Start!

Look into my eyes

This activity will build your student's trust and they will connect with each other. It goes like this: they have to be set in pairs and then stare at the eyes of their partner for a whole minute. They might not like it at first, but it will be very enriching for their relationships.

60'

Time is running out!

Greetings, your majesty

Take a chair

Take one student and sit them facing away from the rest of their classmates

Close your eyes

This student has to close their eyes and the rest must stand behind them

Say "Hi!"

Now, the students say "Greetings, your majesty" imitating different voices

Who said it?

After that, the student in the chair must guess who the speakers were

Rock, paper, scissors tag

Start!

Rock, paper, scissors tag

Two teams!

For this game, you need a lot of room: your students must run freely! First, establish a base for each team.

Shoot!

The teams choose rock, paper or scissors and will play against each other at your signal.

Run!

The winners will chase the opponent team and try to tag them while the losers run back to their base.

Birthday line up

With this activity you'll foster communication between students. They have to line up depending on their birthdays: the younger come first, then the older. This might take a while.

The goal is for them to communicate and develop number sense. They need to figure out who comes after who only by asking the person next to them. It'll be fun!
