fire. Letter written by the deceased had not mentioned about dowry demand. In the history sheet of the hospital where the deceased was treated it has been categorically stated that while the deceased tried to ignite a gas stove the deceased suddenly caught fire. Appellants were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC .[40] Father deposed that there was no ill-treatment by the husband and parents-in-law, only brother-in-law and2652 sister-in-law ill treated her. The husband and parents of the deceased were acquitted of the charges under ss 304B, 306 and 498A, IPC .[41]

The deceased wife had died within few months of marriage. The cause of death in post-mortem examination was asphyxia by throttling. There was evidence of the parents of the deceased about demand of dowry by the accused appellant, cruelty and harassment meted out to the deceased immediately prior to the date of occurrence. The ingredients of s 304B, IPC were satisfied in the case. Conviction of the accused appellant husband was held proper.[42]Deceased wife died unnatural death at her matrimonial home by strangulation within one year and three months of marriage. Father and brother of the deceased deposed about demand of dowry. Appellant husband was convicted under s 304B, IPC .[43]

The court did not find any evidence to show that soon before her death the deceased was subjected to cruelty by the husband or in-laws in connection with a demand of dowry. The accused appellants were acquitted of the charge under s 304B, IPC .[44]

The deceased woman died within three years of her marriage, as such it was a case of unnatural death. It was clear from the evidence of the brother, mother and maternal uncle of the deceased that the deceased was being constantly harassed for demands on account of dowry. The deceased was being asked to bring further cash and gold/silver ornaments and on account of non-compliance of such demand, she was being denied food. On the fateful day she was removed from hospital in an unconscious state. Her death was unnatural. Appellants husband, father-in-law, mother-in-law were convicted under s 304B, IPC .[45]

The brother of the deceased, first informant in the case when reached hospital immediately after the incident, the accused was not found present, he absconded for 6 days after the incident. There was evidence of demand of dowry at the time of the marriage. The accused husband had not admitted the deceased in the hospital. He was convicted under s 304B, IPC .[46]The only evidence relatable to s 304B, IPC against the appellant husband was of a neighbour who was examined after about two months of the alleged date of occurrence. Though the evidence appeared to be sufficient to bring in application of s 498A, there was definite inadequacy of evidence to attract s 304B, IPC . In view of the evidence, conviction of the accused under s 304B, IPC was set aside, but conviction under s 498A, IPC was maintained.[47]

The evidence on record fully established that there was a persistent demand of dowry by the appellants husband, father-in-law and mother-in-law and they subjected deceased to cruelty and harassment in connection with the demand of dowry and eventually beat her to death due to its non-fulfilment. The appellants threw the deceased into well. The medical evidence corroborated the prosecution version that2653 after commission of murder the deceased was thrown into well, ruled out the case of the accused appellants that the deceased fell down in well accidently and died. Conviction of the appellants was held proper.[48]

Except the bald statements of the mother and brother of the deceased, there was no other evidence showing that the deceased had been subjected to cruelty and harassment prior to her death, which compelled the deceased to commit suicide. The accused husband and other relatives were acquitted of charges under s 304B and 498A, IPC .[49]

Suicide note written by the deceased in her handwriting signed by her exculpated the accused husband and in-laws. Reasonable doubt was created about prosecution story. Accused husband was acquitted of the charge under s 304B and s 498A, IPC .[50]

50. Mother-in-law

Mother of the deceased testified before the court that no demands for dowry had been made by the accused mother-in-law either before, during or after the marriage. Only general allegations were made against her, there was some doubt about her involvement in the dowry demand. Accused mother-in-law was acquitted of the charge under ss 304B and 498A, IPC .[51]

Death of the deceased was due to asphyxia caused by hanging. Deceased had died within few months of marriage. Evidence of father of the deceased and other witnesses about demand of dowry and harassment was found reliable. Accused led no evidence to show how and in what circumstances the deceased died. Conviction of the accused husband and mother-in-law was held proper, acquittal of the father-in-law recorded by the High Court was not interfered. However, life imprisonment awarded was reduced to ten years RI.[52]As all the living relations, namely, husband, sister-in-laws and brothers-in-laws were found not guilty and acquitted of the charges under ss 304B, 498A, 306, IPC and ss 3, 4 and 6 of the Dowry Prohibition Act, the appellant mother-in-law in the absence of evidence was also acquitted.[53]

Where the deceased died within one year of marriage on account of burn injuries, there was evidence of ill treatment and demand of dowry by the appellant mother-in-law, the appellant mother-in-law was convicted under s 304B and s 498A, IPC .[54]

51. Father-in-law and Mother-in-law Acquitted

Evidence was lacking to show that the accused appellants mother-in-law and father-in-law subjected the deceased to cruelty in connection with the demand of dowry soon before the death. The two accused appellants were acquitted for offence under s 304B, IPC .[55]2654

52. Dowry Death--Brother of the Accused Husband and his Wife Given Benefit of Doubt

There was evidence of PW that the appellant accused husband and his brother were living on separate floors and there was no evidence that the brother of the husband and his wife had hand in the incident, which led to the death. Both brother and his wife were given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 304B, IPC .[56]

53. Circumstantial Evidence

In cases of dowry deaths and suicides, circumstantial evidence plays an important role and inferences can be drawn on the basis of such evidence. That could be either direct or indirect.[57]

54. Medical Evidence

In Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology, Dr KS Narayana Reddy refers to absence of ligature mark, if a soft material is used either for hanging or strangulation. If a person is in unconscious state of mind due to head injury and if that person were to be hanged or strangulated when such person is still alive, all appearances of case of asphyxia would definitely be present. Similarly, if a person commits suicide subsequent to sustaining head injury it would also give the indication of death due to asphyxia as a result of hanging.[58]

55. Benefit of Doubt

The accused is/are entitled to the benefit of doubt under s 304B, IPC when:

(a) The letters written by the deceased to her mother and sister, and letters written by the mother to her deceased daughter did not cast allegations of torture and demand of dowry, and there was no evidence on record to suggest that the deceased was being maltreated or tortured, except that she was constantly being taunted for not bringing a car in dowry;[59]

(b) there was no specific mention of demand of dowry in the FIR, no eyewitness with regard to causing of murder of the deceased and material improvements by the witnesses of the prosecution in their statements before the court;[60]

(c) there is no specific allegation of any active role played by the accused (mother-in-law) except the solitary expression in one letter of the deceased;[61]

(d) the father of the deceased being the complainant stated in his examination that his daughter was treated with love and affection by her in laws and there was no demand for dowry; the mother and relatives of the deceased woman were also declared hostile, and the magistrate while making2655 investigation under s 174, CrPC had reached the conclusion that no offence was committed by the accused;[62]

(e) prosecution evidence implicating the accused-husband and mother-in-law was not found truthful, credible and trustworthy, the defence plea that the deceased met with natural death out of chest pain cannot be ruled out;[63]

(f) none of the prosecution witnesses stated that the accused had done anything against the deceased woman soon before her death;[64]

(g) there is no nexus between instances of harassment for money claims and the suicide committed by the deceased woman on account of a gap of 3-4 years between the two;[65]

(h) the parents and relatives of the deceased woman failed to disclose to the police on the next day of occurrence that there was a demand of dowry by the accused persons and there was also inordinate delay of 2½ years in lodging the FIR rendering the testimony of the defence witness that there was no demand of dowry, probable;[66]

(i) there was a reconciliation between the husband and the wife, and thereafter, both were living together, during her stay with her parents immediately before her death, the wife did not complain of any ill-treatment or assault by her husband, and there was absence of cruelty or harassment 'soon before' the death of the wife;[67]

(j) the material witnesses were not examined, the testimony of the father and the uncle of the deceased did not clearly spell out harassment on the issue of insufficient dowry, the post-mortem report did not indicate marks of violence on the body of the deceased to conclude forceful administration of poison and the deceased was living separately from her in-laws.[68]

(k) the oral dying declaration of the deceased was found directly in contrast to the FIR where no such allegation of beating was made, the conduct of the deceased in not disclosing the alleged ill-treatment to her parents, reduced the importance of the dying declaration;[69]

(l) the testimony of the father of the deceased contradicted in material particulars by his own son and real brother, and there was no reliable evidence on record to prove that the alleged cruelty or harassment on the part of the accused towards the deceased soon before her death, was for, or in connection with the demand for dowry;[70]

(m) the allegations regarding demand of dowry made by the father of the deceased were of a vague and non-specific nature, the younger sister of the deceased who was married to the younger brother of the accused-husband of the deceased did not depose to any demand of dowry made to her, not even a whisper or even a suggestion of any demand for dowry being made by anyone;[71]2656

(n) they being sisters of the husband of the deceased, were present in the house during the relevant time where the deceased-wife was set on fire, there was no evidence that there was any sort of hostility between them and the deceased, there was no direct evidence as to how the incident occurred and the circumstantial evidence did not show the nature and extent of their participation;[72]

(o) only vague and inconsistent statements were made by interested witnesses, being the parents and brother of the deceased, there was no evidence of any relative or neighbour of the parties about cruelty to the deceased by the accused in relation to the demand of dowry, there was no demand of dowry at the time of marriage, there was no mention of demand of dowry in the letter of the deceased written to her parents soon before her death;[73]

(p) the important witnesses, the mother and brother of the deceased, turned hostile and the dying declaration was not supported by a certificate from the doctor that the deceased was mentally and physically fit to understand and answer questions;[74]

(q) the prosecution improved and exaggerated its case regarding demand of dowry and torture meted out to the deceased, and none of the witnesses of the prosecution was reliable, and the evidence regarding extra judicial confession was also not reliable;[75]

(r) there was no evidence showing demand of the amount ever being made by any accused, the evidence of witnesses was not reliable and the fact that the accused-husband made a desperate attempt to save the deceased and himself got severe burn injuries, renders the prosecution case doubtful;[76]

(s) the accused-husband and the deceased-wife were living separately from the co-accused, the mother-in-law and brother-in-law of the deceased, there was no evidence of torture or harassment by the other co-accused so they were entitled to the benefit of the doubt.[77]

(t) Evidence of prosecution witnesses shows that there was never any demand for dowry by accused persons and relationship between the deceased and accused persons was quite good and cordial.[78]

(u) The statements of the prosecution witnesses, age of the deceased mentioned in post-mortem report established that the deceased did not die within seven years of her marriage, the fact that the deceased died of burn injuries sustained by her accidentally while cooking food, found support from MLC report, post-mortem report and inquest which did not show presence of smell of kerosene oil, medical report although admitted by defence was not admissible as same was not put to accused persons in their statement recorded under s 313 of CrPC .[79]2657

(v) The accused and deceased had lived for almost six years after the marriage. For sheer a half tola of gold, it is preposterous to expect the accused to inflict cruelty on deceased and it is unnatural to believe that version and the evidence showed that the illicit relationship of accused husband prompted the deceased to commit suicide.[80]

(w) No cogent evidence was adduced to establish demand of dowry by accused, the prosecution witness, who alleged to have demanded dowry and was responsible for death of deceased, not prosecuted, there was no direct or indirect evidence as to harassment or cruelty by accused towards deceased and the defence version that cause of death was that deceased insisted to go to her mother's house but she was not allowed, was plausible.[81]

(x) Story about demand of Rs 1 lakh by accused was an after thought, there was nothing on record to lend corroboration to allegation of ill-treatment to the deceased, there was no circumstance and motive to indicate that accused administered poison to deceased and post mortem report showed that she died because of self poisoning.[82]

(y) A lawfully wedded wife in no case tolerates extra- marital relationship of her husband. Therefore, where the deceased wife had a melancholic and pensively sad conjugal life in her matrimonial home which had compelled her to end her life by committing suicide and there was neither evidence co-relating demand of money with dowry nor any proof of cruelty soon before death, conviction of husband under s 302 was not sustainable.[83]

(z) No material to substantiate that the deceased was subjected to cruelty and harassment soon before her death and there was any ill treatment on account of the demand of dowry, death of the deceased was due to fire accident.[84]

(z1) Death of the deceased was not unnatural since evidence of witnesses coupled with postmortem report showing that the deceased died due to injury to the spleen, further evidence showing that there was no harassment by the accused to the deceased demanding dowry for or in connection with marriage, and as a consequence of non-payment of alleged dowry, the death of the deceased had taken place.[85]

(z2) There was no evidence to show that there was any harassment in connection with demand of dowry and there was no finding in this regard recorded by lower courts.[86]

56. Conviction under Sections 498A, 306 and 304B --No Double Jeopardy

The provisions of s 498-A of the IPC creates a specific offence for punishing a husband or relation of the husband of a married women, if they subject her to cruelty. The punishment provided therein is for a term which may extend to three years besides fine, whereas the offence of abetment to suicide is punishable under s 306, IPC is a graver offence and provides for imposition of sentence of imprisonment which may extend to ten years besides the sentence of fine. The2658 provisions of s 304B are specific in nature as these relate to imposition of imprisonment, attributing that the husband or the relation of the husband had caused the death of the married woman. Thus, by no stretch of imagination, it can be said to be a case of double jeopardy. Consequently, it cannot be said that these provisions are violative of the mandate contained in sub-cl (2) of art 20 of the Constitution of India .[87]

57. Sentence

There is no yardstick to measure the heinousness of an offence so as to grant the extreme penalty of imprisonment for life. Death in every case is an unfortunate event, but suicides also depends a lot on the sensitivity of a person who takes his life.[88]Section 304B, IPC, only raises a presumption and lays down that the minimum sentence should be seven years but it may extend to imprisonment for life. Therefore, awarding the extreme punishment of imprisonment for life should be in rare cases and not in every case.[89]

The practice of giving and demanding dowry is a social evil having deleterious effect on the entire civilised society and has to be condemned by the judiciary. Despite various amendments providing deterrent punishment with a view to curb the increasing menace of dowry deaths, the evil practice of dowry remains unabated. The court cannot be oblivious to the intendment of the legislature and the purpose for which the enactment of the law and amendment has been effected. No leniency is warranted to the preperators of the crime against society, against whom different punishment is called for.[90] Misplaced leniency may cause injustice to society of which the accused persons are also members.[91] In case of offence of causing dowry death of woman, a stringent view should be taken while imposing sentence. When the accused-husband and in-laws of the deceased practised cruelty on deceased for greed, no lenient view can be taken while imposing sentence.[92]

58. Sentence of fine cannot be imposed

Section 304B, IPC provides for imposition of sentence of imprisonment as such fine cannot be imposed for offence under this section.[93]

59. Reduction in Sentence

The accused persons were found entitled to reduction in sentence of imprisonment with due regard to the facts that minimum imprisonment cannot be reduced to less than seven years, due to following reasons by appellate court:

(a) old age of accused;[94]2659
(b) one accused of young age and others of old age;[1]
(c) accused young man and might have lost his job,[2] or took his wife to hospital and was by her side during treatment;[3]
(d) accused in custody for several years.[4]

60. Enhancement of Sentence

In the matter of enhancement, there should not be interference when sentence passed imposes substantial punishment. It will only be interfered with when it is manifestly inadequate.[5] Trial court's discretion in awarding sentence does not require any interference when adequate punishment has been awarded.[6]

61. Should the Death Penalty be Provided under Section 304B

Dowry death is considered a heinous crime but the sentence provided under s 304B is a minimum seven years imprisonment extendable to life imprisonment. The Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court recommended to Parliament to amend the law to provide for death sentence in dowry death cases with the following observations:

> We are surprised that while an ordinary murder can be punished by a death sentence under s 302, IPC, a dowry death, which is a much worse offence has a maximum punishment of life imprisonment. An ordinary murder is committed in a fit of rage or for a property, but a dowry death is not just an ordinary crime. It is a social crime. It outrages the modern conscience it makes the whole of society revert to feudal barbarism. Hence we recommend to Parliament to amend the law and provide for death sentence in dowry death cases.

This is why this barbaric practice must be ruthlessly stamped out by imposing harsh punishment.[7]

The Apex Court in Alauddin Mian v State of Bihar ,[8] while dealing with the murder case indicated that death penalty should be awarded to the accused for bride burning and acid pouring. In Machhi Singh v State of Punjab ,[9] the Apex Court held that killing of the wife for extraction of dowry would fall amongst the rarest of rare cases.

The fact that killing the wife for demand of dowry in the face of direct evidence of killing would be covered under s 302, IPC and dowry death cases covered by s 304B, IPC are only those cases where no direct evidence of murdering the wife is available, and on account of the circumstances indicated under s 304B and also under s 113B of2660 Evidence Act, the dowry death presumed may not weigh in the opinion of the legislature to prescribe the death penalty under s 304B .

In the undermentioned case, the Supreme Court has held that extreme penalty of death should be awarded in cases accused is convicted under s 304B, IPC only in exceptional cases where the case falls in the category of rarest of rare cases, and not in each and every case.[10]

62. Section 302 and Section 304B are not Mutually Exclusive

Sections 302 and s 304B, IPC are not mutually exclusive. If in a case the material on record suggest commission of an offence under s 302 as well as s 304B, the proper course would be to frame charges under both these sections and on establishing the prosecution's case, the accused can be convicted under both the sections but no separate sentence need be awarded under s 304B in view of the substantive sentence being awarded for the higher offence under s 302 .[11]

63. Appeal against order of Acquittal or Conviction

It may be stated that although in an appeal from an order of acquittal the powers of the High Court to reassess the evidence and reach its own conclusions are as extensive as in an appeal against an order of conviction, yet, as a rule of prudence, one should always give proper weight and consideration to such matters as:

(i) the views of the trial judge as to the credibility of the witnesses;
(ii) the presumption of innocence in favour of the accused, a presumption certainly not weakened by the fact that he has been acquitted at the trial;
(iii) the right of the accused to the benefit of any doubt, and the slowness of an appellate court in disturbing a finding of fact arrived at by a judge who had the advantage of seeing the witnesses. Where two reasonable conclusions can be drawn on the evidence on record, the High Court should as a matter of judicial caution, refrain from interfering with the order of acquittal recorded by the court below. In other words, if the main grounds on which the court > below has based its order acquitting the accused, are reasonable and plausible, and cannot be entirely and effectively dislodged or demolished, the High Court should not disturb the acquittal.[12]

The well settled principle of law is that an order of acquittal ought not to be set aside, unless it is found to be patently wrong and wholly unsustainable.[13]

64. Suspension of Sentence Pending Appeal

When the accused had already undergone imprisonment for more than three years and seven months after his conviction under ss 304B / 34, IPC, imposing the sentence2661 of imprisonment of ten years if the accused is kept in detention till the decision of the appeal, it would not advance the cause of justice specially when the appeal is not likely to be heard in the near future. In such a case, the sentence[14] of imprisonment awarded to the accused is liable to be suspended under s 389, CrPC (2 of 1974) during pendency of appeal.[15]

65. Appeal/Special Leave Petition under Article 136 before Supreme Court

In an appeal under art 136 of the Constitution, the Apex Court will not reappreciate and/or re-appraise the evidence to arrive at a different conclusion on, unless it is shown that the courts below have not taken into consideration some relevant facts or have not appreciated the evidence in a correct perspective or the Supreme Court finds serious infirmities in the findings of the courts below.[16]

> The Apex Court has laid down a judicious principle that even in a case where one of the accused has not preferred an appeal, or even if his special leave petition is dismissed, in case relief is granted to the remaining accused and the case of the accused who has either not appealed or whose special leave petition has been dismissed, stands on the same footing, he should not be denied the benefit which is extended to the other accused.[17]

66. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 304B

In large number of dowry death cases, demands have gone on for a long period of time after marriage, and so far as it is a demand for money or property addressed to the parents of the wife, it would came squarely within the four corners of dowry related offence. The time factor is not of much significance in a case of burning of a woman in relation to demand for money from the wife's parents, the conviction under s 304B, IPC, would be appropriate, and not under s 302 .[18] Even if a charge under s 304B was not framed against the accused, but the charges under ss 302, 498-A and 201 put together satisfy the ingredients of s 304B .[19] However, when the accused is acquitted under ss 302, 498-A he cannot be convicted for the alternative charge under s 304B in the absence of opportunity being given to him in respect of the offence under s 304B, in view of s 464(1), CrPC[20] as s 304B is not 'a minor offence' for the purpose of s 222, CrPC .[21] In such a case, after the accused is found not guilty under s 302 and s 498A, he should be afforded the opportunity to give his defence on charge under s 304B, and thereafter his guilt should be decided qua s 304B .[22]2662

Once accused was found guilty for committing death of the deceased under s 304 B, IPC, he need not be convicted under s 302, IPC so, conviction under s 302 was set aside maintaining conviction under ss 304B and 498A .[23]

67 Alteration of Conviction from Section 304B to Section 498A

A person charged and acquitted under s 304B, IPC can be convicted under s 498A, IPC without that charge being there, if such a case is made out.[24] If the case is established, there can be a conviction under ss 304B and 498A . However, when mental torture and cruelty has been established and no demand of dowry is proved, the conviction of the accused under s 304B and 498A can be altered to one under s 498A, IPC .[25] When there is inadequate material to attract culpability under s 304B, but s 498A, IPC is clearly attracted, conviction under s 304B, IPC can be altered to offence punishable under s 498A, IPC .[26] However, when no charge is framed under s 498A and charge under s 304B is not established, the accused cannot be convicted under s 498A, though he is entitled to an acquittal under s 304B .[27]

68. Alteration of Conviction from Section 304B to Section 306

Where the accused-husband was charged with and convicted under s 304B, IPC by the sessions court, but the demand of dowry by the husband was not proved, however, the fact that the wife had committed suicide in consequence of cruelty or torture meted out to her by the accused husband was established, treating s 306, IPC as minor offence of s 304B, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 304B to s 306 even though no charge under s 306 had been framed against him.[28]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 305.

Abetment of suicide of child or insane person.--

If any person under eighteen years of age, any insane person, any delirious person, any idiot, or any person in a state of intoxication, commits suicide, whoever abets the commission of such suicide, shall be punished with death or [29][imprisonment for life], or imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, and also shall be liable to fine.2663

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

The offence of committing suicide itself is, obviously, unpunishable,[30] but its abetment is punishable under this section and an attempt to commit suicide is punishable under s 309, IPC . The abetment of suicide by persons of immature years, or of impaired mental powers, is more severely punished under this section than in the case of normal type of persons. Mayne observes that suicide is the only offence for which it is impossible to punish the principal offender. He is already beyond the reach of human law; those, who instigate him, or help him in the act, remain. Where two persons agree to commit suicide together, but if the means employed only take effect upon one, the survivor is held guilty of murder.[31] A person, who takes an active part in the suicide of another by actually shooting him or administering poison to him, would commit culpable homicide not amounting to murder under Exception 5 to s 300, IPC, if the person, being over 18 years of age, gave such consent as defined by s 90, IPC . If he was younger than 18, or if his consent did not come within the purview of s 90, he would be guilty of murder. If, however, he did not actually cause the death, but abetted it within the meaning of s 107, IPC, he would be punishable under s 305 or 306, IPC, as the person, actually committing suicide, was, or was not, capable of giving consent.[32]

Even the effacement of s 309, IPC from the statute as being violative of art 21 of the Constitution by the Supreme Court,[33] would not affect the charge of abetment of suicide punishable under ss 305 and 306, IPC .[34]

This and the next section apply only when suicide has been committed. They do not apply to cases of attempted suicide.

2. 'Commits suicide'

Suicide is the third offence affecting life; it is self-murder, i.e., a person who kills himself in a manner which, in the case of another person, would amount to murder, is guilty of that species of murder called 'suicide'. The killing must take place by the hand of the person himself.[35]

3. 'Abets'[36]

'Abets', i.e., instigates the commission, or conspires to commit, or aids in the commission of the suicide.[37]

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of sessions.2664

5. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of sessions judge etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the.....day of ....., at....., you abetted one AB, a person under 18 years of age (or an idiot or an insane person, etc.), to commit suicide, and he committed it, and you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 305 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

When the accused who was convicted for commission of rape on child and was released on bail alleged to have continuously intimidated and threatened child that he would take revenge and would kill her and her mother, the statement of mother of victim and her friend disclosed that she had gone into depression and was constantly under fear, so, it could be said that act of suicide committed by victim was direct and proximate cause of abetment or instigation offered by accused, therefore, the charge against accused cannot be quashed.[38]

Where evidence was lacking to show that the death of the deceased was a suicidal death, basic constituent of offence under s 305, IPC was lacking in the case, order for framing charges against the accused was set aside.[39]

6. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, prove that:

(1) the person in question committed suicide;
(2) he was:

- (a) under 18 years of age, or
- (b) insane person, or
- (c) delirious person, or
- (d) an idiot, or
- (e) intoxicated, or
- (f) at the time of the commission of the offence; and

(3) the accused abetted the commission of the said suicide.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 306.

Abetment of suicide.--

If any person commits suicide, whoever abets the commission of such suicide, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.2665

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides punishment for abetment of suicide generally while the preceding section provided for abetment of suicide by persons under a disability.

Before s 306, IPC, can be acted upon, there must be clear proof of the fact that the death in question was a suicidal death.[40] Abetment of suicide is confined to the case of persons who aid and abet the commission of suicide by the hand of the person herself who commits suicide. When the question is whether commission of suicide by a woman had been abetted by her husband or any relative of her husband, and it is shown that she had committed suicide within a period of seven years from the date of her marriage, and that her husband or such relative of her husband had subjected her to cruelty, the court may presume having regard to all other circumstances of the case, that such suicide had been abetted by her husband or by such relative of her husband. However, the sine qua non for application of s 306, is the factum of suicide.2666 Where the circumstances did not establish either murder or abetted suicide, the accused can escape the jaws of ss 300 and 306, IPC, but they can be caught in the web of s 498A, IPC . The offence of 'abetment' must naturally conform to the definition of that term as given in s 107, that is to say, there must be instigation, co-operation or intentional assistance given to the suicide. It is not necessary, nor indeed is it a part of the definition that the suicide should have been committed in consequence of the abetment. However, in order to render a person liable as an abettor, it is of course necessary, as indeed it is in the case of any other offence, that the abettor should be something more than a mute spectator--spectator hand particeps. It is conceivable that such presence may encourage a woman to do a deed, which she might otherwise refrain from. In that case the question whether mere presence amounted to intentionally aiding another will have to be decided. Suicide is self-murder. Suicide as such is no crime, as one committing suicide places herself beyond the reach of law, but its abetment does not.[41] The fact that other accused persons, i.e., mother-in-law and father-in-law of the deceased are acquitted, can be no ground to extend benefit of doubt to the accused husband.[42]

2. Law of Canada

It is an indictable offence to counsel or aid or abet a person to commit suicide. The maximum sentence is 14 years imprisonment, whether suicide ensues or not. For the survivor of a suicide pact to be guilty of this offence, as opposed to murder, requires a common and irrevocable intent to commit suicide together, simultaneously and by the same act, where the risk of death is identically equal for both.

Euthanasia

'In Carter v Canada (Attorney General) ,[43] it was stated would be wrong, in my view, to judge this case as a contest between life and death. The Charter is not concerned only with the fact of life, but also with the quality and dignity of life. In my view, death and the way we die is a part of life itself.'

The plaintiffs, Carter, Johnson, Doctor Shoichet, the BCCLA, and Taylor, challenged the constitutionality of the Criminal Code provisions prohibiting physician-assisted death. Taylor suffered from a fatal neurodegenerative disease, ALS. She sought the availability of physician-assisted death as an option in the event life became unbearable. Carter and Johnson helped arrange a physician-assisted death for Carter's mother in Switzerland and were of the view that a similar procedure should be available in Canada. Doctor Shoichet was a family physician in British Columbia who was willing to participate in physician-assisted dying if it were no longer prohibited. Physician-assisted death was prohibited by s 241(b) of the Criminal Code and related provisions. The plaintiffs urged that, to the extent the provisions prohibited physician-assisted dying, they unjustifiably infringed ss 7 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In particular, the plaintiffs claimed that to the extent that the impugned provisions prohibited competent, grievously and irremediably ill adult individuals who voluntarily sought physician-assisted dying on an informed basis from receiving such assistance, they deprived the plaintiffs of their rights to life, liberty and security of the person in a manner that was2667 not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, contrary to s 7 of the Charter. In addition, the plaintiffs submitted that the impugned provisions had a disproportionate impact on physically disabled persons, and thus infringed s 15 of the Charter to the extent that they prohibited competent, materially physically disabled, grievously and irremediably ill adult individuals who voluntarily sought physician-assisted dying on an informed basis from receiving such assistance. The federal and provincial Crowns submitted that there was no basis for departure from the Supreme Court of Canada Rodriguez decision affirming the constitutionality of the affirmed provisions.

Held: Action allowed. The legislative and social fact evidence distinguished the predicated case from Rodriguez. The impugned provisions unjustifiably infringed the equality rights of Taylor, as they had a more burdensome effect on persons with physical disabilities unable to commit suicide without assistance. The provision thus created a distinction based on physical disability, the impact of which was particularly felt by those who were grievously and irremediably ill, physically disabled or soon to become so, mentally competent, and who sought control over their circumstances at the end of their lives. The distinction perpetuated disadvantage and was thus discriminatory. The legislation's infringement of s 15 of the Charter was not demonstrably justified under s 1 . The purpose of the absolute prohibition against physician-assisted suicide was to prevent vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at times of weakness. That purpose was pressing and substantial and the absolute prohibition was rationally connected to it. However, a less drastic means of achieving the legislative purpose existed in the form of a carefully designed and monitored system of exceptions allowing access to physician-assisted death under stringent conditions. Thus, it could not be said that the provisions met the threshold of minimal impairment of Taylor's equality rights. The adverse effects on Taylor and others similarly situated were not outweighed by the benefits. In addition, the impugned provision engaged the rights to life, liberty and security of the person of Taylor, Lee and Johnson in a manner inconsistent with principles of fundamental justice. The legislation was overbroad. The absolute prohibition was grossly disproportionate to the legislative objectives. For the same reasons as the s 15 infringement, the s 7 infringement was not justified under s 1 . The provisions were declared invalid with operation of the declaration suspended for one year. During the period of suspension, Taylor was permitted a constitutional exemption to avail herself of physician-assisted death subject to certain conditions.

Most Western countries do not permit physician-assisted dying or assisted dying, but a few do (Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg and Switzerland). Three of the United States permit physician-assisted dying, in the case of Oregon and Washington through legislation.

3. Ingredients

The necessary ingredients to attract s 306, IPC, are:

(a) a person must commit suicide;
(b) the accused must abet the commission of such suicide.[44]

In order to convict a person under s 306, IPC there has to be a clear *mens rea*to commit the offence. It also requires an active act or direct act which led the deceased2668 to commit suicide seeing no option and this act must have been intended to push the deceased into such a position that he committed suicide.[45] The accused appellant who was an agriculturist was alleged to have harassed his agriculture labour (servant) deceased, making allegations that the deceased had committed theft of some gold ornaments two days prior to his death. It was also alleged that the appellant had demanded Rs.7,000/- from the deceased which was given in advance to him at the time when he was kept in employment. The deceased could not bear the harassment meted out to him, consumed pesticide and committed suicide. The deceased was highly supersensitive. His conviction under s 306, IPC was set aside.[46]

4. Section 306 is not Violative of Articles 14 and 21 of the Constitution of India

The offence under s 306, IPC, which makes abetment of suicide an offence, is constitutional and does not suffer from any vice and it is not violative of arts 14 and 21 of the Constitution of India .

5. Section 302 and Section 306 --Distinction

The two offences under s 302 and s 306, IPC, are of distinct and different categories. While the basic constituent of an offence under s 302 is homicidal death, that of s 306 is suicidal death and abetment thereof.[47]

6. Section 306 and Section 498A --Distinction

A distinction must be borne in mind between the ingredients of offences under ss 306, IPC and 304B therof.[48]

The charges under ss 306 and 498A, IPC are independent of each other. Under s 498A of the IPC, the cruelty is committed by the husband and his relations dragging the woman to commit suicide, while under s 306, IPC, suicide is abetted and intended.[49]

The basic difference between the two sections, i.e., s 306 and s 498A is that of intention. Under the latter, cruelty committed by the husband or his relations drag the women concerned to commit suicide, while under the former provision suicide is abetted and intended.[50] A person guilty under s 498A, IPC, should not necessarily be guilty under s 306, IPC . Every case of assault and harassment will not lead to conviction under s 306, IPC, unless nexus is established.[51]

7. Mens Rea

The abetment of suicide implies intentional abetment. There can be no abetment if mens rea is missing.[52] When there was no transaction between the accused and the2669 deceased lady, and the accused made persistent demand for refund of his amount and also uttered filthy words to the deceased and the deceased committed suicide under great mental stress, as accused did not know that the deceased purchased poisonous tablets and committed suicide, so the accused was not held liable for abetment of suicide.[53]Mens rea is essential ingredient of the offence of abetment. Where the deceased wife on account of stress, depression or family problem commits suicide, the accused cannot be held liable for abetment of suicide. The husband and his brother were habituated to drinking often demanding money and the wife commits suicide, the accused husband cannot be convicted for offence under s 306, IPC .[54]

In order to proceed against a person for criminal offence under s 107, IPC, the prosecution must prove the element of mens rea. The negligence or carelessness or the facilitation cannot be termed to be abetment so as to punish the guilty as per the provisions of penal laws.[55]

Abetment involves a mental process of instigating a person or intentionally aiding that person in doing of a thing. In cases of conspiracy also it would involve that mental process of entering into conspiracy for the doing of that thing. More active role which can be described as instigating or aiding the doing of a thing is required before a person can be said to be abetting the commission of offence under s 306 of IPC .[56]

The law on the subject is fairly well settled. Mens rea is an essential ingredient of a criminal offence unless the statute expressly or by necessary implication excluded it.[57] Presence of mens rea is the necessary concomitant of instigation.[58]

8. Suicide by Daughter-in-law -- In-laws Acquitted

Merely because the accused appellants in-laws were of the opinion that the deceased, as a good daughter-in-law, should look after them in old age could not be said to be an abetment of suicide by the daughter-in-law. Conviction of the in-laws accused appellants was set aside.[59] Deceased daughter-in-law set fire to herself committed suicide within two years of her marriage. There was evidence that the deceased was unhappy as her husband was poor and illiterate. The mother-in-law used to ask the deceased to run hand driven flour mill. There was no direct evidence that the accused abetted the deceased to commit suicide. Mother-in-law was given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under ss 306 and 498A, IPC .[60]

9. Suicide

The word 'suicide' is not defined in the IPC . One must, therefore, look at the dictionary meaning of the word. As per the New Webster's Deluxe Encyclopaedic Edition, the word 'suicide' appearing at page 980 means: 'One who intentionally2670 takes his own life; the intentional taking of one's own life, destruction of one's own interests or prospects... To commit suicide...to kill (oneself)'.

In the Concise Oxford Dictionary,[61] the word 'suicide' is stated to mean the intentional killing of oneself.

In the Halsbury's Laws of England,[62] the word 'suicide' has been dealt with in the following words:

> A finding of suicide must be an evidence of intention. Every act of self-destruction is, in common language described by the word 'suicide', provided it is an intentional act of a party knowing the probable consequence of what he is about. Suicide is never to be presumed. Intention is the essential legal ingredient.

In Re Davis,[63] the court of appeal ruled that suicide required an intention on the part of a person to kill himself so that to justify a verdict of suicide, it must be shown that he knew what he was doing and was aware of the probable consequences of his acts. The earlier decision in Cliff v Schwable ,[64] was approved.

The word 'suicide' in plain English language would mean a person voluntarily putting an end to his life. It is obvious, on a plain reading of the definition of 'suicide', that the causes and circumstances leading one to take such a decision are wholly irrelevant for deciding the question as to whether the death was a suicide or not. A person who is frustrated or defeated in life, or considers himself to be frustrated or defeated in life, may, on the spur of the moment or after proper deliberation, come to the conclusion that he needs to put an end to his life. On the other hand a person who is otherwise happy and claims to be successful in life, and had led a content life, also take a conscious decision of putting an end to one's life. Such a decision may be taken on a full consideration of the relevant facts. Such a decision, as in the case before us, is stated to have been based in one's own interest with a view to avoid any pain or misery, or suffering in old age, to himself or one's dependants. Nevertheless on a plain meaning of the word 'suicide' it is difficult to say that the decision taken to voluntarily put an end to one's life, in the latter case where a person claims to be successful in life and happy, is not suicide.[65]

A woman may attempt to commit suicide due to various reasons, such as, depression, financial difficulties, disappointment in love, tired of domestic worries, acute or chronic ailments and so on and need not be due to abetment. The reasoning of the High Court that no prudent man will commit suicide unless abetted to do so by someone else, is a perverse reasoning. Where the wife committed suicide because the husband accused left the deceased wife with his parents in the village (Sasural) it did not amount to cruelty so as to drive the wife to commit suicide. Conviction of the appellant husband was not maintained, was set aside.[66] Where the appellant husband started harassing the deceased wife eight days after the marriage, and the wife committed suicide appellant husband was convicted under ss 306 and 498A, IPC .[67]2671 In the absence of evidence that the harassment meted out by the accused led the wife to commit suicide, accused cannot be convicted under s 306, IPC .[68]

Abetment involves a mental process of instigating a person or intentionally aiding a person in doing of a thing. Without a positive act on the part of the accused to instigate or aid in committing suicide, conviction cannot be recorded.[69]

Wife committed suicide by hanging. There was evidence of the witnesses and the father of the deceased of dowry demand and harassment meted out to the deceased by the appellant husband and in-laws. Defence theory that the deceased was under mental tension as she was pregnant hence committed suicide was rejected. A young pregnant woman having a child in the womb would not ordinarily commit suicide unless she was compelled to do so. She would not have fell depressed if she had not been harassed on account of dowry demand. Appellant husband was convicted under ss 306 and 498A .[70]

The mere fact that certain persons have been named by the deceased in the suicidal note to be responsible for his death is not by itself a ground to fasten one with the charge of abetment. The act or conduct of the accused, even if there may be any, however insulting and abusive those may be, will not by themselves suffice to constitute abetment of commission of suicide, unless those are reasonably capable of suggesting that the accused intended by such acts consequence of suicide.[71]

There was no evidence of ill treatment and cruelty meted out by the accused to the deceased which led the latter to commit suicide. The High Court had recorded the conviction of the accused on the basis of letter alleged to be written by the deceased to her sister-in-law, in which she had stated that her husband accused had beaten her and had asked her to take divorce. The authenticity of the letter was doubtful, as the letter was not produced at the stage of the investigation of the case. The view taken by the trial court in acquitting the accused was possible view. Accused was acquitted of the charge under s 306, IPC .[72]

Suicide by pregnant woman

A pregnant woman ordinarily would not commit suicide unless relationship with her husband comes to such a pass that she would be compelled to do so.[73]

Suicide or Homicide

Commentary under same heading in s 309, post, may be referred to.

To prove whether the death is due to homicide or suicide, most important evidence is the medical evidence.[74] Where the death of wife was due to combined effect of smothering and carbofaran (Faradan) poisoning and ante mortem injuries sustained2672 by deceased were not possible during struggle for existence after self consumption of poison, it was a case of homicide and not suicide.[75]

When and Where Suicide Ordinarily Committed

Ordinarily suicide would be committed at a secluded place and not in an open place. It would not be committed before anybody and certainly not when everybody in the house was present.[76]

'Commits suicide'

Before s 306, IPC can be acted upon, there must be clear proof of the fact that the death in question was a suicidal death.[77] The proof of commission of suicide is essential for conviction under s 306 . When no definite opinion is given by the doctor about suicide and cause of death, the accused cannot be convicted under s 306 .[78]

Cause for Committing Suicide

Where the prosecutrix committed suicide four and a half months after the date of the alleged commission of rape on her and the charge of rape against the accused was not proved, in the absence of proof of cause for committing suicide, the accused cannot be held responsible for the abetment of the ultimate offence of suicide.[79]

10. Abetment of Attempt to Commit Suicide-- Section 306 not Attracted Section 306 penalises abatement of suicide. It is a unique legal phenomenon in the IPC, the only act, the attempt of which alone will become an offence. The person who attempts to commit suicide is guilty of the offence under s 309, IPC, whereas, the person who committed suicide cannot be reached at all. Section 306 renders the person who abets the commission of suicide, punishable, for which the condition precedent is that suicide should necessarily have been committed. It is possible to abet the commission of suicide. However, nobody would abet a mere attempt to commit suicide. It would be preposterous if the law could afford to penalise abetment to the offence of mere attempt to commit suicide. It is wrong to convict the appellants under s 116 linked with s 306, IPC . The former is abetment of the offence punishable with imprisonment if the offence be not committed. However, the crux of the offence under s 306 itself is abetment. In other words, if there is no abetment there is no question of the offence under s 306 coming into play. It is inconceivable to have abetment of an abetment. Hence, there cannot be an offence under s 116 read with s 306, IPC .[80]

Thus, before s 306 is attracted, the commission of suicide must be proved.[81]

11. 'Abets'

Commentary under s 107, ante, vol. 1, may be referred to.2673

In cases of alleged abetment of suicide there must be proof of direct or indirect acts of incitement to the commission of suicide. Merely on the allegation of harassment without their being any positive action proximate to the time of occurrence on the part of the accused which led or compelled the person to commit suicide, conviction in terms of s 306, IPC is not sustainable.[82]

In order to bring a case within the purview of s 306 of IPC there must be a case of suicide and in the commission of the said offence, the person who is said to have abetted the commission of suicide must have played an active role by an act of instigation or by doing certain act to facilitate the commission of suicide. Therefore, the act of abetment by the person charged with the said offence must be proved and established by the prosecution before he could be convicted under s 306, IPC .[83]

Abetment of Suicide by Cruelty -- Husband Convicted

The evidence of sister of the deceased and neighbour showed that this was a case of extreme mental cruelty which was perpetuated from the point of marriage and lasted till the deceased had committed suicide. The appellant was wholly responsible for creating all the circumstances which led the deceased to take an extreme step of putting an end to her life. Accused appellant was convicted for offence under s 306, IPC .[84]

Appellant no. 1 had illicit relations with the wife (accused no. 2) of the deceased, had taken the wife of the deceased in the presence of the relatives of the deceased. The deceased suffered humiliation and committed suicide. The close relatives of the deceased who were also examined as witnesses had categorically stated in their statements that on coming to know of the fact that Appellant No. 1 has taken Accused No. 2 from the house of PW5 and left her only on 06.01.1996 at her parents' house, the deceased stated before the inmates of his house that because of the said insult and humiliation he does not like to live. It is also established that immediately thereafter in the night intervening 7th and 8th of January 1996 the deceased committed suicide. Held, the facts lead to only one conclusion that it is on account of humiliation and insult due to the behavior and conduct of Appellant No. 1 and Accused No. 2 that deceased committed the suicide. The conviction of the appellant under ss 107 and 306, IPC was held proper.[85]

Where there was a normal dispute between the deceased and her husband regarding not sending the deceased to her parent's house, it cannot be presumed, that the husband appellant instigated or abetted the deceased wife to commit suicide.[86] It often happens that there are disputes and discords in the matrimonial home and the wife is harassed by the husband or her in-laws. This, however, would not by itself and without something more attract s 306, IPC read with s 107, IPC . Thus mere2674 harassment of wife by husband due to differences per se does not attract s 306 read with s 107, IPC, if the wife commits suicide.[87]

Where the wife for failure to satisfy dowry demand raised by her appellant husband was subjected to cruelty and set herself on fire, the theory of accidental fire by kerosene stove was ruled out, the appellant did not take any step to save her, the appellant was convicted under ss 306 and 498A, IPC .[88]

Act done to facilitate the commission of suicide should be closely proximate in time to the time of incident. The acts done at a distant time with no close, nearness or proximity to the time of a suicide will obviously have to be ruled out, as acts facilitating and accelerating the commission of suicide. There was a dispute between the family members of the deceased at one side and with the family of the petitioner on the other side. One case was pending in the court also. After consuming the poisonous substances, the deceased informed the prosecution witnesses that being afraid of the petitioners and on account of their terror, he has opted to die by committing suicide. Held, the act of the accused did not amount to abetment, the accused were discharged.[89]

Where the prosecution evidence was deficient to prove dowry death, but proved that the accused abetted suicide by the deceased, the conviction of the accused appellant under s 304B, IPC was altered to s 306, IPC .[90]

There must be evidence of goading, provoking, instigating, probing or so to a person prompting him to commit suicide. [91]Section 306 requires a reasonable nexus in between acts committed by accused person leading to commission of suicide by the victim and of abetment of commission of such suicide.[92]

Facts not Disclosing Abetment of Suicide

Following are the instances where accused was held not abetted suicide of the deceased:

(a) The relationship between wife and husband is based on love, affection, understanding and reposition of confidence in each other. If the wife being emotionally very weak and sensitive, felt badly insulted or humiliated as the husband did not grant permission to her for something, it could not be held that the accused-husband abetted the offence. It would be dangerous to come to the conclusion that the husband's such refusal would amount to cruelty or could come in the mischief of abetment for commission of the suicide. It may be improper on the part of the accused-husband to refuse such permission to his wife but it would not be a penal offence.[93]

(aa) Every quarrel between a husband and wife which results in a suicide cannot be taken as an abetment by the husband and the standard of a2675reasonable and a practicable woman as compared to a headstrong and oversensitive, one has to be applied. The deceased was married to the accused appellant five years before the incident. There was lack of evidence about the demand of dowry by the husband which allegedly drove the wife to commit suicide. The accused husband was acquitted of the charge under s 306, IPC .[1]

(b) When the deceased-wife committed suicide at the house of her parents and not in the house of the accused-husband the question of abetting the committing of suicide, by the husband-accused does not arise.[2]

(c) When the accused told the deceased that he did not bother if she lived or died and asked her to die.[3]

(d) When the accused threatened and abused the deceased that he would reveal the illicit contact of the deceased to her future husband.[4]

(e) The threat of police action to recover their own property would not amount to instigation to commit suicide.[5]

(f) The quarrel taking place between the accused and the deceased in which the accused was said to have told the deceased 'to go and die', the deceased found dead two days later, it was held that suicide was not proximate to the quarrel though the deceased was named in the suicide note.[6]

(g) Where sexual jealousy existed between the accused and the deceased, during a quarrel, the accused's alleged remarking to the deceased to go and die, where after the deceased went home and committed suicide, it was held that the suicide was not direct result of the words uttered by the accused.[7] The accused in a fit of anger, during the quarrel, told the deceased to go and die. The utterance of these words by the accused made the deceased to take the extreme step of suicide. This incident cannot be construed as the accused abetted the deceased to commit suicide.[8]

(h) A word uttered in a fit of anger or emotion without intending the consequences to actually follow cannot be said to be instigation. If it transpires to the Court that a victim committing suicide was hypersensitive to ordinary petulance, discord and differences in domestic life quite common to the society to which the victim belonged and such petulance, discord and differences were not expected to induce a similarly circumstanced individual in a given society to commit suicide, the conscience of the Court should not be satisfied for basing a finding that the accused charged for abetting the offence of suicide should be found guilty.[9]2676

(i) Mere statement made by the deceased to the accused that he will die under circumstance to which the accused replied that it did not matter to him, cannot constitute abetment.[10]

(ii) Allegations against brother-in-law of nurturing vulgar attitude towards her. Conviction was set aside.[11]

(j) When there was no averment in alleged suicide note that accused had caused any harm to deceased or was in any way responsible for delay in paying salary to him, no reference of any act or incidence in alleged suicide note whereby accused has committed any wilful act or omission or intentionally aided or instigated deceased in committing act of suicide, it cannot be said that accused had in any way instigated deceased to commit suicide or he was responsible for suicide of deceased.[12]

(k) By making a statement 'why can't you go and die' etc, and insulting the deceased in public alone, accused cannot be said to have goaded or urged forward the deceased to commit suicide.[13]

(l) Uttering of abuses will not amount to provocation to commit suicide and it does not constitute abetment and so, no offence is made out under s 306, IPC .[14]

(m) The mere fact that some allegation was made against the deceased that she was unfit for conjugal happiness and the mere fact that some panchayat was held in this regard, cannot be sufficient to attract the ingredients of s 306 of the IPC and, hence, the acquittal recorded in this regard by the learned Judge cannot be found fault by this court.[15]

(n) Accused having doubt in his mind about his wife having eloped with someone for particular period and therefore was rarely talking with her.[16]

(o) The accused husband himself went to the house of her brothers and informed that the deceased was missing, there was no case of dowry harassment, there was no evidence, direct or otherwise, to show that the accused had induced or abetted the deceased to commit suicide, brother of the deceased had given statement that his sister could not have committed suicide leaving her child, under these circumstances the possibility was that the death could have been accidental.[17]

(p) Evidence did not prove demand of dowry, ill-treatment or harassment. The deceased had received 99% burn injuries, was suffering from mental illness, her dying declaration was also not found reliable. Accused appellant was acquitted of charges under ss 304B, 306 and 498A, IPC .[18]

(q) The deceased wife committed suicide by hanging at her matrimonial house. The allegation was that suicide was committed on account of unbearable2677 torture on her mental and physical by her husband and in-laws appellants. The deceased had been to her father's house with appellant husband on 15.10.2000 and they together stayed there till 20.10.2000. On 21.10.2000, the victim allegedly committed suicide at 8.30 a.m. During her stay in her paternal house with the appellant husband, she did not demand any money or her husband also had not given any hints that he demanded money through deceased by creating pressure on her to write a letter to her father. There was no history of torture or harassment caused to the deceased. There was no nexus between the death of the deceased and any overt act on the part of the accused appellants. The conviction of the appellants for offences under ss 306 and 498A, IPC was found not sustainable, was set aside.[19]

(r) Prosecution evidence about the demand of dowry viz. a thin gold chain made after six years of marriage was full of inconsistencies as such was not found reliable. The medical evidence adduced showed that the deceased was suffering from mental depression, had mental, epilepsy and psychosis problem. Husband and his relatives respondents were acquitted for offences under ss 306 and 498A, IPC .[20]

(s) Father deposed that there was no ill-treatment by the husband and parents-in-law, only brother-in-law and sister-in-law ill treated her. The husband and parents of the deceased were acquitted of the charges under ss 304B, 306 and 498A, IPC .[21]

(t) The deceased wife gave poison to her three children and committed suicide. The deceased wife in her letter described the accused as a sexual pervert and that he had behaved like an animal and the deceased had tolerated the insulting manner in which he behaved. They were married in court. It was stated that the accused was impotent and he was trying to defame the deceased for having relationship with ladies. Held, the ingredients of s 306, IPC were not established in the case. Accused husband was acquitted of the charge under s 306, IPC .[22]

(u) The mere fact that the husband treated the wife with cruelty is not enough. Where no element of investigation to constitute abetment to suicide is found in the evidence led by the prosecution, the accused would not be convicted under ss 107, and 306, IPC .[23]

Effect of Demand of Loan from Deceased

Mere demand of loan amount from the deceased does not amount the instigation or commission of the suicide by the deceased.[24]2678

Mere Ordinary Dispute or Harassment Not Sufficient

It often happens that there are disputes and discords in the matrimonial home and a wife is often harassed by the husband or her in-laws. This, however, would not by itself and without something more attract s 306, IPC read with s 107, IPC .[25]

Defamatory Article in Newspaper--No Abetment

Abetment involves a mental process of instigating a person or intentionally aiding that person in doing a thing. In cases of conspiracy also, it would involve that mental process of entering into a conspiracy for the doing of that thing. It cannot be said that by publication of articles, said to be of defamatory character, in a daily newspaper, the respondent no 2 editor or the other respondents who are also said to have published those articles meant to instigate or intentionally aid the commission of suicide by Narsinhbhai. The reaction against an article published can be different from different people who read it. A person may get enraged and retaliate or read it and commit suicide. The possible reaction would not be known before a defamatory statement is published, as it will depend upon the nature and sensitivity of a person. Therefore, the reaction to a defamatory article which cannot be predicted will not be attributable as intention to illegally aid or instigating suicide by the person concerned. In our view, a more active role which can be described as instigating or aiding the doing of a thing is required before a person can be said to abet the commission of the offence under s 306 .[26]

12. Mother-in-law Acquitted

The accused appellant mother-in-law was prosecuted on allegation that her cruel treatment abetted the deceased to committed suicide. The letter written by the deceased to her husband did not indicate the cruel treatment given by the accused mother-in-law to her. It indicated great suspicion against the husband. In matter of offence under s 306, IPC much stronger evidence was required than what was presented. The evidence adduced in the case was not sufficient to hold the accused mother-in-law guilty on the charge under s 306, IPC . The real culprit was the husband. The Investigating Agency instead made a scapegoat of the old mother perhaps to rely on the age old concept of bickering between the mother-in-law and daughter-in-law. That was not the universal truth. The appellant mother-in-law was therefore acquitted of the charge under s 306, IPC .[27]

13. Sati (Suttee)

Cases under this section are generally cases of suttee where a widow cremates herself with her deceased husband. In R v Mohit Pandey ,[28]A, a woman, prepared herself to commit suttee in the presence of B, C and others who stood around applauding and encouraging her. It was held that B, C and the rest abetted the suicide of A. If, in the last cited case, X, a spectator, who has just arrived on the scene, persuades her to return to the fire, X is also guilty of abetment of suicide.[29] In Ramdial v Emperor ,[30]2679*A,* a woman, prepared to commit suttee in the presence of the accused who at first dissuaded her, but on finding that she was determined, yielded and gave her ghee which she poured over the pyre and over herself. The pyre was then burnt which consumed A and the corpse. It was held that the accused were guilty under this section. In Tejsingh v State ,[31] the accused joined the funeral procession from the house of the deceased to the cremation ground, crying 'sati mata ki jai' while the widow of the deceased, wearing new clothes with the intention to become suttee, was going in the front. The funeral pyre was set on fire and the woman sat on it. It was held that the accused were guilty under this section as they were aiding the woman in her decision to commit suicide by taking her to the pyre of the cremation ground.

The cases where people gave ghee to the widow which she poured over the fire and burnt herself, where the accused induced a woman to get herself burnt along with the body of her deceased husband and with that object they made her sit on the pyre, where persons had joined a funeral procession were encouraging the widow to commit sati and such similar cases where there is abetment within the meaning of s 107 in the commission of suicide by a person the courts have held it to be abetment of suicide.[32]

14. Conviction under Sections 498A, 306 and 304B --No Double Jeopardy

Commentary under the same heading in s 304B, ante, may be referred to.

15. Section 306 and Section 113A of the Indian Evidence Act 1872

Though in s 113A of the Evidence Act the words 'soon before' have not been used but the cruelty would become abetment if there have been instances of cruelty soon before death of the woman. Cruel treatment in the long past could not be abetment if such a course of conduct has not persisted soon before the commission of suicide. When the deceased was not treated with cruelty by the accused at least during a period of about three years prior to the commission of suicide by her, the accused could not be held guilty for the offence under s 306, IPC .[33]

Incorporation of s 113A of Evidence Act in the statute book, depicts a legal presumption though however the time period of within seven years of marriage is the pre-requisite for such a presumption.[34]When death has taken place beyond seven years of marriage, the presumption under s 113A, Evidence Act is not available.[35]

The court should be extremely careful in assessing the facts and circumstances of each case and the evidence adduced in the trial for the purpose of finding whether the cruelty meted out to the victim had in fact induced her to end the life by committing suicide. If it transpires to the court that a victim committing suicide was hypersensitive to ordinary petulance discord and differences in domestic life quiet common to the society to which the victim belonged and such petulance discord and difference were not expected to induce a similarly circumstanced individual in a given society to commit suicide, the conscience of the court should not be satisfied2680 for basing a finding that the accused charged of abetting the offence of suicide should be found guilty.[36] Where an account of domestic quarrel between deceased and her sister-in-law over milk, the accused abused the deceased and dragged her to courtyard, in the ordinary course such quarrel abuses or even pushing the woman do not drive her to take extreme step of committing suicide, so the presumption of suicide cannot be raised under s 113A, Evidence Act and accused is entitled to acquittal under s 306, IPC .[37]

Reason Behind Presumption Under Section 113A, Indian Evidence Act 1872

The legislature was cognizant of the difficulty of the prosecution attempting to enter the matrimonial home to collect evidence about the acts of abetment. The presumption is permitted to be drawn only considering the difficulty in securing specific evidence of culpable conduct of abetment of suicide of the bride in the matrimonial home. The presumption has got to be drawn carefully and cautiously.[38]

Conditions for Presumption Under Section 113A, Indian Evidence Act 1872

Section 113A of the Evidence Act raises a presumption against the accused, subject of course to the following conditions:

(a) That the husband or any member of his family had subjected the married woman to cruelty within the meaning of s 498A, IPC .
(b) The presumption is not mandatory; it is only permissive according to the facts and circumstances of a given case.
(c) A consideration of all the other circumstances of the case may strengthen the presumption or may cause the court to abstain from drawing the presumption.[39]

Nature of Presumption Under Section 113A, Indian Evidence Act 1872

The presumption to be drawn is the presumption of 'may presume' as defined in s 4 of the Evidence Act . It reads as follows:

> May presume. Whenever it is provided by this Act that the Court may presume a fact, it may either regard such fact as proved, unless and until it is disproved, or may call for proof of it.

> It mandates that when such a presumption of fact is drawn, the Court may either regard such fact as proved unless and until it is disproved or may call for proof of it.[40]

Drawal of Presumption under Section 113A, Indian Evidence Act 1872 not Obligatory

Section 113A of the Evidence Act shows that a permissive discretionary presumption can be drawn against the indictee, if the circumstances enumerated exist. The legislature had very cautiously reiterated that the presumption can be drawn only 'having regard to all the other circumstances of the case'. It is not obligatory that the presumption should be drawn.[41] When the prosecution could not prove that deceased2681 was subjected to cruelty by the accused, no presumption under s 113A of the Evidence Act of abetment of suicide of deceased can be drawn against the accused though deceased committed suicide within seven years of her marriage.[42]

When the acts of cruelty proved against the accused cannot at all convey to the court that the accused ever desired, intended or contemplated the consequence of suicide by his wife. Even assuming that the presumption under s 113A of the Evidence Act can be drawn, these circumstances and the total absence of any other circumstance to indicate that commission of suicide by the wife was intended by the accused, are sufficient to rebut the presumption under s 113A of the Evidence Act .[43]

Cases Fit for Drawing Presumption Under Section 113A, Indian Evidence Act 1872

Following are instances of cases wherein presumption under s 113A, Indian Evidence Act was drawn:

(a) The accused completely failed to rebut this presumption by any cogent evidence to explain as to how and under what circumstances the wife committed suicide and why her parents and other relatives were not informed about her death and why they hurried to cremate her dead body in the absence of any of her near relatives.[44]
(b) The act of accused keeping his concubine as wife and bringing up child constitutes cruelty within definition as encompassed in s 498A, IPC, such acts of accused would certainly destroy normal mental frame of deceased who was simple housewife and unable to bear mental agony, deceased committing suicide by self immolation so, presumption under s 113A of Evidence Act arises.[45]
(c) Insofar as s 306, IPC is concerned, though there was no direct abetment, committing of rape can be said to be an insulting act. Unable to bear such insult, the deceased must have committed suicide. The prosecution, therefore, proved its case beyond reasonable doubt.[46]
(d) Where husband suspecting her character abused his wife and said 'why don't you die', it was held that the act of husband can be a serious provocation for wife to commit suicide.[47]
(e) The creation of a circumstance for the deceased to commit the suicide constitutes abetment, deceased having felt humiliated by the nefarious activities indulged in by his wife and accused committed suicide by hanging himself, accused not only developed illicit relationship with wife of deceased but had openly declared the same, the outrageous acts resorted to by the accused have left the deceased with no alternative and have2682 driven him to commit suicide, so, the accused was found guilty of abetting suicide.[48]

(f) There was overwhelming evidence that accused husband has made his wife's life intolerable by ill-treating her and beating her frequently and on the day of incident she was not permitted to attend marriage ceremony of her near relative whereas husband had gone to attend that ceremony, such cruel behaviour by husband instigated wife to commit suicide, hence, husband was liable to be convicted under s 306, IPC, though charge thereunder was not specifically framed.[49]

(g) Accused-husband allegedly ill-treating his wife on suspicion of fidelity and that she became pregnant through somebody else and thus forcing deceased wife to commit suicide.[50]

(h) The evidence on record showed that the deceased consumed poison because of beating by the accused as she sold certain agricultural product without permission.[51]

(i) The dying declaration recorded by the magistrate and certified by the doctor that the deceased was fully conscious and she was quite able to give the statement, the deceased in said dying declaration had stated that on account of ill-treatment by in-laws she put herself on fire by pouring kerosene over body and dying declaration was supported by the contents of Dehati Nalishi stating that the deceased was being treated with cruelty and was harassed by the accused persons and she was beaten just one day prior to date of incident by them.[52]

(j) The deceased a newly wedded girl died at verandah of matrimonial house, inmates fleeing away by locking matrimonial house, the medical opinion was that the death was by poisoning, the plea of the accused that the death was accidental, was found not tenable as no attempt was made by inmates to take the deceased to the hospital in these circumstances.[53]

(k) The deceased died at her matrimonial house on account of 96% burn injuries. There was, reliable evidence of the witnesses that the accused husband had harassed and tortured his wife, which compelled her to commit suicide. Accused was convicted under s 306, IPC .[54]

(a) Where in a criminal trial against husband for abetment of suicide by his wife, the prosecution was guilty of improving its case from stage to stage inasmuch as the allegations that the accused did not like to keep the deceased-wife with him because she was not good looking, or that he was addicted to liquor or that the deceased had reported these matters to her parents and others, or that the accused intended to re-marry and had told2683 his wife about it, or that the deceased had once come to her father's house in an injured condition, or even the allegations regarding beatings, did not find place in the statements recorded by the police in the course of investigation and these allegations were made at the trial for the first time and all that was alleged in the FIR or even at the stage of investigation was that there were frequent quarrels between the husband and wife, sometimes resulting in physical assault, on account of the husband being addicted to consumption of 'Bhang' and the other allegation that the accused was aggrieved of the fact that his sister was not being properly treated by her husband who was brother of the deceased was also appeared to be untrue, it was held that the presumption under s 113A of the Evidence Act could not be invoked to find the accused guilty of the offence under s 306, IPC .[55]

(b) Nothing was shown by prosecution to the effect that accused created such circumstances for deceased that she had been forced to end her life.[56]

(c) Where there was no direct evidence against the accused, the father of the deceased had categorically stated that the accused had never demanded any cash or property from him and as per evidence of neighbours, there was no quarrel between the accused and the deceased.[57]

(d) Allegation was that the deceased was not provided food or meals due to financial crises, suicidal note/letter was not proved to be written by the deceased and nothing incriminating against the accused was mentioned in it.[58]

Husband Committing Suicide? No Presumption Under Section 113A, Indian Evidence Act 1872 Arises

The provisions of presumption under s 113A of Evidence Act do not arise against the wife due to whose cruelty the husband commits suicide on account of immoral character of his wife as stated by him in his suicide note, it is not sufficient to infer that wife abetted suicide.[59]

16. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of session.

17. Section 306 , IPC and Section 167(2)(a)(i), Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

A plain reading of s 167(2)(a)(i), CrPC would show that the magistrate may authorise detention of an accused person in custody for a total period which shall not exceed 90 days, where the investigation relates to an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life, or imprisonment for a term of not less than 10 years. The above referred provision clearly conveys that the punishment provided for the offence committed in any eventuality should not be less than 10 years, the2684 punishment which is provided for the offence under s 306, IPC, is punishable with imprisonment of either description for term which may extend to 10 years. This means that punishment can be awarded which can also be less than 10 years, which in fact is not the purport of s 162(2)(a)(i), CrPC and therefore, the period of 90 days contemplated in this provision is not attracted to s 306, IPC .[60] Provision of s 167(2)(a)(ii), CrPC contemplates that where the punishment provided for the offence is less than 10 years, then a magistrate is authorised to detain the accused person in the custody of the police, only till the expiry of 60 days from the date of arrest, and not beyond. The investigation which relates to the offence punishable with death, imprisonment for life, or imprisonment for a term of not less than 10 years, is covered by s 167(2)(a)(i) CrPC, and the magistrate is authorised to detain the accused not beyond the period of 90 days. The offence under s 306, IPC, is punishable with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to 10 years and, therefore, on a plain reading of these provisions, it is amply clear that for the offence under s 306, IPC, the punishment provided is up to 10 years, and it can also be less than 10 years and if it is less than 10 years, sub-cl (i) of cl (a) of sub-s (2) of s 167, CrPC is not attracted, which only deals with offences punishable with death, imprisonment for life or imprisonment for a term of not less than 10 years, and hence, a magistrate is not authorised to detain the accused person in the custody of the police beyond the period of sixty days as contemplated under sub-cl (ii) of cl (a) of sub-s (2), s 167, CrPC[61] and has to be released on bail.

18. Bail

Where the deceased, a young lady had been beaten up in the presence of many in broad daylight by another lady on making reckless allegations, which led the deceased to go to forest and consume poison, the other accused present at the time of the said allegation about an illicit relationship, did not even attempt to save their daughter-in-law, and under the circumstances if she had committed suicide then it cannot be said that no offence under s 306, IPC, is made out, the bail application of the accused persons under these circumstances is liable to be dismissed.[62]

When the first bail application of the accused charged with s 306 was dismissed by the High Court with liberty to the accused to move fresh bail application after six months, but no information was received from the public prosecutor as to what happened after eight months of rejection of the earlier bail application, the accused was released on bail on the principle of speedy trial which is a fundamental right of the accused guaranteed to him under art 21 of the Constitution of India .[63]

18. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted.

I (name and office of sessions judge etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the..... day of..... at..... one AB committed suicide, and that you abetted its commission by..... (specify the act) and thereby committed an offence,2685 punishable under s 306 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

At the stage of framing charge the allegation made in the complaint/FIR and other material seized in the report under s 373, CrPC, only has to be taken into consideration. The evidence collected has to be taken on its face value and at this stage it cannot be expected to screen evidence or apply the standard as to whether the prosecution will be able to prove the case against the accused on trial.

The charge may be framed even on the basis of grave suspicions.[64] Where the accused persons were charged for the offence under ss 304B, 498A, 304 and 494, IPC, the parents of the deceased-wife in their statement to the police stated that the deceased committed suicide when the fact of second marriage of the accused came to her knowledge, the statement of the brother of the deceased was that the accused used to demand money from the father of the deceased, on these facts no illegality or impropriety in framing charge was found against the accused persons.[65]

Where there was a quarrel between the accused and the deceased, and the accused told the deceased 'to go and die', that itself would not constitute on ingredient of 'instigation', the fact that the deceased committed suicide after two days of quarrelling during which the said words were uttered by the accused, would show that the suicide was not a direct result of the quarrel, on these facts the charge framed against the accused under s 306 was quashed as ingredients of abetment were found absent.[66] When there is no averment in the charge sheet or material on record to show that accused either induced the deceased to commit suicide or aided the suicide of the deceased, he is not liable to be charge sheeted for an offence under s 306, IPC, and so charge against him for the said offence is liable to be quashed.[67]

Failure of Charge under Section 304B does not Necessarily Lead to Conviction under Section 386

Commentary under s 304B, ante, may be referred to.

Omission to Frame Charge

Mere omission or defect in framing charge does not disable the criminal court from convicting the accused for the offence, which is found to have been proved on the evidence on record. The CrPC has ample provisions to meet such a situation. The charge was framed under ss 304B and 498A of the IPC . It is clear from the facts that ingredients for framing charge for the offence under s 306 of IPC existed in the case. The mere omission on the part of the trial judge to mention s 306 of IPC does not preclude the court from convicting the accused for the said offence when found proved. In the charge framed under ss 304-B and 498-A of the IPC, it has been clearly mentioned that the accused subjected the deceased to such cruelty and harassment as to drive her to commit the suicide. The provisions of s 221, CrPC take care of such a situation and safeguard the powers of criminal court to convict an accused for an offence with which he is not charged although on facts found in2686 evidence, he could have been charged for such offence.[68] When from the statement of charge framed under s 304B and in the alternative under s 498A, it is clear that all facts and ingredients for framing charge for the offence under s 306 existed in the case, the mere omission on the part of the trial judge to mention s 306 with s 498A does not preclude the court from convicting the accused for the said offence when found proved.[69] Where basic ingredients of offence under s 306 were established by prosecution in order to substantiate charge under s 498A, IPC and accused was also confronted with said features of prosecution case in his statement under s 313, CrPC, therefore, in absence of charge under s 306 conviction of accused under s 306 is permissible since it will not result in failure of justice.[70]

Discharge

Where the deceased was treated harshly and unfairly but it cannot be said that petitioners instigated, goaded or incited her to commit suicide, the order framing charge under s 306 against petitioners is liable to be set aside.[71]

Accused Charged under Section 302 or 304B cannot be Convicted under Section 306 or 498A

It is true that s 222, CrPC read with s 302, IPC, entitles a court to convict a person of an offence which is minor in comparison to the one for which he is tried for the offence under s 302 but s 306 read with s 498A cannot be said to be a minor offence in relation to the offence under s 302 . While the basic constituent of the offence under s 302 is homicidal death, those of s 306 read with s 498A are suicidal death and abetment thereof. Thus, where the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 302 which was the only charge framed against him, the sessions court could not have convicted him of the offence under s 306 read with s 498A .[72]Section 306 cannot be said to be a minor offence in relation to s 304B or s 302 within the meaning of s 222, CrPC .[73] Similarly, when only the charges under ss 498A and 304B, IPC,[74] or ss 302 / 34, IPC, are framed[75] against the accused, the conviction of the accused under s 306 is not proper.

Where the conviction of the accused under s 302 was not found proper, in the absence of essential ingredients of abetment against the husband-accused of the suicide of the deceased-wife, the conviction of the accused cannot be altered from s 302 to s 306 by taking recourse to s 222, CrPC .[76]

Quashing of Charge under Section 306

Where there was a quarrel between the accused and the deceased, and the accused told the deceased 'to go and die', that itself would not constitute an ingredient of 'instigation', the fact that the deceased committed suicide after two days of2687 quarrelling during which the said words were uttered by the accused would show that suicide was not a direct result of the quarrel, on these facts the charge framed against the accused under s 306, IPC, was quashed as ingredients of abetment were found absent.[77] When there is no averment in the charge sheet or material on record to show that the accused either induced the deceased to commit suicide or aided the suicide of the deceased, he is not liable to be charge sheeted for the offence under s 306 and therefore the charge against him for the said offence is liable to be quashed.[78]

Where the accused, a motor vehicle inspector, gave a beating and humiliated a lorry driver by using vulgar language for want of some papers related to the vehicle as a result of which the lorry driver committed suicide, there was nothing to show that the accused committed any act of 'abetment' as defined in s 107, IPC, the charge under s 306 framed against the accused was quashed by the High Court of Andhra Pradesh.[79] When there was no evidence of material on record to infer that the accused at any point of time instigated the deceased or created such circumstances which compelled him to end his life, then primafacie no offence under s 306 is made out against the accused, the charge sheet submitted against the accused and proceedings initiated on the basis of the same are liable to be quashed.[80] Where the suicide note of the deceased does not show that the accused had goaded, provoked, incited, urged or encouraged the deceased-wife to commit suicide, the framing of charge under s 306 [81] against the accused is bad and liable to be quashed.

Mere harassment of the deceased-wife by the accused-husband before her death is not sufficient to show that the accused-husband has abetted suicide within the meaning of s 306, so the charge framed against the accused for the said offence cannot be legally sustained and deserves to be set aside.[82]

Where the allegation in the FIR was that the accused murdered the deceased, and during investigation it was found that the deceased woman had committed suicide, except the statement that there was an illicit relation between the accused and the husband of the deceased, there was no other averment against the accused and there was no material to show that suicide was committed because of the illicit relationship between her husband and the accused, the circumstances of the case, therefore, did not justify sustaining of charge under s 306 which was, therefore, set aside.[83] Where the accused-factory manager assigned night duty to the deceased and none of the witnesses stated in their statement under s 164, CrPC, that the deceased committed suicide because of his continuance with night duty for 3-4 months, in the absence of any nexus between relationship of death of the deceased and functioning of the accused as factory manager of the spinning mill, it is impermissible in law to charge a person with such a serious crime under s 306, so the charge under s 306 read with s 34 was quashed.[84] Where in the suicide note the deceased had stated that the accused had demanded a sum of Rs 15,000/- from him, and on refusal to pay the same the accused had got the deceased declared unfit for recruitment into the Army;2688 the accused was not a member of the selection board and the suicide note did not show that he had instigated the deceased into committing suicide, therefore, the cognizance taken against the accused and summoning him to stand trial under s 302 by sessions court was quashed.[85]

The deceased had already paid the amount of the plots demanded registration of plots from the accused appellants but the accused appellants abused him in filthy language and neither registered the plots and also did not return the amount paid by the deceased. On the utterances made by the accused appellants the victim felt humiliated and committed suicide. The suicide note clearly referred to the acts of the accused appellants and the roles played by them. The order of the High Court rejecting petition under s 482 CrPC for quashing the proceedings was held proper.[86]

20. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, prove that:

(a) a suicide has been committed; and
(b) the accused abetted the said suicide.

In cases of alleged abetment of suicide there must be proof of direct or indirect acts of incitement to the commission of suicide. The mere fact that the husband treated the deceased-wife with cruelty is not enough.[87]

There was evidence of demand of dowry viz cash and tape recorder, proved by the father of the deceased and also by independent witness. Appellants husband and his elder brother had created such hostile environment that the deceased was compelled to commit suicide. Appellants accused were convicted under ss 306 and 498A, IPC .[88]

21. Poison Cases

When there is no convincing evidence on the basis of which any finding can be made that the deceased-wife had committed suicide by consuming poison, the mere possibility of such consumption of poison by her is not sufficient for conviction of the accused under s 306, IPC . The possibility of death by other means must be proved.[89] Where the deceased-wife committed suicide within two years of her marriage by consuming a pesticide, andosulphan, which is a chemical poison, the evidence of her parents clearly established that she was subjected to cruelty, torture and assault with a burning log by the accused-husband, the conviction of the accused under ss 306, 498A was found proper.[90] Where the deceased before her death had sufficient time to disclose to the doctor and other witnesses the cause of her committing suicide, but she only stated that she took insecticide tablets which did not connect the accused person even remotely, the ingredients of s 498A and2689 s 306, IPC did not stand legally established.[1] The deceased wife died of poisoning within seven years of marriage. There was no evidence that the deceased prior to her death was subjected to cruelty. Presumption under s 113B, IPC could not be drawn. The husband, his father and mother were acquitted of charges under ss 304B, 306 and 498A, IPC .[2]

Evidence showed that the deceased wife was harassed for not giving consent for second marriage by the accused husband. She consumed poison and committed suicide. Husband accused was convicted under ss 306 and 498A, IPC .[3]

Where all that the prosecution established was that two bodies were found in the channel that of the wife and infant child of the accused but there was not even an iota of evidence to indicate the circumstances under which the deaths look place; for want of this material link, the order of acquittal under s 304B and 306 was found justified.[4] Mere allegation of harassment is not sufficient to lead to the inference that the accused has abetted suicide of his wife within the meaning of s 306 .[5] The act of the accused in not making an attempt to put off fire and save the life of the deceased does not fall within the expression 'illegal omission' mentioned in s 107, so the accused was not guilty of abetment of suicide under s 306, IPC .[6]

22. Dying Declaration

When the dying declaration was not found genuine in view of infirmities in its recording as well as the fact that the deceased had suffered 100 percent burn injuries, and the accused was not made aware of the said dying declaration to seek his explanation in his statement under s 313, CrPC, the accused was found entitled to an acquittal under s 306, IPC .[7]

Mere allegation of harassment made by the deceased in her dying declaration against the accused is not sufficient to constitute an offence punishable under s 306 .[8] The statement made by the deceased many months prior to her death is not admissible as a dying declaration.[9]

23. Benefit of Doubt

The benefit of doubt to the accused would be available provided there is supportive evidence on record. For creating doubt or granting the benefit of the doubt, the evidence has to be such which may lead to such doubt.[10]Where the accused alleged to have tried to outrage the modesty of deceased and she committed suicide by hanging with help of rope because she felt very much ashamed after two days of incident, the period of two days which elapsed between two incidents showed that act2690 of accused did not instigate her to commit suicide, so, the accused cannot be held guilty of offence under s 306 .[11]

24. Acquittal under Section 306 --No Effect on charge under Section 498A

The charges under ss 306 and 498A, IPC, are independent of each other and acquittal of one does not lead to the acquittal on the other. Although acquittal on a charge under s 306 is not by itself a ground for acquittal under s 498A but some cogent evidence is required to bring home the charge of s 498A, without which the charge cannot be said to be maintained.[12] However, once the accused is acquitted of a charge under s 498A, the requisite ingredients whereof are such which may impel a woman to cause physical or mental injury to herself including suicide, the conviction under s 306, in the absence of any other type of abetment will not be sustainable in law or in fact.[13]

25. Sentence

The offence under s 306, IPC, is against society, womanhood and humanity. Thus, the accused are not entitled to invoke any sympathy or leniency in the sentence which has to be exemplary in such cases.

The custom of becoming sati, which was prevalent up to 1833, was forbidden more than 100 years ago by law. Therefore, a sentence of six month's rigorous imprisonment for such a barbarous act of abetment of sati is ludicrous and a severely deterrent sentence is called for.[14]

The composite sentence on conviction under ss 306 and 498A should not be passed under both sections.[15] The accused should be sentenced under these two sections separately.

Where the husband contracted a second marriage and subjected his first wife-deceased to mental and physical cruelty of an extreme level, leaving her with no alternative and thus provoking her to commit suicide, the accused-husband was sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for five years and fine under s 306 .[16] On account of her mature age of 62 years the accused mother-in-law was expected to treat the deceased with tenderness and sympathy, however, she joined with her sons to force the deceased's parents and brothers to fulfil their demands, and to ensure their fulfilment treated her in a most inhuman manner, so the accused mother-in-law did not deserve sympathy and the sentence of six years rigorous imprisonment under s 306, IPC awarded to her was maintained.[17]

Considering the fact that the incident took place 14 years ago, and both accused-husband and his mother were in custody for about two months, and the accused mother was aged 60 years, the sentence under ss 306 and 498A, IPC of the accused person was reduced to the period already undergone.[18]2691

Following are reasons due to which the sentence of accused/convict was reduced:

(a) Accused was a young person and an agriculturist and father of two children;[19]
(b) Deceased wife was sent to matrimonial house against her wishes, where she never reached;[20]
(c) Accused remarried and had a small female child who was bound to suffer tremendous loss due to custody of accused;[21]
(d) Occurrence took place years before and accused had already suffered some years of imprisonment.[22]

Alteration of Conviction from Section 304B to Section 306

Commentary under the same heading in s 304B, ante, may be referred to.

Alteration of Conviction from Section 306 to Section 354

Where it was not a case of a married woman who having been subjected to a continuous treatment of torture had ended her life, rather it was a case of a woman whose modesty was outraged while she was with her paramour, there was neither any intention nor any positive act on the part of the accused to instigate her or aid her in committing suicide, the conviction of the accused under s 306, IPC was set aside and instead the two accused were convicted under s 354, IPC .[23] Where the accused tried to outrage modesty of deceased few days prior to incident, outraging modesty itself could not be construed as an act of abetment to commit suicide as accused never intended to instigate her to commit suicide, admittedly, the deceased was deserted by her husband and he was not ready to take her back which was cause of her unhappiness and could be main reason for her to commit suicide, so, accused cannot be held guilty of offence under s 306, therefore, the conviction of accused was altered from s 306 to s 354, IPC .[24] It is immaterial for s 306 of IPC whether the cruelty or harassment was caused 'soon before her death' or caused earlier; 'soon before her death', the special provision in s 304B of IPC would be invocable, otherwise, resort can be made to s 306 of IPC . Where it is doubtful as to whether the death of wife has happened because of the cruelty or harassment meted out by the accused No 1 soon before her death in connection with the demand of dowry or not. However, the material on record amply proves that the victim was subjected to cruelty and harassment by the accused, which has led the victim to commit suicide. Thus, the offence committed by the accused squarely falls within the ambit of s 306 read with s 498A of the IPC and not under s 304 B of the IPC . Therefore, conviction of accused under s 304B, IPC read with ss 3, 4, 6 of the2692Dowry Prohibition Act was altered to that under s 306, IPC besides

Where the evidence on record showing cruelty and harassment by husband but no case was made out that husband was instigating or intentionally aiding victim to commit suicide and no active role of husband in that regard proved the husband was found liable to be convicted under s 498A and not under s 306 .[26]

Where it was not established that accused had instigated deceased to commit suicide by doing any act, but his acts in harassing deceased, drinking continuously and beating her regularly which amounted to cruelty to deceased-wife, the conviction and sentence imposed on the accused under s 306 was set aside and he was convicted and sentenced under s 498A .[27]

1. Scope and Applicability

An attempt is an intended, but unfinished, crime, tending, but failing, to effect its commission. Specific intention to commit the crime of murder is a necessary prerequisite of this section. In so far as the offence relates to an attempt, the overt act must necessarily be left unaccomplished because otherwise the prosecution would be for the completed crime. Apart from the necessary mens rea, actus reus must be more than a preliminary preparation.[32] The attempt must have gone so far that it would result in the commission of the crime intended unless frustrated by the intervention of extraneous circumstances, independent of the will of the accused.[33]So, in order to constitute an offence under this section, it must be established that the offender did an act (the actus reus) and that act was actuated by an intention (the mens rea) to go further and to achieve a definite end, which is a specific crime, namely, murder.[34] The prosecution has to establish both the elements of the crime by proving that the accused did something, which, in point of law, would be an intention of the commission of an offence and in taking that step, he was inspired by an intention to achieve the definite objective which constituted the particular crime.[35]

For the application of this section, it is not necessary that the injury, capable of causing death, should have actually been inflicted,[36]because the offence would emerge if the act attempted, if not prevented or intercepted, is such as to be sufficient to cause the death of the victim.[37] An accused charged under s 307, IPC cannot be acquitted merely because the injuries received by the victim are simple injuries, intention and knowledge have to be seen.[38]

In order to attract s 307, the injury need not be on the vital part of the body. A gun shot, as in the present case, may miss the vital part of the body, may result in a lacerated wound, that itself is sufficient to attract s 307 .[39]

Even if the shot, fired by the accused at the victim does not hit him, the offence under s 307, is made out however a lenient view may be taken in awarding2695 sentence.[40] In Bharat Dube v Emperor ,[41]it was observed that in order that an act should amount to an attempt to murder, all that is necessary to prove is that, if the act had caused death, it would have amounted to murder if it was done with such intention or knowledge as would be necessary to be proved in the case of murder. The fact that an act results in minor injuries or even in no injuries at all, is not relevant for the purpose of deciding whether it amounted to an attempt to murder. Where the accused uses sharp-edged weapons, with which causing of death cannot be ruled out, and causes injuries, dangerous to the lives of the victims, the accused can be held guilty under s 307 .[42] If, as a result of some injuries caused to the vital parts of the victim, the possibility of death is not ruled out according to the medical evidence, the offence would fall within the purview of s 307, and not of s 324, IPC .[43] Thus, though the presence of injuries is not of vital importance, yet the number and nature of the injuries are helpful in finding out the intention of the accused.[44]Under this section, the intention precedes the act, and it should be proved independently of the act, and not merely gathered from the consequences that ensue. All that is necessary to be established is the intention with which the act is done, and if once that intention is established, the nature of the act will be immaterial.[45]

Three Parts of Section 307

This section, which deals with an attempt to commit the offence of murder, may be divided into three parts. The first part says that whoever does any act with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances, that if he, by that act caused death, he would be guilty of murder, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine. Here, the stress is laid on the intention of knowledge of accused and, on the circumstances. All that is, therefore, necessary, is that the accused should have the intention to commit murder of the victim or he should have knowledge that he is likely to cause his death. If he commits a certain act with that intention or knowledge and there are circumstances to show that if he had by that act caused the death of the victim, he would have been guilty of murder, he may be punished under this section even though the victim may not be hurt at all.[46]This is clear from the second part of the section which says that if hurt is caused to any person by such act, the offender shall be liable either to imprisonment for life or to such punishment as is2696 hereinbefore mentioned. So, if no hurt is caused, a lighter punishment is provided in the first part; but if hurt is caused, then the second part of the section would come into play and the offender would be liable to an enhanced punishment provided by the second part of the section. Also, the third part of the section provides that if the offender is already under sentence of imprisonment for life and if hurt is caused, he may be punished with death.[47]

First part of s 307, IPC does not contemplate that receipt of any injury on the part of the victim is a pre-requisite for convicting an accused thereunder. In the event injuries are received, the second part of s 307 would be attracted.[48]

2. Law of Singapore

Whoever does an act with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances, that if he by that act caused death he would be guilty of murder, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to 10 years and will also be liable to a fine, and if hurt is caused to any person by such act, the offender shall be liable either to imprisonment for life or to such punishment as is hereinbefore mentioned and shall also be liable to caning.

When any person offending against this provision is under a sentence of imprisonment for life, he may, if hurt is caused, be punished with death.

Thus, where:

(1) A shoots at Z with the intention to kill him under such circumstances that, if death ensued, A would be guilty of murder. A is liable to punishment under this provision.
(2) A, with the intention of causing the death of a child of tender years, exposes it in a desert place, A has committed the offence of attempt to murder, though the death of the child does not ensue.
(3) A, intending to murder Z, buys a gun and loads it. A has not yet committed the offence. If A fires the gun at Z he has committed the offence defined as attempt to murder and if by such firing he wounds Z, he will be liable to punishment provided by the first paragraph of this provision.
(4) A, intending to murder Z by poison, purchases poison and mixes the same with food which remains in A's keeping; A has not yet committed the offence defined in this provision. If A places the food on Z's table or delivers it to Z's servants to place it on Z's table A has committed the offence defined under this provision.[49]

The intention of the accused can be ascertained by reference to: (1) the nature of the injuries inflicted; (2) the nature of the weapon utilised; and (3) the part of the body where the injuries were inflicted or at which the accused's blows were aimed. The intention or knowledge must be followed by an overt act to constitute the offence.[50] Where 'hurt' is caused in attempted murder, the higher tier of punishment may be invoked and that includes life imprisonment and caning.[51]2697

In Saeng-Un Udom v Public Prosecutor it was observed, 'It is true that he caused the death of the deceased. It was argued that he said that because he honestly believed that he did it. However, subsequent investigations revealed that he was mistaken. There was irrefutable evidence that the fatal wounds were not inflicted by him. It was pointed out that at the time when he entered the room of the deceased, armed with the metal rod, the room was dark, and he did not realise that the object which he hit with the iron rod was not the deceased's head, which he believed it was. He therefore did not kill the deceased.'[52]

3. Essential Ingredients

To constitute an offence under s 307, IPC, two ingredients of the offence must be present:

(a) an intention of or knowledge relating to commission of murder; and
(b) the doing of an act towards it.[53]

The essential ingredients required to be proved in the case of an offence under s 307, IPC are:

(i) That the death of a human being was attempted;
(ii) That such death was attempted to be caused by, or in consequence of the act of the accused;
(iii) That such act was done with the intention of causing death; or that it was done with the intention of causing such bodily injury as; (a) the accused knew to be likely to cause death; or (b) was sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, or that the accused attempted to cause death by doing an act known to him to be so imminently dangerous that it must in all probability cause (a) death, or (b) such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, the accused having no excuse for incurring the risk of causing such death or injury.[54]
(iv) To justify conviction under this section it is not essential that bodily injury capable of causing death should have been inflicted.[55]

What was proved against the appellant was that he shot at the deceased, but there was no evidence to show that it was the injury inflicted by the appellant which was the cause of death. However, from the facts proved, there was no doubt that he shot at the deceased with an intention to kill him or at least he had the knowledge that the act would cause the death. Held, that the allegations proved constituted an offence under s 307, IPC . Conviction of the appellant accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 307, IPC .[56]

4. Relevancy of Evidence of Section 300 in Section 307

In order to bring a case within the ambit of s 307, IPC, the prosecution should make out the facts and circumstances envisaged by s 300, IPC . If the ingredients of s 300 2698 are wholly lacking, there can be no conviction under s 307 .[57] Unless it can be said that the intention (or knowledge) of the accused was to cause such bodily injury as would come within one of the four clauses of s 300, he cannot be held guilty of an offence under this section.[58]

5. Simple Injuries and Points for Consideration

The mere fact that the injuries caused to the complainant were simple in nature and were not such as were likely to result in death of the complainant, is not by itself sufficient to take the case out of the purview of s 307 . It, however, still remains to be considered:

(i) whether, but for the intervention of something beyond the control of the accused, the accused's act in question, if completed, would have caused the death of the complainant in the usual course of events; and
(ii) whether there was the requisite guilty intention of knowledge existent in the minds of the accused while doing the said act.[59]

6. Section not Violative of Articles 14 and 21 of the Constitution

Section 307 envisages two types of cases, namely:

(i) where the victim suffers hurt; and
(ii) where the victim does not suffer hurt, in the course of the transaction.

It is needless to point out that in both the cases, the offender intends to cause death of the victim. The legislature accordingly wanted to bring in a distinction between cases where the victim suffers hurt and where he does not suffer hurt, in so as the prescription of sentence is concerned. So it prescribed a sentence of imprisonment for 10 years and fine in cases where the victim does not suffer hurt, and a sentence of imprisonment for life or for ten years in cases where the victim suffers hurt. Therefore, the imposition of sentence depends upon the fact whether the victim suffered hurt or not in the course of the transaction. Therefore, when the section is clear and categorical with regard to the prescription of sentence by saying that in cases where the person assaulted suffers hurt during the course of attempt to murder him, the sentence to be imposed is imprisonment for life or for ten years with fine and in cases where the person assaulted does not suffer hurt in the sentence prescribed is imprisonment for ten years and fine, it cannot be said that the section is violative of the fundamental rights under arts 14 and 21 of the Constitution, and therefore, the question of discrimination does not arise.[60]

7. Section 307 and Section 511 --Distinction

This section deals with an attempt to commit the specific offence of murder which, under s 302, IPC, is punishable with death or imprisonment for life. On the other2699 hand, s 511, IPC deals with an attempt to commit an offence punishable with imprisonment for life or imprisonment 'where no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such offences'. In Empress v Niddha ,[61] the court, dissenting from the view taken in Reg v Francis Cassidy ,[62] which was followed in Jiwandas v Emperor ,[63] and considered in Vasudeo Balwant Gogte v Emperor ,[64] held that s 307 is exhaustive and no court has a right to resort to the provisions of ss 299 and 300, read with s 511, IPC, for the purpose of convicting a person of the offence of attempted murder. An act done by a person, who has formed an intention to commit a murder, can escape falling under s 307, IPC only if the act does not amount to an attempt, but is still a preparation or if it amounts to an attempt, it is an attempt to commit some offence other than murder. If it does amount to an attempt to commit murder, it is difficult to understand how it can escape falling under s 307 and fall under s 511 . If the act does not amount to an attempt, it cannot fall even under s 511 . If it does not amount to an attempt, but is an attempt to commit some offence other than murder, no question of its falling under s 307 arises, and it may fall under s 511 only if other conditions of that section are satisfied. Section 307 is, thus, exhaustive. Section 511 applies to attempts to commit crimes generally. It does not apply to attempts to commit 'murder' or 'culpable homicide not amounting to murder' which are fully and exclusively provided for under ss 307 and 308 respectively.[65] In Om Prakash v State of Punjab ,[66] which was an appeal by the accused against his conviction under s 307 for attempting to murder his wife by starvation, it was contended on behalf of the accused-appellant that the ingredients of the offence under s 307 were materially different from those of an offence under s 511, the difference being that, fit for an act to amount to the commission of the offence of attempting to commit an offence, it need not be the last act and can be the first act towards the commission of the offence while for an offence under s 307, it is the last act which, if effective to cause death, would constitute the offence of an attempt to commit murder. The contention was that even if a woman had been deprived of food for a certain period, the act of so depriving her did not come under s 307 as that act could not, by itself, have caused her death, it being necessary for the period of starvation to continue for a longer period to cause death. However, the Supreme Court did not agree with this contention. Referring to ss 307 and 308, the Supreme Court observed:

A person commits an offence under s 308, when he has an intention to commit culpable homicide not amounting to murder and, in pursuance of that intention, does an act towards the commission of that offence, whether that act be the penultimate act or not. On a parity of reasoning, a person commits an offence under section 307 when he has an intention to commit murder and, in pursuance of that intention, does an act towards the commission, irrespective of the fact whether that act is the penultimate act or not. It is to be clearly understood, however, that the intention to commit the offence of murder means that the person concerned has the intention to do certain act with necessary intention or knowledge mentioned in section 300 . The intention to commit an offence is different from the intention or knowledge requisite for constituting the act of that offence. The expression 'whoever attempts to commit an offence', in section 511, can2700 only mean whoever intends to do a certain act with the intent or knowledge necessary for the commission of that offence. The same is meant by the expression 'whoever does an act with such intention or knowledge, and under such circumstances, that if he, by that act, caused death, he would be guilty of murder' in section 307 . This simply means that the act must be done with the intent or knowledge requisite for the commission of the offence of murder. The expression 'by that act' does not mean that the immediate effect of the act committed must be death. Such a result must be the result of that act, whether immediately or after a lapse of times. The word 'act' again does not mean only any particular, specific, instantaneous act of a person, but denotes, according to section 33, in the case of the appellant in regularly starving the woman, a series of acts and therefore acts falling short of completing the series would, therefore, come within the purview of section 307 of the Code.

8. Sections 307 and 308 --Relative Scope

Commentary under s 308, post, may be referred to.

9. Constructive Liability under Section 34

Commentary under s 34, ante, may be referred to.

It may, in many cases, be difficult to decide whether the criminal act in question has been done by several persons in furtherance of the common intention of all. However, once it is decided that the acts so done by a number of persons in furtherance of the common intention of all, the legal position that results is that each persons shall be held to have committed the entire criminal act and s 34 applies even if that act amounts only to an attempt to murder.[67] Where, being aware that his companion was armed with a pistol, the appellant incited the said companion to shoot, whereupon the companion, pointing to the complainant, proclaimed that he (victim) was doing pairvi against the accused in a previous case, it was held, in these circumstances, that the appellant shared the common intention with his companion to attempt to kill the victim who was hit, on his palm by the pistol-shot.[68] If, however, the common intention to kill on the part of the accused is wanting, they cannot be convicted of an offence under s 307, read with s 34, IPC . However, they may be held guilty of an offence under s 323, read with s 34, IPC, if conditions of s 323, IPC, are fulfilled.[69]

The requirement of the statute is sharing the common intention upon being present at the place of occurrence. Mere distancing himself from the scene cannot absolve the accused. The same depends upon the fact situation of the matter under consideration and no steadfast rule can be laid down therefor.[70]

Mere presence together at the time of incident is not sufficient to hold that accused persons shared common intention. Further, s 34 is attracted only if accused shared common intention and not when they shared only similar intention.[71]

10. Constructive Liability under Section 149

Commentary under s 149, ante, may be referred to.2701

A charge of entertaining the common object of attempting to murder is not maintainable because it cannot be said that the common object of an assembly would be that they should be frustrated in the commission by some unforeseen event just before the completion of the offence.[72] When occurrence took place at the spur of the moment the accused persons cannot be said to be members of an unlawful assembly.[73] An accused not identified by eye-witness cannot be convicted by taking recourse to s 149 even though the co-accused persons are convicted under s 307 read with s 149, IPC .[74] When five co-accused were acquitted, the conviction of other accused on the basis of some prosecution evidence with the aid s 149 was not proper.[75] Failure to establish existence of unlawful assembly would make each accused liable for only his individual acts.[76]

11. Attempt

There are different stages in a crime, first intention to commit it, second preparation to commit it and third, an attempt to commit it. If at the third stage, the attempt fails, the aims is not complete, but law punishes for attempting the same.[77] An 'attempt' means doing everything by an accused within his power to achieve the final result, but the final result alludes because something beyond his control intervenes e.g., there may be slight deflection of the shot or something comes in between suddenly or the victim is saved with medical aid after being struck.[78]It is to be borne in mind that the question, whether a certain act amounts to an attempt to commit a particular offence, is a question of fact dependent on the nature of the offence and the steps necessary to take in order to commit it.[79] It is, thus, left to the commonsense of the court to determine whether the stage reached by the accused is preparation or attempt.[80] The Supreme Court in Abhayanand Mishra v State of Bihar ,[81] observed:

> A person commits the offence of 'attempt to commit a particular offence' when (i) he intends to commit that particular offence and (ii) he, having made preparations and with the intention to commit the offence, does an act towards its commission; such an act need not be penultimate act towards the commission of that offence, but must be an act during the course of committing that offence.[82]2702

In Re T Munirathnam Reddy,[83] it was said that the distinction between preparation and attempt may be clear in some cases, but in most of the cases the dividing line is very thin. Nonetheless, it is a real distinction. The crucial test is whether the last act, if uninterrupted and successful, would constitute a crime. If the accused intends that the natural consequence of his act should result in death, but is frustrated only by extraneous circumstances, he would be guilty of an attempt to commit the offence of murder. Therefore, what has to be established is that if the victim had met his death, the offence would have been one under s 302, IPC .[84] In Om Prakash v State of Punjab ,[85] the Supreme Court observed:

> It may, however, be mentioned that, in cases of attempt to commit murder by firearm, the act, amounting to an attempt to commit murder, is bound to be the last act to be done by the culprit. Till he fires, he does not do any act towards the commission of the offence, and once he fires and something happens to prevent the shot taking effect, the offence under s 307 is made out...

In an attempt, every element of the thing attempted is present except the fact of success. Thus, in an attempt to murder, all the elements of murder exist except the fact of death. The cause of the want of success is immaterial. It may be the timely escape or rescue of the person assailed,[86] the missed fire of the gun, the insufficiency of the dose of poison administered,[87] or recovery from a wound. Whatever the intervening obstacle to success may be, the accused cannot plead it in his aid if it was not known to himself.[88] Chief Justice Beamount, in Vasdeo Balwant Gogte v Emperor ,[89]observed that what s 307 really means is that the accused must do an act with such a guilty intention and knowledge, and in such circumstances, that but for some intervening fact, the act would have amounted to murder in the normal course of events. This has been accepted as correct by the Supreme Court in Om Prakash v State of Punjab. [90]

Child Accused

In Gopi Nath Ghosh v State of West Bengal ,[91] the Hon'ble Supreme Court had firstly voiced its concern about the failure to raise any objection as to the age of the accused in the courts below. The Apex Court took note of the provision of art 39(f) of the Constitution which provides that the state shall direct its policy towards securing that children are given opportunities and facilities to develop in a healthy manner and in conditions of freedom and dignity and that childhood and youth are protected against exploitation and against moral and material abandonment. The Hon'ble Supreme Court thereafter set aside the conviction and sentence. In another case, the same path was traversed by Delhi High Court. Accordingly, the conviction and the sentence of2703 the accused who was only 14 years of age at the time of commission of offence was set aside as unsustainable.[1]

'Attempt' Distinguished from 'Preparation'

Preparation consists in devising or arranging the means or measures necessary for the commission of the offence. Everything, however remotely connected with the commission of the crime, may be regarded as preparation towards it.[2]On the other hand, as a rule, it is the last proximate act, done in the execution of the crime, the completion of the offence being prevented only by some cause independent of the offender's volition.[3] In other words, an attempt to commit an offence is an act, or series of acts, which leads inevitably to the commission of the offence unless something, which the doer of the act or acts neither foresaw nor intended, happens to prevent this. An act done towards the commission of an offence, which does not inevitably leads to the commission of the offence unless it is followed or perhaps, preceded by other acts, is merely an act of preparation.[4]

If something is yet to be done, the act of omission of the accused would be at the preparatory stage and would not amount to an attempt to murder.[5]An attempt is an act of such a nature that it is itself evidence of the criminal intent with which it is done. A criminal attempt bears the criminal intent upon its face. The thing speaks for itself.[6] Attempt to commit an offence, therefore, can be said to begin when the preparations are complete and the culprit commences to do something with the intention of committing the offence and which is a step towards the commission of the offence. As soon as he commences to do an act with the necessary intention, he commences his attempt to commit the offence.[7]An act, which is punishable under this section, must be an act which is itself capable of causing death. Merely aiming the loaded pistol towards a person does not amount to 'an attempt to murder' within the meaning of this section. In cases of attempt to cause death by firearm, the weapon must be fired. So long as it is not fired, no offence of attempt to murder, as contemplated by this section, is committed. However, once he fires and something happens to prevent the shot from taking effect, the offence under s 307 is made out.[8] Also, mere firing does not raise inference of attempt to murder. Fire should be specifically aimed, the mens rea required under s 300, IPC has to exits, there has also to exist an effective act to achieve the end of killing.[9] In the case of an attempt to murder by starvation, the conduct of the accused in regularly starving the victim to accelerate her/his end would amount to an attempt of murder.[10] In Empress v Ramakka ,[11] a woman, on account of a quarrel with her father and brother, ran2704 towards a well shouting that she would fall into it. In a prosecution for an attempt to commit suicide, she was not held guilty. Her running towards the well merely amounted to a preparation and no more. She must have reached the well and must also have done something so that she may fall into it, eg tried to jump from the parapet wall of the well. It was held that she had not gone past the locuspoenitentiae allowed to her by the law. In a similar case, where accused, a husband and wife, jumped into a well with their infant child and, when they were doing so, the child slipped from the hands of the woman, fell into the well and drowned, it was held that they went beyond the stage of preparation and locus poenitentiae, which is available only prior to the actus reus, ceased to exist.[12]

12. 'Act' Denotes Series of Acts Also

The 'act' referred to in this section, does not mean only any particular, specific, instantaneous act of a person; it denotes,' according to s 33, IPC, a series of acts as well.[13]

13. Mens Rea

Mens rea is one of the two essential elements of the offence of an attempt to murder. The mens rea may consist of a guilty intention or of a guilty knowledge. To constitute an attempt to murder, there must be some overt act combined with the evidence of mens rea. The burden is always on the prosecution to prove, first, the actus reus, that is, the accused had done something which, in point of law, marked the commission of the offence, and secondly, the mens rea, that is, in taking this step, he was inspired by the intention to reach a definite objective which would constitute a specific offence. A man cannot be convicted for an attempt to murder if the evidence merely discloses that he was rash, negligent or reckless.[14] If, therefore, the essential ingredient of s 307, pertaining to the proof of existence of intention or knowledge on the part of the accused has not been established, he cannot be held guilty under s 307, IPC .[15] Mere firing does not raise inference of attempt to murder. Fire should be specifically aimed. For the mens rea required under s 300, IPC to exist, there has also to exist an effective act to achieve the end of killing.[16] Where the injuries inflicted were simple, even if one of the accused had assaulted by lathi, held the accused persons had no intention to kill, their conviction under s 307, IPC was altered to one under s 323, IPC .[17]

The crux of every case (apart from cases resting on knowledge) is the intention of the assailant.[18]Intention has been defined to consist of desire that certain consequences shall form a party's act (or omission).[19] If there is no such intention or2705 knowledge as is necessary to constitute murder, there can be no attempt to commit it and therefore, no offence under this section.[20] The intention may be any of the three kinds referred to in the first three clauses of s 300 .[21] Where neither the FIR disclosed that the accused had intended to kill the complainant, nor was such intention disclosed from the medical evidence, it was held that the accused could be convicted only under ss 326 / 149, IPC, and not under ss 307 / 149, IPC .[22]

Intent which is a state of mind cannot be proved by precise direct evidence, as a matter of fact it can only be detected or inferred from other factors. Some of the relevant considerations may be the nature of the weapon used, the place where injuries were inflicted, the nature of the injuries and the circumstances in which the incident took place.[23]

The intention, which brings a case within s 307, IPC, must be inferred from the totality of all the facts and circumstances of a case.[24] Intention, being an act of a mind, has to be gathered by the surrounding circumstances. The mere fact, that the accused used a small pen-knife and because only one injury was caused, is not sufficient to come to a conclusion that the accused did not intend to cause the death of the victim. The conviction of an accused under s 307 must be sustained where the accused has caused the injury under the circumstances that if, by the stab blow, he had caused the death of the victim, he would have been guilty of murder.[25] Where the accused fired at his opponents with his gun, and the firing went on for some time, it cannot be denied that either the intention of the accused was to cause death or he had knowledge that death would be caused.

