TEHRAN — For the third consecutive day, Israel and Iran exchanged missile and drone strikes, escalating a conflict that has raised international concerns and prompted urgent calls for restraint and a return to diplomatic dialogue.

On Sunday, the Israeli military launched new airstrikes on southern Iran, targeting an electronics facility known as Sayran in Shiraz, which is owned by the Ministry of Defense.

According to Iranian state media, strikes also hit a Defense Ministry complex in Isfahan. The Israeli army issued warnings to residents living near Iranian nuclear sites to evacuate.

In retaliation, Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) carried out fresh missile and drone attacks on Tel Aviv and surrounding areas, including direct hits on the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot and several locations in Bat Yam.

The IRGC said it deployed the Haj Qasem solid-fuel tactical guided missile in its strikes and claimed to have hit Israeli energy infrastructure and jet fuel production facilities.

The Revolutionary Guards warned that future attacks "will be more severe" if Israel's aggression continues.

Israeli police confirmed widespread damage in Bat Yam, where a power outage was reported and 61 buildings were damaged, according to the city's mayor.