If death is not caused, the accused must be held guilty under this section.[26] Where the weapon used by the accused was not heavy and the injuries caused were such that the victim did not even loose consciousness, it was held that there could be no intention of causing the death of the victim.[27] Merely because one or two victims has received their injuries on the vital parts of their body, it cannot necessarily be inferred that the intention of the accused was to cause their death unless there is evidence to show that the injuries, received by the victims, were dangerous to their lives.[28] Where the stab injuries caused in the back of the victim were penetrating, the weapon going to the pleural cavity, it was held that it was not difficult to infer that the accused had an intention to cause death of the victim.[29] The mere fact that no2706 vital organ was cut, is not sufficient to take the case out of s 307 .[30] An inference from the injuries inflicted, as to presence or absence of intention to cause death, cannot to drawn unless the doctors, who examined the wounds, are examined.[31] In Farroq v State ,[32] the doctor, in his statement on oath, stated that the injury, inflicted on the victim, could cause his death though he did not say so in his supplementary report. It was observed that if he had written so in the supplementary report, he would have characterised the injury as grievous. Therefore, it could not be held that the injury in question was dangerous to life or could cause death. From this, it could be concluded that the intention of the accused was merely to cause a simple injury to the victim and not to cause his death. In view of this, he could be convicted only under s 324, and not under s 307 . In Kali Charan v State ,[33] six accused were sent for assaulting the victims. Four of them had pistols and two of them pharsa and lathi respectively. First of all, pharsa and lathi were wielded despite the fact that four accused had pistols. However, when an intevener came, pistols were used from some distance, and not from a close range. There was no scorching or tattooing in any gunshot wound of the two injured persons. The dispute was for a trifling matter of digging up of a portion of a water tube of a person of the accused's party. In these circumstances, it was observed that if the accused had come with the intention of taking the life of the two persons, than the four accused having pistols, could have immediately used their weapons and they would not have allowed the other accused having lathi and pharsa, to wield their weapon first, and therefore, the provisions of s 307, could not be said to have been attracted. Of course, the accused could be convicted under ss 326 / 149, IPC . It must be remembered that it is the date on which the injury was examined, and the circumstances of the incident which are to be taken into consideration for determining the nature of the offence committed by an offender. If, on the date of occurrence, the injury caused by the offender is not declared, it cannot be said to have had the intention to commit murder of the deceased merely because, about three weeks after the incident, the injury becomes grievous and dangerous to life.[34] In State of Haryana v Hawa Singh ,[35] it was observed that it is a matter of common knowledge that even a minor wound can cause a serious situation because of the negligence of a doctor to the recipient of the wound himself. Merely because a wound could become serious in future does not show that the nature of the injury, at the time of its infliction, was dangerous to life enabling the court to convict the accused person under s 307, IPC .

Where fire made by accused by pistol missed but the fire was followed by attack with sword, gupti and rod carried by the accused persons, medical evidence showing injuries corroborated the prosecution case, conviction of the accused for offence under ss 307 / 149, IPC was held proper.[36]2707

14. Intention may be Proved by Res Gestae

Intent which is a state of mind cannot be proved by precise direct evidence, as a fact it can only be detected or inferred from other factors. Some of the relevant considerations may be the nature of the weapon used, the place where injuries were inflicted, the nature of the injuries and the circumstances in which the incident took place.[37]

Intention, because of not capable of being proved by direct evidence as a fact, can only be deducted or inferred from other facts which are proved. The intention may be proved by res gestae, by acts or events, previous or subsequent to the incident or occurrence. The various relevant circumstances,[38] from which the intention can be gathered, may be stated as under:

(i) nature of the weapon used;[39]
(ii) the place where the injuries were caused;[40]
(iii) the nature of the injuries caused;[41] and
(iv) the opportunity available to the accused.

In cases under s 307, IPC, the court should carefully consider the provisions of ss 324, 326 and 307, IPC . The circumstances, in which the injury has been caused, should also be considered.[42]

When medical certificate revealed that victim suffered 12 incised wounds, the intention to commit offence under s 307 can be gathered.[43]

15. Nature of Injury and Intention

Although the nature of injury actually caused may often give considerable assistance in coming to a finding as to the intention of the accused, such intention may also be deduced from other circumstances, and may even, in some cases, be ascertained without any reference at all to actual wounds. The sections make a distinction between the act of the accused and its result, if any. The court has to see whether the act, irrespective of its result, was done with the intention or knowledge and under circumstances mentioned in the section. Therefore, it is not correct to acquit an accused of the charge under s 307, IPC merely because the injuries inflicted on the victim were in the nature of a simple hurt.[44]The intention to commit murder can be gathered either from the act of the accused or from the impact of the injuries.[45]

Whether there was intention to kill or knowledge that death will be caused is a question of fact and would depend on the facts of a given case. The circumstances2708 that the injury inflicted by the accused was simple or minor will not by itself rule out application of s 307, IPC . The determinative question is intention or knowledge, as the case may be, and not nature of the injury.[46]

It is sufficient to justify a conviction under s 307 if there is present an intent coupled with some overt act in execution thereof. It is not essential that bodily injury capable of causing death should have been inflicted. The section makes a distinction between the act of the accused and its result, if any. The court has to see whether the act, irrespective of its result, was done with the intention or knowledge and under circumstances mentioned in the section. Therefore, an accused charged under s 307, IPC cannot be acquitted merely because the injuries inflicted on the victim were in the nature of a simple hurt.[47]

The doctor in injury report had not stated that the injury of the victim in the ordinary course of nature was sufficient to cause death. Conviction of the accused under s 307, IPC was altered to one under s 308, IPC and sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[48]

16. Intention or Knowledge

Intention of or knowledge relating to the commission of murder and the doing of an act towards it are the two ingredients of the offence under s 307, IPC .[49]

For the purpose of s 307, IPC what is material is the intention or the knowledge and not the consequence of the actual act done for the purpose of carrying out the intention. The section clearly contemplates an act which is done with intention of causing death but which fails to bring about the intended consequence on account of intervening circumstances. The intention or knowledge of the accused must be such as is necessary to constitute murder. In the absence of intention or knowledge which is the necessary ingredient of s 307, there can be no offence 'of attempt to murder'.[50] The question whether the accused had intention or knowledge that death would be caused by his act is a question of fact dependent upon the facts of each case.[51]

Intention to kill is the most important ingredient of the offence under this section and if this is not proved, no conviction can be had under the section even if the act committed is sufficient to cause death under normal circumstances. [52]Section 307 requires that the act must be done with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances that if death be caused by that act, the offence of murder will emerge. If, in the light of the medical evidence, this requirement is not satisfied, no conviction under s 307 can be sustained.[53] Where the accused persons entered the2709 office of the victim, strangulated him by throwing a telephone wire around his neck, held, the accused had intention to cause the death of the victim, they were convicted under s 307, IPC .[54]Section 307, IPC does not contemplate that the hurt/injury caused should be grievous or of any particular degree or kind.[55]

The appellant accused fired gun shots at the victim injured which was proved by the evidence of the eye-witnesses present on the spot. Prosecution story was corroborated by medical evidence. The doctor deposed that injuries received by the victim could be caused by gun shots. It was immaterial that the injuries were not caused on vital parts of the body of the injured. FIR was filed promptly in the case. The accused could be imputed with the knowledge that his act might cause the death of the injured. Accused was convicted under s 307, IPC .[56]

Where several accused persons attack an unarmed person there is ground to presume that the accused persons had intention/knowledge that the attacks would cause death the victim.[57]

The evidence did not indicate that there was any intention or motive for the accused to assault the victims. The injuries received by the victims were on non-vital parts of their body, none of them either individually or collectively were likely to cause danger to the life of the injured persons. The intention of the accused persons to commit the murder of the injured was not at all made out. Accused appellants were acquitted of the charge under s 307, IPC .[58]

'Or Knowledge'

'Knowledge' is an alternative ingredient of an offence or murder under s 300, IPC . Hence, an offence under s 307, IPC, can be said to have been committed even if knowledge and not intention, on the part of an accused is proved to the effect that the act in question is so dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause the death of the victim.[59] It must be remembered that the knowledge required under this section, is the knowledge, referred to in cl 4 of s 300, and not the knowledge, referred to in cl 3 of s 299 .[60]Where a person, offended by an act of another, deliberately arms himself with a chhuri (knife), enters the latter's house in darkness and strikes him on the neck, causing him an injury, he must be deemed to have intended to cause that other's death or at least, to have had the knowledge that the result of his act would be death. If, however, the victim escapes death, the offender would be liable under this section.[61]If a man, with an evil intent, fires at another at close range, he must be deemed, at least, to know that his act is likely to cause death, and if the victim escapes death, he would be liable under this section.[62]2710

Intention/knowledge of the accused and not injury relevant

It is sufficient to justify a conviction under s 307, IPC if there is present an intent coupled with some overt act in execution thereof. It is not essential that bodily injury capable of causing death should have been inflicted. An accused charged under s 307, IPC cannot be acquitted merely because injuries inflicted on the victim were in the nature of a simple hurt.[63]

17. 'And Under Such Circumstances'

In order to constitute the offence under this section, the act in question must be done not only with the intention or knowledge, but also under such circumstances that if death is caused by that act, the person, doing the act, would be guilty of murder. Justice Straight, in Empress v Niddha ,[64] dissenting from the view, taken by Couch J in Reg v Francis Cassidy ,[65] observed that the words 'under such circumstances' have no other meaning than this that the act must be done in such a way and with such ingredients, that if it succeeded, and if death was caused by it, the legal result would be murder according to s 300 .[66] An almost similar view was taken by Beaumont CJ, in Vasudeo Balwant Gogte v Emperor ,[67] where he observed:

> But if you have an act done with a sufficiently guilty intention and knowledge and in circumstances, which do not, from their nature, afford a defence to a charge of murder, and if the act is of such a nature as would have caused death in the usual course of events but for something beyond the accused's control which prevented that result, than it seems to me that the case falls within s 307 .

Justice Teja Singh, in Bakhshish Singh v State ,[68] agreeing with Straight J and Beaumont CJ, explained the meaning of the words 'and under such circumstances' thus:

> ...these words have nothing to do with the question whether the act, committed by the accused, could, or could not, cause the death, but relate to the nature of the offence which the accused would have committed of the act did cause death.

It must be remembered that the view taken by Straight J in Empress v Niddha ,[69] and Beaumont CJ in Vasudeo Balwant Gogte v Emperor ,[70] is in consonance with the interpretation of the Supreme Court in

Om Prakash v State of Punjab. [71]If a person, who has an evil intent, does an act which is the last possible act that he could do towards the accomplishment of a particular crime that he has in mind, he is not entitled to plead, in his aid, an obstacle intervening not known to himself. If he did all that he could do and completed the only remaining proximate act in his power, he2711 cannot escape criminal responsibility, and this is because his own set volition and purpose, having been given effect to, to their full extent, a fact unknown to him and at variance with his own behalf, intervened to prevent the consequences of that act which he expected to ensue, ensured.[72]

Accused appellants had chopped off victim's leg by axe. They were held guilty of offence under s 307, IPC, even though the injury caused could not be held under the ordinary circumstances sufficient to cause the death of the victim.[73]

18. 'If he, by that act, caused death'

The words 'if he, by that act, caused death' necessary imply that the act must be capable of causing death. An act intrinsically incapable of causing death, like witchcraft or pulling of the trigger of an unloaded gun, cannot constitute the offence.[74] The means must be apparently, though not really, suitable so that they can be adapted to the designed purpose. Well-laid plans, after careful preparation, are sometimes unexpectedly foiled and rendered ineffectual. The best firearms, loaded, capped, primed and well-aimed, any misfire. It may even be that the party, shot at, may be wearing a jacket of impervious mail or the shot may hit a bullet-proof object inside a pocket, eg, metal clasp of a pocket-book or of a purse or of a cigarette case. In all such cases, the accused is guilty of the offence of attempt to commit murder. However, if the means adopted are such as are apparently and also absolutely inadequate to accomplish the designed purpose, then the case for attempted murder cannot be made out. This is illustrated when a man threatens the life of another with a child's popgun, using a cork or similar innocuous thing, as a projectile.[75] In Re Maragatham,[76] Ramswami J, observed:

> To constitute an indictable attempt to commit a crime, its consummation must be apparently possible or, in other words, there must be, at least, an apparent ability to commit it. If the means employed are so clearly unsuitable that it is obvious that the crime cannot be committed of if its consummation is dependent on the conduct of a third-person-principal, who has an opportunity to frustrate it, the attempt is not indictable. On the other hand, if there is an apparent ability to commit the crime in the way attempted, the attempted is indictable.

19. Illustrative Cases

Tangi and Tangia

In general, an axe is termed both tangi and tangia colloquially, as such these are two distinct weapons.[77]

Abandonment Cases

Illustration (b) to this section gives an example of a case when abandonment of a child amounts to an offence under this section. However, if A does not expose the2712 child but leaves it well-wrapped and protected from cold and that too not in a deserted place, but in a place, not far off from the house and the footpath, where the villagers are in the habit of grazing cattle, so that the villagers can easily find it, the offence falls under s 317 .[78]

Drowning Cases

In a case, the accused a woman, in the course of a quarrel with her sister-in-law and in a fit of anger, flung her child, aged three years, into a pond, on the edge of which her house was situated, and, at the same time, gave expression to a wish that the death of the child should rest as a curse on the head of the woman with whom she was quarrelling. Fortunately, there were bystanders about and one of them picked up the child and saved its life. It was also found that the water in the pond was not less than four feet deep. It was held that to throw a child of three years into water four feet in depth gives rise to a presumption that the intention was to cause its death, even though there may have been bystanders ready to pick the child out without loss of time, that the words, used by the accused when flinging the child, also indicated such an intention, and that the accused was, therefore, guilty of the offence under this section.[79] In Re Maragatham,[80] the two accused, who were husband and wife, and were starving for want of means and employment, determined to put an end to their own lives and also that of their infant child. With this determination, they proceeded towards a well, tied themselves together and jumped into it. They were, however, saved from drowning. However, the child, who slipped from the hands of the mother, while they were jumping, drowned to death. It was held that, though the accused had the intention to cause the death of the child, its death was not directly caused by their act, but by accident of the child slipping, and that the accused were guilty of an offence under this section, and not of murder.

Poisoning Cases

A, intending to kill B, gives him large doses of opium in his milk. Unknown to A, B is a confirmed opium-eater with the result that the opium has little or no effect on B. A has attempted to kill B.[81] Where a woman of 20 years of age was found to have administered dhatura, to the members of her family, it was held that she must be presumed to have known that he administration of dhatura, was likely to cause death, even though she might not have administered it with that intention, and as the woman's act might have resulted in death, she was guilty under this section.[82] Powdered glass, mixed with food, may possibly cause death of the person eating it, and the person, administering it with the intention of causing death, is liable under this section if death has not resulted from it.[83] Where it was proved that the accused put into the food cooked for the complainant's family, some vegetable similar in appearance to fragments of dhatura seeds, and it gave physiological reactions, similar to those produced by atropine, but there was no evidence of the quantity of the poison found in the food, or of its possible effects on anyone who might have eaten it, it was held that it was not possible to say that the accused intend to cause2713 anything more than hurt and that the accused could be held guilty only of the offence under ss 328 and 511, IPC .[84]

Attack by Brickbats

Where prosecution case was that the accused R had thrown brickbats causing injuries to one member of complainant party, but the doctor had stated that none of the injuries was caused by brickbats, conviction of the accused R under s 307, IPC was set aside.[85]

Shooting Cases

Mere firing does not raise inference of attempt to murder fire should be specifically aimed. The mens rea required under s 300, IPC has to exist. There should also exist an effective act to achieve the end of killing. Once an accused fires his firearm to shoot the victim, an offence under this section is made out if something happens to prevent the shot taking effect.[86] Firing even two to three shots successively at another indicates a murderous intent.[87] If a person fires several shots with a rifle at a person, it would ordinarily mean that the wants to kill that person. The fact that the person fired at was not killed does not mean that the person firing did not intend to kill him.[88] Likewise, a person firing at the body of another at close range, must be taken to have, at least, the knowledge that he is thereby likely to cause his death. If the shot takes effect on or about the feet of the victim and causes only a simple injury, an intention to cause death may be inferred.[89]

Where the accused lowered down his range and aimed only at the thigh of the victim, and the injury caused was very simple, it was held that these facts indicated that the accused had no intention to murder.[90] When the only evidence against accused was that he aimed gun shot only at the leg of injured, which resulted in fracture. In this view of the evidence it cannot be said that accused intended to cause death or to cause such bodily injuries which may be sufficient to cause his death in the ordinary course of nature, so as to bring the offence within the purview of s 307, IPC . Thus considering the part of body at which the gun shot was fired and taking in view the fact that accused did not repeat the shots, as also the fact that he fired gun shot at the leg and caused fracture, it must be held that accused voluntarily caused grievous hurt by dangerous weapon viz, the gun and hence he must be held liable for committing offence under s 326 IPC and not under s 307, IPC .[91] The mere use of the gun,[92] or of a country-made pistol on a non-vital part of the body from a close2714 range,[1] will not make the offence punishable under this section. Even pulling the trigger would not amount to an offence under this section if the gun is not proved to have been loaded because it is quite possible that the person firing was only trying to frighten the complainant.[2] No assumption can be drawn that by use of firearm in causing injuries on non-vital part of the body, the accused had intention to cause death of the injured. Intention of the accused has to be proved from the nature of the injuries actually received, the part of the body where he caused injuries, number of injuries, the force which he used in causing such injuries and other surrounding circumstances of the case. The prosecution is under an obligation to establish whether or not injury caused by the accused.[3] It must be proved that the accused, while firing the gun, had intended to fire at the victim.[4]If a man fires a loaded gun with a guilty intention or knowledge, he cannot escape liability simply because a fact, unknown to him and at variance with his own belief, intervenes to prevent the consequences of his act, which he expected to ensue.[5] Where the accused fired a country-made pistol from a close range at the upper part of the body of the complainant and not at the lower non-vital parts, it was held that even though the complainant had taken to his heels, the knowledge, contemplated by the section, could be easily attributed the accused and an offence under this section, and not under s 324, was made out.[6] Mere non-examination of fire-arms by a ballistic expert is not fatal for prosecution case.[7]

Where three miscreants appellants were said to have fired when they were surrounded by the police party but none of the police officials had received any injury, the prosecution story was adjudged doubtful, accused appellants were acquitted of the charge under s 307, IPC and s 25 of the Arms Act.[8]

Shot Fired by Accused did not Hit Victim -- Acquittal not Interfered

The shot fired by the accused did not hit the victim. As the propensity to implicate falsely is not uncommon in India. Accused respondent was acquitted of the charge under s 307, IPC .[9]

Where the appellant had fired a shot which missed the target, his conviction under s 307 IPC was maintained. The sentence, however, was reduced from ten years to five years.[10]

Firing at Police Party

The prosecution case was that accused with armed nexallites opened fire on the police party, the fire continued for two hours. No one of the police party was hurt. No empty cartridges were recovered from the spot. The accused were arrested from the place near the incident. The prosecution witnesses divergent versions about the2715 incident. Accused were entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charges under ss 307 / 149, IPC .[11]

The accused was driving car, on interception by Police Officer (ASI), in scuffle the accused snatched service revolver of the ASI and was alleged to have fired at him. All the public witnesses turned hostile, did not support the prosecution case. Injury caused was superficial abrasion. There was lot of discrepancy in regard to the manner in which the incident had taken place. The bullet holes in the pant of the ASI were found inconsistent with the case of single shot of the prosecution. Seizure witnesses also turned hostile. Appellant was acquitted of the charge under s 307, IPC .[12]

Accused Firing Shot not Identified, Acquitted

Even the injured did not identify the appellant to be the person who had fired the shot. Merely because he is the owner of the weapon that cannot be a ground to convict him in terms of s 307, IPC . No question was put to the appellant in his examination under s 313, CrPC regarding his purported role. Accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under s 307, IPC .[13]

Accused Firing in Air

The appellant accused fired in the air from his licensed gun only with an idea to scare away the aggressor and in pursuance of right of private defence of his property and life. Accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under ss 307 / 149, IPC .[14]

Accused Pulled Trigger of Weapon--Did not Fire

Where the evidence was that the accused by a country-made pistol targeted the informant but did not fire. There was no ejectment of shot from barrel. Held, the case would not be covered by s 307, IPC .[15]

The appellant accused was alleged to have stabbed PW2 with a knife while co-accused was driving the scooter. PW2 was an injured witness who was the victim of the assault and PW3 was accompanying him. The offence weapon knife was recovered at the instance of the appellant accused. On scrutiny of the evidence of PW2 and the medical evidence, the court held that medical evidence corroborated the statement of eye-witness PW2. Conviction of the appellant accused under s 307, IPC was held proper.[16]

Stabbing Cases

The presence of two incised wounds on the head and nose, which were both bone deep and were caused by a spear, coupled with severe fractures of bones of other parts of the body, do lead to an inference that it was the intention of the assailants to2716 cause death.[17] However, mere intention to cause even grievous injuries is not sufficient to bring the offence within the mischief of this section. Where, therefore, the common object of the accused was not to cause death, but only grievous injuries, it was held that s 307 could not apply.[18] Where it is found that the immediate purpose of the accused was to release himself from a constable's hold, the fact, that he inflicted a wound on the chest of the constable with a knife, is not sufficient to prove the requisite intention or knowledge.[19] Where only one stab was given, and there was nothing to show that the injury inflicted was likely in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, it was held that the mere fact that if sepsis or gangrene had intervened, it would have endangered life, is not sufficient to come to the conclusion that it was an attempt to murder.[20] Where a person pushed the accused, who fell down and on getting up, took out a knife and attacked that person, but inflicted only trivial injuries, it was held that it was not safe to convict him under this section and that he could be convicted only under s 324 .[21]

Where accused threatened that he would kill the victim, and thereafter, took out a knife and gave a blow on the stomach of the victim, he could not be safely imputed with the knowledge that the blow given by him would be likely to cause death of the victim and so accused was liable under s 307, IPC .[22] A simple hurt caused by the accused voluntarily by means of a knife is only an offence under s 324, IPC .[23] Where three out of the four injuries caused by four or five persons by means of deadly weapons were simple and the fourth one, caused by the appellant, though endangering life, could not be deemed to be an injury which would have necessarily caused death but for timely medical aid, it was held that the appellant could be convicted under s 326, IPC, and not under s 307, IPC .[24] The accused had inflicted six knife injuries on the person of the injured, out of which two injuries were of grievous nature, whereas the other injuries were simple. The guilt of the accused fell under s 307 and not under s 308, IPC .[25]

Accused appellants along with others had gone to the shop of the complainant to settle certain dispute. One of the accused persons with the assistance of the accused appellant who had caught hold of the injured, inflicted knife injuries, the conviction of the accused appellant under ss 307, 323 with the aid of s 34, IPC was held proper.[26]

Sword Cases

The accused tried to assault the police officer deputed to search his house, when he entered his house along with his staff, but the police officer escaped. Thereafter, the accused attacked him with a sword, but he again escaped. On being nabbed, the2717 accused threatened to kill the police officer. A charge of this nature when there is not even an injury upon the victim cannot lead to an inference that there was any attempt to kill when the incident took place.[27]

Where the accused persons alleged to have inflicted sword injuries upon the deceased and eyewitness, and the prosecution evidence was found satisfactory, there was complete corroboration between medical and ocular evidence, the conviction of accused persons under ss 302 and 307, IPC was upheld.[28]

Accused persons had attacked the deceased with sword. In post mortem examination eight cut and curved injuries were found on the body of the deceased. The testimony of the brother of the deceased was found reliable. He was natural witness. There was no reason for false implication of the accused. Conviction under ss 302 / 307, IPC was held proper.[29]

Starvation Cases

In a Madras case, the accused enticed into her house a boy aged nine years, used violence and removed several jewels from his person and being unable to remove his anklets and earrings, tied his wrists and neck with a rope, put a cloth in his mouth, took him into a room and made him sit in a receptacle which was only 22 inches deep, all night and put a mill-stone around him but later replaced the mill-stone. The boy untied the rope and, owing to the omission of the accused to watch the receptacle and the room, got out in the morning and ran away. Holding that the accused was properly convicted under this section, it was observed that it is immaterial how death might result, whether from suffocation, from terror or from starvation; it is sufficient if the final act was done and if, under the circumstances it was done, it was such as might result in death, any subsequent carelessness in watching the jar or the room would make it nonetheless an offence punishable under s 307 .[30] In Om Prakash v State of Punjab ,[31] the accused deliberately starved his wife and kept her locked in a room; she was not allowed to leave the house and only sometimes a morsel or so used to be thrown at her as alms are given to beggars. She was denied food for days together and used to be given gram husk, mixed in water, after five or six days.

She was kept locked inside a room. One day, however, she found her room unlocked and managed to reach the civil hospital in a state of extreme emaciation. The doctors found her condition to be alarming and critical, but medical treatment saved her life. It was held that the accused was guilty of the offence under this section.[32]

Burn Cases

A scuffle over payment of rickshaw charges led the accused customer to pour kerosene on the rickshaw puller and set him on fire. The evidence of victim was corroborated by the evidence of neighbours of the accused who tried to extinguish the fire. Any person, who pours kerosene on another and sets him on fire must be2718 presumed to know the nature of the act committed by him and if in such circumstances, death ensues, it would be deemed to be a murder under the fifth clause of s 300, IPC . Therefore, the conviction of the accused under s 307, IPC was found proper.[33]

20. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and triable by a court of sessions.

Though the offence under s 307, IPC is non-compoundable, yet the factum of compromise between the accused and the complainant can be taken into consideration for determining the quantum of sentence.[34]

21. Compromise

Accused persons armed with iron rod and strips of iron had inflicted grievous injuries on the head of the victim. Offence under s 307, IPC is non-compoundable. Offence cannot be compounded merely because it is a crime against an individual order of the High Court accepting compromise and recording order of acquittal was set aside.[35]

22. Cognizance

While taking cognizance of an offence, a magistrate is under obligation and is required to apply his judicial mind on the material on record and he should not be guided or influenced by any concession made by a public prosecutor to take cognizance of offence under s 326 instead of s 307, IPC . The concession made by the public prosecutor while disposing of a bail application has no relevance and is rather immaterial, and such concession cannot form the ground for taking cognizance by a magistrate.[36]

23. Compounding of Offence under Section 307

Where the accused persons were acquitted by the trial court, but were committed by the High Court for an offence under s 307, this offence was not compoundable under s 320, CrPC . There was a counter case arising out of the same transaction which has already been compromised by the parties. The parties in a special leave petition before the Supreme Court challenging the validity of the conviction wanted to have the offence compounded. After examining the nature of the case and the circumstances under which the offence was committed, the Apex Court directed the trial judge to accord permission to compound the offence, after giving an opportunity to the parties and after being satisfied with the compromise agreed upon.[37] This view of the Supreme Court was taken into consideration by a Division Bench of Calcutta2719 High Court in a case[38] and it was held that an offence under s 307 is not compoundable in view of s 320, CrPC and so, it cannot be made compoundable by invoking a Supreme Court decision compounding a non-compoundable offence as a special case.

Where the complainant and the victim had settled dispute amicably with the accused persons, in the interest of justice, proceedings under ss 307 and 504, IPC were quashed.[39]

Compounding of Offence by Invoking Inherent Powers--Permissibility

The injured suffered grievous injuries and multiple fractures. He remained hospitalised for about one year. He had suffered permanent disability on account of injuries sustained. A competent court has found the appellants/accused guilty of the offences committed in the aforesaid gruesome manner. These are offences against the society. When a person is accused of committing an offence under s 307 read with s 34, IPC in such a gruesome manner, the court need not in the exercise of inherent powers quash the criminal proceedings or allow compounding even though s 320 of the CrPC does not limit or affect the powers under s 482 of CrPC . In such cases, law should be permitted to take its own course and the matter ought to be decided on merits. The persons, who are accused of committing offences in such a gruesome manner, cannot be permitted to set at naught their prosecution by means of affecting a monetary settlement even if the complainant had retracted his statement and supports the settlement. This is a case, where criminal justice system cannot be permitted to be bartered on the plea of settlement, enabling the parties to live in harmony, especially when the settlement is arrived at for commercial considerations.[40]

24. Section 307 , the Indian Penal Code 1860, and Section 167(2) , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

A perusal of s 307 would show that where hurt is not caused, the punishment may extend to 10 years and fine. The expression 'which may extend to ten years' used in s 307, includes a sentence of 10 years. In other words, even in an offence under s 307, where hurt is not caused, punishment of ten years can be imposed and if punishment of 10 years can be imposed in such a case, the period for completing the investigation under s 167(2)(a)(i), CrPC would be 90 days.

The expression 'not less than 10 years used in s 167(2)(a)(ii), CrPC would include offences wherein a sentence of no injury under s 307 can be awarded. Since in a case of no injury under s 307, imprisonment of ten years can be awarded, s 167(2)(a)(i), CrPC would be applicable and the period for completing the investigation would be 90 days. It is only where the period of imprisonment is less than ten years that the investigation has to be completed within 60 days in terms of s 167(a)(ii), CrPC .[41] Therefore, in a case under s 307 where hurt is not caused to the victim, the accused is entitled to bail when investigation is not completed within 90 days and not when investigation is not completed within 60 days.2720

The allegations in the FIR were that the accused and his companion assaulted the complainant with hockey-sticks and lathis with a view to kill him. However, the injuries caused to the complainant were of such nature that bail may not be refused to the accused despite an offence under s 307 indicated in the chargesheet. Although Uttar Pradesh Gangsters and Anti-social Activities (Prevention) Act 1985 bars the jurisdiction of the court to grant bail, but a special law overrides a general law in so far as they are inconsistent. However, if the special law was not a complete code, then the general law would prevail over the special law. As the said Act is not a complete code and does not restrict the powers under s 439, CrPC to deal with bail applications, even s 19 of the said Act puts a bar on the exercise of power under s 439, CrPC, the court can find out by looking at FIR if person seeking bail has been accused of an offence punishable under the said Act, the court can grant bail depending upon facts and circumstances of the case irrespective of the bar under the said Act.[42]

Where an advocate attacked the presiding officer of the court in his chamber and the injury caused to presiding offence was not of a serious nature, the plea of the accused that he sometimes became mentally unbalanced and hence may have attacked the presiding officer cannot be a deciding factor at the time of grant of bail, and in the facts and circumstances of the case, the bail was refused.[43]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 307.

Attempt to murder.--

Bail by Magistrate

Section 437, CrPC envisages that the magistrate is empowered to grant bail to an accused person who is not charged with an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life when the accused was brought before the court either by the police or the accused appears on his own before the court. The prohibition against grant of bail under s 437, CrPC, is confined to cases where the sentence prescribed is 'either death or alternatively, imprisonment for life'. Thus, a magistrate is empowered to grant bail to the accused charged with an offence under s 307 punishable with imprisonment for life even though the offence is exclusively triable by a court of sessions.[44]

Cancellation of Bail

The bail under s 167(2), CrPC is bail under s 437(1) and (2) and s 439(1), CrPC and can only be cancelled when a case for cancellation is made out under s 437(5) and 439(2), CrPC .[45] It is well-settled that under ss 437(5) and 439(2), CrPC, twin reasons for cancellation of bail are: possibility of accused absconding and/or his tempering with the prosecution witnesses.[46]

26. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of session judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:2721
> That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you did an act, to wit..., with such intention (or knowledge), and under such circumstances that, if, by that act, you had caused the death of AB, you would have been guilty of murder and that you thereby caused hurt to the said AB, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 307 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Merely quoting or translating the wording of a section 'with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances' in a charge is not enough. The accused should be told the accusation against him precisely.[47]

If the injury inflicted on the head is only a simple injury, no charge under this section can at all be framed till it was found to be a dangerous one.[48] Since the simple offence gets merged in a graver one, there would be an error in convicting the accused on a charge under ss 307 / 34 as also under ss 326 / 34 . The charge should be not under ss 307 / 34 .[49] So, a conviction under both s 307 and s 326 cannot be maintained.[50] At any rate, there should be only one punishment for the two offences.[51]

Propriety demands that a magistrate should be careful while converting an offence exclusively triable by a court of sessions into an offence triable by magistrate of the first class. Taking cognizance and framing charge under s 326, IPC instead of s 307, IPC is highly improper even though on the form of application for bail, there were no materials for an offence under s 307, IPC though facts of the case prima facie disclose commission of offence under s 307, IPC .[52]

Where an accused has been charged only under s 307, his conviction for an offence under s 387, IPC is illegal unless justified by the provisions of ss 221(2) and 222, CrPC .[53]

Where the suicide note left by the deceased and other evidence prima facie showed that tremendous pressure was exercised on the deceased and the deceased was left with no option but to commit suicide, charge under s 306 / 34, IPC was framed against the accused.[54]

Where, in a case under ss 307 and 323, the magistrate disbelieves the prosecution evidence and discharges the accused, it is not open to the sessions judge in revision to dissect the order of discharge, confirm it in respect of s 307, and order further inquiry in respect of the offence under s 323 .[55]

Quashing of Charges

Where the allegations were that the accused aimed at and fired a gunshot towards a person, but it missed and hurt another resulting in simple injuries, there was delay in lodging FIR and there was no evidence of ballistic expert to support prosecution story, besides absence of medical evidence that injuries so alleged were caused by a2722 fire-arm, there was no evidence to show that the accused shared a common intention along with co-accused and fired from his gun with intention or knowledge to kill, the order framing the charge under ss 307 / 34, IPC against the accused persons was gushed.[56] When the prosecution case that the accused with intention to cause death of the deceased, gave three axe blows to him while co-accused caused an injury from blunt side of axe, there was no material on record for framing a charge under s 307, IPC against the co-accused as injuries caused by him are simple in nature, hence, charge framed under s 307 against co-accused, was set aside.[57]

27. Joint Trial of two Offences under Section 302 and under Section 307 Maintainable

Section 219, CrPC, allows the trial of an accused for three or less number of offences of the same kind, committed within the space of 12 months, and provides that offences of the same kind are those which are punishable with the same amount of punishment under the same section of the IPC or of any special law or local law. Two offences under s 302 with respect to the murder of two persons are punishable under the same section of the IPC with the same amount of punishment. In view of the proviso to s 219(2), an offence of attempting to commit an offence is of the same kind as that of the other offence. Thus, the offence under s 307 is of the same kind as the offence under s 302 . The three offences are, therefore, of the same kind and one joint trail of the said three offences would be justified under s 219, Crpc . Section 223 , CrPC, lays down the joinder of persons at one trial and provides that persons, accused of more than one offence of the same kind, within the meaning of s 219, committed by them jointly within a period of twelve months, can be charged and tried together. Therefore, the trial of a number of persons for the said three offences, each of which was alleged to have been committed by them jointly within 12 months, would be justified.[58]

28. Proof

It is for the prosecution to prove conclusively, by producing not only the medical records relating to the treatment given to the injured, but also by producing the doctor, who had attended to the injured in the surgical ward, that the injury under consideration was of such nature which would be covered by the definition of grievous hurt as given in s 320, IPC . Alternatively, it is open to the prosecution to prove that the intention of the accused in inflicting the said injury was of the kind referred to under s 300, IPC .[59] As held in Sarju Prasad v State of Bihar ,[60] the burden is still on the prosecution to establish such an intention where, in fact, no vital part has actually been cut as a result of the injury. When the requisite intention has not been proved, it is unsafe to hold that the injury caused was grievous, especially in the absence of the reasons which prompted the doctor to opine it as such.[61]

Appellant No. 2 was alleged to have given lathi blow on the knees of the victim who fell down. Appellant No. 1 was alleged to have caused serious injuries with gandasa. It was highly doubtful if the Appellant No. 2 shared common intention with2723 Appellant No. 1and both of them wanted to kill the injured victim. Appellant No. 2 was acquitted of the charge under s 307 read with s 34, IPC .[62]

There was some ill feeling between the accused and members of the prosecution party on account of land dispute. The accused persons armed with and gandasa attacked the complainant party causing sever injuries, the arms of the victim had to be amputated. There was reliable evidence of the victim and his brother, an eye-witness. Conviction of the accused under s 307, IPC was proper, sentence was reduced from eight years to six years RI.[63]

Accused respondents were prosecuted under ss 307, 498A and 506, IPC on allegations that as their dowry demand was not fulfilled, they subjected the wife to cruelty and attempt was also made to set her on fire. Only relative witnesses were examined. There was no evidence that the accused persons ever demanded or accepted dowry. The testimony of the victim wife was full of contradictions, there were complaint and counter complaints between the parties. Acquittal of respondents accused recorded by the trial court was proper.[64]

29. Benefit of Doubt

The accused appellant in the company of the co-accused was alleged to have assaulted the victim with knife. The co-accused was not named in FIR. He was given benefit of doubt and was acquitted of the charge under s 307, IPC .[65] Appellant accused R was alleged to be armed with lathi. PWS did not state that the accused R had caused any lathi injury, no overt act was attributed to him. The appellant accused R was held entitled to benefit of doubt, was acquitted.[66]

Accused appellant was prosecuted on allegation that on dispute regarding loan transaction accused assaulted the complainant with chopper causing injury below the ear. The testimony of the complainant and the witnesses was inconsistent about the place of occurrence and the recovery of weapon. The accused was given benefit of doubt, was acquitted of the charge under s 307, IPC .[67]

30. Appellant not Aware that Co-Accused was Carrying Knife--Acquitted of Charge under Sections 307IPC

As no specific over act was attributed to the accused appellant by the injured and perhaps she was also not aware that the co-accused was carrying knife with him, she was held entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 307, IPC .[68]

31. Self-defence

The law is settled that in spite of the plea of right of private defence of property having not been taken by the accused in their statements under s 313, CrPC, the said defence is available if it is borne out and sustainable from the testimony adduced on2724 record. The crucial factor is not what the accused pleaded, but whether the accused could show the existence of right of private defence of person or property from the record itself.[69] An accused firing gunshot in self defence cannot be held guilty under s 307 particularly when he was in actual possession of the field and was ploughing it before the complainant party went there duly armed.[70] If an accused uses a fire-arm to exercise his right of private defence, he cannot be convicted under s 307 .[71] Where the circumstances of the case proved that the accused and not complainant was in possession of disputed land and the evidence showed that the complainant party armed with fire-arms and lathis attempted to take possession of land forcibly, the accused having reasonable apprehension of death or grievous hurt cannot be said to have exceeded his right of self-defence by firing at the complainant party. While exercising such right accused persons cannot be said to have shared common intention to commit an offence, the conviction of accused persons under ss 302, 307 read with s 34, IPC was set aside.[72]

If an accused uses a firearm to exercise his right of private defence, he cannot be convicted under s 307 .[73] Where the plea of self-defence taken by the accused alleging that he was attacked by the complainant party appeared to be true in the absence of explanation from the prosecution about injuries sustained by the accused, the medical papers of complainant in primary health centre where he had gone for treatment did not find mentioning name of assailant though it was present in the medico-legal case, the conviction of accused under s 307 was set aside.[74] When the prosecution failed to explain the reasons for injuries received by accused persons, the plea of self-defence of the accused was acceptable entitling them to acquittal.[75]

32. Appreciation of Evidence

When there is evidence to show that the accused had enmity towards the victim and his family, and there is no evidence to show that the victim had enmity with anybody else, it is not correct to say that the accused had no reason to assault the victims and that they had falsely implicated the accused. There is no reason as to why the victims would leave their real assailants and implicate the innocent ones.[76]

Accused would not be acquitted on the mere ground that the PW first informant in the witness-box could not give the name of the father of the accused, though mentioned in the FIR.[77]

33. Only Role of Exhortation--Accused Appellants Acquitted

The three accused appellants were armed with lathi which had not been used by them in any manner and the only allegation against them was that they had exhorted their co-accused to fire at the opposite party. Held, the possibility that the three accused persons were roped in on account of animosity could not be ruled out. The three2725 accused appellants were given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under ss 149, 302 and 307, IPC .[78]

34. Non-Examination of Injured Victim--Effect

The victim was alleged to have received injuries with an axe in an incident in which his four relatives were also killed, but the prosecution had come with the explanation that the victim could not be medically examined because he was busy in making arrangements for last rites ceremony of dead persons; however, the police-witness stated that because of danger to his life the victim being the sole eyewitness of the incident could not be examined, the victim nowhere stated that because of safety to life he was not medically examined. In view of these contradictions, the non-examination of injuries of sole witness was held fatal to the prosecution case.[79]

35. Medical Evidence

Where the medical evidence showed that as a result of one shot by the accused in question, same injuries on the back of deceased were caused which were not sufficient to cause death, the co-accused who caused fatal injuries was acquitted by the court below, ss 34, IPC would have no application, the conviction of the accused was converted from s 302 to s 307, IPC .[80]

Since the medical report in the case did not support the allegations against the Appellant No. 2 and No. 4 they were given benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under ss 307, IPC and 149, IPC .[81]

The question as to whether an injury in the parietal region with a lathi would fall within the scope of s 307 would ultimately depend upon the evidence which is brought on record and also the opinion which may be expressed by the medical experts when they came into the witness box.[82] The mere fact that out of the several injuries found inflicted by the accused, one, which was a punctured wound on the left side of the victim, was dangerous in nature, does not necessary make the offence one under s 307, particularly when the medical evidence in the case does not prove that the injury, characterised as dangerous by the doctor, 'would have necessary caused death but from timely medical aid'.[83]

Evidence of injured victim was also contrary to the medical evidence, according to him there was one shot. But there were three injuries. There was no explanation for the third injury. Even doctor's evidence was that the two injuries cannot be treated as an entry and exist wounds. Accused was acquitted of charge under s 307, IPC .[84]

Evidence of injured victim was also contrary to the medical evidence, according to him there was one shot. But there were three injuries. There was no explanation for the third injury. Even doctor's evidence was that the two injuries cannot be treated as an entry and exist wounds. There was unexplained delay of two days in filing FIR.2726 The IO was not examined in the case. The judgment of acquittal recorded by the High Court was not interfered.[85]

DNA Test

DNA stands for deoxyribonucleic acid, which is found in the chromosomes of the cells of living beings is the blueprint of an individual. DNA decides the characteristics of the person such as the colour of the skin, type of hair, nails and so on. Using this genetic fingerprinting, identification of an individual is done like in the traditional method of identifying fingerprints of offenders. Experts opine that the identification is a 100 percent precise.

The key feature of this technique is that no matter what biological sample is obtained--hair, a bit of skin, blood--the results are not going to be different. This is because all the cells in the body contain the same set of DNA something unique for each individual.[86]

An article written by one Lalji Singh, Centre for Cellular and Molecular Biology, Hyderabad, in DNA Profiling and its applications in which the learned Author has observed as under:

> Precautions:
> DNA profiling is technically demanding. There are cases on record in the US where mistakes seem to have been prompted by human errors. There is a need for quality control. Every precaution should be taken to ensure preparation of high-molecular-weight DNA complete digestion of the samples with appropriate enzymes, and perfect transfer and hybridization of the blot to obtain distinct bands with appropriate control. If necessary the analysis should be repeated. The DNA fingerprinting test, if performed properly, is infallible. However, there is need to interpret DNA typing with a thorough understanding of the populations involved.

The Division Bench of Andhra Pradesh[87] has accepted said proportion.

Contradiction between Ocular and Medical Evidence

When the statement of injured that the accused open fired from back side was belied by medical evidence suggesting that injury was on front of right side of chest of the injured, it could be inferred that injured could not see faces of real assailants and falsely roped in the accused. Thus, the order of conviction of the accused under s 307 was not found proper.[88]

36. Dying Declaration

Commentary under s 302, ante, may be referred to.

Where the husband inflicted injuries on his wife, her statement was recorded while she was in hospital, she died two months after the incident and 21 days after she was discharged from the hospital, her statements not relating to the cause of her death cannot be termed as dying declaration as per s 32(1) of the Evidence Act .[89]2727

When the victim whose dying declaration was recorded survived, the dying declaration so recorded is to be treated as a statement under s 164, CrPC .[90] Such a declaration cannot be used as a substantive piece of evidence against the accused as the victim survived.[91] The statement given by an injured to the investigation officer and also FIR lodged by him is not admissible as dying declaration.[92]

37. Motive

Commentary under s 302, ante, may be referred to.

Where direct evidence is worthy of evidence, the question of motive is of academic importance only. Motive is a fact which is only within the knowledge of the person doing the act and which no human being but the party himself can be familiar with. Therefore, failure to discover the motive for an offence does not signify its non-existence and failure to produce evidence does not fatally affect it. It is not the sine qua non for the success of prosecution.[93]

38. Res Gestae

Section 6 of the Evidence Act is an exception to the general rule whereunder the hearsay evidence becomes admissible. However, for bringing such hearsay evidence within the scope of s 6, what is required to be established is that it must be almost contemporaneous with the acts and there should not be an interval which would allow fabrication. The statements sought to be admitted, therefore, as forming part of res gestae, must have been made contemporaneously with the acts or immediately thereafter.[94]The statement of the witness indicating that the injured told him that his nephew had fired at him, would become admissible under s 6 of the Evidence Act as the witness on hearing sound of firing went to the scene of occurrence and found the injured lying on the ground when he made that statement.[95]

39. Identification of Accused

When the parties are well-known to each other, the identification of accused by injured eye-witness cannot be doubted,[96] when there was sufficient moonlight.[97]

When the victim survived due to efforts of the doctor and medical treatment, the dying declaration so recorded is to be treated as his statement under s 164, CrPC, in which the accused persons were named and corroboration regarding their identity came from other eyewitness, the mere fact that the doctor who treated victim deposed that victim did not disclose names of accused to him, would not make their identification doubtful.[98] The plea that the injured eyewitness met the accused only once so identification was improbable is not tenable when the incident had taken2728 place in broad daylight and accused was introduced to the eyewitness a few days back in a hotel.[1]

The prosecution witnesses did not describe the appellant accused either in their statement recorded under s 161, CrPC or prior to holding of T.I. Parade before the Magistrate. Although, they claimed in their testimonies, that they had seen the appellant in the full moon light, but this fact was not mentioned by them in their statements recorded under s 161, CrPC . The identification of appellant accused in T.I. parade was highly doubtful. He was acquitted of the charges under ss 399, 392 and s 307 read with s 149, IPC .[2]

The conviction of accused under s 307, IPC on the basis of a statement recorded under ss 161, and 164, CrPC in the absence of proper identification of the accused is not proper.[3]

40. Benefit of Doubt

Where five co-accused were not named in FIR, nor their names appeared in statements of the witnesses recorded under s 161, CrPC, the prosecution witnesses for the first time in statements made before the court, gave out their names, the five co-accused persons were held entitled to benefit of doubt and acquitted of the charge under s 107, IPC .[4]

41. Conviction

It is sufficient to justify a conviction under s 307, IPC if there is present an intent coupled with some overt act in execution thereof. It is not essential that bodily injury capable of causing death should have been inflicted. The section makes a distinction between the act of the accused and its result, if any. The court has to see whether the act, irrespective of its result, was done with the intention or knowledge and under circumstances mentioned in the section. Therefore, an accused charged under s 307, IPC cannot be acquitted merely because the injuries inflicted on the victim were in the nature of a simple hurt.[5]

To justify a conviction under this section, it is not essential that bodily injury capable of causing death should have been inflicted. Although the nature of injury actually caused may often give considerable assistance in coming to a finding as to the intention of the accused, such intention may also be deduced from other circumstances, and may even, in some cases, be ascertained without any reference at all to actual wounds. The section makes a distinction between an act of the accused and its result, if any. Such an act may not be attended by any result so far as the person assaulted is concerned, but still there may be cases in which the culprit would be liable under this section. It is not necessary that the injury actually caused to the victim of the assault should be sufficient under ordinary circumstances to cause the death of the person assaulted. What the court has to see is whether the act, irrespective of its result, was done with the intention or knowledge and under circumstances mentioned in the section. An attempt in order to be criminal need not2729 be the penultimate act. It is sufficient in law, if there is present an intent coupled with some overt act in execution thereof.[6]

Accused had inflicted two grievous injuries by Farsa and lathi on the head of the victim. The High Court was not justified in recording the acquittal of the accused on the ground that the injuries were not grievous or sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death. The injuries were serious and investigating agency felt the necessity of recording the dying declaration. Order of conviction passed by the trial court under ss 307 / 34, IPC was restored.[7]

The appellants came on motorcycle, entered the clinic of the injured, fired shots at the injured who suffered two injuries. Both the appellants were convicted under ss 307 / 34, IPC .[8] The accused appellants assaulted the victim with blows, kicks, iron rods and poured acid leading to disfigurement. Accused appellants were convicted under s 307, IPC .[9]

There was really no direct exhortation to kill but the same was to the effect that the deceased and others should not be permitted to run away and should be attacked. On hearing the exhortation accused no. 2 pierced the spear in the chest of the deceased. The evidence of PWS was different as to the manner of exhortation. Accused was convicted under s 307 read with s 110 and not under s 302, IPC .[10]

The two injured persons by tempo were going to courts, the appellant accused persons emerged on the road stopped the tempo and inflicted a number of injuries with sharp edged weapons and blunt weapons like hockey sticks. They were mercilessly beaten and attack was also so severe that all the other passengers sitting on the tempo ran away from spot and none came forward to save the injured. The injuries caused were dangerous to life. Persons who have suffered injuries would not shield the actual culprit and implicate an innocent person when false implication is pleaded. The testimony of eye-witnesses was found reliable. The conviction of the appellants under ss 307, 326 / 34, IPC was held proper.[11]

Accused Convicted under Section 307 cannot be Convicted and Sentenced under Section 326

An offence under s 326, IPC, is a minor offence in relation to that under s 307, IPC, and it is a trite that where the court convicts for a major offence, it should not convict for a minor offence. Thus, an accused convicted under ss 307 / 34, IPC cannot be convicted and sentenced under s 326 read with s 149, IPC .[12]2730

Accused cannot be Convicted under Sections 302 and 307 for Murder of same Person

When the victim is only one person for whose death the accused were charged under s 302, IPC, there was no need for framing charges under s 307 read with s 34, IPC, against them. The accused cannot be convicted both under s 302, IPC and s 307 read with s 34, IPC . When it was done by the trial court and ignored by High Court, the Supreme Court maintaining the conviction and sentence of accused under s 302, IPC, set aside the sentence and conviction under s 307 read with s 34, IPC .[13]

42. Benefit of Probation

In order to be eligible for the benefit of probation, the accused should meet two conditions simultaneously; (i) he is not a previous convict, and (ii) the offence must be of the character specified in s 360, Crpc or s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958. When the accused is charged with an offence of s 307, IPC, which entails imprisonment for life or imprisonment for ten years, he cannot be dealt with under s 360, CrPC .[14] In a case of attempt to murder the accused cannot be acquitted by giving benefit of probation.[15]

43. Admonition

In Radharani v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[16] it was observed that when an accused has been released on admonition for an offence under s 309, IPC, he should also be released in admonition for the offence under s 307, IPC, as there is no valid distinction for releasing him for the former offence and convicting him for the latter offence.

44. Sentence

Section 307 provides sentence of both imprisonment and fine. The imprisonment may extend to 10 years along with fine. A reading of s 307 would make it clear that there is no minimum sentence, but imposition of imprisonment and fine is mandatory.[17] Though retribution is not the main plank of sentencing justice, yet the criminal propensities of the offender may something impel the court his segregation from society. When the crime is not impulsive, but a calculated one, the comparative young age of the offender pales into insignificance when viewed with the substratum of the crime.[18] Where the accused attempted to commit murder by firing shots at victims from their guns, and the victims escaped with injuries as pallets did not hit their vital parts, sentence of seven years' rigorous imprisonment awarded to accused persons is not disproportionate.[19] In passing a sentence under this section, the facts that the crime was committed at a time when the accused, a police constable, was labouring under great mental strain as a result of a departmental punishment which was inflicted on him, that the result of the conviction would inevitable be that he would lose the benefit of a long and meritorious service and the rewards of that2731 service, and that he had already been in detention for a year, were taken into consideration as mitigating circumstances.[20] In State v Murugan ,[21] the occurrence took place in 1989 and the appeal was disposed of in the year 2001 by setting aside judgment of acquittal rendered by the trial court, so each accused was awarded under s 307, IPC sentence of four years' rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 1,000. In State v Narsingh Khunti ,[22] five years' rigorous imprisonment was held to meet the ends of justice in a case where a skilled artisan had been permanently incapacitated by an attack of the accused.

Reduction in Sentence

In the following circumstances the sentence of accused was reduced.

(a) The convict had for years been in the habit of taking opium daily.[23]
(b) Inquired person himself became friendly with convict and desired reduction of his offence.[24]
(c) Accused was prosecuted for offence after about 14 years and/or occurrence took place years ago.[25] Accused forced provocation for 15 years. [26]
(d) A small scuffle over payment of rickshaw charges, without any motive.[27]
(e) No definitive evidence that the convict, by firing a rifle, had caused hurt to any one of victims.[28]
(f) Accused was an illiterate woman belonging to an aboriginal tribe and had young kids.[29]
(g) About three years ago convict was treated for schizophrenia and if he were sent back to prison, it would lead to his mental imbalance or mental disorder.[30]
(h) Accused was 65 years old and not keeping good health.[31]
(i) Accused was only aged about 20 years at the time of incident and had already served sentence of about three years.[32]
(j) Injuries inflicted were simple in nature.[33]2732
(k) Non-examination of independent witness, non-seizure of weapon of offence and the fact that accused had already undergone 4 years of custody.[34]
(l) Accused and his victim wife leading separate life after divorce.[35]
(m) Accused and victim were mere relatives.[36]
(n) There was no evidence to show that injured lost his speech because of injuries inflicted by the accused.[37]
(o) The incised wound inflicted by the accused appellant on the victim which attracted s 307, IPC on right side below abdomen was of 1/2 (× 1/4 (of very small dimension. Other three injuries were inflicted on hand and were simple. Incident occurred 18 years before, hence the sentence of five years imposed by the courts below was reduced to two years RI.[38]

Sentence Reduced to Sentence Already Undergone

Offence under s 307, IPC is not compoundable. However, the accused appellants were agriculturists by profession, had no criminal background as the incident was 20 years old, there was reconciliation amongst the parties to maintain peace and in the interest of justice, the Supreme Court reduced the sentence to the period already undergone.[39]

Accused appellants were convicted under ss 307, and 323, IPC . During the pendency of the appeal pending before the Supreme Court, the parties entered into compromise. Held, settlement/compromise arrived at between the parties can be taken into consideration for the purpose of determining the quantum of sentence to be awarded to the appellants. As the incident related to the year 1994 and the parties had entered into the compromise, sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[40]

No Foolproof Formula for Just Sentence

After giving due consideration to the facts and circumstances of each case, for deciding just and appropriate sentence to be awarded for an offence, the aggravating and mitigating factors and circumstances in which a crime has been committed are to be delicately balanced on the basis of really relevant circumstances in a dispassionate manner by the court. Such act of balancing is indeed a difficult task. It has been very aptly indicated in Dennis Councle Mcgautha v State of California (402 US 183, 28

LD 2d 711), that no formula of a foolproof nature is possible that would provide a reasonable criterion in determining a just and appropriate punishment in the infinite variety of circumstances that may affect the gravity of the crime. In the absence of any foolproof formula which may provide any basis for reasonable criteria to correctly assess various circumstances germane to the consideration of gravity of crime, the discretionary judgment in the facts of each case, is the only way in which such judgment may be equitably distinguished. The object should be to protect the society and to deter the criminal in achieving the avowed object to law by imposing2733 appropriate sentence. It is expected that the courts would operate the sentencing system so as to impose such sentence which reflects the conscience of the society and the sentencing process has to be stern where it should be. Imposition of sentence without considering its effect on the social order in many cases may be in reality a futile exercise. The social impact of the crime, eg, where it relates to offences relating to narcotic drugs or psychotropic substances which have great impact not only on the health fabric but also on the social order and public interest, cannot be lost sight of and per se require exemplary treatment. Any liberal attitude by imposing meagre sentences or taking too sympathetic view merely on account of lapse of time or personal inconveniences in respect of such offences will be result-wise counter productive in the long run and against societal interest which needs to be cared for and strengthened by string of deterrence inbuilt in the sentencing system.[41]

Reduction of Sentence Without Satisfactory Reasons is Not Proper

Where sentence of seven years rigorous imprisonment under s 307 was imposed by the trial court but no satisfactory reason for reducing sentence to less than one year was assigned by the appellate court, the order of the appellate court was set aside.[42] Where in an appeal against conviction of an accused under s 307, the High Court reduced the sentence from three years' imprisonment to just three months' imprisonment by enhancing fine on the ground that accused were not previous convicts and some co-accused were acquitted, though assault was at night and pre-planned. This order of the High Court did not find favour with the Supreme Court and while holding the same unjustified, the Supreme Court set it aside and restored the sentence imposed by the sessions court.[43]

Proportion Between Crime and Punishment

Commentary under similar heading in s 302, ante, may be referred to.

The criminal law adheres in general to the principle of proportionality in prescribing liability according to the culpability of each kind of criminal conduct. It ordinarily allows some significant discretion to the judge in arriving at a sentence in each case, presumably to permit sentences that reflect more subtle considerations of culpability that are raised by the special facts of each case. Judges in essence affirm that punishment ought always to fit the crime; yet in practice sentences are determined largely by other considerations. Sometimes it is the correctional needs of the perpetrator that are offered to justify a sentence. Sometimes the desirability of keeping him out of circulation, and sometimes even the tragic results of his crime. Inevitably, these considerations cause a departure from just desserts as the basis of punishment and create cases of apparent injustice that are serious and wide-spread. Proportion between crime and punishment is a goal respected in principle, and in spite of errant notions, it remains a strong influence in the determination of sentences. The practice of punishing all serious crimes with equal severity is now unknown in civilised societies, but such a radical departure from the principle of proportionality has disappeared from the law only in recent times. Even now for a single grave infraction drastic sentences are imposed. Anything less than a penalty of greatest severity for any serious crime is thought then to be a measure of toleration that is unwarranted and unwise. But in fact, quite apart from those considerations that2734 make punishment unjustifiable when it is out of proportion to the crime, uniformly disproportionate punishment has some very undesirable practical consequences.[44]

The object of imposing sentence should be to protect the society and to deter the criminal in achieving the avowed object of law by imposing appropriate sentence. It is expected that the courts would operate the sentencing system so as to impose such sentence which reflects the conscience of the society and the sentencing process has to be stern where it should be. The court will be failing in its duty if appropriate punishment is not awarded for a crime which has been committed not only against the individual victim but also against the society to which the criminal and victim belong. The punishment to be awarded for a crime must not be irrelevant but it should conform to and be consistent with the atrocity and brutality with which the crime has been perpetrated, the enormity of the crime warranting public abhorrence and it should 'respond to the society's cry for justice against the criminal'.[45]

Accused Juvenile on the Date of Offence

Where the accused was a juvenile on the date of commission of offence under s 307 the entire trial of the accused by the sessions court and his conviction and sentence of imprisonment under s 307, IPC were without jurisdiction. The case was, therefore, remanded for disposal in accordance with the law keeping in view the provisions of West Bengal Children Act 1959.[46] Where the accused was aged 15 years only at the time of occurrence, and was convicted under ss 302 / 149 and ss 307 / 149, IPC and had already served five years in the institution under s 7 of United Provinces Borstal Act 1938, for such an offender the sentence of five years will be equivalent even to a higher sentence of life imprisonment. Therefore, it was held that he need not surrender for the remaining sentence.[47]

Combined Sentence under Sections 302 and 307 --Not Proper

Where the accused was convicted under s 302, IPC for killing the deceased and also under s 307, IPC for injuring others, the awarded of combined sentence under s 302 and s 307 was not proper. Separate sentence under s 302 and s 307 should be passed.[48]

Attempt by Life-Convicts--Sentence

Although attempt by a life convict to murder is punishable with death sentence if hurt is caused in such attempt to kill any person. However, in Mithu v State of Punjab ,[49] the Supreme Court while considering s 303, IPC which provides the only sentence of death to the person who commits murder while being under sentence of imprisonment for life, held s 303, IPC violative of arts 14 and 21 of the Constitution of India . Thus, a person undergoing the sentence of imprisonment of life who commits a murder, is not necessarily liable to the death penalty and his case is to be considered as under s 302 and not under s 303, IPC, the latter provision having been held unconstitutional. Thus, by the same analogy and attempt to murder under s 307, IPC cannot lead to the only punishment of death sentence. In such a case, the court2735 should pass sentence under s 307 in first or second part and not in the third part. However, judicial pronouncement to the effect seems to be abetted.

45. Alteration of Conviction from Section 307 to Lesser Offence

In cases under s 307, IPC, the court should carefully consider the provisions of ss 324, 326 and 307, IPC . The circumstances, in which the injury has been caused, should also be considered.[50]

An offence under s 307, IPC is a very serious offence and it requires the same very factors to be proved as are needed to prove an offence under s 302, except that in this case the act falls short of the death of the deceased which is necessary under s 302, IPC . Sometimes, it becomes very difficult to differentiate between an offence under s 307, and under ss 324, 325, 326, IPC*etc.* In both cases, injuries may be present. There may be existence of motive or intention or knowledge on the part of the wrongdoer. Care has, therefore, to be taken that in such cases there may not be a wrong application of the evidence looking to the serious consequences following from such an error, as the penalty prescribed under them vary to a great extent.[51]

46. Alteration of Conviction from Section 307 to Section 308

It has to be examined whether the act committed by the appellant comes within the scope and orbit of s 307 or s 308, IPC . If an accused does any act with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances that, if he, by that act, caused death, he would be guilty of murder, he shall be guilty of committing an offence punishable under s 307, but if an accused did any act that he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, he shall be guilty of committing an act punishable under s 308 .[52]

The accused, in a sudden flash of anger, pierced a sharp-edged weapon which was at the time in his hand and had not gone anywhere to pick up the instrument of assault. Prior to the incident, he was not quarrelling with the injured. As the victim intervened in the quarrel, the accused gave two quick blows with the sharp edged instrument, i.e., a screwdriver. The part of the body which he chose to hit, was a vital part of the body, i.e., the chest. The force he used was not very strong so as to penetrate the lungs. Thus, the intention and knowledge of the accused seemed to be to cause such bodily injury that he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, if the injured had died. His act, therefore, comes within the ambit of s 308 and not s 307 .[53]

Where the doctor's evidence showed that none of the vital organs of the victim was injured, a doubt arises whether the accused intended to commit murder and thus, made an attempt. He, however, can be attributed with knowledge that by inflicting such injuries, he was likely to cause death to attract s 308 . Thus, conviction of accused under s 307 was set aside and instead conviction under s 308 .[54]

A heavily intoxicated accused caused abdominal injury dangerous to life to the victim, the requisite intention envisaged in s 300 was not proved. However, the2736 knowledge could be imputed to the accused under s 86, IPC of this act and the conviction of accused was, therefore, altered from ss 302 and 307, IPC to s 304, Pt II and s 308 .[55] Where in a sudden fight without premeditation, accused persons alone suffered injuries, the conviction of accused was modified from s 307 to s 308 .[56] However, where during an attempt by the police party to apprehend the accused, accused fired a loaded revolver at a member of the police party who was saved as revolver misfired, the offence fell under s 307 and not under s 308 .[57] The state of mind of the accused, showing that he was so heavily drunk that he was incapable of forming the requisite intent while inflicting a dangerous injury on the person of the victim, would bring the case within the purview of s 308 instead of s 307 .[58]

Where the accused fired at A, but the bullet missed the target and hit B's thigh, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 307 to s 308 .[59]

47. Alteration of Conviction from Section 307 to Section 323

When the common intention to kill on the part of the accused is wanting, they cannot be convicted of an offence under s 307 read with s 34, IPC though they may be held guilty of an offence under s 323 read with s 34, IPC,[60] or without s 34,[61] if condition of s 323, IPC are fulfilled. When the injuries found on the victims were not sufficient in ordinary course to cause death and injuries cannot also be said to be grievous in absence of X-ray report, the conviction of accused persons under ss 307, 325 was altered to ss 148, 323, 324, IPC .[62]

48. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 307

Commentary under s 302, ante, may be referred to.

49. Alteration of Conviction from Section 307 to Section 324

Where the accused stabbed complainant on his chest with a knife but the prosecution did not examine the doctor nor there was any evidence on record to show that injury caused to the complainant was dangerous to life, the conviction of the accused under s 307 was altered to one under s 324 .[63] Where the injuries inflicted by the accused persons on informant were not of grievous nature and were not on vital parts and medical evidence not suggesting that injuries could have caused death but for treatment given by the doctors, the conviction under s 307 was altered to s 324 .[64] Where the accused allegedly gave a knife blow on injured during quarrel ensued between them over grazing of cattle in fields, the doctor who examined injured classified injury received by him to be simple in nature, the evidence showed that altercation between the injured and the accused was on spur of moment, there was no serious dispute between injured and the accused so that the accused could entertain intention of doing away life of injured, therefore, the conviction of the accused was2737 modified to under s 324 from s 307 .[65] Where the cause of dispute was cutting of earth by the accused from field of informant party, the evidence of doctor showed that injuries received by injured were simple in nature and they were not on any vital part of their body, there was no evidence to show that the accused had any intention to kill or commit murder of informant or any of his brother, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 307 to s 324 .[66]

When the injuries are simple and have been caused by a weapon like a spear, knife, lathi, gun, etc, and the medical evidence shows that they are not sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, the accused can be held guilty under s 324, IPC, and not under s 307 .[67] Where a single knife blow given on the chest of the victim caused incised wound which was a simple injury, the conviction of there accused was modified from s 307 to s 324 .[68] Where two accused had come together, but the co-accused did not assault the injured who was the real target, but caused minor injury to his son, the conviction of co-accused under s 307 read with s 34, IPC along with main accused was not found proper and was altered to one under s 324 .[69]Where only a single shot was fired which only resulted in an entry wound with one pellet which entered the body but did not go deep enough to damage spinal cord or injured any internal organ, it cannot be said that the act was done with an intention or knowledge to commit culpable homicide amounting or not amounting to murder, and so an offence under s 307 or even s 308, IPC was not made out. The conviction of accused was, therefore, altered from s 307 to s 324 .[70] Where the evidence of victim was that she has sustained gunshot injury on her leg, in view of nature of injuries sustained by victim, offence of attempt to murder not made out, but as the hurt has been caused by a firm arm, the offence squarely falls within the mischief of s 324, hence, the conviction of the accused persons under ss 307 / 149 altered to one under ss 324 / 149 .[71]

When, in a skull injury, the skull is neither cut nor fractured and the depth of the injury is only a quarter of a centimetre, the injury cannot be said to be dangerous to life because it is highly improbable that such an injury would worsen the condition of2738 the injured to such an extent that it would prove dangerous of life. The offender can only be convicted under s 324, and not under s 307 .[72]

Where a single firearm injury was caused on a non-vital part of the body of the victim, and the medical evidence showed that injury was not grave but only simple, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 307 to s 324 .[73]

50. Alteration of Conviction from Section 307 to Section 325

The evidence of injured that when the co-accused caught hold of him, the accused at first instance gave a stone blow and later on gave blows by the reverse side of a tangia as a result of which he sustained injuries, medical evidence showed that said injuries were grievous in nature, and there was no material showing that the accused had the intention or knowledge to kill the injured, the act of the accused falls under s 325 and not under s 307 .[74] Where two accused persons armed with machus (sharp cutting instrument) on being instigated by other three accused persons assaulted the injured, the intention of the accused was to assault and not to kill and the possibility of use of reverse side of weapon of offence could not be ruled out, the conviction of accused persons under s 307 was altered to one under s 325 .[75] Where there was an assault by 11 assailants, and one of the victims sustained head injury, but the persecution evidence was silent with regard to who gave the head injury to the victim, and the statement of medical officer did not support the fact that head injury suffered by victim was sufficient in ordinary cause of nature to cause his death, the conviction of accused persons under s 307 read with s 149 was set aside and that under s 325 read with ss 149 and 147, IPC was maintained.[76] Where in a sudden quarrel, the accused persons caused grievous as well as simple injuries by a sharp-edged weapon on the head of the victim which were not sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, the conviction of accused under s 307 was altered to one under s 326, IPC . Further, for causing grievous injury on the head of the victim by a blunt object, the accused were also convicted under s 325 .[77] Where the accused causing grievous and simple hurt with a knife, the said hurt was caused when victim, sister-in-law of accused, obstructed him from taking away his teenage daughter with wrong intention of having illicit relation with her, however, considering relationship between parties accused cannot be said to have requisite intention to do away with life of victim, so, ingredients of s 307, IPC, having not been satisfied to base conviction under s 307, so conviction of accused was altered to s 325, IPC .[78] When the accused persons have caused injury to complainant by lathi, fist and kicks causing injury on his head, hand and leg and complainant remained in hospital for treatment for more than one month and there was absence of fracture on his body, on account of nature and number of injuries caused and weapon used it could not be said that attempt was made to cause death of complainant, so, conviction of accused persons under ss 307 / 149 was altered to one under ss 325 / 149 IPC .[79]

Where the common object of a unlawful assembly did not travel beyond commission of offences under ss 325 and 323, IPC, the conviction of the accused2739 persons under s 307 with aid of s 149 was altered to one under ss 147, 325 / 149 .[80] Where there was no intention on the part of accused persons to attempt to commit murder of the victims who sustained grievous injuries, the conviction of one accused was modified from s 307 to s 325 and that of two others altered from ss 307 / 34 to ss 325 / 34, IPC .[81]

Commentary under the same heading in s 326, post, may be referred to.

When in the light of evidence of eyewitness and doctor, there is no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the accused had intended to cause only grievous hurt and it could not be said that he had the intention to cause death of the victim, the conviction of accused under s 307, IPC was set aside; instead he was convicted for the offence under s 326 .[82] Where the injuries caused to the injured were neither dangerous to his life nor capable of causing his death, the conviction of accused was altered from ss 307 / 34 to one under ss 326 / 34 .[83] Where the medical evidence did not support case of the prosecution that victim could have lost his life as a result of the injuries, in the ordinary cause, but for availability of immediate medical treatment.[84] When the only evidence against accused was that he aimed gun shot only at the leg of injured, which resulted in fracture. In this view of the evidence it cannot be said that accused was intended to cause death of injured or to cause such bodily injuries which may be sufficient to cause his death in the ordinary course of nature, so as to bring the offence within the purview of s 307, IPC . Thus considering the part of body at which the gunshot was fired and taking in view the fact that accused did not repeat the shots, as also the fact that he fired gunshot at the leg and caused fracture, it must be held that accused voluntarily caused grievous hurt by dangerous weapon viz, the gun and hence he must be held liable for committing offence under s 326, IPC and not under s 307, IPC .[85] When the accused allegedly came from behind inflicted two wounds with knife and fled, the doctor who examined and treated injured, not examined, further from size of blade of knife it could not be said that intention was to commit murder of injured, however, accused had inflicted two wounds on stomach of injured for which he was operated and hospitalised for nine days, the conviction of accused was altered from s 307 to s 326, IPC .[86] Where the accused only attacked once on person of the injured and injuries were not on vital part of body, there was absence of intention or knowledge to commit murder, so, the accused convicted under s 326 instead of s 307 .[87] Where the injuries caused to the victim were grievous, but not on any vital part of the body, conviction of the accused appellant under s 307, IPC was altered to one under s 326, IPC .[88]

Where the injuries caused to the victims were established to be grievous in nature, the conviction of the accused persons was altered from ss 307 / 34 to one under2740 ss 326 / 34 .[89] Spear injuries, even if caused by the accused on the vital part of the body of the victim, cannot bring a case under s 307, if none of the injuries is found, by the medical witness, to be dangerous to life in any way.[90] Such a case falls under s 326 . Simply because the injuries were caused by a sharp-edged weapon and were on the head, i.e., a vital part of the body is not sufficient toshow that accused had any intention to murder the victim. The accused had given only one blow so conviction of the accused under s 307 was set aside and that under s 326 was maintained.[91] Where one of the injuries found on the person of victim was of grievous nature, but not sufficient to cause death, the fact that when the injured fell down, the accused did not try to cause further injuries shows that he had no intention to kill the victim, the conviction of accused under s 307 was set aside and that under ss 324 and 326 maintained.[92]

The doctor examined in the case had not categorically deposed that the knife injury caused to the victim by the appellant no. 2 was dangerous to life, the conviction of the appellant no. 2 under s 307, IPC was altered to one under s 326, IPC . Sentence imposed was reduced to the period already undergone.[93]

In Kali Charan v State ,[94] where three out of the four injuries caused by four or five persons by means of deadly weapons were simple and the fourth one caused by the appellant though endangering life, could not be deemed to be an injury which would have necessary caused death, but for timely medical aid, it was held that the appellant could be convicted under s 326 and not under s 307 .[95]

There was no allegation that the accused wanted to kill or eliminate the victim, None of the injuries inflicted on the victim was on the vital part of the victim, there was no enmity between the parties, conviction of the accused recorded under s 307, IPC was altered into one under s 326, IPC .[96]

Where the accused amputated the left forearm of son of the deceased who tried to intervene and save his father from the attack of an unlawful assembly but only single blow was inflicted on the son of the deceased and no fatal blow was inflicted, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 307 read with s 149 to one under s 326 read with s 149 .[97]

Complainant while returning from other village after his meals was interrupted by the accused persons inquiring from him as to why he came to their village. An altercation took place between parties, wherein two accused persons caught hold of complainant and the main accused shot an arrow which pierced near right ear of the complainant. There was no previous enmity between parties. The evidence of Medical expert neither proved that the injury could or could not be dangerous to life, but that the injury was caused on the vital part of body. only single injury was caused by main accused though other accused persons were also armed with bow and arrow, thus it could not be said that accused had caused injury with intention to cause death2741 of complainant and conviction of main accused was altered from s 307 to one under s 326 and in case of other co-accused from s 307 / 34 to one under s 324 / 34 .[1]

52. Alteration of Conviction from Section 307 to Section 328

Where the accused administered poison to his brother through food under instigation of a person who had absconded, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 307 to s 328 .[2]

Attempt to commit culpable homicide.--

Whoever does any act with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances that, if he by that act caused death, he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both; and, if hurt is caused to any person by such act, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

A, on grave and sudden provocation, fires a pistol at Z, under such circumstances that if he thereby caused death he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section corresponds to s 307 with the exception that it deals with an attempt to commit culpable homicide not amounting to murder. The punishment provided under this section is less than that provided under the preceding section.

A person commits an offence under this section if he does not act with such intention or knowledge, and under such circumstances, that if he thereby caused death, he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. In Om Prakash v State of Punjab ,[3] it was held that:2742

A person commits an offence under s 308 when he has an intention to commit culpable homicide not amounting to murder and, in pursuance of that intention, does an act towards the commission of that offence whether that act be > the penultimate act or not. But this is meant only to show the nature of the intention and of the act required to constitute the offence. It does not speak of the alternative requirement of knowledge. Again, except for a few lawyers, nobody knows, or is expected to know, the fine distinction between culpable homicide amounting to murder and culpable homicide not amounting to murder and it is, therefore, difficult to conceive of a man to have an intention to commit culpable homicide not amounting to murder.

If an accused does any act with such intention or knowledge, and under such circumstances that if he, by that act, caused death, he would be guilty of murder, he shall be guilty of committing an offence punishable under s 307, but if an accused did any act that he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, he shall be guilty of committing an act punishable under s 308 .

Culpable homicide does not amount to murder:

(i) if the act is done with the intention or knowledge referred to in s 300 but under circumstances which would bring the case within one of the Exceptions mentioned in that section; or
(ii) if the act is done with the intention or knowledge referred to in s 299, IPC but not falling under cll (2), (3) and (4) of s 300, IPC .

In the latter case, it is not necessary that any of the exceptions mentioned in s 300 should be applicable. Thus, if an accused does not intend to cause death or any bodily injury which he knows to be likely to cause death or even to cause such bodily injury as is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, this section would apply even if the case is not covered by any of the exception mentioned in s 300 .[4] Where injuries, including three serious head injuries, with underlying fractures of the skull were inflicted, it was held that it could be considered sufficient to bring the case of the accused under s 308, because, had the injured died, the accused would have been easily convicted under s 304 .[5]

The accused appellant had inflicted injuries by lathi on the left side of head, seven cm above eye-brow, the victim had sustained fracture on left parietal bone also, the accused appellant was convicted under s 308, IPC .[6]

Where in a land dispute in a tussle between the parties to grab possession of the land, the accused persons suddenly fired causing simple injuries to the members of the prosecution party, accused persons were convicted under s 308 instead of ss 307 / 149, IPC .[7]

2. Sections 308, 307 and 511

Both ss 307 and 308, IPC have to be interpreted similarly. An attempt to commit culpable homicide is punishable with imprisonment for a certain period and therefore, but for its being expressly made an offence under s 308, it would have fallen under s 511, IPC which applies to all attempts to commit offences punishable2743 with imprisonment where no express provisions are made by the Code for the punishment of that attempt. It should follow that the ingredients of an offence of attempt to commit culpable homicide not amounting to murder should be the same as the ingredients of an offence of attempt to commit that offence under s 511 .

It was held in Abhayanand Mishra v State of Bihar,[8]that a person commits the offence of attempting to commit a particular offence, when he intends to commit that particular offence and having made preparations and with the intention to commit that offence, does an act towards its commission and that such an act need not be penultimate act towards the commission of that offence, but must be an act during the course of committing such offence. It follows, therefore, that a person commits an offence under s 308 when he has an intention to commit culpable homicide not amounting to murder and in pursuance of that intention does an act towards the commission of that offence whether that act be the penultimate act or not. On a parity of reasoning, a person commits an offence under s 307 when he has an intention to commit murder and in pursuance of that intention, does an act towards its commission irrespective of the fact whether that act is the penultimate act or not. It is to be clearly understood, however, that the intention to commit the offence of murder means that the person concerned has the intention to do certain act with the necessary intention or knowledge mentioned in s 300 . The intention to commit an offence is different from the intention or knowledge requisite for constituting the act as that offence. The expression 'whoever attempts to commit an offence' in s 511, can only mean whoever intends to do a certain act with the intent or knowledge necessary for the commission of that offence. The same is meant by the expressions whoever does an act with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances that is he by that act, caused death, he would be guilty of murder' in s 307 . This simply means that the act must be done with the intent or knowledge requisite for the commission of the offence of murder. The expression 'by that act' does not mean that the immediate outcome of the acts committed must be death. Such a result must be the result of that act whether immediately or after a lapse of time.[9]

The accused had inflicted six knife injuries on the person of the injured, out of which two injuries were of grievous nature, whereas the other injuries were simple. The guilt of the accused fell under s 307 and not under s 308, IPC .[10]

Sections 307 and 308 --Relative Scope

Section 308, IPC is per verba et literis, the same as s 307, IPC, with the only difference that it relates to an attempt to commit culpable homicide whereas s 307 relates to an attempt to commit murder. Punishment under s 308, IPC as provided is consequently also less. In other respects the constituting element of the two sections are the same.[11]

3. Sections 308, 323 / 324 and 325 / 326

An offence punishable under s 308 postulates doing of an act with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances that if one by that act caused death, he2744 would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. An attempt of that nature may or may not actually result in hurt. It is the attempt to commit culpable homicide which is punishable under s 308, whereas punishment for simple hurts can be meted out under ss 323 and 324 and for grievous hurts under ss 325 and 326, IPC . Qualitatively, these offences are different.[12]

4. 'Act' Denotes Series of Acts Also

Commentary under the same heading in s 307, ante and s 33, vol 1, may be referred to.

5. 'And under such Circumstances'

Commentary under the same heading in s 307, ante, may be referred to.

6. Mens Rea

Commentary under the same heading in s 307, ante, may be referred to.

Before an act can be said to have been committed under s 308 of the IPC, it is essential to examine the mens rea of the appellant at the time of the incident, because *mens rea*is one of the two essential elements of the offence of an attempt of murder. To constitute an offence of attempt to murder, there must be an act coupled with mens rea. Intention has been defined to consist of a desire that certain consequence shall follow from the act or omission of the accused. If there is no such intention or knowledge as is necessary to constitute murder, there can be no attempt to commit it. The intention may be proved by res gestae, by acts or events, previous or subsequent to the incident or occurrence. Various relevant circumstances from which the intention may be gathered are the nature of the weapon used, part of the body where injury was caused and nature of injury and opportunity available to accused.[13]

7. Intention

Intention is a mental state of a person. It cannot be ascertained with an instrument. Since intention manifests itself in an overt act, intention has to be gathered from the act of the party. In a case, weapon of offence, nature of injuries, body parts towards which injuries are directed, etc., guide in formation of the opinion as to intention.[14]

8. 'If he, by That Act, Caused Death'

Commentary under the same heading in s 307, ante, may be referred to.

Offence punishable under s 308, IPC postulates doing an act with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances that if one, by that act, caused death, he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.[15]

If an accused does any act with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances that, if he, by that act, caused death, he would be guilty of murder, he shall be guilty of committing an offence punishable under s 307, but if an accused2745 did any act that he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, he shall be guilty of committing an act punishable under s 308 .

9. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and triable by a court of sessions.

10. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of sessions judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the...day of ..., at ..., did an act, to wit ..., with such intention (or knowledge), and under such circumstances, that, if, by that act, you had caused-the death of AB, you would have been guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, and that you caused hurt to the said AB by the said act, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 308 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tired by this court on the said charge.

Where the injuries were caused with lathis to four persons by the accused resulting in fracture of head bone and grievous injuries, the complaint was lodged under ss 323 and 504, IPC . However, charge was framed under s 308, IPC ; it was held that the evidence sufficient to prove charge is not necessary at stage of framing of charge, hence, there was no illegality if charge has been framed under s 308 .[16]

11. Appreciation of Evidence

Where the accused fired a shot from airgun at the complainant which hit near his eyes though the shot was aimed to the head, the accused was held guilty under s 308 .[17] Where the fact of possession of airgun by the family of the accused is proved, the non-recovery of the such airgun which happens to be the weapon of offence is not fatal to the prosecution case.[18] Where the accused fired at one person, but the bullet missed the target and hit the thigh of another person, the accused was found guilty under s 308 .[19] Where there was an argument between the accused conductor of the bus and the injured, and the accused pushed injured out of the running bus, the injured fell down and sustained injuries, the conviction of accused under s 308 was found proper.[20] Even if no injury grievous in nature has been noticed by the doctor who medically examined the injured and that injury which has been proved dangerous to life has no basis, yet the conviction can be recorded under s 308 in the facts and circumstances of a case. When the accused were armed with deadly weapons like gandasi and lathis, and they had selected the sensitive parts of the body like the head for inflicting injuries and one injury was even bone-deep, the conviction was found proper.[21]2746

12. Right of Private Defence

When no plea is set up by the accused that he assaulted the injured because latter encroached upon his land by ploughing the same, no question of exercise of right of private defence by the accused arises.[22]

13. Sentence

There is purpose and policy behind the provision of s 235(2), CrPC which came to be introduced in this Code and commands that the court is obliged to take into account various facts and circumstances peculiar and personal to the accused before determining quantum of sentence like: (i) age; (ii) economic standard; (iii) nature of employment or vocation; (iv) character; (v) nature of offence; or (vi) mode and manner in which weapon came to be employed during the course of offence. It is the duty of the court to bear in mind all these facts and circumstances, the proposition of law and existing prevailing policy and philosophy of criminology and penology without being oblivious to the vitality and has to strike a balance so that sentence does not become disproportionate to the harm caused in the offence and at the same time, too lenient or inadequate that it may affect to an extent, social good.[23]

The accused cannot be granted any benefit because of the gap between time of occurrence and date of conviction of the accused. The scales of justice have to be kept even and a wrongful acquittal of the accused made by the trial court must be set aside and adequate sentence must be awarded.[24] The fact that the sentence is being awarded to the accused after about 10 years from the date of the incident cannot weigh consideration in a case where very severe injuries were caused by accused to the victim and a number of his bones were broken and no mercy was shown by the accused to the victim. In these circumstances sentence of three years' rigorous imprisonment cannot be said to be harsh.[25]

The accused appellant had inflicted injuries by lathi blows on the left side of head, seven cm above eye-brow, the victim had sustained fracture of left parietal bone also. Sentence of two years RI was imposed.[26]

Where the accused and complainant parties were neighbours and were on good terms before the incident and the accused persons were of young age, the sentence of imprisonment of accused persons was reduced from three years' rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 3000.[27] Where the accused faced trial for four years, though benefit of probation under s 360, CrPC was not given to him, his sentence was reduced from five years' rigorous imprisonment to one year.[28] Where the accused convicted under s 308 was 19 years old, he had no previous conviction or any other antecedents of violence, the sentence of imprisonment of the accused was reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone, but the sentence of fine was maintained.[29]2747

Compromise--Effect on Sentence

Although an offence under s 308 is not compoundable, but the fact that complainant and the accused have compromised is a instigating factor in awarding lesser sentence to the accused.[30] Where the 70 years old accused and co-accused were economically poor and had already undergone one month's imprisonment, the dispute between accused and complainant party had already been resolved, and compromise reached, the sentence of the accused person under s 308 was reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone and fine.[31]

14. Alteration of Conviction from Section 307 to Section 308

Commentary under the same heading in s 307, ante, may be referred to.

The doctor in injury report had not stated that the injury of the victim in the ordinary course of nature was sufficient to cause death. Conviction of the accused under s 307, IPC was altered to one under s 308, IPC and sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[32]

Where the doctor stated that the injury found on the person of the injured was not sufficient to cause death in the ordinary cause of nature, conviction of the accused under s 307, IPC was altered to one under s 308, IPC .[33]

15. Alteration of Conviction from Section 308 to Section 323

Where the accused inflicted injuries on the victim which in the opinion of the doctor were grievous injuries but the doctor had not given sufficient reasons for opining the injuries to be grievous in nature, the conviction of the accused under ss 308 / 34 was set aside and instead they were convicted under s 323 .[34] Where the accused was alleged to have attacked the victim with iron rod, the evidence of eyewitnesses was infirm and contradicting as to the weapon of offence, the opinion of the doctor was that the injuries found on the person of victim were simple and caused by blunt object, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 308 to one under s 323 .[35]

16. Alteration of Conviction from Section 308 to Section 324

Where in a sudden fight, the accused inflicted a blow with iron pipe in a spur of moment, there was no pre-plan or pre-meditation, the conviction of accused was altered from s 308, Pt, II to s 324 .[36]

17. Alteration of Conviction from Section 308 to Section 352

Where it was not established as to which of the accused persons inflicted the head injury on the victim, but each of the accused aimed a lathi blow at the victim, an act which, irrespective of whether the blow hit the mark, renders the wielder guilty of2748 assault as defined under s 351, IPC, the conviction of accused person was altered from s 308 to s 352 .[37]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 309.

Attempt to commit suicide.--

Whoever attempts to commit suicide and does any act towards the commission of such offence, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year [38][or with fine, or with both].

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes the act of 'attempt to commit suicide'. This section is the only instance in the whole IPC wherein an attempt is made punishable while what is attempted is not an offence because the offender, being dead, cannot be punished. In the expression 'any act towards the commission of such offence', the word 'offence' does not refer to 'suicide' but to the 'attempt to commit suicide' which is made punishable, as an offence, under this section.

The question as to whether the suicide was committed explosively or whether it was committed after prolonged deliberation is wholly irrelevant.

No distinction can be drawn between the suicide committed by a person who had led a successful life, and the mission of his life been completed, and between suicide committed by a person who is a citizen frustrated or defeated in life. The same should be the position with regard to attempt to commit suicide.[39]

2. Law of Australia

'Suicide' is the intentional killing of oneself with knowledge of the probable consequences of such an act. In no jurisdiction is suicide an offence. It is an offence in every jurisdiction to assist or encourage another person to commit suicide. In most jurisdictions it is an offence to assist or encourage someone to attempt to commit suicide. In South Australia, the offender is liable for murder or attempted murder if he or she procures the suicide or attempted suicide by means of fraud, duress or undue influence. Under the (CTH) Criminal Code, it is an offence to use a carriage service (such as the Internet) to access, transmit, make available, publish or distribute suicide related material, or to possess, control, produce, supply or obtain such material for use through a carriage service.2749

In some jurisdictions, legislation further provides that it is lawful for a person to use force that is reasonable to prevent the suicide of another person or any act that the person believes on reasonable grounds would, if committed, result in the suicide by another person. However, such provisions do not permit apprehension or arrest of a person who has threatened or is threatening suicide.[40]

""Suicide" would not be a correct finding if the proper conclusion on the evidence were that, although the deceased was aware that she was projecting herself through an upper storey window, she was unable through a temporary defect in understanding to appreciate that death was the probable consequence of her actions, so that she did not intend to kill herself. In such a case, the finding should be "misadventure", though insanity or disturbed balance of mind will justify a finding of suicide unless it is of such a character as to deprive the person of the ability to appreciate the probable consequences of the act."[41]

3. Sections 309, 302 and 84

Where a woman jumped into a well along with her children and was convicted under ss 302 and 309 for murdering her two children and attempting to commit suicide, the plea of insanity as a defence was not accepted, as mere insanity as is known in medical science is not sufficient to dismiss a charge of criminal prosecution unless the insanity alleged is one which is shown to have suffered at the time of commission of offence and the accused woman on being rescued voluntarily offered exculpatory explanation ruling out the plea of insanity, conviction of the accused under ss 302 and 309 was found proper.[42]

Constitutional Validity of Section 309

It would be appropriate to refer to the decisions wherein the question of constitutional validity of s 309 was considered.

Maruti Shripati Dubal v State of Maharashtra ,[43] is a well-known case decided by a Division Bench of the Bombay High Court. In that decision, PB Sawant J, as he then was, speaking for the Division Bench held that s 309 is violative of art 14 as well as art 21 of the Constitution . The provision was held to be discriminatory in nature and also arbitrary so as to violate the equality principle enshrined in art 14 . Article 21 was construed to include the 'right to die' or to terminate one's own life. For this reason it was held to violate art 21 also.

State v Sanjay Bhatia ,[44] is a decision of Delhi High Court, wherein Sachar J, as he then was, speaking for the Division Bench held that the continuance of s 309 is an anachronism unworthy of human society like ours. However, the question of its constitutional validity with reference to any provision of the constitution was not considered.

In Chenna Jagadeeswar v State of Andhra Pradesh ,[45] a decision by a Division Bench of Andhra Pradesh High Court, the challenge to the constitutional validity of s 309, IPC was rejected. The argument that art 21 includes the 'right to die' was2750 rejected. It was also pointed out by Amareshwari J, speaking for the Division Bench that the courts have sufficient power to see that unwarranted harsh treatment or prejudice is not meted out to those who need care and attention. This negatives the suggested violation of art 14 .

The first decision of the Supreme Court in P Rathinam[46] by a Division Bench, wherein Hansaria J, speaking for the Bench rejected the challenge to the constitutional validity of s 309 based on art 14 of the Constitution, but upheld the challenge on the basis of art 21 of the Constitution . The earlier decisions of the Bombay High Court and the Andhra Pradesh High Court were considered and agreement was expressed with the view taken by the Andhra Pradesh High Court as regards s 309 qua art 14 . The decision then proceeds to consider the challenge with reference to art 21 of the Constitution . It was held that art 21 has enough positive content in it so that is also includes the 'right to die' which inevitably leads to the right to commit suicide. Expressing agreement with the view taken by the Bombay High Court in respect of the content of art 21, it was held as under: 'Keeping in view all the above, we state that right to live of which art 21 speaks of can be said to bring in its trail the right not to live a forced life'.

The conclusion of the discussion was summarised as under:

> On the basis of what has been held and noted above, we state that section 309 of the Penal Code deserves to be effaced from the statute book to humanise our penal laws. It is a cruel and irrational provision and it may result in punishing a person again (doubly) who has suffered agony and would be undergoing ignominy because of his failure to commit suicide. Then an act of suicide cannot be said to be against religion, morality or public policy, and an act of attempted suicide has no baneful effect on society. Further, suicide or attempt to commit it causes no harm to others, because of which state's interference with the personal liberty of the persons concerned is not called for.
> We, therefore, hold that s 309 violates Article 21 and so, it is void. May it be said that the view taken by us would advance not only the cause of humanization, which is a need of the day, but of globalization also, as by effacing section 309 we would be attuning this part of our criminal law of global wavelength.

In Gyankaur v State of Punjab ,[47] a Constitutional Bench of the Supreme Court examined the aforesaid decisions of the High Courts and the Supreme Court and overruled P Rathinam's case,[48] stating as

> When a man commits suicide he has to undertake certain positive overt acts and the genesis of those acts cannot be traced to, or be included within the protection of the 'right to life' under Article 21 . The significant aspect of 'sanctity of life' is also not to be overlooked. Article 21 is a provision guaranteeing protection of life and personal liberty and by no stretch of imagination can extinction of life be read to be included in 'protection of life'. Whatever may be the philosophy of permitting a person to extinguish his life by committing suicide, we find it difficult to construe Article 21 to include within it the 'right to die' as a part of the fundamental right guaranteed therein. 'Right to life' is a natural right embodied in Article 21 but suicide is an unnatural termination or extinction of life and, therefore, incompatible and inconsistent with the concept of 'right to life' with respect and in all humility, we find no similarity in the2751 nature of the other rights, such as the right to 'freedom of speech' etc. to provide a comparable basis to hold that the 'right to life' also includes the 'right to die'. With respect, the comparison is inapposite, for the reason indicated in the context of Article 21 . The decisions, relating to other fundamental rights wherein the absence of compulsion to exercise a right was held to be included within the exercise of that right are not available to support the view taken in P Rathinam, qua Article 21 .

To give meaning and content to the word 'life' in art 21, it has been construed as life with human dignity. Any aspect of life which makes it dignified may be read into it but not that which extinguishes it and is, therefore, inconsistent with the continued existence of life resulting in effacing the right itself. The 'right to die', if any, is inherently inconsistent with the 'right to life' as 'death' with 'life'.

The Constitutional Bench however, approved the view taken in P Rathinam case that s 309 is not violative of art 14 by observing as follows:

> With respect, we are in agreement with the view so taken qua Article 14, in P Rathinam,.

> We have already stated that the debate on the desirability of retaining such a penal provision of punishing attempted suicide, including the recommendation for its deletion by the Law Commission are not sufficient to indicate that the provision is unconstitutional being violative of Article 14 . Even if those facts are to weigh, the severity of the provisions is mitigated by the wide discretion in the matter of sentencing since there is no requirement of awarding any minimum sentence and the sentence of imprisonment is not even compulsory. There is also no minimum fine prescribed as sentence, which alone may be the punishment awarded on conviction under s 309, IPC . This aspect is noticed in P Rathinam for holding that Article 14 is not violated.

It is pertinent to note that against the decision of Bombay High Court in Maruti Shripati Dubal v State of Maharashtra ,[49] the matter came up in appeal before the Supreme Court and the decision of Bombay High Court was overruled.[50] In the below mentioned case, the Supreme Court opined that although s 309 of the IPC (attempt to commit suicide) has been held to be constitutionally valid in Gian Kaur case, the time has come when it should be deleted by Parliament as it has become anachronistic. A person attempts suicide in depression, and hence he needs help, rather than punishment, the Court recommend to Parliament to consider the feasibility of deleting s 309 from the IPC .[51]

4. 'Attempts to Commit Suicide'

Commentary under heading 'Attempt' in s 307, ante, may be referred to.

An attempt belongs to the stage of execution of the offence in question; it is not merely an act of preparation. Hence, the mere running to a well, with the intention of committing suicide, is not an attempt to commit suicide.[52] A person who jumps into a well in order to avoid and escape from the police and subsequently comes out of the well himself, cannot be convicted under this section if there is no evidence to show2752 that he wanted to commit suicide.[53] A person cannot be convicted under this section for emasculating himself.[54]

'Attempt' involves a conscious effort to achieve a particular result. A mere refusal to take any food or nourishment would not amount to such a conscious effort towards achieving the object to putting an end to one's own life. It may be a stage of preparation after the formation of an intention. It is only refusal to take food or nourishment, at the critical stage, when the individual is hanging between life and death, which would amount to a conscious attempt to commit suicide. In a case, Broome J, observed that unless there is some overt declaration by the accused of his intention to fast to death, it is difficult to be sure that he really intends to persevere to the bitter end. Also, even if there is such an intention at the beginning, one has always to make allowance for the possibility of the accused's changing his mind and breaking his fast before it becomes dangerous. If, therefore, a person openly declares that he will fast to death and then proceeds to refuse all nourishment, even when there is imminent danger of death ensuing, he can be held guilty of the offence of attempted suicide.[55] Where a woman, who had been driven almost frantic by pains of prolonged labour, attempted to take her own life by throwing herself into a well, in which she delivered the birth of a child, who was unfortunately born dead, it was held that she was guilty under this section.

5. 'Suicide'

Commentary under the same heading in s 306, ante, may be referred to.

Suicide consists of a self-killing inspired by deliberate intention of the deceased to put an end to his own existence.[56]

Where the accused was convicted for murder of her three children by throwing them into a river after which she had attempted to commit suicide by jumping into the river, and her conviction was based on extra-judicial confession before a village administrative officer and evidence of one eyewitness, the evidence showed the possibility of receding said extra-judicial confession in presence of the police, there was a huge rock between eyewitness, accused and her children standing on river bank, the defence's plea that accused accidentally slipped into river with her children was corroborated by evidence of doctor, motive for commission of offence by accused was also absent, the conviction of accused under ss 302 and 309 was set aside.[57]

Cause of death of deceased wife was burn injuries. In her dying declaration she stated that the accused (her husband) had beaten her, poured kerosene oil and set her on fire. Burn injuries were not found on the back side of chest, abdomen and right foot of the deceased. The theory of suicide and accidental death was ruled out. Conviction of the accused appellant under s 302, IPC was held proper.[58]2753

Commentary under the same heading in s 306, ante, may be referred to.

Where the death of a recently wed and highly educated wife occurred by burning during midnight in a dark kitchen, no kerosene or other catalyst or a match box was found in kitchen where the incident happened; there was a discord between spouses and deceased reconciled to the prospect of separation and determined to embark upon new life by obtaining a job, the conduct of husband was unnatural as on knowing about burning of his wife, he also absconded for a month, it was held to be a case of murder and not suicide.[59]

The very fact that the body with ligature mark around the neck was found on a cot and not hanging, completely demolished the theory of suicide and proves that the deceased-wife was murdered. As regards the possibility of murder by some intruder, the most eloquent circumstance against its acceptance is that there was no sight of scuffle or mark of sexual assault on the deceased and no proof of theft of any article from the room or any attempt of such a thing. In these circumstances, the conclusion could be drawn that the accused after strangulating his wife to death, which according to the doctor could be caused within two to three minutes, came out with a false version that she was lying unconscious. The conviction of the accused under s 302 was, therefore, found proper.[60] Where the accused-husband used to make acquisitions against his deceased-wife that she was suffering from leprosy showing the motive of accused for her murder, the doctors after seeing the report of chemical analyst, stated that poison would have worked fatally on the victim, the accused had opportunity to administer poison when he was in the same room with deceased on the fateful night, acquittal of accused by the High Court on coming to conclusion that deceased-wife had committed suicide, was set aside by the Supreme Court.[61]

Where in a case of death by hanging, there was no direct or circumstantial evidence to show any cause of murder, the opinion of autopsy surgeon that the death might be homicidal was not decisive but ambivalent in nature, the body of the deceased was found hanging by rope, eyes partly open, light whitish secretion was coming out from the nose, and the tongue had also come out, these features were suggestive of possibility of suicide, so conviction of the accused for murder under s 302 and imposition of death sentence was found improper and set aside.[62]

Fast unto Death

The fast unto death is also an attempt to commit suicide. Where the accused had undertaken a 'fast unto death', and an FIR under s 309 was registered against him, his challenge to the registration of FIR in the writ petition on the ground that s 309 is ultra virus the constitution was not accepted in the wake of Gyan Kaur v State of Punjab ,[63] and the writ petition of the accused was, therefore, dismissed.[64]

6. Euthanasia--Meaning

The word 'euthanasia' originated from the Greek words 'eu' which means 'good' and 'thanatos' which means 'death'. One meaning given to the word is 'the2754 intentional termination of life by another at the explicit request of the person who dies'.[65]

The term euthanasia normally implies that the act must be initiated by the person who wishes to commit suicide. However, some people define euthanasia to include both voluntary and involuntary termination of life.

Euthanasia may be classified as active and passive, or alternatively as voluntary, non-voluntary and involuntary. Active euthanasia involves painlessly putting individuals to death for merciful reasons, as when a doctor administers a lethal dose of medication to a patient. Passive euthanasia involves not doing something to prevent death, as when doctors refrain from using devices necessary to keep alive a terminally ill patient or a patient in a persistent vegetative state. Voluntary euthanasia is when a person asks to die (by either active or passive euthanasia). Non-voluntary euthanasia refers to ending the life of a person who is not mentally competent to make an informed request to die, such as a comatose patient. In addition, there is another category of involuntary euthanasia. This is said to occur when a patient is killed against his express will.[66]

It is important that euthanasia should not be confused with assisted suicide. The latter involves a patient's voluntarily bringing about his or her own death with the assistance of another person, typically a physician. In this case, the act is a suicide (intentional self-inflicted death), because the patient actually causes his or her own death. Thus while in assisted suicide the doctor makes available to the patient the means by which he can kill himself, in euthanasia the doctor himself (by act or omission) kills the patient. The issue of assisted suicide is closely related to that of euthanasia because it also involves questions of a similar nature. Furthermore some countries have preferred to legalise assisted suicide though they remain averse to permitting euthanasia.[67]

Merey killing or Euthanasia

Euthanasia is of two types: Active and passive. Active euthanasia entails the use of lethal substances or forces to kill a person e.g. a lethal injection given to a person with terminal cancer who is in terrible agony.

Passive euthanasia entails withholding of medical treatment for continuance of life, e.g. withholding of antibiotics where without giving it a patient is likely to die, or removing the heart lung machine from a patient in coma. While active euthanasia is illegal unless there is legislation permitting it, passive euthanasia is legal even without legislation, provided certain conditions and safeguards are maintained. In India, active euthanasia is illegal and a crime under s 302 or at least s 304, IPC . Physician assisted suicide is a crime under s 306, IPC (abetment to suicide). In this case, the petitioner Aruna Ramchandra Shanbaug was working as Staff nurse in King Edward Memoriam Hospital, Bombay. On 27 November 1973, a sweeper in the hospital tried to rape/sodomize her and to immobilize her during the act twisted the chain around her. Due to strangulation by the chain the supply of oxygen to the brain stopped and the brain got damaged. After about 36 years from the date of the incident, the petitioner aged 60 years and in a persistent vegetative state, was virtually dead. Prayer of the petitioner was that the respondent be directed to stop feeding the petitioner and leave her to die peacefully. The Supreme Court held:2755

> There is no statutory provision in our country as to the legal procedure for withdrawing life support to a person in PVS or who is otherwise incompetent to take a decision in this connection. We agree with Mr. Andhyarujina that passive euthanasia should be permitted in our country in certain situations, and we disagree with the learned Attorney General that it should never be permitted. Hence, following the technique used in Vishakha's case, we are laying down the law in this connection which will continue to be the law until Parliament makes a law on the subject.
> (i) A decision has to be taken to discontinue life support either by the parents or the spouse or other close relatives, or in the absence of any of them, such a decision can be taken even by a person or a body of persons acting as a next friend. It can also be taken by the doctors attending the patient. However, the decision should be taken bona fide in the best interest of the patient.
> (ii) In the present case, we have already noted that Aruna Shanbaug's parents are dead and other close relatives are not interested in her ever since she had the unfortunate assault or her. As already noted above, it is the KEM Hospital staff, who have been amazingly caring for her day and night for so many long years, who really are her next friends, and not Ms. Pinky Virani who has only visited her on few occasions and written a book on her. Hence it is for the KEM Hospital staff to take that decision. The KEM Hospital staff have clearly expressed their wish that Aruna Shanbaug should be allowed to live.

Unfortunately the petitioner has died in the year 2015, while the accused who put the petitioner in such a stage is still alive.[68]

Euthanasia--Legal Position in India

Suicide by its very nature is an act of self killing or self-destruction, an act of terminating one's own life without the aid or assistance of any other human agency. Euthanasia or mercy-killing on the other hand means and implies the intervention of other human agency to end a life. Mercy-killing is not covered by the provisions of s 309 . The two concepts are both factually and legally distinct. Euthanasia or mercy-killing is nothing but homicide whatever the circumstances in which it is effected.[69]

Being pro-euthanasia on the view that existence in Persistent Vegetative State (PVS) is not a benefit to the patient of a terminal illness being unrelated to the principle of 'sanctity of life' or the 'right to live with dignity' is of no assistance to determine the scope of art 21 of the Constitution for deciding whether the guarantee of 'right to life' therein includes the 'right to die'. The 'right to life' including the right to live with human dignity would mean the existence of such a right up to the end of natural life. This also includes the right to a dignified life up to the point of death including a dignified procedure of death. In other words, this may include the right of a dying man to also die with dignity when his life is ebbing. However, the 'right to die' with dignity at the end of life is not to be confused or equated with the 'right to die' an unnatural death curtailing the natural span of life.[70]

A question may arise, in the context of a dying man who is terminally ill or in a PVS that he may want to terminate his life in such circumstances. This category of cases may fall within the ambit of the 'right to die' with dignity as a part of right to live with dignity, when death due to termination of natural life is certain and imminent and the process of natural death has commenced. These are not cases of2756 extinguishing life, but only of accelerating conclusion of the process of natural death which has already commenced. The debate even in such cases to permit physician assisted termination of life is inconclusive. It is sufficient to reiterate that the argument to support the view of permitting termination of life in such cases to reduce the period of suffering during the process of certain natural death is not available to interpret art 21 to include there in the right to curtail the natural span of life.[71]

Only cases of voluntary euthanasia (where the patient consents to death) that would attract exception 5 to s 300 . Cases of non-voluntary and involuntary euthanasia would be struck by proviso 1 to s 92, IPC and thus, be rendered illegal.

The law in India is also very clear on the aspect of assisted suicide. Abetment of suicide is an offence expressly punishable under ss 305 and 306, IPC .

Moreover, after the decision of a five judge bench of the Supreme Court in Gian Kaur v State of Punjab ,[72] it is well settled that the 'right to life' guaranteed by art 21 of the Constitution does not include the 'right to die'. The court held that art 21 is a provision guaranteeing protection of life and personal property and by no stretch of the imagination can extinction of life be read to be include in the protection of life.[73]

Commentary under the same heading in s 307, ante and also commentary under s 33, vol 1, may be referred to.

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable and triable by a magistrate.

9. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.

11. Drowning, Sunk and Floating Body

As regards the buoyancy of the human body, Taylor in his Principles and Practice of Medical Jurisprudence opined as under:[74]

The recovery of an immersed body:

After drowning has occurred the body usually sinks and then may reappear after a variable period of time. The time interval depends on:

1. the nature of water--salt or fresh;
2. the specific gravity of the body;
3. the rate of putrefactive change.

It may be recalled that according to the principle of Archimedes a body in water will experience a buoyant force equal to the weight of water it displaces. Also the specific gravity of the body relates the weight and volume of the body to that of the water. The specific gravity of the human body is very close to that of water. Small variations, therefore, have considerable effect on the buoyancy.

In a study in which the specific gravity and buoyancy were calculated related to specific volume of air in the lungs of each subject Donoghue and Minnigerode concluded that all subjects would be capable of floating in either fresh water or sea water at total lung capacity. At functional residual capacity (the approximate lung volume of the dead body), 69 percent of the subjects would float in sea water whereas only 7 percent would float in fresh water.

In addition to the amount of air in the lungs, the specific gravity of the human body varies with the size and composition of that body. The weight of the skeleton is balanced against the amount of fat present. Thus women generally have a lower specific gravity than men while infants and young children appear to float more readily than adults.

Clothing will tend to support the body initially with natural buoyancy and later perhaps assist in sinking because of its weight. The addition of weights to the body will also assist the process.

Thus, as a general rule the body with water in the lungs and stomach will sink. It will go down to the bottom because hydrostatic pressure which increases with depth will compress but gas is present and thus increase specific gravity. There it may remain until, if it is free to move, the formation of the gases of putrefaction will decrease the specific gravity. It will then rise to the surface and float.

In Modi's Textbook of Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology,[75] it is stated as follows:

> Length of time the body was in water:
> Normally the human body is slightly heaven than fresh water and immediately the person becomes unconscious, sinks and goes down is the bottom unless there is some2758 obstruction between or there is a strong upward current it the water. Owing to putrefaction and formation of gases all bodies sooner or later again come up to the surface, it is much quicker in warm water than cold. Usually the sunk body comes to the surface a little distance away from the site of drowning, however, the current, its speed and the tide in sea water are some of the factors.[76]

Where the accused mother was alleged to have thrown her children into well and therefore jumped in well to commit suicide, the statement of eyewitness that she saw the body of accused son floating when he looked down into the well after seeing her jumping into it cannot be believed as the body of the boy would also have sunk and not floated after the accused jumped into the well, the statement of the witness was also against the principles of buoyancy of human body, the evidence of the doctor prior conducted post-mortem was also not clear as to how the body of the son could instantly float while the body of the daughter was fully sunk in the water, the conviction of the accused under ss 300 and 309 IPC was set aside giving her benefit of doubt.[77]

12. Proof

It is to be proved that the accused did an act in the course of an attempt to commit suicide and that it was for the purposes of committing suicide.

Where from the evidence of prosecution witness, it is clearly established that when they tried to take accused into custody, he had attempted to commit suicide by biting a cyanide capsule, the accused in his statement made under s 313, CrPC, also admitted that he had tried to bite a cyanide capsule when he was caught by the police, the acquittal of the accused under s 309 was altered to his conviction under the same section.[78] Where accused mother after altercation with other family members proved to have locked herself in a room along with the deceased son, circumstantial evidence listed and witness corroborated prosecution story, conviction of the accused woman under ss 300 and 309 was found proper.[79]

13. Probation

Many decisions show that even on conviction under s 309, IPC, in practice the accused have been dealt with compassion by giving benefit under the Probation of Offenders Act 1958 or s 562, CrPC 1898 corresponding to s 360 of the CrPC 1973.

14. Admonition

Where accused woman jumped into well with her two children and after being convicted under ss 307 and 309, IPC she was released on admonition for the offence under s 309, IPC and had been sentenced to imprisonment for three years for offence under s 307 for attempting for murder her children, the Supreme Court did not see any valid reason for making this distinction in award of sentence under ss 309 and 307 and thus, directed the offence to be dealt with under s 307 also.[80]2759

15. Sentence

The law confers, upon the court, a very wide discretion in the matter of punishment and it is not necessary to inflict a sentence of imprisonment upon a person who, on account of family discord, destitution, loss of a dear relation, or other cause of a like nature, overcomes the instinct of self-preservation and decides to take his life. In such a case, the unfortunate person deserves indulgence and should be either released on probation for good conduct or sentenced to a fine if he is not too poor to pay it. These observations apply with greater force to the case of a woman who attempts to commit suicide in similar circumstances. It is not possible to lay down any hard and fast rule on the subject, but the court must, in each case, consider the motive which has prompted a person to destroy his or her own life.[81] A severe punishment should not be inflicted where the accused suffers from a bodily ailment likely to cause acute mental depression.[82]

Remission of Sentence

Where after altercation with other family members, the accused woman murdered her child and attempted to commit suicide, she had apparently no motive to commit murder of her own son, her age was about 17 years, a Division Bench of Allahabad High Court while confirming her conviction under ss 302 and 309, IPC recommended that it is a fit case in which the government may consider the feasibility of remitting a part of punishment to which the accused has been sentenced in exercise of their power under s 32, CrPC .[83]

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF OFFENCES AFFECTING LIFE

S. 310.

Thug.--

Whoever, at any time after the passing of this Act, shall have been habitually associated with any other or others for the purpose of committing robbery or child-stealing by means of or accompanied with murder, is a thug.

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines the term 'thug'. In order to be thug, a person must:

(i) habitually
(ii) associate
(iii) with any other or others;
(iv) for the purpose of committing robbery or child-stealing;
(v) by means, or accompanied with, murder.2760

2. 'Shall have been Habitually Associated with any Other or Others'

There must be, at least, one more person besides the thug and they must habitually, i.e., regularly for some time, associate. A casual association is not enough. There must be evidence of their habitual association.[84]

3. 'For the Purpose of Committing Robbery or Child-stealing'

The habitual association must be for the definite purposes of committing robbery or child-stealing.

4. 'Robbery'

Commentary under s 390, post, vol. 4, may be referred to.

5. 'Child-stealing'

Presumably, 'child-stealing' means kidnapping or abduction (s 359-362, IPC). A human being cannot be the subject of theft.

Commentary under s 378, post, vol. 4, may be referred to.

6. 'By means of, or Accompanied with, Murder'

The modus operandi, intended to be employed for the purpose of robbery or child-stealing, must involve murder. This is what distinguishes thugee from robbery and dacoity. Merely administering a stupefying drug like dhatura is not enough because dhatura can be, and, in practice frequently, is, used by robbers without a fatal result. It is necessary, therefore, to show, against a person, accused of a purpose to commit robbery with murder, something more than that he proposed to administer, or did, on a particular occasion, administer dhatura in order to effect his purpose of robbery though it may not be absolutely necessary to show that, on any occasion, culpable homicide amounting to murder was, in fact, committed.[85]

The preceding section defined a 'thug' and this section provides the penalty for being a 'thug'.

2. Imprisonment for Life

The offence under this section may be tried by a court within whose local jurisdiction the offence was committed or the accused person is found.[87]

5. Charge

The charge, for an offence under this section, may run thus:

> I (name and office of sessions judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the .....day of ..... at..... you were a thug and you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 311 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this Court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge'.

6. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(a) the accused habitually associated with any person or persons;
(b) he did so since or after the passing of the Indian Penal Code ; and
(c) the purpose of such association was to commit robbery, or child stealing, by means of, or accompanied with, murder.

86 Substituted by Act 26 of 1955, s 117 and Sch, for 'transportation for life' (wef 1-1-1956).

87 Refer to the Code of Criminal Procedure 1973, s 181 (1) .

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 312.

Causing miscarriage.--

Whoever voluntarily causes a woman with child to miscarry, shall, if such miscarriage be not caused in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the woman, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both; and, if the woman be quick with child, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.--A woman, who causes herself to miscarry, is within the meaning of this section.2762

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

Under this section, voluntarily causing a woman with a child to miscarry is an offence if such miscarriage is not caused in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the woman; and the offence is liable to additional punishment if the woman is quick with the child. The explanation added to the section, points that a woman who causes herself to miscarry, is within the purview of the section. The section only applies to a 'woman with child', i.e., a pregnant woman, at the relevant time. If she is pregnant and the means used do not succeed, the accused can only be convicted, under s 511, IPC, for an attempt.

2. Ingredients

The ingredients of the offence under s 312, IPC, are that the accused voluntarily does some act to cause a woman with a child or quick with a child to miscarriage and that he did not cause the miscarriage in good faith in order to save the mother's life.[88]

3. 'Whoever'

This means the woman herself or any other person.

The section may even apply to the pregnant woman herself, who causes her own miscarriage.[89]

4. 'Voluntarily'

Commentary under s 39, vol 1, may be referred to.

A bare reading of s 39, IPC shows that the person need not intend to cause a certain effect. If an act is a probable consequence of the means used by him, he is said to have caused it voluntarily whether he really means to cause it or not. The section implicitly lays down the principle that a man is presumed to intend the probable consequences of his act.[90]

5. 'Voluntarily Causes Miscarriage'

Miscarriage must actually take place in consequence of what has been done. The expression 'Voluntarily causes a woman to miscarry' would include any act such as delivery of medicine which causes the miscarriage, but if a person merely pledges ornaments and raises money to aid and facilitate the miscarriage, he would properly be charged for abetment under s 312 read with s 109 .[91]2763

6. Woman with Child

This section requires proof that woman is 'with child'; it is enough if the fact of pregnancy and the intentional expulsion of the immature contents of the uterus are established. The words 'with child' mean pregnant, and it is not necessary to show that 'quickening', i.e., perception by the mother of the movements of the foetus has taken place or that the embryo has assumed a foetal form.[1]

'Quick with Child'

The expression 'quick with child' means that the process of quickening has taken place. This refers to any time after the woman first feels the movements of the child within her.[2] In common, quick with a child, simply means the stage of pregnancy where the quickening takes place. It is the perception by the mother of the movement of the foetus.[3] The process of quickening is not an indication that the foetus has acquired life in any different sense from that which it had before. It merely shows that a particular stage of the pregnancy has been reached, which stage generally produces a particular sensation in the mother. The 'quickening' describes the sensation, and not the stage.[4] No evidence but that of the woman herself canestablish the fact of quickening. Cases every now and then occur in which healthy women do not experience the sensation of quickening during the whole course of pregnancy, and the movements of the child may be, at no time, perceptible to the examiner. The discovery of the movements of a child by an examiner is proof that the usual period of quickening is past; but their non-discovery at the time of examination is no proof whatever that the woman has not quickened because the movements are, by no means constant and may be accidentally suspended at several successive examinations.[5]

Woman not Pregnant

Section 312, IPC can even apply to a pregnant woman herself, who causes her own miscarriage.[6] The woman must, as a fact, be pregnant. Therefore, a woman, who is not pregnant, though she imagines herself to be so, cannot be convicted of an offence under this section. Of course, she, and other people concerned (if any), may be convicted of abetment of the offence,[7] or of an attempt, under s 511, IPC to commit it, according to circumstances.

7. Miscarriage

The term 'miscarriage' is not defined in the IPC . In its popular sense, it is synonymous with abortion,[8] it consists of expulsion of embryo or foetus that is termination of pregnancy before the period of viability[9] and consists in the expulsion of the embryo or foetus, i.e., the immature product of conception. The stage, to which2764 pregnancy has advanced and the form, which the ovum or embryo may have assumed, are immaterial.[10] In Modi's Medical Jurisprudence, it is stated thus;

> Legally, miscarriage means the premature expulsion of the product of conception, an ovum or a foetus, from the uterus, at any period before the full term is reached. Medically, three distinct terms, ie, abortion, miscarriage and premature labour, are used to denote the explosion of a foetus at different stages of gestation. Thus, the term abortion' is used only when an ovum is expelled within the first three months of pregnancy, before the placenta is formed 'Miscarriage' is used when a foetus is expelled from the fourth to the seventh month of gestation, before it is viable, while 'premature labour' is the delivery of a viable child possibly capable of being reared, before it has become fully mature.

Child Born at or After 210 Days

In Modi's Medical Jurisprudence, it is stated that children, born at or after 210 days or seven calendar months of uterine life, are viable, i.e., are born alive and are capable of being reared. Similarly, where the pregnancy has advanced beyond seven months, the act of doctors and nurses, who facilitate or accelerate delivery cannot be treated as offences under the section, only because the delivery otherwise would have been delayed and particularly when the child is born alive and no injury is caused to the mother or the child.[11] If, therefore, the period is completed, i.e., the child is fully grown, the offence of causing miscarriage cannot be effected; an attempt to bring about a miscarriage, in such a case, would be punishable under s 511 .[12]

8. 'If such Miscarriage be not caused in Good Faith for the Purpose of Saving the Life of the Woman'

These words exclude from the section, acts done in the course of proper treatment in the interest of the life or health of the mother.[13] Where the accused has only accompanied the pregnant girl to the nursing home but there was no evidence to show that the pregnancy was terminated on his instructions, the pregnant girl and the doctor were not arrayed as accused, the doctor had opined that the termination of pregnancy was to save the girl's life, the conviction of the accused under ss 366 and 312, IPC, was set aside.[14]

9. Protection to Medical Practitioner under Medical Termination of Pregnancy Act 1971

According to s 3(1) of the Medical Termination of Pregnancy Act 1971, notwithstanding anything contained in the IPC, a registered medical practitioner shall not be guilty of any offence under the said Code, or under any other law for the time being in force, if any pregnancy is terminated by him in accordance with the provisions of the Medical Termination of Pregnancy Act 1971 as aforesaid. The text of s 3 of the above Act is given below:

S. 3 . When pregnancies may be terminated by registered medical practitioners.--

(1) Not withstanding anything contained in the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860), a registered medical practitioner shall not be guilty of any offence under that Code, or2765 under any other law for the time being in force, if any pregnancy is terminated by him in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

(2) Subject to the provisions of sub-section (4), a pregnancy may be terminated by a registered medical practitioner,--

- (a) where the length of the pregnancy does not exceed twelve weeks, if such medical practitioner is, or
- (b) where the length of the pregnancy exceeds twelve weeks but does not exceed twenty weeks, if not less than two registered medical practitioners are, of opinion, formed in good faith, that--
  - (i) the continuance of the pregnancy would involve a risk to the life of the pregnant woman or of grave injury to her physical or mental health; or
  - (ii) there is a substantial risk that if the child were born, it would suffer from such physical or mental abnormalities as to be seriously handicapped.

Explanation I.--Where any pregnancy is alleged by the pregnant woman to have been caused by rape, the anguish caused by such pregnancy shall be presumed to constitute a grave injury to the mental health of the pregnant woman.

Explanation II.--Where any pregnancy occurs as a result of failure of any device or method used by any married woman or her husband for the purposes of limiting the number of children, the anguish caused by such unwanted pregnancy may be presumed to constitute a grave injury to the mental health of the pregnant woman.

(3) In determining whether the continuance of a pregnancy would involve such risk of injury to the health as is mentioned in sub-section (2), account may be taken of the pregnant woman's actual or reasonably foreseeable environment.

(a) No pregnancy of a woman, who has not attained the age of eighteen years, or, who, having attained the age of eighteen years, is a mentally ill person, shall be terminated except with the consent in writing of her guardian.
(b) Save as otherwise provided in clause (a), no pregnancy shall be terminated except with the consent of the pregnant woman.

'Good Faith'

Commentary under the same heading in s 52, vol 1, may be referred to.

Good faith by itself is not enough. It has to be good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the mother or the child and not otherwise.[15]

Accused Doctor Administering Injection of 'Menstrogen Forte'

Where the deceased woman was living separately from her husband for about a period of 3 to 4 years, during which she conceived a child as a result of her illicit relations with a distant cousin, and she contacted the accused-doctor who administered an injection of 'menstrogen forte,'. However, the literature accompanying menstrogen forte medicine under the sub-head 'warnings and precautions', had the following specific instructions:

(1) There is some evidence to show that preparation when used during pregnancy may lead to foetal abnormalities and as such these should not be used during pregnancy or for pregnancy diagnosis.2766
(2) Before administering Menstrogen forte injection to women, pregnancy should be excluded.
(3) This preparation should neither be used for the diagnosis of pregnancy nor for the management of threatened or habitual abortion.

The accused-doctor must be presumed to know the effect of the medicine as revealed from the literature issued by the manufacturer of Menstrogen forte that such use of medicine was likely to result in a miscarriage. Merely because of the evidence of the doctor as prosecution witness that there was no miscarriage, it cannot be said that the charge under ss 312 / 511, IPC, for attempt to cause miscarriage against the accused or his conviction for the said offence was not proper.[16]

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

11. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the .....day of..., at...., voluntarily caused..... (name of the woman), then being with child, to miscarry, such miscarriage not being caused by you in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the said..... and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 312 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

12. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(1) the woman in question was with the child or (if under the second clause) she was quick with child;
(2) the accused caused the woman to miscarry;
(3) the accused did so voluntarily; and
(4) such miscarriage was not caused in good faith in order to save the woman's life.

13. Sentence

The first Part of s 312 does not make any mandatory provision for jail sentence and therefore, for an offence to make an attempt to commit the offence under the first Part of s 312 the sentence of imprisonment may appear to be excessive in the facts and circumstances of the case. Thus, where the accused doctor attempted to cause miscarriage of the patient by giving an injection of Menstrogen forte, the sentence of rigorous imprisonment for one year awarded to the accused by the trial court was set aside but the sentence of fine was enhanced from Rs 5000 to Rs 15000.2767

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 313.

Causing miscarriage without woman's consent.--

Whoever commits the offence defined in the last preceding section without the consent of the woman, whether the woman is quick with child or not, shall be punished with [17][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

The offence of voluntarily causing miscarriage under s 312, IPC may be aggravated by reason of the fact that the woman never gave her consent to what was done. In such a case, the offence is more severely punished under this section, whether the woman was quick with child or not.

Section 313, IPC, is an aggravated form of offence defined under s 312 . It provides for a more severe punishment if the offence defined under s 312 is committed without the consent of the woman whose miscarriage is caused.[18]

2. Consent

Where the victim a pregnant lady was kicked in the abdomen by the accused-lady resulting in her abortion, the other accused though present, did not participate in the assault or abuse, the lady-accused was found guilty under s 313, IPC, but the other accused persons were acquitted by getting the benefit of the doubt.[19]

3. Quick with Child

Commentary under s 312, ante, may be referred to.

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-baliable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of session.

Section 313,Indian Penal Code 1860, and Section 319 , Code of Criminal Procedure 1973

In order to take action under s 319, CrPC, it postulates the existence of evidence. The expression 'evidence' in the context with reference to the statement of witness,2768 would mean a complete statement, i.e., examination-in-chief and cross-examination. The statement which does not satisfy this test, cannot be called 'evidence' within the meaning of s 319, CrPC .[20] Thus, where the accused was issued a show-cause notice during trial for offences under ss 498A and 313, IPC, on the basis of incomplete examination of the witness who was examined-in-chief but was partly cross-examined and her cross-examination was not concluded, the order issuing show cause notice to the accused under ss 313 / 34, CrPC was set aside.[21]

Accused Kicking the Abdomen of Pregnant Wife

Where the accused and the complainant-wife were living separately, and the accused-husband was already married twice and had children out of the said wedlock, the relation between the accused and the complainant were strained on account of pregnancy of the complainant as the latter had refused to terminate it, the accused after gaining entry into the house of the complainant kicked her on her abdomen resulting into expulsion of her six months old foetus, the criminal proceedings and issue of process against the accused was found proper as prima facie offences under ss 313, 448 and 506, IPC were made out, so the petition of the accused under s 482, CrPC, for quashing criminal proceedings was dismissed.[22]

5. Setting Aside of Erroneous order of Summoning of Accused Doctor

In a complaint case it is all the more necessary for the magistrate to first ensure that there was at least some sort of evidence on the basis of which summons against the doctors could be issued. Thus, where the magistrate has acted in haste and proceeded against a respectful doctor without caring to ask the complainant to substantiate his allegations as provided under s 200, CrPC, and summoned the doctor under ss 313 to 316, IPC, the summoning of the accused doctor was found palpably erroneous and illegal, so the High Court on a petition under s 482, CrPC, set aside the order of the magistrate summoning the doctor and the other accused and quashed the complaint.[23]

6. When Abetting Doctor not Made Co-accused--Effect

Where the accused persons brought the prosecutrix to clinic of doctor for termination of her pregnancy, though s 313, IPC makes person performing operation of termination of pregnancy without consent of prosecutrix responsible and liable under s 313 but the doctor was not made as the accused, the case of prosecution was that doctor performed operation on misrepresentation made by the accused persons and it was not the case of prosecution that the accused had abetted doctor in performing the operation, accused cannot be convicted under s 313 .[24]

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:2769

I (name and office of sessions judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the ....day of..., at...., you voluntarily caused AB (the woman who was miscarried), then being with child, to miscarry without her consent, such miscarriage not being caused by you in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the said AB, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 313 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Where the allegations against the accused-doctor were that she was negligent and careless while injecting needles twice, for performing abdominocentesis test, as a result of which the patient-pregnant woman had to undergo forced abortion as septicaemia had developed while performing the test, no consent of the patient and her spouse had been taken by the accused, required as per practice before conducting the test, the framing of charge under ss 313 / 269, IPC against the accused was found proper.

8. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(1) the woman in question was with a child;
(2) the accused caused her to miscarry;
(3) he did it voluntarily and without her consent; and
(4) such miscarriage was not caused in good faith in order to save the woman's life.

9. Conviction under Section 313 or Alternatively under Section 315 --Validity

Commentary under the same heading in s 315, post, may be referred to.

10. Sentence

Where the accused kicked the lady in the abdomen resulting in her abortion, and the occurrence took place two decades earlier, the sentence of the accused-lady was modified under s 313, IPC, from four years' rigorous imprisonment to two years rigorous imprisonment and also a fine of Rs 2000, in default of such payment, three months rigorous imprisonment.[25]

11. Alteration of Conviction from Section 314 to Section 313

Commentary under the same heading in s 314, post, may be referred to.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 314.

Death caused by act done with intent to cause miscarriage.--

Whoever, with intent to cause the miscarriage of a woman with child, does any act which causes the death of such woman, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine;2770

If act done without woman's consent.--And if the act is done without the consent of the woman, shall be punished either with [26][imprisonment for life], or with the punishment above mentioned.

Explanation.--It is not essential to this offence that the offender should know that the act is likely to cause death.

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section provides punishment for the offences mentioned in the preceding two sections, where death has occurred in causing miscarriage. A distinction is made in this section in awarding punishment, between an act done with the consent of the woman and an act done without such consent. The Explanation, added to the section, states that it is not essential to an offence under this section that the offender should know that the act was likely to cause death. If the death is caused by an act likely to cause death, it would be, at least, culpable homicide not amounting to murder and might even be murder if the act was of an eminently dangerous character. This section will, however, apply only where the act, done by the offender, or for which he is jointly responsible,[27]is the act which causes death. In Queen v Kalachan Gope ,[28] a poisonous drug administered to a woman to procure miscarriage, resulted in her death. It was not proved that the accused knew that the drug would be likely to cause death, etc. They were not held guilty of murder, but only for the offence under this section.

2. 'Miscarriage'

Commentary under same heading in s 312, ante, may be referred to.

3. 'With Intent to Cause the Miscarriage of a Woman with Child'

Under this section, miscarriage need not have taken place. However, the accused must have an intent to cause it by means of any act, as a result of which the death of the woman is caused. The act in question must cause death.

4. Common Intention

Commentary under s 34, vol 1, may be referred to.2771

To apply s 34, IPC, apart from the fact that there should be two or more accused, two factors must be established:

(i) common intention, and
(ii) participation of the accused in the commission of an offence.

If common intention is proved but no overt act is attributed to the individual-accused, s 34 will be attracted as it involves vicarious liability, but if participation of the accused in the crime is proved and common intention is absent, s 34 cannot be invoked, in every case, it is not possible to have direct evidence of common intention, it has to be inferred from the facts and circumstances of each case.[29]

Where the accused was alleged to have illicit relations with the deceased and took her to the clinic of the doctor with the intent to cause her miscarriage, the deceased woman died during abortion by the doctor who was not competent to terminate pregnancy of the deceased nor his clinic had the approval of the government under s 4 of the Termination of Pregnancy Act 1971, where even basic facilities for abortion were not available in his clinic, the act was done by accused persons in furtherance of their common intention so the accused was found rightly convicted under ss 314 / 34, IPC .[30]

5. Direct Nexus between Death and Act of the Accused

Nexus between acts done by the accused and death of the woman must be direct.[31]Where the deceased-woman had a love affair with the accused and they had also developed a physical relationship due to which the deceased became pregnant, the deceased was taken to the house of the accused, where the accused with the consent of the deceased administered crude mechanical means to induce abortion resulting in the rupture of blood vessels causing the death of the deceased, and the abortion-stick was also found in her body during post-mortem examination, and direct nexus between death of the deceased and act done by the accused was established, the accused also did not inform the police, the conviction of the accused under s 314, IPC, was therefore found proper.[32]

6. 'Consent'

'Consent' mitigates an offence.[33]

Commentary under same heading in s 90, vol 1, may be referred to.

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of sessions.

8. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:2772

> I (name and office of sessions judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That you, on or about the.....day of..... at..... with intent to cause the miscarriage of....(name the woman), did a certain act, to wit ..... which caused the death of the said..... and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 314 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

Accused Charged with Section 302 can be Convicted under Section 314

When the accused is charged under s 302 and not under s 314, but the broad facts necessary for charge under s 314 are incorporated in the charge under s 302 framed by the sessions court, the court can then convict the accused and sentence him under s 314 while acquitting him under s 302, even though the charge under s 314 was not framed against him.[34]

Accused Charged with Abetment with Co-Accused Person Cannot be Convicted for Abetment with Deceased Woman

In Madan Raj Bhandari v State of Rajasthan ,[35] the accused was charged and tried for an offence of abetting one R to cause abortion of the child in the womb of the deceased, but curiously enough he was convicted for abetting the deceased to cause her miscarriage. Throughout the trial, the accused was asked to defend himself against the said charge and, at no stage, he was asked that he would be tried for an offence of having abetted the deceased to cause her miscarriage. It was held that the accused was likely to have been prejudiced by the charge on the basis of which he was tried, and, therefore, the conviction of the accused under this section, read with s 109, IPC, was set aside.

9. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(1) the woman in question was with a child;
(2) the accused did an act with intent to cause her miscarriage;
(3) such act caused the death of the woman; and
(4) such act was done by the accused (if the case comes under the second clause) without the consent of the woman.

In the absence of any evidence from the prosecution side to the effect that the accused had the intent to cause the deceased's miscarriage resulting in her death, the accused cannot be convicted for the offence under s 314 .[36]

10. Probation

In V Manickam Pillai v State [37] on consideration that the accused being a government servant, in the event of sentence of imprisonment may lose her job, it was thought fit that an order under s 4(1) of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958, would meet the2773 ends of justice and she was, therefore, released on probation of good conduct for three years.

If a homeopath takes it upon his hand to operate on a pregnant lady, and perforate her uterus by trying to abort, he does not deserve the benefit of probation. It would have been a different matter if a trained surgeon while carrying out the operation in question with the consent of the lady, would have committed a mistake in judgment resulting in the death of the patient.[38]

11. Sentence

Where the accused had an illicit relation with the deceased and took her to a clinic with intent to cause her miscarriage where the doctor neither had the basic facilities nor the competency to cause miscarriage, and caused the death of the woman during abortion, the sentence of seven years imprisonment was found excessive which was reduced to one and a half years rigorous imprisonment but the sentence of fine of Rs 10000 was enhanced to Rs 25000, and in default the accused was to undergo further rigorous imprisonment for one year. It was also directed that in case fine is realised from the accused, the same shall be payable to the mother of the deceased.[39] Where the accused with the consent of the deceased administered or got administered crude mechanical means to induce an abortion which resulted in rupture of blood vessels causing death of the deceased, the sentence of imprisonment awarded to the accused was reduced from eight years rigorous imprisonment to five years rigorous imprisonment while maintaining the sentence of fine of Rs 1000 in default of payment of which the accused was to further undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months.[40]

12. Alteration of Conviction from Section 314 to Section 313

Where there was no proof that the death of the woman resulted due to miscarriage, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 314 to s 313, IPC .[41]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 315.

Act done with intent to prevent child being born alive or to cause it to die after birth.--

Whoever before the birth of any child does any act with the intention of thereby preventing that child from being born alive or causing it to die after its birth, and does by such act prevent that child from being born alive, or causing it to die after its birth, and does, by such act, prevent that child from being born alive, or causes it to die after its birth, shall, if such act be not caused in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the mother, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, or with fine, or with both.2774

Comments

1. Scope

Section 315 and s 316, IPC are intended for the protection of unborn children. If a man intending to prevent the birth of a living child, does any act, either through the medium of a miscarriage or otherwise, which prevents the child from being born alive or causes it to die after its birth, and if such act is not done in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the mother, he commits an offence under this section. If, however, without any special intention to injure the child, he injures the mother in such a way that she dies, he would be guilty of culpable homicide; then if his act causes the death of her quick unborn child, he commits an offence under s 316 .[42]

To attract the provisions of this section, the act or omission of the accused must be such that there should be prevention for the child to be born alive or must be caused to die after its death. The act or omission of the accused must be timed during the time when the child is in the womb of the mother. However, if a child is allowed to be born alive without any such act or omission and is killed thereafter, then it is homicide of an alive human being and s 302, IPC, would, then, be attracted.[43]

Intention is one of the major ingredients of s 315 . To attract and prove s 315, IPC, the act of the accused must have been done with the intent of causing the miscarriage of a woman with a child. The criminal liability envisaged by this section will not extend to a case where the abortion/miscarriage was caused by totally extraneous factors or ones which were not directly connected with it. The prosecution is required to prove beyond reasonable doubt that it was that very act which ultimately caused the miscarriage, that is, nexus between acts done by the accused and the miscarriage must be direct. The accused must be in the know of the fact that the lady was in the family way having pregnancy. In the instant case, nothing emerged if the appellant alleged to have hit the victim with leg, who was the brother-in-law of the victim, was aware of the pregnancy of the victim. The relations were strained to share this development with him specifically when the duration of pregnancy was very short. The occurrence had taken place all of a sudden when appellant's mother objected to her son P going upstairs with dirty shoes. Arrival of the complainant at the spot to intervene was not anticipated. In the scuffle she allegedly suffered a leg blow on her intervention. It did not cause any immediate pain or bleeding to the complainant. The prosecution was unable to establish that the abortion was the result of leg blow or that the criminal act of assault was done intentionally or deliberately to prevent the child from being born alive. The conviction of the appellant under s 315, IPC was not permissible and was not sustained.[44]

2. 'Before the Birth'

The words 'Before the Birth' used in the section means before the child is born or during the period the child was in womb of his mother.

3. 'Good Faith'

Commentary under s 52, vol 1, may be referred to.2775

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of sessions.

5. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of sessions judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the.....day of...., at...., you did an act, to wit..... before the birth of a child, with the intention of preventing that child from being born alive (or of causing it to die after its birth), and that act did prevent that child from being born alive (or caused it to die after its birth), and the said act was not done in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the mother, and you thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 315 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this Court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

6. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(1) the woman in question was with a child;
(2) the accused did an act, before the child was born, with the intention of preventing the child from being born alive or causing it to die after its birth;

(3) in consequence of the act the child was born dead or died after its birth; and
(4) the said act was not done in good faith to save the life of the mother of the child.

Where there was no medical evidence to show that the accused lady had either aborted by taking any drug or the child died immediately after birth due to administration of any drug to it, and it was not proved that abortion was unnatural, the evidence of the prosecution witnesses being full of contradictions and the extra-judicial confession of the accused was of no consequence in the absence of laboratory evidence, the accused were acquitted of the charge under s 315 read with s 34, IPC .[45]

7. Conviction under Section 313 or Alternatively under Section 315 --Validity

The law does not envisage or endorse conviction of a person under s 313 or in the alternative under s 315, IPC . Such conviction is itself an illegality vitiating the judgment.[46] Where there was no iota of legal evidence on record to substantiate the prosecution case, the conviction of the accused under s 313 or in the alternative under s 315 was found unjustified.[47]2776

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 316.

Causing death of quick unborn child by act amounting to culpable homicide.--

Whoever does any act under such circumstances, that if he thereby caused death he would be guilty of culpable homicide, and does by such act cause the death of a quick unborn child, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Illustration

A, knowing that he is likely to cause the death of a pregnant woman, does an act which, if it caused the death of the woman, would amount to culpable homicide. The woman is injured, but does not die; but the death of an unborn quick child with which she is pregnant is thereby caused. A is guilty of the offence defined in this section.

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

Under s 299, Explanation 3 of the IPC, the causing of the death of a child in the mother's womb is not homicide. Such killing is made punishable by ss 317 and 318, IPC, which deal with abandonment and secret disposal of the dead body of a child, born alive.

This section punishes the causing of death of a quick unborn child by an act amounting to culpable homicide.[48] This section has no application to a case where the act, attributed to the accused person, has resulted in the causing of death of a pregnant woman.[49] However, a man who assaults a pregnant woman with such violence that her death is a likely result, or sets fire to a house in which she happens to be, would be punishable under this section if the mother survives but gives birth to a dead child in consequence of her injuries or fright.[50]

2. 'Quick Unborn Child'

In order to hold a person guilty under s 316, IPC it must be established that the woman was quick with the unborn child. Neither the 'child' nor the quick unborn child has been defined under the IPC . However, on the basis of medical opinion and authorities, it has been held that a woman is considered to be with a child as soon as she becomes pregnant.

It is enough if the pregnancy and the intentional expulsion of immature contents of the uterus are established for the purpose of holding that the woman was with a child. Quickening is the name applied to peculiar sensations which are experienced by a woman after about four months of pregnancy. The symptoms are ascribed to the first perception of movements of the foetus which occur or the womb begins to rise out of the pelvis. These movements are perceptible to the mother before they are made2777 evident by an external examination. It is acknowledged that the woman starts feeling the movements of the foetus between 14 to 18 weeks of pregnancy.[51]

Accused was prosecuted on allegations that he assaulted a pregnant lady on her stomach causing death of the child. However, evidence showed that the child was born alive in the hospital and the child died later. The doctor who held medical examination of the victim was not examined in the case. Offence under s 316, IPC was found not proved, accused was acquitted of the charge.[52]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of sessions.

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of sessions judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the....day of..... at.....you did an act, to wit...., under circumstances, to wit...., that if you had thereby caused death, you would have been guilty of culpable homicide, and did, by such act, cause the death of a quick unborn child of AB and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 316 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

To established an offence under this section, it has to be proved[53] that:

(i) the woman was quick with a child;
(ii) the accused did an act to cause the death of such child;
(iii) the circumstances, under which the act was done, were such as to make the accused guilty of culpable homicide if death had been caused; and
(iv) the said act did cause the death of the quick unborn child.

The emphasis appears to be on the fact that the unborn child should have already been quick inside the womb of the mother.

Where the accused-husband had strained relations with the deceased-wife, and gave a single blow on the head of the deceased causing her death, and made no attempt to report the occurrence to the police and told other persons that his wife had committed suicide; the medical officer stated that in the uterus of the deceased there was a male body 20 weeks old and that 12 after weeks of conception, the foetus gets life, the charge for the offence under ss 302 and 316, IPC, was found proved against the accused-husband.[54]

Where the accused-husband caused the death of his pregnant wife, the motive of which was proved to be his illicit relations with his sister-in-law, the medical2778 evidence corroborated the prosecution case of the death of the deceased due to throttling, the accused and the deceased were present in the house of the accused on the date of the incident and slept adjacent to each other, the conviction of the accused under ss 302 and 316 was found proper.[55]

6. Separate Sentences under Section 302 and Section 316 --Permissibility

Where the accused is sentenced under s 302 for causing the death of a woman in an advanced stage of pregnancy and also for causing the death of her quick unborn child, then, even if a separate conviction is not open to exception, separate punishment would offend s 71, IPC .[56]

But a contrary view was taken by the Bombay High Court (Division Bench) where the conviction and sentence of the accused under ss 302 and 316 was found justified and proper.[57] However, when the accused are convicted under ss 302 / 34, IPC, and sentenced, it is not desirable to add sentences for the offence under s 316 and ss 498-A / 34, IPC .[58]

7. Alteration of Conviction from Section 316 to Section 323

Where a woman claimed to have been assaulted while she was pregnant with a quick unborn child, though the medical evidence indicated that she was pregnant for about three months and the woman did not state about the sensations which were likely to be felt in case of a quick unborn child/ the conviction of the accused under s 316 was not sustainable, however, they were guilty for causing hurt to the woman and convicted under s 323, IPC .[59]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 317.

Exposure and abandonment of child under twelve years by parent, or person having care of it.--

Whoever being the father or mother of a child under the age of twelve years, or having the care of such child, shall expose or leave such child in any place with the intention of wholly abandoning such child, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.--This section is not intended to prevent the trial of the offender for murder or culpable homicide, as the case may be, if the child die in consequence of the exposure.2779

Comments

1. Scope

This section renders punishable the act of anyone who, being the parent, or having the care, of a child under the age of 12 years, exposes it or leaves it in any place with the intention of wholly abandoning it.[60] The Explanation of this section indicates with clearness its scope and purview. It provides for the case of injuries, actually ensuing, that the guilty person shall be punished for the injury so inflicted according to the circumstances under which the injury is done, i.e., for murder or culpable homicide, as the case may be.[61] If the child dies, charges should be added under ss 302 and 304, IPC, and, in case of a conviction, a sentence in respect of the most serious offence proved should be passed.[62]

2. Object

The object of this section is the prevention of abandonment or desertion, by a parent, of his or her children of tender years in such manner that the children, not being able to take care of themselves, may run the risk of dying or being injured. The section implies that children, left without any protection, are the object of its provision.[63]

3. Gist of the Offence

The gist of this offence, therefore, is the exposure or leaving of the child in any place with the intention of wholly abandoning it.[64]

4. 'Being the Father or Mother of a Child...or Having the Care of Such Child'

The exposure or leaving must be the act of the father, mother or caretaker of the child, done with the intention of 'wholly abandoning such child'. Both the father and the mother are equally bound by ties of duty, whether the child be born out of wedlock or is illegitimate. An infant, requiring nurture, or a child of tender years, will ordinarily be in the immediate charge of the mother, the father's duty being that of providing for both the mother and the off spring. The person, who has the immediate care of the child, is the person contemplated. A parent, who is absent, but who has duly provided for the maintenance and protection of his child, would not be criminally answerable for its abandonment by the person in whose charge he had left it. The offence consists in the desertion of the child by a person, who is bound, by nature, to support and protect it, or who has taken on himself that duty, whether by adopting the child, or by way of contract with the parent, or in some other way.[65] A person, having the de facto possession of the child, has the care of the child for the purpose of the statute.[66] A person, receiving an infant from its mother on the distinct understanding that the mother never desired or wished to have the child back again, must, in law, be regarded as a person having the care of that child until he or she had transferred it to the care and custody of some other person or institution.[67]2780

5. 'Expose'

To 'expose' denotes laying open to danger or risk of some harm or injury of a bodily nature. The offence is the exposure to such risk and is wholly independent of the consequences of such exposure.[68] Likewise, the exposure, as contemplated by this section, must be one by which some danger to the life of the child may ensue. In order to make it an offence under this section, the child must have been exposed alive. If the child is dead, before exposing, or if the person exposing remains with the child till it is dead, or if the person exposing murders the child and then leaves its body somewhere, a case under this section is not made out.[69] A married woman, who eloped leaving her suckling baby, aged about a month and a half, in the house of her husband, was not held guilty of an offence under this section as she knew that her husband would surely take care of it.[70] A mother, who, being too ill to move, sends another to expose her child, is not guilty of an offence under this section as she is not the mother; nor can either of them be guilty of abetting the other.[71]

6. 'Leave'

Justice Fitzpatrick, in Re Bhuran,[72] observed that, in order to make the leaving of a child an offence under s 317, IPC, the child must be left without protection. Similarly, Blair J, in Empress v Mirchia ,[73] observed that 'leaving' cannot mean leaving in the large sense of abandonment; it must be construed in strict connection with the word 'exposure'. In Re Khairo,[74] a woman left her daughter's newly born baby with the sister of her son-in-law, who was absent from the place, saying that it was her brother's child, and the baby died shortly after her departure, it was held that the woman was not guilty of an offence under this section and that her daughter had not abetted any such offence.

7. 'In any Place'

The child need not necessarily be exposed to any particular danger; it may simply be left in any place, i.e., deprived of the protection necessary for one of tender age and place on its own resources.[75] Therefore, to leave a child in the care of someone, capable of protecting it, is not to leave such child 'in any place' although there is an intention to abandon it.[76] A mother, who leaves her child with a friendly stranger, in a crowded railway station, to mind for a few minutes and then decamps, does not leave the child 'in any place'; on the contrary, she leaves it in the custody of another person. It would be otherwise if she left the child alone in the crowd or if she had deserted the child in the jungle. A mother would, however, be liable to be punished under this section, and not under s 307, when she leaves her child in a place, which is quite close to a village and also near a public road where it is, in fact, shortly after being discovered.[77]2781

8. 'With the Intention of Wholly Abandoning Such Child'

The only intention, required to complete the offence under this section, is the intention of wholly abandoning the child. It is not necessary that there should be intention to abandon the child so as to endanger its life.[78]

To constitute abandonment contemplated by this section, the child must be left under circumstances where it would be deprived of the protection which the law considers due to it.[79] The section will not apply to a case of mere neglect or temporary abandonment.[80] In Empress v Mirchia ,[81]A, in order to get rid of her newly born illegitimate child, left it with B, a blind woman to take charge of it till she returns. A did not return. B protected the child. It was held that A had not exposed or left the child 'in any place' though she did intend to abandon it. A left her child at a certain spot with the intention of abandoning it, but in the expectation that the child would be found and cared for by the owner of a neighbouring house. A committed an offence under this section.[82]

9. 'In Consequence of the Exposure'

The Explanation to the section renders a party, abandoning a child, liable for murder or culpable homicide, as the case may be, 'if the child dies in consequence of the exposure', i.e., the Explanation, contemplates cases in which death is caused due to cold or some other result of exposure. Death must be the immediate, and not a remote consequence of the exposure. In Queen v Khodabux ,[83] a prisoner was proved to have taken the child away, shortly after its birth, and to have abandoned it in a thicket, not far from the house and footpath, and in a place where the villagers were in the habit of herding cattle. The child was found almost immediately after exposure and was taken into the village. Ineffectual means were used to feed it, but the child died (for want of sustenance) some six hours after. It was held that the prisoner was guilty of wholly abandoning the child, but not of murder.

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

11. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the.....day of..... you, being the father (or mother, or person having the care) of the child, named..... which was then aged under twelve years exposed (or left) it, in a certain place, to wit..... with the intention of wholly abandoning it, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 317 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.2782

12. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(1) the accused is the father or mother, or the person having the care, of the child in question;
(2) the child is under 12 years of age;
(3) he or she exposed or left such child in a certain place; and
(4) he or she so exposed or left the child with the intention of wholly abandoning it.

Before any person can be convicted of an offence punishable under this section, it is incumbent on the prosecution to prove, beyond all reasonable doubt, that such person has exposed (or left) a child under the age of 12 years in some place with the intention of wholly abandoning it.[84] The prosecution cannot expect a conviction of the accused at the hands of the court unless and until it proves its case beyond all reasonable doubt. Where the prosecution alleges perfect ignorance of the actual occurrence, the explanation given by the accused cannot be lightly put off.[85]

1. Scope and Applicability

This section punishes a person for secretly burying, or otherwise disposing of, the dead body of a child and, also for intentionally concealing, or endeavouring to conceal, the birth of such child.[86]It is important to note that it is the act of secretly2783 disposing of the dead body of the child with the intention of concealing its birth, and not with the intention of concealing the death of the child, that is made punishable under this section.[87] Where a woman gives her newly born illegitimate child to another woman with instructions to dispose of it secretly and the latter carries out the instructions by throwing it in a river, the mother cannot be convicted of the substantive offence under this section though her offence can more appropriately come under the definition of abetment.[88]

The application of this section is not, like s 317, IPC, limited to parents and persons having the care of children. The section is so framed as to include every person who conceals or endeavours to conceal the birth of a child; it is quite immaterial whether there be any evidence against the mother or not. 'A person, assisting the mother in concealing a birth, will come within the terms of this section as a principal',[89] and not as an abettor.

2. Object

Section 318, IPC, like the previous one, is intended to prevent infanticide and penalise the disposal of the corpse to prevent detection of the infanticide. Mayne, in his Criminal Law[90] observes that this section is designed to meet the case of illegitimate children which is probably the only case in which such concealment would be attempted. A woman is not bound to announce that she is going to have a child, and if the child lives, she is at liberty to keep its existence secret. However, if it is born dead, or dies after its birth, the dead body must not be concealed by getting rid of it privately.

3. Ingredients of an Offence under this Section

This section lays down two essential ingredients of the offence, and they are:

(i) the secret burial or disposal, in any manner, of the dead body of a child, whether such child died before, during, or after, its birth; and
(ii) the intention to conceal the birth of such child by such act of burial or disposal.

The first ingredient specifies the act and the second ingredient specifies the intention that should permeate the act. The act is the means through which a certain end is to be achieved, the end being to conceal the birth of the child. The act, thus, forms the foundation on which the fabric of intention stands.[91] A person does not commit the offence of endeavouring to conceal the birth of a child if such person puts it, while it is still alive, in a place of concealment even though it may subsequently die.[92]

4. 'Secretly Burying or Otherwise Disposing'

In order to constitute an offence under this section, there must be a secret burial, or disposal, of the dead body. The disposal need not necessarily be a final disposal. It is sufficient if the body be temporarily concealed with the intention of removing it2784 elsewhere when opportunity offers.[1] There must be a secret disposition of the body; an offence under this section is not committed when the body is left in a public place.[2] Throwing the dead body of a child on a botora, or dung heap, close to a public road, is not secretly disposing of the body within the meaning of this section.[3] However, putting the body into a pit would be a secret disposal.[4]

5. 'Of the Dead Body'

In order to convict a woman of attempting to conceal the birth of her child, the dead body must be found and identified as that of the child which she is alleged to have delivered.[5]

6. Recovery of Dead Body of Child at the Instance of Accused

Recovery of the dead body of a child at the instance of the accused only shows that the accused knew the spot. There can be no inference that the accused had buried it in order to conceal it.[6] However, where the dead body of a child was recovered from inside the quarter of the accused, who was present in the house from the moment the child was born till the time of discovery of its dead body, the accused was held guilty of the offence punishable under this section read with s 201 .[7]

In the instant case mother AI had shown the place where the dead body of her infant child was lying. She had concealed the birth of the child by secret disposal of the dead body, she was convicted under s 318, IPC .[8]

7. 'Of a Child'

The word 'child' is not defined in the IPC . A mere foetus of a few months formation is not a child within the meaning of this section.[9] To support a conviction under this section, it is sufficient to show that a child was born and that the child was sufficiently developed to have lived if born alive.[10]

8. 'Whether Such Child Dies Before, or After, or During, its Birth'

The offence contemplated by this section becomes complete when the accused conceals the birth of her child by burying its body, independently of the question 'whether such child dies before, or after, or during, its birth'.[11]

9. 'Intentionally Conceals or Endeavours to Conceal the Birth of Such Child'

The concealment, sought to be checked by this type of legislation, is that which would keep the world at large in ignorance of the birth of a child.[12] Where the birth of the child was known to most of the villagers in the village, it was held that no2785 inference could be drawn that the disposing of the body of that child was with the intention of concealing the birth of that child within the meaning of the expression in this section.[13] Where a woman was found to have delivered a dead child and to have left it at the place of its birth, which was in the compound of her house, and to have told no one of the birth, she could not be convicted of an offence under this section as there was no secret burying, or otherwise disposing of the dead body of the child.[14]

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

11. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[15]

12. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(1) the birth of a child, and not a mere foetus;

(2) its death before, during, or after, its birth;
(3) the accused buried, or otherwise disposed of, the dead body of the child;
(4) such burial or disposal was done secretly; and
(5) in so doing, his, or her, intention was to conceal its birth.

13. Evidence Not Believed for Section 302 Should Not be Believed for Section 318

The same evidence which has not been believed for an offence of murder should not be believed for an offence under s 318, IPC, when there is no eyewitness to show that the accused herself came to charwada and secretly buried the body of the child there. The fact that the accused absconded soon after the incident is not sufficient to base a conviction under s 318 . Even grave suspicion against the accused cannot be taken to be a substitute for proof.[16]

Hurt.--

Whoever causes bodily pain, disease or infirmity to any person is said to cause hurt.

Comments

1. Scope

Section 319 of the IPC, gives the definition of hurt. It defines that whoever causes bodily pain, disease or infirmity to any person is said to cause hurt. Section 323 of2786 the IPC provides that whoever except in the case provided for by s 34, of the IPC voluntarily causes hurt shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both. Therefore, when a complaint in respect of offences punishable under provisions of sections of IPC has been presented before the court, the court is bound to make a scrutiny of the material which has been placed before it for the purpose of finding out whether any prima facie case has been made out showing commission of offence punishable under provisions of IPC or any other penal law. The court should not mechanically issue the process whenever complaint has been presented before the magistrate. The court has to make the scrutiny qua definition given by the penal provisions of the relevant law brought in picture by allegations made in the complaint.[17]Where there was absolutely no allegation in the complaint that accused persons committed any act for the purpose of causing any bodily pain, disease or infirmity as contemplated by the provisions of s 319 of the IPC, when that was so there was no question of issuing process against them for the offence punishable under s 323 of the IPC .[18]

Sections from s 319 onwards relating to hurt do not postulate death as the end result of the alleged act.[19]

2. 'Causes Bodily Pain'

A person, causing bodily pain to another, is said to cause 'hurt'. However, it is not necessary that the hurt should be caused by direct physical contact between the accused and his victim.[20] If a person, by administration of a drug, is thrown into delirium, with the possible risk of falling into coma and becoming unconscious for the time being, it is clear that both bodily pain and infirmity is caused.[21] It may be remembered that bodily pain or infirmity may either be permanent or temporary.[22]

Swelling amounts to hurt. Swelling necessarily causes bodily pain and as such the injury amounts to hurt within the meaning of s 319 .[23]

3. 'Infirmity'

Infirmity denotes an unsound or unhealthy state of the body or mind, and clearly a state of temporary mental impairment or hysteria or terror would constitute infirmity within the meaning of this expressions in this section.[24] It is an inability of an organ to perform its normal function, whether temporarily or permanently.[25]

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 320.

Grievous hurt.--

The following kinds of hurt only are designated as "grievous":

First.--Emasculation

Secondly.--Permanent privation of the sight of either eye.2787

Thirdly.--Permanent privation of the hearing of either ear.

Fourthy.--Privation of any member or joint.

Fifthly.--Destruction or permanent imparing of the powers of any member or joint.

Sixthly.--Permanent disfiguration of the head or face.

Seventhly.--Fracture or dislocation of a bone or tooth.

Eighthly.--Any hurt which endangers life or which causes the sufferer to be during the space of twenty days in severe bodily pain, or unable to follow his ordinary pursuits.

Comments

1. Scope

The previous section having defined 'simple hurt', this section should logically have defined 'grievous hurt' which is an aggravated form of hurt. However, the framers of the IPC found it difficult to draw a line between the two forms of hurt, and, following art 309 of the French Penal Code, enumerated eight kinds of hurt and designated them as 'grievous'. They observed:

> We have found it very difficult to draw a line between those bodily hurts, which are serious, and those which are slight. To draw such a line with perfect accuracy is, indeed, absolutely impossible; but it is far better that such a line should be drawn, though rudely, than that offences, some of which approach in enormity to murder, while others are little more than frolics which a good natured man would hardly resent, should be classed together.....Who have, therefore, designated certain kinds of hurt as grievous.

Before a conviction can be passed for the offence of grievous hurt, one of the injuries, defined in this section; must be strictly proved.[26] To make out a case of grievous hurt, therefore, there must be evidence to show that hurt was caused and that it came within one or more of the eight kinds of hurt enumerated in this section. If a man died of a blow, it must have been a violent blow, but that is not technically the same as grievous hurt.[27] A surgical injury for curing diseases cannot be said to be injury caused voluntarily, punishable under s 326, or else every surgeon will be guilty of an offence under s 326 .[28] It should be remembered that it is the court that2788 has to decide whether a bodily injury constitutes hurt or grievous hurt. It is not the duty of a medical witness to classify a hurt; he is simply to describe the facts.[29]

2. Strict Construction of the Section

Some hurts which are not like those hurts which are mentioned in the first seven clauses, are obviously distinguished from a slight hurt, may nevertheless be more serious. Thus, a wound may cause intense pain, prolonged disease or lasting injury to the victim, although it does not fall within any of the first seven clauses. Before a conviction for the sentence of grievous hurt can be passed, one of the injuries defined in s 320, IPC must be strictly proved and the eighth clause is no exception to the general rule of law that a penal statute must be construed strictly.[30]

3. 'First--Emasculation'

Emasculation means depriving a person of masculine vigour, castration. Emasculation naturally applies only to a man. This clause was inserted to counteract the practice, common in this country, for women to squeeze men's testicles on the slightest provocation.

4. 'Secondly--Permanent Privation of the Sight of Either Eye'

An injury of equal gravity is the permanent privation of the sight of either eye, the effect of which would be depriving the person of the use of his one or both eyes permanently. The gravity of such an injury lies in its permanency because it deprives a man of the use of his sight and also disfigures him.

5. 'Thirdly--Permanent Privation of the Hearing of Either Ear'

This injury also is classified as grievous injury because it deprives a man of his sense of hearing. Such injury is caused by a stemming blow, given on the head, ear, or those parts of the head which communicate with and injure the tympanum or other auditory nerves, caused by thrusting something into the ear or putting into it, some such substance which causes deafness.

6. 'Fourthly--Privation of any Member or Joint'

This injury is also classified as a grievous injury whereby a man is rendered less able to defend himself or to annoy his adversary. The term 'member', as used here, means nothing more than an organ or a limb, being a part of a man, capable of performing a distinct function. As such, it includes eyes, ears, nose, mouth, hands, feet and, in fact, all distinct parts of the human body designed to perform a distinct offence. A 'joint' is a place where two of more bones or muscles join. Similarly, there are well known joints in human anatomy at the lower jaw, shoulder, elbow, wrist, thumb, hip, knee and great toe. All these joints are in the nature of hinges which perform a similar function.[31]2789

7. 'Fifthly--Destruction or Permanent Impairing of the Powers of any Member or Joint'

The use of limbs and joints of the body are very essential to the discharge of normal functions of the body in the ordinary course of life. Their deprivation entails lifelong crippling and makes the person defenceless and miserable. The law has classified the destruction or permanent impairing of the powers of any member or joint as grievous hurt as it causes great hardship to the human body by its retention without normal function which is like amputation.

8. 'Sixthly--Permanent Disfiguration of the Head or Face'

The word 'disfigure', in this section, means to do a man some external injury which detracts from his personal appearance, but does not weaken him, as the cutting off a man's nose or ears.[32] Branding a girl's cheeks with a red hot iron, which leaves scars of a permanent character, amounts to disfigurement.[33] Likewise, is the case when acid is thrown on victim girls causing disfigurement of their faces.[34] A cut on the bridge of the nose of a girl, caused by a sharp weapon like a razor or knife has been held to be permanent disfigurement within the meaning of this section even though the internal wall, separating the nostrils, is intact. [35]Section 320, IPC clearly lays down that injuries caused by way of permanent disfiguration of head or face will be grievous in nature and even though doctor has come to a finding that injuries are simple but in fact as per provision as laid down in s 320, IPC, this injury will definitely be grievous in nature.[36]

9. 'Seventhly--Fracture or Dislocation of a Bone or Tooth'

The term 'fracture' has not been defined in IPC . In Maung Po Yi v Ma E Tin ,[37] it was held that the primary meaning of the word 'fracture' is breaking, though it is not necessary in the case of a fracture of skull bone that it should be divided into two separate parts because it may consist merely of a crack; but if it is a crack, it must be a crack which extends from the outer surface of the skull to the inner surface, which means the entire depth of the bone, it does not amount to a fracture. The Patna High Court has also held that where the evidence is merely that a bone has been cut and there is nothing to indicate the extent of the cut, whether it is deep or a mere scratch upon the surface, it is impossible to infer from that evidence alone that grievous hurt has been caused within the meaning of this section.[38] However, the said two cases have not been followed fully in a later decision in Kalya v State ,[39] where the view, expressed in this case, is stated thus:

> Ordinarily, fracture means breaking of a bone. Fissured fracture is one, in which there is no displacement of the fragments, and this condition may be caused by direct or indirect violence, usually resulting from a fall or a blow from a blunt object. These fissures may extend far and wide from the point struck, may implicate one or both tables, and not infrequently run down into the base. A scratch or a cut, which does not go across the2790 bone, cannot be > said to be a fracture of a bone within the meaning of s 320 . Both outer and the inner tables of the skull bone may be considered to be bones by themselves and fracture of outer or the inner table by itself can be taken to be a fracture of a bone within the meaning of s 320 . A crack, which does not involve both the tables of the skull bone, may amount to a fracture of a bone. A fissured fracture of the outer table of the skull bone would, therefore, bring the case within the definition of a grievous hurt. It would, thus, appear that both the outer and the inner tables of the skull bone are bones by themselves and fracture of outer or the inner table, by itself, will be a fracture of a bone within the meaning of this section.[40]

The Supreme Court has, in a later case, said in unambiguous term, that it is not necessary that a bone should be cut through and through or that the crack must extend from the outer to the inner surface or that there should be displacement of any fragment of the bone. If there is a break by cutting or splintering of the bone, or there is a rupture or fissure in it, it would amount to a fracture.[41] It cannot, therefore, be said that unless the crack extends to the inner side, the hurt cannot be said to be grievous within the meaning of this section. There can be a cut, though the division or split resulting from the cut need not be complete. If, however, a cut results only in a scratch and does not go deep in length into the bone, it will not be a fracture; otherwise, it should be deemed to be one.[42] In the absence of the extent of the cut, fracture or dislocation, the injury cannot, therefore, be designated as grievous.[43] Where the result of a joint attack by several persons on one party is a fracture of the arm of the party assaulted, the offence committed is grievous hurt, and not assault.[44]

The dictionary meaning of 'dislocation' is displacement or putting out of joint or derangement. A mere statement, that 'the four teeth were loose', is not sufficient to even make it an injury, much less make it a grievous injury within the meaning of this section. It has to be proved that there was fracture or dislocation by the injury.[45]

10. 'Eighthly--Any Hurt...his Ordinary Pursuits'

Under this clause, three different classes of hurt are designated as dangerous. They are:

Any hurt:

(1) which endangers life, or
(2) which causes the sufferer to be, during the space of twenty days, in severe bodily pain, or
(3) which causes the sufferer to be, during the space of twenty days, unable to follow his ordinary pursuits.[46]

The said three classes are independent of each other; a hurt of any of the three classes would be grievous hurt under this clause. An injury, which endangers life, may, unless it results in instantaneous death, also causes severe bodily pain for twenty days; but an injury, which causes such pain, may not be dangerous to life and it may2791 still be grievous hurt under this clause. Where a woman by reason of certain injuries inflicted on her, was confined to a hospital for only seventeen days, but her life was in danger for three days, it was held that her injuries amounted to grievous hurt.[47] However, where the medical evidence does not reveal that the abdomen injury had endangered the life of the victim, there can be no conviction by virtue of this clause.[48] An injury, even if called by the medical witness to be a grievous one, may still not satisfy the ingredients of s 320 .[49]

11. 'Any Hurt Which Endangers Life'

This phrase is not intended to apply to cases in which life is not only endangered, but is also actually taken away.[50] The line between culpable homicide not amounting to murder and grievous hurt is a very thin and subtle one. In one case, the injuries must be such as are likely to cause death; in the other, the injuries must be such as which endanger life.[51] A wound on the neck is dangerous to life within the meaning of cl 8 and, therefore, grievous.[52] Where, in the course of an altercation the appellant stabbed the deceased on the left forearm with a knife, piercing the radial artery, causing hemorrhage, and resulting in the death of the deceased, it was held that the offence was neither murder, nor culpable homicide not amounting to murder, as the forearm was not a vital part of the body, he could be guilty of voluntarily causing grievous hurt with a deadly weapon because he must have known when he stabbed the deceased that he was likely to cause grievous hurt.[53]

An injury which endangers life means that the injury which is actually found should itself be such that it may put the life of the injured in danger. A simple injury cannot be called grievous simply because it happens to be caused on a vital part of the body, unless the nature and dimensions of the injury, or its effects, are such that in the opinion of the doctor, it actually endangers the life of the victim.[54] However, an injury 'dangerous to life' is synonymous with an injury 'which endangers life'.[55] The expression 'dangerous' is an adjective while the expression 'endangers' a verb. An injury which can put life in immediate danger of death, would be an injury which can be termed as 'dangerous to life' and, therefore, when a doctor describes an injury as 'dangerous to life', he means an injury which 'endangers life' in terms of cl (8) of s 320, IPC, because he describes the injury 'dangerous to life' only for the purpose of the said clause. Both expressions have, thus, the same meaning.[56] A vital difference between the expressions 'dangerous to life' and 'could have been dangerous to life' was, however, pointed out, in the case of Karnail Singh v Nihal Singh ,[57] by saying that what the latter expression connotes is that the injury may, or may not, be2792 dangerous to life. A large number of injuries with a hot iron chimta in the belief of driving out evil spirits, will certainly endanger life of the victim.[58] Similarly, the thrusting of a lathi into the anus of a man has been held to be the causing of a grievous hurt which endangers life.[59] However, the mere administration of a deleterious drug to a person in order to render him insensible is not causing grievous hurt even though it may cause death in some cases if the drug is administered in large doses. If, in a particular case, the life of the party to whom the drug has been administered has not been endangered, it is not a case of grievous hurt,[60] but the administration of poisonous prasad has been held to be causing grievous hurt.[61]

12. Medical Jurisprudence on Injuries Dangerous to Life

Taylor, in Principles and Practice of Medical Jurisprudence,[62] stated thus:

> The meaning of the words 'dangerous to life' is left entirely to the professional knowledge of a witness. It is not sufficient that he should make a simple assertion that the wound was dangerous to life; he must be prepared to state, to the court, satisfactory reasons for this opinion, and these reasons may be rigorously inquired into by counsel for the defence.

Danger to life primarily depends upon haemorrhage, shock or damage to a vital organ, and secondly on the chance of complications such as infection leading to septicaemis, payemia, tetanus or gas gangrene and of infection of particular parts of tissues-pneumonia, pleurisy, empyema, pericariditis, meningitis or peritonitis or more remotely to the effects of scrarring, causing structure (of the urethra, oesophagus, gas, etc.) paralysis, urinary infection, etc.

Modi, in Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology,[63] states:

> Danger to life should be imminent before the injuries are designated 'dangerous to life'. Such injuries are extensive, and implicate important structures or organs, so that they may prove fatal in the absence of surgical aid. For instance, a compound fracture of the skull, a wound of a large artery, or rupture of some internal organ, such as the spleen, should be considered 'dangerous to life'. But the injuries, which prove fatal remotely by intercurrent diseases, such as tetanus, erysipelas, etc, should not be considered as dangerous.

The above extracts clearly reveal:

(1) That danger to life from an injury should be imminent to constitute as grievous. Haemorrhage, shock or injuries, implicating important structures or organs, are instances of injuries causing imminent danger. Extensiveness of the injuries may also cause imminent danger. Injuries, which only cause remote danger to life, cannot be treated as dangerous to life.

(2) That the concept of an injury dangerous to life cannot in the very nature of things be very precise. While there may be cases which can be easily placed either in the category of injury dangerous to life or in some other category, there may be marginal and border line cases where it may be very2793 difficult to categorise the injuries as dangerous to life, or not, and, in such cases, the medical experts may also differ.

(3) That the concept of injury dangerous to life, being not very precise, it is necessary that the medical witness should not remain content with making bald statement that the injury, in a particular case, is dangerous to human life. He should place all the relevant data, namely whether the injury caused haemorrhage or shock or implicated important structures or organs or was very extensive or otherwise caused imminent danger, and should also state the various grounds on which he considers the injury to be a dangerous one.

(4) That in arriving at the finding, whether an injury is dangerous to human life, the court should apply its mind to all the relevant data, brought on record, and to the reasons given by the medical witness or witnesses and record its finding, after an overall consideration of the materials on record, giving reasons for its conclusion.[64]

13. 'Which Causes the Sufferer to be, during the Space of Twenty Days, in Severe Bodily Pain or unable to follow his Ordinary Pursuits'

With regard to this, the authors of the IPC say that the length of time during which a sufferer is in pain, diseased or incapacitated from pursuing his ordinary avocations, though a defective criterion of the severity of a hurt, is still the best criterion that has ever been devised. It is a criterion which may be employed not merely in cases where violence has been used, but also in cases where hurt has been caused without any assault such as by the administration of drugs, the setting of traps, the digging of pitfalls, the placing of ropes across a road.

Though it is difficult to prove that an injured person was in severe bodily pain for a period of twenty days, yet it is easier to prove that he was on account of the hurt unable to follow his ordinary pursuits. This must, however, be strictly proved.[65] When the victim was hospitalised for 23 days before her death, the accused was held liable to be convicted under s 326, IPC .[66] Where the evidence was that the injured man 'had to be kept treated in the hospital as an in-patient for 45 days', but the medical witness stated, in evidence, that, after 14 days the injured man could have been discharged and that after that period he was in a position to attend to his ordinary avocations in life, it was held that the hurt was not a grievous one.[67] It is only a disability for 20 days that constitutes grievous hurt. A disability for a fortnight constitutes only simple hurt.[68] It was observed, in Empress v Vasta Chela ,[69] that though an injured man may be quite capable of following his ordinary pursuits long before twenty days are over, yet he may, for the sake of permanent recovery of greater ease or comfort, be willing to remain as a convalescent in a hospital, especially if he is fed at public expense. In such a case, the opinion of the medical2794 officer attending on him on the point of his ability is very important. Similarly, the medical evidence is more reliable, but it is not legally necessary because the law does not say that the injured must get himself admitted inside the hospital.[70] The mere fact that the sufferer did not attend to his duty for the statutory period,[71] or that he or she was in hospital for twenty days,[72] is no indication of his inability to do so.

Voluntarily causing hurt.--

Whoever does any act with the intention of thereby causing hurt to any person, or with the knowledge that he is likely thereby to cause hurt to any person, and does thereby cause hurt to any person, is said "voluntarily to cause hurt".

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines 'voluntarily causing hurt' which is an offence made punishable under s 323, IPC . Almost every other offence has two elements, viz, actus reus and mens rea. It is only a certain kind of act and certain intent or knowledge that makes an offence. What constitutes a particular offence depends not only upon the nature of the act done (actus reus), but also upon the nature of the intention or knowledge (mens rea) with which it is done. Section 319 described the nature of the *actus reus*or act, which would constitute the offence of voluntarily causing hurt, punishable under s 323, and this section describes the mens rea, or the intention or knowledge, necessary to constitute that offence. The *mens rea*required to constitute the offence punishable under s 323 is either the intention of causing such hurt as is described in s 319, or the knowledge that, by this act, the offender is likely to cause such hurt. If the actus reus described in s 319 and the mens rea, described in this section are present, the two together would constitute the offence which is compendiously called 'voluntarily causing hurt', and is made punishable under s 323 .

2. 'Voluntarily'

Commentary under s 39, vol 1, may be referred to.

The word 'voluntarily', in connection with causing hurt, does not bear quite so wide a meaning as it does in general in IPC, an effect is said to be caused 'voluntarily' if it is either intended or is known to be likely, or if the doer of the act in question has reason to believe that effect to be likely to happen. In this section (and in s 322, IPC), the word is restricted in meaning to intention or knowledge, and does not, therefore, include a case of causing hurt by an act which the doer has only reason to believe to be likely to cause hurt (for which refer to ss 337 and 338, IPC). That the hurt was caused 'voluntarily', in the above sense, is of the very essence of the offence,[73] and a verdict of 'guilty of causing hurt, but not2795 voluntarily' is in effect a verdict of 'not guilty'. However, surgical injury for curing diseases cannot be said to be injury caused voluntarily punishable under s 326 .[74]

3. 'To any Person'

The person actually hurt need not necessarily be the person who was intended to be hurt, e.g., A aims a blow at B, a woman who is carrying a child in her arms, and, failing to hurt B, hits the child.[75]

Voluntarily causing grievous hurt.--

Whoever voluntarily causes hurt, if the hurt which he intends to cause or knows himself to be likely to cause is grievous hurt, and if the hurt which he causes is grievous hurt, is said "voluntarily to cause grievous hurt".

Explanation.--A person is not said voluntarily to cause grievous hurt except when he both causes grievous hurt and intends or knows himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt. But he is said voluntarily to cause grievous hurt if, intending or knowing himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt of one kind, he actually causes grievous hurt of another kind.

Illustration

A, intending or knowing himself to be likely permanently to disfigure Z's face, gives Z a blow which does not permanently disfigure Z's face, but which causes Z to suffer severe bodily pain for the space of twenty days. A has voluntarily caused grievous hurt.

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines 'voluntarily causing grievous hurt' which is an offence punishable under s 325, IPC . To make out an offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt, there must be some specific hurt, voluntarily inflicted, and coming within some of the eight kinds, enumerated in s 320 .[76]

In order to determine whether the offence has been committed, both the nature and extent of the hurt caused and the intention or knowledge of the offender have to be taken into account.[77] The court has to see that the accused intended to cause grievous hurt, or that he knew that grievous hurt was likely to be caused, and that such grievous hurt was actually caused.[78]

2. 'Voluntarily'

Commentary under same heading in s 321, ante and commentary under s 39, vol 1, may be referred to.2796

3. Explanation

The explanation to this section really unfolds the significance of the expression 'voluntarily to cause grievous hurt'. It states, in clear terms, that the offence of grievous hurt is not caused unless the offender both causes grievous hurt and intends, or knows himself to be likely, to cause grievous hurt.[79] It will appear from a perusal of s 325, IPC, read with this section, that the essential ingredients of the offence of causing grievous hurt are three,[80] which are as follows:

(1) Grievous hurt as described in s 320, IPC, must first be caused. If the hurt, actually caused is simple, a person cannot be held guilty of voluntarily causing grievous hurt even if it was in his contemplation.[81]
(2) The offender intended, or knew himself to be likely, to cause grievous hurt. If he intended, or knew himself likely, to cause only simple hurt, he cannot be convicted for the offence under s 325 even if the resultant hurt was grievous.[82] In other words, to constitute the offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt, there must be complete correspondence between the result and the intention.[83]
(3) The hurt was caused voluntarily. In other words, the causation of the grievous hurt was either in contemplation or was the likely result of the act done.

In order that a person may be held guilty of an offence of causing grievous hurt, it must be proved that he either intended, or knew himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt, and not otherwise.[84] And even if the necessary intention is not proved, the requirement of the explanation will stand satisfied if the offender is shown to have the knowledge that, by his act, he was likely to cause grievous hurt.[85] When a man strikes a woman with a child in her arms, on that part of her person which is close to the head of the child, it is impossible to say that he does not know that he is likely to cause grievous hurt to the child.[86] A violent blow inflicted upon the body indicates an intention to cause grievous hurt.[87]

4. Determination of Nature of Injury

In the nature of the things, it is difficult to obtain direct proof of what the offender thought was likely to happen. In all cases, it is really a question of inference from the nature of the act committed by the offender, his conduct and the surrounding circumstances of the case. When the act, that he did in the process of causing hurt, is such as any person of ordinary prudence knows it likely to cause grievous hurt, he may safely be taken to have intended to cause grievous hurt or, at least, to have contemplated grievous hurt as likely to occur. If the act was such that nothing more than simple hurt could reasonably be thought likely to ensue from it, then, although2797 grievous hurt may unexpectedly have ensued, the offender can be convicted of simple hurt only, assuming that grievous hurt was not in his contemplation. The means by which the injury is caused are not the true criterion. If it were so, however grievous an injury may be, the provision of s 325 will not be attracted if no weapon were used in causing it. The answer really depends upon the nature of the injury caused and the manner in which the blows were administered, whether by fists and slaps or by a weapon.[88]

Punishment for voluntarily causing hurt.--

Whoever, except in the case provided for by section 334, voluntarily causes hurt, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

Section 319, IPC defines 'hurt' and s 321, IPC defines 'voluntarily causing hurt'. This section declares such voluntarily causing hurt to be an offence and prescribes a punishment for it. It makes an exception only in cases provided for by s 334, IPC,2798*i.e.*, 'voluntarily causing hurt on provocation', for which a much lighter punishment is provided. Section 337 , IPC also prescribes a lighter punishment for causing hurt, but there the hurt caused is not voluntarily, but by doing an act rashly or negligently. Sections 324 , 327, 328 and 394, IPC also prescribe punishment for voluntarily causing hurt, but they prescribe heavier punishment if the hurt is caused in aggravating circumstances, while this section prescribes a punishment for voluntarily causing simple hurt when there are no aggravating circumstances. It may be noted that even the voluntary causing of hurt would not be an offence if the harm caused is so slight that no person of ordinary sense and temper would complain of such harm.[89] In this regard s 95, IPC may also be referred to. Similarly, it would not be an offence if any of the general exceptions applies to it. Thus, a person causing hurt in the exercise of the right of private defence of person or property, cannot be convicted of an offence under this section.[90] Where the accused caused slight injury while rescuing persons who were unlawfully detained, it was held that he could not convicted of causing hurt under this section.[91]

2. 'Whoever'

Where hurt is caused, it is only the person, who voluntarily caused it, who is directly liable for it under this section. Others, who have not actually caused the hurt, can only be held liable constructively under this section, read with s 34 or s 149, if any of those sections apply.[92] Thus, where the common object of an unlawful assembly was to give a beating and if there was any resistance to their taking away the buffaloes, and, in prosecution of that common object, some members of the assembly gave a beating, all its members would be liable for the beating under this section read with s 149 .[93] However, if the common object of a party is only to rescue a person, and not to beat anybody, there is no unlawful assembly, and if some members of the party, in effecting the rescue, cause hurt, only they can be held liable under this section, and not the other members of the party.[94] Where the common object of the assembly was to chastise the owners for certain trespassing cattle, but one of the members caused death by beating, it was held that the other members who caused only simple hurt, could be held guilty only of the offence under this section.[95] However, merely because the charge under s 34, IPC, is not established, it does not debar the court from convicting the accused under s 323 simpliciter if an offence under it is established and proved.[96]

3. Essential Ingredients

Reading this section with ss 319 and 321, IPC, it would appear that the essential ingredients of the offence under this section are that:

(1) hurt, as described in s 319, must be actually caused; and2799
(2) it must be caused with the intention of causing it or with knowledge of its being likely to be caused.

If hurt actually caused is simple, a person cannot be held guilty of voluntarily causing grievous hurt even if it was in his contemplation.[1]

If he intended, or knew himself to be likely to cause only simple hurt, he cannot be convicted for the offence under s 325 even if the resultant hurt was grievous. In other words, to constitute the offence of voluntarily causing hurt, there must be complete correspondence between the result and the intention or the knowledge of the accused.[2]

To constitute offence of voluntarily causing hurt punishable under s 323, IPC, the act attributed to the accused must have caused hurt as defined in s 319, IPC .[3] Where during scuffle between the accused and the injured, the latter fell down over stone and received injuries over shoulder and back, the accused would not be guilty of offence under s 323, IPC .[4]

4. 'Voluntarily'

Commentary under the same heading in s 321, ante, and also commentary under s 39, vol 1, may be referred to.

5. 'Hurt'

Commentary under s 319, ante, may be referred to.

6. Illustrative Cases

(a) School Master's Liability

In the case of a pupil under twelve years of age, a schoolmaster, chastising him, is protected under s 89 of IPC, from prosecution under this section. In Emperor v Maung Ba Thaung ,[5]a schoolmaster was prosecuted under this section for caning a schoolboy under his charge. It was not suggested that the schoolmaster was actuated by improper motives or that he was not acting bonafide in the interest of the school discipline or that the punishment was unduly excessive. It was held that the schoolmaster had committed no offence. The act of a schoolmaster in administering corporal punishment to a pupil over twelve years of age will in the like circumstances be covered by s 88 .[6]

Where the accused supervisor in a school had slapped the deceased student who was found sitting on scooter of the accused, his conviction under s 323, IPC was held justified, he was held not entitled to the protection of ss 88 and 89, IPC .[7]2800

(b) Husband's Liability for Beating his Wife

A husband has no general or unqualified right of punishing his wife by beating her for imprudence and impertinence.[8]

(c) Slapping by Mother-in-law

When the prosecution has proved that the accused mother-in-law had slapped the deceased on the day of the incident during the course of the quarrel and had also abused her, the accused mother-in-law was held to be rightly convicted under s 323, IPC, by the trial court.[9]

(d) Rescue

However, since the word 'rescue' used in s 225, IPC, necessarily implies the use of a certain amount of criminal force, a person who helps the accused in rescuing another in lawful custody must not be visited with a separate sentence under s 323 .[10]

(e) Stone Blow

It is not that in every case a stone would constitute a dangerous weapon. It would depend upon the facts of the case.[11] Where the accused was alleged to have caused simple hurt to the victim by inflicting a stone blow, the prosecution witness did not support the prosecution in the examination-in-chief but in the cross-examination by the public prosecutor he stated that the accused hit the victim with stone but when cross-examined by the accused he stated that he had not seen anyone hitting with the stone. The self contradictory and self destroying version of the witness is utterly unacceptable as an eye account of the occurrence, the sole testimony of the injured was found unacceptable to prove commission of the offence under s 323, IPC, by the accused.[12]

(f) Fist and Slaps

Where the accused person were alleged to have assaulted the complainant with fist and slap, none of the prosecution witnesses stated that the complainant was actually assaulted by all other accused persons, the doctor who examined the complainant stated that the injuries caused to him were simple and superficial which could also be caused by a fall. Contradictions were also found in the statement of the prosecution witnesses, the acquittal of the accused persons was, therefore, found proper.[13]

(g) Kick

Where ten accused persons were alleged to have assaulted the complainant by kick, and it was not possible for the Court to fix the liability of any one individual out of total 10 accused persons for causing injuries on the body of the complainant which were found very simple in nature, the conviction of the ten accused appellants under s 323, IPC was found not sustainable, and was set aside.[14]2801

(h) Pushing

Where the accused pushed the deceased on the chest and the deceased fell down on a stone which resulted in his death, there was no intention of the accused to kill the deceased, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 304, Pt II to one under s 323, IPC .[15]

(i) Free fight case

Where both the complainant and the accused had sustained injuries in a free fight, the accused appellant had not caused fatal injury on the deceased, the accused was convicted under s 323, IPC . [16]

(j) Bamboo stick

Where the accused appellant A5 had caused simple injury by bamboo stick to the deceased, while other accused A1 had given fatal blow, he was convicted under s 323, IPC .[17]

(k) Single lathi Blow

Where the accused inflicted a single lathi blow on the head of the deceased causing simple injury, and the deceased died due to intra-cranial haemorrhage, the accused did not have knowledge that a single lathi blow could cause such internal injury as to result in death, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 323, IPC .[18] The accused appellant had inflicted injuries by lathi on the left side of head, seven cm above eye-brow. The victim had sustained fracture of left parietal bone also. Held, the case did not fall under s 323, IPC, but under s 308, IPC .[19] Where the appellant accused in exercise of right of private defence had hit the deceased with thorny stick lying on the spot causing death, the appellant accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 302 and 323, IPC .[20]

(l) deceased aged 60 years suffering from cervical spondylosis

Due to enmity between two rival groups in the incident, one person died. Medical evidence showed that the deceased was aged 60 years and suffering from cervical spondylosis. The deceased had sustained fracture of cervical spine. The injuries sustained by the deceased were simple in nature. The injury caused to the deceased was neither intentional nor the members of the unlawful assembly had knowledge that the injury received by the deceased could have caused death. Accused were convicted under ss 325, 323 read with s 34 .[21]

7. Procedure

An offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, and is triable by a magistrate. It may also be tried summarily.2802

The cognizance of offences under ss 323 and 324, IPC, by the magistrate after the period of limitation and without any explanation regarding extension of period of limitation by the prosecution is bad in law and liable to the quashed.[22]

8. Investigation

The offence under s 323, IPC, is non-cognizable, so the police cannot investigate it without the order of the magistrate.[23] However, if this offence is committed by the accused along with a cognizable offence, the investigation can be done by the police for this offence and like a cognizable offence the investigation should be done in a fair and proper manner by the police with due regard to the facts and circumstances of the case. Thus, when the victim lodged an FIR under s 506 and s 323, IPC and the complainant did not wish to go to a government hospital but wanted to go to a private hospital, the case was closed by the police as a mistake of fact, the High Court of Madras took a serious view and observed that only make believe investigation has been done and the investigation was not only faulty, but also partial.

The submission that the injured wished to go to the private hospital and the police having allowed to do so was found unacceptable as it was for the police to keep track of the evidence and preserve the same and they ought to have sent the complainant to the government hospital with a memo which was a clear lapse, the Madras High Court directed a detailed departmental enquiry to be conducted against the sub-inspector and inspector of police for their lapses by the superintendent of police and also de novo investigation of the case of the complainants.[24]

Once, on the circumstances prevalent at the time of registration of the case, it is evident that a non-cognizable offence is not made out, permitting the police to first register a cognizable offence, carry out investigation and ultimately if it is found that a cognizable offence was not made out, would be giving a long rope to the police. The nature of offence is to be gathered from the facts available at the relevant time and if there is doubt as to whether a cognizable offence is made out, the police can report it to the magistrate concerned and obtain appropriate orders. Therefore, when the offence under s 323, IPC, was made out but the police registered the case under s 324 read with s 34, IPC, to make the non-cognizable offence cognizable, the investigation done by the police was without jurisdiction and magistrate could not take cognizance upon the submission of challan by the police after investigations and charge under ss 323 / 34, IPC, framed by the court on such illegal investigation is also liable to be quashed.[25]

9. Acquittal on a charge under Section 352 Bars a Fresh Trial on the same Facts under Section 323

Commentary under the same heading in s 352, post, may be referred to.

10. Summary Trial

A chief judicial magistrate, a metropolitan magistrate, or a magistrate of a first class, especially empowered in this behalf by the High Court, may, if he thinks fit, try the offence, under this section, in a summary manner, as per s 260, CrPC .2803

11. Case Triable as a Summons Case

The maximum punishment prescribed for an offence under this section does not exceed imprisonment for one year. Similarly, a case relating to an offence under this section is a summons case,[26] and the procedure, to be observed by a magistrate in the trial of such a case, is prescribed in ch XX of the CrPC .

The adoption by a magistrate of the procedure prescribed for warrant cases where the offence is triable as a summons case does not constitute an illegality and it is only an irregularity which is curable under s 465(1) of the CrPC, if no prejudice is caused to the accused.[27] It must be remembered that the breach of every mandatory provision of the CrPC does not render the trial of an accused person illegal. There is a distinction between provisions which prescribe the mode or manner of a trial, and provisions which provide for the conduct of the trial. An infringement of a provision as to the mode or manner of a trial constitutes an illegality which vitiates the whole trial and cannot be cured by s 465(1) of the CrPC, but an infringement of a provision which prescribes even mandatorily a matter relating to the conduct of a trial constitutes a mere irregularity which can be cured by the said section if no prejudice is caused to the accused.[28]

12. Compounding of an Offence under this Section

Under s 320 of the CrPC, the offence of hurt can be compounded only by the person to whom the hurt is caused. Where a widow complained of hurt caused to her husband in consequence of which he died, compounded the offence and the magistrate thereupon acquitted the accused, it was held that the acquittal was wrong.[29] Similarly, where hurt is caused to three persons one of whom dies subsequently, the remaining two cannot lawfully compromise the offence as regards the deceased.[30] However, a compromise cannot be refused merely because the masterof the person, in whose quarrel the complainant was injured, refuses to give his permission.[31]

In a case relating to an offence under this section, a compromise petition filed by the complainant alone would be effective even though it is not signed by the accused person.[32] The compromise is effective even without the permission of the court.[33] In a compromise case, the acquittal is recorded because the parties come to terms.[34] Since the composition of an offence has the immediate effect of acquittal, so as to deprive the magistrate of his jurisdiction to try the case, the subsequent withdrawal from it by any party can neither affect the acquittal, nor revive the jurisdiction of the magistrate to proceed with the case.[35]2804

The composition of an offence under s 323, IPC, does not amount to an acquittal of the accused of an offence under s 147, IPC .[36] In State v Bherulal Dagadulal Jain ,[37] where the accused was tried under ss 323, 504, 506, read with s 148, IPC, and offences under ss 323, 504 and 506, IPC, were compounded, it was held that the proper order for the magistrate to pass under s 148, was to discharge the accused under s 239, CrPC . There is, however, no reason forthcoming from the last cited case as to how the composition of the offences under ss 504, 506, and 323, IPC, could render the charge under s 148, to be groundless so as to attract the said provision of s 239, CrPC . In order to supply such omission, reference may usefully be made to the case in Tarakanta Bhadra v Bhanu Charan Sahu ,[38] to the effect that, since the compromise is bonafide and has already been acted upon, one cannot lose sight of the fact that there would be no evidence forthcoming to support the prosecution and no purpose would be served in continuing the prosecution.

13. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[39]

14. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(1) the accused caused hurt, that is, bodily pain, disease or infirmity to the complainant; and
(2) he caused the hurt, voluntarily, that is, he did the act, causing hurt, with:

(a) the intention of causing hurt to the complainant, or
(b) the knowledge that he is thereby likely to cause hurt to the complainant.

Where a person, who intervened, was said to have been beaten but appeared to have compromised and did not appear in the witness-box, and his injuries were not proved, it was held that conviction on a charge under s 323 read with s 34, IPC, in a murder case was not maintainable.[40]

15. Appreciation of Evidence

When the witness suppresses the genesis of the incident and when the witness is not found truthful, in major part of his testimony, the court should not rely on the statement of the witness to convict the accused.[41]

Unless the evidence is good enough to warrant a clear finding as to the facts and guilt of the accused, no conviction can be arrived at.[42]

Where the story given in the FIR was that the accused pelted stones on the complainant and his sons causing injuries and whereas, in the statement before the2805 court it was stated that the bleeding injury to the nose of the complainant was caused due to a lathi blow, the acquittal of the accused was found proper.[43] Where the accused constables had merely accompanied the station officer to cause arrest of the victim, no specific allegation of assault was made by the accused constables upon the deceased either in the statements of witnesses under s 161, CrPC, or before the court, the accused constables were found entitled to the benefit of the doubt.[44] The intention or knowledge may be gathered from the circumstances of the case and nature of the injuries.[45]

When the accused is arrested on the spot, the question as to the presence of sufficient light becomes inconsequential.[46] However, the evidence is to be weighed as a whole, and not piece-meal. It is difficult to believe that the accused would enter the room at midnight only to commit an offence under s 323, IPC .[47]

16. Acquittal

The accused allegedly insulting the complainant by referring to his caste and assaulting him but all the witnesses examined by the prosecution were interested witnesses and were from same family, there were glaring contradictions in their evidence, the witnesses referred to presence of independent witnesses who were not examined, in these circumstances the accused was found entitled to acquittal.[48]

Where evidence of the witness was that during course of quarrel, the accused gave a tangia blow aiming at head of the victim causing bleeding from his nose, however, injuries sustained by the accused persons during same transaction were not explained by the prosecution and the prosecution was guilty of suppression of facts, therefore, acquittal of the accused persons was found proper.[49]

In the instant case the complainant went to touch the feet of the accused at the place which was almost overcrowded and all of a sudden he (complainant) felt that accused gave a blow with a kick on his head when the accused was going to pick up a car. Held, there was no intention on the part of the accused to kick on the head of the complainant because at the place which was completely filled with large group of persons it was practically impossible for the accused to move and see the particular person who has touched his feet and in that event if he waved his feet aside, it will not mean that intentionally the accused had given the blow with a kick on the head of the complainant. No offence under s 323, IPC was made out, order summoning the accused for offence under s 323, IPC was set aside.[50]

17. Contradiction between Medical and Oral Evidence--Effect

Where the oral evidence of sole injured eyewitness did not corroborate by the medical evidence and the injury said to be sustained by her by sword was not caused in the manner and by weapon as stated by her, there was delay of three days in2806 lodging FIR which was not explained, the evidence of sole eyewitness was not found believable, trustworthy and reliable.[51]

18. Conviction

When the ocular testimony regarding date, time and place of occurrence is supported by medical evidence, the accused is liable to be convicted inspite of the fact that eyewitnesses are the brothers of the victim.[52] An accused charged under s 323 with the aid of s 149 cannot be convicted under s 323 when there is no specific allegation in the charge that the accused caused simple hurt to the victim.[53]

Where the charge against the five accused is only of an offence under this section and there is no charge under s 147, only those accused who caused the injuries can be convicted under this section.[54] However, in the absence of a charge under this section framed during trial, a conviction under s 147, IPC, cannot be altered to one under this section,[55] but where an accused charged under ss 147 and 325 / 34, IPC, is convicted of the former and acquitted of the latter, the appellate court can alter the conviction under s 147 to one under s 323 .[56] A charge under ss 147 and 323 cannot, however, be altered to one under s 160 .[57]

If an accused is charged under s 290 (where the elements of the offence are essentially different from those for an offence under s 323), and he has no notice of a charge under s 323, his conviction under the latter section is vitiated as he is misled by the charge put to him.[58]

An accused charged under s 323, cannot be convicted for abetment under ss 323 / 109, IPC, if there is no mention in the complaint of facts constituting abetment.[59]

Conviction under ss 147 and 323 or 326 are not illegal.[60] In Chhidda v Emperor ,[61] and Emperor v Sahab Raj Singh ,[62] it was held that separate convictions under ss 147 and 323, read with s 149, IPC, are not illegal. In Tiny v State ,[63] Brij Mohan Lal J, relying on a Full Bench decision, reported in Empress v Ram Sarup ,[64] held that a person who actually causes hurt and is also a member of an unlawful assembly can be convicted of committing riot under s 147, and of causing hurt under s 323, and there is no illegality in it.2807

Where no injury is inflicted pursuant to the common object to kill the deceased, all members of the unlawful assembly cannot be guilty of murder, the conviction of the accused who caused the injury and the one who instigated him to inflict injury under ss 302 / 34 and of other members of the unlawful assembly under ss 323 / 149, 147, 148 was found proper.[65]

Only evidence against the appellant was that he gave chappal blow to the mother of the deceased, he was convicted under s 323, IPC .[66]

Death caused by the accused was not premeditated, accused had no common intention to cause death of deceased, the injuries were not sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to have caused his death. Only accused no. 1 had caused vital injury on the head of the deceased. Held, the case was covered by Exceptions 1 and 4 to s 300 of IPC . Appellant accused No. 1 was convicted under ss 304, Pt I/149. Other accused were convicted under ss 323 / 149, 147 and 148, IPC .[67]

The deceased who had come to the field of the accused unexpectedly was attacked by accused by gandasa. Held, the accused did not have common intention to cause the death of the deceased. The accused who gave fatal blow was convicted under s 302, IPC, others were convicted under s 323, IPC . [68]

19. Conviction and moral Turpitude

Conviction under every section of IPC cannot be said to be conviction of an offence involving moral turpitude affecting government service of the convict.[69]

20. Conviction of some Accused under Section 323 and others under other Offence

Where the accused persons armed with lathis went to the house of the complainant to belabour the complainant party, the main accused who was not a member of the assembly picked up a heavy stone and dropped it from the roof of his house on the head of the deceased who had arrived there, the act of the main accused was an isolated act unconnected with the purpose or object of unlawful assembly formed by the accused persons, however, there was sufficient evidence with regard to formation of an assembly and causing injury to the complainant and others, in these circumstances the main accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II and other accused persons were convicted under s 148 and ss 323 / 149, IPC .[70] Where the main accused attacked the deceased with mushal on the head causing his death, but the co-accused only assaulted the deceased with fists and slaps, the co-accused did not share the common intention to commit murder of the deceased, therefore, the main accused was convicted under s 304, Pt II and the co-accused under s 323 .[71]2808

21. Accused Convicted under Section 302 cannot be convicted under Section 323

When the accused are convicted for a major offence under s 302, IPC, of causing murder of the victim, their conviction under s 323 is unjustified and unsustainable.[72]

22. Acquittal under Section 376, but conviction under Sections 323 / 354 / 34

The acquittal of the accused under s 376 was found proper. The prosecutrix did not support the prosecution case and the medical evidence also did not support the prosecution regarding the offence under s 376 . However, the prosecutrix had clearly deposed to the fact that the accused had bitten her on the breasts and the bite-marks had been recorded by the doctors. Therefore, the accused person were convicted under ss 323 / 354 / 34, IPC, for outraging the modesty of the prosecutrix and in respect of injuries caused to her.[73]

23. Admonition

When an accused is guilty of an offence punishable with imprisonment for not more than two years or five or with both and for some other specified offences and no previous conviction is proved against him, having regard to the circumstances of the case including the nature of offence and the character of the offender, or any extenuating circumstances under which the offence was convicted, instead of sentencing the accused, the court may release him after due admonition.[74] Where the accused was less than 21 years of age at the time of commission of offence and at the time of the trial, the report of probation officer clearly showed that the accused deserved the benefit of the Probation of Offenders Act but since more than 14 years has lapsed since the decision of the first appellate court, so it was not thought proper to release the accused on probation by bounding him and instead the accused was released with due admonition as per s 360(3), Crpc and s 3 of the Probation of Offenders Act .[75]

Interest of justice may, in fit cases of first offenders be served by admonishing the accused under the provision of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958.[76]

Where the injuries sustained by the victim were minor and superficial, the sentence of 30 days simple imprisonment awarded to the accused was set aside and the accused persons were directed to be released after due admonition by giving them the benefit of s 3 of the Probation of Offenders Act .[77]

24. Probation

An order under s 4(1) of Probation of Offenders Act cannot be said to be a punishment.[78]

When any person is found guilty of having committed an offence not punishable with death or imprisonment for life and no previous conviction is proved against him,2809 having regard to circumstances of the case including the nature of the offence and the character of the offender the court may instead of sentencing the accused, release him on his entering into a bond, with or without sureties to appeal and receive sentence when called upon during such period not exceeding 3 years and in the meantime to keep the peace and maintain good behaviour.[79]

Before making any order for release of the accused on probation, the court shall take into consideration the report, if any, of the probation officer concerned in relation to the case.[80]

Consideration of a variety of factors like gravity of the crime, its impact and effect on the morals of society, its defenceless and unprotected state of the victims, the age of the criminal, his conduct, the circumstances under which crime was committed are relevant factors to ascertain whether the accused is entitled to the benefit of probation or is liable to be sentenced.[81]

Where the allegations were that the accused assaulted with a lathi causing bleeding injuries, the injuries were trifling in nature and were also possible due to a fall. Three of the accused persons were ladies, in these circumstances the accused were found entitled to the benefit of Probation of Offenders Act and were released on execution of a bond instead of a harsh sentence.[82] Where the accused assaulted the informant with a lathi causing injury to the head, the conviction of the accused under s 323, IPC, and his release on probation under s 360, CrPC, was found proper.[83]

In another case, the accused convicted under s 323 were released on probation under s 360(1), CrPC, by setting aside the sentence imposed against them.[84]

Where the incident took place 9 years and 8 months ago, extending the benefit of Probation of Offenders Act to the accused persons was found just and proper.[85] The incident was thirty years old, some of the accused appellants had become old, the accused were released on probation of one year.[86]

25. Punishment

The question of punishment is a matter of discretion of the trial court. However, that discretion must be exercised judicially.[87] Inexcusably shocking and reckless anti-social behaviour, causing hurt to an innocent person, does not deserve a lenient sentence.[88] Similarly, if the discretion is not judicially exercised and the sentence passed by the trial court is too lenient, the appellate court may enhance the sentence.[89] Where the injuries sustained by the complainant were simple in nature and more or less superficial, the sentence of nine months' rigorous imprisonment was2810 found to be erring on the side of severity and was, accordingly reduced to about one and a half months as already served out.[90]

Where different persons are injured and grievous hurt is caused to some while simple hurt to others, it is competent to pass separate and cumulative sentences.[91]

When the accused suffered the ordeal of protracted litigation for about 12 years, the substantive sentence of imprisonment imposed on the accused was converted into fine.[92] Where the occurrence took place 16 years ago, the accused was aged about more than 55 years, he was re-arrested and was in custody since then, under the circumstances the sentence was modified to period already undergone and a fine of Rs 1,000.[93]

When the incident took place 12 to 20 years ago,[94] and litigation prolonged since, the sentence of the accused was reduced to the period already undergone by him in jail and also pay the fine.

Where the accused persons were convicted under ss 342 and 323, IPC, and remained in police custody and judicial custody for one month and the incident took place 16 years ago and this period is sufficient to exhaust anybody mentally, physically or economically, so the sentence of imprisonment of the accused persons was reduced to the period already undergone.[95] Where the incident took place 20 years ago, the sentences under ss 323, 324 awarded to the accused were reduced to the period already undergone by them, (i.e., about 23 days) as no useful purpose would be served to send them to jail.[96] Where the occurrence took place eight years back, the accused were in jail custody for about one month and seven days, the sentence of imprisonment of the accused under s 323 was reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone and a fine of Rs 3000 was also imposed.[97]

Where the incident took place in a heated moment as a result of exchange of abuses between the parties, the sentence of six months rigorous imprisonment was reduced to the period of imprisonment of one month already undergone by the accused.[98]

26. Compensation to Victim

The court should take into consideration that if some fine is imposed on the accused, then a sufferer must be compensated by taking recourse to s 357, CrPC, if the trial court is satisfied that the benefit under the Probation of Offenders Act is not required to be given to the accused and on recovery of fine amount the trial court ought to award proper compensation to the complainant. Section 5 of Probation of Offenders Act provides that the court while directing the release of an offender under s 3 or s 5 may at the same time give a further order directing the accused to pay such2811 compensation as the court thinks reasonable for loss or injury caused to any person by the commission of the offence.[1]

The compensation so awarded, if not paid by the accused, can be realised as per provisions of ss 421 and 422, CrPC, but the accused cannot be sentenced to imprisonment in default of payment of compensation, while it can be done if the fine imposed by the court is not paid by the accused.[2]

27. Autrefois Convict

An accused convicted of an offence under this section, cannot, afterwards be tried under s 325 on the same facts unless the case falls under s 300(3), CrPC .[3] Where the facts, necessary to make out an offence of hurt, are altogether different from those for affray, the previous trial and conviction under s 160, IPC, are no impediment to a subsequent case under s 323, IPC, filed by one of the parties to that affray.[4] If a person is tried for a petty offence under s 51, Kerala Police Act, and acquitted, a subsequent trial for an offence under s 323, or s 324, IPC, is not barred when the two offences are distinct and fall under two different enactments, and the one is not cognate with the other so as to be clubbed together in the same trial.[5] Where, however, the accused, along with some others, are jointly tried on charges of rioting and extortion and are acquitted, because the magistrate disbelieves the evidence, the accused cannot, on the same evidence, be convicted of voluntarily causing hurt in a separate trial.[6] Similarly, a person, acquitted on a charge of using criminal force, cannot afterwards be charged with causing hurt in respect of the same transaction.[7]

28. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 323

Commentary under the same heading in s 302, ante, may be referred to.

Four accused persons armed with iron rod, knife, dang had assaulted the deceased, and caused injuries. The appellant no. 4 inflicted 4-5 knife blows in the abdomen of the deceased as a result of which the deceased fell down. After the deceased fell own, appellant nos. 1, 2 and 3 did not inflict injuries on the deceased. Conviction of the other appellant nos. 1, 2 and 3 under ss 302 / 34, IPC was set aside. However, they were convicted under ss 323 / 34 and 324 / 34, IPC .[8]

There was no evidence of plan or prior meeting of mind between the two accused appellants A1 and A2. A1 had assaulted and caused injuries to the PW5, hence his conviction under ss 302 / 34, IPC was altered to one under s 323, IPC .[9]2812

35. Alteration of Conviction from Section 354 to Section 323

Even though, it is true that assault or criminal force towards a woman is one of the essential pre-conditions for applicability of s 354, IPC, but the same has to be with an intent to outrage her modesty or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby outrage her modesty. When the second element or ingredient of the offence, i.e., intending to outrage or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby outrage her modesty, is completely missing in the case, then a case of pure and simple hurt has been converted into an offence under s 354, IPC, which is wholly impermissible and illegal. Therefore, conviction under s 354 was altered to one under s 323 .[10]

36. Alteration of Conviction from Section 395 to Section 323

Where the quarrel took place between six boys and a scooterist in front of the house of the informant, and when the informant asked them not to quarrel, the accused boys grappled with him and allegedly looted one wrist watch and one silver ring of gomade from the possession of the informant, the informant stated the same in his examination-in-chief. During cross-examination, he stated that the wrist watch and the ring were snatched away by someone of the assailants but he added ho sakta hai ki guttam guttha me wahin giri ho lekin mujhe waha mili nahi, this reply of the informant rules out the offence of dacoity or attempted dacoity punishable under s 395, IPC . However, since voluntarily causing hurt was established, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 395 to ss 323 and 147 .[11]

37.Accused Charged under Section 376 or Sections 376 / 511 or Sections 376 / 109 can be Convicted under Sections 354 and 323

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 324.

Voluntarily causing hurt by dangerous weapons or means.--

Whoever, except in the case provided for by section 334, voluntarily causes hurt by means of any instrument for shooting, stabbing or cutting, or any instrument which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, or by means of fire or any heated substance, or by means of any poison or any corrosive substance, or by means of any explosive substance, or by means of any substance which it is deleterious to the human body to inhale, to swallow, or to receive into the blood, or by means of any animal, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section deals with a case of causing voluntary hurt by means of an instrument which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death.[12] In Thakar Das v State ,[13] in the course of a scuffle between the complainant and the accused, while grappling, the accused fired a pistol shot which caused simple hurt to the complainant. There was no evidence to show that the accused fired at the complainant with the intention of killing him. It was held that the offence, committed by the accused, fell within the purview of this section, and not under s 307 . Since a push, followed by blows with the blunt edge of a tangia on the legs and joint of knees of the deceased, would not afford ground to hold that accused had intended death of the deceased, a conviction can be made only under this section.[14] If this2814section is to be applied, regard must be had, not to the injury caused, nor even to the part of the body on which it is caused, but to the weapon with which it is caused. The other considerations may be taken into account in assessing the punishment, but not in determining the applicability of this section.[15] To constitute an offence under this section, the extent of the injury caused is therefore, immaterial.[16] The stress of the section is more on the nature of the weapon, and not on the gravity of the injury.[17] If bleeding head injuries are caused with a wooden club and reaper, the offence under s 324, IPC, is made out.[18] However, in the absence of any grievous injury, the case would fall within the purview of s 323, rather than under s 324 .[19]

2. Object

This section prescribes a heavier punishment where hurt is caused by a dangerous weapon or means. The reason for prescribing a heavier punishment than what is prescribed in the last section is that the use of dangerous means to inflict hurt indicates great malignity. The framers of the IPC said thus:

> Bodily hurt may be inflicted by means, the use of which generally indicates greater malignity. A blow with the fist may cause as much pain and produce as lasting an injury, as laceration with a knife or branding with a hot iron. But it will scarcely be disputed that, in the vast majority of cases, the offender, who has used a knife, or a hot iron, for the purpose of wreaking his hatred, is a far worse and more dangerous member of society than he who has only used his fist. It appears to us that many hurts, which would not, according to our classification, be designated as grievous hurt, ought yet, on account of the mode, in which they are inflicted, to be punished more severely than any grievous hurts. We suppose, therefore, that where bodily hurt is voluntarily caused by means of any sharp instrument, or fire of any heated substance, of any corrosive substance, of any explosive substance, of any poison, internal or external, or of any animal, the maximum of imprisonment may be increased, in cases of grievous bodily hurt, to fourteen years, and in other cases to three years.

3. This Section Distinguished from Section 307

The two elements of the offence under this section, namely, (1) the use of a dangerous weapon or means and (2) the causing of simple hurt, may also be found in a case, under s 307, IPC, of an attempt to murder. However, there is a clear distinction between the offences under the two sections. In order to make out an offence under s 324, IPC, all that is necessary is to establish the two elements mentioned above, but those two elements by themselves are not sufficient to make out an offence under s 307 . In order to bring home an offence under that section, the prosecution must prove that the act causing the hurt, was done 'with such intention of knowledge, and under such circumstances, that if he (the offender), by that act, caused death, he would be guilty of murder'. If such intention or knowledge is not proved, the case will fall under s 324, and not under s 307 .[20] The mere circumstance2815 that a knife had been used as a weapon of attack on a vital part of the body,[21] or a firearm was used to cause injuries to the victim (vide s 324, IPC), would not be sufficient to establish that the accused had committed an offence punishable under s 307 . Evidence has further to be led by the prosecution to establish the intention of the accused to cause death or his knowledge as envisaged under s 300, IPC . The burden of proof is on the prosecution, and not on the accused.[22]

Where the accused inflicted injuries by kassi, the injured fell down after receiving injuries and became unconcious, the accused had the occassion and full liberty to cause further injuries in order to murder the injured, the fact that the accused did not do so shows that he did not attempt to commit murder of the victim so his conviction under s 307, IPC was set aside, but that under ss 324 and 326, IPC, was maintained.[23]

4. Applicability of Section 34 to Section 324

Commentary under s 34, vol 1, may be referred to.

Mere presence at the place of occurrence would not, ipso facto, attract provision of s 34 of IPC .[24]

Where the common intention of two or more persons is to deprive the party of the deceased of the weapons which they are carrying, and to cause hurt to them with those very weapons, and while carrying out the common intention, one of them exceeds the common intention and kills a member of the deceased's party, the others will not be held liable for the murder; if, however, they cause any hurt with lathis seized from the deceased, they would be liable for the offence under s 324 read with s 34 .[25] However, in the absence of any evidence of 'common intention', a conviction under ss 324 / 34, IPC, cannot be sustained.[26] In Malkhan Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[27] the shot was fired by one accused and the other accused merely continued pedalling the cycle to run away with the first accused and there was no evidence that the shot was fired in furtherance of any common intention. It was held that the conviction of the second accused under ss 324 / 34, IPC, was liable to be set aside.

5. 'Whoever'

Commentary under the in s 323, ante, may be referred to.

6. 'Voluntarily Causes Hurt'

Commentary under s 321, ante, may be referred to.

7. 'Instrument for Shooting'

The expression 'instrument of shooting' is not confined to a firearm like a gun, pistol or revolver. It may include a bow and arrow because the word 'shoot' means 'to let2816 fly or drive with force as an arrow'. All firearms, like guns, pistol and revolvers are shooting instruments.[28]

8. Dangerous Weapon

Commentary under the same heading in s 326, post, may be referred to.

9. 'Instrument for...Stabbing or Cutting'

With regard to this, the law commissioners said: 'The instrument must be a sharp instrument with an edge, which will cut, or a point which will stab; any instrument, which answers this description, we apprehend, will be within the definition, whether made of metal or not'.

Stabbing instruments are, therefore, instruments with a point, such as a dagger, a bayonet or a kukri. A spear was classed as a cutting weapon by the Lahore High Court,[29] but the Assam High Court has held it to be a dangerous weapon.[30] A dao is an instrument for cutting.[31] A knife is an instrument of stabbing or cutting.[32] Tooth is an instrument for cutting and biting.[33]

In the present case, eye-witnesses described the knife, and merely because the knife was not recovered during investigation, same could not be a factor to discard the evidence of PWS. Wounds noticed by the Doctor examined in the case also threw considerable light on this aspect. Doctor's opinion about the weapon, though theoretical, cannot be totally wiped out. Appellant accused was convicted under s 324, IPC .[34]

Where the evidence of the injured and the eye-witnesses that when the appellant chased the injured received injury on his testicle by the point of the knife possessed by the appellant, the injury was simple, held the appellant did not cause injury to the injured, thus, the conviction of the appellant under s 324, IPC was not proper, and was set aside.[35]

10. 'An Instrument which, used as a Weapon of Offence, is Likely to Cause Death'

The expression 'an instrument, which used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death' should be construed with reference to the nature of the instrument and not the manner of its use. What has to be established by the prosecution is that the accused2817 voluntarily caused hurt and that such hurt was caused by means of an instrument referred to in this section.[36]

The expression 'dangerous weapon', used in the marginal note is described in the body of this section, as 'any instrument which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death' which expression should be construed with reference to the nature of the instrument, and not with reference to its use.[37] To be a dangerous weapon, the instrument must be one which is 'likely to cause death', and not one which is liable to cause death. It must be inherent in the very nature of the weapon used that death is likely to ensue.[38] Thus, a spear thrust in the chest, is likely to have a fatal result; so, the spear is a dangerous weapon although the actual injury caused in a particular case may not endanger life so as to make it a grievous hurt.[39] A granite stone with rough edges will come under 'instrument which, used as a weapon of offence, likely to cause death'.[40] A hockey stick is an instrument 'which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death'.[41] A hatchet has been taken to be a dangerous weapon.[42] In Ghulam Muhay-ud-Din v Emperor ,[43] it was held that a pen-knife of not more than four inches' length could not, under ordinary circumstances, be deemed to be a dangerous weapon, but this decision has been dissented from in Varkey Joseph v State of Kerala .[44] In Allah Din v Emperor ,[45] the Lahore High Court has itself held that causing grievous hurt with a pen-knife is an offence under s 326 . Where the accused had caused injuries by scissors, a dangerous weapon, he was convicted under s 324, IPC .[46]

Accused who were armed with axe and sword, had assaulted witnesses, were convicted under ss 324 / 149 IPC .[47]

Although a bamboo or common stick has been held not to be a dangerous weapon,[48] an iron-rod stick has been held to be a dangerous weapon.[49] In Saidino v2818 Emperor,[50] it was remarked that a wooden kharwanji is not a weapon of a lethal nature, but in Preman v Emperor ,[51] a dang was described as a lethal or dangerous weapon, and, following this, in Sewa Singh v Emperor ,[52] a lathi was described as a lethal weapon. Cudgels have been held to be deadly weapons.[53] However, whether a lathi is a weapon which is likely to cause death depends upon the weight and length of the lathi. Whether the lathi used is a lethal weapon is, therefore, a question of fact in each case. Where the lathi used is not produced in court and what was the weight and length of the lathi is not known, it cannot be said to be a dangerous weapon.[54] In order that a lathi may be regarded as a dangerous weapon, there must be evidence about its length, weight, diameter and whether it was iron-rod or tied with wires.[55]

The victim had sustained one grievous lathi injury on right forearm. There were two accused M and B armed with lathi. It was not clear from the evidence of the eye-witnesses as to who amongst the two appellants M and B had caused the injury. Both the accused were held entitled to benefit of doubt and were acquitted of the charge under s 324, IPC .[56]

Where the accused R had caused lathi injury on the left shoulder of the victim, the accused R was convicted under s 324, IPC and sentenced to two years RI.[57]

11. Single Sickle Blow on Back of Deceased

On the date of the incident, all of a sudden, altercation ensued between the appellant and deceased on the issue of payment of Rs.150/- as interest amount. There was no previous enmity between the appellant and the deceased. A single blow of sickle was inflicted by the appellant on the back of the deceased. In the opinion of the doctor, injury nos. 1 to 9 were in the nature of 'Ulcers' and indirect outcome of injury no. 10. The deceased died two years after the incident. The doctor opined that the deceased had not died due to direct result of injury no. 10 sustained by him. The conviction of the appellant under s 324, IPC was affirmed. In view of the mental agony and financial sufferings, the sentence of three years imposed by the High Court was reduced to the period already undergone.[58]

12. 'By Means of Fire or any Heated Substance'

Inflicting bum injuries with the help of burning firewood would fall under this head and is, therefore, an offence under this section.[59] Pouring boiling water on a person would come under this head.[60]2819

13. 'By Means of any Poison'

It is difficult to give an exact definition of the term 'poison' because substances which are harmless to the body in certain conditions, may become dangerous in other conditions. Broadly speaking, a 'poison' may be defined as a substance of the nature of a drug which, if administered in a way and in an amount, in which it is likely to be administered, will produce deleterious effects resulting in ill-health, disease or death. This, however, applies to the term as usually employed. It does not cover poisonous gases which are not substances of the nature of a drug.

In cases of criminal poisoning in India, the law does not insist on the precise definition of a poison because sections of the IPC dealing with the offences relating to the administration of a poison, make use of such self-explanatory term as any poison or 'any stupefying, intoxicating of unwholesome drug, or other thing', or 'any corrosive substance...or any substance which it is deleterious to the human body to inhale, to swallow, or to receive into the blood'. All, that the law requires, is that the substance is such as, if taken, will endanger human life, or will be likely to cause hurt or injury to any person. Again, the law takes cognizance of the malicious intention of the individual who administers a drug or other substance with a view to causing injury or death, irrespective of the quantity or quality of the substance.[61]

14. 'Corrosive Substance'

A corrosive substance is a substance which irritates the system causing local hyperaemia and discomfort like burning or pain, etc., e.g., copper, iron, lead, mercury, silver, thallium or zinc salts; antimony, arsenic, barium, bismuth, boron, bromine chlorine, iodine, phosphorus; abrin, aloes, bilowan, chillie, colchicine, croton, ipecac, ricin; benezen-hexachloride, DDT, dinitrocresols, kerosene oil, etc. Mineral acids have a local chemical action of corroding and destroying the tissues they come into contact with, a coagulation necrosis is produced by the precipitation of protein, and may produce fatal consequences, if extensive. They have no remote effects on the system. They act as irritants, when slightly diluted, but as stimulants, when well diluted and given in the pharmacopoeial doses.[62]

15. 'By means of any Explosive Substance'

'Explosive substance', according to s 2 of the Explosive Substance Act 1908, shall be deemed to include any materials for making any explosive substance; also any apparatus, machine, implement, or material used, or intended to be used, or adapted for causing, or aiding in causing, any explosion in or with any explosive substance; also any part of any such apparatus, machine, or implement. The expression 'explosive substance' would also include any explosive, or finished product, ready for explosion.[63]

16 'Any Substance which is Deleterious to the Human Body to Inhale, to Swallow, or to Receive into the Blood'

Where acid was thrown on the face of informant by the accused, the accused was found guilty under s 324 .[64] Causing hurt by the administration of a substance, which,2820 if administered in small quantities, is not deleterious, is punishable under this section.[65]

17. Corporal Punishment to Child/Student by Teacher

Commentary under the same heading in s 88, vol 1; commentary under the heading 'Delegation of Parental Authority for Corporal Punishment by School Master and its Extent' in s 89, vol 1; commentary under sub-head 'School Master's liability' under the heading 'Illustrative Cases' in s 323, ante, may be referred to.

18. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable only with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution is pending,[66] and is triable by a magistrate.

19. Compounding of Offence

The finest hour of justice is the hour of compromise when parties after burying the hatchet reunite by a reasonable and just compromise.[67] The offence under s 324 is compoundable only with the permission of the court concerned and the effect of compounding of offence is the acquittal of the accused.[68] Where in an appeal the conviction of non-compoundable offence is altered to that of a compoundable offence, the permission to compound the offence can be granted.[69]

By the CrPC (Amendment) Act 2008 (5 of 2009), s 320, CrPC has been amended and offence under s 324, IPC is no more compoundable. The Amendment Act of 2005 came into force from 23 June 2006. Where the offence was committed prior to this date viz. 23 June 2006, permission to compound the offence can be granted by the Court.[70]

20. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the-day of..., at..., you voluntarily caused hurt to AB by means of ..... which is an instrument for shooting (or stabbing, or cutting, or which, used as weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, etc), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 324 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.2821

The charge should mention the particular kind of weapon used for causing the hurt. Merely saying that a dangerous weapon was used is not sufficient.[71] Though a dao is an instrument for cutting, yet this fact should be stated in the charge so as to make the charge comply with the law in all respects.[72]

Even in the absence of a charge, an accused can be found guilty of an offence under s 324, IPC, if the facts found on a charge under s 394 read with s 397, support his conviction, as an offence under s 324 is a minor offence as compared to the offence under s 394 read with s 397 .[73]

21. Proof

To secure a conviction under this section, it must be established that:

(a) the accused voluntarily caused hurt; and
(b) the said hurt was caused by a dangerous weapon or means specified in the section.[74]

Where the ocular testimony regarding date, time and place of occurrence is supported by medical evidence, the conviction of the accused is proper inspite of the fact that eyewitnesses were the real brothers of the victim.[75]

If there is other reliable evidence on the basis of which the court enters a finding and convicts an offender, the absence of evidence of a medical witness of the wound certificate issued by him, is insufficient to set aside such conviction.[76] The stress of the section is more on the nature of the weapon, and not on the gravity of the injury.[77]Where the act itself is proved, it is no part of the duty of the prosecution to establish intention for the act.[78]

The medical evidence showed that the sole injured eye-witness had received injuries on the previous day of the occurrence. The conviction of accused appellant rested solely on the testimony of the injured witness. Inference drawn that the eye-witness was not present at the time of occurrence. Appellant accused were acquitted of the charges under ss 302 and 324, IPC .[79]

22. Contradiction between Oral and Medical Evidence

Where the evidence of eye-witnesses was that bhala was used in manner in which it was used and there was nothing to show that bhala was used by side portion of blades and that too in slanting fashion, the very finding of incised wound and the opinion of doctor that it was caused by sharp cutting weapon, created a doubt over prosecution story that accused persons had caused bhala injury to two injured as alleged by prosecution, so the conviction of the accused persons was found not sustainable.[80]2822

23. Self Defence

If the accused pleads self-defence, the burden is on him to show that he had a right of self-defence.[81] In Deep Singh v State ,[82] the persons of the accused party were found to be injured at the hands of the complainant's party, but none of the prosecution witnesses could give any explanation of the injuries suffered by the accused's party. It was concluded that the accused were acting in exercise of the right of private defence of persons.[83]

Where the complainant party was found to be the aggressor and the accused apprehended that the aggressor might cause death or grievous hurt to him and his family members, so he fired at the victim, a mere reasonable apprehension was held to be enough to put the right of private defence into operation.[84] Appellant accused had caused simple injury to the victim, and in the same incident he had also received injuries. Held, appellant was justified in causing injuries in the exercise of right of private defence, his conviction under s 324 IPC, was set aside.[85]

24. Acquittal

Where there was no evidence as to who amongst the two accused caused the injury in question, both of them were found liable to be exonerated.[86] Where the allegations were that the accused persons armed with firearms and barcha entered the beda (gher) of the complainant and fired at him and inflicted injuries, both parties were involved in various civil and criminal litigation, the weapon of offence were not identified by any of the eyewitnesses, the FIR was antitime and antedated, the evidence of witnesses was contradictory as to the place of occurrence, blood was not recovered from the spot, the conviction of the accused persons under ss 324 / 34 was not found proper, so they were acquitted by the appellate court.[87]

Where the eyewitnesses neither stated how incident occurred, nor explained satisfactorily the injuries caused to the accused persons, the testimony of the eyewitnesses was that one of the accused gave a gandasa blow to the victim, but no injury by sharp-edged weapon like a gandasa was found on the person of the victim, the explanation given by the accused as to how and under what circumstances they caused injuries appear to be more probable, the conviction of the accused persons was not found proper, and was set aside.[88] Where seven persons received injuries in the incident but the prosecution evidence suffered from grave infirmities, the evidence of injured witnesses examined by the prosecution was not reliable, one of the injured persons in the incident appeared as a defence witness in the trial and did not name any of the accused as culprits, the conviction of the accused persons under ss 324 / 149, IPC, was therefore set aside.[89] If however, there is no evidence to prove that the accused inflicted a knife blow and the knife produced contains no blood stains, there is no justification for convicting the accused under s 324 . The accused was alleged to have been armed with a gun and inflicted injuries, the statements2823 recorded in the FIR were found unreliable, the testimony of injured witnesses as regard firing by the accused was not found conclusive and conviction under s 324, IPC, was set aside.[90]

25. Conviction

When the evidence of the eye-witness and the medical evidence showing that the accused in question caused lathi injury on shoulder of the victim, the accused was found liable to be convicted under s 324 .[91] Where the accused and co-accused caused injuries to the prosecution witnesses, the evidence of injured witnesses was consistent, reliable and clear regarding parts played by each accused, their evidence was also corroborated by evidence of other witnesses, the conviction of both accused under s 324, IPC, was found proper.[92]

26. Conviction of some Accused under Section 324 and others under Different Sections

Where the accused persons chased the son of the deceased to kill, the deceased-father interfered and was got killed instead, and the accused persons had no intention to kill the deceased-father, the accused who inflicted fatal injury on the head of the deceased was convicted under s 304, Pt II and the other accused persons who inflicted sword-injury were convicted under s 324, IPC .[93]

Where the accused persons being the father, mother and their son, were involved in causing grievous and simple hurt on the person of the injured, the accused-father who caused the head injury was convicted under s 326, and the other accused were convicted under s 324, IPC .[94]

If a person urinates in front of the house of another person occupied by members of his family including woman folk, the owner of the house has a right to object and if a person persists in using that place as an urinal, this would amount to causing of provocation. Thus, the accused who caused injuries to the victim on such provocation was found guilty under s 335 and the other accused who caused injuries to the intervener or who gave no provocation was held guilty for causing simple injury under s 324, IPC .[95]

27. Probation

In view of fact that occurrence took place more than decade ago and accused persons were not previous convicts and remained in jail for considerable period of time, the benefit of probation was extended to them.[96] Accused, a yound lady was not a previous convict so was entitled to benefit of the Uttar Pradesh

First Offenders Probation, other accused being a male person, his case could not be equated with lady accused though role assigned to him during incident might be the same.[97]2824

Where the accused person inflicted injuries with a knife on the person of the injured and the injuries were not caused with an intention to kill, the benefit of probation extended to the accused persons was not found unjustified.[1] The simple injuries caused to the victim were suggestive of intention of the accused to give a beating only and not to cause the death of the victim, more so, when the accused did not inflict fatal blows despite having plenty of time, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 307 to s 324, IPC . However, since the injuries sustained by the injured were minor and superficial in nature, the case was found fit where the benefit of s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act should be extended to the accused.[2] Where it was apparent that the incident occurred at the spur of the moment and was traverse in nature, there was no material on record to indicate that the accused persons were having any previous conviction, in the absence of such evidence, they were first offenders, and were released on probation.[3] The accused persons who made assault using danda and fists which caused simple injuries to victim were found entitled to benefit of s 4 of Probation of Offenders Act 1958.[4]

However, where the occurrence took place on account of the victim, the brother of the accused, asking the accused to refund borrowed money, the assault inflicted by the accused was pre-determined, the accused was found not entitled to the benefit of s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act .[5]

28. Sentence

A proper reading of ss 326 and 324, IPC, read with s 354, CrPC shows that a separate order of sentence is required to be passed for each offence proved for which the accused is convicted.[6] Where the accused are convicted of offences under ss 324, 325 and 326 read with s 147, it is not proper to pass one sentence for all the offences; but if the cumulative sentence passed is such that it can be passed by the magistrate in respect of any one of the offences, it is not illegal.[7] A sentence of three years rigorous imprisonment is not excessive for an offence under this section even though the injury caused is simple.[8] The fact that injuries were simple, or that five years have elapsed from the date of incident, is no just ground for the reduction of sentence.[9] However, in State of Bihar v Lala Mahto ,[10] the sentence inflicted on a boy of 18 years was reduced to one years rigorous imprisonment where it was not known as to who began the assault and the accused was not found vindictive. In Modi Ram v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[11] the Supreme Court keeping in view the nature of the act of the victim, which caused provocation and sense of humiliation in the accused, reduced sentence of eight years rigorous imprisonment (which was enhanced by the High Court from one year's rigorous imprisonment) into three years rigorous imprisonment.2825

The gunshot injury caused to the victim was a muscle injury, the doctor did not depose that the injury was grievous. The incident took place 20 years before. The sentence of 3 years imposed by Court was reduced to one year RI and compensation of Rs. 20000/-.[12]

In considering sentence, the appellate court must take into account the fact that the appellant was not released on bail during the trial as also during the pendency of the appeal, and has, thus, undergone rigorous imprisonment.[13]

Where the accused had suffered an ordeal of protracted trial for about 15 years his sentence of imprisonment was reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone, but he was directed to pay a fine of Rs 1,000[14] where the incident took place 24 years ago, the accused convicted under s 324 was found entitled to reduction of sentence to the period already undergone.[15] Where there was a long gap between the date of occurrence and the hearing of appeal, and the accused was on bail during trial and appeal for about 16 years, and he also remained in custody for 55 days, the sentence of the accused was reduced to the period already undergone by him as an undertrial and as a convict but the amount of fine was enhanced from Rs 1000 to Rs 3000.[16] Where the accused person caused simple bodily injuries to victims with a deadly weapon, the trial continued for 22 years, the sentence of imprisonment of the accused was reduced to the period already undergone.[17] Where the occurrence took place on the spur of the moment without any premeditation or plan by the accused, the incident took 15 years back and each accused remained in jail for a period of a fortnight, the sentence of the accused was reduced to imprisonment already undergone, and also a sentence of fine was increased from Rs 200 to Rs 500.[18]

Where the accused were agriculturists and not regular or hardened criminals, the sentence of fine of Rs 1000 was found proper.[19]

The accused persons attacked the victim with casuarina sticks and caused simple injuries on his legs. The imposition of sentence of fine of Rs 500 was found proper.[20] The accused were convicted under s 324 for causing hurt by dangerous weapon. The incident took place nearly 24 years back. The imposition of sentence of fine of Rs 5000 for each accused was found proper.[21]

Where the conviction of the accused was altered from s 307 to s 324, IPC, the accused had been in custody as an undertrial for a period of one month and 18 days and as a convict two months and 12 days which makes the total period of his custody as 120 days, the sentence of the accused was reduced to the period of imprisonment2826 already undergone by him, but fine was enhanced from Rs 200 to Rs 6000 out of which Rs 4000 were directed to be paid to the injured.[22]

The incident was 12 years old. The High Court had reduced the sentence to period of four years already undergone. The reduction of sentence ordered by the High Court was held proper.[23]

29. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 324

Four accused persons armed with iron rod, knife, dang had assaulted the deceased, and caused injuries. The appellant no. 4 inflicted 4-5 knife blows in the abdomen of the deceased as a result of which the deceased fell down. After the deceased fell own, appellant nos. 1, 2 and 3 did not inflict injuries on the deceased. Conviction of the other appellant nos. 1, 2 and 3 under ss 302 / 34, IPC was set aside. However, they were convicted under ss 323 / 34 and 324 / 34, IPC .[24]

Evidence of reliable eye-witnesses proved assault by the accused persons on the deceased causing injuries. Accused was also named in dying declaration of the deceased. The medical evidence did not show that the deceased eventually died on account of the injuries, the accused were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC, but were convicted under ss 326 and 324, IPC .[25]

Where both oral and medical evidence established that the accused inflicted lathi injury on the left shoulder of the victim, his conviction under ss 302 / 34, 307 / 34, IPC was altered into one under s 324, IPC .[26]

33. Alteration of Conviction from Section 326 to Section 324

Medical report showing two injuries on the head of injured, but there was no evidence as to which of those two injuries were caused by the accused, thus, the accused could not be held responsible for causing fracture of parietal bone and so, he was found liable to be convicted under s 324 instead of s 326 .[27] Where the accused assaulted the complainant with an axe, the injury caused on the person of the complainant was found simple and not grievous, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 326 to s 324, IPC .[28] Where the accused caused a knife injury on the belly of the injured, the injured was discharged from hospital after a few days, there was no material on record to conclude that the injury caused severe physical pain for 20 days or that the victim was unable to follow his ordinary pursuits for 20 days, in the absence of appropriate material on record by categorical evidence through the mouth of the doctor that the injury had endangered the life of the victim, it would not be appropriate to come to a conclusion that a grievous injury had been caused inspite of the opinion of the two doctors to the contrary, the conviction of the accused under s 326 was therefore altered to one under s 324 for simple hurt with a deadly weapon.[29] Where one accused gave a knife blow where the other accused caught hold of the victim, the mere opinion of a doctor that the injury if grievous without supporting reasons may not be sufficient in every case to hold that grievous injury as envisaged in s 320 has been caused, the injured was discharged from the hospital after about 7 days and there was no material on record to indicate that injury had endangered life of the victim, the conviction of the accused was therefore altered from s 326 to s 324, IPC .[30]

The mere fact that the victim remained in hospital for 20 days is not sufficient to attract cl 8 of s 320 when the evidence of the doctor does not show that during that period the victim was in severe bodily pain or unable to follow his ordinary pursuits, the conviction of the accused was therefore altered from s 326 to one under s 324, IPC .[31]

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 325.

Punishment for voluntarily causing grievous hurt.--

Whoever, except in the case provided for by section 335, voluntarily causes grievous hurt, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.2828

Comments

1. Scope

This section prescribes the punishment for voluntarily causing grievous hurt which is made an offence under s 322, IPC . A person is said to voluntarily cause grievous hurt when the hurt caused by him, is of the nature of any of the eight kinds of hurt enumerated in s 320, IPC, and he intends or knows himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt. It may be presumed from the conduct of several persons, striking another with lathis, that each of them intends to cause grievous hurt; but such a presumption alone is not sufficient to establish the offence of causing grievous hurt against an accused unless it is further shown that that accused actually caused grievous hurt.[32] In short, to make out the offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt, there must be some specific hurt, voluntarily inflicted within the meaning of s 322, and coming within some of the eight kinds of hurt enumerated in s 320 .[33]A person can be said to voluntarily cause grievous hurt even if, intending or knowing himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt of one kind, he actually causes grievous hurt of another kind. Where a person struck a blow to another causing death without any intention of causing death, or of causing such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, or without the knowledge that he was likely, by such act, to cause death, but with the intention of causing grievous hurt, it was held that the offence, of which such person was guilty, was not the offence of causing death by a rash act, but the offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt.[34] The intention can be inferred from the circumstances of the case and the nature of the injury caused. [35]Section 335, IPC provides an exception to this section.

2. Motive

Where the complainant and his daughter were the victims of the highhandedness of the accused who teased the daughter of the complainant, because the complainant and his daughter had reported the matter to the panchayat, the accused felt offended and that was the motive for the commission of the crime.[36]

3. Grievous Hurt Distinguished from Culpable Homicide not Amounting to Murder

Culpable homicide not amounting to murder presupposes that the party inflicting the injury does it either with the intention that it should cause death, or with the2829 knowledge that it may do so, and the offence is modified from murder (which it would be if the above mentioned knowledge or intention is proved) by the existence of certain exceptions, noted under s 300 of the IPC . When there is neither intention, nor knowledge, nor likelihood, that the injury inflicted will or can cause death, the offence would be 'voluntarily causing grievous hurt' under s 322, punishable under s 325 .[37] The only distinction between culpable homicide not amounting to murder as defined in s 299, IPC, and an injury which falls within the definition of grievous hurt, on the ground that it 'endangers life' is this that, in the former case death occurs while, in the latter case death does not take place.[38] Giving of fist blows on the abdomen of the victim under normal conditions is neither likely to cause his death nor endangers his life so as to invoke the provision of s 320 .[39] Whether there was danger to life is to be taken with reference to the normal condition, and not with reference to the abnormal physique or health of the victim.[40] In Bai Jiba v Emperor ,[41] it was held that phrases such as 'hurt which endangers life' used in s 320, IPC, or 'injury which is likely to cause death' within the meaning of s 299, IPC, must be applied with reference to normal condition, and any hurt, which endangers human life, must also be likely to cause death. Where a person struck another a blow, which caused his death, without any intention of causing death, or of causing such bodily injury as was likely to cause death, or with the knowledge that he was likely, by such act, to cause death, but with the intention of causing grievous hurt, it was held that the offence, of which such person was guilty, was not the offence of causing death by a rash act, but of the offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt.

4. Benefit of Exception

Where an accused claims the benefit of an exception, the burden of proving that exception lies on him; but the burden is to be undertaken by the accused only when the prosecution case establishes that in the absence of such a plea, he would be guilty of the charge (under s 325 read with s 34, IPC). If there is no reliable evidence in support of the prosecution and the liability of the accused arises only from the plea of right of private defence, raised by him in his examination in the trial court, he can be convicted only if his plea amounts to a confession of guilt. However, if the plea amounts only to an admission of facts and raises a plea of justification, the court cannot proceed to deal with the case as if the admission of facts, which do not form part of the prosecution case, were true and the evidence does not warrant the plea of justification.[42]

5. 'Voluntarily'

Commentary under the same heading in ss 321, 322, ante, may be referred to.

6. 'Grievous Hurt'

Commentary under s 320, ante, may be referred to.2830

7. 'Voluntarily Causes Grievous Hurt'

Commentary under s 322, ante, may be referred to.

8. Inference of Intention or Knowledge

The intention or knowledge of a person causing hurt to another is a matter of inference from the nature of the weapon used, the manner of its use, the part of the body on which the hurt is caused, and the nature of injury, etc. If a man strikes another person a ferocious blow with a heavy stick upon a vital part of the body, he cannot complain of the inference being drawn that at the very least he must have known that grievous hurt was likely to be caused.[43] The probable result of the use of a lathi is at least grievous hurt caused and the assailants may be deemed to intend to cause grievous hurt.[44] It is much more so when a violent blow is struck with a lathi.[45]

When a person strikes a hard and determined blow on a vital part of the body of the victim, he must be deemed to have intended to cause, or, at least, to have known that he was likely to cause grievous hurt.[46] When it has come in evidence that the act complained of, was sufficient to cause fracture, the doer can well be attributed with knowledge that, by doing that act, he would be likely to cause grievous hurt.[47]

9. Stone

It is not that in every case a stone would constitute a dangerous weapon. It would depend upon the facts of the case. In view of the size of the stone used as weapon of assault, it could not be said that a dangerous weapon was used, hence, the conviction of the accused under s 326, IPC was altered to one under s 325, IPC .[48]

10. Illustrative Cases

(1) A struck B, a woman, carrying a child in her arms at the time, some violent blows on the head and shoulders. One of the blows fell on the child's head, from the effects of which it died. It was held that A was guilty of causing grievous hurt to the child.[49]

(2) A, B and C attacked D with lathi. One of them fractured D's skull by a blow and he died. It was held that they were all guilty under s 325, IPC, but not of culpable homicide.[50]

(3) A administered dhatura to B with the object of robbing him. B died therefrom. It was held that A was guilty of an offence under this section, but not of culpable homicide.[51]2831

(4) Where the deceased, after he was cured and discharged from the hospital, though it was not clear from medical evidence as to whether the injury on his head was, or was not, sufficient, in the ordinary course of nature, to cause death, was re-admitted after an attack of dysentery and thereafter, died, it was held that the accused was guilty of an offence under s 325, IPC .[52]

(5) Where it was found that the accused did not intend to kill the deceased nor cause such injury as was likely, in all probability, to cause his death, and all that he intended was to cause grievous hurt, it was held that he could be convicted under s 325, IPC .[53]

(6) Where the deceased died on account of the pus formation and toxaemia and not owing to the grievous hurt caused by the accused, the accused was held liable under s 325, and not under s 302 or s 323, IPC .[54]

(7) Accused inflicted knife blow on the chest, vital part of body, causing death of the deceased. He was convicted under s 302, IPC and not under s 325, IPC .[55]

Where the accused, duly armed with lathis, launched a concerted attack on the victim, causing 33 injuries on the various parts of his body, it was held that knowledge to cause grievous hurt could safely be attributed to the assailants.[56]

In Kalika Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[57] several injuries caused to the complainant by the accused by fists and a lathi, included a fracture caused to his left thumb by his fall to the ground during his beating by the accused. It was held that they were liable under s 325 read with s 34, IPC, even though the fracture was caused by the fall, and not by the lathi.

One accused P had given beating with her plastic shoes to the deceased an old lady, causing death. Petitioner persons who arrived on the spot were not armed, did not indulge in or facilitating the shoe beating by the accused P. Held, the petitioners accused did not share common intention of the accused P, thus, all were acquitted of the charge under ss 325 / 34, IPC .[58]

Where the accused husband inserted his fingers and a stick in the vagina of his wife as a result of which she sustained heavy bleeding injury, delay in lodging FIR was properly and satisfactorily explained, evidence of victim wife was convincing and trustworthy and corroborated by medical evidence with regard to nature and cause of injuries sustained by her, mere non-seizure of the stick alleged to have been inserted in the vagina of victim would not affect the prosecution case and so the conviction of the accused under s 325 was found proper.[59]

11. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable only with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution is pending, and is triable by a magistrate.2832

12. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the.....day of...., at..... you voluntarily caused grievous hurt to AB and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 325 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

It is wrong to use the word 'willingly', instead of 'voluntarily', in the charge as the word 'voluntarily' is used in the section in a technical sense and means something more than 'willingly'. It is, however, not necessary to specify the kind of grievous hurt caused by the accused, as, under the explanation to s 322, the accused can be said to voluntarily cause grievous hurt even if, intending, or knowing himself likely, to cause grievous hurt of one kind, he actually causes grievous hurt of another kind.

Even if a charge is initially framed only for an offence under s 323, IPC, the magistrate, by virtue of the provisions in s 216 (1) and (2) of the CrPC, can alter the charge and frame a new charge under s 325, IPC .[60]

13. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must establish that:

(a) the accused caused grievous hurt;[61] and
(b) he did it voluntarily.[62]

When the accused persons made a concerted assault on the victim with weapons like axe, cycle-chain and stick, it can be reasonably presumed that they shared a common intention to inflict grievous hurt on him in terms of s 325, IPC making them liable under s 325 read with s 34, IPC .[63]

In case(s), where several accused persons assault and give numerous blows to the deceased, evidence is quite unclear as to whose blow resulted in the death of the deceased, accused have no intention to kill, the accused would be convicted under ss 325 / 34, IPC and not under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[64]

14. Medical Evidence

There must be evidence to show that the hurt caused is such as is described in s 320, IPC . A mere report of the civil surgeon is not sufficient.[65] The production of X-ray photo is essential to establish a fracture.[66]2833

Non-examination by doctors is not proper even though the tendering of wound certificates which are public documents by the investigating officer is legally permissible. The court, however, should never overlook the fact that there are various special features in relation to medical evidence about which only the doctor can depose. However, when the wound certificate by the prosecution is not disputed by the defence and examination of the doctor is also not insisted upon, the non-examination of the doctor is not fatal to the prosecution.[67]

15. Non-Explanation of Injuries on the Person of Accused

It is for the prosecution to explain as to how the accused suffered injuries, if the prosecution did not explain any of the injuries found on the accused and on the contrary, it totally denied that the accused suffered injuries at the hands of the witnesses. It gives presumption that the witnesses were suppressing genesis and the origin of the incident when they gave evidence in the case, so the accused is entitled to be acquitted.

16. Cross-Examination by Prosecutor

Ordinarily, a party calling his witness is not allowed to cross-examine him but this ordinary rule is relaxed by s 154 of the Evidence Act . The purpose of such relaxation is only to find out if the witness is telling the truth and can be relied on, because cross-examination is the most powerful and effective instrument for bringing out and testing the truth. However, before permitting the prosecution to cross-examine the witness it has to be shown that the witness has resiled from the statement made by him during investigation. The prosecution must lay foundation for examining his own witness in the nature of cross-examination and if the court finds from the temper, attitude, inconsistent statement or otherwise, that leave should be granted, the court should readily grant the permission at any stage of examination of the witness.[68]

17. Compounding of Offence under this Section

An offence under s 325, IPC, can be compounded with the permission of the court. The effect of such permission is the acquittal of the accused in view of the provisions of s 320(8) of the CrPC .[69] But the compounding of offence after the judgment of conviction is not permissible as once a court passes a judgment of conviction, it has to pass the order regarding sentence in accordance with the law, regard being had to the provisions of s 360 of the CrPC in appropriate cases, and it cannot permit compounding of offence at that stage. However, if further order is passed by the trial court and if it is challenged in appeal, the appellate court can consider the prayer for compounding of the offence under sub-s (5) of s 321 and if a revision is preferred either to the court of session or to the High Court, the revisional court can consider the same under sub-s (6) of s 320 of the CrPC .[70]

18. Acquittal

Where the accused gave slaps and fist blows to the victim whereby he fell down and sustained grievous and simple injuries, the version of the victim in the FIR and in his2834 statement in the court was contradictory, the case seemed to have been instituted and initiated as a counter-blast to the report lodged by the accused earlier against the victim, the acquittal of the accused under s 325, IPC, was found proper.[71] The allegation against the accused-persons were of causing voluntarily grievous hurt and assault, the statement of the complainant before the court and in the FIR were contradictory, the story given in the FIR was that the accused pelted stones on the complainant and his sons which caused injuries, whereas in the statement before the court it was stated that the bleeding injury to the nose of the complainant was caused due to a lathi blow, because as per the medical report, the injuries caused were not serious and the same did not match the prosecution story, the acquittal of the accused in these circumstances was found proper.[72] Where the injuries on the accused were not explained and eyewitnesses showed their ignorance about them, no independent witness was examined by the prosecution, statements of the accused under s 313, CrPC, were not properly recorded, the probability of a quarrel at the instance of the complainant party could not be ruled out, the accused were found entitled to be acquitted.[73] The conviction of the accused under s 325 based on the evidence of the widow of the deceased victim, supported by medical evidence and to some extent by the testimony of hostile witnesses is not improper.[74] When the victim who had suffered grievous injury on his right arm did not state that he had suffered any injury on his right arm at the hands of the accused persons, it is not possible to maintain conviction of accused persons under s 325, IPC .[75] Where the trial court examined three injured witnesses but did not give reasons for discarding their testimony, the acquittal of the accused by the trial court for want of availability of independent eyewitnesses was found not proper and was set aside and the case remanded back to the chief judicial magistrate for further necessary action in accordance with law.[76]

19. Conviction

An accused can be convicted under s 325 even when he is acquitted under s 397, IPC .[77] If, out of the two accused, charged under s 325 read with s 34, one is acquitted after being given the benefit of the doubt, the other accused cannot be convicted under ss 325 / 34 .[78] However, a conviction under s 304 read with s 34, can be altered to one under s 325 read with s 34 .[79] Similarly, a person, charged under s 326 read with s 149, may be convicted under s 325 read with s 34,[80] or merely under s 325 .[81]

Due to enmity between two rival groups in the incident, one person died. Medical evidence showed that the deceased was aged 60 years and suffering from cervical spondylosis. The deceased had sustained fracture of cervical spine. The injuries2835 sustained by the deceased were simple in nature. The injury caused to the deceased was neither intentional nor the members of the unlawful assembly had knowledge that the injury received by the deceased could have caused death. Accused were convicted under ss 325, 323 read with s 34 .[82]

Where an accused is charged under s 325 read with s 149 and he has been acquitted of this charge, he cannot be convicted for the specific offence under s 325, IPC .[83] If, however, the common object of an unlawful assembly is found to be merely causing simple hurt, and not grievous hurt, but one of them causes a grievous hurt, he alone is liable for the grievous hurt; all cannot be held guilty of an offence under s 325 read with s 149 .[84] In Pritam Singh v State of Punjab ,[85] where two out of six persons in a trial under ss 325, 148 and 149, had been acquitted, it was held that as s 148 under the circumstances could not apply, conviction of the remaining accused under ss 325 / 149, IPC, was not maintainable.

20. Separate Convictions

Where the two offences under s 147, and ss 325, 149, IPC, are held to have been committed by the same acts and the accused convicted thereof, the offenders are not liable to be punished with the punishment for more than one of such offences under s 71 .[86] However, in Empress v Bisheshar ,[87] the rioting under s 147 could not be held to be a part of voluntarily causing grievous hurt under s 325 and, therefore, the provisions of s 71 were held to be inapplicable.[88] In Empress v Bana Punja ,[89] it was held that separate sentences for s 147, and ss 323 / 149, IPC, are legal if the total punishment does not exceed the maximum for any of the offences.

21. Probation

Where there were cross-versions and the accused persons had already undergone part of the sentence awarded, they should be released on probation.[90]

Where the accused committing an offence under s 325, IPC, were less than 21 years of age and were first offenders and had given fist and leg blows on the stomach and waist of the injured, and they had faced trial for about 10 years, the accused persons were released on probation of good conduct under s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958 on their furnishing a personal bond in the sum of Rs 1000 each, together with surety bond of the like amount for a period of 3 years. In addition, they were directed to pay compensation of Rs 12,500 each to the injured.[91]2836

To be a student is no reason by itself for showing leniency to a culprit. Section 6 of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958, however, provides to give benefit of s 3 or s 4 of the said Act to a person who is below 21 years of age at the time of commission of an offence if such offence is not punishable with life imprisonment. These provisions, no doubt, are of mandatory nature. However, the court is not to give the benefit of probation if it is not warranted in view of the circumstances of the case, nature of the offence and the character of the accused.[1]

Since the grievous injury inflicted was intentional, the appellant accused convict was not released on probation of good conduct. However, as the incident was ten years old, and the appellant had been in custody for 15 days, the sentence of one year imposed was reduced to the period already undergone, and he was directed to pay Rs.10,000/- as compensation.[2]

22. 'Shall also be Liable to Fine'

It is not obligatory for the court to impose a sentence of imprisonment, and also a sentence of fine.[3] The court has, under this section, no option to dispense with the sentence of imprisonment and award the sentence of fine only. To award a sentence of fine only is illegal, which illegality can be set aside by the High Court under s 401 of the CrPC .[4] There must be a sentence of imprisonment, irrespective of whether a sentence of fine is imposed.[5]

23. Punishment

The imposition of sentence is always a matter of discretion, and unless the discretion has been exercised arbitrarily or capriciously, based on unsound principles, or the court has not taken into account any relevant factors in imposing sentence, a reduction in sentence would not be justified in appeal.[6] In awarding sentence, the court should take, into account, the weapon used, the manner in which the offence was committed, and the consequences that had ensued.[7] Provocation may be taken as a mitigating circumstance.[8] If, however, the court is satisfied that the accused is responsible for the injuries caused, he must be given a substantial sentence of imprisonment, and not a nominal sentence of imprisonment till rising of the court.[9] The fact that the accused persons are settled in life during pendency of appeal does not constitute mitigating circumstances to award lesser punishment.[10] In Abadhraj Dukharam v State of Maharashtra ,[11] the submission for reducing the sentence of one2837 year's rigorous imprisonment was rejected because the injury caused was serious and it was inflicted by tearing a portion of the abdomen by razor. In Rabi Deb Burma v State ,[12] however, a sentence of seven year's rigorous imprisonment, along with a fine of Rs 1,000, was reduced to a sentence of five year's rigorous imprisonment with a fine of Rs 500 as the assault made by the appellant was not found premeditated.

Where 16 years had passed from the date of incident and the accused did not have any criminal antecedents or adverse criminal history, the sentence was reduced to the period already undergone and the accused were directed to pay the fine of Rs 10000 each to be payable to the widow of the deceased.[13] Where the impugned incident took place more than 26 years ago and the accused were now more than 60 years old, the sentence of imprisonment was reduced from the period of 5 years to 2 years.[14]

Where the incident took place about 8 years ago and by that time the socio-economic conditions of the accused persons had undergone a radical change, the accused were in jail during the pendency of the case for 42 days and they had no criminal history or bad antecedents, the sentence of the accused were reduced to the period of imprisonment already undergone but the fine imposed upon them was enhanced to Rs 2000 each.[15] Where the incident took place 15 years back, and accused were not previous convicts, the injuries caused to the victim were almost superficial except the fracture of the fifth metacorpal bone of the right hand of the victim, the accused persons were sentenced to pay a fine of Rs 800 each and in default to undergo rigorous imprisonment for 6 months, the fine realised was to be paid as compensation to the victim or his legal representatives as the case may be.[16] The accused being the old man of 86 years; having caused injury on the non-vital part of the body and having undergone one year of sentence was sentenced to imprisonment already undergone by him.[17]

However, in some cases, the High Court refused to interfere on the ground that it was only a formal defect,[18] or that a court, sitting in revision, is not bound to interfere even though an illegality has been committed by the lower court if it finds that substantial justice has been done.[19] In Ghariby v State ,[20] the High Court exercised its revisional powers, suo motu, to alter a conviction under s 304, read with s 34, to one under s 325 read with s 34, and to reduce the sentence. It was also held there that the mere fact, that a man who unfortunately lost his life, should not be a reason for inflicting too severe a punishment. Where the injuries inflicted were of a minor nature and one of them, which was described to be grievous and detected only after four or five days, involved a fracture of a metacarpal bone in the right hand, the High Court interfered in revision and reduced a sentence of six months imprisonment to2838 that already undergone (one and a half months).[21] A gun shot was fired by one of the accused appellants on the left leg of the injured. The accused appellants were convicted under ss 325 / 34, IPC, the sentence awarded was already undergone.[22]

Injury was caused by stone. As major portion of the sentence had already been served by the accused convict, sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[23]

24. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 325

Commentary under the same heading in s 302, ante, may be referred to.

Except one witness who stated that the appellant assaulted the deceased with a stick the other purported eye-witnesses stated that the accused appellant gave only fist blow to the deceased. The conviction of accused appellant under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 325, IPC .[24]

25. Alteration of Conviction from Section 304 to Section 325

Commentary under s 304, ante, may be referred to.

The prosecution story was that the accused appellant, nephew of the deceased aged 76 years, sat on the chest of the deceased and had hit his head with stone. There was evidence of PW that after the appellant had sat on the chest of the deceased he had held his head and repeatedly hit it against the ground. The injuries caused were apparently not with a stone but it was the concussion and the rough handling by the appellant that had led to the internal injury to the brain which had resulted in haematomal haemorrhage and then to death. The conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II, IPC recorded by Courts below was altered to one under s 325, IPC and sentence of seven years was reduced to sentence (two years) already undergone.[25]

26. Conviction of Accused when not Alterable to Section 325 from Section 304, Part II

When one of the injuries inflicted over the left ear caused fracture of left parietal and left temporal bone extending to the frontel and occipital region, such an injury is not contemplated by s 325, so the conviction of the accused under s 304, Pt II was found proper.[26]

27. Alteration of Conviction from Section 307 to Section 325

Commentary under the same heading in s 307, ante, may be referred to.

28. Alteration of Conviction from Section 326 to Section 325

Commentary under the same heading in s 326, post, may be referred to.2839

Where grievous injuries were caused to the victim by using the blunt part of the axe, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 326 to s 325, IPC . Where the accused struck the victim with a lathi which is a blunt weapon, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 326 to s 325 . Where one accused assaulted the deceased with a stick, and others used only fists and kicks, the stick with which the assault was caused was not identified, there was no finding that the stick was capable of causing death, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 326 to s 325, IPC .[27]

29. Alteration of Conviction from Section 325 to Section 335

Where the handicapped brother of the accused was thrown on ground by the deceased, the accused in a sudden provocation picked up a stick and beat the deceased on his head, the offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt on provocation under s 335 was made out, hence, conviction of the accused under s 325 was altered to one under s 335 .[28]

30. Alteration of Conviction under Section 324 to Section 325

Injury inflicted on the victim by the accused was contusion on the left side of chest. X-ray report showed that there was fracture of the first rib on the left side. Held, the injury was not a 'hurt', but was a grievous hurt. Conviction of the accused under s 324, IPC was altered to one under s 325, IPC .[29]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 326.

Voluntarily causing grievous hurt by dangerous weapons or means.--

Whoever, except in the case provided for by section 335, voluntarily causes grievous hurt by means of any instrument for shooting, stabbing or cutting, or any instrument which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, or by means of fire or any heated substance, or by means of any poison or any corrosive substance, or by means of any explosive substance, or by means of any substance which it is deleterious to the human body to inhale, to swallow, or to receive into the blood, or by means of any animal, shall be punished with [30][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.2840

Comments

1. Scope

This section closely corresponds to s 324, IPC, the only difference between the two being that while s 324 relates to simple hurt, this section relates to grievous hurt. The offences under this section and s 324 are only aggravated forms of the offences under ss 325 and 323, IPC, respectively. This section applies only to a person who does a substantive act, causing grievous hurt, as defined in s 320, IPC, by some dangerous weapon or means.[31]

Section 325, IPC is an exception to this section also.

Since this section closely corresponds to s 324, IPC, the commentary under that section may be read as the commentary under this section also, and what follows may be read as supplementing that commentary.

2. Essential Ingredients

For commission of an offence under s 326, IPC, the essential ingredient is that the grievous hurt must be caused by means of an instrument of cutting, stabbing, shooting, etc.[32] The heading of the section provides some insight into the factors to be considered. The essential ingredients to attract s 326 are: (1) voluntarily causing a hurt; (2) hurt caused must be a grievous hurt; and (3) the grievous hurt must have been caused by dangerous weapons or means.[33]

3. Applicability of Section 34 to Section 326

To apply s 34, IPC, apart from the fact that there should be two or more accused, two factors must be established (i) common intention; and (ii) participation of the accused in the commission of an offence. If common intention is proved but no overt act is attributed to the individual accused, s 34 will be attracted as it essentially involves vicarious liability, but if participation of the accused in the crime is proved and common intention is absent, s 34 cannot be invoked. In every case it is not possible to have direct evidence of common intention. It has to be inferred from the facts and circumstances of each case.[34]2841

The accused caught hold of the victim while the co-accused inflicted knife blow on the victim. The accused could be said to have shared common intention of causing grievous hurt to the victim and their conviction under ss 326 / 34, IPC, was held proper.[35]

Where the accused, though he went with the two other offenders, did not, at all, participate in the assault on the deceased, but, on the other hand, threw brickbats on somebody else and was not even armed with a stick, which was the weapon, with which the deceased was assaulted, it was held that his conviction under ss 326 / 34 was proper.[36] Where grievous hurt has been caused by a particular accused, but not in furtherance of the common intention of all the accused, the other accused cannot be held guilty under s 326 read with s 34, IPC .[37]

If it is proved that the accused armed with a deadly weapon, gave an order to other persons armed with deadly weapons, to assault the complainant, the accused can be convicted under s 326 read with s 34, even if the original charge is under s 326 read with s 149, IPC .[38]

For further commentary, text under s 34, ante, vol 1, may be referred to.

4. Applicability of Section 149 to Section 326

Where, in a free fight, the accused are not found to be the aggressors, though the prosecution side might get the worse of it after the fight was started, no case against them under ss 147, 148 or 149, IPC can be maintained, and it is for the prosecution to prove the individual assaults.[39] In Ram Prasad Singh v Emperor ,[40] it was held that if a member of an unlawful assembly is to be found constructively guilty of an offence, it must be the same offence of which the principal is guilty, and not some other offence. Once an assembly becomes unlawful, all things, done in the prosecution of the common unlawful object of that assembly, are chargeable against every member thereof. The liability of every member extends not only to the acts intended by all to be done, but also to those offences which were likely to be committed in achieving the common object.[41] It has to be determined, with reference to the facts of a case, as to what offence the members must have known to be likely to be committed. If such offence is a minor offence, then they should be convicted accordingly.[42] As long ago as 1894, it was pointed out, in Jahiruddin v Empress ,[43] that members of an unlawful assembly may have a community of object only up to a certain point, beyond which they may differ in their objects, and that the knowledge possessed by each member of what is likely to be committed in prosecution of their common object will vary, not2842 only according to information at command, but also according to the extent to which he shares the community of object, and, as a consequence of this, the effect of s 149 of the IPC may be different on different members of the same unlawful assembly. Therefore, a conviction for an offence under s 326 read with s 149, may be recorded against the members of an unlawful assembly even if it be established that the offence of murder was committed only by a member of that assembly.[44]

Where grievous hurt has been caused by a particular accused, but not in prosecution of the common object of the unlawful assembly, the other accused cannot be held guilty of an offence under s 326 read with s 149, IPC .[45] Where the three accused were armed with jellis and there was nothing to rule out that each of them gave one blow, it was held that even assuming that one of the accused did not cause any injury, that fact alone could not exculpate him.[46] In MuthaNaicker v State of Tamil Nadu ,[47] it was held that when some of the accused, charged under ss 326 / 149 have been acquitted, it would not only be unfair, but also self contradictory, to sustain the conviction of the remaining accused under ss 326 / 149, IPC .

5. 'Voluntarily Causes Grievous Hurt'

To constitute an offence under this section, the act of the offender must have been done voluntarily.[48] Even if death ensues, the offender can be held guilty only under this section unless his intention or knowledge is proved to be such as is required by s 300, or even by s 299,[49] and the injury inflicted is the direct cause of death.[50] Reading s 321 with s 322, it is obvious that the guilt of an accused person remains just the same, whether in seeking to inflict simple or grievous hurt, as the case may be, upon one person, he actually causes the intended hurt to that person or to some other.[51]

6. 'Any Instrument which used as a Weapon of Offence, is Likely to Cause Death'

A perusal of s 326, IPC, would show that a stone would only fall within its ambit if it is of a size and weight that if 'used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death'. When stones used were not as big and heavy as were likely to cause death, the conviction of the accused under s 326 is not proper.[52]

An offence of grievous hurt stipulated in s 326, IPC would be made out if grievous hurt is caused by 'any instrument which used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death'. The stick would fall within the ambit of the said expression under s 326 .[53]2843

7. Dangerous Weapon

Whether a particular article can per se cause any serious wound or grievous hurt or injury has to be determined factually. It would be relevant to note that in some provisions e.g., ss 324 and 326, IPC, expression 'dangerous weapon' is used. In some other more serious offences the expression used is 'deadly weapon' (e.g., ss 397 and 398). The facts involved in a particular case, depending upon various factors like size, sharpness, would throw light on the question whether the weapon was a dangerous or deadly weapon. That would determine whether in the case s 325 or s 326 would be applicable. It is not that in every case a stone would constitute a dangerous weapon. It would depend upon the facts of the case.[54]

8. Stone

It is not that in every case a stone would constitute a dangerous weapon. It would depend upon the facts of the case. In view of the size of the stone used as weapon of assault, it could not be said that a dangerous weapon was used, hence, the conviction of the accused under s 326, IPC was altered to one under s 325, IPC .[55]

9. Identity of Accused

As a matter of fact, in case of known persons the existence of light is not essential for their recognition.[56] Known persons can be recognised by their gait, timbre of their voice, etc.[57] When the accused was the husband of one of the victims and his name was disclosed to the police immediately after the occurrence, the identity of the accused cannot be mistaken by the victims.[58]

10. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and can be tried by a magistrate of the first class.

Offence under s 326, IPC is non-compoundable, the Court would not grant permission to compound the offence.[59]

11. Reference of Case to the Lok Adalat--Permissibility

Sub-section (5) of s 19 of Ch 6 of the Legal Services Authorities Act 1987 reads as follows:

> ...
> (5) A Lok Adalat shall have jurisdiction to determine and to arrive at a compromise or settlement between the parties to a dispute in respect of--
> (i) any case pending before; or
> (ii) any matter which is falling within the jurisdiction of and is not brought before, any court for which the Lok Adalat is organised:2844
> Provided that the Lok Adalat shall have no jurisdiction in respect of any case or matter relating to an offence not compoundable under any law.

Merely because the police may invoke a particular section which may appear to be non-compoundable, that ipso facto will not bar the jurisdiction of the lok adalat provided the following factors are prevalent. Firstly, if on an examination of the material, i.e., the evidence and in particular the injuries, it clearly emerges that had a court even come to the conclusion that the accused was guilty, that the conviction would only be under a lesser offence as for instance where the chargesheet may invoke s 326, IPC, but the statements and the medical certificates only make out a charge under s 323 or s 324 ; the reference to the lok adalat would not be bad in such a situation. In many instances, where there is suspicion that the injury is more serious than it actually was, such as to where there is suspicion that a fracture has occurred and s 326 or s 307, IPC is originally invoked, which on a subsequent examination of the material before the court is wholly unjustified.

The legislature has intended through this enactment to put an end to a large number of disputes wherein cases are pending before the courts and where in the general and social interest a compromise is far more desirable. If the authority is satisfied that the parties have willingly compromised the dispute, the enactment provides for a closure of the proceedings, and that laudable objective should not be frustrated merely on technical grounds that the chargesheet may mention a section that is not compoundable. A careful examination of the record must be undertaken, and the order must clearly specify that the charge could only be under a section that is compoundable, but this does not mean that if the material discloses a non-compoundable offence, that the authority would still be entitled to entertain the dispute.[60]

12. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the...day of..., at..., you voluntarily caused grievous hurt to AB by means of exhibit, which is an instrument for shooting (or stabbing, etc, as the case may be), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 326 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

The charge under this section should mention the particular kind of weapon used for causing the hurt. Merely saying, that a dangerous weapon was used, is incorrect.[61]

Omission to mention s 149, IPC, in the charge is only an irregularity curable under s 215 and s 465 (1) of the CrPC, unless the accused has been prejudiced.[62]

Similarly, where a charge has been framed under ss 326 and 149, IPC, a conviction under s 326 alone is not necessarily bad when the accused has not been materially prejudiced by the form of the charge.[63]

However, when the victim had sustained firearm injuries on the neck and during his treatment a projectile/pellet of a bullet was extracted from the chest wall of the2845 victim, the prima facie offence under s 307 was made out. The framing of charge and taking cognizance of the offence by the magistrate under s 326 instead of s 307 is not proper inspite of the fact that then public prosecutor at the times of disposal of bail application had conceded that there was no material for an offence under s 307, IPC, which is exclusively triable by the court of session.[64] Whether the accused has committed offence punishable under s 326 or under s 307 of IPC are matters to be considered at the time of trial and not at the stage of framing of charges. Therefore, framing of charge for an offence under s 307, IPC is proper.[65]

13. Plea of Guilty

Conviction based on a plea of guilty is not sustainable when the question put by the magistrate, is found to be illegal.[66]

14. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) the accused voluntarily caused grievous hurt to some person; and
(2) it was caused by one of the means mentioned in the section.

Merely because the accused did not try to abscond immediately after the incident cannot establish that he was not guilty of the offence.[67]

In cases where there is admittedly enmity and when, in an occurrence, persons, belonging to the prosecution as well as the accused, are injured, it is necessary to look into the facts that have been proved, rather than accept the testimony of the witnesses at their face value.[68] Mere non- examination of investigating officer is not a prejudice to defence.[69] In the case of Sarat Chandra Naik v State of Orissa ,[70]

the Orissa High Court has held that in the absence of proof of X-Ray report, it is not proper to warrant a conviction for grievous hurt.

Where the accused appellant was convicted for having assaulted a police constable on duty with brick and caused injuries to him, the incident was 26 years old, the accused was now aged 74 years, the jail sentence of two years awarded to the accused was substituted by a fine of Rs. 8000/-.[71]

Non-production of the X-ray report and non-examination of the doctors who took the X-ray are sufficient to deduce that criminal liability either under s 325 or 326, IPC, is not established.[72]

It is imperative on the part of the trial Court to appreciate the evidence in proper prospective which would prove the prosecution case against the accused beyond reasonable doubt.[73] A close relative of the victim cannot be branded as interested witness.[74]2846

15. Putting Contradiction/Suggestion to the Witness

By putting suggestions to the witness and the witness denying the same will not amount to putting contradiction to the witness. The contradiction has to be put to the witness as contemplated under s 145 of the Evidence Act . If a contradiction is put to the witness and it is denied by him, then his attention has to be drawn to the statement made by such witness before the police or any other previous statement, and he must be given a reasonable opportunity to explain as to why such contradiction appears and he may give any answer if the statement made by him is shown to him and if he confronted with such a statement, and thereafter, the said contradiction must be proved through the investigation officer. Then only it amounts to putting the contradiction to the witness and getting it proved through the investigation officer.[75]

16. Private Defence

Under s 106 of the Evidence Act, a court is bound to presume absence of circumstances which fall within the exclusive knowledge of any person. Under s 105 of Evidence Act the burden of proving the general exception of private defence under ss 96 to 106 of the Evidence Act falls squarely on the shoulders of the accused. All courts shall presume the absence of such circumstances. The expression 'shall presume' is defined under s 4 of the Evidence Act . It is, of course, trite that the burden on an accused raising the plea of private defence is not as heavy or onerous as an initial paramount burden resting on the shoulders of the prosecution. At least by the inferior standards applicable to an accused facing a criminal trial, the burden under s 105 of the Evidence Act has to be discharged by the accused. The slender and feeble attempt to claim the right of private defence cannot succeed in generating any reasonable doubts in the mind of the court.[76] Where the accused on hearing his widowed sister-in-law's cry for help rushed to her house with a gandasa and found the injured grappling with her and trying to outrage her modesty, the accused saved his sister-in-law from the clutches of the injured and inflicted *gandasa*blow while the injured was running away, the act of the accused can be said to be in exercise of his right of private defence under s 100, IPC . Likewise, the accused was found entitled to be acquitted.[77]

The accused being the co-owner and possessor of land where the occurrence took place, is entitled to protection of right of private defence of property under s 104 .[78] However, when the accused persons are aggressors and came to the place of incident armed with deadly weapons, they cannot claim the right of private defence.[79]

17. Acquittal

An order convicting the accused alone under s 326, IPC on the ground that the injury in question was corresponding to the statement of one witness while rejecting the same evidence in relation to all other co-accused is not proper, moreso, when the2847 evidence of the doctor was that the injuries in question could have been caused by a weapon other than the seized weapon. So, the accused was entitled to acquittal.[80] The accused persons were alleged to have thrown acid on the complainant who was sleeping in the ward of the hospital. The testimony of the eyewitness and injured witness suffered from material discrepancies and their statements that they saw and identified the miscreants and disclosed their names did not corroborate with the evidence of the independent witness, there was delay in recording the FIR and sending it to the magistrate. The possibility of false implication of the accused persons on account of previous enmity would not be ruled out, so conviction of the accused persons was set aside.[81] The accused persons armed with kirpans and dang were alleged to have inflicted injuries on the person of the victim on account of a land dispute. The investigation of the case was bound to be biased and partial. The eyewitnesses had not given a correct account of the incident. The prosecution had not presented the true version and thereby suppressed the genesis and origin of the occurrence. The accused persons were found entitled to the benefit of the doubt and were acquitted of the charge under s 326, IPC .[82] Where the delay in recording the FIR was not properly explained by the prosecution who were liable to adverse inference, the injuries sustained by the accused were not explained by the prosecution, only interested witnesses were examined by the prosecution and no effort was made to examine independent witnesses, the conviction of the accused under s 326 was reversed to an acquittal.[83] Where most of the accused persons were acquitted by the High Court, the evidence of the prosecution witness including eyewitness was not reliable, the evidence of the witness examined to corroborate the testimony of the main witnesses be relied as a witness of truth, the prosecution failed to establish that the accused persons in questions attacked the deceased, the conviction of these accused under s 326 was therefore, set aside.[84]

The mere fact that the assault was made with a knife in the abdomen of the victim, does not establish an offence under s 26 unless, from the medical report, it is clearly made out that the injury caused was on a vital part of the body, was grievous in nature and likely to cause death.[85]

If the victim has sustained no grievous injury, nor any serious injury on any vital part of his body, no conviction under this section can be passed.[86]

18. Probation

By a cursory look at the provision of s 4(1) of the Probation of Offenders Act (20 of 1958), it is clear that when a person is guilty of an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life, the section has got no application at all. As the punishment prescribed for the offence under s 326 is imprisonment for life or imprisonment for 10 years and fine, the benefit of probation under s 4(1) of the said Act cannot be extended to the accused convicted under s 326, IPC .[87] Where the accused was a2848 young man and 17 years have elapsed after commission of the offence under s 326 but keeping in view the manner in which the deceased was killed, and the deceased's wife being a young woman was left without a husband, the benefit of probation under s 360, CrPC, was declined.[88]

19. Conviction

The accused was alleged to have attacked his sister-in-law with a iron rod in a fit of anger. The evidence of the injured was found trustworthy and nothing was elicited in cross-examination to discredit the same. The evidence of ocular witnesses was affirmed by medical evidence. The conviction of the accused under s 326 was found proper.[89] Where the appellant accused had caused grievous hurt by sharp edged weapon and the deceased died in hospital after 24 days, he was convicted under s 326, IPC .[90]

The ferocity with which all the accused chased and attacked the victim and grievously injured the victim, clearly made out a case for the offence under s 326, as the victim had a fracture and was bed-ridden for 15 days at the hospital.[91] The eyewitnesses and medical evidence supported the prosecution version of the injury, not sending of the sword for chemical examination was of no consequence when the charge was amply proved. The conviction of the accused under s 326, IPC, was found proper.[92]

20. Conviction Both Under Sections 307 And 326 Improper

Where an accused shoots one with a pistol, and thereby caused hurt to him, he is liable to conviction under the latter part of s 307 ; his conviction under s 326 for the same offence is not warranted.[93]

Commentary under the heading 'Accused convicted under Section 307 cannot be convicted and sentenced under Section 326 ' in s 307, ante, may be referred to.

21. Conviction of some accused under Section 326 and other under Different Section(S)

When the accused persons act individually in the fight and ss 34 and 149 are not attracted, they are liable for their own acts. Thus, where the deceased party tried to enter into possession of land occupied by the accused persons, forcibly, the accused who caused death was held to have exceeded his right of private defence and held liable under s 304, Pt I, while the other accused who caused grievous injury with a spear to an armed member of the deceased party was convicted under s 326, IPC .[94]

Where the members of an unlawful assembly, animated with the common object of causing grievous hurt, cause death and it is found that one of them was immediately2849 responsible for one of the deaths caused, that member is guilty of the offence of rioting under s 147, and of culpable homicide under s 304, and the rest are guilty of rioting and causing grievous hurt under s 325 read with s 149, IPC .[1]

The accused who inflicted knife injuries on the deceased and stabbed him to death was guilty under s 302 and the other accused who only caught hold of the hands of the deceased and there was nothing on record to suggest or prove their intention or knowledge to kill were found guilty under ss 326, 323 read with s 34, IPC .[2]

The two injured persons were going to Courts by tempo, the appellant accused persons emerged on the road, stopped the tempo and inflicted a number of injuries with sharp edged weapons and blunt weapons like hockey sticks. They were mercilessly beaten and attack was so severe that all the other passengers sitting on the tempo ran away from the spot and none came forward to save the injured. The injuries caused were dangerous to life. Persons who have suffered injuries would not shield the actual culprit and implicate an innocent person when false implication is pleaded. The testimony of eye-witnesses was found reliable. The conviction of the appellants under ss 307, 326 / 34, IPC was held proper.[3]

Where only accused A2 gave fatal blow, and other accused A2, A3 and A5 had not caused any injury but had carried deadly weapons, the knowledge that grievous injury may be caused can be attributed to them. Accused A2, A3 and A5, could not be convicted under ss 302 / 149, IPC but were convicted under s 326 read with s 149, IPC .[4]

Evidence of reliable eye-witnesses proved assault by the accused persons on the deceased causing injuries. Accused was also named in dying declaration of the deceased. The medical evidence did not show that the deceased eventually died on account of the injuries, the accused were acquitted of the charge under s 302, IPC, but were convicted under ss 326 and 324, IPC .[5]

22. Conviction under Section 326 Based on Doctrine of Transfer of Malice

See text under the same heading in s 301, ante.

23. Compounding Mitigates the Offence

An offence which the law declares to be non-compoundable even with the permission of the court cannot be compounded at all. The offence under s 326 is not compoundable under s 320, CrPC . So the court cannot permit the composition of this offence.[6]2850

Though an offence under this section is non-compoundable, the fact of compromise between the injured and the accused was taken into consideration by the Supreme Court in reducing the sentence of four years rigorous imprisonment to the period of four months already undergone.[7]

Similarly, some other cases where due to settlement between victims and the accused a lenient view was taken by the Supreme Court and the sentence of imprisonment was reduced to the period of 6 months,[8] 3 months,[9] several months[10] the accused had already undergone.

Where the accused had reached the age of about 60 years, and 16 years had passed since the date of offence, the dispute amongst the parties had been amicably settled, the sentence of imprisonment of the accused was reduced to the period already undergone and a fine of Rs 5000 was also imposed.[11]

24. Sentence

The section makes grievous hurt more grave and liable to more severe punishment which may extend to imprisonment for life. The important points to be considered in the matter of sentence would be the nature of injury, the weapon used and the part of the body on which the injury was caused.[12] Lapse of a long period between the date of commencement of the trial and the hearing of the appeal is a factor, which in the context of a particular case, may, in conjunction with other circumstances, justify the reduction of sentence. However, this is not an absolute rule justifying interference with the discretion of the trial court in the matter of sentence in every case.[13]

Where the accused inflicted a solitary blow with a sharp-edged weapon on the neck of the victim, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 326 and his sentence was modified from life imprisonment to 5 years imprisonment.[14] Where in a sudden quarrel, only one blow was inflicted by the accused, the sentence of ten years was altered to that of two years and fine of Rs 5,000/-.[15] Where the accused threw acid on the face and body of the injured thereby not only causing grievous injuries, but also destroying one of his eyes, the incident occured nineteen years back and the accused was 48 years of age at the relevant time, considering the old age of the accused, sentence of 3 years imprisonment was reduced to period of one year.[16]

25. Reduction in Sentence

Meagre sentence imposed solely on account of lapse of time without considering the degree of the offence will be counter-productive in the long run and against the interest of the society. As the accused had inflicted simple and grievous injuries on the complainant, the High Court merely on the ground of lapse of time was not justified in reducing the sentence to the period already undergone.[17]2851

Incident occurred in spur of moment and the accused and members of prosecution party were close relatives, the sentence of 5 years imprisonment reduced to 2 years.[18] Where the occurrence took place prior to 19 years and the accused had remained in jail for about 10 months as under-trial convict, the accused was sentenced to the period already undergone.[19] Although the sentence of three and a half years awarded to them was reasonable, but in view of the fact that all the accused persons were young within the age group of 23-25 years and 14 years had lapsed from the date of incident, their sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[20] The incident occurred 22 years before and there was no indulgence of accused persons, who assaulted the victim with barchhi and lathis, in any criminal activity during this span, the accused armed with the barchhi was sentenced to two years rigorous imprisonment under s 326 and one years rigorous imprisonment under s 324 with set off of the period of imprisonment already undergone and fine, the accused persons who were armed with lathis were sentenced to the period of imprisonment already undergone by them plus a fine.[21] The incident took place 16 years ago when the accused inflicted a solitary sword blow on the head of the victim causing grievous hurt, the accused remained in jail for nearly 2 months, the sentence of imprisonment of the accused was reduced from 3 years rigorous imprisonment to one year rigorous imprisonment.[22] The accused persons were college students when the offence under ss 326 / 34, IPC, was committed. They had undergone the ordeal of a trial for 15 years. The case was found fit to reduce the sentence to the period of imprisonment already undergone by the accused persons.[23] The incident took place 11 years back, the sentence of imprisonment of the accused was converted to fine of Rs 50,000 to be paid to the victim and in default of payment of fine the sentence of imprisonment of 3 years awarded by the trial court was directed to be implemented.[24]

The incident took place 17 years ago so considering long pendency of trial, the sentence of imprisonment was reduced to the period already undergone and sentence of fine was confirmed and the accused was directed to pay Rs 10000 as compensation to the injured.[25] Where the incident took place 6 years ago and the accused persons were not habitual criminals or previous convicts, the sentence of imprisonment of the accused persons was reduced to the period already undergone with fine of Rs 5,000 each.[26] However, the Apex Court has taken a contrary view which is not in consonance with the foregoing decisions of the different High Courts. The Supreme Court held that merely because the occurrence took place sometime back, the same cannot be affected to reduce the sentences.[27]2852

Where the role attributed to the appellant accused was of catching hold of the injured victim, and more than three decades had elapsed from the date of the incident, sentence awarded under ss 326 / 34, IPC was reduced to the period already undergone.[28]

In Kalu v State ,[29] the accused, who was a young lad of only 18 years at the time of commission of the offence, was found to be a junior member of the family and acting under the influence of the senior member of the family. It was held that he deserved to be treated leniently in the matter of sentence and an imprisonment for one year was considered sufficient under this section read with s 34 .

The accused had thrown acid on complainant tenant while the latter was sleeping inside the house, had caused acid burn injuries to the complainant. He had acted under the influence of his father. The incident was 30 years old and after being released in 2006 on bail, it was considered not proper to send the accused back to jail, more particularly, because nothing was stated against him regarding his indulgence in any criminal activity. The sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[30]

An offence under s 326, IPC is not compoundable under s 320, CrPC . As ten years had elapsed from the date of occurrence, one year sentence imposed was reduced to the period already undergone. A fine of Rs. 5000/- was imposed on each accused out of which Rs. 4000/- was to be paid as compensation to the injured.[31]

26. Deterrent Punishment

The age of 27 years of the accused cannot be considered as a young age for showing any leniency in the sentence.[32]

Where the accused caused grievous hurt with an axe to a public servant performing his duty, presumably to prevent him from doing it, and the injury eventually resulted in his death, it was held that the case called for a severe sentence, in view of which a sentence of three years rigorous imprisonment was enhanced to seven years rigorous imprisonment. It was also held that the fact that the accused was an unusually excitable and pernicious individual, was not a ground for imposing a lighter sentence in such a case.[33] Deliberately cutting the nose of a woman, simply because she would not live with the accused as his wife, deserves severe punishment, and a sentence of two years rigorous imprisonment was considered very inadequate.[34] In Zora Singh v Emperor ,[35] the accused, who fired a shot at point blank range on the upper portion of the thigh of the victim, caused him grievous hurt, as a result of which he died. The accused was found guilty under this section. It was held that the case called for a heavy sentence and was sentenced to transportation (now imprisonment) for life. Where the nature of the injury showed that both the hands of the victim were almost2853 maimed by the shots fired by the appellant, it was held that there could be no room for reducing the sentence of three years imprisonment along with a fine of Rs 600.[36]

27. Enhancement of Sentence

Where the accused had fired several shots on the complainant causing major and minor injuries to him and was sentenced to undergo one year rigorous imprisonment, the High Court in appeal while upholding the conviction reduced the sentence to the period of custodial sentence already undergone and fine was enhanced by it. No reasons were indicated to justify the reduction in sentence, and the accused had undergone only 63 days of custodial sentence. So, the reduction in sentence was not justified by the Apex

Court and the sentence was fixed at eighteen months, taking into the account the enhanced fine which was already deposited.[37]

28. Alteration of Conviction from Section 302 to Section 326

In Karnail Singh v State of Punjab ,[38] it was held that because, the two accused assaulted the deceased, and out of the two, one was acquitted of the charge under ss 302 / 34, IPC, the other accused could not be convicted under ss 302 / 34, but since he was armed with a kripan and he used that kripan in assaulting the accused, he must be taken to have committed an offence only under s 326 as the injury causing the death of the deceased was found dangerous to life.

(a) Where an accused, on grave and sudden provocation, inflicted a wound, with a penknife, in the abdomen of a woman and caused her death, it was held that the first exception to s 300, IPC, applied and would be convicted of the offence under s 326, IPC, because he must be taken to have intended to cause grievous hurt.[39]

(b) Where the accused inflicted with a knife as many as 15 incised injuries, on his wife, one of which was caused to the child, which his wife was carrying at that time, and the injury to the child proved fatal, it was held that the accused could properly be convicted under s 326, and not under s 302, having regard to the facts and circumstances of case.[40]

The accused allegedly dealt a blow to the deceased by means of katau on his right leg. The doctor stated that if the best of treatment would have been provided immediately, death might not have occurred. Conviction of the accused was altered from s 302 to s 326, IPC .

The prosecution case was that the accused appellant along with other co-accused assaulted the deceased causing death and inflicted injuries to others. The injured witness deposed before the Court that co-accused inflicted injury by sword on the deceased. The other eye-witness deposed that the appellant had given blow on the belly of the deceased but no injury was found in the belly. The conviction of the accused recorded under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 326, IPC .[41]2854

Mere fact that no single injury inflicted on the victim is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause the death of the deceased is no ground to convict the accused under s 304, Pt II, or s 326, IPC and not under s 302, IPC .[42]

The appellant and the accused no. 1 had entered the house of the deceased. Accused no. 1 poured a watery substance over her from the pot carried by him on the deceased leading to her death. The deceased had refused sexual favour to them. However, no over act was attributed to the appellant. Held, in absence of any active role played by the appellant or overt act being done by the appellant, it cannot be said with certainty that the appellant had accompanied the accused no. 1 to the house of the deceased with a common intention to murder the deceased. In view thereof, the conviction of the appellant under s 302 read with s 34, IPC was not sustained. The appellant was convicted under s 326, IPC and s 304, Pt II, IPC . As the death ensued after twenty six days of the incident as a result of septicemia and not as a consequence of burn injuries, the sentence was reduced to the period already undergone.[43]

The accused appellant attacked the deceased with sickle and had caused several injuries, the deceased died next day in the hospital. The deceased had a serious heart problem which was a matter not within the appellant's knowledge and on the contrary, the medical evidence revealed that he had undergone an angioplasty but had nevertheless suffered heart attack thereafter. The doctors had not opined that the death was caused due to the injuries caused by the appellant. There was also no evidence to show that the injuries could have independently caused the death of the deceased even if the deceased had not been suffering from a heart problem. The conviction of the appellant accused under s 302, IPC was altered to one under s 326, IPC .[44]

For further commentary, the same heading in s 302, ante, may be referred to.

29. Alteration of Conviction from Section 304, Part II to Section 326

Where the accused, who had no right of private defense to cause the death of the deceased, who, with his son, was the aggressor and made an attack on the accused, was found to have no knowledge that the wound he was inflicting was likely to cause the death of the deceased, it was held that he was guilty of the offence under this section, and not under s 304, IPC .

For further commentary, the same heading in s 304, ante, may be referred to.

30. Alteration of Conviction from Section 326 to Section 304, Part II

Commentary under the same heading in s 304, ante, may be referred to.

31. Alteration of Conviction from Section 307 to Section 326

Causing grievous hurt with a cutting instrument, though with the intention of causing death, but not actually resulting in death, would be an offence under this section, and not under s 307 .[45]2855

The essential ingredients of an offence punishable under s 307 underlines the fact that the act of assault committed should be capable of causing death. If in the case of an assault, only injuries are caused and the injuries caused are not dangerous to life, and cannot have effect of causing death, there cannot be a conviction under s 307 in such a situation. Necessarily, the conviction has to be only under ss 326, 324 or 323, IPC, as the case may be.[46] When the accused caused a fracture to the rib of the victim, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 307 to s 326, IPC .[47] Merely by keeping bow and arrows does not prove the intention of the accused person that by causing injuries to the complainant they had the intention of causing death of him. So, the charge under s 307 cannot be proved against the accused persons. They can be held guilty for causing grievous hurt to complainant under s 326 .[48]

The doctor examined in the case had not categorically deposed that the knife injury caused to the victim by the appellant no. 2 was dangerous to life, the conviction of the appellant no. 2 under s 307, IPC was altered to one under s 326, IPC . Sentence imposed was reduced to the period already undergone.[49]

There was no allegation that the accused wanted to kill or eliminate the victim. None of the injuries inflicted on the victim was on the vital part of the victim, and there was no enmity between the parties, thus, conviction of the accused recorded under s 307, IPC was altered into one under s 326, IPC .[50]

For further commentary, the same heading in s 307, ante, may be referred to.

32. Alteration of Conviction from Section 326 to Section 324

Commentary under the same heading in s 324, ante.

33. Alteration of Conviction from Section 326 to Section 325

There was no evidence to indicate that the stones used for causing injuries were so big and heavy that they were likely to cause death, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 326 to s 325 .[51]

Causing grievous hurt with a cutting instrument, though with the intention of causing death, but not actually resulting in death, would be an offence under this section and not under s 307 .[52]

For further commentary, the same heading in s 325, ante, may be referred to.

34. Alteration of Conviction from Section 326 to Section 352

Where the initial purpose of unlawful assembly of the accused persons was to assault the victim, and some of the accused went inside the house of the victim and others remained outside, the subsequent change of common object of some of the members2856 of the assembly who entered the house of the victim and caused him grievous injuries cannot make the other accused members of the assembly equally guilty who remained outside the house, so the conviction of the accused who remained outside the house of the victim was converted from ss 326 / 149 to ss 352 / 149, IPC .[53]

35. Alteration of Conviction from Section 397 to Section 326

Where a charge under s 397, IPC, is not proved, the accused can be convicted of an offence under s 326 if the offence under this section is proved.[54]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 327.

Voluntarily causing hurt to extort property, or to constrain to an illegal act.--

Whoever voluntarily causes hurt, for the purpose of extorting from the sufferer, or from any person interested in the sufferer, any property or valuable security, or of constraining the sufferer or any person interested in such sufferer to do anything which is illegal or which may facilitate the commission of an offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes voluntarily causing hurt to extort property or to constrain another to do an illegal act. The simple offence of causing hurt is aggravated by the criminal motive or object of the offender in causing the hurt.

2. 'Voluntarily Causes Hurt'

Commentary under ss 319 and 321, ante, may be referred to.

3. 'For the Purpose of Extorting'

For definition of extortion, s 383, vol 4, may be referred to.

4. 'Person Interested in the Sufferer'

To make a person 'interested in the sufferer', any tie of blood relationship, marriage, service, or even friendship seems sufficient. The court must ascertain for what purpose the suffering was caused, whether it was directed wholly at the sufferer or at another through him.[57]

5. 'Any Property'

For the various senses, in which the word property is used, Bans Gopal Sheo Narain v PK Banerji may be referred to.[58]

For further commentary, s 22, ante, vol 1, may be referred to.

6. Valuable Security

Commentary under the same heading in s 30, ante, vol 1, may be referred to.

7. 'Constraining'

The word 'constraint' implies that a person is controlled or obstructed from doing an act which the person wants to do. To 'constrain' means to compel or to confine.2859 Constraining is an alternative to extorting. The section is not confined to causing hurt for the purpose of extorting property, it extends also to causing hurt for the purpose of constraining a person to do an illegal act.

8. 'Illegal'

Commentary under s 43, ante, vol 1, may be referred to.

9. 'Offence'

Commentary under s 40, ante, vol 1, may be referred to.

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

11. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the... day of, at..., you voluntarily caused hurt to AB for the purpose of extorting, from the said AB (or from CD who was interested in the said AB), a certain property (or valuable security), to wit (or, for the purpose of constraining AB (or CD who was interested in the said AB) to do..., which is illegal (or, which may facilitate the commission of an offence), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 327 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

12. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) the accused caused hurt, and
(2) he did so:

(a) to commit extortion, or
(b) to constrain a person to do anything illegal, or
(c) to facilitate the commission of an offence.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 328.

Causing hurt by means of poison, etc., with intent to commit an offence.--

Whoever administers to or causes to be taken by any person any poison or any stupefying, intoxicating or unwholesome drug, or other thing with intent to cause hurt to such person, or with intent to commit or to facilitate the commission of an offence or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause hurt, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.2860

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes causing hurt by means of poison, or any stupefying, intoxicating or unwholesome drug, or other thing, with the intent to commit an offence. The offence of administering deleterious drugs, when life is not endangered, is punishable under this section.[59]To administer an innocuous substance, intended to act as a 'charm' is no offence under this section.[60] However, it is otherwise if the 'charm' causes suffering.[61] Where poison is administered but the victims escape death owing to ready help rendered, the question is whether the offence falls under this section or under s 307 . In Emperor v Israil Mahto ,[62] the question was raised, but, without deciding it, the High Court convicted the accused under this section on the ground that he was a youth and probably acted under the instigation of another person, who was absconding, and even if he was convicted under s 307, he would not have been sentenced to more than ten years rigorous imprisonment which was the sentence impossible under this section. In Narayani Dasi v State ,[63] a lady-accused, on her lover's marriage having been arranged, offered arsenic poison in his food. The lover did not die as the arsenic poison was in small quantity, but he succumbed due to maltreatment. It was held that the proper section, which could be invoked to convict the lady, was s 328, and not s 307, IPC .

2. Essential Ingredients

The following elements are essential to constitute on offence under s 328, IPC :

(i) some person or persons should administer and cause to be taken by any person any poison and stupefying, intoxicating or unwholesome drug, or other thing; and
(ii) the intention of the person or persons mentioned in (i) should be to cause hurt to the person concerned, or should be to commit or to facilitate commission of an offence or there should be knowledge on the part of the person or persons that the result of his act or their act was likely to cause hurt to the concerned persons2861

Both these elements should exist conjunctively, then and then alone would the offence be complete and the person or persons, as the case may be, would be guilty of the offence contained in s 328 .[64]

3. 'Administers to or Causes to be Taken by'

Merely procuring a dangerous drug, at the request of another, is not administering.[65] To constitute administering, or causing to be taken, it is not necessary that there should be a delivery by hand. Where, therefore, on an indictment for administering poison, it appeared that the prisoner had mixed poison with coffee and told his mistress that the coffee was for her, who then drank some of it, it was held that this was sufficient for the act to fall within the mischief of this section.[66] It has, however, to be proved that the dangerous drug, such as dhatura or any other dangerous drug, was actually administered to the victim by producing clear evidence.[67]

It need not be emphasised that administering of poison is only one of the modes by which an act may fall within the mischief contemplated by this section.[68]

4. 'Any Person'

The hurt may be caused to any person, whether known or unknown. In R v Dhania Daji ,[69]A placed, in his toddy-pots, some juice of the milk bush, knowing that such a substance, if taken, causes injury, with the intention of detecting an unknown thief. Some soldiers drank the toddy, having purchased it from an unknown vendor, and suffered in consequence. A was held guilty of an offence under this section.

5. 'Any Poison'

What is made punishable, under this section, is administering to, or causing to be taken by, any person, a poison or other noxious or destructive thing. Where the evidence disclosed that there was a reeling sensation after a person had eaten the curry served by the accused, and had also got a bitter taste of the curry, it was held that this was sufficient to constitute an offence under this section.[70]

Where if the victim was given some stupefying drug though sugar-cane juice before removing her ornaments from her neck, the offence under s 328, IPC, was held made out and the prosecution did not need to prove that any poison was also administered to the victim.[71] Where an accused was charged with the offence of murder by poisoning the deceased with sodium nitrate, the lethal dose of which was about twenty to thirty grains, and only one grain of the poison was detected in the viscera of the deceased, it was held that the accused was guilty under this section.[72] Where the accused poured out of a bottle, a mixture of arsenic poison into a chatti of cooked fish and curry, without any knowledge of the real contents of the bottle that it2862 was a deadly poison, with the result, that one of the persons, who ate the curry, died, it was held that the accused could not be convicted of murder, but he was guilty under this section though he was found to have become a tool in another's hand.[73] Where, for the purpose of facilitating a robbery, dhatura was administered by two persons to certain travelers, in consequence of which one of the travelers died and others were made seriously ill, it was held that in respect of the traveler, who died, the offence committed was that punishable under s 325, viz., grievous hurt, and in respect of the travelers, who did not die, the offence committed was that defined by this section of the IPC .[74]

The prosecution case was that the accused administered some sedative to the victim to remove his belongings. The medical officer was not examined to state that any poisonous substance was found/detected in the body of the victim. Mere injury report was found not sufficient. The appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 228, IPC .[75]

6. 'Any Stupefying, Intoxicating or Unwholesome Drug'

The offence of administering deleterious drugs, when life was not endangered, is punishable under this section.[76] A compounder, dispensing a deleterious substance to his own doctor was held guilty under this section.[77]

So far as applicability of s 328, IPC is concerned, that will attract only after having administration of the drugs, poisonous substance, sedative or other items so identified therein and for that, positive evidence should be on the record to justify administration of any one of the aforesaid items.[78]

7. 'Or other Thing'

The words 'or other thing' in this section, must be referred to the preceding words and be taken to mean unwholesome or other thing, and not any other thing simply. To administer an innocuous substance, intended to act as a charm, is not an offence.[79]

8. 'With Intent to Cause Hurt to such Person'

This section renders punishable anyone who administers, to any person, any poison with an intention to cause hurt to such person.[80] Mere administering of a drug will not be sufficient for a conviction in the absence of intent or knowledge specified in the section.[81] Where the accused without any intention to kill her husband, but only to obtain some kind of domination over him, mixed some minor aconite powder in his evening meal and he died afterwards, it was held that the accused was guilty under this section, and not under s 302 .[82]2863

9. 'Offence'

Commentary under s 40, ante, vol 1, may be referred to.

10. 'Knowing it to be Likely that he will Thereby Cause Hurt'

A person of age 16 years, must be presumed to know that dhatura is poisonous, and if he causes such a drug to be administered, he must be presumed, at least, to know that it is likely to cause hurt.[83]

11. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and exclusively triable by a court of sessions.

12. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of sessions judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That on or about the ....day of...., at...., you administered, to AB, a certain poison (or any stupefying thing, etc.), to wit....(or caused the same to be taken by AB), with intent to cause hurt to the said AB or to commit or to facilitate the commission of the offence of....(or knowing it to be likely that you will thereby cause hurt to the said AB), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 328 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Where the only link between the accused and the offence of sale of adulterated mustard oil which was poisonous, was the statement of co-accused, the investigation has not procured any evidence to show that the contents of the tin recovered from the co-accused could not have been supplied to him by anyone other than the accused. The label, sticker and the print on the tin recovered from the accused showed that the manufacturer of the oil was Haryana Oil Industries, therefore, the oil recovered from the co-accused could have been supplied to him by any manufacturer of oil and even if it was the same oil which was produced by Haryana Oil Industries, the same could have been supplied to him directly by Haryana Oil Industries or by any other middle-man, thus the very foundation of the charge against the accused, namely the link of the sale of adulterated/poisonous mustard oil and the accused was missing and the accused cannot be charged for the offence under s 328, IPC .[84]

13. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) the accused administered to, or caused to be taken by, any person, a thing;
(2) the said thing was poison, or a stupefying, intoxicating or unwholesome drug, or any other thing; and2864
(3) the accused did so:

(a) intending to cause hurt to the said person, or
(b) knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause hurt, or
(c) intending to commit, or to facilitate the commission of an offence.

14. Acquittal

Where the accused was found to be in possession of liquor adulterated with a poisonous substance known as methyl alcohol, even though the accused was not a licencee of arack, the offence under s 272, IPC, and s 55(a) of the Abkari Act stood proved, however, in view of important links in prosecution evidence missing, and the act of the accused in adulterating liquor per se, as the law then stood sans amendments, would not attract the provision of s 328, IPC, unless there is punitive evidence that the accused administered the poisoned liquor directly or indirectly causing it to be taken by the victim, with the necessary intent and mens sea. The accused was acquitted of the charge under s 328, IPC .[85]

Dhahera seeds were found in their hard form in the stomach of the deceased-wife which contradict the theory of seed being administered without being noticed by the deceased. Adverse inference cannot be drawn against the accused who allegedly represented to the doctor, a prosecution witness, that the deceased suffered from hysteria which fact was not established on record. The act of the accused in going to the village of his in-laws to inform in time that the deceased had been taken ill, indicated no ill-intention on his part, the conviction of the accused under ss 328 and 302, IPC, was not found proper.[86]

15. Conviction

The accused offered stupefying drug mixed in laddus to the victims which rendered them unconscious, the accused stripped the victims of their belongings and was arrested after being identified by the victims, the conviction of the accused under ss 328 and 379, IPC, was found proper.[87]

The accused was alleged to have offered intoxicating biscuits to the complainant who became unconscious after its consumption. The accused thereafter made off with valuable articles belonging to the complainant and the administered poisonous substance. The testimony of the complainant and the investigating officer were duly corroborated. The accused had the intention to cause death and take away valuable articles of the complainant. The fact that no hurt was actually caused to the complainant is immaterial. The conviction of the accused under ss 328 and 378, IPC, was found proper.[88]

When the evidence of a person working in a medical shop that the accused used to purchase intoxicating medicine from a shop and he was identified by the victim during the test identification parade, the gold bracelet stolen from the victim was disposed of by the co-accused within a short period after the incident, the presumption would be that the co-accused was one of the persons committing the offence of administering simplifying/intoxicating drugs to passengers in train and2865 then committing theft of their properties, as the discovery of the gold bracelet was made at the instance of the co-accused, the conviction of the accused and the co-accused under ss 328, 379 was found proper.[89]

Where the accused and the the co-accused lady stayed in a hotel room with eight co-pilgrims, the co-pilgrims became unconscious after consuming food prepared by the accused and the co-accused lady, both fled from the spot, on arrest the accused admitted that he stayed in hotel with the co-pilgrims, the victims stated that they were administered with some poisonous substance by serving food, the fact was further corroborated by medical opinion of a pharmacist, the conduct of the accused and the co-accused absconding from the place of incident further corroborated that they administered poisonous food to the co-pilgrims, so, the conviction of the accused was found proper.[90]

16. Accused Charged with Section 304 cannot be convicted under Section 328

The charge under s 304, IPC framed against the accused was with definite allegation of culpable homicide not amounting to murder by reason of administration of drug without taking precaution for reaction therefrom. This is totally different from causing hurt by means of administration of unwholesome drug. On no count a definite charge of culpable homicide can be an error for causing hurt. Going by s 214, CrPC, in every charge words used in describing an offence shall be deemed to have been used in the sense attached to them by law under which such offence is punishable. Therefore, to construe the section relating to culpable homicide as only an error for causing hurt by unwholesome drug will lead to misleading so far as the accused is concerned resulting in failure of justice so far as his opportunity to defend is concerned. Therefore, the accused charged with s 304 cannot be convicted under s 328 .[91] Where the accused appellant in a restaurant had administered some intoxicating substance to the victims and deprived them of golden chain, locket, car key, driving licence and Rs. 3500/- and all these articles were recovered from the possession of the accused persons, their conviction under s 328, IPC was held proper.[92]

17. Sentence

The offence under s 328 of IPC is punishable with imprisonment, which may extend to 10 years with fine. The offence of administering stupefying or intoxicating drug to passengers in train and then committing offence of theft is a serious offence and such criminals do not deserve any leniency. The imprisonment for 4 years for the offence under s 328 of IPC imposed by the trial court was found just and reasonable.[93] Persons guilty of performing depraved acts do not deserve any sympathy. If the sentence of such persons is reduced, it would be case of misplaced sympathy resulting in society losing confidence and faith in the criminal justice delivery system.[94] Thus, when a simple, innocent lady aged 50 years was given some2866 stupefying drug through sugar cane juice and robbed off her ornaments, the court refused to reduce the sentence of 5 years rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs 500.[1] Similarly, in another case where the accused offered stupefying drug mixed in ladoos to three victims and which rendered them unconscious, the accused stripped the victims of their belongings, the court declined to reduce the sentence of 4 years rigorous imprisonmentof the accused despite the fact that the accused had already undergone the period of 2 years and seven months imprisonment.[2]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 329.

Voluntarily causing grievous hurt to extort property, or to constrain to an illegal act.--

Whoever voluntarily causes grievous hurt for the purpose of extorting from the sufferer, or from any person interested in the sufferer, any property or valuable security, or of constraining the sufferer or any person interested in such sufferer to do anything that is illegal or which may facilitate the commission of an offence, shall be punished with [3][imprisonment for life], or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is similar to s 327 of IPC except for the difference that hurt caused in the offence under this section is grievous, whereas, only simple hurt is caused in an offence under s 327 . The commentary under that section may, therefore, usefully be read under this section also.

This section will come into play if the act, which the other person is constrained to do, is itself illegal. The illegality appertains to the action that the other person is compelled to take; it does not arise from the means adopted in constraining that person to take the action.[4]

2. 'Voluntarily Causes Grevious Hurt'

Section 329, IPC, deals with grievous hurt caused for the particular purpose, i.e., extortion or other purposes mentioned in the section.[5]

Commentary under ss 320 and 322, ante, may be referred to.

3. 'For the Purpose of Extorting'

The words 'for the purpose of extorting' are most important in s 329, IPC and include an attempt to extort also. The provision would be attracted even if extortion is not complete. For definition of extorting, s 383 in vol 4, may be referred to.2867

4. 'Person Interested in the Sufferer'

Commentary under the same heading in s 327, ante, may be referred to.

5. 'Any Property'

Commentary under the same heading in s 327, ante, may be referred to.

6. 'Valuable Security'

Commentary under s 30, vol 1, may be referred to.

7. 'Constraining'

Commentary under the same heading in s 327, ante, may be referred .

8. 'Illegal'

Commentary under the same heading in s 43, vol 1, may be referred to.

9. 'Offence'

The accused persons allegedly wanted to obstruct the complainant from deposing against them in another criminal case. It is clear from the section that whatever be 'an offence' within the meaning of IPC would be covered by it. If a person refuses to take oath or state on affirmation before a court of law, he is liable to be punished under s 178, IPC . If a person refuses to answer questions as a witness in a court of law, he is liable to be punished under s 179, IPC . When the accused persons tried to prevent the complainant from deposing in the case attracting offences under ss 178 and 179, their act is covered under s 329, IPC .[6] For further commentary, s 40, vol 1, may be referred to.

10. Procedure

Commentary under the same heading in s 328, ante, may be referred to.

11. Charge

The charge should be in the same form as that under s 327, IPC, except that the expression 'grievous hurt' should be substituted for 'hurt', s 329, IPC should be substituted for s 327, and the expressions 'sessions judge' and 'within the cognizance of this court' should respectively be substituted for 'magistrate' and 'within my cognizance'.

Causing grievous hurt to obstruct a person from deposing in the court amounts to forcing him to commit an illegal act which is an offence under ss 178 and 179, IPC, so the framing of charge against the accused under s 329, IPC is not improper.

12. Proof

The elements which have to be proved for an offence under s 327, IPC, have to be established under this section with the only difference that 'grievous hurt' instead of 'hurt' has to be proved for establishing an offence under this section.[7]2868

Wherein a case of causing grievous hurt and extortion of money, three of the accused persons stabbed the complainant, causing injuries dangerous to life if not treated, the testimony of the complaint was corroborated with the FIR as well as the medical evidence, the accused persons could be said to be acting in concert and in furtherance of their common intention to extort money, the conviction of the accused persons under s 148 and ss 329 / 149 and in the alternative under ss 329 / 34 IPC was held proper.[8]

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 330.

Voluntarily causing hurt to extort confession, or to compel restoration of property.--

Whoever voluntarily causes hurt for the purpose of extorting from the sufferer or from any person interested in the sufferer, any confession or any information which may lead to the detection of an offence or misconduct, or for the purpose of constraining the sufferer or any person interested in the sufferer to restore, or to cause the restoration of any property or valuable security or to satisfy any claim or demand, or to give information which may lead to the restoration of any property or valuable security, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

(d) A, a Zamindar, tortures a ryot in order to compel him to pay his rent. A is guilty of an offence under this section.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is similar to s 327, IPC, with the difference that, while that section punished the causing of hurt for the purpose of extorting property or valuable security or constraining one to do anything illegal or to commit or facilitate the commission of an offence, this section deals with the same offence when hurt is caused for the purpose of extorting a confession, or information, leading to the detection of an offence or misconduct, or for constraining the sufferer or another to restore any property or valuable security, or to satisfy any claim or demand or do2869 anything subservient thereto. The difference between the two sections lies only in the purpose for which the hurt is caused.

To constitute an offence under this section, the hurt must be caused to extort a confession of some offence or misconduct, etc.;[9] and whether that offence or misconduct had been committed is wholly immaterial.[10] Where the deceased having been suspected of theft, was beaten by the accused, a police officer, to extort a confession and the beating resulted in the death of the suspect, but there was no intention on the part of the accused to cause death so as to bring the case under s 300, IPC, it was held that the accused was guilty under this section.[11] Where an accused, a police officer, with a view to extort a confession or information, used third-degree methods, as a result of which the suspect died, it was held that the accused was guilty under this section.[12]

2. 'Voluntarily Causes Hurt'

Commentary under ss 319 and 321, ante, may be referred to.

3. 'For the Purpose of Extorting'

Commentary under the same heading in s 327, ante, may be referred to.

4. 'Person Interested in the Sufferer'

Commentary under the same heading in s 327, ante, may be referred to.

5. 'Confession'[13]

It must be proved that the hurt, to the complainant was caused with the intent to extort a confession of some offence or misconduct punishable under the IPC . This section, therefore, does not apply to a case where the confession extorted has reference only to a charge of witchcraft.[14] 'A confession', as stated in Pakala Narayana Swami's case,[15] must either admit, in terms of the offence or, at any rate, substantially all the facts which constitute the offence. An admission of a gravely incriminating fact, even a conclusively incriminating fact, is not, of itself, a confession.

A police officer is under a legal duty to prevent the infliction of torture on those who are in his custody, and his failure to discharge that duty makes him a party to the crime.[16] A policeman, who stands by, acquiescing in an assault on a prisoner, committed by another policeman, for the purpose of extorting a confession or information, leading to the detection of a crime, is, therefore, guilty of the offence punishable under this section.[17]2870

Commentary under s 40, vol 1, may be referred to.

7. 'Constraining'

Commentary under the same heading in s 327, ante, may be referred to.

8. 'Restoration'

Voluntarily causing grievous hurt to the complainant to extort a promise from him to restore the woman, whom he was alleged to have abducted, does not fall under this section.[18] There must be immediate connection between the assault and the restoration of the property, that is to say, the intention of the person causing the assault must be proved to be to obtain from the person assaulted, a confession or the restoration of stolen property, and there must be no reasonable ground for explaining the assault otherwise than upon that foundation.[19]

9. 'Any Property'

Commentary under the same heading in s 327, ante, may be referred to.

10. 'Valuable Security'

Commentary under s 30, vol 1, may be referred to.

11. 'Demand'

Demand must be in respect of property.[20]

12. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

13. Sanction

A case, falling under s 197 of the CrPC, cannot be instituted under this section, unless sanction is obtained from the Central or State Government, as the case may be. Such cases depend upon the status of the accused and the nature of the offence committed in the execution of his duty.

14. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the .....day of....., at.....you voluntarily caused hurt, to AB, for the purpose of extorting, from him (or from a certain person, namely, CD,2871 interested in the said AB), a confession (or information), which may lead to the detection of the offence of.....(or misconduct) (or for the purpose of constraining the said AB (or CD) to restore (or to cause the restoration of) any property (or valuable security) (or to satisfy any claim or demand) (or to give information which may lead to the restoration of any property or valuable security, to wit.....), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 330 (or s 331) of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

15. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) the accused voluntarily caused hurt (for which prove all that is required under s 321, IPC); and
(2) the accused caused such hurt, to the sufferer or other person interested in him:

(a) to extort a confession, or some information, which may lead to the detection of an offence or misconduct, or
(b) to constrain such person to restore, or to cause the restoration of, any property or valuable security, or
(c) to satisfy any claim or demand, or
(d) to give information which may lead to the restoration of any property or valuable security.

Where the accused, an investigating officer and his assistant having no reliable information, entertained suspicion about two persons in a case of theft subjected them to ill-treatment to extort a confession on information leading to the detection of stolen properties, the accused persons were found guilty for the offence under s 330, IPC .[21] However, when the police resorted to violence while pursuing investigation and not pursuing any unlawful object, the suspect in trying to escape custody was beaten up by a police party which caused him to die on the spot, ss 147 and 149 could not be invoked and the conviction of the accused-police officials under ss 147, 325 / 149 and 330 / 149 and 354 / 149 was not found proper and set aside.[22]

16. Onus of Custodial Crime and duty of Court

Though ss 330 and 331 of the IPC make punishable those persons who cause hurt for the purpose of extorting the confession by making the offence punishable with sentence up to 10 years of imprisonment, but the convictions, as experience shows from track record have been very few compared to the considerable increase of such onslaught because the atrocities within the precincts of the police station are often left without much traces or any ocular or other direct evidence to prove as to who the offenders are. Disturbed by this situation, the Law Commission in its 113th Report, recommended amendments to the Indian Evidence Act 1872 so as to provide that in the prosecution of a police officer for an alleged offence of having caused bodily injuries to a person while in police custody, if there is evidence that the injury was caused during the period when the person was in the police custody, the court may presume that the injury was caused by the police officer having the custody of that2872 person during that period, unless the police officer proves to the contrary. The onus to prove the contrary must be discharged by the police official concerned. Keeping in view the dehumanizing aspect of the crime, the flagrant violation of the fundamental rights of the victim of the crime and the growing rise in the crimes of this type, where only a few come to light and others don't, the government and the legislature must give serious thought to the recommendation of the Law Commission and bring about the appropriate changes in the law not only to curb the custodial crime, but also to see that the custodial crime does not go unpunished. The courts are also required to have a change in their outlook, approach, appreciation and attitude, particularly in cases involving custodial crimes and they should exhibit more sensitivity and adopt a realistic rather than a narrow technical approach, while dealing with the cases of custodial crime so that as far as possible within their powers, the truth is found and guilty should not escape so that the victim of the crime has the satisfaction that ultimately the majesty of law has prevailed.[23]

17. Sentence

An offence of the nature, described in this section, can rarely be proved. It is, therefore, the duty of the court, when a case of this kind is proved, to pass a sentence which may have a deterrent effect.[24] In Public Prosecutor v Kanniappan ,[25] the accused, suspecting a boy for committing a theft, in order to extort a confession from him, brought both his hands together wrapped pieces of cloth round his hands, poured kerosene oil over the wrapping and set fire to it, as a result of which the hands of the boy were burnt, on account of which the boy had to remain, as an in-patient in a hospital for twelve days. The trial court, trying the accused under this section read with s 511, IPC, sentenced him to imprisonment till the rising of court. The High Court enhanced the sentence, to one year's imprisonment, with the observation thus:

> ...When the statute says that, for an offence, the offender shall be imprisoned, it normally means that he should be sent to jail. To impose a sentence of imprisonment till the rising of court is an evasion of the statutory provisions, and such an evasion would be justified only in very exceptional circumstances as, for instance, where the offence is found to be very severely technical or where there are extenuating circumstances possessing unusual force..... Those, who are called upon to administer the criminal law, must bear, in mind, that they have a duty not merely to the individual accused before them, but also to the State and to the community at large.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 331.

Voluntarily causing grievous hurt to extort confession, or to compel restoration of property.--

Whoever voluntarily causes grievous hurt for the purpose of extorting from the sufferer or from any person interested in the sufferer any confession or any information which may lead to the detection of an offence or misconduct, or for the purpose of constraining the sufferer or any person interested in the sufferer to restore or to cause the restoration of any property or valuable security or to satisfy any claim or demand or to give information which may lead to the restoration of any property or valuable security, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.2873

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section is similar to s 330, IPC, the only difference being that the hurt caused in a case under this section is grievous. The commentary under the preceding section may, therefore, be usefully read under this section also.

The section applies to cases where grievous hurt is caused by a person for the purpose of having a claim or demand, which the other person owes to him, satisfied, and not to cases where the claim or demand is owed by the culprit to the victim of assault.[26]

2. 'Voluntarily Causes Grievous Hurt'

Commentary under ss 320 and 322, ante, may be referred to.

3. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of sessions.

4. Charge

The same form of the charge which is used for an offence under s 330, IPC, may be adopted for a charge under this section subject to the following changes, i.e., the expressions 'grievous hurt', 'sessions judge' and 'within the cognizance of this court' must be substituted for 'hurt', 'magistrate' and 'within my congnisance', respectively.

5. Proof

The elements, which require proof for establishing an offence under s 330, IPC, necessary to be established for securing a conviction under this section, except the fact that hurt need to be proved, must be grievous hurt, and not merely simple hurt.

6. Onus of Custodial Crime and duty of Court

Commentary under the same heading in s 330, ante, may be referred to.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 332.

Voluntarily causing hurt to deter public servant from his duty.--

Whoever voluntarily causes hurt to any person being a public servant in the discharge of his duty as such public servant, or with intent to prevent or deter that person or any other public servant from discharging his duty as such public servant, or in consequence of anything done or attempted to be done by that person in the lawful discharge of his duty as such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.2874

Comments

1. Scope

So far, the IPC has dealt, under the heading of 'hurt', with causing hurt or grievous hurt to any person. This section deals with causing hurt, and the next section with causing grievous hurt, to a public servant. A similar provision is to be found in s 353, IPC which deals with assaulting or using criminal force on a public servant. Except for the nature of the act done by the offender, in all other respects, the three sections are in exactly the same or similar terms and they all mean the same thing. The object of this section is to protect public servants so that they may discharge their duties without fear of being hurt or assaulted. This protection is given to the public servant not only during, but also before and after, the execution of his duty. The first clause in each of the said sections speaks of causing hurt to a public servant while he is engaged in the discharge of his duty. The second clause speaks of causing hurt to prevent or deter a public servant from discharging his duty in future, and the third clause speaks of causing hurt in consequence of anything done by the public servant in the past in the discharge of his duty. The said three clauses also make it clear that the offence under this section is related not so much to a public servant, but to the discharge of his duty by him. Therefore, merely causing hurt to a public servant would not constitute an offence under this section if it is not connected with the discharge of his duty as a public servant, whether in the present, future or past.[27]

As regards mens rea, it is only the second clause that requires an intention to prevent or deter a public servant from the discharge of his duty. The other two clauses do not require any particular intention or knowledge. In cases falling under these two clauses, causing hurt to a public servant is made an offence because it has the effect of preventing or deterring the public servant from discharging his duty.[28]

2. Relative Scope of Sections 353, 332 and Section 333

Commentary under the same heading in s 353, post, may be referred to.

3. 'Voluntarily Causes Hurt'

Commentary under ss 319 and 321, ante, may be referred to.2875

4. 'To any Person'

As these words are qualified by the words 'being a public servant', etc., in this section, refer to public servants only, and not to private individuals. The general words 'any person' are used because the offence is against the person though that person is a public servant.

5. 'Public Servant'

Commentary under s 21, vol 1, may be referred to.

6. 'In the Discharge of his Duty as such Public Servant'

The words 'in the discharge of his duty' can have only one meaning, namely, that the officer has a duty, imposed by law, to discharge and a duty to discharge at the relevant time. They cannot mean that the officer is acting under the colour of his office. If the public servant, who is hurt, is a police officer, he must be acting at the relevant time as a police officer, and in the particular matter, must be discharging a duty imposed upon him as a police officer.[29] Persons, not having, strictly speaking, a right to test the main switch in a certain premises by reason of s 20(2)(b) of the Indian Electricity Act 1910 (9 of 1910), cannot be said, while so testing, to be discharging their duties as public servants.[30]When the forest in question, from which the timbers are being removed, has not been legally proved to be a reserve forest, it cannot definitely be said that the forest officers who obstruct the complainants from removing the timbers, act strictly in due discharge of the duties imposed on them.[31] The act of a police constable in prohibiting men from playing cards cannot be said to be in the discharge of his public duty, and if hurt is caused to him while doing so, the offence does not fall under this section, but under s 323 .[32]

Prosecution evidence established that train was stopped by the accused appellant, he cut the hotch pipe and on being restrained from doing so, assaulted the complainant police constable. When the accused appellant and other persons were taken to the guard room, they were shouting at him and threatening to throw him on the railway track. The accused was duly identified. He had obstructed a public servant and voluntarily caused hurt to him in order deter him from discharging his duty. He was convicted under ss 186 and 332, IPC .[33]

The accused respondent driving auto on the M.G. Road jumped the signal line. Police constable PW2 chased the auto of the accused appellant. The appellant denied the commission of any traffic offence, hit PW2 on his chest, and three ribs of the left2876 side of the chest of PW2 were fractured. Evidence of Sub Inspector PW2 who intercepted the auto of the accused was found reliable, and was corroborated by independent witness and medical evidence. Appellant accused was convicted under s 333, IPC and sentenced to three months RI and fine of Rs. 25000/-.[34]

However, where the accused caused hurt and grievous hurt to a forest guard in uniform while on patrol in his beat tried to apprehend the accused, who cut pieces of wood and was removing them from the reserve forest without permit, it was held that the accused were guilty of offences under ss 332 and 333, IPC .[35] A person, who causes hurt to a police officer making a search commits an offence under s 332, IPC .[36]

7. Public Servant not Acting as per Law--Effect

The words 'in the discharge of his duty' do not cover an act done by the public servant in excess of his authority, though the same may have been done in good faith and under the colour of his office.[37] Where a naib-tahsildar, collecting arrears of land revenue from a defaulting landlord, was assaulted by the landlord and his men, but it was found that hurt was caused by the accused in resisting a beating, given by the chaprasis of the naib-tahsildar under his orders, it was held that s 332 did not apply.[38] A police officer executing an illegal warrant cannot be said to be acting in the discharge of his duty, and an accused causing hurt to him, while doing so, cannot be held guilty under this section.[39] A police officer conducting a search is bound under s 100, CrPC, to call upon two or more respectable inhabitants of the locality to attend and witness the search; and if he ignores this provision in conducting the search and hurt is caused to him in resisting the search, the offence would not be covered by this section.[40] Where a constable, not in possession of a warrant of arrest and not entrusted with the duty of arresting the accused, proceeded to arrest him and was assaulted by him, it was held that the accused could not be convicted under this section.[41]

8. Public Servants Protecting their Private Properties

Where public servants were hurt when they were protecting their private property, it was held that in protecting their private property, they were merely acting as private persons, and therefore, this section had no application.[42]

9. 'With Intent to Prevent or Deter'

These words are sufficiently wide to take in acts of obstruction. Slamming of a door in the face of an officer, just when he is about to enter, is obstruction. However, mere2877 objection or protest does not fall within the section, unless, it verges on threat which is likely to be carried out immediately.[43] To constitute obstruction, actual physical force is not necessary. If there is sufficient indication that force would be used if the officer persists in executing the work, which he is commissioned to do, it would be sufficient to constitute obstruction.[44] Even the use of abusive language, as a result of which a sale had to be adjourned by an officer, was held to be obstruction.[45] Blocking a gateway, or deliberately placing a cycle in front of a police constable and thereby preventing him from dealing with an offender, was held to be obstruction. Similarly, closing a house, and thus, preventing a policeman from removing stolen articles found in the room and threatening to kill him was held to be an obstruction. Again, obstruction like jostling an officer was held to be an offence.[46] Threats may not, however, amount to obstruction in all cases. The point for determination in such cases is whether the act of the accused was such as to prevent the public servant from carrying out his duties. Where threats are combined with an attitude of an aggressive character, or where there is an exhibition of dangerous weapons by the accused, or where the threat is likely to be carried out immediately, the offence of obstruction may be held to be made out.[47] Where the appellant accused, in attempt to escape, tried to overturn his four wheeler overloaded with cows over police constable on duty causing injuries, he was convicted for offence under s 332, IPC .[48]

A convict undergoing imprisonment removed the bolt of the prison cell, hit warders with wooden plank, caused simple injuries, was convicted under ss 332 and 333, IPC .[49]

The duty of a public servant may be negative as well as positive. It is the duty of a patwari not to make entries, in his official records, under pressure from an interested party which he would not otherwise have made. Where the accused dragged a patwari to a place, put pressure upon him to make certain entries in their favour, and then beat him when he refused to do so, it was held that the accused intended to prevent or deter the patwari from discharging his duties as a public servant and were guilty of the offence under this section.[50]

10. 'In Consequence of anything done or Attempted to be done by that person in the Lawful Discharge of his duty as such Public Servant'

The offence under this section can be committed not only when a person is assaulted when he is discharging his public duty, but also when he is assaulted in consequence of the discharge of his duty. Where, therefore, a naib-tahsildar had made a report against a patwari in the lawful discharge of his duty, and as a consequence thereof,2878 he was beaten by the accused, it was held that the accused were guilty of the offence under this section.[51] The expression 'in consequence', as used in this and the next section, includes the motive which actuates the accused to cause voluntary hurt or assault upon a public servant.[52]

11. Section 186 Distinguished from Sections 332 and 353

Commentary under the same heading in s 186, vol 2, may be referred to.

12. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

13. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the .....at..... you voluntarily caused hurt to one A B, a public servant, in the discharge of his duties as such a public servant (or with intent to prevent or deter that person (or any other public servant (or with intent to prevent or deter that person (or any other public servant, to wit.....) from discharging his duties as such a public servant) (or in consequence of anything done or attempted to be done by that person in the lawful discharge of his duty as such a public servant), and thereby committed an offence punishable under s 332 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

While framing a charge under this section, it is not essential to state, in all cases, that hurt was caused to the public servant while he was actually discharging his official duty. If the beating is given as a consequence of anything done by him in the discharge of his duties as a public servant, then it would be sufficient to attract the application of this section.[53]

14. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) the accused voluntarily caused hurt to a public servant; and
(2) the said public servant, at the time of being hurt, was discharging his duty as such public servant, or
(3) the hurt was caused with intent to prevent or deter that public servant or any other public servant from discharging his duty as such public servant, or
(4) the hurt was caused in consequence of anything done, or attempted to be done, by that public servant in the lawful discharge of his duty as such public servant.2879

In the absence of corroboration by medical evidence, the allegation that the injured was beaten by the accused, was not believed in Nirbhai Singh v State of Madhya Pradesh .[54]

15. Examination of the Accused

The accused was known by more than one name. The fact that an accused person has an alias is not a circumstance appearing against him, and therefore, the accused need not have been put to answer any question regarding such facts not required to be asked to the accused under s 313, CrPC .[55]

16. Acquittal

Where the ingredients of offences under ss 332 and 353, IPC were not proved, the injury suffered by the complainant is too trivial and general and could be accidental as a consequence of the defence by the accused, the conviction of the accused is not proper.[56] The allegations against the accused were that they assaulted two police officers while they were executing a non-bailable warrant, the statements of the two police officers were contradictory to each other, the prosecution did not examine any independent witness, the alleged recovery of a shoulder flap from the uniform of a police officer and nickel-stars, etc. from the place of occurence was doubtful, so the conviction of the accused under s 332, IPC, was not found proper.[57] The accused persons entered into the school premises and gave lathi blows to the victim-teacher for beating their children. The evidence of the victim was not corroborated by medical evidence. The other teachers who were eyewitnesses to the occurrence, also did not corroborate the statement of the victim in material particulars, the recovery memo of the lathi and victim's clothes, allegedly formed by the accused at the time of occurrence, was proved to be a farce. The acquittal of the accused under ss 353 / 332 / 34, IPC, was found proper.[58] The independent witness did not support the prosecution version, the testimony of the public servant (victim) and another witness (conductor of the bus) was discarded due to infirmities in their statements. The essential ingredients of s 332 were not proved on record. The origin, manner and genesis of occurrence were highly suspicious. The acquittal of the accused under s 332 was found proper.[59]

The prosecution case was that the accused persons forcibly entered the office of the DCP Traffic, gheraoed and manhandled DCP. The prosecution case of causing hurt, assault or use of criminal force to deter a public servant from discharging his duty was not proved, the accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 186, 353 and 332, IPC .[60]

17. Tendering Apology by the Accused

Where the accused-clerk picked up a wooden roller and gave a beating to the victim/complainant-headmaster of the school, resulting in injuries, the High Court set2880 aside the conviction of the accused, the occurrence took place more than 20 years before, in the criminal appeal filed by the complainant/victim-headmaster under art 134 of the Constitution of India, the accused filed an apology by way of an affidavit clearly stating that with a view to assuage the hurt feelings of the victim and maintain good relations, he is tendering the said apology. He also stated he apologises to the victim for any injury, physically or otherwise, if any, caused because it was unintended and unintentional. In view of the written apology of the accused which showed repentant mood of the accused, the Apex Court directed the written apology to be placed on record and declined to interfere with the order of acquittal under s 332, IPC, of the High Court.[61]

18. Probation

The object of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958 is to prevent the conversion of youthful offenders into obdurate criminals as a result of their association with hardened criminals of mature age, in case the youthful offenders are sentenced to undergo imprisonment in jail. However, if the court came to the conclusion that the release of a convict under the said Act will have a detrimental effect on society, it will be slow to release him under the Act. When the accused, an educated person heading an association who was expected to behave in a very orderly manner, but instead of doing that he assaulted the public servant to defer him from his duty in a public place, the benefit of the said Act was declined to the accused who was convicted under ss 332 and 26, IPC .[62] However, when the victim sustained simple injuries and no previous conviction was proved against the accused, the accused persons convicted under s 332, IPC, were extended the benefit of s 4 of the Probation of Offenders Act 1958.[63] Where in the first appeal, the case was not argued on merits and the counsel of the accused prayed for benefit of probation which was allowed, the plea taken in the second appeal that no such concession was given by the counsel is not acceptable, moreso, when the conviction of the accused is justified by the evidence on record.[64]

19. Sentence

The causing of a series of injuries to a public servant on duty in broad daylight shakes the confidence of people in law enforcement machinery, and it is necessary that whenever such an offence is found to be proved, the court must award a deterrent sentence.[65] The accused caused injuries to the police constable in uniform and persisted with unruly behaviour in a public place under the influence of liquor. The plea for a lenient sentence was declined by the High Court observing that the sentence of 2 years imposed by the trial court did not warrant any interference.[66]

However, when the incident took place about 19 years ago and one of the accused was acquitted by the trial court, the sentence of 2 years imprisonment each under ss 332 / 34 and ss 324 / 34, IPC, of the accused persons was reduced to the period2881 already undergone in addition to imposing a fine of Rs 500/- in lieu of the remaining period of imprisonment.[67]

The court should not allow an offender to go, on the payment of a small fine only, where a public servant has been assaulted and beaten with sticks.[68] Where, however, instead of the amin, a peon was sent for collecting land revenue and an altercation followed, the same was considered to be an extenuating circumstance for reducing the sentence of six months rigorous imprisonment to that already suffered.[69]

The incident having taken place in the year 1992, the accused had attained the age of 50 years, the sentence of two years imposed was reduced to a period of three months, and a fine of Rs. 5000/- was imposed.[70]

20. Alteration of Conviction from Section 332 to Section 323

Where the incident was the sequel of a private quarrel, which took place between the complainant and the accused on the preceding day, and the assault had no connection, or consequential relation, with the complainant's performance of his duty as a public servant, the accused's conviction was altered from one under s 332 to one under s 323, IPC .[71]

21. Alteration of Conviction from Section 333 to Section 332

In the case of assault on a police party while executing an irregular warrant, the offence falls under s 323, IPC, and not under this section.[72] The accused dealt a fist blow on the face of the victim resulting in the loosening of one of his teeth. The victim was discharged from the hospital on the same day, and moved throughout the day and also attended his duties the next day. The injury suffered by the victim cannot be said to be grave and serious and the case of simple hurt was made out. The conviction of the accused was therefore altered from s 333 to s 332, IPC .[73]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 333.

Voluntarily causing grievous hurt to deter public servant from his duty.--

Whoever voluntarily causes grievous hurt to any person being a public servant in the discharge of his duty as such public servant, or with intent to prevent or deter that person or any other public servant from discharging his duty as such public servant, or in consequence of anything done or attempted to be done by that person in the lawful discharge of his duty as such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.2882

Comments

1. Scope

An offence under this section is an aggravated form of the same offence, which has been dealt within the preceding section, with the only difference that hurt caused under this section is grievous hurt, on account of which the section provides an enhanced penalty. The commentary on the preceding s 332, IPC may, therefore, be usefully read as a commentary on this section also.

Under the provisions of this section, a person who causes grievous hurt to a public servant can be convicted under the following three circumstances:

(a) when the public servant, grievously hurt, was discharging his duty as such public servant;
(b) when grievous hurt was caused with intent to prevent or deter the public servant, or any public servant, from discharging his duty as such public servant; and
(c) when grievous hurt was caused in consequence of anything done, or attempted to be done, by the public servant in the lawful discharge of his duty.

In the first case, motive and object are irrelevant. Similar is the position in the third case. In the second case, it is, however, necessary that the object of the accused should be to prevent or deter the public servant from discharging his duty, but it is not necessary that the public servant should be discharging his duty at the time of being grievously hurt.[74]

2. Relative Scope of Sections 353, 332 and 333

Commentary under the same heading in s 353, post, may be referred to.

3. 'In the Discharge of his Duty as such Public Servant'

If a forest guard in order to prevent an accused from cutting wood in government forest, endeavours to snatch the axe of the accused cutting wood, on account of which a scuffle ensues in which grievous hurt is caused to the guard, the act of the forest guard is in discharge of his duty as a public servant and the accused is guilty under this section.[75] While driving the bus, or even while standing at the bus-stand, the driver discharges his duties, and if he tries to prevent an accused from committing trespass by entering into the driver's cabin, he undoubtedly acts in the due discharge of his duties as a driver of the bus belonging to the transport2883 department. If, despite the attempt of the driver to stop the accused from entering the driver's cabin, the accused abuses the driver and gives him a kick, which results in grievous injury, it cannot be said that s 333, IPC has no application.[76]

A convict undergoing imprisonment removed the bolt of the prison cell, hit warders with wooden plank, caused simple injuries, was convicted under s 332 and 333, IPC .[77]

A person, arrested illegally, has a right to defend himself.[78]

4. Public Servant not Acting as per Law--Effect

Commentary under the same heading in s 332, ante, may be referred to.

5. Public Servants Protecting their Private Properties

Commentary under the same heading in s 332, ante, may be referred to.

6. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of session.

7. Charge

The charge is the same as under s 332 by substituting 'grievous hurt' for 'hurt', ' s 333 ' for ' s 332 ', 'sessions judge' for 'magistrate' and 'withing the cognizance of this court' for 'withing my cognizance'.

8. Proof

The proof is the same as under s 332, by substituting 'grievous hurt' for 'hurt'.

The accused dealt a gupti blow on the chest of deceased-police constable who had caught hold of his co-accused, there was sufficient light available at the spot to enable the witnesses to identify both the accused and the co-accused, the medical evidence was in consonance with the oral evidence of the prosecution witnesses. The conviction of accused under ss 302 and 333, IPC was found proper.[79]

9. Accused Acquitted under Section 302 cannot be Convicted under this Section

An accused cannot be convicted under this section when he is acquitted on a charge under s 302, IPC, on the ground that firing of the gun was accidental.[80]2884

10. Sentence

The object of imposing sentence should be to protect the society and to deter the criminal in achieving the avowed object of law by imposing appropriate sentence. It is expected that the courts would operate the sentencing system so as to impose such sentence which reflects the conscience of the society and the sentencing process has to be stern where it should be. The court will be failing in its duty if appropriate punishment is not awarded for a crime which has been committed not only against the individual victim, but also against the society to which the criminal and victim belong. The punishment to be awarded for a crime must not be irrelevant but it should conform to and be consistent with the atrocity and brutality with which the crime has been perpetrated, the enormity of the crime warranting public abhorrence and it should 'respond to the society's cry for justice against the criminal'.[81] Therefore, when attempt to murder and causing grievous hurt to public servant, both offences are of serious nature, reduction of sentence to custodial sentence of 6 months 23 days that was already undergone on the ground that the accused were illiterate persons belonging to lower income group and were of 23 years of age is not proper.[82]

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 334.

Voluntarily causing hurt on provocation.--

Whoever voluntarily causes hurt on grave and sudden provocation, if he neither intends nor knows himself to be likely to cause hurt to any person other than the person who gave the provocation, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides punishment for voluntarily causing hurt on grave and sudden provocation, and forms a proviso to ss 323 and 324, IPC . It is immaterial in this section, whether the instrument used for causing hurt is simple or deadly.[83]

Under the explanation to s 335, IPC, this and that section are subject to the same provisos to which exception 1 to s 300, IPC, is subject.

2. 'Voluntarily Causes Hurt'

Commentary under s 321, ante, may be referred to.2885

3. 'Grave and Sudden Provocation'

Provocation, which is involved in the apprehension of an offence against person or property (in certain cases), is the basis of the right of private defence (ss 96 to 106, IPC) against the person threatening such offence (s 97, IPC). Sections 334 and 335, IPC have nothing to do with that subject.[84] Other provocation, if grave and sudden, which causes the person provoked to kill the person, who offers the provocation, or any other person by mistake or accident, renders the killing culpable homicide, but not murder (s 300, exception 1, IPC). If, in the case of such provocation, the person provoked does not kill another, but causes hurt or grievous hurt, the case falls under s 334 or s 335, IPC, whereby the punishment is reduced by reason of the fact of provocation. It should, however, be remembered that grave and sudden provocation mitigates the offence of voluntarily causing hurt or grievous hurt only if the offender neither intends, nor knows himself to be likely, to cause such hurt or grievous hurt to any person other than the person who gave the provocation. What is done intentionally or knowingly cannot be said to be done whilst the offender is deprived of the power of self control by the grave and sudden provocation.

As to what grave and sudden provocation is, exception 1 to s 300, IPC, and the commentary under s 300, may be referred to.

Accused an ex-service man released from army on medical grounds suffering from Neurosi s 300D, and depressive disorder, shot at the complainant with fire arm. He was convicted under ss 335 and 337, IPC .[85]

4. Procedure

An offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, and triable by any magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

5. Charge

Commentary under the same heading in s 323, ante, may be referred to.

6. Proof

The prosecution has only to prove the commission of the offence under ss 323 or 324 .

7. Burden of Proof

The burden of proof of grave and sudden provocation lies on the accused.[86] He has further to prove that he neither intended, nor knew himself to be likely, to cause hurt to any person other than the person who gave the provocation.

Voluntarily causing grievous hurt on provocation.--

Whoever [87][voluntarily] causes grievous hurt on grave and sudden provocation, if he neither intends nor knows himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt to any person other than the person who gave the provocation, shall be punished with2886 imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to four years, or with fine which may extend to two thousand rupees, or with both.

Explanation.--The last two sections are subject to the same provisos as Exception 1, section 300 .

Comments

1. Scope

This section, which, by virtue of the explanation annexed to it, is subject to the provisos to exception 1 to s 300, IPC, prescribes punishment for voluntarily causing hurt on grave and sudden provocation, and has to be read as a proviso to ss 325 and 326, IPC . Where grievous hurt is caused to the person who gave the provocation, all that is necessary to attract the provisions of this section is that it is caused on grave and sudden provocation. This section is not attracted when hurt caused is not grievous within the meaning of s 320 .[88]

2. 'Voluntarily Causes Grievous Hurt'

Commentary under ss 320 and 322, ante, may be referred to.

3. 'Grave and Sudden Provocation'

A person who by a single blow with a deadly weapon killed another, entering at the dead of night into a dark room, where he and his wife were sleeping separately, for the purpose of having sexual intercourse with her, was held guilty of causing grievous hurt on grave and sudden provocation.[89] In Dhondey v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[90] the accused, who cut off the nose of his wife along with that of her lover on finding the former in the company of the latter, was convicted under this section. Commentary under s 300, ante, may also be referred to.

4. Explanation

According to the explanation, this section and the preceding s 334 are subject to the same provisos to which exception 1 to s 300, IPC, is subject.

5. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable only with the permission of the court before which the prosecution is pending, and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.2887

6. Charge

The charge is the same as in the case of an offence under s 325 or s 326, as the case may be.

7. Proof

The proof required is the same as under s 334, except that the prosecution has to prove that the hurt caused is grievous hurt.

8. Burden of Proof

Commentary under the same heading in s 334, ante, may be referred to.

9. Sentence

Grave and sudden provocation mitigates the offence of causing grievous hurt, but an act of nose-cutting or ear-cutting aggravates the offence under this section and deserves heavier punishment.[91] A sentence of fine only is not enough.[92]

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF THE CAUSING OF MISCARRIAGE, OF INJURIES TO UNBORN CHILDREN, OF THE EXPOSURE OF INFANTS, AND OF THE CONCEALMENT OF BIRTHS

S. 336.

Act endangering life or personal safety of others.--

Whoever does any act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to two hundred and fifty rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes doing an act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or personal safety of others.[93] The offences, punishable under this section and ss 337 and 338, IPC, are confined, in their operation, to acts done without any criminal intent, apart from the rashness or negligence which is their essential ingredient.[94]

2. 'Act'

Only rash or negligent act, which endangers human life, or the personal safety of others, is punishable under this section, even though no harm follows, and is additionally punishable under s 337, or s 338, IPC, if the same causes hurt or grievous hurt, as the case may be. Naked wires of an electric line, when taken out on2888 bamboo poles, can hardly be said to be anything less than rash or negligent act endangering human life.[1]

It is not the act, but the manner of doing it, which is made punishable by this section. The act may itself be lawful, but if it is done so rashly or negligently that it becomes a positive nuisance,[2] it is punishable under this section.[3] In Re Thippana Gangi Reddy,[4]it was observed that the real question for decision is whether the act done was such as was likely to endanger life, and in determining this question, no distinction ought to be made between the act itself and the instrument with which it is done. If injury is actually caused to the person, then the case falls within s 337 or s 338, IPC, according to the nature of the injury.[5]Sections 33 and 52, and the commentary thereunder may be referred to.

3. 'Rashly or Negligently'

'A rash act is primarily an overhasty act and is opposed to a deliberate act. Even if it is partly deliberate, it is done without due thought and caution'.[6] If the act, complained of, is a deliberate act, it cannot be called a rash or negligent act.[7]Similarly, a rash act is primarily a hasty act and is, thus, opposed to a deliberate act.[8]

The phrase 'rashly' means something more than mere inadvertence or inattentiveness or want of ordinary care. A person, who acts rashly, shows indifference to obvious consequences and to the rights of others, and does not mind whether a danger would result. A rash act is indicative of disregard of consequences. A drunken person, firing a gun in the dark, does so 'negligently'.[9]Where a person commits a wanton or dangerous act with the knowledge that it is so, but without knowing that it may probably cause injury and without the intention of causing it, it will be a rash act. In such a case, the person, committing the act, does not know that the result of his recklessness or negligence may probably cause injury to somebody, and he never intends that such injury should be caused. When a person is negligent as to the consequences of his act and there is failure on his part to take reasonable and proper care and precaution to guard against injury to somebody else, it may be a negligent act. However, if, on the other hand, a person commits an act with the intention of causing injury to somebody else, it is an intentional act, done with consideration, and cannot, therefore, be a rash and negligent act.[10] In Gaya Prasad v Emperor ,[11] the pujari of a temple left the temple at night in charge of a third person. While he was away, he deliberately threw bricks at the temple in the hope that the Hindus would believe that the bricks came from the Mahomedan quarter with the result that the Hindus would be enraged against the Mahomedans and there would be a riot between the Hindus and the Mahomedans. It was held that the act was done deliberately, and not rashly or negligently.2889

For further commentary, text under ss 279 and 304A, ante, may be referred to.

4. 'To Endanger Human life or the Personal Safety of others'

On the occasion of a festival, a temple becomes a place of public resort, and it is the bounden duty of the person-in-charge to take all reasonable precautions, necessary to ensure the safety of pilgrims. Where a well stands by the path, which the pilgrims must necessarily take to reach the shrine, which they have come to visit, and the person-in-charge of the temple omits to enclose the well and even indicate its position by lights, and removes the light, placed near the well at the instance of the officers on duty, he acts with gross negligence and thereby endangers the safety of a large number of persons within the meaning of this section.[12] Where an engine driver was taking an engine, which was letting off steam, along a public thoroughfare at a time, when the traffic was exceptionally heavy, and within a few yards of a large number of horses and carriages which had been parked together, in spite of warnings from the police that to do so would endanger public safety, it was held that he was guilty of an offence under s 336, IPC, though he might have believed that no danger would, in fact, be caused.[13]

Except the first petitioner, the Master of the vessel, the others were not responsible for rash and negligent navigation. Evidently, the rest of the crew members who belonged to different nationalities, were working in the fishing vessel to earn their livelihood. The case registered against the rest of the crew members except the first petitioner, the Master of the vessel, was set aside.[14]

It would be a rash or negligent act for a person, with defective eyesight, to drive a motor car without wearing spectacles. However, an omission to wear the spectacles at the time of driving the car, in every case, where a driver may properly use spectacles, would not necessarily render the driver liable under this section. It must depend upon the nature of the defect in the eyesight.[15]When the riots are taking place in different parts of the town, a man, possessing a gun, may very well fire shots just to indicate to the would be mischief-makers that there are arms of defence in the house, and anybody who is mischievously inclined should take care of his safety. Such an act does not amount to an offence under this section.[16]

When after surgery, the girl recovered from her illness and started living without any stomach pain, it cannot be said that accused-doctor had done any act to endanger the life of the girl.[17]

Whether pelting of stones by a large crowd can be held to be an act which endangers life, cannot be answered in the absence of certain and categorical evidence. The answer would depend on having regard to the entire situation, the locality, the rapid movements and the shifting of scenes.[18] However, when a person intentionally throws a stone at a house, under such circumstances, although he does not intend to cause hurt, and does not, in fact, cause hurt, yet he must know that he is likely to cause hurt, he commits an offence punishable under this section.[19]2890

5. Sections 279, 337, 336 --Distinction

Commentary under the same heading in s 279, vol 2, may be referred to.

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by any magistrate, and it may be tried summarily.[20]

7. Quashing of Complaint

The death or premature delivery must be the direct result of the accused and must be the proximate and efficient cause without intervention of another's negligence. It must be the causa causans; it is not enough that it may have been the causa sine qua non.[21] The accused-doctor was alleged to have acted negligently in removing the intra-uterine device during fourth months of pregnancy of the complainant. The complainant had premature delivery and the child died after 22 days of delivery. There was no material to come to the conclusion that the premature delivery and the death of the child were the direct consequence of the act of the accused-doctor. The taking of cognizance of a complaint and issuing process against the accused were held to be abuse of process of the court, so all the proceedings in the complaint were quashed.[22]

The allegation against accused-doctor were that due to his negligence the right ovary of the patient was lost while performing surgery of appendectomy. The surgery of the ovary was done by a gynecologist when it was diagnosed that the right ovary had been covered by cystic mass. The fact that consent of the complainant for such surgery was duly obtained was suppressed in the complaint. The reports of the medical college hospital showed that the removal of right ovary was necessary and done for the safety of the patient. On these facts the complaint under ss 336 and 338, IPC, were quashed by the High Court on a petition under s 482, CrPC .[23]

8. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[24]

9. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) the accused did an act rashly or negligently; and
(2) the rashness or negligence was such as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others.

In order to convict a person under this section, the prosecution must prove rashness or negligence on the part of the accused, and also that by such rashness or negligence, human life or the personal safety of others was actually endangered.[25]2891

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

S. 337.

Causing hurt by act endangering life or personal safety of others.--

Comments

1. Scope

Under this section, whoever causes hurt to any person, by doing an act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others, is liable to be punished in the manner provided. It is an aggravated form of the offence defined in s 336, IPC .[1] The operation of this section is confined to acts done without any criminal intent, apart from the rashness or negligence which is its essential ingredient.[2] If there is no rashness or negligence, there is no offence.[3]Personal injury, intentionally or knowingly caused, can never be a rash or negligent act,[4]e.g., throwing missiles at human beings.[5]

2. Sections 279, 337 and 336 --Distinction

Commentary 0075nder the same heading in s 279, IPC, vol. 2, may be referred to.

3. Essential Ingredients

The main ingredients of an offence under this section are:

(a) the doing, by the accused, of an act;
(b) so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of other; and
(c) thereby causing hurt to any person.[6]

Commentary under ss 33 and 52, IPC, vol. 1, may be referred to.

6. 'So rashly or negligently as to Endanger Human life or the Personal Safety of others'

Where, on account of the rash and negligent driving of a vehicle, a collision occurs and hurt is thereby caused to a person, the driver of the vehicle would be guilty under this section.[7] The person hurt may be an occupant of the vehicle itself.[8] The driver of a motor vehicle is under a duty of using whatever means at hand to avoid a threatened collision. It will constitute culpable negligence if a driver drives a vehicle with patently defective brakes or fails to apply the brakes in time.[9] Mere negligence or rashness is not, therefore, enough to bring a case within the ambit of s 337, or s 338, IPC . Negligence or rashness, proved by evidence, must be such as should necessarily carry with it criminal liability.[10] Criminal negligence is the gross and culpable neglect, or failure to exercise that reasonable and proper care and precaution to guard against injury either to the public generally or to an individual in particular, which having regard to all the circumstances, out of which the charge has arisen, it was the imperative duty of the accused person to have adopted.[11] Where two buses were racing and competing with each other, the owners of both the buses were held guilty under ss 279 and 337 because racing or competition involves rash driving on both sides.[12]

The accused driver was driving the bus which took deviation at the spot of the accident and hit the house. The injured passenger, PW, did not depose that the accused was driving the bus rashly and negligently. The defence version was that somebody was crossing the road and to avert the collision, the deceased driver took the vehicle to the other side of the road and hit the house. The defence version being probable was believed; the accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under ss 279, 337, 338 and 427, IPC .[13]

The respondent accused was prosecuted under ss 279 and 337, IPC on allegations that he was driving the motorcycle at high speed and that he hit the victim from wrong side, causing injuries on his legs, chest, head etc. There were material omissions and contradictions in the statement of the prosecution witness. The respondent was acquitted of the charges under ss 279 and 337, IPC .[14]

There was explosion of a bomb kept inside a passenger bus which caused the death of one passenger and injuries to several passengers. The prosecution witnesses2893 identified the accused appellant. There was enough material to connect the accused appellant with the heinous crime of planting a live bomb in a passenger bus and getting down from the same before the bomb exploded, thereby causing death of one person and grievous injuries to several other passengers. The accused appellant was convicted for offences under ss 285, 337, 338, 427, 302, IPC and s 3 of the Explosive

Substances Act .[15]

Where the accused, driving mini bus, rashly and negligently dashed against the bus, causing injuries to the passengers of both the buses, the mini bus driven by the accused was on the wrong side of the road; the passengers of the mini bus deposed that the accused driver was driving the bus at a high speed and the accused respondent was convicted under ss 279 and 337, IPC .[16]

The accused appellant, by his rash and negligent driving, had caused various injuries to the victims which suffered simple hurt. The conviction of the accused appellant under s 337, IPC, concurrently recorded by the trial Court and High Court was held proper.[17]

In prosecution of the accused for rash and negligent driving under ss 279, 337 and 338, IPC, witness supporting the prosecution case, who was minor at the time of the incident, testified before the Court that the driver was not on the wheels at the time of the accident. Another hostile witness deposed that he could not see the driver of the offending vehicle. Therefore, the accused was not convicted for offences under ss 279, 337 and 338, IPC .[18]

Where the photographs of the spot showed that the offending truck was on the wrong side of the road, i.e., on the extreme right side of road on the curve, whereas the victim's Maruti Car was at its left side, the appellant accused was convicted under s 279, IPC .[19]

Speed is not a criterion, even to infer the rash or negligent act of driving; it is merely a corroborative factor.[20] The accused driver of a roadways bus was driving the bus at a high speed, which dashed against a tempo coming from the opposite direction, caused injuries to three persons being the occupants of the tempo. The accused was convicted under ss 279 and 337, IPC .[21]

The prosecution's case was that, the accused, driving the goods truck in a rash and negligent manner, dashed against the Tata Sumo which was coming from opposite direction. All the PWS were sitting in the rear seats of the Tata Sumo and as such they had no opportunity to see the driver of the offending vehicle. The witnesses did not depose before the Court that they saw the face of the driver of the offending vehicle. The identity/identification of the accused was not proved beyond reasonable doubt. The accused was acquitted of the charge under ss 279, 337 and 304A, IPC .[22]

Where the appellant driver of police jeep, under the influence of alcohol, was driving the jeep at a high speed, and thereby caused the death of five persons and2894 injured seven and went 93 feet ahead of the incident, he could be stopped by the Police Officer who was travelling in the vehicle. It was held to be a case of culpable negligence. He was convicted under ss 304A, 337, 338 and 279, IPC .[23]

Illustrative Cases

Negligent Shooting

The causing of hurt by negligence in the use of a gun would fall within the purview of s 337, rather than s 286, IPC . However, where all the evidence against the accused was that he went out for shooting in the month of July, when people were likely to be in the fields, and that a single pellet from his gun struck a man who was sitting in a field, it was held that this was not sufficient evidence of rashness or negligence to support a conviction under this section.[24] If a man fires blindly, in the dark, with a shotgun in the direction from which he has heard sounds coming from a long distance, it cannot be held that his act must, in all probability, cause death, or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, and, therefore, he must be convicted under this section, and not under s 307 .[25]

Rash and Negligent Operation

In Gulam Hyder Punjabi v Emperor ,[26] the accused, who was a hakim, performed an operation on the outer side of the upper lid of the eye of the complainant. The instruments used were a pair of scissors and needle, which would ordinarily be used by a tailor, and not by an eye-surgeon. The wound was sutured with ordinary thread. The most ordinary precautions, such as using proper instruments for the operations as well as for protecting the eyeball, disinfecting and sterilising the instruments and using antiseptics, were entirely neglected. The medical evidence showed that the operation was needless and performed in a primitive way, and not in accordance with any recognised Indian method. It was held that whether a practitioner is trained or not, he is bound, by law, to avoid such rashness or negligence as would endanger human life or the personal safety of others, and if he undertakes an operation and he has been properly found to have acted rashly and negligently, he is guilty of an offence under this section.

Where during cesarean operation the accused doctor left a scissor in the abdomen of the patient and no injury was caused to the patient, the case appeared to be more close to a case of accident; refusal to frame charge under ss 337 and 338, IPC against the accused was held proper.[27]

Negligence in Administering Drug

The mere administering of a love potion or drug, which a person thinks might be beneficial, is not in itself an offence; but when it is supposed to have effect upon persons, with whom the paramour of the accused has enmity, and when she administers it without due care and caution or any enquiry as to what it really is, she commits an offence punishable under this section.[28]2895

Use of Old and Crude Method by Doctor--If Negligence

The doctor has discretion in choosing treatment which he proposes to give to the patient and such discretion is relatively ampler in cases of emergency.[29] For draining out wine from the bladder, two methods are proved; one of them being the doctors treats the patient with a method normally adopted to drain out wine by using a catheter. The plea of the complainant that using a catheter is old and a crude method and the doctors ought to have used the above public method which is proper, is not tenable and the doctors cannot be said to be negligent in treating the patient.[30]

Pelting of Brickbats

The victim was alleged to have suffered injuries by the pelting of brickbats. The police officer who visited the place of occurrence did not find any brickbats there. There was no explicit accusation against any of the accused to be the author of injuries found on the victim by pelting of brickbats. The accused were acquitted under s 337, IPC, by getting the benefit of doubt.[31]

7. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable only with the permission of the court before which the prosecution is pending, and triable by any magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

Unless the person, who has been hurt, joins the petition of compromise, the case cannot be compounded merely with the consent of the person making the FIR.[32] The court before which the prosecution is pending should permit the offence to be compounded.[33] However, when in a joint trial under ss 337, 426 and 279, IPC, the court permits the compounding of offences under ss 337 and 426, IPC ; the permission does not result in the acquittal of the accused for the offence under s 279, IPC .[34]

8. No Effect of Repealing Provision of Section 25, Prevention of Food Adulteration Act (37 of 1954)

Commentary under same heading in s 270, IPC, vol. 2, may be referred to.

9. Quashing of Complaint

Commentary under same heading in s 336, ante, may be referred to.

10. Joint Trial under Sections 279, 337 and 426 --Not Illegal

Where, in a case, the series of acts were: (1) the rash and negligent driving of a bus by its driver; (2) the rash and negligent driving of a car by its driver; and (3) the acts of both the drivers in acting negligently leading to a collision, the combined effect of which resulted in damage to the bus and the car, and injuries to the driver of the car,2896 constituting offences under ss 337, 426 and 279, IPC, it was held that the drivers of both the vehicles could be tried together and a joint trial was not illegal.[35]

11. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.

12. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) the accused did an act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others; and
(2) he thereby caused hurt to certain person/persons.

Once the accident stands proved and the circumstances which appear on the record conclude the rash or negligent driving by the offending vehicle, immediately the onus shifts upon such driver to prove due care and caution.[36]

When no witness was available to show that the accused was driving a truck at the time of accident, the sole evidence relied on by the prosecution was 'Bilti' showing the name of the accused as driver of the truck in question, in the statement under s 313, CrPC, the accused stated that another driver belonging to the same company took away his truck before the accident took place, the conviction of the accused under ss 279, 337, 338 and 304-A, IPC, was not found proper.[37] However, the mere fact that the injured witness admitted that he failed to see the accused as he fell down when he was hit is not sufficient to hold that the accused was not properly identified or was not driving the vehicle at the time of the accident.[38] If an accident occurs on a public road in a village and is witnessed by one or more witnesses, the eye witnesses are more likely to be the residents of the locality or the persons visiting that locality on business or some other purpose. Merely because the persons are residents of the village or the locality where the accident occurred, they cannot be called as interested witnesses.[39]

The non-examination by the motor vehicle inspector is not fatal when his report was admitted in evidence by the consent of the accused.[40]

13. Acquittal under Section 337 or Section 338 --No bar to Prosecution under Section 279

Commentary under same heading in s 279, IPC, vol. 2, may be referred to.

14. Conviction both under Sections 279 and 337 or Section 338 --Legality of

Commentary under same heading in s 279, IPC, vol. 2, may be referred to.2897

The offence punishable under s 279, IPC, is a grave offence, the sentence prescribed is higher; the accused can be punished under s 279, IPC only, and not under both ss 279 and 337, IPC .[41]

15. Sentence

Where the accused driver of a Government Roadways bus was not previously convicted and had not repeated the offence after conviction by the Court below, the High Court substituted the sentence of imprisonment by fine.[42]

Where the accused appellant by driving a jeep on a public road in a rash and negligent manner, had endangered the life of innocent persons, caused death of an occupant of the jeep and injuries to others, the High Court by showing undue sympathy, was not justified in reducing the sentence to the period already undergone.[43]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

S. 338.

Causing grievous hurt by act endangering life or personal safety of others.--

Whoever causes grievous hurt to any person by doing any act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life, or the personal safety of others, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

A reading of s 338, IPC would clearly indicate that there must be some act done by the accused and that act must be done so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others.[44] This section deals with causing grievous hurt by any act endangering human life or the personal safety of others. The offence under this section is only an aggravated form of the offence under the previous section, the only difference between the two being the degree of the injury caused. Under the preceding section, it is simple hurt whereas, under this, it is grievous hurt. Otherwise, the two sections are in identical terms.2898

The main feature of the offence under this section is the causing of grievous hurt by any act, which is not voluntary, but which is rash or negligent. The liability is to be judged with reference to the effect produced by the rash or negligent conduct of the accused.

2. Main Ingredients

The main ingredients[45] of an offence under this section are:

(a) the doing, by the accused, of an act;
(b) so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others; and
(c) thereby causing grievous hurt to any person.

3. Sections 279 and 338 --Distinction

Commentary under the same heading in s 279, IPC, vol. 2, may be referred to.

4. 'Grievous Hurt'

Commentary under s 320, ante, may be referred to.

5. 'By doing any Act'

For the purpose of this section, the nature of the act is immaterial. All, that is necessary, is that, whatever be the act, it should be done so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others. The act done may even be lawful in itself. Thus, where the accused, who was a fully developed man, had sexual intercourse with his child-wife, who had not yet attained puberty, with such violence as to rupture her vagina and destroy the portion between the vagina and the rectum with the result that she died, it was held that he did a dangerous act with reckless indifference to the welfare and personal safety of his wife and was guilty of the offence under this section.[46]

Commentary under s 337 and under s 326, may be referred to.

6. 'So rashly or Negligently as to Endanger Human Life or the Personal Safety of Others'

Commentary under s 279, IPC, vol. 2 and 304A, 336, 337 ante.

7. Illustrative Cases

In State of Bihar v Mangal Singh ,[47] the respondent was driving a bus, with defective brakes, at such high speed that when he made an attempt to apply the foot brakes on being signalled to stop, he was completely unable to control it. Two of the wheels had already gone into a nala by the side of the road.

The bus after having swerved to the right and to the left ultimately capsized on the road. Several passengers received injuries, some receiving serious injuries. One of the passengers even succumbed to2899 his injuries. The driver was tried for offences under ss 279, 338 and 304-A . It was held that he was rightly convicted for the offences charged. Where grievous hurt was caused to a person in an accident and it was found that the accident was due, mainly, if not entirely, to the rashness of the accused in driving the motor car, when he was drunk, and getting on the wrong side of the road, while there were vehicles in front, or otherwise, to his negligence in not seeing a tonga in front of him and not properly controlling the motor car so as to avoid a collision, it was held that he was rightly convicted of the offence under this section.[48] If the driver of a truck allows another person to drive the truck, knowing that the person has no driving licence, and that person causes grievous hurt to a person by driving the truck rashly or negligently, the driver would be liable under this section read with ss 107 and 115 .[49]

Where during cesarean operation the accused doctor left scissor in abdomen of the patient, no injury was caused to the patient, the case appeared to be more close to the case of the accident, refusal to frame charge under ss 337 and 338, IPC against the accused was held proper.[50]

The accused driver was driving the bus; the bus took deviation at the spot of the accident and hit the house. The injured passenger PW did not depose that the accused was driving the bus rashly and negligently. The defence version was that somebody was crossing the road and to avert accident, the deceased driver drove the vehicle to the other side of the road and hit the house. The defence version being probable was believed, the accused appellant was acquitted of the charge under ss 279, 337, 338 and 427, IPC .[51]

Evidence of witnesses established that the accused appellant driving a jeep loaded with passengers, dashed with roadside trees, collapsed by the side of the road, and as a result 12/13 passengers on board sustained injuries and one injured died later in the hospital. The vehicle was seized from the spot in a damaged condition. The Motor Vehicle Inspector reported that the vehicle was having no mechanical defect at the time of the accident. The accused appellant had suffered injuries in the accident. The appellant driver was convicted under ss 279, 338 and 304A, IPC .[52]

Where the accused driver of the bus, in the process of overtaking the bullock cart, dashed against the motorcycle coming from the opposite side, the pillion rider of the motorcycle injured in the accident was the best witness for the incident. The accused driver of the bus dragged the motorcycle for about 20 feet and stopped the vehicle on the footpath on the western side of the road. Held, the accused driver of the bus was guilty of rash and negligent driving of the bus. He was convicted under ss 279, 338 and 304A, IPC .[53]

Accused appellant by rash and negligent driving caused grievous injuries to two PWS on temporal parietal region causing deep scar with bleeding. The injuries were covered by the definition of 'grievous hurt' under s 320, IPC . Conviction of the accused appellant under s 338, IPC was held proper.[54]2900

In prosecution of the accused for rash and negligent driving under ss 279, 337 and 338, IPC, the witness supporting the prosecution case, who was minor at the time of the incident, testified before the Court that the driver was not on the wheels at the time of the accident. Another hostile witness deposed that he could not see the driver of the offending vehicle. Accused was not convicted for offences under ss 279, 337 and 338, IPC .[55]

There was prosecution evidence that the accused respondent was driving motorcycle at a high speed on the wrong side of the road after it had become dark and without lights. In mechanical examination, the motorcycle was found in order. Held, the act of the accused was such a wanton one that it must be presumed that he had the knowledge that his act would cause injury to any person on the road. He was convicted under ss 279 and 338, IPC .[56]

Where the appellant driver of police jeep under the influence of alcohol was driving the jeep at a high speed, and thereby caused the death of five persons and injured seven, went 93 feet ahead of the incident spot and could not be stopped by the Police Officer who was travelling in vehicle, held it was a case of culpable negligence and was convicted under ss 304A, 337, 338 and 279, IPC .[57]

8. 'Act'--Covers Medical Profession

Expression 'act' occurring in s 338, IPC, includes acts of omission as well. Section 338 of the IPC does recognize unambiguously that the particular offence can be committed by omission. The medical profession is included in it. The offence under s 338 of the IPC is capable of being committed by omission.[58]

Medical Negligence--Criminal Liability of Doctor

If the conduct in question involves elements of recklessness, then it is punishable and should not be described as merely negligent. If, however, there is nothing to suggest that the accused (doctor) was aware of the risk deliberately taken, then he is morally blameless and should face, at the most, a civil action for damages.[59]

The appellant a renowned surgeon advised Exploratory Laparotomy of a cancer patient which was not an act of negligence much less a wanton negligence. On opening the abdomen, one Dr. A.K. Mukherje found plastering of intestines as well as profuse oozing of ascetic fluids. He immediately called the appellant who was performing other surgical procedures in another operation theatre. The appellant after seeing the condition of the patient, albeit, from the distance found that it was not possible to proceed with the operation. He advised Dr. A.K. Mukherjee to close the abdomen. Dr. Mukherjee thus closed the abdomen. It was because of the deplorable condition of the patient, the surgery could not be completed as on the opening of the abdomen other complications were revealed. This would have happened in any case, irrespective whether abdomen was opened by Dr. Mukherjee or by the appellant himself. Held, the act of the accused appellant was not punishable under s 338, IPC and accordingly his conviction under s 338 read with s 109, IPC was set aside.[60]2901

In the instant case the complainant's wife was admitted in the respondent's hospital for second pregnancy. On 01 January 2010, she underwent a caesarian operation for the delivery and the delivery was successful, but, while the abdomen was to be closed, she developed unexpected cardiac arrest and though she was shifted to some other hospital, she became unconscious and fell in coma. The complainant filed complaint against the respondent hospital and the doctors who were working as gynecologists. The Special Medical Board gave opinion that there was no negligence on the part of the respondent doctors. The proceedings filed under s 338, IPC were quashed on petition under s 482, CrPC .[61]

9. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable only with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution is pending, and triable by any magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

10. Quashing of Complaint

Commentary under the same heading in s 336, ante, may be referred to.

11. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[62]

However, when the offence under this section is clubbed with other offences attracting a warrant trial, the charge under this offence may also be framed. But when no negligence or rashness of the accused-doctor in performing an operation endangering the life of the patient was averred or proved, the surgical injury for curing deceases cannot be said to be injury caused voluntarily, punishable under s 326, by performing the operation no wrongful gain was made to the doctors or to the hospital, the order framing of charges under ss 326, 338, 420 read with s 120 B, IPC was quashed.[63]

There is no impediment in law for an offender being charged for the offence under s 304, Pt II, IPC and also under ss 337 and 338, IPC . The two charges under s 304, Pt II, IPC can legally co-exist in a case of single rash or negligent act where a rash or negligent act is done with the knowledge of likelihood of its dangerous consequences.[64]

12. 'Proof'

The proof required is the same as under s 337, by substituting 'grievous hurt' for 'hurt'.

Merely because a person got injured when he came in contact with the bumper of the car, cannot lead to an inference that the driver must have been rash or negligent. The prosecution should lead evidence to establish the fact of negligence.[65]2902

13. Accidents on Account of Mechanical Defect, in the Vehicle

Commentary under the same heading in s 304A, ante, may be referred to.

14. Examination of the Accused

Commentary under the same heading in s 304A, ante, may be referred to.

15. Acquittal under Section 337 or Section 338 --No Bar to Prosecution under Section 279

Commentary under the same heading in s 279, IPC, vol. 2, may be referred to.

16. Conviction Both under Sections 279 and 337 or 338 --Legality of Commentary under the same heading in s 279, IPC, vol. 2, may be referred to.

17. Conviction

A conviction under s 121 of the Motor Vehicles Act 1939 is no bar to a conviction under this section.[66]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF WRONGFUL RESTRAINT AND WRONGFUL CONFINEMENT

S. 339.

Wrongful restraint.--

Whoever voluntarily obstructs any person so as to prevent that person from proceeding in any direction in which that person has a right to proceed, is said wrongfully to restrain that person.

Exception.--The obstruction of a private way over land or water which a person in good faith believes himself to have a lawful right to obstruct, is not an offence within the meaning of this section.

Illustration

A obstructs a path along which Z has a right to pass. A not believing in good faith that he has a right to stop the path. Z is thereby prevented from passing. A wrongfully restrains Z.

Comments

1. Scope

This section defines wrongful restraint which is made an offence punishable under s 341, IPC . Similarly, s 340, IPC defines wrongful confinement which is an offence2903 made punishable under s 342, IPC . The remaining sections under this head, i.e., ss 343 to 348, IPC, deal with aggravated forms of wrongful confinement.

2. Law of Singapore

Whoever voluntarily obstructs any person, so as to prevent that person from proceeding in any direction in which he has a right to proceed, is said to wrongfully restrain that person. The obstruction of a private way over land or water which a person in good faith believes himself to have a lawful right to obstruct is not an offence within the meaning of this provision.[67]

The accused was convicted of this offence when he raised his hands to prevent the victim from proceeding to the washroom.[68]

3. Wrongful Restraint--Essentials

The essential ingredients of the wrongful restraint are:

(1) Accused obstructs voluntarily;
(2) The victim is prevented from proceeding in any direction;
(3) Such victim has every right to proceed in that direction.[69]

By wrongful restraint is meant the keeping of man out of a place where he wishes to be and has a right to be. Wrongful confinement, which is a form of wrongful restraint, is the keeping of a man within certain limits out of which he wishes to go and has a right to go.[70] The offence of wrongful restraint, as has been pithily put, is linear in its scope while wrongful confinement is circular in its character. The illustration to this section refers merely to the ordinary case of a path.[71]

A person may obstruct another by causing it to appear to that other that it is impossible, difficult or dangerous to proceed, as well as by causing it actually to be impossible, difficult or dangerous for that other to proceed. The obstruction-must be physical, a verbal prohibition or remonstrance does not amount to such obstruction. The offence is the abridgment of the liberty of a person against his will. In a wrongful restraint, there need not be any stoppage of the movement; it may be directed into a channel different from the direction in which the victim intends to move. Physical presence of the obstructer is not necessary, nor is any actual assault necessary, and fear of immediate harm restraining a man out of place, where he wishes to be and has a right to be, is sufficient to constitute an offence under this section. The slightest unlawful obstruction to the liberty of a person to go when and where he likes to go, provided he does so in a lawful manner, cannot be justified and is punishable.[72]2904

4. 'Voluntarily'

This section relates to the voluntary obstruction by a person, and not obviously, at least, to obstructions which are not voluntarily continued by the persons, accused of the obstruction, throughout the time the obstruction lasts.[73]What the section contemplates is that there must be obstruction attributable directly to the person charged; the section does not include, within its scope, an act which, in its remote and indirect consequence might obstruct the free movement of a person.[74] It is not voluntary obstruction of a person unless the obstructor intends it or knows or has reason to believe it to be likely that the means adopted would cause his obstruction. The section does not say that whoever does an act, which causes obstruction to a person so as to prevent him from proceeding in any direction, etc., wrongfully restrains that person.[75]

5. 'Obstructs'

Obstruction, within the meaning of this section, must be physical obstruction although it may be caused by physical force as well as by being a menace and using threats.[76] There must be some physical coercion or threat of physical injury. Mere exercise of moral influence does not amount to restraint.[77] Ploughing up a path, over which a person has a right to pass, is not obstruction.[78] The obstruction must be such as to prevent the ordinary normal movements of a person.[79] To constitute an offence under s 341 or s 342, IPC, it is not necessary that the person, to be deprived of his liberty, should be touched or assaulted or actually arrested or confined within walls. The offence may be committed by words alone, or by acts alone, or by both, or by merely operating on the will, or by personal force, or by both. A person can be deprived of his liberty of his locomotion by the exercise of force as well as by the express or implied threat of it.[80]

6. 'Any Person'

To come within the section, the obstruction must be to the passage of a person, and not of cattle,[81] or of a vehicle.[82] However, voluntary obstruction of a vehicle, in2905 which persons are travelling, would amount to wrongful restraint of the persons in the vehicle.[83]

Even a child of tender age can be 'a person' within the meaning of this section.[84]

7. 'So as to Prevent that Person from Proceeding in any Direction in which that Person has a Right to Proceed'

To prevent a person from doing something, which he has a right to do, is not necessarily wrongful restraint, e.g., A prevents B from building a party wall between their backyards.[85] To justify a conviction for wrongful confinement, it must be found that: (1) the complainant had a right to proceed in a certain direction, say along a path; and (2) he was so obstructed that he was prevented from so doing. Ploughing up a path would not, by itself, prevent people from walking over it.[86] Mere unyoking of the bullocks, tied to a plough, does not amount to wrongful restraint.[87] Where the accused placed a lock on the outer door of the complainant's house intending to prevent, and thereby actually preventing, his ingress, it was held that the offence of wrongful restraint was established.[88]

8. 'From Proceeding'

The word 'proceed' is not confined to the case of a person who can walk on his own legs or can move by physical means within his own power.

It includes the case of a person proceeding by outside agency which in the case of a baby would mean the agency of its natural protector or guardian.[89] It includes proceeding by a car or a bus,[90] or on horse-back.[91]

9. 'In any Direction'

These words would include a vertical direction so that the section would cover the case of a person reasonably wanting to go vertically upwards,[92] or downwards.[93] Proceeding in any direction must mean proceeding in that direction, and not in any other direction, much less in the reverse direction.[94]2906

10. 'In which that Person has a Right to Proceed'

For an action to amount to 'wrongful restraint', the person concerned must have 'right to proceed', in the direction in question.[1] The right to proceed may be vested in a person on account of his being a tenant or a licensee or right as a member of the public, etc., which is discussed below separately.

License

This section applies only if a person is prevented from proceeding in a direction in which he has a right, and not when he has only a license to proceed. The right to proceed in that direction must be clearly established.[2]

The complainant teacher who was licensee of a room in the hostel cannot have the right to live after termination of his license. Hence, the school authorities cannot be charged for wrongfully restraining the said teacher from entering the said room.[3]

Tenant

This section does not, however, cover cases where there is no ordinary or special reason for a person to proceed in the direction which is obstructed.[4]

Where a landlord prevented a tenant from going to, and using a bathroom and a privy by locking the door, and it was not established beyond a reasonable doubt that the bathroom and privy were part of the tenancy and the tenant had a right to use them, it was held that the landlord could not be convicted of the offence of wrongful restraint.[5] A tenant, holding over, however, has a right to retain possession of the premises which he occupies, until he is dispossessed in due course of law, and if the landlord blocks his passage to the premises, he is guilty of the offence of wrongful restraint.[6] Even an intending emigrant, who has been treated as an emigrant and has been given meals and an advance of money by the authorities at an emigration depot, has a right to proceed in any direction he likes, and if he is prevented by the accused-watchman of the depot, the latter would be guilty of wrongful restraint.[7]

Offering Namaaz in a Public Mosque

Every person professing Islam has a right to offer namaaz in a public mosque according to religious faith and belief and the traditions. The Jama Masjid, the mosque in question, happens to be a public mosque. Therefore, prima facie the trustees of the said mosque had no right to lock the doors of it for preventing the other persons of Harkul Budruk from entering into the said mosque for offering namaaz and worshipping God as per the Islamic faith, belief and traditions.[8]

Others

A person, preventing another from proceeding along the public street, would be guilty of the offence of wrongful restraint.[9] Any member of the public has a right to2907 use a public street in any lawful manner.[10] Persons of whatever sect are entitled to conduct religious processions through public streets subject to such directions as the magistrate may lawfully give to prevent obstructions of the thoroughfare or breaches of public peace.[11] The worshippers in a mosque or a temple, which abuts on a high road, cannot compel processionists passing along the road, to interrupt their worship while passing the mosque or temple on the ground that there was continuous worship there.[12]

Wrongful restraint--Prosecution of Director of company

The respondent company was carrying out construction work on the road through workers. The directors of the company had asked the workers to work on the spot; they were not present on the spot. The prosecution of the Managing Director and other directors of the company for offence under s 341, IPC was bad. The order summoning the respondent company was quashed.[13]

11. Exception

The exception specially exempts from the operation of s 341, IPC, obstruction to a private right of way. Where there is a dispute between the parties as to whether the obstruction is to a public thoroughfare or to a private way, the procedure, provided by s 133, CrPC, is more fitting than a prosecution under this section.[14] The question whether the complainant has acquired a right of way over the land of the accused, can be decided authoritatively only in a civil court, and not in a proceeding under this section. If the accused believes, in good faith, that he has a right to prevent the complainant from passing over his ground, he cannot be convicted of the offence of wrongful restraint.[15] Where the obstruction is made in good faith and the accused believes himself to have a lawful right to obstruct, no offence under this section committed.[16] However, a person cannot be deemed to believe, in good faith, that he has a lawful right to obstruct the passage by closing the door which is necessary for the occupant's egress and ingress. The exception cannot be attracted in such a case.[17]

Apart from the exception appended to this section, the general exceptions in ss 76 to 79, IPC, also protect persons acting bona fide, i.e., in good faith believing in a right. Similarly, a police officer, arresting a person with warrant and refusing to let him go home without furnishing bail, can seek the protection of the said provisions only if he acted in good faith, i.e., with due care and attention. Otherwise, he would be guilty under this section.[18]2908

1. Scope

This section defines the offence of wrongful confinement which is made punishable under s 342, IPC . Wrongful confinement, which is a form of wrongful restraint, as defined in the s 339, IPC, is the keeping of a man within the prescribed limits, out of which he wishes to go and has a right to go. In the case of wrongful restraint, a person is restrained from proceeding in any direction, in which he has a right to proceed, while, in the case of wrongful confinement, he is restrained from proceeding beyond certain prescribed limits. If the acts, complained of, come within both the definitions, the offence under this section has been committed unless there are other sections in this Code, which provide an excuse for, or a defense to, what otherwise, would be a crime.[19] Where the accused, a district traffic superintendent, being under the bona fide impression that the complainant admitted that he had travelled without a ticket, seized the hand of the complainant, dragged him to the ticket collector and ordered the ticket collector to realise the full fare, it was held that the accused was guilty of wrongful confinement, and even submission, by the complainant to arrest, could not diminish the legal effect of his acts.[20] Arrest and detention by a police officer, not strictly justified by the provisions of law, would be unlawful and wrongful and would render the police officer liable under s 342, IPC .[21] A police officer is, in no case, justified to keep a person in confinement even for a single hour except on reasonable grounds warranted by the circumstances of the case.[22]However, where there was no malice, no intention of doing an act of the nature spoken of in s 339 or s 340, IPC, and no voluntary obstruction or restraint, though2909 there was probably excessive and mistaken exercise of powers, not a civil excuse in a police officer, the facts were held not to amount to the criminal offence of wrongful restraint.[23] Where a police officer, in execution of a warrant to arrest a certain person, arrests another person by mistake, he would be protected by s 76 .[24] Where the arrest of the victim has been strictly legal, the accused cannot successfully be proceeded against on a charge under s 342, IPC .[25] If a constable and a chaukidar are sent to jail for six months for taking a man to the police station in order that a sub-inspector, conducting an investigation into a burglary, might ask him some questions, it would be impossible for the police administration of the country to be carried on.[26]

2. Law of Canada

Unlawful confinement deprives a person of the liberty to move from point to point. Unlawful confinement is a general intent offence requiring proof only of a minimal intent to effect deprivation of freedom of movement. Confinement does not require proof of total physical restraint or confinement for the entire time period alleged. It is sufficient to show that the confinement lasted for a significant period of time. An ability to escape is not necessarily inconsistent with an unlawful confinement.[27]

Physical restraint standing alone will satisfy the minimum intent to perform the act which constitutes the actus reus of unlawful confinement. Although the serious nature of the crime itself might be suggestive of the necessity of establishing an 'ulterior intent', over and above the minimal intent required for general intent offences, the minimal intent to effect deprivation of freedom of movement will suffice. A robber who instructs staff and customers to raise their hands as he empties the cash box does so in order to hold them captive. The minimal intent associated with unlawful confinement is to prevent the victim from leaving or from being removed. A temporary restraint will suffice if it is a purposeful detention.[28]

Within the context of s 279, kidnapping is a more serious offence than forcible confinement. Unlike murder, there is neither any stigma attached to a conviction for forcible confinement, nor is the penalty especially harsh.[29]

3. Issue of Process Against Accused on Complaint

The complaint has to be read as it is and the allegations made by the complainant in the complaint have to be read as they are and the magistrate has to apply judicial mind and to find out whether an offence indicated by the provisions of IPC has been spelt out prima facie or not. If he is satisfied that such an offence has been spelt out, it is his duty to take the cognizance of such complaint and to take every legal step as2910 indicated by the IPC by issuing the process against the accused named in the said complaint.[30]

4. Kidnapping Distinguished from Wrongful Confinement

Commentary under the same heading in s 360, post, may be referred to.

5. 'Whoever Wrongfully Restrains'

To constitute wrongful confinement, there must first be wrongful restraint, and, secondly, that restraint must be such as to prevent the person restrained from proceeding beyond certain circumscribing limits.[31] Where there is evidence of wrongful restraint only and there is no independent evidence of wrongful confinement, the offence would fall under the preceding s 339, punishable under s 341, and not under this section, punishable under s 342 .[32]

There can be no wrongful confinement when a desire to proceed has never existed, nor can confinement be wrongful if it was consented to by the person affected.[33] If escape is open to the person confined if he himself wishes to avail of it, his confinement will not be wrongful confinement. However, whether an escape was open, will depend not upon the person confined could open a door and escape if she wished, but upon whether she would be feeling confident that she would be able to extricate herself from the confinement notwithstanding the presence of the confiner, who was able bodied, robust and strong man, as against a lean and thin girl who was confined.[34]

As to what is wrongful restraint, commentary under s 339 may be referred to.

6. 'Any Person'

Commentary under the same heading in s 339, ante, may be referred to.

7. 'In such a Manner as to Prevent that Person from Proceeding Beyond Certain Circumscribing Limits'

Neither in wrongful restraint, nor in wrongful confinement, is the liberty of movement totally restricted. Even in wrongful confinement, the person confined is free to move within certain limits. He is prevented only from proceeding beyond those limits.[35] A person may be guilty of wrongful confinement though he acts without malice.[36] Of course, it may always be a question whether such person is protected by s 79 of the IPC .[37] In Habib Khan v State ,[38] the accused, a chaukidar and daffadar, charged the complainant with theft, tied him with a turban and compelled him to proceed towards the police station, and, on the way, detained him in an2911 orchard, made a proposal of payment of certain amount of money for his release, and released him only on such payment. It was held that the action of the accused in keeping the complainant tied in the orchard was certainly an act which amounted to wrongful restraint in such manner as to prevent that person from proceeding beyond certain circumscribing limits.

8. Physical Obstruction--If Necessary

Proof of actual physical obstruction is not essential to support a charge of wrongful confinement. It must, in each case, be proved that there was, at least, such an impression produced, in the mind of the person detained, as to lead him reasonably to believe that he was not free to depart and that he would be forthwith restrained if he attempted to do so.[39] The mere threat of some future harm in case of departure would not suffice if he knew that it was open to him to go away. However, if the circumstances were such as to justify and create the belief that he could not depart without being seized immediately, then it would be proper to hold that he was obstructed and confined.[40]

In Madala Peraiah v Voruganti Chendriah ,[41] it was observed that physical presence of the obstructer is not necessary, nor is any actual assault necessary, and fear of immediate harm, restraining a man out of a place, where he wishes to be and has a right to be, is sufficient to constitute an offence under s 341 of this Code. The same reasoning applies to an offence under s 342, the emphasis being on the apprehension produced in the mind of the person restrained or confined.[42]

9. Duration of Confinement Immaterial

The time during which a party is kept in wrongful confinement is immaterial, except with reference to the extent of the punishment. However, s 342, IPC, under which wrongful confinement is punishable as such, refers only to confinement for less than three days because s 343, IPC provides a heavier penalty for wrongful confinement for three or more days and s 344, IPC provides a still higher penalty for wrongful confinement for 10 or more days. But wrongful confinement even for a single hour is punishable under s 342 unless it is justified in law.[43]

10. Rightful Confinement

It has to be understood that unless the confinement of the victim is wrongful, the offence under s 340 read with s 342, IPC cannot be said to have been committed. A confinement of a person which is authorised by law cannot be said to be wrongful confinement and such authorised confinement does not attract ss 340 / 342, IPC .

The arrest and detention of a person accused of an offence under s 307, IPC, by the accused-police inspector and constables is not illegal so they cannot be held guilty of the offence of wrongful confinement punishable under s 342 .[44] However, when a person is detained against an order of detention passed by a judicial magistrate2912 having no authority to order detention under s 3 of the National Security Act which authorises the state or the Central Government pass a detention order but not the judicial magistrate, the detention of the said person is highly illegal, unwarranted and wrongful and besides being liable to be quashed by the High Court in the writ petition filed on behalf of the persons detained, he was also held entitled to compensation. It was further held that the judicial magistrate passed an order of illegal detention.[45]

11. Habeas Corpus

In cases of wrongful detention of the victim, the petition under art 226 of the Constitution of India is maintainable before the High Court. However when a person having attained majority live out of his/her own freewill then such a writ is not maintainable. Thus, where the petition under art 226 by the husband for the production and release of his wife was allowed by the High Court, an appeal by special leave was filed by the wife against the order of the High Court, the wife/appellant completed 21 years of age during pendency of the appeal before the Supreme Court, observing that the petition for writ of habeas corpus was not maintainable as the court satisfied itself that the appellant wife was not being detained against her will and without her consent, the Supreme Court reversed the decision of the High Court.[46] However, in another case where a woman was illegally confined, the letter of that woman to the Supreme Court was treated as a writ under art 32 and the Supreme Court directed the person against whom the complaint was made to produce that woman before additional chief judicial magistrate concerned. The additional chief judicial magistrate was also directed to ascertain true facts from the woman concerned and if he is satisfied that the said woman was being detained against her wishes, she was to be set at liberty forthwith and provided police protection in order to escort her to the place where she wants to go. Thereafter, the additional chief judicial magistrate was to report the matter to the Supreme Court.[47]

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF WRONGFUL RESTRAINT AND WRONGFUL CONFINEMENT

S. 341.

Punishment for wrongful restraint.--

Whoever wrongfully restrains any person shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.2913

Comments

1. Scope

This section prescribes punishment for an offence of wrongful restraint as defined in s 339, IPC .

In order to attract this section, the alleged restraint must be wrongful. If the accused is lawfully authorised to put restraint, he cannot be punished under this section.[48] For an action to amount to 'wrongful restraint', the person concerned must have the 'right to proceed' in the direction in question, as would appear from what has been stated in s 339, IPC, which has spelt out what is wrongful restraint.[49] Where, owing to the keeping of a car, by the petitioner on the pathway, there was obstruction to the complainant in bringing out his car from the garage, it was held that the complainant could have some other remedy, but not the prosecution of the petitioner under this section.[50] In Ayyapazhan v State ,[51] the accused did nothing beyond dragging the deceased from the car, conceivably, for the purpose of questioning him. It was held that the conviction of the accused under this section could not be maintained.

2. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, as well as compoundable, and is triable by any magistrate, and may be tried summarily. However, it is not advisable to try summarily public servants whose whole career might depend upon the result.[52]

Order of the court taking cognizance of an offence under s 341, IPC, after expiry of the period of limitation, in violation of s 468, CrPC is bad in law and so, is liable to be set aside.[53]

3. High Court Ordering Retrial after Six Years--Not Proper

The accused were acquitted of charges under ss 341 / 34 or 149, IPC, and s 36AD of the Banking Regulation Act 1949 by the trial court. The appeal remained pending before the High Court for six years. Disagreeing with the finding of the trial court, the High Court ordered a retrial. The Supreme Court was of the view that the High Court should have dismissed the appeal even if it disagreed with the view taken by the trial court, having regard to inordinate delay of nearly six years that had ensued after the judgment of acquittal, the nature and magnitude of the offences alleged to have been committed and the difficulties that may have to be encountered in securing the presence of witnesses in a case of this nature nearly seven years after proceedings would secure the ends of justice, as it would bring about reconciliation between the management and the employees and also an end to state criminal proceedings in which the public had no longer sufficient interest. Accordingly, the Supreme Court set aside the judgment of the High Court and restored the order of acquittal passed by the trial court.[54]2914

4. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[55]

If despite the statement of several witnesses under s 161, CrPC attracting prima facie s 341, IPC, the accused was discharged by the magistrate, holding that the question raised was of a civil nature and criminal restraint cannot be found, the order of discharge was held liable to be set aside.[56]

5. Vicarious Liability

Where the accused persons were charged under ss 341 / 326 / 324 / 34, IPC, and some of the accused persons were acquitted of the charges while one accused was convicted, there was no independent charge framed against the accused excluding s 34, so the conviction of the accused under ss 323, 324 and 341 read with s 34, IPC, was not found proper, and was set aside.[57]

6. Wrongful Restraint

Wrongful Restraint and Lurking House Trespass

The accused was charged for committing the offence of wrongful restraint under s 341 and house trespass under s 454, IPC . The FIR was lodged by the complainant stating that he and his brother were tenants in the shop of the accused and the accused forcibly took its possession from them. No evidence was produced, i.e., no rent note and rent receipts were produced to prove that the complainant was a tenant of the accused. The possession of the shop in question remained with the accused. The conviction of the accused under ss 147, 341 and 454, IPC, was not found proper and was reversed.[58]

Wrongful Restraint and Attempt to Murder

The accused persons armed with deadly weapons stabbed the victim and restrained the police officials from discharging their duties. The occurrence took place inside cantonment premises in broad daylight. The testimony of police witnesses who followed the accused persons and caught them red-handed was found truthful. The fact that the informant and injured witness turned hostile cannot be the sole ground to reject police witnesses nor non-production of medical memo and discrepancies regarding its preparation would affect the prosecution case. The conviction of the accused persons under ss 307, 148, 341 and

353, IPC, was found proper.[59]

Wrongful Restraint and Rape

The accused was alleged to have stopped the prosecutrix who was passing through the field and forcibly committed rape on her; there was no inconsistency between the statement of the eye witnesses and the statement of the prosecutrix. The order of acquittal of the accused by discarding evidence was held not proper and the accused2915 was convicted under ss 341 and 376, IPC .[60] When the prosecutrix stated that she was threatened and a piece of cloth was put on her mouth by the accused in order to prevent her from shouting, the mere absence of injury on the body of the victim cannot be taken to mean that no rape was committed, so the conviction of the accused under ss 341, 376(2)(f), IPC was found proper.[61] When the prosecutrix was waylaid in broad daylight and raped twice in presence of witnesses, the conviction of the accused under ss 341 and 376, IPC, was confirmed.[62]

Wrongful Restraint and Outraging Modesty of a Woman

The victim, a young girl of 13 years was taken forcibly to a nearby bush in the jungle and made to lie down by the accused when she was returning alone from the school. Her evidence was cogent, convincing and corroborated by evidence of other witnesses. However, seminal stains were absent on her body or clothes, though rape was not established but the intention of the accused to outrage the modesty of the victim was proved. The accused was held liable to be convicted under ss 341 and 354, IPC .[63]

7. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) there was obstruction by the accused;
(2) the obstruction prevented a person from proceeding in a particular direction; and
(3) the person, so prevented from proceeding, had a right to proceed in that direction.

8. Acquittal

Where the allegation was that the accused persons prevented the victim from going in the direction he wanted to go and beat him but the evidence by the eye-witnesses was that the victim was beaten when he was sitting in the house of some person, therefore, no question of the victim having been obstructed so as to prevent him from proceeding in the direction in which he had a right to proceed arises. The conviction of the accused persons was set aside.[64] Even if it is assumed that visitors to a liquor shop have a right to proceed to consume alcohol, preventing them from entering the liquor shop would cause only slight harm which warrants no serious concern. Those who cause such harm are guided and inspired by the noble ideal that it is their fundamental duty to dissuade people from drinking alcohol. The further protection of the criminal case against the accused persons under s 341, IPC, is abuse of process of law.[65]

9. Conviction

In order to secure a conviction under this section, it must be established that the complainant was obstructed from proceeding along a particular direction. Where one2916 of the doors was admittedly not closed, it was held that it could be said that the complainant was obstructed wrongfully from passing along the passage.[66] Victim, a head constable on patrolling duty at night questioned four accused sitting inside a van parked authorizedly. The four accused pulled the victim inside the van and inflicted injuries on him, including fracture of nasal bone. The accused were convicted under ss 341, 367, 333 and 506, IPC .[67]

Conviction of Main Accused under Section 302 and other Accused under Section 341

Where the main accused stabbed the deceased, and the co-accused was only holding the deceased, the common intention to cause death of the victim could not be inferred, the main accused was convicted under s 302 while the co-accused was found guilty under s 341 and not under ss 302 / 34, IPC .[68]

10. Sentence

If a substantial sentence of two years rigorous imprisonment in respect of an offence, punishable under s 148, in addition to the maximum sentence of one month simple imprisonment under s 341 read with s 149, IPC, has been inflicted, a further sentence of fine is uncalled for.[69]

When the prosecutrix was waylaid in broad daylight and raped twice in the presence of witnesses, simple imprisonment of one month under s 341 and rigorous imprisonment for seven years under s 376, IPC, cannot be said to be excessive.[70]

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF WRONGFUL RESTRAINT AND WRONGFUL CONFINEMENT

S. 342.

Punishment for wrongful confinement.--

Whoever wrongfully confines any person shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section, which prescribes the punishment for the offence of wrongful confinement defined in s 340, IPC, is confined to simple wrongful confinement for2917 less than three days. The aggravated forms of the offence of wrongful confinement are dealt with in ss 343 to 348, IPC . Wrongful confinement is defined in s 340 . As observed by the Supreme Court in Shyam Lal Sharma and another v State of Madhya Pradesh ,[71] where a person is wrongfully restrained in such a manner as to prevent that person from proceeding beyond certain circumscribed limits, he is wrongfully confined within the meaning of this section.[72]

If some persons taking shelter in a house, being afraid of a crowd outside, and if that crowd remains there, effectively preventing the inmates of the house from coming out, there is no reason why it cannot be said that an offence punishable under s 342, IPC is committed.[73] Where the accused brought the victim at night to the house of the co-accused under wrong pretext, the accused had earlier taken the daughter of the victim to the house of the co-accused, thus making it compulsory for the victim to go to the house of the co-accused, the door of the house of the co-accused was locked from outside making it compulsory for the victim to stay in with the accused and the co-accused. She could come out of the house only in the morning. The accused was held guilty of the offence of wrongful confinement.[74] The statements of the prosecutrix and the manager of the hotel that the accused had illegally confined the prosecutrix in hotel room were found reliable; accused was convicted under s 342, IPC .[75]

Where Sarita as PW6 deposed that when her father and brother came to her matrimonial home, she was sitting in her bedroom and she came out of the bedroom of her own freewill, the prosecution case that PW6 was locked up in a room was found false; the accused persons were acquitted of the charge under s 342, IPC .[76]

2. Essential Ingredients

The essential ingredients of the offence 'wrongful confinement' are that the accused should have wrongfully confined the complainant and such restraint was to prevent the complainant from proceeding beyond certain circumscribed limits beyond which he/she has a right to proceed.[77]

3. Wrongful Confinement by Public Servant/Police

This section, being a general section, is not confined to offences against public servants. Thus, where a public servant, who had come out on the road after taking the search, was seized, lifted, taken into the office, thrown on a chair, and threatened with a lathi, to comply with the demand of giving in writing to the effect that he had taken a search of the barrier, it was held that an offence under this section read with s 353 had been committed.[78]

No offence under this section is committed when a person, legally arrested and taken to the police station, is released after the ascertainment of his proper identity.[79]2918 However, a police officer who pays no heed to a bail order and detains the person concerned in custody for an offence which is bailable, would be guilty under this section.[80] Similarly, the right to protect one's property from apprehension of theft does not include a right to put a neighbour in wrongful confinement.[81]

Where a person was arrested as he was required in a kidnapping case and died in police custody, no offence under s 342, IPC was made out; appellant accused was acquitted of the charge under s 342, IPC .[82]

Where the accused police officials kept the victim in lock up from 2 February 1994 to 5 February 1994, subjected the victim to third degree methods, their conviction under s 342, IPC was held proper.[83]

Where in the dispute between the occupiers of a land and its developer, the complaint against the developer was made by the occupiers, show cause notice was issued to the developer under s 107, CrPC, the petitioner (developer) furnished security bond in the said proceedings, thereafter again on the complaint against the petitioner by the occupier second show cause notice was issued cancelling earlier bond on the ground that he was in the breach of earlier bond, the petitioner was asked to furnish fresh bond with two securities, however, without giving any opportunity to arrange for those securities, the petitioner was taken in custody and detained for five days. The petitioner was held deprived of his personal liberty without following the procedure established by law. The executive magistrate acted illegally without following the provisions of the CrPC before confining the petitioner to jail. So, he cannot claim protection under s 3(1) of the Judges (Protection) Act 1985.[84]

4. Procedure

In cases under this section and s 166, IPC, against police officers, delay in making the allegations against them to a magistrate, or other competent authority, is almost fatal to the prosecution.[85] For further commentary, see under same heading under s 341 ante.

5. Sanction for Prosecution

In a complaint against the executive magistrate for wrongfully detaining the petitioner for five days behind the bars in violation of the provisions of law, the executive magistrate being a public servant could not be proceeded against without the sanction under s 197, CrPC . So, the dismissal of complaint for the want of sanction to prosecute him was found.[86]

6. Writ under Article 226 --High Court can direct the Police to Investigate the Offences

The High Court, while exercising the power under art 226 of the Constitution of India, in a case where the allegation leads to commission of a criminal offence, can2919 direct the police force of the state to perform its legal duty to investigate the offences. However, a direction for appointment of a high ranking judicial officer to conduct enquiry or direction to the CBI to conduct such enquiry cannot be passed by the High Court in exercise of such jurisdiction.[87] Thus in a case of custodial death and illegal detention at the hands of the police, the High Court while exercising jurisdiction under art 226 directed the police force to investigate the offences.[88]

7. Identification of Accused

The question of holding an identification parade does not arise when the accused persons were caught and taken to the police and remained in the company of the complainant, right from going to their house to reaching at the police station.[89]

8. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[90]

Where the accused forcibly dragged the victim from her house and the offence of wrongful confinement was proved, it was held that they could be held guilty under ss 342 and 352, IPC, even if they were not charged under the said sections.[91]

The complainant, a public servant, was assaulted while making a telephone call to his senior as he had made a complaint against the assailants. He was kept in confinement in a jeep for sometime. The assault upon him was neither with a view to prevent him from performing his official duties nor was it a result of any official act. The accused were found entitled to be discharged for offences under ss 147, 148, 332, 352, 427, IPC, but the charge under ss 323 and 342, IPC, was framed against the accused.[92] However, when the public servant being a police official, visited to check fresh electric wiring and leakage of the current, with permission, and were conducting a search, were obstructed from taking photographs and confined wrongfully in the house, the framing of charges under ss 186, and 342, IPC, was found proper.[93]

Case under Section 342 and Section 363

A boy residing at Meerut was confined at Haridwar, a prima facie case against the accused was made out under s 363, IPC, but the accused was summoned by the magistrate under s 342 . On a revision petition being filed, the sessions court revised the order of the magistrate, and remanded the matter to the magistrate for re-consideration of the matter according to law as the offence under s 363 was also attracted. The order of the sessions court also found favour with the High Court.[94] There was unimpeachable evidence that the appellants had wrongfully confined the complainant, therefore their conviction under s 342, IPC was held proper.[95]2920

Case under Section 342 and Section 354

The accused attempted to commit rape on a 10 year old girl and was convicted by two courts below under ss 354 and 342, IPC . The concurrent finding of fact of the courts below was based on credible and sufficient evidence, so the High Court declined to interfere in the criminal revision filed by the accused, with the orders of the courts below.[1]

Case under Section 342 and Section 376

The accused was alleged to have lifted the prosecutrix and committed rape on her when she had gone to the shop for purchasing a matchbox. The testimony of the prosecutrix was not trustworthy and was inconsistent with the statement of prosecution witness. The circumstances of the case showed that she had gone inside the shop willingly and was not lifted by the accused. The conviction of the accused under ss 376 and 342, IPC, was set aside and the accused was acquitted.[2] However, when the accused, a teacher, alleged to have restrained the prosecutrix, a minor student, from going home and thereafter committed rape, the statements of the prosecutrix was corroborated by medical evidence as well as oral evidence of witnesses, any minor omission and contradictions found in the statement of prosecutrix were found immaterial, the conviction of the accused under ss 376 and 342, IPC, was found proper.[3]

Case under Section 342 and Section 302

Where the evidence showed that the accused persons in furtherance of common intention to extract confession regarding the alleged theft of a bicycle took the deceased along with them and wrongfully confined him and assaulted him with an iron pipe and a wooden stick, the fact that the deceased was wrongfully confined after his hands and legs were tied was established by the testimony of witnesses. Further, the accused persons left the deceased in an injured condition confined to the said place. The conviction of the accused persons under s 342 read with s 34, IPC was maintained.[4]

9. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) the accused wrongfully restrained the complainant; and
(2) the restraint was such as to prevent the complainant from proceeding beyond certain circumscribing limits beyond which he had a right to proceed. Proof of actual physical restraint is not essential.[5]

It is sufficient if the evidence shows that such an impression was produced in the mind of the victim as to create reasonable apprehension in the mind of the victim to lead him reasonably to believe that he was not free to depart.[6]2921

The accused is not to be convicted under this section on the sole testimony of the prosecutrix when there is no corroboration.[7]

10. Acquittal

The victim was arrested in a case under s 307, IPC, and was allegedly beaten and confined in police custody by the accused police inspector and the constables. The arrest and detention of the victim was not illegal. Therefore, the accused persons cannot be held guilty of offences of wrongful confinement punishable under s 342 .[8] When the evidence on record clearly established that prosecutrix had attained the age of puberty about a year before the first act of sexual intercourse, and even the said act was with her consent, the question of holding the conviction of the accused under s 342 does not arise at all.[9] The prosecution case that PW6 was locked up in a room was found false; the accused persons were acquitted of the charge under s 342, IPC .[10]

11. Punishment

When a person is convicted of an offence under this section, and of one under s 352, IPC, the case is within the second paragraph of s 71 and infliction of separate punishments is not illegal if the aggregate punishment awarded is not in excess of what the court can inflict for either of the offences.

The accused who attempted to commit rape on a 10 year old girl was convicted under s 354 and sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for two years and pay a fine of Rs 500. In addition, he was convicted under s 342 and sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months and pay a fine of Rs 100.[11] The incident took place 14 years ago when the accused were about 18-19 years old. The accused had no criminal antecedents. Each of the three accused was sentenced to 5 years rigorous imprisonment under s 376 and one month rigorous imprisonment under s 342, IPC .[12]

Where a person is charged with, and acquitted of, an offence (of abduction) under s 365, but is convicted for an offence under s 342, the appellate court can alter the finding of the trial court and convict him under s 365 without altering the sentence so as to enhance it.[13]

12. Acquittal under Section 342 is No Bar to Trial under Section 436

Acquittal of an accused on a charge under this section is no bar to his subsequent trial on a charge under s 436, IPC .[14]

Commentary under s 436, IPC, Vol. 4 may be referred to.

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF WRONGFUL RESTRAINT AND WRONGFUL CONFINEMENT

S. 343.

Wrongful confinement for three or more days.--

Whoever wrongfully confines any person for three days or more, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section prescribes punishment for wrongful confinement, as defined in s 340, IPC, for a period of three days, or more, but less than 10 days. If the wrongful confinement is for less than three days, it would be punishable under the precedings 343 while wrongful confinement for 10 days or more is punishable under the nexts 344.[15] As remarked elsewhere, the offences dealt with under this section and under s 344, are only aggravated forms of the offence of wrongful confinement, the aggravating circumstance being the longer duration of the confinement.

For the general subject of wrongful confinement, refer to the commentary under ss 339, 340 and 342 .

2. Relative Scope of Sections 324 and 343

Under s 324, IPC, it must be shown that the accused caused hurt voluntarily and such a hurt was caused by means of any instrument referred to in that section. Insofar as s 343, IPC, is concerned, whoever wrongfully confines any person for three days or more shall be punished. Whoever wrongfully restrains any person in such a manner as to prevent that person from proceeding beyond certain circumscribing limits is said 'wrongfully to confine' that person, as defined under s 340, IPC . Use of physical force is not necessary for the offence of wrongful confinement. A mere detention of a person against law would attract s 343, IPC .[16]

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable only with the permission of the court before which the prosecution is pending, and triable by any magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

4. Sanction for Prosecution

Where the sub-inspector of police illegally detained an accused against whom a non-bailable warrant was issued for one week and he was also alleged to have assaulted the said accused, the said action of the sub-inspector being not a part of his official duty, obtaining the prior sanction for his prosecution was not necessary.[17]

5. Charge

Commentary under the same heading in s 342, ante, may be referred to.2923

6. Proof

The points, requiring proof of an offence under this section are the same as under s 342, in addition to which it has also to be proved that the wrongful confinement was for three days, or more.

The appellant accused Suman Sood, wife of the main accused kept the kidnapped person inside her house, supplied him food knowing fully that her husband and his companions had kidnapped the victim. Her conviction under ss 364A, 365, 346, 343 read with 120B, IPC was held proper.[18]

Where the prosecutrix admitted in her evidence that she did not complain to anyone at the places where she was kept and stayed for 10 days, that she was brought by deceit or was being detained against her will, she was, thus, not a helpless victim who had surrendered or resigned to her fate, she also did not complain in the bus even though she was with other passengers for 8-9 hours, the obvious inference is that the prosecutrix cannot be said to have been detained or abducted against her will and she was a consenting party, the conviction of the accused under ss 342, 343 and 366, IPC, was therefore set aside.[19]

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF WRONGFUL RESTRAINT AND WRONGFUL CONFINEMENT

S. 344.

Wrongful confinement for ten or more days.--

Whoever wrongfully confines any person for ten days or more, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section punishes wrongful confinement for 10 days or more.

For 'wrongful confinement', refer to the commentary under s 340 .

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable and compoundable only with the permission of the court before which the prosecution is pending, and triable by a magistrate.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the ....day of ..... at...you confined AB for ....days and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 344 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

> And I hereby direct you to be tried by this court on the said charge.

Omission in the charge, to mention the period of wrongful confinement for 10 days, or more, has been held to be a grave defect entailing acquittal of the accused.[20]

4. Proof

The points requiring proof are the same as those for an offence under s 342, IPC, in addition to which it must further be proved that wrongful confinement lasted for 10 days, or more.

Where in a case of wrongful confinement for more than 10 days and abduction and rape, the age of prosecutrix was found to be above 18 years, it was also established that she had earlier also, gone with the accused and stayed with him and had also admitted not only close intimacy with the accused but also that she had remained in his house willingly for many days, the prosecutrix thus was a consenting party, and the conviction of the accused under ss 344, 366 and 376, IPC, was set aside.[21]

5. Sentence

Under this section, a sentence of imprisonment, even for a very short period, is compulsory and cannot be dispensed with. Fine alone is not a legal sentence.[22]

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF WRONGFUL RESTRAINT AND WRONGFUL CONFINEMENT

S. 345.

Wrongful confinement of person for whose liberation writ has been issued.--

Whoever keeps any person in wrongful confinement, knowing that a writ for the liberation of that person has been duly issued, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years in addition to any term of imprisonment to which he may be liable under any other section of this Chapter.

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides an additional penalty for the offence of wrongful confinement, the aggravating circumstance being the keeping of a person in wrongful confinement in contempt of a writ issued for his liberation. The section applies only if a writ for the liberation of a person, wrongfully confined, has been issued and the offender keeps such person in wrongful confinement even after knowing that a writ for his liberation has been issued.

2. 'Wrongful Confinement'

Commentary under s 340, ante, may be referred to.2925

3. 'Knowing'

Knowledge, on the part of the accused, that a writ for liberation of the person confined has been issued is an essential ingredient of the offence under this section. Mere belief is not sufficient; 'knowledge' is a much stronger word than 'belief as the latter is stronger than 'suspect'.[23]

4. 'Writ for Liberation'

The Constitution of India guarantees to all the citizens of India, certain fundamental rights, one of which is the right 'to move freely throughout the territory of India'.[24] Article 32 of the Constitution empowers the Supreme Court to issue writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibitions, quo warranto and certiorari for the enforcement of the fundamental rights. Article 226 confers similar powers on all the High Courts. The power under art 226 (as under art 32) is not confined to the issuing of prerogative writs only. The court has been conferred additional powers to frame proper directions or orders to suit the exigencies of particular cases even though they may not conform to any of the prerogative writs.

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and is triable by a magistrate of the first class.

6. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[25]

7. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that--

(a) the accused kept a certain person in wrongful confinement; and
(b) he kept the said person wrongfully confined even after knowing that a writ for the liberation of that person had been duly issued.

Wrongful confinement in secret.--

Whoever wrongfully confines any person in such manner as to indicate an intention that the confinement of such person may not be known to any person interested in the person so confined, or to any public servant, or that the place of such confinement may not be known to or discovered by any such person or public servant as herein before mentioned, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, in addition to any other punishment to which he may be liable for such wrongful confinement.2926

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with wrongful confinement in secret which is another aggravated form of wrongful confinement. To render a person liable under this section, it must be shown that there was wrongful confinement of a person and that the wrongful confinement was of such a nature as to indicate intention on the part of the accused, that the person confined should not be discovered. If the complainant was only induced and not forced, to go to different places and that her confinement was not actual, but only potential, it is not sufficient to constitute wrongful confinement. Again, where, after taking the complainant to different places, the accused themselves produced her before a pleader of the court, the conduct of the accused cannot be said to indicate an intention on their part that the complainant should not be discovered. In such circumstances, the accused cannot be convicted of an offence under this section.[26]

Appellant accused Suman Sood, wife of the main accused, kept the kidnapped person inside her house, supplied him food knowing fully that her husband and his companions had kidnapped the victim. Her conviction under ss 364A, 365, 346, 343 read with 120B, IPC was held proper.[27]

2. 'Public Servant'

See commentary in s 21, IPC, Vol. 1.

3. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable only with the permission of the court, before which prosecution is pending, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

4. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[28]

5. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the complainant was wrongfully confined by the accused; and
(b) the manner of the confinement was such as to indicate an intention, on the part of the accused, that the confinement of the complainant, or the place of the confinement, may not be known to any person, interested in the complainant, or to any public servant, or that the place of confinement may not be known to, or discovered by, such person or public servant.

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF WRONGFUL RESTRAINT AND WRONGFUL CONFINEMENT

S. 347.

Wrongful confinement to extort property or constrain to illegal act.--

Whoever wrongfully confines any person for the purpose of extorting from the2927 person confined, or from any person interested in the person confined, any property or valuable security or of constraining the person confined or any person interested in such person to do anything illegal or to give any information which may facilitate the commission of an offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with wrongful confinement, as s 329, IPC deals with voluntarily causing grievous hurt, to extort any property or valuable security, or to constrain a person to do an illegal act or to give any information which may facilitate the commission of an offence. The difference between the two sections lies in the nature of the act, which is made punishable, though the motive for doing the act is almost the same. The aggravating circumstances, calling for enhanced punishment, are the same.

Wrongful confinement, under this section, may be of the person, from whom the property is extorted or the information is received, or it may be of any other person interested in such person.

2. 'Whoever Wrongfully Confines'

Under this section, the person liable for punishment, is the person who wrongfully confine.[29] Where the appellants charged the prosecutor with theft and handed him over to the police and it was the police, who wrongfully confined the prosecutor, it was held that the police, and not the appellants, were responsible for the oppression or extortion, practised, by the police, on the prosecutor when he was in confinement.[30]

3. 'For the purpose of Extorting'

Commentary under the same heading in s 327, ante, may be referred to.

4. 'Valuable Security'

The affixing of a thumb impression to a piece of paper is 'authority, to the holder of the same, to make the document into a valuable security'. The thumb impression is regarded everywhere as the signature of an illiterate man.[31]

Where, therefore, the accused intentionally put a person in fear of injury to himself and thereby dishonestly induced him to place his thumb-impression upon certain2928 pieces of paper, being, in each case something signed, which could be converted into a valuable security under s 30, IPC, it was held that the accused was guilty of the offence under this section.[32]

5. 'Constraining'

Commentary under the same heading in s 327, ante, may be referred to.

6. 'Illegal'

Commentary under s 43, IPC, Vol. 1, may be referred to.

7. 'Offence'

Commentary under s 40, IPC, Vol. 1, may be referred to.

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate.

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the .....day of.....at.....you wrongfully confined one AB for the purpose of extorting, from the said AB (or from one CD, interested in the said AB), certain property (or a valuable security), to wit....., (or for the purpose of constraining the said ABor one CD, interested in the said AB) to do.....,that is illegal (or to give any information, which may facilitate the commission of an offence), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 347 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

10. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused wrongfully confined a person; and
(b) he did do for the purpose of:

(i) extorting, from the person confined, or from a person interested in the person confined:

- any property,
- valuable security, or

(ii) constraining the person confined or a person interested in the person confined:

- to do anything that is illegal,
- or to give any information which may facilitate the commission of an offence.

11. Separate Convictions under Sections 147 and 347 Not Illegal

Separate convictions under s 147 and s 347 are perfectly legal though the aggregate sentences, which may be passed, cannot be in excess of the sentence which can be passed for the offence which is more heavily punishable under the IPC .[33]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF WRONGFUL RESTRAINT AND WRONGFUL CONFINEMENT

S. 348.

Wrongful confinement to extort confession, or compel restoration of property.--

Whoever wrongfully confines any person for the purpose of extorting from the person confined or any person interested in the person confined any confession or any information which may lead to the detection of an offence or misconduct, or for the purpose of constraining the person confined or any person interested in the person confined to restore or to cause the restoration of any property or valuable security or to satisfy any claim or demand, or to give information which may lead to the restoration of any property or valuable security, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with wrongful confinement, as s 330 deals with voluntarily causing hurt, to extort a confession or to compel restoration of property. The difference between the two sections lies only in the nature of the act made punishable, the motive for doing the act being the same. The commentary on s 330 may, therefore, be usefully read as a commentary on this section.

2. 'Whoever Wrongfully Confines'

Commentary under the same heading in s 347, ante, may be referred to.

3. Procedure

The procedure is the same as in the case of an offence under s 347 .

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the .....day of.....,at....., you wrongfully confined one AB for the purpose of extorting, from the said AB (or from one CD, interested in the said AB), any confession (or any information which might lead to the detection of an offence or misconduct) (or for the purpose of constraining the person confined) (or a person interested in the person confined) to restore (or to cause the restoration of) any property (or valuable security) (or to satisfy any claim or demand), (or to give information which2930 might lead to the restoration of any property or valuable security), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 348 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Joinder of Charges

Where the accused causes hurt as well as wrongful confinement, he may be charged for both the offences.[34]

6. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) the accused wrongfully confined a certain person; and
(2) the said confinement was for the purpose of:

(a) extorting

(i) from the person confined, or
(ii) from the person interested in the person confined,

(a) a confession, or
(b) an information which might lead to the detection of an offence of misconduct; or
(c) constraining

(i) the person confined, or
(ii) the person interested in the person confined.

(a) to restore, or to cause the restoration of, a certain property or valuable security, or
(b) to satisfy a claim or demand, or
(c) to give information which might lead to the restoration of a certain property or valuable security.

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF CRIMINAL FORCE AND ASSAULT

S. 349.

Force.--

A person is said to use force to another if he causes motion, change of motion, or cessation of motion to that other, or if he causes to any substance such motion, or change of motion, or cessation of motion as brings that substance into contact with any part of that other's body, or with anything which that other is wearing or carrying, or with anything so situated that such contact affects that other's sense of feeling: Provided that the person causing the motion, or change of motion, or cessation of motion, causes that motion, change of motion, or cessation of motion in one of the three ways hereinafter described:

First.--By his own bodily power.

Secondly.--By disposing any substance in such a manner that the motion or change or cessation of motion takes place without any further act on his part, or on the part of any other person.

2931Thirdly.--By inducing any animal to move, to change its motion, or to cease to move.

Comments

1. Scope

This section does not define any offence; it only gives an elaborate explanation of the use of force. Under the terms of the section, to cause motion, change of motion, or cessation of motion, by one or other of the three means mentioned, to another person, either directly or indirectly, bringing some substance in contact with his body, or with something that he is wearing or carrying, or with something that affects his sense of feeling, is to use force. Where the accused raised their lathis to strike another person with the result that he had to flee to save himself, it was held that they used force on that person and by using bodily power.[35]

'Force' as defined in this section, and 'criminal force', as defined in s 350, must necessarily be used against a human being, and not against an inanimate object. If any motion, change of motion, or cessation of motion, is caused to any property without affecting a human being, there is no use of force within the meaning of this section.[36] Where the accused removed a ladder and thereby detained a person on the roof of a house, it was held that the act did not amount to an act of using criminal force, but to an act of wrongful restraint.[37] However, causing an animal to move is to use force within the definition of this section.[38]

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF CRIMINAL FORCE AND ASSAULT

S. 350.

Criminal force.--

Whoever intentionally uses force to any person, without that person's consent, in order to the committing of any offence, or intending by the use of such force to cause, or knowing it to be likely that by the use of such force he will cause injury, fear or annoyance to the person to whom the force is used, is said to use criminal force to that other.

Illustrations

(a) Z is sitting in a moored boat on a river. A unfastens the moorings, and thus intentionally causes the boat to drift down the stream. Here A intentionally causes motion to Z, and he does this by disposing substances in such a manner that the motion is produced without any other act on any person's part. A has therefore intentionally used force to Z; and if he has done so without Z's consent, in order to the committing of any offence, or intending or knowing it to be likely that this use of force will cause injury, fear or annoyance to Z, A has used criminal force to Z.

(b) Z is riding in a chariot. A lashes Z's horses and there by causes them to quicken their pace. Here A has caused change of motion to Z by inducing the animals to change their motion. A has therefore used force to Z; and if A has done this without Z's consent, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby injure, frighten or annoy Z, A has used criminal force to Z.

(c) Z is riding in a palanquin. A, intending to rob Z, seizes the pole and stops the palanquin. Here A has caused cessation of motion to Z, and he has done this by his own bodily power. A has therefore used force to Z; and as2933*A* has acted thus intentionally, without Z's consent, in order to the commission of an offence, A has used criminal force to Z.

(d) A intentionally pushes against Z in the street. Here A has by his own bodily power moved his own person so as to bring it into contact with Z. He has therefore intentionally used force to Z; and if he has done so without Z's consent, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby injure, frighten or annoy Z, he has used criminal force to Z.

(e) A throws a stone, intending or knowing it to be likely that the stone will be thus brought into contact with Z, or with Z's clothes, or with something carried by Z, or that it will strike water and dash up the water against Z's clothes or something carried by Z. Here, if the throwing of the stone produce the effect of causing any substance to come into contact with Z, or Z's clothes, A has used force to Z; and if he did so without Z's consent, intending thereby to injure, frighten or annoy Z, he has used criminal force to Z.

(f) A intentionally pulls up a woman's veil. Here, A intentionally uses force to her, and if he does so without her consent, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby injure, frighten or annoy her, he has used criminal force to her.

(g) Z is bathing. A pours into the bath water which he knows to be boiling. Here A intentionally by his own bodily power causes such motion in the boiling water as brings that water into contact with Z, or with other water so situated that such contact must affect Z's sense of feeling; A has therefore intentionally used force to Z; and if he has done this without Z's consent intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause injury, fear, or annoyance to Z. A has used criminal force.

(h) A incites a dog to spring upon Z, without Z's consent. Here, if A intends to cause injury, fear or annoyance to Z, he uses criminal force to Z.

Comments

1. Scope

The preceding section, s 349, IPC defined force or, rather, explained as to when a person is said to use force. However, mere force or use of force is not criminal. This section, therefore, proceeds to define 'criminal force' or, rather, to explain as to when the use of force becomes criminal, or, in the language of the section, when a person 'is said to use criminal force'. If added, to the use of force, as defined in the preceding section: (1) the intentional use of such force; (2) without the other person's consent; and (3) with the object of either committing an offence or of causing injury, fear or annoyance to the person, to whom the force is used, the force becomes 'criminal force'.2934

The use of criminal force, as defined in this section, is itself an offence made punishable under s 352, IPC . However, there can be no question of using 'criminal force' if an investigating officer uses reasonable means to obtain a few specimens of hair of the accused for establishing the identity of those who took part in a crime.[39]

Relative Scope of Section 349 and Section 350

It is obvious from a bare reading of ss 349 and 350, IPC, that it is the using of force when a person brings a substance in contact with any part of another's body. It would be criminal force because by using force if fear or annoyance is caused to the person or an offence is committed, it would be falling within the expression of 'criminal force'.[40]

Section 349 does not define any offence though it explains the use of force. The use of criminal force defined in s 350 is punishable under s 352 .

2. 'Criminal Force' Distinguished from 'Assault'

Though the definition of 'criminal force' as defined in this section, has been included in the definition of 'assault', defined in s 351, evident from the fact that in ss 352 to 358, which prescribe the punishment for the offences, the expression used is 'assault or criminal force', and no distinction is made between them in the matter of punishment, they have been made separate offences in the IPC . However, 'assault' is confined to a mere gesture or preparation to use criminal force while the actual use of criminal force is made a separate offence designated as 'criminal force'.

3. Essentials of an Offence Defined in this Section

To constitute the offence, defined in this section, the following elements are essential:

(1) there must be an intentional use of force to any person;
(2) such use of force must have been without the said person's consent; and
(3) the said use of force must have been

(a) to commit any offence, or
(b) to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will cause, injury, fear or annoyance to the person to whom the force is used.

Mere use of force is not enough to bring an act within the ambit of s 350 or s 353, IPC . It has further to be shown that force was used intentionally to any person, without that person's consent, in order to commit an offence or with the intention to cause, or with the knowledge that the use of force will cause, injury, fear or annoyance to the person against whom this force is used.[41]

4. 'Whoever Intentionally Uses Force to any Person'

Commentary under s 349, ante, may be referred to.2935

5. 'Without That Person's Consent'

Commentary under s 90, IPC, Vol. 1, may be referred to.

6. 'In Order to the Committing of any Offence'

Commentary under s 40, IPC, Vol. 1, may be referred to.

7. 'Intending, by the Use of Such Force, to Cause, or Knowing it to be Likely that, by the use of such Force, he will Cause, Injury, Fear or Annoyance to the Person to Whom the Force is Used'

To constitute an offence, the force must be used with the intention, or knowledge that it is likely, to cause injury, fear or annoyance to the person to whom the force is used.[42] The use of criminal force may cause hurt, grievous hurt, or even death. However, the nature of the offence will depend upon the intention or knowledge of the offender. If his intention or knowledge falls short of the intention or knowledge, required by ss 321, 322, 299 or 300, IPC, and is limited to the intention or knowledge to cause 'injury, fear or annoyance to the person to whom the force is used', the offence would fall only under s 352, IPC . Thus, where the accused struck the deceased, who had an enlarged spleen, in the course of a quarrel, and caused his death thereby, but the accused had no knowledge of the state of the deceased's spleen, it was held that the accused was guilty only of using criminal force under s 352, IPC, but not of culpable homicide.[43] To strike a pot of lahn, which a man is carrying and is in contact with that man's body, constitutes the offence of criminal force if it is done to cause him fear, annoyance, etc.[44]

Snatching of ballot box from Presiding Officer would not amount to criminal force.[45]

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF CRIMINAL FORCE AND ASSAULT

S. 351.

Assault.--

Whoever makes any gesture or any preparation, intending or knowing it to be likely that such gesture or preparation will cause any person present to apprehend that he who makes that gesture or preparation is about to use criminal force to that person, is said to commit an assault.

Explanation.--Mere words do not amount to an assault. But the words which a person uses may give to his gestures or preparation such a meaning as may make those gestures or preparations amount to an assault.

Illustrations

(a) A shakes his fist at Z, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause Z to believe that A is about to strike Z. A has committed an assault.

(b) A begins to unloose the muzzle of a ferocious dog, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause Z to believe that he is about to cause the dog to attack Z. A has committed an assault upon Z.

(c) A takes up a stick, saying to Z, "I will give you a beating". Here, though the words used by A could in no case amount to an assault, and though the mere gesture, unaccompanied by any other circumstances, might not2936 amount to an assault, the gesture explained by the words may amount to an assault.

Comments

1. Scope

The preceding section defined the offence of using criminal force and this section defines the offence of 'assault' which may be committed even by a mere gesture causing an apprehension of criminal force being used. It is something less than the use of 'criminal force'. An assault, when completed, becomes 'criminal force'. According to this section, a gesture or preparation, made by a person, who intends, or knows that it is likely, that some person present will thereby apprehend that he is about to use criminal force is assault. Any gesture, calculated to excite in the party threatened, a reasonable apprehension that the party threatening intends immediately to offer violence, or is about to use criminal force to the person threatened, constitutes, if coupled with a present ability to carry such intention into execution, an assault in law.[46] However, mere threatening words, unaccompanied by any gesture or preparation, may amount to intimidation under s 503, but not an assault punishable under s 352 or s 353 .[47]

Before an act can amount to an assault under s 351, IPC, it is necessary that gesture or preparation should be made by the person who would cause another to apprehend that the person is about to use criminal force to him, then and there, and the preparation, taken with the words used, must cause him to apprehend that criminal force would be used on him if he persisted in the particular course of conduct and there would be no assault if he desisted from that conduct.[48]

The gist of the offence lies in the effect which the threat creates upon the mind of the victim. Whether a particular act amounts, or does not amount, to an assault depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. Thus, where an accused went away from the scene, threatening certain officers that he would return and teach them a lesson, and soon afterwards returned with a lathi in his hand and went sufficiently close to the officers to raise in their minds a reasonable apprehension that actual force was likely to be used, it was held that in these circumstances, the act of the accused fell within the definition of assault.[49] However, where a person takes a lathi and shouts that he will break the head of a policeman if he insists upon taking his thumb impression, it will not amount to an assault.[50]2937

For an assault, it is not necessary that the threatened force should be used. An apprehension, that it is about to be used, is sufficient. It is an assault to point a loaded pistol at any one.[51] In the case of attacks on human beings, mere preparation by itself may amount to an assault.[52]

The offence of assault is one that is committed against a person, and not against the public. It involves a breach of the peace, and a fortiori the offence of actually causing hurt to a person must also involve a breach of the peace.[53]

2. English Law

A person commits an assault if he intentionally or recklessly causes another person to apprehend the application to his body of immediate, unlawful force. An assault can be committed by words alone if they cause the necessary apprehension. The requirement of the apprehension of immediate force is satisfied if the prosecution proves a fear of force at some time not excluding the immediate future.

A person commits a battery if he intentionally or recklessly applies unlawful force to the body of another person. The slightest degree of force, even mere touching, suffices. It is not necessary that the victim should feel the force through his clothes; a touching of a person's clothes is the equivalent of touching him. Without the application, however, of some force there cannot be a battery. Thus causing someone psychiatric harm by a threat does not constitute a battery. Similarly, the use of force merely to pull away from another does not constitute a battery.

Although an assault is a separate, independent crime and should be treated as such, for practical purposes, the term 'assault' is generally synonymous with 'battery' and is used to mean the actual use of unlawful force to another person with the requisite mens rea. Where there is actual as well as apprehended unlawful force, the charge should be assault by beating rather than assault and battery since the latter form is duplicitous.[54]

The only exception is where the defendant has created a dangerous situation (even inadvertently) in which case he is under a duty to take such steps as lie within his power to counteract the danger, and a failure to do so which is accompanied by the requisite mens rea will suffice if it results in the necessary application of force.[55]

In Wood v Director of Public Prosecutions , it was observed, 'where a police officer restrains a person, but does not at that time intend or purport to arrest him, then he is committing an assault, even if an arrest would have been justified.'[56]

3. Essential Ingredients of an Offence under this Section

The essential ingredients[57] of an offence under this section are as follows:

(a) the accused must make a gesture or preparation to use criminal force;2938
(b) the said gesture or preparation must be made in the presence of the person with respect to whom it is made;
(c) the accused must, by the said gesture or preparation, intend to cause, or know that it would cause, that person to apprehend that criminal force would be used against him by the accused; and

(d) the said gesture or preparation must cause, in the mind of that person, apprehension that the accused would use criminal force against him.

4. 'Whoever'

A person in uniform, be he an officer, NCO or private, is not entitled to assault another person, whether in peace or at the time of war.[58]

5. 'Gesture' as under Illustration (a) to Section 351

Lifting a lota to hit is a gesture.[59] Similarly, the taking up of a lathi or raising a bottle,[60] drawing a sword or bayonet, aiming a gun at a person who is within its reach, are all also gestures.

6. 'Preparation' as under Illustration (b) to Section 351

This is one of the few sections in the IPC which makes a mere preparation, not amounting to an attempt, by itself an offence.[61]

7. 'Intending or Knowing it to be Likely'

Intention or knowledge is an ingredient of the offence under this section. Throwing of a bottle by an accused, into the complainant's house, for the purpose of either hurting some of the inmates of the house or frightening them, was held to be an assault.[62] Where all that was found was that the accused surrounded a constable and showed a threatening attitude, it was held that it was not sufficient to find that an assault was committed by the accused.[63]

8. Apprehension must be from the Accused

According to the section, the apprehension of the use of criminal force must be from the person making the gesture or preparation, and if that apprehension arises not from that person, but from somebody else, it does not amount to assault on the part of that person. Even if his followers moved a little forward at his gesture, and caused the apprehension, it would not amount to an assault.[64]

9. Conviction of some Accused under Section 326 and others under Section 352

Where the original common object of the accused persons was to assault the victim, some of the accused persons, however, after entering the house of the victim2939 developed different common object and caused grievous injuries to the victim attracting s 326, IPC, so far as those accused who stood outside the house of the deceased and who could not have known what actually transpired inside the house, the act of those members of the original unlawful assembly who entered the house cannot be attributed. Hence, at the most these accused persons will be liable to be punished for sharing the original common object which is only to assault the deceased. Therefore, they can be held guilty of an offence punishable under s 352 read with s 149 only.[65]

Punishment for assault or criminal force otherwise than on grave provocation.--

Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person otherwise than on grave and sudden provocation given by that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Explanation.--Grave and sudden provocation will not mitigate the punishment for an offence under this section, if the provocation is sought or voluntarily provoked by the offender as an excuse for the offence, or

If the provocation is given by anything done in obedience to the law, or by a public servant, in the lawful exercise of the powers of such public servant, or

If the provocation is given by anything done in the lawful exercise of the right of private defence.

Whether the provocation was grave and sudden enough to mitigate the offence, is a question of fact.

Comments

1. Scope

Assault under s 351, IPC and the intentional use of criminal force under s 350 are punishable alike, and this section provides just such a punishment. The application of this section is, however, limited to the said two offences committed 'otherwise than on grave and sudden provocation', given by the complainant. For assault and use of criminal force on grave and sudden provocation, given by the complainant, mitigated punishment is provided by s 358 .

An assault, committed by a person in resisting an illegal arrest,[66] or an illegal attachment of property or to defend his right of possession by ousting the2940 complainant party[67] is no offence under this section. However, a defence under s 97 is not available to a person assaulting another, when that other has not done anything amounting to an offence against a human body or an offence of any kind specified in that section against property.[68]

2. Section 186 Distinguished from Sections 332 and 353

Commentary under the same heading in s 186, IPC, Vol. 2, may be referred to.

3. 'Assaults or Uses Criminal Force'

Forcibly taking the thumb-impression of a person on a blank piece of paper amounts to an offence of assault or use of criminal force punishable under this section.[69]

Sections 350 and 351, and the commentary thereunder, may be referred to.

4. 'Otherwise Than on Grave and Sudden Provocation'

The punishment provided in the section is mitigated in circumstances of grave and sudden provocation attending the assault or use of criminal force under the provisions of s 358, IPC . The terms of the explanation, regarding provocation, are identical with the provisos to exception 1 to s 300, IPC, so refer to exception I to s 300, ante.

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

6. Sanction

Charges under ss 352 and 353 are not such as would require any sanction.[70]

7. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[71]

8. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(a) in the case of an assault:

(i) the accused made a gesture or preparation to use criminal force in the presence of the complainant;
(ii) the accused, by the said gesture or preparation, intended to cause, or knew that it would cause, the complainant to apprehend that criminal force would be used against him by the accused;2941
(iii) the said gesture or preparation did cause such apprehension in the mind of the complainant; and
(iv) the accused received no grave and sudden provocation to make the gesture or preparation.

(b) in the case of use of criminal force:

(i) the accused used force to the complainant;
(ii) he did so intentionally;
(iii) he used it without the complainant's consent;
he did so to commit an offence, or to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he would cause, injury, fear or annoyance to the complainant;[72] and he received no grave and sudden provocation from the complainant.

Absence of medical evidence about the injury is inconsequential when there is positive evidence to the effect that the complainant had been assaulted by the accused. The offence would fall under s 351, IPC .[73]

9. Acquittal on a charge under Section 352 Bars a fresh trial on the same facts under Section 323

A person, tried and acquitted on a charge of using criminal force under s 352, cannot be tried, in respect of the same criminal matter, on a charge of hurt.[74]

10. Sentence

Where no substantial hurt is caused, no useful purpose would be served by sending the accused to jail for a short term, and a sentence of fine would meet the ends of justice.[75] Where, however, a railway officer of some status, whose duty as such officer was to behave fairly and courteously to passengers, was convicted of an offence under this section, for forcibly occupying a berth occupied by a lady, by not only assaulting her when she resisted, but also by casting aspersions on her character, the Supreme Court observed that his conduct called for censure and the maximum sentence permissible under the section.[76]

The occurrence took place 15 years back when the accused was 32 years and co-accused 35 years of age. Thus keeping in view the age of the accused persons and passing of a long period from the date of occurrence the sentence under s 352, IPC, was reduced from three months rigorous imprisonment to a fine of Rs 3000, in default of payment of which rigorous imprisonment for three months.[77]

As this section limits the imprisonment for a term of three months, imprisonment in default of payment of fine cannot, in view of s 65 of this Code, exceed one-fourth of the term of three months fixed. A sentence of imprisonment for one month[78] or for three months[79] in default of payment of fine is illegal.2942

11. Conviction of main Accused under Section 304, Part I and Co-accused under Section 352

Where the main accused inflicted a knife injury on the deceased causing his death, and the co-accused wielding a stick intended to hit the victim but he averted the same, the main accused was convicted under s 304, Pt I and the co-accused under s 352, IPC .[80]

12. Alteration of Conviction from Section 353 to Section 352

Commentary under the same heading in s 353, post, may be referred to.

13. Alteration of Conviction from Section 326 to Section 352

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF CRIMINAL FORCE AND ASSAULT

S. 353.

Assault or criminal force to deter public servant from discharge of his duty.--

Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person being a public servant in the execution of his duty as such public servant, or with intent to prevent or deter that person from discharging his duty as such public servant, or in consequence of anything done or attempted to be done by such person in the lawful discharge of his duty as such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

Sections 353 to 357, IPC provide for five aggravated forms of assault or use of criminal force. This section deals with assault or use of criminal force to prevent or deter a public servant from discharging his duty as such public servant.[81]Section 3532943 of the IPC states that whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person being a public servant in the execution of his duty as such public servant is punishable as stated in that section.[82]

To attract the offence under this section, there should have been an assault or use of criminal force on any public servant in the execution of his duty as a public servant or with an intention to prevent or deter such public servant from discharging his duty.

Relative Scope of Sections 353, 332 and 333

This section is similar to ss 332 and 333, the only difference between the three sections being the act constituting the offence. In s 353, it is assaulting or using criminal force; in s 332, it is causing hurt; and in s 333, it is causing grievous hurt. In all other respects, they are exactly similar and are couched in the same terms.

2. Principle Underlying this Section

A public servant is often exposed to considerable risks in the discharge of his official duties; the law, therefore, throws around him a special protection by prescribing especially deterrent sentences to those who offend against the majesty of the law, of which he is a minister. However, it is not intended to encircle him with a perennial halo of sanctity and inviolability and the IPC has throughout, in referring to him, protected him only when he is in the execution of duty, he being left at other times to have recourse to the ordinary law, applicable to all alike.[83]

Section 353, IPC, postulates that the public servant has jurisdiction to execute and insist that he should be in the process of execution of his duty when he is assaulted or criminal force is used. Legality of the execution of duty is the sine qua non for the application of s 353 . When, therefore, a duty is prohibited by statute or by orders of a superior authority, it cannot be said that the public servant acts in execution of his duty, for he was not duty bound to execute any order. Administrative discipline compels obedience to the order of the superior authority by the subordinate. A stay of an order issued by a higher authority prevents its execution by the subordinate.[84]

3. Section 353 Distinguished from Section 24 of the Cattle Trespass Act 1871

Section 24 of the Cattle Trespass Act 1871 does not supersede s 353 of the IPC . They co-exist. In s 353, use of criminal force and assault are essential while in s 24 all that is required is that the cattle should be rescued after seizure; assault or use of criminal force is not necessary.[85]

4. Section 186 Distinguished from Sections 332 and 353

Commentary under the same heading in s 186, IPC, Vol. 2, may be referred to.

5. Ingredients

The essential ingredients[86] of an offence under this section are as follows:2944

(1) there must be assault or use of criminal force by the accused;
(2) the victim of the assault or use of criminal force must be a public servant; and
(3) the assault or use of criminal force must have a link with the discharge, by the public servant, of his public duty.[87]

It must be committed:

(a) while the public servant is engaged in the discharge of his duty so that he cannot proceed with it, or
(b) in order to prevent him from discharging his duty in future, or
(c) in consequence of anything, done, by him, in the past in discharging, or attempting to discharge, his duty.[88]

Similarly, the assault or use of criminal force to a public servant, while he was doing his official duty as such, is a necessary ingredient of the offence under this section. The criminal force contemplated under this section is intended to mean criminal force as applied to a person, and not as applied to an inanimate object or substance.[89]

Where offence of criminal force is not attracted, the offence would not fall under s 353, IPC .[90]

6. 'Assaults'

A constable is entitled to arrest a person, causing hurt to another person, by inflicting injuries with a knife, and if the constable is assaulted while effecting the arrest, the offender commits an offence under this section.[91] For further commentary, see text under s 351, ante.

7. 'Uses Criminal Force'

Commentary under s 350, ante, may be referred to.

8. 'Public Servant'

Where it is doubtful whether the person assaulted is a public servant or not, the accused is entitled to the benefit of doubt and the offence would be treated as one falling under s 352, and not under this section.[92]

A police constable is a police officer and is supposed to be so all during 24 hours of the day as he can at any moment may be called upon for duty. However, in order to sustain the charge of the offence punishable under s 353, IPC, what has to be established is that the public servant was actually engaged in execution of the duty.[93]

For further commentary, see under s 21, IPC, Vol. 1.2945

9. 'In the Execution of his Duty as Such Public Servant'

It is essential for a conviction under this part of the section, that the public servant at the time of being assaulted was acting in the execution of his duty.[1] If, at the relevant time, he is not doing his duty as a public servant, the offence does not fall under s 353, but under s 352, IPC .[2] Similarly the test is whether at the time of the assault, the public servant was lawfully discharging a duty imposed on him by law as such and whether he was doing what it was his duty to do.[3] If, without justification, a public servant prevents a person from going home in his car and that person pushes the public servant aside and goes his way, the person commits no offence under this section.[4] Similarly, where a tahsildar, having no authority to issue a search warrant or to make a search, was merely present at a search conducted by a police officer when he was assaulted, it was held that the assault on the tahsildar fell under s 352, and not under this section.[5]

An officer who exercises his official duties grossly, illegally and in an outrageous manner, cannot be deemed to be a public servant in the execution of his duty so as to bring an assault against such an officer within the purview of this section.[6]

Where a forest officer apprehended the accused, without having the power to so apprehend, and a scuffle entailed, it was held that no offence under this section was committed.[7] If an attachment is itself without jurisdiction, the act of the accused in causing obstruction to the bailiff, while he is putting to auction a buffalo in execution of an order of maintenance, does not constitute an offence under this section.[8] Likewise, if an accused attempts to release his relation from being arrested by police constables, who are neither in uniform, nor authorised to arrest the particular individual, nor disclose their identity and purpose, he commits no offence under this section.[9] Similarly, if the action of a public servant at the relevant time is not found to be valid in law, an assault on him, or using criminal force against him, would not amount to an offence under this section.[10]2946

If a constable is having a private quarrel with another man and is beaten in the course of that quarrel, that will not be use of criminal force in the course of his duty. Likewise, is the case when a constable is trying to commit an offence like a theft, and hurt is caused during the scuffle to prevent it. However, a constable, interfering in an affray in order to prevent it, is only discharging his duty as a public servant. If, as a result of his warning to persons committing the affray, to desist from committing the affray, or even as a result to his taking them illegally into his custody for persisting in the affray, he is subjected to criminal force by pelting stones after the persons have escaped from his custody, and there is no need to inflict any criminal force on him for the purpose of such escape, an offence under this section will be made out.[11] Similarly, a police constable, searching a person or a boat for illicit liquor, acts in the execution of his duty as a public servant and if he is assaulted, or criminal force is used against him, an offence is committed under this section.[12] A police officer, receiving information, which he believes to be correct that gambling is going on in a public place, is entitled to apprehend the gamblers without warrant, and if he is prevented by the accused from doing so by the use of criminal force, the accused is guilty under this section.[13] Likewise is the case when a person resists the search by pushing the public servant who is legally authorised to make it.[14] Where the accused had submitted to their arrest by a constable, who was entitled to arrest them and take them to the thana, but, subsequently, in endeavouring to escape, they assaulted the constable when he tried to prevent them from escaping, it was held that they were guilty of an offence under this section.[15] Allegations were that the accused persons had voluntarily caused grievous hurt to the junior engineer and foreman of the electricity department when they were discharging public duty. The incident took place at 7.30 p.m.; the duty chart was not filed to show that at the relevant time, the junior engineer and the foreman were on public duty. The accused persons were acquitted of the charges under ss 353 and 332, IPC .[16] If a police officer executing a warrant, which, on the face of it is valid, is assaulted, the accused commits an offence under this section.[17] Where, however, the warrant of arrest, the execution of which is resisted by a person, is clearly an illegal one, the person resisting cannot be convicted under this section.[18]

Where the complainant police officer entered the house of the accused in connection with the investigation of a case, had not obtained any warrant or written permission, the accused had not used any criminal force or assaulted the complainant2947 to deter her from discharging her duty, it was held that no offence under s 186 or s 353, IPC was committed. FIR was quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[19]

In the instant case, the appellants on Facebook posted adverse comments against the respondent police officer. The appellants had met with an accident with an auto rickshaw and sustained injuries. The constable present at the time of the incident directed the appellants to meet police inspector K. When the appellants entered the office of K, the latter asked the appellant to produce her driving licence and other documents. As at that time no FIR was lodged, the appellant questioned the police inspector as to why she was being asked to produce those documents. The respondent K, in reply, alleged to have threatened appellant by saying that he would drag her to Court if she continued to argue and she was also thrown out of his office. On the order of K, his deputy told the appellants that they are booking them on the charge of rash and negligent driving. Being aggrieved with the manner with which they were treated, the appellants posted comments on the Bangalore traffic Police Facebook page, accusing K of his misbehavior and also forwarded an email complaining about the harassment meted out to them at the hands of the respondent police inspector. The respondent filed complaint for offences under ss 353 and 503, IPC . Held, there was absolutely nothing on record to show that the appellants either assaulted the respondents or used criminal force to prevent the second respondent from discharging his official duty. Considering the uncontroverted allegations, the ingredients of the offence under s 353, IPC were not made out.[20]

10. 'With Intent to Prevent or Deter that Person from Discharging his Duty as such Public Servant'

Where a sales tax officer attempted to take possession of the account books from the hands of the accused's son and the accused gave him a jerk to allow his son to run away with the account books, it was held that the accused had used criminal force to deter the officer from discharging his duty and, consequently, was liable under this section.[21]

11. 'In Consequence of Anything Done or Attempted to be Done by Such Person in the Lawful Discharge of his Duty as Such Public Servant'

The expression 'in consequence', as used in s 332, IPC, and this section, includes the motive which actuates the accused to cause voluntarily hurt or assault to a public servant.[22] Where the assault did not relate to anything done or attempted to be done by the public servant as a public servant, and it was to feed the personal grudge of the accused against the public servant, conviction under this section was not held sustainable though conviction under s 325 was maintained.[23]

The words 'in the lawful discharge of his duty as such public servant' mean in the discharge of a duty imposed by law on such public servant in the particular case; they do not cover an act done by him in good faith under colour of his office.[24] The duty,2948 assigned to a public servant by his master, be it under a statute or by an executive order, will assume the character of a public duty if the duty assigned is not illegal or against public policy.[25]

In certain pension matter proceedings before the Deputy Secretary to the Government of Karnataka, the counsel for the petitioner had made certain submissions, when the counsel was required to sign the proceedings, he was said to have refused to sign those proceedings. Held, no offence under s 180 or s 353, IPC was made out; proceedings were quashed on petition filed under s 482, CrPC .[26]

12. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

13. Sanction

Where, upon the facts, the commission of several offences is disclosed, some of which require sanction and others do not, it is open to the complainant to proceed with respect to those offences only which do not require sanction.[27] However, at the same time, the provisions of s 195, CrPC, cannot be evaded by the device of charging a person with an offence, to which that section (i.e., the said s 195) does not apply, and then convicting him of an offence, to which it does, on the ground that the latter offence is a minor one of the same character, or by describing the offence as one punishable under some other section of this Code, though, in truth and substance, the offence falls in the category of sections mentioned in s 195, CrPC .[28] Again, since the offences under ss 228 and 353 fall in the same category and they are of the same nature, it is not permissible for the prosecution to split up the facts of the case in order to get rid of the bar of s 195, CrPC, and proceed only in respect of the offence under s 353 .[29]

14. Prison Act and Section 353 --Jurisdiction

Where a regular challan or complaint is instituted, the ordinary courts of criminal law can proceed with the inquiry and trial of the cases, notwithstanding the fact that such offences may also fall in the definition of prison offences under s 45 of the Prisons Act . In cases, where the offence also constitutes an offence under the IPC, the superintendent of prison has the option either to take cognizance of the cases himself or to file a regular complaint in a criminal court. Where, therefore, a constable, who is assaulted, makes a complaint under s 353, IPC, and the police submits a challan to the magistrate, the magistrate cannot refuse to exercise his jurisdiction and acquit the accused on the ground that he has no jurisdiction.[30]

The offence under s 60 of the Uttar Pradesh Excise Act 1910, and the one under s 353, IPC, being distinct and different, a person prosecuted under both the sections,2949 if acquitted on a charge under the former section, can be convicted on the same facts, under s 353, IPC .[31]

15. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[32]

16. Proof

To establish a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) the accused assaulted or used criminal force to a public servant; and
(2) the said assault or use of criminal force was:

    (a) in the execution of his duty as such public servant, or
    (b) with intent to prevent or deter that person from discharging his duty as such public servant, or
    (c) in consequence of anything done or attempted to be done by such person in the lawful discharge of his duty as such public servant.

There must be evidence of the terms of the warrant, in execution of which the public servant was acting, either by production of the original warrant or secondary evidence of it. In the absence of such evidence, it would not be possible to regard the warrant as a valid warrant and convict the accused under this section.[33] Likewise, it is incumbent on the prosecution, in cases of disobedience to a warrant, to show that the accused is the person against whom the warrant was issued.[34]

17. Acquittal

Where the complainant was alleged to have been assaulted by the accused person when he was checking the electric meter installed in the latter's premises, there was complete silence about the motive of the assault which probabilised the defence version that the motive of the alleged assault was not as alleged in the complaint. There was a delay of two days in lodging the complaint which created serious doubt about the correctness of the prosecution version. Further, the complainant was not assaulted as per the prosecution version in discharge of his duty as a public servant. Therefore, the acquittal of the accused was found proper.[35] The accused persons allegedly entered into the school premises and gave lathi blows to the victim-teacher for beating their children. The evidence of the victim was not corroborated by the medical evidence or by the statement of other teachers/eyewitnesses to the occurrence. The recovery memo, lathi and victims clothes allegedly torn by the accused proved to be only a farce. The acquittal of the accused persons under ss 353, 332, 506 / 34, IPC, was held proper.[36] The allegations against the accused were that they obstructed police officials in discharge of their official duties. The eyewitnesses failed to identify the accused. The other evidence was not found sufficient to convict2950 the accused. The conviction of the accused under s 353 was therefore not found proper.[37]

The allegation against the accused was that when the public servant/complainant was checking the vehicles while performing his official duties, the accused tried to run the truck over him with an intention to kill him. There were material contradictions in the statement of witnesses. The independent witnesses who were present at the place of the incident did not support the prosecution version. The accused had stopped the truck when asked for and a challan was filed, the truck was seized, so there remained nothing to be done so far as seizure of the truck in question was concerned. In these circumstances, the order of acquittal of the accused under ss 353 and 307, IPC was found proper.[38] The allegations against the accused were that he abused and assaulted the municipal officials. There was no evidence to show that the said officials had gone to the scene of the offence in the discharge of their duties as public servants. Even deputation of these officials upon oral instructions was not proved. No independent witness was cited by the prosecution. The FIR was lodged by the sweeper of the municipality and not by any responsible officer. On these facts, the accused was found to be acquitted under ss 353 and 323, IPC .

The prosecution case was that the accused persons forcibly entered the office of the DCP Traffic, gheraoed and manhandled the DCP. The prosecution case of causing hurt, assault or use of criminal force to deter a public servant from discharging his duty was not proved and thus, the accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 186, 353 and 332, IPC .[39]

18. Quashing of FIR/Charges

The accused person had picked up/snatched the ballot papers from the custody and possession of the public servants. It is patent that criminal force had been used by them. They had even torn the ballot papers and in the process used criminal force. The charges framed against the accused persons under ss 353 and 171-F, IPC, was found proper and the petition under s 482, CrPC, by the accused persons for quashing the charges and the FIR was dismissed.[40]

19. Conviction

Where an assault on the police officer on duty was made by the accused, an auto driver who intercepted his auto for violating traffic rules, the prosecution version about the interception of auto and the assault was proved by the eye-witnesses and corroborated by independent witness and medical evidence, the accused was liable to be convicted.[41]Where the accused assaulted to deter a public servant from the discharge of his duty and sprinkled black paint and used the abusive language against the commissioner of the municipal corporation while he was in office, such an act of humiliation was done intentionally and was sufficient to obstruct the duty of the public servant. The cognizance was taken when the written complaint under s 195, CrPC, was filed by the public servant. Therefore it was not necessary for the2951 complainant to be present when the FIR was registered and the conviction of the accused was found proper.[42]

Where the accused was firing shots on the Revenue Officials, thereby obstructing them in discharge of their official duty, two persons were injured in firing. The mere fact that the Revenue Officials visited the place of occurrence eight months after making an application for demarcation of the land by the complainant would not, by itself, make the prosecution version doubtful. The injuries found on the person of the victims were caused by the fire-arms as per the evidence of the doctor. The FIR was lodged with promptness. The conviction of the accused under ss 307, 353 was found proper.[43]

20. Sentence

A breach of peace, even if it involves an assault on a public officer of a mild character, unless there be some elements of criminality in it, should not ordinarily be punished by a sentence of imprisonment.[44] Where, therefore, a conviction under this section is only technically correct, imposition of a small fine is sufficient.[45] In Vaney Singh v State ,[46] the unexpired portion of the accused's sentence was converted into fine as he was not a previous convict. Generally, however assaulting a public servant in the discharge of his duty is a serious offence which requires to be punished severely and a mere sentence of fine would not suffice,[47] particularly when the occurrence took place inside court premises in broad daylight.[48]

21. Alteration of Conviction from Section 353 to Section 352

Where it is doubtful whether the person assaulted is a public servant or not, the accused is entitled to the benefit of the doubt and the offence would be treated as one falling under s 352, and not under this section.[49] Even when the person assaulted is a public servant but when he was assaulted while not discharging any duty imposed on him by virtue of his office and was not performing any act connected with the duty attached to his office, the case will riot be covered by s 353 but will only be covered by s 352, IPC .[50]

Where a magistrate takes cognizance of a case on a police charge-sheet under s 353, IPC, for assault on a public servant, finds on the evidence that the person assaulted was not a public servant, the magistrate is not debarred from convicting the accused for the offence under this section. If the magistrate has convicted him of the offence under s 353, the appellate court can alter the conviction to one under this section.[51] Where the evidence produced in a case shows that the person against2952 whom the accused made an assault or used criminal force was not the public servant at all, or was not the public servant mentioned in the original complaint, but some other person,[52] or was not acting as a public servant at the relevant time,[53] the conviction of the accused can be altered under s 352, from one under s 353, IPC . It may, however, be remembered that alteration of a conviction under s 351 from one under s 353, IPC, does not amount to an acquittal under s 353 .[54]

22. Alteration of Conviction from Section 353 to Section 503

Where the accused threatened to kill a revenue inspector for lawfully distraining his properties, his conviction under s 353 was altered to one under s 503 .[55]

23. Alteration of Conviction from Section 353 to Section 355

Where an elderly peon attempted with an open knife in his hand to assault the railway magistrate in whose house he was working, the act of the accused came within the ambit of s 355 and not s 353 . The conviction of the accused accordingly was altered from s 353 to s 355 .[56]

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

Section 354 has been amended by the Criminal Law (Amendment), 2013 (13 of 2013), (wef 3-02-2013) on the recommendations of the Justice J.S. Verma Committee. The punishment/sentence imposable under this section has been enhanced, which now shall not be less than one year but which may extend to five years and also fine.

2. Scope

This section deals with another aggravated form of assault or use of criminal force. The offence under this section is committed only when a person assaults or uses criminal force upon a woman, intending to outrage, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby outrage her modesty. It is not the act of outraging the modesty that is made an offence under this section. In order to constitute an offence under this section, there must be an assault, or use of criminal force, to any woman with the intention or knowledge that the woman's modesty will be outraged.[58]

As the section is intended to promote morality, its operation is not confined only to females above a certain age. 'Modesty', in this section, is an attribute associated with female human beings as a class. It is a virtue which attaches to a female owing to her sex. 'Modesty' is to be considered to be an attribute of a female human being, irrespective of the fact whether the female concerned has developed enough understanding as to appreciate the nature of the act or realise that it is offensive to decent female behaviour or sense of propriety concerning the relations of a female with others.[59]

If any person uses criminal force upon any woman with the intention or knowledge that the woman's modesty will be outraged, he is to be punished.[60]

3. English Law

A person (A) who intentionally touches another person (B) commits an offence if the touching is sexual, B does not consent to it, and A does not reasonably believe that B consents to it. A person guilty of such an offence is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, or on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum, or to both.[61]

'Intentional touching' means deliberate touching which is in fact sexual; it is not necessary to prove that the touching was done for any sexual purpose.[62]

In R v Heeney , it was held, 'True it is that the sexual assault here was limited in time and extent, but in this case it is not the extent of the assault which makes it so serious, it is the circumstances surrounding the assault which make it particularly serious. It is a classic case for the application of the principle that the presence of2955 aggravating features makes the offence significantly more serious than the nature of the activity alone might suggest'.[63]

In a case, it was observed, 'Despite the drink which she had taken, the complainant had not consented, and had never given the offender the slightest reason that she would or might consent, to sexual familiarity with him. Rather, she had been defenceless and the offender had taken advantage of her vulnerability to molest her when he knew perfectly well that she would not have agreed to sexual familiarity of any kind. The exploitation of her vulnerability was an aggravating feature, not a mitigating feature'.[64]

4. Law of Canada

It is an offence to commit sexual assault. Sexual assault is an assault committed in circumstances of a sexual nature such as to violate the sexual integrity of the complainant. It is a crime of general intent. The test of sexual nature is objective, the issue being whether, viewed in the light of all the circumstances, the sexual or carnal context of the assault would be visible to a reasonable observer. The term 'sexual' in sexual assault is not so vague as to offend ss 7 or 9 of the Charter. A husband or wife may be charged with sexual assault in respect of his or her spouse, whether or not the spouses were living together at the time the activity that forms the subject matter of the charge occurred.

Elements

To determine whether sexual assault has been committed, a court should consider all relevant factors, including the body part touched, the nature of the contact, any words or gestures including threats accompanying the conduct, and the accused's intent or purpose, including the presence or absence of sexual gratification. Sexual assault does not, however, require sexuality or sexual gratification. A misguided and primitive disciplinary exercise that is an aggressive act of domination, which violates the sexual integrity of the complainant and constitutes an assault, may be a sexual assault. The accused's intent is only one factor to consider in deciding whether the overall conduct has a sexual context. Its importance depends on the circumstances.

Actus reus

The actus reus of sexual assault is established by the proof of three elements: (i) touching, (ii) the sexual nature of the contact, and (iii) the absence of consent. The first two of these elements are objective. It is sufficient for the Crown to prove that the accused's actions were voluntary. The sexual nature of the assault is determined objectively; the Crown need not prove that the accused had any mens rea with respect to the sexual nature of his or her behaviour. The absence of consent, however, is subjective and determined by reference to the complainant's subjective internal state of mind towards the touching, at the time it occurred.

Mens rea

Sexual assault is a crime of general intent. Therefore, the Crown needs only to prove that the accused intended to touch the complainant in order to satisfy the basic mens rea requirement. However, since sexual assault only becomes a crime in the absence2956 of the complainant's consent, the common law recognizes a defence of mistake of fact which removes culpability for those who honestly but mistakenly believed that they had consent to touch the complainant.

Sexual orientation

There is no special obligation of inquiry where the accused is homosexual and charged with the sexual assault of someone of the same sex. The test is still whether the accused was wilfully blind or reckless in acting on an assumption without receiving or eliciting consent to the sexual activity.[65]

In R v Larue ,[66] considering the particular facts, it was held that 'how she became undressed, and any prior sexual activity, were legally irrelevant considerations'.

In R v Cooper ,[67] the Court observed, 'It is not enough for the appellant to assume that F.C. wanted to have a sexual experience with a man because he said that he had had an unsatisfactory experience with a woman and that this therefore meant F.C. was consenting to a sexual relationship with the appellant. The appellant should have inquired further to satisfy himself that F.C. was in fact consenting to a sexual relationship with him. The appellant was therefore willfully blind or reckless with the result that the defence of honest but mistaken belief failed'.

5. Validity of the Section

This section is neither opposed to the provisions of art 14, on the ground that men only, and not women are made punishable under this section, nor to the provisions of art 15 Constitution of India, on the ground that it discriminates between men and women on the basis of sex alone.[68]

6. Section 354 Distinguished from Section 3(1)(xi), Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act 1989

There is lot of difference in between prosecution under s 354 of IPC and under s 3(1) (ix) of Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act (SCST Act). The investigation is always made by a Circle Inspector or SHO, in case arising under s 354, whereas the investigation has to be made under s 3(1)(xi) of the SCST Act by an officer not less than the rank of a Deputy Superintendent. The penal sections are also quite different. Under s 354, IPC, as per the Andhra Pradesh Amendment, the offence is punishable for not less than five years, but may extend to seven years and also liable for fine. A lesser sentence can always be imposed after recording special reasons as per s 354, proviso. Whereas, the penal provision under s 3(1)(xi) of the SCST Act makes the offence punishable up to five years and with fine, and the minimum punishment being six months.

7. Section 354 Distinguished from Section 366

Both ss 354 and 366, IPC require a particular intention or knowledge on the part of the offender. However, the intention or knowledge, required by the one, is different from that required by the other. The intention or knowledge, required by this section, is of outraging the modesty of the woman concerned. On the other hand, the intention2957 or knowledge, required by s 366, is of compelling her to marry somebody against her will or seducing her to illicit intercourse. In the absence of some evidence, that the accused abducted the woman with the intent that she may be compelled, or knowing it to be likely that she will be compelled, to marry any person against her will, or that she may be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse, or knowing it to be likely that she will be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse, a conviction under s 366 cannot stand. Where all that is known is that the accused caught hold of a woman and dragged her, but there is nothing to indicate what his real intention was, he cannot be convicted of an offence under s 366 . However, it may be taken that he, at least, intended to outrage the modesty of the woman, or, at any rate, the culprit knew it to be likely that her modesty would be outraged by his act, and he may be convicted of an offence under this section.[69]

8. Section 354 Distinguished from Sections 376 / 511

In this country, indecent assaults are often magnified into attempts at rape, and more often into rape itself. The distinction between the two offences, one under this section and the other under s 376 read with s 511, is sometimes very meagre, but, nonetheless, it is real.[70] The point of distinction between an offence of attempt to commit rape and to commit indecent assault is that there should be some action on the part of the accused which would show that he was just going to have sexual connection with her.[71] There may be cases, and frequently there are, where assault on a woman neither amounts to rape nor an attempt to commit it. It may still be such an assault as it interferes with her modesty or is considered indecent, not only according to the prevalent notions of morality, but also in the eye of law.[72]

As observed by Patterson J in Rex v James Lloyd ,[73] in order to find the accused guilty of assault with intent to commit rape, the court must be satisfied that the accused when he laid hold of the prosecutrix, not only desired to gratify his passions upon her person but that he intended to do so at all events, and not withstanding any resistance on her part. The point of distinction between an offence of attempt to commit rape and to commit indecent assault is that there should be some action on the part of the accused which would show that he was just going to have sexual connection with her.[74] Where the prosecutrix admitted in the cross-examination that the accused rubbed his male organ on her private part, and when she cried, the accused released her and started wearing his clothes. In the facts and circumstances of the entire case it was a clear case of attempt to commit sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix and it cannot be said that it was a simple case of outraging her modesty.[75] Putting saliva on the private part of the girl after removal of her underwear is a step forward towards commission of the actual penetration of the male organ. It is a positive attempt to commit rape. It cannot be brought within purview of mere outraging modesty.[76] When there is evidence showing that there was an intention on the part of an accused person to commit rape followed by an attempt on his part,2958 merely because he had failed in his attempt to complete the act it cannot be said that he is liable to be punished only for an offence punishable under s 354 and not for offence punishable under s 376 read with s 511 .[77]

9. Essential Ingredients

In order to constitute an offence under this section, there must be: (1) an assault or use of criminal force, (2) to any woman, (3) with the intention or knowledge that her modesty will be outraged.[78] There must be either criminal force or assault on any woman, intending to outrage the modesty and in case if this much of evidence is available, the offence under s 354, IPC stands proved.[79]

Holding arms of the prosecutrix, gagging her mouth with one hand and holding her breast with the other hand constitutes offence under s 354 .[80]

To pull a woman's hair and hand, in the presence of several persons, is calculated to outrage the woman's modesty.[81] However, there would be no offence under this section if the girl is a consenting party to the affair.[82] Where a court peon, executing a decree for delivery of possession to the decree-holder, forcibly removed the judgment-debtor and his wife, when they refused to vacate the house, and as the woman, offering resistance, struggled and her dhoti got loose, it was held that as the woman was not a pardanashin lady, the peon was within his powers when he forcibly removed her and as the getting loose of her dhoti was a result of her own violence during the struggle and was not a deliberate act of the peon, he was not liable under this section or even under s 323 .[83]

10. 'Whoever'

The word 'whoever' in the section, means any person, whether male or female. The pronoun 'he', used in the expression 'that he will thereby outrage her modesty', must, in view of s 8 of this Code, be taken to import a male or female.[84] Similarly, a man as well as a woman can be held guilty under this section for the offence of assaulting, or using criminal use of force to a woman with the intention or knowledge that the woman's modesty will be outraged.[85]

11. 'Assaults or uses Criminal Force to'

To constitute an offence under this section, there must be assault or use of criminal force. Unless there is assault or use of criminal force, a person cannot be punished under this section. Of course, physical assault is not necessary, but assault, or use of criminal force, as defined in ss 350 and 351, IPC, will certainly be necessary. Merely removing one's clothes and showing his private parts to a lady may amount to2959 indecency, but not an offence under this section. Where an accused caught hold of the hands of a woman from behind and in the struggle that followed, she was thrown to the ground on her back, it was held that it amounted to assault, or use of criminal force, under this section.[86]

In the undernoted case, there was evidence of the eye-witnesses that the appellant accused forcibly stopped the minor girl going on cycle and tried to make physical contact with her; however, he did not depose that the accused used criminal force or assaulted the victim. Held, the act fell under s 354A and not under s 354, IPC . Accused was convicted under s 354A, IPC .[87]

Winking his eye at woman in public and beckoning her to the notice of others, catching hold of her arm are obvious acts of assault to outrage her modesty.[88] The touching of the body of the woman by the accused by placing his hand on her cheek and his leg on her waist attract s 354, IPC .[89]

12. 'Any Woman'

The word 'woman', as defined in s 10 of this Code, denotes a female human being of any age. An offender cannot, therefore, contend that the victim of his assault was too young, or too old, to understand the purport or significance of his act.[90] The essence of a woman's modesty is her sex. Young or old, intelligent or imbecile, awake or sleeping, the woman possesses modesty capable of being outraged. The test of a woman's individual reaction to the outrage, perpetrated on her has to be rejected. Even if a victim is a baby of seven and a half months old, she possesses, from her birth, the modesty which is the attribute of her sex. Therefore, if an accused deliberately interferes with the vagina of the child, he must be deemed to have outraged her modesty and is punishable under this section.[91]

13. Modesty

What constitutes an outrage to female modesty is not defined anywhere. The essence of a woman's modesty is her sex. The culpable intention of the accused is the crux of the matter. The reaction of the woman is very relevant, but its absence is not always decisive. Modesty in this section is an attribute associated with female human beings as a class. It is a virtue which attaches to a female owing to her sex. The act of pulling a woman, removing her sari, coupled with a request for sexual intercourse, is such as would be an outrage to the modesty of a woman, and knowledge that modesty is likely to be outraged, is sufficient to constitute the offence without any deliberate intention having such outrage alone for its object. As indicated above, the word 'modesty' is not defined in IPC . The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary[92]2960 defines the word 'modesty' in relation to woman as follows: 'Decorous in manner and conduct; not forward', or 'scrupulously chaste'.

Modesty is defined as the quality of being modest; and in relation to a woman, 'womanly propriety of behaviour scrupulous chastity of thought, speech and conduct. It is the reserve or sense of shame, proceeding from instinctive aversion to impure or coarse suggestions.[1]

'Intending to Outrage, or Knowing it to be Likely that he will Thereby Outrage, her Modesty'

An offence of indecent assault on a woman cannot be complete unless there is intention or knowledge that the woman's modesty will be outraged.[2] Intention is not the sole criteria of the offence punishable under s 354, IPC, and it can be committed by a person assaulting or using criminal force to any woman, if he knows that by such act the modesty of the woman is likely to be affected. Knowledge and intention are essentially things of the mind and cannot be demonstrated like physical objects. The existence of intention or knowledge has to be culled out from various circumstances in which and upon whom the alleged offence is alleged to have been committed.[3]It is not necessary under this section that the act complained of, should have resulted in outraging or insulting the modesty of a woman. What is necessary to prove is that such an act has been committed with the intention of outraging the modesty of a woman or knowing it to be likely that her modesty would be outraged by such act. It is not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the act complained of, has in fact resulted in outraging the modesty of the woman concerned. Once the act complained of, is found to have been done with the specified intention or knowledge, the court is not to go further to find out the effect of such an act.[4]The act of pulling a woman by the arm, coupled with a request for sexual intercourse, is such as would be an outrage to the modesty of a woman, and knowledge that modesty is likely to be outraged is sufficient to constitute the offence without any deliberate intention having such outrage alone for its objects.[5]

Holding a woman by her breast by a person who is not her husband in public and particularly by a person who is an utter stranger, will be an act very much likely to outrage the modesty of a woman.[6]

The appellant accused had called the minor girls, took them inside the room, removed their undergarments, and to satisfy his lust touched their bodies also, he was convicted under s 354, IPC .[7]2961

Omission to mention s 34, IPC, in the order of conviction has nothing more than academic significance as observed in Ude Singh v State. [8] When one of the accused stripped the complainant and all of them carried her in her naked condition, all of them are guilty of the offence of outraging her modesty.[9]

Ultimate Test to Ascertain Outraging Modesty

Webster's Third New International Dictionary of the English Language defines modesty as 'freedom from coarseness, indelicacy or indecency; a regard for propriety in dress, speech or conduct'. In State of Punjab v Major Singh ,[10]a question arose whether a female child of seven and a half months could be said to be possessed of 'modesty' which could be outraged. In answering the above question the majority view was that when any act done to or in the presence of a woman is clearly suggestive of sex according to the common notions of mankind that must fall within the mischief of s 354, IPC . Needless to say, the 'common notions of mankind' referred to have to be gauged by contemporary societal standards. It was further observed in the said case that the essence of a woman's modesty is her sex and from her very birth she possesses the modesty which is the attribute of her sex. From the above dictionary meaning of 'modesty' and the interpretation given to that word by the Supreme Court in Major Singh's case (supra) the ultimate test for ascertaining whether modesty has been outraged is whether the action of the offender is such as could be perceived as one which is capable of shocking the sense of decency of a woman.[11]

The Approach that 'Ordinarily a lady would not put her character at Stake' cannot be Applied Universally

The approach of the learned trial judge that ordinarily a lady would not 'put her character at stake' may not be wrong but cannot be applied universally. Each case has to be determined on the touchstone of the factual matrix thereof. The law reports are replete with decisions where charges under ss 376 and 354 of the IPC have been found to have been falsely advanced.[12] No decent woman would risk her reputation and honour for no apparent reason to falsely implicate the accused.[13] It would, however, be unusual in a conservative society that a woman would be used as a pawn to wreck vengeance. When a plea is taken about false implication, courts have a duty to make deeper scrutiny of the evidence and decide acceptability or otherwise of the accusations.[14]

14. Honour and Prestige of the Family

Needless to say that in such cases, the honour and prestige of the family is involved and nobody would like to drag female members of the family to courts unnecessarily.[15]2962

15. Conspiracy cannot be Post Facto and Conspirators cannot be Accessories after the Fact

The case of the defence that the complainant went to the airport with the specific intention of being seen in the company of the accused with the motive of later on falsely implicating the accused makes nonsense of the defence charge that complainant has falsely implicated the accused at the instance of prosecution witness. There is nothing to show that prosecution witness had contacted the complainant at any time prior to prosecution witness complainant visiting the airport and 'deliberately' allowing herself to be seen in the company of the accused. Conspiracy cannot be post facto and the conspirators cannot be accessories after the fact.[16]

16. Outraging modesty does not mean Abetment of Suicide

The mere act of outraging the modesty itself cannot be construed that it has caused an act of abetment to the deceased so as to commit suicide. There should be clinching evidence so as to believe that the accused caused such an act of abetment to the deceased so as to drive her to commit suicide. In the absence of proof of the ingredients of s 306, IPC, the question of basing conviction for the said offence does not arise.[17]

17. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable with the permission of the court, before which the prosecution is pending, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

When, in the course of trial, it appears that the offence committed would fall under s 376, it would be proper for the magistrate to commit the case to the court of session.[18] Where the father was alleged to have committed sexual assault against his minor daughter, compounding of offence was refused.[19]

18. Provocation under Section 354 and Section 3(1)(xi) of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act 1989--Propriety

When investigations have to be made by different officers under different Acts and the court takes the cognizance of the offence and frames the charge treating the offence under s 3(1)(xi) of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act 1989, the investigation is sealed. In any view of the matter, a person cannot be prosecuted for s 354, IPC as well as for the offence under s 3(1)(ix) of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act 1989 at one and the same time and cannot be tried for the offence under different Acts. When the victim happens to be a person belonging to SC community, the only provision that can be applicable is s 3(1)(ix) of the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes (Prevention of Atrocities) Act 1989 and not s 354, IPC . The prosecution under s 354 as well as giving a finding of guilt is not proper.[20]2963

19. Recalling of Prosecutrix for Further Cross-Examination

In cases of rape and outraging the modesty of a woman, recalling the victim for further cross-examination requires some exceptionally serious grounds. The vague allegation in the application of the accused under s 311 read with s 242, CrPC that during the earlier cross-examination of the victim, certain main points were left out from being asked, are not sufficient for permitting the accused further cross-examination by recalling the victim.[21]

20. Quashing of FIR

The accused, a top most official of the state police, slapped a senior lady IAS officer on her posterior in the presence of a gathering of elite persons of society which amounted to outraging her modesty. There was nothing in the FIR that the alleged act was committed accidentally or mistakenly by the accused. The offence relating to modesty of a woman being not trivial, s 95, IPC, is not attracted. Thus, quashing of FIR and complaint in the absence of finding that allegations made in the FIR were absurd and inherently improbable, was held by the Apex Court to be improper.[22]

21. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[23]

Where the allegation was that the accused entered the house of the complainant dragged her out, tearing her clothes and improperly behaving with her, prima facie, the essential ingredients of the offence under s 354 were made out, so the refusal of the court to frame charge under s 354 was held not proper.[24]

22. Discharge

Unless the requirements of s 354 are satisfied which requires participation of a minimum of 5 persons, the charge under s 354 read with s 149, IPC, cannot be framed. The framing of charge under s 354 read with s 149 against the accused only and under s 354 against the other two co-accused is improper.[25] In the absence of charge under s 354 there is no occasion for acquitting the accused of the said offence.[26] Where the allegations were made that the petitioner called the informant an 'ugly bitch' and assaulted her by punching on her hips in the presence of the constable and other witnesses, the police constable who immediately reached the spot gave a completely different version than the informant's version and stated that there was no quarrel in that place nor was there any fight. The other witnesses mentioned about a quarrel started by the informant herself and that the accused did not threaten, assault or abuse the informant. Besides the informant there was no one speaking about the incident as alleged by her. The order of framing charge against the accused was found not proper.[27]2964

23. Proof

In order to establish an offence under this section, it must be proved that:

(1) the accused assaulted, or used criminal force upon, a woman; and
(2) he did so intending to outrage, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby outrage, her modesty.

The solitary evidence of the prosecutrix not supported by any corroborative evidence is no ground to fasten guilt under s 354, IPC .[28]

24. Physical Injury

Physical injury is not sine qua non for offence under s 354, IPC .[29]

25. Acquittal

Where in a case of outraging the modesty of a woman and her abduction the allegations were that the accused forcibly offered a lift to the complainant and her daughter on his scooter and took them to a lodge instead of her home, where the complainant did not raise any alarm during their travel. It is difficult to visualise that the accused had asked the complainant to have sexual intercourse with her in presence of her 11 year old child and that he allowed her to easily slip out of his hands from the lodge, if that was his intention. On these facts, the conviction of the accused under s 354 read with s 366, IPC, was set aside, and the accused was acquitted.[30] The accused was acquitted by the trial court under s 354 . Nine years elapsed from the date of the incident and the prosecutrix also got married during this period. The suit for damages filed by the accused against the prosecutrix was withdrawn by him in view of the order of his acquittal. On these facts, the Madras High Court refused to interfere with the order of acquittal passed by the trial court, on being approached in the revision petition under s 397, CrPC, despite the finding that appreciation of evidence in the case by the trial court was not proper.[31]

Where in a case of causing hurt and outraging the modesty of a woman, the testimony of the eyewitness was inconsistent and self-contradictory, the medical evidence did not corroborate with the evidence of the injured witness, giving the benefit of the doubt, the accused was acquitted.[32] The testimony of the prosecutrix that she received injuries on her head, breast and shoulder was not corroborated by medical evidence. The fact that talks of compromise were going on between the parties showed that the hidden story was something different. The independent witnesses turned hostile. On these facts the accused was acquitted under ss 354, 341 and 323, IPC .[33]2965

The prosecution case was that the accused forcibly fingered in the private parts of the body of the prosecutrix, thereby outraged the modesty of the prosecutrix. The evidence of all the witnesses except the prosecutrix was hearsay. As spurted out in the cross examination of the prosecutrix, there was enmity between her father and the family of the accused. There was unexplained delay in lodging FIR, though the police station was situated at a distance of one kilometer only. Accused was acquitted of the charge under s 354, IPC .[34]

Appellant accused was prosecuted on allegations that he embraced the complainant from back and touched her breasts, thus outraged the modesty of the complainant. There were frequent disputes between the parties; the complainant had been pressing the appellant tenant to vacate the premises. Material contradictions were found in the statement of the witnesses as to the place and manner of occurrence. Held, the appellant accused was entitled to benefit of doubt, he was acquitted of the charge under s 354, IPC .[35]

Accused Acquitted under Section 376 or 376 / 511 Should not be Convicted under Section 354

Where, the accused is charged with rape or, at least, an attempt to rape and these offences are not proved, the court should not convict him for indecent assault under this section, especially when she has never deposed to it.[36]

26. Conviction

Where a primary school teacher molested young girl students, the evidence of the victim girls was reliable. Nothing was brought out in their cross-examination to discredit their evidence. Their evidence was also corroborated by the evidence of the in-charge headmaster and their parents. The conviction of the accused teacher was found proper.[37] The accused entered the house of the complainant and tried to outrage the modesty of his wife, the statement of the victim was supported by the complainant, eyewitness and investigating officer. The mere fact that the accused denied the prosecution case or some witnesses did not support the prosecution case would not make it unreliable. The conviction of the accused under s 354 was held proper.[38] The accused along with another person went to the house of the victim in the night, and by deceitful means induced her to go with him from her house and on the way tried to molest her and beat her. The evidence of the victim was reliable, trustworthy and corroborated, not only with medical evidence but also with oral as well as circumstantial evidence. The conviction of the accused under ss 366 and 354 was held proper, but since the name of the co-accused was not mentioned in the FIR and no identification parade was conducted to identify him, the co-accused was acquitted.[39] The accused persons took the prosecutrix to a lonely place by deception and with cruelty pushed a bunch of leaves into her mouth and untied her undergarments to satisfy their carnal desire. The evidence of the prosecutrix was cogent and consistent. The mere fact that there was animosity between the parties2966 and the other witnesses were clear relations of the prosecutrix, is not sufficient to discard the prosecution case. The conviction of the accused under s 354 was found proper.[40]The accused forcefully held the breast of the prosecutrix. The act of the accused was described by prosecutrix immediately after the occurrence and corroborated by evidence of witnesses, the order of acquittal of the accused was set aside and the accused convicted under s 354, IPC .[41] The accused appellant neighbor, taking advantage of the absence of male members of the family, entered the house of the prosecutrix and tried to commit sexual intercourse. Held, all the ingredients of offence punishable under s 354, IPC such as, the criminal force applied on the woman and that force had been used on the woman intending to outrage her modesty or knowing that the act would likely to outrage her modesty were proved beyond reasonable doubt. Appellant accused was convicted under s 354, IPC .[42]

The victim girl deposed that the accused blinked his eyes and asked her to accompany him and when she told him that he has no sense of humanity and showed her leg and chappal (footwear), the accused suddenly dragged her stole and abused in filthy language and threatened to kidnap her and also disfigure her face by throwing acid. The evidence of the victim girl and her brother was believed. The delay of 24 hours in filing FIR was held not fatal. Accused appellant was convicted under s 354, IPC .[43]

Bottom Slap Case Against DGP

The appellant accused Director General of Police of the State of Punjab at the dinner hosted by Secretary to the Government of Punjab, gently slapped on the posterior of the prosecutrix in the presence of some guests. This act on the part of the accused did constitute the ingredient of s 354, IPC . The accused used criminal force with intent to outrage the modesty of the complainant and he knew fully well that gently slapping on the posterior of the prosecutrix in the presence of other guests would embarrass her. Knowledge can be attributed to the accused that he was fully aware that touching the body of the prosecutrix at that place and time would amount to outraging her modesty. He was convicted under ss 354 and 509, IPC . However, he was granted probation and directed to pay Rs. 2 lacs as compensation to the prosecutrix.[44]

27. Probation

The Supreme Court has held that an accused convicted for offences under ss 354, 354A, 354B and 354C, IPC should not be released on probation.[45]

Where the accused, aged 45 years, finding the victim who was 22 years old, alone, when she was returning to her house, fell upon her like a vulture and lifted her and carried her to the bajra field, laid her on the ground and made every effort to gratify his lust on her by trying to open the string of her salwar, keeping in view these facts and circumstances, the case was not found fit to extend the benefit of release of the2967 accused on probation of good conduct.[46] In another case pertaining to abduction and outraging the modesty of a woman, the benefit of probation was declined to the accused despite a lapse of 16 years from the date of the incident.[47] The accused was convicted for committing offences of house trespass and outraging the modesty of a woman under ss 457 and 354, IPC . Keeping in view the gravity of the offences and the fact of commission of such offences in a dare devil manner, the benefit of the Probation of Offenders Act was not extended to the accused.[48] However, the accused who was aged 17 years at the time of commission of the offence under s 354, IPC, was not a previous convict or habitual offender, was extended the benefit of probation under s 360, CrPC .[49] In another case, accused A1 was found guilty and convicted for offences under ss 380 and 354, IPC . As the accused A1 was 20 years of age at the time of the commission of offence, he was released on probation.[50] Where the incident happened in 1988, despite the accused holding a high position in the state police, the various courts found him guilty of the offence punishable under ss 354 and 509, IPC and that by itself is setting a model for others and would enhance the faith in the judicial system. The accused had completed the period of probation. There was no occasion for any complaint or violation of any of the terms of the bond. Therefore, the Supreme Court did not think that it is just and proper to resort to any other punishment.[51]

Where probation was refused, however, keeping in view the age of the accused, the sentence of one year simple imprisonment imposed by the Court below was reduced to 3 months simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 5000/-.[52]

28. Sentence

In Bhagwat Ganpat Tayade v State of Maharashtra ,[53] the accused was a teacher. Imparting knowledge is a noble profession. The accused was in locoparentis to his pupil. Instead of imparting knowledge, the accused was indulging in molestation of young girls of tender age. If the conduct of the accused is considered, this is not a fit case for showing leniency. A deterrent sentence ought to be passed in a case where a man takes advantage of the absence of the girl's parents to commit an attack upon the defenceless girl.[54]

The accused persons took the prosecutrix to a lonely place by deception and cruelly pushed leaves into her mouth and untied her undergarments to satisfy their carnal desire. In view of the manner in which the offence was committed, and the deception adopted by the accused, the High Court refused to interfere with the order of the trial court sentencing the accused to 4 months RI.[55] Where the accused, a young married agriculturist of 22 years age, was convicted and had completed six2968 months and twelve days sentence, he was first the offender having the responsibility to maintain his wife, children and other members of his family. In the circumstances, he was sentenced to period already undergone with the fine of Rs. 1,000.[56] In the instant case, the High Court in a very casual manner reduced the sentence of the accused to the period already undergone merely on the ground that the accused is a first time offender.

The reduction of sentence in such cases is totally detrimental to the society which would embolden the accused to repeat the crime. The sentence of six months RI imposed by the trial Court was restored.[57]

When about 16 years elapsed from the date of the incident, though benefit of probation was not extended to the accused, yet his sentence of two years RI under s 354, IPC, was reduced to six months RI.[58] In another case, on account of a long lapse of time the accused was sentenced under s 354 to pay a fine of Rs 1000, and in default to undergo SI for 15 days.[59]

29. Alteration of Conviction from Section 376 to Section 354

Where the witness testified that she saw the accused committing rape on the prosecutrix and on raising a hue and cry the accused ran away from the place of occurrence, the prosecutrix who was a patient of mental retardation on the date of occurrence, gave no evidence herself about the alleged rape committed by the accused, no injury was received by the prosecutrix on her private parts or other parts of her body, no definite opinion regarding rape could be given in absence of FSL report, the prosecution however proved that the accused used criminal force on the prosecutrix with an intention to outrage her modesty, on these facts the conviction of the accused under s 376 was altered to one under s 354, IPC .[60] The prosecutrix nowhere stated about the removal of her clothes. 'Ulta Kam Kiya', stated by the prosecutrix in her evidence, cannot in local parlance mean commission of sexual intercourse. Medical evidence did not support the prosecution case and the statement of witnesses was discarded being hearsay evidence, the conviction of the accused was modified from s 376 to s 354, IPC .[61]

For further commentary, see under the same heading in s 376, post.

30. Alteration of Conviction from Section 354 to Section 376 by the Session Court

Commentary under the same heading in s 376, post, may be referred to.

31. Alteration of Conviction from Section 354Sections 376 / 511

A conviction under s 354 can, on appeal, be altered to one under ss 376 / 511 .[62] When a girl, aged about 5½ years, was found, by her mother, sitting without her trousers, on a naked lad of 18 years and, except for fresh redness at the entrance of the vagina, the girl bore no other marks of injury and her hymen was intact and further the girl had not cried out till she saw her mother, the lad was held guilty of an attempt to2969 commit rape, and not merely of indecent assault.[63] Similarly, an accused, who had laid himself on a girl and tried to thrust his male organ in her private parts despite the girl's strong resistance, and gave up only when witnesses arrived on the spot, was held to have gone beyond the stage of preparation and committed an attempt to commit rape.[64]

The difference between preparation and attempt to commit an offence, consists chiefly in the greater degree of determination, and what is necessary to prove for an offence of an attempt to commit rape has been committed, is that the accused has gone beyond the stage of preparation. If an accused strips a girl naked and then makes her lie flat on the ground, undresses himself and then forcibly rubs his erected penis on the private part of the girl but fails to penetrate into her vagina, and on such rubbing ejaculates himself then it cannot be said that it was a case of assault under s 354 and not an attempt to commit rape under s 376 read with s 511, IPC .[65] For further commentary, see under the same heading in s 376, post.

32. Alteration of Conviction from Sections 376 / 511 to one under Section 354

Where the allegations were that the accused entered the house of the victim when she was alone and asked her to undress at the point of knife and fled away due to the intervention by the sister of the victim, it was held that asking to undress at point of knife and even trying to molest the lady cannot be held to be offence of attempt to rape, however a case under s 354 of the Penal Code can be said to be made out wherein an attempt and the use of criminal force is made to outrage the modesty of the victim and her sister. Therefore, the conviction of the accused under ss 376 / 511 was altered to one under s 354 .[66]

Where the evidence on record was only to the effect that the accused catching hold of the hand of the informant/victim and when one of the prosecution witnesses came there hearing the alarm of the victim, the accused fled away, in the aforesaid facts, the conviction was converted from ss 376 / 511 to the one under s 354 for outraging the modesty of the victim.[67] Where the allegations were that while the victim aged about four years went to shop of the accused to purchase a sweet pudia (small packet), he called her inside and took her in his lap and did something as a result of which her dress was wet, but there was no material showing that any attempt was made by the accused to commit rape or intercourse. There was no material that the accused had undressed himself and any attempt was made by him to undress the victim, hence the conviction of the accused under ss 376 / 511, IPC, was altered to one under s 354, IPC .[68] When according to confession made by the accused, no attempt whatsoever was made by them to commit rape, the conviction recorded under ss 376 / 511, IPC, is wholly illegal and unsustainable but in view of the fact that the accused persons with an ill motive did catch hold of the deceased, same sufficiently constituted an offence under s 354 of the IPC . Consequently, even in absence of specific charge, there would be no difficulty,2970 keeping in view the provision made under s 222 of the CrPC, to record the conviction under s 354 of the IPC against the accused persons.[69]

The accused entered the house of the prosecutrix when she was all alone, and misbehaved with her by making her lie down on the cot. There was nothing to show that any preparation to commit rape, like by starting to undressing himself was done by the accused. The prosecution story that the apparels of the victim found by the accused was not reliable for want of production of such apparels, on these facts the conviction of accused under ss 376 / 511 was altered to one under s 354, IPC .[70]Where the evidence of the prosecutrix showed that her clothes were neither removed nor opened, and moreover, the accused had spent himself and left the prosecutrix before doing anything more to her, on these facts it was held that the act of the accused did not amount to either rape or an unnatural offence but amounted to indecent assault, the conviction of the accused under s 376 read with s 511, IPC, was therefore modified to one under s 354 .[71] The accused forcibly laid the prosecutrix on the bed and broke the string of her pyjama but made no attempt to undress himself. The prosecutrix pushed him away and the accused made no effort to grab her again. The conviction of the accused under s 376 read with s 511 was altered to one under s 354, IPC .[72] The evidence showed that the accused removed the sari of the victim and ran away on seeing some person. There was no material to show that the accused were determined to have sexual intercourse at all events. The case was found to be one of indecent assault and not of an attempt to commit rape. The conviction of the accused under ss 376 / 511 read with s 34, was altered to one under s 354 read with s 34, IPC .[73] Where the accused tried to seduce a girl, assaulted and made her lie down, stripped her naked, but did not expose his private part, and fled when attracted by her cries her uncle came, it was held that the offence did not amount to an attempt to rape and that it was one under this section.[74] For further commentary, see s 376, post.

33. Accused charged under Section 376 , Conviction under Section 354,IPC proper

There was no evidence that the accused penetrated his private part into private part of the prosecutrix. Medical evidence did not establish sexual intercourse. The accused merely put his finger into the private part of the prosecutrix. Held, no offence under s 376, IPC was made out. Accused was convicted under s 354, IPC .[75]

34. Alteration of Conviction from Section 354 to Section 323

Commentary under same heading in s 323, ante, may be referred to.

35. Accused Charged under Section 376 or 376 / 511 or 376 / 109 can be Convicted under Section 354 or Section 323

Commentary under s 376, post, may be referred to.2971

36. Alteration of Conviction from Section 354 to one under Section 353

Where the prosecutrix is found to have exaggerated the story, the benefit thereof must go to the accused and the conviction of the accused may be altered from one under s 354 to that under s 352,[76] but such a course cannot be adopted where the main charge under s 354 has failed because of scanty evidence.[77]

37. Alteration of Conviction from Section 354 to one under Section 451

Where, however, a person has been charged and convicted under ss 451 and 354, IPC, and on appeal, the appellate court finds that the accused committed house trespass in order to commit some offence, other than the offence under s 354, IPC, it can acquit the accused of the offence under s 354 and maintain the conviction under s 451, IPC . It need not acquit the accused of both the offences simply because the charge under s 355 fails.[78]

The six accused persons were alleged to have attacked and raped a 14 year old village girl. Out of these six accused, three were actual participants and the remaining three were instigators and abettors to the crime. Though the involvement of the three accused who actually participated in the alleged rape was established, but the medical evidence was slightly weak and there was infirmity in the evidence of the victim. The conviction of the three accused who actually participated in the offence was altered from s 376, IPC and the three accused-abettors were found entitled to be acquitted as the victim did not say anything against them in her statement in court.[79]

However, when on the evidence on record, the charge under s 376, IPC, has not been proved beyond reasonable doubt, but it is proved beyond doubt that the accused outraged the modesty of the prosecutrix, he can be held guilty of an offence under s 354, IPC .[80]

57 Substituted by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 2013 (13 of 2013), s 6 (wef 3-2-2013) for "shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both".

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF CRIMINAL FORCE AND ASSAULT

[84][S.354C.

Voyeurism.--

Any man who watches, or captures the image of a woman engaging in a private act in circumstances where she would usually have the expectation of not being observed either by the perpetrator or by any other person at the behest of the perpetrator or disseminates such image shall be punished on first conviction with imprisonment of either description for a term which shall not be less than one year, but which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine, and be punished on a second or subsequent conviction, with imprisonment of either description for a term which shall not be less than three years, but which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation 1.--For the purpose of this section, "private act" includes an act of watching carried out in a place which, in the circumstances, would reasonably be expected to provide privacy and where the victim's genitals, posterior or breasts are exposed or covered only in underwear; or the victim is using a lavatory; or the victim is doing a sexual act that is not of a kind ordinarily done in public.

Explanation 2.--Where the victim consents to the capture of the images or any act, but not to their dissemination to third persons and where such image or act is disseminated, such dissemination shall be considered an offence under this section.]2974

1. Legislative Changes

This section is new, inserted by the Criminal Law (Amendment), 2013 (13 of 2013), (wef 3-02-2013) on the recommendations of Justice J.S. Verma Committee.

2. English Law

A person commits an offence of voyeurism if:

(1) for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification, he observes another person doing a private act and knows that the other person does not consent to being observed for his sexual gratification;
(2) he installs equipment, or constructs or adapts a structure or part of a structure, with the intention of enabling himself or another person to commit the above offence;
(3) he operates equipment with the intention of enabling another person to observe, for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification, a third person (B) doing a private act and he knows that B does not consent to his operating equipment with that intention; or
(4) he records another person (B) doing a private act and does so with the intention that he or a third person will, for the purpose of obtaining sexual gratification, look at an image of B doing the act, and knowing that B does not consent to his recording the act with that intention.

A person guilty of any of these offences is liable on conviction or indictment to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or on summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum, or to both.[85]

In many cases the question of whether or not there is a reasonable expectation of privacy is closely related to the nature of the observing in question; although in the context of communal showers or changing rooms there is no reasonable expectation of privacy from casual observation by other users of the communal showers or changing rooms, there is a reasonable expectation of privacy from being spied on in such places by someone who has drilled a hole in the wall for this purpose.[86]

In R v Sturgess ,[87] the Court held that, taking into account the extreme gravity of the offence of voyeurism perpetrated over a significant period in the circumstances here pertaining, with the additional aggravating offence of the photographing of young females, justified the sentence of two and a half years, and on no footing can that total sentence be regarded as manifestly excessive.2975

In R v Hodgson ,[88] it was observed, 'Although there had been no recording or dissemination of images of a sexual nature, the offence had been a 'continuing' one, not a single instance of spying; it had involved the use of relatively sophisticated technology, which implied a high degree of planning and premeditation; and the fact that the ladies who had been the target of the defendant's activities had been colleagues of his had added to their distress, and had to be regarded as an aggravating factor.'

3. Law of Canada

It is an offence to surreptitiously observe, including by mechanical or electronic means, or make a visual recording of a person who is in circumstances that give rise to a reasonable expectation of privacy, if:

- the person is in a place in which a person can reasonably be expected to be nude, to expose his or her genital organs or anal region or her breasts, or to be engaged in explicit sexual activity;
- the person is nude, is exposing his or her genital organs or anal region or her breasts, or is engaged in explicit sexual activity, and the observation or recording is done for the purpose of observing or recording a person in such a state or engaged in such an activity; or
- the observation or recording is done for a sexual purpose.

Similarly, it is also an offence to print, copy, publish, distribute, circulate, sell, advertise or make available the recording, or have the recording in his or her possession for the purpose of printing, copying, publishing, distributing, circulating, selling or advertising it or making it available, where the accused knows that the recording was surreptitiously obtained illegally. 'Visual recording' includes a photographic, film or video recording made by any means.

Reasonable Expectation of Privacy

A 'reasonable expectation of privacy' under s 162(1), Criminal Code must relate to the character of the location or space where the viewing occurs, and the usual activities and uses of that space. An expectation of privacy does not relate to the manner or intention under which that location or space is observed. A couple in a spare bedroom in a third party's private residence have a reasonable expectation of privacy. Any reasonable person would understand that unless otherwise told, a couple engaged in sexual activities would not wish to be observed or intruded upon. A restaurant storage room where employees sometimes change into uniforms is not a 'place in which a person can reasonably be expected to be nude, to expose his or her genital organs or anal region or her breasts, or to be engaged in explicit sexual activity' within s 162(1)(a) . It has been held that persons in a public park had 'a reasonable expectation of privacy' so that an accused who surreptitiously video records them for a sexual purpose commits an offence contrary to s 162(1)(c) of the Criminal Code.

Defences and Exemptions

No conviction lies if the acts that are alleged to constitute the offence serve the public good and do not extend beyond what serves the public good. It is a question of law2976 whether an act serves the public good and whether there is evidence that the act alleged goes beyond what serves the public good, but it is a question of fact whether the act does or does not extend beyond what serves the public good. The motives of an accused are irrelevant.

Warrant

A police officer acting under a warrant may make a surreptitious observation or recording, but not for a sexual purpose. See s 487 .01, Criminal Code for warrant making authority.

Procedure and Punishment

These are hybrid offences. Where the Crown proceeds by way of indictment, the maximum sentence is five years' imprisonment.[89]

The applicant was not guilty of voyeurism as, while he clearly took pictures at a nude beach, he did not act in a surreptitious manner. His camera was clearly visible and not concealed. The fact that most of the photos were taken from behind or to the side of his subjects did not render his activity surreptitious. While the complainant may have had a subjective expectation of privacy at the beach, in that she did not expect to be photographed, none of the nude sunbathers at this public beach had an objectively reasonable expectation of privacy.[90]

In R v Hamilton ,[91] the Court held, 'A business owner would be guilty of voyeurism under this section if a hidden in-office security camera captured an employee exposing their genital organs in their office or a female employee exposing her breasts in her office. Speculatively, it is certainly possible that such exposure would occur.'

4. Scope

This section is new, and deals with the offence of voyeurism.

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compundable and triable by any Magistrate.

6. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I,.....(name and office of the Judicial Magistrate 1st Class etc.) charge you.....(name etc. of the accused) as under:
> That you on or about the day of ..... at District ..... watched (or captured) the image of X (name of the woman) in private act in circumstances where she would usually have the expectation of not being observed by your or others and (or disseminated such image) and thereby committed an offence punishable under Section 354C , IPC and within the cognizance of this Court.

Comments

1. Legislative Changes

This section is new, inserted by the Criminal Law (Amendment), 2013 (13 of 2013), (wef 3-02-2013) on the recommendations of the Justice J.S. Verma Committee.

2. Law of Australia

It is an offence to stalk another person. Stalking involves engaging in prescribed conduct towards another person on more than one occasion or, in some jurisdictions, on one occasion in a protracted manner. The conduct prescribed for the purpose of stalking varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, and includes the following:

(1) following or approaching a person;
(2) loitering near, watching, approaching or entering a place where a person lives, works or frequents;
(3) keeping a person under surveillance;
(4) interfering with property in the possession of a person;
(5) giving or sending offensive material to, or leaving such material where it is likely to be found by, given to or brought to the attention of, a person;
(6) contacting or communicating with a person;2978
(7) sending or making available to anyone else electronic messages about a person;
(8) acting in a way that could reasonably be expected to arouse apprehension or fear;
(9) engaging in conduct amounting to intimidation, harassment or molestation;
(10) engaging in an act of violence or a threat of violence against a person or against the property of a person;
(11) causing a person to receive unsolicited items;
(12) communicating with another person by way of mail, telephone, facsimile, internet or other form of electronic communication in a manner which could reasonably be expected to arouse fear or apprehension;
(13) causing an unauthorised computer function in a computer owned or used by a person; or
(14) tracing a person's use of the internet, email or electronic communication
(15) using abusive or offensive words to or in the presence of the victim, performing abusive or offensive acts in the presence of the victim and directing abusive or offensive acts towards the victim.

In most jurisdictions, the offender must act with the intention of causing physical or mental harm or of arousing an apprehension or fear for the safety of the person being stalked, or another person. In Western Australia, stalking may also include an intention to prevent or hinder someone from doing an act they are lawfully entitled to do, or to compel a person to do an act that person is legally entitled to abstain from doing.

In the Australian Capital Territory, an offender has the requisite intent if he knows or is reckless as to whether the stalking would be likely to cause fear or apprehension or harassment. In the Northern Territory, intention is presumed if a reasonable person in the particular circumstances would have been aware that the conduct would be likely to cause harm or arouse fear or apprehension. In New South Wales, it is sufficient that the offender knew the conduct was likely to cause fear. In Tasmania and Victoria, it is sufficient that the offender knew or ought to have known the conduct would be likely to cause harm, apprehension or fear if actual harm, apprehension or fear was caused.

In Queensland, the conduct constituting the stalking must be intentionally directed at the stalked person, and must be:

(1) conduct that would cause the stalked person apprehension or fear, reasonably arising in all the circumstances, of violence to, or against property of, the stalked person or another person; or
(2) conduct that causes detriment, reasonably arising in all the circumstances to the stalked person or another person.

It is immaterial whether the offender intended to cause the apprehension, fear or detriment.

In some jurisdictions, it is not necessary to prove that anyone actually apprehended or feared harm. In the Northern Territory, it is an element of the offence that the conduct actually caused physical or mental harm or aroused fear or apprehension. In Western Australia, a person who pursues another person in a manner that could2979 reasonably be expected to intimidate, and that does in fact intimidate, that person or a third person, is guilty of an offence.

Some jurisdictions make provision for specific circumstances of aggravation. Some jurisdictions also expressly provide that conduct engaged in as part of a person's employment, and which is not otherwise unlawful, does not constitute stalking.

In New South Wales, in addition to the stalking offences under the crimes of domestic violence legislation, it is an offence to do any of the following:

(1) use violence or intimidation towards a person, his wife, child or dependent;
(2) do any injury to a person, his wife, child or dependent;
(3) follow a person from place to place;
(4) hide any tools, clothes or other property owned or used by a person; or
(5) follow a person with two or more other persons in a disorderly manner through any street, road or public place, with the intention of compelling that person to do or not do any act, or in consequence of any act the person did or did not do. It is also an offence to stalk, harass or intimidate a police officer or other law enforcement officer while in execution of that officer's duty, and to stalk, harass or intimidate any person with whom the officer has a domestic relationship, with the intention of causing the officer to fear physical or mental harm, as a consequence of, or in retaliation for, actions undertaken by the officer in the execution of the officer's duty, or because the officer is a police or law enforcement officer. It is an offence to obtain personal information about a person with whom a police or law enforcement officer has a domestic relationship, with the intention of using or permitting the use of the information to cause the officer to fear physical or mental harm, as a consequence of, or in retaliation for, actions undertaken by the officer in the execution of the officer's duty, or because the officer is a police or law enforcement officer. It is an offence to stalk, harass or intimidate a school student or member of staff of a school while the student or member of staff is attending a school.

In the Northern Territory and South Australia, there are separate offences of stalking with intent to influence a person involved in a criminal investigation or judicial proceedings and stalking with intent to influence a public official in the performance of their official duties.

Both Tasmania and Victoria make provision for the extra-territorial operation of the offence to acts committed outside the jurisdiction.[93]

'Loiter' has no fixed technical meaning but can include 'linger idly' about a place or hang about in an idle manner; a complainant 'frequents' a place if he or she visits constantly, habitually or regularly.[94]

An intention to cause serious apprehension or fear is not restricted to apprehension or fear for personal safety and could include fear for reputation or public embarrassment.[95]2980

In Longfield v Glover ,[1] it was observed, 'Whilst he in his own mind might simply say he's doing it purely for his children, the number of calls made in a short span of time, in a background where he knows that already there are protection orders in place that may or may not be breached, can only lead to one conclusion, that whatever he might pretend his intention is, it is to cause harassment at least and, in my view, there are certain statements there that could also be interpreted as possibly causing an apprehension or fear.'

Stalking by surveillance may be made out by keeping watch over a location with the intent of observing or recording a specific victim's movements. But there was no focus upon the requirement that the appellant have the intent during the period alleged to keep the complainant under surveillance. A continuity of purpose in relation to the complainant was essential. It was for this reason that the director acknowledged that the evidence of photos of other boys taken at the same location during the same period did not assist the prosecution's task of establishing that the appellant had a specific intent to stalk the complainant. It would not have been enough to prove an intention to photograph young boys at random as they happened to pass by his camp site and that coincidentally the same boy was photographed on more than one occasion.[2]

3. Scope

This section is new, and deals with the offence of stalking.

4. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable in case of first conviction and non-bailable in case of second and subsequent conviction(s), non-compoundable and triable by any Magistrate.

5. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I,.....(name and office of the Judicial Magistrate 1st Class etc.) charge you.....(name etc. of the accused) as under :
> That you on or about the day of ..... at District ..... followed (or attempted to contact) A (give name of the victim woman) to foster personal interaction repeatedly despite a clear indication of disinterest of A thereby committed an offence punishable under Section 354D , IPC and within the cognizance of this Court.

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF CRIMINAL FORCE AND ASSAULT

S. 355.

Assault or criminal force with intent to dishonour person, otherwise than on grave provocation.--

Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person, intending thereby to dishonour that person, otherwise than on grave and sudden provocation given by that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.2981

STATE AMENDMENT

Andhra Pradesh--In Andhra Pradesh, the offence under section 355 is non-cognizable, bailable and triable by any Magistrate vide Section 2 of the Andhra Pradesh Act 3 of 1992.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with another aggravated form of assault or use of criminal force, the aggravating element being the intention to dishonour a person. In every case of assault or use of criminal force, the victim may feel dishonoured, but that does not bring the assault or use of criminal force within this section. To come within this section, the assault or use of criminal force must have been committed with specific intent to dishonour the victim. It is not necessary that the victim should be at the accused's place.[3]

This section makes an exception in the case of an assault or use of criminal force committed on grave and sudden provocation. In order to bring a case under this section, it is necessary, therefore, for the prosecution to establish that the accused did not receive grave and sudden provocation from the person assaulted.[4]

2. 'To any Person'

The word 'person' includes both male and female, and therefore, this section is not confined to an assault, or use of criminal force, to a woman as is the case in the previous section.

3. 'Intending Thereby to Dishonour'

The intention to dishonour the person assaulted, or to whom the criminal force is used, is an essential ingredient of an offence under this section. There can be no conviction under this section in the absence of proof of such intention. Such intention cannot be imputed to the accused, or inferred, if it is proved that he assaulted, or used criminal force to the person concerned on grave and sudden provocation from the victim.[5]

An act likely to outrage the modesty of a woman is likely to dishonour her, but an act likely to dishonour her need not necessarily outrage her modesty. If, therefore, a man catches hold of a woman's hand, in circumstances in which it cannot be said that he intended to outrage her modesty, he cannot be held guilty under s 354 though he may be held guilty under this section if he did the act, without grave and sudden provocation, with intent to dishonour the woman.[6]2982

Pulling a person's nose, or kicking or assaulting him with a shoe,[7] is likely to dishonour him. Where the accused, while under trial before a magistrate, struck a sub-inspector of police giving evidence in the case, with intent to dishonour the sub-inspector, it was held that the accused was guilty of the offence under this section.[8]

4. 'Grave and Sudden Provocation'

See Exception 1 to s 300, ante.

5. Procedure

An offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[9]

6. Proof

Prove that:

(1) the accused assaulted, or used criminal force upon a person;
(2) he did so intending thereby to dishonour the said person; and
(3) he did so otherwise than on grave and sudden provocation given by the said person.

In order to prove that the assault by the accused was made with intent to dishonour, absence of grave and sudden provocation has to be proved by the prosecution.[10] Where there was consistent and convincing testimony of three eyewitnesses to the effect that a government servant, doing official work, was assaulted with a chappal and the medical evidence had corroborated the assault, it was held, in M Maaiah v State of Karnataka ,[11] that the offences under ss 332 and 355, IPC, were fully proved. Where the finding is that no force was used, there can be no conviction under this section.[12]

7. Alteration of Conviction from Section 353 to Section 355

Commentary under the same heading in s 353, ante, may be referred to.

8. Sentence

Where police personnel ill-treated and dishonoured advocates, the trial court imposed a sentence of fine under ss 341 and 355, IPC, holding that the sentence should be compatible with the gravity of the offence. The sentence of imprisonment was awarded to the head constable in addition to fine and a sentence of fine to his juniors was confirmed if police personnel entrusted with security and liberty of people act against their interest they are liable to harsh punishment.[13]2983

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF CRIMINAL FORCE AND ASSAULT

S. 356.

Assault or criminal force in attempt to commit theft of property carried by a person.--

Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person, in attempting to commit theft of any property which that person is then wearing or carrying, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with another aggravated form of assault or use of criminal force. The actus reus consists of assault or use of criminal force, and it being committed during attempt to commit theft is the aggravating element. The theft, contemplated by this section, is of property, which the person is then wearing or carrying, and not of 'movable property out of the possession of any person' as in s 378, IPC . This section applies only to cases where the assault or use of criminal force is committed in attempting to commit theft, and not to cases in which actual theft has been committed.[14]

2. 'In Attempting to Commit'

Commentary under s 307, ante and s 511, IPC, vol. 4, may be referred to.

3. 'Theft'

Commentary under s 378, IPC, vol. 4, may be referred to.

4. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

5. Quashing of FIR

The accused persons were involved in a case under ss 323 / 427 / 452 / 356 / 506 / 34, IPC . During the pendency of the case, parties arrived at an amicable settlement. The High Court, exercising its powers under s 482, CrPC, quashed the FIR in question and consequential proceedings including the charge-sheet framed against the accused.[15]

6. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[16]2984

7. Proof

Prove that:

(1) the accused assaulted, or used criminal force upon, some person;
(2) that person was then wearing, or carrying, certain property; and
(3) the said assault, or use of criminal force, was committed in attempting to commit theft of that property.

Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person, in attempting wrongfully to confine that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section provides punishment for assault, or use of criminal force, in attempting to wrongfully confine the victim. Punishment for wrongful confinement is provided for in s 342, IPC . It appears that this section is intended to apply to cases where an assault is made, or criminal force is used, to a person in order to disarm opposition, offered by the victim, against getting into wrongful confinement, and not to cases where the assault is made, or criminal force is used, to prevent escape of a person from wrongful confinement after such confinement has been effected.

2. 'In attempting'

Commentary under s 307, ante and s 511, IPC, vol 4, may be referred to.

3. 'Wrongfully to Confine'

Commentary under s 340, ante, may be referred to.

4. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, compoundable with the permission of the court before which the prosecution is pending, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.

5. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[17]

Where the complaint and material on record showed that the SHO was actively involved in the alleged detention of the complainant in the police station, in the beatings given to her and in outraging her modesty, the SHO being in-charge of the2985 police station and expected to know what was happening within its four walls and the fact that he was in the know, was prima facie borne out from the threats extended by him while letting the complainant go on these facts, the order of the sessions court holding that there was no sufficient ground for proceeding against the SHO and thereby discharging him under ss 343, 354, 357, 376, 506, 120-B read with s 34, IPC, was set aside and the case was remanded to the sessions court for proceeding further.[18]

6. Proof

The prosecution is required to prove that:

(1) the accused assaulted, or used criminal force to, another person; and
(2) he did so in attempting to wrongfully confine that person.

Explanation.--The last section is subject to the same explanation as section 352 .]

Comments

1. Scope

Section 352, IPC provides punishment for assault or use of criminal force, otherwise than upon grave and sudden provocation. This section provides punishment for the contrary case of an assault or use of criminal force upon grave and sudden provocation. Such provocation acts in mitigation of punishment for an assault, or use of criminal force, under this section.[19]

2. 'Grave and Sudden Provocation'

See exception 1 to s 300 and the relevant commentary on it in s 300, ante.

3. Explanation

The expression 'The last section', in the explanation, is incorrect. It should be 'This section' and it is subject to the same Explanation as is found in s 352, IPC .

4. Procedure

An offence under this section is non-cognizable, bailable, compoundable, and triable by a magistrate, and may also be tried summarily.2986

5. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case.[20]

OF KIDNAPPING, ABDUCTION, SLAVERY AND FORCED LABOUR

S. 359.

Kidnapping.--

Kidnapping is of two kinds: kidnapping from [21][India] and kidnapping from lawful guardianship.

Comments

1. Scope

The word 'kidnapping', which seems to be derived from the words 'kid', which means a child, and 'nap' or

'nab', which means 'to steal', originally meant 'child-stealing'. However now, it simply means the carrying away of a person against his will or, if he/ she is a minor, against the will of his/her lawful guardian.

This section simply declares that kidnapping is of two kinds, namely: (a) kidnapping from India; and (b) kidnapping from lawful guardianship, both of which terms are defined in the next ss 360 and 361, IPC respectively and both of which are made punishable alike by s 363, IPC .

The classification of kidnapping in this section is not exhaustive as there may be cases in which the two kinds overlap each other. For instance, a minor may be kidnapped from India as well as from his/her lawful guardianship.

21 The words 'British India' have successively been substituted by the AO 1948, the AO 1950 and Act 3 of 1951, s 3 and Schedule, to be read as above.

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF KIDNAPPING, ABDUCTION, SLAVERY AND FORCED LABOUR

S. 360.

Kidnapping from India.--

whoever conveys any person beyond the limits of [22][India] without the consent of that person, or of some person legally authorised to consent on behalf of that person, is said to kidnap that person from [23][India].

Comments

1. Scope

Out of the two kinds of kidnapping specified in s 359, IPC, this section defines the first kind of kidnapping, namely, kidnapping from India, which is made punishable as an offence by itself under s 363, IPC .2987

2. Kidnapping Distinguished from Wrongful Confinement

Kidnapping and abduction do not include the offence of wrongful confinement or keeping, in confinement, a kidnapped person.[24]

3. Essential Ingredients

The following are the essential ingredients of an offence under this section:

(1) conveyance of a person;
(2) beyond the limits of India; and
(3) without the consent of that person or of some person legally authorised to consent on behalf of that person.

4. 'Conveys'

'To convey' means to 'carry from one place to another'. The conveyance or carrying is a continuous process until the destination is reached. In the case of an offence under this section, the destination may be some place in a foreign territory, but it is not necessary that it should be reached. The offence is complete as soon as the limits of India are crossed; but until then, the offence cannot be said to have been committed and a person, abetting the kidnapping, can be convicted only under s 363, read with s 116, and not under s 363 read with s 109, IPC .[25]

5. 'Any Person'

The use of the word 'any' before 'person' indicates that the person kidnapped may be a male of female, major or minor, sane or insane, and a citizen of India or a foreign subject.

6. 'Beyond the limits of India'

These words, in the section, indicate that for an offence under it, the kidnapping or conveyance must be from some place, within the limits of India, to some place outside those limits. The offence is not completed until the person is conveyed to some place outside India, and until such time, the offence is going on, but is capable of being abetted.[26]

As to the limits of India, refer to see s 1 of the IPC .

7. 'Without the Consent'

Having regard to the provisions of s 90, IPC, a girl, who is more than 12 years old, is competent to give a valid consent. A person, kidnapping her from India with her consent, cannot be held guilty of the offence defined in this section.[27]

A consent, given under a misapprehension of fact, is not a true consent (s 90, IPC), e.g., to induce women to go to Ceylon by promising to find husbands for them there, and, on their arrival, to employ them as coolies is an offence under this section.[28]2988

22 The words 'British India' have successively been substituted by the AO 1948, the AO 1950 and Act 3 of 1951, s 3 and Schedule, to be read as above.

OF KIDNAPPING, ABDUCTION, SLAVERY AND FORCED LABOUR

S. 361.

Kidnapping from lawful guardianship.--

Whoever takes or entices any minor under [29][sixteen] years of age if a male, or under [30][eighteen] years of age if a female, or any person of unsound mind, out of the keeping of the lawful guardian of such minor or person of unsound mind, without the consent of such guardian, is said to kidnap such minor or person from lawful guardianship.

Explanation.--The words "lawful guardian" in this section include any person lawfully entrusted with the care or custody of such minor or other person.

Exception.--This section does not extend to the act of any person who in good faith believes himself to be the father of an illegitimate child, or who in good faith believes himself to be entitled to the lawful custody of such child, unless such act is committed for an immoral or unlawful purpose.

STATE AMENDMENT

Manipur--In s 361, for the word "eighteen", substitute the word "fifteen".[31]

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section defines the second kind of kidnapping, namely, kidnapping from lawful guardianship. This is kidnapping in the literal sense of the term, i.e., child-stealing. Obviously, the section applies only to the kidnapping of a minor, or of a person of unsound mind, whether male or female. The law does not permit even a girl of easy virtues to be taken away from lawful guardianship without the consent of parents, the object of the section being to provide security and protection to the wards themselves.[32] Persuasion by the accused, which creates willingness on the part of the minor to be taken out of the keeping of the lawful guardian, would be sufficient to attract this section.[33]2989

The offence of kidnapping under s 363, IPC consists solely of taking or enticing a minor from the keeping of her/his lawful guardian and no intention on the part of the accused is required to be established. All that is needed is that a minor under 16 years of age in the case of a male, or under 18 years of age in the case of a female, is taken or enticed from the keeping of the lawful guardian.[34] The moment a child is taken out of the keeping of his/her lawful guardian, the offence of kidnapping is complete, the criminal intention being not a necessary ingredients for making out this offence.[35]

Since the offence under this section consists in taking or enticing a minor, or a person of unsound mind, out of the keeping of a lawful guardian, it has no application to the taking, or enticing, or a minor, or a person of unsound mind, who has no guardian, whether legal, lawful or de facto, such as a street child who may permit himself to be taken away by anyone who may choose to do so. But the person, taking away such a child, may himself become the 'lawful guardian' of the child and any other person taking or enticing the child out of his keeping, may be guilty of kidnapping.[36] The same rule applies to a lunatic without a lawful keeper.

2. English Law

It is an offence in common law, punishable by fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court, to kidnap any person. Kidnapping consists of the taking or carrying away of one person by another by force or fraud without the consent of the person so taken or carried away and without lawful excuse. In addition to being taken or carried away, the victim must have been deprived of liberty.[37]

The common law offence of kidnapping exists in the case of a victim under the age of 14; and it may be committed by a parent who takes away by force or fraud his own unmarried child under the age of 18, without the child's consent and without lawful excuse, or by a husband on his wife if he treats her with hostile force and carries her away from the place where she wishes to remain.[38]

Kidnapping is not committed where a defendant, by a fraudulent misrepresentation, induces another person to go unaccompanied by the defendant from one place to another; in such circumstances there is nothing capable of constituting a taking or carrying away or a deprivation of liberty.[39]

In R v Cort , [40] it was observed, 'Without considering the issue of deprivation of liberty, the Court of Appeal upheld a conviction for kidnapping where a man had induced a woman to accept a lift by fraud on the ground that the woman's consent to the taking or carrying away had been induced by fraud.'

3. Law of Canada

It is an indictable offence to kidnap a person with intent to cause the person to be confined or imprisoned against the person's will, to cause the person to be unlawfully2990 sent or transported out of Canada against the person's will, or to hold the person for ransom or to service against the person's will. It is an offence to confine, imprison or forcibly seize another person, without lawful authority. A kidnapping necessarily entails an unlawful confinement, but the converse is not always true.[41]

Kidnapping consists of taking control of another person, and transporting that person away from one point to another. 'Taking' the person by fraud or trickery is kidnapping notwithstanding the absence of a forcible conveyance. The absence of a demand for ransom or any other demand is irrelevant. The American power of bail bondsman to seize an escapee does not legalize such a seizure in Canada and is not a defence to a kidnapping.

One's participation in the movement is not a necessary element to convict him as a party to kidnapping. Knowledge that the victim has been taken is sufficient.[42]

4. Object

The object of this section seems to be as much to protect the minor children from being seduced for improper purposes as to protect the rights and privileges of guardians having the lawful charge or custody of their minor wards.[43]

5. Essential Ingredients

To constitute an offence of kidnapping of a minor under this section:

(a) there must be taking or enticing of a minor;
(b) the minor must be under 16 years of age, if a male, or under 18 years of age, if a female;
(c) the taking or enticing must be out of the keeping of the lawful guardian of the minor; and
(d) the taking or enticing must be without the consent of such guardian.[44]

The consent of the minor, who is taken or enticed, is wholly immaterial; it does not affect the commission of the offence though it is a matter for consideration under the question of sentence.[45] The motive of the kidnapper is also immaterial unless it falls within the exception to the section. Motive is, however, an important consideration with reference to the question of punishment.[46]2991

6. 'Takes'

Taking or enticing away a minor, or a person of unsound mind, out of the keeping of a lawful guardian is an essential ingredient of the offence of kidnapping.[47] Without a taking or enticing, there can be no kidnapping.[48] The section requires either taking or 'enticing', and not both.[49]

'Taking' may not be by Force

'Taking' need not be by force, whether actual or constructive,[50] as it implies neither force,[51] nor misrepresentation,[52] nor fraud.[53] The word 'take' merely means 'to cause to go', 'to escort' or 'to get into possession'. No doubt, it does mean physical taking, but not necessarily by use of force or fraud.[54] Persuasion by the accused person, which creates willingness on the part of the minor so he taken out of the keeping of the lawful guardian, would be sufficient to attract the section.[55] The word 'take' implies want of wish and absence of desire of the person taken.[56] When a girl under 18 years of age was taken away by the accused who threatened to her to kill her, and even though subsequent conduct of the victim showed was that she was a consenting party for cohabitation, however, it cannot be inferred that she was not 'taken away' by the accused from lawful guardianship.[57]

'Taking' Need Not be by a Single Act

Taking need not be constituted by a single act. A whole series of acts may together constitute the-process of taking.[58] Similarly, the question whether the 'taking' of a minor out of the custody of her lawful guardian was complete at a given moment, is a question for determination with reference to the circumstances proved in each particular case. Generally speaking, the keeping of the guardian is at an end when the person of the minor is transferred from the custody of the guardian, or some person on his behalf, into the custody of some person, not entitled to the custody of the2992 minor.[59] Thus, the act of taking is complete when the accused takes the minor with him or accompanies him in the ordinary sense of the term, irrespective of his/her mental attitude.[60] In determining whether a person has taken the minor out of the lawful keeping of its guardian, the distance is immaterial. Even if a person takes a minor girl without the consent of her guardian to a distance of 20 or 30 yards, it would amount to taking her out of the keeping of her lawful guardian.[61]

7. Minor Leaving Guardian

A minor may not be competent to give her consent to her taking, but is certainly competent to leave the protection of her guardian on her own accord. Similarly, if a minor girl, without any inducement on the part of the accused, has left her home to come to him, he is not bound to return her to her father's custody. To hold him guilty of the offence of kidnapping, it must be shown that he took some active step by persuasion or otherwise to cause the girl to leave her home. In the absence of any evidence as to inducement or actual taking, the mere finding of the victim girl and the accused, living together under the same roof, would not substantiate the prosecution case of kidnapping.[62] In order to prove the offence of kidnapping from lawful guardianship under s 361, IPC, it is required of the prosecution to prove that the accused had taken the minor out of the keeping of her lawful guardian. The only happenstance that the minor girl was seen in the company of the accused, is not sufficient unless some evidence is forthcoming as to the taking of the minor, by the accused, out the keeping of her lawful guardianship.[63]What is necessary is to make out that the active part in going away together was the act of the accused, and not of the girl. Factors, to be taken into consideration, are the conduct of the parties particularly of the accused at the time and before their going away together, the maturity of the girl and her intellectual capacity to think for herself and to make up her own mind and the circumstances, under which, and the object, for which, she felt it necessary to leave her guardian's protection.[64]

Where the minor, alleged to have been taken by the accused, leaves her father's protection, knowing and having capacity to know the full import of what she is doing and voluntarily joins the accused, the accused cannot be said to have taken her away from the keeping of her lawful guardian. Something more has to be shown in such a case and that is some kind of inducement held out by the accused or an active participation by him in the formation of the intention of the minor to leave the house2993 of the guardian.[65] When the evidence on record showed that the victim aged 16 years on her own consent had travelled with the accused knowing fully well that she was going to meet her boyfriend, it cannot be said that it amounts to taking her out of keeping of her lawful guardian. Kidnapping can be said to have taken place only when she was detained against her will by her boyfriend for purpose of pressurising her to agree to his proposal for marriage, etc.[66] It would be sufficient if the prosecution establishes that though, immediately prior to the minor leaving the father's protection, no active part was played by the accused, yet he had, at some earlier stage, solicited or persuaded the minor to do so. If evidence to establish one of these things is lacking, it would not be legitimate to infer that the accused is guilty of taking the minor out of the keeping of the lawful guardian merely because, after she had actually left her guardian's house, she joined the accused and he helped her in her design not to return to her guardian by taking her along with him from place to place. Of course, the part played by the accused can be regarded as facilitating the fulfilment of the intention of the girl, that, however, falls short of an inducement to the minor to slip out of the keeping of her lawful guardian and does not, therefore, tantamount to 'taking'.[67] Where the evidence shows that there was, between the girl and the accused, an arrangement from before that she would leave her father's house to meet the accused in park from where she would be taken away, and under this arrangement she left the protection of her father, even if with the intention of not returning again, that will be sufficient to hold the accused guilty of kidnapping.[68] In such a case, the mere circumstance, that the act of the accused was not the immediate cause of the girl's leaving her father's protection, would not absolve him if he had, at an earlier stage, solicited her or induced her, in any manner, to take the final step.[69] Where the minor was a poorly educated girl, belonging to a backward class, and it could not be said that she knew, or had the capacity to know, the full import of what she was doing when she left her family with the accused on the carrier of his bicycle, it was held that it was a clear case of the minor being taken out of the custody of her lawful guardian so as to invoke s 363 for the offence of kidnapping.[70] However where a person of less than 16 years voluntarily left his father's house to go with the accused, it was held that the accused had committed no offence of kidnapping punishable under s 363, IPC .[71] Similarly, if the suggestion to leave home comes from the minor girl and the accused merely acquiesces, he commits no offence.[72] If a minor girl runs away from her home in consequence of ill-treatment and goes, of her2994 own accord, to B,[73] or if a minor girl, having been driven out of her father's house, is found, some days after, in the company of B,[74]B does not commit the offence of kidnapping. Similarly, mere passive consent on the part of a person is giving shelter to the minor does not amount to taking or enticing of the minor.[75] Of course, the active bringing about of the stay of the minor in the house of person by playing upon the weak and hesitating mind of the minor would amount to taking within the meaning of this section.[76]

8. 'Or Entices'

'Enticing'[77] is one mode of taking a minor. It is inducing the minor to go, of her/his own accord, to the kidnapper. The word 'entice' involves an idea of inducement or allurement by exciting hope or desire in the other.[78] The inducement of allurement may take many forms difficult to visualise and describe exhaustively; some of them may be quite subtle, depending, for their success, on the mental state of the person at the time when the inducement is intended to operate. This may work immediately or it may create continuous and gradual, but imperceptible, impression, culminating, after some time, in achievement of its ultimate purpose of successful inducement.[79] It may be in such a way that though the person kidnapped may have left the keeping of the lawful guardian willingly, yet the state of mind, that brought about that willingness must have been induced or brought about, in some way, by the accused.[80] Similarly, anything, which is likely to allure the minor girl, will do. It need not always be sweetmeats or money; it can also be an offer of sexual intercourse. The fact that the minor girl had gone to the accused's house for sexual intercourse a year before the offence is no defence to a charge under s 363 . The minor's infatuation with her enticer will be no answer to a charge of kidnapping.[81] Enticing need not be deceitful.[82] A promise of marriage made to the prosecutrix which amounts to enticement of a minor because of which she had left the house of her lawful guardian.[83]It is also not necessary that it should be by a single act, it may consist of a continuous process. It is no one particular fact, isolated from others; it is that totality of the relevant facts, to which regard must be had in deciding whether a girl was enticed out of the keeping of her guardian within the meaning of this section.[84] It must be shown that the accused took some active steps by persuasion or otherwise to induce the minor to leave home; if the suggestion comes from her and the accused merely acquiesces, he is entitled to be acquitted.[85] Where the girl went of her own accord to the accused, persuaded him to execute a marriage agreement, got the same registered, returned to her father's house and told him about the agreement,2995 whereupon her father locked her in a room, which she broke open after three days and went to stay with the accused, it was held that no offence under this section was made out[86] as there was neither 'taking away' nor 'enticing'. Where there was no evidence to show that the accused had taken away the minor girl from her father's field (possession) and there was evidence on record to shown that she wanted to marry him and probably had the illegal intimacy with him, it was held that the accused had committed no offence of kidnapping.[87] Similarly, where the girl, after the examinations were over, as agreed with her classmate, went, from the school, straight to the station, from where they went together to his relation's place and stayed there, like sister and brother, for 10 days, it was held that the accused committed no offence under s 363, IPC .[88]

9. Taking and Enticing--Distinction

There is an essential distinction between taking and enticing. The mental attitude of the minor is immaterial in the case of taking. The word 'take' means 'to cause to go', 'to escort' or 'to get into possession'. When an accused takes a minor with him, whether he or she is willing or not, the act of taking is complete and the condition is satisfied. However the word 'entice', as stated in the preceding paragraph, involves an idea of inducement or allurement by exciting hope or desire in the other. One does not entice another unless the latter attempts to do a thing which she or he would not otherwise do.[89] The Supreme Court, in Varadarajan v State of Madras ,[90] envisaged circumstances in which the two words 'take' and 'entice', though not synonymous, may be regarded as meaning the same thing for the purpose of s 361 . In Thakorlal D Vadama v State of Gujarat,[91] the Supreme Court observed that the two words 'takes' and 'entices', as used in s 361, IPC, are intended to be read together so that each takes, to some extent, its colour and content front the other. The statutory language suggests that if the minor leaves her parental home completely uninfluenced by any promise, offer or inducement, emanating from the accused, then the latter cannot be considered to have committed the offence, as defined in s 361, IPC . However if the accused has laid a foundation by inducement, allurement or threat, etc., and if this can be considered to have influenced the minor or weighed with her in leaving her guardian's custody or keeping and going to the accused, then *prima facie*it would be difficult for him to plead innocence on the ground that the minor had voluntarily come to him. If he has, at an earlier stage, solicited or induced her, in any manner, to leave her father's protection by conveying or indicating an encouraging suggestion that he would give her shelter, then the mere circumstance, that his act was not the immediate cause of her leaving her parental home or guardian's custody, would not absolve him. The question would truly fall for determination on the facts and circumstances of each case.2996

'Any Minor'

Any female, whether married or unmarried, if under the age of 18 years, is included in the expression 'any minor' in this section.[1] No doubt, occurrence of puberty determines the minority of a female under the Mohammedan law. But, for the present purpose, regard must be had only to female's age specified in this section. This section itself makes it clear that it applies to any minor, whether male or female. If he is a male, his age must be under 16 years at the time of kidnapping.

10. Age of Minor

Birth entry in the Municipal record is best evidence.

Section 361 does not leave any doubt that a girl until completing her 18th year shall be regarded as a minor so far as the offence of kidnapping is concerned.[2]

In a minor's kidnapping case, the important question for consideration is the age of the victim.[3] It can be proved any legal evidence.[4] Evidence of Municipal Register of Births, properly authenticated, is the best evidence regarding the age of a victim. Even medical evidence cannot stand against it. However the birth entry does not prove itself and does not furnish any proof of age of any particular person unless that person is connected with the birth entry.[5] An unproved and unexhibited school certificate, giving the date of birth of the prosecutrix, cannot be treated as evidence in a case.[6]

Medical Evidence as to Age

Medical evidence as to age is no doubt valuable, but, it, by itself, is not sufficient to fix the age.[7]

The age of the victim given in the ossification test by the doctor cannot outweigh the oral/documentary evidence of the age of the victim.[8]

However the ossification test, though not a sure test, is generally accepted as the best available test for the determination of age of human beings.[9] It has, therefore, better credence over a physician's opinion.[10] In ossification test, x-ray examination of the bones is absolutely necessary. If the doctor has formed an opinion on other characteristics like height, weight, teeth, etc., her opinion is, in no way, better than the opinion of a layman and is not entitled to the weight which the court should attach to the opinion of an expert under s 45 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872. A2997 certificate, given by a doctor about the age on an examination of the teeth, appearance and voice, etc., is not the certificate of an expert, but only an assertion of his opinion which is worthless.[11]

The variation of the age in the ossification test can be up to three years in either way.[12]

The statement of a doctor as the age of a girl, based entirely on certain physical peculiarities such as her height, weight, teeth, etc., is no legal proof of the age, but only an opinion if it does not appear that the doctor has brought any scientific knowledge to bear the opinion.[13] In Somgir v State of Gujarat ,[14] it was observed that the medical opinion as to age on the basis of medical science is admissible, but, in the absence of any explanatory statement from the doctor as to what factors individually or cumulatively were significant, the opinion cannot carry much weight. For further commentary, see under the same heading in s 366, ante.

Birth Certificate Issued by Sarpanch Gram Panchayat

The birth certificate issued by sarpanch of a common gram panchayat, wherein age of the prosecutrix is shown below 16 years, being public document is admissible in evidence.[15]

Birth Certificate Issued by School

Certificate regarding date of birth of prosecutrix issued by head master of the school as per *dakhal kharij*register of the school can be proved by the prosecution[16] but in case of variance in date of birth of the prosecutrix in birth entry in government register and that in school regard, the birth entry must prevail as that is the conclusive evidence.[17] In case of difference in age given in school certificate and medical opinion, the school certificate would prevail since medical opinion is based on estimate, and possibility of errors is not ruled out.[18] However, the school admission register cannot be regarded as the sole clinching factor for determination of the age.[19]The entries of the date of birth in the school record is relevant under s 35 of the Evidence Act put when the basis on which sent enters were made in not proved the said enters do not carry much weight.[20]

If the evidence of the doctor and that of the father of the girl,[21] or that of the school register, without any evidence from the birth register,[22] make two inferences possible2998 as to her age, the benefit of doubt should go to the accused. Once it is held that the girl might have been above 18 years, it is not possible to convict the accused.[23] If the evidence of the doctor is not conclusive,[24] or when, according to the prosecution evidence itself, the age of the prosecutrix is proved to be 17 to 19,[25] the benefit must go to the accused. The onus of proving the age of the girl is on the prosecution.[26]

11. Ignorance of age is no Defence

In cases, where the age of the girl is one of the elements in an offence, the accused cannot take shelter behind the defence that he did not know that the girl was under the statutory age and that from her appearance he concluded that her age was more than that prescribed by the law. A person, who commits an offence in respect of a female, when the law has laid down that the offence would be complete only if he female is below a certain age, does so at his peril and if it turns out that the age of the girl is below that prescribed by the law, he must suffer the consequences and he would not be permitted to plead in defence that he bona fide believed, or had reasonable ground for his belief, that the girl was over the prescribed age.[27]Section 361, IPC, is framed in such terms as to make it immaterial that the offender took the age of the victim.[28] If, subsequently, it turns out that she was below 18 years of age, the accused, even if he honestly believed her to be above 18 years, cannot protect himself as he must be deemed to have acted at his peril.[29]

12. 'Person of Unsound Mind'

An unconscious person cannot be said to be of unsound mind. For example, a person under an anaesthetic for an operation can hardly be said to be of unsound mind.[30] For further commentary, see s 84, IPC, vol 1.

13. 'Out of the keeping of the Lawful Guardian'

The most important question is when a minor can be said to have been taken out of the keeping of the lawful guardian in given facts and circumstances of a case.[31] The word 'keeping', in the expression 'out of the keeping of the lawful guardian', used in this section, connotes the idea that it is compatible with independence of action and movement in the minor kept. It implies neither prevention not detention, but rather maintenance, protection nor control, manifested not by continual action, but as available on necessity arising.[32] And this relation between the minor and the guardian is certainly not dissolved so long as the minor, at will, takes advantage of it and place herself within the sphere of its operation.[33] The word 'keeping' cannot be interpreted in a narrow sense. It is no the physical presence in the precincts of the father's house2999 that matters to determine the 'keeping of the lawful guardian'.[34] It is not necessary that the girl should be in the physical possession of the guardian. It is enough if it is under a continuous control which is, for the first time, terminated by the act complained of. If a girl goes out into the street or into a field by herself, or goes on a visit either with or without the knowledge of the guardian, she is still said to be in the legal keeping of her parents.[35] The mere fact, that a girl, at the time of the taking or enticement, was playing in a public place,[36] or was on a visit to a friend[37] or a relative,[38] does not render her free from her guardian's keeping. The protection and control of the guardian is not put an end to by the fact that the minor has temporarily left the guardian's house.[39] Where a girl under 18 years of age went out to a market in search of work and a woman, promising to obtain work for her, took the girl to her own house and then handed her over to the accused, it was held that the relation of minor and guardian was not dissolved at the time when the woman met the girl in the market and the girl must still be deemed to be in the keeping of her guardian.[40] Similarly, a married girl under 18 years of age who leaves her husband's house of her own accord and proceeds to the house of her maternal uncle, does not cease to be in the keeping of her lawful guardian and a person who induces her at that time to go with him, is guilty of kidnapping.[41]

Guardian Abandoning the Minor and Vice Versa

The minor does not cease to be in the keeping of the guardian unless the guardian himself abandons the minor or the minor, having attained years of discretion, voluntarily and definitely abandons the protection of the guardian. In Pandyaram Sastrulu v Emperor ,[42] and in Francis Hector v Emperor ,[43] in which the guardian had abandoned the minor and had turned her out, it was held that the minor ceased to be in the keeping of the guardian. There may also be circumstances in which the minor herself may be said to have voluntarily abandoned the keeping of the guardian.[44] All these cases recognise that the minor of her own accord may leave the keeping of the guardian, but such inference is not to be ordinarily drawn unless evidence quite clearly establishes that the minor had formed a definite intention and had abandoned the protection of the guardian, either permanently or for a substantial temporary period, by setting up her own independent life or seeking and obtaining protection in the de facto guardianship of some other person. However, where a minor leaves her husband's house temporarily on account of anger, with no intention to leave it for good, it cannot be said that she is not in the keeping of the husband and a person,3000 taking or enticing her away, would be guilty of kidnapping her.[45] Where a minor leaves the immediate custody of her lawful guardian for a temporary purpose such as a visit to friends, she will be deemed to be still in his keeping for the purposes of s 361 . There must, however, be a point after which it can no longer be held that the girl, while out of the immediate custody of the guardian, can still be deemed to be in his keeping. The court must, therefore, consider all the facts and see whether they are consistent, or not, with the continuance of the father's keeping of the minor. If they are not inconsistent, the minor must be held to be in the father's keeping even though the actual physical possession should be temporarily with a friend or other person.[46] Where a minor boy was entrusted to the care of the accused to teach and feed him at his place with the money supplied by the father, and the accused took the boy to some other city without the knowledge of the father, it was held that the accused was not the lawful guardian and the removal of the boy amounted to taking the boy out of the keeping of the lawful guardian.[47] In Debaprosad Bose v King ,[48] the court observed thus:

> The mere fact, that a minor leaves the protection of her guardian, does not put her out of the guardian's keeping. If, however, it is proved that a minor had abandoned her guardian with no intention of returning back, she cannot, therefore, be deemed to continue in the keeping of the guardian. What will be deemed to be sufficient to constitute an abandonment of a guardian by a minor girl depends on the fact of each particular case. It cannot be that whenever a child, being taken to task by the guardian, leaves the guardian's house with the mental reservation that he or she will not be returning back to be under that guardian, it must, in the eye of law, be taken to put an end to the protection of the guardian at the sweet will of the minor. If it is shown that such conduct is due to a mere petulant outburst in consequence either of a quarrel with her relations or because of the guardian reprimanding her for her conduct, that will be a relevant question to be considered for deciding whether her conduct was sufficient to put an end to the ties of guardianship.

Want of Knowledge of Guardianship--No Defence

The circumstance that he accused omitted to inquire whether the minor has a guardian or not, is no defence to a charge of the offence of kidnapping. By not inquiring, the accused takes upon himself, the risk of being held guilty and he cannot escape its legal consequences.[49] A person taking away a minor girl, must be taken to have known that she had a lawful guardian and that he was taking her away from her lawful guardianship. It is not necessary that he should know definitely who that lawful guardian was, when he found and used her for his own purposes.[50]

14. 'Lawful Guardian'

The 'guardian' is described, in this section, as a 'lawful' guardian, and not as a 'legal' guardian, and the significance of the adjective is emphasised by the explanation which shows that it includes any person who is lawfully entrusted with3001 the care or custody of the ward-concerned.[51] In Empress v Pemantle ,[52] it was observed that the word 'lawful guardian', in s 361, are intended to obviate the difficulty which would otherwise arise if the prosecution were required to prove strictly that the person, from whose care or custody a minor had been abducted or kidnapped, came strictly within the meaning of a guardian

according to the legal acceptation of that word, in Kesar v Emperor ,[53] it was observed that it must, in fact, duly, properly and legally be proved that taking or enticing away of a minor was from the custody of the following persons, namely: (a) the natural guardian; or (b) the legal guardian, if the natural guardian be dead; or (c) a person lawfully entrusted with the care and custody of a minor. Class (c) enumerated above, covers all persons other than the legal and natural guardian, who, for the time being, may be lawfully entrusted with the care and custody of a minor, such as a schoolmaster, or a friend, at whose house a minor maybe staying on a long visit, or such like persons standing in a similar degree of relationship. However, this has not been accepted in subsequent cases. As observed in State v Harbansing Kisansing ,[54] 'there may be cases where the minors or lunatics would have no legal guardians as such, and, in their case, if the word 'lawful guardian' are strictly construed so as to include only legal guardians, taking, or enticing them away from the custody of persons, who are looking after them in a legal and legitimate way, would not constitute the offence of kidnapping. The word 'lawful' is deliberately used in its wider denotation and must, in the context, be distinguished from the word 'legal'. Wherever the relationship of a guardian is established by means, which are lawful and legitimate, that relationship is intended to be included within the explanation to s 361 . A strict and narrow construction of word 'lawful guardian', used in s 361, would, thus, expose a large class of minors and lunatics to the danger of kidnapping. Therefore, the words 'lawful guardian', as explained in the light of the explanation, include all person who have obtained the care and custody of their wards in a lawful manner, in other words, the expression 'lawful guardian' includes the legal guardian as well as a person who has become the guardian of the minor or the lunatic in a lawful manner. There should, however, be no doubt that the expression 'lawful guardian' cannot include a person who obtains the care or custody of the minor by illegal or unlawful means.[55] The term 'lawful guardian' does not, therefore, include a person who has himself gained possession of the minor by an offence under this section.[56] However, it includes not only the parents or relations in whose house the minor lives and is brought up, but also any other person with whom the minor resides by the consent, express or implied, of those who have the higher legal right.[57]

15. Explanation

A guardian may be lawful without being a legal guardian.[58] The words 'lawful guardian', as is apparent from the language of this section, are of wider connotation3002 than the words 'legal guardian'. The word 'lawful', in the section, has deliberately been used in its wider connotation[59] and the explanation is intended to extend protection, given, to parents and minors, by the section, by including, in the term 'lawful guardian', any person lawfully entrusted with the care or custody of a minor.[60] The entrustment may be by a legal guardian, it may be written, oral, express or implied. In the absence of a legal guardian, the entrustment may be presumed from the course of conduct of the person, actually taking, upon himself, the duties of the care and custody of a minor,[61] as the guardianship connotes maintenance, protection and control of the minor.[62] The entrustment may be proved by oral evidence as well as by surrounding circumstances and the conduct of the parties concerned,[63] and the prosecution need not prove the guardianship in the strict legal acceptance of the word[64] if an orphan is left without the protection of the legal guardian and a philanthropic person, out of humanitarian or charitable motives, takes up the care and custody of such an orphan and treats him as his child, the person so taking the custody and care of the orphan, would be a lawful guardian of the orphan within the meaning of this section.[65] However, it does not mean that the guardian, so treated as a lawful guardian, would have any higher rights than the natural or legal guardian.[66] A person in temporary charge of a minor cannot be regarded as a lawful guardian as against the guardian at civil law.[67]

16. Civil Law Guardians

Though the explanation to s 361, IPC, may extend the accepted definition of the words 'lawful guardian' under the civil law, yet, as against a person, who, in fact, is the civil law guardian of the minor, mere de facto guardianship cannot be set up so as to convict the real civil law guardian of an offence under s 361 .[68] Where a minor in question happens to be in the custody of a de facto guardian and the legal guardian takes such a minor from the custody of such a de facto guardian, the case would not fall under s 363 . The de facto guardian cannot be said to have higher rights than the natural guardian and, therefore, there would be no question of taking a minor girl away from the custody of a lawful guardian.[69]

A Muslim father, according to the Privy Council, in Imambandi v Haji Mursaddi ,[70] is the natural and legal guardian of a minor. When such a guardian takes his minor3003 child from the custody of its mother, he does not take the child out of the keeping of the lawful guardian. The right of the mother to the custody of her minor child is something different from the right of the lawful guardian.[71]

Guardianship under Hindu Law

The term lawful guardian has been explained in s 361, IPC, to include any person lawfully entrusted with the care or custody of such minor or person of unsound mind. When parties are Hindu by religion and the provision in Hindu Minority and Guardianship Act 1956 (the Act 1956) is applicable to the parties. In s 4(b) of the Act 1956, 'guardian' has been defined as a natural guardian and guardian appointed, in various manner. In that respect s 4(c) read with s 6 defines the term 'natural guardian'. For ready reference the relevant portion from s 6 is quoted below:

> S. 6 . Natural guardians of a Hindu minor.--The natural guardian of a Hindu minor, in respect of the minor's person as well as in respect of the minor's property (excluding his or her undivided interest in joint family property), are--
> (a) in the case of a boy or an unmarried girl--the father, and after him, the mother:
> Provided that the custody of a minor who has not completed the age of five years shall ordinarily be with the mother;

Even according to s 4(2) of the Guardians and Wards Act 1890 (the Act, 1890) 'guardian' means a person having the care of the person of a minor or of his property or of both his person and property. The provision in the Act provides for appointing a person other than the father as the guardian of a minor with respect to his person or property only in appropriate cases. On a conjoint reading of the aforesaid provisions in the said two statutes it appears that the father who is the natural guardian, has right of domain over the minor unless there is order of a competent court debarring him to have custody or guardianship of such minor.[72]

It is thus clearly readable from the position of law as noted and discussed above that unless there is legal prohibition by order of a court of competent jurisdiction, the father cannot be booked for taking away his minor child from the custody of his wife because he is the natural guardian and, therefore, the offence under s 363, IPC, cannot be attracted against him for taking the child from the custody of the mother.[73]

However, if the father acquiesces in the retention by the mother of the custody of the child from the date of its birth for over three years, the mother clearly becomes the 'lawful guardian' within the meaning of the explanation to this section.[74] Similarly, where the mother has the custody of her minor daughter by virtue of an order passed in a suit for divorce, she is the lawful guardian of the minor and if the father takes or entices the minor from the keeping of the mother, he would be guilty of kidnapping the minor.[75] However, even then, since, under the exception to this section, a person, who, in good faith, believes himself to be entitled to the lawful custody of a child, cannot commit an offence under s 361, IPC, it seems to follow a3004 fortiori that a person, who is, in fact, the father of the child and, therefore, in law, entitled to the lawful custody of the child, cannot come within the scope of this section.[76]

In the case of illegitimate children, the mother is the lawful guardian,[77] and not the father.[78] However, the father has the preferential claim to the custody of his illegitimate daughter when he is under an obligation to maintain her and the mother is leading an immoral life.[79]

On the death of the father, or in his absence, and in the absence of a valid appointment by him, the natural or adoptive mother, as the case may be, is entitled to the guardianship of her minor children.[80] In the case of an orphan girl, her paternal uncles would, according to the provisions of the Hindu law, be entitled to the guardianship of the minor. However, if she has been residing with her maternal uncle for over 18 months, without objection on the part of anybody, and is carried away forcibly by the paternal uncle from the custody of the maternal uncle, the paternal uncle is guilty of kidnapping her.[81] However, being the maternal uncle would be no defence to a charge of kidnapping a minor from the custody of a de facto guardian.[82]

A brother of the deceased husband of a minor widow is her guardian in preference to her own father and mother,[83] and if, with his consent, the minor widow is living with her mother in-law, the latter would be her lawful guardian. In such a case, the person, who takes, or entices, away the minor widow from the keeping of her mother-in-law, would be guilty of kidnapping her.[84] Where the husband of a minor girl sold her away to one person with whom she resided with the consent of the husband, it was held that person was her lawful guardian and the accused, who enticed the girl from the keeping of the person, was guilty of kidnapping her.[85]

A person has no absolute right to the custody of a minor on the sole ground that he happens to be the nearest male relation of the minor.[86]3005

Guardianship under Mohammedan Law

Among Mohommedans, the Sunnis and Shias have different laws.

Under the Hanafi or law, the mother is entitled to the custody of her son until he attains the age of seven years,[1] and of her daughter, even against the husband of that daughter,[2] until her puberty.[3] The right continues even if she is divorced by the father of the child,[4] unless she marries a second husband who is not related to the minor within the prohibited degrees, in which case the custody belongs to the father.[5] If, after the mother has so lost her right of being the lawful guardian, a person removes the minor from her custody, he cannot be convicted of kidnapping the minor.[6]

Failing the mother, the custody of a boy under the age of seven years, and of a girl, who has not attained puberty, belongs to the mother's mother how highsoever; failing her to the father's mother, how highsoever; failing her to the sister; failing her to the maternal aunt; and failing her to the paternal aunt.[7] In default of the mother and the female relations, mentioned above, the custody belongs to the father; failing him to the nearest grandfather; failing him to brother; failing him to his son, failing him to paternal uncle; and failing him to his son.[8]

The father is entitled to the custody of his son over seven years of age[9] and of an unmarried daughter who has attained puberty. Failing the father, the custody belongs to the paternal relations in order given above.[10] Thus, a brother would be the lawful guardian of an orphan minor girl though he is not over 18 year of age.[11]

According to the Shias, the mother is entitled to the custody of the male child until he is two year's old,[12] and of her female child until she is seven years old.[13] The father then becomes entitled,[14] but failing him the mother's right returns. Failing both parents, the agnates become entitled.[15]

The custody of illegitimate children, whether under the Sunni law or the Shia law, belongs to the mother and her relations.[16]3006

17. 'Without the Consent of such Guardian'

The consent required is of the lawful guardian,[17] and not of the minor kidnapped,[18] at the time of taking or enticing. It may be express or implied,[19] but it must be given prior to the taking or enticing. A subsequent consent of ratification cannot take the case out of the purview of this section.[20] It is not necessary that the taking or enticing must be shown to have been by means of force or fraud. Persuasion by the accused person which creates willingness on the part of the minor to be taken out of the keeping of the lawful guardian would be sufficient to attract the section.[21] Where a Mohammedan girl of 10 or 11 years of age was married without the consent of her lawful guardian under the Mohammedan law, but with the full approval of the minor's mother, it was held that the accused were guilty under s 366 .[22]

A consent given under a misconception of fact, as where it is obtained by fraud, is not a true consent. Consent must be a voluntary consent.[23] For further commentary, see s 90, IPC, vol 1.

Father Cannot be Guilty of Kidnapping

It is clearly readable from the position of law that unless there is legal prohibition by order of a court of competent jurisdiction, the father cannot be booked for taking away his minor child from the custody of his wife because he is the natural guardian and, therefore, the offence under s 363, IPC, cannot be attracted against him for taking the child from the custody of the mother.[24]

18. Exception

The exception is personal to the father or other person acting in good faith. The belief in the fatherhood,[25] or in the right to custody, must be entertained in good faith. Where a mother of an illegitimate child, believing herself to be entitled to the custody of the child, removed the child from the father's care, it was held that she was protected by this exception.[26]

The exception has no application where the taking or enticing is 'for an immoral or unlawful purpose'. An intention to give a child in marriage in contravention of Act 19 of 1929 is an unlawful purpose.[27] It is upon the prosecution to prove that the3007 kidnapping under consideration was committed for immoral or unlawful purpose.[28] If there is no proof of the purpose for which the accused caused the child to be taken away from the keeping of his mother, and all that is proved is that the father of the child, by deceitful means, got the child from the keeping of his mother to his own, it is no offence under s 361, IPC .[29]

The exception relates only to a person who in good faith believes himself to be the father of an illegitimate child or who in good faith believes himself to be entitled to the lawful custody of the child. It has no application to a person who does happen to be a lawful guardian. Consequently the words 'unless such act is convicted for an immoral or unlawful purpose' do not apply to a lawful guardian. The words 'to the act of any person' and 'unless such act' have to be read in conjunction with each other and not in isolation.[30] For further commentary, see s 52, IPC, vol 1.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF KIDNAPPING, ABDUCTION, SLAVERY AND FORCED LABOUR

S. 362.

Abduction.--

Whoever by force compels, or by any deceitful means induces, any person to go from any place, is said to abduct that person.

Comments

1. Scope

This section merely defines what 'abduction' is. It does not define as offence Abduction becomes an offence only when it is accompanied by one of the three intentions described in ss 364, 365 and 366 of the IPC .[31] Apart from the elements or force or fraud, which may be involved in abduction and which may attract punishment under other sections of the Code, abduction, per se, of an adult person is not punishable under this Code.[32]If kidnapping is accompanied by any of the said intentions, it is more severely punished, in consequence, under the same section. The offences of kidnapping and abduction are kindred or cognate offences. The abduction of minors or persons of unsound mind from lawful guardianship may constitute a species of kidnapping (differing from the usual form of that offence in the nature of the means employed), if they are removed from the keeping of their guardians without the latter's consent, and is punishable under s 363 . There may be cases in which an act falls under both offences, e.g., when force or deceit is employed in removing a female minor from the custody of the guardian with intent to murder her,3008 or to force her to illicit intercourse, etc.[33]However, in the majority of cases, the act, while coming within the purview of one of the offences, will not attract the provisions of the other.[34] There may be abduction without the removal of a person from lawful guardianship.[35] It may also be observed that the words 'kidnapping' and 'abduction' do not include the offence of wrongful confinement of a kidnapped person.[36]

The offence of abduction is a continuing offence and a woman is abducted not only when she is first taken from any place, but also when she is subsequently removed from the place to another.[37]

2. 'Abduction' Distinguished from 'Kidnapping'

The offences of kidnapping and abduction, though cognate, are essentially dissimilar. In the former, the person kidnapped, if not a person of unsound mind, must be minor of the age specified in s 361 while the subject of abduction may be a person of any age. A child, without a guardian, cannot be kidnapped, except when it is taken out of India, which is a separate offence applicable equally to persons of all ages. Abduction, on the other hand, has reference exclusively to the person abducted. Again, consent of the person abducted, if freely and voluntarily given, condones abduction, and while in kidnapping, consent of the kidnapped person is wholly immaterial. Further, the means employed in abduction must have an element of force or deceit in it, whereas, in kidnapping, they may be entirely absent. Another important distinction is that in kidnapping, the intent of the offender is a wholly irrelevant consideration, whereas in abduction, it is an important factor. Kidnapping from lawful guardianship is a substantive offence while 'abduction' is an auxiliary act, not punishable by itself, but made criminal only when it is done with one or other of the intents specified in ss 364, 365, and 366.[38] Kidnapping from lawful guardianship is not a continuing offence because as soon as the minor is removed out of his or her guardianship, the offence is completed whereas a person is being abducted not only when he is first taken away from any place but also when he is removed from one place to another.[39]

3. Essential Ingredients

This section requires the following two essentials:3009

(1) there must be forcible compulsion or inducement by deceitful means; and
(2) the object of such compulsion or inducement must be the going of the abducted person from any place.[40]

Under this section, it is necessary for the prosecution to establish that the victim was, by force, compelled to leave not only her house, but also to go to various places.[41]

4. 'By Force Compels'

There can be no conviction for abduction if no force or deceit has been practiced in the person abducted.[42] Compulsion by force or inducement by deceitful means in an essential element of abduction.[43] In the case of a grown-up woman, it would be an offence to carry her away by force even if it be with the object of restoring her to her husband.[44] However if a minor girl voluntarily leaves the roof of her guardian and, when out of her house comes across another who treats her with kindness, or at least, without employing any force or without practising any fraud on her, he cannot be held guilty for kidnapping or for abduction.[45]

Where in a case the person alleged to have been abducted on being persuaded went inside the house and after being dressing properly accompanied the persons abducting him, no charge of abduction can succeed against him.[46]

The compulsion, contemplated by this section, must be by force. The word 'force' is defined in s 349, IPC of this Code as implying a contact between the person, on whom force is used, and some other person or object in order to compel the former to move, or to ceases to move, from a certain place. The word 'force' in this section means actual force and not merely a show or threat of force,[47] or imaginary apprehension of force.[48] Where the accused lifted a woman to carry her away but dropped her when she raised an alarm, it was held that he was not guilty of abduction as the woman was not compelled to go from the place where she was, but was merely lifted up, and that the action of the accused merely amounted to an attempt to abduct.[49]

It is for the prosecution to prove compulsion by force.[50]

5. 'By Deceitful Means'

The expression 'deceitful means' is wide enough to include the inducing of a girl to leave her guardian's house on some pretext. 'Deceit', according to its plain dictionary meaning, signifies anything intended to mislead another. It is, really speaking, a matter of intention, and even if the promise, held out by the accused, is3010 fulfilled by him, the question is whether he is acting in a bona fide manner when he is extending certain promises to a woman and thereby inducing her to accompany him.[51] If a woman is found to have voluntarily gone from place to place with the accused without his employing any deceitful means for inducing her so to go, then abduction cannot be said to have taken place at all.[52]

6. 'Induces'

To induce means 'to lead into'; it connotes a leading of the abducted person in some direction in which he would not otherwise have gone. There must be a change of mind caused by an external pressure of some kind. Inducement does not involve any force or compulsion.[53] It simply means persuasion, but for abduction it must be by deceitful means. Leading a girl to go by making a false representation would be inducing her to go by deceitful means.[54] When the girl is above 18 years of age and there is no evidence that the accused induced her to go from her house to various places by deceitful means, conviction for abduction cannot be sustained.[55]

The recovery of money from the house of the accused A6 and A7 was proved, but there was no evidence to show that the said amount was paid as ransom to the accused. The two accused A6 and A7 were also not involved in his confessional statement by the co-accused. Acquittal of the accused A6 and A7 for offences under ss 362 and 383, IPC was held proper.[56]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF KIDNAPPING, ABDUCTION, SLAVERY AND FORCED LABOUR

S. 363.

Punishment for kidnapping.--

Whoever kidnaps any person from [57][India] or from lawful guardianship, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section merely prescribes the punishment for kidnapping whether it be from India or from lawful guardianship. The offence of kidnapping from lawful3011 guardianship, penalised by this section, is the offence which is defined in s 361 .[58]

To constitute an offence of kidnapping, as defined in s 361, IPC, all that is required, is that a minor, under 16, in the case of a male, or under 18, in the case of a female, must be taken or enticed from the keeping of the lawful guardian of the minor without such guardian's consent. No intention of the kidnapper needs to be established.[59] Where the victim is below 18 years of age, her consent is immaterial.[60]

2. 'Kidnaps any Person from India'

Commentary under s 360, ante, may be referred to.

3. 'Kidnaps any Person from....Lawful Guardianship'

Commentary under the relevant heading in s 361, ante, may be referred to.

4. Procedure

The offence punishable under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

A de facto guardian, who has the keeping of a minor with the consent of a de jure guardian, is competent to make a complaint of the offence under this section.[61]

5. Delinquent Child

When the crime is committed by a child below 16 years of age, when he is produced before a court not competent to hold any inquiry against him, it is the duty of such court to forward the delinquent child to the court which is competent to try him.[62]

6. Jurisdiction

Under s 181(2), CrPC, any offence of kidnapping or abduction may be inquired into, or tried by, a court within whose jurisdiction the person was kidnapped or abducted or was conveyed or concealed or detained.

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the.....day of....., at....., you kidnapped AB (AB, a minor male then under 16 years of age (orAB, a minor female then under 18 years of age), from India (or from the lawful guardianship of PQ his/her.....), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 363 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

3012

Where a person is charged both under ss 363 and 366 and is acquitted of the charge under s 366, he can still be convicted under s 363 .[63]

8. Proof

The prosecution must prove:

(1) for kidnapping from India, that:

- (a) the person kidnapped was, at the time of offence, was in India;
- (b) the accused conveyed him beyond the limits of India; and
- (c) he did so without his consent or the consent of another legally authorised to consent on his/her behalf.

(2) for kidnapping from lawful guardianship, that:

- (a) the person kidnapped was, at the time of offence, a minor under 16 years of age, if a male, or under 18 years of age, if a female, or he/she was a person of unsound mind;

(b) such person was in the keeping of a lawful guardian;
(c) the accused took or enticed such person out of such keeping;[64] and
(d) he did so without the consent of the lawful guardian.[65]

Prosecution should prove all the ingredients of the section, including the 'want of consent of the guardian'. The accused has not to prove the consent.[66]

When the evidence of the mother of the prosecutrix and that of her school master showed that she was below 16 years, the medical evidence also corroborated the same and the said evidence was not challenged by the defence, the finding of trial court that age of prosecutrix was below 16 years was found proper.[67]

The rule of prudence requiring corroboration of prosecutrix's evidence in a case of rape does not apply to the offence of kidnapping.[68] The rule requiring corroboration of the evidence of the prosecutrix is generally accepted only in cases of rape, and not in other cases involving a sexual offence[69] though, in MP Ponnamma v State of Karnataka ,[70] the conviction based on the bare statement of the prosecutrix, was set3013 aside. Uncorroborated testimony of the prosecurtrix if found reliable and trustworthy can form the basis of conviction for offence under ss 363, 366 and 376, IPC .[71]

9. Acquittal

There was no conclusive proof that prosecutrix was below 18 years. She made statement before the court that she had voluntarily gone with the accused and was not kidnapped and earlier on occasions also, she had gone with the accused. On these facts the conviction of the accused under s 363, IPC, was set aside.[72] In light of the fact that the victim was about 18 years of age and in the absence of any other credible evidence, the accused was found entitled to acquittal.[73]

The only prosecution evidence against the accused appellant was that he was present at the home where the victim was brought after kidnapping; the victim was not available for examination in Court. The appellant was not named in the FIR, other evidence on the record did not show the involvement of the appellant in the offence of kidnapping. The appellant could not be implicated in the offence under s 363 or s 366A, IPC*dehors* other evidence to show his involvement in the events preceding the kidnapping. His conviction on the basis of s 164, CrPC statement was found not sustainable and was set aside.[74]

10. Conviction

The medical evidence showed that prosecutrix was below 18 years of age at the time of the incident. She was undisputedly taken in a tempo to a particular place by the accused. The conviction of accused under s 326, IPC, was found proper.[75] The victim girl aged below 16 year left her house of her own, the accused, therefore met her and took her to his house and detained for several days. The conviction of accused under s 363, IPC was confirmed.[76] The point of the matter is when the prosecutrix was a minor, her taking away by the accused from her school on whatever pretext and even with her consent amounted to kidnapping her from her lawful guardianship. He, thus, committed an offence of s 363, IPC .[77]

After the complaint about missing of a boy was filed, telephone call was received demanding ransom amount. From the nearby place where the ransom amount was to be paid, accused persons were arrested and on their pointing out, the dead body of the kidnapped boy was recovered. The accused persons could not explain their presence. Held, the circumstances proved beyond doubt that the accused persons committed the offence. Conviction of the accused persons under ss 363, 302 and 201, IPC was held proper.[78]3014

11. Punishment

The act of taking and keeping away a young minor girl from her parents' house should be viewed by the court with sternness and the culprits should not be lightly dealt with, otherwise it is likely to have adverse effect on the morals of the society.[79] However, a lighter sentence is sufficient if the offence is merely a technical one.[80] The court is not bound to sentence an accused to fine in every case. What is essential is that a person, convicted of such an offence, should be punished with imprisonment, and should not be punished with fine alone,[81] though sentence of imprisonment can be reduced when victim is a consenting party after the commission of offence.[82]

R A Nelson's Indian Penal Code, 11e 2015/R A Nelson's INDIAN PENAL CODE/Volume 3/Chapter XVI Of Offences Affecting the Human Body/S. 363A.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF KIDNAPPING, ABDUCTION, SLAVERY AND FORCED LABOUR

[83][S. 363A.

Kidnapping or maiming a minor for purposes of begging.--

(1) Whoever kidnaps any minor or, not being the lawful guardian of a minor, obtains the custody of the minor, in order that such minor may be employed or used for the purposes of begging, shall be punishable with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

(2) Whoever maims any minor in order that such minor may be employed or used for the purposes of begging, shall be punishable with imprisonment for life, and shall also be liable to fine.

(3) Where any person, not being the lawful guardian of a minor, employs or uses such minor for he purposes of begging, it shall be presumed, unless the contrary is proved, that he kidnapped or otherwise obtained the custody of that minor in order that the minor might be employed or used for the purposes of begging.

(4) In this section--

(a) "begging" means--

(i) soliciting or receiving alms in a public place, whether under the pretence of singing, dancing, fortune-telling, performing tricks or selling articles or otherwise;

(ii) entering on any private premises for the purpose of soliciting or receiving alms;

(iii) exposing or exhibiting, with the object of obtaining or extorting alms, any sore, wound, injury, deformity or disease, whether of himself or of any other person or of an animal;

(iv) using a minor as an exhibit for the purpose of soliciting or receiving alms.

(b) "minor" means--3015

(i) in the case of a male, a person under sixteen years of age; and

(ii) in the case of a female, a person under eighteen years of age.]

Comments

1. Scope

To effectively curb the evil of kidnapping of children for exploiting them for begging, the provisions existing in the IPC, were quite inadequate. There was also no special provision for deterrent punishment for the greater evil of maiming of children so as to make them object of pity. This section makes kidnapping or obtaining custody of a minor and maiming of a minor for employing him for begging specific offences and provides for deterrent punishment.

2. 'Kidnaps'

Commentary under s 361, ante, may be referred to.

3. 'Minor'

'Minor', according to sub-s (4)(b) of this section, means:

(a) in the case of a male, a person under sixteen years of age; and
(b) in the case of a female, a person under eighteen years of age.

4. 'Lawful Guardian'

Commentary under s 361, ante, may be referred to.

5. 'Begging'

'Begging', contemplated by this section, is defined in sub-s (4)(a) of this section.

6. 'Maims'

'Maiming' means injuring by inflicting a disabling wound. Cutting off or disabling, or weakening a man's hand or finger, or striking out his eyes or foretooth, or depriving him of those parts, the loss of which, in all animals, abates their courage, are held to be maims, but the cutting off of a man's ear, or nose, or the like, are not held to be maims at common law because they do not weaken a man; they only disfigure him.[84]

7. Presumption Regarding Kidnapping

Sub-section (3) of this section enacts a special rule of evidence. Under this sub-section, the mere fact of the minor being employed or used for begging raises a3016 presumption that he has been kidnapped in order that he might be employed or used for the purposes of begging. However, this presumption is made rebuttable.

8. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable and non-compoundable. It is triable by a magistrate of the first class when the offence relates to kidnapping, and by a court of sessions when it relates to maiming.

9. Jurisdiction

Section 181(2), CrPC, may be referred to.[85]

10. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate/sessions judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of...., at...., kidnapped or obtained custody of AB, a minor (or maimed AB, a minor), in order that such minor may be employed, or used, for purposes of begging, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under section 363 -A of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance (or within the cognizance of this court).

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

11. Proof

The prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused kidnapped, or otherwise obtained the custody of, or maimed, a minor; and
(b) he did so in order that the said minor might be employed, or used, for the purpose of begging.

83 Inserted By Act 52 of 1959, s 2 (wef 15-1-1960).

Kidnapping or abducting in order to murder.--

Whoever kidnaps or abducts any person in order that such person may be murdered or may be so disposed of as to be put in danger of being murdered, shall be punished with [86][imprisonment for life] or rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section deals with cases of kidnapping or abduction in order that the person, kidnapped or abducted, may be murdered or may be so disposed of as to be put in danger of being murdered.[88] Abduction, per se (i.e., pure and simple), is not punishable under this Code.[89] In the absence of proof of any of the said intentions, mere decoying a boy is not punishable under this section.[90]

To establish an offence under s 364, IPC, it must be proved that the person charged with the offence had the intention at the time of kidnapping or abduction that the person was kidnapped or abducted or so disposed of so as to put him in danger of being murdered.[91]

Since this section provides for the case of a kidnapper, whose object is that the person kidnapped may be murdered or may be so disposed of as to be put in danger of being murdered. It has no application to a case where the object of the kidnappers is only to hold the kidnapped person to ransom.[92] However, where the modus operandi, disclosed in the letters from the accused demanding ransom from the father of the boy, whom the accused had kidnapped, was to put the father in fright of the boy being murdered and there was throughout the likelihood of the boy being murdered in case the ransom, for any reason, was not paid, it was held that the accused were guilty of the offences under ss 364, IPC (kidnapping) and 386, IPC (extortion).[93] However, where the deceased died even before he was kidnapped, it was held that the accused could not be held guilty under this section.[94]

This section provides for the punishment of a specific offence and, is not intended as an indirect method of punishing persons who are suspected, but not proved, to have committed a murder.[95]

Where the evidence did not show the complicity of the appellant in the abduction of his deceased wife, he was acquitted of the charge under s 364, IPC .[96]3018

2. Intention

The intention to murder or to so dispose of the victim as to put him in danger of being murdered, being the important element of the offence under this section, must be proved to have existed at the time of kidnapping or abduction. If the accused is not proved to have had the necessary intention at the time of kidnapping or abduction, he cannot be held guilty even though the kidnapping or abduction placed the victim in danger of being murdered.[1] The intention of the accused, or the common object of the unlawful assembly, can be judged from the acts committed by the accused at the time of abduction or thereafter till the time of their arrest.[2] The intention of the accused while dragging away the victim is evidenced by the statement attributed to one of the accused which the accused addressed to the son of victim, calling him to bring a lathi to kill the victim. The acts and words imputed to the accused when they pulled the victim, belaboured him and dragged him away, leaves in no doubt that their intention was to so dispose him as to put him in danger of being murdered.[3]

The action of the accused in bringing back his wife to the matrimonial home cannot attract the necessary ingredients of either the offence of kidnapping or abduction so as to attract s 364, IPC .[4]

3. 'Kidnaps'

Commentary under ss 360 and 361, ante, may be referred to.

4. 'Abducts'

Where there was no evidence on record to show that the deceased was forced for compelled by any deceitful means was induced by the accused to go with him, the abduction of the victim was not proved.[5] Commentary under s 362, ante, may be referred to.

5. Principles of Holding test Identification Parade

The principles for holding test identification parade may be summarised as follows : (i) Identification tests do not constitute substantive evidence, they can only be used as corroborative of the statement in court; (ii) the main object of holding an identification parade during the investigation stage is to test the memory of the witnesses based upon first impression and also to enable the prosecution to decide whether all or any of them could be cited as eye-witnesses of the crime; (iii) in order to eliminate the possibility of the accused being shown to the witnesses prior to the test identification parade and it is desirable that a test identification parade should be conducted as soon as after the arrest of the accused; (iv) appreciation of such evidence would depend upon the strength and trustworthiness of witness.[6]3019

6. Absconding or Disappearance of Accused--Effect

Mere absconding or disappearance of the accused by itself can not form the basis of conviction. Even an innocent person may, when suspected of a grave crime be tempted to evade arrest, such being the instinct of self preservation. When a false accusation is raised, any innocent person may behave like a guilty one to avoid a false charge or harassment in the hands of police.[7]

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of sessions.

8. Bail

The question as to the likelihood of tampering with the prosecution witnesses relates to ensuring a fair trial of the case in a court of justice and is, therefore, of paramount consideration to be given due weight, while considering a bail matter.[8] In a case where accused is alleged to have committed offences under ss 364 and 302, IPC, the question is not whether the evidence, of produced and remains unrebutted at the trial would sustain the charge but is merely whether there are grounds for believing that the accused were guilty of such offences. If it is so, the bail should be refused otherwise it should be granted.[9]

9. Jurisdiction

Any offence of kidnapping or abduction of a person may be inquired into, or tried by a court within whose local jurisdiction the person was kidnapped or abducted or was conveyed or concealed or detained. See s 181(2), CrPC .[10]

10. Issue Estoppel

In a case of assault on a family to death of there family members, two of the seven accused were convicted of murder under s 302, IPC, while the others under s 364, IPC . The special leave petition against conviction of two murder convicts was dismissed by the Apex Court. In a criminal appeal against conviction under s 364, the Apex Court opined that it would be impermissible for it to go into the question of identification of the accused persons in the wake of rejection of special leave petition of two murder convicts.[11]

11. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of Sessions Judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> 3020

> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

Where a man has been abducted and taken away and later on found dead, the accused should be charged under s 302, or under s 302, read with s 109, IPC, and not merely under s 364 which is a special case of enhanced punishment for a particular type of abetment of murder.[12]

When the person abducted has been murdered by the abductor there can be no scope for a charge under s 364, IPC . The abductor should be charged with murder pure and simple.[13]

12. Burden of Proof

The pristine rule that the burden of proof is on the prosecution to prove the guilt of the accused should not be taken as a fossilised doctrine as though it admits no process of intelligent reasoning. If the traditional rule relating to burden of proof of the prosecution is allowed to be wrapped in pedantic coverage, the offenders in serious offences would be the major beneficiaries and the society would be the casualty.[14] So the onus is cast upon the prosecution to prove that the deceased was compelled to go from his house or by deceitful means he was asked to leave the house along with the accused and that the said abduction was in order to commit murder of the said person.[15]

13. Proof

The prosecution must prove that:

(a) the accused kidnapped (as contemplated by s 360, or s 361, IPC, as the case may be), or abducted (as contemplated in s 362, IPC), a person; and

(b) he did so in order that such person may be murdered or may be so disposed of as to be put in danger of being murdered.

The recognition of known persons in the bright room light is not possible from a distance of 50 feet.[16]

To prove a charge under the said section it is necessary for the prosecution to prove forcible compulsion or inducement by deceitful means and object of such compulsion or inducement must be the going of a person from any place. To prove a charge under this section, the prosecution must prove that there was a misrepresentation, that the particular misrepresentation was the result of a plan to murder and that it was one by which, the abducted person was himself deceived and induced to go. In order to bring home a charge under s 364, IPC, the prosecution3021 must establish that at the time when the victim was taken away the accused had the intention to cause his death.[17]

14. Presumption of Fact

Presumption of fact is an inference as to the existence of one fact from the existence of some other facts, unless the truth of such inference is disproved. Presumption of fact is a rule in law of evidence that a fact otherwise doubtful may be inferred from certain other proved facts. When inferring the existence of a fact from other set of proved facts, the court exercises a process of reasoning and reaches a logical conclusion as the most probable position. The above principle has gained legislative recognition of India when s 114 is incorporated in the Evidence Act. It empowers the court to presume the existence of any fact which it thinks likely to have happened. In that process the court shall have regard in the common course of natural events, human conduct, etc., in relation to the facts of the case.[18]

What is frequently happening during these days is persons are kidnapped in the sight of others and are forcibly taken out of the sight of all others and later the kidnapped are killed. If a legal principle to be laid down is that for the murder of such kidnapped there should necessarily be independent evidence apart from the strong circumstances be providing a safe jurisprudence for protecting such criminal activities, India cannot now afford to lay down any such legal principle insulting the marauders of their activities of killing kidnapped innocents outside the ken of others.[19]

Abductors can be Presumed to be Murderers

The abductors alone could tell the court as to what happened to the deceased after they were abducted. When the abductors withheld that information from the court there is every justification for drawing the inference, in the light of all the preceding and succeeding circumstances, that the abductors are the murderers of the deceased.[20]

Section 106 of the Evidence Act is not intended to relieve the prosecution of its burden to prove the guilty of the accused beyond reasonable doubt but the section would apply to cases where prosecution has succeeded in proving facts for which a reasonable inference can be drawn regarding the existence of certain other facts, unless the accused by virtue of special knowledge regarding such facts failed to offer any explanation which might drive the court to draw a different inference.[21]

When more persons than one have abducted the victim, who was later murdered, it is within the legal province of the court to justifiably draw a presumption depending on the factual situation, that all the abductors are responsible for the murder. Section 34 of the IPC could be invoked for the aid to the end. Unless any particular abductor satisfies the court with his explanation as to what else he did with the victim subsequently, i.e., whether he left his associates enroute or whether he left his dissuaded others from doing the extreme act, etc.[22]3022

Presumption that Abduction was to Commit Murder

Where the abductors were armed with weapons and there was no explanation by the accused as to why the victims were abducted, it could be presumed that victims were abducted with at least the knowledge that they were likely to be murdered and thus, the accused were guilty of offence under s 364 . When a fact is especially or pre-eminently within the knowledge of an accused, the onus lies on him to offer his explanation for his conduct if his intention was contrary to, or in consistent with what his conduct indicated. When the prosecution succeed in proving certain facts, the court may presume the existence of certain other facts, which are likely to follow, in normal circumstances, from the proven facts. Such a presumption is available to a court in the light of the provisions of s 114 of the Evidence Act .[23]

15. Acquittal

When an accused is charged under ss 302 and 364, IPC,[24] if the evidence of murder is disbelieved and there is no evidence upon which it can be said that the person was abducted with the object that the person may be murdered or placed in danger of being murdered, there is no scope for a conviction under s 364 .[25]

Only one out of five witnesses of last seen evidence examined in the case identified the accused appellant in the court. The recovery memo of dranti alleged to be recovered from the possession of the accused was not witnessed by any one; it contained the signature of police officer only. Five other accused had been discharged/acquitted by the trial court. The case of the accused appellant was not distinguishable; conviction of the accused appellant under s 364, IPC was also set aside.[26]

The prosecution case was that the deceased boy was kidnapped and murdered as the accused persons wanted to offer a human sacrifice to please deities. The prosecution case rested entirely on the testimony of one prosecution witness without any corroboration of his testimony on any of the material aspects. Despite the testimony of informant witness that tongue, hair and nails of the deceased boy were found in the house of one of the accused, the same were not recovered by the police. There was no explanation as to what was interconnection between the accused and other accused nor there was evidence to connect accused persons with the crime. On these facts these accused persons were found entitled to benefit of doubt and were so acquitted under ss 364 and 302, IPC .[27] The prosecution case based on circumstantial evidence was that accused kidnapped the victim child about four years of age from the house of the parents and took him to the village and pushed him into the well thereby causing his death. The extra judicial confession made by accused to the witness was not found genuine and voluntary. The non-examination of the material witness, i.e. auto driver in whose auto-rickshaw deceased was allegedly taken was considered fatal to the prosecution case. The evidence showed that the dead body of the victim was recovered from the well only after the police came to the spot and not on pointing of well by the accused. Holding that there was no evidence to connect the3023 accused with the offences under ss 364 and 302, IPC, the accused was acquitted.[28] The allegation against the accused was that he kidnapped his two step-brothers and therefore killed them in order to solely succeed to his father's property. There was absence of the corpse and other evidence regarding death of the deceased brothers. The alleged eyewitnesses to the kidnapping did not name the accused in the FIR. There was no sufficient light on the place of incident for eyewitness to identify the accused. The conviction of the accused under ss 364 / 302 / 149, IPC, and under ss 201 / 149, IPC, and under s 120B, IPC, was set aside.[29]

Where in examination under s 313, CrPC no question regarding kidnapping or abduction of the victim was put to the accused, conviction of the accused appellant under s 364, IPC was set aside.[30]

16. Conviction

An accused, charged under ss 302 and 364, IPC and acquitted of the charge under s 302, can still be convicted under s 364 .[31] The victim was dragged away by accused person from two places. The words attributed to the accused persons showed that abduction was done for the purpose of finishing off the victim, these words spoken by the accused were also quoted in the FIR. When informant did not know that the victim was not alive, the accused were held guilty for abducting victim in order to murder him and convicted for offence under s 364, IPC .[32] A boy of 10 years was taken from his house by the accused in presence of his father and brother. The accused and the victim boy were missing for about two months and accused alone returned thereafter and told that he had employed the victim boy in a shop in Bombay. The boy was not traced nor returned thereafter. The conviction of the accused, on these facts, under s 364, IPC, was found proper.[33] A three year old child was kidnapped from the lap of his mother by three accused persons and subsequently was found murdered. The testimony of mother of the child was most natural, reliable, trustworthy and could not be shaken in the cross-examination. The conviction of accused persons under s 364 was found proper.[34] Where in a case of kidnapping and murder of a girl and then concealing her body, the evidence of the prosecution witnesses mutually corroborated each other regarding presence of the deceased in the company of the accused on fateful day, the prosecution proved and accused admitted that the house from where the body of the deceased was exhumed, belonged to the accused but accused failed to explain as to how the body of the deceased came to be exhumed from his house, the conviction of the accused under ss 302, 364 and 201, IPC, was confirmed.[35] The prosecution case based on circumstantial evidence was that the accused person abducted a jeweller and subsequently murdered him. The accused absconded from the scene of occurrence soon after co-accused was apprehended. The revolver was found from the person of accused at the time of his3024 arrest. The opinion of the ballistic expert was that the bullet recovered form the head of the deceased could only have been fired from the said revolver. The bags of ornaments which were in possession of the deceased jeweller at the time of his abduction were recovered from the house of co-accused pursuant to the information elicited from the accused. The conviction of the accused under ss 364 and 302, IPC, was confirmed.[36] A four year old boy allegedly kidnapped by the accused persons with the motive to sacrifice him in their field under instructions of a tantrik for being blessed with son and a pot of gold. The eyewitness, a servant of the accused witnessed the incident and intimated the police. His testimony remained unshaken and was corroborated by the medical evidence. The accused who was detected by the informant while he was disposing off the dead body in a pond, later made extra-judicial confession about the offence before the informant. The recovery of 'puja materials' from the field of the accused strengthened the prosecution case. Conviction of the accused under ss 364, 302 and 201, IPC, was found proper.[37]

There was reliable evidence that the accused appellant along with other accused wrongfully restrained the deceased by inflicting severe injuries on the body of the deceased i.e. by causing as many as 36 injuries in which process the deceased lost his conscious whereafter he was shifted to a different place, where it ultimately came to light that the person was killed by hanging. The conviction of the accused under s 364, IPC was held proper.[38]

17. Sentence

Where two persons are kidnapped, there are two distinct offences of kidnapping and it is lawful to award separate sentence for each offence. However, if the two offences are committed in the course of the same transaction, it is not necessary to order the sentences to run consecutively.[39]

In a case, in which two accused act in concert by virtue of a common intention and of a criminal conspiracy, their entire activities cannot, in the very nature of things, be brought out in evidence and, therefore, no distinction should be made between the two accused in the matter of sentence.[40]

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF KIDNAPPING, ABDUCTION, SLAVERY AND FORCED LABOUR

[41][S. 364A.

Kidnapping for ransom, etc.--

Whoever kidnaps or abducts any person or keeps a person in detention after such kidnapping or abduction and threatens to cause death or hurt to such person, or by his conduct gives rise to a reasonable apprehension that such person may be put to death or hurt, or causes hurt or death to such person in order to compel the Government or [42][any foreign State or international inter-governmental organisation or any other person] to do or abstain from doing any act or to pay a ransom,shall be punishable with death, or imprisonment for life, and shall also be liable to fine.3025

Comments

1. Scope

This section was incorporated in the IPC in 1993 but was amended soon in 1995 with a view to insert the cases pertaining kidnapping or abduction to compel any foreign state or international or international inter-governmental organisation or to any other person to do or abstain from doing any act or to pay a ransom. The offence committed under this section is considered so serious that the punishment provided under IPC to a more serious offence, i.e., murder under s 302, IPC is provided in it. An offence under s

364A, IPC is a serious offence, but the court should not be influenced by sentiments, and the judgment of the court should be objective, based on judicial considerations and evidence adduced in the case.[43]

From the language of s 364A, IPC, it becomes crystal clear that this section is applicable only when the kidnapping for ransom etc., is done in order to compel the government or any foreign state or international inter-governmental organisation to do or abstain from doing any act.[44] If it is established that offender after kidnapping/abducting a person keeps him in detention and threatens to cause death or hurt in order to extort ransom and communicates that demand, he is guilty for kidnapping for ransom.[45] When an individual person has been compelled to pay the ransom amount, the offence under s 364A, IPC, is not made out at all.[46] Once a person (victim) is shown to have been kidnapped, onus would shift on the kidnapper to show when the person kidnapped was released by him.[47]

It is established that if the offender after kidnapping a person keeps the said person in detention or threatens to cause death or hurt in order to extort ransom, s 364A, IPC is attracted.[48]

5. Demand of Ransom and its Communication

To pay a ransom, as per *Black's Law Dictionary,*would mean 'to pay price or demand for ransom.' The word 'demand' means 'to claim as one's due:' 'to require' 'to ask relief' 'to summon' 'to call in Court'; 'An imperative request preferred by one person to another requiring the latter to do or yield something or to abstain from some act'; 'An asking with authority, claiming'. The definition as pointed out above would show that the demand has to be communicated. It is an imperative request or a claim made. Therefore, that claim or imperative request or asking with authority could only be if the demand is conveyed or communicated. Communications means 'information given;' 'the sharing of knowledge by one with another;' bargaining preparatory to making a contract;' 'to convey;' 'made known;' 'to talk over;' 'to transmit information.' That the demand in order to communicate requires necessarily the information to be conveyed to the person for whom it is meant. It is only after receipt of this information that the question to pay a ransom would arise.[49]

'To Pay a Ransom'

On the failure on the part of the prosecution to prove that the letters demanding payment of ransom emanated from the accused or were sent at the behest of the accused, the accused cannot be convicted for kidnapping for ransom under s 364A .[50] It is important to know what do the words 'to pay a ransom' stand for. Does it mean that kidnapping or abduction with the intention to demand ransom is sufficient to cover the prosecution case under s 364A or such a demand has to be translated into action by communicating the demand either by post or by contact.[51] To pay a ransom, in the ordinary sense means to pay the price or demand for ransom. This would show that the demand has to be communicated. It is not necessary for the prosecution to establish the offence under s 364A of IPC that the abductors have actually extorted some ransom and not fulfilling the demand of ransom had resulted in the death of the abductee. But the prosecution has to prove that the abductee was kept in detention and that the abductor threatens to cause death or hurt in order to extort ransom and communicates that demand for ransom.[52]

Where the accused has demanded ransom for return of the child kidnapped, s 364A, IPC has clear application.[53]

'To pay' means to set in motion the demand for payment. Demand cannot be by keeping the letter in one's pocket. It has to be communicated to the person from whom the demand to pay is made. Unless that is done, prosecution cannot succeed in covering its case under s 364A IPC .[54] 'To pay a ransom' means demand which requires communication by the kidnapper on the family of the kidnapped. Unless it is established 'to pay a ransom' cannot be inferred.[55] Thus, when the accused did not post the letter containing demand of ransom after kidnapping the child, nor the3027 accused personally contacted the family of that child, he was held to have not raised the demand to pay a ransom.[56] In another case,[57] where the demand for ransom by the accused from the uncle of kidnapped child was not established, the prosecution theory of ransom was found not proved despite the fact that kidnapping of boy by the accused was proved.[58] However, when the communication of demand of ransom to the family of kidnapped child is established, the accused is liable to be convicted.[59] In the instant case, the father of the minor kidnapped had received 89 calls from the kidnappers for payment of ransom and was told that if ransom was not paid his son would be killed; the conviction of the accused appellant was sustained.[60]

Accused appellant was prosecuted on allegations that he had been removed from service by the mother of the kidnapped children and hence, he abducted the minor children. There was no evidence on record to establish that infuriated by his removal from service and non-payment of dues, the appellant master-minded the plot to abduct the children or played any active role in abducting them. If a telephone call was received making ransom demand and making grievance about alleged ill-treatment of the appellant, the police should have traced the calls and identified the caller. Suspicion, however, grave, cannot take the place of proof. The conviction of the accused appellant for offence under s 364A, IPC was not justified and therefore, was set aside.[61]

Where a child returning from school was kidnapped by two accused persons, the father of the child received telephone call and paid ransom amount at the appointed place, child was recovered from the custody of one accused, the kidnapped child disclosed information of co-accused also, both the accused persons were convicted for offence under s 364, IPC .[62]

6. 'To Compel the Government or any Foreign State..... Any Act'

From the language of s 364A, IPC, it becomes crystal clear that this section is applicable only when the kidnapping for ransom, etc., is done in order to compel the government or any foreign state or international inter-governmental organisation to do or abstain from doing any act.[63] When an individual person has been compelled to pay the ransom amount the offence under s 364A IPC is not made out at all.[64]

7. 'May' cannot be Raised to the Level of 'Must'

There may be cases when the court is left with the mere possibility amounting almost to certainty as to there being some motive for the entire exercise of kidnapping or abduction. However, what may be there cannot take the place of what is established by proof. 'May' cannot be raised to the level of 'Must', unless there is material warranting such conclusion.[65]3028

8. Admissibility of Ransom Note

The ransom note could not be compared with the writing of the accused during investigation while in custody as the same is not admissible under s 73 of the Indian Evidence Act and cannot be acted upon under s 45 of the Indian Evidence Act by an expert. When the admitted hand writing was never taken before the court seized of the matter, the comparison of the ransom note with the specimen taken in contravention of law would not be admissible in evidence.[66]

9. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable and triable by the court of sessions.

10. Charge

The following form of charge may be adopted:

> I, (name and office of the Sessions/Additional sessions judge) hereby charge you (particulars of the accused) as follows:
> That on or about-day of-month of-year, you kidnapped (or abducted) or kept, (Particular of the victim) in detention after such kidnapping (or abduction), and threatened to cause death (or hurt), or caused death (or caused hurt) to such person in order to compel the Government or any Foreign state or International Inter-Governmental organisation or any other person to do or abstain from doing any act of (particulars of the act) or to pay a ransom, and you have thereby committed an offence punishable under section 364 -A, IPC and within the cognizance of this court of sessions.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

When no charge under s 364A, IPC, has been framed by the sessions court, the conviction of the accused for the said offence is not justified.[67]

11. Proof

In order to prove the offence under s 364A, IPC, the prosecution must establish that:

(a) the accused kidnapped or abducted any person; or
(b) the accused kept the person in detention after such kidnapping or abduction; and
(c) the accused threatened to cause death or hurt to that person; or
(d) the accused actually caused hurt or death that person in order to compel the government or any foreign state or international inter-governmental organisation;
(e) such kidnapping or abduction was for ransom.[68]

Once the person concerned has been shown as having been kidnapped, the onus would shift on the kidnapper to establish how and when the kidnapped individual came to be released from his custody. In the absence of any such proof produced by3029 the kidnapper, it would be natural to infer/presume, that the kidnapped person continued in the kidnapper's custody, till he was eliminated.[69]

Where the accused appellant along with other co-accused was alleged to have kidnapped niece of his brother-in-law, but there was no reliable evidence showing the involvement of the accused appellant, the maruti car recovered from the possession of the accused was not used in the kidnapping of the child, his conviction under s 364A, IPC was set aside.[70]

12. Acquittal

Accused persons had kidnapped the son of the complainant, had demanded rupees five lacs as ransom, threatened the safety of the kidnapped boy on telephone. A trap was laid, the accused were arrested and on the disclosure statement made by them, the kidnapped boy was recovered. The testimony of the father of the boy was believed. Non-examination of the independent witnesses was held immaterial. Accused persons were convicted under ss 120B and 364A, IPC .[71]

Where there was no evidence to show that the co-accused had instigated the appellant accused to kidnap the child, his acquittal did not entitle the appellant accused to be acquitted on charge of s 364A, IPC amply proved by prosecution evidence.[72]

13. Conviction

Appellant accused, Suman Sood, wife of the main accused kept the kidnapped person inside her house, supplied him food knowing fully that her husband and his companions had kidnapped the victim. Her conviction under ss 364A, 365, 346, 343 read with 120B, IPC was held proper.[73]

The evidence on record showed that in terms of the disclosure made by the accused the child was recovered. The accused came near the culvert and picked up the bag containing money. The prosecution case was that the place was indicated where the bag was to be kept. Adequate arrangements were worked out and the bag was put as indicated by the accused who came to collect the same. Conviction of the appellant accused under s 364A, IPC was held proper.[74]

Accused persons had kidnapped the son of the complainant, had demanded rupees five lacs as ransom, and threatened the safety of the kidnapped boy on telephone. Trap was laid, accused were arrested and on the disclosure statement made by them, the kidnapped boy was recovered. The testimony of the father of the boy was believed. Non-examination of the independent witnesses was held immaterial. Accused persons were convicted under ss 120B and 364A, IPC .[75]3030

In the instant case, it was duly proved that the victim had been kidnapped by the accused appellant; the accused appellant did not produce any material as to when he released the victim from his custody. The conviction of the accused appellant under s 364A, IPC was held proper.[76]

In the instant case, the deceased and his son were kidnapped for ransom and killed by the appellants accused. Recovery of dead bodies from covered gutters and personal belongings of the deceased from other places disclosed by the accused stood fully established. The conviction of the appellants accused for offences under s 364A, IPC was held proper.[77]

The kidnapped boy was got released by the police and the neighbours. Two of the accused persons who were found along with the kidnapped boy were arrested on the spot. There was also evidence of demand of ransom. The accused were convicted for offence under s 364A, IPC .[78]

14. Sentence

An offence under s 364A is punishable with death or imprisonment for life and shall be liable to fine. In the instant case, looking at the facts of the case, award of sentence of imprisonment for life and a fine of Rs. 500/- with default clause was held appropriate.[79]

Comments

1. Scope

The gravamen of the offence under this section is the intention to keep the wrongful confinement a secret.[81] When the motive behind kidnapping the victim was to confine him wrongfully for passing information to the army about the ULFA, the conduct of the accused clearly fells within the mischiefs of this section.[82]

The intention of the accused at the time of kidnapping or abduction can be deduced only from what they subsequently did.[83] Where a woman is forcibly dragged out of her house and kept locked up in a room in the house of the accused, an offence under this section is made out. The mere fact, that the house, where the woman is confined, is in the abadi, does not negative secret confinement.[84]

A child, who cannot walk on his own legs, can be the subject of wrongful confinement and so of this section also.[85] However, in case of kidnapping, a person, who cannot be convicted under s 363, cannot be convicted under this section.[86]

Even a person, who joins at a subsequent stage while the victim is being taken from place to place, would be guilty under this section.[87]

2. 'Kidnaps'

Sections 259, 360 and 361,ante, and commentary thereunder, may be referred to.

3. 'Abducts'

Commentary under s 362, ante, may be referred to.

4. 'Secretly and Wrongfully Confined'

It would be apparent from s 365, IPC, that this section enacts that kidnapping or abduction with intent to secretly and wrongfully confine a person is an offence. The gravamen of the offence under this section is the intention to keep the wrongful confinement a secret.

This section again embraces the offences of kidnapping as well as abduction and prescribes the punishment, for either or both, if committed with the particular intention of causing the person kidnapped or abducted to be secretly and wrongfully confined. Mere kidnapping or abduction without the particular intent is not punishable under this section.[88]

The intention must be to cause the kidnapped or abducted person to be confined not only wrongfully, but also secretly.[89]

If it is found that the kidnapped or abducted person was merely wrongfully confined, the case would fall under s 342, IPC, and not under this section.[90] Where,3032 however, a person is abducted in order that he might be held to ransom, there is always present the intent to cause the person abducted to be secretly and wrongfully confined and, therefore, the case would fall under this section as well as under the appropriate extortion section.[91]

5. Conduct of Accused

When the motive of kidnapping the victim was to confine him wrongfully for passing information to the army about the ULFA, the conduct of the accused clearly falls within the mischiefs of s 365, IPC .[92]

6. Common Intention

The accused who was driver of the car, after the sudden quarrel between occupants of the car and the petrol salesman drove away the car and even after the car got stuck in the ditch, no act whatsoever is attributed to this accused except for his trying to make good his escape on the arrival of police. There was no evidence on record to suggest that this accused along with other set out that morning in pursuance of a pre-arranged plan to commit any crime. There was no evidence of pre-concert of any kind. Merely because the said accused was in the company of the other accused persons and happened to be driving the vehicle at that time, he cannot be tied down by the fragile and unsafe threat of s 34, IPC, and sent to the gallows, especially when the others have got away unpunished.[93]

7. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

8. Subsequent Trial

Previous conviction of the accused for an offence under s 149, or s 452, IPC, is no bar to their subsequent trial under s 365 . In Baldeo Prasad v Emperor ,[94] it was held that when the case fell under s 235(1) [present s 220(1)] CrPC, and, therefore, having regard to s 403(2) [present s 300(2)] the previous trial was no bar to the subsequent prosecutor.

9. Jurisdiction

Section 181(2), CrPC, regulates jurisdiction for trial of any offence of kidnapping or abduction.

10. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

3033

> That you, on or about the.....day of....., at....., kidnapped (or abducted) one AB, with intent to cause the said AB to be secretly and wrongfully confined, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 365 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

11. Proof

In order to establish the offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) the accused kidnapped or abducted a person; and
(2) he did so with intent to cause him secretly and wrongfully confined.

It must be clearly proved that at the time of kidnapping or abduction, the intention of accused was to cause the kidnapped or abducted person secretly and wrongfully confined.[1] The existence of an intention, like any other fact, may be inferred from the circumstances of the case and the subsequent conduct of the accused after the kidnapping or abduction has taken place.[2] The mere circumstances of a kidnapped girl, staying, in the accused's house, for a day or two, does not warrant the conclusion that she was wrongfully confined with the object of baffling any search that might be made for her.[3] Where the accused appellant was identified in the court, by the prosecution witness (Head Mistress of the School) who had sufficient conversation with the accused when the kidnapped child was given to the accused, holding of test identification parade was found not necessary.[4]

12. Acquittal

Though the main accused is liable to be convicted under s 365, IPC on account of consistent testimony of prosecutrix and eye-witness about abduction by the accused but when investigating officer has not put up co-accused at a test identification parade, mere nomination of co-accused by the prosecutrix at trial cannot be made a foundation of his conviction, so the co-accused is entitled to be acquitted on a charge under this section.[5] The accused who were related to victim child were charged with kidnapping. The three accused were acquitted by the trial court. In the absence of evidence or circumstances attributing prior knowledge of kidnapping, guilt under ss 365 and 368, IPC, cannot be fastened or the fourth accused and so he was also acquitted.[6]

13. Conviction

When there is consistent testimony of prosecutrix and eyewitness about abduction by the accused, the accused is liable to be convicted under s 365, IPC .[7] When the testimony of victim is corroborated by other witnesses, the prosecution evidence3034 showed that the victim was confined to a room, ignoring the delay of one day in recording FIR being not found fatal, the conviction of accused under s 365, IPC, was found proper.[8] In a case of kidnapping and murder based on circumstantial evidence, both the accused and deceased were last seen together, the testimony of witnesses was free from contradictions. Extra judicial confession made by the accused was proved by the prosecution, the conduct of accused before and after commission of offence was found inconsistent with the innocence of the accused. On these facts, discarding the fact that specimen handwriting of the accused did not match with the writing of letter demanding ransom, conviction of accused under ss 365 and 302, IPC, was found proper.[9]

Appellant accused, Suman Sood wife of the main accused kept the kidnapped person inside her house, supplied him food knowing fully that her husband and his companions had kidnapped the victim. Her conviction under ss 364A, 365, 346, 343 read with 120B, IPC was held proper.[10]

14. Probation

On account of gravity of offence under this section the benefit of probation under s 360, CrPC, cannot be extended to the accused.[11]

15. Sentence

The fact that the accused has mother, wife and children to support is no ground for leniency in awarding sentence. Human consideration is no ground for showing leniency to the perpetrator of the crime against the organised, civilised society, which is abhorrent to the concept of rule of law. The offence of kidnapping in any form imposes upon human rights and right to life enshrined in art 21 of the Constitution . Such acts not only strike a terror in the mind of the people but have deleterious effects on the civilised society and have to be condemned by imposing deterrent punishment.[12] When motive behind kidnapping the victim was that he was being accused for giving information to the Army about ULFA, the sentence of five years rigorous imprisonment awarded to accused though found lenient was still confirmed.[13]

However, where the appellant had taken an active part in abducting and torturing the complainant and had demanded ransom, it was held that there was no ground to reduce the sentence of three years rigorous imprisonment.[14]

Where the accused abducted a woman merely in order to put pressure upon her friends to restore another young girl, whom they had abducted, and this object was achieved by the abduction and no harm was done to the woman abducted, it was held3035 that under these circumstances, a heavy sentence was not called for.[15] Where the girl abducted is of easy virtues and is perhaps not averse to what is happening to her, ends of justice would be satisfied by reducing the sentence to the period of imprisonment already undergone by the accused.[16] When the accused are men of respectable position, it is not necessary to keep them in prison for so long a period as three years. A short term imprisonment will do.[17]

16. Alteration of Conviction from Section 342 to Section 365

Where the accused has been charged under this section, but has been convicted by the trial court under s 342, IPC, the appellate court can alter the conviction to one under this section without altering the sentence imposed by the trial court.[18]

17. Alteration of Conviction from Sections 366 and 376 to Section 365

An offence under s 365, IPC, within the meaning of s 222, CrPC 1973, being a minor offence, as compared with offences under s 366 and s 376, IPC, an accused can be convicted of the former offence without a formal charge having been framed.[19]

18. Alteration of Conviction from Sections 366A and 372 to Section 365

Before convicting a person under ss 366A and 372, IPC, it has to be conclusively proved that the victim was below 18 year of age on the date of occurrence. There is no specific provision in the IPC which makes kidnapping or abduction for the purpose of sale as a prostitute an offence if the subject is above 18 years of age. Thus, in a strange case where though it was proved that the victim was abducted and then sold to a brother house where she was used for the purpose of prostitution but on account of age of the prosecutrix not being below 18 years, the conviction of the accused was altered from s 366A and s 372, IPC to s 365 IPC .[20]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

OF KIDNAPPING, ABDUCTION, SLAVERY AND FORCED LABOUR

S. 366.

Kidnapping, abducting or inducing woman to compel her marriage, etc.--

Whoever kidnaps or abducts any woman with intent that she may be compelled, or knowing it to be likely that she will be compelled, to marry any person against her will, or in order that she may be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse, or knowing it to be likely that she will be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; [21][and whoever, by means of criminal intimidation as defined in this Code or of abuse of authority or any other method of compulsion, induces any woman to go from any place with intent that she may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be, forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person, shall also be punishable as aforesaid].3036

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section, which deals with kidnapping and abduction with the intention or knowledge of forcibly marrying a woman or forcing or seducing her to illicit intercourse,[22] is an aggravated form of the offence punishable under s 364 .[23]

In the case of abduction, this section would apply where the woman, at the time of her abduction, had no intention of being married or to be put to illicit intercourse which, the offender contemplated, was to be brought about afterwards by force or seduction.[24]

In the case of kidnapping, if the object of the offender is that which is specified in this section, the consent of the minor girl does not affect the commission of the offence thought that may be a consideration under the question of sentence.[25] In Emperor v Safdar Reza ,[26] it has been held that the offence, dealt with in s 366, IPC, is merely an aggravated form of the offence, created by s 363, IPC, and it would, therefore seem to follow that when the matter under consideration, in relation to s 366, is the seduction to illicit intercourse of a girl under 18 years of age, her consent or intention would be just as immaterial as it would be in connection with the offence dealt with under s 363, the object of this section being also to protect the girls themselves and to prevent persons taking improper advantage of their youth and inexperience. The fact that the girl, at the time when she was enticed away from her3037 home by the accused, had the intention of having illicit intercourse with him, is no defence to a charge under s 366 .

The offence under this section being only an aggravated form of the offence under s 363, the same person cannot be convicted on the same facts under both the sections.[27]

In the absence of a finding to the effect that the accused had abducted the victim for any of the purposes mentioned in s 366, a charge under s 366, IPC, cannot be sustained on the mere finding that the accused had abducted the victim.[28] If a husband, by force, compels his wife to come to him for living as wife, he commits no offence under this section[29] even if he might have earlier turned her out, but not divorced her, and even if she might have started living with another man on the pretext that she has married him.[30]

Where a girl kidnapped by a person from her lawful guardianship and another person, who was no party to that kidnapping, takes the girl away for illicit intercourse, the latter person cannot be convicted under this section.[31] Similarly, a person, joining the accused at a subsequent stage, cannot be held guilty of an offence under this section if he was not associated with him from the very beginning.[32]

A man committing sexual intercourse with a minor girl in a field near her own home without having any intention of taking her away with him, is not guilty of an offence under s 366 though he may be held guilty of the offence of rape even if the sexual intercourse may have been committed with her consent.[33] Where the offence of rape was committed by a father on her own minor daughter in his own home, it was held that no charge under this section could survive.[34] It was held, in Emperor v Sakhanam Jan ,[35] that the offences under ss 366 and 376 are distinct offences and it is not competent to a judge, in an appeal, to alter a charge under s 376 to one under s 36 because a charge under s 366 involves different elements and different questions of fact from a charge under s 376 .

2. Section 366 Distinguished from Section 498

Section 366 applies to cases where, at the time of her abduction, the woman has no intention of marriage or illicit intercourse, but it is evident that the intention of the abductor was to compel her afterwards to marry any person against her will or to force or seduce her afterwards to illicit intercourse, whereas to constitute an offence under s 498, IPC, the ingredients of compulsion or deceit need not be there and further s 498 applies to cases where the object of taking or enticing is that the woman may have illicit intercourse with some other person even though, as generally3038 happens she is quite aware of the purpose for which she is quitting her husband and is an assenting party to it.[36]

3. Sections 366 and 366A --Distinction

When the language of s 366A is contrasted with the language of s 366, it is clear that s 366A will be attracted only when the accused induces a minor girl to go from any place with intent that such girl may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be, forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person, meaning thereby with a person other than accused.[37]Section 366, IPC, is an aggravated form of the offence under s 363 . For proving the offence under s 366, IPC, it must be proved by the prosecution that the girl may be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse or knowing to be likely that she will be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse. However, for proving the offence under s 366A, IPC, the prosecution has to prove that the girl was kidnapped with the intention that she will be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person.[38]

4. Jati Panchayat, Customs, Traditions and Dignity of Woman

Jati panchayats are guided by caste taboos. The jati panchayat gives verdict against women for breaking caste-taboos and directs barbarous punishments. The members of assembly abet and become executors. The perpetrators of the crime do not allow the law to take its course. Public opinion is sought to be formed in favour of the caste taboos and against the women resulting into punishment of victim and protection of criminals. Anti-social people, criminals and law brokers with the help of muscle power and money enters in such jati panchayats and exploit the situation for their benefit, monetary or otherwise. If such cases are closely analysed, the act constitutes an offence of kidnapping for ransom, etc, punishable under s 364A, IPC . People do not have the courage to stand against the caste panchayat. Even the so called social or political workers play their role under the pressure of jati panchayat for the sake of votes at all levels, ie, election of the Gram Panchayat, Assembly or Parliament. Academicians also play role misdirecting the issue by asking a debate on personal law or customs. Arguments are advanced that these are social problems and will vanish with economic development. It is well settled that the customs or traditions in conflict with the basic rights of citizens, cannot be given preference. Sometimes the protection of such customs and traditions are given in the name of freedom of religion without under standing that it is not absolute. It is subject to public order, morality and health and other provisions of the Constitution, which includes the gender equality and right of women to make a choice about her personal life. In the case of rape, the physical integrity of a woman is destroyed. No amount of justifications under religious texts and their purported interpretation can justify an inhuman action. The basic principle of justice in the civilised society is that a person committing crime is punished and not the victim. Indeed, the victim is compensated and rehabilitated. Apart from the fundamental right of a woman of right to life, to live with dignity free from cruel degrading treatment, there is also a duty cast on every citizen by art 51(e) of the Constitution to renounce practices derogatory to the dignity of women. It must be realised that the security of a woman is essentially a3039 law and order problem, which is a state subject. In discharge of its constitutional obligation, the state cannot take plea of helplessness in the name of tradition.[39]

5. Ingredients

The first of the section requires:

(1) kidnapping, or abduction, of any woman;
(2)
  (a) with intent that she may be compelled, or knowing it to be likely that she will be compelled, to marry any person against her will; or
  (b) in order that she may be forced, or seduced, or knowing it to be likely that she will be forced, or seduced, to illicit intercourse.

The second part of the section requires:

(1) inducing, by means of criminal intimidation or of abuse of authority or any other method of compulsion, any woman to go from any place;
(2) with intent that she may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be, forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person.

What the first part of the section requires is kidnapping or abduction. If the girl is 18 or over, she can only be abducted and not kidnapped; if, however, she is under 18, she can be kidnapped as well as abducted.[40] It may be noted that the second part of the section does not require kidnapping, as defined in s 360 or s 361, or abduction, as defined in s 362 ; it requires that a woman should be induced, by intimidation or abuse of authority or any other method of compulsion, to go from a place with the same intent as in (2) (b) of the ingredients of the first part of the section mentioned above.

To prove an offence of abduction, under the first part of the section, in respect of a major woman, two ingredients must be established, namely:

(i) she was abducted; and
(ii) she was abducted with the intention of compelling her to marry any person against her will or in order that she may be forced or seduced to illicit sexual intercourse.

In other words, for an offence under s 366, IPC, abduction, by itself, is not sufficient; in the absence of evidence that the accused abducted the woman with the intention or knowledge, specified in the section, a conviction under s 366 cannot be sustained.[41] Similarly, where the first ingredients of abduction itself is not proved, the allegation, that the prosecutrix was forced to sexual intercourse with particular persons, would carry no weight to prove an offence under s 366 .[42]

Unless it is established that the abduction was for the purposes specified in s 366, IPC, the accused cannot be convicted under s 366, IPC ; mere abduction by the accused does not establish charge under s 366, IPC .[43]3040

For a prosecution for an offence under this section, it is not necessary that the woman kidnapped or abducted was already married. Such a question is relevant only in a prosecution for an offence under s 497 or s 498 .[44] If, in the case of kidnapping of a minor girl, the ingredients of an offence under s 363, IPC, are proved along with the intention or knowledge that the girl might be compelled to marry against her will, a charge under s 366, IPC, is established.[45]

To constitute offence under s 366, IPC, it is not necessary that the woman abducted should be subjected to sexual intercourse, mere intention to do it or even the knowledge that it is likely that she would be subjected to illicit intercourse, is sufficient.[46]

6. 'Kidnaps'

Commentary under ss 359, 360 and 361, ante, may be referred to.

7. 'Abducts'

Commentary under s 362, ante, may be referred to.

8. 'Women'

Under s 10 of this Code, the word 'woman' denotes a female human being of any age.[47] So, even a minor female is a 'woman',[48] and it is not necessary that she should be a virgin.[49]

9. Custody of Victim Girl

When the girl attains the age of majority as per law, she is at liberty to live anywhere she likes and there shall be no necessity for the court to pass any order for the stay in a particular place unless she applies for protection. However, when the victim girl is a minor, i.e. below 18 years of age, her custody cannot be given to accused against whom an offence under s 366, IPC, for kidnapping the victim, is alleged.[50]

10. 'With Intent'

The intention of the accused is the gravamen of an offence under this section. If an accused kidnaps or abducts a woman with the necessary intent, the offence is complete, whether or not the accused succeeds in effecting his purpose, or even if the woman has, in fact, consented to the marriage or the illicit intercourse taking place.[51] In the absence of the intention, specified in the section, the accused cannot be held guilty under it, however reprehensible his conduct may be.[52] It may be noted that the first part of the section itself specifies two alternative intentions, either of which is3041 sufficient to constitute the offence. It is only when the intention of either marrying the woman against her will, or of forcing her to subject herself to illicit intercourse, is proved that abduction becomes an offence under this section. Otherwise, the mere act of assault and outraging the modesty of a woman is covered by s 354, and not by this section.[53]

Ordinarily speaking, when a body of person is alleged to have abducted a girl with the intention of compelling her to marry one of the abductors or a stranger, it is reasonable to suppose that the abductors, apart from the abductor with whom the girl is being compelled to marry, would not have the intention of seducing her to illicit sexual intercourse. Even if one of the accused asks the girl to have sexual intercourse with him after the abduction, it does not follow that, at the time of abduction, he had the intention of seducing her to illicit intercourse.[54]

The question of intent is a pure question of fact.[55] Each case turns on its own facts. Therefore, before an accused can be convicted of an offence under the first part of this section, the court must be satisfied, as a matter of fact, upon the evidence that the accused, when he kidnapped or abducted the woman, whatever her age might be, did so with intent to compel her, or knowing it to be likely that she would be compelled, to marry against her will, that is to say, in spite of her opposition, and unless such an intent is proved, the accused is entitled to be acquitted.[56] However if, whenever the marriage was talked of, the woman's consent was asked for, it cannot be said that the intention was to compel her to marry against her will.[57]

11. Inference of Intention

Direct proof of intention is not always possible. It can be inferred from the facts and circumstances of each case.[58] It is impossible for the prosecution to establish the intention except by proving the conduct of the accused.[59] Where the intention of the accused was not only to persuade the girl abducted to change her mind to accept him as her groom but also to marry her, her refusal notwithstanding, it was held that there could be no other conclusion than this that his intention was to compel her to marry or, if opportunity permitted, to marry her forcibly and, therefore, he would be guilty under this section.[60]

However, if the girl's consent has already been sought, it cannot be said that the intention of the accused was to compel her to marry.[61]

It is difficult to visualise that the accused had asked the prosecutrix to have sexual intercourse with her in the presence of her 11 years old child, and that further, the3042 accused had allowed her to easily slip out of his hands from the lodge, if that was his intention.[62]

12. 'Or Knowing it to be Likely'

This simply means with intent implied in law.

Commentary under s 39, IPC, vol 1, may be referred to.

13. 'Against her Will'

The 'will', mentioned in this expression in the first part of this section, means the 'will' of the victim girl, and not of her guardian.[63] The consent of the guardian in the case of a minor girl is relevant in kidnapping, punishable under s 363, but that should not be confused with an offence under this section which requires an intent to compel a woman to marry a person against her will.[64]

When a minor girl had known the accused who was her neighbour for quite some time and had gone with him to Meerut and other places for eight days voluntarily but did not complaint of her alleged kidnapping by accused to anyone, the conviction of accused under s 366, IPC, was set aside.[65] Where the victim minor girl had visited a number of places but had not raised any protest, her conduct showed that she was a consenting party; the accused was acquitted of the charges under ss 366 and 376, IPC .[66] Where the prosecutrix was major, she along with the accused lived in a rented house for a period of sixty eight days from the date of alleged abduction. She did not raise alarm or protest during this long period. The prosecutrix was held a consenting party. The conviction of the accused under ss 366 and 376, IPC was set aside.[67]

Where the medical evidence showed that the victim girl was aged 18/19 years at the time of the occurrence, no injuries were found on her body, the evidence showed that the victim girl had eloped voluntarily with the accused, acquittal of the accused for offence under s 366A, IPC was held proper.[68]

Where the victim girl deposed before the court that the accused appellant had put vermilion or her head, also had photographs with her, she was treated well, even given food, she did not raise any protest when she had opportunity to react with the ladies of the house where she stayed, held the victim girl was not kidnapped, the accused was acquitted.[69]3043

In a case, the mother-in-law, abducting her daughter-in-law and compelling her to marry against her will, was held guilty of the offence under this section.[70]

14. 'To Marry'

In s 366, the expression 'to marry' implies, as in s 494 of this Code, going through a form of marriage, whether the same is, in fact, valid or not.[71]

15. Constitutional Right of Adults to Love and Marry

Article 19(1) (a), (b) and (c) of the Constitution of India reads as follow:

19. Protection of certain rights regarding freedom of speech etc.--(1) (1) All citizens shall have the right--

(a) to freedom of speech and expression;
(b) to assemble peaceably and without arms;
(c) .....
(d) to move freely throughout the territory of India;
(e) to reside and settle in any part of the territory of India;

...

From a conjoint in depth reading of the aforementioned article it is clear that the Constitution guarantees its citizens freedom of expression, who can meet peaceably without arms, and move freely, reside and settle throughout the country.

Article 21 of the Constitution of India reads as follows--

> 21. Protection of life and personal liberty--No person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to procedure established by law.

Its bare perusal shows that life and liberty of accused and prosecutrix both stand guaranteed except according to the procedure established by law. When both are adults the law does not prohibit them to love each other. They have a right to live with dignity and honour and make their life meaningful. In Kharak Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh ,[72]Gobind v State of Madhya Pradesh [73] and PUCL v Union of India ,[74] it was held that art 21 guarantees the right to privacy.[75]

16. 'Forced'

'Forced' implies not merely physical force, but also the force of circumstances. For instance, a girl, who has been kidnapped from her father's house, may be placed in such circumstances that she has no option but to submit to illicit intercourse. The word 'forced', as used in s 366, IPC, is used in its ordinary dictionary sense which would include forced by stress of circumstances.[76] If a woman voluntarily surrenders herself and her chastity to the accused and voluntarily follows him from village to village, no offence of abduction under this section can be said to have been3044 committed in view of her consent.[77] This section does not apply if the girl, at the time of kidnapping or abduction, intends to cohabit of her own free will with the kidnapper or abductor.[78]

17. 'Seduced'

Etymologically, the word 'seduction' is derived from two Latin words 'se' which means away, and 'duco', which means to lead, and together they mean to lead away or to draw away. The term 'seduction', therefore, implies that the woman is led away or is induced when the girl is drawn away from the virtuous course and then made to yield her chastity. However, where the deviation on the part of the girl is the result of the promptings of her own inclinations and she herself permits or encourages improper sexual relations, as opportunity comes her away, without the aid of any artifice or will on the part of the man, there is no seduction.[79]

'Seduced', in this section, is not used in the narrow sense of inducing a girl to part with her virtue for the first time; it includes subsequent seduction for further acts of illicit intercourse. The words 'seduced to illicit intercourse' do not refer to the first act of seduction only when she is lured into surrendering her chastity.[80] In Pessumal v Emperor ,[81] it was held that the word 'seduction' was not to be confined to the first connection with an unmarried girl. When a man has induced a girl, while in the custody of her parents, to surrender her chastity to him and has thereafter induced her to leave the protection of her parents and live with him in a condition of concubinage, not sanctioned by law, he commits an offence under s 366 . Every time a woman surrenders herself to lover, whether it is the first or the twentieth time, there is a seduction.

In Krishna Maharana v Emperor ,[82] it was held that a person may be guilty of kidnapping a girl for the purpose of seducing her to illicit intercourse even though he also had such intercourse prior to the kidnapping.[83] Following Lakshman Bala v Emperor ,[84] it has been held, in State v Gopichand Fattumal ,[85] that it is true that in its ordinary sense, it may have the same meaning as inducing, but, then, in conjunction with illicit intercourse, the word 'seduced' seems to be more appropriate than the word 'induced'. The word is used in the ordinary sense of enticing or tempting, irrespective of whether the girl has been previously compelled, or she has previously3045 submitted, to illicit intercourse. The Calcutta High Court has also held that the expression 'seduced to illicit intercourse' means induced to surrender. It is not restricted to inducing a girl to surrender her chastity for the first time; it covers the case in which the girl, having surrendered her virtue in the past, had returned to a life of purity at the time of the kidnapping.[86] The Orissa,[87] Assam,[88] Andhra Pradesh,[89] and Madras,[90] High Courts have also accepted the same line of reasoning. The Supreme Court,[91] upholding the above wide view, observed thus:

> Seduction implies surrender of her body by a woman, who is otherwise reluctant or unwilling to submit herself to illicit intercourse, in consequence of persuasion, flattery, blandishment or importunity, whether such surrender is for the first time or is preceded by similar surrenders on earlier occasions. However, where a woman offers herself for intercourse for money not casually, but in the course of her profession as a prostitute, there are no scruples nor reluctance to be overcome, and surrender by her is not seduction within the Code. It would, then, be impossible to hold that a person, who instigates another to assist a woman, following the profession of prostitute, abets him to do an act with intent that she may, or with knowledge that she will, be seduced to illicit intercourse.

18. 'Illicit Intercourse'

The words 'illicit intercourse' means the sexual intercourse between a man and a woman who are not husband and wife.[92] A wife may be chaste and may be seduced, that is to say, induced to surrender her chastity, by some man other than her husband. Therefore, 'seduced to illicit intercourse', in s 366, cannot be intended to be restricted to inducing a girl to surrender her chastity for the first time.[93]

19. 'By Means of Criminal Intimidation'

'Criminal intimidation' is defined, in s 503, thus ' Whoever threatens another with any injury to his person, reputation or property, or to the person or reputation of any one, in whom that person is interested, with intent, to cause alarm to that person, or to cause that person to do any act which he is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do any act which that person is legally entitled to do, as the means of avoiding the execution of such threat, commits criminal intimidation.'

For abduction, as defined in s 362, a person has to be compelled 'by force' or induced by 'any deceitful means' to go from any place. However, under the second part of this section, the compulsion to go may be by means of 'criminal intimidation or of abuse of authority or any other method of compulsion'. The compulsion need not be by force alone. But to convict a person under the said part, it is essential that he is found to have practised some criminal intimidation or employed any other method of compulsion. If the woman goes with a person willingly and without3046 anybody exercising any compulsion on her, no offence under this section is made out.[1] Where A, a procuress, induced B, a married woman, aged 20, to leave her husband and become a prostitute in Calcutta and B made a deliberate choice to do so and left her husband, it was held that A had committed no offence under this section.[2]

20. Age of Prosecutrix

The finding of the age of the prosecutrix being 16 years by the medical witness was primarily based on the x-ray report read with existence of eruption of 28 permanent teeth. The estimation of age from the teeth by noting the number and position of teeth and with x-ray examination with some amount of certainty is possible up to 17 to 20 years of age and beyond that it is merely guesswork. Third molar teeth which are six in number erupt between the age group of 17 to 25 years. In this case four 'third molars' teeth had not so far erupted in case of the prosecutrix on the date of her examination and the fusion of the epiphysis of her iliac crest had not yet started. As per Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology, crest of iliac appears at the age of 14 and its fusion starts between the age of 17 to 19. Medical jurisprudence aforesaid further reveals that distal end of ulna appears between age of 8 to 10 while its fusion in case of female starts at the age of 17. Therefore, the finding of the medical witness in view of the radiological report appears to be well founded and there should be no hesitation to come to the finding that prosecutrix was a woman under 18 years of age on the date of the occurrence.[3] See commentary under s 361, ante.

Where the victim is below 18 years of age, her consent is immaterial.[4]

The entries in school register by the Head Master of the School and certificate of birth issued by Municipality showed that the prosecutrix was aged about 14 years and was not major on the date of the incident. Both these documents were ante litem motam. Documents made ante litem can be relied upon safely, when such documents are admissible under s 35, of the Indian Evidence Act. Accused appellant was convicted under ss 366 and 376, IPC .[5]

Normally for various reasons, the guardians do understate the age of their children at the time of admission in school.[6]

Age of Prosecutrix Based on Unproved Marksheet

Where the mark sheet showing the age of the victim below 18 years was neither filed along with the challan by the prosecution nor it was exhibited by the prosecution, the finding of trial court that age of victim was below 18 years based on the said marks sheet, is not sustainable.[7]

Unreliable Evidence of Prosecutrix as to Age

Where the evidence of the father of the girl showing that the age of the girl on date of the incident was around 19 years, the physique of the girl as explained by the doctor indicated the probability of that girl being above the age of 18 years, the evidence of3047 the girl in such background appeared to be wholly unreliable when she stated that she was only about 14 years old.[8]

21. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of sessions.

22. Judicial Restraint while Dealing with Judgments of Lower Courts

The Apex Court has, time and again, advised the courts below to be extra careful in commenting upon the judicial conduct of the members of the judiciary. The adage 'to err is human' must always be borne in mind and this understanding must percolate down to the appellate and the trial courts.[9] For further commentary, see under same heading in s 302, ante.

23. Jurisdiction

When the prosecutrix is kidnapped from place 'A' and taken to place 'B' with intent to commit sexual intercourse, the act of kidnapping and that of rape formed part of same transaction, so by virtue of s 220, CrPC, both courts at place 'A' and 'B' would have jurisdiction to try offences under ss 366, 376, IPC .[10] The offences of kidnapping and rape are not only so interconnected as to cause and effect but also that the series of acts are so connected as to form part of the same transaction within the meaning of s 223(d), CrPC . Thus, when the offence of kidnapping was completed when the prosecutrix was kidnapped with the intention that she may be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse at place 'N' and the purpose of kidnapping was achieved at place 'I', the offences in question being connected together as to form part of same transaction within the meaning of s 223(d), CrPC, the accused person can be tried at place 'N'.[11] See s 181(2), CrPC .[12]

24. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of session judge, etc.) hereby charged you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the.....day of...., at....., you kidnapped (or abducted) AB, a woman, with intent (or knowing it to be likely) that she might be compelled to marry any person against her will (or in order (or knowing it to be likely) that she might be forced (or seduced) to illicit intercourse) (or you induced AB, a woman, by means of criminal intimidation (or by means of abuse of authority) or by any other method, to go from any place with intent (or knowing it to be likely) that she might be forced (or seduced) to illicit intercourse with another man), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 366 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charged.

Kidnapping and abduction are two distinct offences though they are punishable under the same section.[13] If it is desired to charge the accused with both the offences,3048 separate charges, and not one framed in the alternative in respect of both the offences, should be framed because the accused is entitled to know as to which of the charges he is asked to meet.[14] If there is only one charged framed in the alternative in respect of both the offences, the result would be that it cannot be ascertained for which the accused has been convicted.[15]

25. Evidence not Worth Believing

It is difficult to believe that the prosecutrix who is a mature lady married for 10 years would be made to walk from her place of residence to the other village and she would not raise any hue and cry apart from the fact that her husband who was sleeping with her had woken up and yet the accused had forcibly taken the prosecutrix away from her house. The husband in natural course of conduct would have resisted her wife being taken away forcibly. If he had some handicap because of being single, he would have certainly raised alarm and called the other persons. The place from where the prosecutrix was taken away, as referred in the FIR on one hand and stated in the evidence of the prosecutrix on the other, raises a grave doubt about the happening of the incident as alleged by the prosecution.[16]

26. Proof

Prove:

(1) for an offence under the first part of this section, that:

(a) the accused kidnapped, or abducted, a woman; and
(b) he did so with the intent, or knowledge of likelihood, of her being:

(i) compelled to marry any person against her will, or
(ii) forced, or seduced, to illicit intercourse;

(2) for an offence under the second part of this section, that:

(a) the accused induced, by means of criminal intimidation, or abuse of authority, or any other method of compulsion, a woman to go from any place; and
(b) he did so with the intent that she may be, or knowing it to be likely that she will be, forced, or seduced, to illicit intercourse with another person.
(c) to constitute an offence under s 366, IPC, it is necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused induced the complainant-woman or compelled by force to go from any place, that such inducement was by deceitful means, that such abduction took place with the intent that the complainant may be seduced to illicit intercourse and/or that the accused knew it to be likely that the complainant may be seduced to illicit intercourse as a result of her abduction. Mere abduction does not bring an accused under the ambit of this penal section.[17]

In a case of abduction and rape, conviction of the accused can be based entirely on the statement of a rape victim.[18]

27. Acquittal

In the absence of any evidence to prove the offence of abduction, simply because it is alleged that the accused committed rape, that does not necessarily mean that the prosecutrix was abducted by the accused. The conviction of the accused under s 366 was set aside.[19] Where the accused promised to marry the victim who was a major and voluntary party having followed path paved by the accused, there was absence of evidence on record showing compulsion on the part of accused, the conviction of accused under s 366, IPC, was found not proper and so was set aside.[20] Where the prosecution case was that the appellant accused kidnapped a 12 year old girl, raped her, committed her murder and threw her dead body in the bushes, the evidence of last seen was found not reliable, the identity of the appellant accused was not fully established, the appellant accused was not convicted of offences under ss 363, 376, 302 and 201, IPC .[21] Where the testimony of the prosecutrix does not inspire confidence, the conviction of the accused for kidnapping her cannot be based on her false testimony.[22] Accused appellant was prosecuted on allegations that he along with other accused persons abducted the prosecutrix and committed rape on her. Accused was not named in FIR. The mother and the sister were present at the time of abduction; the most important witnesses were not examined by the prosecution. The prosecutrix did not raise alarm for help while travelling certain distance after alleged abduction. Her testimony was shaky and not corroborated by medical evidence. The accused was shown to the prosecutrix at the police station. Conviction of the accused appellants under ss 366 and 376(2)(g), IPC was held not proper.[23] In a case under s 366, IPC one P who allegedly introduced the accused/appellant with the victim woman was neither made a witness nor she was made accused. Similarly, the other two ladies with whom the victim woman had allegedly gone to Mumbai were also not examined. The non-examination of the three ladies was held fatal to the prosecution case. Conviction of the accused appellant under s 366, IPC recorded by court below was set aside.[24] For further commentary, see under the same heading in s 365, ante.3050

The evidence showed that the victim girl had gone willingly. There was no evidence of any threat, coercion or inducement alleged to be extended by the accused. The victim girl was habituated to sexual intercourse and as such no injury was found on the person of the victim girl. Accused appellant was acquitted of the charges under ss 363, 366 and 376, IPC .[25]

28. Conviction

Unless the prosecution proves that the abduction is for the purposes mentioned in s 366, IPC, the court cannot hold the accused guilty and punish him under s 366, IPC .[26] If, instead of kidnapping, the offence of abduction with the same intention is proved, the accused can be convicted on a charge under this section in view of s 221(2), CrPC .[27]

Separate convictions for the two offences, if supported by evidence, cannot be said to be illegal.[28]

Where the evidence showed that the accused had visited the prosecutrix's house on earlier date and made sure that she goes to the school the next day, accused on the next day countered her on the way and made her sit in autorickshaw on false pretext of meeting someone, and she was taken to the railway station and to another city forcibly for sexual purposes, the conviction of the accused under ss 363 and 366, IPC was found proper.[29] The accused forcibly abducted the prosecutrix on gun point and carried her away and kept her confined and forcibly subjected her to sexual intercourse. The testimony of the prosecutrix, though not corroborated by other witnesses, was found consistent, reliable and trustworthy. The conviction of the accused was found proper.[30] The prosecutrix stated that the accused persons caught hold of her hand and dragged her to near by place and ravished her. The prosecutrix fled from there after the accused went to sleep. No consent on part of prosecutrix was proved. Holding that the fact that the version of prosecutrix was not corroborated by the medical evidence was immaterial, conviction of accused persons was found proper.[31] The accused and his companions were alleged to have abducted the prosecutrix with the object of getting her married with the accused. One doctor of the locality of prosecutrix followed accused persons while they were taking her away in car along with a police constable and arrested the main accused. The evidence of prosecutrix, doctor and police constable implicated the accused and his companions. Minor omissions in the testimony of prosecutrix were found immaterial. The conviction of the accused under s 366, IPC, was found proper.[32]3051

The accused kidnapped a girl aged about 18 years, took her to a lonely place and committed rape on her. The accused appellant was convicted under ss 366 and 376, IPC .[33]

The school leaving certificate and school register produced before the court showed that the age of the victim was 14 years on the date of the commission of the offence, there was also evidence of the Head Master of the School. There was no material before the High Court to ignore the said evidence. The acquittal of the accused was set aside and the accused was convicted for offences under ss 366 and 376, IPC .[34]

Four accused appellants entered the courtyard of the prosecutrix at about 11 p.m., on the point of pistol took her to the house in another village and committed rape on her. FIR was lodged the next day. Testimony of the prosecutrix and her mother was found reliable and was believed. Plea of false implication had no substance and as such was rejected. Conviction of all the accused under ss 366 and 376, IPC, sentence of 10 years RI for offence under s 376, IPC, and five years for offence under s 366, IPC was held proper.[35]

Three accused persons entered the house of the victim forcibly, lifted her, carried her to the shop of one accused, committed rape on her, the testimony of the prosecutrix was found reliable, accused were convicted under ss 366 / 457, 376 / 34, IPC .[36]

29. Probation

The benefit of probation should not be given to the abductor.[37] When the accused is convicted for offence under ss 366 and 354, IPC as he by deceitful means took the prosecutrix from her house and then outraged her modesty, though about 16 years elapsed from the date of the incident, the benefit of probation was not extended to the accused.[38]

30. Sentence

In the case of a woman, who, though under age of 18 year, is not only fully developed but is also used to sexual intercourse and is perhaps indulging in it for quite some time, the offence is just a little more than a technical one and the end of justice will be met if only a sentence of short term of imprisonment is inflicted.[39] Where the accused, who abducted the prosecutrix, who was of their own community and was a relation of theirs, forcibly took away the prosecutrix to their house, detained her for long against her will to pressurise her for marrying one of accused, to which she never yielded, and as such, finally released her to go back to her home, the sentence of four years rigorous imprisonment was reduced to one year's rigorous imprisonment and also a fine of Rs 2,000 each and in default of payment of fine, to further undergo two years rigorous imprisonment. It was further added that out of the fine, if realised, Rs 3,500 be paid to the prosecutrix by way of compensation.[40]

On account of lapse of 16 years from the date of incident the sentence of imprisonment was reduced from four years RI to one year RI under s 366, IPC .[41] When the accused has undergone the rigmarole of a criminal trial and trauma of3052 criminal proceedings for almost 24 years and had already served more than 1½ years custody out of total sentence of two years, the sentence of imprisonment was reduced to the period already undergone.[42] When the incident took place about seven years ago and accused was known to the prosecutrix and believed that she would come with him and accused wanted to marry her, the sentence of imprisonment was reduced from two years RI to one year RI.[43] When the prosecutrix below 16 years was consenting party, the sentence of four years RI awarded to main accused was reduced to three years RI and that of co-accused who had remained in jail for more than 21 months, was reduced to period already undergone.[44]

In the instant case the offence in question was a serious one, the accused appellant had seduced, kidnapped, sexually exploited a young girl of 16 years and thereafter deserted her, the trial court awarded the sentence of 4 years' RI which itself was inadequate. The reduction of sentence to the period already undergone (one month and three days) by the High court was ridiculously disproportionate to crime committed by the accused. The sentence awarded by the trial court was restored.[45]

The accused lady purchased the girl to compel her to have illicit intercourse, the accused lady was 76 years old when the appeal was decided by the High Court, the incident took place about 22 years ago, so the sentence of four years RI under s 366, IPC, was converted into the fine of Rs 10000 and in default of payment of fine to undergo RI for two years.[46]

The main accused was convicted under ss 376, 366 and 342, IPC, by the sessions court and sentenced to undergo imprisonment for seven years, five years and one year, respectively, and fine of Rs 200. The two co-accused were convicted under ss 366 and 342 IPC and sentenced to undergo imprisonment of five years and one year respectively. The session court also directed all the sentences to run concurrently. On appeal filed by the accused persons, the High Court reduced the sentences of the accused persons to the period already undergone, i.e., one and a half months after confirming their conviction for the said offences. The Apex Court set aside the order of the High Court and sentenced the main accused to undergo five years RI under s 376, IPC . Equally, all the accused were sentenced to undergo imprisonment for 5 years under s 366 and one year under s 342, IPC . The main accused was also directed to pay a fine of Rs 2000 and other accused Rs 1000 each.[47]

31. Alteration of Conviction from Section 366A to Section 366

When the prosecutrix had been kidnapped by the accused for the purpose of having illicit intercourse by the accused themselves and not others, the ingredients of s 366 IPC and not of s 366A, IPC, are attracted. Similarly, the conviction of accused was altered from s 366A to s 366, IPC .[48]

32. Alteration of Conviction from Sections 366 and 326 to Section 365

Procuration of minor girl.--

Whoever, by any means whatsoever, induces any minor girl under the age of eighteen years to go from any place or to do any act with intent that such girl may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be, forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person shall be punishable with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.]

Comments

1. Scope

This section is aimed at procurers only. If a person induces a girl under 18 years of age, by whatever means, to go from one place, or do any act, with the intention that such girl may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be, forced, or seduced, to have illicit intercourse with another man, he is punishable under this section.[2] When the prosecutrix had attained majority at time of occurrence, the offence under s 366A is not made out.[3] If, however, the accused procures the girl for himself, his offence is not one which comes within the purview of this section.[4] Similarly, where it was found that the prosecutrix, who was herself responsible for her misdeeds, herself wanted to have a good time and earning out of prostitution and no force, threat, deceit or inducement were used, upon her, by the accused and the illegal sexual intercourse, which she had, was not the result of any force or seduction, it was held that the accused could not be held guilty under this section.[5]Likewise, a person, who merely accompanies a woman, going out to ply her profession of a prostitute, even if she has not attained the age of 18 years, does not thereby commit an offence under this section. It cannot be said that merely by accompanying her, he induces her to go from any place, or to do any act, with the intent, or knowledge, contemplated in this section.[6] An offence under this section is a continuing offence.[7] Similarly, when, after inducement, the offender offers the girl to several persons, a fresh offence is not3054 committed at every fresh offer for sale and therefore several offers for sale show as much of a criminal intention of the offender as that of one offer for sale.[8]

2. Essential Ingredients

The principal ingredients,[9] which are essential for an offence under this section, are as follows:

(a) the accused must induce a girl;
(b) the age of the girl must be under 18 years;
(c) the said girl must be induced to go from a place or to do any act; and
(d) the accused must do so with the intention that she may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be, forced, or seduced, to illicit intercourse with another person.

To constitute an offence under s 366A of the IPC, there must be kidnapping of an woman under 18 years of age by inducing her to go from a place with intent that such woman may be or knowing that it is likely that she will be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person.[10]

3. 'Induces'

Inducement is an essential ingredient to constitute an offence under this section which requires that a minor girl must be induced, by the accused, to go from one place, or to do any act, with the requisite intention or knowledge. If, in a case, there is no evidence of any direct talk between the accused and the girl, nor even of any inducement offered, no offence is committed by the accused under this section.[11] Where evidence showed that the victim girl had left in the company of the accused of her own will and she was not forced to have sexual intercourse with any person other than the accused, the conviction of the accused under s 366A, IPC was set aside.[12] However, once the offence is committed by inducement, the girl's subsequent willingness will neither prevent the offence, nor would it reduce the gravity of the offence.[13]

The offence under s 366A is complete, if a girl under the age of 18 years is induced to go from any place by the culprits on any pretext.[14]

Once the age of the prosecutrix is found to be of about 12 or 13 years that is much below the age of 16 at the time of her having been taken away by the accused, her consent in going with him becomes quite immaterial.[15]3055

4. 'Minor Girl under the age of 18 Years'

Whether there is consent or no consent, kidnapping of a minor girl from the lawful custody of the guardian is punishable under s 366A, IPC .[16] One of the essential ingredients of the offence under s 366A is that the prosecutrix must be under the age of 18 years. Thus, when the victim is not a minor on the date of occurrence, in view of the oral evidence and in the absence of any authentic document regarding her age, the accused is entitled to be acquitted under s 366A .[17] On the point of proof of age, school certificate is the best evidence and so far as the medical certificate is concerned, the same is based on estimate so possibility of error cannot be ruled out.[18] It is true that the medical evidence in respect of age cannot be exact and the determination of the age is with reference to certain lower and higher margins and the benefit of outer margin must be given to the accused.[19] When the age of the victim is not proved to be below 18 years at the time of occurrence, the offence under s 366A, IPC, is not made out.[20] When the oral evidence of parents of the prosecutrix is corroborated by oral evidence of other witnesses and also medical evidence to show that her age was 12 or 13 years, her consent in going with accused becomes quite immaterial.[21]

For further commentary, s 361, ante, may be referred to.

5. Age of Prosecutrix--Determination of

The principal means which enable one to form a fairly accurate opinion about the age of an individual especially in the earlier years are teeth and ossification of bones. The estimation of age from the teeth by noting the number and position of the teeth erupted and the x-ray examination with some amount of certainty is only possible up to 17 and 20 years of age and beyond that it is merely guesswork. Primary teeth are replaced by permanent teeth which are 32 in number consisting of four incisors, canines, four premolars or bicuspids and six molars in each jaw. As per Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology[22] the third molar tooth erupts in the age group between 17th to 25th year. The Apex Court in the case of Jaya Mala v Home Secretary, Govt Of J&K ,[23] has observed that one can take judicial notice that the margin of error in age ascertained by radiological examination is two years on either side.[24] In Bhoopram v State of UP ,[25] the Hon'ble Supreme Court held that on the point of proof of age, school certificate is the best evidence and so far as the medical certificate is concerned, the same is based on estimate and possibility of error cannot be ruled out.

6. 'With Intent'

The intention of the accused is the gravamen for an offence under this section. An offence under this section is committed only when the accused induces the minor3056 girl, to go from one place, or to do any act, with intent that she may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be, forced, or seduced, to illicit intercourse with another person. Removal of the minor girl, by the accused, with the intention of marrying her is no offence under this section though under s 366, IPC, the removal of a girl even with the intention of giving her in marriage without her consent is illegal.[26]

7. 'Forced, or Seduced, to Illicit Intercourse with Another Person'

Commentary under the relevant headings in s 366, ante, may be referred to.

8. Sections 366 and 366A --Distinction

If the charge is under s 366A then 'kidnapping' is not the essential ingredient as there is a difference between s 366 and s 366A, IPC . While kidnapping, abduction is a part of the offence under s 366 and its latter part, viz., 'inducement' is the only common ingredient in s 366 and s 366A, IPC .[27]

Commentary under same heading in s 366, ante, may be referred to.

9. Anticipatory Bail

The provision under s 438, CrPC,[28] had to be sparingly used in rarest of rare cases where the conscience of the court of justice is satisfied that the accused is innocent or he has been falsely implicated due to some mala fide intent or it appears that it is a case of over-implication by an unscrupulous complainant. It is a condition precedent that anticipatory bail must be moved before cognizance is taken and non-bailable warrant is issued.[29] When from the perusal of case diary it appears that ingredients of s 366A, IPC are fully satisfied against the accused, he is not entitled to be enlarged on anticipatory bail.[30]

10. Identification of Accused

The identification of the accused in the court is substantive evidence. When it has come in evidence that the hotel manager and servant of the hotel had disclosed the name of the accused and on that basis he was arrested, and the mother, daughter, servant of hotel who identified the accused in the court had enough opportunity to identify the accused, so not holding of the test-identification parade for identification of the accused is not fatal to the prosecution case.[31]

11. Procedure

In view of the provisions of s 180, CrPC, a charge of abetment of an offence under s 366A may be enquired into and tried by the court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the offence itself was committed even if the abetment took place outside those limits.[32] For further commentary, s 366, ante, may be referred to.3057

12. Compounding of Offence--Permissibility

Whether there is consent or no consent, kidnapping of a minor girl from the lawful custody of the guardian is punishable under s 366A, IPC, so also the offence under s 376, IPC . Such offences are offences both against the individual and the society, and are not compoundable in nature. If a minor girl is kidnapped, raped and compelled to marry, then there is perhaps no other way for such a girl and her parents to agree to the terms of the accused of the crime. Quashing of such a criminal proceedings may or may not enure to the benefit of the prosecutrix in the long run, but compounding of such type of offences amounts to a disservice to the society in as much as by invoking the inherent power of the High Court tends to protect an accused who committed such heinous crime.[33]

13. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of session judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the.....day of....., at....., you induced AB, a minor girl under the age of eighteen years, to go from.....(name the place), (or to do the following act, namely,.....), with the intent that the said AB May be (or knowing that it is likely that the said AB will be) forced (or seduced) to illicit intercourse with CD, and thereby committed an offence, punished) to illicit intercom's with CD, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 366A of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

14. Evidence of Abducted Woman

The most important witness in an abduction case is generally the abducted woman herself and when her evidence is solitary one and other witnesses are not corroborating her evidence, then in such a situation the evidence of the abducted woman has to be scrutinised with care and caution to find as to whether there is ring of truth in the statement of the said abducted woman.[34]A prosecutrix of a sex offence cannot be put at par with an accomplice. She is in fact a victim of the crime. The Evidence Act 1872, nowhere says that her evidence cannot be accepted unless it is corroborated in material particulars. She is undoubtedly a competent witness under s 118 of the Evidence Act and her evidence must receive the same weight as is attached to an injured in cases of physical violence. The same degree of care and caution must attach in the evaluation of her evidence as in the case of an injured complainant or witness and no more. To insist on corroboration except in the rarest of rare cases is to equate a woman who is a victim of the lust of another with an accomplice to a crime and thereby insult womanhood, and it would be adding insult to injury to tell a woman that her story of woe will not be believed unless it is corroborated in material particulars as in the case of an accomplice to a crime. The standard of proof to be expected by the court in such cases must take into account the fact that such crimes are generally committed on the sly and very rarely direct evidence of a person other than the prosecutrix is available. Ordinarily a woman, more so a young girl, will not stake her reputation by leveling a false charge3058 concerning her chastity.[35] In the case of Bharwada Bhoginbhai Hirjibhai v State of Gujarat ,[36] it has been observed by the Apex Court that if the evidence of the victim does not suffer from any basic infirmity, and the 'probabilities factor' does not render it unworthy of credence, as a general rule, corroboration cannot be insisted upon, except from the medical evidence where, having regard to the circumstances of the case, medical evidence can be expected to be forthcoming. It has further been observed in the same case that, on principle, the testimony of a victim of sexual assault stands on par with the testimony of an injured witness. Just like the testimony of the injured witness, that of the victim of sex offence is entitled to great weight.

15. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(1) the accused induced a minor girl under the age of 18 years to go from a place or to do any act; and
(2) he did so with the intent that the girl may be, or knowing it that it is likely that the girl will be, forced, or seduced, to illicit intercourse with another person.

The prosecution must prove that the accused intended that the girl would be forced or seduced. If a person induces a girl to go from one place to another for the purpose of seducing her for himself, the offence is not one which comes within the purview of this section.[37] Similarly, the fact that a girl is beautiful is no evidence at all to show that the persons, with whom she goes away, had any intention that she should become an inmate of a brothel.[38]

When the evidence of informant father that victim was last seen going with the accused was not found convincing, it was proved that victim had left her house on earlier day of occurrence and there was no other evidence against the accused, the accused was acquitted under s 366A, IPC by giving the benefit of doubt.[39] The evidence does not always need corroboration in cases under s 366A, but where it is found that the girl in question has been definitely lying on important points in her story, then it is unsafe to rely on other parts of her evidence to convict any person of a criminal offence unless that evidence is corroborated on material points.[40]

The only prosecution evidence against the accused was that he was present at the house where the victim was brought after kidnapping, the victim was not available for examination in Court. The accused was not named in the FIR, and other evidence on the record did not show the involvement of the accused in the offence of kidnapping, therefore, it was held that the accused could not be implicated in the offence under ss 363 or 366A, IPC dehors other evidence to show his involvement in the events preceding the kidnapping.[41]3059

Where the victim girl stated that she was kidnapped while she was going to school and a tablet was put in mouth by which she got unconscious and the next day the victim was found in an unconscious state and then hospitalized, and the doctor's report also suggested that she had been hospitalized where she gained consciousness after 4-5 days, the uncorroborated testimony of the victim girl was believed, and the conviction of the accused under s 366A, IPC was held proper.[42]

Where it was not conclusively proved that the victim at the time of the occurrence was below 18 years of age and that the accused had induced the victim to leave her house, the accused was acquitted of the charge under s 366A, IPC .[43]

16. Sentence

Where the accused convicted under s 366A, IPC, had already remained in jail for about three and a half years and both the victim girl and accused had already been married, the sentence of imprisonment of the accused was reduced from seven years to five years.[44] The accused had been in custody for more than seven years so his sentence under s 366A, IPC, was reduced from seven years rigorous imprisonment to the period of custody already undergone.[45]

Where the accused kidnapped a minor girl and sold her at a place far away for illegal and immoral purpose, it was held that in such a case it was just and proper that a deterrent sentence be imposed on the accused. Thus, a sentence of 7 years rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs. 50,000/-, as awarded by the High Court, was upheld.[46]

17. Alteration of Conviction under this Section into One under Section 498

A conviction under s 366A, IPC, does not, by necessary implication involve an acquittal on an alternative charge under s 498, IPC, and an appellate court is competent under ss 385 and 386, CrPC, to alter the conviction under s 366A, IPC, into a conviction on the alternative charge under s 498, IPC .[47]

18. Alteration of Conviction from Section 366A to Section 366

Commentary under the same heading in s 366, ante, may be referred to.

19. Alteration of Conviction from Section 366A to Section 365

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

S. 367.

Kidnapping or abducting in order to subject person to grievous hurt, slavery, etc.--

Whoever kidnaps or abducts any person in order that such person may be subjected, or may be so disposed of as to be put in danger of being subjected to grievous hurt, or slavery, or to the unnatural lust of any person, or knowing it to be likely that such person will be so subjected or disposed of, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section penalises kidnapping or abduction in order to subject a person to:

(1) grievous hurt,
(2) slavery, or
(3) unnatural lust.

2. 'Person'

The word 'person' in this section, would denote any male or female human being, and under s 5, the singular number would include the plural number.

3. 'Grievous Hurt'

Commentary under s 320, ante, may be referred to.

4. 'Slavery'

Commentary under the heading 'slave' in ss 370 and 371, post, may be referred to.

5. 'Unnatural Lust'

When despite the fact the accused was arrested within 24 hours of commission of offence, he was not examined to discover injuries on his private parts or presence of any organic matter around his private parts and no injury was found around the anus of the victim, the charge under s 367, IPC, against the accused was found not proved.[53] For further commentary, see s 377, ante.3062

6. Procedure

When the police officials while discharging their official functions are accused of having committed some excesses and offences under ss 367, 368, 363, 365, 330 and 331, IPC, sanction under s 197 of CrPC for prosecution of police officials is mandatory.[54] For further commentary, see s 366, ante.

7. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

> I (name and office of sessions judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:
> That, on or about the .....day of ....., at..... you kidnapped (or abducted) AB in order that the said AB may be subjected (or may be so disposed of as to be put in danger of being subjected) to grievous hurt (or slavery (or to the unnatural lust) of CD, or knowing it to be likely that such person will be so subjected (or disposed of), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 367 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.
> And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

A person can be charged with an auxiliary offence when he stands charged with the main offence. An offence under s 326, IPC is triable by a magistrate of the first class. So, the charge under this section can be framed along with a charge for the auxiliary offence under s 326 and the offence under s 326 can be tried by the court of session, if committed to it by a competent magistrate.[55]

8. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(1) the accused kidnapped or abducted a person; and
(2) he did so:

(i) in order that such person may be subjected, or may be so disposed of as put in danger of being subjected, to

(a) grievous hurt, or
(b) slavery, or unnatural lust, of any person, or

(ii) knowing it likely that such person will be subjected, or disposed of, as stated in the above sub-cl (a) or (b).

When the High Court did not accept the story of murder by the accused who was alleged to have abducted the deceased nor did the High Court record a finding that the grievous hurt was caused to the deceased by the accused, the conviction of the accused under s 367, IPC was held not warranted.[56]

9. Conviction

When the abduction of the victim is proved by evidence adduced by the injured and also by his son and the co-villager, the place of occurrence has also been established by the prosecution, the finding of the trial court that accused persons armed with3063 guns were members of the unlawful assembly and in prosecution of common object to cause grievous hurt to the victim, they had abducted him from his village and thereby committed offence under s 367, IPC, which were subsequently upheld by the High Court, is not liable to be disturbed.[57]

10. Sentence

The accused was convicted under ss 342, 367 and 377 read with s 511, IPC and sentenced to undergo imprisonment for one year under s 342 and three and a half years RI and fine of Rs 500 each for committing offence under ss 367 and 377, IPC, read with s 511, IPC . In default of payment of fine he was ordered to undergo further RI for six months on each court. All the substantive sentences of imprisonment were to run concurrently as per order of the trial court. Taking into consideration the fact that the accused underwent agony of trial for about eight months in the trial court and his appeal also remained pending for the last more than one and a half years in the High Court, and he was in jail for about 11 and a half years, the sentence of imprisonment awarded to the accused was reduced to the period already undergone in jail whereas the sentence of fine or in default thereof awarded by the trial court was maintained.[58]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

S. 368.

Wrongfully concealing or keeping in confinement, kidnapped or abducted person.--

Whoever, knowing that any person has been kidnapped or has been abducted, wrongfully conceals or confines such person, shall be punished in the same manner as if he had kidnapped or abducted such person with the same intention or knowledge, or for the same purpose as that with or for which he conceals or detains such person in confinement.

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

This section applies to persons who assist in concealing or confining a kidnapped or abducted person, and not to the principal offender,[59] whose conviction is not necessary in order to convict the person who assists even knowing that kidnapping or abduction has been committed by someone or the other.[60] The section presupposes that the offence of kidnapping or abduction has taken place so that anyone, wrongfully concealing or confining the person kidnapped or abducted, is guilty of an3064 offence under this section.[61] There must be a concealment or confinement, and not merely keeping by giving food and shelter and allowing the person to live in the house.[62]

2. 'Knowing that any Person has been Kidnapped or has been Abducted'

A conviction under this section can be maintained only if the accused can be charged with the knowledge of the fact that a person had been kidnapped or abducted. The mere fact that a girl was brought to his house at night and was kept there in a locked room, is not enough to credit the accused with a knowledge that the girl had been kidnapped or abducted.[63] It must be remembered that this section is confined only to knowledge of the fact of kidnapping or abduction. It contains no words, as do certain other sections of the Code (e.g., ss 411, 497 and 498, IPC), such as 'or having reason to believe or suspecting'. Similarly, the only question that has to be considered, is whether the accused can be said to have known that the person in question had been kidnapped or abducted.[64] If knowledge required by the section is not established, the question of wrongful confinement would remain. And if the wrongful confinement is proved, the accused can be convicted for that offence.[65]

3. 'Wrongfully Conceals or Confines'

As to wrongful concealment, a Full Bench of the Punjab Chief Court observed that the act of concealment refers to the withdrawal, from the actual observation of others, by removal or otherwise, of the person, kidnapped or abducted, and does not include the mere giving of false information about such person.[66] Merely taking the kidnapped or abducted girl away to a long distance, so that her father or guardian should not know where she is, does not amount to concealment.[67] The mere fact of a girl being received into a house and retained there by the owner, even after he may have become aware, or found reason to believe, that she has been kidnapped, does not amount to concealment of her unless an intention of keeping her out of view is apparent.[68] If the evidence is that the girl was recovered from a room in the house of the accused which had no shutters and which opened on an outer verandah, it cannot be said that the girl was concealed within the meaning of the section.[69]

However, where the accused took a girl to her own house and kept her there till evening and then removed her in a closed carriage to a solitary bungalow, far away from the town, it was held to be a good evidence of concealment.[70] For further commentary, see s 340, ante.

4. Bail

The offences under ss 366, 368, 376 / 34, IPC, were alleged against accused. Two of the accused had already been granted bail. Though police has not registered the3065 offence under s 370, IPC, despite the fact that prosecutrix was treated as a chattel as a subject of sale and purchase, such omission by police does not reduce the gravity of offences alleged against accused person, thus, considering the seriousness of the allegations made against the accused, the bail application was dismissed.[71]

5. Grant of Custody of Prosecutrix

Though father sought custody of the prosecutrix alleging her to be minor but once it is found that the marriage between prosecutrix is valid in law, her custody should be given to the accused only as he is her husband in the eyes of law. The order of the trial court directing the custody of the prosecutrix with Nari Niketan is unsustainable. During the pendency of the proceedings under ss 363, 366, 368 and 376, IPC, before magistrate, the question of guardianship or custody of the guardian does not arise at all. To have the custody of the prosecutrix if she is found to be minor, the father of the girl may approach the appropriate civil court under the Guardianship and Ward Act, and the Hindu Minority and Guardianship Act.[72]

6. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non compoundable, and triable by a court by which the kidnapping, or abduction, is triable.

7. Place of Trial

A charge under this section may be enquired into or tried by the court having jurisdiction at the place of concealing or at the place where the kidnapping took place.[73]

8. Joint Trial

A person charged under this section can be jointly tried with persons charged under ss 366 and 498, IPC, where all the offences are committed in the course of the same transaction.[74] However, two persons charged for separate acts of concealment of the same girl cannot be tried jointly.[75]

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Magistrate/sessions judge, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the .....day of.....at... you wrongfully concealed (or confined) AB, knowing that the said AB had been kidnapped (or abducted), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 368 of the Indian Penal Code, within my cognizance (or3066 within the cognizance of this court). And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

10. Statement made by Prosecutrix Against Accused to her Parents--Admissibility

The statement made by the prosecutrix against the accused persons to her parents narrating the incident soon after the occurrence is a corroborative piece of evidence under ss 8 and 157 of the Evidence Act 1872.[76] The statement is also admissible as res gestae under s 6 of the Evidence Act 1872.[77]

11. Proof

In order to secure conviction under this section, the prosecution must prove[78] that:

(a) the person in question had been kidnapped or abducted;
(b) the accused knew that the said person had been kidnapped or abducted; and
(c) he, having such knowledge, wrongfully concealed or confined the person concerned.

The prosecution has to prove that the accused wrongfully concealed or confined a person knowing that person was kidnapped or abducted. Mere evidence to show that the accused said that they wanted to sell the girl is not sufficient to warrant their conviction under this section.[79] Unless it is proved that the accused had knowledge that the girl was kidnapped or abducted, he or they cannot be held guilty on mere presumption.[80]

12. Acquittal

When the statement of prosecutrix is contradictory and inconsistent and she is not a woman of virtue, the conviction of the accused persons under ss 366, 368, IPC is not proper on the basis of the sole testimony of such prosecutrix.[81]

13. Conviction

A person convicted of the offence under this section or its abetment, can again be convicted on the same facts under s 343, IPC .[82]

Where the prosecutrix aged 15 years was induced and taken by first accused from her house to the house of second accused and second accused confined her therein concealing her presence, the conviction of first accused under s 363 and second accused under s 368, IPC, was upheld. However, in the absence of any overt act by other co-accused persons, their conviction under ss 363 and 366, IPC, was set aside.[83] When the minor girl was kidnapped and kept in confinement by the accused, conviction of accused under ss 366 and 368, IPC, was found proper.[84]3067

The offences under ss 365 and 368 are lesser offences as compared to offence under s 366 . Where there was sufficient evidence to show that the woman was abducted from her home and was taken to various places by the accused persons, she was also confined in a house till she was recovered by the police, the conviction of the accused under ss 366 / 34, IPC, was altered to one under ss 365 and 368, IPC .[85]

14. Sentence

The accused convicted of offence under s 368, IPC, was sentenced to 11 and a half years imprisonment by the sessions court. He had been facing trial and prosecution for more than 25 years and had already undergone part of the sentence, so sentence of imprisonment of the accused was reduced to the period already undergone by him.[86] Keeping in view that age of accused lady convicted under ss 366-368, IPC was 76 years at the time of disposal of the appeal, and also taking into account the fact that she was ill, instead of sentencing her to imprisonment she was sentenced to pay a fine of Rs 10,000, each under ss 366 and 368, IPC, and in default of payment of fine, rigorous imprisonment for two years on each count.[87] However, where the accused had taken an active part in abducting and torturing the complainant and had demanded ransom, it was held that there was no ground to reduce the sentence of three years rigorous imprisonment.[88]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

S. 369.

Kidnapping or abducting child under ten years with intent to steal from its person.--

Whoever kidnaps or abducts any child under the age of ten years with the intention of taking dishonestly any moveable property from the person of such child, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with the kidnapping or abduction of a child under the age of 10 years with the intention to take away the movable property from the person of such child.

'Taking Dishonestly any Moveable Property'

Commentary under ss 22 and 24, vol 1, may be referred to.

Grant of Custody of Prosecutrix

Commentary under s 368, ante, may be referred to.3068

2. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate of the first class.

3. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of magistrate, etc) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the....day of....at....you kidnapped (or abducted) AB, a child then under the age of ten years, with the intention of taking dishonestly the moveable property, to wit..... from the person of the said AB, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 369 of the Indian Penal Code, and within my cognizance.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

4. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(1) the accused kidnapped or abducted a child;
(2) such child was, then, under 10 years of age; and
(3) he did so with the intention of taking dishonestly any movable property from the person of such child.

The prosecution case was that the accused kidnapped a one and a half year old girl from the house of her parents and relieved her of the gold ornaments which she was wearing and then threw her dead body into a nearby pond after tying stones to it. The prosecution story regarding arrest of the accused was not believable and prosecution evidence regarding commission of offence under ss 302, 392, 417, 369 and 201, IPC, was found unreliable. The acquittal of accused for the said offences was held proper.[89]

5. Separate Conviction and Punishment under Sections 369 and 363 --Permissibility

Since the offence under s 363, IPC is included in an offence under this section, separate convictions and sentences under the two sections are not maintainable.[90]

1. Legislative Changes

The present ss 370 and 370A have been substituted for the old s 370, IPC by the Act No. 13 of 2013, s 8 (wef 3-2-2013). The heading of the old s 370, IPC "Buying or3070 disposing of any person as a salve" has been substituted by the heading "Trafficking of person". The new s 370 deals with the heinous offence of trafficking a person, more rampant these days, and prescribes various sentences ranging from seven years to imprisonment for life. The consent of the victim is immaterial in determination of the offence of trafficking.

The new s 370A makes the sexual exploitation of a trafficked person punishable.

Recommendations of Justice J.S. Verma Committee

> This report will be incomplete without dealing with the heinous offence of trafficking of humans, whether it is of children or women for various purposes, understated as immoral but in reality heinous. It now stands undisputed that one of the main reasons for human trafficking is for Commercial Sexual Exploitation (CSE) of these children and women. This view has been reaffirmed by the Supreme Court in the decision of (Bachpan Bachao Andolan v. Union of India [92]. Offences committed initially on them never come to light. Over time the sexual abuse becomes part of their life. It then gets termed s prostitution and then the abuse borders on being consensual. It is this vicious circle of missing children/women-trafficking-abuse-prostitution which needs to be curbed with urgent measures.
> The NHRC, in a report[93] published on 'missing children' says that on an average 44000 children go missing in the country every year. Of these children, 11,000 remain untraced. It cannot be ignored that there are cases where children run away from their homes. However, it also cannot be ignored that many are taken away against their volition. We are surprised by the fact that when the factum of a child going missing is reported to the police station, no FIR is registered. It is merely educed to a General Diary (GD) entry which then passés through various information dissemination channels and finally rests in the National Crime Records Bureau's (NCRB) TALAASH Information System. This database is not properly updated since the police reporting of having recovered missing children to the NCRB is, apparently, lax.
> It is quite unacceptable that cases of 'missing children', which may or may not be the result of trafficking in humans, is considered at part with a 'lost and found' situation of inanimate objects. Further, the accountability of the police in these cases is almost non-existent. We are of the strong opinion that it be made legally mandatory that FIRS be registered by the police in case where children are reported to be missing. This makes the police more accountable and under the direct control of the Courts.
> As far as the trafficking of these children is concerned, the law seems to lag behind social realities. The only law in India dealing with offence of trafficking is the ITPA apart from the IPC, the latter having many provisions which may be employed to deal with different aspects of trafficking. Ironically though, the term 'trafficking in persons' is nowhere defined in our law. It has been however defined in the United Nations Palermo Protocol (Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Woman And Children, Supplementing The United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime, 2000) as:

"Trafficking in persons" shall mean the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the going or receiving of payments or benefits of achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation.3071 Exploitation shall include, at a minimum, the exploitation of the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery servitude or the removal of organs

The above definition links traditional offences under the Indian Penal Code to the composite offence of 'trafficking in persons' and this inexorable link will put an additional burden on the police to lodge an FIR and investigate it in accordance with law. The above definition is also pertinent because the nadir of an offence need not always be in another offence. Phrases like 'abuse of power or a position of vulnerability' and 'giving or receiving benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control of another person' etc. are per se not offences in the eyes of our law. It is therefore imperative that these actions be linked to the offence of 'trafficking' so as to make them culpable. This definition has been adopted in the Goa Children's Act, 2003[94] which can also be used as a template to evolve law in this area

In any event, we recommend that the definition of 'trafficking' contained in the Palermo Protocol ought to be adopted by the Legislature as a definition of the offence in the Indian context, since the lack of definition of trafficking and the ineffective law enforcement in relation to trafficking and in particular the non-application of the provisions contained in the Indian Penal Code in relation to the same have actually made trafficking a huge industry which has not been brought to any critical gaze of law enforcement for reasons already cited. We believe that in order to protect the dignity of women in particular, it is necessary that the definition of trafficking as contained above must be incorporated as an independent definition in the Penal Code as a separate offence.[95]

2. Essential Ingredients of Offence

Where a person for the purpose of exploitation--

(v) by abuse of power, or
(vi) by inducement, including the giving or receiving of payments or benefits, in order to achieve the consent of any person having control3072 over the person recruited, transported, harboured, transferred or received, commits the offence of trafficking.

5. Commentary under the old Section 370 , IPC

For assistance in the disposal of the pending cases, the commentary below under the old s 370 has been retained.

Scope

The institution of slavery flourished in ancient days, however, with the advance of civilisation, slavery came to be considered as one of the worst social evils. Blackstone defined it as the civil relation in which one man possesses an absolute power over the life, liberty and future of another. The circumstance which made slavery the worst of all social evils was that the master had a legal right to enforce the performance of certain services without the slave having recourse to any tribunals.[1] This section and the succeeding s 371, IPC were enacted to suppress the practice of slavery.[2] The section makes it an offence:

(i) to import, export, remove, buy, sell or dispose of any person as a slave; or
(ii) to accept, receive or detain, against his will, any person as a slave.

The crux of the offence is the disposal as a slave. Disposal of a girl in marriage cannot be said to be a disposal of the girl as a slave. Where the accused bought a girl, aged nine, and gave her in marriage to his brother, it was held that he was not guilty of the offence of disposing a girl as a slave.[3] A sale of an infant by a parent for value would not be an exploitation of the child under s 370, IPC .[4] A person who buys young girls in one district and disposes of them in marriage in another district, is not, therefore, guilty of an offence under this section or the succeeding s 371, IPC .[5] Similarly, if a person purchases a girl in a foreign territory knowing her to be a slave and imports her into India, the purchase is not in itself an offence under this section.3073 Nor is importing her into India such an offence unless it is shown that the accused imported her as a slave.[6] Where, however, in Koroth Mammad v Emperor ,[7] Pulayan, aged 25 years, was sold by the second accused to the first accused under a jenman deed, by which Pulayan and his heirs were granted to the first accused in absolute ownership, it was held that the transaction amounted to disposing of a person as a slave within the meaning of the section and both the accused were guilty. Similarly, where a girl, aged 13 years, was sold as a vellati, i.e. as a slave, it was held that the offence under this section was committed by the person who transferred, or purported to transfer, his supposed rights of property in the girl.[8]

Crux of the Offence

The crux of the offence under this section, as stated earlier, is the disposal of a person 'as a slave'. A slave is a creature, without any right or status whatsoever, who is, or may become, the property of another as a mere chattel, the owner having absolute power of disposal by sale, gift, or otherwise, and even if life or death, without any responsibility to any legal authority.[9] Disposal of a girl in marriage cannot be said to be a disposal of the girl as a slave.

Slave

The world 'slave', as appearing in s 370, IPC, has not been defined in the Code. We have, therefore, to look for its ordinary meaning. The Oxford Dictionary defines slave as a human chattel, a helpless victim to or of some dominating influence, a person having no leisure or a contemptible person, captured by others and made to serve them. In Webster's Dictionary, a slave is defined as one who has no freedom of action but whose person and services are wholly under the control of another.

The Black's Law Dictionary defines slave to mean a person who is wholly subject to the will of another, one who has no freedom of action, but whose person and services are under the powers of a master, and who belong to him, so that the master may sell and dispose his person.

Such is the determinate and fixed condition of the slave and it is not, as ruled in Empress v Sikundur Bukhut ,[10] a condition capable of degrees.[11] A person is treated as a slave if another asserts an absolute right to restrain his personal liberty, and to dispose of his labour against his will, unless that right is conferred by law, as in the case of a parent, guardian or jailor.[12] The minimum requirement of the status of slavery is the absolute power asserted over the liberty of the slave on his personal services.[13] In the last cited case, Napier J, said that the word 'slave', in this Code does not connote any thing more than a right to property in the person, a right to retain his services, and a right to dispose of his person and services. In Ganpat v Empress ,[14] it was said that the word 'slave', in this section, is not used in a metaphorical sense.3074

Slavery Earlier and The Present Position

In the ancient world, the slave girls staffed brothels and filled harems. It was also possible for a free individual to sell himself, or under his authority, a wife or a child, grandchild, a ward into slavery for money or other considerations, until the vassal was recognised as a person before law.[15]

Although the sale of persons into chattel slavery has been virtually eliminated, however, it can be seen that practices leading to the similar results frequently have outlived the legal prohibitions. One such practice has been the adoption of children, especially girls of extremely poor households by wealthy people who pay a certain price to the natural parents and thereafter exploit the child. Such practices have perpetuated in disguise, and this kind of practice continues even after its official legal condemnation.[16]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

S. 371.

Habitual dealing in slaves.--

Whoever habitually imports, exports, removes, buys, sells, traffics or deals in slaves, shall be punished with [18][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Comments

1. Scope

This section is aimed at punishing a habitual slave-dealer. He is one who makes a profession of buying and selling slaves. In other words, he trades in them. The word 'traffic' should be construed ejusdem generis with the words preceding it. It may include an agent who negotiates the purchase and sale on a commission basis. A person, who steals a child for being sold as a slave, is punishable under this section, in addition to that for kidnapping for which he may be principally liable.

2. Slave

The term 'slave' is not defined in this Code. 'Slave', according to Chambers' Twentieth Century Dictionary[19] is a 'person who is held as property' or 'one who is submissive under domination' and, according to the ConciseOxfordDictionary,[20] a slave is a 'person who is the legal property of another or others and is bound to absolute obedience'. Similarly, slavery is the 'civil relation in which one man has absolute power over the liberty of another.'[21] The institution of slavery is now virtually defunct and shocks the civilised conscience of mankind. A dealer in slaves enables a continuous supply of slaves. If he conducts his trade on the seas, he is a pirate and punishable as such. And if he carries on his trade on land, he is punishable under this section. For further commentary, see the same heading in s 370, ante.

3. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of sessions.3076

4. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of sessions judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the.....day of.....at.....you habitually imported (or exported) (or removed) (or bought) (or sold) (or trafficked in) (or dealt with in) slaves.....(name the slave or slaves), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 371 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

5. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(1) the accused imported, exported, removed, bought, sold, trafficked in, or dealt with in, slaves; and
(2) he did so habitually.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

S. 372.

Selling minor for purposes of prostitution, etc.--

Whoever sells, lets to hire, or otherwise disposes of any [22][person under the age of eighteen years with intent that such person shall, at any age, be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution or illicit intercourse with any person or for any unlawful and immoral purpose, or knowing it to be likely that such person will, at any age be], employed or used for any such purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[23][Explanation I.--When a female under the age of eighteen years is sold, let for hire, or otherwise disposed of to a prostitute or to any person who keeps or manages a brothel, the person so disposing of such female shall, until the contrary is proved, be presumed to have disposed of her with the intent that she shall be used for the purpose of prostitution.

Explanation II.--For the purposes of this section, "illicit intercourse" means sexual intercourse between persons not united by marriage, or by any union or tie which, though not amounting to a marriage, is recognised by the personal law or custom of the community to which they belong or, where they belong to different communities, of both such communities, as constituting between them a quasi-marital relation.]3077

Comments

1. Scope and Applicability

The prevalence in the country of the menace of children being used for unlawful and immoral purposes is well-known. Doctors in nursing homes who, contrary to all norms of professional ethics, sell a recently born child without ascertaining satisfactorily the purpose for which the child is being purchased and without taking proper precautions to ensure that the child may not fall in undesirable hands must, prima facie, be imputed with the knowledge that the child, at some age, is likely to be employed or used for any unlawful and immoral purpose within the meaning of s 372 of the IPC .[24] This section, which is enacted to protect the chastity of girls under the age of 18 years, prohibits the disposition of minor girls for the purpose of prostitution or illicit intercourse.[25] To sell a woman as a mistress comes within the purview of this section as this is an immoral purpose. Even where the woman in question is a married woman, any sexual intercourse with her would be immoral.[26] The section is applicable to married as well as unmarried female minors,[27] even if they were prostitutes before the accused obtained possession of them.[28] The section applies whether the woman is taken as a mistress or as a prostitute. This section and the succeeding s 373 do not cease to be applicable because the minor[29] concerned is the dancing girl by caste.[30]

2. Ingredients

The essential ingredients of the offence under this section are:

(1) there should be, by the accused, selling, or letting to hire, or other disposal of a person;
(2) such person should be under the age of 18 years;
(3) the selling, letting to hire, or other disposal should be with intent, or knowledge of the likelihood, that such person shall, at any age, be employed or used for

    (i) the purpose of prostitution, or
    (ii) illicit intercourse with any person, or
    (iii) any unlawful and immoral purpose.

The offence, made punishable under this section, is complete when the person, intending that a minor should be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution or for any unlawful or immoral purpose, or knowing it to be likely that such minor will be employed or used for any such purpose, intentionally places the minor in a position calculated to bring about the result intended or known to be likely. The offence, under this section, consists in the intentional or conscious exposure of the minor to the danger of degradation. If the accused did all, which they could, to expose the minors to such danger, it is immaterial whether the customary ceremonial3078 accompaniments, for giving the prostitutes a particular status, were actually completed or not.[31]

An offence under s 372, IPC may be made out on the proof of sale of a girl, even without the proof of change of possession.[32]

3. 'Disposes of'

The term 'disposes of' does not necessarily mean a change of possession.[33] It is not required that the accused should give up present possession of the minor in order to be amenable to the law under this section.[34] In a Madras case,[35] it was observed that the term 'dispose of', as used in this section, contemplates some physical disposal for a mercenary purpose or the exercise of some power of control which would be final and irrevocable in its moral effects. In a later case,[36] the Madras High Court took the view that the word 'disposal' necessarily connotes some control, at any rate, by the person disposing over the minor, disposed of, and therefore, a mere direction to a minor to go over to a brothel would not constitute a disposal of the minor. When minor girls who were begging were taught singing and dancing, and made to accompany their grandmother, a dasi, to the temple, to take part in the ceremonies of the temple with a view to qualify them as dasis, it was held that this did not amount to a disposal under this section.[37] However, in Public Prosecutor v Maddila Mutayulu ,[38] it was observed that the language of this section and s 373, IPC shows that there must be making over possession of the minor girl either by sale or by hire or some similar arrangement in order that the case may come within the mischief of the section. If the only evidence is that the ceremony of Kanyadikam was performed between the minor girl and the accused with the help of her mother, entitling the accused to enjoy the girl's bed for three days successively, and the minor girl continued to live with her parents, who did not part with her possession to the accused, the facts cannot support conviction of the mother under this section (and, of the lover under s 373, IPC).

It may be regarded as settled law that the dedication of a minor to a temple in order that she might serve the temple as a dancing girl amounts to disposal of the minor for the purpose of prostitution, particularly when there is evidence of the kind of life led by girls so dedicated.[39] It is a notorious fact that women, who are temple dancers, lead the life of prostitutes.[40] If a minor girl is taken for singing and dancing in a temple and received prasadam as the daughter of the accused, a temple dasi, though without any formal adoption of the girl, it is sufficient3079 evidence to raise a presumption of guilt under the section and casts, upon the accused, the burden of showing the absence of a guilty intention or knowledge.[41] However, the mere performance of a gejjee ceremony, which may be a preliminary to the final falshobhan ceremony, is an incomplete dedication to the temple as a dancing girl and would not amount to disposal within the meaning of the section.[42] Similarly, a ceremony, such as the tying of a talisman on a minor girl, worshipping of basin of water and distributing food, may be a preliminary step before the selling or letting out or disposing of the minor and would not constitute an offence under the section.[43]

4. 'Person under the Age of Eighteen Years'

The person disposed of should not attain, at the time of disposal, the age of 18 years. If a person is above that age, the offence, under this section, is not committed, however immoral the transaction may be. Thus, the precise age of the person, at the time of disposal is an essential ingredient of the offence and it must be clearly established.[44] The question of age of a girl, when she is on the verge of becoming a major, presents difficulties. In such a case, medical evidence is useful, but it is liable to err within a year or two of the correct age.[45]

Nevertheless, such evidence may corroborate the direct testimony of witnesses on the question.

5. Intention or Knowledge

The question, whether or not the disposal of the minor was effected with the intention or knowledge which must be combined with the disposal to constitute the offence, is a question of fact to be determined according to the circumstances of each case.[46] The crucial point of time, for determining the culpability of a person under the section, is one when the sale takes place.[47] In order to support a conviction under this section, it would be sufficient to show that the minor (girl) was given and accepted with the intention,[48] or with the knowledge, specified therein. If a minor girl is sold with the intent that she should become the wife of a certain person and cohabit with him as such, no offence under this section is committed[49] even if it subsequently turns out that the marriage did not strictly conform to Hindu Law.[50]3080

6. 'Likely'

It has to be taken notice of that the word 'likely' in the section denotes 'probability' and not 'certainty'.[51]

7. 'For the Purpose of Prostitution'

Prostitution is 'the indiscriminate consorting of a woman with men for hire'.[52] The idea underlying prostitution is that a woman should surrender her body for a monetary consideration to someone who is not, in law, entitled to have sexual intercourse with her.[53] Explanation I provides that if a minor girl is disposed of to a prostitute or the keeper or manager of a brothel, it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that such disposal was with the intent that the minor girl shall be used for the purpose of prostitution.

A brothel is 'a place resorted to by persons of both sexes for prostitution'. The premises are used as a brothel if it is proved that persons of opposite sexes meet there for having illicit sexual intercourse.[54]

8. 'Illicit Intercourse'

The meaning to be given to the words 'illicit intercourse' for the purpose of this section, is provided by Explanation II. In substance, intercourse is illicit if it is between persons who are not united by marriage or do not have a quasi-marital relationship.[55]It is, therefore, no defence, after the amendment of this section in 1924, that there was only a single act of intercourse and that the girl was not used habitually for the purpose of indiscriminate sexual intercourse.

9. 'Unlawful and Immoral Purpose'

This expression demands that the purpose must be unlawful as well as immoral. But an act may be unlawful, though not immoral, it may, likewise, be immoral, but not unlawful. Where the accused falsely represented to a person that a certain minor girl, really belonging to a lower caste, belonged to a higher caste and that person, believing the representation to be true, married her, it was held that it could not be said that the prohibited act was done with the intent that the minor should be used for an 'unlawful and immoral purpose'. Even if the marriage was not broken and the wife became a mistress, the purpose may be immoral, but it is impossible to say that it is unlawful.[56] In Re Ponrangam,[57] it was held that, in the absence of any special custom, at all events, it is unlawful for a person to enter into a transaction whereby a minor is transferred to another as his concubine, the purpose of such a transaction is both illegal and immoral.

10. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a court of sessions.3081

11. Place of Trial

The offence under this section must be tried by the court having jurisdiction over the place in which the sale of the minor (girl) took place.[58]

12. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of Sessions Judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That you, on or about the.....day of .....at.....sold (or let to hire) (or disposed of) AB, a person under the age of eighteen years, with intent that such person should, at any age, be employed (or used) for the purpose of prostitution (or illicit intercourse with CD (or for any unlawful and immoral purpose, viz,....(state the purpose)), (or knowing it to be likely that the said AB would, at any age, be employed (or used) for any such purpose), and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 372 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this court on the said charge.

13. Order of Discharge--Validity

Doctors in nursing homes who, contrary to all norms of professional ethics, sell a recently born child without ascertaining satisfactorily the purpose for which the child is being purchased and without taking proper precaution to ensure that the child may not fall in undesirable hands must, prima facie, be imputed with the knowledge that the child, at some age, is likely to be employed or used for any unlawful and immoral purpose within the meaning of s 372 of the Penal Code. It has to be taken notice of that the word 'likely' in the section denotes 'probability' and not 'certainty'. Thus, an offence under s 372 of the IPC is clearly made out against doctors, nurse and cashier of a hospital who were caught red handed while selling a newly born child of an unwed mother in their hospital. Hence, an order discharging them of the charges under ss 372, 120B and 34 of the IPC would not be proper. So far as a lab technician in the hospital is concerned, there is absolutely no allegation that he was present when the deal was struck between the decoy customers and other co-accused persons for selling a child. There being also no evidence that the transaction of sale and purchase of a minor child took place before him or he had the knowledge of same. Hence, order discharging him would be proper.[59]

14. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, it has to be proved that:

(1) the accused sold, let to hire or otherwise disposed of the person in question;
(2) such person, at the time of offence, was under the age of 18 years; and
(3) he did so with intent that such person should be employed, or used, at any age, for the purpose of prostitution or illicit intercourse with any person or for any unlawful and immoral purpose, or with knowledge that it was3082 likely that such person would be employed, or used, at any age, for such purpose.

15. Sentence

Where the accused kidnapped a minor girl and sold her at a place far away, for illegal and immoral purpose, it was held that in such a case it was just and proper that a deterrent sentence be imposed on the accused. The sentence of 7 years rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 50,000/-, as awarded by the High Court was upheld.[60]

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

S. 373.

Buying minor for purposes of prostitution, etc.--

Whoever buys, hires or otherwise obtains possession of any [61][person under the age of eighteen years with intent that such person shall, at any age, be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution or illicit intercourse with any person or for any unlawful and immoral purpose, or knowing it to be likely that such person will, at any age be], employed or used for any such purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[62][Explanation I.--Any prostitute or any person keeping or managing a brothel, who buys, hires or otherwise obtains possession of a female under the age of eighteen years, shall, until the contrary is proved, be presumed to have obtained possession of such female with the intent that she shall be used for the purpose of prostitution.

Explanation II.--"Illicit intercourse" has the same meaning as in section 372 .]

Comments

1. Scope

This section deals with buying, hiring or otherwise obtaining possession of minors for the purpose of prostitution, etc. One is punishable under this section if he buys, hires or otherwise obtains possession of a minor, whether a male or a female, under the age of 18 years, with intent or knowledge that such minor shall, at any age, be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution or illicit intercourse with any person or for any unlawful or immoral purpose. An offence, under this section, is3083 complete as soon as the buying, etc, by the accused and the guilt, knowledge or intent on his part are proved though the minor bought may not enter upon prostitution until years after she has attained maturity or may not enter upon such a profession at all.[63] The section does not require that a minor, taken possession of by an accused person, should necessarily be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution. It is quite enough that such employment or use would be the probable result of the detention of the girl by the accused though the accused might not have intended the result.[64]

2. Ingredients of the Offence under this Section

The offence consists in: (1) buying, hiring or otherwise obtaining possession of a minor, (2) who is under the age of eighteen years, (3) with intent, or knowing it to be likely, that the minor will, at any age, be employed, or used, for the purpose of prostitution or illicit intercourse with any person or for a purpose which is both unlawful and immoral.

3. 'Otherwise Obtains Possession'

To constitute an offence under this section, it is not essential that obtaining of the possession should be from a third person; the section is quite applicable to an agreement or understanding arrived at with the minor without the intervention of a third person.[65] There need not be a third party from whom possession of the minor should be obtained.[66] There are no words in the section as to the necessity of there being a third party from whom possession of the minor is obtained.[67]

If the keeper of a brothel meets the girl and by physical force or false representation, induces her to enter the brothel and keeps her there, he undoubtedly obtains possession of the girl, and the fact that no third party is involved as the giver of the possession is irrelevant.[68] It is, therefore, enough if it is established that the accused, in fact, obtained possession of the minor with intent that the minor shall be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution.[69] A person, who steals a minor girl under eighteen years of age, may, thus, be held to have obtained possession of the minor within the meaning of s 373, IPC .[70]3084

Obtaining possession involves exercising some sort of control over the person of the girl, possession of whom has been obtained.[71] Where a girl runs away with the accused of her own accord and there is nothing to show that he attempted to control her movements in any way, or that she was prevented from leaving him at any moment she chose, or that he exercised any sort of control over her, his conviction and sentence under this section must be set aside.[72]

The law does not specify the nature of possession, its duration or its intensity; it only specifies the object, namely, prostitution or illicit intercourse, etc.[73] In Emperor v Vithabai Sukha ,[74] the girl came to a brothel whose keeper allowed her to prostitute herself for money for two or three hours in the night. The possession, set up by the girl, was held to be sufficient possession within the meaning of s 373, IPC . But in the following cases,[75]it has been held that in order to amount to possession under this section, something more is required than such possession as is obtained for the purpose of a single act of sexual intercourse.

The expression 'otherwise obtains possession' includes even a valid adoption.[76]

4. Intention or Knowledge

The intention or the knowledge, requisite for the offence under this section, may be presumed from the facts proved and the circumstances of the case.[77] For further commentary, see under s 372, ante.

5. Presumption under Explanation I--When can be Raised?

In order that presumption under Expln I may be raised against an accused, it has to be established by the prosecution that at the time, when he/she bought, hired or otherwise obtained possession of the minor girl, he/she was a prostitute or was keeping or managing a brothel.[78] If the accused, though originally a prostitute, had given up prostitution long before the alleged offence and had been carrying on propaganda for the upliftment of her community, appealing to it to give up prostitution, the presumption cannot be raised.[79] However, once the presumption is raised, it is upon the accused to rebut it. If he/she fails to rebut the presumption, the case against him/her under this section must be considered to have been established.[80]3085

6. Procedure

An offence under this section is cognizable, non-bailable, non-compoundable, and is triable by a court of sessions.

7. Place of Trial

The offence under this section can be tried by the court within whose jurisdiction the offence is completed. In Emperor v Batubai Ganeshu ,[81] it was arranged in Kashmir that a minor girl from that place should be brought to Bombay to keep her in the brothel of the accused who paid the girl's railway fare. It was held that what happened in Kashmir was only a preparation for committing the offence which was thereafter completed in Bombay, when the girl was put in the brothel of the accused, and, therefore, the offence could be tried at Bombay.

8. Joint Trial

The offence under this section is distinct from the one under the preceding section. Therefore, persons accused of the two distinct offences, cannot be tried together unless the offences are committed in the course of the same transaction.[82]

9. Charge

The following form of the charge may be adopted:

I (name and office of sessions judge, etc.) hereby charge you (name of accused person) as follows:

That, on or about the .....day of .....at..... you bought (or hired or obtained possession of) AB, a person then under eighteen years of age, with intent that the said AB shall, at any age, be employed (or used) for the purpose of prostitution (or illicit intercourse with CD) (or for any unlawful and immoral purpose, viz.,.....(specify the purpose)), or knowing it to be likely that the said AB will, at any age, be employed (or used) for any such purpose, and thereby committed an offence, punishable under s 373 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of this Court.

And I hereby direct that you be tried by this Court on the said charge.

10. Proof

To establish an offence under this section, the prosecution must prove that:

(1) the accused bought, hired, or otherwise obtained possession of, a person in question;
(2) such person was, at that time, under eighteen years of age; and
(3) the accused did so with intent, or knowing it to be likely, that the said person will, at any age, be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution or illicit intercourse with any person or for any unlawful and immoral purpose.

It is incumbent on the prosecution to prove that the girl is under the age of 18 years.[83] Where there is no reliable evidence as to the age of the girl, the conviction cannot be3086 sustained.[84] The question, whether a person under the age of 18 years has been bought, hired, or otherwise obtained possession of, is a question of fact.[85]

11. Sentence

Where the accused kidnapped a minor girl and sold her at a place far away, for illegal and immoral purpose, it was held that, in such a case, it was just and proper that a deterrent sentence be imposed on the accused. The sentence of 7 years rigorous imprisonment and fine of Rs. 50,000/-, as awarded by the High Court was upheld.[86]

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860)

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

S. 374.

Unlawful compulsory labour.--

Whoever unlawfully compels any person to labour against the will of that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Comments

1. Scope

This section, the primary object of which is to suppress the pernicious practice of landlords, who as a matter of right, forced their tenants to labour and thus render customary service to them recognises the right of individual freedom, which is now enshrined in arts 19 to 23of the Constitution of India and the essence of which is that no man shall be compelled to labour against his will. Forced labour is clearly an inverse of the right of individual freedom.[87]

'Unlawful compulsory labour' made punishable under this section, is not far different from slavery which is dealt with in s 371, IPC .

2. Essential Ingredients

Following are the essential ingredients of an offence under this section:

(a) there must be taking of labour, by the accused, from another person;
(b) such taking of labour must be under compulsion and against the will of the labourer; and
(c) such compulsion must be unlawful.

3. 'Labour'

'Labour' means toil or work and includes physical as well as mental work. Thus, excavation of earth is as much 'labour' as the composition of a poem or the painting3087 of a picture. Therefore, a person who unlawfully compels another to labour, commits the offence under this section, whether the work be physical or mental. The exaction of such labour becomes criminal when: (1) the person is unlawfully compelled to labour; and (2) he labours against his will. The offence is complete even if the compulsion was exercised only to overcome resistance. However, where the labourer had agreed to work, but later refused, it cannot be said that the compulsion was unlawful though such compulsion might expose the person to the penalties of other offences, such as under s 352, IPC .[88] In cases of labour under a contract, it must be determined, having regard to the nature of the contract, whether the consent was extorted by fear or due to misconception of facts, and it is for the prosecution to prove that there was, in fact, no consent or there was not, in law, a consent. Therefore, if a creditor insists that the debtor should pay his debt or work it off and the debtor, in accordance with the custom of bondage, meekly works for his creditor, he cannot afterwards complain of such compulsion.

Agreement for Work with Minor Victim for Labour--Effect

Even under the provisions of Child Labour (Prohibition and Regulation) Act 1986, employment of children below 14-15 years has been prohibited by the aforesaid Act as well as under various other acts. The age of the child has been defined under the aforesaid Act as a person who has not completed 14 years of age. Though, the provisions of the said Act are not applicable in this case, but for forced domestic labour provisions of s 374, IPC will be applicable. Where, admittedly at the time of incident, the victim was a minor and was below 14 years and even under general law, a contract or agreement with a minor is void, therefore, an acquittal of accused persons on the ground that there was an agreement between the accused persons and the victim for domestic work prima facie appears to be illegal. Even his father could not have entered into such kind of an agreement or contract for the minor. If the minor victim was forcefully compelled to work or labour, it constitutes an offence punishable under s 374, IPC .[89]

4. 'Unlawfully Compels'

Not only must there be compulsion, but such compulsion must be unlawful. In other words, both the elements of compulsion and unlawfulness must be present in the labour. Service rendered under a contract is not compulsory labour as when labour is recruited for employment in tea gardens or sugar plantations outside the country. The term 'unlawfully' in this section is of wider import than the term 'illegally' defined in s 43, IPC . An act or omission, though not prohibited by law or capable of forming the ground for a civil action, may still not be warranted by law and in such a case, it would be unlawful. Forced labour, customary in several parts of India, will not, however, be hit by this section because if such labour has been long customary and recorded in the wajib-ul-arz, it would be treated as a species of rent rendered in kind.

Only Prisoners Sentenced to Rigorous Imprisonment can be Compelled to do Labour

Jail authorities are enjoined by law to impose hard labour on a particular section of the convicted prisoners who were sentenced to rigorous imprisonment. Section 53 of the IPC which falls under the chapter entitled 'Of Punishments' divides punishment3088 into five categories, of which the category 'imprisonment' has been further sub-divided into two sub categories as rigorous and simple. Rigorous imprisonment is explained as 'imprisonment with hard labour'. Section 60 of the IPC confers power on a sentencing court to direct that such imprisonment shall be wholly rigorous or that such imprisonment shall be wholly simple, or that any part of such imprisonment shall be rigorous and the rest simple. The sentence of imprisonment for life tagged along with a number of offences delineated in the IPC is interpreted as rigorous imprisonment for life and not simple imprisonment.[90]

A person sentenced to simple imprisonment cannot be required to work unless he volunteers himself to do the work. Section 374 of the IPC makes imposition of work on an unwilling person as an offence.[91]

However, the jail officer who requires a prisoner sentenced to rigorous imprisonment to do hard labour would be doing so as enjoined by law and mandated by the court. No prisoner sentenced to rigorous imprisonment can complain that the jail authorities committed offence under s 374, IPC, by compelling him to do work during the term of an imprisonment. Similarly, the task to do labour can be imposed on a prisoner only if he has been sentenced to rigorous imprisonment. Neither under trial internees nor the detainee undergoing simple imprisonment nor even detainees kept in jails as a preventive measure can be forced to do manual work during their prison term, however, it is a different matter that he is allowed to do it on request.[92]

Two profiles emerge from the above discussion. Firstly, a vast majority of prisoners are not concerned about the wages for the labour in jails. It is only for a small section of the detainees that this exercise would benefit. Secondly, hard labour is enforced on those sentenced to rigorous imprisonment by sanction of law and jail authorities cannot disobey the directions of the court which passed the sentence.[93]

5. Procedure

The offence under this section is cognizable, bailable, non-compoundable, and triable by a magistrate, and may be tried summarily.

6. Charge

Framing of a formal charge is not necessary, the offence under this section being triable as a summons case. Section 251 , CrPC, may be referred to.

7. Proof

To secure conviction under this section, it must be proved that:

(a) the accused took labour from some person;
(b) such labour was taken under compulsion and against the will of the labourer; and
(c) such compulsion was unlawful.3089

SEXUAL OFFENCES

Rape.--

A man is said to commit "rape" if he--

(a) penetrates his penis, to any extent, into the vagina, mouth, urethra or anus of a woman or makes her to do so with him or any other person; or

(b) inserts, to any extent, any object or a part of the body, not being the penis, into the vagina, the urethra or anus of a woman or makes her to do so with him or any other person; or

(c) manipulates any part of the body of a woman so as to cause penetration into the vagina, urethra, anus or any part of body of such woman or makes her to do so with him or any other person; or

(d) applies his mouth to the vagina, anus, urethra of a woman or makes her to do so with him or any other person, under the circumstances falling under any of the following seven descriptions:--

First.--Against her will.

Secondly.--Without her consent.

Thirdly.--With her consent, when her consent has been obtained by putting her or any person in whom she is interested, in fear of death or of hurt.

Fourthly.--With her consent, when the man knows that he is not her husband and that her consent is given because she believes that he is another man to whom she is or believes herself to be lawfully married.

Fifthly.--With her consent when, at the time of giving such consent, by reason of unsoundness of mind or intoxication or the administration by him personally or through another of any3090 stupefying or unwholesome substance, she is unable to understand the nature and consequences of that to which she gives consent.

Sixthly.--With or without her consent, when she is under eighteen years of age.

Seventhly.--When she is unable to communicate consent.

Explanation 1.--For the purposes of this section, "vagina" shall also include labia majora.

Explanation 2.--Consent means an unequivocal voluntary agreement when the woman by words, gestures or any form of verbal or non-verbal communication, communicates willingness to participate in the specific sexual act:

Provided that a woman who does not physically resist to the act of penetration shall not by the reason only of that fact, be regarded as consenting to the sexual activity.

Exception 1.--A medical procedure or intervention shall not constitute rape.

Exception 2.--Sexual intercourse or sexual acts by a man with his own wife, the wife not being under fifteen years of age, is not rape.]3091

Comments

1. Legislative changes

The present section has been substituted for the old s 375, IPC by the Criminal Law (Amendment), 2013 (13 of 2013), s 9 (wef 3-02-2013) on the recommendations of the Justice J.S. Verma Committee.

> The constitution of this Committee was in response to the country-wide peaceful public outcry of civil society, led by the youth, against the failure of governance to provide a safe and dignified environment for the women of India, who are constantly exposed to sexual violence. The immediate cause was the brutal gang rape of a young woman in the heart of the nation's capital in a public transport vehicle in the late evening of 16 December 2012...

> The urgency of the matter impelled the Committee to undertake the performance of the assigned task within the short period of 30 days to enable the authorities, with all their resources, to take the necessary follow-up action within a further 30 day period, so that the same or a substantial portion of the same may be completed before commencement of the next session of the Parliament, which, we hope, will undertake the needed legislative exercise recommended by this Committee.[2]

New ss 375, 376, 376A, 376B, 376C, 376D and 376E have been substituted for old ss 375, 376, 376A, 376B, 376C and 376D by the Act No. 13 of 2013, s 9 (wef 3-2-2013). The notable changes introduced by the present amendment are --

(i) When a person is said to commit rape, has been defined in s 375, IPC .
(ii) The definition of rape has been expanded.
(iii) Explanation to old s 375, which provided "penetration is sufficient to constitute the sexual intercourse necessary to the offence of rape" has been omitted in new s 375 .
(iv) Explanation I to old sub-s 376 provided for offence of gang rape. New s 376-D specifically deals with the offence of gang rape.
(v) A new s 376-E provides for enhancement of punishment where the accused is a repeat offender.
(vi) Under the new sections, sentence has been enhanced. The sections prescribe punishment extending to the sentence of death, for an offence where in the course of commission of an offence of rape, the offender inflicts any injury which causes the death of the victim or causes the victim to be in a persistent vegetative state, and punish the repeat offenders of rape with imprisonment for life (which shall mean the remainder of the person's natural life), or with death, prescribe that those convicted for the offence of gang rape shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a3092 minimum of twenty years extendable to life (which shall mean the remainder of that person's natural life) and fine; to be paid to the victim to meet the medical expenses, etc.

The definition of the offence of rape has been expanded but the essential ingredients of the offence of rape remain the same.

Prior to its substitution, s 375 ran thus --

" S. 375 . Rape.--A man is said to commit "rape" who, except in the case hereinafter excepted, has sexual intercourse with a woman under circumstances falling under any of the six following descriptions:--

First.--Against her will.

Secondly.--Without her consent.

Thirdly.--With her consent, when her consent has been obtained by putting her or any person in whom she is interested in fear of death or of hurt.

Fourthly.--With her consent, when the man knows that he is not her husband, and that her consent is given because she believes that he is another man to whom she is or believes herself to be lawfully married.

Fifthly.--With her consent, when, at the time of giving such consent, by reason of unsoundness of mind or intoxication or the administration by him personally or through another of any stupefying or unwholesome substance, she is unable to understand the nature and consequences of that to which she gives consent.

Sixthly.--With or without her consent, when she is under sixteen years of age.

Explanation.--Penetration is sufficient to constitute the sexual intercourse necessary to the offence of rape.

Exception.--Sexual intercourse by a man with his own wife, the wife not being under fifteen years of age, is not rape.".

2. Scope

The offence of rape is stated in ch XVI of the IPC . It is an offence affecting the human body. In that chapter, there is a separate heading for 'Sexual Offences', which encompasses ss 375, 376, 376A, 376B, 376C, 376D and 376E, IPC . 'Rape' is defined in s 375 . Sections 375 and 376 have been substantially changed by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 1983, and several new sections were introduced by the said new Act, i.e., ss 376A, 376B, 376C and 376D, IPC . Sections 375 , 376376A to 376D have further been amended and a new s 376E, IPC has been added by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013 (13 of 2013).

The fact that sweeping changes were introduced reflects the legislative intent to curb with an iron hand, the offence of rape which affects the dignity of a woman. The offence of rape in its simplest term is 'the ravishment of a woman, without her consent, by force, fear or fraud', or as 'the carnal knowledge of a woman by force against her will'. 'Rape' or 'Raptus' is when a man hath carnal knowledge of a woman by force and against her will[3]; or as expressed more fully, 'rape is the carnal knowledge of any woman, above the age of particular years, against her will; or of a woman child, under that age, with or against her will'[4]. The essential words in an indictment for rape are rapuit and carnaliter cognovit; but carnaliter cognovit, nor any other circumlocution without the word rapuit, are not sufficient in a legal sense to express rape[5]. In the crime of rape, 'carnal knowledge' means the penetration to3093 any slightest degree of the organ alleged to have been carnally known by the male organ of generation.[6] In the Encyclopaedia of Crime and Justice,[7] it is stated '...even slight penetration is sufficient and emission is unnecessary'. In Halsbury's Statutes of England and Wales,[8]it is stated that even the slightest degree of penetration is sufficient to prove sexual intercourse. By the very nature of the offence it is an obnoxious act of the highest order. The physical scar may heal up, but the mental scar will always remain. When a woman is ravished, what is inflicted is not merely physical injury but the deep sense of some deathless shame.[9] The offence of rape may be defined, in its simplest terms, as 'the ravishment of woman, without her consent, by force, fear or fraud',[10] or as 'the carnal knowledge of a woman by force against her will'.[11] Ordinarily, rape is violation, with violence, of the private person of a woman--an outrage by all means.[12] Under this Code, prior to its substitution vide the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013, the offence consisted in having sexual intercourse with a woman without her consent, or when she is of such an age that she cannot, in law, consent, and the offence consisted in the fact of intercourse, independently of the circumstances of intention, knowledge and consequences.[13]

The essence of the offence is that the connection takes place without the consent of the woman. Non-consent is, therefore, the gist of the offence and the seven clauses set out the circumstances in which the law holds that there is no consent. If there be no consent or the sexual intercourse is against the will of the girl, the age of the girl is immaterial for the offence of rape.[14]Under the Code, consent is no defence when the girl is under 16 years (now, 18 years) of age; or if the sexual intercourse is by a man with his own wife, and the wife is under 15 years of age.[15] When the intercourse is with the consent of the prosecutrix, aged above 16 years (now, 18 years), the sexual intercourse does not come within the definition of rape and, therefore, is not punishable under this section.[16] Sexual intercourse, to constitute an offence of rape, in the case of a married woman, aged about 19 years, who has already given birth to a child, should have been committed against her will or without her consent.[17]

The Courts should bear in mind that false charges of rape are not uncommon. There have also been rare instances where a parent has persuaded a gullible or obedient daughter to make a false charge of a rape either to take revenge or extort money or to get rid of financial liability. Whether there was rape or not, would depend ultimately on the facts and circumstances of each case.[18]3094

A rapist not only violates the victim's privacy and personal integrity, but inevitably causes serious psychological as well as physical harm in the process. Rape is not merely assault, it is often destructive of the whole personality of the victim. The murderer destroys the physical body of his victim. The rapist degrades the very soul of the helpless female.[19]

3. English Law

A person A who intentionally penetrates, with his penis, the vagina, anus or mouth of another person B commits an offence if B does not consent to the penetration and if A does not reasonably believe that the person consents to it. A person guilty of such an offence is liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment for life or shorter term.[20]

In R v T ,[21] the learned judge considered the definitive guidelines issued by the Sentencing Guidelines Council under which the starting point for the offence was eight years and the sentencing range was six to 11 years. Bearing in mind the aggravating features in the case, he considered that the appropriate sentence, after a trial, would have been 12½ years' imprisonment. He reduced that by 20% for the guilty pleas to sentences of 10 years' imprisonment on each count, to run concurrently..

In Regina v Mitchell Moir ,[22] it was observed, 'Much of the reasoning identified in the sentencing remarks, and the further sentencing remarks, is criticised on behalf of the Attorney General. But in the end the real difficulty with the way in which the judge made the observations that he did can be simply expressed: the offender raped the victim. She was not aware of the rape and she was therefore not frightened or fearful; she did not seek to fight off the rapist. The penetration cannot have lasted for a very long time, although it was sufficient in whatever form it took, to have made her sore. But the fact that she was asleep does not constitute mitigation any more than it would have been mitigation if she had been unconscious through drink. There is no scope for much jurisprudence on this issue. It is true that the victim will not remember the precise circumstances of what is always a ghastly experience. But, on the other hand, she was the victim, and she knew perfectly well that she had been the victim of a gross breach of trust. It made her angry. She was fully entitled to be angry at what had happened. In the end a sentencing judge must reflect what actually happened and the circumstances in which the offence of rape took place. In this case the rape occurred just two weeks after the victim's pregnancy by the offender had been terminated; she had made it clear to him, quite unequivocally, that she did not want to have a sexual relationship with him; and in the course of the incident of rape he put her at risk of another pregnancy when she did not want to become pregnant, and certainly did not want to be pregnant by him.'

4. Law of Australia

In all jurisdictions, it is an offence to have sexual intercourse with another person without the consent of that person. Different terminology is used in different3095 jurisdictions to describe this offence. In some jurisdictions, the offence is described as sexual intercourse without consent. In some jurisdictions, the offence is described as rape. In Tasmania, the term rape refers to a sexual assault involving penetration of the vagina, genitalia or anus by a penis and aggravated sexual assault refers to penetration of the vagina, genitalia or anus by any other part of the human body, or by an inanimate object. In Western Australia, the offence is described as sexual penetration without consent. In both Queensland and Western Australia, the term carnal knowledge is used to describe sexual penetration in respect of other sexual offences.

In South Australia, 'rape' is specifically defined to include compelling a person, without their consent, to have sexual intercourse with a third person. In Victoria and Western Australia, it is a separate offence to compel a person, without their consent, to sexually penetrate the offender or another person.

In South Australia, there is an offence of compelling a person to engage in an act of sexual manipulation of the offender or a third person where sexual manipulation means the manipulation by the victim of the anus or genitals of another person and may involve sexual penetration.

The common law presumption that a boy under 14 years is incapable of sexual intercourse has been abolished by statute.

In Tasmania, a male person under 7 years is conclusively presumed to be incapable of having sexual intercourse.

The fact that the accused is married to the other person is not longer a bar to a conviction for non-consensual sexual intercourse.

In the Northern Territory and Queensland, there are separate offences of attempted sexual intercourse without consent and attempted rape. In New South Wales, an offender who attempts to have sexual intercourse without consent is liable to the same penalty as the substantive offence. Other jurisdictions rely upon general attempt provisions. In most jurisdictions, there is an offence of assault with intent to have sexual intercourse.[23]

In a case, it was held that the false representation must be as to the nature or purpose of the act and does not include a false promise to provide a benefit or gift.[24]

5. Essential Ingredients of the Offence of Rape

Prior to its substitution vide the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013, the two essential ingredients of s 375, IPC, were:

(i) Sexual intercourse by a man with a woman;
(ii) The sexual intercourse must be under circumstances falling under any of the six clauses of s 375, IPC .[25]

Under the substituted section,

A person is said to commit rape if he--

(a) penetrates his penis, to any extent, into the vagina, mouth, urethra or anus of a woman or makes her to do so with him or any other person; or3096
(b) inserts, to any extent, any object or a part of the body, not being the penis, into the vagina, the urethra or anus of a woman or makes her to do so with him or any other person; or
(c) manipulates any part of the body of a woman so as to cause penetration into the vagina, urethra, anus or any part of body of such woman or makes her to do so with him or any other person; or
(d) applies his mouth to the vagina, anus, urethra of a woman or makes her to do so with him or any other person, under the circumstances falling under any of the seven clauses specified immediately below in the section.

This is a new definition of rape in the amended section.

Under s 1 of the Sexual Offences Act 2003 (UK), 'rape' occurs when person (A) 'intentionally penetrates the vagina, anus or mouth of another person (B) with his penis' without consent. This carries a maximum sentence of life imprisonment.

Where the accused and the prosecutrix above the age of 16 years (now, 18 years) have fallen in love, no offence under s 375, IPC is committed.[26] Further, in the absence of evidence of sexual intercourse, the accused would not be convicted on the charge of rape.[27]

Sexual intercourse by a man with his wife, if she is not under 15 years of age, is not rape.

In Daji Ghadge v State of Maharashtra [28] it was held that penetration is necessary to the offence of rape, while seminal emission is not necessary to establish rape.

6. Jati Panchayat, Customs, Traditions and Dignity of Woman

Commentary under the same heading in s 366, ante, may be referred to.

7. Dehumanising Effect of Rape--Violation of Prosecutrix's Right Under Article 21 --Socially Sensitised Judge

No father or mother of a girl will falsely involve her daughter in a rape case. Sexual violence, apart from being a dehumanising act is an unlawful intrusion on the right of privacy and sanctity of a female. It is a serious blow to her supreme honour and offends her self-esteem and dignity--it degrades and humiliates the victim and where the victim is a helpless innocent child or a minor, it leaves behind a traumatic experience. A rapist not only causes physical injuries but more indelibly leaves a scar on the most cherished possession of a woman, i.e., her dignity, honour, reputation and not the least, her chastity. Rape is not only a crime against the person of a woman; it is a crime against the entire society. It destroys the entire psychology of a woman and pushes her into deep emotional crisis. It is a crime against basic human rights, and is also violative of the victims' most cherished of the fundamental rights, namely, the right to life contained in art 21 of the Constitution of India . The courts are, therefore, expected to deal with cases of sexual crime against women with utmost sensitivity. Such cases need to be dealt with sternly and severely. A socially3097 sensitised judge is better statutory armour in cases of crime against women than long clauses of penal provisions, containing complex exceptions and provisos.[29]

8. 'Man'

'Man', according to s 10 of this Code, denotes a male human being of any age. By s 82 of the Code, a child under seven years of age is immune from criminal liability. By s 83, if the child is above seven and under 12 years of age, his criminal liability depends on his understanding being sufficiently mature to judge the nature and consequences of his conduct on that occasion.[30] However, a child not under 12 years of age has no such immunity and the question of his criminal liability for the offence of rape must be decided as in the case of an adult.[31]

9. 'Sexual Intercourse'

Cohabitation by a man with a woman is called 'sexual intercourse'.

10. 'Woman'

'Woman', according to s 10 of this Code, denotes a female human being of any age.

11. 'Under Circumstances'

The seven clauses of the section set out the circumstances which would constitute an offence under this section.

12. First Clause--'Against her Will'

The expression 'against her will' imports that the act is done inspite of the opposition of the person to the doing of the act, whereas 'without her consent' imports only a passive attitude without active opposition. The IPC draws a distinction between an act, which is done against the will, and an act, done without the consent, of a person. Every act done against the will of a person is done without his consent, but an act done without the consent of a person is not necessarily against the will of that person, which expression imports that the act is done inspite of the opposition of the person to the doing of it.[32] Where it is not at all established that the woman was ever subjected to any sexual intercourse by the accused against her will, the charge under this section must fail.[33]

13. Second Clause--'Without her Consent'

Forcible sexual intercourse with a woman falls in this clause. When the accused caught the prosecutrix by her neck and felled her on the ground and had sexual intercourse with her without her consent, he committed rape.[34]3098

Bruises, abrasions and scratches on the victim, especially on the forearms, wrist, face, breast, thighs and back are indicative of struggle and will support the allegation of sexual assault.[35]

Where the prosecutrix was 13-15 years of age at the time of the incident, the consent of the prosecutrix, if any, was held immaterial. The accused was convicted for the offence of rape under s 376, IPC .[36]

14. Third Clause--'With her consent when her Consent has been Obtained by Putting her or any Person in whom she is Interested, in Fear of Death or of Hurt'

Submission of her body, by a prosecutrix, under fear or terror, is no consent.[37]A mere act of helpless resignation in the face of inevitable compulsion, quiescence, non-resistance, or passive giving in, when volitional faculty is either clouded by fear or vitiated by duress, cannot be deemed to be a consent as understood in law.[38] However, to vitiate consent, the threat of injury must be sufficient to show that it instilled fear and coerced the woman into submission so as to make the consent involuntary. Where, however, the fear, to which the woman is subjected, is neither of death, nor of hurt, but only of being arrested, when, actually, there is no warrant of arrest against her, the consent, though obtained by fraud, is none the less consent because, in such a case, she is willing to allow sexual intercourse for a price, even if it is fictitious.[39] In a case, the prosecution evidence showed that the prosecutrix was having a love affair with the accused appellant and was a consenting party. The accused appellant belonged to the same caste and gotra as the prosecutrix and was a frequent visitor to the house of the prosecutrix. There was a love affair between them and she never resisted being repeatedly deflowered by the accused appellant. In this background, close and careful determination of the age of the prosecutrix was imperative. The doctor who had clinically examined the prosecutrix, found that her secondary sex character were well developed. Thus, the appellant accused was entitled to benefit of doubt, and he was acquitted of the charge under s 376, IPC .[40]

15. Fourth Clause--Sexual Intercourse with a Married Woman by the Accused by Impersonating himself to be her Husband

Clause fourthly of s 375 of the IPC applies when a man induces a married woman to have sexual intercourse with him by impersonating her husband. When consent by a woman to a man is given under the misconception that he was her husband, it amounts to rape by a person to whom the woman believes to be her husband.[41] This clause is attracted where the woman consents, but the man knows: (1) that he is not3099 her husband; and (2) that the consent is given under the belief that he is the man to whom she is, or believes herself to be, lawfully married. In such a case, the sexual intercourse is rape. The kind of consent, envisaged by the fourth clause, is covered by s 90, which deals, inter alia, with consent given under a misconception of facts that arises under the mistaken belief that the ravisher is her husband whereby the married woman consents to have sexual intercourse with him. Consent, in such circumstances, is not such a consent as is required by law, and the offender is guilty of rape if he knew that he was not her husband; if however, he too believed that he was her husband, he would be innocent of the offence. The misconception must have been induced by the fraud of the ravisher; even if he does not actively induce the belief in the woman, but he has knowledge of it and chooses to keep silent, when he is under a duty to speak the truth, in order to effectuate his criminal intention, he is guilty of rape. In A Krishnaraj v State of Mysore ,[42] the accused, a married person, tied a thali round the neck of a Christian girl of 17 years before the picture of Christ and thereby induced her to believe that he was her husband. He took her out occasionally for sexual intercourse. The girl agreed believing the accused to be her husband. It was held that he was guilty of the offence of rape.

This clause covers a case where a prosecutrix marries a man without the knowledge of the first marriage of the husband. In any event, the accused could not have lawfully married the complainant. Further, a bare reading of cl 'Fourthly' of s 375, IPC makes this position clear. The delay in filing FIR would not be fatal in such a case and the accused would be guilty of the offence of rape if the complainant had given her consent considering the accused to be her husband, therefore, the conviction of the accused under s 376, IPC was upheld[43].

16. Fifth Clause--Consent of the Prosecutrix when Immaterial in a Case of Rape

The fifth clause was added to s 375, IPC by virtue of statutory amendment by the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 1983 (43 of 1983). Even before this amendment, the legal position was that a woman, who is in a state of insensibility, arising from sleep, liquor, drugs or hypnotism, is incapable of giving her consent; so also a woman who suffers from feebleness of intellect or any other defect of mind.[44]

The essence of the offence is that the connection takes place without the consent of the woman.

The same legal portion is incorporated in the definition of rape by virtue of this fifth clause.

Non-consent is, therefore, the gist of the offence and the five clauses set out the circumstances in which the law holds that there is no consent. If there be no consent or the sexual intercourse is against the will of the girl, the age of the girl is immaterial for the offence of rape.[45]An idiot girl may 'consent' to the act from mere animal instinct as in the case of R v Fletcher .[46]3100

Consent given under Fear/coercion/misconception -- No Consent

The concept of 'consent' in the context of s 375, IPC has to be understood differently, keeping in mind the provision of s 90, IPC, according to which consent given under fear/coercion or misconception/mistake of fact is not a consent at all.[47]

17. Sixth Clause--Consent of the Prosecutrix, when Prosecutrix is under Eighteen Years of Age

In a case it was held that sex with a woman above the age of 16 years (now, 18 years) is not rape.[48]

Further, consent is immaterial in the case of rape on a girl under 16 years (now, 18 years) of age[49] subject to the exception that if the sexual intercourse is by a man with his own wife, the wife is under 15 years of age, as the law of rape does not apply as between husband and wife when the wife is above 15 years of age.[50] This clause embodies the principle that the consent of a girl below the age of 16 years (now, 18 years) is immaterial to the offence of rape as, by reason of their immaturity, such girls require to be protected against premature cohabitation[51] as well as immature prostitution. Resistance, therefore, need not be looked for when the girl is incapable of giving consent by reason of her age, as prescribed in the section, i.e., when the girl is under 16 years (now, 18 years) of age, and if sexual intercourse is by a man with his own wife when she is under fifteen years of age.[52] However, when the age of the victim at the time of incident was 11 years and four months and in any circumstances of the matter, she was below the stated age, then the question of consent does not arise at all and the case of the prosecution would fall under s 375(6) of the IPC .[53]

18. Seventh Clause--When she is Unable to Communicate Consent

This clause is new, added by the Criminal Law Amendment Act (13 of 2013).

19. Consent--Meaning of

A woman is said to consent only when she freely agrees to submit herself, while in free and unconstrained possession of physical and moral power to act in a manner she wants. Consent implies the exercise of a free and untrammeled right to forbid or3101 withhold what is being consented to; it is always a voluntary and conscious acceptance of what is proposed to be done by another and concurred in by the former.[54] Consent on the part of a woman, as a defence to an allegation of rape, requires voluntary participation, not only after the exercise of intelligence based on the knowledge of the significance and moral quality of the act, but also after having freely exercised a choice between resistance and assent.[55]It must be an act of reason, accompanied with deliberation, after the mind has weighed, as in a balance, the good and evil on each side with the existing capacity and power to withdraw the assent according to one's will or pleasure.[56] Consent, that the law requires to negative rape, is free and conscious permission and the act of sexual intercourse must be contemporaneous with the consent.[57]

If a woman is unable to put up resistance, consent cannot be inferred. Similarly, any request for money, from the accused, by the woman, subsequent to her rape, would not mean the consent of the woman.[58] The fact, that the victim of the alleged rape was virgo intacta up to the date of the occurrence, is proof that the sexual intercourse was without her consent.[59]

If there is no evidence, on the record, of any struggle, having taken place, nor are there any marks of injuries found on the person, either of the complainant or of the accused, it cannot be said that the accused had connection with the woman without her consent.[60] If the evidence of the prosecutrix herself shows that she was a girl of easy virtues and that, though she was raped, one after another, by as many as five persons within less than 24 hours, yet she never complained to any one, it can be concluded that those, who had sexual intercourse with her, had it with her consent.[61] The circumstances, that a girl of more than 16 years left her house without any compulsion, travelled with the accused from place to place, was literate and could write letters, but did not write to, or communicate with her people, and never complained to any of the people, whom she met, of any ill-treatment by the accused, indicate that if there was any sexual intercourse, it was with her consent.[62] Where a grown-up girl (aged about 18) submitted to being carried about and raped, without protesting, specially when she, according to her own story, was every now and then left by herself by the accused, it3102 was held that she must be held to have been a consenting party in the elopement.[63] The evidence of the prosecution that rape was committed on prosecutrix in the presence of so many persons of the family in a small house was found not believable. It was held that the prosecutrix was a consenting party.[64]

A woman, who is in a state of insensibility, arising from sleep, liquor, drugs or hypnotism, is incapable of giving her consent; so also a woman who suffers from feebleness of intellect or other defect of mind.[65]

The essence of the offence is that the connection takes place without the consent of the woman. Non-consent is, therefore, the gist of the offence and the five clauses set out the circumstances in which the law holds that there is no consent. If there be no consent or the sexual intercourse is against the will of the girl, the age of the girl is immaterial for the offence of rape.[66]

20. Burden of Proof of Consent

It is not for the victim to show that there was no consent. The question of consent is really a matter of defence by the accused and it was for him to place materials to show that there was consent.[67]

21. Act Without Consent, Against the Will--Distinction

The expression 'against her will' imports that the act is done in spite of the opposition of the person to the doing of the act whereas 'without her consent' imports only a passive attitude without active opposition. The IPC draws a distinction between an act, which is done against the will, and an act, done without the consent of a person. Every act done against the will of a person is done without his consent, but an act done without the consent of a person is not necessarily against the will of that person, which expression imports that the act is done in spite of the opposition of the person to the doing of it.[68]

The expression 'against her will' and 'without her consent' may overlap sometimes but surely the two expressions in cll 'First' and 'Secondly' have different connotations and dimensions. The expression 'against her will' would ordinarily mean that the intercourse was done by a man with a woman despite her resistance and opposition. On the other hand, the expression 'without her consent' would comprehend an act of reason accompanied by deliberation.[69]

22. Male Aggressiveness and Females Submissiveness vis-à-vis Consent--Quantum of Resistance

Male aggressiveness and female submissiveness vis-à-vis consent as defence in an offence of rape would be always factual, to be decided in a given case. Quantum of resistance of a woman may vary from person to person and no3103 uniform standard can be laid down. Male aggression and female submission in this regard out of threat, timidity, fear or other like physical or psychological factors also may have some impact on the quantum of resistance. The mere absence of serious injuries on the person of the prosecutrix cannot always be taken as an inference of consent.[70]

23. Resistance or Non-Resistance by Woman--Effect

Since no woman, who values her honour, will yield her body to a stranger without a struggle, resistance on her part is looked for in a case of rape, to negative consent. Hence, non-resistance by the woman may raise an inference of consent.[71] However, absence of resistance does not always imply consent. Where a woman surrendered herself to the accused, policemen, who were following her and accusing her of vagrancy, it was held that it was a case more of helpless resignation under a threat, than of free consent, and the absence of injuries on her person, indicating resistance, was not surprising.[72] If a woman, being in an advanced state of pregnancy,[73] or due to drink,[74] is unable to put up resistance, consent cannot be inferred.

A woman, who is in a state of insensibility, arising from sleep, liquor, drugs or hypnotism, is incapable of giving her consent; so also a woman who suffers from feebleness of intellect or other defect of mind.[75] An idiot girl may 'consent' to the act from mere animal instinct as in R v Fletcher .[76] When the prosecutrix stated that she did not scratch the faces of accused persons and their hands because both of her hands were pressed by their legs, it cannot be said that she was a consenting party.[77]

24. Can a Healthy Adult Female be Violated Against her Will

Modi's Medical Jurisprudence and Toxicology,[78] states:

Can a healthy adult female be violated against her will?

> Under ordinary circumstances it is not possible for a single man to hold sexual intercourse with a healthy adult female in full possession of her senses against her will, unless she is taken unawares, thrown accidentally on the ground and placed in such a position as to render her completely helpless, or unless she swoons away from fright or exhaustion after long resistance. The act may be accomplished, if more than one man are concerned in the crime, or if the woman is too feeble to resist. In giving a definite opinion, it is necessary to take into consideration the relative strength of the parties and the community to which particularly the woman belongs. It is obvious that a woman belonging to a labouring class who is accustomed to hard and rough work will be able to offer a good deal of resistance and deal blows on her assailant and will thus succeed in frustrating his attempts at violation. On the contrary, a woman belonging to a middle or rich class of an educated family and not habituated to go about along by herself will not be able to resist for long and will soon faint or will be rendered powerless from fright or exhaustion. [79]3104

25. Consent is a Matter of Inference

The question of consent is the most important question for consideration in a case of rape. The consent to an act of sexual intercourse may be express or implied. Cases of express consent are rarely brought before a court and if they are brought, the court will have to decide whether such consent was likely to have been given by the ravished woman. Unless the women are prostitutes or otherwise depraved, it is not in their nature to openly state their willingness because they use the language of signs or hints. In such cases, consent is, therefore, a matter of inference from evidence of previous or contemporaneous acts and conduct and other surrounding circumstances.[80]

If a full grown woman consents to the act of sexual intercourse on a promise of marriage and continues to indulge in such activity until she becomes pregnant, it is an act of promiscuity on her part and not an act induced by misconception of fact.[81] In a case decided prior to the substitution of this section vide the Criminal Law (Amendment) Act 2013, where the prosecutrix was above the age of 16 years (now, 18 years), and she neither resisted nor told anyone about the crime, and participated with the accused in the act of sexual intercourse many times and became pregnant, and only when she had been pregnant for 32 weeks she disclosed the crime, looking at such circumstances it was held that the prosecutrix was a consenting party.[82] Bad character of the prosecutrix is not relevant to draw the conclusion that she had given her consent.[83]

The failure to keep the promise at a future uncertain date due to reasons not very clear on the evidence does not always amount to a misconception of the fact at the inception of the act itself. In order to come within the meaning of misconception of fact, the fact must have an immediate relevance. If a full grown girl consents to the act of sexual intercourse on a promise of marriage and continues to indulge in such activity until she becomes pregnant, it is an act of promiscuity on her part and not an act induced by misconception of fact. Section 90 , IPC, cannot be called in aid in such a case to pardon the act of the girl and fasten criminal liability.[84]

When no injury is found on the person of prosecutrix, and she remained in the company of accused for more than seven days and did not put up any resistance when sexually assaulted, she also did not make any hue and cry while she was in the company of the accused, the inference is that the prosecutrix was a consenting party.[85] However, the submission of the body by the prosecutrix under the fear of3105 terror cannot be construed as consent to sexual act as the consent is to be ascertained only on a careful study of all relevant circumstances.[86]

When the prosecutrix in her examination-in-chief has clearly stated that the accused had kept her in the concerned hut for two days and had sexual intercourse with her on three occasions and she had not object to it, and in her cross examination she had admitted having written letters to the accused which showed that she had precious relationship with the accused, the consent of prosecutrix who was more than 76 years of age was established so there was no question of commission of offence under s 376, IPC by the accused.[87] Where there was no mark of injury on the body of the prosecutrix showing absence of her resistance, and the incident took place in the morning and a large number of persons were present near the place of occurrence but no alarm was raised by her, the accused did not use any force against her, it can be inferred that the prosecutrix was a consenting party.[88]

There was a distinct belief that there would be a marriage, as the complainant herself mentioned that when the accused first proposed to her, she had expressed that he should seek the consent of her parents and since they were already related, there was a strong possibility of such marriage and therefore, the relationship continued. The fact that the accused and the prosecutrix continued the relationship over a period of time would indicate that the complainant had consented to have sexual intercourse with the accused consciously, freely and voluntarily, therefore the accused was acquitted of the charge of rape.[89]

26. Consent Withdrawn before Act or Given after Act is Immaterial

The act of sexual intercourse must be 'against her will' at the time it takes place. Therefore, a consent given but withdrawn before the act, or a consent given after the act, is wholly immaterial,[90] nor does the cessation of a genuine resistance amount to a consent.[91]

27. Absence of Injury on the Person of Prosecutrix--Effect

If the victim is unwilling to yield to sexual intercourse, she is expected to receive injuries on her person. The absence of injuries on the body of the prosecutrix, generally, gives rise to an inference that she was consenting party to coitus. Where the prosecutrix had received multiple injuries on the various parts of her body it indicated that she offered resistance when she was subjected to sexual intercourse. The absence of injuries either on the accused or on the prosecutrix shows that the prosecutrix did not resist but absence of injuries is not by itself sufficient to hold that the prosecutrix was a consenting party.[92] In Idan Singh v State of Rajasthan [93] it was held that it is too much to hold that whenever a prosecutrix is found to have sustained no visible injury, consent on her part should be presumed. But where the allegation was that rape was committed on rough and uneven ground, the absence of any visible3106 injury or scratch was held to suggest that sexual intercourse was not forcible.[1] When the girl is used to sexual intercourse and there are no marks of violence on her private parts, it can be said that she might be a consenting party.[2] Willingness of the woman may be presumed where the accused was misbehaving with her for a long time and there were not sufficient injuries on her person.[3] Where the medical evidence showed that there was no sign of recent intercourse or of any injury on her private parts, that the girl, though unmarried and over 16 years of age, was used to sexual intercourse, and that there was also no corroborative evidence, it was held that it could not be said that the accused had intercourse with her against her will.[4] For further commentary, see under s 376, post.

28. Acts and Conduct of Prosecutrix Showing Consent

Where the evidence of the radiologist showed that the prosecutrix was of consenting age, and since the families of the accused and the prosecutrix were not on cordial terms, conduct of the victim responding to call of the accused was quite unnatural and unbelievable. The contents of the letter written by the prosecutrix to the accused showed that there was intimacy between them. So, it can be said that there was consent.[5]

29. Prolonged Forcible Intercourse--Possibility and Effect

Prolonged forcible intercourse is not ordinarily possible without injury to the private parts or other parts of the ravished person.[6]Where, from the circumstances, it appeared that the accused was copulating, in a room, with a married woman, aged 20, and she, when caught in the act of copulation, concocted a story to save her face and stated that the accused had carried her into the room by force, it was held that the conviction of the accused for rape could not be maintained.[7]

Where eyewitness stated that they saw the accused lying over prosecutrix in compromising position and the accused had sex with her, but no injury was found on the person of accused as well as on the person of prosecutrix, the conviction of accused under s 376, IPC was not found proper as it was a case of consent.[8]

30. The Consent After the First Act of Coitus--Effect

Even consent after the first act of coitus does not relieve the accused as it might purely be the result of sexual urge and would not affect the first act of coitus which has already taken place against her will.[9]

31. Plea of consent when not taken

Where the accused has not taken any defence of consent of prosecutrix, the Court would not be justified in recording the finding that there was consent of prosecutrix to the sexual intercourse committed by the accused.[10]3107

32. Consent and Submission--Distinction

There is a difference between consent and submission. Every consent involves submission, but the converse does not follow, and therefore, a mere act of submission does not involve consent.[11] Submission of the body by a woman under fear or misconception of fact cannot be construed as consent to sexual act for the purpose of s 375, IPC .[12]

33. Consent means unequivocal voluntary agreement (Explanation 2)

The new expln 2, s 375 provides that consent means an unequivocal voluntary agreement when the woman by words, gestures or any form of verbal or non-verbal communication, communicates willingness to participate in the specific sexual act.

A woman who does not physically resist to the act of penetration shall not by the reason only of that fact, be regarded as consenting to the sexual activity.

34. Presumption of Absence of Consent-- Section 114A, Indian Evidence Act 1872

In State of Karnataka v Mahabaleshwar Surya Naik ,[13] the Supreme Court went to the extent of laying down that even if the victim of rape is not available to give evidence on account of her having committed suicide, the prosecution case cannot be thrown overboard. In such a case, the non-availability of the victim will not be fatal and the court can base conviction on the basis of the available evidence brought on record by the prosecution.

In spite of the decision of the Supreme Court that (depending upon the circumstances of the case) corroboration of the prosecutrix was not necessary, the cases continued to end in acquittal on account of mishandling of the crime by the police and the invocation of the theory of 'consent' by the courts who tried the offence. To overcome this difficulty, the legislature intervened and introduced s 114A in the Evidence Act 1872 reading as under:

> S. 114-A . Presumption as to absence of consent in certain prosecution for rape.--In a prosecution for rape under clause (a), clause (b), clause (c), clause (d), clause (e), clause (f), clause (g), clause (h), clause (i), clause (j), clause (k), clause (l), clause (m) or clause (n) of sub-section (2) of section 376 of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860), where sexual intercourse by the accused is proved and the question is whether it was without the consent of the woman alleged to have been raped and such woman states in her evidence before the court that she did not consent, the court shall presume that she did not consent.
> Explanation.--In this section "sexual intercourse" shall mean any of the acts mentioned in clauses (a) to (d) of section 375 of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860)."

A bare perusal of s 114A of the Evidence Act 1872 shows that in a prosecution for rape under cll (a)-(n) of sub-s (2) of s 376 of the IPC, where sexual intercourse by the accused is proved and the woman alleged to have been raped states that she did not consent, the court shall presume she did not consent.

Section 114A of the Evidence Act enables a court to raise a presumption that the woman who was the victim of rape had not consented and that the offence was committed against her will. The situation, however, has hardly improved. Conviction3108 rates for rape are still lower than any other major crime and the woman continue to argue even today that in rape cases the victimised women, rather than the rapists, were put on trial. A large number of women still fail to report rapes to the police because they fear embarrassing and insensitive treatment by the doctors, the law enforcement personnel and/or the cross examining defence attorneys. The fear has to be allayed from the minds of women so that if and when this crime is committed, the victim may promptly report the matter to the police and on a charge sheet being submitted, the trial may proceed speedily without causing any embarrassment to the prosecutrix who may come in without fear psychosis.[14]

It may further be stated here that the presumption about want of consent under s 114A is not conclusive. Evidence may still be given to disprove it. But in the absence of any evidence of disproof, there is no option with the court but to raise a presumption about non-consent if circumstances for raising the presumption under s 114A exist.[15]

35. Fear of Death or Hurt--Meaning

'Fear of death or of hurt' means fear of the death of a human being under s 46, or fear of bodily pain, disease or infirmity (s 319). There is nothing to limit the death or hurt to the woman herself. A ruffian who waylaid a woman carrying an infant, and, by reason of threats to strangle or injure the infant, obtained the woman's consent to sexual intercourse, which followed accordingly, would be guilty of rape.

The clause does not say in terms from whom the fear of death or of hurt should proceed. The provisions of s 90 indicate that it may proceed from the accused, but he may not be the direct cause of the fear as when he employs others for the purpose of overcoming the woman's resistance, whatever the methods employed by the others. A consent, produced by fear of injury as when a constable takes on a woman unaware while she is asleep in a room and the chowkidar keeps the door of the room closed to prevent all attempt at rescue, it does not relieve the act of sexual intercourse of criminality, and the act constitutes rape.[16]

36. Explanation [under Old Section]

For assistance in the disposal of the pending cases, the commentary below under the old s 375 has been retained.

Penetration is the sine qua non for an offence of rape. In order to constitute penetration, there must be evidence clear and cogent to prove that some part of the virile member of the accused was within the labia of the pudendum of the woman, no matter how little.[17] It is well-known in the medical world that the examination of smegma loses all importance after 24 hours of the performance of the sexual intercourse.[18] In rape cases, if the gland of the male organ is covered by smegma, it negatives the possibility of recent complete penetration. If the accused is not3109 circumcised, the existence of smegma round the corona gland is proof against penetration, since it is rubbed off during the act. The smegma accumulates if no bath is taken within twenty four hours. The rupture of hymen is by no means necessary to constitute the offence of rape. Even a slight penetration in the vulva is sufficient to constitute the offence of rape and rupture of the hymen is not necessary. The statute merely requires evidence of penetration, and this may occur with the hymen remaining intact. The actus reus is complete with penetration. It is well settled that the prosecutrix cannot be considered as accomplice and, therefore, her testimony cannot be equated with that of an accomplice in an offence of rape. In examination of genital organs, state of hymen offers the most reliable clue. While examining the hymen, certain anatomical characteristics should be remembered before assigning any significance to the findings. The shape and the texture of the hymen is
